Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from the Rosetown area and is signed by 29 of my constituents, I believe primarily from the Rosetown Alliance Church.

They draw to the attention of the House that whereas the majority of Canadians are law-abiding citizens who respect the law and respect the sanctity of human life, and whereas the majority of Canadians believe that physicians in Canada should be working to save lives and not to end them, they pray that Parliament ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

I concur with both of these petitions.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present four petitions today on behalf of my constituents.

The first one is rather timely. The petitioners request that Parliament support laws that severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime, support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions and recognize and protect the right of law-abiding citizens to only use recreational firearms, and support legislation which will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety and have proven not to be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex so as to be ineffective or unenforceable.

There are 125 signatures which support that petition.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions that call upon Parliament to review the Young Offenders Act in an open and accountable process which addresses the following principles: deterrence of the offender, accountability of the offender and the rights of the victim.

I support these petitions.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions dealing with various subjects that I would like to table before Parliament today pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first is from a large number of constituents who want to prevail upon Parliament to respect human life and not to sanction euthanasia.

SAME SEX RELATIONSHIPS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition concerns the issue of same sex relationships.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition deals with the Young Offenders Act.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the Young Offenders Act to reflect the changing character of young offenders by increasing the maximum penalty for first and second degree murder from five to ten years, allowing the publication of the young offender's name after a second indictable offence and lowering the age limits that define a young offender to include those children between the ages of 10 and 15.

SEALS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the last petition has to do with the question of the relationship between the decline in the groundfish population in Atlantic Canada and the burgeoning seal population and calls upon Parliament to urge the federal government to recognize the opportunity presented by the huge seal populations and designate herds for uses to viable entrepreneurial resources.

MR. TRAN TRIEU QUAN

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis-Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents, Tran Trieu Quan, has now been in prison in Vietnam for nearly a year. Your petitioners call upon Parliament to take action as soon as possible in order to obtain the release of Mr. Quan, a request I fully support.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 118 and 120.

[Text]

Question No. 118—Mr. Penson:

How many business people accompanied the Prime Minister to China; what were the criteria for choosing these people; how many of these people had part of their trip paid for by the Canadian government; and what was the total amount of federal government assistance to business people on the trip?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): The Team Canada delegation was comprised of approximately 450 representatives of over 250 companies. Participation was open to all Canadian companies on a first come, first served basis. No members of the business delegation had any part of their trip paid for by the federal government.

Question No. 120—Mr. Penson:

Which memorandums of understanding were signed in China, and what promises were made of possible federal government financing or other assistance if these should result in firm sales?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): For a complete list of memorandums of understanding, please refer to the answer to question No. 119 tabled this day. No promises of possible federal government financing were made in support of potential firm sales.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 119 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 119 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Question No. 119—Mr. Penson:

Which Canadian companies signed firm deals in China, what was the total dollar amount for these deals, and what was the extent and source of federal government financing to make these deals possible?

(Return tabled.)

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—DEFICIT ELIMINATION

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.) moved:

That this House urge the government to respond to the demands of Canadians for decisive spending cuts and no net tax-increases to eliminate the deficit and to produce a smaller federal government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as one of Reform's co-critics for finance, I have the honour to lead today's debate of this resolution. I will discuss its importance by drawing on my background as an economist and a long time teacher of international finance courses.

A number of my colleagues later in the day will expand on the theme in the light of their roles as Reform critics of different ministries. All of our remarks reflect consultations with constituents through personal and town hall meetings, electronic media consultations and the return of questionnaires.

As a preliminary, let me note that Reformers do not enjoy our role as advocates for spending cuts and a smaller government. The government's involvement in the affairs of Canadians is so pervasive that few of us, our families or friends will escape the effects of such cuts.

As a professor, I am personally concerned about their effects on higher education, my own future and that of my friends and colleagues. We all dislike it when changes in government policies force us to alter our habits and way of life. Reformers therefore appreciate very much the personal difficulties which these cuts will bring. We know these difficulties will seem puny in relation to those that will be forced upon Canadians if we do not get our fiscal house in order on our own terms.

Consider what may happen to the exchange rate, interest rates and Canada's foreign position if the forthcoming Liberal budget does not satisfy both Canadian and foreign investors. Investors sell Canadian government bonds and move their money into some other governments' bonds, be they American, German or Japanese. Such sales depress bond prices and increase interest rates, sending the Canadian dollar on a downward slide.

How far will these adverse developments go? No one knows. There is no doubt that at some interest rate high enough and exchange rate low enough, investors will once more purchase Canadian bonds and dollars and the slide will be halted.

It is often said that rationality or real economic values take a back seat to investors' mass hysteria during such speculative bubbles. Falling values create expectations of further falls. Investors rush to liquidate their holdings before they are worth even less. Some hope to buy them back once the bottom has been hit, expecting quick profits. Others are made to move their money into foreign assets which increase in value at the same time that Canadian asset values fall.

At some point a new class of speculators enters the fray. They hold no Canadian assets but sell Canadian dollars short at today's price in the expectation that they can deliver it a few days later at an even lower price.

Some domestic investors will borrow Canadian dollars and buy foreign currencies. The hot money ready to enter such speculation is so large that no country in the world, certainly not Canada, can stop the slide once it has gathered enough momentum.

Many can understand what goes on during such speculative bubbles. They are likely to have been caught in the fever of buying real estate, gold or similar investments in the past. They will remember how profitable it can be to participate in the exciting events and how difficult it is to resist the herd instinct.

We need only to look at the recent experience of Mexico during the last few months to appreciate what can happen to Canada. The Mexican peso depreciated by over 50 per cent against the U.S. and Canadian dollars before stability was restored and a slow recovery started. Interest rates went sky high.

Canadians had a foretaste of possible developments in the middle of January when a small speculative bubble hit the Canadian dollar. The interest and exchange rates moved by extraordinary amounts in a very short time.

In the case of both countries the dramatic interest and exchange rate changes were halted by the interventions of governments. They bought bonds and currency that were being dumped by investors. They used at first the dollar and gold reserves in the accounts of their own central banks. They then drew on credit with private banks, foreign central banks and international organizations that have been negotiated before. They then went, hat in hand, to arrange new lines of credit, asking other central banks to help them by buying their national currencies.

The Government of Mexico went down very far on this road of using ever more costly sources of intervention. It ended up arranging for huge direct loans and standby credits from foreign governments and international organizations.

The cost of such borrowing is now quite transparent and not just monetary. The U.S. Congress debated loan conditions and came very close to requiring Mexico to adopt very stringent policies.

• (1020)

The important thing is that such loan conditions would have represented an almost unprecedented interference in the domestic economic, social and foreign aid policies of an independent nation state. In the end, President Clinton avoided the imposition of such extreme conditions by the use of administrative devices which bypassed Congress.

It is not clear that Congress will let presidents use these devices in the future. The American people and their elected representatives are in a foul mood when it comes to bailing out foreign governments which have what they consider to be inappropriate social and economic policies.

Reformers are not willing to gamble on any of these eventualities. Our first objective as a country must be to never be placed in a predicament like that experienced by Mexico. We want to retain Canada's sovereignty over its economic and social policies.

In the middle of January Canada came very close to the point where we too had to go hat in hand to foreign lenders. As some put it, we came very close to hitting the wall. An economist who watched the tickers flashing interest rates and exchange rates dropping by the minute suggested to me that the situation was saved this time by massive intervention of the G–7 central banks. He is worried that we may not be so lucky the next time or that we can escape really burdensome loan conditions.

The next time may well be in the wake of the upcoming budget, not immediately but when some other event upsets investors. That may be a few days, weeks or even months later.

Investors will look for four major policies in the budget. The finance minister had better not goof.

First, investors will look for tax increases. Individual Canadians oppose tax increases because they feel overtaxed and want a smaller government for understandable personal reasons. Investors would interpret tax increases as a signal that the government does not have the courage to make the spending cuts needed to eliminate the deficit.

Higher taxes mean eventually a bigger government, one which during the last 30 years has grown but has not solved and instead has increased the problems of slow economic growth, increased poverty and unemployment, the breakup of families and which to boot, has created frighteningly large and persistent deficits. It is big government which has created among Canadians the pervasive sense that their and their children's lives are getting worse, not better.

Second, investors will look for cuts to social spending. Social spending programs broadly defined use about $70 billion or 60 per cent of the federal program spending of $120 billion. The current deficit of $38 billion cannot possibly be eliminated through cuts in non–social spending even in the face of rapid growth in revenue during the current boom without a threat to essential efficiency increasing government services.

Past governments have lacked the courage to tackle social spending. That is why the fiscal situation has deteriorated to the present cliffhanger. I predict very confidently that if the upcoming budget does not contain hard–nosed cuts to social spending, investors will be very unhappy. They will point with some justification to a lost opportunity since most Canadians are ready for such cuts.

In addition, it is now official. The OECD noted in a recent report that Canada's social programs are an outstanding example of excessive generosity.

Third, investors will look for a plan for the complete elimination of the deficit during the current economic boom. The Liberal red book target of $25 billion two years from now has been criticized roundly by many experts. It implies an increase in the federal debt by $100 billion or 20 per cent of the $500 billion during the first years of Liberal rule.

• (1025)

Like the Conservatives during the 1980s, the Liberals will find that the debt will cease to grow as a percentage of national income during the upswing if they achieve their deficit target. But this is a hollow victory because the cause of the debt will resume the moment the economy slows down again as inevitably it will.

Predictions are that this may well happen before the end of the present election cycle. Few expect decisive spending cuts during the last two years before the next election. Therefore, one of the crucial aspects of the budget that investors will study is whether and by how much spending cuts go beyond the $25 billion deficit target in two years.

They will also look for further plans for deficit reduction beyond the last fiscal year covered in the budget. Will the Minister of Finance have the backing of cabinet and the Prime Minister to plan for further cuts in the future?

Fourth, I believe that investors will look to the budget for one other important subject. They will look for evidence that the government has accepted certain radically different ideas about the causes of unemployment which have moved out of conservative think tanks and are now discussed freely by the Auditor General, the OECD and many academics.

According to these ideas Canada's high and persistent unemployment rates are caused to a considerable degree by the generous social programs themselves. The unfortunate but unavoidable reality is that Canada once had the choice of having high unemployment rates and generous UIC and welfare benefits as a matter of deliberate public preference. That choice has disappeared with the debt, deficit and slow growth of the last decade.

These are harsh messages for a Liberal government to accept, which on these matters is caught in its own rhetoric. Investors are watching to see if the Liberals can live up to their reputation as the ultimate non–dogmatic pragmatists.

Let me close by suggesting that Reformers have listened to the public and to investors. Our own alternative budget will reflect what we have heard. It will outline steps we would be prepared to take in order to address the four issues crucial for investor confidence and most thoughtful Canadians.

My colleagues speaking after me will elaborate on some of these matters without revealing too much about our specific recommendations. We invite the Liberals to present a budget which will take the news out of the policies on these matters we will propose very soon.

After this gloom and doom, a few words of hope. Once Canadians have gone through three years and deal with the necessary deliberate and thoughtful spending cuts, there is a light at the end of the tunnel.

Such cuts will restore investor and consumer confidence. The economic boom will be fueled and expanded. Economic growth will return to the high levels we have not seen since the pervasive government intrusion of the last three decades.

In a few short years after the budget is balanced there is a prospect of tax reduction, a smaller debt, or both. Mild, short run pain will not only avoid catastrophic pain in the intermediate term, it will also bring large and important gains in what in retrospect will seem like a very short time of sacrifice.

We hope the Liberals will hear this message, not because we want to be right, but because it is right for Canada.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to remind the House of the fiscal commitment and philosophy that will frame our government's upcoming budget. I believe this debate should also include some plan and some plain, positive talk about the Canadian economy and outlook.

This Reform motion cites "the demand by Canadians to cut spending and hold the line on taxes to eliminate the deficit and produce a smaller federal government". Our government does not need this grandstanding motion or any of the stage managed events of a publicity starved party to be deeply aware of what Canadians want.

Starting last October, we put in place the most extensive and most public consultation process in budget history. In my view, these consultations prove that Canadians have a more profound and positive understanding of the budget challenge than the simplistic slash and trash approach of the Reform Party.

[Translation]

In fact, Canadians have identified priorities that are realistic and require a great deal of effort. They want a strategy for phase two, based on last year's budget, to get Canada out of this vicious circle of deficit and debt.

However, the vast majority of Canadians also want the budget measures to meet other essential criteria. They have made it clear that they agree with the principles set forth last fall by the Minister of Finance.

First of all, deficit reduction must be an essential part of a strategy to create jobs through economic growth. Second, fairness is paramount, to ensure that the most vulnerable in our society are not left behind. Third, deficit reduction measures must be based on reasoned choices and reflect clear–cut priorities. Fourth, we must use taxpayers' money wisely. And finally, budgetary actions should focus on reductions in expenditures, as opposed to raising revenues.

[English]

The Canadians I have heard from want a lean government but not a mean government. They want a budget that builds market confidence but not one that abandons basic social responsibility. This budget will meet that dynamic challenge.

There is no contradiction here. Our budget will, because we know it must, take the tough action needed to meet the deficit goals we set out last year. As the Prime Minister said in Quebec City last fall, the time to reduce deficits is when the economy is growing. Therefore, now is the time. The economy is growing which is good news for all Canadians.

Let me give members some examples. Canada's growth rate last year was 4.25 per cent, the highest in the G–7. The OECD predicts that Canada will continue to lead the industrial world for the next two years. In the past 12 months, real exports surged over 20 per cent and we continued to set all time records for our country.

A survey by the Conference Board found that 81 per cent of firms planned to maintain or boost investment over the next six months, another record high for our country. That investment means jobs. Since January 1994 the economy has created over 400,000 jobs. All of these are full–time jobs. The unemployment rate is down to single digits for the first time in four years.

This good news does not mean that Canadian economic renewal is permanently secured. We know that. The government knows that cohesive, co–ordinated action is needed on all fronts. We understand that the spearhead for this action agenda must be to restore a healthy fiscal climate.

[Translation]

We all know the price we have to pay today for having let deficits and the debt rise to new heights during the past decades. That price is higher taxes and interest rates, factors that slow down growth.

• (1035)

This government, however, believes that in order to meet the debt challenge successfully, we must first set realistic and credible targets. This means maintaining the deficit reduction momentum we have set in motion, in other words, bringing the deficit down to 3 per cent of GDP in three years. That is exactly what we intend to do, and as the Minister of Finance said, there are no excuses.

The last time we had a deficit level of 3 per cent was in 1974–75. Since then, the deficit has increased steadily and is now close to 6 per cent of GDP.

It should also be said that setting firm deficit reduction objectives is a considerable departure from past policy.

[English]

Canadians and markets lost confidence because they have suffered too many years of rosy, long term promises that became nothing but short term fertilizer.

Instead, we have set out realistic targets and will take the action to deliver bottom line results. Our success here will strengthen credibility for our long term objective, which is eliminating the deficit completely. This strategy is based on fundamental political and public reality.

We believe it is best to set short term targets, concrete milestones and hit them. With short term targets there is no excuse for delay, no acceptable grounds for not taking tough action to address the problem. When unrealistic long term goals are set, reasons can always be found to avoid tough action today and tomorrow and tomorrow after that.

That was the Tory record, the first cousins of today's Reformers, a legacy we refuse to accept. Let me remind the House that we did more than stake out a deficit goal last year. We backed that goal with real bottom line action.

The 1994 budget set out measures to deliver $20 billion in deficit reduction over three years. For every $1 of revenue action there were $5 of spending cuts. No budget in a decade moved so strongly to cut spending. The fact is we have always recognized the need for continued fiscal action. The 1995 budget process started the minute we introduced the 1994 plan.

That is why we combined immediate action with a sweeping series of program reviews of government operations, defence and social security reform. These have set concrete foundations for this year's budget and the tough decisions needed.

We all understand that we have a long way to go but I think we have made a strong start. I am certain that 1995 budget will show all Canadians and markets around the world that the fiscal commitments made by the government are the fiscal commitments kept by the government.

Before concluding my remarks let me comment directly on the so–called demand that today's motion cites for no net tax increases in the upcoming budget. Nobody likes higher taxes. Only a foolhardy politician would think otherwise. That is why cuts in government spending must and will be our priority in reducing the deficit. We proved that last year when we cut spending by $5 for every $1 in revenue measures.

Most Canadians know that to ever bring taxes down and more immediately to ease the pressure on interest rates and the dollar we have to get the debt under control. That can only start by meeting our deficit targets. Given this challenge, I cannot promise that the budget will not include revenue action. If we take it, the focus will be on improving the fairness of the tax system.

• (1040)

Let me challenge those who argue against any tax action. Do they really believe that the tax system right now is completely fair? Do they really believe that there are no loopholes or no unjustified preferences, especially given our fiscal situation? That type of Pollyanna politicking is not what Canadians demand or need at this time.

[Translation]

In concluding, I would like to point out that the motion before the House today refers basically to decisive spending cuts, a refusal to tolerate tax increases, initiatives to reduce the size of government, and all those measures that are part of an effective deficit reduction strategy. In other words, we have here the entire substance of what our government has said it would do. Unfortunately, the opposition in this House has shown once again it is better at spouting clichés than at making proposals of any substance.

[English]

We welcome the opportunity to debate tax issues before the budget, but we wish the opposition would bring some reality to the dilemma facing Canadians and hope that we hear more constructive propositions during this debate.

Mr. Grubel: Mr. Speaker, could you tell me how much time is allocated please?

The Deputy Speaker: It is 10 minutes for questions and comments. The member will appreciate that in error the government was not given a chance to ask questions or make comments about his speech. It was my error and I apologize to the House. It is 10 minutes basically for questions and comments.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I can understand that the hon. parliamentary secretary cannot reveal anything about the forthcoming budget and that he had to stay with generalities.

The basic principles he laid out, I believe 80 per cent of Reformers agree with. The system must be fair, the cuts must be discussed widely. All the principles he set out are so universally accepted that they are almost empty rhetoric.

I was talking about four issues which were raised before the finance committee where the member opposite sat and listened. An overwhelming proportion of witnesses said we must not do these kinds of things. The report that the finance committee came up with did not reflect these recommendations.

As I said in my speech, those recommendations are absolutely crucial to the way in which the investors of the world are likely to react to the forthcoming budget. I hope that the government will not goof in the budget, that it will take the advice of the overwhelming number of witnesses on those four issues. The four issues are that a $25 billion deficit target in two years is insufficient given the length of the business cycle. It is absolutely dangerous during a period of boom when the economy is growing at 3 or 4 percentage points a year to do as little as necessary to get to $25 billion in two years. It will send the wrong signal.

Everyone who studies the budget realizes that the social programs are absorbing such a large proportion of the total that unless we take very tough steps on those, as has been recommended widely by the OECD and the Auditor General, the budget will not be credible.

I raise this matter because early in this session I asked the Minister of Human Resources Development when he presented his plan for social policy reform whether there would be any savings from the reform. He went into a rhetorical flourish and said they will not eliminate the deficit on the backs of poor people.

The world hears this message but the world also knows that we cannot get away without making such cuts. We will be judged very harshly, especially in light of the fact that we probably have the most generous social security net in the world and in the light of the fact that it is now increasingly recognized that it was a noble experiment. When we are generous we also create dependence and increase unemployment as unwanted side effects.

The world will look for a message on what the government thinks about the cause of our persistently high unemployment rate. For years, for decades, American and Canadian unemployment rates moved in unison. They diverged by very little until the middle seventies when Canada increased the generosity of her social programs. Since then the Americans, who are at the same level of economic prosperity as we are in the business cycle, have had unemployment rates below 6 per cent. We are at around 10 per cent. In Canada 4 per cent of the labour force is unemployed, yet there is no explanation for it. If the deficit could eliminate it, if large exports could eliminate it, if low interest rates could have eliminated it a few years ago, it would have happened. It is not just me who is saying this. The cause is somewhere else.

Unless the government addresses these issues investors will be very unhappy. The probability is that the need for reform and for tough measures on all these issues will not come after deliberate consideration in the House or in committee. It will be imposed by governments and international organizations we have to go to in order to get money to stabilize our exchange rate and interest rate.

It is not a happy picture. We do not enjoy talking about these things. I appreciate the hon. member cannot say more about it, but the generalities that we heard again today are not the way to go. I appreciate the opportunity to share these thoughts with the House and the people of Canada.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to know where to begin. It is obvious that the rough edges of his speech were left for the comments period and not for his actual speech. In his speech he kept himself on track and was quite reasonable, but when he stood on comments he began to get a bit sidetracked as to what the budget process was all about.

The committee very carefully listened to witnesses. We were very careful in our own presentation to reflect the interest of Canadians. We can talk about majorities and what the majority said, but we also have in this country a respect for the minority. Groups that appeared before us were very concerned about the programs that were being presented. They asked us to protect the programs.

The job of a government is not only to get on the high horse of a protest movement. It is also very much to bring into focus what a government should be doing in these very difficult times.

I would argue that the approach taken by the majority report was a reasonable approach. We asked the finance minister to go further than he was originally intending to go. Then in January there were increased interest rates and difficulty with the dollar. I believe it is now accepted that actions will have to be as dramatic as they can possibly be.

The opposition critic vacillates between two important points in this debate: between Canadians they are encouraging to fight against a tax increase and international markets that want to be reassured we have our house in order.

If we ask somebody in New York who is concerned about the Canadian budget whether there should be any tax increases, he would argue that we should do anything to get to our target. He would say: "If you are really concerned about what I think, do what you have to do. If it means tax increases, do it and get to your target". Then the Reformers go back to Calgary and say: "Tell them not to raise taxes". The whole strategy is made vulnerable because they are playing a double game and they know they are playing a double game. Somebody on the floor of the House of Commons should call them on that.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the member has difficulty with his hearing. I was in Toronto last week on Wednesday night. There were well over 2,000 people jammed into the Sheraton Centre who gave a very clear message, and I am delivering it to the House: No tax increase.

I wonder if he could help us understand how it is Liberals do not understand that message when there are rally after rally, grassroots organizations after grassroots organizations, buttons, petitions and everything else. The Liberals are not listening. Why?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, if my hearing is bad, perhaps his eyesight is also bad. Did he see the 5,000 people in Montreal who were worried about their futures?

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to be part of a discussion where people call each other deaf and blind. I am grateful for the chance our colleagues in the Reform Party have given us to discuss the government's budget and, in particular, the appropriateness of keeping taxes and income taxes at their present level in the Minister of Finance's upcoming budget.

I will say right off that the Bloc Quebecois supports the Reform Party's statement that increasing taxes and income tax at the present time, as the Minister of Finance himself acknowledged when he appeared before the finance committee in October, would kill the Canadian economy. It would put a strangle hold on job creation opportunities in the short term and before Canada enters a new period of slowing down, following the economic slowdown in the United States.

Thus I say straight off that we support the Reform Party's proposal that the upcoming budget contain no general increase in income tax, as the Liberal majority on the finance committee suggested in December, and no additional taxes. Taxes and income tax also have an effect on the black market economy, the underground economy. The Minister of Finance himself estimated it represented between 10 and 15 per cent of Canada's GDP. This is a lot and it is the direct result of the excessively high level of taxes and income tax in Canada.

Having said this, we have not forgotten that the budgetary situation of the Canadian government is critical, that the budgetary situation of the governments, as well, in Canada is one of the worst among industrialized countries. The federal debt alone, at $558 billion, represents over 80 per cent of the GDP. This is almost a world record. If we add the provincial debts, the figure increases from 80 per cent of the GDP to 115 per cent of the GDP. A catastrophe.

Another catastrophe, in terms of Canadian public finances, is the high proportion of Canadian securities in the hands of foreigners—43 per cent. This means we have a lot less control over our economic destiny and, in addition the capacity our governments have to act in budgetary or other areas is jeopardized.

In regard to this long-standing situation—it has existed for some ten years—we knew we would find ourselves sooner or later in a catastrophic situation such as the present one. In spite of this, the Minister of Finance gave himself a break of nearly a year and a half. The Minister of Finance has done nothing since assuming his position. The Minister of Finance has done nothing but present a first budget which hurt the most vulnerable, a budget which cut $7.5 billion from unemployment insurance programs but, in the end, solved nothing because in financial circles, both in Canada and abroad, the measures were not viewed as truly serious measures to correct the budget situation in Canada.

In fact, in May 1994, a mere three months after the first budget was brought down by the Minister of Finance, the C.D. Howe Institute was already forecasting additional cuts beyond those mentioned in the minister's budget, additional cuts of $7 billion over two years to allow the Minister of Finance to achieve his goal of a federal deficit of $25 billion for 1996–97, that is 3 per cent of GDP.

In his economic statement of last October—just to give members an example of the seriousness or, to be more precise, the lack thereof, and laziness on the part of the Minister of Finance—the minister estimated that costs would have to be cut not by $7 billion, as the C.D. Howe Institute indicated, but by more than $9 billion. And since January, precisely because of the lack of serious intent on the part of the Minister of Finance, his inability to take truly corrective measures and immediate action, we are now facing necessary cuts estimated at between $12 and $16 billion over the next two years because of variable interest rates. Over a seven month period, forecasts were changed four times as pertains to required cuts or new revenues if the Canadian government is to meet its goal of reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP as established by the Minister of Finance.

And people wonder why things are not going well. People wonder why they still do not know what the federal government is doing to correct the situation. This is what happens when nothing is done for a year and a half, when financial circles tell us for a year and a half, with increasing urgency, that nothing is being done to correct the situation: panic sets in. And at present, we are seeing total panic from the Liberal government. They do not really know where to go from here. They are making proposals left and right. They have been sending test balloons out over the last two or three months, but have failed to do what was needed for a year and a half.

I would even say that not only is the official opposition awaiting the Minister of Finance's next budget, but also the entire international community. Indeed, all foreign investors who hold Canadian debt securities are getting ready to pounce on the Minister of Finance.

The next budget needs to be a budget that clearly shows that a structural reform is taking place, that measures are being taken, not just haphazard measures but serious corrective measures. Not just superficial cuts, cuts concealing the true catastrophic state of our public finances, but real cuts, airtight fiscal measures that will not only permit the Minister of Finance to brag, and pat himself on the back for, reaching his goal of bringing the deficit down to three per cent of GDP in 1996–97, we will come back to this later, but real proof that the Minister of Finance has gotten public finances under control. This is what financial circles are expecting.

And let me tell you that if they are not convinced that this and the 1996–97 budgets contain serious corrective measures and take at least some strain off the public finances, since that is the heart of the problem, I would say that they are going to demand risk premiums, like they did in January and May 1994. In addition to the regular return they receive on Canadian debt securities, they will demand that an additional percentage be tacked on to compensate for the absolutely decrepit state of Canada's public finances and for the Minister of Finance's lack of action, other than his stand–up comedy act, to really correct the situation.

I would argue that people are a little tired of hearing the government and its representatives tell us every day that they will achieve their goal of reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP.

I will make two comments on this. First, if they want to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by continuing to slash social programs enthusiastically, they are on the wrong track. People are fed up with this government's hypocrisy. They are fed up with the red book telling them that they will be protected against underemployment or other social problems they may face and with a government that has been doing exactly the opposite in the past year.

The government has cut UI and stopped contributing to the UI fund. It is raising the spectre of additional cuts in transfers for social assistance, post–secondary education and even pensions. They have been talking about it on that side of the House for about six months. People are fed up with the Liberals' actions, which are not consistent with the reasons they were elected in October 1993.

Second, let me reiterate that even if the government managed to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by 1996–97, it would not solve anything, and that is a little indecent. They tell us every day that they will reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP and solve everything, but that will not solve anything. In 1996–97, we will still be saddled with a $25 billion deficit and, most importantly, with a debt approaching $625 billion. So they are not solving the problem. They are behaving like a government that only cares about being re–elected in three years.

From a structural point of view, they are not solving the federal debt problem at all. With a $625 billion debt, the problem will be just as serious in 1996–97 as it is today; the public finance crisis will be as serious as it is today. That is, in my opinion, Canada's biggest problem. There are other problems but that is the biggest one.

Despite the gravity of the problem, this government, which bragged during the election campaign of wanting to create as many jobs as possible, is doing, in my opinion, the opposite of what it should be doing as a result of its attitude toward public finance.

The debt is so big that going after domestic savings to periodically finance part of this debt pushes up interest rates. Interest rates are going up in this country. The Minister of Finance has lost his credibility with international investors, who are demanding higher yields, and this is also putting upward pressure on interest rates, which in turn affects our national interest rates.

If you happen to be an investor and want to invest money and create jobs, you will invest less and create fewer jobs because of high interest rates due to the pressure of the debt on the Canadian economy, the so–called crowding out effect, and it will not be any different in 1996–97. This jeopardizes our chances of experiencing a really strong economic recovery with substantial job creation.

When we consider how job creation has evolved during the past two and half years since the end of the recession, or at least its end in technical terms, it should come as no surprise that in Canada we are still about 800,000 jobs short of reaching the same labour force participation rate that existed before the first quarter of 1990 or before the recession began. And this is all because of the federal debt.

Even the Department of Finance has calculated that structural unemployment is at 8.5 per cent, in Canada, because of the size of the debt. Even with an economy that is doing well, even when the circumstances for job creation are ideal, the unemployment rate is around 8.5 per cent because of the size of the debt and the pressure of the debt on the economy, and the situation will not change until the structural problems besetting Canada's public finances have been solved.

That is the situation, and I do not think there is any reason for members on the other side to be proud of what the Minister of Finance has accomplished in one year. If I were the minister, I would be ashamed, and if I were the government, I would be even more so.

In any case, and I have a few minutes left, the official opposition wanted to make its own contribution last October when the Minister of Finance appeared before the committee, and we repeated our suggestions last December when the Liberal majority tabled its report on pre–budget consultations. We wanted to make a short–term contribution that would at least reduce the impact of the deficit and give the Minister of Finance a chance to brag that he would hit his 3 per cent of GDP target. We wanted to submit recommendations as an alternative to the drastic cuts in social programs which the government has made and plans to continue.

We made ten recommendations, and I will mention the first eight, which are the most important ones. The first one, and I want the Secretary of State for Finance to listen very carefully, because although his minister realizes we made recommendations, he himself insists we never did, or maybe he cannot read and in that case, he should learn or at least find out about the recommendations enclosed with the report tabled by the Finance Committee last December.

The first recommendation we submitted to the Minister of Finance, to help him be on target with his deficit of 3 per cent of GDP in 1996–97, was that the federal government should withdraw altogether from areas under provincial jurisdiction. For Quebec alone, this means a savings of $2 to $3 billion a year by eliminating overlap, duplication and redundant administration.

The second recommendation we made to the Minister of Finance—and we are still waiting for him and his team to analyse these recommendations—is that we stop giving subsidies to business, which, last year, amounted to $3.3 billion and which are, more often than not, a form of patronage for friends of the Liberal Party of Canada rather than real support to business in meeting the challenges of globalization. Here then is $3 billion; a big savings in reaching the goal of reducing the federal deficit to 3 per cent of the GDP in 1996–97.

The third recommendation we made to the Minister of Finance, and we continue to stand by it, was to make a further cut of at least $1.6 billion in the national defence budget. This would have meant a 25 per cent cut in the defence budget over the past two years. This corresponds to the analysis we made during the electoral campaign. We held that, even with a 25 per cent budget cut, national defence could retain its past and present efficiency in a world of reduced international tensions.

The fourth recommendation, and we still make this recommendation to the federal government, which claims to want to avoid white elephants and wastage, is that, if it wants to maintain some credibility, it withdraw from the Hibernia project, which has already absorbed some $3 billion with no promise of producing any profits within the next twenty years. If this government wants to do something other than playing politics, if it wants to be taken seriously, it must withdraw from the Hibernia project.

The fifth recommendation, one we have been making for a long time—but I think the Liberal government lacks transparency—is for a complete review of the taxation system. Complete, from A to Z, including the 16 tax treaties signed between Canada and several countries which are, in fact, regarded as tax havens. Businesses can claim operating losses abroad, repatriate these losses, though they are fictitious losses, and deduct them from their Canadian income to avoid paying taxes. That too is a major problem, and will become an even bigger one if allowed to continue.

We had also asked, in the context of this taxation review, that the privileges associated with family trusts be eliminated. Shortly before adjournment, we made a motion in the finance committee which was readily defeated by Liberals and Reformers. Why? Because it affected privileges enjoyed by their buddies, the wealthiest of Canadians, who avoid taxes year after year by paying no tax on capital gains or on personal fortunes valued at several hundred million if not several billion dollars. We cannot quote the precise figure because, although the Minister of Finance is ostensibly in favour of transparency, his department does not want to conduct the studies necessary to determine the true value of these tax loopholes.

The seventh recommendation would be to impose a true minimum tax on corporate profits. Not with the aim of adding to their tax burden, but because several thousand companies have paid no taxes in the last ten years. We must be sure, at least, that they are escaping taxes because of their specific production conditions and product–process cycles and not because they have hired tax experts to save money by not paying Canadian taxes.

The eighth recommendation is one of the most important. I was saving it for the end. The auditor general even made the same recommendation, in his last report, regarding the $6.6 billion that Canadians owe in unpaid income taxes. These are not amounts in dispute, but simply money owed to the federal government that has remained uncollected due to the government's lax approach and failure to allot the resources necessary to recover these amounts. The auditor general's own opinion is that 80 per cent of the amount owed, more than $5 billion, could be recovered if only enough resources were available for the task.

In conclusion, we too are not in favour of new general taxes, as was recommended in the Liberal majority reports from the finance committee, but at the same time, we recommend that the government find ways to improve, even in the slightest way, the state of Canada's public finances, at least on the short term, because we have very serious longer term problems.

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance I have a few comments I would like to make to the member opposite—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member cannot make comments on behalf of another member. He has to speak on his own behalf, not on behalf of someone else.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that correction. Canadians might have a little sympathy for the government after seeing this spectacle of members opposite saying no taxes, while the opposition was saying through the last speaker no cuts and maybe we should have tax increases.

What bothers me particularly about the last comments from the opposition critic are the internal consistencies in his very statement. Those members speak often about logic, yet I hear them say: "We recommended a whole host of cuts. On one hand, cut national defence spending but of course not in Quebec. Cut Hibernia but help out MIL Davie", which we heard much about in the months leading up to the Christmas recess.

There were other thoughts about family trusts. The comments on family trusts, as in the minority report they proposed, reflect a complete misunderstanding of the role of trusts in Canada and the importance of family trusts to family businesses, to small businesses, to families; completely misrepresenting the importance and reality of trusts. In the fullness of time, I have confidence the finance committee will issue a majority report that sets the record straight.

With respect to three per cent and the three per cent figure, on one hand we have members opposite saying that it is not enough. On the other hand we get criticized by the opposition critic for adjusting our outlook to take into account the real world, reality, and to make sure we get there.

When we meet that target it will be the first time in a long time that we have met a target in the right direction. It will go a great distance toward restoring the credibility that members opposite suggest is lacking in financial markets and go a great way toward restoring the confidence we should have in our ability to solve our problems.

[Translation]

Mr. Loubier: Mr. Speaker, absolutely, I have a reply for my colleague, a reply to his three questions. Regarding inconsistency, because we are proposing cuts at the same time as we are asking for an increase in the national defence budget in Quebec, I would say that if there is any inconsistency, it is on the other side, not here. We have always been consistent with ourselves, with our option and, above all, with our analysis of the situation.

At the present time, 17.4 per cent of national defence spending takes place in Quebec. We represent very close to a quarter of the population, or, if you consider it in terms of taxes paid, we pay almost 23 per cent of the taxes collected by the federal government, but we receive only 17.4 per cent of the spending. This means that there are others receiving more than they should in terms of population or in terms of their contribution to the federal coffers.

What we have always said is that cuts should be across the board, but with an adjustment for Quebec. This is what happens in the case of agriculture, it is what happens in most areas. So, that dispenses with the first inconsistency.

The second point was family trusts. My colleague claims that I have no idea of the importance of family trusts, but neither does he. And do you know why? Because we repeatedly asked the Finance Committee, senior officials in the finance department, the finance minister, the revenue minister, and senior officials in the revenue department to provide us with an exhaustive evaluation of how much money is in family trusts and the resultant losses in tax revenue to the federal coffers. So he can stop talking about the importance of family trusts, because he is just as much in the dark about them as we are.

We have estimates and are at least trying to give some thought to the magnitude of tax losses resulting from trusts and from tax agreements. My colleague prefers to turn a blind eye to these fiscal inequalities. If we are going to talk about credibility, I would say that the Liberals should look in their own back yard. There has been no sign of credibility for a year and a half now.

[English]

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose two questions to the hon. member who has just spoken in response to the member for St. Paul's.

The first question is with regard to tax increases. The hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot indicated that the Bloc as a party did not want tax increases. Then he went on to say that maybe there are some places where new taxes can be applied.

Is the Bloc Quebecois saying there should be no net tax increases of any kind and that if there is a redistribution because of a change in tax policy, that if there is an increase in revenue in one area, it should be redistributed to other Canadians by way of a tax reduction? Is that the position of the Bloc Quebecois, no tax increases?

I say that in light of some of the other comments and the other observations that I have made in this assembly. When we look at the cafeteria of social programs, unemployment insurance, post–secondary education, old age assistance and also the tax credit with regard to those people over 65, the Bloc did not want to allow or make the change that was recommended in the 1994–95 budget.

If we maintain all of those programs at their current level, how are we going to deal with the deficit and possibly maintain the tax policy that the hon. member recommended to the House?

I would like the hon. member to comment on that first of all. Is his party in favour of no tax increases on a net basis?

Second, with regard to family trusts, I am a member of the finance committee and I have been waiting for some type of a presentation which indicates that there is a major error in family trusts. Is the hon. member asking the finance committee or the government to pass legislation or some mechanism by which it is able to deal with people's private income and private bank accounts to derive what is the composition of a family trust?

[Translation]

Mr. Loubier: Mr. Speaker, in response to the first question on taxes, we do not want the Minister of Finance to raise taxes when he tables his next budget, or the one after that.

However—and I have the feeling my colleague is having trouble reading our recommendations, does not understand them or does not want to understand them—, there are inequities in Canada's current tax system. There are so many inequities, as I demonstrated a little before the House adjourned last December, business taxation in Canada has become so ludicrous that some businesses even sell their unused tax deductions to other businesses. There was a classified advertisement in the newspaper offering a tax loss for sale to businesses that could use it. If you do not find this ludicrous, there is a problem.

What we are saying is that there are loopholes to be closed, inequities to be corrected in our tax system. As a result, we have been recommending for a year and a half that the government undertake a comprehensive review of the tax system.

We already know about the loopholes. The auditor general has already pointed out some of them. He mentioned the 16 tax treaties, saying that there were problems with them because they were often concluded with countries considered to be tax havens, where Canadian businesses open fictitious subsidiaries, report fictitious losses, and manage not to pay what they owe Revenue Canada.

If you want to maintain these inequities, these loopholes, these inconsistencies, while asking Canadian men and women to tighten their belts another notch, there is a problem within the Reform Party although it is not the only problem.

As for family trusts, let me reiterate that the Minister of Finance held out his hand to us by saying that he would let a finance subcommittee look into the matter of family trusts, that it would be given carte blanche, that his officials would visit the committee and do whatever it would ask them to do. It was a monumental farce.

It was even, I would say—no, I will not say it because it would be unparliamentary—but it is a monumental farce. We had four months of regular hearings. We met with officials and experts. Imagine, the Liberal chair told the officials that they did not have to answer the questions. Enough is enough. There is a problem with respect to the relations between the government and senior officials. Senior officials can answer if they feel like it. They never responded to that.

How can we propose specific measures when you and I along with my Liberal colleagues do not know what is happening with family trusts nor how much money we are losing as a result of the tax treaties.

There is a lack of transparency, of understanding, and I think that it has become ridiculous.

[English]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today on this important issue. It is very important that Canadians have access to the facts and to the issues that face us. We are going to be forced in the next budget to make some of the most difficult budgetary decisions that have been made in this Parliament's history, probably the most difficult decisions that we have had to make outside wartime.

As Canadians know, the government inherited a national debt of $500 billion and an annual deficit that had gone up to over $45 billion. As much as we politicians wish we could spend money on people and help people, we can no longer continue at this rate.

If we do not get the deficits down and start to eventually reduce our national debt, we will continue to be even more hostage to the international capital markets whose investors are demanding higher and higher interest rates in order to fund our debt. It is a debt which is so enormous we can no longer fund it out of the pockets and the savings of Canadians alone.

If we do not get the deficit down we will no longer be able to have the economic climate in which we can get lower interest rates, have more investment and create more jobs. Unless we are able to meet the deficit targets that have been set, every one of our social programs will be in jeopardy. We will not much longer be able to go on spending way beyond our means and yet create the type of Canada that all of us want.

It is going to be a difficult task as we go about, over the next two years, of taking maybe $10 billion, $12 billion or even $14 billion in budgetary actions, that is spending and/or tax increases.

One of the things that we must continually bear in mind as we make these difficult decisions and choices is that when social programs are cut, programs designed to protect the most vulnerable in our nation, it must be done with caution, with compassion and with care. For so many Canadians these programs are the only means to security, dignity and opportunity.

In making the difficult decisions that we are called on to make and that we shall make, let us not only remember those who are most in need, but let us also remember that the burden should, to the extent possible, be shared fairly by all Canadians.

We know and the finance committee in its report recognized that Canadians are just about at the ceiling of taxation. Personal income tax rates are very high. When they are combined with the taxes on commodities, the payroll taxes and municipal taxes, Canadians are saying: "We want less. We are prepared to do with less. We cannot afford vastly higher taxes in order to continue the lifestyle to which we have become used".

However, they are also saying to us that when these cuts are made, please be fair. We will be judged, first of all on whether we meet those deficit targets, and we had better meet them, but we will be judged on whether we have done it fairly.

When we cut social programs are we really asking the wealthy in our society to contribute? How are they bearing their fair share when all we are doing is cutting programs? We have $3.1 billion in business subsidies. We want to get rid of all of those as quickly as we can. However realistically our committee looked at these, we said that we probably could not cut more than 36 per cent of those subsidies over the next two years. That will contribute slightly over a billion dollars to deficit reduction. It is not going to be enough.

We may just have to suggest that the very well-off in our society contribute their share to the deficit reduction targets through a few added tax measures. This is why we suggested in our report that we could perhaps ask the large corporations, corporations with capital over $10 million who do not pay taxes because they have losses carried forward or they have capital cost allowances expenditures, to pay just a little bit more. Maybe we could ask Canadians who have huge winnings on lotteries to put 10 per cent or 15 per cent of the winnings toward the deficit reduction. Is it fair to say to wage earners that they will be taxed at 53 per cent or 54 per cent on their wages but that they can make a million dollars in a lottery and not pay any taxes at all?

We recognize our marginal tax rates over the past nine or ten years of Tory government have become less and less progressive. The wealthy in Canada are paying less tax proportionately than the poor and middle income Canadian have been asked to pay.

We suggested that low and middle income Canadians should have their surtax reduced by one percentage point. We think this would introduce an element of fairness. In the overall package that we called for, recognizing that budget cuts must be the prime factor, we said that for about every $9 billion in expenditure cuts we might need about $1 billion in tax increases over the next two years. I do not believe Canadians are going to be reluctant to accept some of the proposed measures, particularly when they are expressed in terms of the fairness we must go about practising when all Canadians are asked to contribute to helping us get out of the mess we are in.

The principle of fairness applies not only to the most disadvantaged of Canadians who need our programs in many cases. This does not mean that we should not reform our programs to help people get off welfare more quickly or to help them rely less on unemployment insurance. After all, we want Canadians want to be working and not be on the dole.

In setting these difficult courses we have to start with ourselves in Parliament. We cannot ask Canadians to make greater sacrifices than we are prepared to make ourselves. This is why the first item of business must be the pensions of members of Parliament before we ask other Canadians to make their sacrifices. This is why we have called in our report for major areas to be cut, namely the $20 billion out of $120 billion in program spending. This $20 billion applies to our government operations, how we conduct our business and how we conduct our affairs. We have said that over two years it should be cut by 12 per cent. In terms of parliamentarians in our own little niche, we have called for a cut of 15 per cent.

I have mentioned business subsidies. We believe we can get rid of most of them over time. There are outstanding commitments that we just cannot break. Therefore we concluded that we had to be practical. About the most we can hope to get rid of over the next two years is 36 per cent. I believe the total amount would be slightly over $1 billion.

We have to bring a new philosophy to how government deals with the private sector. If the only way a private sector enterprise can exist is through government handouts and government grants, it will not be long before we can no longer afford the grants and handouts. Not only that, it is not fair to legitimate operators who do not rely on the dole or do not rely on the deep pockets of government but compete with industries that get these breaks. Not only that. With the new trading regime, the GATT and the NAFTA, we have less and less ability to interfere in this way because subsidies will be subject to countervail.

We are in a new world. We are in a world that many Canadians would not have believed 10 years ago that we would be facing today. The levers of control we had as a national government are no longer there. Whether we like it or not we have to live with the new reality of global competitiveness, international capital flows and international investment.

This will impose upon us new challenges. However one of the challenges cannot be grants to business. That is why we suggested abolishing all outright grants to business. We cannot give business a leg up by way of a loan because our capital markets are not working adequately to supply all small businesses and entrepreneurs with the startup capital they need.

However, if we are to do it, let us do it only on a loan basis. We will lend the money but let us make sure that we have equity in the company. We do not want a one–way street for the public sector such that if the business goes under we lose it. We want to ensure that if the business profits from the investment we make by way of a loan there is an upside for us so that we have money to fund programs and to make them self–funding and self–liquidating.

There are other areas where we have called for cuts. One such area is subsidies. We have about $7.7 billion in subsidies for various crown corporations and others like that. Let us start weaning them from subsidies. Here we have called for a 10 per cent cut. The lowest cut we called for was within the overall package of social programs worth about $40 billion at which the human resources development committee was looking. Because many of these programs go to the most vulnerable in our society we called for cuts of 7 per cent over two years.

There is a number of areas in which the committee did not feel there could be cuts, such as Canada's native people, the Inuit and veterans, people who have a lot of catching up to do because our programs may not be working adequately to bring about the type of social justice they need.

We were also very concerned about the aging population. Many Canadians have not provided for their own retirement needs. Too few Canadians are taking advantage of the very generous tax breaks available to provide for their own retirement. The ideal would be as our population ages that fewer Canadians have to rely on government.

This is a major issue and none of us pretends to have the answer. That is why we suggested before changes were made to retirement provisions, pension plans and RRSPs that we had to take into consideration a number of principles. One is parity between public sector and private sector pensions. Another is the need of those who are self–employed and have to provide for their own retirement through registered retirement savings plans. They need to be able to build a pension fund comparable to those who have been in the private sector and have had long years of contributions to private pension plans.

We also have to look at our public responsibility. Right now we are spending about $15 billion in forgone tax revenues—we can call them tax expenditures or whatever we want—to encourage self–sufficiency during retirement. Before we change this regime we should do so in the context of how we help more and more Canadians provide for a secure and dignified retirement. We are becoming more and more an aging population.

The challenge before us is not an easy one. We have called for getting our deficit down over a two–year period from about $40 billion to about $25 billion. That is about 3 per cent of gross domestic product.

Why is that 3 per cent level important? It is important because with the current growth that is the level where our economy will be growing more quickly than our national debt. That will be the turning point. It will only be one turning point. We will have to go much further in subsequent years. We will have to start at some point paying down a huge national debt that will absorb one–quarter of our national expenditures this year. It takes one–third of every tax dollar paid to the federal government.

I hope we might be able to go slightly beyond the targets. Why? It is because we never know what the economic circumstances will be a few months down the road. We have seen the volatility of interest rates over the last three or four months that make the moderate projections in the papers tabled by the finance minister now seem passé. We are on to a new scenario. We do not know whether it will happen in the future but we must be prepared for it because our credibility depends on at least meeting those targets.

We need a cushion. It is fundamental to have a cushion for an additional reason. Let us admit that we might make mistakes when making cuts that we are not used to doing and we are probably not going to be extremely good at doing. We might unduly prejudice individuals we did not intend to hurt. We might cause pain where it is not deserved. I know we will bring to these people a Liberal spirit of generosity in attempting to undo any harm that was not intended.

Let us approach this tremendous challenge with the spirit of fairness and with the spirit that every Canadian must be called upon to contribute his or her fair share to getting our national resources and our financial picture in shape. Let us not achieve it on the backs of those who are most vulnerable in the country. Let us do it in a spirit of humility that we cannot be right 100 per cent of the time, that we will make mistakes and that we want to hear from Canadians as to where we have made those errors. If that is the case on reflection, let us freely admit that we have made a mistake and rectify it quickly.

By following these principles we can go into the next decades with a much healthier Canada and with a much stronger Canada. We will be able to pass on to succeeding generations what our mothers and fathers have given us: a strong and united Canada.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, before I became involved in politics which was only 15 months ago, I was wondering what was meant by the term code words in politics. I suggest code words are being used by the Liberals.

With due respect to the chairman of the finance committee, when he uses the word "fair" and the phrase "contribute their fair share" what he is really talking about is a further tax increase. Taxes are simply the confiscation of wealth.

• (1145)

It is absolutely outrageous that this government would be compounding the problems created by the Conservatives, particularly with the corporations, that when the corporations have a loss, a no profit year, the government would turn around and confiscate some of their working capital by virtue of the fact that it says they did not make a profit this year, therefore it is going to tax them. It is a simply confiscation of their ability to be able to fund their enterprise. It is absolutely outrageous.

The top 10 per cent of people earning over the $51,000 figure pay 50 per cent of the income taxes. How much fairer can we possibly get? The top 1 per cent who earn over $100,000 pay 15 per cent. How much fairer can we get? Is this not progressive enough?

The reality is that according to well documented and fully accepted statistics, the average tax take on Canadians at all levels of government at this point is 46 cents out of every dollar. How much fairer can we get? Is there any more room in taxation?

Considering that, let us get away from the $51,000 and the $100,000 ranges and talk about the average family income, a joint family income of $46,488. Consider that family spends $17,000 on food, clothing and shelter. However, with all levels of government as a result of past activity of the federal government down loading the taxation to other levels of government, that family with an after tax income of $46,488, $17,000 of which is spent on food, clothing and shelter, has a tax bill of $21,000, which is $4,000 more than it costs to cover food, clothing and shelter.

Does the chairman not believe that there is no more room, no net tax increase, that this is the only position this government can take?

Mr. Peterson: Madam Speaker, I do not believe that for one minute.

There are some inconsistencies here. The hon. member has talked about down loading. That is the concept whereby when we make cuts in program spending or transfers to the provinces, are those services going to be performed at a lower level of government, either the provincial or municipal government?

In some cases those services will not be performed because there is no money available. As the member points out, provinces have increased their taxes in response to certain down loadings that have taken place. Is he saying that we should not be downloading this time? Why are they calling for cuts in transfers—

Mr. Abbott: Provide tax room.

Mr. Peterson: That is to me a great inconsistency. The member has also said that a large corporation with $10 million in capital that is running at a loss position should not have to pay taxes. I agree. However, if the corporation apart from loss carryovers and apart from capital cost allowances is actually experiencing a profitable year in terms of income but not in terms of taxable income, perhaps it could contribute a little more to our deficit reduction. I do not consider that unfair.

If the member is making the point that we are highly taxed, he is right. We cannot argue with this. Canadians realize this. However, this is the party that said no new taxes whatsoever. Then in the next breath it said it will tax the Governor General. In other words, there are no hard and fast absolute rules.

Let us look at each particular tax measure to see if we can afford it, if it would make us non–competitive, if it would have adverse consequences. Let us look at these things with an open mind.

I go back to the fundamental premise. I cannot guarantee that our entire tax system is fair today, that everybody is paying their fair share of taxes. We know that overall we are just about at the limit. We found over two years $1.1 billion in possible net tax increases that we thought might work. Two hundred million dollars out of the proceeds of lotteries; is it unfair that we should have a 10 or 15 per cent tax on $1 million won through a lottery?

Mr. Abbott: Taxing a dream.

Mr. Peterson: The hon. member says it is taxing a dream. We are also taking 15 per cent out of $1 million which was unearned as opposed to taking over 50 per cent out of the pocket of the person who has to toil all day long in order to earn that wage. Is that the concept of fairness?

I hope we do not approach this from an absolute statistic point of view. There may be certain cases in which only tax increases will give rise to that fairness but we face another problem, as the hon. members know. When we cut federal programs we do not often in the first year or in the second year obtain actual savings.

When we close down a military base and put people on the street do we actually save in expenditures when we have to provide for unemployment, severance, reconfiguring the land, getting rid of equipment and materials and things like this? We do not always have savings in the first two years.

I believe our deficit crisis is such that we have to meet our targets that we have set and we have to meet them within the time limit we set. Therefore expenditure cuts alone, while they will produce the savings we need over the longer term, may not work adequately in the first two years. This is why we may need a little tax room on a temporary basis during the first one or two years in order to meet those targets.

I hope that Canadians will keep an open mind when they see the program, when they see the budget that comes down. I hope they will come to the conclusion that the single most important thing we must do is meet our deficit reduction targets.

The second most important priority is how we meet them. If we had to have minor tax adjustments in order to meet those targets, in order to be fair I believe that Canadians would say they do not like them, they may not like the cuts we have imposed but they will judge our overall budget package in terms of all of its aspects; who has been hurt through the cuts, who is hurt through the tax increases, minor as they may be, if there are any. We will be prepared to be judged on the basis of that entire package.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Willowdale.

The hon. member talked about this government's commitment to balancing the budget and he talked about the target of its very weak goal of 3 per cent of GDP in three years.

The interesting thing about that is it is a moving target. It has been much more rapidly moving than economic growth. The government started out talking about $22 billion. Lately the talk has been of $25 billion. It is a rapidly moving target.

The hon. member talked about economic growth and how it has been much higher than what was forecast. The interesting thing is that although economic growth has been much higher than forecasts I have not seen an acceleration in the reduction of the deficit to correspond with this income which was not anticipated.

I would like to ask the hon. member why there has not been a reduction in the three year target to correspond with the unexpected increase in growth.

Mr. Peterson: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to that. All Canadians need an answer.

The member is right. Our growth in Canada has been higher than the norm that was set out, the target that was set out, the standard that was set out in the finance minister's economic analysis. All of us on all sides of the House I believe are pleased that our growth has been this vigorous. It means we are creating more jobs. It means we have unemployment down from over 11 per cent when we took office to under 10 per cent now. This is very encouraging because the reason we have to meet deficit targets is not an abstract study. It is not just because we want the deficit down. It is because we want to help the economy that can create the jobs and the opportunities.

Offside right now in terms of the targets, in spite of excellent growth, the interest rates have gone much higher than we thought. That is the problem and that is one of the reasons we have to meet our targets and get them down. It is one of the main reasons we will.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Because the Chair recognized a Liberal prior to a Reform member, we will be doing two blocks of Reform speakers beginning with the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to give notice to the chair that Reform intends to divide its time from this period forward.

The resolution that we have before us that was placed on the Order Paper by the hon. member for Capilano—Howe Sound makes a very clear point not only to this House but to Canadians that we believe there should be no net tax increases at all used to eliminate the deficit that we face in this country. I think that should be the focus of the debate here today.

Canadians have told us very clearly, as a Reform caucus, that is the message that should be brought to this House. I have found in the last few days that the rate of mail that deals with the matter of taxes has increased significantly. For example, this morning I had 80 letters delivered to my office which sent a clear message that there should be no new taxes or no net tax increase of any kind in the upcoming budget expected at the end of February 1995. I think that is a message we should listen to and not ignore it at all when we are debating this issue.

It is important that this resolution is on the floor here today prior to the finalization of the 1995–96 budget because the minister and the Liberal government must hear a clear message. By debating this supply motion I think the clear message can be presented here on behalf of Canadians.

I want to put into the record a copy of a letter I received that was directed to the finance minister. I have the approval of the author of this letter to make it available in this House if necessary. The letter comes from a resident of my constituency from Magrath, Alberta, Mr. McClung. I thought he put this tax question clearly on the table as a middle income taxpayer of Canada.

He said this to our finance minister as of January 31, 1995: "Sir, I am mad as hell and I am not going to take it any more. Don't raise taxes, cut your spending. If you raise taxes on gasoline I will be forced by you to cut back on my driving. If you raise taxes on milk I will drink water. If you raise taxes on goods and services I will cut back on my purchases of taxed goods and services. If you raise taxes on my income I will be forced by you to again follow the above pattern.

"In my workforce lifetime of 36 years I have seen my take home pay dwindle and my purchasing power of that take home pay dwindle to the extent that I now need a second job in order to pay for my basic needs of shelter, food, clothing and transportation.

"Your suggestion of raising taxes is revolting. It will not fly this time. This is a revolt against higher taxes. Follow the lead from the states in the United States who have raised taxes and achieved the negative revenue increase and from those states who have lowered taxes and have achieved their goal of increased revenues".

His final advice to the minister is this: "Tighten your belt as I have tightened mine". Thousands and thousands of Canadians want that message placed on the floor of the House of Commons prior to the delivery of the 1995–96 budget.

Canadians do not only feel very strongly about taxes not being increased, but they also feel they are not getting value for their dollar. They also feel they are not getting the services nor the results from that dollar that is sent to Ottawa where it is redistributed in a variety of ways.

They asked this very basic question. "Where were our tax dollars being spent? I cannot see any difference, except that I have less left over at the end of the day". They have less in their pockets to spend on their own personal needs. If we look at some of the statistics available to us, that comment is only reinforced and confirmed in many ways.

Canadians today are paying more in taxes but a smaller percentage of these dollars are really being spent on services. In 1961 the average family's tax bill was 22 per cent of the family income. Today in 1994 the average family's tax bill is 46 per cent of that respective income.

I know we have all heard the projection as to how many months of the year we pay taxes to various forms of government. Not too long ago we paid taxes until the month of May. Now we are paying taxes until the month of June and then after the month of June we have some money left over for our own personal needs and support for our family responsibilities.

We also find that since 1980 alone the average family's tax bill has increased on average by $3,500. That includes a variety of taxes that are paid. That is a major increase, a major imposition on Canadians.

If we look at the other side of what is happening in terms of services, we will see the other part of this paradox that Canadians talk about, the fact that there are less services. I have heard that expounded here in this assembly.

People today find that crime is spreading. There is more crime, more dollars are being spent. This country's roads, bridges and infrastructure are somewhat deteriorating. The government is trying to shore that up with some kind of an infrastructure program that really did not directed to roads and bridges like it should have.

It got involved in a lot of other hobby projects and projects that seemed to be the pet objectives of local, provincial and federal politicians, but not on target in terms of what is really the basic infrastructure. Look at hospital beds for example across Canada. Waiting lists have been growing while we have been spending more and taxing more on the Canadian people.

The question is obvious. Why has this happened? It is because of our debt. We owe too much money and it is costing us too much to keep on going the way we have been. In fact, if we look at it in a small segment of time, every minute costs us $86,000 in terms of interest on the debt. Interest on the debt was about 10 per cent of government spending in 1974. Today it is over 25 per cent. In other words, 25 cents out of every dollar that government spends goes to pay the interest on the debt. That is not good enough.

The hon. member for Willowdale has made a very eloquent speech in this House. He said that the job is tough. It is a difficult job to face this deficit question and the government is going to stand up to it. He also said in those remarks—and I hear other Liberal members saying it at the same time—that we are going to introduce new taxes when the budget is brought down at the end of February.

The hon. member for Willowdale said: "We are just about at the ceiling". Those are the kind of weaselly words we use sometimes as politicians to say: "We are going to do something. We do not think we have pressed you hard enough. We do not think we have taken enough from you. We are just about there but we can take more".

In the Reform Party we believe we are at the ceiling. Canadians believe we are at the ceiling. We have paid enough taxes and there is no room between us and the ceiling of taxation.

The government has made a great case to Canadians about the fact that we have to create jobs. If we tax more, what is going to happen to the jobs?

The question was raised earlier about the hurt in terms of taxes and the economy. We know it will hurt individuals. We know it will hurt the budget of this country. Every 1 per cent increase in our interest rates, which is a direct result of increased taxes, will create a problem. I do not think that is acceptable.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's presentation this morning.

One of the things I should tell him and other members of the Reform Party is that they are not the only party or the only body to invent public forums to create the opportunity for people to provide direct input to their members. Like the Minister of Finance and many other members of this House, I have had many public forums.

Last fall we talked about the debt and the deficit. We talked about the ratio of offshore debt which we currently have and the concerns which that gave all of us here in this House as well as Canadians.

He referred to the goal this government had set of bringing our debt under control over the next three years, starting with the current year of bringing the deficit down to $39.7 billion, to go on to $32.7 billion and $25 billion in the third year, to reach our 3 per cent of gross domestic product. I want to assure the hon. member across the way that is only the first goal. The second goal will be to achieve a balanced budget as we go on to tackle and to break the back of the debt which this country has.

One of the things I have often heard from that side of the House is: Let us fill those loopholes that are in our taxation system; I am sure learned accountants across the country will find new ones if new taxation forms, but let us fill them. The minister has indicated on many occasions that he will make every attempt to fill those loopholes.

The system which we have to work with today, which has been inherited and has been added to over many years is cumbersome. We would like to streamline it. There is no question it needs to be done. I believe the minister will make every attempt to fill those loopholes to make our tax system more fair and equitable to all Canadians, regardless of whether they are in the upper echelon of social status, in the middle income group, or in the lower income group. That is what balance and equity are all about.

There will be those who will consider that attempt to fill in those tax loopholes as a tax increase, no question. Anyone it is going to affect will consider it a tax increase.

I would like to ask the hon. member across the way if that is not really indeed what he and his party stands for and would support and which the minister, I certainly hope, will bring forth in his budget.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, the Reform Party believes there should be no net tax increase in terms of revenue to the Government of Canada. There is adequate revenue to support the programs that are here with a change in some priorities. That is number one.

If we plug a loophole somewhere which increases revenue, that should not mean we increase the overall revenue but we should then look at reducing tax somewhere else to the benefit of Canadians which may create some jobs in the marketplace. That would be a good transfer if it is possible. We are not against the plugging of loopholes for fairness, whatever that term means.

On the other side of the balance scale, expenditure reduction and deficit elimination is the road to which we can balance the budget and bring our fiscal house in proper order. We do not believe that 1 per cent of GDP expenditure reduction in three subsequent years will hurt or harm our economy in any way. That is a goal that could be achieved.

The government should look at that. The government is not. It is going to, as the member has stated, work toward the objective of 3 per cent of GDP, which will accumulate another $100 billion on top of our debt. This means that our interest payments may go from $40 billion to $50 billion which I think Canadians do not want to tolerate at this time.

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Madam Speaker, today our country stands at a crossroads. Some say it is a watershed year for Canada. Two very crucial issues must be addressed as we go further into 1995, a year that could very well be the most decisive since Confederation.

The most important issue which must be addressed this year is the national deficit and debt crisis. It is growing by $110 million per day because of federal government mismanagement. The public is becoming all too aware of the effects of big government, big spending and big debt.

My colleagues alluded to the effects which are upward fluctuating interest rates, downward pressure on the dollar, higher taxes, lower consumer and investor confidence, and of course a lower standard of living.

It is interesting to examine what has happened to Canada's fiscal health since the 1960s. That decade rushed in the era of soak everyone, pay everyone's style of government, a government that would create a host of programs to look after the people, the creation of the just society.

Now we see the results of the so–called just society. We have the social welfare state, unsafe streets and the average family's tax bill which has soared by 1,200 per cent since 1961. That is three times the rate of inflation.

The time of government largesse must stop. The Canadian public is demanding balanced books from all levels of government. People are tired of paying for programs they never wanted, they never asked for and they certainly do not want to pay for.

That is why the Reform's supply motion is so important. We are asking that the federal government respond to the demands of Canadians for decisive spending cuts and no net tax increases to eliminate the deficit and to produce a smaller federal government.

My constituents are expressing their dismay over continued federal government mismanagement of their tax dollars. Like my colleague before me, I receive letters as well, lots of them.

Patrick W. Paul, a concerned taxpayer who lives in Edson in my Alberta riding of Yellowhead, expressed his sentiments in a letter to the finance minister. I have his permission to refer to it: Mr. Paul writes:

> I would like to express my extreme concern over the fiscal quagmire our country of Canada has descended into. The taxpayers of our country have been forced to shoulder the burden of government fiscal mismanagement for too long. It is time for government to change. Increased taxes, year after year, rampant out of control government spending, rising interest rates and an ever downward spiralling dollar have caused tremendous pressure on the Canadian taxpayer.
> Massive government bureaucracy, ridiculous social programs and paper tiger politicians are costing us too much. We cannot continue. We are the source of ridicule around the world, from the world press to even more seriously the world financial community. Our out of control debt, weak willed politicians and rudderless leadership are the sources of this ridicule.

• (1215)

Patrick Paul shares the opinion of most of my constituents who have taken the time to phone, to write or to stop me on the street. It is coffee shop talk. They want accountability. They want the federal government spending spree to stop.

Mr. Paul continues in his letter to the finance minister:

> Now is the time to stop this lunacy. Use your mandate to dramatically reduce government spending and the size of government. This budget must reflect an immediate move by government to correct our problem. Do not increase taxes in any way, shape or form! Do not attack my pension plan through any alterations to the RRSP program—this is my pension plan, not yours. Do not approach this in a cavalier manner. There is no accountability in the federal political system, only pandering to special interest groups, lip service and finger pointing. Stand up, do the right thing and make the necessary cuts required. Accept the responsibility of your position, be accountable for your actions. Help your country. We are doing all we can.

Like so many Canadians, Mr. Paul has a warning for the finance minister and his government:

> If this process does not begin with the new budget and there are no significant moves to correct this out of control situation, I promise that I will do everything in my power to contribute to the defeat of your party in the next election.

Despite the most serious warning from the taxpayers and voters of Canada this government continues to be unaccountable. We keep hearing through the media about possible tax increases in a few areas. People are demanding accountability. Unaccountability also takes form through the convoluted, cooked up answers we receive from the Liberal government regarding government spending.

Last week my colleague from Fraser Valley West asked a pertinent question regarding a suspect federal expenditure. He specifically questioned the merit of a grant for $33,800 for the study of major league baseball in Detroit and how this possibly benefits the taxpayers of this country?

The Secretary of State for Science, Research and Technology expounded a typical non–answer and told the House: "The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, an independent arm's length body, has done a great service to university researchers and has provided a very important foundation for knowledge in the country". Since when is the knowledge of the Detroit Tigers baseball team between 1945 and 1992 of any importance to the knowledge base in Canada?

The Secretary of State for Science, Research and Development does not have a monopoly on unaccountable answers in this place. The Minister for Western Economic Diversification is also good at dodging the issue of accountability of public funds. I asked him about spending in his department last week. He reply was filled with more rhetoric than substance.

I recently released a critical report of the Department of Western Economic Diversification. This 36 page document points out the inherent flaws of regional development programs, including using government money to subsidize private industry, distorting the competitive marketplace and pork barrelling.

The report I released, based on date received from the WED department, showed that the minister's home town of Winnipeg received a disproportionate amount of WED dollars between November 1, 1993 and November 15, 1994. The figures used in this report included a list of all the projects both announced and published by the department during that year. It shows Winnipeg received five times more than Vancouver, seven times more than Calgary and seventy times more than Regina.

In defence of this program the WED minister said there is another 80 per cent of projects which have not been announced yet.

I refer to an editorial which recently ran in the Vancouver Sun which sums up the absurdity of trying to defend this pork barrel program. The editorial is aptly entitled "The Sage of Patronage" and begins: "And the prize for the worst political defence of 1995—yes, it's early but we just can't believe anyone will outdo this—goes to the staff of minister for Manitoba patronage, Lloyd Axworthy. Alberta Reform MP Breitkreuz pointed out that while Manitoba, population one million, had received $22 million between November 1, 1993 and November 15, 1994, British Columbia with a population of 3.3 million received $52 million. That is $22 a head for Manitobans, $15.75 for British Columbians".

The editorial goes on to state: "Not fair, said Mr. Axworthy's communications assistant. A better comparison, she said, would include all projects which have been approved but not yet announced. Using her figures we see that while Winnipeg, population 652,000–plus, received $27.4 million, greater Vancouver with a population of 1.6 million received $19 million. That is $42 for every Winnipeger as against something less than $12 per head in greater Vancouver".

In trying to defend this program we see Winnipeg gets even more money than is stated in my report.

The taxpayers of Canada are tired of politicians trying to preserve the status quo because it is painfully obvious that the status quo no longer works. They want and demand their federal government to be fiscally responsible. The upcoming federal budget gives the government a chance to prove to Canadians that it is capable of acting in the best interest of the majority of taxpayers and cut spending, priorize spending to do the right thing for Canada.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my fellow colleague.

All of us are opposed to tax increases. In my lifetime I do not remember anyone ever saying that they were in favour of tax increases. I can go back 20 or 30 years, I do not remember anybody saying that they liked the concept of tax increases.

I am surprised by some of the attitudes of the members of the Reform Party toward changes in expenditures. For instance, I heard the previous speaker talk in terms of any changes in revenue that came through a redefinition of taxation expenditures should somehow be turned around and given back. In other words, it should not be used to reduce the deficit.

At the same time, the same people are telling us that we are not moving fast enough on deficit reduction. I am getting mixed messages. I do not quite understand what they are trying to say.

RRSPs are a good example. The previous government raised RRSP exemption levels to $13,500, that is income levels for individuals earning $75,000. A proposal that I have had is to reduce that down to $9,000. With a $9,000 exemption that would be somebody with a $50,000 income. The object of the exercise would be that people earning over $50,000 surely can save for their own retirement without getting assistance from the taxpayers of Canada.

A second aspect of this also has to do with the foreign component of registered retirement savings plans. Currently we allow up to 20 per cent of RRSP funds to be held in foreign denominations. Once again the question is why is it that the Canadian taxpayer is allowing a tax deduction on their tax return simply so people can invest in foreign countries? It seems to me if people want to make the decision to invest in foreign countries they can do so without the credit of the taxpayers of the rest of Canada.

I am often concerned when I hear people talk about loopholes and incentives.

In my background as an accountant, today's incentives become tomorrow's loopholes. The loopholes we are talking about blocking today were probably yesterday's incentives.

The other aspect about no more taxes, of which I am a believer, is the deficit. The reality is that a deficit is unpaid taxes. In other words, we did not pay enough taxes and that is how we created this deficit; or, as some my colleagues would argue, we spent too much relative to our tax base. Be that as it may, as of today the deficit represents taxes we have not paid. The bottom line is how are we going to resolve those kinds of problems?

I have taken the time to work on a private member's bill which I hope to introduce this month that I call the taxpayers' bill of rights. The bill basically focuses on government spending and how government spending affects each and every individual. In other words, every time the government announces a program it should be visible and costed on a per taxpayer basis. It should allow the individual taxpayer choices and rights.

Do they think a bill in that vein would be good for accountability? Why do they feel expenditure reduction should not be used in fighting the deficit?

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, it will have to be very brief. I believe the member used almost my entire five minutes with some more Liberal rhetoric.

We believe in a zero tax increase. We believe money is much better left in the hands of Canadian citizens than in the hands of politicians. The whole problem is not increased taxes, it is the money the government spends. It is definitely a spending problem, not a revenue problem.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would not have thought it necessary to have this debate today. After the October 1993 election I thought the message would have sunk into whichever party formed the government.

Canadians want decisive spending cuts, no net increases in taxes and a smaller, less interfering central government. What has happened? Since taking office the Liberal government immediately inflated the size of the deficit so when it was seemingly reduced it could pat itself on the back, saying job well done.

By doing this Liberals avoided tough decisions. Then we had the costly cancellation of the helicopter EH–101 purchase. Long term, high tech jobs were lost and millions paid in cancellation fees. The Pearson airport contract was cancelled. An airport desperately in need of refurbishing is allowed to decay while the Liberal government fights it out with developers over the costs of cancellation. Again, jobs are lost and taxpayers' money is to be paid out with no gain whatsoever.

The infrastructure program begins. Billions of dollars borrowed for infrastructure programs by communities that needed jobs but not increased debt. We know that in a healthy economy it is the business sector that creates jobs, real jobs, and not the government through temporary government programs. As the unemployment figures released last week indicate, the jobs are not there anymore but the debt surely is and will be for years to come.

Then in the 1994 budget it is handed down, the great wait until next time budget. Canadians sat in anxious anticipation, hoping at last a Liberal government would make tough decisions. Who were they kidding? The joke was on the people of Canada. The government they elected, this Liberal government, let them down. Spending programs abound in last year's government's budget.

It is hard to imagine a government elected to make tough decisions using the old phrase that losing sports teams use, wait until next year. This is next year and there is still no sign of any willingness to take tough decisions. The government had a chance but really side stepped it.

Canada was going to go through the most massive restructuring of the social welfare system since it was put in place. Studies began. The minister of human resources made grand announcements. Policy and discussion booklets were produced. Two sets of committee hearings were held. This committee of the House of Commons travelled across the country in both sets of hearings.

Four million was given to 159 special interest groups. The people we should have heard from are regular, hard working Canadians who regularly pay their taxes and receive no special grants or privileges. However we heard from special interest groups to ensure that the committee heard testimony. And to what avail?

The minister of human resources announced that the government will have to deal with its budgetary problems before it will be able to get on with reforms. To paraphrase and perhaps combine a couple of old expressions, when the government's fiscal chickens came home to roost, they could not because the field was too full of social welfare sacred cows.

The Liberals side stepped yet another decision to revamp and reshape our social system. It is hard to believe a government so early in its mandate would admit to be fresh out of new ideas.

No one in Canada who has studied our social welfare system believes it needs more money thrown at it. If the government was not going to do anything, why did it spend all the money studying reform? How much did this exercise cost: $10 million, $20 million? Who knows, who cares? Obviously no one on the government side.

We in the Reform Party care deeply. We care about the country and we care about its people. As elected members to this House we realize we owe the people of Canada a duty, a duty not just to criticize but to present alternatives. We believe that the country's financial situation must be addressed in a positive way before the next election.

As a policy the Reform Party believes the solution to our deficit problem must be found on the expenditure side rather than on the revenue side. Presently the government has more than sufficient tax income.

Canadians expect to pay taxes. Canadians expect the government to spend our tax dollars wisely. When the government mismanages our tax dollars as governments have been doing since the 1960s, Canadians get angry. We cannot blame our fellow Canadians for not wanting their hard earned tax dollars to be wasted on grants, unnecessary byelections, make work programs and government to government international aid, among other things.

I recently heard a suggestion that the Liberals might bring in temporary tax increases. Let us not forget another temporary tax measure which was introduced many years ago. It is still with us today. It is called income tax. This tax takes the biggest bite out of our incomes. But it is not the GST, income tax or any other tax that is the problem. It is mismanagement. The problem is mismanagement of our tax dollars.

As Reformers are saying, Canadians fear that the Liberal budget will be the worst of all worlds: spending cuts that are insufficient to lead to a balanced budget and solve the problem, combined with tax increases that reduce disposable income and kill jobs.

As Reformers have said in the past, we believe the first change should come with reform of the MP pension plan. We are not talking about MPs' salaries, which from what I have seen since I have been in Ottawa indicates that MPs work very hard to earn their salaries. Cuts must also come in the institutions of government; the office of the Governor General, the Senate, the House of Commons, the Privy Council and the Prime Minister's office.

We must look at excessive travel of senior officials and urge the government to reduce the number of ministers of state and associate ministers. Cut down the size of government. The Reform plan in the end is to have a smaller, less intrusive and more efficient federal government.

We can include the electoral boundaries reform. Cut spending. We do not need 295 MPs in the House of Commons or 300 plus, as the government is suggesting. Each MP costs Canadian taxpayers about $1 million. The country to the south of us has 270 million people to our 27 million. They have approximately 437 in government to our 295. Last week in Washington I met with American congressmen, congresswomen and constituents who told me their representation was very effective.

Reform is on record for looking at federal funding to multiculturalism and the official languages program. These are just some of the examples where Reform would cut.

We must protect law enforcement, health, education and our environment. We believe we must bring forward alternatives so Canadians can see there is another way other than the Liberal way. We see a need for a fresh, new vision of social policy in the next century, forwarded on the belief that the best guarantee governments can provide of individual personal security is to establish a framework of laws within which individuals can save for or insure against each of the contingencies that life may bring upon them.

We believe in five guiding principles to support our vision of the future. First, build on the Canadian tradition of self–reliance, recognizing the family as the primary caregiver in society.

Second, empower communities and charitable organizations to play an ever increasing rather than a diminishing role in social security.

Third, provide temporary assistance to people who experience short term misfortune while ensuring that long term assistance is reserved for those who are generally incapable of providing for themselves.

• (1235)

Fourth, where government must be involved in social service delivery, entrust the resources and the responsibility to that level of government which is closest to the people.

Fifth, ensure that we can pay for security measures without borrowing more money.

We believe that security must be provided against these types of problems. The first class of security need is for protection against personal catastrophes, such as a medical emergency or the death of a family's chief income earner.

The second class of security need consists of needs that will arise reasonably far into the future but which are predictable. Most people will have such needs at some point in the future. One cannot insure against them but one can prepare for them. Typical needs in this class are post–secondary education, non–catastrophic health care, retirement income and periodic unemployment.

The final class of security need is for intermediate help for those who have not been able to provide for themselves. This is the proper function of charity or, in the absence of it, government transfers.

This is not the cruel and heartless vision of social reform that is attributed to us by the media. It is a system designed to deliver a sufficient level of income to ensure that nobody lives in poverty. Public assistance is to be directed at those who for reasons of physical disability or advanced age are incapable of providing for themselves. At the other end of the scale no one with enough to pay taxes would receive assistance and those who receive assistance would pay no tax.

We must begin to rely on ourselves. We must rely on our families. We can no longer ask the government to provide personal security from the cradle to the grave.

These are some of the ways in which we can achieve a government which is smaller but more effective; spending cuts which eliminate programs that are no longer useful but retain our much needed health care system and our criminal justice system.

I hope the government is listening and will adopt these measures in its upcoming budget.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to support my hon. colleague's motion urging the government to deal with our budget crisis through spending cuts rather than new tax increases.

I cannot stress enough how important it is to approach budgetary policy from the point of view that government in Canada is too big. There is a very simple reason why government spends too much. It tries to do too much. It tries to do things that it either cannot do at all or that it can do but does very badly.

I brought up this point in discussing Bill C–65. I said then, and I say now, that unless the Liberal government understands where the deficit problem is coming from, it will not be able to solve it. I said that our spending problem comes from our big social programs and that no solution which fails to target them can allow us to deal with our spending problems.

I also said then, as I say now, that we should listen to the Auditor General. We should make sure that when we devise a program we understand clearly what it is supposed to achieve. We should also make sure that we have a clear set of criteria to measure whether or not it has succeeded. We should shut it down if it is not succeeding and shows no signs of succeeding. That applies to the question of how to cut spending. It also applies to the question of whether to cut spending.

Our fundamental objective is to balance the budget. A secondary objective is to balance it at a sufficiently low level. If the government were to balance its books by spending and by taking in taxes three–quarters of the GDP I would not be happy. We should certainly consider whether any budget balancing measures lead to a zero deficit at an acceptably low level of overall spending and taxation. Our main objective is to balance the budget.

I know that the Liberals are still waving their little red book and claiming that 3 per cent of GDP is a good deficit target. It is not. It is painfully inadequate. Let us suppose that all we are setting out to do is to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP, to go over the cliff a little more slowly. How are we going to do it? What will our program be? How will we tell if it is working? What will we do if it is not?

There are three ways to try to control the deficit. The first one is to raise taxes. The second one is to cut spending. The third one is to fiddle the books. In my home province of British Columbia they are getting pretty good at number three. I am not even going to consider it. The only thing that I am going to say is that leaving things like the Canada pension plan off budget is not a good idea.

Let us assume that the federal government's books get neither better nor worse over the next few years. That leaves raising taxes or cutting spending. I do not think there is any big mystery about the appropriate yardstick for success or failure. Is the deficit getting bigger, staying about the same or is it getting smaller? By that standard, any reasonable person would conclude that what we have done over the past decade has failed.

If members want a grim laugh go back and read some of the speeches by one Brian Mulroney while campaigning for the Prime Minister's job. Or go back and read the budgets of Michael Wilson or Don Mazankowski. Heck, read the budgets by the former Liberal finance minister, the Prime Minister. They all preach about the dangers of deficits and debt.

It is absolutely amazing to see how many budgets are brought into this House and prefaced with the remarks that the deficit and the debt are the most primary concern of the government of the day. They all promise to bring budgets under control and I have no reason to think they were anything but sincere. Look at the method they chose: constant tax increases. Apply the yardstick. Did the deficit shrink appreciably? No, it did not.

George Orwell once said it is the first duty of every intelligent person to state the obvious. I am about to state the obvious. Tax increases have been tried as a deficit reduction measure for a long time and they have failed. This is also true internationally. It is time therefore for us to recognize the wisdom of an observation by Nobel prize winning economist Milton Friedman: "Governments will spend whatever they can take in plus whatever they can get away with".

The record is clear. Tax increases do not solve budget imbalances. Budget imbalances are caused by spending. They are caused by programs whose appetite is far greater than the tax system can deal with. No tax increases. Spending cuts.

The problem is on the spending side. That is where the ducks are. As Ralph Klein from Alberta said: "If you want to go duck hunting you have to hunt where the ducks are".

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to note that I will be sharing my time with the member for Carleton—Charlotte.

I am pleased to participate in this supply day debate. It allows me to remind the House of a very important policy paper on the government's economic strategy by the Minister of Finance presented at the Standing Committee on Finance last fall.

I know that Reform has little time and less interest in any prescription requiring more than a single syllable. Its formula for government, for the economy and for the budget is simply slash and burn. It has the same petulant one–syllable approach to even boosting revenues by improving tax system fairness, that is, no, no, no.

I regret sounding so sarcastic but frankly that is the only reasonable response to a motion that sings a one–note song: cut the deficit. It proves that the Reform, a Johnny one–note party still cannot recognize the wider economic context that governments and budgets must address.

The great political philosopher Edmund Burke said: "The essence of tyranny is the denial of complexity". Deficit reduction in a way that lays the foundation for deficit elimination is essential. That is why the government has staked out concrete targets for dramatic deficit cuts. We have made clear that the ultimate goal is deficit elimination. Just reducing or eliminating the deficit by itself will not sustain or secure the type of country most Canadians want and expect. At a time of accelerating technology and evolving skills, when almost one in ten Canadian workers are still jobless, even a balanced budget alone will not deliver the new opportunities they need.

This is where our government differs so fundamentally from the Reform opposition. We understand because a majority of Canadians understand that Canada needs a disciplined strategy for economic security and growth.

Under the previous government Canadians saw too often and too much what happens when a government implements spending cuts without clear guiding principles. It is like building a house without a blueprint. It is costly in the long run and then the roof falls in.

That is why our government has set out the framework for economic policies we intend to build upon. The paper "A New Framework for Economic Policy" is a clear statement of objectives that will guide what the government will do and what it will not do. The logic and approaches of the 1960s simply are no longer good enough for a 21st century global arena. We cannot afford them and we will not succeed with them.

Previous generations responded to the challenges of their eras by building the physical and social infrastructures of Canada. We too must create a new infrastructure for our time, the infrastructure of ideas and innovation. That is the thrust of our new framework paper. It proposes five key areas on which we must focus.

The first is helping Canadians acquire the skills to get jobs, to keep jobs and to find better jobs. The facts are clear. Jobs for people with high school education or less are shrinking while jobs for those with education beyond high school are growing. In fact projections show that almost half the new jobs now being created require more than 16 years of education and training combined.

I should add that there is a particular element of this challenge that engages small business. They do not have the resources of large firms to bring employees up to speed with the new skills that our information age increasingly demands. They depend on a public education system that can do its job.

In terms of education the challenge in Canada is not money. We spend more on education than just about anyone else. What we need are better results. Individuals, employers and the government must co–operate and share responsibility for improving education and training.

The second part of our framework is encouraging Canadians to adjust to change. Economic progress depends on a willingness to embrace new opportunities. It is our view that protecting and subsidizing business is almost always the wrong way to go.

For that reason the government is going to change the entire approach to subsidies. Equally we believe regional economic assistance should focus on genuine opportunities such as tourism that have great potential to be self–sustaining. Further, we believe high payroll taxes are nothing more than a tax on hiring. That is why we have taken steps to reduce UI premiums.

The third element of our framework is getting government right. Our attitude here is straightforward. It is time to make choices. We must eliminate or reduce lower priority activities and target scarce resources on the highest priority programs. That is one reason we are also trying to eliminate unnecessary federal regulations that cost Canadian business tens of billions of dollars every year.

Regulatory reform has the potential to increase productivity, stimulate new investment and create a more cost efficient government. We have already reviewed more than half of the 3,000 regulations on the books. We have eliminated one–quarter, left another quarter in place, and the rest are being revised or examined further.

Providing leadership in the economy is the fourth objective. While the private sector creates jobs the government has a clear role in fostering economic growth. In our knowledge based economy success depends on skill and innovation. The government can contribute to this dynamic process by gathering and disseminating information and ideas about technology and new markets. As well it can play an important role in bringing business together, something that is critical in an economy where new firms are small and specialized.

One priority is to do more to harness science and technology in order to improve productivity and growth. Government can help by building better links among industry, universities and government labs. It also has a particular role in making sure small business benefits from the latest know–how, particularly in the high technology sector.

Trade is another area where government involvement is essential for success. Today more than ever Canada is an exporting nation. It is vital that more companies become exporters and that we look beyond our traditional markets to the emerging economies of Asia, Latin America and eastern Europe. Here the government can help by providing more information and by ensuring that small businesses have access to export financing.

The fifth and final objective is absolutely essential to all others. We must create a healthy fiscal and monetary climate in Canada. If we do not meet this fiscal challenge, as the finance minister told the Standing Committee on Finance, we will fail at everything else.

That is why we have staked out a rigid commitment to bringing the deficit down to 3 per cent of the economy in three years, effectively cutting it in half. That is why we have also made it clear that this deficit target is a first step in meeting our ultimate goal of eliminating the deficit completely.

It would be absurd to claim that a single paper is the answer to curing Canada's future, but it is equally absurd to promote deficit elimination as a cure–all of every Canadian challenge. To me and I hope to all Canadians the evidence is clear. Our government has a vision of the role for government in building a more prosperous nation.

The opposition would better serve its mandate by providing meaningful policy alternatives rather than simplistic motions without scope, without depth and especially without heart.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is interesting the secretary of state, being as it were second in command just under the finance minister, delivered the speech that he did this morning. I do not think he or perhaps the government or perhaps the Liberal side understands that Canadians are concerned about a further tax grab, about further tax increases.

While I respect the fact that the secretary of state gave us a nicely balanced speech about economic objectives, fostering economic growth and all these other things that are essential, nonetheless I would point out to him that what is concerning Canadians at this time, and I would suggest what is concerning foreign investment or people who are buying marketable securities offshore or outside the country, is that his government just does not seem to understand. It is an overexpenditure problem; it is not a taxation problem.

I am fully aware that my comment and my follow–up question are not going to be directly on what he just spoke about, but I suggest with the greatest respect that his speech did not have anything to do with the topic that has been brought forward by the opposition, the Reform Party in this instance.

I am sure that coming from the banking background and as an economist he would be aware of the fact that while corporate profits have dropped 10 per cent in the last 10 years corporate taxes at all levels, including compliance costs, have increased by 69 per cent. I therefore find it somewhat strange that he and his government would be talking about a further confiscation of the wealth or the ability of corporations to be able to fund themselves.

I was listening to the chair of the finance committee talking about the fact that there are corporations that because of fast write–offs or other procedures involved in the current tax system should be taxed. That is why the government is talking about a wealth or a capital tax on larger corporations. This is exactly what the Liberals are talking about.

Would the secretary of state be able to inform us whether he, the finance minister and their colleagues are perhaps talking about a cash flow tax? In other words we understand that we have a wealth tax.

• (1255)

Because a corporation is able to carry forward losses and other legitimate things in the tax system it has a sufficient amount of flow. The government will say: "My goodness, here is a couple of million dollars flowing along. Why don't we put our ladle, our pail or our big scoop into this tax?"

Does the Liberal government not understand that individuals and corporations are saying no tax increase?

Mr. Peters: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to reply to the hon. member's question. Again we find the Reform Party is suggesting new taxes. The only matter of taxation the finance minister has mentioned is that we will continue to make the Canadian tax system fairer.

The Reform Party keeps suggesting new taxes. Let me tell Reform Party members that Canadians are not just concerned with taxes. They are concerned with taxes; they are not just concerned with taxes. They are also concerned with jobs. They are concerned with education. They are concerned with crime in the streets. I read my mail every day. They are concerned about all these things.

The Reform Party is playing a Johnny one–note tune on deficits and on taxes and is missing what Canadians really want.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate.

During one of the question and comment periods this morning I mentioned that like many members on all sides of the House I have had an opportunity to host public forums on issues such as the debt and the deficit. We got input from people across our constituencies on what their approach would be. That is part of our responsibility. That is a part of our ongoing job.

Many people said to me that there had to be cuts on the expenditure side, that the government had to do better, that we had to eliminate waste wherever we find it or wherever possible, and that we had to avoid duplication in efforts whether with departments internationally or our provincial counterparts in their respective departments.

The finance committee looked at those matters during its review. The minister and his department have taken them into consideration during the process of preparing for the budget. I say to my colleagues across the way that many Canadians have told us at these meetings that they want government to get it right. That is exactly what we are attempting to do.

People lost faith in our predecessors. Goal after goal was set. Was one ever met? I do not recall one that stands out in my mind as being met.

The government set goals like one might in business. Any good business person knows that challenges and goals must be set for both the business and the staff. Goals are set that offer challenge; the goals are achievable albeit difficult. That is exactly what we have done as a government. We have set some difficult goals.

I have to admit in many cases I have scratched my head and asked how we are going to meet this, that it is going to be very difficult. During the process both the finance minister and quite obviously the Prime Minister have asked all departments, all portfolios and all ministers to share in this challenge before us. I am sure in many cases specific sums were expected to be cut from the respective departments.

As everyone in this House knows, program review has been taking place. That program review asked every department and every portfolio to look at every line of every expenditure to ensure that they were going to be able to justify it to you and me. Ultimately that is where our responsibility lies. It lies not in the day to day operation but in the policy, the planning and the review of the results. That is exactly what the Minister of Finance will do when he brings down his budget.

As we mentioned earlier, this government did set a goal. We took over in the 1993 fiscal year a deficit of some $42 billion which had once again gone even further than the previous administration had projected. We set a goal to bring that deficit down this current fiscal year to $39.7 billion, next year to $32.7 billion, and the third year to $25 billion, thus meeting our commitment of 3 per cent of gross domestic product.

Members would know that in the last couple of weeks the Minister of Finance has stated publicly that not only will we meet that goal this current fiscal year but we will exceed it. That is great news for us. It is fantastic. That is what we should be working toward and challenging ourselves toward. I know the Minister of Finance is doing that and is impressing on the staff of the department to ensure we do all possible to not only meet the current year and subsequent year goals but to surpass them if we possibly can.

During this whole process of reaching our goals we have another goal. That goal is for growth and job creation in this country. Of all the G–7 nations in the world, the economic leaders of the world, in the 1994 calendar year this country was number one. We were number one in the world in economic increase and development.

That in itself is part of our challenge, the balancing part, to be very gentle. The actions we take must be balanced to achieve our goals in reducing our deficit, taking hold of our debt, bringing home those offshore portions wherever possible but at the same time doing it in a balanced fashion that will keep another commitment of this government for economic development: jobs and growth. We call it our growth and jobs agenda.

Members will notice that every piece of material which has been brought forward by this government has had that as the number one priority: jobs and growth. Growth economically for our businesses. Jobs for our young people completing community college and post–secondary education in universities. It is so they will have the opportunity we and our parents had to have a job, to have that self–discipline, to have respect for themselves, to know that following their education there is an opportunity in this country to go to work and to provide for themselves and their subsequent families.

As a member of this government I am indeed proud of the approach it and our finance minister have taken fiscally. There is no question we want to see the major part of deficit reduction done on the expense side. There is no question and the minister has stated that time and time again.

As I mentioned before, a number of those loophole areas are going to have to be filled. I pressured the minister, others did as well. That will be seen by some people as tax increases. I see it as being a fair and equitable tax system for all Canadians.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was listening with great interest to the member's speech. He was talking about the goals the government has set. I would like to talk about those goals.

I wonder if the hon. member would agree with me that if we aim low we just might be able to succeed sometimes, if to aim low so we can succeed is not necessarily where the government is coming from. I wonder why the Liberals do not realize that you cannot get over a wide chasm in two jumps.

The situation is that with our constant overspending and our constant deficit building we are taking the future from our great–grandchildren who we do not know and we have not seen yet. This is an intergenerational transfer of taxation. With the spending we as Canadians under this Liberal government are presently doing, we are handcuffing our descendants countless years into the future with taxation. It is for money we are spending today.

Specifically the government talks frequently about this 3 per cent thing. The people of Canada should know that since the government took over, the federal debt, not the deficit which is the overspending but the federal debt, has increased $60 billion. That is just since this government has taken over.

The government's target is to get to 25 per cent of gross domestic product within four years. People like ourselves figure four years times $25 billion is $100 billion. It will be significantly more than $100 billion. Even if we stayed with $100 billion additional debt, the interest charge on that additional $100 billion that we are having our great, great, great–grandchildren responsible for with their taxation, is $9 billion a year.

The federal transfers for post–secondary education are $2.6 billion. The federal transfers for health are $6.5 billion. In other words for just health and post–secondary education, it is $9.1 billion. And this government with $100 billion more debt is going to be encumbering our great, great–grandchildren with $9 billion more.

It is going to be a lot more than $100 billion, but let us take that number. If the government in all of its wisdom is prepared to go $100 billion more into debt, the interest charges will be at least $9 billion. That then wipes out our ability to fund post–secondary education or to make federal transfers to the provinces in support of health care. Where in the world does the hon. member expect to get that from, except the bogey man which Canadians are concerned about because it is more of a tax grab, more of this government in Canadians' wallets?

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, relative to the points and concerns made by my hon. colleague across the way, I should say first of all that I am not sure how the Reform Party set its goals low as he has suggested. However the Liberal way is to set goals that are a challenge, yet goals that are achievable even though they may be somewhat difficult to achieve. We as a Liberal government have set those goals and we will achieve them, as everyone well knows.

I agree with my hon. colleague across the way that no question, when talking about compound interest, it is a wonderful thing when you are receiving it or if you have dollars to invest and can receive it. It multiplies day in and day out and is a wonderful thing. He is absolutely right. It is a terrible thing when it is the other way around and you are paying your debts. Whether it be us in our private lives, or business, or certainly as government, there is no question it is a terrible thing.

Those goals have to be set and we have to meet those goals and those challenges each step of the way as we go along. In this case we will meet our first goal of reaching 3 per cent of the gross domestic product. Our next goal will be on a balanced budget. Following that, we will break the back of this country's debt. We will take hold of these finances for years and years to come.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the remarks made by my colleague across the way.

We hear from these Liberal members today about how essential it is for government to be involved in the economy and how if we can do things just a little better, if government can just get it right, things will get better in Canada.

We hear about complexity and we hear about the wider economic reality as if these were some buzz phrases that meant that government has to stay involved in the economy. I would suggest that we have had 25 or 30 years of government involved in the economy, trying to direct the economy, trying to drive us to where it would like us to be and it has failed miserably.

There is a model right now for government to emulate and that is Mr. Klein's government in Alberta. Mr. Klein has done some very courageous things starting with the elimination of the MLA's pension plan and a reduction of the MLA's remuneration. He has demonstrated leadership at the top.

Then he has gone on from there to make across the board cuts, major cuts in his government's spending. The reality of that is that Alberta is creating jobs. It is instilling investor confidence and it is showing the people in Alberta that it is serious about reducing its debt and its deficit.

Would the member across the way not agree that is the model for this government to be following rather than to be following the tired old ideas that have not worked and will continue not to work if this government continues on its present course of action?

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, first I should say that government's involvement is certainly to set an economic confidence in this country in which the business and industry communities can build economically to create those jobs. That is where the jobs come from. The member is right. They do not come directly from government. They come from government indirectly because government has to set that confidence, that pace and that tone economically in the country for that to happen. That is exactly what this government is doing.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Madam Speaker, today we are discussing a motion by the Reform Party whose purpose is, basically, to make the government reduce its spending so as to improve the state of public finances. There is nothing wrong with the principle as such. The motion also wants the government to avoid raising taxes and to downsize government. The Bloc Quebecois certainly has no trouble accepting these three principles.

However, the position behind this motion is not necessarily one we can embrace. Our position on the economy is certainly not that of the Reform Party, certainly not the position of the right, which says that economic growth depends largely on what the wealthiest in our society contribute to the economy.

This is often the group they try to defend, either by proposing a single tax or other measures to avoid any form of progressive taxation or redistribution. There are certainly major differences in how the role of government is viewed with respect to redistribution of income. In any case, since it came to power, this government has done very little to improve public finances.

A few weeks from now, we will be told that by the end of the fiscal year, we will have a deficit of about 38 or 39 billion dollars, in addition to a debt of over $500 billion, accumulated during the past twenty years. This is hardly a reason to celebrate.

However, I know some members will celebrate, because the deficit will be one or two billion dollars less than the original forecast. However, whether the deficit is on target is irrelevant. We have to consider the facts.

The facts are that we will still have a very substantial deficit of 37 or 38 billion dollars, as I said earlier, and perhaps even 39 billion, if the government tries to include some of next year's spending in this year's budget to reduce the pressure on the next fiscal year. We must get back to basics. Forget about objectives. What we want is results.

Since the government failed to make certain cuts last year, this has put a lot of pressure on Canadian interest rates. Since February, interest rates have gone up by about 300 base points. Everyone who has to borrow money is feeling the impact on the economy. The Minister of Finance likes to say that increases in the interest rate are like increases in income tax. If he believes what he says, why did he not do something earlier in the year, instead of adding this pressure to the interest rates?

Of course, our friends like to say that the state of the economy is a destabilizing factor. I, however, contend that the greatest destabilizing factor is the state of public finances. Foreign investors recognize this, and this is what they look at first.

There is also no vision for society. It is unfortunate to find that, after a year and a half in office, the present government is taking the same approach as its predecessor. According to this approach, cuts are the only way to improve public finances—a view shared by the Reform Party.

I can remember during the elections speeches about giving priority to jobs and trying to generate growth as ways to improve public finances. So much for those speeches. No vision of society has been put forward in an effort to find a way to revitalize the economy, to everyone's benefit.

You are aware that economic indicators measure growth with traditional indicators such as production levels. We must not forget, however, what we learned in the 1980s—that increased does not necessarily mean increased employment.

The two are linked, of course. If there is an increase in total production, or in the gross domestic product, the number of jobs will certainly increase also, but these two trends are separate. Production may increase significantly faster than the level of employment.

The gross domestic product is therefore not the only yardstick for the economy. We have to focus on the people who are increasingly excluded from society, the unemployed living on unemployment insurance or welfare or who have returned to school because they cannot find a job. Many people are waiting to enter the labour market. The present government has no vision, in this regard.

I would like to speak a bit about the approach which consists of saying that the deficit problem will be resolved by making cuts across the board. We agree that certain cuts can readily be made, for example in the government machine. Later on, I will return to the Bloc Quebecois' suggestions which we have repeated time and again.

We have a major difference of opinion with the Reform Party: in our opinion, some expenditures are tax expenditures. We must look beyond budget expenditures, transfers to individuals and to the provinces.

We should also look at whether they are tax expenditures, lost revenues. We could get into a real philosophical debate on this issue: Is it a tax hike? Is it a spending cut? It seems clear to us that it is a question of spending.

It has always been difficult to discuss the issue of tax expenditures in an effective way, even during the finance committee's hearings, because the figures are derived from data that is only partly revealed. Expenditures that the government plans to make are revealed, but no roll–up of these expenditures is ever given, even though that information is available.

Therefore, I want to talk about this right leaning philosophy that only wants to see across–the–board cuts, blind indiscriminate cuts, a philosophy that often ferments such ideas as a single tax rate, the same rate for everyone. It tempts even the people who would be affected the most. They say "use one tax rate". Currently, we use a progressive tax rate system; the higher the income, the higher the tax rate. Of course, the tax system, however, sometimes reverses trends, but that is another problem which can be looked at in a different way.

Therefore, the principle of redistribution, which is desirable in society, would be severely compromised under a system with one tax rate. I said to someone who was explaining the concept to me that I would give the matter more thought if that person could explain to me how income would be redistributed with just one tax rate for everyone. As long as the proposal cannot be linked with redistribution, how the state redistributes wealth, the concept will not get any support from me.

I would now like to return to what can be expected in the next budget and rumours on this subject. It is becoming clearer that the government will increase its revenues in the next budget. An increase in the surtax for individuals or in income tax rates, traditional taxes or certain consumption taxes is planned, or pension funds may even be hit. There is obviously a lot of money there, and the government is looking for revenue. It is much easier to get a quick revenue fix than to cut spending; it takes more courage to cut spending, especially when friends are among those affected. The Liberals have always had trouble cutting their friends's spending so this may be very difficult to do.

Now why does the government want to do that? Because of the two additional years, and the Conservatives and Liberals are equally at fault. For the past two years, there have been no major changes in budget policy, and we have just had two consecutive deficits of $40 billion, record amounts in Canadian history. This is a country that is supposed to have the best quality of life in the world. This is the country they are trying to sell us, especially to Quebecers. Perhaps we should check the size of the mortgage.

My point is that this government has only itself to blame, because it failed to take action during the second year.

I will give an example of tax expenditures that were introduced and then withdrawn, to show the lack of vision and judgment we see so often in our tax system. That is why we favour a genuine review of the tax system, not a quick fix to please friends who contribute to the party coffers but something that will reflect our social values, our principles and our objectives. Look at the way the government treats capital gains, for instance.

What was the procedure in recent years? First, the government introduced the principle of allowing a $500,000 exemption; the first $500,000 of capital gains were not taxable. After a while, the exemption was reduced to $100,000. Once taxpayers in the highest bracket had taken advantage of this exemption—not everyone can declare a capital gain of $500,000—the government said: "Well, this is costing the government a pretty penny. We will reduce the exemption to $100,000", and so they did. Now that the others had managed to take advantage of this exemption, they said: "Well, this might be too costly for the government after all, so let us cut the exemption to zero", which they did.

If it does not make sense to treat capital gains differently today, why did they do it in the past? How much money did the government lose in the process? How much did it have to borrow to compensate? How much did it cost society? Now, they claim social programs are too expensive, that they are putting us into debt, and the government has all kinds of names for those people.

Actually, if we look at the operating budget, although it does show a deficit, it is practically negligible, which means that if we had not accumulated all this debt over the years, we would not be having this discussion today.

What caused these problems? Is it our social programs? I am not so sure.

This certainly requires some adjustment and a serious look. I come back to the approach advocating only cuts and not fiscal spending. What does this mean? Forty billion dollars spread among 20 million taxpayers. That means about $2,000 per person. We resolve the deficit problem by cutting $2,000 per individual, cuts in expenditures related to individuals.

Can everyone handle $2,000 in cuts? We here in this House can do it easily, with no problem. However, what about people on social assistance, single parent families and older people? Can they handle a $2,000 cut per person? Can they really? It is not a sure thing.

This is why we need to have another way of looking at the approach to public finances as well. There has to be a way to put a stop to the present inefficiencies and straighten out the job market with different and new ideas. We could use our imaginations, we could be creative. There is no end to technological innovation these days. When it comes to public finances, we are stuck for ideas. We want to copy other formulae and other approaches.

We hear more and more talk about New Zealand in Canada these days. People are trying to convince us that we will share the same fate. Why do we not try a different formula? Why not do things differently?

Over the next year, debate will be vigorous, because two visions of society are on a collision course, particularly in Quebec with the discussions on the referendum. I hope there are Canadians who also share a different vision from what we are hearing conveyed at present.

I would like to speak about reviewing the taxation system in connection with current statistics on income. Sixty per cent of people, 60 per cent of the population, have incomes of $25,000 or less. Returning to my earlier idea of cutting expenditures by $2,000, for people with a $25,000 income, that is going to hurt. We must target the cuts where the money is and where it will hurt much less.

Of course, I mentioned redistribution. Also, when we put forward budget policies, specific taxation policies, we must evaluate them before developing them, while they are being developed and after they have been developed. Given the veritable army of civil servants, this could be done and it would be a more productive use of their time. Perhaps cutting 45,000 employees would not be contemplated if this type of useful analysis were conducted. It is certainly possible to re–think the work of the public service in regards to such an approach.

I took part in prebudget consultations. I must say that I was rather disappointed. Earlier, I heard a Liberal member say that all departmental programs were undergoing a review. It is a shame that, in politics, we lack the courage to lay working hypotheses out on the table when people are being consulted. These public consultations were very difficult because the discussion became almost philosophical at one point. It was hard to say that there was nothing concrete, only partial information. It was difficult for people to judge, even for members of the committee.

If that review had been conducted a little quicker, put out on the table to be debated, but it was not, and the government does not want to be transparent, it wants to give itself as much leeway as possible. It does not want to resolve the public finances issue effectively, publicly. Never. This will be done in the backrooms.

Therefore, in my opinion, the exercise will be relatively ineffective. Anyway, most of the report was written by the Department of Finance, which does not want to be affected by the recommendations, so it is making sure it has some leeway.

I would like to use the remaining three or four minutes to talk about the rumour going around regarding a form of flexible federalism which will be introduced in the next budget by decentralizing some powers. What a laugh. The Axworthy reforms were strongly contested and implementing his reforms is proving very difficult; the proposal is obviously lacking vision; people are not rallying around it, they are divided on the issue.

The government had to put these reforms on the back burner because of the referendum campaign But the underlying idea was to cut social program spending. How can this be done now, and in a more positive way? That must be the challenge that Cabinet is facing now, and a decision on the issue has probably already been reached, since the budget has to go to the printer any day now.

Therefore, it is probably already a done deal and the Minister of Finance is probably now in the process of announcing to his provincial counterparts how he intends to reduce the amount of money they receive, and trying to have them believe that he is telling them good news.

What the government is essentially trying to do is to regroup certain transfer payments. Education, health and Canada Assistance Plan transfer payments will be grouped together and added up. What the government will be doing is an addition of sorts. The government will add up the amounts and say to Quebec or another province: "This was what you received in the past, and now we will give it to you in one block payment. However, you will get a lot less, because we have to improve public finances. The rest is up to you. You must decide where to cut, make unpopular choices, tell students their tuition fees will go up. You will bear the responsibility». That is essentially the message they want to convey, while trying to pass it off as decentralized federalism.

Will they cut the workforce which administers these programs here? I doubt it. Will they abolish national standards if they stop contributing financially? If they no longer make a financial contribution, will they forget about national standards? On what logical basis would we maintain national standards, although we know full well that the Liberal Party has this vision of national standards, centralized here and equal across the country, a single country, a single nation in their opinion?

It would be very surprising for them to really decentralize, but they try to convince people that this is flexible federalism. I said yesterday, and I still think today, that this type of federalism is so flexible that we are broke.

In conclusion, I will say a word about transfer payments to the provinces. If I remember correctly, transfer payments to the provinces have been cut by $48 billion since 1982, including $12 billion for Quebec alone, but that did not improve the government's financial situation. So we must not fall into the trap of thinking that this will do much to improve government finances. First of all, it is shifting the burden to the provinces. This will be hard on several provinces whose credit ratings are substantially lower than that of the federal government. The federal government's financial situation is worse, except that it is easy for them to generate revenue by collecting more taxes, but in theory only because people would not stand for it in practice.

This did not put government finances on a healthier footing and it is not a good approach. We must also look at job creation, an issue on which the government is very silent. It lacks a vision. In summary, yes to selective cutbacks, first in the administrative machinery, at the Department of National Defence. We must also collect unpaid taxes. We can achieve a real reduction in overlap, which provides much more effective ways to create a better climate and improve the economic situation. However, I doubt very much that this is the approach contemplated by the government and that concerns me a great deal. In any case, people will have to make choices soon and we will see which vision of society they prefer, especially in Quebec.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it was with considerable interest that I listened to and participated in the debate this morning. I listened closely to the speeches by the member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot and my colleague from Témiscamingue, for whom I have a great deal of respect. I do not always agree with them and I would even say that I am almost in complete disagreement with their option, but I do agree with one point that both members raised this morning, in this House.

The member for Témiscamingue has just concluded with the remark that flexible federalism, or a flexible status quo, if I may so describe it, is the cause of the problem we are now facing daily in Canada. In this regard, I am in complete agreement with him. It is because of the debt load that has plagued the country for years now.

I also agree with another of their observations, which is that the debt load and particularly the deficit we have had for a number of years are not the result of social programs.

There are two factors, first of all the debt load, which is very high, and the political uncertainty, which has resulted in an incredible jump in interest rates.

As the member has already pointed out, since the report was tabled in December there has been an increase of 300 base points, or 3 per cent. I would remind this House that an increase of 1 per cent represents an additional burden of 1.7 billion dollars. This is why, with the budget soon to be tabled, we are 12 to 14 billion dollars short of our objective to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of the gross domestic product.

I would like to put a question to my honourable colleague, who said that our problem is one of the main reasons why their future is brighter in an independent Quebec. I cannot believe that an independent Quebec will be in a better position to offer the services that taxpayers now receive.

Take the debt, for example. It is a very good example. The member for Saint–Hyacinthe told us himself this morning that he was prepared to absorb 25 per cent of the debt. Some economists say that this additional burden would drive the debt of an independent Quebec up to 215 billion dollars. That would be 123 per cent of its gross domestic product. There is no way that an independent Quebec can offer the same services that taxpayers are receiving today.

Could the member explain, for the benefit of all those who will soon have to make a decision, how he expects to offer the same services in an independent Quebec without extensive cuts, when the debt burden is so heavy and there is the risk of a premium on interest rates that would add to the load?

Mr. Brien: Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to answer my colleague who, I hope, will be living in that Quebec with us too. By then, I also hope we will be able to convince him because he seems to show a certain interest in that new Quebec.

First of all, I would like to make a few corrections in what he said about the causes of economic uncertainty. As a primary factor, and I hope this is an error, he cited the political situation as a cause of instability over the last year. May I remind him that the greatest instability in interest rates, when they increased the most, in April and May, that was in reaction to the federal budget when the stock markets recognized that public finance had no means to correct the situation. If he has stock market investments, he will be able to check as stock market performance and interest rates are very often at variance.

The federal budget and overall indebtedness are the first factor. Even if some people mention the uncertainty associated with a sovereign Quebec, this is not because of the political regime or because they have concerns about public finances in a sovereign Quebec in view of the present high Canadian deficit.

They themselves implicitly admit that it is the size of the Canadian deficit which causes uncertainty. This has nothing to do with politics. A sovereign Quebec with viable public finances would be of no concern whatsoever to financial markets.

He also stated that a sovereign Quebec would be responsible for 25 per cent of the debt and that my colleague had mentioned that this morning. He probably remembered part of what my colleague said. The latter probably said that this is what the Liberal and federalists would want. If I may give an example, the Bélanger–Campeau commission which examined this subject indicated that we de not share only one side of the balance sheet, we share the assets and the debt, both sides.

When we add this all up and look at it from an assets standpoint, we arrive at a figure of 18.5 per cent. Since we are contributing 23 per cent of federal government revenues, and taking on 18.5 per cent of the debt, this means a significant gain on top of savings in overlap. There will no longer be two departments of revenue, two departments of the environment, two departments of whatever. I could go on a long time. This will eliminate problems for business, which has to meet the different environmental standards of Ottawa and Quebec City, complete tonnes of forms, GST reports, QST reports. Our business people will use this time to concentrate on what they do best: improve the economy. This will be good for Quebec and good for Canada. I hope Canada's economy will be as strong as it can be, because Canada will be our principal trading partner.

I have no concerns about the viability of a sovereign Quebec. I am perhaps a bit more concerned, sincerely, about the viability of a Canada without Quebec, since it will have to redefine itself, and the process has not yet begun. It will be hard to adjust quickly.

Things are happening in Quebec. A lot of people are taking part in the regional commissions. They are expressing their ideas. They are describing their vision of Quebec in the future. And as I said, it is completely different from what I hear people talking about here. There, they are talking about equity, redistribution and social justice. Here, people are talking about reforms to social programs that involve cuts affecting the disadvantaged in order to improve public finances.

There are other ways to improve public finances, and I think the approach of a sovereign Quebec will show the way, and we can become an international example on how to turn public finances around and achieve sovereignty democratically. Quebec knowledge and know–how will become an international export.

[English]

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I cannot believe what I am hearing here today from this member of the Bloc. I think it is time he became accountable to this House, to the people in his constituency and to the people across the country because he is not being accountable.

This member has said that spending on social programs has not played a part and has not been the reason that we have a deficit in this country. I would like him to answer some very direct questions.

Total federal spending was about $163 billion last year. About $40 billion of that was interest payments on the debt. You are not going to make interest payments on the debt? About $80 billion was in the area of social program spending. About $43 billion was for all other government spending, including the cost of government, defence, Indian affairs and so.

Reform put out a detailed plan to cut $10 billion from that $43 billion and presented it to the finance minister and to the finance committee. I never heard members of the Bloc saying that they would cut more from that area. They complained they would not make the cuts that Reform has proposed to make out of that area. That means the Bloc is prepared to cut more out of this $80 billion in social program spending because there is no other place to make the cuts. That is reality.

I would like this member to start talking about reality. I want to ask him directly how he would propose to balance the budget using some fact without making cuts in the area of social program spending. I would like him to answer this in a way that will be believable to the people in his constituency and across the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): You have barely 30 seconds left.

Mr. Brien: I will be quick, Madam Speaker, and will ask my colleague to reread my speech, which he probably did not understand, because it was in French. Let him reread its translation.

I can see why someone who can only envision resolving the public finances issue through social spending cuts would be frustrated to see other people find other ways of resolving it. They know very well how hard a time they are having with it. Their ideas are not being accepted in Quebec and that probably frustrates them all the more.

It would be my pleasure to send him a copy of the finance committee's report, which contains the Bloc Quebecois' proposed solution to the public finances problem. I will tell him once again that it was certainly not the most needy who got us into our current debt situation. That is certainly not the case. Look at the past to see the reasons for the current debt level.

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Madam Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt. May I ask the hon. whether you are taking 20 minutes or splitting your time?

Mr. Simmons: The former. I intend to take most of the time allotted because it is an issue raised by my good friend from Capilano—Howe Sound, a gentleman who brings great credentials to the House and to the debate. However, he ought to use more of those credentials in formulating his motion but I will come to that a little later because the effort allowing us to debate this issue is applauded. For that I applaud my friend from Capilano—Howe Sound.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate because the motion does have its merits. I am confident that the merits of the motion will be addressed in the budget which is upcoming.

Unfortunately, however, I have to say to him that the motion is also a bit tainted in several areas by a bit of simplistic thinking. I would have expected something different from him. It is tainted by a search for panaceas that if we do this and this, all of our problems will go away. I do not think he believes that.

Let me emphasize that the government knows full well that Canadians believe taxes are already too high. We agree with them on that. We would get a certain impression if we saw some people trying to start a tax revolt or in Mackenzie King's famous statement: "There go my troops. I must rush out to lead them". I am not sure which it is, whether they want to start the revolt, join the revolt or what. It is either naive or treacherous as the case may be but you decide, Madam Speaker.

Our priority objectives as a government are to stimulate economic growth while putting in place some real fiscal discipline. It is this double barrelled thrust that will ultimately allow us to reduce taxes in the years to come.

Let us remember that the tax and deficit relationship is a two way street. Every dollar of deficit borrowing we accept today will lead to higher taxes tomorrow. Every dollar we can trim from the deficit is a step on the road to keeping the tax burden down.

That is why the government's 1994 budget was in many ways a tax reform and a tax reduction budget. It included measures to eliminate loopholes and to increase tax system fairness and equity. It also committed to direct action to bring down unemployment insurance premiums, a payroll tax that acts as a real barrier to new job creation.

It was also a tax reduction budget because of the firm commitment made by the Minister of Finance to cut the deficit to 3 per cent of the economy in three years. Again, let me make this central point. Fiscal discipline is the key to long term tax reduction in two ways. Obviously the less we have to borrow, the less we have to tax to repay the loan and its interest.

There is another important dimension to this process. Controlling government's appetite for debt is our fundamental tool for getting interest rates back down. Lower interest rates mean lower carrying costs on our $500 billion debt. Again that means fewer tax dollars that we need to spend.

I understand the tax fatigue that so many Canadians feel. I can appreciate that some may be cynical about the possibility of measures that add to tax revenues today in order to let us cut taxes in future.

That is why the 1994 budget undertook a program of net spending reduction over three years that is the most significant of any budget in a decade. Over 80 per cent of the net fiscal improvement delivered by the 1994 budget over three years came from spending cuts.

In other words, there was $5 in spending cuts for every dollar of new revenue increase. Obviously I am not in a position to talk about the measures that will be set out in the forthcoming budget, but the Minister of Finance has already made it clear that he will rely overwhelmingly on spending cuts to achieve his fiscal targets.

Lower taxes are important and this government is committed to working toward that. In the process we cannot ignore the facts. The views expressed by the opposition on the issue of taxation appear to be partly driven by a belief that Canadians bear one of the highest tax burdens in the world, but there is more political grandstanding than truth in that particular perception.

The Canadian tax foundation, a highly respected non–profit, non–partisan research organization, has recently made this clear. Among the 24 members of the OECD, an organization that includes most of the world's advanced industrial economies, Canada ranks 14th in total tax burden. That represents 36.5 per cent of our gross domestic product compared with the OECD average of 38.8 per cent.

I say to my friend from Wild Rose, if he heard the first part of my speech, yes it is a matter of concern. If the hon. member is going to vent his concern based on facts rather than fantasies he should first get at the facts. Among the 24 countries we are 14th in total tax burden.

Mr. Abbott: Who do we compete with? The U.S. is 29 per cent.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, they have to be given an opportunity to vent in a way they never can in caucus. We might as well let them do it here.

I would never dare be smug about Canada's tax burden. It should be clear by now that I am not endorsing high taxes. We have to face reality squarely which I believe supporters of this motion are failing to do.

When they make comparisons of Canada's tax burden it is typically vis–à–vis the United States. As much as I want lower taxes I have to point out that there are some flaws in that particular comparison with the United States. Contrary to what some hon. members would have us believe, lower taxes in the U.S. do not come without a cost, a financial cost and a human cost.

Take the example of medicare. Medical insurance represents a very substantial cost for millions of Americans and their employers. For the tens of millions without insurance a serious illness can spell personal and financial ruin. If members want to make the comparison between Canadians and Americans, what they ought to do in fairness is either when they are making comparisons deduct the taxes in respect of which we pay for medicare or alternately when they look at the American tax total add in the medical care costs which are hidden in the sense that they are not tax dollars, they are funded elsewhere but represent a cost on the pocket nevertheless.

They are comparing apples and oranges. Either compare the American and Canadian system with medicare written in or with medicare written out. They will find that they do not have such a tax holiday as my good friend would like to suggest.

The point I am making is twofold. First, we have to avoid making comparisons that are simplistic and specious and I would go so far as to say dishonest because they compare apples and oranges. Second, we have to realize that while the opposition's position on taxes sounds a lot like a call for motherhood, it is about a lot more than taxes. It is about the kind of government, the kind of society that we want in Canada.

I can tell the House how to reduce taxes, bring them way down. Sock it to all the poor people, sock it to all the disadvantaged, do away with our medicare system and so on. There is a way to get ever lower taxes. Low taxation, small government versus big government are not objectives in themselves. None of these is an objective in itself. What they do for society ought to be the objective, what they accomplish.

If we are going to go to the extreme of having small government for the sake of small government, I can tell the House how we can make it really small. Let us have no government at all, none.

I take it you have all written in to forfeit your pensions.

• (1355)

The Minister of Finance has said very clearly that government cannot and should not do everything. We too want—

An hon. member: He does not do anything.

An hon. member: They do nothing except spend money.

Mr. Simmons: Can I get that in writing? He says the government does not do anything. He could have fooled me when I heard his leader yesterday in the House of Commons. I thought he was saying we are doing all kinds of terrible things. Get together, guys. I do not want a fight, especially on Valentine's Day. Let us not have a fight among the kissing cousins in the same caucus. He says we do nothing and the other member says we do a lot. Which is it?

Mr. Abbott: A lot of nothing.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member needs a new writer.

The government was elected to bring the people of Canada leaner, smarter and more efficient government. Even my friend from Elk Island believes that. We were not mandated to wholly eviscerate government.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): What does that mean?

Mr. Simmons: As soon as I find out, I will let the member know.

We were not elected to eviscerate, to cut out the you know what of government without regard to the important job it must and can fulfil both today and in the longer term.

The difficulty if we operate from the premise that we do not need a government, as this crowd obviously does, is we have difficulty seeing the wisdom in anything the government does. I happen to believe we need some government.

Mr. Abbott: Some.

Mr. Simmons: Yes, some government and some good government. I say to my friend that we not only have some government, we have good government. The program review we are undertaking is one of the ways in which the government is bringing about smaller, efficient, effective government.

In the last budget the government launched a review of each and every program. Departments were asked to justify programs and activities on the basis of several tests.

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

TOUGHLOVE

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today in my riding of Halifax West many volunteers are out doing fundraising efforts for TOUGHLOVE Canada, a non–profit organization that counsels families in the use of non–violent discipline to resolve behavioural problems with troubled teenagers.

Many doctors, psychiatrists, psychologists, parents, teachers and police in my riding have attested to the success of this program in dealing with these troubled teenagers. They have used these methods to change the behaviour of these troubled teenagers and create happier, healthier families.

Halifax West is the home of the national headquarters of TOUGHLOVE Canada. I want to wish these volunteers well in their worthwhile efforts.

MEMBER FOR SAINT–HENRI—WESTMOUNT

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): "What a victory", Mr. Speaker. "What a victory!" These were the words of Lucienne Robillard, a former minister in the Bourassa government, on being elected as member for Saint–Henri—Westmount in a by–election in which only 30 per cent of registered voters turned out. What a victory indeed.

It reflects little glory on Mrs. Robillard, who systematically refused to take part in any debate during the campaign. For her, the by–election was a mere formality, somewhat like being appointed to the Senate by the Prime Minister. Let us hope she knows which door is which when she comes to Ottawa.

She will have to explain statements she made earlier as the Quebec minister for health and education, when she fought against federal interference in these sectors. Does she no longer stand by these statements, which are at odds with the present federal government's approach to social program reform?

DEPOSIT INSURANCE

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I monitored the work of the Senate committee which studied deposit insurance in the collapse of Confederation Life.

In commenting on the white paper tabled on February 9 by the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions, I believe the secretary of state missed a great opportunity by not recommending some minor form of co–insurance in relation to deposit insurance.

It is vital that discipline be brought to Canada's financial institutions, but discipline must start with the consumer. If the minister had seized this opportunity, then discipline would begin with the consumer and flow through to the institution itself.

In relation to the changes suggested for life insurance companies I hope those who comment on this paper will ask this fundamental question: If the changes suggested were in place in 1990 would Confederation Life have gone bankrupt? It is against this question that the success or failure of these recommendations must be measured.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, February 15, represents the 30th anniversary of Canada's national flag. It is with a great sense of pride that I rise to pay tribute to this momentous day.

Since its inception in 1965 the red maple leaf has become a familiar sight both here and around the world. Whether emblazoned on the shoulders of our peacekeepers, proudly represented by our athletes, or worn by our children, Canada's flag is the defining symbol for the spirit of our people. It has come to represent a united, proud and confident nation. For people all over the world the maple leaf is regarded as a symbol of peace and compassion. It represents tolerance and hope.

On this special anniversary I urge all members of Parliament and in particular our friends in the Bloc Quebecois to reflect on what it means to be a Canadian.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, salaries as high as $250,000 for a university professor or $400,000 for a hospital president are reported in an article in the Sunday Toronto Star.

Taxpayers are also footing the bill for subsidized housing, company cars and undisclosed travel and expense accounts, all without the scrutiny of public accounting.

This situation must change. As the federal government provides a large proportion of funds to the provinces for secondary education and health care, we must ensure that accountability is made a matter of public knowledge.

YOUTH

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Mr. Jim Coombs, who is a member of my riding of Don Valley North, and the board of directors of Eva's Place, North York's first emergency shelter for youth.

It is most encouraging that Canadians understand and appreciate the role which young people play in our society.

The government has been addressing the needs of young Canadians, those often referred to as generation x. In September 1993 there were about 420,000 unemployed young people in Canada. Since the government took office the number of unemployed youth has been reduced by 60,000. The government is committed to creating more jobs for youth and bringing more youth back into the economy.

We must ensure that our young people have the best possible opportunities to lead productive and self–sufficient lives because they are the future of our country.

Eva's Place is a positive step toward addressing the needs and concerns of homeless, abused and often alienated youth. Once again I applaud the board of directors and urge the government to take notice of their achievements.

RIDING OF BROME—MISSISQUOI

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the voters of Brome—Missisquoi exercised their democratic right. For Bloc Quebecois militants, the result is much less disappointing than our political adversaries would like to think. Let it not be forgotten that in the vote on the Charlottetown accord, Brome—Missisquoi was one of the few ridings to vote in favour.

Yesterday the Bloc took 44.5 per cent of the vote, an increase of almost 4 per cent since the general election in October 1993.

The Bloc and its sovereignist option have gained in popularity. In the riding of Brome—Missisquoi, the real loser was the leader of the Conservative Party, with only 3 per cent of the vote.

PETRO–CANADA

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want Canadians to know that Petro–Canada has altered the lives of seven–year old Laura Curtis and her parents forever, through an environmental disaster in Fredericton, New Brunswick.

I want Canadians to know that Petro–Canada has wrongly altered the lives of Roger and Marlene Chapates forever through a similar environmental disaster in Jedore, Nova Scotia.

I want Canadians to know that Petro–Canada is abusing its power with many dealers, including Tom Daly of Saint John, New Brunswick and Barry Deacon of Kamloops, British Columbia.

I want Canadians to know that the Liberals are aware of these very serious problems but do nothing.

Most importantly, I want Petro–Canada to know that we want a judicial inquiry into its operations. After the next election our government will hold no shares in this company which states it is committed to Canadians.

LAND CLAIMS AGREEMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on February 14, 1973, the late Elijah Harper came to Ottawa to present the first Yukon land claims agreement.

I am pleased that 22 years later, through the efforts of many aboriginal people from the Yukon, from successive governments of different political parties, today we see the proclamation of the Yukon land claims self–government and surface rights legislation.

This is an historic day for all Yukoners. They will benefit from the stability that it gives to our territory and from the respect and dignity it gives First Nations within our territory. Also it has implications for the rest of Canada and for the unity debate that we are once again entering into.

With the Yukon land claims proclamation we see that we can respect other cultures, languages, historical traditions and governments and do it under the flag of Canada.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is the 30th anniversary of the Canadian flag, a flag which commands respect around the world for what it represents: a wealthy and tolerant country that is open to others.

By celebrating the 30th anniversary we acknowledge the richness of our country and of its people. We recognize what we have been as a country, what we are today as a nation and what we can become by working together to improve the quality of life of all citizens, particularly those who have less.

Tomorrow Canadians everywhere from coast to coast to coast will raise their flag with immense pride.

CYPRUS

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the recess I and other parliamentarians had the opportunity to visit the Republic of Cyprus as members of the Canada–Cyprus Parliamentary Committee.

For years I had read and spoken about the Cyprus issue. However, I could never have imagined feeling the way I did that day as I looked on to the ghost town of Famagusta, occupied by Turkish troops since the invasion of the island in 1974, more than 20 years ago.

To this day there are still 1,619 missing persons, 200,000 displaced people. Religious and archaeological sites continue to be desecrated.

[Translation]

As members of Parliament in a country that has always defended human rights, we have a duty to rise against any violation of these rights. Furthermore, Canada must make every effort to convince our southern neighbours and the international community that it is important to find a fair and viable solution to the Cyprus problem.

[English]

It is my hope that I can return to Cyprus one day and see a reunited Cyprus and visit Famagusta and Kirinia, admire the view from the Pendahtila mountains and taste the fresh oranges from the orange groves of Morphou.

MEMBER FOR OTTAWA—VANIER

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure as president of the Liberal caucus of Eastern Ontario to welcome our new colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. Even though he has not yet been sworn in as a member of Parliament, Mr. Bélanger attended our caucus meeting at 7.45 this morning.

[English]

Our new colleague brings a great deal of valuable business and political experience to Parliament. He has worked on the Hill. He knows Ottawa and the national capital region well.

It must be rare for a new MP to attend an official meeting before breakfast on the morning after a tough election campaign.

• (1410)

Mr. Bélanger's willingness to serve augers well for the future of this House. The positive results of all last evening's byelections auger well for the future of Canada.

Bienvenue and welcome to the new member for Ottawa—Vanier, Mauril Bélanger.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, many representatives of national cultural institutions and arts organizations are participating in a cultural sector summit to discuss the future of the artistic community.

In the meantime, the federal government seeks to help spread Canadian culture through its foreign policy. How can it make such a claim when, at the national level, it is slashing the arts and culture budgets, in particular at Telefilm and the CBC?

This government even has the nerve to undertake phoney, improvised and botched consultations through the Canada Council to ask artists where it should make further cuts.

The heritage minister's complicity speaks volumes about this government's respect for culture and the artistic community.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of attending and speaking at a tax rally alert last night in St. Catharines sponsored by the Canadian Taxpayers Federation.

The event drew an overflow crowd of some 800 concerned taxpayers with a strong message for the finance minister: "No new or increased taxes". Several of those in attendance spoke about where they felt spending cuts could be made and how important it was for the government to understand it has a spending problem and not a revenue problem.

As a result of this addiction to tax and spend, our debt clock this morning was $549,892,000,000.

The crowd's reaction to the reported comment of the revenue minister that the government will not be influenced by protests was one of the loudest of the rally, second only to a demand for cuts, not scrapes, to our MP pension plan.

You choose to ignore the people we work for at your peril. No longer are Canadians prepared to roll over and take it from politicians who are not listening.

SAINT–HENRI—WESTMOUNT AND BROME—MISSISQUOI

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely proud and happy today to draw attention to the fine victories achieved by Lucienne Robillard in Saint–Henri—Westmount and by Denis Paradis in the by–election in Brome—Missisquoi last night.

In addition to underscoring the hard work by the members of his team, Mr. Paradis' victory is a strong warning to separatist forces. It is also a good indicator of the mood of the people of Quebec in this period before the referendum, whatever one might say. Quebecers will not be fooled by separatist rhetoric. They are well aware of the issues in this debate. The many still unanswered questions about an independent Quebec in year one contributed as well to this victory by the Liberal Party.

This message the people of the ridings of Brome—Missisquoi and Saint–Henri—Westmount have given to the separatist forces should encourage the Quebec minister of finance to present his famous year one budget. Quebecers will then have an opportunity to see the hidden face of independence for the first time.

Mr. Speaker, the third period is well underway, and Canadians are in the lead.

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is an historic day for all residents of the Yukon, indeed for all Canadians. Today the Yukon Land Claims, Self–Government and Surface Rights Board Acts come into effect marking the culmination of a process that began exactly 22 years ago.

For Yukon First Nations this means a secure land and financial base, and greater control over their own affairs. For the Yukon territory as a whole this opens an era of greater stability and opportunity.

Today aboriginal and non–aboriginal Yukoners alike stand in partnership to celebrate this long awaited achievement. I am certain that hon. members will join me in extending congratulations to all residents of the Yukon on this historic day.

BYELECTIONS

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.):

We watched with great interest three byelections here;
Showing to Canadians that Liberals have naught to fear.
The seats were all so safe no one else need apply,
The rest should just watch hockey
No sense to even try.
Ha! we've got them on their haunches,
We'll drop the writ when no one's here,

Even if they wanted,
No votes for them, I fear. But when it comes to safe seats,
The Liberals should not feel too warm.
For Kevin Gaudet with his worthy team
Gave a glimpse of the Reform swarm.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Resign and we'll have a byelection.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, obviously to give the impression that he is always in control of his department, the minister of defence has called for the suspension of Major–General Brian Vernon, thereby throwing him to the wolves, using him as a scapegoat to calm public opinion. But Major–General Vernon should not bear the sole burden of responsibility for the incidents in Petawawa.

Does the minister of defence intend to suspend or relieve of their duties all officers in charge of the Airborne Regiment who took part in incidents violating army regulations or officers who failed to intervene to put a stop to such activities?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not obviously listen to answers that I have given before.

The removal of General Vernon was a decision taken by the chief of the defence staff. It is his and his alone. It is a decision in which I concurred.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, whereas I am accused of not listening to the answers, the minister does not listen to the questions; that is not what I asked.

Can the minister of defence—and I hope he will understand my second question better—confirm that the government will soon award the Order of Military Merit to Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward, the very person who was supposed to have cleaned up the Second Airborne Regiment of Petawawa and who was commander–in–chief at the time of the incidents recorded on the third video–cassette? Does he still intend to award the Order of Military Merit to this lieutenant–colonel?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that particular decoration was decided a number of months ago by a panel in the military following normal practices and will go ahead as planned.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister consider it normal that his minister of defence still intends to decorate Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward, the former commanding officer of the Second Airborne Regiment, and in fact to do so even before the start of the inquiry which is supposed to get to the bottom of the events in Petawawa? Does he consider that normal?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of defence just gave a very clear explanation. If I heard him right, his peers decided to award that individual the decoration. That will not prevent the committee from asking him the appropriate questions when he comes before the commission.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of defence.

The latest information revealed regarding the Petawawa incidents shows that the minister of defence does not know what is going on in his department. Incidentally, we have been waiting, since last fall, for a reply from the minister regarding the use of an Airbus A–310 by generals who went to Florida to go play a game of golf during Operation William Tell.

Will the minister of defence tell us whether he knows anything about the Canadian army's Eagle River exercise?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of question, as you have advised members before, that should be reflected in an Order Paper approach rather than in question period.

• (1420)

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, once again, I will have to tell the minister what is going on in his department. How can the minister of defence, in this time of fiscal restraint, not realize that the Eagle River exercise was a sham, designed to hide a sumptuous fishing trip to Labrador for senior officers of the Canadian army, at a cost of over $1.6 million for taxpayers in 1993?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, certainly as far as I am concerned this is the type of question that should be for the Order Paper. When it is put down we will give all the details and costs of any particular program.

I remember some facility in Labrador was closed a couple of years ago. It had the name eagle in it. Perhaps this is the one. Certainly I will take notice of the question and get back to the hon. member.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the provincial finance ministers are meeting with the federal finance minister to discuss the federal budget.

At least half the provincial finance ministers are doing a better job at balancing their budgets than the federal government. One of their greatest concerns is that the federal government will simply offload its own debt problem on the backs of the provinces, particularly those that have managed their finances efficiently.

My question is for the Prime Minister. What assurances could he give to fiscally responsible provinces that their reward is not simply going to be an offloading of the federal debt?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just want to tell the member that he should wait to see the budget. We have set some extremely clear goals and we will meet them all.

[Translation]

Since I have the floor, I would like to applaud everyone who voted in the by–elections yesterday and all of the candidates from all parties who ran. In particular, I would like to congratulate the three Liberals who won.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Liberal Premier Clyde Wells of Newfoundland said that the best thing the federal government could do would be to stop direct spending in such areas as education, health and forestry. He argued that all these services could be better provided at less cost by the levels of government closest to the public.

Will the Prime Minister follow the Newfoundland premier's advice and give the provinces real control over these areas including appropriate tax points? In other words, will he make clear his government's philosophy on decentralization including the transfer of tax points to the provinces?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member's arithmetic works. If we do not spend and we give tax points, the deficit remains at exactly the same level. If we are not collecting and we are not paying, it is exactly the same. You should have checked that before asking the question.

The Speaker: I remind all hon. members to address the Chair.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's replies are hardly inspiring confidence. The provincial premiers have joined thousands of Canadians in saying no to tax increases, no to new taxes, and no to tax grabs in the name of tax equity.

As provinces like Alberta, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan reduce their deficits their citizens are looking for tax relief. The last thing they need to see is a tax grab by a fiscally irresponsible federal government.

What assurances could the Prime Minister give to the citizens of those provinces that their reward for practising fiscal responsibility is not going to be a tax grab by a fiscally irresponsible federal government?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I said the Minister of Finance would bring in a budget very soon. It will be a very responsible budget.

When we talk with the provinces they know that the federal government has to do what is needed to control its deficit. They will benefit if we control our deficit because the Canadian bond rating will be better for everybody. They have an interest just like us that we do very well in the next budget.

Everybody knows that 3 per cent of the GDP for the deficit is a very reasonable level. I had a discussion yesterday with the chancellor of Austria who has exactly the same goal as we have in Canada.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, two weeks before budget day, the Minister of Finance is meeting his provincial counterparts. They will probably discuss further reductions in transfer payments to the provinces for social programs financing.

If I understood correctly what the Prime Minister said to the leader of the Reform Party just now, the government is really determined to offload its debt problems on the backs of the provinces, since he just told the leader of the Reform Party that a transfer of responsibility for post–secondary education, health and social assistance would not entail a concomitant transfer of tax points to the provinces. That is what we understood from the Prime Minister's reply.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the provinces asks us to stop paying, we will be glad to oblige.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I certainly did not expect an answer like that to a serious question, but I will control myself for your sake.

Can the Prime Minister promise, and this is a serious matter, that the measures in the upcoming budget will not constitute an outright offloading of the government's responsibilities on the backs of the provinces? This is walking away from responsibility. It is not decentralization.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every day, the hon. member rises in the House to ask us to cut spending. If we cut spending, we cut. If he tells us to cut spending and transfer the money, we are back to square one. We are going to cut a lot of spending and we are going to try to achieve our objectives, and we will. We will do what it takes.

Discussions are being held with the provinces. We will try to reach an agreement the best way we can. Yesterday, Premier Wells said: stop sending us money for our forests. I am not going to argue with Mr. Wells. If he does not want money for his forests, we will not send him any.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, under the justice minister's gun control legislation tabled earlier today hundreds of thousands of firearms legally acquired by law–abiding citizens will now be effectively confiscated.

How does the minister justify his government's confiscation of private property?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is fundamentally flawed. There is nothing in the bill that confiscates firearms.

The bill is intended to enhance criminal sanctions, to crack down on the criminal misuse of guns and to achieve the sort of control any reasonable society wants to ensure public safety.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I contend that the justice minister's plan is fundamentally flawed. Under his plan these individuals will only be allowed to transfer their guns to the crown, to the police or to a few authorized businesses that are licensed to acquire prohibited firearms.

Could the justice minister tell the thousands of responsible gun owners who now own these guns if they are going to get a fair price, considering he has drastically reduced the market?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance I am proud to say that the government has introduced today legislation that will be easily accepted by the vast majority of Canadians.

May I observe as well that the centre point of the plan that involves registration of all firearms has recently been reported to have the support of two out of three Albertans among others.

Last, may I draw the hon. member's attention to the bill we tabled today that makes clear those who own and possess prohibited firearms may continue to buy and sell among their own class so that their investment in those firearms is preserved.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

In her report on her investigation of firearms, coroner Anne–Marie David recommends to the Minister of Justice that shipments of arms stored and transported by importers be covered by specific legislation.

In view of the fact that, in Quebec alone, 1,502 imported revolvers and pistols were reported stolen in 1992 and 1993, how can the Minister of Justice claim to be tabling a bill that responds to needs, when he ignored the recommendation of coroner Anne–Marie David?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed in the hon. member's attitude toward this bill. On November 30, when we tabled our program, she found fault with it because we had no bill. Now that we have a bill, the hon. member is still not offering any constructive criticism. The hon. member knows full well that most Canadians, and Quebecers in particular, support these proposals.

[English]

I would suggest that if the hon. member has suggestions to make in committee to improve the bill that she do so, but that she stand today in this House with the majority of Canadians in favour of this bill instead of making individual criticisms when overall it meets the safety needs of Canadians.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the official opposition's criticism when his plan of action was unveiled in December, does the Minister of Justice still plan to allow the owners of the 13,000 automatic weapons registered in Canada, including 4,000 AK–47s, to keep them legally for the rest of their lives?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, according to the bill that was tabled today, all such paramilitary weapons will be prohibited.

They will be out of circulation at the end of the lives of those who now own them.

In the meantime, so that we do not "confiscate", to use the word of the hon. member from another province, they will be permitted to trade them, buy them and sell them among members of that same class. However, at the end of the day, in keeping with the policies and principles of the bill, those firearms will be out of circulation.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On December 1, 1994 one of my colleagues who was concerned about the detrimental effect the ban of .32 and .22 calibre handguns would have on the world cup shooting competitors who have trained at great expense and proudly represented this country, asked the minister this question: "Will the minister make a commitment to remove the .32 calibre handgun from this list of banned firearms?" The minister's response: "I most certainly will not". I ask the minister, what made him change his mind?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the .32 calibre handguns along with .25 calibre handguns will be prohibited by this legislation.

What we have made clear is that the unique firearm, used for example by Linda Thom in earning a gold medal at the 1984 Olympics, which is a .32–.22 interchangeable barrel Walther handgun, will be permitted.

Today we made clear that as we refer this bill to committee after second reading in this House, we are asking the committee to identify other handguns that are used in competitions sanctioned by the International Shooting Union so that legitimate competitions can continue.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I might advise the minister that the Liberal Party of Alberta opposes his proposal.

Nevertheless, inasmuch as the justice minister has changed his mind regarding the banning of handguns used in competitive shooting, what other areas of legislation is the minister prepared to change?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I hope it is evident not only to the hon. member but to everyone in this House and in the country that notwithstanding changes as reflected in the bill introduced today, the one thing that remains is our commitment to the principles of this policy.

• (1435)

Speaking of commitment to principles, the hon. member is a member of a party which prides itself as the law and order party in the House of Commons. I would like that party to explain why it opposes legislation which has the support of the police and the victims groups of this country.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The tenors of the federal government keep on repeating that we can make federalism more flexible without reforming the constitution, and that administrative agreements could suffice to settle the issue.

If the Prime Minister wants us to take him seriously, before the referendum, why has he refused to grant Quebec's requests regarding job training, and for the sake of efficiency, to finally acknowledge the consensus in Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we made the provincial government some offers on this issue several months ago. We could not grant all of their requests, and as the minister responsible for federal–provincial relations said, half a loaf of bread is better than none, and yet, they refused.

I know very well that she would remain a separatist even if we resolved the workforce issue. The question that should be asked in the referendum is: "Do you want to separate from Canada?" That is the question, and Quebecers will reply: "We want to stay in Canada, we do not want anything to do with the separatists".

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I detect in the Prime Minister's answer that he is interested in foiling the separatists, to the detriment of the unemployed, who are in need of job training.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that his government never planned to transfer responsibility for job training to Quebec, but on the contrary, that he intends to increase intervention in this area through his social program reforms, financing that intervention even more, perhaps even with surpluses from the unemployment insurance fund?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see flexible separatists, because in this case, she is asking to change the Canadian constitution. She is no longer talking about separation. So she is going to have to make up her mind eventually.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

At the most recent meeting of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, Canada won a critical vote to protect and share 60 per cent of the total allowable catch for Greenland halibut. Now the European Union is threatening to ignore this internationally respected conservation body and launch a formal objection. What does Canada intend to do in the face of this challenge?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

Indeed the fishermen of Canada were pleased when Canada was assigned by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization—

The Speaker: Colleagues, I would ask you please to respect both the questions and the answers. I am sure we want to hear both the questions and the answers and everything else which transpires here in the House. The hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, a noisy House is particularly difficult for quiet–spoken members like me.

Canadian fishermen indeed were pleased to receive from the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization 60 per cent of the turbot quota at the meeting in Brussels. They thought it appropriate that the Spanish fleet fishing under the EU flag received an appropriate level of allocation, in this case 13 per cent.

We want to work with the European Union to see this conservation plan put in place in a responsible fashion. The Department of Foreign Affairs has taken the lead in making Canada's view known.

• (1440)

We have heard reports that the EU may object to the NAFO decision and set unilateral quotas. That is not acceptable to Canada. The last time the EU set unilateral quotas they destroyed flatfish stocks and northern cod. Canada will not stand by and see more stocks destroyed.

CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

How many of the men who appeared in the August 1992 video and how many who appeared in the February 1993 video are still serving with the airborne regiment?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I was detained for a few moments. Perhaps the hon. member could repeat his question.

Mr. Frazer: Mr. Speaker, how many of the men who appeared in the August 1992 video and how many who appeared in the February 1993 video are still serving with the airborne regiment?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the actions in those videos are subject to investigation. Once we have the answers I will make them available to the hon. member.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows he could transfer everyone connected with those incidents and those in Somalia, but retain the regiment.

Has he considered that by disbanding the airborne he is unnecessarily inflicting upon the Canadian taxpayer millions of dollars in costs for relocating the personnel and their families, for dismantling the facility at Petawawa and for establishing a new facility for the new unit?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with all these questions three weeks ago. I am sorry the hon. member is now just addressing them.

With respect to operational costs, there probably will be some operational costs involved. On the other hand, most of the activity at CFB Petawawa will be retained simply because in the white paper we announced an augmentation of the army capability. Therefore those people in that particular area should not feel too badly from an economic point of view.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Another trade dispute is looming between Canada and the U.S., this time over eggs, poultry and dairy products, which are all subject to quotas. Such a dispute might hit agricultural producers in Quebec and Canada very hard.

Will the Minister for International Trade firmly reiterate Canada's position by arguing that its tariff schedule is totally consistent with the new GATT, now WTO, agreements and does he undertake not to make any concessions to the Americans on this issue?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the minister make a very clear, perhaps fuller, concrete commitment not to accept any reduction in the customs tariffs put in place by Canada, including those for yogurt and ice cream, or any other concession that would hurt the interests of poultry and dairy producers in Quebec and Canada?

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the specific question of ice cream and yogurt has been a matter of a GATT panel decision. We will take action in light of that decision.

Concerning the broader question of dairy and poultry, we will indeed pursue our basic position that—I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I do not want you to think I do not enjoy looking at you.

The Speaker: I want the hon. minister to know that the feeling is reciprocal.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, Canada will of course defend vigorously its fundamental position that the tariffication under the GATT takes precedence over NAFTA.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Quebec joins Alberta in thinking that the federal Minister of Health is wrong in her rigid rules on semiprivate clinics.

• (1445)

Health minister Rochon says: "Health is a provincial jurisdiction. It is not Marleau's place to determine".

Why does this health minister stick with a rigid centralist view of health care when the rest of the country wants flexibility and real reform?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the member to read the Canada Health Act. That is why we are doing it.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the premier of Newfoundland also agrees with Quebec. He says: "The federal government should stop interfering in provincial areas such as health. Provinces want flexibility. The citizens want flexibility". Has this health minister one single proposal to make Canada's health system more flexible?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member to go back and get a copy of the Canada Health Act and read it.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and the minister responsible for the national infrastructure program.

The national infrastructure program has been a catalyst for growth in Guelph—Wellington and in every community in Canada. Can the minister provide an update as to the status of the program and the number of jobs it has created in Ontario and in this country?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have more good news for the House.

We are not even half way through the funding allocation of this program. Already some 4,700 projects have been approved in Ontario, creating some 31,000 jobs. This is going a long way to putting Canadians back to work and strengthening the infrastructure in our communities and well on the way to the creation of 100,000 jobs.

I think it says to the premier of Ontario that he is out to lunch when he says that we are not focused on jobs. That is our number one priority.

TAINTED BLOOD

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Tomorrow, Judge Krever will submit to the cabinet his interim report on the activities surrounding the blood supply system in Canada.

In order to ensure at least a minimum of openness, can the minister undertake to release the Krever Commission's interim report as soon as it is submitted to cabinet?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Judge Krever's report is not presented to me personally but to cabinet. We will, of course, respond as quickly as possible.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister claim to be restoring Canadians' confidence in their blood supply system when she is not even willing to make this report public as soon as it is presented to cabinet?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me reassure the hon. member and every Canadian that we have not waited to take action. We have taken a number of very decisive steps to ensure the safety of the blood supply in Canada.

When the report is received we will respond quickly. We will respond with all appropriate action to ensure that not only is the blood supply system in this country as good as everyone else's but that it is the best in the world.

SYDNEY TAR PONDS

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the clean up of the Sydney tar ponds in Nova Scotia is under a dark cloud.

The tar ponds, described as Canada's worst environmental disaster, were exempted by the previous government from an environmental assessment.

Because of this deadly blunder the list of compounds and their concentrations in the tar ponds is not fully known. In addition, the toxic coke oven site is not included in the clean ups and the ability of the incinerator to destroy PCBs is in question.

Given these severe limitations, will the environment minister order a full environmental assessment of the Sydney tar ponds project, including the coke oven site and the incineration process?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can repeat to the hon. member that the federal Ministry of the Environment will be working very closely with the province of Nova Scotia to ensure that the CCME guidelines that were adopted in 1992 on hazardous waste incineration, that is stronger, more stringent guidelines, will be applied. We will be working with the province to monitor its application to ensure the health and the safety of all of the residents around the Sydney tar ponds.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is only part of the problem. A full environmental assessment needs to look at all the problems, including the coke ovens.

Yesterday the minister replied that the tar ponds project was operating within CCME guidelines. The minister's answer is inconsistent with the 1994 consultant's report which lists federal guidelines and compares them with the tar ponds operating permit, showing many discrepancies.

Will the minister explain the glaring inconsistencies between the tar ponds consultant's report and her answer yesterday?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the tar ponds operating permit was established in 1988 it was established according to available environmental guidelines at that time.

When in 1992 the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment improved the guidelines to ensure that they were more stringent with respect to PCB incineration, the project in Nova Scotia in question was voluntarily submitted to those guidelines.

As I stated yesterday and in my previous answer, we are working with the Government of Nova Scotia to ensure that not only the incineration be below the acceptable guidelines but also that the regulations generally be changed to reflect that.

SUGAR

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Will the Prime Minister reassure this House that he will raise the matter of further American restrictions of Canadian sugar and sugar containing products that are endangering our sugar industry when he meets with President Clinton later this month? Will the Prime Minister stand up for Canadians whose jobs are at risk because of American protectionism?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): The answer is oui.

RAIL TRANSPORT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development and has to do with Mr. Hope's report on the rail negotiations which the minister has now had for about a week.

When will the minister be releasing the report? Many railway workers have been waiting a long time for this matter to be resolved and they want to see this matter resolved. When will he be releasing the report and when will he tell the Minister of Transport to stop acting like the minister for the CNR or the CPR and tell the Minister of Transport to keep his big nose out of these negotiations?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member was using a figure of speech. I hope we will not resort to these types of remarks. The hon. Minister of Human Resources Development.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have always been a great admirer of the distinguished profile of my colleague, the Minister of Transport, and so I certainly have no intention of undertaking any effort to probe his proboscis.

On the more serious matter, I would like to report that I have received a copy of commissioner Hope's report. Because of the significance and impact we are studying it very carefully. We also will have to submit it for translation so that it is available in both official languages. We would want to depose the report as quickly as possible so that we can get on with the negotiations and discussions.

I say to my hon. friend that there is nothing to stop the parties coming to an agreement without that report if they want to really get down to the brass tacks and negotiate a new deal for the railways.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to follow up on the question of the minister's profile but I do want to follow up on the question I asked the minister responsible for labour about what he is going to do about the fact that the Minister of Transport is taking a position in these negotiations identical to that of the companies.

This is not what the Minister of Transport is supposed to do. It is what the minister of labour should object to if he wants to protect the integrity of that process.

What will the Minister of Human Resources Development be telling his colleague in this respect?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of the minister of labour is to ensure that the Canada Labour Code is properly honoured and recognized by both management and labour in the conduct of their affairs and in their discussions, which we are doing dutifully and properly, and that where there are disputes, we are also here to represent the public interest and to make sure that we can resolve these disputes on the basis which will ensure that all Canadians are served well.

CHECHNYA

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were extremely happy to hear this morning that a ceasefire has been reached in the terrible war in Chechnya. Like most Canadians, I have been horrified by the brutal violence and bloodshed that have marked this war.

Can the Minister of Foreign Affairs inform the House what the ceasefire will mean for the efforts to establish a lasting peace in this area of the world?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, quite clearly we are happy to see that at last there is a ceasefire. We hope that this will be the prelude to intensive negotiations that will lead to lasting piece in that part of Russia.

Clearly, as the hon. member has indicated, we are concerned for the civilians who have been terribly affected by this war. We are in consultation with the international Red Cross in order to assist civilians who have been affected.

PATRONAGE APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

Mr. René Cormier, a member of the Canadian Pension Commission, has been on paid leave, not sick leave, not for a few weeks or a few months, but for over one year. Will the minister please explain to Canadians suffering under crippling tax burdens how this situation involving a political appointee at $100,000 a year can be justified?

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (Secretary of State (Veterans), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. colleagues that it is before the courts and will be settled shortly.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I hope we do not need a fourth video for someone to take action.

My supplemental question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The minister expects Canadians to take him seriously when he talks of reforms to the public service while political patronage appointments like Mr. Cormier are paid for over a year at the taxpayers' expense without doing a thing.

Would it not be a good idea to establish exactly how many redundant political appointments are out there and show some leadership by example by cutting redundant patronage positions before asking productive public servants to take cuts?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to have the last word today.

In response to the hon. member, we have made a review of all order in council appointments. Hundreds of have been cut since this government has taken charge. We are reviewing all of these appointments. We have reduced them and we intend to continue to do so.

In the case of this individual, as the Minister of State for Veterans said, it is a problem which is before the courts at the moment.

OVERLAP AND DUPLICATION

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last week, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said that most of the $5.9 million budget for its department's task force on Canadian unity had been used to finance studies on duplication and overlap between federal and provincial programs.

Considering the numerous questions asked by the Official Opposition regarding waste due to duplication and overlap, will the minister agree to release the studies conducted by its department and table them in the House?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we currently have action plans with eight provinces and two territories to reduce duplication. Over the last year, we signed 64 agreements with the provinces and the territories and they are all public. Consequently, we have no problem with letting the opposition marvel at such achievements.

• (1500)

By September 12, 1994, eight agreements had been concluded with Quebec. Of course, there have not been any since, but we continue to use money to reduce duplication and overlap. We do not talk about it: We do it.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

The Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the hon. Wayne Adams, Minister of Supply and Services of the province of Nova Scotia.

With him today is the hon. Ross Bragg, Minister responsible for Economic Development and Tourism of the province of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I should like to clarify a statement I made earlier today. When I referred to a very strong and respect Indian leader in Yukon I had meant to say Elijah Smith and inadvertently said the late Elijah Harper.

I certainly express my regrets to the hon. member for Churchill for having made that error. I am reminded of Shakespeare's statement that we come to praise Caesar, not to bury him. I express my regrets to the member.

WAYS AND MEANS

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table a notice of a ways and means motion to amend the Income Tax Act, and I ask that an order of the day be designated for consideration of the motion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, 12 years ago a Boeing 767 flying from Montreal to Edmonton nearly crashed over northwestern Ontario. This near tragedy was not a result of a mechanical failure or a powerful prairie thunderstorm. It simply ran out of gas.

In its statement the airline placed the blame for this emergency on human error involved in converting the fuel measurement from imperial to metric amounts. It was only the skill of the pilot that manoeuvred the drifting aircraft to a safe landing. At 30,000 feet refuelling is no longer an option. The fate of the passengers lay in the hands of leadership. Interestingly enough the airline was Air Canada.

Canada as a nation is like that aircraft. Our ship of state is in trouble, not because of some internal mechanical malfunction but because of human error.

The world has changed to a new competitive economy. The rules have changed but our ground crew still does not know how to make the conversion. After two decades of human error air Canada is drifting. Our financial reserves are empty and Canadians, the passengers, are deeply concerned about their future and safety. The only problem is that at this moment the incompetent ground crew is still flying the aeroplane.

Each one of us knows that personal security is vitally important to Canadians. Ours is a compassionate society. We all want to know that our friends, families, neighbours and ourselves will be taken care of during times of need. Yet somehow after 30 years of ballooning government spending on social programs we have been left with less security rather than more. Why is this so?

Let me save the suspense by answering my own question. Canadians feel more insecure now than ever before because government overspending has robbed them of their personal security. The welfare state has failed. Just as communism and socialism crumbled after a 75–year experiment, our own 25–year social digression has come to a painful conclusion.

Canadians are beginning to realize that the welfare state is not working and that it is time to re–evaluate the government's role in providing social security to individuals. The greatest single danger to the personal security of Canadians comes from the financial unsustainability of social programs currently monopolized by government. They are unsustainable if we have to borrow money to pay for them, which is exactly what successive governments have done for the last 25 years.

Thanks to such irresponsible management the federal debt is now over $530 billion and provincial and municipal governments owe another $190 billion. Instead of providing peace of mind these programs and their associated debt have left Canadians feeling anxious about this, about their and their families' futures.

Why have Canada's debt and deficit left Canadians feeling anxious and insecure about their futures? The reason Canadians feel such concern is that after being deceived for so long, led to believe that government would look after them and take care of them from cradle to grave, they have come to realize they are now relying on a bankrupt state. They have come to realize the interest payments on the debt have become so large and are growing so fast that it is beginning to crowd out the social programs that have protected them for nearly a generation.

The greatest risks to Canada's social fabric are the threats of annual deficits and a rising national debt which over the past 30 years has crowded out many legitimate expenditures of governments.

We have borrowed so much over the last 25 years and accumulated so much debt that all the money we borrow this year will be used to pay interest on our federal debt. When it comes to government there are no free lunches. In fact compound interest make the ultimate cost of what government is borrowing very costly indeed; in fact more costly than if we had paid for them outright, if we had paid our own way to begin with.

Effectively interest payments are crowding out programs. Money that could be used to help Canadians is simply not available to us because we have to pay our interest obligations. Interest payment on the debt is now the single largest expenditure item for many governments, depleting resources for public investments in health, education and infrastructure. As we continue to borrow, our debt increases as does the interest, leaving even less money for essential programs.

Where does all this debt and compound interest leave Canadians? It leaves us paying more taxes while at the same time receiving fewer services. Canada's debt burden is both eating up a substantial portion of current tax dollars and reducing the ability of all levels of government to provide essential social services. Can we understand now why Canadians are concerned?

How did we get into this mess? Whose human error or ignorance while working with ground support has brought us to a place of flying empty at 30,000 feet? Who could the passengers of our drifting air Canada hold responsible for bringing them into such a dangerous predicament?

It just so happens the ground support staff has been promoted to captain and crew. Is that not a comforting thought? The very ones who got us into this mess are now in control. Meanwhile, Captain Chrétien sails serenely on committing ordinary Canadians to a perpetual stream of more interest. Ironically it was the Trudeau Liberal government of which Mr. Chrétien was a member and a one–time finance minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I remind the House that during any intervention while referring to any member of the government cabinet we refer to the position or the office. In this case it is the right hon. Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance as opposed to the individual's name.

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, ironically it was the Trudeau Liberal government of which the present Prime Minister was a member and a one–time finance minister that first sold Canadians on the myth that big government could solve most of our problems. What they never made clear was that they would pay for this by heavy taxation and borrowing from future generations.

For more than a quarter of a century Canadians have been encouraged to increasingly rely on government and they have done just that. The disastrous consequences of these Liberal policies are now threatening the well–being of society.

As a co–pilot and former ground support staffer, the failure of the human resources minister to reform social programs to make them target better and cost less is a failure that all Canadians will pay for in the form of higher taxes.

We need to fight the debt and deficit not to hurt people but to help them, to free them from the chains of insecurity, the links of which are made of debt and interest payments. The welfare state is sinking under the weight of its own waste, inefficiency and disabling dependency.

Fundamental reform and renewal of our social security framework are absolutely imperative if we are to have any hope of sustaining our existing high quality of life, providing Canadian youth with opportunities rather than simply an unmanageable financial obligation, and continuing to help the poor and needy among us.

The government intends to continue to borrow billions of dollars every year. Extra interest must then be paid on each year's borrowings. Each extra dollar in interest is a dollar taken out of our economy, a dollar that could have been used to expand a business, take advantage of trade opportunities or hire an unemployed Canadian.

Let us imagine what Canadians could have done with the over $40 billion we had to pay out of our pockets in interest last year alone. Let us imagine the health care it would have paid for or the poor whose basic needs could have been met. Let us imagine the education and training that $40 billion could have provided or the help to our seniors who live in poverty.

The government should act now before interest drains our social security further and further every year, get a grip on its spending, find more effective ways to deliver the services we require, and let us get on with the job of building a secure society for ourselves and our children.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Calgary North who I thought gave a fine presentation. Seemingly she is concerned about finding somebody to blame for our past problems and our budgetary situation today.

I note that all western democracies, all OECD countries, increased their deficits during this period of time. Clearly we would not blame the Prime Minister or our party for the debts of the rest of the world.

I do not think it is fair realistically to go back and study history. What we want and what the people of Canada want are solutions. I am surprised by an opposition party that has no solutions. All I heard were complaints. All I heard were problems. There were no solutions.

• (1515)

There is one thing I would like to know as a bottom line from my hon. colleagues in the Reform Party. They want to basically allocate social spending to the provinces, give up tax points to the provinces. What is the end result of this philosophy? Ten balkanized countries within Canada? What about standards, health standards, labour standards? What is it that makes a country?

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, there were a lot of questions in that intervention. I would be happy to address them.

My hon. colleague says that Canada was not the only one that ran up a debt, that everyone else did too, so why pick on us. I do not know about you, Mr. Speaker, but your mother was probably like mine. She used to say to me: "If all your friends jump off a bridge, does that mean you are going to too?". We are not responsible for other countries. The leadership of our country is responsible for us. It has not done a very responsible job of looking after our interests in the long term.

Members opposite are always pleading for solutions from our party. We have worked hard to provide them with solutions. We will even be providing them with an alternative budget which is something no opposition party has ever done before.

I would suggest to the hon. member that perhaps he and his party need to work a little harder to provide some solutions. They should provide some glimmer of reform solutions to the people of Canada. I might add that solutions in the social policy area were promised loud and long and have never been delivered on.

Members opposite need to realize that if tax points were given to the provinces in order to allow them to have more control over the social programs in their provinces, the tax points grow as the tax base of the province grows. The tax base, the economies of our provinces and our country have been growing.

Once we give provinces tax points, their potential tax base actually expands, many over time. They actually have more hope of funding their programs long term and having a continuing source of revenue than if they were dependent on transfers from the federal government. As we have seen, transfers can be cut or are very uncertain. Provinces that have their own tax base to draw from are much more secure—and my economist colleague is nodding so I think I have this right—than if they are totally dependent on whatever largesse the federal government might decide to give them from time to time.

My colleague mentions fears that if there is not a centralist government, a tightly controlled federation from the centre which has always been the Liberal vision of this country, that somehow things will go to hell in a hand basket. I might point out to him that things are not too far from going to hell in a hand basket with the centralist vision having been very firmly in place for the last 25 years.

Surely we can do no worse than to trust those governments which are closest to us the people. We have the most impact on those and we can influence them more effectively than distant, federal central governments. If we could have more say and more influence over our own local governments, we would be a lot better off than we are today.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak to our supply motion which demands that the government respond to the demands of Canadians with spending cuts and not net tax increases.

Currently we are engaged in one of the greatest threats to our society and economy. It is not something that comes from without, but something that comes from within our own boundaries. It is not the deficit spending but the debt, that massive summation of overspending that has gone on for at least two decades that seeks to compromise every aspect of our society, every aspect of our economy and seeks to affect every individual in this country from coast to coast.

What is the magnitude of this debt? Many people talk about the federal debt being $550 billion. They do not include the provincial debt of $220 billion, the municipal debt of several billion, and unfunded liabilities such as CPP in the order of $500 billion. What does this do? The combination of all this amounts to over $1.2 trillion. This debt is ever increasing and causes us to pay increasing amounts of interest from the public purse on this.

The government takes in about $120 billion every year and spends about $160 billion which means a deficit of about $40 billion. It is interesting because this amount is actually the amount of interest we borrow every year to pay on our debt. The government also spends out of this $40 billion on government services and about $80 billion on social programs.

As the debt increases we have larger interest payments to make which must come from one of two sources, either increased taxes or a boost in the economy. The increased taxes will either come from companies or from individuals.

If you are an individual it decreases your ability to spend money which has a downward effect on the economy. Similarly, if members speak to businesses in their communities they will find they cannot hire more people, they cannot do more research, they cannot do any more development, they cannot expand. Therefore it has a depressing and downward effect on the economy.

The citizens of Canada have sent a clear message to every member of Parliament: No new taxes; get the economic house in order; and make the necessary cuts in expenditures to do this because our taxes are already too high.

The government has said it will cut expenditures to 3 per cent of GDP, but I submit this is an element of intellectual dishonesty. This comes from the Maastricht negotiations where it was said that the combined amounts should be 3 per cent of the net debt, not the federal debt, but the accumulated debt which in this country is over $1 trillion.

If we adhere to what this government wishes to do, over a period of three years we will add at least $100 billion to the debt and further increase the amount of interest payments we have to make every year.

Even if we balance the budget, and we should look at the New Zealand experiment, there will be no change in interest payments over the short term and these expenditures will continue, but we do not have a choice in the matter. If we look at New Zealand now, some 10 years after its economic downturn, we see a country that is booming, a country that has one of the most aggressive and positive economies in the world. The reason it did this was because it was forced to the wall to get its economic house in order.

We do not necessarily want to go the way of New Zealand. We do not want a solution foisted upon us from outside the country by the international financial institutions. We would like to have a made in Canada solution, a solution which makes cuts that are sensitive and sensible without affecting the poorest of the poor in order to save the core of our social programs and to keep the economy we have come to know.

Our role in opposition is not to continually criticize, as the member from the other party mentioned just a few minutes ago. We have put forth a constructive and specific program to this government on how and where to make the necessary decreases in government expenditures. In other words, we have put forward constructive alternatives which very few opposition parties in the history of Parliament have ever done.

Initially, our financial group looked at government operations and removed $10 billion from that. Further, it decided to make cuts of $15 billion to $18 billion from social programs. The rest we would need in order to balance the budget would come from a 3 per cent growth in the economy.

Contrary to what has been put forward in the media, we are not a slash and burn party. Rather we are putting forth constructive and sensitive cuts in order to preserve the core of social programs in order to minimize the effect it will have on those who are most disadvantaged in our society.

Be aware that if we do not make these necessary changes now while we are in an economic upturn, we will have to do it in an economic downturn. That, my colleagues, will be one which is going to affect those who are least advantaged the most.

• (1525)

As I said before, our financial group has put forth a very constructive and specific plan in making these decreases to expenditures. The first priority is that we in this House must set an example. As a result of that we say: Let us make the cuts from the top first.

First we spoke about revamping MP pension plans and time and time again we have presented to this government specific ways in which to do that.

We have also advocated a 15 per cent cut to our budgets and eliminating excessive travel by members of Parliament. Just as an aside, each of us in this House can actually do this. In my office we found that by booking early and looking for deals we have decreased the amount of travel expenditures by 60 per cent from the average MP. If we all did this, it would be a considerable saving to the taxpayer.

We also say in this party that we must prioritize the funding to ensure that those aspects of government that are essential, that is, health care, education and law enforcement, are of the highest priority in terms of spending. We must also decrease duplication between the federal and provincial governments for savings of roughly $3.5 billion.

Some examples are eliminating the Official Languages Act which would save $310 million, to such things as eliminating official multiculturalism. Just as an aside I would like to say that this policy is one of the most divisive policies in the country.

Rather than concentrating on those things that bind us together as individuals it concentrates on our differences.

Speaking as an immigrant to this country, one who is very proud to have had the ability to come here and live here, this country offers so many things to all different peoples. One of the beauties of this country is that we are one of the few countries in the world which has been able to merge together over 160 different ethnic groups into a relatively heterogeneous group in peace. It is something as Canadians we ought to be proud of. Our new Governor General actually made a point of mentioning this in his installation speech which I was very grateful to hear.

Another aspect in our financial plan has been to stop subsidizing businesses and special interest groups to the tune of $3.7 billion a year. When we speak to businesses in the community they do not want handouts. They want a stable economy, a stable dollar, a skilled workforce and good information about where they can capitalize on export markets.

I encourage our fellow members who sit on the foreign affairs committee and the foreign affairs and international trade department to please listen and devise ways in which companies in our country can aggressively take advantage of export markets. They are out there and we can do it. We are more than happy to help.

The cuts we propose are over three years. Again we have emphasized no new taxes.

Some studies recently have come out to say that we in Canada are not taxed that heavily. I would argue again that this is an example of intellectual dishonesty. What it looked at was an example of taxation as a percentage of GDP which has no relation whatsoever as to how this affects each individual Canadian.

What is perhaps more revealing is to look at how it would affect the average person on the street. In 1961 the average Canadian family paid 22 per cent of its income in taxes and the free tax day was May 3. In 1994 the average Canadian family paid 46 per cent of its income in taxes and the tax free day jumped 44 days to June 16. We are being taxed more. Just in the eight years these taxes per family have gone up $3,500. This is due to increased spending by governments.

The government has recommended and made rumblings on increases in taxes on gas, lottery winnings, dental and medical benefits, surtaxes on individuals and businesses, RRSPs, inheritance taxes, and so on. The public and we in this party have said time and time again: Do not do this; we will not allow it to happen.

We would ask the finance minister to please look very carefully at the well thought out and specific plans our financial group has put forth. Please adopt as many of these plans as possible to do. We are more than happy to help you get our economic house in order. I put that to you as an offer.

• (1530)

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca tell us a lot about federal expenditures. I must remind him that this has been going on for a long time and particularly since 1970, when the Liberal government of the time decided to centralize pretty well everything in Ottawa in an effort to boost the economy, so to speak. At that point in the 1970s, the government, by borrowing to create jobs and build up the economy, also caused the economy to overheat somewhat, which led to an appalling rate of inflation.

Do you remember the 1970s? Having created the inflation itself, the government was obliged to raise interest rates enough in the 1980s in order to reduce this appalling inflation, which had reached a rate of approximately 10 per cent per year. This means that the government created the inflation between 1970 and 1980. In 1980, it raised interest rates to reduce inflation and caused the recession. In 1984, the Conservatives continued to spend in the same way as the Liberals, who had set up certain projects to get through the recession between 1980 and 1984.

Between 1984 and 1990, the Conservative federal government continued to spend as the Liberals had between 1970 and 1980. They created more inflation, and, naturally, in 1990, they raised the interest rates and created another recession, which has lasted four or five years now.

It is easy enough to understand; this means that the federal government has caused all of Canada's problems. It is clear and precise. I will try to explain, in three minutes, that the real cause of the debt is the federal government itself which interfered in matters of no concern to it. It meddled in the economy, in all kinds of things.

I agree in principle with the Reform Party member who says that the federal government must stop some of its interference with the provinces if not most of it. And before him, the Reform Party member for Calgary–North said much the same. The government must disentangle itself and decentralize precisely to restore order in the country.

This is why I, for one, have taken the position that federalism has caused a tremendous amount of harm and has led Canada to bankruptcy and this is why I ask and we ask that Quebec become a sovereign nation in economic association with the rest of Canada, with Canada remaining as a type of committee or advisory board, a type of board responsible for managing areas the regions have in common. I would to hear the member's comments on this.

[English]

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the number of questions he poses.

We all know the history of the debt and deficit but rather than pointing fingers back in time we should look forward in the interests of all Canadians to put forward a constructive solution. I believe that is one of the things we have done.

Another issue that my hon. colleague mentions is the division between federal and provincial responsibilities. I will take but one example that is probably very close to his heart and that is the official languages policy. We in this party and people from coast to coast, including the people in Quebec, have said that the official languages policy has been a dismal failure.

We are saying we should give language responsibility to the provinces. If every province had that responsibility then they, the people inside the province, will determine what will be the language of choice in that area. It would reflect the regional bilingualism or unilingualism of an area. It would also save the taxpayer hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

To reiterate, the biggest threat we have to the social programs is continued overspending. What we are trying to do, what we are obligated to do in the interests of those who are most disadvantaged in our society is to ensure that we get spending under control to enable the government to have the money to spend on them.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate.

As I listen to the Reform Party and particularly the last speaker, I cannot help wondering if they believe in a country called Canada at all, believe in a sense of nationhood, in a society in which the public sector, the private sector all have a role to play. Do they believe in the kind of liberalism that has always defended the proper balance between those two roles but above all has stood for a sense of nationhood from coast to coast and not a patchwork quilt?

This debate provides us a good opportunity to bring Canadians and the Reform Party up to date on some of the very specific measures that the government has undertaken to control spending and to use their money prudently.

[Translation]

If the hon. members opposite would only take the time to look at the budget the Minister of Finance tabled last year and to add up all of the initiatives on public finances taken since, they would conclude that the motion is a little off the mark.

[English]

In that budget we made a start, but only a start, by reducing the deficit from $45.7 billion to $39.7 billion. This was done by cutting spending. There were $5 of cuts for every dollar of revenue action.

More important, we introduced a number of policies to stimulate job creation and the economy responded admirably. Since we came to office in November 1993, 413,000 new jobs have been created in Canada. I have to say on behalf of my own region that 13,400 of these were created in the national capital region in spite of expenditure reductions and government restraint. The Canadian economy is now out performing those of all G–7 countries and it is expected to do the same next year.

For clarity and conciseness, I will only comment on initiatives sponsored by the hon. Marcel Massé, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal.

[English]

These initiatives, in general an integral part of the government's overall approach of fiscally sound management, will themselves contribute in a substantial way to the longer term economic management of the country.

When the government took office, we realized that as a nation, we are confronted with change the magnitude of which we have never seen before. The changes that are occurring here, in other countries and in most spheres of human endeavour are ushering in an altogether new era.

It was obvious to us that the old methods of approaching and resolving problems were longer adequate. It was also obvious that, to continue serving the population well in the next century, we would have to change the very role the government played.

[English]

As a government, our agenda is clear: creating the conditions to sustain economic growth, facilitate the creation of new business and get people back to work. As a government, our message is clear. Government spending is being and will continue to be brought under control.

As a nation we have reached a point of no return where we no longer have alternatives. Postponing the hard decisions that are needed this year would merely postpone the inevitable need for more dramatic and disruptive action in the future.

My hon. colleague, the minister and the government caucus understand that any serious attempt at deficit reduction now and especially in the long term requires a basic restructuring of what government is and what government does. That is exactly what the minister has been doing this last year, looking at precisely how government can be restructured in such a way that it not only spends less but also concentrates on its core roles and responsibilities.

The full details, as we are all aware, will be announced in the forthcoming budget. However, the minister has looked at ways that government operations can be more focused, more client centred, more efficient and more cost effective. In a word, the kind of government Canadians want, at a price they can afford.

It is very obvious that Canadians have understood our intentions, that they agree with and support our approach. We need only look at the results of yesterday's byelections for confirmation of this. The voters in three riding enthusiastically endorsed the Liberal government's actions to create jobs and growth.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the Prime Minister asked Mr. Massé to lead a review of every department's programs, activities and expenditures. This initiative, known as a program review, covered approximately $47 billion in program spending.

[English]

The program review had three major objectives. The first was to strengthen the public administration of federal programs and services. Program review will lead to a smaller, more efficient federal government delivering high priority programs to Canadians.

The second objective was to make a contribution to the modernization of Canadian federalism. Program review will help ensure the federal government delivers only those programs and services it is best equipped to deliver.

The third objective was to help the government meet its fiscal objectives. Federal departments have recommended major reductions in program spending based on their priorities. In general, ministers proposed a range of program changes and consolidations which are to be implemented following the 1995 budget.

These changes are designed to ensure that departments discard non–core responsibilities. Similar programs and services are placed in a single department to achieve maximum efficiency. What has been done with pesticide control in recent days is a very good example of that.

Overlap and duplication among and between departments and jurisdictions is removed. New technologies are used to lower the cost of program delivery, while increasing service standards. Cost recovery and user fees are to be used to finance programs that provide economic benefits to clients and stakeholders.

Every sector of government activity—from transportation, farming and fisheries to energy, mines and forestry, as well as assistance to businesses, immigration, etc—was reviewed. Almost all federal departments will be called upon to restructure their programs and to concentrate their efforts on sectors of national or international importance, sectors which are in the general interest of the country. This was one of the program review's guiding principles.

[English]

Program review outcomes will provide clear and undeniable evidence that the federal government has confronted its fiscal pressures by getting its own fiscal house in order. The federal public service will be reduced significantly. Its size and functions will be brought into line with the federal government core roles arising from the program review.

This is and will continue to be a difficult period for public service employees right across the country and here in the national capital region. Local members of Parliament such as myself and the newly elected member for Ottawa—Vanier are all committed to ensuring that reductions in the public service workforce are managed in a fair, orderly way so as to reduce to an absolute minimum the stresses and disruptions to the lives of individuals affected.

As public service employees across this country hear horrendous stories about the magnitude of downsizing, I want it to be clear that we are not talking about huge numbers of public service employees losing their jobs. Financial compensation packages will be there. They will be fair and they will be adequate.

We will be flexible and imaginative in our approach. Every means at the disposal of government will be used to ease and facilitate the acquisition of new skills to make the transition to new careers as smooth and as complete as possible.

Let me illustrate how the program review will translate into specific actions by citing the Department of Transport as an example.

[Translation]

As the Minister of Transport said several times, the transportation system in Canada is too intrusive, subsidies are distorting trade and several parts of the system are in bad shape. Following the program review, Transport Canada will no longer own large parts of the system. It will no longer operate and finance them. Instead, it will focus on its fundamental responsibilities in terms of direction and regulation in order to ensure the safety of the transportation system.

[English]

Market discipline and business principles will be brought into the operation of transportation services. Costs will be reduced, overcapacity eliminated, regulations streamlined.

Another example is in the Department of Industry. The minister has announced that the era of providing subsidies to big business is ending. I am pleased to hear that the Reform Party supports that initiative of our government.

The private sector is the engine of economic growth and job creation. Nevertheless, the federal government will continue to have a significant role in creating the climate for business to be able to invest, innovate and compete for markets.

These are the types of sensible and meaningful improvements that will result right across government as a result of program review.

[Translation]

I would now like to draw the attention of members opposite to another similar initiative taken by the minister to make the federation more efficient by reducing overlap and duplication between the various levels of government.

[English]

Members will recall that at the first ministers meeting in December 1993 very shortly after our election, there was agreement to forge ahead on tackling specific issues and areas of shared responsibility or jurisdiction where overlap and duplication could be greatly reduced or eliminated altogether. Six months later, through a process of joint bilateral agreements, the two territories and eight of the provinces with one more coming on board signed action plans and set timeframes for concluding their work to get rid of overlap and duplication.

To really understand the type of improvements sought, let us consider the situation faced by the pulp and paper mills. They now have to deal with inspectors from the three levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal. We have agreed that, from now on, one inspector would be enough.

[English]

This is an example of the kind of sensible, meaningful activities which will result from the more than 50 action plans that have so far been signed between the federal government and the provinces. This work will continue. There will be more action plans in the months and years ahead as we continue to find ways to improve the efficiency of the federation.

It is important to underline that the reduction of overlap and duplication does not just result in savings. It also results in something as or more important and that is less government intervention on the individual and business and a more rational understandable environment in which to operate. That is not small change.

In addition to these two initiatives, the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal has also looked at the role, function, size and cost of more than 400 federal agencies, boards, commissions and advisory bodies.

Ministers have been asked to review the various organizations under their jurisdiction, in order to simplify the machinery of government, by eliminating the organizations which have become useless or inactive and by streamlining the others.

[English]

In undertaking this review of boards and commissions, there were no set targets. Rather, it was intended to identify sensible and practical changes to make government work better. I might also say that has also been our approach to the public service: not to set numerical targets and not to take the slash and burn approach, but to say what makes sense to make this government work better.

To return to the boards and commissions, the first phase of this initiative is already before the House as Bill C–65, legislation which will enable the government to eliminate or significantly streamline 22 agencies and advisory bodies. By doing this, 150 governor in council positions will be eliminated. In very real terms these measures will save taxpayers about $1.5 million a year.

That is only one step in that process. The minister will be returning to the House with a second omnibus bill which will conclude the work. At that time hundreds of additional governor in council positions will be eliminated at what is anticipated to be a savings of approximately $10 million.

As the minister said in the House last week, the government wants to ensure that federal agencies continue to be relevant, that they are serving Canadians as effectively as possible and also that sensible and practical actions are taken to eliminate overlap and duplication and simplify government wherever possible.

I have just described three impressive components of the overall approach taken by the government towards fiscal responsibility. I think it is important for members opposite to understand these initiatives and agree that, as is the case with all the measures taken by this government, these are thoughtful, rational and well–considered decisions.

[English]

Proposals for mindless, indiscriminate axing in spending do not work in the modern context. Such proposals are simple minded and damaging not just to the economy but to the people of this country. Protecting the vulnerable is an essential function of government and to this we are deeply committed.

Yet we must be fair to taxpayers. Fairness to taxpayers means eliminating abuse, eliminating the careless use of public funds, eliminating non–productive activities, reducing the size of government where possible and providing government that is not only affordable but answers to the real needs of citizens and of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will concur with me that the range of initiatives undertaken by the government meets the objectives of fairness, eliminates wasteful spending and builds a more co–operative approach to a better future for Canadians.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member talked about the cuts proposed in governor in council appointments and mentioned a figure with regard to that. It is very interesting that Bill C–51, which was before the House before Christmas, adds governor in council appointments and Bill C–61, which just passed second reading yesterday, adds governor in council appointments.

• (1555)

I would like to know if this figure the hon. member presented was net of the new appointments that have been added or is this more Liberal doublespeak?

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It gives me an opportunity to say that the world does not stay frozen in time and neither does this government.

Perhaps the hon. member wants to suggest there are no new and emerging needs where this or any government needs the wise advice of Canadians who bring special knowledge, special skills, special expertise and wisdom to the operations and the programs of the federal government. Or, where it makes sense, to open up new ways in which we can be advised and counselled by Canadians who are capable of keeping us informed and aware of broader issues than those we may address in this House. We welcome their contribution to the future of this country. At the same time we do not want to continue carrying out functions and making appointments simply for the sake of making appointments.

As I have said, we have a multi–stage process for getting rid of appointments which are no longer serving a purpose and agencies which no longer make a valuable or important contribution to the essential work of this government.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, once again, this member has brought up the issue of protecting the vulnerable. I suggest that the Liberals are trying to protect the vulnerable with fairy tales.

The difference between the Liberal approach and the Reform approach is that the Reform pragmatic approach is to take the necessary steps to ensure that we can protect those who are most vulnerable in our society.

This Liberal government by design is going to borrow more money in its lifetime to pay the interest on the money we have already borrowed, more money in its lifetime factored for inflation than we borrowed to fund the entire second world war. How in the world are we going to have the money to protect the most vulnerable?

The Liberals are simply trying to protect them euphemistically or with fairy tales rather than practically and by doing the things that need to be done to protect the vulnerable in our society.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party often says that in generalities and yet proposes programs and program cuts that would make victims and casualties of women, children, the disabled, and seniors in this country. That is what its programs would accomplish.

For the first time in 20 years, this government is going to reverse that pattern which the member talked about of increasing interest payments, increasing debt and increasing the burden on the future. For the first time this country and this House are going to see action instead of promises.

This country is not prepared to sacrifice on the altar of short term economic need those who most need to have a stake in the future of this country, those who most need the opportunity to develop their skills and their talents and the ability to be fully part of the Canadian economy and Canadian society.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have had several opportunities on the finance committee and elsewhere to tell witnesses the truth about the welfare program budget cuts that our party is recommending. There is no truth whatsoever to the allegation that we would not protect the truly needy in our society.

The OECD is a highly respected international organization of which Canada is a full standing member and has to approve its reports. It has said that Canada is an outstanding example of excessive generosity in welfare programs.

We are not talking about hitting the poor in this world and it is an untruth being told and repeated again and again here. We are talking about retargeting all the excessive spending that is going on. That is the truth. The rest is slandering.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, when I hear members of the Reform Party speak I sometimes wonder if they know any people who are poor, if they know any people who are vulnerable, if they know the women in my riding living in subsidized housing, working for minimum wage, supporting their families on welfare sometimes, trying very hard to raise children decently on an income of less than $12,000 a year.

I know those people. I would be happy to take the hon. member out to visit my riding to find out just how hard those people are working and what they need to support their dreams for the future and the dreams of their children.

It is also important to point out to this member and others in the Reform Party the cost of poverty. Getting our debt and deficit down does depend on ending poverty in this country. Poverty is expensive. Poverty costs. One out of every five children in this country is poor. That child is four times as likely to end up seriously ill than the child who is not poor. That means that one child simply because of poverty will cost the health care system in this country more than the other four non–poor children. We cannot get our debt and deficit under control unless we get people out of poverty.

Poor children are four times more likely to drop out of school. At the age of 15 they are out on the streets and five years later they have never held a job, they are living in poverty, they are perpetuating the cycle of poverty. That costs us money. When children in poverty drop out of school we pay the price. We pay the price in wasted lives and wasted productivity.

We cannot tackle the problem of the debt and deficit unless we tackle the problem of poverty in this country which costs us all every day.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will be taking the full period of time.

I have to start by addressing the last speaker and speakers before this. Nowhere is there any fact saying that we are not going to take care of the poorest of poor. We are talking about a whole plan, having a plan. The economic management that the member talks about, economic management that is going to add $100 billion to the debt in the next three years, is not management, it is suicide. That is going to hurt those poor and that is what is going to lose these programs more than anything else we might do.

It is like the cab driver said last night when I was in the cab. He said: "I have heard it all before. It doesn't matter what happens in these elections. It doesn't matter because they are all the same. They get there and they are not going to change a thing. They don't have a plan. They are not dedicated. They don't mean it. They just go and do the same thing".

While we hear all this double talk and all this talk about the poor and the tears roll down the eyes, they do not have a plan. There is nothing there. There is nothing behind it. It is just all more talk and I agree with that cab driver.

I heard another speaker say that these were simplistic approaches. Voters want it simple once in a while. They want somebody with a plan they can understand, not a bunch of legal double talk, a bunch of on in the future some place we are going to handle this problem of our debt and deficit. They want it done now and they mean now, right now, and that is what we are here talking about.

I come back to why I even came to this job. There are times we all wonder why we are here. The reason is the government was not listening. It was a top down kind of process that we had here. There was spending and waste. All of us knew about it and all of us were disgusted by the waste that we talked and heard about.

It does not really matter, we thought, what party one elects and I am coming to believe that. It does not matter whether it has the PC tag or the Liberal tag. They are all so much the same.

We send good people from home and those good people all of a sudden come back and tell us what the party says is best for us, it is what the party wants us to do. We are so hung up on this undemocratic party process in this place.

Probably the worst day since I have been here was February 22 last year. I felt like wearing a black arm band. We had a finance minister who gave us a budget or whatever it was, but it did not address anything that the people had been saying since 1984. It did not say anything about the debt and deficit, about what our foreign creditors were telling us. It did not address anything.

The government members said it did not have time, that it had only been here for three months. It should have had that plan in place long before the election was ever called.

We each had that sunken feeling on the 22nd and we said we are not going to let that happen again. You are going to see our alternate budget. You are going to see it before you see the finance minister's budget. You are going to get a chance to compare.

I challenge—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I want to remind colleagues in the House to make all their interventions through the Speaker. Basically if we are using the term "you" it is to the Speaker and I do not think that is the intent. I ask members to keep that in mind.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, what I challenge is that the government, our Prime Minister and our finance minister go on national television with the leader of our party and our finance critic and talk about and compare the two budgets, the budget of the finance minister and the budget that we are going to put out as an alternate. I challenge them to compare those in front of the Canadian people. That is what has to be done.

Let us go back to some of the history behind our problem. I have heard a lot here today. I have not heard a lot of people who seem to really understand very much or certainly could not communicate it to the people who really matter, the taxpayers.

In 1945 we had it pretty good. Europe was in shambles. Asia was in shambles and we were able to grow. We had no competition and we learned the good life. By 1965 we were well into the social experiment programs that we now all feel are threatened and are threatened because of the serious problem we are in.

We allowed government to replace family. We allowed government to replace individual initiative and we said government will take care of each of us. We will lead this good life. We will never have any problems.

What also happened then was that the other parts of the world rebuilt and started to compete. As they started to compete we had a cash shortfall. We had developed a system that we could no longer afford and therefore we started to borrow.

We continued to borrow. Members know where that has taken us today. We have a crisis. In 1984 we said we must change this government. Right across this whole land everybody said we have to change it. Except for a few of those sure seats, the Liberals were literally annihilated.

The belief was that the $289 billion would be dealt with and it would be dealt with now. By 1988 it was up over $390 billion and we were told we did not have time, it was a worse mess than we thought it was, et cetera. However, we were no longer believers in that sort of analysis, and so the birth of our party.

In 1993 we had a $489 billion debt and we were told the Liberals will come up with a plan, and so they did. From October 25, 1993 when the debt was $489 until the budget comes out this month it is going to be $550 billion. We have added another $61 billion to our debt. That is totally unacceptable. The people of Canada will not accept that. They are demanding that action be taken.

It is not good enough to say we will just add another $100 billion and then we will plan to get it under control some time in the future. That is not good enough. We have precipitated a crisis which we are being told about. The dollar is a good indicator. It was about 80 cents U.S. a year or so ago. Look where it is today and where it is going. We know where the interest rates were and where they are going today. Those are simply symptoms and warnings that we had better take action and it had better be soon.

The biggest threat to our social programs is from this debt and that is why we must deal with it. We must passionately convince the government that it must deal with it.

The double talk we have heard today, I am glad it was not from the finance minister or people from the finance committee. Hopefully they understand things better.

We are going to lose pensions, UIC, social programs and education. All of those things are going to be threatened. Not because of any party or because some members take the slash and burn position. They learned that about a year ago and they have not stopped saying it. We are going to lose those programs because of the debt and those interest payments. Then what happens?

There is foreign control. I think we should talk about that. We should look at what just happened to Mexico. Mexico has lost its sovereignty for probably 50 years into the future. Does Canada want to lose its sovereignty? Does Canada want to give up its control of water? We have to look at all of those things. Our sovereignty is being threatened by that debt and deficit.

What do our good friends across the way propose? They have floated trial balloons. They talked about raising gas prices 1.5 cents per litre. That should hit just about everyone, including those poor families trying to earn a living. It is going to hit everybody. That comes from the finance committee.

Taxing RRSPs, that is pretty good. We are encouraging people to take care of themselves and all of a sudden we are going to tax something that goes against this. Dental and medical plans, surtaxes and surcharges on income. Changing the GST to a VAT. Are we going to change that? How high is it going to go? A lot of people predict it will go to 12 per cent. Maybe 15 per cent would be a better number. That is going to hit everybody, not just the rich we so often hear about.

What about a carbon tax? Give it any name you like, I do not think it is dead yet. If any kind of unity is to be promoted in this country it had better be put to rest once and for all.

What are the solutions? There has to be a light at the end of the tunnel. There has to be. That cab driver we talked about has to know there is a solution. He cannot simply say there is no hope, I hate politicians, I hate politics, I have no use for them all. In a couple of ridings only 30 per cent of people voted. That is a disgrace. That is the frustration of people who are saying it does not matter anymore, you are all the same, you are not dealing with the issue. That is not fiscal management. That is no management at all.

The money markets are telling us very clearly to get our act together. They are telling us by the dollar. They are telling us by interest rates. They are telling us to cut spending, do not raise taxes, do whatever to encourage the country but do something.

The public is telling us a lot also. Listen to the messages the public is getting. On February 11 in the Vancouver Sun, a quote from the revenue minister: "Protest all you want, Canadians, but you are not going to change the final look of the coming federal budget". They are saying that they will listen to what the people are saying, but here is someone saying: "Protest all you want, Canadians. We are not going to change our minds. We are not going to listen to you".

We might just ask the member from Transcona what message the people gave him in Winnipeg the other day as they drove him from the stage. What was the message yesterday? What was the message in Toronto? What was the message in Vancouver? What was the message in Halifax?

The message is for the government to get its act together and cut spending. We hear: "Yes, we are going to. Yes, we will". We have heard that before. We have heard that for years and years and it has not happened. The public is saying that the government should cut spending, stop listening to special interest groups and stop waste.

I knocked on doors in some of the poorer sections of Montreal, for the benefit of the member who was talking about that, and the universal thing everybody said was: "Get rid of the Senate. Get rid of that waste. It is an embarrassment". I should have said the other place. They asked us to get rid of it or change it because it is not working.

Another item was MPs' pensions. They asked us to have the courage to lead from the top. They want us to do something and not get stand around making promises. For 15 or 16 months we have been talking about doing something. We cannot go after the public of Canada without doing something here.

They are asking us to do something about the perks and the GST the Liberals promised they would change. How about the international travel that goes on in this place and the parliamentary associations that are going on junkets every other week, heading off all over the place and maybe taking their wives for cost? That touches a nerve ending. Nobody wants to talk about it because it is something we can get away with; it is one of the perks because we have such low pay.

We could try to tell the poor people about whom the minister was talking about the pay MPs receive. How about the eight or nine levels of management versus those levels in a company? Companies right sized long ago. Companies got down to two or three levels of management. I challenge anybody here to go to big corporations and ask them how much management they have. They have two or three levels while this place has eight or nine levels of management protecting themselves. They are not going to be cut. A few at the top will go but they will not be cut down to anything.

Let us look at the other waste that goes on here. All of us go downstairs in the Confederation Building. Has anyone ever wondered why we have a round of marble seven feet in the air in the new renovations over there? Does anyone know how much marble costs? Why is it there? It is there because the bureaucrats are not use to trying to save any money.

A lot of waste goes on in this place. Let us talk about it. Anything would be better than the kind of waste we have. That is what taxpayers are demanding. They want us to get waste under control. The public has lost confidence in the government and politicians. It is saying that we should cut spending and have no new taxes. That message is everywhere.

That message is not just in Canada. That message is in all democratic countries around the world. They are sending the same message. We can learn that lesson. There are lots of places from where we can take examples. People are demanding results. People have finally taken control of the situation.

What would happen if we had a government that would listen and bring about those massive spending cuts that are essential and eliminate the waste that is going on? We would have the confidence of the people, of businesses and of international investors. We would have jobs. We would have growth and the economy would boom. There would be extra income, more money coming in from taxation, and we would be able to start dealing with the real problem, namely our huge debt.

Above all, to get the trust of the general public of Canada back we must enact legislation, a taxpayer protection act that puts a cap on government spending so that this can never happen again. We can never let government do this to the Canadian people again. We have had 30 years of this and it has to stop.

Let us examine what might happen in this situation. There has been a lot of speculating on the other side so I will speculate for a minute. Look at the old line parties first. Let us start with the PCs. To examine the PCs there are three books that might help us. I would suggest that Beyond the Law might be a place to start. On the Take might be another interesting piece of reading. Underground Nation by Diane Francis might be good reading too for finding out what has happened because of extra taxes. That pretty well takes care of the PCs. I guess last night confirmed that.

What about the Liberals? The Liberals started this whole thing. Of course they still feel good and are happy. They are saying: "Maybe we can grow our way out of this problem. It should be fine. Hopefully we will be okay".

Then we have the NDP. Its socialist Utopia has not worked any place in the world so we can dispel that.

We know the Reform Party must be different. We have a situation wherein it is the people versus the elite. Who are the elite? We have talked about the elite a lot before. It is the national media. Certainly it is the old line political parties, the bureaucrats at the top and in many cases big business and banks. Those kinds of people are all part of the elite.

What are the people saying about all of this? They are saying: "We won't take it any more. If you keep spending you are going to pay". The message should be loud and clear. The people's power should be obvious to everyone here but it is not. The last message was in the referendum. The elite to the very last person said: "Vote yes. It will be good for you". However the people said: "No way". The people found out about it. They worked on it, got information and made their decision. They were not heard that well, though.

In 1993 there was another message. We know what that resulted in. What do we have to look at? The people are saying reduce and the government is saying increase. On pensions the people are saying eliminate and the government is saying modify. On the Senate the people are saying abolish and the government is saying ignore and promote. On RRSPs the people are saying raise and promote and the government is saying: "Maybe we will tax them". On jobs the people are saying: "More money should be in the hands of people" and the government is saying: "We will have infrastructure and more bureaucracy. The government can, after all, still take care of you".

In conclusion I quote from Terry Moore, a radio announcer in Calgary:

> We have had it, and you have got to get a handle on this and attack the debt and deficit in Canada and quit playing political games with our future, our children's future, our grandchildren's future and our great–grandchildren's future—because if you don't pull it together, this country will go down the tube.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member's comments. It is fair to summarize by indicating that members of the Reform Party will continue to raise spectres, rumours, innuendo and tax revolts. They will continue to say they are going to do many good things.

However, the important point is that Reform Party members have been tinkering around the edges. They have ignored and failed to explain to Canadians how they are going to deal with their $15 billion cut in social programs. They have not articulated a specific initiative by which they would deal with social programs. They have not told Canadians the truth about what they really have planned for Canada.

We have a source for what Reform Party members plan. I want to give an example. It is articulated in their minority report included in the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development report that was tabled last Monday. I refer the House to their first three recommendations.

The first concerns the guaranteed income supplement in which 40 per cent of seniors participate. They are recommending increasing the age of eligibility. On old age security they are saying: "Eliminate old age security for seniors who have above average incomes". On the Canada pension plan they are recommending raising the retirement age, raising the age of eligibility.

It is fairly clear that the true agenda of members of the Reform Party is slash and burn. If they do not believe our seniors represent a significant portion of the poor in our country they have lost touch with Canadians.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, if I were the finance minister I would say to wait until next week, but I will try to answer the question.

The member can wait until next week but he will see that those in need have to be totally taken care of. People at the upper end who do not need it are quite willing to accept their share of the responsibility to get the country going. They are saying that as long as it is equal and fair they will take those cuts. However the people at the bottom will have to be taken care of. The most needy can never be out on the streets, as the member would like to portray. Next week he will see the exact details of what we are talking about.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my friend's presentation. I agree with him, our financial situation is critical, but there are solutions nevertheless.

A while ago, I heard him speak of the Progressive Conservative Party which I believe is part of history. I think that when you are really optimistic, whether you are a government party, a person or a group, you look to the future. Therefore, we must widen our horizons and determine what aspects of our taxation system can be changed.

For example, since we are here to represent the population, I think it is important that we propose solutions whenever we criticize. I do believe that together we will succeed in addressing the problem of the enormous deficit of our country.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I agree with him 100 per cent that we should not be tinkering around the edges and that we should look at some major reforms, certainly a flat tax system, a new system of taxation that is much fairer than the present tax system with all its exemptions and exceptions. This is something Canadians are asking for and the House should be entertaining as soon as possible. It should be a part of the exercise as we look to fix our finances.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I also listened closely to the speech of the hon. member. Like all the members who took the floor today—I have been sitting here all day, although I never intervened—I agree that the Canadian situation is very difficult right now.

I also think that the government has a tendency to study, to set up committees, to ask for reports and, generally speaking, to postpone any decision. For 20 years we have heard the same speeches from the various ministers of finance. We could take any of them and reissue them, they are all the same.

There are two opposition parties in the House. The Bloc Quebecois proposes a very clear option: let us review completely the Canadian taxation policy. We sincerely believe that without a complete overhaul of taxation we are going nowhere fast.

The Reform Party's option is to cut deeply where it really matters, into social programs. Unlike my Liberal friends, I do not believe that our Reform colleagues are fundamentally evil. I think they have done a serious economic study of the situation.

• (1630)

[English]

If the Reform and the Bloc parties do not do anything, Canada is going to go bankrupt right away. We have to do something.

I would like to ask a question of my colleague on an economic matter. Most people know that we want to make Quebec sovereign and we seriously think that this will become true within a few months from now.

Most Canadians actually believe in two assumptions concerning Quebec. The first is we are a bunch of troublemakers, politically speaking, because we are never happy with what we get. Second, we receive much more money from Canada than what we put in. A lot of people believe these assumptions.

I would like to ask this question of my colleague. Does he not think that a sovereign Quebec would be part of the solution for Canada, depending of course that we take out of Canada our fair share of the debts and assets? That is exactly what we intend to do. Would this not be part of the solution for Canada?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, certainly we agree with a lot of the things that were said.

More important, what I have learned from visiting Quebec a number of times is that the problems in Quebec are the same as the problems in Alberta or in any other part of Canada. We are all the same. We are concerned about the debt and deficit. We are concerned about crime. We are concerned about all of the same things. We are the same. That is the first myth that we have to dispel, that there is any difference between us because there is not.

The people in my part of the country do not hate the people of Quebec. The people in Quebec certainly do not hate the people of Alberta. We need to dispel these myths.

Economically, I believe firmly that as members of the G–7, in negotiating world trade as we are now actively doing, that the bigger the unit the better we are going to be economically.

I hope that the people of Quebec look at the big picture. We are going to be a trading unit of the Americas. I have said that in this House a lot of times. North and South America together are a trading unit. The smaller the unit the more difficult it will be balancing our budgets and taking care of our people.

We have to look at the big picture. The big picture says that the EU is going to get common currency and is going to come together more and more, that the seven tigers of the Orient are going to come together more and more and that the Americas are going to come together more and more. Rather than thinking of little units we should be thinking about bigger units. That is really the success of this country. This is the best country in the world and we need to save it with Quebec.

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that it is a pleasure to participate in the debate on the motion tabled by the hon. member for Capilano—Howe Sound.

As a member of the Standing Committee on Finance the items that are included in the member's motion have been front and centre on my personal agenda for well over a year. There is a reason for that. The reason is that our government understands and takes very seriously the fiscal circumstances that face this nation. We are committed to working responsibly to manage the deficit and the debt and to responding to the needs and the interests of Canadians.

We are doing that in a very dynamic way. It is that process that I would like to refer to in my comments here this afternoon.

About a year ago the Minister of Finance came to us in the House and invited us all to participate in the first ever prebudget debate. He invited us as members to bring the concerns, the issues, the strategy, the direction of our constituents, Canadians, to this House of Commons and share them with him.

That process worked very well. That debate was very energized. It was informative. I know that the minister took a lot away from that day in the House and included it in his subsequent budget, our first budget as a government, that I would remind the House included a number of things. It included issues of tax fairness where we got rid of the $100,000 capital gains exemption. More important and more particular, for every dollar that we raised in revenues there were $5 saved in spending cuts, a five to one ratio.

The process has continued in a very dynamic way. In October 1994 the Minister of Finance came to the Standing Committee on Finance and presented a very articulate and clear understanding of his view of the economic forecast for our nation. At the same time, he talked about the fiscal circumstances that we faced then and face right now. He enjoined the members of the committee to take this information and share it in detail with Canadians and to begin the first ever prebudget consultations.

That consultation process started here in Ottawa with a panel of experts from the economy, from banking, from the social sector, from the NGOs. We sat around the table and talked about the economic assumptions in the minister's papers. We talked about the strategies of spending cuts versus revenue measures. We talked about the spending cuts that might be appropriate, those that would be inappropriate, the tax measures that might be appropriate and those that might be inappropriate.

From there and armed with a lot of information, the committee members fanned out across the nation. We talked to hundreds of Canadians. We went to communities like Lunenburg and Hamilton. In Hamilton I had the great fortune to chair the session.

We did something a little different. Rather than just hear individual witnesses, we encouraged Canadians as individuals to come to sit with us around the table. They took a very short time, two, three minutes, to position their particular areas of interest, their particular concerns. Some of these people came with presentations from groups. Some came merely as individuals interested in the process.

We sat together and we encouraged and invited them to talk with each other, to do their best to build consensus, to try to find and agree on the things that Canadians say we need to do to deal with the fiscal situation that we face.

As this process continued and coincident with it, members and colleagues of mine went back to their ridings and had town hall meetings with their own constituents, asking the same questions. Tell us about the assumptions. Tell us about spending cuts versus revenue measures. Members brought that data back to the minister who I know will read them and respond probably after the budget when he can not only comment on their suggestions but on his thinking around where he agreed and where he made some different choices.

I had one of these meetings. It is my second annual meeting and what I found in my riding was very interesting. Last year, I had 20 people out to my forum. It was a very interesting and informative night but only 20 people were there.

This year there were over 100 people. The message to me from my constituents was that they appreciated the process the government was taking. They believed that the government is listening to them, that it will take what they are saying and deal with it to build a consensus, a balanced strategy to help the country restore itself to fiscal stability.

The other thing that proved to me that this was so was that the whole thing was done without cost. The room was donated. The microphone system was donated. The coffee and donuts were donated. The community said: "This is important to us. This is significant for us. We believe in this process".

We did not have to charge Canadians $1 a shot to phone in on the 1–900 number. People were invited to come and share free of charge their concerns and their interests.

Over the course of the last five months we have been engaging Canadians in a very participatory and involved strategy. It makes a difference. Canadians want to be a part of this. They want to be heard.

What are the messages we have heard over the last while? Very clearly we found consensus that we must deal with the deficit and the debt. There is no question. Second, there is general agreement that it is far preferable to focus on the spending side and to reduce spending than it is to do a lot on the revenue measures side.

When I gave a speech in my riding last week I said to my constituents, "We are listening. We hear you. We understand the importance of spending cuts. But please understand what you are saying. You may think that your tax dollars are being burned in the fireplace and going up in smoke. Yes, there are places where we have to do a better job, where we have to cut back and where we have to be more efficient, but there are many programs that are helping Canadians". Those programs are helping groups in my community. They may be cut. As a result we have to be prepared to be compassionate.

With that in mind I would like to turn to some of the recommendations which were made by the standing committee. The first recommendation, which I strongly agree with, is that we must deal with the issue of MPs' pensions. I look forward to the President of the Treasury Board presenting that legislation, sooner rather than later, because I believe that as we members have to show as these spending cuts come into effect—and they are going to be an impact—that we too are part of the process.

The other thing which we recommended as part of the committee report was that we must start with government operations. Government must take the responsibility to look at itself, improve its efficiencies, improve the quality of the programming that we are providing to Canadians and do it less expensively. We have to understand there are going to be cuts in the public service. People are going to be affected.

I have been involved in downsizing programs in the private sector. There are good ones and there are bad ones. The ones that work recognize that the people who are affected really have nothing to do with the growth in the business or in the government. They are not guilty; however, they are the ones who will have to make changes.

I know that the Canadian taxpayer as a good employer will want to provide to the people who are leaving packages which allow them to leave with respect and dignity. These packages will cost money. It would be totally inappropriate for me to say that there can be no new spending in this budget. We have to recognize that for longer term gains we have to have spending in the short term to recognize the good work that our public servants have done. Certainly in my riding I have been well supported by the correctional people, by my human resources development people and by Industry Canada, those in the regional office, and I thank them. We must deal with that with compassion.

As we talk about the strategy of spending cuts versus tax measures, I would like to point out that in the jurisdictions that we hold up as the best jurisdictions for spending control—and I am thinking of Alberta as one—there have been revenue measures. In Alberta the increase was in medical premiums of about 50 per cent. There were other increases in fees and in licences.

I know that the hon. member for Capilano—Howe Sound talked once in an intervention about loopholes. He said, "Those are taxes. They collect money. If it looks like a tax and it collects money like a tax, it is a tax". These fees and these revenue measures could be determined or viewed as taxes.

My point is that in jurisdictions where they are managing their deficit and debt there are revenue initiatives which go along with and are part and parcel with the spending cuts.

When we look at these messages we now consider what it is that the minister is going to do in terms of his next budget; the action that we will see as a response to this consultation and these messages. I do not know what he is going to have in his budget. He has been very good and done a good job as a minister in keeping those things close to his vest, as he should.

The thing I need to point out, which has been pointed out on a number of occasions in this House today, is that we have to, as I believe the minister will, deal with this very difficult agenda with compassion, generosity, fairness and balance.

Strangely enough those words are clearly absent from the member's motion. There is never a reference to how it would be done. Perhaps that in itself is the difference between the Liberal Party and the Reform Party. While Reform members protest that they will not hurt anyone, they never use words like fairness, balance and compassion. Those are real in our society and are things which I am committed to and which I believe in.

In closing I would like to say that experiencing the cross–country discussions, talking to Canadians, and hearing their perspectives was tremendously important for me to understand the differences that exist across this vast nation.

The last budget was brutal in Atlantic Canada. Communities that lost their defence installations were hit very hard. It is my expectation that in the next budget some of the rest of us may start to feel that pinch. It is going to be a challenge for us as a government to continue in a positive fashion to make sure Canadians do not go without, but that we do manage things more effectively and efficiently, that we recognize where government can play a role and where other partners in society can fill the void or maybe take over.

These are challenges that will make it very interesting for us over the course of the rest of our mandate. I very definitely believe and I would encourage the Minister of Finance to continue his dynamic and evolving process in this important area.

I have to make reference to one particular event that happened. Over the course of our discussions many Canadians said: "You know, these are tough times and I really do not want more taxes, but by golly, this country is important to me. We have to make sure it stays together. If there is a way of me providing funds that will go directly to maintaining our country, to reducing the deficit, I would be willing to participate".

Do not get me wrong. I would never suggest this is a strategy that will help us out of our problem. What made it important to me was the fact that I received a cheque from one of my constituents made out to the "save Canada and deficit reduction fund". Interestingly, I discovered there is an account this money could be sent to. I have sent it on and expect he will receive recognition for his contribution.

The message to me is that Canadians do feel passionately about this country. They do want things to be better. They do believe this government through balance, fairness and equity has a plan that will work.

I look forward to the minister's budget. I have every confidence that he is listening to the Canadian people and will respond to their needs and to the needs of others who have an influence on our domestic economy. With that I close and thank the member for providing us with the opportunity today to talk about this very important subject.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for her speech, although I basically disagree with her fundamental premise. I would like to make a comment and have her respond.

Having worked with her on the Standing Committee on Finance for a while, I know she is sincere in looking for solutions. As an individual who obviously by her considered remarks is very intelligent, I would like to offer a suggestion as to how to find that solution.

• (1650)

A lot of people know that if you define the right problem or if the problem is defined correctly, you now have at least 50 or 60 per cent of the solution because that is where you will focus your efforts.

I would present the case that this government has not identified the right problem. We have a problem in this country with the deficit, debt and the interest costs to service this debt. It is the debt that is causing the high interest costs and it is the high interest costs that is the number one problem in this country. Therefore the deficit is part of it because it contributes to the debt which increases the interest.

I will go very slowly. There are three parts to it: debt, interest and deficit. The government says it is the deficit that is the problem, that if we reduce the deficit, we will solve the problem. Wrong.

At the end of three or four years, this government's program will have added $90 to $100 billion to the debt which then would make the interest costs rise regardless of this 3 per cent of GDP. That is what everybody is saying in the world economy. That is why they are concerned about the toughness of the cuts necessary. It is adding to the problem.

What this government is doing is adding to the problem, thinking it is solving it by defining the wrong problem. That is why it is paramount that we get to a zero deficit so that we do not keep adding to the debt. It is the interest cost that is going to hurt those very people who the government is concerned about, the very people the government wants to help. The government will raise taxes to help and it will hurt the economy even more.

I am saying if we identify the interest costs to service the debt as the problem that then we will come up with different solutions and more of the solutions that the Reform Party is putting forth. I would like the member to make a comment on that, please.

Mrs. Stewart (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed working with the hon. member on the finance committee.

He points to a very important matter and I referenced it in some of my last comments. Not only do we have to understand and look at the things that Canadians need, but we have to unfortunately look outside our nation to the other people who have an influence on our current situation. What we find is that if the foreign markets are comfortable with us, if they are confident that what we say is what we mean and it is what we are going to do, then they back off and leave us alone a little.

We have worked very hard to indicate very clearly to the outside world that we are committed to price stability. Thank goodness we have been able to maintain inflation at very low and sometimes negative rates. That helps us in dealing with outside responsibility.

The other thing we have to do is be absolutely clear on what our strategy is. We have been. Our strategy has been to say that we will get the deficit to GDP ratio down to 3 per cent come—excuse my French but the minister said it—hell or high water.

If the minister can confirm that and make sure that is our strategy and that we do not waiver from it, the confidence it creates outside the nation is extremely helpful to us. That is because it has been difficult for us to have the best economic growth in the world, to have inflation managed efficiently, to have unemployment reduced significantly.

I expect after the implementation of our next budget it will again be clear to the markets that we are committed to this, that we mean what we say and that we will do what we say we are going to do.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's speech. It was full of compassion. She also argued that she had a monopoly on compassion, that the Reform Party had no compassion whatever.

I have been in this business of arguing over social and economic policies for over 30 years. We agreed a long time ago that discussions over who is more compassionate will lead nowhere. I assert herewith that I am more compassionate than that member and every member of the Liberal Party.

The issue ought to be not who is more compassionate, but what is a rational solution to the problem so that we can give real expression to our compassion. That is the issue. This is rhetoric which leads nowhere. This country is going down the drain and we have to have practical solutions to the problems we face.

I also would like to make a brief comment on the member's description of the consultation process. I sat through more hours of this than I ever want to think about and travelled more miles than I would like to.

Most of the time I found that the witnesses said: "I do not know anything about the budget making process. That is your business, but let me take the next 20 minutes and tell you why the money I have been getting from the government is the best way the money could be spent and why you must never touch my program". Others had been coached by the intellectual and political left and had patent solutions that were obvious demagoguery from lowering the interest rate, to taxing the rich, taxing capital.

The Globe and Mail had an editorial saying that this process was dividing the country into hostile camps. I have not got the same impression, that this was a fruitful exercise in the way in which the opposite member was talking about.

Mrs. Stewart (Brant): With regard to the initial comment I would say that perhaps the member doth protest too much.

He is saying that he is compassionate and I am sure he is. I still stand and say nowhere in the motion doe I see and never do I hear the words fairness, balance and equality. I am sorry but without those words I do not know how anyone can pretend to be compassionate.

As far as the process goes, perhaps compassion has something to do there as well. Quite frankly to hear the message that Canadians are giving, you have to listen. You have to be patient. You have to recognize that the venue is not one they are particularly familiar with.

Yes, the hon. member is right. There are many people who said: "By golly, cut the deficit and look after the debt but do not touch me". I do not necessarily blame those people because they have only had one year of experience with us. They may still be thinking back to the old government, the government they could not trust and they had to say: "Do not touch me, because I do not trust you for not touching me". We are a little different from that. We do listen.

I suspect the next time we have these prebudget consultations which will be next year, we will hear a lot less of that. We will be better at the process. Canadians will be better prepared to be involved and understand the role that they can and must play.

I think the process was wonderful. It is a step in the right direction. It is an opportunity to give Canadians the governance back to them, to let them be part of this very important thing we call governing.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the intervention by the member while eloquent reminds me of a song from "My Fair Lady" that says "words, words, words, I am so sick of words".

Just talking about equity and compassion and fairness is all very nice, but saying it does not make it so. These words keep rolling off the tongues of members opposite as if they have a corner on knowing of compassion and fairness and equity.

The Liberals have no plan to present the people of this country. In the short time they have been in office they have run up our interest obligation almost $2 billion. Every year forever because of their overspending we will have to pay almost $2 billion more in interest, just for one year. That is $2 billion that has been taken away from the poor people of this country, the people who need help, the services of this country.

Yet they are the ones who talk about giving fairness and equity when they are the ones taking the money and using it for interest because they cannot control their spending. It is also a government that has yet to stand up and give a plan to the people of this country to break the gold plated pension plans that they are getting. Where is the fairness in that?

• (1700)

Where is the fairness from a member talking about fairness, taking a pension that no other Canadian can hope to get? I ask this member to show the kind of fairness that she—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I know that we are generally pretty generous with each other in the House but there is an obligation with members to be careful in the way they insinuate such things as people receiving pensions when they are sitting in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I would like you to actively encourage people to follow the public record more carefully.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): With the greatest of respect to the member, that is not a point of order. I will return to the member for Calgary North. There are a few minutes left in the intervention of the member for Brant. Has the member for Calgary North concluded?

Mrs. Ablonczy: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Stewart (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I will respond quickly to the hon. member and say wait for the budget.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, mine is more of a complaint than a question.

The hon. member said "pardon my French" and then went on to make some expression about "hell and high water" which I think was rather derogatory and indicates that the French language is used in a derogatory way.

I wonder if she might withdraw that statement.

Mrs. Stewart (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely thank my colleague. I would be glad to have that removed from the record. It was an inappropriate comment. I appreciate that being drawn to my attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, I am happy to speak to the motion presented by the Reform Party which is supposed to be trying to provide the finance minister with some solutions, answers, and ideas on how to cut government spending and shift the fiscal burden.

Of course, I suppose that, by the very nature of its name, the Reform Party has set out to reform Canadian institutions. This is the reason why it is called the Reform Party. Before finding solutions to all of Canada's financial ills, one should find their causes.

I am going to give a brief background, starting in 1970, when Mr. Trudeau's Liberals were in office. I remember well that in early 1970, I believe it was in 1969, the federal government had a budget surplus. One must assume that the Liberal Party was not happy with the situation and that, with characteristic generosity, it found that Canada was not progressing fast enough on the economic and job creation front. In 1972, the deficit really started building up with Mr. Turner and under Mr. Trudeau.

The then Liberal government decided that the only way to create jobs and to have a decent standard of living was for the federal government to interfere in just about every area. So it started borrowing money and the deficit started growing. In 1972, 1973 and 1974, the deficit was respectively $5 billion, $10 billion, $15 billion and then $20 billion. It kept on growing well into the 1980s. In 1972, 1980, and especially 1984, we had huge deficits.

From 1972 to 1980, the government used borrowed money to create an artificial economy. It borrowed in order to pour large amounts of money into our society, which resulted in the economy becoming completely artificial. It was not a normal, natural economy. It was borrowed money that was injected into our society so that people could spend, which in turn led to job creation, but all that job creation was artificial.

Spending borrowed money created an artificial economy. This overheating of the economy generated inflation, which lasted several years. Members will recall that in the years 1975–1976, the annual inflation rate varied between 6, 7, 8, 10 and 11 per cent. Such high inflation was not normal. But instead of cutting expenditures at that time, the government kept borrowing, which continued to create this overheating of the economy.

What solution was available to the governor of the Bank of Canada? He had only one solution, as he said himself, and that was to raise interest rates. And the government, as ignorant then as it is today, continued to borrow money, thereby creating inflation.

So, in 1980, interest rates went up as high as 20 per cent. It ruined a large percentage of small and medium size businesses in Quebec. It created hardship and unemployment. It created impossible situations. People were discouraged. People lost hope, particularly in Quebec where there are a lot of small and medium size businesses.

The result, in 1980, was a horrible economic disaster. The government, which had not found a solution, tried to correct its mistakes by borrowing even more, putting in place programs to save the economy. It kept injecting money into our society to try and protect the poor, and it was right. Having created an economic disaster, it had to do whatever it could, so it then injected, between 1980 and 1984, some $100 billion in borrowed funds to try to save the economy and avoid a crisis like the one of the 1930s. So more money was injected to help people who the government had just put out of work by its sky high interest rates. So much for the federal government.

In 1984, when I was with the Conservative party which was elected, the federal government had tallied up an accumulated debt of $175 billion. It had completely lost control over its spending. Revenues were of about $70 billion and expenditures of about $110 billion, and at the time Mr. Lalonde had predicted a deficit of some $39 billion for 1983–84; the largest deficit in Canada's history. People were saying, "We are bankrupt. It makes no sense. We have lost control over spending in Canada".

When I hear members of the Reform Party refer to this today, they might do well to remember that this is nothing new; this federal system does not work, it no longer works, it is a big mess.

Returning to 1984, the deficit was $38 or $39 billion. We had completely lost control over spending. On 4 September 1984, the Conservative government took office declaring, "We have to get out our axe. We have to make cuts".

At that time, the Conservative Party was similar to the Reform Party in terms of its culture and habits. It had more or less the same policies. It was a party pretty much of the right. People said that it would clean things up, that it was made up of people with a sense of responsibility. They said the Liberals had made a mess in the previous 20 years and that the Conservatives would put a stop to things and fix Canada up.

Well, it was very difficult for the Conservatives, because the debt was extremely high. The Liberals had made a lot of long term commitments. It was therefore very difficult for the Conservatives to cut.

Nevertheless, the economy grew between 3 and 5 per cent from 1984 to 1988. It would have been very easy to cut expenditures by $5, $10 or $15 billion a year, and we would have had economic growth at the rate of 2 per cent, probably, instead of 4 to 5 per cent. This would have been a normal rate of growth. The economy would have been sound and natural, not artificial. Public finances would have been put in order.

However, the federal system does not work this way. The federal system is governments in power, which want to show their electors—and I have seen it, I have been there—that expenditures cannot be cut, because people had to be shown that the federal government was useful and necessary. Money just had to be spent to prove that the government was indispensable, that federalism was alive, and that, without federalism, we could not function and exist as a country, without federal spending. A government always has to justify itself to the people and it generally does so by its spending.

If the people do not get anything, they believe the government is useless. So, what is needed is a government sufficiently strong to say what its role is and what the role of the provinces in various sectors is.

But no! Because the federal government had the power to spend, it continued to borrow, continued to spend in order to prove to Canadians that federalism was the solution, and that was the only way to justify federalism's existence.

Therefore, by 1990, we were faced with the same problem. We had to raise interest rates because the Conservatives did not cut spending enough and set off inflation themselves and we were back at square one. In 1990, interest rates were increased to cause a recession. Intelligent, is it not? What a smart government. We created the problem ourselves and we aggravate the situation by saying: "We created inflation ourselves so, now, we will increase interest rates to slow the economy and create a recession".

But this time, people were not deceived. A short time before, they had just lived through a terrible recession. And people stopped trusting the federal government. They still mistrust the federal government. The recession has lingered since 1990. It is now 1995. People have lost faith in the federal government, have lost faith in the future and have lost all hope. There are more and more family problems, young people are becoming more and more desperate, they have no hope for the future because over the past 25 years the federal government has not learned how to assume its responsibilities in order to prove that it is indispensable.

And it was Trudeau's policy, that of the strong central governments of the Liberals of today and of the past, which has led Canada to bankruptcy. Canada is bankrupt, pure and simple. Thus, now that we know what we did wrong in the past, other problems have emerged, of course.

I was forgetting another problem: that, in this Canadian system, we have a structure designed to administer perhaps some 300 to 400 million people and there are now 28 or 29 million people in Canada. We have 11 political powers, 11 governments. There is a socialist government, an NDP government, in Ontario; there used to be a Liberal government in Quebec; there was a Conservative, then a Liberal government in Ottawa, with contradictory policies in most cases, so that the system cannot work.

At any one time, there is a government getting ready for an election. Since there are also Liberals in Ontario, the Liberal government in Ottawa tries not to hurt its Liberal colleagues in Ontario and vice versa. This means that the federal government never takes action, never does the right thing, never acts rationally, so that the country cannot function.

Let us stop putting our heads in the sand and believing that Canada is the country with the highest standard of living in the world. Such a claim is ridiculous and deceives people. Canada is now considered to be a third–world country in terms of its debt.

We are now considered to be at the same level as the third world, but we still call Canada a rich country. I thought that the way to evaluate a business is to look at its assets and liabilities. Canada is now considered a third–world country in terms of its debt. Let us stop putting our heads in the sand and look reality in the face.

That is why we in Quebec think that extensive decentralization is the key to saving Quebec and even Canada. Canada stands at the edge of the abyss but can be saved through extensive decentralization. We started to talk about it with the Meech Lake Accord, we said that we had to decentralize, we said the same thing in Charlottetown, and Canadians said no. Canada's future lies in small sovereign countries.

We in Quebec want to achieve sovereignty because we believe that with a single government and a smaller country, we will be better able to succeed. It is easy to understand. We are saying that in a small country with only one level of government, that government, the universities, as well as business and union people can arrive at solutions together. We will be able to set a joint economic and social policy for the mid and the long term.

There will only be one government, instead of 11 different ones constantly fighting and implementing conflicting policies. We will work in harmony. We feel it is the only way to get out of this mess. As Quebecers, we do not want to sink with the rest of a country, which has been mismanaged for a quarter of a century and is now bankrupt. I am not exaggerating when I say that we are bankrupt; I am merely telling the truth.

The Reform member who spoke earlier was quite right when he said that, in Canada, the accumulated debt stands at $1.2 billion. That figure includes the debts incurred by the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government, as well as by private companies. We are currently paying $100 million per day in interest to foreign creditors.

Surely we must have borrowed enough money if, every day, $100 million leave the country to pay the interest on foreign loans. We could do a lot with that money. Why is that? It is because the federalist structure did not allow us to manage the country in a way that would have been beneficial to everyone.

Consequently, we are struggling with this serious problem. As Quebecers, as members of a nation speaking the same language, sovereignty is the only option. Our culture is different from that of the rest of the country, whether we are talking about financial institutions, artists or creators. We are simply different. As a small country, if we work together, we will be able to have our own legislation, collect our own taxes, spend according to our priorities, and we will undoubtedly be better off. It is with that in mind that we embark upon our plan for a sovereign Quebec. We do not have anything against anglophones, Ukrainians, Italians or Jews. We do not have a grudge against anybody. All we want is to survive. We just want to keep at least a decent standard of living, which we will lose if we stay within the Canadian Confederation. It is with that in mind that we intend to embark upon our plan for a sovereign Quebec.

The future belongs to small countries. We will negotiate and we will succeed. I can guarantee Quebecers that even the hon. member from Quebec, on the other side, knows I am right and agrees with what I have just said. But, unfortunately, he will not accept this daily reality.

What I say today does not all come from me. In the study which was carried out by the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, in 1992, experts clearly said that there was only one solution, that is, that Quebec must recover the great majority of its powers. If not, it will have to become sovereign or risk losing its standard of living and becoming poorer and poorer. Since the rest of Canada said no, this leaves us with only one alternative.

In matters of public finance, changes of all sorts are no use. There is only one alternative for Quebec, and for the rest of Canada, that is, to have a sovereign Quebec, an economic association open to the world. This is the only way we will save Canada and Quebec.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to speak this afternoon. I am convinced that some federalists from Quebec, on the other side, have understood some of the matters I have discussed this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of comments and then a question for the hon. member who has just spoken.

The hon. member gave a very good history of government incompetence in the terms of fiscal mismanagement over the past 25 years. He has proven to be very accurate in that regard. Certainly some members of the cabinet from the governing party have played an important role over this time period including the Prime Minister who was finance minister in a former Liberal government.

The member also said that it is this fiscal mismanagement and the financial condition of Canada that would drive Quebec out of this country and is leading Quebec out of this country if the referendum is successful.

The hon. member said that under these conditions of financial mismanagement the federal system in Canada does not work as it is now. I absolutely agree with that. The federal system in Canada does not work as it is now. I would like to ask the member a question. I am going to put some "ifs" into the question.

If governments over the past 30 years had been more fiscally responsible, if the federal government had left the powers that rightly belong to the provinces under the Canadian Constitution in the hands of the provinces, and if each province were given control over language and culture, would this member be sitting as a separatist in this Parliament? If those conditions had happened, would he be sitting in this government trying to lead Quebec to become a separate country? I am asking the member to look back.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I ask the member for Longueuil to reply, the pages have reminded me that I have been delinquent.

• (1725)

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bourassa—immigration; the hon. member for Yukon—violence against women.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be asked this question. The member said there were several conditions. Yes, of course, there were several conditions. However, I want to point out to the Reform member that we have been working hard for 10 years and, personally, when I was a member of the Progressive Conservative Party, I worked hard to get approval for the Meech Lake Agreement.

I can tell you that we worked for two and even three years, because it took three years, a lot of discussion and efforts, to get this agreement approved. Let me remind Reform members that we spent almost $500 million. The Canadian government spent almost $500 million to try to explain how this country could be managed. The overall process, the ads, the whole thing cost almost $500 million and took several years. In the end, the federal government and English Canada did not want any changes.

So, do not say we did not try. We did and we spent a lot of money we did not even have. We borrowed to try and get approval for this agreement and it was rejected. What else can I say, we did everything possible. Mr. Mulroney put all his heart into trying to renew Canada, but he failed. Maybe the Reform Party will succeed, I do not know, but I have lost faith. Any way, I can tell you that we tried our best, but we failed.

Do not try to convince me that I made a mistake in becoming a sovereignist member in this House. From an economic standpoint, it is a matter of life and death. I believe, and I will repeat it, that the only solution for Quebec is to become a sovereign state, to collect its own taxes, to make its own laws, to sign its own treaties and to have an open economic association with the rest of Canada, just as we have today. If Quebec continues to do business with the rest of Canada after it achieves sovereignty, there is not one Canadian that will see a difference. People from Montreal will continue to go to Toronto to do business, and people from Toronto will continue to come to Montreal just as they do now.

It will not change a thing. The only difference is that we will have only one government, we will have only one set of laws, we will collect our own taxes, we will spend according to our own priorities and we will make progress. And the rest of Canada will also benefit from that because a strong Quebec will share its wealth with the rest of Canada and help Canadians to continue to live well. We will stay good friends.

I can assure you that I will continue to ski in Whistler and I will feel very good about it. I have no problem with that. It is in that sense that we will succeed in helping the rest of Canada to survive economically so that it does not become a kind of third world country, as we already are in terms of our debt.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (for Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development –Quebec, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent that the vote taken on the main motion for second reading of Bill C–65 be applied to the concurrence at report stage of Bill C–59 now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 159.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

It being 6.10 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

NUCLEAR REACTOR FINANCE LIMITATION ACT

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP) moved that Bill C–285, an act to eliminate financial support for nuclear reactor design and construction in Canada or abroad and to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to have the chance to raise this private member's bill today. It is very timely. Today is Valentine's Day when we acknowledge the special relationships that we have in our lives.

Today I call into question the relationship that the federal government has with the nuclear industry. For many years it has been a sweetheart deal between the federal government and the nuclear industry of Canada.

Essentially this bill is intended to cut the subsidies that the federal government over the years has provided for the nuclear sector. I have a list from 1948 until 1992. I will not read it out because it goes on and on. It clearly identifies the hundreds of millions of dollars with which the Canadian taxpayers subsidize Canada's nuclear industry.

I want to make clear from the start that this in no way reflects a reduction in support for the use of isotopes for medical use. We all acknowledge the benefits that accrue from a whole set of medical initiatives.

Perhaps I should read what this bill does. The title is Nuclear Reactor Finance Limitation Act.

• (1815)

It says:

> Notwithstanding any act of Parliament, no payment shall be made from the consolidated revenue fund for the purpose of subsidizing or paying or loaning any part of the cost or of guaranteeing any loan that is for the purpose of subsidizing or paying or loaning any part of the cost of any real property, intellectual property, goods or services that are used for the research, investigation, design, testing, construction, manufacture, operation, use, application or licensing of any thing or property of any nature that will be used in or for a nuclear reactor.

It goes on to elaborate on this theme. Basically it is a bill that would eliminate the subsidies that the federal government provides to the nuclear sector. These are substantial. I think if one were to generalize, it would not be an elaboration to suggest that on average about $200 million a year of taxpayers' money goes to subsidizing this particular industry.

This is a time when we are all conscious of the need for fiscal restraint and aware of the need for evaluating every subsidy, grant and expenditure on a cost benefit basis. We can apply any cost benefit analysis to ask whether the $200 million year after year is a good investment for the taxpayers of Canada. There is only one conclusion in economic, health and environmental terms. It does not stand up to scrutiny.

I want to elaborate on a few points. We talk about being on the dole. A previous leader went on at some time about the corporate welfare bums. If there were ever a corporate welfare bum it has to be the nuclear sector. We would assume the nuclear industry is a major player in the energy sector because of the tremendous subsidies it receives.

We would assume the nuclear sector contributes a significant percentage of the overall energy sector of Canada. It does not. It is actually beneath firewood. In other words, more people use firewood for energy than nuclear energy. By firewood I am talking about hog fuels as opposed to what people are using in a fireplace or whatever. We typically burn chunks of wood.

Wood accounts for about 7 per cent of the energy picture. Coal, electric and others account for 6 per cent. Hydro accounts for 14 per cent, gas for 33 per cent, oil for 36 per cent, nuclear 4 per cent. Out of all of the various energy options in our country, nuclear accounts for about 4 per cent of the entire energy package. Yet in terms of research and development monies coming from the federal government, it receives more than all others combined.

When we add up the $200 million a year over the life of this particular government, it will come to nearly $1 billion. I think if taxpayers were put the question in a referendum: "Are you prepared to spend $1 billion over the life of this particular federal government to support and subsidize the nuclear energy sector?", my guess is that overwhelmingly people would say no.

I know that an argument people often use for example is there are a number of people employed in this sector. Of course, we could say that about any sector. If that were the sole motivation, I suppose we should be subsidizing the marijuana industry or the drug industry if jobs are the criteria.

Any economic activity will create jobs, including the nuclear sector. Of greater relevance is whether such jobs are sustainable, including the overall cost to society of maintaining those jobs.

When I talk about the $200 million subsidy annually, that is not the actual cost to Canadians. That is the cost today. Eventually we are going to have to start dismantling these nuclear reactors, 22 of them with Ontario Hydro alone. We are going to start decommissioning these nuclear reactors. To decommission a nuclear reactor is not some minor financial undertaking.

The Auditor General, I think in the 1992 report, indicated that a major cost that is never counted into the accounting system of Atomic Energy Canada is the cost accruing in terms of eventual dismantling. We have some evidence of what that cost would be. I think the most recent nuclear reactor that was dismantled in New Jersey cost $157 million U.S. Rounding it out, for one nuclear reactor alone we are adding another $200 million for the decommissioning. That is just decommissioning. What do we do with the nuclear waste? Again, we have yet to come up with something for what is at this moment a serious problem and likely to be a problem for perhaps hundreds, thousands or millions of years to come.

Here we are on this treadmill developing nuclear reactors, going head long in terms of these incredible subsidies to this one energy sector that only accounts for 4 per cent of the total energy package for Canada at a time when they are unsafe, we do not know what to do with the waste. Even now the subsidies do not reflect the true cost.

We just had on Parliament Hill a reception. The minister welcomed the nuclear industry to Parliament Hill. We heard what people are really worried about, that this is very economical.

If it is so economical why have we had to subsidize this industry since 1948? Why does it cost the taxpayers of Canada, not $200 million, not $1 billion, but close to $20 billion? Is this what we call economical? That industry after decades of subsidization still cannot stand on its own two feel. It requires this incredible subsidy by the federal government on an annual basis.

Talk about being on the dole. That industry should be hanging its head in disgrace, coming here wearing out the knees of its pants asking for that kind of handout from the taxpayers of Canada year after year. Has it no grace? Has it no pride?—not as long as those people are across the way, whether they be Tories or Liberals, it does not make any difference. They are there, backing up the old truck and shovelling out the taxpayers' dollars, $200 million to start with on an annual basis.

I think my Liberal friends across the way surely should be waiting for me to sit down so they can get up and condemn this abuse of taxpayers' money and to say now is the time to send a message to our Minister of Finance. They should stand up and be counted. Do the right thing. Listen to Canadians and stop this handout to the nuclear industry.

I got a little worked up but I cannot help it when I see the kind of abuses we tolerate.

What can we say about this? I want to reiterate a few points. The nuclear industry represents 4 per cent of the energy package of Canada and yet receives more than the natural gas sector, the oil sector, the coal sector, the renewable sector and conservation combined in terms of subsidies.

I ask my Liberal friends across the way—I know my Reform friends will agree with me and certainly the Bloc will agree with me—if we are going to subsidize any part of the energy sector should it not make more sense to subsidize the area that is looking into how to replace this kind of industry, the renewable resources or the alternative, the conservationist options that are available to us?

We heard sometime ago that down in New York they decided to back out of the big James Bay hydro project. The reason they did that was the conservation elements that they introduced in the state of New York were so overwhelmingly successful they did not need the power. There might be other factors that we have to take into consideration but fundamentally the energy authority in the state of New York said the conservation methods introduced have been so successful that it does not have to enter into that long term energy agreement with Quebec Hydro.

Again, where we have evidence it works. Yet this government seems to be walking around with a real hearing problem, a real sight problem. It cannot see what is obviously the right thing to do. I say to the government if it is confident in what it says it does, ask the people of Canada what they think; if we should be handing out money by the basket full, $200 million a year plus to one energy sector that accounts for only 4 per cent of the whole energy package in Canada.

If there is a country in the world that does not have to subsidize the nuclear industry, that does not need a nuclear industry, it is Canada.

• (1825)

We have energy coming out of our yin–yang. We have coal, we have—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: Yin–yang is a town in Saskatchewan, I think. I am not certain of that.

An hon. member: It is a little town in China.

Mr. Riis: My friend says it is a little town in China. That sounds better.

Despite 50 years of massive government subsidies, being on the dole, asking for handouts, the nuclear industry still cannot stand on its own two feet. Should that not get all of our attention in this House? After 50 years of handouts, after 50 years of coming in here and begging for support, it still cannot stand on its own two feet. Should we not say it is time it reassess how viable it is in terms of the future of Canada?

This gets almost obscene. The federal government wrote off a $70 million loan to AECL for the Douglas Point reactor at Bruce site. Quebec's number one reactor never operated properly and had to be shut down. A $90 million loan to AECL was written off by the federal government.

Despite the failure of that reactor Ottawa has now financed a second one to the tune of $151 million. It gets worse. It is very embarrassing.

It is the standing policy of this government, the Tories before and the Liberals now, to finance one–half of the estimated cost of any province's first nuclear plant. That is policy. The Government of Canada has written off about $800 million in unpaid loans to Nova Scotia and Quebec heavy water plants. In 1977–78 the federal government wrote off about $190 million in loans to AECL.

Canada's Nuclear Liability Act limits the liability of nuclear operators to $75 million in the event of a nuclear accident. It has been estimated that a severe accident at the Darlington nuclear station would cost at least a trillion dollars and could lead to over 200,000 fatalities.

I could go on and on. That brings me to an important point, whether the nuclear energy sector is safe? I think this is fundamental in people's minds. It is certainly not economical. It is certainly environmentally unsound and I think that is a given. Is it safe?

Mr. Speaker, I think you will be shocked. During 1993 the Atomic Energy Control Board recorded 700 "unusual incidents" at Canada's 22 operating nuclear reactors. That is almost two a day. You are astonished. I am too. These incidents range from spills of radioactive heavy water to unexplained power surges. Of these, 270 were serious enough to warrant a full report to AECB and a follow up investigation. That is incredible, two incidents a day that warranted full scale investigations.

The annual reports of the Atomic Energy Control Board provide ample evidence of the inherent dangers of nuclear technology. The following really got me riled up in terms of having to do something to prevent this catastrophe that is about to happen. It is reported that in August 1992 radioactive heavy water from the Pickering A nuclear reactor leaked into Lake Ontario downstream from the water supply plants for the communities of Ajax and Whitby, forcing a shutdown of the plants. This incident resulted in the highest single emission of radioactive tritium into the lake since the reactor began operating in 1971.

This goes on and on. No wonder those whales are whipping up on the beaches in Quebec all scarred up, sick and blue. We have nuclear waste draining into the Great Lakes.

The 1992 annual report, the one that really got my attention, states that in March 1993 Ontario Hydro discovered a serious deficiency in the analysis of an accident involving a large loss of reactor coolant. The analysis showed that the consequence of such an accident, if it were to occur while operating at full power, would be unacceptable. The term unacceptable is a euphemism for a disaster, probably.

They are not safe. They are not economical. They are environmentally unsound. They are a threat to our health and they are breaking the treasury. Why on earth would we continue on this sort of treadmill to nowhere, forking out that kind of taxpayers' money?

Mr. Speaker, my time is quickly coming to an end. So I will sit down now while I wait for my friends across the way to explain to the taxpayers of Canada how this incredible subsidy ought to continue.

Hopefully, a little lightening bolt will come out of the sky and give them a little snap so they will say: "Yes, tomorrow morning I am going to walk over to the Minister of Finance's desk, sit down beside him and say: "Mr. Minister of Finance, it is time to end this madness. Save the taxpayers of Canada hundreds of millions of dollars. Bring them a safer environment, a healthier environment and something that is economically and environmentally sound now". The only way we can do that is to stop funding Canada's nuclear sector.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Earlier in his intervention the member referred to the Speaker being shocked. I am not so sure about that, but I am still looking for that little town in the Chinese province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, well here we go again. The NDP party with the same bill it brought in before. The same old party. The same worn out rhetoric. The same wrong conclusions—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I want to hear the hon. member's speech however, he mentioned the NDP party. Think about it. That would be the New Democratic Party party. If he is going to refer to us, at least say the New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Respectfully, the member does not have a point of order.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was very kind because I have heard them called worse.

I want to remind the hon. member that Ontario Premier Bob Ray stood with the Prime Minister of Canada when we sold two reactors to China. He was so proud of our Canadian technology. I know he got into a bit of criticism over that, but he understands what research and development means and we respect him for that.

This bill will prevent the federal government from giving any financial assistance or technical support to nuclear reactor projects, except those making isotopes for medical use.

The hon. member made a great deal out of wasting money. Let me state one important point right off the bat, and this is for Canadian consumption in view of what the hon. member has said. From 1952 to 1992 the Canadian government invested $4.7 billion in Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. During the 30 year period from 1962 until 1992 the nuclear industry in Canada had a return for Canadians of $23 billion. Now, if we are going to get a return of $5 for every dollar invested, I do not think that is a bad investment.

NDP members have learned one thing. It took them some time to learn it, but they learned that isotopes are useful in medicine. Radioisotopes have various applications. One use is for sterilizing medical instruments. The hon. member does not seem to understand that cobalt 60 which is a byproduct from Ontario Hydro's power reactors is an isotope product. He wants to destroy the reactors that produce it, yet he wants isotopes saved for medical purposes.

Come on, do your homework here. In their press conference material the hon. member and his colleagues do not want the production of isotopes for medical use interfered with, but in this bill they are proposing to cripple hydro power reactors which produce isotopes. What a contradiction.

Molly 99 which is a shortened version of Molybdenum 99 is produced at the NRU research reactor at Chalk River. This is a radioisotope product which is supplied to Nordion International Incorporated so that Canada can continue to control the 88 to 90 per cent of the world market we control today in isotopes. However, the NDP today wants to cripple some of the production facilities of isotopes while at the same time wanting to maintain isotope production. That sounds like the modern day rhetoric of the NDP.

I want to get on to some other very interesting things in reply to what the hon. member has said. Those are items about the economic factors.

In 1993, 50 per cent of Ontario's electricity came from nuclear generators and in New Brunswick, 35 per cent came from nuclear generators. In 1993, Ontario Hydro's published generating costs were 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour for fossil fuel and 5.4 cents per kilowatt hour for nuclear power. This is a 20 per cent advantage for nuclear power, yet the NDP calls that waste. We can understand that.

In terms of lifetime performance, five in the top 20 reactors in the entire world were Candu reactors made in Canada by Canadians. Canada's Pointe Lepreau reactor was the number two reactor in the entire world.

The automobile industry uses nuclear technology to test steel quality in cars. The paper industry uses it in the production of coded stock. Manufacturers use it to check for flaws in jet engines. Construction crews gauge the density of road surfaces and subsurfaces with it. Pipeline companies test the strength of welds, and oil and gas mining companies map the contours of test wells and mine bores with it. But NDP members want to do away with all this. They are very progressive in their thinking. It is no wonder they are sitting where they are today.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited engineers developed the first commercial sterilizers in 1964. There are roughly 170 such units currently in use in 46 countries and 90 of them are Canadian designs.

Radioisotopes are used extensively by industry in quality control and process management. The petroleum industry uses them to test pipeline welds. The pulp and paper industry uses them to measure the thickness of paper. Many industries use them to trace the flows of material through process systems.

Imagine what would happen to our modern day industry if we destroyed the basis of all this. In environmental matters, the worldwide use of nuclear power plants results in lowered CO_2 emissions globally by 1.5 billion tonnes a year.

Mr. Milliken: And they are opposed to this?

Mr. Hopkins: Yes, they are opposed to this.

If Ontario Hydro had used coal fired generating plants to produce the same amount of electricity as has been made by its nuclear plants to date, it would have released 9.9 million tonnes of acid gas into the atmosphere and produced 23.3 million tonnes of ashes.

All of the used fuel from Canada's nuclear plants would fit into one olympic size swimming pool. The coal ashes would require about 25,000 times as much space if coal had been used.

What is more, the nuclear fuel still has the potential for recycling to produce much more energy. A single uranium fuel bundle of about 10 centimetres in diameter and 50 centimetres long and weighing 25 kilograms produces as much electricity as 380 tonnes of coal or 1,800 barrels of oil. But the NDP wants to do away with this.

A large nuclear power reactor uses 150 tonnes of natural uranium per year, equivalent to two million tonnes of black coal or 10 million barrels of oil. Is that what the NDP stands for?

Since 1973 nuclear power plants worldwide have cut fossil fuels used to generate electricity by 17.6 billion barrels of oil worth $470 billion U.S., 2.2 billion tonnes of coal, 26 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. This is not a bad saving. It is not bad for conservation.

For medical applications almost every facet of modern medicine relies in some way on nuclear technology, from nuclear powered units in heart pacemakers to the sutures, surgical gloves and medical supplies that are sterilized by radiation and used in hospitals each day.

Millions of diagnostic procedures are carried out annually using nuclear technology. Cancer treatment systems using nuclear technology are used to save thousands of lives throughout the world. More than 1,300 of the world's cobalt therapy machines have been supplied by Canada. This figure represents close to 50 per cent of the total cobalt 60 therapy machines used to date.

Every year in 70 countries an estimated one-half million people are treated for cancer using cobalt therapy machines designed and built in Canada. Canada is a world leader in the production of cobalt 60. The country supplies more than 80 per cent of the world's total cobalt 60 used in medical and industrial applications. AECL was instrumental in the development of the cobalt 60 treatment for cancer.

Cobalt 60 is a human–made radioisotope produced using a nuclear reactor. Radioisotopes are used to help diagnose medical ailments and prescribe remedies. Such isotopes can detect how well organs are functioning, how well the body absorbs particular substances, and where tumours might be located. They have a range of valuable uses.

The hon. member has told this House of Commons and all Canadians that AECL is a waste of money. Are all these facts a waste of money? The hon. member should take a second look and do his homework.

I will end my comments here. I have much more I would like to say to educate the hon. member, but I will pay due respect to the Chair. My time is up.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I am very happy to take part in the debate on Bill C–285. First of all, I wish to thank the NDP member who introduced this bill and who has done so in such an entertaining and informative way.

Bill C–285 provides for the elimination of financial support for nuclear reactor design and construction. That prospect is viewed by the Bloc Quebecois as interesting and relevant under the present circumstances.

Indeed, how could we not have doubts about the nuclear energy development policy of the Canadian government and the significant investments required for the implementation of that policy. As the Official Opposition of the House of Commons, we are deeply concerned by energy development policies.

Our concerns are twofold. First, we should wonder about the environmental costs of the development of any type of energy, in this instance nuclear energy, and second, about the impact the development of such energy may have on the economy of a country. I would like to take a few minutes to discuss those two issues.

The Minister of Natural Resources of Canada said recently to the Nuclear Awareness Project that she believed it would be appropriate to continue to develop nuclear energy in Canada. But at what cost to the environment and the Canadian taxpayers, that is the question.

First of all, in the industrial process of long term development of nuclear energy, the risks for the human environment are very high. Indeed, we know fully well that radioactive waste produced by the nuclear industry is most dangerous to the human species. Spent fuel represents not only the highest risks, but also the most difficult challenge if we want to find a safe, long term method of storage.

After 500 years, for example, nuclear fission material produced by the Canadian nuclear industry will still be active. In December 1992, there were 21,000 tonnes of spent fuel stored in Canada, 90 per cent of which was produced by Ontario Hydro, and the Canadian nuclear industry is not even 50 years old. For human beings, radioactivity is highly cancerous and very harmful genetically.

Clearly, the results of the accidents that occurred at the nuclear compounds of Three Mile Island and Chernobyl are very good examples of that. We must also remember that the nuclear industry in eastern European countries is in such a state that it is a time bomb for humanity and we can all see clearly what political problems that creates. The coming apart of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics left nuclear power plants almost abandoned everywhere because the people in charge of those plants moved from Eastern Europe to more financially secure countries where they can earn a better living. Mechanics and plumbers generally speaking operate the power plants and these certainly are time bombs for humanity.

Not only does the nuclear reaction from the fuel produce radioactive elements, it also produces neutrons which strike other components of the reactor itself and activate some of its substances which also become radioactive. This means that the reactor structure will have to be stored as radioactive waste once the reactor has reached the end of its useful life. The Chalk River nuclear laboratory of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited contains three outdated nuclear reactors, and the site itself is seriously contaminated by radioactive waste. Atomic Energy is also responsible for two outdated reactors, at Whitshell, Manitoba, for the NPD reactor at Rolphton and the Douglas Point reactor at Bruce, both in Ontario, and for the Gentilly 1 reactor in Bécancour. All of these reactors are no longer in use and should be stored.

The cost of a stockpiling system is astronomical. The estimated cost of stockpiling a little over 100,000 tonnes of used fuel is $9 billion. We share the view of the Auditor General of Canada that Atomic Energy of Canada will require even larger subsidies in order to cover the costs of dismantling these outdated reactors. This means that the costs the government is calculating now, in terms of the cost of this energy, the costs that have to be budgeted later, to ensure safe storage of the waste from these plants when the government is no longer in power, simply because hundreds of years are involved, these costs are never calculated.

This leads to the next question of whether the nuclear industry can turn a profit over the long term. Another question with respect to the human environment concerns the use of nuclear energy for military purposes. Uranium 235 and 238 are consumed in Canadian reactors of the CANDU type; they are elements which, when bombarded by a neutron to cause fission and create energy, become plutonium 239 atoms. The creation of plutonium 239 in nuclear reactors raises a very serious problem in regard to nuclear weapons and world peace. Plutonium 239 is fissionable and can be used in the production of nuclear weapons.

Even if plutonium 239 is the isotope preferred by arms manufacturers, other plutonium isotopes are also fissionable and can be used to manufacture bombs. Knowing that Atomic Energy of Canada, the body responsible for promoting nuclear energy in Canada, is trying to sell CANDU reactors by any means possible, which is, after all, why they are building them all over the world, we must look into this very closely. Despite the many multilateral and bilateral treaties on the non–proliferation of nuclear weapons between Canada and the rest of the world, we must be realistic: there will be a real risk of nuclear technology being used for military purposes as long as the nuclear industry is developing in the world.

The second facet of Canada's nuclear industry is government financing. I have already mentioned the astronomical costs of storing radioactive waste. Maintenance at Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is subsidized by the public purse, and has been for the past six years, to the tune of $1.2 billion. The cost of building a reactor is $1.5 billion, an investment on which even a long term return is not guaranteed. We are justified in questioning the investment of public funds in this industry.

During the Prime Minister's trip to China last fall, according to representatives of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited who were interviewed in Peking, Atomic Energy made a proposal to build two reactors on Chinese territory under a turnkey proposal without requiring a large investment by China. The representatives said that acquiring these reactors, valued at $3 billion, would be extremely advantageous for the Chinese, who would not have to tie up foreign currency holdings for a long period. In other words, we are selling CANDUs, but we are financing them entirely.

What about the people of Canada who pay the major part of the construction costs of such reactors? Is the present evolution of Chinese society collateral enough for Canadian investments? These are legitimate questions we should ask ourselves.

The present Canadian policy in the area of nuclear development is costly and dangerous, in terms of both public finance and the human environment. This is why, considering that Canada is trying to reduce its deficit, we believe that Bill C–285, which seeks to eliminate financial support for nuclear reactor design and construction in Canada and abroad, is a worthwhile initiative.

[English]

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the millennium has arrived. We have just had an NDP member suggesting that we cut off subsidies to a major crown corporation. I thought I would never see the day. Actually what he is in effect proposing in the practical sense is the privatization of AECL.

If he wants to make the same proposal with respect to the CBC, the National Film Board and what is left of the government's stake in Petro–Canada, I will move over one seat and let him join us. We will make him a Reformer, an honorary Reformer.

Mr. Riis: Thanks but no thanks.

Mr. Morrison: It is a good idea to talk about privatizing AECL but it is not simple. We cannot do that in one quick step.

We must remember that more than 80 per cent of the nuclear industry in Canada is already private. The only parts that are still under government supervision and are still being subsidized by the government are the parts that do not make money, the research facilities primarily. Everything else is being operated by the private sector. There are 150 companies out there that compete with suppliers in client countries. They are efficient and they make money.

The Koreans have been so delighted with what we have done with the private end of the industry, the building of the reactors, that they have ordered three more. I would have to take issue with the hon. member who spoke for the Liberals. Wolsong 1 is probably a better reactor even than Point Lepreau. It has been up and running since 1982. They love it and they want more of them.

Let us get back to AECL specifically. Among the major crown corporations it is the only one that is seriously cutting costs. This formerly bloated entity has cut its staff from 4,500 to 3,700. Even more commendable is that it has reduced its Ottawa head office staff from 160 to 54, a two–thirds reduction.

I was out at Chalk River a couple of months ago to look the place over and what I found was quite a tight ship. There was none of the opulence that we have come to associate with government. It was nothing like the Department of National Defence, for example, or the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. This is an outfit that knows what money is for.

Let us take a look at the specifics of the bill. Clause 3(b) speaks of research, investigation, design, testing, construction, manufacture, operation, use, application or licensing of any thing or property of any nature that will be used in or for a nuclear reactor. If the world were only that simple. We cannot pigeon hole or categorize scientific research like that. Much of what is being done at Chalk River at the moment is pure scientific research which may or may not be applicable to reactor design.

The line between pure and applied science is very hard to draw. That is why privatization although necessary and desirable will be difficult. An entirely new company of researchers will have to be formed to sell their services to the people who have the reactors. That is going on now to some extent. They take in $86 million a year in fees for the work that is done at Chalk River on behalf of reactor owners. Eventually they will have to become self–sufficient and I do not think it will happen until it is privatized.

With all the pure science going on out there it is not going to be an easy sell. However we do not just kill the flagship of Canadian R and D. Let us remember the Avro Arrow, because this is the sort of thing we are talking about. Clause 4 would preclude provision to any person, any professional, scientific technical information or assistance that relates to research investigation, design, testing, construction, manufacture, operation, use, application or licensing of any thing or property of any nature that would be used in or for a nuclear reactor. In plain English, it would make orphans of the Candu reactors that provide almost half of Ontario's electricity.

The work being done at AECL that is not pure science is bankrolled by the utilities. As I have mentioned they spend about $86 million a year on it. It is to enhance plant safety, prolong operational lives and cut maintenance costs. If we want to remain in the forefront of an industry we have to do R and D and we have to do it continuously.

They are doing work out there now on the applications of computer technology to the construction and operation of plants, improving reactor fuel channels, better fuel design and so on. Bill C–285 would stop this cold.

Clause 5 says that the act does not apply to a nuclear reactor that has as its sole purpose the manufacture or development of isotopes for medical use. The hon. member for Kamloops should know that this function of AECL has already been privatized. Nordion was sold for $165 million. Incidentally the government of the day pocketed the funds into general revenue and did not leave a penny for the operations.

During his long harangue about the technical side of nuclear energy the hon. member for Kamloops reflected the anti–industrial primitivism that is so common among a small segment of his party, the people we refer to as the nuts and berries crowd.

We live in a climate of irrational fear of the atom because most people do not understand it. They do not have a vague notion of how a reactor works. Polls indicate that 10 per cent of the public actually believes that a reactor can explode like an atomic bomb. Vast numbers who at least know better than that believe a nuclear plant constantly emits streams of deadly radiation that will induce cancer, make them sterile or cause them to conceive defective children.

A few highly visible crusaders have seized upon the fears as a convenient means of attacking a social order that they find distasteful and have found highly successful careers as virtual cult leaders. When primitive man was troubled by fears of the unknown, he consulted the witch doctor or the shaman. Sophisticated modern man appeals to Amory Lovins, Ralph Nader or Barry Commoner.

The hon. member was engaging in a little shameless sophistry when talked about 4 per cent of the energy uses of Canada coming from nuclear. For God's sake that includes the use of fuel in cars. There are not very many nuclear cars. What it does produce is 20 per cent of the electrical energy that is used in the country and, as has been stated two or three times, nearly 50 per cent of Ontario's electrical energy. We used to have a bumper sticker out west that said: "Let those eastern bastards freeze in the dark". Apparently this is what the hon. member for Kamloops is suggesting we do again.

He mentioned the decommissioning cost of $13 billion. That is not bad for an industry that produces $4 billion worth of electricity annually over a period of probably 30 years of operational life for a plant. Remember, that $13 billion is not just for one reactor, that is for the whole shooting match. At least that is a number which both the pro and the anti–nukes agree on.

There has been a lot of talk about the waste. It is an insoluble problem. It will be with us forever. The nuclear priesthood will have to guard it. I am reminded of a quote from Goethe that the phrases men repeat incessantly end by becoming convictions and ossify the organs of intelligence.

If Canada went 100 per cent nuclear for its electricity each family share of spent fuel, or high level waste if you prefer that term, would be seven ounces a year. This stuff is put into the swimming pools at the plants. As somebody said, there are 21,000 tonnes of it around now. Within 10 years the radioactivity is reduced by 90 per cent. Within 1,000 years in dead storage the radioactive levels would be sufficiently reduced to make it perfectly safe to eat a few spoonfuls of the stuff.

You get these anti–technological myths about plutonium, because there is plutonium in the waste. It is the deadliest thing known to man. It is evil. God did not create it. That is garbage. That stuff is an alpha emitter, for openers. You could wrap it in a piece of tissue paper, put it in your pant's pocket and walk around with it with impunity because it emits no gamma radiation and no beta radiation. It is not dangerous. If you were to eat a bunch of it, it is 50 times less poisonous than ordinary arsenic trioxide. Mr. Speaker, you can look that up in any good journal of toxicology.

It has been studied in great detail. The toxicity of plutonium on a weight dose basis is much less than that of many items which are kept commonly around the home. It is lethal only if breathed into the lungs or directly injected into the bloodstream. Then it will kill you, and it will kill you quick, but not as quickly as botulism poison, for example, which is fairly abundant, and anthrax. Again, there are many natural toxins which are more toxic than this horrible stuff that we all have to worry about so much.

I see the Speaker starting to rise from his seat. I wish I could have spent some time on the technical aspects of this. As you have probably gathered I do have some knowledge of nuclear energy production. Perhaps another day.

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill C–285 on behalf of the people of the Whiteshell facility in my riding of Provencher and to say that this bill would in effect eliminate Canada's nuclear industry.

The government believes that to do so would be fundamentally wrong. Not only has the nuclear industry provided a good return for investment to Canadians, and I will get into that later, it has achieved international acclaim. That recognition includes the recent Nobel prize to Dr. Bert Brockhouse for pioneering scientific work carried out at the Chalk River laboratories of AECL.

I would like to look at the myths and also address the facts of the Canadian nuclear industry. Nuclear energy supplies 15 per cent of Canada's nuclear electricity with a value of close to $4 billion.

The hon. member for Kamloops stated earlier that the nuclear industry provides 4 per cent of Ontario's power. That is not true. The fact is the 22 reactors in Ontario provide 66 per cent of that power.

Direct employment in the nuclear sector is estimated at 30,000 jobs and at least 10,000 jobs in other sectors depend directly on the nuclear industry. Many of these jobs are highly skilled and knowledge based, the kind of jobs that are consistent and compatible with the new economy. They are the kind of jobs that we are trying to develop and encourage in Canada. Indeed in the last year we have created 437,000 of those kinds of jobs.

More than 150 companies across six provinces supply manufacturing and engineering products or services. In addition to those that we directly subcontract to, there are another 400 or 500 companies beyond that who subcontract to those 150 companies.

The recent sale of three Candus to Korea has generated more than $1 billion in Canadian content, providing some 25,000 person–years of work over six years. The Korean Candu sale in 1992 was Canada's largest export order. It is well known to most Canadians and certainly to all those interested in the nuclear industry of the Prime Minister's most successful and recent trip to China where letters of undertaking were signed with the Chinese for two more reactors, estimated to bring back a total of $4 billion worth of investment in Canada.

In 1991 the industry had a trade surplus of approximately $500 million and that trend continues. Ontario Hydro estimates that from 1965 to 1989 the nuclear industry saved the Canadian economy $17 billion in foreign exchange. Were we to have imported oil and coal, it would have cost the Canadian taxpayers another $17 billion, to say nothing about the points addressed by my hon. colleague from Renfrew about the acid rain emissions and other kinds of global warming effects that would inevitably occur from burning these other kinds of fuels. For each year of the 1990s foreign exchange savings will amount to about $1 billion.

The federal government has supported the development of Canada's nuclear energy capability. In the period between 1952 and 1994 the nuclear industry contributed at least $23 billion to the gross domestic product. The federal government received $700 million annually from the nuclear industry in the form of income and sales taxes.

I can tell you of a similar study to the one that Ernst & Whinney completed for the Government of Canada done in Manitoba which demonstrates clearly that the investment that the government makes in the facility close to where I live generates $30 million of tax a year in the Manitoba economy alone.

The private sector also benefits. In the four years between 1988 and 1992 private sector companies that provide nuclear products and services had sales of almost $10 billion. The performance of the research reactors has been the envy of the world. The performance of the Candu reactor is second to none.

Out of the 369 power reactors which provide significant amounts of electricity in 29 countries throughout the world there are four Candus in the top 10 in lifetime performance. As was pointed out earlier, the reactor at Point Lepreau, New Brunswick is number one. That is a formidable record.

With the kind of high–tech job–creation initiative that is inherent in the nuclear industry why the member for Kamloops would want to oppose that kind of job creation and that kind of record for Canadians and Canadian researchers.

Nuclear energy's contribution to electricity supply is not its only benefit to humankind. It also contributes to the quality of life. Its spinoff benefits to the environment and to medicine are equally significant. I refer to clause 5 of this bill where the member for Kamloops wants to keep isotope production but toss out everything else.

Let me make a couple of other points about some of the more recent research and possibilities.

• (1910)

In the biotech area, for example, in terms of a radiation facility we can design new kinds of drugs. A nuclear capacity allows us to investigate small, molecular membrane interactions which will help in terms of the health care, the medical field and the life chances of Canadians who are unfortunate enough to have trouble with cancer or other kinds of illnesses. This is a record breaking and ground breaking kind of technology that is important to us all.

The boron neutron capture therapy is another example. It is a new mode of radio therapy that combines tumour seeking components to destroy cancer cells and tumours. Is that wrong? Is that bad? Is that not a worthy undertaking for the Canadian economy? Is that not a legitimate expense for the Government of Canada?

It was mentioned earlier by one of my colleagues that we have built in AECL through one of its spin–off companies over 1,300 of the world's cobalt therapy machines. Each year 500 million people are treated for cancer through those 1,300 machines. Is that not a wonderful contribution and worth the effort of the Government of Canada to participate with our world neighbours in cancer treatment research? I think so.

The nuclear industry is an important factor in the sustainable development equation. Nuclear electricity generation is clean, burning an abundant fuel and has no other practical uses. It does not emit the acid gases, as I referred to earlier, carbon dioxides and particulates associated with fossil fuels.

Nuclear energy has been and continues to be a good investment for Canadians and for Canada. It plays an important role not only in providing clean electricity, but in the creation of jobs, revenues and in spin–off benefits that have improved the quality of life of Canadians and the people in other nations.

We talked earlier about some of the financial aspects in the Ernst & Whinney study which I think was important and timely in terms of allowing Parliament to tell Canadians what this kind of investment has meant over the past 30 years.

As my hon. colleague from Renfrew pointed out earlier, surely I could go to any Canadian taxpayer or the the Canadian business person and say: "For every dollar you give me, I promise you a 400 or 500 per cent return, a 4:1 or 5:1 ratio". Surely that is a wise investment of Canadian tax dollars to bring those revenues back to the Government of Canada, to create jobs in Canada and to continue to place Canada and Canadians at the front of the Canadian nuclear industry.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand our time is up for debate on this issue. Unfortunately I am not going to get the opportunity to deliver the tremendous speech I had prepared for this time.

I would like to go on record, with your permission, to advise the House that I was going to speak in favour of Bill C–285 and that I fully support the House referring this to the Standing Committee on Finance for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): That is not a point of order, but I guess the member was able to get his view on the record.

Under right of reply, the member for Kamloops. No one else will speak to the motion and this will close the debate in a maximum of two minutes.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, before I wrap up my comments, my hon. friend was obviously waiting for an opportunity to get in on the debate and I think has a speech with him. Would it be appropriate for the House to seek unanimous consent to have him table his speech as part of Hansard?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, there has obviously been a difference of views presented here this afternoon. I respect the views of my colleagues, although they are perhaps not exactly the same as my own. Others are similar and supportive.

I make two requests. The other day the minister announced that the government was to examine the whole nuclear industry and the support of that. The question was put to her at that time whether she would allow public input. At that point I think she mumbled a bit.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: She did not say she would. I say mumble because she made no commitment.

• (1915)

I would hope that after hearing the diverse views here she would say that legitimate views exist in the country and that she would agree to hold public hearings in all parts of the country to allow the public an opportunity to present its views.

Just on the long shot that people are generous here tonight, would there be any inclination on the part of my hon. friends to provide unanimous consent to send this to committee for further consideration?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There is no consent. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on February 8, I put my main question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and a supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister regarding the deportation of Taramatie Ramsubhag and her three children, who are originally from Trinidad and Tobago.

The minister then asked me to bring any new information to his attention so that he could review this case on the basis on humanitarian considerations, which I did on February 10, when I personally gave a document to the minister and his parliamentary secretary. Although Mrs. Ramsubhag and her three children had adapted well to Quebec society, they were all ruthlessly deported the same day.

Furthermore, the minister rejected, without any sign of consideration or deference, a request by Quebec's Minister of International Relations, Cultural Communities and Immigration, Bernard Landry, to delay the deportation, to allow the Quebec government to consider issuing a certificate of selection.

The minister and his government did not show any respect or consideration for the numerous women's rights organizations begging them to grant Mrs. Ramsubhag permanent resident status in Canada. These organizations include Assistance aux femmes de Montréal, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Vancouver Status of Women, the Ontario Association of Interval and Transition Houses, the CNTU's national committee on the status of women, the Quebec women's federation, etc.

The minister showed an unacceptable insensitivity to this refugee claimant. Yet, he gave her aggressor and ex–husband a special permit allowing him to return to Canada. Is that the Liberal government policy on women who are victims of spousal abuse?

Mrs. Ramsubhag does not have a criminal record. Canadians and Quebecers will never understand the policy applied by the minister in this case, nor why immigration officers had to use force to arrest three children aged 9, 11 and 13. Under the circumstances, arresting these children without a warrant amounts to kidnapping pure and simple. Mrs. Ramsubhag also had to pay $800 to have her case reviewed by the same officials who wanted to deport her.

During the election campaign in September 1993, the Deputy Prime Minister promised that women who were victims of family violence and applied for refugee status would no longer be deported. However, so far at least two members of this group of women in Montreal have already been deported. What about the Deputy Prime Minister's commitment to defending women's rights? That the Canadian government should take this kind of action is appalling, especially the immigration officers who arrested the three children. This attitude is in stark contrast with the open and generous approach taken by the Government of Quebec, which had applied for a stay of execution to consider the possibility of giving the Ramsubhag family a Quebec certificate of selection.

I wish to commend the many womens' groups that sent letters to the minister, with copies to the critic for the Bloc Quebecois, as part of the campaign to defend the case of Mrs. Ramsubhag. I hope she will return to Canada, with her children, as a landed immigrant.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada is universally recognized as having one of the fairest and most generous refugee determination systems in the world.

We were the first country to establish formal guidelines on gender persecution. It would not be, and the hon. member well knows this, appropriate to go into the details of an individual case on the floor of the House. However let me assure the hon. member that the application was reviewed in a most thorough and fair manner and the individual was found not to qualify as a refugee.

Similarly the case was reviewed in the light of our gender persecution guidelines three times and was examined for any special merit on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

As the results of all these reviews were negative, the individual was obliged to comply with the removal order. We carried out the deportation order to uphold the integrity of the immigration system as a whole. The person did not qualify as a refugee but she is welcome to apply to immigrate to Canada through the normal channels.

I understand the Government of Quebec has shown interest in the case and under the Canada–Quebec agreement Quebec officials are welcome to facilitate her application for immigration to Canada for residence in the province of Quebec.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on December 6, the National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women, I asked the Deputy Prime Minister whether her government was committed to ensuring the continuation of core funding for essential services that help prevent, treat and counsel against violence against women. The minister answered at that time that her government would respect its commitment to funding for women's shelters and other support services.

However since that time the review by the Minister of Human Resources Development has taken place. We have heard a lot of prebudget comments being made. Indeed there are Liberal members of Parliament who are advocating that these services to women's groups be cut or reduced.

As well, the federal government is considering combining transfers for social programs, health programs and post–secondary education to provinces and territories. One of the concerns in this regard of many groups across the country including myself is that it could break the social consensus that has been built in Canada. It has been one of the strengths of Canada that says that regardless of where one lives geographically and regardless of income there are certain standards of service that one gets as a right of a Canadian citizen.

It is also my feeling that these proposals to do this transfer without national standards would in the end hurt women more than men. Single mothers could lose many of the supports they now have. We know that is the group with the largest number of unemployed.

The Canadian Action Committee on the Status of Women estimate that violence against women adds at least $1 billion a year to the bill for health and related services in Canada. It is the time for zero tolerance of violence against women. Yet I do not see from the government or in the Deputy Prime Minister's response a true commitment in this regard.

We have the Minister of Justice introducing gun control legislation that he says will make women safer because of the number of women who are victims of violence. Yet there is no proof the legislation he is proposing would do that.

It seems hypocritical to me that there is one piece of legislation that we are told by the Minister of Justice will make women safer in their homes, again with no proof, and at the same time they are looking at either not funding at all or severely reducing funding for services that provide information, counselling and protection for women who have been victims of violence.

I was quite interested in doing my research to come across a letter written in 1990 by the opposition at that time to a women's centre. It stated that core funding cutbacks, that is those proposed by the former Conservative government, would have a devastating impact on women seeking shelter from family violence. That letter, by the way, was written by the now Solicitor General.

I want to ask again whether it is the policy of the government to have a real plan to combat violence against women or simply a public relations effort and whether in fact the government and the minister will be committed to having core funding for women's shelters to provide the services that help women who may be victims of violence.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have already demonstrated our commitment.

In 1994–95 for the women's program of HRD Canada the contribution was $4 million in core funding to a broad cross–section of women's organizations across Canada which carry out a clearly defined program of activities related to the areas of economic equality, social justice and access and participation.

In addition, the women's program and the disabled persons participation program of the same department are involved in the family violence initiative, providing approximately $5.5 million for community based initiatives to raise awareness and promote institutional change.

I remind the hon. member, and I know how very deep her commitment to this issue goes, that in the February 1994 budget, the women's program budget for group funding was spared from the 5 per cent across the board cuts made to other HRD programs. That is commitment.

This government has also moved quickly toward prevention of violence against women. We have taken prompt action in several areas. The Minister of Justice today tabled gun control legislation. As well there are the amendments to the Criminal Code's peace bond provisions to be proclaimed into force on February 15, 1995. These amendments will provide increased protection to women and other victims of violence before the courts.

That is commitment and it is a commitment we intend to carry on with.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the premier of Alberta recently received a B–plus grade from the Fraser Institute for his government's approach to fiscal management and deficit reduction in my province. In its eyes he is an honour student.

However in another report card, one given by the people of Alberta, the premier received a failing grade for his approach in cutting essential services. The disapproval is growing. Some 69 per cent believe changes in health care services have been brought about irresponsibly while 67 per cent disapprove of how the province has handled cuts in education.

Albertans, like all Canadians, support leaner and more efficient government but they will not accept an assault on their most valued and essential services. The premier's approach may be praised by a few but it is not a responsible one in the eyes of many.

The federal government on the other hand will act responsibly in the upcoming budget by controlling spending and reducing waste. However we refuse to sacrifice the things that Canadians value most for the sake of a few accolades.

QUEBEC SENIORS' FEDERATION

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec seniors' federation or Fédération de l'âge d'or du Québec celebrated its 25th anniversary yesterday. On this occasion, its president, Mr. Philippe Lapointe, reiterated the FADOQ's commitment to participate in the important discussions on sovereignty and on the reform of social programs, in which the Fédération was quick to support the students.

Seniors are currently taking part in the vital process of consultation on the future of Quebec. Every day, the Commission des aînés meets with many seniors who come to voice their questions, fears and aspirations.

Mr. Lapointe said the FADOQ would follow the debate closely. The Bloc Quebecois is delighted by the calm and watchful attitude of the FADOQ and hopes that its members will participate actively in the consultation process so they may define the country they helped build.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, over the years western economic diversification has sunk taxpayers' money into all kinds of projects: the Custom Gourmet Coffee Shop, Dave's Pizza, Imperial Oil. Even Novatel had the pleasure of receiving taxpayers' dollars courtesy of WED.

Today taxpayers can take delight in knowing their hard earned dollars are going to yet another worthy project, the Artificial Reef Society of British Columbia. WED is loaning $160,000 to this group so it can buy a ship from DND. It wants to use government money to buy a government ship so it can be towed out to sea and sunk.

What an investment. To top it off this group claims it will pay WED off by selling salvaged boat parts. We hear old boat parts are selling like hotcakes. WED will be repaid its $160,000 in no time flat at the used boat flea market.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House of the visit to Ottawa today by Mrs. Cathy Ingram, a teacher at the Fellowship Christian School, and her students from the city of Waterloo. I am pleased they are in Ottawa today as we celebrate the 30th anniversary of Canada's maple leaf flag.

As a former refugee who came to Canada with my parents, brother and sister in 1957, I now have the privilege of representing the constituency of the federal riding of Waterloo. I bear witness to the idea of compassion, sharing and equity that Canadians represent and what our flag symbolizes.

Our flag represents a beacon of hope in a troubled world, a world that is too often torn by strife based on ethnic, race, religious and national intolerances.

Let each and every one of us appreciate the model that Canada represents and commit ourselves to working together to enhance what we have built—Canada.

DR. J. A. DOIRON

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honour the life of a great Canadian and former Lieutenant–Governor who passed away recently.

Dr. J. A. Doiron was one of the first Acadians on Prince Edward Island to serve as the Queen's representative as Lieutenant–Governor.

Dr. Doiron was a true patriot both to his country as well as to his Acadian heritage. It was his belief that to understand the heritage of all Canadians was the first step in building a strong Canada. He took pride in serving as one of the only bilingual dentists on Prince Edward Island and was a member in many island francophone organizations. Dr. Doiron received honorary doctoral degrees in humanities, laws and the social sciences.

Perhaps one of his proudest moments was receiving the Order of Canada in July of last year. Dr. Doiron was a true gentleman, was loved by all who knew him and will be missed dearly by his family, friends and all Islanders.

NATIONAL BIOMASS ETHANOL PROGRAM

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on December 21, 1994, the National Biomass Ethanol Program was announced committing up to $70 million in contingent loan guarantees to ethanol producers.

• (1405)

On behalf of the ethanol task force, I wish to thank the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food and the Minister of the Environment for their commitment to making domestic ethanol production a reality.

This program has already inspired nearly $300 million in private investment for two ethanol plants in Ontario alone. These plants are expected to create 1,500 construction jobs, 150 permanent jobs and add $175 million annually to the local economies of Chatham and Cornwall.

As the name of the program suggests, this is a national program and all of Canada will benefit from this announcement. Canadians will now be able to use renewable, clean air fuel which is domestically produced from Canadian biomass.

CHIAPAS

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois is delighted at the decision by the Mexican president, who ordered the army, yesterday, to stop its offensive action in Chiapas and who proposed a truce to the rebels of the Zapatista National Liberation Army.

We hope that the resignation of the governor of the state of Chiapas will help bring peace once again to the region.

Let us hope now that the Mexican government will take whatever steps are required to improve the appalling living conditions of the Indians in the state and that it will succeed in changing the region's political and economic structures in the near future, so that the claims of the people of Chiapas may be defended fairly within the law. By proposing to bring a return to peace and avoid armed confrontation, the Mexican government is giving us hope for the future.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, February 12, 1995, 2,500 citizens of Surrey, B.C. braved the elements to join Mr. and Mrs. Steven Carpenter's walk in memory of their daughter Melanie who was tragically slain in early January.

Today in my riding, the citizens of Cranbrook, British Columbia are conducting their own march in support of the Carpenter family and to speak out against early parole of dangerous offenders. The march is spontaneous. It is grass roots. I commend the efforts of my constituents and only wish I could join them.

Fernand Auger, the suspected assailant of Melanie Carpenter, only served two–thirds of his sentence and was obviously not rehabilitated, let alone ready to be released into society.

The Liberal government has shown in the past that it is not interested in listening to the concerns of Canadians. I therefore implore the justice minister to listen to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are worried for the safety of their families and support my Reform colleague's Bill C–240 which would prolong the detention of these high risk offenders.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, as we approach the release date of the federal budget, Canadians are expressing some very strong opinions about what should be and should not be contained in that budget.

One thing we should not overlook in this process is that the current emphasis on expenditure cuts will leave people living in rural areas of Canada more adversely affected than their urban neighbours.

If the emphasis remains where it is today, the reduction in rural services, which began with former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's cuts and closures to post offices, will continue in transportation and rural support services. For example, the national highways program is threatened, the rail system is under attack and rural local airports have lost support.

Rural residents will find that they have to go further and spend more money to maintain their quality of life because of these and other cuts.

The policies expressed and implied by the federal finance minister are not being delivered in a fair or even handed way and Canadians should take note of this.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the past number of weeks Canadians have expressed abhorrence concerning videotaped hazing rituals and other deplorable conduct that has occurred within our military service.

The reputation of the Canadian military has been significantly harmed by these revelations. To suggest that these activities are innocuous or nothing more than male bonding essential to teamwork is an affront to dignity and common sense.

What we have witnessed is human degradation, racism and other completely unacceptable activities. The Minister of National Defence has acted prudently, expeditiously and decisively in order to send a clear message from the bottom to the top of the military establishment that these activities are a disgrace to our proud military tradition and that they will not be tolerated now or ever.

I commend the minister and those within the department who are working hard to restore integrity and professionalism in the military and to restore its now tarnished image.

DR. GEORGE STANLEY

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a New Brunswicker, I am pleased to pay tribute today to Dr. George Stanley.

• (1410)

Dr. Stanley is a former Lieutenant–Governor of New Brunswick and a key player in designing the Canadian flag.

During Dr. Stanley's tenure as dean of arts at Canada's Royal Military College in Kingston, he drew a design of a maple leaf placed on a red and white background. This design Dr. Stanley modelled after the college's own flag.

On February 15, 1965, the maple leaf was raised over Parliament Hill. To quote Dr. Stanley:

> A flag is more than a means of identification. It is the embodiment of what a country stands for: It is the symbol of the ethos or spirit of a people, its aspirations, its will to live and its determination to play its role in history.

How true are those words, Mr. Speaker. I add that our flag is also the symbol of unity, one that speaks for all the citizens of Canada.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a decision handed down by the Ontario Court highlights the need to adopt legislation to establish the legal and ethical framework for new reproductive technologies. After separating from his wife, a man was declared the legal father of a female child, although the child was conceived by artificial insemination from an unnamed donor.

In the absence of legislation on new reproductive technologies, the judge gave priority to the child's interests, but there is nothing to say that this will always be the case.

This situation points to the important impact of new reproductive technologies on the people who use them. The government has not yet stated that it will soon introduce a bill to prevent potential abuses in this area. Is it waiting for a mockery to be made of children and parents' rights before taking action?

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, 30 years ago, I was moved by a ceremony at the Citadel in Quebec during which the Canadian flag was hoisted for the first time.

[English]

I was impressed then, as I was two hours ago, to stand on the lawn in front of this building to participate again in a memorial to our flag of 30 years.

I would ask Canadians in this House to join me right now in singing O Canada.

[Editor's Note: Whereupon members rose and sang O Canada.]

The Speaker: Colleagues, a little earlier in the House one of our members, as I said, was using a prop. He used the Canadian flag. I am very hard pressed to intervene at any time.

I am not sure the statements were designed for the singing of a song, but I am very hard pressed not to have you, the members of the Parliament of Canada stand and sing our national anthem. In keeping with this, I was going to wait until three o'clock, but I think I will proceed now.

• (1415)

I would like to introduce to members and to all of the citizens in Canada the two designers of our Canadian flag, Mr. Stanley and Mr. Matheson who are with us today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Prime Minister said in this House that his government was preparing to offload financial responsibilities on the provinces without giving them sufficient resources, let alone tax points, to deal with this new development.

Would the Minister of Finance confirm that in his next two budgets, thus reflecting what was said by the Prime Minister, he is planning a wholesale shift of certain federal commitments to the provinces, without transferring the requisite financial and fiscal resources?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had an excellent meeting and some very useful discussions with the provincial Finance ministers. I presented them with the main parameters of the reforms we have in mind. First of all, I told them there would be no surprises and second, before anything is done affecting the provinces, we will first look at federal spending. I think the message was very well received and that these discussions came at the right time. I am very pleased with the meeting we had yesterday.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance agree that no matter how he intends to shift the burden of financial problems on to the provinces, nothing will change as far as the Canadian taxpayer is concerned, since if the federal government manages to lighten its debt load by transferring part of it or part of the deficit to the provinces, as far as the average citizen is concerned, the financial problem remains the same? Would he agree that is basically what his approach boils down to?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is, of course, no. We are not dumping our problems on the provinces. Yesterday's discussion was about the fact that we have a national problem, at the federal level and at the provincial level. The Quebec Minister of Finance agreed, incidentally. Upon leaving the meeting, he said there was a consensus on the need for all levels of government to work together. And that is what we intend to do.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance may wish to refer to certain statements by the ministers, including the minister from Quebec who said that this approach would become a disaster for Quebec in 1996.

Would the Minister of Finance agree that his decision to postpone until next year the drastic cuts he intends to make in transfer payments to the provinces for social programs financing was made in order to avoid weakening the federal position on the eve of the referendum? Will he be frank and forthright and admit that major cuts are to be postponed until next year, for purely political reasons?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in our last February budget, we made it very clear to the provinces that we intended to examine the matter of transfer payments in 1996–97. In other words, what we did yesterday was entirely in line with what we said in our last budget.

Second, what I did yesterday and my announcement about the one year postponement was something we promised in the red book, and I would advise the hon. member to read his copy again.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, during his meeting with his provincial counterparts, the federal Minister of Finance carefully avoided discussing the issue of the GST replacement which, according to the commitment made in the red book, should normally be implemented next year. I would ask him to reread the red book, since the commitment was made in it.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister concede that he refused to discuss the issue of reforming the GST because Alberta, and especially Quebec, want nothing to do with a national sales tax that would limit their freedom to tax when Ottawa is also preparing to reduce transfer payments to the provinces?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the specific purpose of yesterday's meeting was to exchange points of view on budgetary issues because the federal government is getting ready to table its budget, and several provinces, for example Saskatchewan and Alberta, will also be tabling theirs very shortly. So, the meeting was quite short and its only objective was really to air viewpoints on the upcoming budgets.

Furthermore, I do not need to reread the red book; unfortunately or fortunately, I know it by heart.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Minister of Finance plan, on the one hand, to reduce the provinces' transfer payments, which will cause a shortfall in social program funding, and on the other, to shrink their tax bases by putting in place a Canada-wide sales tax which would replace provincial sales taxes? Can he explain this to us?

[English]

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in yesterday's meeting which I must say was very constructive all the provincial finance ministers without exception basically recognized that we have a huge problem at the federal level and at the provincial levels and that it is crucial we work together to solve it. That is really the spirit that animated the entire meeting.

As far as the sales tax is concerned, that was not the purpose of the meeting. I find it incredibly difficult given the tremendous desire of the business community and consumers across this country in every province, including Quebec—all one has to look at is the Conseil du patronat, the consumers associations in Quebec—that everybody in Quebec wants a national sales tax so that we can lower the cost and make it fair.

The only people I know who are against it are Bloc Quebecois members. Then again, they are against everything.

TAXATION

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, after weeks of telling this House that he could not reveal the contents of the budget, the finance minister appears to have spilled the beans to his provincial counterparts and the national media. He indicated yesterday that he intends to raise taxes on corporations and so-called better off Canadians.

At what levels of household income does one become a better off Canadian and therefore a target for a tax increase?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the discussion we had yesterday with the provincial finance ministers, which was actually the second because we had one prior to the last budget, was very worthwhile. It is really part of making federalism work when finance ministers can sit down and basically off the record exchange views and build a common consensus. It was very good.

I did not go into complete detail. What I did was provide the broad outlines, and they did as far as I was concerned.

The point I made yesterday in terms of taxes was that I pointed out what I thought was a reasonably perceptive glance into the obvious. However, I will draw it to the member's attention again. We are going to close loopholes. To the best of my knowledge it is not the poor in this country who are utilizing loopholes.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance of all people must understand the impact of tax increases on the economy. If tax levels or other charges paid to governments are increased, one effect is to drive capital, jobs and companies out of the country.

Canada Steamships, for example, which is owned by prudent and patriotic people, has registered a number of its vessels under foreign flags of convenience to no doubt avoid paying astronomical registration charges, et cetera.

Does the minister not agree that there will be a flight of capital, companies, jobs and productive individuals out of Canada if they are the targets of tax increases in the next budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the leader of the third party that if he wants to go into the details of any company with which I happen to have had some association all he has to do is talk to the Ethics Commissioner who would be delighted to lay the whole thing out in front of him.

I would also suggest that if the leader of the third party wants a lesson in international taxation I am sure that some of his colleagues might explain it to him so that he might begin to understand it.

There is no doubt that any country must be competitive in its tax policies. I can assure the hon. member that we are not the party that brought in 39 tax increases in a row. We are the party that in the last budget dealt very fairly with the whole question of taxes. I do not believe that corporate Canada is so shaky that making the tax system fairer is going to make it leave the country.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the present premier of Ontario was chosen as citizen of the year in Buffalo, New York because his tax and spend policies drove so many companies across the line to Buffalo, New York.

Is it the aim of the finance minister to become citizen of the year in Panama by including tax increases in his next budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not the height of my ambition to stand up in this House and defend the current premier of Ontario.

All I can say to the hon. member is that he is obviously a far greater expert on taxation in Panama and so I will let him answer his own question.

GUN CONTROL BILL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

After stalling for over five months, the Minister of Justice finally decided to table his gun control bill. This bill represents a retreat from the government's original intentions, especially with regard to handguns.

Since the minister claims to be settling an urgent social problem, why must we wait at least eight years for his bill to have an effect?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that this legislation has the support of the vast majority of Canadians, particularly Quebecers.

As I mentioned yesterday, I am disappointed at the approach she is taking to this initiative. I would call upon the hon. member to stand with this government in support of this legislation to see it enacted as soon as possible.

In the meantime, let me address the specific questions asked by the hon. member. With the enactment of this legislation commencing in January of next year the registration system will be under way. Two years after that the registration of firearms will commence. By reason of incentives for early registration we fully expect that registration will be in place within two or three years of the undertaking of the program, which I think is an objective for which we should all work together.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that this eight–year delay is the price the minister had to pay for the support of his Liberal colleagues and the cabinet?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the implementation of the registration program is timed and organized as a rational and sensible approach to the implementation of such a program on a national scale. It is the way it should be done to be done properly.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the news reports today that Lieutenant Colonel Alan Stephens, Commander of the Canadian Logistics Battalion in Croatia, was on Saturday relieved of his command for inappropriate conduct. Will the minister provide the House with the details of this incident as he knows them?

• (1430)

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member obviously knows that with respect to the privacy of the individual concerned, while investigations are pending I cannot make any comment.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am still looking for information.

The Royal Kingston Curling Club hosted the Labatt Tankard competition over the weekend. For no apparent valid reason, a team of five Canadian forces video technicians spent three days on full pay and allowances filming the event. As a result, they were unable to film military activities for which they had been scheduled.

Can the minister explain to the House the rationale which has a military video team filming a civilian event at the expense of a valid military commitment?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians are getting sick and tired of this line of questioning.

The Canadian Armed Forces not only discharges its very noble efforts outside the country but assists many Canadians, worthy causes and communities in local events across this country. They just assisted with the flag ceremony outside the House of Commons.

I really do not want to politicize this too much, but is the Reform Party saying that the Canadian Armed Forces has no business helping communities with their local events? Is that what he is saying?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday in this House, in responding to a question I asked him, the Minister of National Defence did not seem to know about the Eagle River exercise, which is nothing but a sumptuous fishing trip at Canadian taxpayers' expense.

Did the Minister of National Defence make inquiries and can he assure us that there was no Eagle River exercise or any other similar activity in 1994?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons I said this should be put on the Order Paper yesterday is that I could not believe the hon. member was asking a question about a facility that was closed two years ago and before this government came into power.

As far as I am concerned that facility is closed. The province of Newfoundland has indicated some interest in taking it back. That is all I have to say.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I still think that the minister did not answer my question. I asked him if there had been other similar activities. I did not get an answer.

Did the Minister of National Defence issue directives to Canadian Forces officers forbidding them to organize activities similar to the Eagle River exercise and, if so, will he table them in this House?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to which activities the hon. member is referring, but I will certainly take this as a representation and draw it to the attention of the chief of defence staff.

SPORTS CANADA

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Sports Canada receives $64 million a year to help Canada's athletes. Unfortunately a paltry 8 per cent or approximately $5 million of that $64 million actually reaches Canadian athletes. Over $42 million is being spent to administer a huge, cumbersome sports bureaucracy.

My question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Is Sports Canada there to benefit the athlete or the bureaucracy?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague presumably must have been listening to my speeches. I have said repeatedly that I consider the athlete should have first priority. And I have done more than say it. We are in the process of putting into place a sports funding and accountability framework that will ensure at long last that the athletes receive the rewards they deserve.

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want action, not more studies. Will the minister act to rectify the gross mismanagement in Sports Canada?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I already gave the answer. We are acting. We are putting policy into place with no more studies but action from now on.

BLOOD SUPPLY SYSTEM

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

The minister herself claims that everything is now being done to ensure the quality of blood products and the safety of the blood supply in Canada. But we learned that the Canadian Bureau of Biologics has yet to approve two factor IX products used to treat haemophilia B.

How can the minister justify that these products, which are purer and of higher quality than existing products, have not been approved by the Canadian Bureau of Biologics after more than two years?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have taken the necessary steps, i.e. the steps that can be taken at this time to ensure the safety of the blood supply system, and we will continue to do so.

This does not mean that we are closing the door to new developments or new measures. If you have any information that may help us, by all means, share it with us and we will act on it.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister realize that, because these drugs have not yet been approved by the Canadian Bureau of Biologics, some doctors have to use lower quality products to treat haemophilia B? Does she not realize that?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a process for approval of drugs within the Department of Health. This process is based on scientific study of the products being offered. That process is ongoing. The idea is to ensure the drugs that are approved are safe and effective. That is what our job is about and the orders I give Health Canada ensure the safety and the health of Canadians.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Young people in Canada experience the highest rate of unemployment due to the legacy of nine years of Tory mismanagement of the economy. What has the minister done to make sure there is hope, opportunity and jobs for our young people in Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is important for us to point out that since October 1994 we have been able to achieve some 60,000 new jobs for young people in this country. The unemployment rate is now down to its lowest level since 1990. Of those 60,000 jobs, over 15,000 were as a direct result of initiatives we have taken under strategic initiatives of the red book policies.

For example, one important initiative has been partnerships with both business and labour in areas like electronics, horticulture, tourism, and car repair. Over 5,000 young people are now involved in major apprenticeship and internship programs working with private industry so they can get good careers for their future. We hope to have close to 20,000 enrolled this year in that very good program.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice knows that a number of countries have tried to implement a universal firearms registration system. Can the minister tell us, how do successful universal firearms registration systems work in reducing violent crime in those countries and what percentage reduction can we expect in Canada?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the connection between universal registration, reduction in crime and increase in community safety is sufficiently obvious that today the initiative of this government was endorsed by the Canadian Medical Association.

May I say as well that if the hon. member does not find my explanation for the justification sufficiently persuasive, then perhaps he can ask the question of others who endorse it. Did I mention that they include the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, the police services boards from Brandon, Manitoba; Calgary, Alberta; Edmonton, Alberta; Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan; Nova Scotia; the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police; Sudbury Chief of Police; the Thunder Bay police—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as usual, the minister is skating around the issue and is not answering the question.

Many countries have tried registration and he knows they have abolished it. The minister will not do an evaluation as the Auditor General has recommended. We know that registration will not work but surely the minister must know that lives will not be saved.

My question very simply is: How will this minister measure success? How will he do it?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we shall measure success by providing the police forces of this country with a tool they have been asking for, for a dozen years.

AIR TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Next week, the Prime Minister is scheduled to ratify with President Clinton a treaty to liberalize Canadian-American air space and provide Canadian carriers better access to the lucrative U.S. market, particularly at the New York and Chicago airports.

Since the Minister of Transport deprived Air Canada of the very lucrative Asian market, to the benefit of Canadian International, can he tell us if, this time, he intends to favour Air Canada as regards access to the U.S. market?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, the question asked by the hon. member is based on an absurd statement. Indeed, since I was appointed Minister of Transport, the government granted Air Canada access to the new Kansai airport, in Osaka. Air Canada also has flights to Seoul, in South Korea, and has landing rights in Singapore, even though it does not go there. You can rest assured that when the time comes to allocate U.S. routes, assuming the bilateral agreement with that country is ratified, we will—as we have always done—ensure a balance and a reasonable sharing of the benefits for the two Canadian airlines.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that Hong Kong is a more important destination than Osaka. Does he not agree that his decision to reserve international routes for only one carrier, except for the U.S. market, is likely to favour Canadian International, at the expense of Air Canada, whose employees are mainly located in Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should recognize that it is government policy to recognize there are two great Canadian airlines in this country: Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International.

What we have achieved with respect to what we hope we will be able to sign when the president comes to Canada is something that has been worked on in this country for nearly eight or nine years.

I would have thought that instead of playing petty parochial politics the hon. member would have recognized that Canadians from coast to coast in every province and both airlines have accepted this deal as the biggest step forward in Canadian aviation history in the last 15 years.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration sponsored a meeting and flew writers and bureaucrats on short notice to a four star west coast hotel to ask them: What should we do with the citizenship oath? The meeting was purposely kept secret and the new so–called pledge omits the head of state.

• (1445)

Was the minister aware of this meeting and does he approve of its final result, a pledge that is no longer an oath that leaves out any and all mention of the Queen?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was aware of the meeting. The recommendation to the government to hold such a meeting to bring together Canadian writers was by the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration, and the Reform Party agreed with the recommendation.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the recommendation of the standing committee. However they did not recommend a secret meeting.

On this day 30 years ago Canadians chose their new flag in an open forum that included the whole country. Today the minister uses backroom politics in a four–star hotel to try to slip in a new oath by Canadians on the sly. Canadians are saying: "Stop the secrecy but above all stop the waste".

Will the minister tell Parliament that he will put a stop to these backroom meetings and that any future changes of such profound importance will be brought before the Canadian people as was done 30 years ago?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member's long preamble is simply absurd. The member knows full well—he was a member of that committee—that one of the major recommendations was to try to engage some leading Canadian writers to bring some vigour to a Canadian oath, to a charter of values for Canadian citizens.

Rather than undermining the voluntary efforts of the 10 writers who came together, he should be complimenting those Canadians who are prepared to give of themselves like Canadians gave of themselves 30 years ago for the flag.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

[English]

The previous government had a clear bias toward contracting services within the public service, with little control on the costs, numbers or quality of this shadow public service.

What means will the minister take to rigorously examine and restrain contracting so that public service employees do not lose their jobs while the shadow public service continues to prosper and grow?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a close encounter. The government does not have the bias of the past government with respect to the matter of contracting out. We believe in getting best value for the taxpayers' dollar and ensuring efficiency and effectiveness in how we spend those dollars.

In respect of the downsizing that will be occurring, certainly we will want to look at it very carefully and take into consideration the concerns the hon. member has raised here today.

It is our effort to treat our employees fairly and reasonably. We will make every effort to try to put them in other jobs if their current positions have been declared surplus.

However the whole question of contracting out is also a matter that is before the government operations committee.

Oral Questions

TAXATION

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who has obviously been hearing like the rest of us about a lot of taxpayers who are fed up with hitting the wall. Some taxpayers have not hit the wall. Some taxpayers have never even seen the wall and others have jumped over the wall.

Over the last few days the minister has talked about tax loopholes. I am pleased to hear him actually using that term as part of his vocabulary these days.

Will the minister as part of this theme seriously address the fact that capital gains in Canada are not taxed as other income as we find in the United States? People who inherit vast amounts of money do not pay tax. Would he consider the mother or father of all tax loopholes, the family trust, and remove that tax option in his budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have said in the House on numerous occasions I will not comment on specific suggestions. When bringing down the budget I will obviously give an answer to the member's question. In the meantime I will take it as representation.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, in the theme of fairness that the minister has commented on so much recently, would he ensure in whatever provisions he brings down in his budget that urban Canadians and rural and small town Canadians take an equal hit?

There is a lot of concern out there right now, particularly around the whole matter of transportation policy and so on, that rural and small town Canadians will be adversely affected by the budget much more than urban Canadians.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that a great deal of effort has gone into and is going into making sure that the budget is fair.

The comments of the hon. member are well taken. Between urban Canadians and rural Canadians, in fact between Canadians in each region of the country the budget must be fair.

If we are to face up to the tremendous problem of the debt and the deficit, it is clear the budget will only be accepted if Canadians feel that everybody is bearing their fair share of the burden. I can assure the hon. member that is our intention.

30TH ANNIVERSARY OF CANADIAN FLAG

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of heritage. Canada is celebrating the 30th anniversary of the flag today, at a cost of a million dollars in this era of budget cuts, while the 25th anniversary was only marked by a simple ceremony on Parliament Hill.

How can the minister explain why the government will invest over one million dollars this year, half of it in Quebec the year the referendum will be held, when a simple ceremony sufficed for the 25th anniversary?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have several things to say in reply. The first is that in the year of the 25th anniversary, the government in power was perhaps not interested in Canada's symbol, was perhaps was not as interested in the Canadian flag as we are.

The figures you gave were wrong. Only 25 per cent, not 50, of the budget for the event will be spent in Quebec. I was asked how many flags there were, and I can say that approximately 30 per cent of them are for Quebec. You were misinformed, Madam.

The Speaker: I would like to remind the hon. minister to always address the Chair.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, instead of clumsily justifying himself, why does the minister not just admit that we have a clear case here of a vast federal propaganda campaign gearing up in Quebec during the year of the referendum?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues may suppose that I am using the 30th anniversary of the flag to detract attention from a referendum that has not even been called yet. I would say that some people have a very narrow mind on these issues, so narrow that their ears are stuck together from the inside. Now I understand why they need to separate to broaden their vision and their minds.

The Speaker: Sometimes, these exchanges give me such a headache. Let us move on.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Many Canadians feel that the Achilles' heel of the gun legislation is the registration of long guns, not of handguns nor the other aspects of the bill but the registration of .22s and shotguns.

The justice department considers that the cost may be as much as $85 million and others have said considerably more over five years. Could the Minister of Justice tell the House whether this money would not be better spent in cancer research or, better yet, not spent at all in so far as this is money we have to borrow from future generations for registration and there is no proof that it will do one iota of good?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the first place may I say that the estimates as to costs which the Department of Justice has arrived at will be put in detail before the parliamentary committee that will consider the legislation. It will examine our assumptions. It will see our calculations. We will establish that they are real and that they are dependable.

Second, may I say that the registration system, together with the other elements of this package in the bill, are going to save lives in the country. May I close by saying that I am not the only one who believes in that.

May I point out that a survey done by the hon. member in his own riding established that 69 per cent of the respondents agreed with registration. I would like the hon. member to tell the House whether he is going to vote with his constituents on this issue.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to advise members opposite that I was elected by 100 per cent of the people who voted for me for three very distinct reasons. The first was to get our nation—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Usually the answers are to my right and the questions are on the other side. Would the hon. member please put his question.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I will vote in absolute fidelity to the best wishes of my constituents.

I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. It is a most serious question because we are facing a most serious debt crisis in the country.

Will the minister, before universal registration of long guns is implemented, bring before the House the quantitative information that will attest to the veracity of his decision to register all long guns before it is implemented?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have already made it clear that we will put the details of our calculations before the committee.

In so far as the wisdom of the registration system is concerned, first we rely upon the advice of the experts, the police chiefs across the country who have been asking for this for years.

We say as well that if the approach advocated by the hon. member was to have been taken by the person who first proposed a traffic light at an intersection it would never have been installed.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, several women in my riding are extremely concerned about the ability of defence lawyers to subpoena the confidential records of sexual assault crisis centres for use in court. They are afraid that the protection gained by the rape shield legislation is being eroded as lawyers use a back door to gain access to their confidential information.

What actions will the Minister of Justice consider taking to ensure that the personal records of assault victims remain confidential?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of and share the concerns identified by the hon. member.

The House should know that at my direction as Attorney General the federal government intervened in a case recently argued before the Supreme Court of Canada in which the circumstances under which such evidence can be compelled and the circumstances under which it can be introduced at trial were canvassed and argued.

In that case the federal government argued that the Supreme Court of Canada should adopt and strengthen guidelines stipulated by the Court of Appeal of British Columbia to protect sexual assault centres from harassment. The court reserved its judgment and we will await the disposition.

Let me make it clear to the House that if necessary the federal government is prepared to introduce legislation under the Criminal Code to ensure that we strike the right balance between full answer and defence on the one hand and the freedom of sexual assault centres to operate without harassment.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

The Speaker: Colleagues, I would like to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of Mr. Trevor Pinnock, Artistic Director and Principal Conductor of the National Arts Centre Orchestra who will soon be representing Canada in a major European tour.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for the record I would like to correct a factual error that was made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in answer to my question.

The Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might consider another avenue. Question Period is over. I sense that this would probably be getting us into a debate.

If the hon. member wants to correct something that the hon. member said I would accept that but to correct another member would be out of order.

Mr. Mayfield: Mr. Speaker, I would like to state that I was not a member of the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration at the time the decision was made to have a group of writers write a new oath.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

The Speaker: My colleagues, I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing on February 6, 1995 concerning media disclosure of the report of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development prior to the report's presentation to the House.

I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. The hon. member submits that the privileges of the members of the House of Commons have been breached because this report was given to the media before being tabled in the House.

[English]

The hon. member pointed out that until they are presented in the House committee reports should remain confidential. On this he is absolutely correct. However, as all members are aware, the Speaker is loath to intervene in committee matters unless difficulties arising in committee are brought to the attention of the House by way of a report from the committee. This tradition has been outlined by many Speakers before me and in particular by Speaker Fraser on November 7, 1991 in a ruling on a question of privilege involving committee proceedings.

In circumstances similar to those currently before us, a standing committee might decide to examine the matter of a breach of confidentiality and decide to report it to the House. Only then can the Speaker intervene.

Although I do not find a prima facie question of privilege in this situation, the premature release of a committee's confidential information is nonetheless a very serious matter.

[English]

In his submission the hon. member further noted that as an associate member of the committee in question he was denied access to the report.

Let me remind the House that the role of associate members, as outlined in Standing Order 104(4), is basically two–fold. They can be designated by a standing committee for membership on a subcommittee it establishes and, as such, become full members of that subcommittee and enjoy all the rights of a permanent member.

They can also serve as substitutes in the committee for which they have been named as associate members, thereby having the same rights as those of the permanent members they are replacing.

However, in the case now before the House these situations did not occur. Furthermore, according to citation 766 in Beauchesne's sixth edition, non–members of a committee normally retire when the committee is about to deliberate upon its report.

Therefore, in this case the fact that the hon. member was not given access to the draft report does not, in the view of the Chair, constitute a breach of his privileges.

Finally, the issue of confidentiality is one of great importance for the House. I would remind all members of their obligation to see to it that the confidentiality of committee deliberations and reports is respected.

MANAGEMENT OF GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table before this House a document on the expenditure management system of the Government of Canada, which describes the government's new decision–making process in matters of programs and expenditures.

[English]

With this overhaul, the first in 15 years, we ensure the system responds to today's economic and fiscal realities. It recognizes the way this government has been doing business since elected in October, 1993.

To reduce spending to meet our fiscal targets and to free up resources for reallocation to new priorities requires that we make tough spending and program choices. Our ultimate objective is to deliver quality programs and services within the resources that Canadians can afford.

We are demonstrating to Parliament and to all Canadians that we are fulfilling our red book commitment to fund new initiatives through reallocating expenditures, not with new money, not with adding further to the debt, but to set our priorities by reallocating for new expenditure items.

The document outlines the formal mechanisms that will foster greater fiscal responsibility and help this government to meet its targets.

I would like to bring to members' attention some of the system's major features, quite briefly. It formally eliminates central policy reserves. It integrates practically all decisions about spending into the budget planning process. The document clearly outlines the cycle that will now be followed.

We will deliver information on program performance to Parliament in better and more timely ways. Departments will produce documents on the outlook for their program priorities and expenditures over the next few years and provide them to Parliament. These documents will increase parliamentary involvement by assisting the standing committees in fulfilling their mandates to examine future year expenditures, trends and priorities. These outlook documents are new to this Parliament and expand the involvement and role of members of Parliament in the budgeting and estimates process.

We will adjust these processes over the next few years. It will take some evolutionary time as we gain experience with them.

[Translation]

I am confident that they will help us make the difficult decisions that are involved in providing quality services and reducing the cost of government.

• (1510)

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Madam Speaker, I must tell the President of the Treasury Board that I will carefully read the document he has just tabled on the expenditure management system of the Government of Canada.

Like all Quebecois and Canadian taxpayers, I am concerned about the current management of federal public expenditures. In view of the information supplied to us every year by the Auditor General, it is high time for the federal government to make an in–depth review of its expenditures and, above all, of its management practices.

I hope the document tabled today will address the concerns voiced by parliamentarians and that the proposed improvements will be consistent with the auditor general's recommendations.

The criticisms expressed by the auditor general regarding program evaluation, for instance, should be taken into account. Given the abysmal performance of the Canadian government in the area of program evaluation, the Bloc Quebecois hopes this new document will contain not only new tools to more adequately inform parliamentarians of public expenditures, but also real solutions to evaluate the results of such programs.

Each year, the auditor general presents us with an impressive list of waste in the use of public funds, and the government must, as a first step, clean up its expenditures before it can justify cutting programs.

By eliminating the central policy reserves, the government will lose its flexibility to fund new projects. Since such projects will be funded by reallocating moneys committed elsewhere, the government must clearly express its priorities for the coming years.

The Bloc Quebecois will be keeping a very close watch on the political choices to be announced in the upcoming budget. I would also like to take the opportunity to congratulate the minister for expressing himself so well in French.

[English]

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Madam Speaker, if I have to congratulate the President of the Treasury Board on the introduction of this policy it must surely be with a very small c.

The country is crying out for cuts, elimination of waste, downsizing, less government, and yet the number one item in the minister's statement is that he will formally eliminate central policy reserves. Surely we could do much better than this.

There is nothing in this statement about departmental cuts or elimination of departments. The minister is shuffling the policy chairs on the deck of the Titanic. These policies provide a different look at a serious but old problem of runaway deficits. There is not one single word in this statement about cuts, about smaller government, about downsizing the civil service.

We can only say that we are extremely disappointed in the statement and we look for more, bigger and better news in the budget.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table today the 60th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the membership of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move that the 60th report be concurred in later today.

[English]

I also have the honour to present the 61st report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding changes to the Standing Orders as they relate to the printing of papers and evidence of standing committees.

Madam Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent of the House to dispense with the reading of the 60th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs. If the House gives its consent I move that the 60th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs presented to the House earlier this day be concurred in.

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to table before this House a petition on behalf of senior citizens from my riding of Richmond—Wolfe.

I would like to do so by stating the facts. It reads: We, the undersigned citizens of Disraeli, Danville, Lawrenceville, Maricourt, Valcourt, Saint–Élie d'Orford, Rock Forest, Richmond, Windsor, Saint–Claude, Stoke Centre, Chesterville and Saint–Denis–de–Brompton, wish to call the attention of Parliament to the following facts.

Whereas seniors are naturally more at a loss when faced with voice mail technology; whereas seniors are entitled to adequate service, particularly with regard to their income security enquiries; therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ask the government to abandon its plan to introduce voice mail systems for seniors.

I table this petition, Madam Speaker.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this petition concerns excessive violence in our society, on the radio and on television.

[English]

Violence in our society is a concern of these petitioners: violence in general, violence on radio and television or wherever one finds it.

The petitioners ask the government and the CRTC to ensure that to the extent possible we diminish and remove violence. They point out that violence is not necessary to entertain or to inform, that it is counter to what many families are trying to do in their homes as they raise their children.

They point out however that there has been some progress made in this area and they applaud the government and the CRTC for their efforts.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I present today three petitions from constituents of New Westminster—Burnaby as well as from other parts of British Columbia.

In the first two, the petitioners state that physicians should be working to save lives and not to end them. They pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the third petition, petitioners from B.C.'s lower mainland pray and request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

ROBERT LATIMER

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I present a petition compiled by Jamie and Janet Bassett from my riding of Prince Albert—Churchill River.

The petition has been signed by approximately 14,400 Canadians and requests that Parliament grant conditionally or unconditionally a pardon to Mr. Robert Latimer of Wilkie for a second degree murder conviction.

While I respectfully disagree with the petition, I hold the Bassetts in high regard. I respect their viewpoint and their right to express it, and the viewpoint of the many thoughtful Canadians who have signed this petition.

I present this petition on their behalf.

• (1520)

MINING INDUSTRY

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to table.

The first states that Canada's mining industry is a mainstay of employment in over 150 communities across Canada, an important contributor to Canada's gross domestic product in total exports and a cornerstone of our economic future.

Therefore, the petitioners call on Parliament to take action that will increase employment in this sector, promote exploration and rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada.

I concur with this petition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase, sexual orientation.

I concur with this petition.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of constituents of Calgary North, praying that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously.

This petition is signed by more than 25 members of the Calgary North constituency.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition on behalf of my constituents and residents from the greater Toronto area. The petitioners claim that the majority of Canadians believe that the privileges society accords to heterosexual couples should not be extended to same sex relationships.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase, sexual orientation.

ROBERT LATIMER

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, it my duty and privilege to present a petition signed by approximately 3,000 Canadians, the majority of whom reside in the Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituency.

The petition was collected and brought to my attention by the Woodrow family of Battleford, Saskatchewan. It notes the conviction of Robert Latimer for second degree murder with no chance of parole for 10 years.

The petitioners request that Parliament grant Robert Latimer of Wilkie, Saskatchewan a pardon conditionally or unconditionally for his conviction of second degree murder in the death of his daughter Tracy Latimer.

JUSTICE

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my hon. colleague, the member for Calgary Southeast, I rise in the House on day eight to present petition number eight. These petitions are being presented on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson. April 11, 1995 is the date set for the parole hearing.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition.

The petitioners request that Parliament support laws that severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime; support new Criminal Code firearm control provisions that recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms; and support legislation that will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have proven not to be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex as to be ineffective and/or unenforceable.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the second petition is from the constituents of Wetaskiwin.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase, sexual orientation.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of residents of communities in western Canada.

The petitioners point out that the Canadian Mineral Industry Federation has proposed a 10–point plan of action to be addressed by both the mineral industry and the Government of Canada to keep mining in Canada.

They call on Parliament to take immediate action which would increase employment in this crucial sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves and sustain mining communities in order to keep mining in Canada.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Madam Speaker, I have another petition in which the residents point out to the House of Commons that a company in western Canada called Multinational Resources has indicated its plan to divert water from the North Thompson River near Valemount, British Columbia, in an effort to resell that water in San Diego, California. This is one of the many proposals from the North America Water and Power Alliance; that is, to divert Canadian rivers into the United States and northern Mexico.

The residents call on the government to introduce legislation that would categorically prohibit any permits allowing freshwater rivers to be dammed or diverted into the United States—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry. I think we are into debate.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to Question No. 93, which I tabled in this House on October 19, 1994. Usually, the response period is 45 days, but, in this case, 120 days have gone by since the question was raised.

I would like to know why it is taking three times the usual maximum time allowed. What is the point of having rules, if the government is not going to comply with them? Despite whatever excuses might be made, I would like to know when I will get an answer to Question No. 93.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, as always, the government tries to prepare responses to questions as quickly as possible. In this particular instance, I am informed that the response is almost ready to be tabled in the House. I will table it as soon as I receive it.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): If Questions Nos. 112 and 113 could be made orders for returns, these returns would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 112 and 113 be made orders for returns?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Question No. 112—Mr. White:

What was the total number of full time employees at each job classification in the respective federal departments for fiscal 1993?

Question No. 113—Mr. Caccia:

What is the total amount of federal public money given to the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (AECL) since its inception?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—BUDGET POLICY

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ) moved:

That this House call upon the government in its next budget to avoid any tax increases targeting low and middle-income taxpayers and to consider instead trimming the fat from the government, eliminating tax expenditures which primarily benefit large corporations and wealthy Canadians and collecting on unpaid tax debts owed to the federal government.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to debate this motion in the House because it is consistent with what the official opposition has been defending, since the last election, as a means of putting our finances in order, as short term or medium term corrective measures, since most experts agree, as we do, that, without fundamentally changing the system, it will be difficult to get control over public finances again.

The Bloc Quebecois is of the opinion that the government must, in its upcoming budget, substantially reduce its expenditures and refrain from increasing income taxes for the middle class or low income taxpayers. The Bloc Quebecois asks that the federal government undertake a complete review of the tax system in order to eliminate unfair tax expenditures and ensure that companies currently not paying taxes pay their fair share.

The federal government should, in particular, eliminate tax shelters benefiting high income taxpayers and big business. Not the measures which favour middle or low income individuals, but the real tax loopholes benefiting very wealthy Canadians and big business who have not been paying their fair share in the federal system for at least 12 years.

The government has tried to justify a possible tax increase, stating that the rise in interest rates is forcing them to do so, forcing the Liberals, when in fact this rise is in large measure attributable to their inaction in fighting the deficit in the last year. I would like to remind you that just days after the Minister of Finance tabled his first budget last February 22, Canada's credit rating was lowered significantly for the first time in five years and the interest rates demanded by domestic and foreign investors on Canadian securities increased considerably, which in turn caused mortgage rates in particular to rise.

Middle class taxpayers are past their tolerance level. Any increase in their tax burden is unacceptable, and the Prime Minister should be reminded that he made promises and commitments regarding the issue on the Téléjournal newscast, on October 1, 1993. He said then that he would not raise taxes during his first two years in office. This is year two.

Last December, the Liberal representatives on the finance committee paid no heed to the Prime Minister's commitment and recommended an across the board surtax on income. This proposal, in the official opposition's opinion, is utterly unacceptable, and I would like to remind you, Madam Speaker, that according to the OECD, individual Canadian taxpayers pay 33 per cent more taxes than the average taxpayer in the United States. We are neighbours, we have a free trade agreement in common and it is inadmissible to have such a disparity between levels of taxation.

The official opposition also warns the government not to make any attempt to use devious means to increase the tax burden of the middle class and others by hitting RRSPs. The Bloc Quebecois is also firmly opposed to the option considered by the federal government to impose a one per cent capital tax on RRSPs. I would say to you that this hidden tax, which could net up to 5 billion dollars annually, would be an insidious blow to taxpayers who are trying to plan for a comfortable retirement, at a time when public funds are inadequate and Canadians' savings are at their lowest in thirty years. This would be an ill–considered and irresponsible measure.

Neither should the federal government abdicate its responsibilities by shifting its deficit onto the backs of the provinces. This approach is irresponsible and has been resorted to time and again in the past, by this government. As an example, since 1982, in the health and education sectors alone, the federal government has deprived the provinces of 48 billion dollars—no small amount—by cutting transfers to the provinces, a loss of 12 billion dollars just for Quebec. Members will recall that, in his February 1994 budget, the present finance minister again made additional cuts of over 2 billion dollars in transfers to the provinces.

Since meeting with his provincial counterparts, the Minister of Finance has left open the possibility that the federal government might make new cuts in transfer payments to provinces. This dumping of the deficit and this scheme to force the provinces to shoulder the burden of the cuts to social programs are unacceptable and irresponsible.

The official opposition feels that the federal government must withdraw from provincial fields of jurisdiction and provide full financial compensation. After all, and in spite of what we are often led to believe, transfer payments to provinces are not gifts from the federal government. The money being transferred comes from taxpayers, including Quebec taxpayers.

Between 1982 and 1992, taxes paid to the federal government by Quebecers increased by 121 per cent. Over that same ten year period, financial transfers from the federal government to Quebec only rose by 50 per cent.

If the federal government makes cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, it should also transfer to provinces tax revenues or tax points equivalent to those cuts, so that the provinces can assume their new responsibility.

The issue of duplication and overlap must be a priority in the government's upcoming budget. Any attempt to eliminate these problems will fail if it is not supported by a withdrawal of the federal government from provincial fields of jurisdiction, as well as full financial compensation. Our friends opposite know that it would be irresponsible for the federal government, after creating duplication by meddling in areas of provincial jurisdiction, to cause a sudden and serious imbalance by withdrawing from social programs while keeping Quebecers' savings and taxes in Ottawa.

I wish to raise a last point. The Liberals have forgotten that the fight against the deficit involves creating jobs. We will create jobs not by cutting post–secondary education funds, as proposed by the Axworthy reform, or by raising taxes, but above all by assuming our responsibilities.

A consensus was reached long ago, in particular in Quebec, on the generalized decentralization of everything having to do with manpower training, job training, the re–entry of unemployed workers into the labour force and even income security. The time has come for the federal government to open its ears and eyes and do what is needed to stimulate employment. It is not by quoting the red book to us every day and telling us that their infrastructure project has created thousands of jobs, when they only created 45,000 casual jobs, that they will convince us that they are concerned about employment. This government must learn the difference between wasteful spending and investing in human capital. That is something it has forgotten in the last year and that is unfortunate.

Finally, last October and last December, when the Liberal majority on the finance committee tabled its report concerning the prebudget consultations, the official opposition made some suggestions to put our finances back in order in the short or medium run, but mostly on the short term. We made these suggestions to allow the Minister of Finance to boast and to reduce the deficit to $25 billion, or 3 per cent of the GDP, by 1996–1997.

We came up with measures to find the money where it is. Cutting social programs will not help us to straighten out our finances. Let me briefly recall the recommendations we put forward.

The first thing the official opposition suggested was for the federal government to withdraw from the provincial areas of jurisdiction upon which it has encroached since the second world war and from all the areas it has invaded, oftentimes by ignoring the provincial governments' prerogatives. We suggest that it withdraw completely from areas that belong to the provinces, with financial compensation.

This withdrawal must not be drastic, it must not steal away like a thief, but in areas of provincial jurisdiction, it should give the provinces all the tools they need, especially fiscal, with full tax points so that they can meet their new obligations. The provinces are not asking for a handout. They just want the federal government to have the honesty to say: We are pulling out of certain areas, we are eliminating the costs of duplication and overlap, and we are going to let the provinces, who are in the best position to do so anyway, manage their own affairs, as provided in the Canadian constitution, in the fields of health, post–secondary education and social assistance, to name a few.

This proposal has a dual objective. First, it sets out to eliminate contradictory policies and to allow the provinces to adopt an integrated policy on job training, education, job creation and health, in short truly comprehensive social policies. Second, this proposal allows the provincial and federal governments to reduce their operating expenses by eliminating costly overlap and duplication in programs and services. In Quebec alone, the cost of duplication and overlap is in excess of $3 billion. I think it would be worthwhile for the minister to consider this proposal.

The second recommendation from the official opposition contained in the minority report submitted to the finance committee in December, as part of the finance minister's pre–budget consultations, is to stop providing subsidies to business immediately, as these subsidies total more than $3.3 billion and are more a source of patronage than a source of assistance for businesses facing modern day challenges, mostly in terms of productivity and international competitiveness.

The president of the Conseil du patronat du Québec himself made the same suggestion in his testimony. He said something like this: these subsidies only foster competition between those businesses which are subsidized and those which are not, and this is unhealthy in terms of management and business growth. I think that it is fair to say that, however much wisdom Mr. Dufour may have displayed in the past, on several occasions, he really outdid himself this time.

We are suggesting that the Minister of Finance immediately cut business subsidies, in other words to forget about his corporate chums for once and make sure that expenditure restraint targets are met, this year as well as next year.

Third recommendation: these are times of reduced international tensions. Experts we consulted before the last election when the Bloc Quebecois became the official opposition say that it is possible, practical and, in fact, desirable that the defence budget be cut by 25 per cent. That is what they said a year ago. National Defence's budget has since been reduced by some 13 per cent, which leaves 12 per cent more cuts to be made, for savings of $1.6 billion. It is definitely worth it in times of constraint, when the Minister of Finance is actively seeking to save. I think there is a good potential for savings there.

We also recommended and continue to recommend that the federal government withdraw from a huge money pit project in which the government has already sunk over $3 billion in direct transfers or loan guarantees. I am referring to Hibernia. According to all the studies conducted, except government studies justifying its continued involvement in this harebrained project, oil prices are unlikely to rise in the next 20 years and may even fall in relation to today's prices. If Hibernia is not profitable with today's prices, how can it be profitable in 20 years with lower prices?

If the government really believes in sound financial management, it should start there. I think it is an interesting idea.

• (1545)

Our fifth recommendation was that the government, the Minister of Finance, undertake a full review of the taxation system in preparing his next budget. We are no longer the only ones asking, although we were the first in the last two years to push for the establishment of a special committee, made up of elected parliamentarians, to review the whole tax system, item by item.

The Canadian tax system is very complex and has not undergone a thorough review in 25 years. Some tax experts mired in administration will, of course, tell us that changes have been made, but these changes are nothing more than patchwork and cannot be compared to a thorough review.

They added some provisions and removed others, and made more additions and deletions. For example, they allowed big businesses to hire renowned tax experts familiar with Canadian tax loopholes. And there are many of them. We have discovered new tax loopholes every day since becoming the official opposition.

The time has come to undertake a thorough review of the tax system. I do not understand why finance department officials, the finance minister himself, the revenue minister and the members of our third party are all opposed to this idea. I do not understand why they are against reviewing the Canadian tax system when many experts, if not the vast majority of them, see this as a necessity at this time.

Our tax system—and particularly our corporate tax system—is the most complicated one in the world. And I am not just expressing my own opinion.

There are people in the United States, including tax experts and economists, who simply cannot figure out our system. I should point out that, towards the end of the Reagan administration, the United States undertook such a process. The Americans reviewed their whole tax system. They did not only look at the corporate tax system, but also at the personal income tax program. They streamlined their whole system to the greatest possible extent. The Americans did not do that just to simplify matters, but also to facilitate detection of tax evaders, including those who take advantage of their financial means or corporate income to hire experts who help them avoid the tax man. It is now more difficult in the United States to avoid paying one's due to the government.

Why not do the same here? Why is the government so reluctant to follow up on our suggestions to target two sectors on a priority basis? The first one is the tax conventions signed with 16 countries considered to be tax havens. Investment management companies will tell you that they can easily find loopholes. It is easy to establish subsidiaries in some of those 16 countries and take advantage of tax loopholes which will allow you to save hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions, or even billions, in federal taxes.

Why does the government refuse to review these 16 tax conventions? Is it because of possible conflicts of interest? Is it because some friends of the party might be taking advantage of these tax havens by creating bogus companies in these countries? They also declare phoney operating losses in these tax havens, so they can deduct them from their profits in Canada and avoid paying taxes.

It is time something was done about this. When the government talks about cutting back, when Quebecers and Canadians are asked to tighten their belts and make incredible sacrifices, maybe it is time the Minister of Finance acted responsibly and stopped protecting his friends and the friends of the Liberal Party of Canada, whose incomes are not necessarily those of the average Canadian.

Tax treaties should be a priority in the next budget. The minister should overhaul some of these treaties which are riddled with tax loopholes.

Family trusts are another case in point. In November, and even in his last budget, the minister tried to make a good impression when he said he would create a sub–committee of the finance committee to analyse the impact of family trusts on federal tax revenues.

The subcommittee was set up, but despite assurances that the process would be completely open, first of all we never got the co–operation of senior officials from the Department of Finance who just laughed at us in committee; second, whenever we asked for additional information and studies, the real stuff, we were turned down; and third, before Christmas, when the official opposition presented a motion in the finance committee to review the policy on family trusts for wealthy taxpayers who never have to pay a cent of capital gains tax, the committee's Liberal majority and the Reform Party voted the motion down. They even voted against a study of family trusts. I think that is unconscionable.

In concluding, I have another recommendation. In his report, the auditor general referred to federal accounts receivable still outstanding. He mentioned the $6.6 billion, owed by taxpayers, especially wealthy taxpayers, to the federal government. They did not deny the fact that they owed the money, but because of this government's spineless attitude, no attempt is being made to recover the $6.6 billion. According to the auditor general, we could recover 80 per cent of this amount.

If the minister needs a few more billion, we suggest that he can get around $14 billion without even touching social programs. It is high time government members woke up to this fact, because people have had enough.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to the member's statements. As he well knows, when leading up to a budget there is always speculation and rumour. Indeed, what we have heard today from the member is a lot of speculation and a lot of rumour.

The member started off by talking substantially about somehow shifting the tax burden to low and middle income Canadians. The member knows that when the Minister of Finance addressed the finance committee on October 17 and 18 the very clear message was that the minister was not looking at increasing taxes as a primary vehicle for deficit reduction and meeting his target of 3 per cent of GDP.

As the debate and the work of the committee have gone on, there has been no question that the committee, of which the hon. member is a member, has concentrated on many items the member has raised. These include the elimination of overlap and duplication among different levels of government; the reduction of subsidies to businesses; and dealing with loopholes that are not illegal but were brought in to handle certain situations at a certain time which may no longer serve their purpose.

The member also spent quite a bit of time referring to the rich and making the rich pay. I thought it might be helpful to pass on to the member for his information some facts that were published by StatsCanada.

The top 10 per cent of taxpayers in Canada in 1992 started at some $50,000 a year. Those top 10 per cent of taxpayers paid 34 per cent of all taxes. In addition to that, that top 10 per cent of taxpayers also contributed 42 per cent of all charitable donations.

When we are talking about who is paying for what, it is clear we have to take into account the full dynamics of the financial affairs of those people who are successful. I think the member would agree that we want Canadians to aspire to do as well as they possibly can. If we have successful leaders in businesses and industry, we will also have successful people working within those businesses and industry.

I have a question I want the member to deal with. He talked about tax reform. I think most members will agree that tax reform is an important process of this House. He talked about it in the sense of reducing the complexity of our taxes and simplifying them.

The member then went on to talk about corporate taxation. He abandoned the arguments about complexity on a personal level and went on to tax havens and other exotic tax matters that do not have anything to do with the ordinary Canadian. Would the member care to comment on tax reform from the perspective of making it simpler or less complicated?

• (1555)

Would he not agree that changing the way in which income tax is calculated is not going to improve government revenues in itself? Would he not agree that in fact we need fundamental tax reform, not in the way we are doing things now but in the fundamental way in which we actually assess taxation on ordinary Canadians?

[Translation]

Mr. Loubier: Madam Speaker, I do not know where to start with this question. It is huge, and it is more of a commentary than a question as such. My statement contained neither speculation nor rumour, it was based on fact. The facts are as follows: since it came to power, the Liberal government has done exactly the opposite, or just about, of what it said it was going to do in the red book, except for infrastructure projects.

It said it would protect society's most disadvantaged; it said it would not tax middle income Canadians. The first thing it did in its first budget, on February 22, was cut unemployment insurance by $7.5 billion. If these are not the most disadvantaged—I think these are people who are somewhat desperate. They are looking for work and have little to do as well, because, with the tightening up of unemployment insurance measures, whole families have been thrown on welfare. This is what happened in my riding and in the ridings of my colleagues as well. I hope my Liberal colleagues are still checking on the people in their ridings.

Secondly, as for the taxation measures, in 1993 the Prime Minister said: "No problem, we will not tax, we will not increase taxes or income tax". Since we have been here, since we started questioning the government, led off by the Prime Minister, has not ruled out the possibility of an increase in taxes and income taxes. So, they are looking at increasing taxes and income tax for taxpayers, but they are not prepared to clean up the tax system. Where is the logic? There is no way the tax return can be simplified with the present tax legislation.

This is not what I was saying earlier. I was not talking about simplifying tax returns. In any case, we have decided not even to raise this issue any more. Each time we called for a simplified tax return, senior government officials would complicate tax returns even more. So we have stopped raising the issue. People are beginning to get used to the present forms. What I am talking about is an in depth reform of the tax system. I do not know whether you have read the tax legislation for the past 40 years—it is awful.

I have tried to do my best. I have often taken those books out of the library and have gone to consult them there as well. It is a monumental mess. Only the experts can find their way around. Secondly, you will admit that without this reform, we have a serious taxation problem. Forty–five years ago, corporate taxes accounted for 50 per cent of federal revenues, while the remaining 50 per cent was drawn from individual taxpayers.

Now nearly 83 per cent of federal tax dollars are collected from individual taxpayers. The remaining 17 per cent is collected from businesses. This is an imbalance, an unhealthy one, I would say, and people are increasingly aware of that. It is no wonder that, just about everywhere, and I am not referring to the revolt stirred up by Reformers, people are outraged to see this, they see what is happening and see us walking away from our responsibilities, they see that the government will not even go so far as to review the tax system.

Even if it takes two or three years, it has to be done, such a review must be done. This should have been the first step, the first measure taken by the Liberal government. They talked about it before the election campaign, during the campaign, and even before bringing down the first budget and the Minister of Finance has turned a deaf ear to it all. So has the Prime Minister. Reformers are doing the same because it is a direct attack on their friends, and even on a number of the people they represent who have considerable personal assets.

This review must be carried out, I feel, and so must tax expenditures be reviewed. There was talk earlier of tax treaties; they really must be reviewed individually because, in this area too, people are becoming aware that some large, very profitable companies benefit by establishing phoney companies abroad, in countries considered as tax havens, and thereby avoid paying taxes. Ordinary people cannot do that. They cannot set up such companies and, when they owe a dollar in taxes, be assured that they are hunted down for it.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, a motion introduced by the Reform Party regarding the government's next budget was debated in the House yesterday. Now the Bloc Quebecois is taking a crack at it. Both parties' motions clearly demonstrate that neither has what it takes to accomplish this imposing task or to run a country like Canada, let alone an independent Quebec.

In both cases, political grandstanding takes precedence over real and credible action. The two motions also prove that the two opposition parties do not dare acknowledge the budgetary principles the Minister of Finance applied in last year's budget.

I know that the historic budget he will soon table will be based on these principles. The minister repeated several times that the emphasis of this budget will be on spending cuts and not on tax increases. And he stressed that if tax measures must be taken, their purpose will be to make the tax system fairer, not to increase the tax burden of low income taxpayers, as the opposition claimed today.

We have also clearly indicated that we believe that the first steps that must be taken to pare down the government machine are to downsize it and cut fluff and waste. This is what the opposition has been telling us. We have already taken real action on the issue.

Last week, the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal tabled a bill to dissolve or reorganize 22 organizations. Taxpayers would save almost one and a half million dollars. I understand that this is very little, really just a drop in the bucket, but I know that this budget will be the result of the most extensive review of government programs and operations ever undertaken in recent history in this country.

I am also convinced that the budget will demonstrate to all Canadians that we have the courage to do what we say we will do and to keep our promises. We need to take action to reduce the cost and size of government because it is vital to the deficit reduction goals we set last year. And it is precisely this question of the deficit, in the debates yesterday and today, which brings out clearly the fundamental shortcomings of the two opposition parties.

[English]

As for members of the Reform Party, eliminating the deficit but without tax action seems to be their only concern. They seem to think that deficit action alone will ensure Canada's economic success and renewal. They refuse to recognize that there is a role for government in promoting economic development and in protecting Canadians in real need.

It is also interesting to note that where Reform sees only the deficit, the Bloc seems to have completely forgotten it exists at all. The result is a motion on the budget that ignores Canada's real fiscal problems.

After all, the Bloc's separatist cousins in Quebec City include a finance minister who feels that Quebec's obligations with respect to the national debt need be honoured only when it is convenient to do so. But our government refuses to slough off its responsibilities. We are aware of the burden of decades of debt and galloping deficits, which have given rise to an increase in taxes and interest rates, and a certain mistrust on the part of investors; all are factors detrimental to growth and job creation.

You know, the latest statements by the Quebec finance minister did not help the province's ratings, and it is the middle class that will pay the price.

However, our government is determined to do what is necessary to maintain growth and create jobs in all regions of the country, including Quebec. And in order to reach these objectives, it is essential, and Canadians themselves are demanding it, that we put in place an effective financial reform strategy.

[English]

Our government believes that winning the debt challenge starts with laying a clear, concrete and credible foundation. That means keeping to the deficit track we set out on to bring the deficit down to 3 per cent of GDP in three years.

That is exactly what we will do, as the minister said, "come hell or high water". The federal deficit now near 6 per cent of GDP has not been as low as 3 per cent since 1974–75, 20 long years ago.

• (1605)

In addition, setting specific deficit reduction goals is a significant change from past practices. That is why our government used a different approach. We set realistic goals and we will take all necessary steps to achieve concrete results. Our success in this regard will make our long–term objective of totally eliminating the deficit more credible.

[English]

We believe it is best to set out short term targets, concrete milestones, and achieve them. With short term targets there is no excuse for delay, no acceptable grounds for not taking tough action to address the problem. When we set unrealistic long term goals, we can always find a reason to avoid tough action today, tomorrow and the tomorrow after that.

Let us remember that we have done more than just set out a goal. Last year's budget took dramatic bottom line action. It set out measures to deliver $20 billion in deficit reduction over three years. For every $1 of revenue action there were $5 of spending cuts. No budget in a decade moved so strongly to cut spending.

We also know that even stronger action might be necessary. The problem is interest rates. They are much higher than we or the private sector expected.

There is no mystery about the pressures at work. To begin with, there is action by the U.S. central bank to control American inflation. There is also the lingering concern about the Quebec situation and the worry over Canada's debt and deficit burden.

The problem is our accumulated $500 billion debt. It is so big that an increase in rates has been a frightening wallop. Let us remember that last year the interest charges on the debt consumed almost $40 billion of taxpayers' money, the single largest expense of government. Every time the rates go up one percentage point our carrying costs jump by $1.7 billion, and that is just in the first year. By the third year it is a $3 billion penalty.

It is this punishing dynamic of compound interest that makes tough budget action the right action. The fact is that we have always recognized the need for continued fiscal action. The 1995 budget process started the minute we introduced the 1994 plan. That is why we combined immediate action with a sweeping series of program reviews on government operations, defence and social security reform. These have set concrete foundations for this year's budget and the tough decisions needed.

In this regard let me remind both opposition parties, given their calls for eliminating government waste and inefficiency, of the six questions that have framed our program review of government operations.

(1) Do the program areas continue to serve the public interest?

(2) Is there a legitimate and necessary role for the government in this area?

(3) Is the current role of the federal government appropriate, or can the program be realigned with the provinces?

(4) What programs should or could be transferred to the private or voluntary sector?

(5) If the program continues, how can its efficiency be improved?

(6) Is the resulting package of programs affordable?

Before concluding my remarks I should also reiterate a point made yesterday on the issue of tax increases. Only a foolhardy politician would ignore the real "tax fatigue" felt by Canadians. It is felt on this side as well. That is why cuts in government spending must and will be our priority in reducing the deficit. We proved that last year when we cut spending by $5 for every $1 in revenue measures.

However, most Canadians know that in order to cut taxes in the future and, in the short term, to ease the pressure on interest rates and the dollar, we must bring the debt under control. And this will only be possible after we achieve our deficit reduction goals.

Given the magnitude of this challenge, I understand why the Minister of Finance will not promise a budget without measures to increase revenue. But, if such measures are included, I am confident that they will be aimed at improving the tax system and closing loopholes. To those who are opposed to tax measures, I ask this: Do you really feel that the existing system is totally effective, that there are no loopholes or unjustified advantages? Given our financial situation, Canadians do not want or need such stupid political games.

I could say much more but I think that the budget will be more eloquent. Yes, we have a long road ahead of us, but I think that we are off to a good start. I am confident that the budget to be tabled in late February or early March will show all Canadians and world markets that our government meets its financial commitments.

By doing this, we will reinforce the conviction of the vast majority of Canadians, including my fellow citizens from Quebec, that this country, Canada, will fulfil its destiny of greatness and unity it deserves.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine. I wish I was as confident about anything as the hon. member opposite seems to be about everything, especially since it was the party opposite that was the father, the parents and the grandparents of the present dilemma our country faces today.

The member opposite is very quick to criticize opposition parties. However it does not seem to sink into members opposite that there is a good deal of distrust in the nation of the Liberal government, the parents of the dilemma that our country is in today, the very people who got us into this mess. A lot of people perhaps mistrust the fact that the Liberals present themselves as the people who have seen the error of their ways and are now going to be the ones who will lead us out of this dilemma and into the promised land. A lot of people in Canada have a healthy degree of scepticism about the ability of the Liberals to come through and do what they acknowledge must be done.

I have a question for the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine whom I know to be earnest and hardworking. I honestly believe he speaks with conviction. What in his opinion is the single most important ingredient in getting our nation's finances back on track? What is the single ingredient on which everything else hinges?

Mr. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, I think I will include some of the very favourable remarks of the hon. member opposite in my next householder.

Yes, being a Liberal I am somewhat confident. There is confidence out there in the general population that the Liberals can deliver. The minister said it very clearly when he said that he would bring the deficit from a high of 6 per cent down to approximately 3 per cent of GNP within the next three years. This is something we are striving to do.

Of course it will not be done without any pain. We might be talking about short term pain for long term gain. We are not going to cut indiscriminately in every area. We still have social conscience on this side of the House. I believe it still exists among certain members on the benches opposite.

After hearing what the member told me earlier I am convinced a number of the members will recognize the efforts made by the government to decrease the deficit and to make sure that we eliminate the deficit by some time at the beginning of the turn of the century.

It will be a long term process. This is what we have to prove to outside investors and Canadian investors. Canadians are expecting us to make sure that we come out with a reasonable budget, given the situation we are faced with, so that we can look at the future with hope and encouragement, thanks to the first steps taken by the Minister of Finance. In the next few weeks the course will be set.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix, BQ): Madam Speaker, first of all, further to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de la–Madeleine, of course Canadians as well as Quebecers are aware of the fact that the national debt has grown to $600 billion, with debt charges totalling about $115 million per day.

• (1615)

We all know that, just to pay the interest on this debt, the Canadian government now has to borrow money. We are also aware of the need to paid off this debt someday, or at least to reduce the deficit. The last budget the Minister of Finance tabled in this House was passed with a deficit of approximately $52 billion, this being the biggest deficit ever approved by this House.

Naturally, this budget was passed by the Liberal majority who had approved in this House the biggest deficit ever in Canadian history. Today, it is suggested to create a deficit to solve the deficit problem.

The people are prepared to tighten their belts and make sacrifices. What they will not accept is the shameless government overspending. They have a problem with expenditures like the $475,000 spent just recently on the installation of the Governor General. They find it difficult to accept that members of Parliament be entitled to a pension for life after serving for just six years.

And this causes concern and social insecurity from coast to coast. The concern caused by such things as the Minister of Finance contemplating tax hikes, contemplating replacing the GST with a tax hidden in product prices so as to be able to tax everything that is presently tax–free, such as food, prescription drugs and health care, is not making seniors feel any safer, because there is even talk of taxing RRSPs.

Meanwhile, the Minister of Human Resources Development is considering making cuts in education programs, loans and scholarships for students, who represent our future. The minister is considering making cuts in the UI program, which should not be used for government administration purposes since it is an insurance for those who lose their jobs. The minister is also considering making cuts in the government support to seniors and to low income families. When I think of low income families, I am reminded of all the cuts made by the previous Conservative government, including the subsidies to provinces for social housing.

The minister is also considering making cuts in the subsidies to women's organizations which promote employment and equal pay. Then, there is the Minister of Finance who is also considering cuts in airport and airline services, or even privatizing these services. If the equipment is transferred to the provinces, it is like shifting the burden onto their shoulders.

So, I ask the hon. member: Is it possible that, this year, the government will manage to reduce its deficit without targeting the poor and, if so, how will it do that?

Mr. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, I can assure you it was never the intention of the Liberals to introduce budget cuts at the expense of the most vulnerable in our society, and I said as much in my speech.

As the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, and like the hon. member from the North Shore, I represent a riding that has to live with financial, economic and social problems.

However, in his comments he referred to the fact that people needed security, and I also heard him say that people thought we spent too much money on the installation of the new Governor General of Canada and all the activities that were organized around this event. I would like to remind the hon. member opposite that the Premier of Quebec is going to spend, not two million, as he promised, but more than five million on the commissions going around Quebec that want to discuss only one topic: Quebec's independence. There is nothing that makes my constituents feel more insecure, and I hear people say this. I hear this from people in Quebec's remote areas, when they see a provincial government that is intent on only one thing: the break–up and, in fact, the end of the best country in the world.

The only way we can survive is by introducing a new fiscal policy, making certain cuts and reallocating our spending priorities. Reallocation is necessary to ensure that we can become leaders in important fields.

However, we must stay together, because dividing Quebec and dividing Canada and making all kinds of statements, as the opposition sometimes does, is not the answer. I am not necessarily referring to members opposite, but it was the Quebec finance minister who said recently that he felt Quebec was not necessarily obliged to meet Canada's international commitments in terms of paying off loans and servicing the debt.

In concluding, we want Quebecers to feel secure, and I think we are going about it the right way. This is a caring government, and I think the Chrétien government has proved repeatedly during the past one and half years that we are in touch with the grass roots, that we are fully aware of our financial obligations in terms of the national debt and that we also realize that the federal government has an obligation to take care of the neediest in our society.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Madam Speaker, for the benefit of those watching on television I would like to read the Bloc motion once again. It is non–votable and it reads as follows:

> That this House call upon the government in its next budget to avoid any tax increases targeting low and middle income taxpayers and to consider instead trimming the fat from the government, eliminating tax expenditures which primarily benefit large corporations and wealthy Canadians and collecting on unpaid tax debts owed to the federal government.

How do we go about disagreeing with that? We cannot. It is like motherhood and apple pie. Furthermore, it makes sense. Why should we not be doing the things that the Bloc suggests? As a matter of fact, we are doing most of them now.

Our party agrees 100 per cent with the notion that we should avoid any tax increases targeting low and middle income taxpayers. We are very adamant in saying that we should not have any new taxes on anybody for any reason, period; not on people, not on businesses, not on anyone for any reason, not direct and not indirect. The reason for this is we have to establish the political will to do what has to be done.

Earlier in questions and comments I asked the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine to tell me what in his opinion was the most important single thing that needed to be done, what was the factor above all other factors that would ensure success in eliminating the deficit and getting our country's finances in order. For those watching and for those in the House it is no surprise that we did not get an answer to that question. I asked the question specifically because I wanted to know whether the member opposite really had a sense of what had to be done. We did not get an answer to the question. I assumed that the member opposite did not know what that ingredient was.

I am going to give him the answer. I am going to let him and other members opposite know what the single ingredient is which must be there. Without that ingredient there will not be success. It cannot happen. That single ingredient is political will. Members opposite control the purse strings. They have their feet on the pedals and their hands on the wheel that steers our nation. We in opposition can influence but we do not make the final decision. It is the government opposite that makes the final decision. Unless the government opposite has the political will to do what has to be done it simply will not be achieved.

How does it go about getting this political will? What does it take? That is why it is so important that the government not look for tax fairness at this time. Tax fairness is not the issue. Spending is the issue.

If we allow ourselves as a Parliament to wriggle off the hook instead of saying to ourselves our problem is that spending is out of control, instead of being absolutely committed and convinced of this and start burrowing around looking for little ways that we can pick up a few bucks here and a few bucks there, we will very quickly lose the political will to do what has to be done, reduce spending.

Programs have to go. If we do not do it we absolutely will not achieve the goal that has to be achieved. Our nation is quickly getting behind the power curve financially.

For those present who do not understand what the power curve means, getting behind the power curve is an aviation term. What that means is that if a person is flying along and there is a mountain ahead and that person pulls the nose of the aircraft up, they will have to increase power so that they can climb up over that mountain. If there is not enough power in that aircraft to keep the nose up and to keep flying, they will very quickly lose speed, lose control, spin, crash and burn.

Our nation is in an aircraft and there is a mountain of debt ahead of us. That mountain of debt is growing rapidly through the magic of compound interest which is people's greatest enemy when they owe money and their greatest friend when they do not owe money.

Here we are hurdling along in the sky. This mountain of debt is in front of us and we have to keep pulling our nose up. As we pull our nose up, which is increased taxes, we are losing power.

There is the point when our economy has lost so much power because we have to keep increasing the taxes so that we can get over the mountain we simply will not be able to do it. That is why the political will to get our spending under control is of critical importance.

That is not to say that there are not elements of our taxation policy which should not be corrected. That is not to say that my colleague and friend from St. Hyacinth—Bagot is not absolutely correct in saying that in our tax life you have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to fill in your tax form.

Have members ever tried to make money in this country? People pay taxes on making money. People pay taxes on spending money. Every time we turn around there is a disincentive to be productive in our economy. There is an incentive to be non–productive.

We have to get those changed. We have to simplify our tax regime in this country. As a matter of fact our hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has been working diligently for years to introduce the single tax in Canada.

Our party is 100 per cent supportive of that but we have to set priorities. Right now our nation and all Canadians are in a lifeboat. We have already hit the iceberg. The Titanic is going down and we are in this lifeboat. There are holes in the lifeboat and what are we doing? We are talking about who should be the captain and what colour we should paint it.

We better get some priorities together. We better be plugging the holes in the lifeboat and bailing because if we do not, we are going down, and we are going down together.

It does not matter if one is bankrupt in French or English. One is bankrupt. It does not matter if one is bankrupt and cannot afford to buy a gun. Does it matter if one has to register it? Does it matter if one is gay or straight? One is bankrupt.

Our priority is to get our nation's finances in order. That is what we have to do. Once we have done that, this Parliament should rightly put its interests in all the other thousands of things that drag us away from where we should have our noses focused, one of which is on government spending.

We need as a Parliament to get our noses on the ground, to get our butts in the air and work on priority number one, that which is most important above all other things, to get the political will so that we can make the tough decisions. We can look our fellow Canadians in the eyes and say we have made the first sacrifice ourselves. We have done away with this outrageous pension plan that acts like a magnet for all the ire of everybody in the country.

When they look at that and say: "How can these people who are elected to lead us write laws that protect them from the very mismanagement they have put on to our country in the first place? How is it that people can spend 20 years here and get a pension that allows them to live so they do not ever have to worry about the consequences of their mismanagement of our economy?"

We have to restore the bonds of trust between the elected and the electors. We have to put the rights of victims ahead of the rights of criminals. Above all, we must get our nation's finances in order and we must have the political will to make the very tough decisions necessary.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am not able to associate with this picture by my colleagues in the Reform Party. Day in and day out they try to paint this as a sinking country that one cannot live in and that has so many things wrong with it.

For the third time in a row the United Nations has clearly stated that Canada is the best country in the world in which to live and raise a family. Twenty years ago when I came to this country I knew Canada was the finest and best country in the world. I say that over and over again.

I do not understand what is wrong with my colleague. Perhaps we should establish a fund for our colleagues in the Reform Party to send them abroad to look at the world. When they come back to Canada, maybe then they will start talking about the positive things that exist here. Then they could truly appreciate all of the good things we have and will come to the conclusion that we have to work collectively in order to make it even better.

This negativity day in and day out, the doom and gloom is not serving anybody. It is not serving the interests of Canada. Business people have told us over and over again: "Give us the tools and we will make it happen". Government has to provide a proper environment in order for business to create jobs and we are doing that.

Economic indicators by all agencies, whether from Canada or abroad, whoever we talk to, all of the economists agree that Canada and this government is going in the proper, right direction. We are leading the other industrialized countries in terms of growth. According to the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister we are way over what we have forecast in terms of economic growth.

What is wrong? In terms of what the government is spending annually versus what we are getting in terms of revenue, we are in a surplus position. However, we have a debt and interest to pay on it.

For my colleague to turn around and attack the government for its track record is unfair. He should stand up and congratulate this government, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, every member of the cabinet and government for a job very well done. That is what he should do. Stop the doom and gloom. Talk about the positive. Smell the roses. Have some coffee. Maybe he would wake up.

Mr. McClelland: Madam Speaker, it is such a delight to respond to the hon. member opposite as he whips his rose coloured glasses from his nose.

You do not have to be a brain surgeon to figure that if you have been running up debts, you can live like a king if you are doing it on someone else's money. The problem is the bank is about to cut off our Visa card. Our Visa card, American Express, Mastercard and our bank line are as high as they will go. We opened up a home equity line of credit which we are using and still we cannot pay our bills. We are going further into the hole every day. That, sir, is the problem.

Step number one in solving a problem is that you must deal with things as they are, not as you would wish them to be. This Pollyanna wishing and saying that the United Nations says we are number three in the world, why are we not number two or number one in the world? We are borrowing it. We are going down the hole. Our grandchildren and our children will be paying off debts that our generation and the generation that preceded us ran up. And these people are saying: "Everything is fine in the world". It is insane.

Let me read from The Wall Street Journal about this number one nation in the world. I am quoting Mr. Alan Reynolds in The Wall Street Journal of Friday, October 14:

> The drop in the Canadian dollar, 20 per cent since 1991, is largely caused by the uncompetitive tax climate for both labour and capital. World investors do not like to invest in countries with rising tax rates.

The article goes on:

> The weak currency means Canadians, and the Canadian government, have less buying power in the world. When the Canadian dollar falls, the government needs more Canadian dollars to make the interest payments on its large foreign debt. The increased tax rates after 1989 have thus increased the spending side of the government's budget by sinking the currency and raising interest rates, as well as shrinking real revenues.

Now this is not the party opposite. This is a world renowned, respected economist from the Hudson Institute.

These are the kinds of comments, the kinds of articles that affect our interest rate on the 30 per cent of the foreign debt owned by other countries. Every time we make an interest payment on that foreign debt we are putting German, Japanese, and American people to work.

Why do you think our interest rates are five points higher than the American interest rates? Is it because we are such great money managers? Why do you think our unemployment rate is 3 or 4 per cent higher than the American unemployment rate, yet our economies have matched each other for 40 years? Is it because such masterful people have been running our economy, the Liberals, the Conservatives, and again the Liberals?

In 1984 the Conservatives were elected with a mandate to get our country's finances under control. They did not. They blew it. There are two Conservatives in this House today. Count them. The Liberals have the same opportunity today to address the number one problem. If they do not do it there will be two of them left after the next election, maybe. Canadians are sick and tired of this Pollyanna attitude to what is really hurting our country.

Mr. Jean-Paul Marchand (Québec-Est, BQ): Madam Speaker, the Reform Party member is right when he says that Canada is heading for national bankruptcy. The hon. member is also pretty much on target when he says that the government lacks the will to put some order in its finances.

This lack of political will, as well as the fact that we are obviously heading for bankruptcy, has been quite noticeable since the Liberals took office. Foreign investors are extremely concerned about the state of the federal government's finances. The fact that Canada's economic situation is truly out of control may not be the main reason why Quebec wants to become a sovereign state, but it is certainly one of the reasons. As the Reform member pointed out, this government lacks the will to act.

We can accept the fact that Liberal members rise in this House to say that Canada is the best country in the world. However, with impending bankruptcy looming on the horizon, Canada may not hold that honour for much longer. This reminds me of the captain of the Titanic who, in 1912, said that his ship was the most beautiful in the world and referred to it as "the unsinkable Titanic".

The Titanic sank, but that does not justify the fact that Canada is experiencing very serious problems. The whole world is aware of that, and particularly investors. Yet, this government does not have the political will to correct the situation. This is serious, especially since the government and the minister could take a whole slew of realistic measures to help the economy. However, they simply will not do that. On the contrary, the government is bent on eliminating the debt at the expense of the poor. And that makes this federal regime even more unfair.

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Madam Speaker, I think my hon. colleague from the Bloc hit upon quite a salient point. We are facing yet again this question of how we are going to survive as a nation united with Quebec as a part of Canada.

The Bloc brings forward the notion that what is it about the federation of Canada financially, is this country so well managed that we could not manage on our own just as well? I guess it does that because of the mess we are in and that argument has some weight. In my opinion, and I think in the opinion of most Canadians, we would all be much worse off, Canada and Quebec, in the event of a separation. That very question is hurting us today in interest rates.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saint John—Trans-Canada Highway; the hon. member for Mercier—Manpower training.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to add my words on the issue of Canada's financial circumstances.

The other day I heard it described as a prize fight in Canada. It was a prize fight between the fiscal disciplinarians, and I would characterize the fiscal disciplinarian as our Minister of Finance, and the social capital advocates. I would describe the minister of HRD as the social capital advocate. This prize fight had been won by the fiscal disciplinarians. The commentary was that this was a tragedy for Canada because our social programs were going to be eaten away by fiscal disciplinarians, those who had understood and realized the depth and severity of our debt problems.

My difficulty with that discussion and argument is that surely there is a connection between our social programs and financial responsibility. Surely there is a connection that will not allow that to be broken.

I would like to go over a few individual statistics. I hear over and over again that the way out of our debt problems is simply to close loopholes and make our taxation system fairer.

Taxes now account for a much bigger proportion of the average family budget than shelter, food and clothing combined. It is a complete reverse of what is normally present in the country. In 1961 the reverse was true.

There are those who say that the rich in our society should take a heavier hit from taxes. Last year the top 30 per cent of families, those earning $61,660 or more, paid 62.4 per cent of the taxes. "Let's hit them harder", say some. To those who say that we are not taxed too highly compared to our major trading partner, Canadians pay $50 billion more tax per year than Americans after adjusting for the size of our economy. We are taxed to the eyeballs. We are taxed until we are drowning. We are taxed so much that anyone who says we can pay more taxes is dreaming.

I liken this to two individuals. One is a prize fighter who is lean, mean, quick and knows all the tricks. The other prize fighter looks like a Sumo wrestler. The Sumo wrestler waddles into the ring and says: "I'm going to take you on" and does take on the quick, alert prize fighter by lying on him and squashing him. There is no talent in that at all.

The overweight, bloated debt in our country is a Sumo wrestler and it is going to kill completely the prize fighter who has the ability to move quickly, to adjust to circumstances and to be competitive.

I tried to look for an international comparison to see if Canada could look at some other location. I looked at New Zealand. I took an opportunity to review what happened in New Zealand in 1984. New Zealand has a House much like ours and these same conversations were going on in 1984. The government of the day said: "Everything is fine. We are in third place in the world. We are the third best country in the world. Everything is fine". We heard that.

One day after the debt wall—the member opposite said not to be so violent—I was going to say smack into the debt wall but instead I will say gently nudge up to the debt wall and hip check the debt wall. New Zealand did a hip check of the debt wall. They did not smash into the wall. In one day New Zealand went from the third highest in the world to twenty–second.

My field is health care so I looked at what happened to health care in New Zealand in that one day. The same scenario faces Canada. In one day they ended up with advertising on the ambulances to pay for the fuel. To go to sick patients they had to advertise chocolates and booze, in order to get the sick patients to the hospital. In one day they went from a system very similar to ours where everything was free to a system where there were user fees for everything.

One of my friends who practised medicine in New Zealand said: "The tragedy for those individuals who came to the hospital with a coronary was that they lay sweating in bed worrying about how much it would cost". This was from a society that said: "Everything is fine. All is well". One day later, their health care system was gone. Can members sitting on the other side tell me that is not a problem?

What do I see in our health care system that caused me to come to Parliament, to leave a medical practice that obviously is better than doing this? What caused me to come here? These are the things that caused me to come here.

First, the waiting lists for my patients were getting longer. I am told there are no problems in Manitoba today. Hip replacement is a 60–week wait. The standard for Canada should be 12.7 weeks. No problems in Canada.

I watched technology in our country slipping behind other countries. We have in Canada 1.1 MRI machines per million people. The U.S. has lots of them. They are techno freaks so I will not talk about the U.S. Germany, a country very close to us, has 3.6 MRI machines per million people. Where do we go if we need an MRI in our country? We go to the U.S. We cross the border. We put our Canadian dollars on the table in the U.S.

• (1650)

The technology that we need, that we deserve, that we must have, is being denied by a rigid set of rules that say we cannot provide more funds to the health care system. That might privatize something.

If an individual here needs health care should we wait for New Zealand? I suppose that is the answer. Monumental waiting lists will be the legacy of a government that will not pay attention to our debt.

I had a young student face me not so long ago and say to me: "You are so hard–hearted. All you care about are finances". All I care about is a health care system that will survive. If we go New Zealand's route and I say to my grandchild that everything is fine, my grandchild will say to me, "You are not a good grandad".

Health care will not survive with a government that does not pay attention to its debt. I will not allow that to happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Because the last speaker's time ran over by five minutes on questions and comments I will allow one comment and one question in response.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Madam Speaker, I was somewhat surprised by the comments of the Reform member, especially when he talked about health care. Obviously the Reform Party wants to privatize health care. It is a party that has not defended social programs. We are the only party that has defended social programs in this House, in spite of the attacks and reductions by the Liberal government.

The Reform Party has not spoken in defence of social programs. It is obviously opening the door to privatization of health care. Our health care system is one of the standards of Canada, one of the hallmarks of Canada, one of the achievements of Canada. This party is talking about privatizing health care and giving us the model, obviously, of the American system where if a person gets sick he or she risks going bankrupt very quickly.

Under the cover of comments of New Zealand's problems and success story, among all the other comments that have been made, which unfortunately Americanize things that have been good for Canada, he is again opening the door to a system that has proven to be costly and wasteful and even dangerous, where people go bankrupt if they become ill.

That is not an avenue which is very constructive. It is probably even worse than what the federal government is now doing. The federal government has not been doing very much in terms of helping people, in terms of the social programs, in terms of health care. The government in trying to reduce its deficit has attacked unemployed people and senior citizens. It has tried to put more debt on students. It is now even increasing the rent of the poorest people in our society. That is what the government is doing now, which is probably the worst thing that I can imagine, and the hon. member is suggesting something which is even worse.

I ask the member how privatizing the health care system in Canada would improve the debt problem?

Mr. Hill (Macleod): Madam Speaker, I will have to be brief. That was quite a discourse.

The response of the health minister in Quebec to the new proposals from the federal health minister is quite interesting to me. The health minister in Quebec said simply: "Health is a provincial responsibility. The federal government should keep its nose out of health". That is a proposal I strongly support.

Alberta, my province, says that Quebec has it right. We may disagree on whether or not there is any place in health care for a safety valve. We may disagree but surely we do not disagree that health is an important program. Surely this is not a partisan issue.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am happy today to speak to the motion presented by my colleague, the member for Saint–Hyacinthe. I think it is important for the official opposition to raise once again this pressing matter which the government should address, but about which it keeps on procrastinating.

The government is supposed to present its budget very soon; it was said to be in early February; but it would appear that it will not be until late February or even early March. The social reform was announced for the fall; it had been postponed until winter and now it is postponed indefinitely. In the meantime, the situation is deteriorating, the deficit and the debt are increasing.

Why is the government dragging its heels? It is dragging its heels because it knows it must take steps which are going to hurt. It is afraid to do anything which will make it the enemy of the people or which will cause the vast majority of Canadians to hate it.

In the past, we have made many suggestions on how to solve the deficit problem. We have offered numerous options to the government in order to solve this problem without raising taxes, but it refuses to listen. The solutions it favours, the only ones it is considering are those aimed at the majority of people, namely the under–privileged members of our society.

What we are proposing instead is that the government target the minority of Canadians who are more fortunate, the people and corporations which are in a position to contribute more through their taxes. However, because these corporations, these executives, these wealthy people are friends of the government, it is reluctant to tackle a job which is most urgent. It refuses to assume its responsibilities for fear of alienating those Quebecers who are about to vote, in the referendum, in favour of a flexible Canada, a flexible constitution.

The present government is playing hide and seek, when we require openness. In my speech, I would like to emphasize the collection of unpaid taxes owed to the federal government.

My colleagues already talked about other aspects of the motion. They talked about trimming the fat from the government. True, we could save millions by doing that, but when we talk about trimming the fat, we do not mean simply cutting jobs in the civil service. It is not true to say that all depends on the number of civil servants. If there are too many, fine, by all means cut, but I hope the cuts are going to be fairly spread among the various provinces, not made in the way recently announced by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal. If a 25 per cent reduction in spending is anticipated, I hope we will not see a 33 per cent cut in Quebec, as is expected.

That is not the only way to trim the fat from the government. To trim the fat, we could have only one bus service to take members of Parliament from their offices to the House of Commons. The same bus service could be used by members of both houses to reduce the cost. We never talked about that. Each House wants its own staff, its own accommodations, its own transportation system, its own allowances. We have two sets of everything; yet we still wonder what purpose the other place serves. However, no expense is spared.

I will not dwell on this issue any longer, because I want to come back to what I said earlier about recovering delinquent taxes. The auditor general made several comments on that topic. Most taxpayers pay their taxes when they file their income tax return or when they get a notice of assessment. But sometimes, measures have to be taken to recover, for example, unpaid balances or tax deductions at source. Also, an employer can forget to remit on time to the government the tax deductions at source. Or some taxpayers can deliberately neglect to pay their taxes.

Let me describe briefly the situation we have. Right now, there is about $6.6 billion in delinquent taxes, that is unpaid taxes that should have been paid. These $6.6 billion are owed by some 1.6 million taxpayers. These are the numbers we had as of December 31, 1993. Of these $6.6 billion, $3.6 billion were owed by individuals, self–employed workers, corporations, and include source deductions by employers.

Of that amount, $900 million had been owed for less than 90 days. This was the case in 1993 for 21 per cent of taxpayers in arrears. And $250 million had been owed for more than 90 days on small amounts. But $5.35 million had been owed for more than 90 days on larger amounts. This was the case for 25 per cent of delinquent taxpayers.

Thus, of the 1.6 million delinquent taxpayers or corporations, 25 per cent, or some 400,000, representing the smallest group, owe more than $5 billion in taxes. That is to say that each of these 400,000 taxpayers owes a lot of tax money to the government. These are not humble and poor people. They are not people who are always in need.

On the Public Accounts Committee, we were told that we sometimes go easy on the people who have some difficulty in paying, because we do not want them to go bankrupt. We say: "We have to be understanding. Sometimes, you know, floods or fires occur. So companies are given more time to pay their taxes".

But for individuals whose income tax is deducted from their pay cheques, not even a flood will stop their employer from taking off their share of income tax and sending it directly to the government. Even if a fire destroys their home, these individuals will not be able to use the money that their employer has already deducted from their pay cheques for tax purposes. For salaried employees, the income tax is collected immediately. And for those who have different means of paying their income tax, the state is always willing to show some understanding, which gives these people an opportunity not only to take advantage of the system, but in many cases to abuse the system.

I think that the government must take action to give the Department of Revenue more control over individuals and corporations that owe taxes to the government. There has to be greater control if the just society that we have heard so much about in this country is to be reflected in the way Canadians pay their taxes. If we want a just society, everybody must pay their fair share of taxes. We must not have half of the population paying taxes for the other half.

I know that my time has expired. I still have a lot to say and I hope that the questions and comments period will give me an opportunity to complete my remarks.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague on his remarks about this motion presented for the official opposition by the hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot. This opposition day motion clearly demonstrates how appropriate it is to warn the government of the consequences it will face if it continues to overburden low income taxpayers, the have–nots, the needy, and the unemployed, if it keeps doing what previous governments have been doing for years, and if it does not get its money where it should get it by following our ten point plan. Could the hon. member for Joliette who just spoke further explain the solutions advocated by our party, the Bloc Quebecois, in order to help the government better understand public finances?

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for this opportunity he is giving me to add a few comments. Since the tabling of the last government budget, the Bloc Quebecois has gone out of its way to propose numerous solutions to help reduce the deficit. One of the first measures we recommended was the creation of a joint committee on the financial situation. The Bloc Quebecois would have participated and we could have studied possible solutions together, out in the open. The government refused.

Given that situation, we took a different approach. We proposed solutions to the Standing Committee on Finance. We asked that government pass legislation to prohibit family trusts as we know them today, because they are tax havens for a privileged few in our society. These are real solutions. There are billions of dollars in those trusts.

Here in this House, and also in committee, we suggested that the government should focus more on finance and tax control. I have just spent the last ten minutes talking about taxes. Just think that there are now $6.6 billion in unpaid taxes which delinquent taxpayers will not pay; $6 billion is a lot of money and the interest on such an amount adds up to more millions. We asked the government to provide for stricter controls on those overdue accounts.

We asked the government to look into the issue of businesses, tens of thousands of businesses, which have not paid taxes over the last ten years, in spite of profits earned in Canada. Why do we allow those companies to profit from such a tax exemption system, albeit a legal one? That is not normal; all taxpayers, corporations as well as individuals, should pay their fair share of taxes in Canada. That is another solution that we proposed to the government.

We also proposed to slim down the government machinery. We talked about that many times. We also asked the government to avoid duplication in the various administration sectors, duplication of provincial and federal spending in the same areas.

These are suggestions that we made to the federal government and, each time, we were met with an outright refusal. Why? Because in each of these solutions, the government saw an opportunity to decentralize its powers to the provinces, which it does not want to do, because its leitmotiv is to further centralize powers and to leave the provinces with their problems.

It is clear today that this government does not intend to make concessions to the provinces. On the contrary, it intends to give them more responsibilities, without the tax points which would go with those responsibilities.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the opposition's motion, which reads as follows:

> That this House call upon the government in its next budget to avoid any tax increases targeting low and middle-income taxpayers and to consider instead trimming the fat from the government, eliminating tax expenditures which primarily benefit large corporations and wealthy Canadians and collecting on unpaid tax debts owed to the federal government.

It seems a bit strange that the opposition should feel the need, on the eve of the government's second budget, to ask it to think about getting off the backs of the disadvantaged and the unemployed and start spreading the wealth more equitably.

However, the government has never stopped talking, in its electoral promises and in the red book it waved about throughout the entire electoral campaign, about equity and tax reform. It always defined itself as the protector of the ordinary citizen. It spoke of balance. It spoke of redistributing the country's wealth. Yet, since it has been in office, it has done just the opposite.

Is this surprising behaviour from a Liberal government? Is it surprising that a government led by old crocks like the Prime Minister and the Minister of External Affairs, old political hacks, who have always backed down on their electoral commitments, who have always reneged on their promises?

Let us go back a bit in the history of this moribund party. A party without a soul, that fails to keep its promises, interested only in staying in power to fatten up the friends of the regime, and let them take a turn at the trough. This has always been the Liberal party style.

Do you remember, in the 1970s, when Robert Standfield promised in an election campaign, as the head of the Conservative party, that he would freeze wages and prices, and Pierre Trudeau, the head of the Liberal Party, said wages and prices should never be frozen? He was elected on this promise. What did he do six months after? Just the opposite of what he said he was going to do: he froze wages and prices. That is the Liberal party, for you: two different messages, one for the elections, another for once they are elected.

Once they are elected, the promises are forgotten. Everything is forgotten. The red book becomes a red, blue or green paper depending on the occasion, and electoral commitments become simply good intentions that, unfortunately, the current economic situation obliges them to put off—like the postponement of the Axworthy reform or the promises to help the disadvantaged.

Do you also remember, in the 1980s, when the Conservatives brought down a budget providing for an 18 cent increase in the price of gasoline, what the Liberals did?

There was an historic vote, which in fact defeated that government on the pretext that an 18 cent increase in the price of gasoline was unacceptable. The Liberals said: "If we are voted back into office, there will be no increase in gas prices. We will exert better control over government spending. We will decrease the number of unemployed. All in all, we will reduce the deficit which has reached $13 billion". Once again, we believed them. Very naive, in the opinion of many Quebecers and Canadians, we believed them. And what did they do once they got back into office? In less than a year, the price of gasoline increased by 65 cents, not 18, contrary to what they had promised.

During their term in office, from 1980 to 1985, the deficit rose from $13 billion to $38 billion. Sixteen months went by and no budget. In spite of this, Mr. Trudeau was travelling around the world. They were spending money left and right. Apparently they felt the need to interfere in all provincial jurisdictions to counter the rise of the sovereignist movement. Public expenditures were about $76 billion, but gradually rose to just over $100 billion.

So much for the Liberal government. Is it surprising that we feel compelled, as the official opposition, to enjoin the government to remember the less fortunate, to think of its election promises and the promises made in the red book? We have to make the government realize and state publicly that we remember.

I see members of the governing party lower their heads, and well they might. They are embarrassed in their ridings. They go to their ridings every weekend and are ashamed of all of these cuts.

Take the first budget, for example. They had so much hope after being elected. But no, the first budget made an incredible, unacceptable attack on the unemployed. And yet these same Liberals while in opposition had cried murder over the Valcourt reform. And the cuts made by the Minister of Finance in the last budget are 5, 10, 15 times worse than those made by Minister Valcourt in the former government. Such criticisms have been completely forgotten.

The Hon. Minister of Human Resources Development cried murder when there was talk of touching social programs. Now, he will deal the fatal blow to these programs. He proudly defends this, completely forgetting the commitments he made while in opposition and during the election campaign.

We could also talk about the Liberal Party of the 1980s, which has not changed, is still run by the same people, who broke all their commitments, even betrayed their people, for example the Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in order to rise to the leadership of, or to an important position in, the party. So in 1980 they said: "Do not back sovereignty. This could jeopardize our seats. The dollar will fall to 80 cents if you do". At the time, the dollar was worth $1.03. Suddenly after the Liberals came to power, the dollar sank to 69 cents.

That is the Liberal Party, and the same people are still running it. Can we believe them when they say they will table a fair budget? Never. So, we openly say to them: "The eyes of the public in Canada and Quebec are on you. They are watching you. Your commitments are still printed in the red book and you will have to fulfil them. We beseech you to find concrete solutions". As the hon. member for Joliette said earlier, we recommended 10 ways to clean up the government's finances, to trim the fat, to make people who have the means pay and to unearth those who bury their money in tax havens. We have repeated this many times. We will see whether you will take into consideration our suggestions or if you will continue to break your promises.

Now, let us recall the last speech on free trade that the Prime Minister made in Montreal. He warned Quebecers that they will be shut out of free trade. However, when the vote on free trade was on, the Prime Minister travelled Canada–wide to preach against it, to spew out lies about it. Now, he warns Quebecers that if they declare sovereignty they may not be covered under the free trade agreement, which he now considers as an element that is essential to Canada's survival, even though he denied this throughout the 1988 campaign which was based on free trade. Two different messages, one for the election campaign, one for when he came to power. The Liberals as they have always been.

I will end on the following note: As a Bloc Quebecois member and as a representative of Quebec, I remind my fellow citizens, Quebecers, that trusting this government, trusting these politicians, has always led to disappointment. The time is long overdue for us to take over full power to tax and to pick and choose the services we want to share with this federal state.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Richelieu on his heartfelt speech in which he shared his past experience with the House. Of course, he raised points denouncing the behaviour of our Liberal friends opposite who, when they were in opposition, criticized the Tories on the issue of cuts to social programs and often on the tax system. He told us clearly that the Liberal Party was not the same after the election.

I wish to ask my colleague from Richelieu if, on the basis of his experience in federal politics, he could explain to us how a party like the federal Liberal Party, which initiated major social programs, which used to pay lip service to the need to defend the most disadvantaged in society, is now cutting UI benefits and transfer payments to the provinces for social assistance and education, while at the same time closing its eyes to the fact that some members of society do not pay the taxes they owe the government. The question I want to ask my colleague is this: Based on his experience, how did the federal Liberal Party reach this point?

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I welcome this question. Nothing the Liberals do should ever come as a surprise. They will stop at nothing. But when you say that certain social programs were instigated by the Liberal Party, make no mistake about this party. It happens that it often formed the minority back in those days. There was a left–center trend in Canada, Quebec, America and even Europe then, and this leftist sentiment often found a voice in the third party, that is to say the New Democratic Party, who traded its support to the government for rather important social measures. Therefore, the credit does not go the Liberal Party for instigating the measures, because it simply acted to ensure its survival and remain in power.

Now, there is a shift toward the right, as can be seen with the emergence of the Reform Party. So, what do the Liberals do? They go with the flow, shifting toward the right, casually casting aside any commitment or promise made and anything it has been forced to do by the NDP in the 1970s. They are now forced by the Reform Party to renege on all that. They are making this shift to the right for the sake of staying in power.

The Liberal Party can also be expected to go to any length to succeed. It has never had an ounce of social conscience. Not only does it renege on its commitments, but this is the kind of party that will happily squander public funds and do whatever it takes to stay in power. You do not have to go far to find evidence of this. Take today for example, with these Canadian flag celebrations. This is hilarious. Have you ever heard of an organization celebrating its 30th anniversary? Of course not. You celebrate a 25th or 50th anniversary. And not a penny had been spent on the 25th anniversary of the flag.

It has now been decided to spend $1 million on propaganda against Quebec sovereignty. They will do anything, have 800,000 posters printed, 400,000 in Quebec alone. The propaganda effort is under way, taking up million upon million of dollars, but that is no problem. That is the Liberal way. You set up three floors of office space in an office building in Ottawa, pay salaries of $90,000 to $100,000 to everyone if necessary, and you have the money to set the propaganda machine in motion. The Liberals will do anything, anything short of having open and honest discussions, honouring their commitments and going back to their red book to check what promises were made and concentrate on fulfilling them. And these are basically the things the Bloc Quebecois is asking for in its motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry but the hon. member's time is up.

[English]

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with intent to members of the Bloc and members of the Reform Party. I must say I heard a lot of rhetoric from the member for Richelieu but not many solutions to the problem he has put forward.

I am wondering where members of the Bloc have been. A lot of the points they have brought forward have been discussed. In the motion they have put forward today they refer to no taxes on lower and middle income taxpayers. As a Liberal member the last thing I want is taxes. I think Canadians are overtaxed. As a government and as a member of Parliament we are working toward reducing taxes if anything. That is what the Canadian public wants.

The member for Richelieu spoke extensively about commitments. The recent byelections show where the Canadian public stands and that the government has fulfilled its commitment. That is why we won three out of three seats in the byelections. It is a pretty good signal for the government. We are following the agenda we put forward in the red book. We are fulfilling those promises and we will continue to do so.

I heard both Bloc and Reform members talk about tax increases. I have never heard the minister say that there would be tax increases in the budget. He has said that we will have a fair taxation system. No taxes does not mean that we do not want fairness and equity. We want fairness in the tax system and we want equity in the tax system. That is what the minister did in the last budget and that is what I am confident he will do in this budget as well.

Bloc members have talked about the other part of the motion which deals with trimming the fat from government. This is why I say I do not know where they have been. That is what we talked about; we talked about getting rid of duplication in government.

Mr. Thompson: Talk, talk, talk. No action.

Mr. Dhaliwal: We took action. I do not know where the Reform members were; maybe they were sleeping. Look at the boards we got rid of. That bill was recently discussed. Look at the number of patronage appointments we have dropped: one–third. I have to hand it to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs who has reduced the number of political appointments from 3,000 to 2,000.

We are not a party that wants to add. We want to reduce. We want to look at what federal agencies make sense and what ones do not, what are duplications and where changes need to be made. Those members should wake up. They should learn to understand and hear, not just listen.

The bill that was before the House recently talked about a comprehensive program review on which the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has done an excellent job. It will look from the bottom up in a comprehensive review.

Too often government keeps adding programs. We have learned that now is the time to do a very comprehensive review and ask: "Do we need this program? Does it make sense? Is it relevant today? Is the structure correct?" We have taken action and we will continue to take action on those programs.

If we look at the reductions of numbers on boards, some boards have been totally eliminated and other boards have had their numbers reduced. We can cut but there is a limit. We can only cut so much. I know Reform members want to slash and burn everything totally but that is not the solution. Those members do not understand we have to build the infrastructure, whether it is the cultural infrastructure or the scientific infrastructure.

If Reform members would listen they would learn something but too often they are not listening.

People always want to build silicone valleys and tremendous infrastructures. Those cannot be done overnight. But it can be destroyed overnight by slashing the budgets. Members of the Reform Party were the people who were against the infrastructure program. They do not have a very good understanding of how important infrastructure is, whether it is the road system or the communication system. All those systems are very important.

As a business person I know how important that is. If a business person wants to transport goods some 100 miles away, without a good road system it could take four hours instead of two hours, which would be more expensive. Therefore, good infrastructure is very important.

The members of the Reform Party keep talking about this huge tax increase coming up. They know it is not true. Why are they doing it? It is because their membership is dropping and they want to increase their membership. They have sent out a brochure with all sorts of figures. In the middle of that brochure, lo and behold, is a membership form. What does it say? It says: "Join the Reform Party". It is political opportunism. Shame on you. Let us give the reality to the Canadian public. Let us give the truth.

We have to deal with the deficit and we have a clear program. As I said earlier, if the Reform members would listen they would learn but too often they have this one narrow view. Any other view to them is totally out.

We have to deal with the deficit. We have to do it with a rational, realistic and reasonable approach. We have set ourselves very clear targets. We set them during the election and we are going to follow through. We said we were going to bring the deficit down to 3 per cent of GDP in the first three years.

The members of the Reform Party had this crazy plan zero in three. They have abandoned that and are now calling it zero in five. They want to do it over five years now. They have realized that it cannot be done in three years.

Part of dealing with a deficit is not only dealing with the expenditure side but dealing with the revenue side as well. We have to make sure there is economic growth and confidence in the economy. Under the Reform program you would take $40 billion out of the economy over three years. Is that going to build confidence in the economy? Is that going to create economic growth? Absolutely not. That is why a rational and reasonable approach is very important.

Reform members always talk about the pension—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): May I ask hon. members to address their comments through the Chair.

Mr. Dhaliwal: Madam Speaker, as I was saying, to deal with the deficit we have to have a rational and reasonable approach both on the expenditure side and the revenue side. We have set a clear agenda and clear goals. We are going to fulfil the goal that we set during the election. We continue to say that we will bring it down to 3 per cent of GDP.

On the other side is the revenue part of it. We want to make sure there is confidence in the economy. If you look at what has happened, we have done that. We have had 4.7 per cent growth in the economy. We have created 400,000 jobs. That creates confidence in the economy where people want to invest and make sure that we are able to create growth.

Another thing we have done is assist small businesses because we know they create employment and jobs. We want to make sure we reduce the paper burden on small business. We have taken steps to do that.

• (1735)

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dhaliwal: The member is applauding because we know we have taken concrete steps to reduce the paper burden on small business.

Also, in the creating of wealth, we have set a very good agenda on the trade side. Members have seen what a successful program the Prime Minister has put forward to ensure that in this global economy we will be able to compete, that Canadian business will be able to go all over the world to promote their products, ensuring we are not left out of the global economy.

Not only do we have an expenditure program, we also have a revenue program to make sure we deal with the current economy.

We are going to deal with the deficit. Canadians want us to deal with it and I am sure members from both sides will support the budget, which will deal with our difficult situation in a rational, reasonable and comprehensive way.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.36 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 81(19), proceedings on the motion have expired.

It being 5.36 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.) moved:

That this House, recognizing the fundamental Canadian right of religious freedom and the courageous contributions of our veterans of all faiths, urge the Royal Canadian Legion and its constituent branches to reconsider their recent decision so that all of their members will have access to their facilities without having to remove religious head coverings, including the Sikh turban and the Jewish kipa.

She said: Madam Speaker, I am splitting my time with the hon. Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women.

Although I proudly represent the riding of Windsor—St. Clair, I was not raised there. I grew up in a small town, a village actually, Thamesville, Ontario, in the riding of Chatham—Kent. I grew up in a warm, wonderful home with caring parents, four caring sisters, in a caring village of only 1,000 people. I grew up thinking that our way of life, my family's way of life, the way we related to one another, the expressions we used, our relationships to our extended family, the food we ate and all the things we did were just plain Canadian.

However, as I grew older and my personal world expanded, my perception of what was Canadian changed radically. My parents adopted three sons, my brothers, who are proud to be aboriginal Canadians. I went to a university. I made friends with men and women of colour, of varying religions and heritages. I married a Jew and I raised with him our daughter in a new multicultural world.

Eventually it came full circle as I came to know friends who were recent immigrants to Canada from Ireland. I visited their home. I watched their way of life, the way they related to one another, the expressions they used, their relationships to their extended family, the food they ate. I realized with something of a jolt that I was seeing my own roots. There remained things in my life that still hearken back to the Shaughnessys and the Brennans who came to Canada in the 1840s and to the Murrays and Bradys who came here at the beginning of this century.

I realized then that I, a fifth generation Canadian on my mother's side, am different. I realized that I am a product of my heritage, and I am entitled to be proud of that heritage. Pride in my heritage is pride in my present. My heritage is very much a part of the Canadian fabric.

Over the centuries there have been vast waves of immigration to Canada. Aboriginal people migrated here; Europeans came. People came from the Middle East, Africa, India, Japan, Vietnam, Korea, China and points east. With them came their heritage, their culture and their religious beliefs. My maternal ancestors, like many of them, came here not voluntarily but because of persecution in Ireland.

They were fleeing an artificial famine. They lost their property and were hoping to find a place where they could live in economic freedom and could practice their religion.

That is one very good reason why new Canadians come here today. I say that it is the duty of all Canadians to welcome them, their heritage, their religions and to honour their traditions and let them practice them, just as my great–great–grandparents were allowed to go to mass, to dance their jigs, to drink their beer and to live in peace.

This motion is not just about the Canadian Legion. This motion is about Canada, our multiculturalism and our tolerance of our fellow citizens. On Remembrance Day 1993, the Newton Royal Canadian Legion hall in Surrey, B.C. refused to permit four Sikh veterans into the hall because of their religious headgear.

The four individuals were a retired Indian air force technician and three Sikh World War II veterans. Thirteen other veterans trooped from the hall to show their support for the Sikh members.

On entering the Legion hall, removing hats out of respect for fallen comrades is a dearly and deeply held tradition. On May 31, 1994 delegates to the Royal Canadian Legion's national convention voted against a bylaw that was revised by the dominion executive council that would have required all of its 1,700 branches to admit those wearing religious headgear into public areas of Legion halls.

Today only about 5 to 10 per cent of the Legion's constituent branches are opposed to the wearing of religious head–dress as they feel it displays disrespect to Canada's war dead. They claim that it is their right to make this decision because they have a private club. They say that because they took a democratic vote, the majority must rule.

Both the Canadian Jewish Congress and the World Sikh Organization realize that this decision does not represent all veterans and is not binding on all Legion branches. I would like to point out that in zone 10 of the Royal Canadian Legion, which is the town of Tecumseh that I represent, the city of Windsor part that I represent and the town of LaSalle, the newest town of Ontario which is part of the riding of Essex—Windsor, no Legion discriminates against people based on their headgear.

I call on the Legions and I call on other organizations to recognize that headgear and other religious symbols are simply that. They are the symbol to that person of a deeply held belief.

The Quebec Human Rights Commission yesterday ruled that the wearing of a veil by Muslim women is not something that can be interfered with by the state, nor is it something that should be forbidden in schools or in public places. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police have accepted religious headgear as part of their uniforms.

My father, who is a veteran and my constituents who are veterans, are proud to march next to the many great Sikh veterans, the many great Jewish veterans who wear kipas or yarmulkas. They are proud to march with them and we all should be. Instead of forbidding them from entering our institutions, instead of giving them a hard time, we should be thanking them for the freedoms they have preserved, so that Shaughnessy Cohen can go to mass, so that she can serve in the House of Commons, the freedom that others have in this society that we would not have if it were not for them.

I call on this House to support this motion. I call on all members to urge the Royal Canadian Legion and it constituent branches to reconsider their recent decision.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to second the motion brought before us and I thank the member for Windsor—St. Clair for raising this issue today, particularly as it comes so close to the beginning of a new year, one in which veterans will be much in our thoughts.

This year we observe the 50th anniversary of the end of the second world war. We recall the Canadians who fought in that conflict, above all those who lost their lives on the field of battle and also those who returned after the war to continue working peacefully for the same principles for which they had once fought. Those principles were democracy, human rights, freedom of the individual, and respect for people of different appearances, cultures and religions. These principles have become woven into the very fabric of Canadian society.

I am sure all hon. members of the House honour Canada's veterans as well as the organization that has represented them with such dignity for nearly 70 years. I am referring of course to the Royal Canadian Legion. We admire its members for upholding Canada's traditions. The most important of those traditions are the principles for which legion members fought and bled on our behalf half a century ago.

Back in 1986 a commemorative volume was published to mark the legion's 60th anniversary. It is a handsome book, full of warm anecdotes and evocative images. At one point it notes how the legion has evolved along with the country. It states:

> The people of today's Legion reflect the complex cultural mosaic of Canada. Though they hail from diverse ethnic backgrounds from Inuit and Indian to Greek, Jewish, Ukrainian, Polish and French Canadian, all Legion members are united by common ideals. They are joined by a spirit of volunteerism and a dedication to peace and democracy, patriotism and commemoration, mutual help and wide community service.

That spirit of service has made the Royal Canadian Legion a highly valued national institution. Through it our veterans have gone on contributing to our country in years of peace as they once did in wartime. It is a matter of deep regret now to find this organization embroiled in a controversy that threatens to lower the esteem of Canadians for this grand institution, the legion.

It is certainly not up to this House today to define the rules on how members of the Royal Canadian Legion should pay tribute to our country's victims of war. Nor should we decide how Sikhs and Jews should practice their religion in Canada. Rather, we must ensure that all Canadians are treated in compliance with the law and the fundamental principles which govern our society.

While very unfortunate, that incident forced us to reconsider these principles and ask ourselves if we comply with them. Indeed, this review could help us define the kind of country we want and how we can build it. And that should be the most significant aspect of what happened on November 11, 1993.

[English]

Imagine, Madam Speaker, that you should meet a gentleman of the old school whose distinguished bearing is a sure sign of his military background. He tells you that, following in his father's footsteps, he enlisted at the age of 18 and served for nearly 40 years in the armed forces. During the second world war he fought in North Africa at El Alamein, Tobruk and many other famous battles.

Since Remembrance Day is approaching, you invite this gentleman and some of his colleagues to join with you and your fellow veterans to mark the occasion. But when they turn up wearing their well–earned medals, you subject them to a public humiliation that shocks them and many of the participants in the observant ceremonies.

It is hard to believe that such an incident could happen here in Canada. But it did happen in 1993 when Lieutenant–Colonel Pritam Singh Jauhal and four other Sikh veterans from Surrey, British Columbia were refused admittance to the nearby Newton legion branch even though they were invited guests. The door was barred to them unless they agreed to remove their turbans, something observant Sikhs could never do.

One would have expected them to have been made welcome in every way out of feelings of gratitude, respect for their years, or simple hospitality. Instead, less rational feelings held sway that day.

Though within weeks the president of the branch offered an unconditional apology, last May the legion's dominion convention revived the controversy by voting down a proposal to allow religious head–dress in legion halls. The convention thereby barred from legion premises orthodox Sikhs who wear the turban, as well as orthodox Jews who wear a skullcap or kipa.

• (1750)

Legion members argued that their tradition requires all who enter legion halls to remove their head–dress as a mark of respect to those who fell in battle as well as to the sovereign. No one can question the desirability of showing respect, but surely there are different ways of doing this.

What are these issues, and why do they generate such concern? One of them may have to do with freedom of religion, while another is undoubtedly related to the right of all Canadians to equal treatment, without discrimination based on race or on national or ethnic origin. However, these rights are part of Canada's global social and political structure. What is at stake here is the very nature of that structure, the type of society in which we live, as well as the kind of country which we want for ourselves and for future generations of Canadians.

[English]

In a letter to the Prime Minister, Lieutenant–Colonel Jauhal and his colleagues recently wrote about their wartime service:

> During the second world war alongside the Commonwealth armed forces, we too put our lives on the line to protect the Commonwealth and preserve the democracy in which different people could live together and enjoy freedom in peace. Irrespective of different nationalities, faiths and cultures, we all in the Commonwealth armed forces developed comradeship, esprit de corps and tenacity and formed ourselves into a well–knit united family. Not only did we respect each other, we would have died for each other.
> During the second world war—no Canadian comrade asked us to remove our turban at that time. At Buckingham Palace Sikhs were allowed to appear in turbans before the King and Queen to receive awards. In Victoria last August the Queen met and chatted with each one of us. She did not ask us to remove our turbans.

If there is a note of bewilderment here, I think it is understandable. The Queen is a living symbol of Canada's traditions as well as those of the legion. If she is able to countenance the turban, to look beyond the headgear to the man, cannot the Royal Canadian Legion do likewise?

The Sikh veterans who were refused admittance have filed a formal complaint with the British Columbia Human Rights Commission. I have little doubt that through such formal channels they can gain a ruling in their favour. But would it not be preferable to do the right thing willingly rather than under court order?

There is more at stake here than simply showing civility. The five who were turned away are Canadians as much as I am and everyone else is in this Chamber. Whatever their appearance or religion, they have the right to participate fully in our national life.

Still more, all of us are impoverished if any group is marginalized and denied full participation. Even in the case of those who refuse to accept religious head–dress, we gain nothing by putting the worst interpretation on their actions. In fact, I think we misrepresent them by doing that.

The comments of legion members who voted against allowing headgear suggest that they were acting to uphold traditions. In the decades since they fought for our country they have seen Canada change at a dizzying pace. Successive waves of immigrants have transformed the face of Canadian society. This change is thought by some to be jeopardizing our fundamental values and traditions.

Let us recall what our traditions truly are, what being a Canadian and possessing a generosity of spirit is all about. Ultimately, I think we can all agree it is not a matter of appearance. This country derives its identity and its greatness from the principles for which our veterans fought: democracy; basic human freedom; fairness; justice; and equality of rights for all. Just plain decency.

By acting on these principles we uphold Canada's traditions. By working to realize these ideals in our ever evolving multicultural society, we show that we have not forgotten the sacrifices of our veterans. We will always remember them.

I am confident that the members of the Royal Canadian Legion will demonstrate in peacetime the same courage they showed in battle. For all of us, they can continue to set an example of generosity, of inclusion, and fairness.

I thank the member for allowing us to have this discussion today.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Madam Speaker, as the veterans affairs critic for the official opposition, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. However, we cannot expect the debate on the motion moved by the hon. member for Windsor–St. Clair to provide us with the answer to a problem involving the rights of the individual and the rights of the community. We can explain our respective positions and comment on them, but it would be hazardous for anyone to claim that he or she has the answer.

After establishing the principle of human rights a number of years ago, we started to establish the boundary between individual rights and the rights of agencies, corporations or companies. We know that these two kinds of rights—individual and collective rights—may or may not clash, depending on how tolerant or intolerant people are.

Individual rights have been recognized for many years by various charters of rights and freedoms. One that stands out is the charter adopted unanimously by the Quebec National Assembly in 1975. These charters recognize the right to fundamental freedoms such as freedom of conscience and freedom of religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association.

Some of these individual or collective rights may impinge on one another. We all know this fundamental principle: one person's freedom extends to where the other person's freedom starts. However, although Parliament can indicate how we should see the nature of this boundary between my rights and the rights of my neighbour, it is up to the courts to make a decision in disputes that may arise between conflicting rights. We can suggest where the boundary should lie, without actually changing anything. In this case, we think that, in time, a consensus will develop in favour of greater tolerance.

Tolerance, and by that I mean accepting the differences of the other person, is not always easy to accept when we are directly involved. Tolerance can quickly turn into resistance when we are directly confronted with a total departure from what we see as normal.

In this particular case, the Legion tells us that the wearing of the Sikh turban and the Jewish kipa is not allowed in the facilities of the legion, any more than any other head coverings. To the legion, the religious aspect of certain head covering is irrelevant. The Royal Canadian Legion argues that an organization has the right to impose certain rules and practices within the framework of its activities.

This position is not consistent, however. A spokesperson for the Canadian Jewish Congress pointed out last June that the Legion had no trouble with cowboy hats or baseball caps. Why the inconsistency?

At a Christmas party in 1987, a branch of the legion in Alberta barred a Sikh wearing a turban from entering its premises, although the hall had been rented for the occasion and the Sikh was not a member of the legion. He then filed a complaint with the Alberta Human Rights Commission. A tribunal finally asked the branch to apologize and amend its discriminatory regulations since the legion does not have the right to deny access to public activities. The branch made minor changes without allowing full access.

The 1990 turban scandal provoked strong negative reactions in many branches of the Royal Canadian Legion against legitimate differences that are not prejudicial to legion members in any way. On November 30, 1993, Sikh veterans participating in Remembrance Day ceremonies in Surrey, British Columbia, were denied access to royal legion facilities because they refused to remove their turbans.

In February 1994, the president of a local branch in Cornwall, Ontario was reinstated after being suspended by the provincial branch after he spoke against the wearing of turbans. Either to clarify the situation or to try to hold back the movement against the religious practices of fellow soldiers, the Royal Canadian Legion took the opportunity, at its annual convention in late May 1994, to urge participants to pass a resolution allowing Sikh members to wear religious head–dress on branch premises.

Those present rejected this proposal, forcing their national president to resign on the spot. Without a national policy, individual branches are still free to regulate access to their facilities as they see fit. This event has stirred up many reactions, here in the House of Commons as well as in the media. Local chapters of the legion that have formulated or maintained the restrictions concerning the wearing of head–dress have pointed out that they are exercising a right accorded to private organizations such as theirs.

In fact, the Royal Canadian Legion has its roots in a private organization formed on July 10, 1926, which through federal statute assented to on June 30, 1948 was incorporated as the Royal Canadian Legion. The best conclusion that I can offer this Chamber is undoubtedly the one that preceded us by 24 hours, in Montreal. Yesterday, the Quebec human rights commission published a legal opinion concerning the banning of the Islamic head scarf. It ruled clearly that such bans were a violation of freedom of religion.

In the same breath, however, it recalled that section 20 of the Quebec charter of rights and freedoms allows non–profit organizations to impose rules consistent with their objectives of a charitable, philanthropic, religious, political or educational nature. For the commission, this provision would not, however, allow interference with the freedom of conscience or religion of an individual.

The Quebec human rights commission is in a way proposing a set of rules under which the current debate on religious pluralism could take place. They set out clearly the legal principles that the courts should rely on in dealing with these issues. Although it emphasizes that the Quebec charter would prohibit any discrimination on the basis of religion, the commission does not recommend that the courts be asked to settle disputes.

Instead, it invites the opposing parties and the general public to arrive at a consensus on the broader issue of conflicting rights.

This is our choice. We hope that attitudes will evolve and that each of us will become aware of the worth of others, with respect for the self. We invite the Royal Canadian Legion to examine the opinions just published by the Quebec human rights commission.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on Motion No. 310.

My fellow colleague's attack against the Royal Canadian Legion, an independent association of veterans who risked their lives to fight racism and oppression, is in my opinion unfounded.

The Royal Canadian Legion is not an organization permeated with bigots and racists—far from it. The legion is an organization of war veterans with their own valued customs and traditions to show respect for their fallen comrades.

Their methods of showing respect are their own and should not be subject to parliamentary inquiry. I feel strongly that my colleague has misinterpreted the whole issue.

During the 35th dominion convention of the Royal Canadian Legion which was held in Calgary from May 29 to June 2, 1994 the legion passed a resolution:

> Branch bylaws or house rules shall include a provision for the wearing of head–dress in the premises and when doing so must provide that religious head–dress is not considered to constitute head–dress in the traditional sense.
> Therefore, once a person who is required to wear head–dress by his faith has been accepted as a Legion member, or invited as a guest to a Legion branch, he is authorized admission to all areas of that branch that are normally open to the general membership or invited guests.

• (1805)

This bylaw clearly states that once a branch allows an individual in as a member or as a guest that individual will have access to all areas of the branch regardless of religious head–dress. This is a sensible policy.

However, individual branches can comply with this bylaw as they see fit due to their grassroots independence from the dominion command. Individual legion branches have the right to accept or refuse all new members, period, regardless of head–dress. Therefore, the legion has taken effective action to ensure that all Canadians have access to their facilities.

President of the Royal Canadian Legion, Mr. Hugh Greene, stated after the convention: "It is wrong to say that the convention banned turbans. The delegates did not vote to ban religious head–dress from branches. The vote was to rescind a national general bylaw that imposed a dress regulation on branches. This decision took the responsibility for branch head–dress rules back into the hands of the branches".

I find it hard to comprehend why my colleague wants this decision reversed. As she states in her motion:

> —urge the Royal Canadian Legion and its constituent branches to reconsider their recent decision.

Is the return to a national general bylaw imposing a dress regulation in the best interest of all Canadians? I do not think so. I think it is important for Parliament to respect the right of organizations such as the legion to make and maintain their own bylaws. Nobody in Parliament would question the bylaws of the Kiwanis Club or the Optimist Club. Besides, the Royal Canadian Legion has been very generous in its interpretation of its customs. The vast majority of legion branches are following the resolutions passed by the conventions.

If the members across the way would listen for a minute, the statement made was that the vast majority of legion branches are following the resolution passed by the convention.

John Spellman, professor of Asian studies at the University of Windsor, documented that in the past 67 years and out of a membership of nearly 700,000 there have been fewer than six cases in all in Canada involving turbaned Sikhs not being admitted to Legion halls. No person of Jewish descent has ever been turned away. The Human Rights Commission has only ever decided against a legion branch once. Many veterans who require head–dress for religious reasons have been legion members for years.

My colleague's motion has called into question the integrity of the Royal Canadian Legion and I feel strongly that I must set the record straight. I would like to take this opportunity to tell the House what kind of organization the Royal Canadian Legion is.

We all know the legion was formed after the great war to help veterans secure adequate pensions and other well earned benefits for them and their families. Today's Royal Canadian Legion has many other stated purposes and objectives which include bringing about the unity of all who have served their country, furthering the spirit of camaraderie, striving for peace, goodwill and friendship among all nations, co–operating with the commonwealth and allied associations with similar aims and encouraging, promoting and engaging in or supporting all forms of national, provincial, municipal and community service or any other charitable purpose.

Today's Royal Canadian Legion benefits everyone in this room and all Canadians.

• (1810)

Its programs have had a very positive impact throughout the communities that are blessed with a legion branch. In 1993 the Royal Canadian Legion's 1,720 branches contributed $63 million and over 2 million volunteer person hours to their communities.

The Royal Canadian Legion, through its service bureau which acts as an advocate for thousands of veterans and their families, provided assistance to those veterans.

In 1993 the Royal Canadian Legion provided $6.8 million in direct support and over half a million hours of volunteer time assisting 67,000 veterans.

The legion is also active in supporting commonwealth veterans internationally. As a member of the British Commonwealth ex–service league, the Royal Canadian Legion has welcomed the responsibility for assisting Caribbean veterans through 15 Caribbean ex–service organizations in countries such as Jamaica, Trinidad and Guyana.

The legion has also assisted peacekeepers who have been injured during peacekeeping activities. We are all familiar with the Royal Canadian Legion's remembrance and poppy campaign. It raised nearly $5.2 million in 1993 which is used to assist needy veterans and their families. It was also used to purchase medical supplies and funds, medical research and training.

In 1992 the legion's senior program provided seniors with $3.9 million in direct support and contributed 400,000 hours of volunteer time assisting 57,000 seniors. It also provided hundreds of thousands of dollars to help train practitioners in gerontology and geriatric medicine.

In addition, the legion sponsors Meals on Wheels and provides transportation for seniors and disabled Canadians. It helps them reach day hospitals, recreational activities and medical appointments.

The Royal Canadian Legion is one of the country's leading community organizations. It contributes tens of millions of dollars to private charities annually.

In 1992, $10 million was earmarked for direct support of youth activities such as the finest youth organization in the world, the Royal Canadian Air, Sea and Army Cadets across the country. Also, much needed money went to Scouts Canada. It provides the children and grandchildren of veterans with educational bursaries and scholarships.

I would like to take a moment to offer all my colleagues in the House an opportunity to pay tribute to the good deeds of the Royal Canadian Legion. I can only pray that the Royal Canadian Legion remains an independent, grassroots, democratic organization, for without the input of the grassroots, the legion would not be the progressive community organization it is today.

It has assisted more Canadians than any other non–government organization I know of.

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to speak to Motion No. 310 which urges branches of the Royal Canadian Legion which do not permit Jews and Sikhs to wear religious head dress in their branches to reconsider this discriminatory practice.

As my hon. colleague for Windsor—St. Clair suggests in her motion, all members of the legion must have access to legion facilities without having to choose between their legion affiliation and their religious belief.

As most of us know, the Royal Canadian Legion does excellent work among other worthy things in perpetuating the memory and deeds of the fallen. Founded in 1925 by Field Marshall Haig, the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League was organized to bring veterans' concerns to the attention of government.

In 1960 the organization was renamed the Royal Canadian Legion and continues to this day to act as an intermediary between veterans and government.

Today, the Royal Canadian Legion is made up of 1,720 branches and has over 570,000 members. The mere mention of the Legion conjures up the poppy campaign, the November 11 parades as well as the design and literary contest for high school students. Indeed, the Legion has taken on the task of bringing together, within a democratic and non partisan association, the men and women who fought in the various branches of the Armed Forces.

• (1815)

However, the non partisan nature of the Legion has been put in question by the unfortunate incident where Sikh veterans were denied access to Legion facilities for refusing to take off their turbans. In trying to deal with subsequent allegations of racism, the Dominion Command of the Canadian Legion put forth a resolution to amend the rule concerning the wearing of the Jewish kipa and the Sikh turban inside Legion facilities. It read in part as follows:

[English]

> Once a person who is required to wear a head–dress for (the Jewish and Sikh) faiths has been accepted as a Legion member, they are to be authorized admission to all areas of that branch that are opened to the general membership or invited guests.

Unfortunately at the general assembly in May last year more than 75 per cent of the legion's delegates voted down this resolution. In so doing they placed in jeopardy the non–sectarian nature of the legion. Those who voted to maintain a ban on head–dress within legion premises refused to depart from a principle to the effect that wearing a hat shows disrespect to the fallen. The national president was so outraged he immediately resigned.

Fortunately not all members of the legion have similar narrow views. A letter published in the February 1994 issue of The Legion reminds legion members of the spirit of friendship and camaraderie that is supposed to be found in legion halls. It states:

> It seems to me some of my comrades have forgotten that one of the things they fought for was democracy and within that democracy is the right to practise religion. If, in so doing, it means that uncovering one's head would be an offence to one's god, then why should we be affronted? These people are not slighting the memory of those who paid the greatest sacrifice for freedom. Instead, we should be open minded enough to remember that some Sikh veterans fought in the same campaigns with great distinction, and wish the fellowship of their comrades in a Legion branch without being harassed by close minded discrimination.

[Translation]

In an effort to appease the strong public outcry against the proposed motion being rejected, the Dominion Command urged Legion branches to reconsider their decision. I am pleased to report to this House that almost 90 per cent of the branches have now passed motions recognizing the important contribution of Jewish and Sikh servicemen in the world wars and, consequently, repealed their discriminatory policy on religious head–dress. Unfortunately, another 10 per cent did not.

[English]

It is important to state once again that Canadians of various religious backgrounds, including Jews and Sikhs, have in the past served and continue to serve with great distinction in Canadian and other Commonwealth forces. Their faith did not prevent them from serving and dying for their country.

In the second world war alone, 10,235 Canadian Jews served in the army, another 5,889 in the Royal Canadian Air Force and yet another 596 in the navy. I am sad to remind the House that 429 Canadian Jews were killed in action from 1939 to 1945, over 200 were wounded and 84 were made prisoners of war. In recognition of their valuable contribution to the war effort almost 200 Jewish soldiers were decorated.

Should not all veterans regardless of their gender, ethnic origins and religious affiliation receive fair and equal treatment by the Royal Canadian Legion?

By refusing to adopt a resolution permitting Jews and Sikhs to wear their religious head–dress on legion premises, some members of the legion have shown themselves to be insensitive to the Canadian reality and to the members they are supposed to represent.

Canada is not a monolithic society. Unfortunately some are still unwilling to acknowledge our cultural and religious reality. Some branches of the legion have adopted regulations that may contravene Canadian and provincial human rights legislation. These branches need to be reminded that Canada has a long and well respected tradition of tolerance. The legion should reflect upon its decision and its actions in this light.

It is sad that in 1995 some still do not accept and respect our rich and diverse cultural and religious traditions. We must continue to work toward better understanding among all Canadians, not the opposite. This debate is extremely important for it causes us to reflect on the work that remains to be done; too much work unfortunately.

Members of the branches that have banned religious head–dress must be made aware that the kipa is not a hat to a conservative Jew. He does not wear it for vanity but in order to observe a religious injunction to cover one's head before God. With respect to the turban it is more than a simple regalia to an orthodox Sikh. It is a powerful symbol of the mystery which binds the man to his faith.

Incredibly during the Calgary Stampede some branches allow their members to drink beer and socialize with their 10–gallon cowboy hats fitted nicely on their heads. The rationale behind this exemption is: What would the stampede be without our cowboy hats? Why do some legion branches believe that a legion member who wears a 10–gallon hat in the legion hall during stampede is only following tradition, while a Jew who wears a kipa or a Sikh who wears a turban is showing disrespect for the fallen.

I am concerned that Jews and Sikhs are being denied entry by some branches because some legion members are uncomfortable with fellow members who look a little different or whose headgear may demonstrate that they are a little different. These members think that maybe they do not belong. They belong as much as any other Canadian. Our differences do not divide us; they enrich us.

We each have a duty to denounce all forms of discrimination. Ironically it is in our own self–interest to do so. The Protestant theologian Neimoller said after World War II:

> When the Nazis came to get the gypsies I did not say anything because I was not a gypsy. When they came to get the communists I did not say anything because I was not a communist. When they came to get the Jews I did not say anything because I was not a Jew. When they came to get me there was no one left to stand up for me.

We have a moral obligation to strive to understand one another as a people. Whether a Jew wears a kipa, a Sikh a turban, a Calgarian a cowboy hat or a Torontonian a Blue Jays cap, we are all Canadian citizens and have a right to express our beliefs without fear of discrimination.

I urge branches of the Royal Canadian Legion which prevent members from wearing a religious head–dress to reconsider their position so that they foster a climate of tolerance and understanding. I believe the legion should be an agent for tolerance and understanding within Canadian society. I am only surprised that this is not universally the case.

The legion should never forget the principles its members fought and died for. The legion, as should all Canadians, should remember the eloquent words spoken by our Prime Minister on the beaches of Normandy for the 50th anniversary of D–Day:

> In death they are not anglophones or francophones, not from the west or from the east, not Christians or Jews, nor aboriginal people or immigrants. They were Canadians.

They died as Canadians and I think some branches of the legion insult the memory of these Canadians by excluding other veterans from legion posts.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Private Members' Motion No. 310.

I would like to start by reminiscing a bit back to the sixties when I first immigrated to Canada. I remember a couple of incidents that happened during my early arrival to Canada that I will never forget. One was a fairly simple matter.

When we were first invited into the homes of some of our neighbours, my wife and I went tramping in like one always does in Colorado where we came from. When other guests arrived and I noticed no one had any shoes on their feet it kind of surprised me. I asked: "What is this? Don't you guys believe in wearing shoes any more?" They informed: "That is what is done in Canada. When we visit we take our shoes off". I said: "I can buy that. I will be prepared for it, though, in case I ever have to take my shoes off".

The next time we went out to visit somebody we removed our shoes because that was the way it was done. Of course when I went back to Colorado after getting accustomed to it, I took my shoes off when I went to visit and they laughed at me because that did not happen there. That is fairly minor.

I remember another time my wife and I attended a community dance. When they announced it was the last dance I grabbed my best friend, my wife, and I said: "Come on, let's have this last dance together". They finished and then they played another song. I thought we were going to have one more. It took about three twirls before it dawned on me that everybody else was standing still because they were playing: "God save the Queen". That was a little embarrassing. I twirled around the floor just about three steps too many not to be embarrassed. I felt a little strange. I can say the next time there was a community dance I not only stood with the rest of them but I sang the words; I learned them.

I tell those stories because there were a number of things we had to get used to when we moved to Canada. Although we were not that far apart, a number of things were different.

Another thing I remember that caught me off guard was going into a club. It was not the legion; it was an Elks club, I believe. I did not realize the difference in Canada. In my state they had an Elks club. I was not a member but I always went there. In this club in Canada I did not have a membership so I was not allowed in. I accepted that as being the way it was. It took me and my family a number of months to get accustomed to different things that were happening.

What worries me about a bill of this nature is that it is a bill that says to a certain segment of society that it does not do things right, that we are going to legislate and do it the way it should be done. I realize it is just a motion to encourage the legions to reconsider. However my biggest fear is that if that is not the case and these wishes are not followed, would it some day become the wish of the House to legislate a rule that would affect an organization of this type?

When we start making legislation that controls the rights of individuals or controls the collective rights of organizations, we are stepping out of our bounds as legislators. I do not think we are here to start controlling things. I hope we do not get to that point in our lives.

I hope everybody here who has feelings today will express those feelings to the legions in the manner they should. I would not want it to be a collective thing coming down in any way, shape or form from the House saying: "We know what is best for you people out in Canada. Let's get away from that idea. We are going to do it for you. If not then we are going to have to do some other things".

I recall attending a golf tournament one time. A fellow drove about 300 miles to join us in that tournament. He came from Peace River and the golf tournament was in Red Deer. He walked in with his 12–year old son. Immediately the golf managers told him that the son had to leave because he had Levis on. Levis were not allowed. He said: "We came a long way. He is just going to caddy". It did not matter. Levis were not allowed on the course.

Are we to start going to golf courses and saying: "You have to change your dress code because you are offending some people?" Do we have to go to restaurants that say we have to wear a coat and tie to come in? They set the rules so we do not go in.

We should get away from the idea that we have to be involved in controlling the situation and not leave it in the hands of good common sense thinking Canadians. If we give them time to organize their thoughts, rules and regulations, it will come into play where we can all be happy with it.

However when we start acting as government officials who know best and suggesting as legislators the way it has to be, it is wrong. It worries me that we would even consider to move in that direction. I encourage us not to do so by means of legislation, a member's motion of this nature or anything else.

If members wish to express their desires as they have done so well today, they should do so to the legion clubs in their ridings as individuals and not as a collective unit of government saying: "It is our way".

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Madam Speaker, first let me congratulate the member for Windsor—St. Clair for giving the House the opportunity to debate the issue. Also let me congratulate my colleagues who were so articulate in this situation.

I would like to inform the Reform member that we do have a law. It is called the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms it says that we do not discriminate. There is a item called freedom of religion. I encourage him to take some time to look at that.

I do not think I can articulate better than members have already the concern in terms of the legion and how in certain branches—there are a few, not many—there is discrimination against Sikhs who wear headgear.

My grandfather came here in 1906 and was one of those who wore a turban. He would not be allowed in certain legions right now because of his turban. That is terrible. A member of this House of Commons would also not be allowed into certain legions and I find that unacceptable.

I would like to leave my colleagues with an example that happened in my riding. I think it articulates best what our young people are thinking. I believe we have to learn from our youth.

In a Churchill high school, which I attended as a student, the members voted to not participate in the Canadian legion poppy fund. They gave very good reasons when they said: "We want to support the veterans of this country, but we cannot do it through the Canadian legion". The students voted in a democratic election. The overwhelming majority refused to get involved in the poppy fund. It was not because they did not believe in the veterans but because of what the legion did, the discrimination of some legion branches. That is why they refused to participate.

That is leadership. That is looking ahead. But the students also said: "We are going to have our own poppy fund. We are not going to let those veterans down. We want to support those veterans so we are going to make our own poppies". I applaud those students for showing leadership and for showing us which way to go.

I am a Sikh, as many of my colleagues know. I am not a turban Sikh because I am not an orthodox Sikh, but I can tell you that this is very important to me. Frankly, I was disappointed in some of the comments made by members of the Reform Party. I know that many members from the Okanagan would also be disappointed.

That example shows that our young people are taking leadership. They are saying: "We do not accept discrimination. We do not accept bigotry. We want to tolerate people. We want to include people. We do not want to marginalize anybody. We do not want to exclude people. We want to bring Canadians together". That is what this is all about. We want to bring Canadians together. We want to understand each other.

My own children who are seven, twelve and thirteen share Indian food with other children. My daughter came home singing a Hebrew song. That is what sharing is all about, what understanding is all about, what tolerance is all about. That is what all of this is about. Racial harmony is linked to economic prosperity. It is also linked to a better understanding. As Canadians we have to move forward.

There have been times in Canadian history when there has been discrimination. We look back on it and ask: Did this really happen? In 20 years from now we will look back and ask: Did this really happen in Canadian history? And we will not believe that it did.

I want to thank all the members who have articulated this issue so well. I am sorry I do not have more time to speak. I am sharing it with another member.

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased and privileged to rise in the House today to speak to Motion No. 310 presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

As the House is aware, I am the first turbaned Sikh to sit in the House of Commons. The turban is recognized by this House as religious headgear and no restrictions whatsoever are placed upon me. Likewise, Her Majesty the Queen has clearly indicated that the wearing of the turban in her presence is totally acceptable. The Queen's aide, Robin Janvrin, in a letter dated September 13, 1991 wrote: "I confirm that many Sikhs have been invited to Buckingham Palace over the years. They were not asked to remove their turbans".

Today's motion urges the Canadian legion to recognize that the turban is not simply a hat, but rather it is an integral part of the Sikh faith.

• (1835)

The Sikhs have proudly served during the time of war all the while wearing their turbans. The fact that the turban has been recognized by the RCMP and the Canadian military as suitable dress for parade or duty should be extended to the wearing of religious headgear in the legions.

What was World War II all about anyway? Was it just fearless exploits and dramatic battles? Or was it about fighting for freedom, including religious freedom at a time of virulent anti–Semitism?

The brave soldiers of all faiths fought and died so that the living would be respected. They died so that a religious Jew would never be forced to remove his yarmulke and a devout Sikh would not be humiliated by being asked to remove his turban.

On the battlefield, no one asked Jewish and Sikh soldiers to fight and die without their religious headgear. Yet now, the yarmulke and turban are deemed disrespectful, on par with a cowboy hat, baseball cap or fedora.

In voting down the pleas of their own leadership to allow religious headgear into legion halls, the convention delegates violated the spirit of Canada's human rights laws and trampled on traditional Canadian values.

Today's motion would ensure that this situation would not be allowed to continue. I urge all of my fellow members in the House to support this motion and once and for all put this humiliating situation to rest.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TRANS–CANADA HIGHWAY

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Madam Speaker, I rise to pursue a question that I asked the Minister of Transport last week in the House about a proposed route for the Trans–Canada Highway through New Brunswick.

In answering my question the Minister of Transport said that he could not address the matter because it was a provincial jurisdiction. What the minister failed to note was that the federal government cost shares on all trans–Canada projects. That makes it a federal concern.

Although the ultimate route has not yet been determined, the New Brunswick government is leaning toward the idea of an expanded Trans–Canada Highway from Fredericton to Moncton, New Brunswick through Jemseg Marsh and CFB Camp Gagetown. This plan will cost an estimated $1 billion and will cause environmental problems.

Under this plan, Saint John would not be on the Trans–Canada Highway route. As the province's largest city, its industrial centre and the city closest to the U.S. border, Saint John should be directly on the TCH. In fact, this new route would also cut off Sussex, New Brunswick and many other towns and villages along the way.

There is an environmental assessment being done of Premier McKenna's choice of the route. The possibility of the route going through a designated flood plain and going through Camp Gagetown, including one of the province's largest inland marshes is worrisome.

Citizens groups from my province say Premier McKenna's preference seems to fly in the face of a federal government policy calling for no net loss of water habitat for wildlife. Even if this is not of concern to the transport minister, it should of interest to federal ministers of the environment and defence.

The preferable route would twin Saint John, Fredericton, Moncton and St. Stephen and can be built for $220 million. It could be done by upgrading the existing highways linking these four centres. This option will make the three largest cities in the province of New Brunswick equal and will pose no threat to the environment whatsoever.

I ask the minister once again to reassure the House that the government will not contribute one federal dollar to a trans–Canada highway project that is not only exorbitant in cost but may also be harmful to the environment. How could any member of this government agree to spend $1 billion when in fact it can achieve its objective by spending $220 million?

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question this evening.

Highways in Canada, except for those on federal property, are the responsibility of the provincial government. The member knows that. It is a simple fact but true.

I do not think there is anyone in Canada who is more knowledgeable or concerned about highways than Premier McKenna of New Brunswick and his transportation minister, the Hon. Seldon Lee. Therefore, quite simply, the appropriate place to raise questions about the routing of a highway within the province of New Brunswick is in the New Brunswick legislature, not the federal House of Commons.

Premier McKenna is doing the best job he can and we of course will do everything we can within our jurisdiction to assist him in his most laudable goals.

As for the choosing of the route, as I understand it, the province hired a consultant to review the options to improve the trans-Canada highway in New Brunswick. I should point out the study did not involve the federal government whatsoever. The province is working toward a four lane highway from the New Brunswick–U.S.A. border at St. Stephen through Saint John to the Nova Scotia border. That is its right, its duty and its jurisdiction.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Madam Speaker, yesterday, February 14, I put a question to the Prime Minister. I reminded him that the tenors of the federal government keep on repeating, hoping to convince Quebecers, that we do not need to reform the constitution, since federalism is flexible and in constant flux.

Then, I said to the Prime Minister something like: "If you want to be taken seriously, why do you refuse to recognize Quebec 's jurisdiction, requested time and time again, in the area of manpower training". There is a consensus among all Quebec parties in this regard. A consensus to which even the president of the Conseil du patronat, a well known federalist, subscribes.

Not only Quebecers share that opinion. The president of the Canadian manufacturers' association said recently: "Why is it that the federal government does not let the provinces exercise this responsibility?" There are powerful economic arguments in favour of it. Manpower training has to be geared to the job market.

The Prime Minister, instead of answering my question, said—and I can repeat it, since it is on the public record—"I know very well that she would remain a separatist even if we resolved the workforce issue." Of course.

However, what I find disturbing—and I cannot help but say it here—is that the Prime Minister is basically saying that he could not care less about what happens to young people, women and all those who need this efficient manpower training, because it is managed by the manpower agency we, in Quebec, have set up and which is not a government body. It is made up of representatives from the private sector, labour unions, municipalities, and of course, a few representatives from the Quebec government. It is an institution which should be recognized, if only the federal government cared about all those Quebecers who need manpower training.

The fact is that even if the federal government agreed to it, I would still be a sovereignist. But I will tell you one thing, it is because there have been so many situations like this one that many people like me know now that there is only one option for Quebecers, and that is sovereignty.

[English]

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will address myself directly to the question and not debate whether the member is or is not going to remain a federalist.

Let me reassure the hon. member that the situation of young people in Canada is an issue that concerns us all. Contrary to the member's claims in her previous questions, there is no conclusive data demonstrating that unemployment insurance changes contained in the 1994 budget have had an impact on provincial social assistance caseloads.

What the hon. member ignores is that new unemployment insurance claims and the number of UI claims exhausted have both been decreasing since the government came into power. What is more, strong employment growth and job creation in 1994 have been the most significant factors contributing to these decreases, bringing new UI claims down by 10 per cent.

The latest labour market data also offer hope. In January 1995 the unemployment rate for 15 to 24–year old Canadian workers decreased by 3.4 percentage points over the January 1994 rate. Employment is up by over 114,000 in Quebec alone since the government came into power, including 16,000 new jobs in January 1995.

In response to my hon. colleague's concerns about the UI fund, she should remember that UI pays for itself through the premiums of employers and workers and that there is still a debt of $3.7 billion in the account accumulated over the past recession.

As employment continues to grow in the coming year, that debt may well be repaid, providing more room to reduce premiums while still giving unemployed people the assistance they need to get back to work.

I hope this answer is one the member can agree with.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT, 1995

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–69, an act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries.

He said: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I wish to inform the House that the bill just introduced is in response to the order of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 68(6), made last Tuesday.

Consequently, further proceedings will be subject to the provisions of Standing Order 68(7)(a), which includes a requirement that consideration of second reading be postponed until no earlier than the third sitting day after today.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–302, an act to amend the Canada Health Act (nutrition services).

He said: Madam Speaker, I have the honour to introduce today in this House a bill to amend the Canada Health Act with regard to nutrition services.

This bill includes the expression "nutrition services" in the definition of health services provided under the existing Canada Health Act. We all know that nutrition is an essential component of health and that Canadian dieticians are the only health professionals duly trained and authorized to evaluate a person's nutritional status.

Furthermore, the Canadian government recognizes dieticians as key resources in developing health policies such as Canada's Food Guide, which sets guidelines for good health. I therefore feel that it is important, as much for the general public as for the order of dieticians, that they be formally recognized and included in the Canada Health Act.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–303, an act to amend the Criminal Code (dangerous intoxication).

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to introduce this bill. I know other members in the House were working on similar bills. The motivation behind the bill is to remove the ability of persons to hold themselves harmless from responsibility for self–induced intoxication.

As members know, recently the Supreme Court held that persons could be held harmless from the result of their own actions because of self–induced intoxication. This goes against the grain of all thinking Canadians and common sense.

This bill, which I would ask all members in the House to support, would create a separate offence. The offence of being criminally intoxicated would ensure that Canadians are held personally responsible for the results of their actions. They cannot hide behind the charter of rights and freedoms to escape responsibility for what they have done. This would prevent violence to others who are innocent.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it gives me pleasure to present a petition today from men and women in southern Ontario.

The petitioners would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that public safety is the number one priority of the criminal justice system. The existing controls on law–abiding, responsible firearm owners are more than enough to ensure public safety and that the current and proposed laws criminalizing certain firearm activities when the danger to the public safety and criminal intent is either virtually non–existent or totally absent.

The target for all gun control laws in the Criminal Code of Canada must be the criminals who are either a danger to the safety of the public or those who have criminal intent, not law–abiding, responsible firearm owners. No amount of gun control has ever succeeded in preventing criminals from acquiring guns by illegal means. What our criminal justice system must ensure is that criminals who steal, import, sell and possess guns and/or use guns in the commission of a crime will be severely punished.

Therefore, the petitioners pray and request Parliament to support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime; second, support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms, and last, support legislation which repeals and modifies existing controls—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): May I remind hon. members that it is normal to read the prayer only and not to enter into a form of debate when presenting petitions.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this petition is about abuse and violence in society.

[English]

The petitioners believe that unnecessary violence and abuse in society in all of its forms, on radio and television, have become a major concern of the Canadian population.

• (1015)

They want the government to ensure that the CRTC is able to regulate it and reduce it and if possible remove it, I suspect. They point out that it is not necessary to educate and it goes counter to families trying to raise their children.

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present three petitions on the whole business of firearms legislation. Two petitions are from towns in Yellowhead and one is from Ontario.

Among other things the petitioners request that Parliament support laws which will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime. I concur with that request.

TWO DOLLAR COIN

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Madam Speaker I have petition with 1,826 signatures. It is a rather interesting petition. It was the inspiration of a Mrs. Ruby Stone who lives in my riding.

She is petitioning the government as all these people are against the introduction of a $2 coin. Some of us may not be aware that there is a study going on in this country to introduce a $2 coin. Sometimes these things are slipped in. I know this government would not likely do that.

I think we should introduce more $2 bills because if you use a $5 bill you usually get four coins back. People are getting tired carrying them around. I support these petitioners.

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is with pleasure that I rise today to present a petition containing signatures from people in Beaverton, Fenelon Falls, Woodville and Cannington in the riding of Victoria—Haliburton.

This petition calls on Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of 78 of my constituents from Gold River and Campbell River, British Columbia, who call upon this Parliament to reject any further firearms control legislation, regulations or orders in council and rather focus on the misuse of firearms by violent criminals.

I support the petition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I present a petition today from some 25 lower mainlanders, some of whom are constituents of mine from New Westminster—Burnaby, British Columbia.

The petitioners fear that inclusion of sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act will infringe on the historic rights of Canadians such as the freedoms of religion, conscience, expression and association. Therefore, they call upon Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present several petitions. Several members of my constituency of Trinity—Spadina call upon the Government of Canada to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act so as to give statutory recognition of homosexual relationships and to enshrine their equality before the law with that of heterosexual relationships.

On behalf of my constituents, I humbly submit these petitions.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I also rise today for members of my constituency of Trinity—Spadina who call on the government to enact legislation of a national policy on child care that is unifying and provides non–discretionary, equitable and sufficient service to all residents of Canada.

On behalf of my constituents, I humbly submit this petition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have four petitions to present on behalf of the constituents of Simcoe Centre today. The first group of petitioners request that the Government of Canada not amend the human rights act to include the phrase sexual orientation. The petitioners fear that such an inclusion could lead to homosexuals receiving the same benefits and societal privileges as married people.

MARRIAGE

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the second petition concerns the subject of the family. The petitioners request that Parliament oppose any legislation that would directly or indirectly redefine the family, including the provision of marriage and family benefits to those who are not related by ties of blood, marriage or adoption, where marriage is defined as a legal union between a man and a woman.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the third petition is on the issue of euthanasia.

• (1020)

The petitioners request that current laws regarding active euthanasia be enforced and that Parliament not sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or euthanasia.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the final petition today is of the subject of section 745 of the Criminal Code. The petitioners request that Parliament repeal this section so that those convicted of first degree murder will have to serve their full 25–year sentence behind bars.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise to present three petitions today. The first is to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the second petition from the constituents of Hamilton—Wentworth calls upon Parliament to put an end to the discriminatory treatment of gay and lesbian citizens and their familial relationships by amending federal legislation that currently allows unequal treatment, including an amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation.

Madam Speaker, the third petition calls for Parliament to not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

MINING

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the citizens of the great communities of Logan Lake, Kamloops, Ashcroft, Cache Creek, Merritt and Savona. There are hundreds of names on this petition.

The people point out that Canada's mining industry is a mainstay of employment in over 150 communities across Canada, an important contributor to Canada's gross domestic product in total exports and a cornerstone of our economic future. They point out that the industry has proposed a 10 point plan of action which would enhance the mining industry of Canada.

They are calling upon Parliament to take any action that will increase employment in this sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and essentially keep mining in Canada.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 46 and 128.

[Text]

Question No. 46—Mr. Chatters:

With respect to government funding of Indian bands, tribal councils and aboriginal/Metis organizations, (a) how many are in a deficit situation, (b) for each of them, what is the amount (i) received in the last fiscal year, (ii) of their current deficit, (iii) they will receive for the current fiscal year?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I am informed by the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Canadian Heritage as follows:

In so far as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, DIAND, is concerned:

(a) For the year ended March 31, 1993, 159 Indian bands, tribal councils and aboriginal organizations are in a deficit position.1–2

(b) With respect to the names and deficit situation of Indian bands, tribal councils and aboriginal organizations, this information is confidential third party financial information under section 20(1)(b) of the Access to Information Act and cannot be released.

1 DIAND does not fund Metis organizations. Please refer to the answer by Canadian Heritage.

2 DIAND determines a recipient's deficit position by applying an indicator of whether the recipient's cumulative deficit is greater than 8 per cent of its total revenues, one month's cashflow. Statistics are collected on this basis.

In so far as the Department of Canadian Heritage is concerned:

(a) Based on the 1992–93 audited financial statements available—48 per cent were available—27 organizations were in a deficit situation.

(b) With respect to the name and deficit situation of these organizations, this information is confidential third party financial information under section 20(1)(b) of the Access to Information Act and cannot be released.

Question No. 128—Mr. Simmons:

What action will be taken on the recommendation made by the Auditor General in his 1994 annual report that the "Ice Services Branch must ensure that its contingency plans can be put into effect quickly and successfully" in the event of systems malfunction or communications failure so as to avert any possible "rerouting or disruption of ship traffic in and out of Canadian ports or, at worst, loss of life and property?"

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Data collection buoys are stationed so that in the event of an emergency they can back each other up. These buoys are equipped with information transmission devices which ensure transmittal of all necessary information. The buoys and equipment have been designed and are situated so that, short of several stations failing at once, the ice services program will be maintained.

A complete failure of all the ice program systems at once is highly unlikely. In the event of a major catastrophe, we have an agreement with the U.S. National Ice Centre to provide essential ice information to our clients until our normal operations can be resumed. We can do the same for the U.S. We developed this backup plan over the past year and it will be tested shortly.

Once these tests have been completed, a comprehensive backup plan will be published in order that Canadians will know exactly how ice information is being provided.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Shall the remaining question stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PICTOU LANDING INDIAN BAND AGREEMENT ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–60, an act respecting an agreement between Her Majesty in right of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian Band, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): When shall the bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Irwin moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise to address the House on third and final reading of Bill C–60, the Pictou Landing Indian Band Agreement Act.

As the member of Parliament for Central Nova, on behalf of the Pictou Landing Micmac First Nations people in my riding, I thank hon. members for their support of this bill at second reading and in committee. I am certain that the more than 400 Pictou Landing Micmacs appreciate your support in helping to bring much awaited certainty to their lives.

This may appear to be a minor piece of legislation but it is very important to the First Nation concerned. Therefore it deserves quick passage through Parliament.

Bill C–60 is important for three reasons. First, the bill will ensure that claims by members of the First Nations related to the effluent treatment system at Boat Harbour are to be directed to a fund established for that purpose under the agreement. As a result it will protect both the Government of Canada and the Pictou Landing Micmac from further claims.

Second, Bill C–60 will ensure that the Pictou Landing Micmac are responsible for managing the settlement money that has been and will be paid out by the federal government.

Third, Bill C–60 will confirm that the Government of Canada intends to live up to its commitment to aboriginal people, including commitments made by previous governments.

Hon. members from all sides should recognize that the settlement agreement with the Pictou Landing Micmac is already well on its way to full and complete implementation. We are not being asked today to approve new arrangements, to make new commitments, or to break new ground. We are being asked to live up to outstanding commitments that have been made by the Government of Canada to the Pictou Landing Micmac of Nova Scotia. Living up to that commitment is very important, so important is it that this government put it in writing in an agreement.

In our red book we mapped out our intention to build new partnerships with aboriginal people. Today we are being asked to live up to that pledge, not just for the Pictou Landing Micmac but for all aboriginal people. Specifically, this bill asks us to take appropriate action to protect both the Government of Canada and the First Nation from further claims related to the Boat Harbour effluent treatment system.

Madam Speaker, let me tell you a little more about Boat Harbour back when. Imagine a picture with rolling hills dipping to the ocean, sandy beaches, boats drifting by with multitudes of fish in the ocean and majestic black cormorants nesting in Pictou Harbour. I hope this image will bring you and my hon. colleagues closer to Pictou Landing and closer to the understanding of the importance of this bill, because in spite of this picture just painted this is not the Boat Harbour that exists today.

• (1115)

For more than two decades treated effluent from Scott Pulp and Paper Mill at Abercrombie Point has been released into Boat Harbour, less than half a kilometre from the Pictou Landing Micmac community. This has had a serious and negative impact on the environment and on the quality of life on the reserve and in the surrounding communities in Pictou County.

Now Boat Harbour is an industrial effluent treatment facility operated by the province of Nova Scotia. It serves the nearby Scott Maritimes Limited kraft paper mill. Boat Harbour is adjacent to Pictou Harbour, about 150 kilometres northeast of Halifax.

The Boat Harbour holding pond was created by blocking the entrance of a former tidal estuary to the Northumberland Strait. Boat Harbour is currently surrounded by provincial crown land and the reserve lands of the Pictou Landing Micmac.

It bears repeating the First Nation was not happy about this effluent treatment system when first approached in 1966. It agreed only after intense lobbying by Nova Scotia.

The damming of Boat Harbour permanently raised the level of the harbour and flooded approximately 12 hectares of reserve land. The harbour became devoid of oxygen almost immediately after the treatment facility commenced operation.

Over the ensuing 12 years the First Nation made a number of representations to the Government of Nova Scotia seeking compensation for damage to its land and for the flooding.

Although the province made improvements to the treatment facility, it ended negotiations with the First Nation in 1982 by refusing to recognize its claim. The Pictou Landing Micmac then entered the federal government's specific claims process. In 1986 the First Nation filed suit against the federal government alleging breach of fiduciary duty.

Boat Harbour has been lost as a source of food for the Micmac. For the past 25 years this First Nation has also had to forego hunting, wildlife harvesting and other benefits on some 12 hectares of flooded reserve land.

As a result of the federal government's fiduciary responsibility to the First Nation people the government reached an out of court settlement with the First Nation that has avoided a potentially lengthy and costly legal battle. Now it rests with this hon. House to bring this chapter in the government's relations with the Pictou Landing Micmac to a close. There should be no hesitation to do so by the hon. House.

As my hon. colleague the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development pointed out at second reading, Bill C–60 is very straightforward.

The settlement agreement ratified by community members in a 141 to 25 vote in the summer of 1993 is a $35 million settlement which includes a $20 million compensation package; $8 million was earmarked to be distributed among the members of the First Nation for individual compensation. Much of this money has already been paid out; $9.725 million was placed in a continuing compensation fund to address special claims by members of the First Nation related to the Boat Harbour environmental problem; $2.275 million was allocated to support projects that would benefit the First Nation, including the building of a multi–purpose recreational centre and the establishment of a Pictou Landing economic development promotional package. This money is intended to compensate the members of the First Nation for general impact associated with the Boat Harbour facility.

The remaining $15 million in the settlement has been directed into a community development trust fund that will enable members of the First Nation to relocate if necessary. This fund is being administered by the First Nation and will ensure that the First Nation and its members will be able to protect themselves from any future health effects from Boat Harbour.

This bill accomplishes two basic objectives, both of which are in the interests of the First Nation, the federal government and the Canadian taxpayer. The first objective is to ensure that the $35 million settlement fund that has been agreed upon will be the full amount for which the Government of Canada will be liable related to the Boat Harbour effluent treatment system.

As the House has been previously informed, about 80 per cent of the settlement funds have already been transferred to the First Nation. In turn, the First Nation has paid out most of the $8 million earmarked for individual compensation to eligible members.

Any claims over and above this amount will be addressed through the $9.725 million continuing compensation fund. The Pictou Landing Micmac have also been using the $2.75 million allocated to the band compensation and development account to support projects that will benefit the entire community such as the building of a multi–purpose centre and the establishment of a Pictou Landing economic development promotional package.

These two initiatives and others pursued by the Pictou Landing Micmac will be of great benefit not only to the First Nation but to other residents of Pictou County.

Bill C–60 provides that any claims by the members of the First Nation that are not already settled by acceptance of the payments to individuals be directed to the continuing compensation fund. It will ensure that both the Government of Canada and the First Nation are protected from any such claims.

The second objective to be achieved by Bill C–60 is to stipulate that the moneys paid to the Pictou Landing Micmac under the final agreement will not be considered Indian moneys as defined by the Indian Act.

This benefits the federal government because it releases the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development from any responsibility for managing these moneys. In these times of fiscal restraint the department should avoid taking on administrative functions that can and should be performed by First Nations.

This provision of Bill C–60 benefits the First Nation because it will ensure that the Pictou Landing Micmac have complete control over their compensation dollars. This would not be possible if the moneys were considered Indian moneys as defined pursuant to the Indian Act.

This is one of the most important provisions of this bill. I have said this government is committed to fulfilling its obligations to aboriginal people. Beyond just fulfilling commitments, we want to build a new partnership, a partnership based on trust, mutual respect and participation in the decision making process.

This provision of Bill C–60 is a step toward making this goal a reality. Management of their own funds affords First Nations opportunities to chart their own course for economic development.

I am confident that my constituents, the Pictou Landing Micmac, like many First Nations across the country will prosper. The government recognizes that the untapped potential of aboriginal people is untapped for Canada. In a small way the development opportunities afforded by the provision of Bill C–60 open the door to potential.

The projects already borne from this settlement like the Pictou Landing economic development promotional package are just the beginning, a beginning not only for the First Nation but for other communities in Pictou County and in Nova Scotia as a whole.

Implementation of the Boat Harbour agreement has been proceeding well with no significant problems encountered by either party to the agreement. Nevertheless, the settlement agreement does require Canada to explore ways that might yield a solution to the environmental problem that now exists at Boat Harbour.

Toward this end several federal departments are facilitating and working with the Pictou Landing Micmac and other concerned parties to achieve the rehabilitation of Boat Harbour.

I want to advise hon. members in this House that the federal government is committed to ensuring that the clean–up of Boat Harbour meets Canada's high environmental standards. This proposed legislation will have no impact on this process.

As a party to the final agreement, the Pictou Landing Micmac have clearly indicated that they want and expect this legislation to be enacted.

• (1125)

To ensure that Bill C–60 meets with this understanding in the settlement agreement the First Nation was consulted during the drafting of the legislation. Members of the First Nation are now awaiting Parliament's decision. In making that decision I would ask my hon. colleagues to keep the crown's honour in mind.

I would ask them to remember that this legislation is the product of a clear and genuine commitment which was made at the request of the Pictou Landing Micmac more than a year ago. I would remind them that the government's word was accepted by the First Nation in good faith despite the problems it has endured over the past 25 years.

It is time to put the unfinished business behind us so that the First Nations and the federal government's energy can be devoted to building for the future rather than rectifying past mistakes. We can and must do so by giving our unanimous support to Bill C–60.

Therefore, as the member of Parliament for Central Nova I ask on behalf of my constituents, the Micmac First Nations people, for unanimous support from this honourable House for Bill C–60.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Madam Speaker, let me tell you right away that the Bloc Quebecois will be supporting this bill. As usual, I will try and explain the Micmac reality. I think it is important to give a little background because the Micmac Nation has always been recognized as a fishing nation living for the most part by rivers, lagoons or the sea.

Many people wonder about the meaning of the word "Micmac". In fact, there are two: "a nation and its language", and "my family and friends". When I travelled just recently to the Restigouche reserve, which by the way is called Listuguj, Whatever meaning you give to the word Micmac, what I saw and experienced on the reserve of which Chief Miller is the worthy representative confirms that both meanings perfectly describe the reality as I experienced it on this reserve.

I saw people bound by very strong ties of friendship. Families form a very tightly knit fabric. Micmacs are also very proud of their language. In fact, they make a point of promoting the Micmac language in schools. Micmacs have traditionally been very close to their roots and accorded great importance to their culture.

Historically, what set Micmac villages apart from others was the fact that lodgings often housed one or more families and were located by the water. The significance of this bill's impact comes from the fact that the Pictou Landing reserve was located by the water, which is essential. Naturally, all that has happened over the course of the last three decades has had a direct impact on Micmacs' lifestyle. I felt that this needed to be pointed out.

The Micmac Nation is a nation who was much affected by the arrival of Europeans. A population decline ensued. In the early days of the colony, there were about 50,000 Micmacs, as compared to a mere 10,000 registered Micmacs today. Some kind of socio–cultural conflict arose also because, for the Micmac Nation as for other aboriginal nations, exposure to the European culture did not always prove beneficial.

Socio–cultural shocks have led this nation, and others, into dire poverty. Even during British rule, efforts were made to turn Micmacs into farmers but, given their traditional way of life, these efforts failed of course. Integration attempts continued, with Micmacs being sent out to work on the railway and in logging. Finally, you realize that these people were really sincere in the importance they accorded to their culture, a culture that has not only lived on to this day but is still highly valued, while all integration attempts have failed.

Therefore, I felt it was important to present this short scenario, because the bill relates to a Micmac nation, the Pictou Landing community, which has always lived close to water. This bill deals with a specific body of water, the Boat Harbour.

The problem started when the Scott Maritimes Limited Pulp and Paper Mills settled at Abercrombie Point. As we know, pulp and paper companies tend to pollute the environment. As well, the protection of the environment was not seen as vital then as it is now. The priority was to create jobs in an area largely covered with forests. In fact, that is where the bulk of wood harvesting took place.

However, in 1965, the provincial government decided to build a waste treatment plant after realizing that the company was polluting the water. It was thought to be a good idea to set up a treatment plant to try to solve the problem. I say "to try to solve" because, as I will show in the next few minutes, that attempt unfortunately failed, with the result that lots of contaminants ended up in the water.

That plant, which was built to treat the water coming from the pulp and paper mill, created a body of water covering several acres, in the vicinity of the reserve, and even on reserve land. From the very beginning, there was a lack of movement on the government's part regarding the cleaning up of this environmental catastrophe. This is deplorable. For two decades, from 1965 to 1985, the Micmac tried to come to an amicable settlement with the federal government, which is responsible for native issues, and also with the Province of Nova Scotia, which has jurisdiction over the environment.

For almost 20 years, the Micmac tried to reach some agreement. Because nothing was being done, they finally decided, in 1986, to sue the government.

In this area, the environment has reached the critical stage in terms of its deterioration. According to some information, the level of pollution is such that it has been blamed for a number of deaths on the reserve.

Through an agreement in principle, the government proposed a financial out–of–court settlement to the Pictou Landing Indian band. That agreement in principle was reached in December 1992 and ratified in July 1993. It is a compensation agreement intended to settle out of court a suit brought by the Micmac in 1986.

The bill may look like a minor piece of legislation. There are only four clauses. Consequently, one might think that it does not deal with a complex issue. However, I know from experience that the number of clauses is no indication of how complex a piece of legislation can be. That bill may have only four clauses, but the last one refers to a specific agreement which, as I will show in a minute, is flawed in many ways. Although the bill does have some merits, as the hon. member pointed out. For instance, the money to be paid will not be money as provided under the Indian Act, which means that the community will be able to spend it as it sees fit.

This is probably one of the few positive factors I found in the bill. If we refer to the agreement as such, and there is a reference to the agreement in clause 4, we realize that it does not really deal with the environmental problem. And I am not so sure that we are doing the Pictou Landing First Nation a big favour.

Clause 4 of the bill, where we find the reference to section 13 of the agreement, mentions a compensation account. In the event of legal proceedings in the days and months to come, claims may only be made against this compensation account.

We in the Bloc Quebecois considered trying to help those who did not waive their rights, because, as I will explain later on, the people who use this compensation fund waive their right to sue the federal government, and in return, the government gives them $35 million, and I will give you a breakdown of this amount later on. In any case, at first we had some questions about section 13, because some people had not waived their rights.

What happens to those people? I will expand on this later on, but before I go any further, I would also like to thank my colleagues on the standing committee who agreed to adjourn so I could investigate this particular point, since we were not entirely satisfied with the response we got from the bureaucracy.

That day, after meeting with officials from the Department of Indian Affairs, we were supposed to adopt the bill clause by clause, but because of my questions and the response from the officials, we agreed, many thanks to my colleagues, to adjourn for two days and—it never rains but it pours—I was given a draft amendment a few minutes before the committee started a special sitting to hear the Bloc Quebecois amendment, but unfortunately, the amendment suggested by our legal expert was not quite what we had in mind. As a result, I had to go before the committee empty–handed and apologize.

We then considered introducing an amendment at the report stage, and although I did not discuss this with my colleagues on the standing committee, in the end, we decided not to introduce an amendment, after receiving additional information from the officials and getting in touch with the community of Pictou Landing.

Initially, and I will provide some details later on, we were somewhat dubious in the case of individuals who did not waive their right, about their ability to bring legal proceedings against the company or Nova Scotia, and we could perhaps discuss this later on, but meanwhile, I would like to say a word of thanks to my colleagues, because they gave me a chance to get to the bottom of this matter and do a decent job in committee, in other words, to carefully examine each clause and then decide whether or not we wanted an amendment.

I touched on this earlier, and I would just like to say, very briefly, that this is money that will not be subject to the provisions of section 35 of the Indian Act. This means the Pictou Landing community will be able to use this money as it sees fit, without being restricted by the provisions of the Indian Act.

I would now like to comment on the agreement as such, and perhaps I should point out that only $17 million remains to be paid to the community, so the rest of the money has already been paid, and that being said, I may have quite a few things to say later on about the logic of having a bill before the House today when the process has already started and all the money or almost all has been paid, so that the government is saying: I just want you to agree and adopt this bill.

It seems to me that certain elements with respect to the process of negotiation with the band must be taken into account, the government's fiduciary responsibility, the Bloc Quebecois' responsibility as the official opposition and the responsibility of the opposition parties of the time, have been overlooked. The whole thing is now presented to us as a package. Now we are faced with an alternative, that is, do we vote in favour of the bill or not. Since 95 per cent of the people in the community voted in favour, our options are somewhat limited.

So, therefore, naturally, we will support the bill without amendment. We do, however, have a few things to say about the agreement, and I think we will use this debate to express them. I said earlier that the agreement was signed on July 20, 1993 and was ratified following a referendum. At the time, 95 per cent of the people said they were in favour of it. In a minute we will have a look at why they were in favour. I have my own personal idea on the matter. In democratic terms, however, we cannot criticize the agreement as such. Given the very high rate of participation—80 per cent—and the strong vote in favour—95 per cent—, we really cannot criticize the democratic aspect of the question.

Furthermore, according to the officials we asked, the remaining 5 per cent are people registered on the list of band members, but who do not live on the reservation. We were told they could live as far away as California. There were also a number of people with intellectual handicaps, who were unable to vote because they could not understand the scope of the agreement.

I will quickly go through the agreement, section by section, to highlight certain comments that, among other things, raise doubt about the seriousness of the government's intention to really resolve the legal action issue and also the basic environmental issue.

In section 2 of the agreement, Canada agrees to pay a $35 million settlement. This amount is intended to cover compensation and to fulfil the government's fiduciary duty. Three funds have been created: one for band compensation and development, one for community development and one for individual compensation and development. I do not wish to get into the breakdown of the $35 million, so suffice it to say that the three funds exist. I will repeat throughout my speech that, in our opinion, this is not enough to compensate for the current environmental damage and the wrong done to these people.

As I have said, since 1965, it is clear that the environment has been seriously harmed by the construction of the effluent treatment facility. Over the past 30 years, the government has been slow to put facilities in place. It has somewhat neglected its fiduciary duty towards first nations because they continually protested the way they were being treated, and neither the federal nor the Nova Scotia government made many firm commitments or took much real action to correct the situation.

We can also say that the negative effects have taken on catastrophic proportions at present. Earlier, I mentioned 162 hectares. Responsibility for resolving the issue and for taking legal action is now in the government's lap. We think that the government is not only hesitating now and will be hesitant in the future to enter into legal proceedings, but that it will also eventually take legal proceedings in the event that Boat Harbour is further developed. Therefore, we have reason to doubt whether the government really has the will to really resolve the main issue.

The true problem remains the same, even with this bill, because pollution has not disappeared. All that is proposed is that some aboriginals be relocated. We might also wonder what type of land aboriginal people will be able to afford with that $35 million. And we are told that moneys have already been earmarked for purchasing this land. But will these people be better off? Unfortunately, we do not have the answer. I see this merely as an attempt to relieve the federal government of its fiduciary duty to aboriginals and to get out of a tight spot. So we have to find out whether the move will solve the problem.

I also know that the governments of Canada and Nova Scotia are trying to assess the issue of environment versus employment. One cannot deny that Scott Paper creates a lot of jobs in Nova Scotia. We also know that this community suffers from a high rate of unemployment. So can we afford to say to this company, given the present situation, that standards will be set so high, that we will allow so many suits that, in the end, it will have to close its doors and lay off a lot of employees?

We are caught in this tension between the environment and employment. I understand that employment was easily given higher priority than the environment at the time. But, for several years now, there seems to have been increasing concern over the environment. So the debate or tension between the environment and employment remains unresolved. And for our part, we can see that the government has decided to give priority to employment over the environment.

I would like to move on to section 5 now. In this section, one begins to see the Canadian government's position in the matter. The agreement was reached in December 1992 and ratified in July 1993. Even before the agreement was signed, each band member had received $2,000. This, in itself, is a clear indication of the government's approach to the matter.

Even before an agreement had been reached, even before a bill had been introduced, the government had already started with its hand–outs. We have to realize also that the Micmac Indians on that reserve live in appalling conditions, as practically none of them have jobs. Their environment is heavily polluted and, after 30 years, they are sick and tired of negotiating or trying to negotiate with the government. They have to set money aside to set up a fund to pursue their case against the government. It is in such a context that they are presented with a nice cheque for $2,000 and told: This is a first instalment, you will get more, probably as much, but first of all you must relinquish your right to sue. You sign away that right and the federal government will give you $2,000.

We can see why these people would jump at this offer, it is a ray of hope, a chance to improve their situation. Not only were they given a cheque for $2,000, but individuals were promised an additional amount of $1,500 upon signing the agreement in principle. Except that the parliamentary process was conveniently forgotten. This was done without us, we were informed only when the bill was tabled and, today, we are asked to approve a bill implementing this agreement. I find this approach questionable.

This is an approach that we consider paternalistic. It is like saying: We have been negligent, but we are going to make up for it, we are going to give you some money and you forget about the whole thing. With this money you will be able to move elsewhere. We, as a government, are not going to restore the environment, but neither are we going to launch any lawsuit against you. People who sign and take the money must sign an undertaking not to sue the government of Canada or of Nova Scotia or the company. Everybody involved in that mess is getting off scotfree. They did not act responsibly and now people have to take the money because they are in dire straits.

This is a paternalistic approach. We find this kind of approach questionable, at best. In short, band members had already received money, $2,000 in December 1991, and $1,500 in December 1992, before the agreement was signed, and now the government confronts them with a fait accompli.

Before I became a parliamentarian I was, among others things, a negotiator for twenty years or so. This is a well known fact in negotiating circles: when one of the parties to the negotiations is in a very weakened position—negotiating being basically a power struggle—it is easy to promise things, give them systematically and then say to this party: Now, all you have to do is to sign this form and all your problems will be solved.

Everything was done very quickly, in a paternalistic manner, and the environmental issue has not been settled. The whole process is highly questionable.

The agreement provides for a period of prescription; that is to say that individuals have up to two years after the signing of the agreement to decide whether to give up their rights and be entitled to this famous compensation fund, or not to give them up. According to the interpretation given by officials, these individuals are going to be caught between a rock and a hard place, because it will be extremely difficult to challenge the legislation on account of section 13 which creates a further impediment, with respect to individual rights, for people wanting to appeal to the courts. As I said before, it is this particular point we find extremely questionable.

Thus, this prescription period will come into effect in July of this year. Then, not only will the people have not taken advantage of this find it difficult to start legal proceedings but they will no longer have access to the compensation fund. They will be left with nothing at all.

Other sections as well are a little disturbing. The federal government is getting out from under any future fiduciary duties or obligations towards the community with regard to the risks associated with the facilities. It not only said that you are released of responsibilities, of prosecutions concerning the environment, but that, in the future, if the company decides to pollute even more, the government will assume these responsibilities and thus release individuals from them.

We see that the environment has been greatly deteriorating for almost 30 years and we recognize that this could continue in the future and that the federal government is released of all future responsibilities. I think that this is prejudicial enough to the environment to be mentioned.

Section 7 stipulates the responsibilities of the chief and his or her council with regard to the management of the money received. I agree that the $35 million received are not native moneys but one has to realize that the band and the chief must meet certain requirements. This money is not given unconditionally, to be spent however they wish.

In section 8, the government recognizes that Canada's current position is that it is not at all sure that Boat Harbour will be brought back to its natural condition, that is, the condition it was in before 1965. The government itself admits that it is not sure this can be done. But the government of Canada is committed to exploring possible ways of dealing with the environmental problem.

We have to take a good look at the words that are used. The government will explore possible ways of dealing with the problem. There are other words to which I would like to draw your attention. The government of Canada may undertake, at its sole discretion, reasonable action that it deems necessary. As a negotiator, I could not accept that such vague words as "at its sole discretion" and "reasonable action" be included in an agreement, especially since it is the government itself which must decide what constitutes reasonable action.

There are some flaws in the agreement and we feel that it is important for us to inform you of these flaws and to tell you that, unfortunately, it is a done deal and that this agreement must now be justified. We will not keep our mouths shut. We will denounce all these flaws. I hope the government will take my comments into account so that things are done differently in the future.

Section 9 deals with the creation of a committee on environmental issues composed of three members from the Micmac community and three members appointed by the government of Canada. It says further on that the number could increase with the agreement of both parties. What does that mean? It means that, eventually, the government of Nova Scotia could be represented on this committee and so could the main pulp and paper company, thereby diluting native participation. It is something to be cautious about. Fortunately, both parties concerned have to agree to this.

I have no advice to give. I think that people are mature enough, but personally, if I were on the aboriginal side, I would maintain my participation on the committee at 50 per cent and would not agree to the addition of other members, who would reduce my impact. Just a warning in passing, but a necessary one.

Section 12 provides that all members that have received moneys must automatically renounce completely any present or future claims. Thus, anyone accepting money, who has recourse to the compensation account, agrees not to take any action regarding past or future events. The danger is that the Scott Paper company will feel it is off the hook, that it will continue to pollute—I know that jobs are involved—but the difficulty, however, is that none of the compensation money has been set aside for the environment.

After all, this is a company that is providing employment, even if it hardly gets full marks for its environmental performance. In my view, this company does not even get a passing mark. So, in exchange for an amount of money, the members of the community must forever agree not to take any action against the federal government, Nova Scotia, or the company.

In fact, all rights to take legal action are transferred to the federal government, in the terms I mentioned earlier, at the discretion of the government, reasonable action, as decided by the federal government. One is left to wonder if the federal government is going to take its environmental responsibilities seriously, and I must admit that I have not yet ruled out the possibility of pointing out to my colleague from Laurentides, the environment critic, that there is a major environmental issue at stake here of which she should be aware. As I was saying, if the company decides to step up production, thereby increasing pollution, it is a great pity, but there is almost no conceivable way of stopping it at the present time.

As for section 13, I probably raised the question with officials and was told that my question was perhaps not clear the first time. After reading the committee blues once again, I realize that the question was clear enough and that the official probably changed his mind in the meantime. But section 13 only refers to the compensation account. Those who relinquished their rights have already dipped into the compensation account. Those who do not give up their rights by the July 1995 deadline I mentioned earlier can access the compensation account but, according to lawyers, the department and, after checking with the band, the Indians themselves, no one can get around this account.

Therefore, band members who have decided not to give up their rights will be forced eventually to use the compensation account, with little or no recourse against the different levels of government or the company. The purpose of the compensation account is to settle past and future bills, but it will be the only money offered by the government.

The federal government must have thought: "I will pay $35 million to settle past and future debts, and that is how I will discharge my fiduciary responsibility toward the Pictou Landing Indians." In a nutshell, I think that is what the government attempted to do. No one, I think, could circumvent the provisions in this bill and say, "I will go further by launching a personal lawsuit for, say, $10 million". People will always be brought back to the compensation account, which is a major obstacle to taking individual legal action. If I were in the shoes of someone who did not give up his rights, I would see if I could sue under the constitution.

I know that this would be an additional obstacle, but I think that individuals can probably still sue. However, the clause I have just read to you will certainly be used by crown attorneys to bring people back to the compensation fund.

In conclusion, there are positive elements in the agreement. This money will be exempt from the Indian Act. However, this approach is highly questionable from a regulatory and parliamentary standpoint. On one hand, the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia have let the situation deteriorate for 30 years. The federal government has neglected its fiduciary role for 30 years. It takes action only when the damage is done and almost irreversible.

It entices the natives knowing full well that they are living in miserable conditions. It waves this $2,000 cheque at them and promises another $1,500 will be paid if the agreement is signed. It tells the band: "You will have a compensation account. You will have up to $35 million to relocate and start up new projects." Given their living conditions, this offer is so tempting that I can see why they jump at it. The approach is paternalistic. Any right to sue is taken away in a context where the scope is so broad and the words used so vague that nothing stops the government from doing absolutely nothing and letting the situation deteriorate if it so pleases. Finally, the government comes up with this bill when all is settled.

When I say that all is settled, I mean that the agreement was signed and money paid. The band already committed itself. It is all done. The only thing left to do is for us to put our seal of approval on the whole thing.

Regarding the settlement process and the parliamentary process, we express serious concerns. Sadly, we have been put in front of a fait accompli. We will go along with the referendum decision whereby a 95 per cent majority approved the agreement as is, but I would like to make a suggestion to the government. It would be interesting if any new claim settlement—and I am convinced there will be more, given the number of reserves in Canada—be subjected to a regulatory process and a slightly more democratic parliamentary process, so that we are not put in front of a fait accompli again. You just cannot come and tell us: "See, it is all settled; all you have to do is to pass the bill".

As I said, this bill looks quite innocuous with just four clauses, but it has impacts and effects on Pictou Landing. Let me wrap up. Based on the background I gave you earlier, we can assume that people who have probably lived by that this stretch of water now have to relocate on land that—I hope, with $35 million—will allow them to maintain their traditions and culture. These people depend on fishing for their livelihood and survival.

While deploring the regulatory and parliamentary process, the Bloc Quebecois will support the bill in consideration of the decision made by Pictou Landing and the aboriginal people who live there to approve the agreement as it stands.

[English]

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the member for Central Nova in whose riding is the Pictou Landing band. I also enjoyed the speech of the Bloc member for Saint-Jean. However, if it had not been for the opening and closing statements, I would not know which way he would be voting.

It is a pleasure to have an opportunity to say a few words at third reading of Bill C-60, the Pictou Landing Indian Band Agreement Act. The legislation has received due consideration at second reading and careful review in committee. I thank the departmental officials who have provided us with a cogent and detailed explanation.

While my party and I had some concerns, particularly over ratification of an agreement after payment of $28 million of the $35 million package has already been made, we support the intent of the legislation.

I will give a quick background. In 1966 the crown failed to provide or to obtain the band's informed consent to transfer to the province of Nova Scotia its riparian rights on the Boat Harbour tidal estuary. This transfer permitted the province to operate Boat Harbour as a facility to treat effluent from the kraft mill owned by Scott Industries Maritime Limited.

In July 1992 the government approved a mandate to negotiate an out of court settlement of the lawsuit. It was ratified by vote on July 5, 1993. The final agreement was signed on July 20, 1993. That was under the previous administration.

• (1205)

The final agreement provides that the band gives Canada a release from responsibility and liability for past, present and future effects related to the Boat Harbour effluent treatment system in exchange for compensation to the Pictou Landing band. As I mentioned previously, the total compensation was $35 million of which the band received $28 million at the end of April 1994 and will receive the remainder in April 1995.

The one outstanding question in my mind is: What has taken so long to bring the bill forward? I have asked the question and I have yet to receive a satisfactory answer.

There are two critical issues addressed in the legislation. First it will ensure that all future claims by members of the First Nations in that area will be directed to an established fund that the bill provides. This means that no further claims can be made against the crown in this instance. This is critical to me and my party. We therefore are satisfied with that arrangement.

Second, Bill C–60 provides that the Pictou Landing Micmac band is responsible for managing and disseminating the settlement money provided, a total of $35 million, $20 million of which will go to pay out claims to the band and to individual members. The remainder, $15 million, shall be used to pay band members to relocate should it become necessary. Once the allotment has been used, the band has no further recourse against the crown for further financial compensation.

Having addressed the two operative principles of the bill, I want to add that it is my hope the $20 million will help deliver the band to self–sufficiency. We feel that every agreement the government signs should ultimately bring more self–sufficiency to the band.

The Reform Party supports the conclusion of outstanding claims. The Pictou claim is a consequence of the non–fulfilment by the government of an obligation arising from the improper administration of reserve lands by the department. This breach of fiduciary responsibility and duty has now been settled.

I am confident members of the Pictou band will manage this settlement responsibly and I wish them well.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.)

FIREARMS ACT

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.) moved that Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, may I say that I consider it a privilege to lead off debate at second reading on this important piece of legislation and to urge the House to adopt the legislation in principle before sending it to the standing committee for detailed consideration.

If I may, I would propose to begin my treatment of the legislation today by speaking about matters of principle that motivate the government in preparing and presenting this legislation: objectives, ideals and values.

The government suggests that the object of the regulation of firearms should be the preservation of the safe, civilized and peaceful nature of Canada.

While there are many reasons we respect and admire our neighbours to the south and value our unique relationship with them, there are also aspects of the American way of life that we see as very different from what we want for ourselves. Perhaps chief among them is the way in which firearms are regulated and used.

It is said that there are over 200 million firearms in private ownership in the United States of America, including tens of millions of handguns, with varying levels of regulation, but generally in a context in which the private use of firearms is acknowledged, recognized and even in some places encouraged including for self–protection.

It seems to me and to the government that we do not want that for ourselves. We do not want to live in a country in which people feel they want or need to possess a firearm for protection. That is the first principle we take as a guiding principle for the preparation of legislation in terms of the regulation of firearms.

A second principle is that if we are to retain our safe and peaceful character as a country we should signal in every possible way that we will not tolerate and we will severely punish the use of firearms in the commission of crime. Those who take up a firearm to threaten others, to rob or to assault must know that by choosing to use a firearm they are making an important decision about a large part of the rest of their lives. The punishment must be certain and must be significant.

Those who smuggle guns, those who traffic in illegal firearms, those who profit by putting guns into the hands of criminals must know that the penalties for such misconduct will be swift and will be certain. That is the second principle we take as governing or guiding the preparation of legislation as it relates to firearms.

A third principle is that we must acknowledge and respect the legitimate uses of firearms. We should acknowledge and respect the history and tradition of hunting, not only as a favourite pastime in many parts of Canada but as a very important economic activity contributing directly to the prosperity of a number of regions throughout Canada. We must acknowledge and respect the use of firearms for ranching or hunting purposes where firearms are a tool, an implement used by the proprietor of business to get by. We must allow for that. We must not interfere with that unduly.

May I say as well that we must acknowledge that some people enjoy collecting firearms. Some people enjoy the shooting sports. Indeed, Canada has achieved distinction internationally through the skill of those athletes who train and excel at sport shooting. We must acknowledge and respect that interest and that skill. But those legitimate interests, while they are acknowledged and respected, must be carried on in a context that is consistent with public safety.

Consequently, Canadians firmly intend to safeguard and to reinforce the exceptional civility which has always been theirs. The legislative and political program entitled "Safe Home Safe Street" is testimony of this government's commitment.

[English]

These are the elements of the legislation that we bring forward today as Bill C–68: First, tough measures to deal with the criminal misuse of firearms; second, specific penalties to punish those who would smuggle illegal firearms; and third, measures overall to provide a context in which the legitimate use of firearms can be carried on in a manner consistent with public safety. In all of that, the universal registration of firearms is a fundamental strategy, a fundamental support system to allow us to achieve the objectives I have described.

I know that for many members and for many Canadians the prospect of universal registration is the aspect of this legislation which is the most controversial. In the months I have spent travelling the country and speaking with those who own, use and enjoy firearms lawfully, I have been told by many that they see registration as a point on which they are going to differ with this government.

May I deal directly with the issue of registration and how it is going to enable us to achieve the objectives of a safe and peaceful society, a more effective response to the criminal misuse of firearms and enhanced public safety.

I will begin with the proposition that we live in a society in which all manner of property is licensed, registered or regulated in some way. All manner of activities are regulated either by legislation or administrative action to achieve a level of orderliness which is desirable in a civilized society. In that context, where cars, pets, and property of all description are registered or recorded for purposes of tracing ownership or reflecting transfers, surely the prospect of registering firearms is rationally justified by a society that wants to achieve a level of order.

What is the connection between registration on the one hand and the efforts of police to fight crime on the other, or trying to achieve a safer society? From my inquiries, from everything I have read and all the discussions I have had, both with law enforcement officers and with members of the firearms community themselves, it seems to me that criminals derive their firearms from the underground market. They do not register their firearms. They do not buy them at a local dealership, fill out the forms, apply for the firearms acquisition certificate, take the courses or pay the fees. Criminals acquire their firearms in the underground market illegally.

Those who engage in street crime tap into a market that is fed from one of two sources: guns that are smuggled into Canada and therefore are here illegally, or guns that are stolen from lawful owners and then traded in the underground.

Suppose you are inclined to use a gun in a holdup or an assault. You can go to one of Canada's major cities and, out of the trunk of a car, behind an after hours club, or on the second floor of a certain downtown hotel, or at a suburban house, if you know someone who knows someone, you can by one of these guns illegally and put it to a criminal use.

Surely we must choke off the sources of supply for that underground market. Surely we must reduce the number of firearms smuggled into the country. Surely we must cut down on the number of firearms stolen and traded in the underground. How do we achieve that? Through registration.

The registration of all firearms will enable us to do a better job at the borders. We will never stop the smuggling of firearms entirely. There are 130 million border crossings a year. We cannot stop every vehicle and check every trunk and glove compartment. But we can do a better job than we have done in the past and registration will enable us to do it.

Last year approximately 375,000 firearms came into Canada. Almost all guns sold here are imported. We do not know where they are or how they got here. There is no control once they arrive. We know that guns leak from shipments that come in lawfully. Just last week in Toronto there was an arrest of someone who had been illegally selling guns that were legally imported.

Registration will enable us to record what arrives and track it to the point of sale into the hands of a lawful owner. Registration will enable us to stop the kind of leakage that now occurs, to reduce the incidence of people illegally selling that which is legally imported.

Along with other measures that the government proposes in relation to border controls, including enhanced inspection and enforcement, registration will enable us to address one of the two principal sources of guns for the criminal market in the underground.

As to the second source of guns, those stolen from lawful owners, last year approximately 3,800 firearms were lost or stolen by those who lawfully own them in Canada. In the years since 1974 a cumulative total of 65,000 firearms have been stolen or lost and not recovered.

What does this have to do with registration? The police contend, and I accept it as a matter of logic, that registration which obligates each of us to record the fact of our ownership of firearms will imbue the owners with a heightened sense of responsibility to comply with laws already on the books mandating safe storage. These might involve locking the triggers, keeping the ammunition separate, or keeping the firearms themselves in a locked case.

With compliance with those safe storage requirements the incidence of firearms being stolen, of someone breaking and entering into a person's house and finding a shotgun leaning against the closet wall or a handgun in the bedside table will diminish. A second important source for criminals and guns will be addressed.

There is more. Registration will reduce crime and better equip the police to deal with crime in Canadian society by providing them with information they often need to do their job. Let me provide a practical example for my colleagues in the House.

Two weeks ago in Victoria when I met with provincial and territorial ministers of justice, we talked about a number of amendments to the Criminal Code that might make it more effective. One of them had to do with criminal harassment or so–called stalking.

It was suggested an improvement might be to add to the panoply of penalties the court can impose when convicting a person of criminal harassment, an order prohibiting them from possessing firearms because we would be dealing now with someone who had been convicted of a crime which too often leads to violence.

That suggestion was made in the context of ministers, not all of whom agreed with universal registration. But when the question was asked: Assuming that we have an order against someone made by the court forbidding them from possessing firearms because they have been convicted of criminal harassment, how will we enforce that order? How will we know that all of the person's firearms have been surrendered? How will the police know what firearms to look for when they arrive to enforce the order?

Mandatory registration will provide a basis upon which the police can enforce that kind of order, which is commonly made in the courts when people have been convicted of such offences.

I have said in the House in the past and rely heavily upon the fact that preponderantly the police are in favour of universal registration. We can quibble about individual officers. I know it is not unanimous. However, the chiefs have been vigorously pressing for this legislation for many years.

The Canadian Police Association, through its executive, is supportive of these measures. Police forces and boards across the country are encouraging us to proceed with this legislation. I know there are police officers who see it differently, but preponderantly the police forces are in favour of these measures.

Victims groups, including CAVEAT, urge us to have universal registration. Priscilla de Villiers, the president of CAVEAT, lost a daughter in a dreadful tragedy. She was murdered by a man in respect of whom the police had investigations concerning firearms.

In the Jonathon Yeo case there was an inquest into Nina de Villiers' death. After spending months looking at the facts of that case, the jury at that inquest recommended universal registration of all firearms. Priscilla de Villiers has spoken out strongly in favour of that measure, explaining her conviction that it will help the police to deal with crime.

The point is broader still. Registration will assist us to deal with the scourge of domestic violence. Statistics demonstrate that every six days a woman is shot to death in Canada, almost always in her home, almost always by someone she knows, almost always with a legally owned rifle or shotgun. This is not a street criminal with a smuggled handgun at the corner store. This is an acquaintance, a spouse or a friend in the home.

What does this have to do with registration? Domestic violence by its very nature is episodic and incremental. Typically, somewhere along the line the court has made an order barring the aggressor from possessing firearms. When the police try to enforce that order, just as in the case of stalking, they do not know whether they have been successful or not. They do not know what firearms are there.

When firearms are registered, if it is necessary for a person to register and show proof of registration to buy ammunition, as it will be, the police will know what firearms are there. The police will be able to enforce those orders and lives will be saved.

Suicides and accidents provide another example. Last year, of the 1,400 people who died by firearms in Canada, 1,100 were suicides. I know there are those who say that suicide by its nature will result in death no matter what controls are in place if the person is determined to take his or her life. No doubt that point has some force. However, too many of those suicides were by young people acting in a moment of anguish, acting impulsively because of a failed relationship, difficulty in the home, or problems at school.

If a firearm is not readily available, lives can be saved. If registration, as the police believe, will encourage owners to store firearms safely so those impulsive acts are less likely, the result may be different.

In the years since 1970, some 470 children have died in Canada as a result of accidents with firearms. If we can achieve safer storage through registration, if registration will provide us with a tool by which we can identify firearms owners, educate them about their obligations for safe storage and encourage them to comply, children's lives could be saved. Against this background what are the objections to registration? It is said that it will be unduly costly, both to the government and to the firearms' owners. Let us examine that contention, first, with respect to the government.

We have provided our estimate of the cost of implementing universal registration over the next five years. We say that it will cost $85 million. We have also said that we will put before the parliamentary committee, on which all parties sit, details of those calculations showing our assumptions and how we arrived at those figures. We encourage the members opposite to examine our estimates. We are confident we will demonstrate that the figures are realistic and accurate.

In so far as the cost to firearms' owners is concerned, the system of registration that we envisage if this legislation is enacted would commence next year with the registration of owners. Those who own firearms would be asked within five years to pick up a card, conveniently available in their communities, to identify themselves by name and address and to return it. They would then be sent a permit or a licence to own a firearm. In the first year of the five–year implementation period we expect that the cost to the firearms owner would be zero. If it is not zero, it would be a nominal amount in the range of $10.

The second phase of registration, the registration of the firearms themselves, would commence two years later in January 1998. Again firearms owners would be asked to fill out a card, which they would pick up in their communities, identify their firearms by make, model and serial number, to return it and we will send them a registration certificate for their firearms. Once again, this would be phased in over five years from 1998. Once again, in the first year of implementation, the cost would be zero, or if not zero a nominal amount in the range of $10 to register up to 10 firearms.

If we contrast the relative convenience of such a system—all we are asking of firearms owners is to fill out two cards and mail them in—with the advantages that responsible people say we will achieve through such a system, it seems that on any cost–benefit analysis registration is justified.

It is said that such a system will be complex and bureaucratic. Surely it is evident from the description which I have given that it will be just the opposite. We can take the opportunity of designing and implementing such a system in collaboration with provincial authorities, with the input of the firearms groups to eliminate irritants, to overcome paperwork burden, to simplify and streamline the system so that all of our objectives can be achieved at the same time.

It is crucially important, in my judgment, that as we debate this question of registration, in respect of which there are strongly held views on both sides, that we do so on the real facts. Let us confine ourselves to the reality of the situation. Let us not hear that the registration system will cost $100 per firearm. Let us not hear that it is a prelude to the confiscation by the government of hunting rifles and shotguns. Let us not contend that it will cost $1.5 billion to put in place.

That is the way to distort the discussion. That is the way to frighten people. Surely this debate must be carried out on the real facts. When the real facts are addressed it seems clear that the objectives of which I spoke at the outset can be achieved while respecting the legitimate uses of firearms. This can surely be done without imposing unduly on firearms owners through the introduction of universal registration for the reasons I have described.

So far as crime is concerned, the House will know from statements made earlier that the legislation contemplates a toughening of the penalties of the criminal misuse of firearms. It contemplates a change in the structure of the code to overcome the plea bargaining of charges relating to the use of firearms so that the penalties will be woven directly into the sections which provide for the offences themselves.

I have discussed with my provincial and territorial counterparts their collaboration in an effort to ensure that the laws we write in the Criminal Code will be enforced as such in the courts and that the attorneys general of the provinces will instruct crown attorneys, in any case in which the facts justify them, to seek the penalties that are included in this legislation as deterrents to the criminal misuse of firearms.

In the course of the work that I did in response to the Prime Minister's request that I prepare this legislation, I met with over 150 national and regional organizations of firearms owners and users. I met with hunters, farmers, target shooters, collectors, skeet shooters and athletes who achieved distinction for Canada in the Commonwealth and Olympic Games. I met with the Shooting Federation of Canada. I met with all manner of local hunting and outdoors and wilderness clubs.

I want the House to know that I listened and I learned from that process. Elements of this package were changed substantially, moulded specifically, on what I heard from firearms owners.

For one thing, the House will see in Bill C–68 that we not only intend changes to the Criminal Code to toughen the sanctions but we also contemplate a separate statute called the Firearms Act to deal with the regulatory aspects in relation to firearms acquisition, use and ownership.

This is intended to meet the longstanding complaint from firearms owners that they were offended by having to consult the Criminal Code to determine the manner in which their private ownership of firearms was to be regulated.

I was asked why it was necessary to combine the regulation of private ownership of firearms with the criminal law. I responded by removing those elements from the code and embodying them in a separate statute called the Firearms Act.

There were also suggestions early on calling for the central storage of firearms or urban gun free zones. From my consultation with the firearms community I learned that such proposals were impractical and they were not pursued.

At the outset the government was urged to ban all handguns. We were told that three–quarters of Canadians, and indeed the majority of firearms owners, believed that all handguns in private ownership should be banned. We did not do that.

In the course of my meetings with the firearms groups, I was very much impressed with the ardour with which many Canadians approach the target shooting sports. They are highly skilled people, very law–abiding, conscientious in their pastimes and their hobbies. These Canadians want to continue in those sports.

Therefore this legislation acknowledges and allows those sports to continue. What we have done is remove from circulation over time, and to ban immediately after the enactment of the legislation, the importation and sale of those handguns inappropriate for target or sport shooting, the so–called Saturday night specials. These handguns are by their design and characteristics suitable for concealment, inexpensive to buy, easy to trade in the underground and not appropriate for target shooting because of their lack of accuracy.

We have also made it clear that for those who own handguns in the banned or prohibited categories, such owners will be able to use them in accordance with the requalification requirements in the statute and trade them to and from others in the same class. Consequently complaints that we were affecting the property value of owners' investments have been addressed.

May I also emphasize that as this bill goes to committee following second reading debate, it will go with my request that the committee look at specific changes in the law. First of all, to ensure that we are accommodating all of those sporting competitions with handguns, we have already made it clear that the .22–.32 calibre Walther used by Linda Thom at the 1984 Olympics will not be covered by the ban. We want the committee to take the advice of the International Shooting Union to determine whether there are other handguns that should be exempted so that legitimate sporting activities will not be threatened.

Second, I will ask the committee to examine the question whether there are black powder shooting events that might be affected by this legislation. It is not our intention in any way to limit historical re–enactments with the use of reproductions. We do not believe we have done that but we will ask the committee to look specifically at that question and to let us know whether additional technical amendments are required to make the meaning clear.

Third, we will ask the committee to look at the question of relics and heirlooms, recognizing that there are families and individuals who want to pass on to the next generation firearms that they have acquired and that have a specific sentimental or historical value to the family. That should be respected. We will ask the committee to fashion a way to allow it to happen consistently with the imperatives of public safety.

May I also observe that the introduction of universal registration will allow a rational way to control access to ammunition so that those who wish to buy ammunition will have to establish that they are properly registered to have and use a firearm.

Last, may I refer to the aboriginal communities who during the period of consultation were insistent that we respect, first, their treaty rights and second, their traditional and community way of life.

The firearms legislation will apply to aboriginal communities in exactly the same way as it applies to everyone else. The principles are identical. However, we have undertaken to respect treaty rights. We believe that this legislation is consistent with treaty rights because it is no more than the regulation by the federal government of hunting and other activities.

An hon. member: Two classes of Canadians.

Mr. Rock: Not two classes. Furthermore, we believe that this legislation can be implemented in a way that is sensitive to the traditional way of life of aboriginal people, that its administration can be decentralized to the community. We are committed to working with the aboriginal communities across Canada to ensure that happens.

From time to time issues and questions arise which permit the legislature of a country to define what kind of future it wants for the country. It seems to me that on the subject of the regulation of firearms we have just such an issue. We have an opportunity for Parliament to make a statement about the kind of Canada that we want for ourselves and for our children, about the efforts we are prepared to make to ensure the peaceful and civilized nation that we have and enjoy and to demonstrate just who is in control of firearms in Canada. Is it the gun lobby or is it the people of this country?

Much reference is made in the House on the subject of polls. It was not polls that inspired this legislation. This legislation is based on the principles and objectives that I described at the outset. However, polls are useful from time to time to remind us just where the people stand on these issues. There is no doubt that these proposals enjoy the support of the vast majority of Canadians, rural and urban, in every region of the country. They see this legislation as an opportunity for us to make exactly the kind of statement I referred to about the kind of country we want, the kind of future we want and just how firearms should be acquired and used in Canada.

I commend this legislation to the House. I invite its attention to the principles of which we speak and I ask for the support of the House for those principles.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Madam Speaker, at last we have a bill on gun control, and we are very pleased. It was high time the Minister of Justice tabled his plan of action in the form of a bill. We are delighted to proceed with the real debate. No more delays, no more conferences and consultations. Now the debate can start on Bill C–68, which is supposed to be an innovative piece of legislation.

We in the official opposition are aware of the concerns of a public that is disturbed, and rightly so, about the proliferation of firearms and the shocking number of deaths caused by these weapons.

• (1245)

We do not criticize just for the sake of criticizing, although the Minister of Justice does not seem to agree. Our criticism is constructive. Basically, we support legislation that will tighten gun control.

Right from the start, I would like to stress the attitude of the Minister of Justice during the debate on gun control. It is always a pleasure to watch a politician who sticks to his guns.

That being said, although the Minister of Justice is to be commended, Bill C–68 is not a panacea. It will not deal with all the problems out there. In fact, I am not so much worried about what the bill contains as about what it does not contain. I will expand on this in a few minutes.

I can hardly ignore the behaviour of the minority pro–gun lobby, a minority that managed to give the impression that its extreme position is widely shared. The pro–gun lobby and their Reform Party friends have been piling on the speeches. They would have us believe that more is better. The warm welcome they gave the Minister of Justice when he visited Calgary says a lot about their allegiance and their cynical attitudes. Threats of civil disobedience, the sacrosanct right to own firearms and individual and collective rights are all part of their rallying cry.

They want the public to believe that a bill on gun control is worthy of a dictator like Stalin, Hitler or Pol Pot. I even received a communication in my office in Ottawa, with a list attached of countries where genocide had been practised and the dates on which gun control legislation had come into effect in those countries.

These fervent supporters of the right to bear arms were trying to establish a link between gun control and the genocides that have tarnished the history of mankind. This is pretty sad. I never saw such a total lack of intellectual honesty. These people should be ashamed of spreading such monstrous lies. To claim that the Armenian genocide was a direct consequence of gun control legislation that came into effect 40 years earlier is not only absurd but insane.

I agree that these individuals are not representative of the majority of those who object to all forms of gun control. Reform Party members should check their ranks and flush out the extremists. Some spring cleaning would be in order.

I come back to the bill before us today. In the fall we criticized it and, again today, we decry the minister's hesitation. Since the minister has been promising us legislation on arms control for such a long time, we were expecting something more complete, I can assure you.

The Minister of Justice wanted to win everyone over by giving something to each of them. Reformers, the gun lobby, and a number of colleagues of the Minister of Justice are delighted with the increase in the minimum sentences for crimes committed with guns and the fact that current firearms owners have almost eight years' grace to comply with the requirements of the national registration system the government is proposing today.

Let us have a closer look at who should be celebrating: the gun lobby or those in favour of stricter arms.

First, the bill proposes major changes to the Criminal Code. In terms of sentences, the bill increases from one year to four years the minimum sentence an individual must serve for committing a crime with a firearm. The present section 85 of the Criminal Code provides for a minimum sentence of one year for anyone using a firearm to commit a criminal act.

The problem with section 85 is that only a third of the charges made under this section result in convictions. Lawyers on a case will use this section most of the time for plea bargaining. The Crown is satisfied with the few convictions, because, in return, it obtains a guilty plea for the principal offence, such as robbery or sexual assault.

The bill does not resolve this de facto situation. Minimum sentences are increased, but there is no mechanism to force lawyers to stop bargaining for guilty pleas. In addition, judges, generally, tend to follow a principle of combining the number of years a defendant has to serve. Nothing in the bill will change this practice.

I would even bet that they will continue to do it and in this way reduce the length of the sentence for major offences. In real terms, there may be no significant increase in the actual number of years that the person will have to serve. However, if judges stop giving concurrent jail sentences, the increase in the jail population could become another problem area. I will come back to this later.

Finally, section 85 is modified by the addition of a list of 10 violent offences which will be covered by the provision. We wonder whether the government really was serious when it drew up this list. Manslaughter, an unpremeditated crime, is on the list. However, armed assault is not. Does that mean that the punishment will be the same, whether or not the victim survives the assault? Forcible confinement is not on the list, but kidnapping and hostage are.

I also really have doubts about whether the increase in the minimum sentence provided for in section 85 will be a deterrent. I would like to point out that a working paper on section 85, in particular, and on minimum sentences, in general, prepared by the department of justice concluded that for the most part, the public does not know which offences have a mandatory minimum sentence.

In addition, the same document, which the Minister of Justice should have analyzed more thoroughly, also concludes that mandatory minimum sentences are very weak deterrents and have little impact on the incidence of major crimes. Robbery is an excellent example. Even worse, apparently juries are less inclined to render a guilty verdict if they know that the accused will have to serve a mandatory sentence for the offence.

Assuming that judges will not apply the principle of adding up the total number of years for multiple offences, prison populations will increase substantially as a result. Indeed, the minimum sentence of four years would be served after any other sentence imposed by the judge.

The Minister of Justice seems to believe, naively, that detention centres could accommodate this increase in the number of prisoners. He claims that the deterrence effect of his bill would lower the number of firearms offences. There is no way of knowing the impact of his reform bill on the number of future convictions.

We must bear in mind that a chain is only as strong as its weakest link. If the minister wishes to increase minimum sentences stipulated under section 85 of the Criminal Code, he must realize that prison populations will increase thereby and that we do not have the necessary infrastructure to accommodate these new prisoners.

Let us turn our attention to the warning issued by Professor Pierre Landreville of the Université de Montréal. In an article published in Le Devoir of December 23, Mr. Landreville explains the danger of such legislation, and I quote: "Some 1,500 persons are convicted each year in Quebec and could possibly be given a minimum sentence of four years in addition to the sentence for the major offence. The population of Quebec penitentiaries, currently about 4,000 prisoners, would nearly double in the first four years after implementation of this measure".

If prison populations increase, so too will the related costs.

Will the minister honestly tell taxpayers how much his reform will cost us, knowing that, just to keep a prisoner in jail, it cost on average, in 1992–93, $56,000 in a maximum security facility and $36,000 in a medium security one? Can the pro–gun lobby still say it is satisfied with the increase in the minimum sentence stipulated in section 85?

Moreover, for those of us in favour of gun control, can we claim this as a victory? Certainly not. The bill establishes a separate piece of legislation providing for a licensing system regarding the possession and use of firearms, and a national system for the registration of all firearms. Non–compliance with the provisions dealing with licensing and registration will be an offence under the Criminal Code. Going against the wishes of several of his Liberal colleagues, the justice minister decided to maintain sanctions in the bill.

Moreover, Bill C–68 provides for new offences and hefty penalties for the illegal importing of firearms and gun trafficking. In addition to the compulsory minimum sentence, individuals convicted of one of the ten designated violent offences will be prohibited for life from possessing a restricted or prohibited weapon. Up to now, everything is fine and these provisions are the direct result of our representations.

Also, under bill C–68, from now on, importing or selling .25 and .32 calibre handguns and handguns that have a barrel 105 mm in length or less will be prohibited. This ban affects roughly 58 per cent of all handguns in Canada.

Concurrently with Bill C–68, the justice minister has banned several types of military and paramilitary weapons by an order in council taking effect on January 1st, 1995. A total of 21 types of military and paramilitary firearms will now be prohibited, and they include more than 200 models. However, as the Minister of Justice said, the cornerstone of his bill is the registration system, a computerized record of names and particulars of all gun owners, along with a description of all the firearms they own.

On the eve of the new budget of the Liberal government, the proposals of the Minister of Justice raise a number of questions on the cost of implementing such a system at the national level. The minister was saying, on December 6, in Alberta, that it would cost at least $85 million to implement. He said that the cost would be spread over five years and that, afterwards, the system would generate revenues. The day before yesterday, during a press conference, he went back on his word and said that the cost would actually be spread over seven years. He demonstrated to the people that he has no idea of the possible cost of such a system and who should bear it.

Unfortunately, we can no longer rely on the minister's estimates since, in two months, he added two years to the amortization period. In a few months, will come before the Standing Committee on Justice to tell us that the costs will never be recovered?

We always asked for a self–financing system. How is the Minister of Justice going to finance his system? He said that gun owners would not have to pay a cent to get their new registration certificates. Current owners will simply have to pay renewal fees of $60 in five years.

He also states that new certificate holders will only have to pay a small fee of around $10. How can the minister claim that system costs will be paid off over five or seven years? Why not 10 years?

• (1300)

In the meantime, he is asking the provinces to loosen their purse strings to help him pay the bill. He is asking the provinces to help him administer a system whose costs are unknown. This means that not only gun buyers and owners but all taxpayers will pay.

As I said earlier, to the costs associated with the system we must add those associated with a possible increase in prison population. The Minister of Justice can manipulate numbers as much as he likes, but the fact remains that the costs of his bill will be supported by the entire population.

Another flagrant example of the lack of rigour in calculating costs is a January 19 memorandum from the office of the justice minister stating that the government hopes but cannot confirm that current gun owners will not have to pay fees to obtain certificates of ownership.

The memorandum goes on to explain that fees will go up over time to encourage early registration and that the government is hoping that fees will not be charged during the first year.

Terms like "hoping" and "cannot confirm" suggest that the minister does not know the first thing about arithmetic. He has no idea of how much ordinary taxpayers will have to pay. He does not have any idea of the costs associated with Bill C–68 and how much gun owners will have to pay. We are basically demanding that the Minister of Justice's mathematics be clarified.

Finally, can we really talk about a victory, as suggested by the minister, when we know that all this great system will not become operational until the next century? I doubt it.

On the subject of regulations, the justice minister has missed a golden opportunity to practice what he preaches. Regulations respecting the storage, display, handling and transportation of certain firearms is a legal jumble that his department would have trouble sorting out. These regulations have been in force since January 1, 1993, but a great many people are still not aware of their existence, let alone their requirements. Even the police, who are responsible for enforcing them, says they are unfamiliar with these regulations.

When I questioned him in the House on November 15, the Minister of Justice answered, and I quote: "I well understand that the challenge we face is to make Canadians understand and comply with safe storage requirements."

I reviewed his action plan and his bill inside out, but nowhere is any revision of these regulations to be found. Yet, the Minister of Justice claims universal registration of firearms is necessary to make owners more responsible vis–à–vis storage and transportation. How can gun owners be asked to be more responsible and comply with regulations that they do not know about or do not understand?

The danger with inadequate regulations is that improperly stored firearms and ammunition are readily available to an individual who yields to a suicidal or violent impulsion. On the other hand, if firearms and ammunition are not readily available, chances are the person will calm down. Statistics on deaths caused by firearms are alarming. In 1991, suicides accounted for 77 per cent of the 1,445 deaths caused by firearms. In 1992, out of 732 registered homicides in Canada, 246, or 34 per cent, were committed with a firearm.

In the last ten years, most homicides were committed with shotguns or hunting rifles. Three times out of four, a spouse is killed by a rifle or a shotgun.

• (1305)

In Quebec, from 1990 to 1992, there were 1,293 deaths caused by firearms, which represents an annual average of 425. In that same province, suicides account for three out of four deaths caused by firearms, for a total of about 300 suicides per year. These statistics cannot be overlooked.

The inquest conducted in Montreal, last November, by coroner Anne–Marie David shed some light on the deficiencies, and the resulting dangers, related to inadequate regulations. Coroner David's report was released on January 26.

Throughout the hearings, the most frequent criticisms were related to the inconsistency of the current regulations. Lieutenant Guy Asselin of the Quebec provincial police testified and said: "The regulations are not necessarily clear, which does not help those who have to enforce them, nor those who want to comply with them".

The spokesperson for the Quebec police and fire chiefs' association, Mr. Richard Côté, made essentially the same comment when he said: "Police officers do not know how to interpret the law. You almost have to be a legal expert". Mr. Côté added that these regulations were included in the program of only two of the nine CEGEPs offering the police technology course, and that the related training lasted only a few hours.

If police officers themselves cannot understand the regulations, how can the Minister of Justice claim that his bill will increase safety at home? Police officers are not the only ones who do not know the regulations. Those who are directly concerned, and I am referring to the owners of firearms, hardly know there is such a thing as regulations on the safe storage of firearms.

A Léger & Léger poll has confirmed these disturbing facts. The poll was conducted from September 1 to September 13, 1994, among 515 owners of firearms residing in Quebec. When asked whether they knew about these regulations, only 53 per cent of respondents thought there was a law on storage, 31.8 per cent said no and 15.1 per cent were undecided. It is clear that, in addition to a national registration system, a thorough review and targeted advertising are necessary.

The Minister of Justice forgets that sometimes simple solutions are the most effective. If the government made it compulsory for businesses to supply individual locking systems for every firearm sold in this country, the problem would be practically solved.

The minister keeps repeating that registration of owners and firearms is just like getting a driver's licence or a licence for your car. If the minister had pursued his analogy, he would have realized that cars are sold with locking systems. I may have a driver's licence, but that does not mean I can start my neighbour's car without an ignition key.

My point is that every firearm sold in this country would have a device that would make it totally harmless. The owner would then be under the obligation to keep the firearm locked at all times, failing which he would be breaking the law. In this way, gun collectors would be able to exhibit their pieces, and in season, hunters would be able to practise their favourite sport.

I support the recommendations of coroner David, in which she urged the Minister of Justice to amend the wording of the regulations for storage, display and safe transportation of firearms, to make them more consistent and ensure they are more readily understood by the general public.

Similarly, the Minister of Justice should pay particular attention to the recommendation that the regulations be changed to oblige people selling guns to lock or disarm all weapons intended for sale and to prevent them from storing restricted firearms anywhere but in a vault and prevent the delivery to a customer of a firearm not equipped with a safety catch.

In conclusion, I believe that setting up a national registration system is a positive step, subject to my earlier comments. I must, however, say again that I find it most regrettable that the Minister of Justice bowed to pressure from the gun lobby. By spreading owner and weapon registration over eight years, the minister is stating very clearly that he does not want the system implemented during his term of office. Furthermore, I believe the minister backed off significantly from his original plan of action by permitting the purchase and sale of handguns between owners of the same type of weapons.

Finally, it appears that the minister has not yet completed his consultations and that he is now leaving it up to the Standing Committee on Justice. He wants the committee to look at the following questions: Should we allow the owners of prohibited firearms to bequeath these weapons to their children? Are there handguns that may be used for target practice? Will the use of replicas of powder fired guns be allowed at celebrations?

The minister should have assumed the consequences of his choices himself rather than force the parliamentary committee to make some of the unpleasant decisions.

In closing, we hope the minister still has sufficient leeway to take our recommendations into consideration.

[English]

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin this debate before I get into the text of my intervention by touching on a couple of comments the justice minister made.

This is the most confusing time for the justice minister to bring new legislation on gun control into the picture. The reason is that we have court decisions, one in Alberta, clearly indicating the orders in council passed by Kim Campbell are invalid.

Until such time as that decision is overturned, the orders in council passed by Kim Campbell and the orders in council passed by this minister, becoming effective January 1, are considered to be invalid and are not being enforced. I also understand that B.C. has taken the same position on these orders in council. A court of Queen's Bench decision renders those orders in council invalid.

We have asked the justice minister in this House if he would not consider waiting until that particular case moves through the appeal courts and a final determination is made. The justice minister has refused to accept that advice and is now heaping orders in council upon orders in council that the courts in this land are saying are invalid.

It also means that all the actions taken by the police and the court under the authority of the orders in council passed by Kim Campbell's government have been illegal. All of the seizures, confiscations and destruction of weapons without compensation are considered illegal.

Unless the judge's decision is overturned they will remain in that state. We have asked the justice minister to please wait until such time as this confusion within the courts has been cleared up. He has failed to do so.

I would like to touch on the point the justice minister raised about registration of rifles and shotguns where an individual will simply have to go to the appropriate place within his community, pick up a card and fill in the make, model and serial number.

I was talking to a firearms inspector in Alberta. I suggested this was the method that would be introduced. He said it is utter nonsense. I asked why and he said you cannot register what you do not inspect, otherwise you are going to have a system that is absolutely unreliable. I asked: "What do you mean?" He said: "Unless you inspect the identifying features on a firearm and the firearm inspector records that within the system they cannot be sure of the accuracy of that information".

The justice minister knows as well that there are many firearms with the same serial number, the same identifying features. The suggestion by the justice minister that this is going to be easy and inexpensive is simply nonsense. It is just not accurate.

I cannot support this gun control legislation because the centrepiece of it, the registration of all rifles and shotguns, will not reduce the criminal use of firearms.

The justice minister has not told us how these measures will reduce the criminal use of rifles and shotguns. The police chiefs have not told us. The Coalition for Gun Control has not told us how the registration of rifles and shotguns will reduce their criminal use. No one who supports the registration of rifles and shotguns has told us, told the House or told anyone how it will reduce the criminal use of these firearms. They have not because they cannot.

Handguns have been registered in the country and their use strictly controlled for 60 years. Yet we see an increase in the criminal use of handguns in Canada today. If handgun registration does not reduce the criminal use of these particular firearms, will the justice minister please tell Canadians how the registration of rifles and shotguns will have a different effect?

Death from shotgun wounds occurs in four primary areas: in criminal activity, in domestic disputes, in suicides and in accidental use of firearms. The imposition of a firearms registration system will do nothing to reduce deaths in any of these areas. The gun control bill does not address or reduce the cause of domestic disputes or suicides. Certainly registration is not the answer.

The justice minister has stated in the House, as he did today, that every six days a woman is shot to death in the country. This is a horrific statistic. Unless the causes of domestic dispute that produce these statistics are addressed nothing will change. The registration of firearms will not change this statistic and nothing within the minister's bill will address the cause of domestic disputes.

Safe storage of firearms may reduce suicides and accidental shooting. However these regulations are already in force. I have heard no one to whom I have spoken who is opposed to those regulations. They are common sense and they support them.

Over 80 per cent of the people in my riding of Crowfoot, Alberta, who responded to a survey indicated they did not believe the banning of handguns or the registration of rifles and shotguns would reduce the criminal use of firearms. The question that was asked directly was: "Do you believe that the registration of rifles and shotguns will reduce the criminal use of these firearms?" Over 80 per cent said no.

The other question was: "Do you believe an outright ban of handguns will reduce the criminal use of these firearms?" Over 80 per cent said no, but 94 per cent said that they were in favour of imposing harsher penalties upon the criminal users of firearms.

I believe during the period of review and debate on Bill C–68 as more Canadians become apprised of the details of the legislation and as people recognize the ineffectiveness of these gun controls in reducing crime and the enormous cost to the taxpayer, opposition will mount. I am reminded of the support for the Charlottetown accord when it first came out. Over 70 per cent of western Canadians were willing to support it but the more they learned about it, the more support for that accord plummeted like a stone.

Canadians have repeatedly urged the government to do something about crime, to strengthen the Young Offenders Act, to reform sentencing procedures and the parole system that continues the early release of violent offenders into society. These people have witnessed innocent victims being murdered, raped and viciously assaulted by offenders released into society by a system of justice that is preoccupied with the rights of the criminal, not the protection of the law–abiding citizen.

I might add that the registration of rifles and shotguns is aimed at the law–abiding citizen. I will touch upon this point later in my speech. If they should deliberately neglect to register their shotgun or firearm they are subject to 10 years in jail, which is draconian, absolutely absurd.

The sentencing provisions of the bill suggest the justice minister and the Liberal government are getting tough on crime. This is nothing more than a pretence. The bill contains provisions for a minimum of four years imprisonment for the criminal use of a firearm. However section 85 of the Criminal Code already allows for an additional sentence from one to fourteen years for the use of a firearm in the commission of a crime. This law has not been enforced rigorously at all in some areas of the country.

Crown prosecutors have used their discretion either to ignore this law or to plea bargain it away. The justice minister admitted shortly after he submitted the proposals in the legislation that his new bill would not eliminate the discretion of the prosecutors to continue to ignore or plea bargain away the new four–year minimum sentence. There is no assurance of that.

We look upon this portion of the bill as a step in the right direction. However it would not be needed if section 85 were enforced and it will be useless if the crown continues to plea bargain away the new four–year minimum sentence.

In addition to the lack of enforcement of section 85, lenient sentences and early parole are contributing to a violent society. Who is responsible for this? I ask this question of the House: Are the parliamentarians who created the laws that now spew violent offenders on to the street before they have served their full sentences not responsible for the death of the Melanie Carpenters of the country? Are those same parliamentarians not responsible for creating a situation where the rights of the criminal supersede the rights of the victim and the victim's family? Are they not responsible for the growing fear of violence experienced throughout the country?

I want the people of Canada to know that when the justice minister had the opportunity to vote for a safer society or the early release of murderers into society, he voted for the violent criminal instead of a safer society. The Minister of Justice voted against eliminating section 745 from the Criminal Code which grants first degree murderers the right to apply for early parole. The justice minister in effect voted for the criminal and against eliminating violence and against the Melanie Carpenters of the country. So did the entire caucus, except for the Minister of Transport.

The Minister of Transport stood with 24 of his Liberal colleagues and voted with the Reform Party to eliminate section 745 which allows for the early release of convicted murderers into society. I might add that during that vote when I looked over at Bloc members I did not see one of them standing against the early release of violent criminals back into society.

If the minister is sincere about fighting crime we recommend that he do the following: increase the maximum jail terms for all violent crimes including firearms crimes, implement a zero tolerance policy for criminal offences involving firearms, ensure that charges are laid in all firearm crimes and that plea bargains are not permitted, provide judges with sentencing options including no parole for all violent crime and provide for progressively more severe penalties for repeat violent offenders and firearms offenders.

Until the Minister of Justice implements these get tough measures he is only pretending to get tough on crime. Until the minister can demonstrate to us that the sentencing provisions of the bill will deter criminals from using a firearm during the commission of a crime we cannot support the bill because that we understand is what the bill ought to be doing. It is not going to do that.

Until the minister can assure Canadians unequivocally that the registration of rifles and shotguns and the banning of 58 per cent of the handguns currently sold in Canada will reduce the criminal use of firearms we will work to defeat this convoluted and expensive piece of legislation.

Reform members, like many Canadians, support gun control legislation based upon common sense. We fully support any and all gun regulations that will enhance public safety by reducing the criminal use of firearms. We say that present firearms legislation is adequate.

What the government ought to be doing is focusing its attention on the criminal use of firearms, giving Bill C–17 an honest chance and evaluating the impact it has upon these problems. It was recommended by the Auditor General in his 1993 report that before the government moves forward with any further gun control legislation a careful and thorough analysis of Bill C–17 and its impact upon the whole issue should be made. This we submit has not been done and it should be done.

The expensive and ineffective system of licensing and registration rifles and shotguns described within Bill C–68 simply does not make sense. It will not reduce the criminal use of these firearms. It will not reduce domestic violence and it will not prevent suicide.

The minister has not provided us with any statistical justification for the registration of rifles and shotguns. How can Canadians, in the absence of such information, be confident that universal registration will reduce the criminal use of firearms and thereby make society safer?

The minister defends the bill by claiming that the chiefs of police support him and have requested the registration of all rifles and shotguns. We ask this question: Why does the minister not also embrace the chiefs' position on capital punishment and on the elimination of section 745 of the Criminal Code which grants murderers the opportunity for early parole?

It is clear to me that he does not really believe that when we have a law enforcement problem we go to the chiefs of police. It seems the justice minister is only going to the chiefs of police when he needs them to support a particular bill.

We cannot afford ineffective legislation particularly in the area of criminal justice. We must have sound and proven controls in place that ensure public safety.

The minister states that the cost of the legislation will be only $85 million. However the cost of registering a single handgun is estimated today to be $82 and over $100 in Quebec. It is estimated that there are approximately six million rifles and shotguns to be registered in Canada.

Taking the lowest of these two fees, the cost for registration alone comes to $492 million. If the minister is suggesting that the registration of a rifle or a shotgun will be substantially less than the present cost to register a handgun, has the government been wasting taxpayers' money on the handgun registration system? Does this imply that the registration of long guns will not be as rigorous and thorough and therefore less effective than the handgun registration system?

I might add that the Terence Wade report clearly demonstrates that the expensive handgun registration system is defective and almost useless as a crime fighting tool. This is a report that we had to wring out of the justice department.

Let us deal with the banning of handguns and the hand held crossbow.

• (1330)

Where is the information and where are the statistics that the Minister of Justice used to justify such a draconian measure? That is what we ask for. Certainly anyone who responds to common sense will respond to those kinds of statistics that justify such measures. We have not seen them. We have not seen any of the statistics upon which much of this legislation is based.

The minister's original proposals banned the handguns used by our World Cup competitors. When asked in the House of Commons to exempt the .32 calibre handgun which is used in those competitions he said he most certainly would not. However, Bill C–68 does provide an exemption for these handguns and I compliment the minister for taking a second look at that issue.

It is clear, though, the minister's consultative process was badly flawed in spite of his presence that he was taking expert and technical advice from all interested groups. In connection with that, in the back of one of the pamphlets which was put out with the proposals, was a list of all the organizations and groups which the Minister of Justice met with on firearms. They are listed by way of province. There are eight listed for Alberta.

However, I have been advised that the Nosehills Gun Club and the Provost and District Fish and Game Association never met with the justice minister; yet that is what the document claims. Further inquiries indicated that they sent a letter to the justice minister expressing their concerns about the gun control proposals. They did it by way of someone else who was coming to Ottawa to meet with the justice minister. They had not received a reply to their letter, which was sent by courier, as of the date on which I spoke with them.

I submit that the registration of rifles and shotguns does not and will not protect Canadians. If the registration of firearms did we would have no problem with handguns and the criminal use of handguns. Every firearms control aimed at law–abiding gun owners such as the banning of handguns and the registration of firearms is an assurance to criminals that their victims and their potential victims are becoming more and more defenceless and helpless.

It has been proven by various sources that banning a product, including firearms, does not prevent criminals from getting these items from the black market. Repeatedly governments in this country have learned that prohibitive or restrictive measures lead to an underground market where people thrive on the challenge of obtaining something illegally and where ruthless entrepreneurs profit tremendously.

This bill clearly indicates that those Canadians who so adamantly oppose registration and may defy the minister and his law will not go unpunished. Under Bill C–68 these people will be subjected to a maximum ten–year penalty, a penalty which is equivalent to those imposed on some murderers in this country. What comes to mind is Mr. Lortie who went into the Quebec legislature and murdered three people and wounded 13 others. Now he is out after serving 10 years. The justice minister wishes to equate anyone who deliberately neglects to register their shotgun or rifle with that kind of prison term. That is absurd. It is wrong. It is unconscionable. It ought to be deleted from the bill before it goes any further and I would ask the minister to do that.

In addition, this bill creates one penalty for those who in ignorance of the law fail to register their firearms and another much more serious penalty for those who deliberately neglect to register their rifle or shotgun. The Reform Party believes that existing controls on gun ownership are more than enough and that no further controls of this type are necessary to ensure public safety. We also believe that no amount of gun control on firearm ownership can stop criminals from acquiring guns by illegal means.

In conjunction with the regulations we recommend these following features: decriminalize minor violations respecting storage, display, handling and transportation of firearms; decriminalize those offences that are more of an administrative matter than any criminal attempt to violate a law; make all firearm regulations, including orders in council, subject to review and approval by Parliament, and let us have no more of these orders in council that are not viewed by the elected representatives of the people being passed into law; simplify the firearms acquisition certificate renewal process.

I would like to end my speech today using the words not of members on this side of the House but those of members from across the way. On November 5, 1991 the Liberal member for Kenora—Rainy River said when the House was debating Bill C–17: "What we are debating is just what it means to the law–abiding citizen, the individual who feels that this piece of legislation does absolutely nothing to the criminal element that we as members of Parliament are supposed to be dealing with. We are not supposed to be restricting severely law–abiding citizens who are not the problem at all. We have suggested to law–abiding citizens of this country that we cannot trust them to do the right thing".

On the same date the Liberal member for Willowdale said: "There has been almost no suggestion and certainly no evidence that it is legitimate gun owners and members of gun clubs who have created the problem of gun related deaths in Canada. It seems to me that this bill as it now reads is dealing not with the fundamental issue of controlling the criminal use of guns, it is penalizing people who have proven in the past that they are part of the solution and not part of the problem of gun related deaths in Canada. This bill is very deficient in that it is not fair. People have over the years acquired a number of guns. Many of these guns are going to be taken away from them by this bill without compensation". It certainly applies to this bill.

The member further stated: "It is expropriation without compensation. You cannot do that in terms of people's homes and cars. Surely this is not fair. Let us not pretend that we are dealing with the root cause of gun related deaths in Canada and the harm that guns can cause Canadians. It does not address the real problems so that we as a Parliament will have to come back to deal with those issues not too many years from now".

I have news for the member for Willowdale. You are back, your party is back and, like the previous government, is still not dealing with the problem, certainly not the cause of the problem.

Finally, we have the words of the member for Haldimand—Norfolk: "I believe this is nothing but a bill to hoodwink the Canadian people into believing that the government is concerned about trying to do something about gun control when it clearly does not. This bill addresses none of these uses of a firearm except by placing more stringent conditions on the acquisition of an FAC. It fails to address the real problems in society. It gives Canadians a false sense of security that the government is actually doing something to stop crimes when it is not. This bill seems designed to disarm, overregulate and financially devastate the honest Canadian citizen. It will redefine Canadians as criminals and punish them severely for things like paperwork. I suggest that in this bill the government is encouraging an underground network of illegal guns".

These members were all speaking against Kim Campbell's Bill C–17 which did not restrict and confiscate law–abiding citizens' guns to the same extent as the current bill before us will or threatens to.

I am glad that so many members on the other side of the House share the same common sense opinions expressed on this side. I sincerely hope that these members continue to express these views despite the pressure from within their caucus to do otherwise.

I would like to tell this House and make a commitment to all Canadians that a Reform government will repeal any ineffective, costly legislation such as Bill C–68.

• (1340)

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Madam Speaker, regarding the last comment by my Reform colleague, I can understand why the Reform Party will never form the government. It would be going against the wishes of 95 per cent of Canadians.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Which survey?

Mr. Lincoln: At the last biennial—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order. The hon. member.

Mr. Lincoln: At least they should show courtesy. If they do not agree, they should show courtesy. We listen to them. We do not agree with them, but we listen.

At the last biennial convention of the Liberal Party in May 1994 the women's commission of the Liberal Party presented a resolution asking for tighter gun control laws in Canada. I felt very privileged to be asked to second that motion which was adopted by unanimous vote of our party then. That same day the Prime Minister in his address at the end of the convention made a very strong commitment to gun control legislation.

I would like to quote his words: "I would like to thank the women's commission in particular for having tabled an excellent resolution and strengthening firearms legislation. I believe that there is no place for firearms on our streets or playgrounds and I believe that the time has come to put even stricter measures in place to achieve this goal. I will be asking my Minister of Justice to examine your resolution very closely and to draft tough gun control legislation. I hope we have the support of all parties for this tough gun control. I know the Bloc Quebecois supports gun control and Preston Manning and the Reform Party are certainly talking a lot about crimes. I hope they will support these restrictions because tough talk is easy. What Canadians want and what we must provide is tough action".

At this point I would like to pay special tribute to the Minister of Justice. He has been patient in an exemplary fashion. He has heard. He has listened. He has crossed Canada to hear groups that were for gun control legislation and those violently opposed to gun control legislation.

He has heard not only from police chiefs but from community groups, from sports and gun clubs and any number of citizens of Canada who felt one way or another about this legislation. Eventually the time comes when decisions have to be made.

I thank him for his courage, his tenacity, his perseverance in bringing forward Bill C–68. What is more important is that he has told us time and time again that this is only part of a much broader picture, that crime prevention is not ensured by gun control legislation alone, that several measures must be taken together so that there is a reversal of attitudes in our society so that crime does not continue to be the menace it is today in our streets, in our villages and in our towns.

The whole crime prevention package is far broader than gun control legislation. It includes sentencing reform. It includes corrections and parole reform. It includes, as we have done, amendments to the Young Offenders Act. It included a Canadian crime prevention council which was launched last year.

More important, it includes broad social reform. In our red book we have tried to portray a holistic approach to society, to social reform, because unless we prevent the social causes that are the very root of crime in our society we will never eradicate crime no matter what legislation we put forward, no matter how tough the legislation, no matter how tough the jail sentences.

We have to reverse attitudes, create a new type of society in which we eradicate the root causes of crime: poverty, lack of education, lack of opportunity. This is what we are doing to approach social questions in a holistic fashion so that there is not only the tough legislation on gun control and crime but also the addressing of the root causes that lead to crime.

The intention of Bill C–68 is not to penalize or hinder legitimate gun owners. Not at all. In fact it recognizes the legitimate right of gun owners to use them for sport or for their livelihood. It recognizes the treaty rights for aboriginal people in Canada. At the same time it does recognize a profound reality. That reality is very simple. Guns are lethal weapons and they kill.

In fact, some of the opponents of gun control have tried to portray this as an urban versus rural debate. I suggest it is not. In fact, statistics accumulated for the period between 1980 and 1989 showed that in those 10 years there were 63 per cent more deaths by guns in towns with a population of under 5,000 than in towns with a population of over 500,000. Therefore it is not a big city versus small city problem. It is a problem of the safe handling of guns.

Guns impact especially on the lives of women. In the case of violence against women 42 per cent of all acts of murder committed on women have been done with guns. Of those guns 80 per cent of them are rifles used by their owners to batter and murder their wives.

We have to do something about this. We have to attack the problem, certainly the long term problem, by looking at the root causes of the social evils of society. At the same time we have to take short term measures to ensure that crime does not pay and that guns will not kill.

I would like now to pay a special tribute to two young women I know well—especially one of them—, Heidi Rathjen and Wendy Cukier, two young women who quit lucrative jobs. Heidi Rathjen is an engineer. She is now working almost on a volunteer basis to achieve stronger legislation on gun control. Heidi Rathjen said recently in an interview: Had we had stricter legislation, Marc Lépine and Valery Fabrikant might not have been able to do what they did. Were there even a slight chance that stronger legislation would have prevented Marc Lépine and Valery Fabrikant and all the others who committed senseless, horrible crimes from doing so, then that legislation would have been worthwhile, a thousand, a hundred thousand times over.

Michael Hogben was one of the four individuals killed by Valery Fabrikant. Michael was one of my friends. I worked very closely with him at Concordia University. We worked together on the Esther Goldenberg lectures, and it was on the eve of these lectures, which Michael was to organize, as he always had in the past, that he was killed. I remember being at the Hogben apartment with Esther Goldenberg after his funeral. I remember seeing Mrs. Hobgen there, whom I had not met before, and the two young Hobgen girls, and thinking that a scholarly person, a person with so much to give to society, not only erudite but a person of character, exceptionally high–minded, well–liked by everyone, his students and colleagues, was killed in the prime of his life, senselessly, by someone who had managed, under existing legislation, to obtain not one but two firearms.

We must recognize that the legitimate use of firearms is acceptable, but when used maliciously, firearms can cause irreparable, irreversible damage.

• (1350)

How can one measure the damage of a ruined life, the nightmare experienced by the surviving family, who relive the event every day and every night, because they can never forget? This is not death due to illness, it is violent death brought about by the use of a firearm. And that is a price no society can afford.

I know the debate on firearms is heated. I know the whole question of registration is especially controversial.

[English]

Yesterday in question period and again today our friends from Reform were questioning the cost of $85 million. They saw that as being too much. One Reform member said yesterday that we should send that money to cancer research or not spend it.

I wonder if the Reform members have calculated the cost to society of a simple trial, of putting people in jail, of police control for people who have used guns. The cost is far greater not only in terms of money, but certainly in terms of life lost.

What is the value of a life? Is it $1 million, $2 million, $80 million, $85 million? I wonder how much the lives of the 14 young women killed at the polytechnique were worth. I wonder how much Michael Hogben's life was worth. They are not statistics. We do not measure their lives, their souls, their beings in monetary terms.

It seems to me that society has not only the right but a duty to make sure we take every possible step we can as legislators to try to eradicate the ills caused by guns. If registration helps, even if it is not watertight, even if there are loopholes and even if we cannot prove statistically that it will work 100 per cent of the time, if it makes committing crime more difficult, then it would be worth it and would be money spent well.

Registration will certainly improve the control of the flow of firearms across borders. It will help the police trace firearms used in crime. Moreover, it will place the responsibility on the individual himself or herself. When someone has to go through a registration process, be it for a car, a boat, or any possession, it ties a special responsibility to that person to care for that possession.

Registration will be an immense deterrent. In fact, it is no accident that a great number of community organizations, police organizations and all anti–crime community organizations and institutions are heavily in favour of registration. That includes the great majority of people in the province of Alberta where most Reform members are from. British Columbians should be proud because it is the case in B.C. as well.

If registration and gun control legislation were only to save one life, I suggest it is worth it. I know the Bloc members share our view on this and I thank them for it. On this side we hope, and are convinced, that if it saves many lives, then Bill C–68 will be a major piece of legislation. Not only will it be because it is Liberal legislation, the work of this government and this Minister of Justice, but because it is a piece of legislation that society at large needs and wants.

Today we are in the process of getting it. Once again, I pay tribute to, thank and am very grateful to the Minister of Justice for having brought this bill forward.

I hope the great majority of us here will reflect the majority view of Canadians at large, and 95 per cent of those in Quebec, who believe that gun control legislation is not only needed but it was needed yesterday. It is a great piece of legislation. It is a forward piece of legislation and I will support it with great conviction.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I get the impression from the rhetoric over there, the violence of it and the great emotion I heard that this is exactly the type of approach to gun control that makes people in this country frightened. The reasoned arguments which were expressed by the justice minister, although I emphatically disagree with them, do not carry the same connotations as what came across the aisle from the hon. member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis.

If one is to take seriously what he was saying, I am quite convinced that this is the type of thinking, this rabble rousing, this fanning the emotions of people which will ultimately lead to the confiscation of private arms in this country. That is why people are so concerned.

The hon. member refuses to deal with real numbers. He says that he thinks registration will be a deterrent. Those were his words. We do not pass legislation of this magnitude simply because we think something.

He quoted the chiefs of police, as did the Minister of Justice. I would remind both members that when gun control was being discussed in this House in 1976, the police chiefs presented a brief to the Standing Committee on Justice. In that brief they emphatically stated that registration would serve no useful purpose in the control of crime. Whether the organization had—

The Speaker: My colleagues, we will have seven or eight minutes remaining after question period and the hon. secretary of state will have the chance to speak at that time.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the budget is quickly approaching. Canadians are not prepared to pay more taxes. They are in fact letting all of us in government know that they are prepared to react very negatively should taxes be increased.

However, Canadians are prepared to do with less services. They are asking us to cut services and programs and to ensure a fair taxation system so the middle class does not bear an undue burden of taxes.

Being a Liberal is not easy in these times. While we know we must bring down the deficit, we also know that our party has shown compassion over the years and has taken care of individuals in need.

We must and will continue to ensure that we are able to care for all Canadians, both now and in the future. I am committed to working toward these fundamental values. We recognize that difficult choices must be made if we are to ensure Canada's well–being and prosperity.

We are listening to Canadians. We hear that a fair taxation system should be introduced, cuts to services should be implemented, that duplication should be avoided and most important, that those in need should not suffer through this exercise but rather be strengthened by it.

DEFICIT REDUCTION

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, even though the reason interest rates have gone up is that the Minister of Finance has not taken any deficit–fighting action for a year now, he is bragging that he will be able to reach the gigantic deficit goal of $39.7 billion.

The minister's strategy is extremely obvious. To reach the enormous deficit goal of $39.7 billion, he plays with numbers at the expense of the unemployed. In fact, he is using the surplus in the unemployment insurance fund to reduce the government's deficit.

The Minister of Finance not only is using this surplus to reduce this year's deficit, but now that 11 months have passed by, we can see that he also overestimated the 1993–94 deficit by close to $4 billion in his last budget. All that to make people believe that the situation is improving. In reality, the minister is playing all kinds of games to mask his lack of action in the fight against the deficit.

NATIONAL LITERACY ACTION DAY

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as one who left school too early and returned to get my grade 12 at the age of 28, I wish to mention a new study.

We have heard that 30 per cent of Canadian youth leave school. However a school leavers survey from September 1993 shows this has improved 18 per cent of 20–year old Canadians not completing high school.

Employment is related to school leaving, with employment in excess of 20 hours per week a big factor. Despite long hours in blue collar and service jobs, hundreds in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap are attending an alternate education program called "The Open Door", open until 9.30 p.m. weekdays. Since it started three years ago school leavers have completed 338 courses.

Last week I had the pleasure of speaking there. Today on National Literacy Action Day I applaud "The Open Door" and the hard working people walking through it to a better future.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the House is aware that the Ministry of Transport has introduced new long term regulations and guidelines for local regional airports.

To increase understanding I was active in facilitating an airports conference in Brandon, Manitoba on February 7 and 8, 1995. The main conference objective was to bring together stakeholders from central Canada to discuss the challenges of assuming ownership and operation of community airports.

I can confidently say the majority of 91 participants left the Brandon Airports Conference respecting the minister's efforts of establishing a more affordable, integrated, efficient and competitive transportation system that still remains safe, secure and accessible.

My thanks to the inspired participants, informed speakers and my staff for making the conference such a great success.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were shocked yesterday when they learned that almost all Reform Party MPs did not make time to attend solemn observance of the 30th anniversary of Canada's flag. In fact I saw only one Reformer there.

Perhaps it is because they wanted to stay in their offices preparing to sing our national anthem on the floor of the House of Commons. Perhaps they were just too busy getting ready for another event which took place last evening.

I was one of many members who accepted an invitation to attend a reception by the Canadian Restaurant Association, a wonderful event where guests are served tasty delights from every Canadian province.

Included in the crowd were many Reform Party MPs who appeared to be having the time of their lives. Their usual sanctimony was gone. There was no evidence of the parsimonious, frugal, grassroots politicians. They came to eat, drink and be happy. On that, I think everybody can agree.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was the 30th anniversary of our maple leaf flag.

Our flag is a proud and distinct international symbol. It is recognized and greeted with warmth all over the world. Canadians can be seen wearing the maple leaf on their backpacks while travelling abroad. Even some Americans have been known to wear our flag while travelling.

The maple leaf flag unites us from coast to coast. The flag is one of the things that encompasses all Canadians despite our varied regional characteristics.

Yesterday in communities all across Canada there were flag raising ceremonies, speeches and school assemblies. Canadians from all races and religions celebrate the flag together.

I congratulate and welcome the three new members elected to represent their constituencies and our flag. Today I ask all my colleagues to reflect on the significance of our maple leaf flag and its meaning to all Canadians.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister of heritage made a very clumsy attempt at camouflaging the federal government's prereferendum propaganda by literally plastering Quebec with posters on the 30th anniversary of the Canadian flag, at a cost of over $1 million.

• (1405)

Today's Toronto Star confirms that more than half of these propaganda posters are for Quebec, despite the minister's statement that only 30 per cent of them would be put up in that province.

Why will the minister not simply admit what the federal government's goal is in lavishly celebrating this anniversary, in using all available means to try to influence Quebecers on the eve of the referendum and in trying to artificially instill in them a fleeting feeling of Canadian identity?

BILL C–263

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the constituents of Okanagan—Simikameen—Merritt to remind my colleagues that Bill C–263, which I introduced in the House, will be debated today.

Bill C–263 is an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and will bring five crown corporations under part X of the act. The five corporations are the Canada Council, the Canadian Film Development Corporation, the Canadian Wheat Board, the International Development Research Centre and the National Arts Centre Corporation.

The bill intends to bring accountability to these five corporations through allowing the Auditor General to conduct special examinations, a value for money audit every five years, as the Auditor General's office does regularly with other departments in the public service.

This matter concerns accountability. It works toward reducing waste, improving requirements for planning, improving strategy and cost systems. In short, the bill will ensure that five crown corporations are following good management practices.

I encourage all members to support Bill C–263.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have a proposal for the Minister of Transport who says he wants to rid himself of the financial obligations for the Crow benefit. He also says he wants to get rid of the Canadian National Railway.

Since the present value of the Crow benefit obligation is somewhere between $7 billion and $9 billion, sums which the government is hard pressed to find, why does the minister not offer prairie farmers the CNR (North American) as at least a partial payment of the Crow obligation?

While CN's net worth is considerably short of the Crow obligation, it could be a start toward providing a means of connecting farm fields with sea ports in a way that satisfies both Canadian needs and international obligations under the GATT.

Such a proposal leaves farm people with some control over export costs since it allows them real choices in striking a balance between viable railways and viable farms, something the minister has not considered so far.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my great honour to speak on behalf of my fellow Quebecers on this occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of the Canadian flag. Internationally, the Maple Leaf is a symbol of generosity, democracy and freedom. At home, it symbolizes strength, unity and pride.

The past thirty years have seen profound changes in Canada. Rather than passively submit to these changes, our country has shaped and adapted them to the principles and values of tolerance, justice and fairness that we hold dear.

Canadians from coast to coast proudly display our majestic red and white flag. Businesses spend thousands of dollars to develop a trademark, but Canada has the finest trademark in the world, the Maple Leaf.

Long may it fly! Long live Canada!

LITERACY ACTION DAY

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is Literacy Action Day. Since 1990, the Year of International Literacy, government, business, labour and voluntary sectors have been working together to find ways to solve this problem.

The Canadian Commission for UNESCO's International Literacy Year's objective is to eradicate illiteracy by the year 2000.

Despite ongoing struggles as many as 963 million people, 26.9 per cent of the world's people, remain illiterate. Thirty–eight per cent of Canadian adults have some difficulty dealing with the reading requirements of everyday life.

I would like to pay tribute to three organizations in my riding who are fighting relentlessly against illiteracy. They are the Haitian community action and social affairs centre, the Villeray literacy centre known as La Jarnigoine, and the new immigrants' centre known as Le Centre N–A Rivé.

Education is the key to freedom. Let us continue to work together to eliminate illiteracy.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on February 4 the Ottawa Citizen reported that some hunters savagely killed their hunting dogs by slashing their throats or shooting them at point blank range because the dogs were no longer useful at the end of the hunting season.

Recently the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters responded to this article saying that the federation has advocated mandatory identification of hunting dogs for many years. The federation takes this position so that hunters would be discouraged from abandoning their responsibilities as dog owners and to ensure that lost dogs are returned to the owners.

As we begin the debate on gun control in the House of Commons, I call on the hunters who oppose any firearm registration to help us create a safer Canada and not only support registration of dogs but the registration of guns because, like dog owners, gun owners sometimes abandon their responsibilities, resulting in the loss of life. It is our responsibility as lawmakers to discourage this.

JOB CREATION

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on February 6, the Minister of Finance boasted that more than 438,000 jobs had been created in Canada and that this was the best performance in a decade. Unfortunately for Canadians and Quebecers, Statistics Canada's annual figures are nowhere near this level. In fact, 261,000 jobs were created in 1994.

If we compare these figures with those recorded at the end of the early 1980s recession, last year's 261,000 jobs should be compared with an average of 347,000 jobs created annually between 1985 and 1988. The minister has nothing to brag about.

Especially since, with the increase in population, 825,000 jobs would have to be created to return to prerecession employment levels.

AIRBORNE REGIMENT

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians' sense of fair play was offended when the airborne regiment was ordered disbanded. They saw this action, rather than being based on factual evidence, as an emotional overreaction to amateur videos.

A whole regiment laid low for the misbehaviour of a few. Humiliation for the several hundred remaining members of the airborne as well as every serving or retired member who ever saw duty with the regiment.

Families: wives, daughters, sons, who proudly associated themselves with the regiment now feel tarnished by this ignominious end to their unit. A professional, highly trained and motivated force which should be remembered for claiming the dominion of our north; for the deep respect earned while on duty in Europe and in the Middle East; and for the humanitarian relief provided across many continents. Government, attempting to appear decisive, has made an inappropriate decision.

A proud and capable regiment has been lost from the order of battle and the Canadian taxpayer burdened with a large and unnecessary expense.

DECADE OF LITERACY

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this decade of the 20th century has been declared by the United Nations as the Decade of Literacy. This is a time to raise our awareness of those Canadians who can neither read nor write.

It is a disturbing fact that nearly three million Canadians are unable to function with basic literary skills. We are now halfway through the Decade of Literacy and inroads are being made by groups like the Movement for Canadian Literacy and ABC Canada.

Learning to read is a golden key which unlocks the door to creativity and independence. One of the greatest satisfactions of my entire life was teaching an adult male to read. He trusted me enough to share his dark secret that he had been faking it. Privately we persisted and a few months later he was on his own, actually reading the daily newspaper. The joy was like the miracle of restoring sight to the blind.

I encourage anyone hearing my voice today who cannot read to take action to seek the help in learning the greatest joy in life, the joy of reading.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on January 19, the PQ government decided to close Quebec's office in Edmonton, thus forcing francophones in the three Prairie Provinces and the Northwest Territories to turn to the Vancouver and Toronto offices for assistance.

• (1415)

On May 27, 1994, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois unveiled a policy on francophone and Acadian communities, claiming that after achieving sovereignty, Quebec would strengthen the role of its offices across Canada in promoting Quebec's co–operation programs.

Who is right? The leader of the Bloc Quebecois who wants to make more assistance available or the separatist PQ government which closes offices and cuts services to francophones outside Quebec?

FEDERALISM

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In a prereferendum speech to the Metropolitan Quebec Chamber of Commerce, the Minister of Foreign Affairs said, and I quote: "—no one in Canada is going to discuss the status quo. There will be no more status quo. There will be major changes—".

Does this statement by the Minister of Foreign Affairs mean that the Prime Minister has changed his mind and that his government will now support major changes in the way federalism operates, this after doggedly defending the status quo?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development is introducing major changes in the way unemployment insurance and social programs operate. Who is opposed to these changes? Who wants to keep the status quo?

An hon. member: The Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): The Bloc Quebecois, exactly.

When the Minister of Finance suggests ways to improve our society, who wants to keep the status quo? Always the Bloc Quebecois.

Our federalism is flexible. We will make some adjustments, but we do not have to change the constitution to make those adjustments. We must be practical and tackle one problem at a time, in the best interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, seriously. The Prime Minister should take this seriously.

If it is so easy to transform Canada by signing administrative agreements and if the Prime Minister is sincere about this, could he explain why, fifteen months after his party came to power, he has yet to recognize the unanimous demands for full jurisdiction over manpower training from all stakeholders in Quebec? All stakeholders in Quebec are asking him to withdraw from this area of jurisdiction. If it is so easy and if he is so serious about it, why has nothing been done? Why?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have made several offers to the Government of Quebec. We have offered to simplify the system, as the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said. We could not offer everything they wanted, but we offered half a loaf.

Since these people want to maintain the status quo, they will not consider accepting anything else. Right now we are signing harmonization agreements with Canada's nine other provinces, except the Government of Quebec that wants to keep the status quo. We are not maintaining the status quo. They are.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the Prime Minister that the Quebec Premier who turned down the agreement with the Liberal government was the former Liberal Premier of Quebec, the Prime Minister's partner on the no committee for the Quebec referendum?

Will the Prime Minister admit that this manoeuvring by his Minister of Foreign Affairs was an attempted rerun of the referendum speech by Pierre Elliott Trudeau in 1980?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers must have liked Mr. Trudeau's speech, because they voted 60 per cent in favour of staying in Canada, and this year, Quebecers will again listen to the people in Quebec who want to stay in Canada. Apparently, on the evening news tonight, we will be told that it is even better than last time. Two or three months away from the referendum, they are at least 15 points behind where they were in February 1980.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what has stuck in the mind of Quebecers about Pierre Elliot Trudeau's 1980 speech is that promises were not kept.

An hon. member: And unilateral patriation.

Mr. Duceppe: In his speech, the Minister of Foreign Affairs announced that, from now on, the federal government would concentrate on areas of federal jurisdiction, recognizing implicitly that duplication and overlap had become common practice in Ottawa, when he said: "We will review this matter and focus on areas of federal jurisdiction."

My question is for the Prime Minister. Now that his Minister of Foreign Affairs has announced that the federal government will no longer encroach on areas of provincial responsibility, will the Prime Minister indicate from which areas Ottawa plans to withdraw?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have offered on several occasions to withdraw from forestry agreements for example, but Bloc members would rise in this House and ask that we go on providing funds for Quebec forests. Questions were put to us on this subject.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): It is always the same thing. They want us to withdraw, but at the same time they want us to continue paying. If we withdraw, we withdraw. The problem is they want to have their cake and eat it too. They want us to collect taxes for Quebec to spend as it pleases. Well, from now on, we will spend our own money and they can spend theirs.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister wants his remarks to be taken seriously, could he clearly identify the areas from which he intends to withdraw, as well as the federal departments and agencies that will be abolished to eliminate the costly duplication referred to by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who is incidentally the minister responsible for Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are working day in and day out with the other provinces to try and eliminate duplication. In many areas, there is no duplication. Take income tax for example. In every other province, there is only one level of government collecting.

Duplication comes from Quebec deciding to have its own ministry of revenue collect personal income tax, unlike the other provinces. You know, it does not cost Ontario anything to collect its provincial income tax, because a line was added to our tax form for that purpose, while in Quebec a separate report has to be filed. Hundreds of millions are spent unnecessarily because of this. Duplication often comes from the other side.

FINANCE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, just a few hours ago Moody's bond rating service announced it will review Canada's foreign debt rating and also Canada's AAA domestic rating. Moody's is not only sending the government a wake–up call, it is ringing the alarm bell.

Will the Minister of Finance finally acknowledge that the markets are rejecting his deficit reduction targets as inadequate and that Canada's debt and deficit situation is much more serious than he or the Prime Minister has led us to believe?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Moody's certainly could have waited until the government brought down its budget.

When the government brings down that budget the financial markets will see very clearly this government has kept faith with what it said in its pre–election campaign and in the last budget.

We have repeatedly said that we will fulfil our obligations, we will live up to our commitments, we will hit our targets. In terms of this year's deficit, I am here to tell you we have done a hell of a lot better.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister and the members opposite just do not get it. When one of the world's largest bond rating agencies will not wait two weeks to get the minister's budget, it is telling him that his targets are not only unbelievable, they are unacceptable to the money markets. That is the message they are trying to send to the minister.

• (1425)

Will the minister simply accept the fact that his deficit reduction targets are inadequate and commit to eliminating the deficit within the life of this Parliament, which is what the money markets are asking?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last year in the months that followed the budget the leader of the third party kept standing up and saying that we would never hit our targets, that they were too tough, that we would never get there, that the sky was about to fall, that Chicken Little had a lot of trouble.

Why at least does the leader of the Reform Party not have the decency to stand up today and congratulate the government for having done what he said we never could do?

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the minister on hitting that target would be like congratulating a high jumper for getting over the bar when it is at three feet.

We are wondering whether the minister and the government ever learn anything from the experiences of others. The government and this minister are going down exactly the same fiscal path as the NDP Government of Ontario. First it denies the situation is serious, then a half–hearted attempt at tax increases to deal with it, then in the final analysis come to cut spending after it is too late.

Is it really the minister's ambition to become known as the Bob Rae of federal politics?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last October the government provided a very accurate analysis of this country's financial situation. It was an analysis praised by the financial markets. It was an analysis praised by the great majority of economists. It was an analysis praised by those of the Reform Party who understand economics, who basically said it was an accurate analysis. Is he about to now deny that which his colleagues said?

Let me tell the House something. I know it is hard for this member to accept some good news. This country is leading the G–7 in growth, leading the G–7 in employment, leading the G–7 in controlling inflation.

For the love of heaven let me say today, manufacturing shipments in this country were up 1.6 per cent in December and 12—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FEDERALISM

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The government's pre–budget public relations exercise, including the speech made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, is an attempt to convince Quebecers that the government is about to decentralize the federal regime.

Does the Prime Minister agree that true decentralization requires a transfer of tax resources, including tax points, so that the provinces can take over from the federal government?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be in a position where someone else would collect taxes on my behalf, so that I would not have to do it myself. Tax collection is a part of political responsibility. If they want us to decentralize, fine. However, they were happy to let us collect taxés, and take the blame for it, and then get the money from us. In the context of responsible government, it would be better if everyone collected his own taxes. The situation would be clearer for everyone.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what we are asking, namely that the federal government withdraw from these tax fields. We will do the job ourselves.

Does the Prime Minister agree that this renewed Canada, which he is predicting, is nothing more than an attempt to hide the fact that the federal government continues to dump the costs of social programs on the provinces?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can see that the Bloc members are in disarray because they realize that our flexible federalism approach is working very well. If they knew a bit about history, they would know that, a few years ago, the federal government collected over 60 per cent of the taxes in this country, while incurring close to 60 per cent of the expenditures.

Now, the figures are reversed. Indeed, the provinces, which used to collect 40 per cent of all taxes, now spend and collect 60 per cent of the money. The federal government is currently collecting 40 per cent, a proportion which is diminishing. Thus, the situation changed considerably over the last ten years, even without any constitutional amendment.

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the age old problem of patronage under the former Tory government is well known. Now it is coming back to haunt the new masters of patronage, the Liberal government.

Most recently Canada Ports Corporation chairman Arnold Masters has reportedly abused his expense account, billed an unreasonable amount of work and doctored the minutes of the corporation's board of directors.

Now it has been revealed that nearly 50 top executives of shipping companies from Vancouver to Halifax have written to the Minister of Transport calling for Masters' immediate resignation.

When will the Minister of Transport take action on these abuses, take the advice of the Canadian shipping industry and demand the resignation of Arnold Masters?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that this is a serious matter.

Because we try to pay attention to the advice that is given by members of the third party in the House, in situations such as this one where serious allegations have been made and there is a call for drastic action we want to take some time to make sure we do the right thing.

The hon. member would know, as many of his colleagues have said on another matter that has been the subject of a great deal of discussion in the House, a person does not want to act rashly in these matters.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister has already claimed to be waiting on a report from the transport committee's study of marine policy before he takes any action.

The purpose of that study is to consult with users to determine how they want their port system changed to make it more viable. Those users have spoken and they have spoken loudly against Arnold Masters.

With this kind of unified opposition, when is the Minister of Transport going to act?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member indicated, the appointment of the gentleman in question was made by the previous government. He has been in office for several years and had acted as a director prior to that. We understand the importance of making sure that the operations of Canada Ports are done efficiently.

There have been questions raised by the hon. member and others at hearings of the Standing Committee on Transport. We are going to review the matter very seriously, but I want to emphasize that the Standing Committee on Transport, mandated by the House to look into the whole area of the operation of Canada Ports, is meeting across the country right now and will have an opportunity to hear from these people who signed their names to a letter. They can make their allegations directly before the committee.

Perhaps, if the hon. member has any other information that he wishes to make known to the Canadian public, he might want to step outside and make whatever allegations he wishes to make.

HEALTH

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Pointing to the massiveness of the system, the Minister of Foreign Affairs said that Ottawa would work to eliminate overlap and duplication. It would therefore be devoting its efforts to areas under its jurisdiction. Under the constitution, health is a provincial matter.

To demonstrate his good faith, does the Prime Minister intend, as logic would dictate, to abolish the national forum on health that he chairs?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, health is a complex issue, and we have a responsibility in this area. We set up a national health service in Canada, which all Canadians and a large majority of Quebecers continue to support. It guarantees free health services to all Canadians and ensures that there will not be two categories of hospitals in Canada and Quebec—one for the rich, and one for the poor.

We wanted to ensure dignity, in Canada, for all who are sick. This is why the federal government stepped in. Canada's health system has set an example for the world, and the Americans would like to have it right now.

• (1435)

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand from the Prime Minister that his "new" Canada in health matters simply means that Ottawa will force the provinces to meet ever more stringent national standards while cutting transfer payments to them and leaving them with the financial burden?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we decided to try to improve the systems. As I was saying earlier, we have succeeded in signing agreements with all the provinces to eliminate duplication. The only government that does not want to sign an agreement with us in an attempt to identify areas of duplication which could be eliminated is the government of Quebec, because it wants to use the status quo for its purposes. I just hope they will hold a referendum soon, ask an honest question, so that the blackmail business will be over with.

CANADA COMMUNICATION GROUP

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Communication Group has been recommended for privatization, yet unbelievably the President of the Treasury Board has extended the workforce adjustment directive giving the employees of CCG guaranteed job protection. This is the very same workforce adjustment directive the minister is attempting to eliminate from other federal employees.

Why would the minister extend a policy that guarantees these federal employees job protection when the recommendation is to get rid of the agency?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have said before in the House that we are going through a downsizing. Part of that downsizing will require that different programs and services are curtailed or completely removed from what we provide to Canadians. That is part of getting our deficit reduction targets met.

In the course of doing that it will be necessary to downsize the public service, but we will be treating our employees in a fair and equitable fashion in doing that, whether they are part of that agency or any other part of the government.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question was: Why give them the protection of the workforce adjustment agreement when we are trying to downsize the government?

Will the President of the Treasury Board assure the House that he will rescind the most recent extension of the workforce adjustment agreement and that there will be no further extensions of the policy, as he admits, while we are downsizing the government?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as it applies to the particular agency the hon. member is mentioning, I would have to repeat what I am saying in terms of the public service overall.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in his speech to the Chambre of Commerce of Metropolitan Quebec, the Minister of Foreign Affairs and minister responsible for Quebec stated that the government must concentrate less on regional development and focus instead on helping small business.

Can the Minister of Finance, minister responsible for regional development in Quebec, confirm his government's intention to withdraw from regional development and focus exclusively on helping small business?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that the best way to go about regional development is to help small business. That is truly where most new jobs are created. I am not the only one to say so, so do local authorities in Quebec, as well as the provincial government, the parent company.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If it is clear, given that Quebec has adopted a general strategy for regional development, including assistance to businesses, would the minister not agree that, in the interest of avoiding all duplication and overlap, as the Prime Minister has said, he must recognize Quebec as the sole authority in terms of regional development, including assistance to businesses?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not only do I disagree with the hon. member's hypothesis, but I say that, having discussed the matter with the current Government of Quebec, the current government does not agree with the hon. member's hypothesis.

Yesterday, he tabled a report entitled "On Track" from the committee reviewing the Railway Safety Act. Can the minister tell us when he will be in a position to respond to the report's recommendations?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has mentioned a very major report that is quite long. First off, I would like to thank those who wrote it. The government is currently preparing its response to the many recommendations, a good number of which are very broad in scope, and we should be able to publish that response within 90 days.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on September 24 of last year in my constituency, Catherine Evenson, a beautiful young lady who was confined to a wheelchair, was raped in her home. The man facing rape charges is a refugee and is now trying to cement his stay in Canada by applying for permanent resident status.

Will the minister of immigration intervene in this case and ensure that no permanent status in Canada is considered until the case is heard and the verdict is handed down?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have no specific details of the case. I appreciate the hon. member raising it. I will give her my word that certainly I will have officials look into the case.

It is also a good reason, rather than simply dealing with individual cases, to have had Bill C–44 approved at third reading. It attempts to make the system better so that we minimize any such horrible cases we hear about.

I was somewhat distraught that the Reform Party, which relishes bringing case after case to the floor of the House of Commons, did not see fit to support Bill C–44.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I assure the minister that I have been in constant contact with his office on the matter as well as with the Solicitor General's office. I also stress that I am assured Bill C–44 will do nothing to help this case at all.

I thank the minister for his response. I assure him that today this young woman and her family are listening to and watching these proceedings. Would the minister please notify me as soon as a decision is made?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said in my first answer, I would be happy to look into the file. I can appreciate that the hon. member has been in touch with officials of my department, but as any member can appreciate no minister can be on top of the thousands of cases across the country.

The hon. member, with all due respect, is absolutely wrong if she and her colleagues believe that Bill C–44 will not improve the system's capacity to keep those individuals from getting protection and allowing those legitimate cases to be accepted in our system. I ask her and her colleagues to change their minds about Bill C–44 because it would help Canadians and the system.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The Official Languages Commissioner published a study this morning on services in the minority official language offered to the public in designated federal offices. Among other things, the study found that in Quebec, service in English is available 98.8 per cent of the time, while in the rest of Canada, 28 per cent of all designated offices still do not provide service in French.

How can the President of the Treasury Board justify that, more than two years after a regulation was passed on the issue, over one in four francophones outside of Quebec are unable to obtain federal services in their language?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, even while the official languages commissioner was undertaking his survey the Treasury Board was consulting with managers in offices across the country to help ensure that they were carrying out their obligations under the Official Languages Act.

Furthermore, we have assembled information that we have provided to Canadians through minority language newspapers across the country so that they know where to find the offices and who to contact to be able to get services in the language of their choice.

• (1445)

Finally, let me say that this government is solidly committed to quality services in the official language of choice by Canadians and in meeting its obligations under the Official Languages Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the alarming increase in the assimilation rate of francophone and Acadian communities in Canada, how can the minister justify the slow pace with which the government has made its services available to francophones in the language of their choice? Is bilingualism a sham?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the official languages commissioner said that in 79 per cent of cases across the country the service was available and that 92 per cent of the time it was good quality service that was being provided.

We are not satisfied with those numbers. We are not satisfied with anything short of 100 per cent in meeting our targets under the Official Languages Act.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Justice could not or would not answer how a national gun registry program would reduce crime. If the minister could show this evidence to support registration, most Canadians would probably support it.

Will the minister provide this House with evidence that shows how a national gun registry will save lives and reduce the criminal use of firearms in our communities?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if anyone has questions to answer about their position on gun registration surely it is the Reform Party of Canada. The very party that styles itself as the party of law and order opposes a measure that the police want in this country. The very party that styles itself as the party of the people is against a measure that poll after poll shows is supported by the vast majority of Canadians.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for Canadians who are concerned about the cost of firearms registration and for Canadians who are concerned about crime on the streets using firearms, would the minister give them the statistics that confirm a national firearms registration program will save lives and will reduce the criminal use of firearms?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, time and again the police chiefs of this country tell us that a registry system will help us stop the traffic in illegal arms at the border. It will help us ensure that the number of firearms lost and stolen every year and end up in the hands of criminals is reduced. Time and again they tell us they need registration to enforce court orders that prohibit people convicted of crimes of violence from possessing firearms. I will take the word of the chiefs of police on that question.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Ian Murray (Lanark—Carleton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal.

The minister announced today that hundreds of governor in council and ministerial appointments will be eliminated as a result of the agency review. I agree that this overhaul of boards and commissions is long overdue, but is it all just window dressing or will this initiative bring real savings for Canadian taxpayers and help put an end to political patronage?

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for his question. It allows me to comment on the agency review report which was released today. The report looked at 400 commissions, boards and agencies and 120 were affected, 73 were wound up, 47 were restructured and no less than 665 governor in council positions were abolished.

To give members an idea of the scope of this review, since this government was elected, it has appointed approximately 700 persons to governor in council positions, 100 of which were reappointments. In short, the government has abolished more governor in council positions than it has appointed new persons to such positions.

We are bringing efficiency and fairness to government.

NATIONAL PORTS

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Forty maritime organizations and businesses have asked the Minister of Transport to dismiss the chairman of Ports Canada's board of directors, Arnold Masters, from his duties. Just a few minutes ago, the minister said that he had to wait for a report from the transport committee before he could take action.

How can the minister wait for the report from the transport committee before taking action in this matter, since the committee has no mandate to review Mr. Masters' case?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what a revelation: the hon. member will now wait for a mandate before raising such issues. When I appeared before the transport committee, the hon. member, instead of dealing with the problems affecting the transportation system across the country and proposing solutions, went on and on about Mr. Masters. With or without a mandate, the hon. member always knows where to dig.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since Mr. Masters is completely discredited in the eyes of the Canadian maritime industry, why does the minister not suspend him immediately now that the allegations are out in the open?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I indeed received a letter signed by several stakeholders in the industry asking me to replace the gentleman in question. However, as far as I know, the allegations are based on comments which so far are not supported by any evidence of criminal or fraudulent activities.

I wish to emphasize that we are, of course, reviewing the situation because it is important. Unless the hon. member has specific evidence to submit to us which would point to unacceptable behaviour on the part of Mr. Masters involving criminal or fraudulent activities, I would appreciate it if the hon. member exercised his right to make these accusations outside this Chamber instead of staying here where he is protected.

TAXATION

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister is well aware that virtually all of the OECD countries now have an inheritance tax for people who inherit, say, sums of money over $1 million. This would generate hundreds of millions of dollars in revenue at a time when revenue is much in need.

Can the minister tell us, is there some reason Canada does not have an inheritance tax like virtually every other OECD country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question as asked concerning the reasons for not having one. I interpret this question to be not related to the budget, but simply seeking information.

The reason is that we in Canada, unlike other countries, have deemed capital gains disposition on death, which roughly equates to an inheritance tax. Another reason is that we have much higher property taxes than do many other countries. It is felt that does the case. Also, the principal interest most Canadians have is their main residence, which as the hon. member knows, is not subject to capital gains tax and would not be subject to any kind of a wealth tax.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, that is why I suggested a ceiling of $1 million would be a useful guideline. It would get around the matter of one's principal residence.

The minister has said that not many poor people use tax loopholes. I suggest that not many poor families use family trusts. Can the minister explain to the House of Commons and the people of Canada why a country like Canada would continue to have in its tax system a provision that caters virtually exclusively to the wealthiest families in Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, family trusts are also used by many small businesses in order to make sure the business can pass from one generation to the other. Where objections have been raised to family trusts is where it really does entail undue tax advantage for those who are using it. This was a position that many on this side of the House took when in opposition and it is a position that is certainly supportable in debate.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Many Indian people in my riding are expressing deep concern that the federal government is about to sign a self-government agreement with Gitksan Indian leaders. Their concerns relate mostly to the fact that elected band councils will disappear and will be replaced by an unelected and unaccountable hereditary chief system.

Can the minister confirm that the federal government will not now or in the future allow such a system of government to gain power in Canada?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no, I cannot.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the minister cannot answer my question perhaps the Prime Minister can.

Will the Prime Minister of Canada as the leader of the government guarantee that his government will never sanction undemocratic Indian governments of any kind in Canada?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the member that the Government of Canada will never sanction undemocratic governments of any nature.

ATLANTIC GROUNDFISH STRATEGY

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The good news is that 27,000 Newfoundlanders are benefiting from the TAGS program. The bad news is that many hundreds of fishermen and plant workers, all of whom have had a long work attachment to the fishery, are being deprived of benefits. I say to the minister that the culprit is the appeal process. There are rumours, for example, that more than 95 per cent of second level appeals are being rejected by HRD officials.

What is the minister doing to ensure that the appeal process is fair?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to the hon. member and other members of the Atlantic provinces and Quebec who have been working very closely with us to ensure that those who are eligible will be able to receive their benefits under the TAGS program.

We understand there are some difficulties being faced by the appeal process. The latest records are that about 75 per cent of the appeals are being recommended, but there are some difficulties which the hon. member and others have brought to my attention.

I have been working closely with the minister of fisheries. I can make a commitment to the hon. member that we will have a correction of the appeal process within the next two weeks.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Since 1986, Portuguese nationals need visas to visit Canada. Portugal is the only EEC country to which such a restriction applies.

Does the minister, who stated in 1986 that, by imposing visa restrictions on Portuguese citizens, we were doing a disservice to a European country and an ally, agree that this is a discriminatory and unjustifiable measure which must be lifted as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for raising a question on an important policy issue. Members should be very well aware that the federal government has already seen fit to lift visas in a number of countries throughout the world.

Some months back we lifted the visa restriction on Hungary. During his trip to South America the Prime Minister made an announcement that no longer will Chile, a country the member knows well, have a visa restriction.

We are making progressive moves but it is a two way street. When we lift visa restrictions we also want to make sure that our system is protected with respect to documentation as well as visits from individuals from that part of the world. Where they meet our conditions we can make such moves, as we have in the past.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. This morning I had the pleasure of introducing a private member's bill to the House which would have the effect of amending the Criminal Code to make dangerous intoxication a criminal offence. This would prevent people from hiding behind the charter of rights and freedoms to get away from their own responsibility for offences committed while drunk.

Will the minister take this bill, make it a government bill and try to get all–party support for this very important consideration that all Canadians hold together? Most people in Canada cannot understand why this loophole exists.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge the hon. member's initiative and I share his objective. I too have been at work on this very subject.

The Department of Justice has its own approach to this very problem. I expect before too many days are out to be introducing government legislation to achieve the same objective.

The Speaker: We will have the usual question on the Business of the House. Then I will hear a question of privilege, a point of order and then I want to give a ruling a little later on another question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as customary, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for Parliamentary Affairs to let us know what the legislative menu for the coming week will be.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the consideration of Bill C–68 on firearms. Tomorrow, we will start the debate in third reading on Bill C–59 to amend the Income Tax Act.

[English]

On Monday we will debate third reading of Bill C–37, the young offenders legislation, and if there is any time left when this is finished we will resume consideration of report stage of Bill C–52.

Tuesday will be an allotted day. On Wednesday we will deal with second reading of the electoral boundaries readjustment bill and we will then resume consideration of Bill C–68.

There will be no ordinary sitting on Thursday but at three o'clock p.m. on that day there will be a joint meeting of both Houses in this Chamber to hear an address by the President of the United States.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege and I appreciate the opportunity to be recognized today.

I take the point of privilege very seriously. After six years and some months in this Chamber I have never risen on a point of privilege, recognizing that to do so would mean that my rights as a member of Parliament were abused or the ability to do my job was somehow impeded by rules of this House or by actions that may have taken place elsewhere.

I rise today on a point of privilege to express my concern that my ability to do my job as a member of Parliament has been impeded by rules and regulations that exist in this place.

A bill before the House at the present time, Bill C–68, the firearms legislation, is a bill that in my constituency and elsewhere across Canada is of great interest. The bill has elicited a tremendous amount of letters and telephone calls over the last few months. The proposals that were brought forward by the government have been out in front of Canadians for several months.

As a result of those proposals being put forward to Canadians I have had a great many telephone calls and letters from my constituents asking to be kept informed of the progress of this bill and when the bill was printed and available in the House to supply those constituents with copies of that bill.

I have compiled a list of names in my constituency and tried to assess the number of letters that I received with regard to this bill.

I have calculated that maybe 200 or 300 copies of the bill would be required for me to distribute to the people who have expressed an interest in responding to this issue in front of all of us to provide me with their comments and backgrounds so that I can properly represent them and to communicate an intelligent review of the bill to the minister and the government.

On doing so I have contacted the Department of Justice for extra copies of the bill to provide to my constituents. I am told by the Department of Justice that I am limited to a handful of copies of the bill.

I contacted distribution of the House of Commons and I am told that there is a limited supply of the bill, that very few can be available to me. Only after all members are done getting their limited supply will I be able to have access to the few copies that would be left over.

Finally I took the bill along with a letter and some newspaper clippings to printing this morning to ask if it could produce some copies so that I could keep my constituents informed as they requested about the contents of this important bill.

I am told by printing that it cannot do it because the rules of the House of Commons specify that if the bill is available elsewhere, it cannot print it.

We have exhausted all the possibilities of the bill being available elsewhere. I do not want to be embarrassed in front of my constituents by being unable to provide them with copies of bills that I am debating in this Chamber.

I ask that my question of privilege be examined by the House and at the very least that I and members of Parliament who require copies of this bill to keep our constituents informed be allowed to have printed enough copies to satisfy our demands.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, although I doubt that this is a question of privilege the issue brought to the attention of the House by the member is an important one.

A number of my own colleagues have approached me in my position as whip on the same issue. Perhaps more appropriately it would be a matter for the Board of Internal Economy to consider. If either that member or another member can make a formal request that we do that you, Mr. Speaker, and I and others who sit on that board could look at this issue and how to accommodate it.

For this to be a question of privilege, I suppose a member would have to be denied access to the information which of course he is not. There is a fee, quite a hefty one, for obtaining copies of the bill. I am informed that it is in the area of $10 a copy.

It is more appropriately a matter to be discussed by our board as an expenditure of the House. Perhaps in so doing we could see what we could do to accommodate at least some of the members or accommodate all members with a quantity of some sort to satisfy the demand that is expressed by this member and others who have brought it to my attention as well.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the words of my hon. friend but recognizing that, it might be some time before the Board of Internal Economy would have an opportunity to address this. The matter is rather urgent. The legislation is before the House now.

Speaker's Ruling

Our constituents want to find out immediately what this bill involves. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you can assure members that this is not some item that might be put off indefinitely or for a few days even.

The Speaker: To the extent that I can give that assurance to all hon. members, I will surely give it. This would be a point that would be put on the agenda. I do not know whether I can talk to the Board of Internal Economy. I will defer to that and go back to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for an answer to that question.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I guess I am really responding as the spokesperson for the Board of Internal Economy. I can assure my hon. colleague that he has my undertaking to bring it to the attention of the board as early as the meeting on Tuesday.

The Speaker: With agreement from hon. members we will proceed this way. If there is not agreement at the end of it all I will take this up again and I will get back to the House.

PROPS IN THE CHAMBER

• (1510)

I am informed, although I did not see it as I could not see it from my seat, that on the television cameras it was quite obvious that he was holding a prop. The prop was in the nature of a sign posted on the back of the document or portfolio that he was holding. The document was clearly visible on television and contained a slogan that related to recent meetings on taxes in Canada.

The person who told me this saw it on television in the lobby. I was not in the lobby, I was in the House and could not see it from where I was sitting.

I refer to Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 501:

> Speakers have consistently ruled that it is improper to produce exhibits of any sort in the Chamber. Thus during the flag debate of 1964, the display of competing designs was prohibited. At other times boxes of cereal, detergent and milk powder have been ruled out of order.

Citation 502 states:

> When a member produced samples of grain in the House, the Speaker deprecated the practice, saying, 'If we allowed hon. members to produce such exhibits, we would get ourselves involved in a position where perhaps all too often hon. members would want to table dead fish, herrings, or red herrings, damp grain or wild oats'.

This quotation from previous Speakers indicates the grave nature of this offence against the rules of the House and I ask the Chair to apply the proper discipline to the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke.

The Speaker: Perhaps there is a simple explanation. The hon. member is here now and perhaps he can explain it in a few words.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that a prop is something that relates to the subject at hand. I held up my speech and I used a piece of stiff cardboard in order to keep the pages from falling over, as they will.

I will not display it now and further incur the wrath of the hon. member, but as it happens there was a label on the back, which we have on briefcases and everything else, which said "No more taxes. No more debt".

I can understand the hon. member's sensitivity to that. It was not my intention—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I am glad we do not have the lash in our arsenal.

I would encourage all hon. members not to use props. The hon. member has explained that it was done inadvertently. I accept the hon. member's word.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS IN QUESTION PERIOD—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: I am now ready to rule on a question of privilege by the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen–Merritt, which he raised first on November 2, 1994 and then again on February 8, 1995.

On November 2 the member rose to complain that during question period the previous day the Deputy Prime Minister had breached confidentiality by quoting from a letter which the member had written on behalf of a constituent to the Minister of Canadian Heritage. He contended that by revealing the contents of this letter without his permission the Deputy Prime Minister had interfered with his ability to carry out his duties. He argued that his constituents would now wonder whether or not matters on which they sought his assistance could be kept confidential.

The Deputy Prime Minister responded that the letter was part of the public record of the Canadian Radio–Television and Telecommunications Commission.

On February 8, 1995 the hon. member again rose on a question of privilege to state that new information had come to light on the same matter. He explained that the constituent on whose behalf he had written had received a letter from the manager of correspondence and complaints at the CRTC. In that letter the constituent was advised that under the terms of the Privacy Act, unless she requested otherwise, the hon. member's letter, sent on her behalf, and any other correspondence related to her complaint would become part of the licensee's publicly accessible file in early January.

The hon. member now argues that contrary to the statement of the Deputy Prime Minister his letter was not in fact a public document when the Deputy Prime Minister quoted from it last November and again requested that I review the matter.

• (1515)

The chief government whip then intervened and argued that what was at issue was a question of law and that the Speaker does not rule on such matters. He also added that if the hon. Member had a complaint with the CRTC, there were other avenues by which he could pursue it.

Let me first address the matter of whether or not the member's letter to the Minister of Canadian Heritage was a public document and therefore able to be quoted from in debate. Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, page 151, citation 495(7) states:

> When a letter, even though it may have been written originally as a private letter, becomes part of a record of a department, it becomes a public document, and if quoted by a Minister in debate, must be tabled on request.

[English]

From this, I must conclude that the letter from the hon. member to the minister was in fact a public document and therefore could be quoted from in the House.

It is not for me to decide whether or not, as the Deputy Prime Minister stated, the letter was part of the public record of the CRTC. The application of the Privacy Act and the laws and policies governing CRTC dossiers are beyond my purview. As my predecessors have repeatedly ruled, it is not now, nor has it ever been, the role of the Speaker to rule on questions of law. This has been a longstanding practice and I draw members' attention to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada, Fourth Edition, 1916 at page 180 which reads that the Speaker:

> —will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same be raised on a point of order or privilege.

This is also repeated in citation 168(5) of Beauchesne's sixth edition, 1989.

On matters of privilege, it is up to the House to decide whether or not a member's privileges have been breached. The Speaker must be persuaded that there is some evidence that a member has been hindered in the performance of his or her parliamentary duties, before putting the question to the whole House for determination.

Having carefully reviewed the procedural authorities and the interventions of hon. members, I must conclude that in the case before us there is no prima facie question of privilege.

I thank all hon. members for their contribution to this decision.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FIREARMS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I understand there was some time left in the question and comment period for the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment. I believe the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia had the floor.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I had digressed to the question of the political flip–flop of the Association of Police Chiefs on the question of the registration of guns. However, I would like to pursue my original debate with the hon. member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis.

He has at rather great length discussed the causes of domestic violence and suicide in the home as it relates to the registration of firearms. I fail to see, and I have tried very hard to understand, how a registered gun is any less lethal than an unregistered gun. If we want to solve the problem of domestic violence leading to death or of suicide with firearms, there is only one way it can be done. That is by totally disarming the civilian population.

I would ask the hon. member if that is his vision of Canada.

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, I was really interested in hearing the hon. member before question period when he contrasted the styles of the Minister of Justice who spoke in calm tones and mine with very passionate, emotional tones.

In this party we are individuals. We have different styles, different ways of expressing ourselves, different points of view sometimes. That is what makes a democratic party. I do not see why we should not speak with passion. I feel very passionately about this issue. I feel passionately about it because guns kill. They cause death and injury. We should do whatever we can to be on the side of caution. That is what Bill C–68 is all about.

I would remind the hon. member that there are an estimated five million rifles and shotguns in Canada. Nobody knows who owns them. Over the past 20 years 62,000 guns have been stolen and not recovered. Over 3,000 a year are lost and nobody knows where they are.

A registration system makes it easier for police control, for people in charge of legal control to trace possessions. This is why we register cars and boats. When they get stolen or burglarized people can trace them.

Today the Reform Party is challenging us to prove without any fear of contradiction, with 100 per cent certainty, that registration will be watertight or statistically proven. We have suggested that there is a whole body of opinion relating to crime. The police chiefs association, the Canadian Association of Police, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Crime Association all tell us that registration will have an impact on at least controlling the guns that flow across the borders unregistered, unknown.

Surely it is worse, the precautionary principle. Where is common sense? Where is the fact that we should use caution when it comes to lives? The onus should be on us to show we have taken every possible action to ensure life is protected.

If registration would save one life—according to all the experts it will save many lives—then of course registration is possible. We have a duty as a government to do it. Bill C–68 is awaited by a great majority of Canadians. Eighty–eight per cent of Canadians in the Angus Reid poll say they are for registration, including a majority all across Canada. In some provinces it is up to 95 per cent, in another, 69 per cent. Every western province is for it.

Therefore, Bill C–68 is a big step forward. It is a reflection of what the majority of Canadians want. I am very pleased it is here. I will support it with great conviction.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to listen to the rhetoric flow, having it interfaced with an appeal to common sense. That is what we ask for, to see some common sense in the gun legislation in this country. The hon. member mentioned there are estimates which range from five million to as high as 12 million firearms and long guns unregistered in the country.

• (1525)

The registration of handguns has been in effect since 1934. We have had 60 years of registration and it has done nothing to prevent criminals from acquiring and using handguns for criminal purposes.

I ask the hon. member for a succinct answer, if possible, because I know his time is up. How will registration of long guns be more successful than the registration of handguns has been?

He also mentioned experts who say that registration will work and that "it will save countless numbers of lives" I believe was the term. Name the experts. We would love to know who the experts are who claim that registration will save lives.

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, I said it would save lives. If it saves just one life it would be worth it. They never talk about life over there. They talk about guns. They do not talk about human life. That is really what this bill is about.

The member makes the point that the registration of handguns has been in place since 1934 and it still permits criminals to use handguns. What would happen if there was no registration of handguns? Would there not be more crime?

If the registration system needs improving, then let us improve it. Today we have computers, all kinds of technical means to ensure that a registration system is far better than the one that was set up many years ago. This is the opportunity to do it. We have the technological means to set up a proper registration system. It will take time but the minister has allowed for that in the bill. Once it is set up it will be a modern, up to date registration system which may filter into the communities and which hopefully will involve the community at large, the grassroots. It will be far better than the system we now have, which is no system.

If the handgun registration system is not perfect, then let us perfect it. But at least it is a step toward caution, toward saving lives.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate at second reading of Bill C–68, An Act respecting firearms and other weapons, which was tabled on February 14, 1995, by the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada.

That legislation, which was promised a long time ago by the Liberal government, and the tabling of which was postponed on several occasions, amends the Criminal Code and includes a new Firearms Act. It provides harsh sanctions for crimes committed with a firearm, as well as a system of registration certificates and a national firearms registration system.

This dense, complex and technical piece of legislation of 132 pages, with no explanatory notes, will give effect to the measures announced on November 30 by the minister. The delay in the tabling of that bill can only be explained by the considerable opposition it has stirred in the ranks of the Liberal Party. Over 30 Liberal members will vote against that bill, including the member for Timiskaming—French River, the member for Kenora—Rainy River. Some ministers are also said to have strong reservations about the new legislation.

I hope that these dissenting members will have an opportunity to express their views in this House, so that we get an idea of just how divided the Liberals are on this issue. The hon. member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis, who just made a good speech, should use his persuasiveness to convince his colleagues to support this legislation.

• (1530)

Bill C–68 proposes several measures, including: the establishment of a national firearms registration system; a minimum jail sentence of four years for violent crimes committed with a firearm, as well as a prohibition to ever own a restricted or prohibited weapon; the inclusion of new Criminal Code offences with harsh penalties for the illegal importation and traffic of firearms; measures to tighten controls at the Canadian border—this morning, the minister mentioned that a very large number of firearms are imported into Canada each year—, and a prohibition to import and sell .25 and .32 calibre handguns, as well as handguns equipped with a barrel of 105mm or less.

Individuals who do not acquire a licence or a certificate within the time prescribed could be sentenced, under the Criminal Code, to a maximum of six months in jail, or to a fine of up to $2,000. The weapons license is renewable every five years at a cost of $60. The registration certificate will be valid for life, unless the weapon is sold or transferred. Once the system is in place, the license will be mandatory for the purchase of ammunition.

Control of firearms has caused and continues to cause heated debate. Those in favour of control are demanding, among other things, more stringent regulation, that all weapons be registered, and that certain types of firearms be prohibited.

On the other hand, the weapons industry is angry at having to submit to new restrictions. It will therefore intensify its pressure in strongly opposing this bill. We of the Bloc Quebecois have always held that there must be legislation in this area in order to better control firearms.

In my opinion, it will also help resolve the crime problem. I also realize that more restrictive gun control alone cannot resolve the crime problem. We must reconcile the right of individuals to protect themselves against violence with the legitimate interests of weapons' owners, including hunters.

It must be pointed out that the minister resisted the pressure of the powerful gun lobby. Universal registration of firearms is a positive measure. It will encourage owners to find ways to store them safely.

Reactions to the bill in Canada and in Quebec are divided. However, I think most of the country, including the people in my riding of Bourassa, in Montreal North, support the broad lines of the bill. Therefore, I believe this bill, despite many gaps and shortcomings, is a step in the right direction.

• (1535)

Among the measures contained in this bill, the registration of all firearms is the most seriously disputed. Under the administrative control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, this measure should be implemented in conjunction with the provinces and territories. We will keep an eye on co–operation between the RCMP and the Government of Quebec. In Quebec, where at least one firearm offence is committed daily, the police must use stronger measures to effectively counter the criminal use of firearms.

In my province, 400 to 450 deaths are caused by firearms every year, about 300 of which are suicides. This is why the health care community, in particular, has been calling for registration of all firearms for a long time. We must remember that in Quebec firearms have been registered since 1972, but the registration system must be improved.

I have serious reservations about several measures in the bill, especially in regard to registration procedures and costs. The national registration system is not self–financed, something which the Bloc Quebecois has been demanding for a long time. The justice minister has merely mentioned that implementing this system will cost $85 million over seven years. But he has not said where he got these figures, how he arrived at this amount. In addition, I believe the cost will be much higher than what the minister has calculated.

Moreover, we believe the minister and his government have given in to the powerful progun lobby by allowing a period of eight years for the registration of gun owners and their weapons.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, I am Chilean by birth. I came here following the military coup in 1973. Chile was a peaceful country; Pinochet's dictature brought total insecurity. When my wife, my children and I came to Montreal in 1974, we most cherished the safety of this country's cities and streets.

However, I was shaken by the tragedy of December 6, 1989, when 14 young women lost their lives at l'École polytechnique de Montréal, at the hand of a misogynist murderer. Marc Lépine used a Luger rifle. The incident spurred a major movement in Quebec and Canada in favour of increasing firearm controls and it heightened awareness of the daily violence that women are subjected to in our society.

I was personally affected by the tragic incident five years ago because one of my goddaughters was studying at l'École polytechnique during the incident but, fortunately, did not get shot.

The bill outlaws the sale of all weapons like the one used by Marc Lépine. At the time, close to three out of four Canadians felt that the massacre of the 14 students at l'École polytechnique demonstrated the need for tighter gun controls.

• (1540)

Women, seniors and Quebecers in general were and are the three groups most in favour of legislative action to restrict the sale of weapons. According to figures from Statistics Canada, between 1978 and 1982, 37 per cent of all murders were committed with firearms. Of the 6,465 crimes committed between 1978 and 1987, 33 per cent were committed using a firearm.

The minister said that on the average, every six days a woman dies from a gunshot wound in Canada. The situation is therefore very serious. However, in my opinion, the minister is afraid to really get to the heart of it. He should have tabled a tougher bill. He extends until the 21st century the time limit for those who currently owner firearms to get a certificate in compliance with the minister's action plan.

He has committed the sin of omission on many points in his bill. The Minister of Justice did not pay enough attention to coroner Anne–Marie David's inquest, held in Montreal in the latter part of 1994. Twenty or so witnesses representing various organizations testified about how inconsistent and unclear the regulations were and how the minister's new proposals did not address the problem as a whole.

Government must protect citizens against any fraudulent and dangerous use of firearms. Public safety must be improved by limiting the use of firearms for criminal purposes. I think that all immigrants in Quebec and Canada wish to live in a safe and law–abiding society. I also think that the people do not want Quebec and Canada to become like the United States as far as firearms are concerned.

But at the same time, I would like to see this bill take into consideration the legitimate interests of hunters and farmers. Hunting is a long–standing traditional activity. It is a major leisure and economic activity for many Quebecers and Canadians. Sports shooters have gained international recognition. Many aboriginal people hunt to feed their families. I have nothing against people using weapons for good reasons.

I do not think that in Canada, unlike other countries, we need to be armed to protect ourselves. At least, this is not the kind of society I would like to live in.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member for Bourassa mentioned that about 30 members on the government side will be voting against the bill. I would suggest that he redo his research because many of the concerns that our members had have been addressed in the latest changes to this bill.

I was pleased to hear from him that he personally will be supporting this bill because, as he said, it was a long time coming. He did comment, though, that the bill did not go quite far enough.

• (1545)

The minister of the environment and wildlife for Quebec stressed that the bill goes too far. I am wondering if he can give us some clarification if this is the same split within his party. He makes a very strong statement that the bill does not go far enough and yet we are hearing another message from that province that the bill has gone too far.

[Translation]

Mr. Nunez: I hope that the dissent within the Liberal caucus with respect to Bill C–68 is not deep–seated. I accept your explanations, but I still think there are some serious problems about this bill within your caucus.

As I said before, we agree with the general principles of the bill. We are in favour of tighter gun controls, especially in Quebec, where we had the tragic killings at l'École polytechnique in Montreal and where other occurrences have made us very much aware of the problem.

I hope that during consideration of the bill in the Justice Committee, we will be able to take a closer look at this legislation and propose amendments that will make it more effective and give it more teeth, and that will also ensure it will come into force as soon as possible. As the hon. member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis said earlier with such passionate conviction, I think society in Canada and Quebec absolutely needs this legislation.

[English]

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Bourassa two questions.

The hon. member indicated that he supported the idea of prohibiting the Mini Ruger which was used in the polytechnique massacre. I can support that and understand that assault weapons are off the list. My constituents support that as well. However, someone who is deranged will find a weapon in some way, whether it is registered or not under this current program. He could have used a sawed off shotgun, for example.

The first question is how would registration have stopped that circumstance from actually happening?

The second question is with regard to a remark the hon. member made concerning universal registration. He said it is a good idea because it will encourage owners to store their guns and ammunition safely. The last House of Commons passed Bill C–17 and put into place legislation that required all people in Canada to store their guns and ammunition safely. It has not lowered the crime rate or the illegal use or misuse of firearms in crimes in any way. How can the hon. member say that universal registration is going to make a difference with regard to this?

[Translation]

Mr. Nunez: Mr. Speaker, of course there are limits to what we can do. There are mentally disturbed individuals in every society. However, I believe that our goal and the public's goal is to minimize the risk of crimes being committed with firearms.

I do not know whether the weapon used by Marc Lépine was registered, but I think firearms registration will be helpful because we will know who the owner is. In the case of people who are mentally disturbed, I trust they will be denied the right to have a firearms licence.

I think registration is essential to gun control. Of course, if we have a national registration system, we can also ensure safer storage of these firearms. I hope that this bill will help us achieve some of these goals, despite, I repeat, some considerable deficiencies in Bill C–68.

• (1550)

[English]

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I remember one time being stopped by a policeman for a routine check in my car and in the back seat was a baseball bat. He asked why I had a baseball bat in my car. I said that along with the ball and the glove on the floor of the car, I used it to play with my children. This was a few years ago. He said that was fine, but that if I were carrying it to use as protection or to use against someone it would be a crime to have it in the car.

It seems to me that the intention of the use of a firearm or a hatpin or a hammer or a kitchen knife or a pair of fists is the thrust of what we should be talking about. It is the intention of a person to harm, the deformed will of a person that we should be addressing ourselves to. We cannot stop every threat. When we are told that if we can save even one life, if it were true I would accept that.

If we are so concerned about saving lives, why is the government and why are the people of Canada not more concerned about the technical standards of appliances, of automobiles, of so many of the things we use? Why do we allow smoking? Why are the restrictions on drunken driving not more stringent? This is a red herring.

How will the registration of guns, how will further restrictions on guns and how will this bill on gun control affect the misuse of guns by someone who is determined to cause someone else harm?

[Translation]

Mr. Nunez: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, I believe the national firearms registration system will provide tighter controls over who owns these firearms and where they are stored. I am not alone in this respect.

In my own riding of Bourassa, in Montreal North, 15 per cent of my constituents are senior citizens. I discussed this with them. We had a number of meetings, and I asked them: What do you think about gun control and the bill announced by the Minister of Justice? All senior citizens are in favour of tighter controls because they want to be able to go out, and walk in the park, without fear of being attacked by some crazy person with a gun. And many people would agree.

I spoke to the labour movement, the Canadian Labour Congress, which represents more than two million members in this country, and especially in Quebec, they agree with the broad principles of this bill. I spoke to physicians and health care workers. They also want tighter gun controls in Canada. I think the majority of the people in Canada and Quebec, and in my riding, support the broad principles of this bill.

[English]

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is a great opportunity for me to speak on the topic of gun control. I hope to talk about some of the concerns expressed by the Reform Party and go through a whole series of situations in terms of support, some of the statistics that support strong gun control.

• (1555)

Let me start with a basic premise on why gun control is good for Canada. Gun control is not simply about controlling guns. It is about public safety. It is about crime prevention.

Do members think—I have asked this question to people often—if we have more guns on the street we will have more crime? Consistently the answer is yes, the more guns we have on the street, the more crime we will have. If you can go out and buy a gun in a local store, do you think we will have more crime? The answer consistently is yes.

Is that not logical? If there are fewer guns on the street and if the government makes it more difficult for people to get more guns, will we not have less crime? My basic premise is if we have fewer guns on the street and those that are there are restricted and managed, we will have a safer society and safer communities.

The other part of it is just the psychological effect, the fact that we know as a society we do not tolerate people having guns, and the fact people know it is illegal to have guns on the street and that we do have restrictions. That will also help in determining that psychologically there is less fear in our society. That is very important as well.

Let me look at the support that this bill has right across this country, whether it be in Alberta, British Columbia or anywhere else. There is tremendous support for this bill. For example, from October 5 to October 25, 1994 Environics Research Group Limited conducted a national survey of Canadian public attitude toward various gun control measures. The survey reported that 90 per cent supported a law requiring all firearms to be registered.

In British Columbia 88 per cent of the people support strong gun control. In Alberta 83 per cent of the people support gun control. Virtually all Canadians, 96 per cent, support increased penalties for the use of a firearm during the commission of a crime. Part of that bill also increases the crime whenever a firearm is used in the commission of a crime.

Seventy–five per cent wanted restricted access to ammunition. Sixty–seven per cent supported a law preventing civilians from owning handguns.

There is a whole list of the polls done. It goes on and on. I could probably go on. There was a survey done in Alberta recently which said that 64 per cent of Albertans support a national firearms registry.

This was a poll done by Alberta's minister of justice, Mr. Evans, who said that he was surprised by the results of this poll. An Angus Reid poll was done in the fall of 1994 in which 70 per cent of Canadians favoured tougher gun controls.

I can go on and on and cite more polls but it is pretty evident that Canadians support strong gun control. If one looks at the groups that are supporting gun control, there are incredible groups that are saying they want gun control.

For example, on August 25, 1994 at its 89th annual conference the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police passed six resolutions that support strengthened firearms control measures. Mayors of B.C., mayors of some of the people in the Reform Party, said they want stricter gun control. Eighteen mayors throughout British Columbia representing 1.7 million people said they want stronger gun control. This is coming from the mayors of municipalities.

It is quite evident that groups right across Canada, whether it is the mayors, the Canadian police chiefs or other groups including community groups, have said they want stricter gun control. As the Reform Party always says, we are listening to those Canadians. We are listening and we are responding. We believe we need to listen. The difficulty for Reform Party members is that if they do not support this bill, they will be against the majority in their own ridings that wants stricter gun controls.

I know we have to be careful in using statistics because they can be used in misleading ways. I want to share some statistics with the Canadian public. A recent survey showed that guns were used in 42 per cent of murders of women by their spouses. One woman in Canada is killed with a gun every six days. Most often she is killed in her own home and almost always she is killed by someone she knows. That is quite a revealing statistic.

There is another statistic that we should look at closely. Over 80 per cent of the rifles and shotguns were legally owned at the time of the shooting. Is that not an incredible statistic? The members of the third party say: "It is the criminals that are committing the crimes". It shows that over 80 per cent of the rifles and shotguns were legally owned by those people at the time of the shooting. What does that tell us? It sends a very strong message when 80 per cent of the rifles and shotguns were legally owned at the time of the shooting. We have to take action.

In 1991 there were a total of 1,445 deaths involving firearms. Of those, 19 per cent were homicides, 4 per cent were accidental deaths and 77 per cent were suicides. In 1992, 26 per cent of all robberies involved firearms. This represents a gradual decline since 1977 when it was 39 per cent, the year before stricter gun control measures were passed by Parliament.

As the result of stricter gun controls we have cut robberies down from 39 per cent to 26 per cent. We heard the same arguments in 1977 when the Liberal government, proposed by Minister Ron Basford, passed legislation on stricter gun control. The same arguments are coming out. In looking back the statistics show we did the right thing. In 15 or 20 years we will look back and say we did the right thing now as well.

In 1992 there were 732 homicides. Of those 732, 34 per cent were committed with firearms. That is a serious problem.

We can compare our gun laws with those in other countries. Unfortunately we do not have a comprehensive study that compares countries that have stricter gun controls and those that have less restrictions.

We do have one very comprehensive study that took the example of two cities which were within a 100 to 150 mile radius. The study looked at what happens in crime in those two cities. The two cities were Seattle and Vancouver, the city which I am from and represent, Vancouver South. It looked at these two cities because there were a lot of similarities in geography, climate, make–up and population. It was a study done between 1980 through 1986 in order to investigate the associations among handgun regulations, assaults and other crimes, as well as homicides.

The two cities are similar in many ways. They share common geography, as I said, climate history and both cities have a comparable level of schooling and have almost identical rates of unemployment and ethnic diversity.

Although similar to Seattle in many ways, Vancouver has adopted a much more restrictive approach to the regulation of handguns. During the study period, it is quite relevant that both cities had similar rates of burglary and robbery.

In Seattle, the annual rate of assault was modestly higher than that in Vancouver. However, the rate of assaults involving firearms was seven times higher in Seattle than in Vancouver. That sends a very good message. Despite similar overall rates of assault the relative risk of death from homicide was significantly higher in Seattle than in Vancouver. Virtually all of this excess risk was explained by a 4.8 fold higher risk of being murdered with a gun in Seattle as compared with Vancouver. That is very revealing.

The conclusion of this study was that restricting access to handguns will reduce the rate of homicide in a community. That is the basic premise I started from. It is logical that if we have more guns on the street, we will have more crime. If we have fewer guns on the street, it is logical that we will have less crime.

That is a very simple way to look at it. Unfortunately the members of the Reform Party still do not see that. It is very simple. The average person should understand that. If we let people buy a gun whenever they want with no restrictions or rules, we will have higher crime. If we restrict firearms, we will reduce the crime.

Another example is Indianapolis. Its police wanted to stop vehicles to have a real, active approach on gun control, like our drinking program. They said they would stop cars in a certain area where they had problems; they would search cars, looking for guns. They set up a proactive approach to this.

The police actively sought out and confiscated illegal firearms in high crime neighbourhoods. The result was that gun related crimes were reduced by almost 50 per cent in the relevant areas. Homicides and drive–by shootings also went down significantly. This is a very good message.

Even with this information, the Americans have been unable to put forward stricter gun controls because of the national riflemen's lobby association. Strangely enough, we hear members of the Reform Party talking about lobby groups. They say their favourite subject is lobby groups and how they are against lobbyists and lobby groups. However, when the lobby groups support their position, they are holding hands. They do not mind going to bed with the lobby groups that support their position, as they have done with the gun lobby group.

We always get the argument that we should punish those people who cause the crime. Here is another statistic that will interest people. Eighty per cent of all homicides in Canada occur between people who know each other. Most homicides occur as a result of assaults during arguments or altercations. A small minority occur during the commission of a robbery or other felony.

If there are more guns in the homes, there will be more homicides. If there are fewer guns in the home, there will be fewer homicides. It is very simple.

What is the cost of this program? Prove that it will reduce crime. If everything we did to prevent crime had to be proven first, we would not have very many crime prevention programs.

We have heard from major groups that have said that this bill will reduce crime. Common sense tells us that it will reduce crime. However, members of the Reform Party want evidence, proof now, on crime prevention programs. The proof is already there if we look at past legislation and at the gun control bill of 1977. It shows that stricter gun control reduces crime. We do not need any more proof. The government will take action whenever a crime prevention program shows it reduces crime and helps public safety.

Once a crime is committed there are incredible costs. I know members of the Reform Party have mentioned costs. But what does it cost once a crime is committed? What is the cost to a family? What is the cost to society? What is the cost of losing a family member? There are huge financial costs, for the courts, for the legal system, for the pleas. To keep someone in jail costs $60,000 a year.

Yes, the program will cost something. The registry system will cost approximately $85 million. But it is not a cost, it is an investment because it is going to reduce crime. It is an investment because it will ensure there are fewer tragedies, whether it be a suicide or a murder. Hopefully as parliamentarians we can attempt to reduce those kinds tragedies. That is why I am supporting this bill.

The Reform Party strongly opposes any preventive gun control measures. Its arguments are primarily based on defending the interests of gun owners, not in public safety. Reformers ignore the facts about the use of firearms in domestic violence, suicides and accidental deaths. Although Reform claims to put a high priority on crime prevention, the only action it advocates is to deal with criminals after lives have been lost. We want to prevent the loss of lives. That is our goal.

The costs of registration have been exaggerated by the Reform Party with allegations that the registration system will cost hundreds of millions of dollars. Concerns about the design and the cost of the system are being dealt with by taking time to develop it carefully.

I have to congratulate the Minister of Justice who had the courage to tackle this issue and to make sure that it is done right. Too often politicians do not want to tackle tough issues. They do not want to tackle issues where there is some resistance. The minister saw resistance to gun control. It took a lot of courage for him to bring in this legislation.

With today's technology it will also be cheaper than it would have been 15 or 20 years ago. We think those figures are correct.

I know that I am running out of time. My colleague from Edmonton Southwest said his survey showed that 69 per cent of the people in his riding support stricter gun control. In a lot of ways Canadians are ahead of politicians on this one. However, as a government we recognize that we must do this. The Canadian public wants us to do it. The police forces want us to do it. Let us do it for our children. Let us do it for the youth so they will face less crime.

I have three children and I want them to live in a safe society, where they do not feel threatened by someone having a gun. I want them to build a stronger society. We do not want to be Americanized as do some Reform Party members. We want to have a safe country. We do not need guns.

If there is any message I can send today it is that everyone, including the Reform members, should support this bill and give support to the minister. If anything, it should be a tougher bill than what it is now. I hope in the future we can make it more tough because the fewer guns out there, the less crime. It is only logical.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a couple of questions.

I too have spent the last seven or eight weeks touring the country far and wide talking to people at many public meetings. I have also received polls. I received one yesterday regarding registration from the constituents of Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, which had 2,807 respondents. Of those respondents, 111 said yes and 2,696 said no.

That is what came from that riding. The member of Parliament has received that poll from those constituents. Is that member of Parliament going to be allowed to represent his people? After all, the polls he is getting certainly do not indicate what the minister and other members are claiming.

Are we aware that the Prime Minister received 200 resolutions from municipalities in the province of Manitoba opposing the minister's gun law? We have not heard anything about that, but I know they were delivered to the Prime Minister of Canada from the province of Manitoba.

Tons and tons of petitions are being tabled. I have managed to put in over several thousand names from all over the country because some members evidently do not want to table these petitions. They have come from all parts of the country. The latest one was from Manitoba and was signed by somewhere in the neighbourhood of 1,400 individuals, including 400 or 500 women who signed it on special pink paper so it would be recognized. They are opposing this bill.

The hon. member for Burlington was with me at a meeting in Kamloops. The place was packed full. There might have been 300 or 350 people there. They asked that member to send a message to the minister. They called for a vote and they all stood opposing the gun proposals.

For heaven's sake, when you see these kinds of things—and everywhere I go I see them—and you get them from your own members' ridings, where it says that 96 per cent oppose gun registration, where in the world are you dreaming up these figures that you keep talking about?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. The Chair recognizes that this is very controversial and that there are very strongly held views on both sides of the debate. However I would remind members on both sides of the House to always direct their interventions through the Chair, through the Speaker, and avoid referring directly to one another as "you".

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for that. I forgot for a moment that you were there. I will not do that again. But as you say, it is very easy to get worked up.

I have attended over 19 public meetings. I have personally interviewed thousands of people and I have listened to them. I did not encourage them in any way, fashion or form. I asked: Are you familiar with the proposals? They said yes. I asked: Are you in favour? There was an overwhelming no. This is mostly grassroots. I do not have time for a lot of the elite, as do some of the ministers. I am talking to grassroots individuals throughout the country. They do not want it. It is loud and clear from every indication.

Check the petitions that are tabled and tell me how many petitions are in favour of this and how many are against. Mr. Speaker, you will be pleasantly surprised.

Mr. Dhaliwal: Mr. Speaker, on any given day on any issue I could probably get 1,000 people out in my riding. If a Reformer comes to speak in my riding, I can get 1,000 people to protest against them because of their stance. It is not hard to get 300 people up against it.

• (1620)

However, that is not the issue here. The issue is that overall, the polls coming in show again and again that the majority of Canadians are supporting this. There are going to be some people who oppose it because it will be in their interests to do so. These are the hunters and the people who sell guns. It is in their interests to oppose this.

Some of them have legitimate reasons. I give the minister credit because he has met with people right across the country from coast to coast to talk to them about their legitimate concerns. Some of them are hunters up in the north whose livelihoods depend on guns.

When the polls show that 15 per cent of the people are against this bill, they are going to sign petitions, but 85 per cent of the people want gun control. It is an overwhelming fact that people want gun control.

The Reform Party will pay a very high price for not listening to the Canadian public in the next election. A recent poll has shown how marginalized it is and it will be more marginalized after the next election. It will have less than the two seats the Conservatives got.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member from the other side state many facts and figures.

It has been mandatory to register handguns since 1934. I would like to know how much and how far crime has depleted with the use of handguns. I also heard the member mention crime control at border crossings. I would like the hon. member just to remember that this is the same government that could not stop the smuggling of cigarettes.

Mr. Dhaliwal: Mr. Speaker, this government has done a very good job in stopping the smuggling of cigarettes. All one has to do is look at the facts.

The hon. member was not listening when I gave an example. I said that in 1977, 39 per cent of the people were using a firearm in robberies. Now it is only 26 per cent. The evidence is there and it is overwhelming. If some people want to ignore the evidence, so be it. Some people do not want the truth and choose to ignore the evidence, as some of the Reform members have done.

However, we are not going to ignore the truth or the facts. We are going to look at this in 20 years and know that we did the right thing in this Parliament. We will have passed strong gun control legislation which I think should be even stronger than it is now. Canadians across this country have shown support for us. In the recent byelections it was three seats out of three for the Liberals. Why? It is because we are doing the right thing, we are listening to Canadians.

It is surprising that whenever we have done consultations the Reform Party has called them a sham. It is not interested in consultation and it is the party that wants consultation.

There are some legitimate concerns out there on gun control and the minister has dealt with those concerns. This is an excellent piece of legislation. I hope the members will strongly endorse and support it because when they look back at it 20 years from now, they will know they did the right thing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Kamloops—Taxation.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead has given me written notice that he will be unable to be present to move his motion under Private Members' Business on Friday, February 17, 1995.

[English]

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a). Accordingly, I am directing the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), private members' hour will be deferred and the House will continue with the business then before it.

• (1625)

[English]

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could stand today to say it is a pleasure for me to speak on Bill C–68 but I am afraid I cannot. I had hoped that the hon. minister would have listened to the concerns of literally hundreds of thousands, millions of Canadians across the country who have deep concerns about gun registration. Obviously he has not and has chosen to forge ahead.

I personally have received thousands of letters from people who are concerned that the Minister of Justice has confused gun control with crime control. I am sure that every other member of Parliament in the House has as well.

There is a growing perception that our justice system is not working. The justice minister and the anti–gun lobby are trying to convince everyone that if we just make it tougher to own and use a gun legally, somehow it will be harder for criminals to use them illegally. Somehow I have my doubts about that.

Our justice system was built on the principle that one is innocent until proven guilty. We must work hard to maintain the integrity of that system to ensure that innocent people are not deprived of their rights for the wrong reasons.

When any program is put into place, it should be clear what the objectives are. There should be a means of evaluating its effectiveness. In this case, I feel the government has clearly failed.

What does imposing more restrictions on law–abiding citizens have to do with crime control? To use the minister's own words, how does registration make Canada a safer, more civilized place to live? In 1993 the Auditor General said that we do not have statistics indicating whether previous gun control legislation has had any effect on the misuse of firearms.

The results of just one short term evaluation done in 1983 were used as a basis for the even stricter gun control legislation introduced by Kim Campbell, Bill C–17 in 1991. When Bill C–17 was passed, there was no real proof that the new laws or regulations would meet the government's crime control objectives.

This justice minister has introduced legislation with some very clear crime control measures, such as stiffer penalties for using a gun in the commission of a crime or for weapons trafficking. However, in the same bill he has included restrictions on honest citizens who he cannot demonstrate have anything to do with the problem.

I object to the minister lumping measures against criminals in with measures against law–abiding citizens. I object to the implication that responsible gun owners are somehow guilty of a moral deficiency or harbouring criminal intentions simply because they own a gun. I am referring to such measures as mandatory registration and powers of search and seizure without a warrant.

In parts of my riding, every household has at least one gun. The police have been handed the power to search businesses and premises other than dwellings, without a warrant. The minister has created a new category of criminals in this country.

Where I grew up in northern B.C., someone is a criminal if they do something illegal, if they actively go out and break the law. This bill makes honest Canadian citizens criminals subject to a 10 year prison term if they do not do something. If they fail to register their .22 they can be thrown in prison for up to 10 years.

Ten years was the penalty Denis Lortie got for murdering three people and wounding 13 others in the Quebec National Assembly. Ten years is the maximum penalty this minister is seeking for a young offender who commits premeditated first degree murder. Is this minister saying that because someone fails to register their gun they must be going to commit murder or rob a bank?

This legislation is a slap in the face to every law–abiding gun owner in Canada. This government tells us that we need tougher gun laws against legal gun owners because stolen guns are used by criminals. Where is the proof that registration will prevent even one death? The government does not have any.

If crime prevention is not the objective of registration, then what is? Murder rates in Canada have remained relatively stable over the last 15 years. Yet in April, the justice minister reacted to two high profile murders in Ottawa and Toronto by floating a proposal for a total ban on guns within city limits. Who did he think would be affected by such a ban, the criminals?

Tougher gun control legislation in many states has had no discernible impact on gun violence. In the United States 93 per cent of the guns used in homicides were apparently acquired illegally. New Zealand and Australia found registration did not help the police. It did not seem to have any tangible aim and did not help at the scene of a crime when the offender stole, borrowed or found a firearm.

What about in Canada? Here the government does not keep statistics on the use of illegally versus legally owned guns in the commission of crimes. Why not? Would they not support the government's position?

Last June I asked the Minister of Justice to prove to law–abiding gun owners that they are part of the crime problem before he enacts even tougher laws. We want proof that tighter restrictions for people who respect the law will prevent the criminals who do not respect the law from getting their hands on guns. Eight months later we are still waiting for an answer.

Restricted and prohibited firearms are already registered. What has their registration done to prevent crime? In most cases where restricted and presumably registered guns are used in crimes the government does not even know if the criminal bought the firearm legally. It does not keep records. There are already 1.2 million registered firearms in the country and this government does not have a clue how many of them were used in crimes because it does not ask. It knows guns used in crime were smuggled into the country and I fully support tougher measures against gun smuggling.

Why is the minister taking rights away from people who are not criminals? The hypocrisy of selling universal registration as crime control is readily apparent to everyone.

We know that thousands of guns are smuggled into the country all the time. What is the point of borders and laws if we cannot or will not enforce them? If we cannot close our borders to cigarette smuggling how much more difficult is it going to be when the government finally gets serious about gun smuggling? When will the government take a stand and give the police or the army the mandate to stop international trade in arms?

I visited with police in the Cornwall area. The minister and other members opposite like to talk about how they have the support of the police forces. Everyone knows gun smuggling is going on down there but they have not been able to stop it. When I questioned the police as to why they have not been able to stop the smuggling they said to me: "Why should we risk ourselves with a small revolver against automatic weapons? When we apprehend these people, we make an arrest, we get them into court and they get off with a slap on the wrist".

Their message to me was to get tough with the people who are misusing and abusing firearms rather than legislate a useless registration system.

I hope this government's anti–smuggling legislation works better than its anti–cigarette campaign. I understand cigarette use has increased dramatically since this government lowered the taxes a year ago. I hope the plan is not to lower the taxes on guns to combat smuggling.

Bill C–68 has some tough laws on trafficking. Under sections 99 and 100 of part III of the Criminal Code a weapons trafficker will get up to 10 years. I also notice that tucked away in section 110(v) of the Firearms Act the governor in council can pass regulations "respecting the manner in which any provision of this act or the regulation applies to any of the aboriginal peoples of Canada and adapting any such provision for the purposes of that application".

The question has been asked and will repeatedly be asked whether this legislation will apply equally to all Canadians. The minister's reply throws more confusion when he says yes, but with flexibility toward the aboriginal people. What does this mean? Canadians need to know.

The justice minister maintains that the government is not effectively destroying the value of the prohibited handguns because Bill C–68 creates a class of gun owners they can trade with. This class is defined as any current gun owner who legally owned one of the newly prohibited guns on or before Tuesday, February 14. Considering that date I wonder if Bill C–68 is not just a Valentine's present by the minister to Wendy Cukler of the Coalition for Gun Control.

Does that really protect their investment in these guns? Over time the class of owners will dwindle through attrition. Fewer and fewer people will be allowed to buy these guns and eventually there would be only one avid collector in possession of half a million guns. When he or she dies all those guns will be confiscated by the crown. Will they get fair compensation for those firearms if he or she tries to sell them before they die? There will only be a few collectors allowed to buy them. Do not tell me that fair compensation will be offered. Do not tell me or the country that their market will be stable.

Last year a young Edmonton mother, Barb Danelesko, was savagely murdered in a home invasion. Do you think she could have convinced a firearms officer that she needed to protect herself or her children? Recently one young offender found guilty for that crime was handed a three–year sentence.

Under Bill C–68, if Mrs. Danelesko had had an unregistered firearm at her disposal for her defence and had survived, she would have had to face up to 10 years for non–compliance. Where is the balance? Where is the justice?

Proven criminals receive fewer years than this minister wants to give responsible hunters who have done nothing wrong but failed to register their shotgun.

Many people, especially those living in cities, do not believe the ability to protect your home and family is a legitimate reason to own a gun. The justice minister certainly does not believe it.

Less than a year ago he said he came to Ottawa with the firm belief that the only people in this country who should have guns are police officers and soldiers. This is a sobering thought for millions of responsible gun owners in Canada. With the introduction of Bill C–68 he is one step closer to fulfilling his goal.

He also said he did not want Canadians to think they needed to protect themselves. I have news for him. With our over burdened police forces and court system, most Canadians already know they need to protect themselves.

Guns are a necessary part of life for many people in northern B.C. Farmers need them for predator control. Trappers and guides use them every day in their work. Hunters use them to help stock their freezers. Many of us also believe that we should be able to use guns for personal protection, to defend our homes, our families and our property.

The criminals laugh while the rest of us become their victims and have our civil liberties taken away. This is how the Liberal government deals with gun related violence. People need to be able to defend themselves in situations in which the police, as much as they would like to, cannot.

In Edmonton a man shot at intruders in his yard and he is the one facing charges. The papers called the thwarted robber the victim. If we are to have true justice the rights of the innocent defending their homes must supersede the rights of the guilty who are trying to rob them.

Today the criminals are called the victims and society apologizes for their behaviour. Meanwhile responsible citizens have more of their rights infringed upon because the police and the courts cannot keep up.

This government is trying to convince Canadians that gun control is the same thing as crime control. Maybe it is easier to go after law–abiding gun owners than after hardened criminals. I do not believe it is going to solve the crime problem and I do not think most Canadians do either.

I do recognize, however, that there are positive aspects to this legislation. If the hon. members opposite would listen, I will list the positive aspects.

For example, I applaud the changes to section 85 for the use of a gun in the commission of a crime. It has been beefed up to include imitation firearms and use during flight or the attempted commission of a crime. Although the first offence only gets 1 to 14 years, subsequent offences will net a criminal 3 to 14 to be served consecutively to any other sentence related to the same event.

However, these changes are meaningless if the charge is plea bargained away in our overcrowded courts. On the first offence a criminal would also be prohibited from owning a gun for 10 years. If he or she violates this prohibition order, they are subject to a maximum 10–year sentence. It does not say if it is consecutive.

I have some questions about whether the 10–year maximum for violation of the prohibition could ever get tacked on to a maximum 14–year sentence for using a gun in another crime. I think a potential 24–year sentence for using a firearm again would certainly make some criminals think twice before acquiring yet another gun for illegal purposes.

Making sentences tougher on the books will not mean anything to criminals if our judges will not impose sentences consistently or if gun charges are plea bargained away. Imposing a mandatory minimum sentence for armed crimes has no deterrent effect if criminals do not get a consistent message.

The minister has given law enforcement officers greater powers under this bill for search and seizure. The police need to be able to go into a domestic violence situation with the ability to remove firearms while the situation is still out of control.

However, this minister has given police far greater powers. Under section 117.02 police officers can enter any premises, except dwellings, without a warrant if they suspect someone has not registered their shotgun. Why does this justice minister believe people sign away their rights to privacy simply because they choose to own a gun?

I would like to draw the attention of the House to section 112 which says many regulations made by the governor in council do not have to be laid before the House. I find it very disturbing that further regulations can be made with respect to the Firearms Act or part III of the Criminal Code without coming before Parliament.

A small handful of people can make regulations affecting millions of gun owners and there is no public accountability or scrutiny before going into effect. I do not believe it is right that a handful of bureaucrats should be able to make regulations that can land Canadian citizens in prison.

The Minister of Justice believes Canadians widely support all of his gun control initiatives as we have heard countless times in the past and again today. Why does he not have the courage to place all orders in council related to his Firearms Act before the House? Why does Bill C–68 make it so explicit that regulations can be passed without parliamentary approval?

More important, why does he not separate his new Firearms Act pertaining to legal gun owners from his amendments to part III of the Criminal Code dealing with criminals? He has said in the House today that the reason he has drafted the Firearms Act is to address the concerns expressed by legitimate firearms owners, that they feel certain violations pertaining to them should not fall under the Criminal Code.

If he is convinced this has widespread support, he should have the courage to separate these two issues and defend each on its own merits.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am frankly sick of listening to the flagrant misrepresentations the hon. member is indulging in with his efforts to mislead the Canadian public as to what is going on in this bill. He knows perfectly well he is doing it and he should be ashamed of himself.

I refer him for the purpose of clearing up the error—perhaps he will admit his deliberate error—to section 92(1) of the proposed new bill currently before the House. Page 68:

> Subject to subsection (4) and section 98, every person commits an offence who possesses a firearm knowing that the person is not the holder of
> (a) a licence under which the person may possess it; and
> (b) a registration certificate for the firearm.

Subsection 3 says:

> Every person who commits an offence under subsection (1) or (2) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable——to the 10 year imprisonment to which he referred. This is a person who committed an offence possessing a firearm knowing the person was not the holder of a licence and that the gun was unregistered. In other words, it is the criminal misuse of firearms.

Let us go back to section 91(1) of the bill:

> Subject to subsection (4) and section 98, every person commits an offence who possesses a firearm, unless the person is the holder of
> (a) a licence under which the person may possess it; and
> (b) a registration certificate for the firearm.

Then it says in subsection (3):

> Every person who commits an offence under subsection (1) or (2)
> (a) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years; or
> (b) is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

He knows that an offence punishable on summary conviction carries a maximum sentence of six months or a $2,000 fine. It also carries the possibility of an absolute or conditional discharge. He knows that the innocent gun owner who fails to register will be charged under that section, not someone who is committing an offence which is the section he is referring to when he talks about 10 years. He is misleading the Canadian public. He should apologize for his deceit.

• (1645)

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that we are able to excite the opposition across the way.

What I was referring to—and I stand by my earlier statements—is that there are two classes of people when it comes to registering firearms. There are those who will be covered by section 91 who will for some reason not hear about it. I cannot imagine who they will be because everyone, before we get done, is going to know about this. I do not think the government can keep it a secret much longer. The word is getting out.

For those who inadvertently do not register their firearms, the hon. member is quite correct, under section 91 they will either be facing a jail term of up to five years or an offence punishable by summary conviction which could be as little as a fine.

However, section 92 pertains to people who willingly disobey and do not register their firearms. For this crime, the government has decided that 10 years imprisonment is a justifiable sentence. I have talked to hundreds and hundreds of gun owners throughout my riding.

In January I took a tour throughout my riding which covers the whole northeastern corner of British Columbia. I tried to talk to as many people as possible. We held meetings on this. As one of my hon. colleagues said, I did not try to drum up the anti–gun control sentiment. I merely went to these meetings and asked the individuals how they felt about it. I did not have to ask very loudly because they were very forthcoming with their sentiments about more gun control and certainly about registration, not only on restricted firearms but on long guns as well.

I asked them in confidence, without revealing names, how many of them were going to be registering their firearms. I did not find one individual in my travels who said he or she would willingly and voluntarily register his or her firearms.

Under section 92 those individuals, if they have willingly not registered their firearms, will be subject to 10 years of imprisonment. That is how I read this, but I admit that I am not a lawyer, and thank goodness I am not a lawyer.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. colleague give his speech and I have a couple of questions I would like to ask him.

Regarding the numbers and stats, how far did you go in trying to find this information? Were you able to get this information from the Minister of Justice or his department? Also, with you living in a rural area how long would it take for the police to respond?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We use the word "you" so often that somehow there is sort of a dialogue going on between the two of you while the rest of us are attentively waiting to get involved. I certainly do not want to be forgotten or left out. Please, through the Speaker.

Mr. Stinson: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to forget about you either.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member how long it would take the police force to respond to his home in case of an emergency if he was to dial 911 like we normally can in most cities?

• (1650)

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his questions.

As I indicated in my speech, it is simply not possible for our police to get there on time. If we talk to the policemen one on one they readily admit this.

Statistics clearly indicate, unfortunately, that the vast majority of times when police are responding to a crime, by the time they get there the crime has already taken place. Their job is to try to investigate and hopefully apprehend the criminal. That is the job and the duty of the police in most cases. On rare occasions they can intervene in time to save someone from assault, rape or murder, but it does not happen very often.

In my case, because I live outside of town, I suggest it would probably take in the neighbourhood of half an hour for the police to get there if someone was breaking into my home. We see increasing evidence across the country that citizens are concerned. There is increasing evidence of home invasions, where young hoodlums break into homes, often targeting the elderly. They break into these homes for no apparent reason. Many times the people are at home and they have no means to defend themselves.

I guess the answer to my hon. friend's question is that it would probably take about half an hour before the police could respond to a break–in in my home.

As to how much effort I have made to try to get statistics from the government, I referred in my speech to the fact that last June I asked a question during question period of the minister requesting the statistical evidence to prove how even the existing gun controls under Bill C–17, without registration, were working to prevent crime, to bring down the levels of violent crime and the criminal misuse of firearms. Nothing was forthcoming.

On October 28, 1994 I placed a question on the Order Paper. I could read it but it is quite lengthy. It consists of seven specific questions that ask the government to provide proof to us, and to the Canadian people, how legal firearms pertain to crime in the country.

I will refer to one of the questions, which is part (c) of Question No. 96. In that question I was referring to section 85 of the Criminal Code, which is already in force. The question is as follows: "How many of those charged with this offence were the legally registered owner of the firearm used in the commission or attempted commission of the crime?" It is a very simple, straightforward question asking for statistical evidence.

What was provided after three months, not 45 days, was the following answer:

> The Uniform Crime Reporting Survey—which comes from StatsCan:

> —does not collect information which can distinguish the number of criminal offences which have been committed with the use of legal firearms. Prior to 1992 the Homicide Survey collected data on registered and non–registered firearms, but because this information was grossly under–reported (90 per cent unknown) the data are no longer collected.

That is the best the government could provide to me in the way of statistics to show that legally owned firearms have anything to do with curbing crime.

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people of northern Ontario have a culture that is unique, and part of our culture is hunting and fishing. My riding of Nickel Belt is a rural riding. I probably have more hunters and fisherpersons than most of the Reform members.

I support this legislation and I have supported registration since we began to speak about it. As a matter of fact, during the campaign we had 12 debates and I made it very clear that our policy was to fight crime. We have presented legislation which will fight crime.

Part of this bill deals with the smuggling, the importing, of arms. It is a very important part of this legislation.

• (1655)

The next package that will be coming is sentencing. The Reform Party would like to throw everybody in jail and throw away the key. That is not the way we want to run the country. Probation is a very important issue for the government. The Young Offenders Act is very important as is the gun bill or the gun and rifle registration.

How can a government that is serious about fighting crime, a government that is responding to requests from Canadians from all over to combat crime, a government that wants credibility say: "We will look at importation and smuggling. We will look at sentencing. We will look at probation. We will look at family violence. We will look at the Young Offenders Act but we will not talk about guns or rifles. We will not talk about this".

How can any politician have credibility and say, we will fight crime but we will not talk about the weapons that kill people?

I intentionally prepared this speech not wanting to use statistics. The reason I am not using statistics is that I do not have to stand in the House to convince my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois. Very seldom can I stand and say that I agree with what they are doing. They agree with this bill.

Even though its members want to leave our country—they will not leave—they have the good sense, they have the wisdom and they care enough to want to leave behind a country that is safe, a country that continues to be the envy of the world. In the end that is why they will not leave. They will stay with us and feel good about having supported this legislation.

I will not spend too much time referring to the Reform Party because it is very clear that its view of Canada and my view of Canada differs immensely. I would not spend valuable time in the House trying to compare the views of these individuals who do not care who has guns, who do not care how many guns there are, who do not care what kind of guns they are, who want to throw everybody in jail, who say: "Hang them. Bring back capital punishment if you want to eliminate crime".

An hon. member: Good idea.

Mr. Bonin: "Good idea", he says. Do all these things. One thing we never hear is "do it with compassion". Talk about the individuals. Talk about the families of criminals, because they are victims also. If we do not deal with people everything is so simple.

When I have a discussion with a group it really scares me when one individual in the group has all the answers, when one individual for any problem that one can present has a solution. It is usually a very simplistic solution. I get my share of hearing simplistic solutions when I listen to the Reform Party address the House.

The people representing Canadians on all sides of the House have worked for years to make Canada a safe country, a safe society, a place where people want to emigrate to and contribute to and create wealth.

My two sons are married and I am very proud of that. They married last summer. The next step will be grandchildren. I look forward to it. I spoke so proudly a few minutes ago about northern Ontario and Nickel Belt but there are things that I am concerned about for my grandchildren.

I have brought a newspaper article. I have them by the dozen in my riding. "Former boyfriend shoots single mom then commits suicide in apartment". That was in my riding and there are a number of them.

• (1700)

Mr. Grubel: It was a handgun.

Mr. Bonin: I hear remarks. This does not affect individuals who care not about people but it affects me that this young woman was shot and killed. It affects me that every six days it happens in Canada. When we say it, we hear silly remarks from individuals who do not care about people. They ask whether the gun was registered. If it was registered, would it make it okay? No, that is not the issue.

Mr. Morrison: That is the question.

Mr. Bonin: That is not the issue. The issue is that for a number of years in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada you could buy guns if you owned an FAC. If you did not own an FAC you could not buy guns. That is fine.

What has been happening is that people are starting to think differently about guns. I come from a culture where there was a gun on the wall. It came from dad, a beautiful short .22, a masterpiece. We all wanted to inherit it.

The issue is that people are tired of guns. People who do not use them say that it is too cumbersome and too much trouble to own rifles. They want to get rid of them, have them taken off their hands. Someone with an FAC could take it off the owner's hands for 20 bucks. The person with the FAC bought it, legitimately and legally. The result of that is there are people in my riding who own 250 and 300 rifles legitimately and they are not registered.

Mr. Morrison: So what?

Mr. Bonin: The so what is that come June, junior boy or girl graduates from high school and throws a party. There are 300 people in that house and a fight breaks loose. Members are laughing. We are talking about possible victims and they are laughing. When the fight breaks out and the police are called they say: "Give us a break. Give us a chance. Before we knock on that door we want to know if there are 300 guns downstairs". And these members laugh.

This legislation is just a small piece of a large puzzle. All members of Parliament take their jobs seriously, even my colleagues from the Reform Party. I know they take their jobs seriously. I do not think their motives are correct, but I think they believe in them so they are doing the best they can.

I take this very seriously. Gun control is very serious. Guns are serious. However it is not the most pressing problem in my life. I want to deal with this, I want to pass it and I want to get it done.

Then I want to move on to senior citizens who are losing their ability to support themselves, some of whom are lonely and addicts dying alone. I want to deal with people who cannot find jobs. I want to deal with children who go to school in the morning with cramps in their bellies because they do not have food. I want to move on. When we deal with these issues I hope my colleagues will have the same vigour they have when they take so much pleasure in talking about guns. What a fun thing to talk about.

I want to deal with family violence. I want to deal with the deficit. I want to deal with the debt. For Canadians to be part of a democracy, if the price they have to pay is to register their guns and their long arms then I am prepared to do it. I will be the first to line up to register mine.

Reform members say that registration will not eliminate all serious crimes so we should not do anything about it. They do not worry about how many guns people have. They do not worry about the kinds.

• (1705)

The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police say that we need gun registration. The police association says: "We support registration. Help us do our job". The Reform Party says: "They do not know what they are talking about". The police officers want it. Their associations do too.

The Reform Party spoke of motions that were presented by towns and municipalities. The FCM represents all municipalities in this country and it supports this. But the Reform Party says: "They do not know what the heck they are talking about". The list goes on. I will not name them all because it will take up my 20 minutes.

Nobody knows anything about anything, only the few members of Parliament here on the Reform side who do not even agree with the majority of people in their own ridings.

Mr. Morrison: What about the 12,000 people who marched on Ottawa?

Mr. Bonin: Last summer was when the debate first started and I remember full well. It has been a good debate. We have served our constituents well. We have met with them. Many times my constituents were misinformed and they disagreed with me. I met with them anyway and I took my bumps.

Last summer when we met for the first rally, here is what was distributed. It is very interesting that many of the lines that are used in the presentations by the Reform members are lines that are used in the documents of propaganda. It may be a coincidence.

This is how the debate started: "To all firearms owners, the federal Minister of Justice wants to ban all firearms in Canada. Contact your member of Parliament immediately and tell him or her the following: This is unacceptable. Firearm owners are tired of being punished for the acts of criminals. Members of Parliament who advocate gun control or the banning of firearms and ammunition banning are attempting to deceive Canadians into thinking that gun control will prevent or reduce crime. Banning of firearms and gun control will not prevent or reduce crime. Criminals do not obey laws", and it goes on to talk about polls. When I heard these things at the beginning I said no.

The media called me and asked whether I supported the banning of all guns, arms and long rifles. I said that I did not support that as it is part of our culture. I still have guns. Every year my brothers phone me and ask: "Are you coming hunting with us this year? You have not been hunting with us for a number of years. You are so involved with your politics you never have time to come hunting". But I will go back. Someday I will retire and I will go hunting. I am a legitimate gun owner and I will be the first one lined up to register my guns.

But then there was a debate. People call it a rally. There we were, as we usually say, two against a thousand. But it was two against about 250. It was amazing. The information that came out of that room was scary. When it was over I moved through the hall talking to individuals. I asked one individual: "What is the problem for you?" The answer was: "It is going to cost a lot and it is not going to work". I asked: "If it does not cost a lot and it is an efficient and effective system, can you live with that?" The answer was yes.

Do you know what? One of the organizers stepped in and said: "Do not say that. That is what Hitler did. He registered all guns and then he confiscated them all". That is the fear that was put into them. Some of these people were senior citizens. The reason they were concerned about the cost is because it is difficult for them to make ends meet. These organizers put that fear into their minds. They said: "That is what Hitler did". I heard Hitler's name so many times it was scary.

My answer to them is that in Canada we have more boy scouts and girl guides than we have soldiers, so we cannot go in and confiscate all those guns. We have no intention of doing it and we do not have the capacity to do it.

• (1710)

We kept getting the calls. Getting the calls is very difficult because everyone agrees that we work long hours and it takes time. However, that is the best way to deal with the issue. I would rather get 100 phone calls than meet 100 people in one hall because I know I can give the correct information and mail out documents.

Canadians are reasonable when we pull the individuals away from the people who try to influence their way of thinking. They understand common sense. They tell me that if it is cheap and reasonable, there is no problem and they will register them. That is what is happening and it will be cheap.

We continued the debate and the fear mongering kept happening. Now we are here with a document. We had a document before Christmas which I mailed out to many people. Some people will never agree with anything that is said. Maybe they were former Reform Party candidates, I do not know, but they will never agree. It is impossible to discuss common sense with them. Now we have a document so I am calling them.

If I have a few minutes I call them and say for example: "You are a target shooter and you are the first group I went to see. I went to see you at the range on a Sunday morning". Like the minister, I was impressed at the seriousness of these people and how they are careful to check their members. I remember being asked for a letter of reference for a person who wanted to become a member. They go through the whole thing. It impressed me. That was at the time when it was being said that we would confiscate all these things. The media was saying it and the Reform Party was saying it.

I said to them then: "No. The Liberal Party does not do it to the people; we do it for the people. We are being asked to do it and we will do it for Canadians". Now I call them and I say: "Tell me what the problem is with the bill in the way we have presented it. Does it prevent you from practising your sport?" One of them said: "Well, the .32". I said to him: "No, in the legislation you will find that all guns and rifles that are used in legitimate competitions will be permitted". They had no problem with that.

Some will have a problem. When I go back they will have heard this and they will say: "Ray, you said I would have no problem and I have a problem". I agree that some people will have problems.

Before talking about the collectors, just before I left home I saw a sad thing on TV. I cannot even begin to tell you how many rifles, guns, grenades, rounds of ammunition, launchers and machine guns that someone turned over. The discussion was bringing people out of the woodwork. This was in a private home. It scared the heck out of me. We do not know who the individual is. For all I know, it could be my neighbour. I do not think so but it is somebody's neighbour.

I called the legitimate collectors and asked them if they had a problem. They do not have a problem any more. They have intelligently and reasonably brought their comments to the Minister of Justice either directly or through us and their concerns have been addressed. Their investment can now be sold to other collectors of the same nature and the estate can sell them. Brokers eventually will sell them outside the country, the illegal ones. Eventually they will be gone and I will be glad when they are.

Some people said: "Well this gun came from my great–grandfather". When they told me that I brought it to the attention of the Minister of Justice because I had to agree with them. It is not a gun that will be used even for target shooting. It is just great–grandpa's gun or rifle. It is something that you do not sell, there is no value in that. Now we are going to find a way for people to pass them on.

We are left with registration, the only other problem we can have now. The minister has repeatedly told us today that it will be cheap. It may be free. I am talking about registration. It may be free and will be very reasonable. I am talking about people. I am talking about the gun owners.

It is difficult for the Reform Party to relate that I am talking about individuals. It is talking about the 85 million, because it does not know how to associate an issue with individuals. That is what we are talking about here today. The cost will be very reasonable. It will be efficient.

After we had our discussions, our rallies, the pro–gun groups were still not satisfied. I understand it was because there was so much wrong information going around. On their behalf I asked the justice minister to come to our region to talk to the people who are against him.

As backbenchers they say we do not count in this House and cannot do a thing. We, the backbenchers, were able to ask our Minister of Justice to come to our communities to talk to the people who are working against him. Tell me another country where that happens. That does not even happen in the United States, a democracy. However, in Canada it does because we have a Minister of Justice who cares about people, individuals. He covered six ridings.

It was suggested that we invite four individuals in each riding. I invited the president of the local gun club. I did not try to dodge the issue, did I? I invited the president of the local gun club who was against the legislation and probably still is. I will have to phone him when I get back home.

I invited the president of the fish and game association, who is adamantly against it. He bought a membership in my riding and he was going to the annual meeting in Toronto, and we did not try to stop him or railroad the meeting. We welcomed him. To balance the load, I invited the crown attorney because they meet the victims.

My fourth candidate was Dr. Bota who works in emergency at Sudbury General Hospital. This is the individual who meets the victims, sometimes teenagers who try to commit suicide with these long rifles lying around uncontrolled in their homes. They blow off half their face. He works on them for hours and hours. He saves them and tries to rebuild their features. These young people are still alive. They are discouraged individuals. If we can save one of them, it is worth it. One in a hundred years is worth it.

Let one go. It is just an individual. That is what I am hearing—embarrassing. The hard core individuals said the figures were all wrong in Dr. Bota's study, who had just marked real cases, a real scientific poll.

Canadians have asked us to do something for them. They have asked us to make Canada safe. The women of Sudbury who are walking one night a year to take back the streets that are too dangerous are saying do it.

I say to the minister let us do it fast, in spite of the members from the Reform, because we know the people they represent want us to do it too.

• (1720)

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I really do not know what to say about this. Most of what I heard was absolute nonsense.

Not all of what he said was nonsense. He talked about saving one life. An individual told me of this actual account where an elderly couple was driving through the United States. Somehow they got off the turnpike and down two or three miles on to a narrow road. When they ran out of gas, he took a container and tried to get back to the highway. He got lost in the woods and they never saw him again but his wife had some supplies in the motorhome and she was able to live for two weeks. She was saved by a hunter who found her. He saved one life. I agree with my hon. colleague.

There are both sides to this argument and we should recognize both sides. He has certainly taken a shot at the Reformers but he should take a look and save some of his energy in terms of discussing what we stand for and why we are against this bill. He should talk to his own backbench. He should perhaps clean up his own House if he thinks that this bill is absolutely waterproof and bulletproof. Start there.

He told the story about selling his guns to a person who had a FAC. He has over 200 guns. He told about a party and problems arising and the police being called in. It sounded to me as if everyone was going to run for a rifle.

I spent 14 years as a peace officer and I have never heard such nonsense in all my life. Even if that did happen, what difference would it make to the police or anyone else if those firearms were registered? What difference would it make? This is the essential question that we ask.

For those who commit suicide, what difference does it make if the weapons are registered? For women who are shot every six days in this country, what difference does it make? This bill does not attack the cause, domestic disputes. It does not attack the cause of suicides. That is what we are saying ought to be done.

Certainly if registration is going to reduce that, please tell us how because we do not know how. We have as much concern about these matters as anyone in the House. We have sons and daughters, brothers and sisters and aunts and uncles. They are not immune to these social problems. We have as much concern about that as anyone across the way.

We ask very simply how will the registration of these 200 firearms have any impact at all? Reduce the suicides. Reduce the domestic occurrences. How will it do that? I did not hear a thing. I never heard a thing that the hon. member said that went anywhere near answering that question.

That is what the common sense people are asking for. I have told the people all across the country where I have met with them that I would be willing to give up my right to own the old weapon that I have locked away if it would reduce the criminal use of firearms.

It is not going to reduce the criminal use of firearms. It is simply not because we know where they are getting them from. He has given evidence of that. The haul that the police made in Vancouver on all of these weapons being smuggled in is evidence.

As a peace officer I know we get about 10 per cent of the infractions that occur. One can multiply that haul by about 90 per cent for the day. We have some understanding of the number of firearms being smuggled into our country.

If statistics and evidence can be submitted to suggest that this will save lives, we have not seen it yet and that is what we are asking for.

• (1725)

Before the hon. member comments on what I have had to say, I would like to point out one glaring error in the statistics which have been given to the House in this debate. In 1977 the Auditor General's report indicated clearly that the reduction in violent crime through the use of firearms was beginning before the legislation came in. The Auditor General said that it was wrong to assume that the total responsibility for the dip which had been reported in the House after the 1977 legislation was brought in was the only cause for the decline because there were causative factors which came to bear prior to that.

I leave that information for the hon. member. I have been in northern Ontario, by invitation, and I welcome him on the campaign trail during the next election if he continues his stand on this issue.

Mr. Bonin: Mr. Speaker, the challenge is accepted. I will be running in the next election and I will support this bill.

I am here to do a job. I am here to do what is good for Canadians. Unlike my colleagues on the other side, everything that I do in politics is not measured by the number of votes that I will be getting. I am here to do an honest job. I swore an oath. I told people about the way that I do my politics and my politics are done for the good of the people I represent, not to be re–elected.

It is fascinating that people who question every simple statistic presented by reputable companies, who have disputed every poll done by credible, reputable companies are saying show them statistics. We know already they will say they are all wrong, only their statistics apply.

My hon. colleague who asked the question said that he was a police officer and that he had never heard of such hogwash. When I said there were 250 to 300 rifles in some of my constituents' basements, it is because a crime was committed in one of those homes, the wife was killed and suicide occurred. I do not make up these stories. They break us up when we think about them, when we think of their children and their neighbours. It is not hogwash. If that is the type of police officers in his community, I am very pleased he was not a police officer in northern Ontario. I will leave it at that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We have very little time before we move to the next order of business at 5:30. I will take a question from the hon. member for Red Deer, but wanting to give an equal amount of time to the hon. member for Nickel Belt to respond, I hope that the intervention will be brief in order that he may give a brief response.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will make my question very brief. I will not try to answer or discuss any of the claims which have been made. However, what I would like to do—and you know the facility that I am talking about in central Alberta, between Edmonton and Calgary—is challenge the minister to stand in front of the thousands of people who would come out to hear the facts about this whole gun control legislation and tell them why they should vote for it. That is an open challenge to the minister to come to tell the people the facts. There will be thousands.

I just brought down a petition which had 5,000 signatures. That gives us an idea of the interest which exists. These people want to hear answers, they want the truth and they want the facts.

I challenge the minister to take me up on that.

[Translation]

Mr. Bonin: Mr. Speaker, the justice minister travelled to Alberta on at least five occasions. Possibly the hon. member opposite was misled when I said that, as a back–bencher, I had asked the minister to come and visit my riding. I think he heard somehow that I was the Minister of Justice. He heard wrong. Mr. Rock is the Minister of Justice and I am the back–bencher.

I would like to address the first question, as I am told it was not answered. How will registration help reduce crime? Already, I have widows phoning me to say: "I have rifles here and I do not know what to do. Can you help?" Already, people in my riding are starting to say: "We have rifles at home and we want to get rid of them."

People who own between 200 and 300 rifles will take them out, women will make sure that men get rid of rifles, and vice versa, and the problem will be solved.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.) moved that Bill C–263, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof (exempted crown corporations), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the message was loud and clear to every member of Parliament during the last election. Our constituents demanded accountability.

All members of the House were asked by their constituents to come to Ottawa to work toward solutions to the debt problem facing our nation. I am sure all hon. members would agree that as elected representatives of the people we ought to work toward ensuring accountability in every activity of the federal government.

The Canadian people want us to provide the means by which we can all come to trust the government. When it concerns government programs my constituents, and I am sure many MPs feel the same way, are very inquisitive. They are like investigative reporters. They use the five ws: who, what, when, where, why and all the time when it comes to government programs they ask how much it is going to cost. The people of Canada want to know. They want to be proud of the activities and the performance of the federal government.

Bill C–263 provides all members of the House with an opportunity to say to their constituents that at least in some small way we have come together to work toward ensuring that the federal government is accountable to the Canadian taxpayer.

I feel strongly that members from all sides of the House should rally in support of Bill C–263 so that we can honestly say we have tried to respond to the wishes of the people who sent us here.

Bill C–263 is not all encompassing, dictatorial, unable to change or restrictive. Bill C–263 is flexible. I have tried to provide an occasion for all corners of the House to work together and at the end of the day five crown corporations will be more accountable. We will all feel as though we have done a good day's work and proudly report to our constituents what we have done. Our constituents in turn will take note of our work and they will feel we are serious about doing positive and constructive work.

As members know, in the 1993–94 fiscal year crown corporations incurred losses of $57.2 million. Their net borrowing from the Government of Canada amounted to $14.2 billion and they received $4.6 billion from the government through budgetary appropriations.

We say $1 billion so often it just floats by. How much is $1 billion? It is such a massive amount. If you earned $1 per second you would be a millionaire in 11 days; but it would take you 33 years to become a billionaire.

When we are talking of billions of dollars it is very important that we do not just flash by it very quickly and nct understand how large a sum of money it is. Our task is to ensure for our constituents that every government department and agency be accountable for every tax dollar spent. I dare say that everyone in the House wants to be able to say to the people at home that we are responsible to the people who ultimately pay the bills, the Canadian taxpayer.

• (1735)

On those occasions when constituents ask us why it is that certain public corporations do not report their financial status, members have no satisfactory response. The average Canadian wants to know about all federal agencies and departments.

When constituents hear about an activity financed by the government and they are not allowed to know about the finances associated with that activity, they become quite interested. They are concerned that maybe there is something to hide.

The Auditor General has a key role to play in this regard. In many cases, which I will refer to in a moment, the Auditor General has not only made available publicly the exact facts and figures concerning the activities and performance of the federal government, but the Auditor General has been able to improve such activities and performance levels by dissecting and evaluating agencies and departments.

There is no shame involved in the work performed by the Auditor General. The auditor's detection of poor performance and recommendations is seen by Canadians as routine and expected. Canadian firms, large and small, perform audits on their own activities and performance. Often the audits show that they are right on track with their objectives. And sometimes they must swallow tough medicine to cure ailments detected in their business audits. This is a fact of life. Canadians expect their government to follow good business practices as well.

No one can deny the performance of the Auditor General in recent history. Progress has been made. The Auditor General has the power to follow up on recommendations. The result has been that in many cases Canadians are realizing better value for their tax dollars because of the efforts of the Office of the Auditor General.

In May 1994 the members of this place took a step closer to greater accountability by freeing the Office of the Auditor General to report on matters which the auditor deems pressing. Members of the House have already moved in the direction of Bill C–263, by endowing the Auditor General with a measure of discretion. In fact, there was a great deal of agreement on all sides of the House. We saw this as a good thing, a chance that would enhance the Auditor General's ability to do the job expected of the office.

Canadians want their watchdog to have a long enough leash. We all wanted to further empower the watchdog last spring, and I am sure I speak for all of us when I say we were proud to do so.

With reforms instituted in 1984, most crown corporations have operated within the accountability framework established under part X of the Financial Administration Act. Part X of the act requires each crown corporation to do three things:

There must be an annual report. The annual report in addition to its financial statements in the auditor's report also presents information on how well the objectives of corporations were achieved during the reporting period. Crown corporations must submit a corporate plan. They must submit budget summaries for tabling in Parliament.

In my view, these requirements are basic and simple. They are not unreasonable. Yet we have a system where all crown corporations are not required to do these basics.

Canadians expect that their tax dollars are spent within this framework of accountability. Again, when Canadians hear of moneys being spent by the government without the above criteria, they become suspicious. There is good reason for Canadians to feel this way. The Financial Administration Act could be easily made applicable to the crown corporations listed in Bill C–263.

There are 49 crown corporations, seven of which are exempted from the Financial Administration Act. They are the Bank of Canada, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canada Council, the Canadian Film Development Corporation, also known as Telefilm Canada, the Canadian Wheat Board, the International Development Research Centre and the National Arts Centre. Bill C–263 would move these crown corporations under the supervision of the Auditor General with the exception of the Bank of Canada and the CBC.

With respect to the Bank of Canada, central banking independence is critical for the proper conduct of monetary policy. Monetary policy is ultimately the responsibility of the federal government, specifically the Minister of Finance and the executive of the Bank of Canada. There are informal avenues of accountability to which the governor of the Bank of Canada is subject.

With respect to the CBC, provisions of the Financial Administration Act were incorporated into the Broadcasting Act in 1991. In short, the CBC is already subject to the accountability requirements of Bill C–263 and the Financial Administration Act.

This latter point is important for all members to note. The CBC is the recipient of about 70 per cent of government funding provided to exempt crown corporations. This means that Bill C–263 is finishing the job already accomplished by Parliament. Since 1991, the CBC has adjusted to the accountability requirements of part X of the Financial Administration Act.

Hon. members may agree with my observation that the CBC, more than any other exempt crown corporation in Bill C–263, was most insistent about the idea of the critical importance of an arm's length relationship to government. Yet the CBC has not had any of the difficulties that it anticipated in adapting to these accountability requirements. The CBC has been operating within this framework for the past four years.

I can remind my colleagues that the Auditor General already performs financial audits on the five crown corporations in this bill. These audits do not permit the Auditor General to comment on the appropriateness of the activities of the five nor is the auditor able to comment on the extent to which each fulfils its mandate. As it stands now these are not value for money audits.

Value for money audits are done every five years. They are different from the annual audits in that they comment on corporate management, goals and objectives. I think it is fair to say that the boards of the exempt corporations should welcome the value for money audits. It is not unthinkable that the board members would look on the audits as helpful to their work as well as a positive accountability measure.

In the course of my work and research concerning this bill, I have stumbled across some very interesting things. For example, I have a letter from Tommy Banks, a member of the Canada Council audit and evaluation committee which he wrote to me shortly after I began working on my bill.

In his letter, Mr. Banks heralds the benefits of special examinations which the Auditor General has been invited to do for the Canada Council every five years since 1986. Mr. Banks states that "the glaring scrutiny by the Auditor General—is contemplated as an ongoing process". Yet there is no formalization of this process. The problem now is that there is no assurance that these value for money audits will be done in a set time frame with the resulting benefits of regular periodic audits. Clearly a legislated requirement is needed.

It has been 10 years since the accountability framework for crown corporations was established. Exempt corporations have had a decade to review and analyse the effects of the Financial Administration Act on the independence of non–exempt crown corporations. By now it is highly likely that crown corporations exempted from the act would conclude that the Financial Administration Act poses no real threat to them. The CBC is an illustration of this. Provisions of the Financial Administration Act were incorporated into the amended Broadcasting Act of 1991.

The exemption of the seven crown corporations means that they have not been subject to certain provisions that support good management and accountability. As such, their exemption is hard to justify in these times of fiscal restraint. These exempt crown corporations are more than two times more dependent on budgetary appropriations from government as a percentage of total assets than non–exempt corporations and more than four times more dependent on a per employee basis.

I feel it is reasonable to require the five crown corporations to prepare a business plan so that annual reports can allow Canadians to monitor and gauge the performance of the five. There have been some cases where a crown corporation's annual report objectives differ from its business plan objectives.

• (1745)

An example of that is in 1991–92, Telefilm Canada spent 90 per cent of its film funds on projects from Toronto and Montreal. One film of the 24 supported by Telefilm came from western Canada. Moreover, Telefilm spent 41 per cent of its budget that year on French language film and only 2 per cent on the English language film from the west. We know Telefilm has stringent linguistic targets. Having said that, I think hon. members would agree that the objectives of Telefilm were not fulfilled in the business it conducted in 1991–92.

Even though there are provisions for exempt crown corporations to invite the Auditor General to conduct a special examination, the audit itself is only released to their board of directors, not to this place. The problem with making administrative as opposed to legislative arrangements for voluntary audits is that with a change in administration or administrative policy, these agreements may fall apart. Providing the corporations with an option of inviting the Auditor General in to do an audit is just not good enough.

For example, because the National Arts Centre remains one of Canada's most secretive crown corporations, in 1990 the House of Commons communications and culture committee recommended that the Auditor General perform a special examination of the centre. The board's directors jumped at the chance. Yet the process was fudged. The board had problems releasing the report, even though it initially promised to publish the report.

Some 300 days after receiving the report, which the board originally denied receiving, it finally responded. The Ottawa Citizen called the response hilarious. The Auditor General had portrayed the arts centre as an institution that fails to properly define its objectives, plot its future, monitor its expenses and communicate with its board.

In this regard, we can clearly see that inviting the Auditor General to do a special examination or a value for money audit is insufficient. If the Auditor General's office was involved with the corporation on a regular basis, business plan objectives would not deviate from objectives stated in the annual reports.

The benefits are worth the cost of the Auditor General's audit. Reporting is not onerous. It is good management. Value for money audits pay their way.

Another example: In 1992 the Auditor General reported that tax arrangements for foreign affiliates were costing Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue. Following the report, amendments were made to the rules relating to how foreign affiliates were taxed. This ensured that foreign affiliates paid their fair share.

In 1993 another special examination identified overpayments to CPP and old age security, which were between $120 million and $220 million per year. Following the report, an action plan was tabled with the public accounts committee to stop the problem. The government was able to act and produce an action plan.

You may be wondering if the other 42 non–exempt crown corporations included in the Financial Administration Act have increased their accountability since the introduction in 1984 of the act. In 1993 the Auditor General reported that management of crown corporations has improved because of the requirements for planning, strategy, and cost systems, in short, good management practices.

I think we can all agree that in times of restraint those who spend taxpayers' dollars must be more than ever aware that they are answerable for how they spend those dollars. Since part X of the Financial Administration Act has been so effective for other crown corporations, it seems reasonable that the crown corporations outlined in Bill C–263 are in line as well.

In closing, I would like to quote a statement from the director of the National Arts Centre Corporation board, who is recognizing that improvements were needed in the corporation's financial management. The director said: "Given the limited resources which management has at its disposal, tackling the institutional mentality rooted in two decades of lack of accountability has been a monumental task".

I urge all members of the House to support Bill C–263.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak today to the bill presented by the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

The bill has as its basic purpose the removal of exemption from application of divisions I to IV of part X of the Financial Administration Act for five crown corporations. These are the Canada Council, the Canadian Film Development Corporation, the Canadian Wheat Board, the International Development Research Centre, and the National Arts Centre Corporation.

These corporations, together with the Bank of Canada and the CBC, are exempt under section 85 of the Financial Administration Act. All other crown corporations, which number about 41, are subject to part X of the FAA.

If we study part X, we see that the goal was to provide a more or less standard accountability and control system for all our crown corporations.

The role of Parliament was to hold the government and the crown corporation accountable through the appropriate minister for the public funds allocated to the corporation.

[English]

The government's role was seen to be to provide co–ordination, direction, as necessary, and control with the objective of protecting the public's investment and ensuring that public policy objectives are met.

Part X of the Financial Administration Act represents a comprehensive accountability system allowing crown corporations to adopt private sector management systems and practices, while ensuring that government and Parliament exercise certain key approvals.

For example, corporate plans of crown corporations subject to part X require approval annually by the governor in council. As well, the corporation's annual report must be tabled in Parliament. Part X requires that it contain information on how well the corporation has met its objectives.

[Translation]

At the end of each calendar year, the President of the Treasury Board must submit to Parliament his annual report on crown corporations and other corporate interests of Canada. This report contains a section which is audited by the Auditor General and which shows to what extent activity summaries and annual reports are submitted in accordance with established criteria for every minister responsible.

[English]

It can be seen from this one example how part X is designed to ensure that not only government but Parliament as well is viewed as integral to a sound accountability and control system for crown corporations.

As previously indicated, certain crown corporations are exempt from this part X system. The grounds for exemption, while not found in any written or formal criteria or regulation, reflect some of the special sensitivities in the relationship between the government and these particular corporations.

For example, the perception of arm's length freedom from government direction and decision which involve awarding grants to juried recipients is viewed as fundamental for the Canada Council. The government should not be seen to be dictating artistic merit as a matter of the politics of the day. Similarly, the mandated freedom for the CBC in areas of programming and journalistic independence led to the provision that this corporation also be exempted from part X.

The remaining exempts, five of which are named in the bill before us today, are subject to the elements of accountability found in their own enabling legislation. For example, all are required to provide annual reports for tabling and for those which are dependent upon government subsidization, they are subject to the annual process and procedures of parliamentary supply.

Bill C–263 contains two additional elements of some concern to me.

The first of these is the provision that employees of the National Arts Centre, the Canada Council and the International Development Research Centre become members of the public service. This is moving in the wrong direction.

Crown corporation employees are, for the most part, not public servants. In fact, the legislation creating the four museums crown corporations specifically states that museum employees are not public servants. We do not want to increase the size of the public service for no good reason.

• (1755)

The second element deals with the concept of agent of the crown status being introduced for these three corporations by the bill. This is a complex legally challenging subject that requires some thought.

I believe the International Development Research Centre was specifically made a non–agent for compelling reasons relating to its mandate and the freedom to choose fields of research of international significance. Agencies should not be arbitrarily invoked under the assumption that it removes autonomy.

Clearly, the experience we have had over the last 10 years indicates that generally there may be merit in bringing other exempts under a modified form of accountability framework similar to the regime that is now in place for the CBC which is different from some of the others. I can and do support that general principle.

Bill C–263 however, while moving these corporations in the right direction, contains certain fatal flaws which I suggest would preclude my support for it today. I urge hon. members not to support it.

[Translation]

The most serious flaw is that the bill does not recognize the need for a thorough review of the mandates given to these corporations in order to develop an appropriate accountability framework, without the appearance of unjustified political meddling in sectors where a certain level of independence from the government is in the public interest.

[English]

For example, part X contains sections which provide for a directive power for government to override decisions taken by crown corporation boards of directors. This could be construed as a fundamental change in the traditional approach of successive governments allowing cultural crown corporations the freedom to engage in decision making affecting artistic merit or research matters. This issue was thoroughly reviewed in the debates and committee hearings on Bill C–24 back in May and June of 1984.

Looking forward, I see merit in exploring better ways to ensure accountability for the crown corporations named in this bill. Subject areas such as auditing, corporate governance, financial management and control, corporate planning, reporting to Parliament and borrowing plans have been very thoroughly addressed in part X of the Financial Administration Act and have resulted in a system which the Auditor General noted is working well. The hon. member acknowledged that in his speech.

This system can probably be further modified to meet the special circumstances of the majority of exempt crown corporations. Whether this is best achieved through a series of initiatives amending existing enabling statutes for each of the named corporations in question requires further study.

I am informed that discussions have already occurred with some of these corporations as to the best way of achieving this.

[Translation]

I have no doubt that additional efforts will be invested to improve the accountability system while giving exempt crown corporations the appropriate level of freedom that Canadians will continue to perceive as being in the public interest.

[English]

As this bill stands I cannot support it and do not recommend it to the House.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C–263 is to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

As you know, these five crown corporations are now exempted from this act. The Financial Administration Act is a very broad law which deals among other things with the running of Treasury Board, public funds, public spending and the public debt.

This act was amended 58 times between 1985 and 1994, an average of once every two months. I will not go as far as saying that there has been a lack of consistency in the Financial Administration Act in the last decade, but the least that can be said is that a flood of legislative amendments were adopted to adjust to a so–called changing environment.

There are currently almost 50 crown corporations in Canada. The overall budget of these corporations is close to $5 billion and together they employ 115,000 people. Their economic impact is therefore considerable.

Although relatively autonomous with regard to their management, these crown corporations are ultimately accountable to Parliament through the minister responsible. These crown corporations' management framework, established in 1984, comes under Part X of the Financial Administration Act.

These crown corporations are accountable; they must submit an annual corporate plan to the minister responsible. They must also submit an operating budget approved by Treasury Board. They must prepare an annual report, that is, the required financial statements and statistical data showing to what extent their goals have been achieved.

Finally, each corporation must conduct internal audits. The corporation's auditor also carries out a special, more comprehensive audit every five years. However, seven corporations are exempted from these legal requirements.

Bill C–263 maintains the exemption granted to the Bank of Canada, which keeps its independence at the management level and may, for example, pursue its monetary policy whatever the government in power.

Bill C–263 also maintains the exemption already enjoyed by the CBC. In any case, the corporation is already subject to the accountability principle—internal and special audits, annual report and corporate plan—through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Act which reflects the provisions of Part X of the Financial Administration Act.

The ultimate purpose of Bill C–263 is to remove the exemption from accountability for the following five corporations: the International Development Research Centre, the Canadian Wheat Board and three other corporations involved in the arts: the Canada Council, the National Arts Centre Corporation and the Canadian Film Development Corporation.

If this bill were adopted by the House, all five corporations would be subject to the provisions of the act. They are exempted mainly because of the specific nature of their relationship with the government. Parliament has, until now, preferred to maintain the arm's length relationship of these corporations.

In 1991, the auditor general commented that many exempt corporations had voluntarily conformed with the provisions of the act. Half of the exempt corporations had asked for a value for money audit. Many exempt corporations had also established internal audit functions and audit committees within their organizations.

These corporations can be allowed greater flexibility in terms of management control. Extending certain provisions of Part X of the Financial Administration Act to the five corporations mentioned in the bill would not necessarily mean eliminating arm's length position in terms of administrative control.

According to the auditor general, there are a number of ways in which the rules can be standardized to make exempt corporations more accountable. One way would be to incorporate the provisions of Part X of the act in the enabling legislation for each exempted corporation, as in the case of the CBC, which remains accountable to Parliament but maintains a large measure of management autonomy, which means it is not subject to management audits by the government.

One could also add these corporations to the schedule to the Financial Administration Act while exempting them from certain provisions of the act. Many exempt corporations already conform voluntarily to many of the provisions in the act, so that any concerns that overly vigorous management audits would be detrimental to the mandate of these five corporations would seem to be exaggerated.

In any case, we will vote against Bill C–263 because it goes too far in terms of controlling the administration of these corporations. It would subject the five crown corporations identified to close supervision involving both their accountability and their control over their management.

We would prefer a more flexible approach, such as the one advocated by the auditor general, who proposes incorporating the requirements selected by the legislator in the enabling act of each of the five exempted corporations, as is already the case for the CBC, as we have mentioned.

Each corporation will have to be looked at individually, after analysis, to discover the best way to make it accountable and establish a level of control in keeping with its particular goals and mission. We will therefore vote against this bill, because it gives the same status to all government corporations, except the CBC and the Bank of Canada.

• (1805)

We favour ensuring accountability by making these corporations responsible for their operations rather than by controlling them, as Bill C–263 would have it. We want to increase their accountability, make them accountable to Parliament and thus permit a better assessment of their performance. We are opposed to unbounded control over the management of these corporations. Three of them contribute to the development of the arts, the fourth, as we said earlier, contributes to agricultural development, and the fifth contributes to international development.

We can provide a proper framework for their operations and, at the same time, show some flexibility in monitoring their management practices; this can also enhance the performance of these corporations and their efficiency.

We are also opposed to the bill as presented because it gives the minister responsible the right to interfere in the mandate of cultural agencies. Such agencies must be accorded greater flexibility in their activities.

Bill C–263 does not resolve the issue of the accountability of crown corporations since, as the auditor general himself has said, several non–exempt corporations do not comply with this principle of accountability, even if they are subject to it. They do not respect all of the accountability requirements prescribed by law.

This bill increases only slightly the accountability required of crown corporations. It seems to us that other means could be used to hold these crown corporations accountable for their results to a greater extent. This does not mean passing legislation. The auditor general's input can be extremely helpful in evaluating their results. Likewise, the fact senior executives of such corporations must appear before standing House committees, such as the public accounts committee, to account for their management, serves as a powerful incentive to produce the required reports and present documents of higher quality.

We favour this type of approach since it seems more effective to us than new legislation.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before the member proceeds with his intervention, on the basis that the mover of the motion spoke to his motion and the next two interventions were against the motion, I am going to look to the same party as the mover and possibly he will speak to the motion.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some interest to the member opposite representing the government and the member representing the Bloc who just finished speaking to the bill.

The intent of the private member's bill is to bring more financial accountability to crown corporations. These are not public corporations; they are crown corporations. It is kind of a hybrid. It is not as though they are using their own money; they are using our money.

How is it that a member of Parliament representing the people of the country, especially the member for Kingston and the Islands, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, could possibly say that he cannot support the bill as it is written? What would it take for the government to support the bill?

Perhaps the answer is not to support the bill. Perhaps it would be to privatize it. Mr. Speaker, if this were your money or my money, or the money involved was not public money but personal money out of the pockets of Mr. and Mrs. Taxpayer, would we be looking at our responsibilities as members of Parliament a bit differently?

A crown corporation has the benefit of being supported by public funds. Yet it does not have the downside of having to worry about whether it is going to get funds to manage its daily affairs from the product of its work. When things go wrong in these crown corporations, when they are not efficiently managed, when they do not have a business plan, do they go to their shareholders who are individuals that put up the money? No. They come running to the Government of Canada with their hands out and say: "Top it up".

The problem is that our country is going into the hole at the rate of $110 million a day. What do we have to do to get it to sink into the heads of members opposite that they should start by doing the little things right and eventually, if they do enough of the little things right, the big things will turn out right? A little thing is to support the bill which calls for more accountability in a mere five crown corporations.

• (1810)

In order to get some unanimity in the House, the mover of the bill deliberately left out some of the more contentious crown corporations such as the CBC. If we in the House were to reduce the budget of the CBC by about 50 per cent tomorrow, which would mean that we could spend lots of money on cancer research, lots of money on AIDS research or not borrow money to put more of our children to work, I guarantee it would focus the attention of the CBC on what it really should be doing, what we can afford and what we cannot afford. However the mover of the motion did not include that because it is a very contentious issue.

What do we have here? We have the Canada Council, the Canadian Film Development Corporation, the International Development Research Centre, the Canadian Wheat Board and the National Arts Centre.

What, the National Arts Centre? How did the National Arts Centre creep into this? How on earth did that become a crown corporation? Could it be that it is located in Ottawa and it is one more thing for the people of Canada to subsidize?

It would be an interesting exercise to go to the rest of the arts centres in the country to find out whether they are crown corporations and whether they have their arms in the pockets of Canadians from coast to coast. Somehow I doubt it.

What is it about being in Ottawa that gives people the thought that money is something that sort of grows on trees or that if it is public money it is not accountable for?

Anybody who has been in business knows that the discipline of an audit is not a negative thing or a bad thing. The discipline of an audit will make any company work better. That is why these crown corporations should be saying: "Wait a minute. We want to be overseen. We recognize the fact that we are dealing with public money".

Why should they not want to be involved? Is it because they are not efficient? Is it because they can run like little fiefdoms and do whatever they want any way they want to? Is it because the Canadian Wheat Board is not perhaps so much a wheat board but a co–op? Is it because the Canada Council is a collection of people who are self–interested, get public money and dole public money out to whoever they think should have it?

I am not suggesting for a moment that the Canada Council and the people involved in the Canada Council are doing so somehow maliciously. I am sure they are doing everything that they are doing with their hearts in the right place. However it is not their money; it is our money. Why should we not oversee every nickel they spend?

The Canadian Film Development Corporation has been the subject of some debate in the House in past months. There are people who think it is doing a good job and there are people who think it is not doing such a good job. There are people who say we have to support it because it is Canadian culture. I think most of us like to go to a movie every once in a while to see a movie that speaks about us, to see something familiar. There might be some granting to the Canadian Film Corporation that pays off; it might even make some money from time to time.

It would be interesting if they used their own money and had to compete in a world market on the quality of their product and rather than saying that we have this domestic market which has the tariff wall surrounding it, we are going to make movies that everybody in the world is going to clamour to see because of the quality of the story, the quality of the acting, the quality of the distribution?

That is what we should be looking for in our Canada. We can compete with the best in the world in anything, in business, in arts, in film development. If we are going to have crown corporations that have the purview of doling out public money for private purposes, certainly to oversee over these crown corporations is common sense.

I would like to conclude my few moments of discussing this bill, because it is a votable bill, by once again appealing to my hon. colleagues to reconsider the initial response not to support this bill.

The hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt brought this bill to the House with the express intent of ensuring that it was innocuous enough that it could find support on the Liberal benches and with the Bloc as well as a testimony to the fact that on some things, albeit a minor start, the members of Parliament in this House assembled can come together for the right reasons and do the right thing.

It is a tragedy that every time a member gets up to speak, to move a motion or to do something in this House, it is always done on an adversarial position. It need not be that way. Common sense is common sense, whether it originates on the Liberal benches, on the Bloc benches or on the Reform benches.

When we have an opportunity in this House to come together in unity to do the right thing for the right reasons which could have the effect of using taxpayers' money more efficiently, we should seize the opportunity, seize the moment and do the right thing for the right reasons.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak for a few minutes on this bill that is before the House, Bill C-263.

I want to assure the member who just concluded his remarks that my remarks are not made in an adversarial way but just to simply point out how this bill would address the Canadian Wheat Board. I know it is a crown corporation that is of some interest to the Reform Party and it is of some interest to all of us in this House, particularly those who are involved in the agri-food industry.

I want to point out in the next few minutes why this bill is absolutely unnecessary and actually would be doing much of what the Reform Party has faulted governments in Canada for in the past, repeating something that is already done and doing things twice and spending money that is not necessarily spent.

The Canadian Wheat Board was established in 1935 as a marketing agency for western grain farmers. At the time farmers in western Canada wanted a system that would control price fluctuations, distribute delivery opportunity equitably and move the largest volumes of grain at the best possible prices.

That mandate is still the same. The Canadian Wheat Board remains the same now as it was years ago in the mandate that it has, to earn farmers the best possible returns for their wheat and barley. That is exactly what the board has been doing for that 60 years. It has done an excellent job of selling Canadian grain at the best possible prices and then returning as much money as possible to the users of that board, those users being western Canadian farmers.

Although the Canadian board is a crown corporation, its operations are financed by 130,000 grain farmers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the grain growing areas of British Columbia.

• (1820)

This in itself makes this crown corporation unlike many of the others. Some crown corporations including the Canadian Wheat Board are exempt from the application of the Financial Administration Act. It is one of the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt listed this afternoon as being exempt.

With this bill this exemption would be removed and the crown corporations affected by the bill would become subject to a different reporting system with different requirements.

For example, under this bill the Canadian Wheat Board would be required to submit a corporate plan to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food for approval by the governor in council. The board would also have to submit an operating and capital budget annually for approval by Treasury Board. This report would then be included in a review by the parliamentary committee.

Finally, the wheat board would be subject to an audit by an outside auditor and possibly the Auditor General of Canada.

There is no doubt in my mind that the objectives of the bill are well intended. I can assure everyone that the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food and the government are in favour of ensuring that the accountability is there. That accountability at the present time is to farmers, the government and to taxpayers.

It is essential to remember that the board's operations are funded by farmers, not by government. Nor does the board operate with a capital base funded by the government. Although some accountability to the government is appropriate the board's first responsibility is to western Canadian wheat and barley producers.

I should also emphasize that the board is already accountable to the government through a variety of provisions in the Canadian Wheat Board Act, a separate act. The safeguards established under that act are virtually the same as those under the Financial Administration Act. Again, why repeat it?

Even though they are there they are slightly modified to take into account the unique nature of the wheat board's business. For example, the board is required to file an annual report with the minister by March 31. This annual report is tabled in Parliament.

The wheat board act requires the board to have an external auditing firm conduct an audit each year and to keep proper books. The Canadian Wheat Board Act also grants borrowing powers subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. In all of these examples the provisions of the Financial Administration Act are virtually identical.

I could go on but the point is Bill C–263 which has been put before us today is not the way to enhance the accountability of the Canadian Wheat Board. The government's main concern for accountability and the reporting process that ensures it should stem from a need to be aware of possible government expenditures.

There will only be government expenditures if there is a deficit in the pool accounts. A deficit in the pool accounts will only occur if the Canadian Wheat Board's initial payments to farmers are set at or raised to levels that exceed the ultimate levels from the sales of wheat and barley. Since the government must approve the level of the initial payments it already has an effective method of accountability in this area as well.

Another serious concern with the bill is that the nature of the marketing activities of the Canadian Wheat Board requires extreme confidentiality. The reporting relationship between the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food is created under the Canadian Wheat Board Act and it is appropriate, given the need to ensure that confidentiality.

We are also concerned about timing. The minister has already announced his intention to begin a process that will rigorously examine all of the facts and issues relating to western grain marketing and the Canadian Wheat Board. It is no secret that opinions on this and these issues are sharply divided on the subjects. There have been meetings, rallies and demonstrations on both sides of these issues.

Before the government makes any decision on the future of the board, farmers have a right to carefully consider the situation and together they must decide what represents the best balanced solution for their industry. Bill C–263 represents a very important decision. Its impacts on the Canadian Wheat Board and on western grain growers are potentially far reaching.

• (1825)

It is our duty to act fairly through a transparent forum and to consult farmers before we make any major decision on the future of the Canadian Wheat Board.

We know what the majority of farmers want. When we are convinced that the procedure to get their views has been fair, impartial and equitable and does represent what the majority wants, then and only then will this government be ready to approve changes to existing legislation.

Until then I urge members of this House to respond to Bill C–263 with a clear and strong message that we are not yet ready to make major changes without understanding the consequences and most important without consulting with its users, the prairie farmers.

There is still a lot of work to be done and there is still much consultation to go through before we can come to a definitive decision on the future of the wheat board.

In conclusion, I would ask the members of this House not to support Bill C–263 as it relates to the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, basically what I want to talk about in Bill C–263 is the openness, accountability and transparency that I think these agencies should have. I want to talk specifically about IDRC. That organization is often confused with CIDA. It is wrong that this should happen.

Throughout many of the discussions I have been involved in we have heard what the people of Canada are saying about CIDA. They are saying that there is inefficiency, that they want accountability there. However, they quite often mix IDRC into that same ball of wax. I think that is rather unfair.

This bill asks for accountability. I think that will do nothing but benefit that organization because the Canadian public wants to know it is getting good value for its dollar.

Under the current system IDRC is not getting audited the same way as other government institutions. It does not follow all of the provisions of the Financial Administration Act. Therefore, Canadians have a hard time really knowing whether they are getting value for money.

In a time of serious spending cuts and serious budgetary constraints, we can make an awfully good case for getting some kind of regular, accountable audit procedure. In terms of this, I know this year IDRC has done a budget. I have certainly talked to the organization. I would say it is a very well run organization. I know a member across who would agree with me on that.

If there were support for this bill we would have to separate IDRC from CIDA. Going through most of my notes, in many cases the people in IDRC I have talked to would totally agree with this. In private conversation they would say that. We have an agency, a crown corporation, that may or may not do an audit. Only because of good management would it do an audit, becoming accountable.

We also have the public saying this agency is the same, it gives out aid or it is something involved with aid, and what are we going to do about that, maybe we should subject it to the same treatment that we subject an organization like CIDA to.

As I pointed out, that is totally wrong. For that reason I would strongly advise members to read the member's bill, to take a look at what it is trying to accomplish and the fact that it is allowing this organization to get its dollars and cents out on the table and to make them open to the public, thus achieving the accountability and transparency that I believe people are demanding.

• (1830)

Obviously I had a lot of other areas I would have liked to have covered, but for the sake of time I will stop at this point. I ask members to reconsider their support of Bill C–263. When it comes to an area like the IDRC they would welcome that as much as any of us would in this House.

TAXATION

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious to anyone who is watching the various news programs today, or who has any sort of sensitivity to what is going on in the country, that there is the equivalent of a tax revolt well under way.

People have literally been driven to the wall when it comes to the existing tax system which, to give it undue consideration, would be to call it unfair, unjust, unbalanced and discriminatory. It discriminates against the small business sector relative to the corporate sector. It is biased against the average working person, as opposed to people in the upper income or the very wealthy tax brackets.

This tax revolt has occurred by the economy moving underground. There probably is not a Canadian citizen who is not participating in some way in the underground economy, with the exception of yourself, Mr. Speaker, and some of my colleagues who are presently in the House.

Who does not participate with cash transactions or in a barter system? It is increasing. It is estimated that somewhere between $40 billion and $120 billion of business transactions each year take place in the underground economy. This makes it almost impossible to pay down the debt of the country until we get some confidence back in the system.

Why is that? First of all, if we add up all of the tax exemptions, they come to about $36 billion a year. That was in the press yesterday. Thirty–six billion dollars a year is lost to the treasury because of tax exemptions. Many of these exemptions are legitimate but many must be classed as tax loopholes. I give my friend, the Minister of Finance, full credit for going public in the last few days and saying that the system is filled with tax loopholes that have to be closed. He also said that the poor do not use tax loopholes. It is clear what he means. The rich use tax loopholes.

When we go down to the harbours in some of the port cities of Canada and see the huge yachts, they are by and large tax deductions. I personally know a number of people with boats who write off half of the cost of the boat and call it a business tax deduction for entertainment purposes. The boxes in the big sports stadiums are tax write–offs. We found out from the news today that even escort services can be a tax write–off if the name is changed to a tour guide or a bodyguard.

I suspect a lot of submissions will be made by individuals who are entertaining their clients. A lot of touring will also be going on, or perhaps a lot of bodyguards will be put into place. That will be a legitimate tax write–off.

The reports say that Revenue Canada will soon send out a circular clarifying this issue. As long as the escort service is also a tour guide or a bodyguard, it will qualify for a legitimate tax write–off. I could go on, but I suspect that we are all familiar with the various forms of tax write–offs.

I would like to ask a couple of serious questions. Canada is one of the very few OECD countries that does not have an inheritance tax. Across the way, when my hon. friend inherits $2 million or $3 million, it is not taxed. We are virtually the only country in the western world where an inheritance is not taxed.

• (1835)

Even the United States has an inheritance tax. The United States also considers capital gains to be like any other income. In other words $1 of capital gains is taxed like $1 of regular income. But not in Canada. That $1 of capital gains is only considered to be worth 75 cents for taxation purposes.

Once again we are one of the very few OECD countries that says to people: If your income is from capital gains we are automatically going to give you a 25 per cent tax break before we even start considering it.

Again I have to ask, why the tax break for those who earn their income from capital gains as opposed to someone working in a radio station, a factory or a plant? Why do we distinguish between those two kinds of incomes? Why do we let those people who inherit vast amounts of money off, not to pay any income tax at all on it? Again, we are one of the very few countries in the world that does that.

I could also ask about the family trust provision. Here is the mother of all loopholes. I believe there is now universal agreement that if there is a tax provision that has to go in this budget, it has to be this family trust business. The tax experts told us this provision was brought in to protect only the very wealthiest families of Canada. Must we have a special tax provision that costs us many hundreds of millions of dollars to make life easier for the very wealthy in Canada? I think the reaction to that is no.

We will be watching very closely to see what the Minister of Finance does when he brings in his budget in a few days and whether or not he says: "We are going to take this loophole of loopholes, the mother or father of all loopholes out of the system". If he does that, then I think we can legitimately say that yes, there is some balance to the budget.

For example, he should tax the inheritances people receive, let us say, over $1 million or $2 million. I am not talking about people who inherit the family farm or the person who inherits a small business or the family home or whatever. I am talking about people who inherit $2 million, $3 million, $5 million or $10 million. Why should they not pay tax on that? They would if they were in virtually every other western industrialized nation, but not in Canada.

A whole set of questions must be asked about the loopholes in the system. I am very happy to see that the Minister of Finance has now acknowledged this. We will be watching carefully as he attempts to close off some of these loopholes in an effort to make the tax system a bit fairer.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to try to respond to the very windy comments of the hon. member for Kamloops. With his typical hyperbole he went on to grossly exaggerate the deficiencies of the Canadian tax system, I am sure for the benefit of his viewers in Kamloops.

He sounded a little like the premier of Ontario did when he was in opposition, and we have all noticed how he has changed his tune since he came into government. Of course he has made the worst mess we have ever seen of any government in any province. I suspect the hon. member for Kamloops would agree with me if he lived in Ontario. He does not, so he has missed out on some of the worst aspects of NDP rule in our province.

The NDP is involved in the tax system in Ontario and the Ontario taxpayers are complaining about high taxes. What they have not fully realized in every case is how many of those taxes are charged by their provincial government. It has really slapped it to Ontarians in a big, big way, in spite of having a massive deficit and total incompetence in its government and running the economy of that province.

I agree with him that the fundamental basis of a sound tax system is that everyone pays his or her share. When a minority of taxpayers are able to avoid paying their fair share, the legitimacy of the whole system suffers.

Like the hon. member for Kamloops, the Minister of Finance and indeed every member of this caucus is committed to trying to restore an element of fairness to our tax system. But the government in fact has already taken steps to do that. It did it in the last budget.

I did not see the hon. member for Kamloops applauding the minister on budget day last year. I am sorry he did not, but I can safely tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I know you will agree, that none of us have ever seen the hon. member for Kamloops applaud a budget in this House.

There is a good reason for that. None of them has been an NDP budget. If there had been one, no doubt he would applaud it. But as long as the budget is presented by any other party, no matter how fair it is, he will say it is not fair enough for him. He does not talk about Bob Rae's budgets. If he did, I think he would be complaining about the lack of fairness. I am sorry we are not able to hear his thoughts on that tonight.

I want to point out examples of some of the things the Minister of Finance did last year in his budget.

He eliminated the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption that had been put in by the previous government that benefited high income individuals almost exclusively. The deduction for business meals and entertainment expenses was reduced from 80 per cent to 50 per cent, another item that benefited substantial taxpayers. Large Canadian controlled private corporations are no longer eligible for the small business deductions which benefit small business and which the hon. member for Kamloops ignored in his remarks. I think that is important.

The need for increased equity and simplicity in the tax system is recognized. The finance minister has made it clear on a number of occasions that his budget will be fair and will try to reduce inequities in our tax system.

I am sure the member for Kamloops will applaud the minister on budget day and thank him for the great service he is doing for Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (for the Minister of Finance, Lib.) moved that Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to begin the third reading debate on Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. Hon. members will recall that C–59 will put into law several measures announced in the 1994 budget.

That budget was a first step in a historic two stage process to bring government finances under control. This is essential if we are to sustain the conditions for continued economic growth, especially easing an important source of pressure on interest rates. The budget set out a concrete interim budget to cut the deficit to 3 per cent of our GNP in three years. It made clear our ultimate goal to eliminate the deficit completely.

But last February's budget did more than establish a target. The previous government had deficit targets galore. Instead, this budget took hard fiscal action to set a real deficit cutting process in motion by reducing spending more than any other budget in a decade.

However, given the dimensions of our deficit and debt dilemma, spending cuts alone would not have been enough to meet our target and restore confidence in the fiscal commitment of government. That is why revenue increases were also necessary.

I should also remind my hon. colleagues that for every $1 in revenue gains, we took $5 in action to reduce government spending. We did not take the decision to increase revenues lightly. There is no member of this government who does not recognize the tax fatigue and resentment felt by so many Canadians. That is why our government refused to hike tax rates.

Instead, we felt the better way to raise the necessary revenue was to broaden the tax base and increase fairness within the tax system. This is what Bill C–59 does. In particular, it also makes the corporate tax system fairer and better targets the tax assistance available to certain businesses.

Because C–59 increases the fairness of Canada's tax system in a number of areas, I believe the bill deserves the non–partisan support of all sides of the House. Let me deal briefly with some of the measures in this bill.

Bill C–59 eliminates the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. This action addresses a growing body of criticism concerning the exemption that it distorts the tax system by totally exempting certain gains while taxing others, that it is essentially of benefit to high income Canadians, and that it makes the tax system more complex.

In 1992 thanks to a wide range of allowable tax deductions and credits, some 12,000 Canadians who earned $50,000 or more paid no income tax. Of this group, over 4,700 people used their lifetime capital gains deduction to help eliminate their tax payable. These people did nothing wrong, but at a time when most Canadians feel overtaxed there is little tolerance for measures that help well off individuals avoid taxes completely.

Eliminating the exemption will mean a system of taxing capital gains which will be fairer, simpler and more sustainable. I should point out that the exemptions will be withdrawn only for a gains occurring after February 22, 1994, the last budget day.

Another fairer measure in C–59 is the provision to tax the full value of employer paid life insurance premiums. This will improve tax equity. There is simply no justification why employees with employer paid life insurance should receive a tax benefit while self–employed Canadians who have to buy their own life insurance must pay with after tax dollars.

Currently only the portion of coverage over $25,000 is a taxable benefit. By basing the benefit on the full amount the tax system will be fairer, treating all Canadians equitably. The impact on group plan members will not be harsh. On average, employees under such plans receive about $125 of benefits a year as a result of employers paying insurance premiums for the first $25,000 of coverage. Under this proposal the combined federal and provincial taxes will increase by some $30 to $50 a year and the increase for 1994 will be half of this amount.

In another personal income tax measure, Bill C–59 will subject the age credit to an income test. Canada's debt and the burden of high taxes and interest rates it imposes on all Canadians, including seniors, demands that government spending be both fair and effective. This measure meets that test by ensuring that assistance goes to seniors who need it, but not to those who have annual incomes hitting $50,000.

Under the current tax system all Canadians 65 and over are eligible for the age credit. It delivers a combined federal–provincial tax credit of about $950 per year. Under this proposed legislation, individuals with net incomes below $25,921 will retain their full credit. For people with net incomes above the threshold, the credit will be reduced at a rate of 15 per cent of their net incomes exceeding $25,921 and the threshold will be indexed.

Let me make clear that fully 75 per cent of seniors, which is 2.6 million individuals, will not be affected. Moreover, most of those who will be affected will continue to receive partial benefits. Only 6 per cent of seniors will no longer receive benefits because their income exceeds $49,134, the threshold at which benefits are exhausted.

I should also point out that the reduction will be phased in over two years. For 1994 the reduction will be one–half of the amount otherwise determined. As well, the age credit will remain transferable to a spouse.

A further measure in C–59 extends on an ongoing basis a program that has become an important part of our social infrastructure, the RRSP based homebuyers plan. First time homebuyers can withdraw up to $20,000 tax free from their own RRSPs and repay the money over 15 years. By last February about 234,000 people had already participated in the plan with an additional 30,000 participants expected each year.

Moving on, Canadians will be encouraged to give more to charities because Bill C–59 enhances the charitable tax credit. It used to be that taxpayers gained 17 per cent on the first $250 of their total charitable donations and 29 per cent on the remaining donations. Now the threshold for the higher credit rate will be $200, not $250. The fact that individuals will now receive a greater benefit when they give more than $200 in a year will further encourage charitable giving.

I would now like to remind the House of the measures in C–59 relating to the corporate sector. There is a perception among many Canadians that businesses receive preferential tax treatment compared to individual taxpayers.

The fact is often overlooked that businesses, while paying corporate income tax, must also pay many other taxes such as provincial corporate income taxes, capital and insurance premium taxes, payroll levies and municipal property taxes. In fact, the total corporate tax bill last year was about $44 billion. However, Bill C–59 does take steps to reduce deductions and eliminate some existing loopholes.

For example, the tax deduction for eligible business meals and entertainment expenses is reduced from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. All businesses large and small will now pay an appropriate share of tax, making the tax system fair.

The element of personal consumption will also be better reflected in these expenses. This measure is consistent with business meals and entertainment expense deductions in Ontario, Quebec and the United States. It will apply to expenses incurred after February 21, 1994.

Another measure in C–59 restricts the use of certain tax shelters where investors in partnership could claim tax deductible losses and/or receive cash contributions which actually exceed the cost of their investment. The amount of losses that may be flowed out to an investor will now be restricted. This will help to limit the erosion of the tax base, ensuring that business pays a fair share in the national deficit battle. As well, to prevent further erosion of the tax base, the use of the purchase butterfly tax avoidance technique will be curtailed.

The Income Tax Act allows for corporate property to be divided pro rata among its shareholders on a tax deferred basis. This helps in dividing up a corporation so that shareholders can carry on separately the corporation's business.

Unfortunately the rules have been used to avoid or defer tax on the sale of corporate assets. As a result the government introduced rules in May 1993 restricting cross–border purchase butterfly transactions. Bill C–59 extends these rules to all purchase butterflies. The tax advantage of structuring a corporate asset sale for this purchase will no longer exist.

The next measure I want to discuss is the elimination or reduction of the regional investment tax credit, known as ITC. It has become evident that regional ITCs are not a cost effective means of attracting incremental investments, nor do they help to reduce economic disparity. Bill C–59 eliminates a special investment tax credit and the regional component of the scientific research and experimental development tax credit. The Atlantic investment tax credit rate will be reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent.

While these changes will come into effect after 1994 they will not apply to property acquired after 1994 that relates to a project which was under construction before the last budget date, nor will they apply to property acquired at any time under a written agreement entered into before the budget date.

Another fair tax measure in Bill C–59 makes large private corporations ineligible for the small business deduction. Relief will be targeted where it is intended, just to small business. The small business deduction lowers the tax rate, thereby providing small corporations with more after tax income for reinvestment and expansion.

However, under the current rules some very large corporations are obtaining this benefit. Large corporations with taxable capital of $15 million or more will no longer be eligible for the small business deduction. As well, the rule changes will reduce the deduction for corporations having taxable capital of between $10 million and $15 million.

The last measure in Bill C–59 that I want to discuss allows for a deduction for contributions into government mandated mine reclamation trust funds in the year in which they are made. Under the current income tax rules mine reclamation expenses are deductible only in the year in which they are incurred. This addresses the concerns of Canada's mining industry.

In conclusion, Bill C–59 takes progressive measures to broaden the tax base for fiscal renewal and to improve the fairness and efficiency of the tax system. Those are goals that we can all accept and this legislation deserves the full support of the House.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois to the income tax bill before the House today. This legislation implements measures announced by the minister in his budget on February 22, 1994, almost a year ago.

The Bloc Quebecois was opposed to the bill on second reading and in committee, and its position has not changed. Granted, we did find a number of positive measures in the bill. These include, for instance, the decision to extend provisions allowing first–time homebuyers to use their RRSP funds; measures to increase the value of the charitable donations tax credit; and incentives for mining companies to engage in mine reclamation, although at this level, the government is not exactly applying the principle "the polluter pays".

The Bloc also welcomed the proposal to reduce the percentage of meal expenses recognized for tax purposes from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. As you know, companies may deduct meals as part of the cost of doing business, and reducing the percentage of such expenses from 80 per cent to 50 per cent is at least a first step. These are some of the positive aspects we see in the bill, but there are negative aspects the Bloc cannot accept.

This morning, I will focus on three specific points. The first one is the reduction in value of the age tax credit; the second concerns the reduction or elimination of tax credits for regional investment; and the third concerns the inadequacy of measures aimed at curtailing certain tax avoidance techniques.

As far as the age tax credit is concerned, the Bloc Quebecois presented an amendment that was defeated in the House, an amendment rejecting a provision in the bill that reduces the value of the age tax credit for persons 65 and over. The reduction concerns people with net incomes between $25,000 and $50,000. The age tax credit for these people will be reduced. For some people these amounts mean a lot, since it works out to a federal tax reduction of $610, while at the provincial level, it adds up to $950. That is a substantial reduction.

Of course, our friends across the way told us this would not affect seniors in need, those with an income of $25,000 or less. In fact, this hits the middle class. Once again, the government is hitting the middle class, and that is why the Bloc Quebecois objects to this provision.

So who is affected? People who worked all their lives and accumulated a pension fund and did everything they could to provide for decent incomes for their retirement. These people had a deduction. It was a form of recognition. It was like saying: You are people who helped to build Canada or Quebec, people who worked all their lives to enjoy decent incomes for their retirement. They were entitled to a tax credit of $3,482, and 17 per cent of that worked out to the amounts I mentioned earlier. As a result of the bill before the House today, this tax credit will be eliminated.

Certainly, in the case of people with incomes of perhaps $60,000, $70,000 or $80,000, we could understand abolishing the tax credit. However, in the case of people earning $28,000, $30,000, or $35,000, we do not believe it is right to reduce the benefits they enjoyed under the old legislation. Certainly the government is saving money with this measure. It is expected to save $170 million in 1995–96, but this is $170 million once again saved on the backs of the middle class. At some point, the Canadian middle class will have had enough of always paying taxes and not always getting the necessary benefit or the necessary recognition from society.

As we have already spoken at length on this matter, I am going now to deal primarily, in the second part of my remarks, with the disappearance of the regional investment tax credit. You know that Canada used to offer benefits in the form of tax credits to people who invested in certain parts of the country, primarily the Atlantic provinces, the Gaspé Peninsula, and certain northern regions.

There was a special investment tax credit. It was a 30 per cent tax credit for eligible investments in machinery, buildings, and new equipment for manufacturing and production purposes. This tax credit has been eliminated. Another tax credit is also affected. It is the Atlantic/Gaspé tax credit. It was a tax credit of 15 per cent, again for buildings, machinery, and equipment to be used in resource development. This tax credit has been reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. The third tax credit affected is the scientific research and experimental development investment tax credit. It is a 30 per cent tax credit, again in the Atlantic region and the Gaspé, and has been reduced to 20 per cent, the level for all the other regions. This means that the Atlantic region and the Gaspé have lost the benefits they enjoyed under the last budget.

These measures affecting tax credits will mean a saving of $90 million for the government in 1995–96 and of $95 million in 1996–97. The most ironic part of all of this is the reason given by the finance minister in his budget plan of last February and in the budget document entitled "Tax measures: Supplementary Information". His budget plan indicates, and I quote, "These credits have not been effective in attracting new investments to designated regions or reducing economic disparity". The document entitled "Supplementary Information" states in regard to the budget: "Regional investment tax credits have not generally been considered to be cost effective".

Basically, it says that these tax credits did not have a very high level of effectiveness and are not an effective means of attracting investments. So we would have expected the minister to completely eliminate these tax credits because they are not effective, but this has not happened. One tax credit has been eliminated, the tax credit for investment in the Atlantic region, and the tax credit for investment in scientific research has simply been reduced. In other words, the minister admits that he will still offer tax credits in certain regions of Canada. The minister is aware of their lack of effectiveness, but goes ahead all the same.

The Bloc Quebecois has denounced this measure and has asked that moneys earmarked for regional investment be redistributed to the provinces instead as a tax percentage. Why? It is because in Quebec, we think that decision making and regional investments should be decentralized so that local decision makers and people in the regions can identify their needs and take measures suited to their regions.

The Canadian government does not do this. It refused to redistribute these amounts among the provinces and maintained national standards, giving the credit to everyone while admitting that all this is inefficient. This is yet another illustration of the Canadian problem, that is, putting everyone, every citizen and every province on the same footing and ensuring uniform distribution everywhere before realizing that this is very costly and inefficient but continuing to do so anyway. One does not have to look very far to see that this is the reason why Canada does not work.

The third reason why we oppose this bill is the measures designed to counteract some tax avoidance strategies. This bill proposes measures to ensure that some individuals and corporations can no longer avoid taxes. These measures are quite timid. There are measures intended to eliminate preferential tax rates for large corporations, to make corporate taxes more equitable, to provide special rules for taxing foreign corporation shareholders.

Looking at all this, we ask ourselves are they trying to catch those who do not pay taxes in Canada, who establish phoney companies abroad and who, through various tax schemes, manage to avoid taxes. Reading this, we might think that such is the case, but we would be mistaken. These measures do not affect family trusts or the use of tax havens and are not designed in any way to institute a minimum corporate tax.

A lot has been said about family trusts. What are they exactly? A family trust is a tax measure allowing great wealthy families to avoid paying taxes on capital gains on assets.

• (1030)

It is money on which no taxes are collected because it was put in a trust. And this remains the case for a long time. An amendment to that provision was proposed in 1992 by the Conservative government. Under that legislation, the money in a trust was exempt from taxes until the death of the last beneficiary of that trust. In some cases, that could take up to 80 years.

The Bloc Quebecois pledged to fight for the elimination of that provision, which allows tax avoidance. We discussed the issue at length in this House. We do not see, in the current budget, any step to abolish that tax loophole.

We are talking about hundreds of millions every year. We do not know exactly how much money is involved. To find that out, we would need a special bill to allow Revenue Canada officials to tell us exactly how much money is involved. What is the government waiting for to pass such legislation and to abolish that provision in the Income Tax Act?

Let us now look at tax havens. We have an idea of what goes on. The auditor general raised that issue in 1992. This is not a figment of the imagination of a demagogic opposition party. The auditor general himself told us that several major Canadian corporations somehow manage to avoid paying taxes in Canada. The losses in tax revenues are said to be in the hundreds of millions.

We know the process. Some companies establish or use subsidiaries in countries where tax rates are much lower than in Canada. They can do so because Canada signed tax conventions to avoid double taxation for corporations and individuals conducting business in those countries.

The auditor general is strongly opposed to such tax treaties. Currently, 16 such conventions are said to be in effect. There is nothing wrong with these countries, but we wonder why Canada signed such treaties, if not to promote the self–interests of people who want to avoid the payment of taxes. These countries include Cyprus, Malta and Papua New Guinea. It is not a foregone conclusion that Canada's trade with these countries justifies the signing of such conventions, but these treaties were concluded.

The auditor general also denounced another more subtle process. Some companies can deduct, from their payable taxes, the interest on loans contracted in Canada for foreign investment purposes. In other words, Revenue Canada is financing investments abroad. This is unbelievable.

Another provision regarding tax havens that must be revisited is tax avoidance. In 1992 the auditor general again asked the government to amend the act to prevent Canadian companies with subsidiaries abroad from using these subsidiaries' annual losses to reduce their taxable income in Canada. They lose money outside of Canada and can deduct these losses in Canada.

How could a Canadian company or a multinational that is in the slightest way on the ball not be tempted to create bogus companies outside of the country? How can these companies resist the temptation to reduce their Canadian taxes, to make foreign investments and to claim a deduction for the interest on those investments? It is an open invitation that the Bloc Quebecois decries. The Bloc denounces such things and would like to see all countries treated equally.

The Bloc Quebecois calls for an end to flags of convenience, to freebies for big business that allow them to avoid paying tax. Many large businesses pay no taxes. Indeed, a Liberal member, the member for Gander—Grand Falls, told us last October that according to his research, 77 companies with over $25 million in profits did not pay any tax in Canada.

They do not pay any tax because they can make deductions, they can make money out of the country, they can search for deductions. What do you think people over 65 years of age who earn $30,000 and are seeing their age credit taken from them have to say when they see big multinationals and prosperous companies that turn a profit get away without paying any tax?

They say that honest taxpayers are being picked on again, and that those with means, who are rich, who can make representations and can lobby have access to provisions in income tax laws which allow them to avoid paying their fair share. The Bloc will not stand for this.

I would like to add, before closing, not to take advantage of your kindness, that the budget and perhaps this bill should have contained other measures regarding the whole issue of business subsidies.

Everybody tells us that their economic effectiveness is debateable. The Bloc Quebecois has demanded that a good part of these business subsidies, which amount to approximately $3.3 billion in Canada, be cut. We asked for a reduction in defence spending totalling $3.2 billion over two years. We asked the government to stop investing in the Hibernia group in Newfoundland. We asked for a real minimum tax on the profits of large corporations, because the strategy of these corporations is to reduce their profits for the current fiscal year by subtracting any losses they may have incurred in previous years, so they do not have to pay taxes on those profits.

In fact, we asked Revenue Canada to do what it has to do to get the $6.6 billion owed to the federal treasury. The auditor general said in his report that a large percentage of this money could be recovered. In other words, before reducing the incomes of senior citizens and cutting social programs, the government should go out and get the money owed to the treasury. To put it bluntly, that is part of the mandate of the Minister of National Revenue.

For all these reasons, the Bloc Quebecois will vote against Bill C–59, because it contains measures that are inadequate and do not deal with the real problems of tax collection in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to speak on Bill C–59.

Bill C–59 is sort of a remnant, a leftover or a bad memory about the last budget that was brought into this House, the 1994–95 budget, a most disgusting type of document that was ever presented to Canadians. It was a document that was not prepared, not thought through and had nothing to do with the real economy of this country. That is one of the disgusting things that I think about this morning.

The other disgusting thing that I think about is the fact that the Liberal members, many of them who sit in the front row today, sat for eight years on this side of the House and never prepared themselves for government. The reason that a party is in the official opposition is that it prepares itself to be the government. They did not do that. For eight years the Liberals played politics, surface politics. They tried to think about how they could go on a power trip or manipulate the government to get back into power and sit on the front benches on that side.

By accident the Liberals did. By accident they became the government. When they became government they did not have any plans. They did not know why they were government. They were like a dog that caught a car and did not know what to do with it, that traditional, proverbial story.

The Liberals talk about the fact that they put out a red book. The fact of the matter is that red book has so many generalities and political statements that are out of date and meaningless today that it is like the ostrich that has his head in the sand and does not look around at the true reality of life at a point in time. They stand up over and over again and say to us as Canadians that the red book states they are going to do this. They cannot bring themselves beyond the red book to try to create another idea or to recognize that the economy of Canada is something different than it was four or five years ago when the red book was written.

The minister of defence should certainly think about some of these things and take his responsibility when these kinds of things are before the House.

• (1040)

Here before us we have Bill C–59 which talks about tax increases. Most likely these were designed in the red book as well. Three or four years before they were introduced nobody looked at whether they were contemporary in nature or not or fit the circumstances. They do not.

Today in the 1994–95 budget there should not have been any increases in taxes or a greater imposition on the business community of this country which Bill C–59 does. It is the most disgusting thing that I have ever seen.

Here today we hear this ghost of the 1994–95 budget being brought into this House, the ghost that is going to haunt us as Canadians.

What has been the result of that kind of planning and that kind of responsibility that this Liberal Party has taken? What is the response? Yesterday we had the response to Canadians by Moody's from New York. It made a political interception into the economy of Canada and said very clearly to Canadians, said very clearly to the Minister of Finance, said very clearly to the Prime Minister they are going to bring forward a budget in 1995–96 that is absolutely inadequate and that Moody's is going to lower the credit rating of this country from an AAA to an AA.

This government is thinking five years ago about things it did five years ago. This government does not recognize that you cannot tax people more in this country. This government does not recognize that this target of 3 per cent that was set out in the red book is not a realistic figure in terms of the economy today. It is a political target that was set up by this government three or four years ago to move into an election. It cannot understand the stupidity of that projection at that time is only more stupid today. It is unrealistic in terms of this economy and the needs of this economy.

The government does not understand. The Liberal Party does not understand. The Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, who are key to where we go in Canada, key to our economic stability, key to job growth, key to economic growth, are blind to the facts of the current circumstances. They do not realize that they have to sit down with their colleagues in caucus and say that this liberal approach to government, this kind of soft, fuzzy decision making has to stop. They have to recognize that they have to eliminate the deficit in the next three or four years. They must do it within the term of this Parliament. They must say it in the 1995–96 budget that is going to come before us in about a month.

They have to say that to Canadians. They have to say that to the investment community. If they do not, what is going to happen? Yesterday was the best signal this government could ever have. The government has time to revise its plans. It was given a signal loud and clear. It has to come up with a plan to balance its budget, to bring the deficit to zero within the term of this Parliament. The dollar lowered yesterday some 47 points. We saw it lower again this morning. We saw the bonds affected significantly. We are going to see interest rates going up. They have already. We know what interests rates do to the cost of government.

Many of us have said this in this House and I feel it is a very reliable figure. Every 1 per cent increase in interest rates over a period of a year costs $7 billion to this government and to us as Canadians. If we compound the interest into the second year it is something like $2.3 billion with that 1 per cent interest rate. In the third year that 1 per cent interest rate means something like $3.5 billion. Government members do not understand that. They were given a shock treatment yesterday that should have provided them with the best advice or the best favour ever. However what did they do? They do not listen.

• (1045)

As the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister stand in question period today they will say they are going to hit their target in two years. Who cares? The target is stupid. The target is out of gear. The target is not even realistic. It is the most unrealistic thing I have ever heard in terms of today's economies.

Moody's is telling the government that its target is out of gear and inadequate. It is reported in the press. If all these people who read the paper in the morning to get their political advice read the Financial Post or the Globe and Mail this morning, they would have received some good advice on the implications of what the Liberals are doing or how they are acting.

I hope the government takes some time to listen. I hope it will revise some of these fuzzy liberal expenditure reductions that we will hear about at the end of the month. I hope it will reconsider some of the taxes to be imposed.

As I listen to members, not only in the House but in interviews through the various media, I hear that the Liberals are going to put a tax on lotteries. They are going to tax greater the corporate sector. I am sure they will put a surtax on all Canadians to pay for their bad management and the fact that they cannot reduce expenditures in the country quickly.

They are setting up Canadians in the sense that they are misinforming Canadians. They are telling Canadians that if they reduce the size of government, lay off employees, pay them severances and so on, they will not be able to bring the budget down quickly. They are creating this image. They are saying that they cannot bring it down quickly in the first two years so they will put a surtax on us. It just does not work that way.

If expenditure reduction is done in the right way and some grant programs and the overhead in some departments are cut and employees are released as quickly as possible, there will be an expenditure reduction.

All we have to do is look at what happened in Alberta. There was a direct relationship between the reduction in the size of government and the reduction in expenditures. The fallacy that is being created that we will need a surtax on an interim basis is a bunch of hogwash and I hope Canadians do not accept it. They will react to that kind of thing.

The Liberals talk about other taxes such as an inheritance tax. There are a few people in Canada who worked hard and saved money, and they want to take from their pockets as well. They also talk about the RRSPs. People know that the Canada pension plan will not be sustainable under current circumstances. What are they going to do there? I am sure it is part of the upcoming budget. They will reduce the level and the amount of RRSPs middle income people can put away for their future retirement.

The Liberal government is still living with its head in the sand. It is living a the period of time about five years ago when the red book was written. It has not adjusted to today. It is still living this old traditional approach to politics, that is to tax the people and not cut the money spent on inefficient and ineffective social programs that have failed.

I have had the fortunate opportunity to have been in politics for about 30 years. I observed in my early days that people were more self–reliant. I recognize that this liberal attitude has caused us to spend billions of dollars on what we thought were social problems. Everybody in Canada were to be perfect individuals. It has failed. Unemployment is greater. There are more people on social programs, unemployment insurance and public assistance today. There are three million Canadians on public assistance. If that is a success story then we should spend more money and improve it some way or another. However that is not the way it is done. Those social programs have failed but members of the government want to carry on because they think that is the approach to making Canadians perfect.

It is like their support for the CBC. I hear from some of them that the CBC has to continue its rate of expenditure because it creates the culture of Canada. That is the dumbest thing I have ever heard.

Bill C–59 is a glimpse of the inadequacy of the government. It is a glimpse of what is to come: more taxation in the 1995–96 budget because they want to take from the rich and supposedly give to the poor. That is the philosophy but I do not know who is on either end today.

It also indicates a soft fuzzy approach to expenditure reduction to eliminate the deficit. Many of my colleagues have asked over and over again in the House what will happen after two years when we still have a $25 billion deficit. There most likely will be a downturn in the economy that could immediately put pressure on government borrowing and push our deficit again up to $40 billion or $50 billion. It will be out of control. We have a window at this time and the government does not recognize that it is there.

Government members blame the debt on the Conservatives. They say that the Conservatives did it. They have to remember that Mr. Chrétien, Mr. Trudeau and others left $170 billion of debt. Certainly the Conservatives boosted that up to $500 billion. Now it is at $550 billion. In two years it will be $600 billion with a $50 billion interest payment being made. Where are social programs then?

We do not support Bill C–59 and the government has to wake up and be realistic about its responsibility. It is unfortunate that we have to sit here for another three years with a majority government. It is going to be an unfortunate circumstance for Canadians.

I urge everybody in the House to vote against Bill C–59.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair would ask the hon. member for Lethbridge not to refer to sitting members of the House or ministers by their proper names. As he knows we are expected to refer to their ministries and so on.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend, the member who spoke on behalf of the Reform Party on Bill C–59. I must say I always appreciate his comments. I agree with hardly any of them but I nevertheless appreciate them. He always presents them in a thoughtful and articulate way.

One point perplexed me about his comments. Canada is one of the very few countries of the OECD that does not have an inheritance tax; people inheriting $10 million or $20 million are not required to pay any tax.

An hon. member: That is good.

Mr. Riis: I hear my friend in the Reform Party saying that is good. They say that it is good, that people should inherit vast amounts of money and pay no tax.

They support the notion that on income received from capital gains tax is paid on only 75 per cent. They say that is good. They say that certain people, particularly the wealthy people of the country, should get as much as possible. They say that is good because they work hard for it. That implies that other people do not work hard for their money.

Why is it that Reformers feel average working people produce the most if their are wages are low and they are hungry? Why do they feel if we pay them very poorly they will be out there working hard? Why do they feel the way to get working people to work is to pay them as little as possible? However, they feel that the way to get wealthy people working is to pay them the most possible.

Is there not some inconsistency in the logic of rewarding the wealthy so they will work but keep the wages of the poor and average working person as low as possible to encourage them to work? To me there is a bit of inconsistency in the argument of my friends in the Reform Party.

Today we are talking about Bill C–59. The speaker for the government went on at some length about how it was an effort to make the tax system fairer. It might be a slight baby step in that direction.

Let us take the whole issue of escort services. No one here knows anything about escort services, but if we look in the telephone book there are a number of pages listing escort services. It is interesting that our tax system says that escort services are tax deductible. I guess with some people it is a cost of doing business. I am not sure what escorts cost, but whatever the bill is it can be submitted as part of a tax return. It is called a cost of conducting business.

When the question was recently put to national revenue officials, they said they have to change it, it is getting a little questionable in terms of a legitimate tax deduction. However if the escort service is called a bodyguard or a tour guide it is acceptable. We have some interesting concepts here in terms of what a bodyguard or a tour guide might imply.

Nevertheless the reality is that simply by using a little creative commenting on an income tax return, escort services and entertainment of that type will be tax deductions. Is this reasonable? Is this acceptable to the people of Canada? My suspicion is that it is not.

My hon. friend talked about the business tax deduction moving from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. Should we not distinguish between various kinds of business costs? I do not think anybody here would argue that business people getting together over a dinner, lunch or breakfast to discuss a transaction or a business arrangement is a legitimate cost of doing business.

However, as I said earlier, is an escort service deduction a legitimate cost? Is the annual fee for a box in a sports stadium a legitimate cost of doing business? Is purchasing a yacht to entertain clients a legitimate cost of doing business? Is choosing the Bali Hilton or the Waikiki Hilton as the place for an annual meeting a legitimate cost of conducting a business?

I know a number of people who own large boats, sailboats, launches and racing boats. They are business tax deductions and are used for entertaining clients.

Is a hunting lodge or a fishing camp a legitimate business deduction? I suppose we could say in some cases it is, but enough is enough. My hon. friend stands and tries to say that part of the changes to the Income Tax Act will be to bring fairness back into the system by removing the deduction—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30 (5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Monday's three by–elections confirmed Canadians' continued faith in our federal system of government and in its ability to adjust to new problems in Canadian society, problems hardly dreamed of or imagined by those who established Canada's constitution.

Canadian federalism has never been an abstract and inflexible charter carved in stone in 1867. It is a dynamic process of constitutional creation. It involves balancing differing social interests in a spirit of pragmatism and cooperation. It is a new federalism, a living, highly efficient and cooperative one.

REFERENDUM ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on March 13, 1865, a majority in the Parliament of the Province of Canada voted against holding a referendum on confederation. The proposed referendum was defeated by a vote of 83 to 35.

Canada was therefore born out of a bill adopted by a simple majority.

The people of Canada had no say in this process, because a simple vote in the House was deemed sufficient to legitimize the process.

Unlike the act establishing Canada, the draft bill declaring Quebec's sovereignty will not come into effect without the support of the people of Quebec expressed in a referendum.

To all those Canadians with lofty democratic ideals, who consider a vote of 50 per cent plus one insufficient to legitimize the choice of Quebecers, I would suggest another look at their Canadian history books.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, since January 1 of this year I have received over 700 letters and 60 petitions from my constituents in Cariboo—Chilcotin rightly protesting the government's intention to introduce new firearms legislation. I would like to quote from one letter:

> Ignorance is the cause of fear and the fear of firearms now is caused by a general lack of understanding of what a gun is, how it functions and how extensive our existing gun laws currently are. If the public understood what an honest citizen must currently go through to legally acquire a firearm, they would realize that the new gun control legislation is nothing more than an expensive publicity campaign designed to appear as if the government is fighting crime. We, the people, need education about firearms, not gun laws that attack honest gun owners and leave the criminals at the status quo.

I agree with my constituents. We do not need any more firearms legislation.

MEMBER FOR LONGUEUIL

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Longueuil asserted in the House that it is ridiculous to think that Canada ranks among the best countries in the world in respect of standard of living because, according to him, Canada is considered to be like a Third World country because of the size of its debt. He even claimed that we were trying to deceive people.

The comparison made by the Bloc Quebecois member is crude and his reasoning very unsound. Here are the facts. The UN world report on human development for 1992 and 1994 ranks Canada as the best country in which to live.

The only ones trying to deceive people, and in particular the population of Quebec, are the Bloc Quebecois members. It is very easy to be a separatist if the effect of the worst scenario they can imagine, that is losing the referendum, would be for them to continue living in the best country in the world.

TRADE

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on February 2 the United States formally notified the federal government that it considers our move toward tariffication of supply managed commodities to be a violation of the NAFTA.

Let me state clearly that our tariffication is what was agreed to at the GATT, including by the Americans. In reality our good neighbour to the south is playing big bully games against the very principles agreed to at the GATT.

On February 14 the Minister of International Trade made it clear he will not make any concessions to the Americans on this issue. I support that position. This government cannot make any concessions on the supply managed commodities. Our legal position is sound and the GATT takes precedence over the NAFTA.

I would expect, therefore, that consultations with the Americans will be short and the message will be clear: no concessions on the tariff issue.

PROJECT READ

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has already been five years since the United Nations designated 1990 as the international year of literacy. It is the UN's goal to liberate nearly a quarter of the world's population from the bonds of illiteracy by the year 2000 and much of this work starts at home.

It is estimated that 1.2 million adults in Ontario are functionally illiterate. In my own riding of Parkdale—High Park, librarian Rita Cox and the Parkdale Project Read are beating the odds. Just ask two of Project Read's recent graduates, Jerry Lee Miller and Ed Anable. They are individual success stories and are shining examples that together we can break the cycle of illiteracy.

I congratulate the minister responsible for literacy for doing an excellent job in this field.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a study made public yesterday, the Commissioner of Official Languages said that francophone and Acadian communities in Canada have good cause to complain.

Bilingualism in federal institutions has been a dismal failure, in spite of the Official Languages Act which was passed 25 years ago.

How can one explain that, in spite of the already very limited number of federal offices outside of Quebec which are designated bilingual, 28 per cent of them still do not provide services in French? In all other offices, even though they are designated bilingual, francophones have to kick up a fuss to be served in their language.

In view of the worrisome rate of assimilation of francophones outside Quebec, what precisely is the government waiting for to assume its responsibilities and to respect the most fundamental rights of the francophone minority?

CANADA COUNCIL

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I received a card from the Canada Council last week, as did all MPs. It asked me to imagine Canada without musicians, painters, writers and other artists. The card implies that without the council Canada will lack culture and imagination.

Well I have news for the Canada Council. Canadians have culture and imagination in spite of the Canada Council. Works like those of the Group of Seven that are now hanging in our National Gallery were examples of Canadian culture and imagination long before the Canada Council was ever conceived. No grants were needed to create these masterpieces and many of today's artists work grant free.

Why not imagine a country with a balanced budget, a healthy economy, a workplace free from government interference? Speaking of balanced budgets, the debt clock this week passed $550 billion. Shame, shame.

RANDOM ACTS OF KINDNESS

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, did you know that today is the last day for random acts of kindness week?

Ten years ago author Anne Herbert scribbled a phrase on her paper placemat: "Practise random kindness and acts of senseless beauty". Since then her message has become the slogan for people who believe in their ability to make the world a better place.

This week then is an opportunity for Canadians to surprise their fellow citizens with unselfish resplendent acts.

In these times of economic disparity it is important to bring to the attention of this House and to all Canadians that a kindness movement is sweeping through North America. As the movement's organizers state, this week provides a common focus for all Canadians who believe that a little kindness goes a long way and that the greatest gift we can share with one another is our spirit of hope and optimism.

Although the week is coming to a close, I would like to wish all of my colleagues a day, a session and a year filled with random kindness and acts of senseless beauty.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR GLOBAL SECURITY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in January the Canadian Centre for Global Security announced that it would be shutting down as a result of the federal government's decision to terminate its funding.

For 12 years this centre provided independent and non–partisan policy advice on a wide range of strategic issues. Among them was the centre's work on the nuclear non–proliferation treaty and peacekeeping reform.

By terminating its funding, the government has closed one of the last independent centres of this type in Canada. This is of further concern given that we are now celebrating the 50th anniversary of the United Nations and the world is still plagued by war, instability and injustice.

In opposition we were outraged when the previous government shut down the Canadian Centre for International Peace and Security in 1992.

I am extremely concerned that this decision will send a negative message with respect to Canada's commitment to peacemaking, peacekeeping and arms control. I ask the government to reconsider.

GUELPH STORM HOCKEY TEAM

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on February 2 the Guelph Storm became the first Ontario Hockey League team to secure a play–off berth.

The Storm has enjoyed a very successful year and is currently fighting Sudbury for first place in the central division. It is in a tight race with six other teams for first place overall.

Coach Craig Hartsburg deserves much of the credit for the team's success, along with every Storm player. Coach Hartsburg stresses the philosophy of team work both on and off the ice.

Guelph—Wellington fans look forward to the remaining games in the chase for the Memorial Cup. Like everything else we do, our hockey team has proven that Guelph—Wellington takes its opponents by storm.

1980 REFERENDUM

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's peculiar sense of humour reached unexpected cynical heights when he said yesterday in the House that Quebecers liked Mr. Trudeau's speech so much that they voted no in the 1980 referendum.

How could the Prime Minister say such a thing and really believe it? Between you and me, the Prime Minister certainly could not have been serious. He has undoubtedly forgotten the famous promise: "We are putting our seats on the line to bring about change; a no in the referendum will mean a yes to renewed federalism".

Quebecers remember that this promise was broken, and, for this reason, have elected few Liberal members of Parliament since 1984. The Prime Minister has once again demonstrated in the House that he has absolutely no understanding of the hopes and motivations of Quebecers.

GOVERNMENT BACKBENCHERS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, every day in the House of Commons we are forced to witness a humiliating spectacle as government backbenchers rise to ask their own ministers the easy questions.

My heart goes out to these members as they perform their odious duty. I wonder what fears must cross their minds. What if they refuse? What if they make a mistake? What if the minister eager for the planted question misplaces his briefing notes?

It is refreshing that one backbencher, the member for York South—Weston, refuses to advise the front bench of his questions in advance. It is unfortunate that more Liberal backbenchers fail to place the interest of their constituents ahead of the party line.

Have pity for the lowly backbenchers today as they rise to lob beachballs at their political bosses. Pardon the ministers who make a sham out of question period by delivering speeches dressed up as answers. But most of all, pity the listening public which graciously endures the public daily humiliation of members who wish they could just say no.

LITERACY

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is literacy week in Canada.

The ability to read and write empowers people. It enables them to improve their position in an increasingly complex economy, to avail themselves of their rights and fulfil their duties in our country with its democratic privileges and responsibilities and to better understand themselves and the world around them.

[Translation]

Literacy is an essential element of every modern society and we can be proud of the fact that this government has named a minister responsible for literacy and has established a secretariat with the mandate of eliminating illiteracy nationwide.

[English]

Personally, I am very proud of Frontier College located in my Toronto riding and the leadership it provides in this field. It and other institutions like it and thousands of volunteers work on literacy programs that make an important contribution to our society.

If not addressed, illiteracy has heavy costs for Canada and for those individuals who struggle with the problem every day of their lives.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to indicate my outrage that Moody's bond rating agency would place Canada's credit rating under review only two weeks before the federal budget comes down. Why did it not just place a horse's head in the Minister of Finance's bed?

We recognize that strong fiscal action is required. We are determined to meet our financial targets stated in the red book. Our deficit reduction target of 3 per cent of GDP is only an interim target while our long term goal is to eliminate the deficit in its entirety.

Canada's inflation is the lowest in the G–7. Our export growth is strong. StatsCanada's composite leading indicator grew by .6 per cent in January and wage settlements only grew by .3 per cent in 1994.

I think it is Moody's that should be watched.

Oral Questions

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third annual gala for child poverty will take place in the capital tomorrow.

This successful event benefits needy children in the Ottawa—Carleton region. It is sponsored by the Fund for the New Generation, a group of active young people who represent all parties in the House as well as the public, private and university sectors. These young people strongly believe in grassroots community support.

• (1115)

I would like to take this opportunity to thank local merchants, retailers and national sponsors, such as Sun Life, Ryder Travel and Merck Frosst. Additional support is also provided by the Museum of Nature, the Ottawa Sun, KOOL–FM and the Hill Times.

Honorary chairs are Mayor Holtzman and the Speaker of the House of Commons. They have made the event possible, but they cannot do it alone. I call on members and citizens in the Ottawa–Hull area to go to the Museum of Nature tomorrow night at eight o'clock.

CANADA'S CREDIT RATING

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after the dollar's wild ride last month and the recent rise in interest rates, yesterday, the renowned rating agency Moody's put Canada's credit rating under review.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Since Moody's explained that its warning was due to the unacceptable levels of the federal and provincial deficits, does the Minister of Finance admit that his strategy to shovel his deficit into the provinces' backyards is making financial markets even more nervous?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker. We indicated very clearly to the provinces that our intention was not to shovel anything into their backyards but to work in close co–operation with them to really solve our common problems by putting our fiscal house in order at the federal and provincial levels. I must say that, at our meeting with the provincial finance ministers, they understood that very well.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, around this time last year, the Minister of Finance announced that he would show his true colours in his 1995 budget. We learned this week that the real Martin budget will be the 1996 budget.

Does the minister admit that Moody's warning is based on the financial markets' fear of having to defer the real decisions for another year?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in our last budget, we took more measures to solve Canada's financial problem than in any other budget in the last decade.

We said that last year's budget was the first phase and that the second phase would be this year's budget. And that is still our strategy.

Now, am I to understand from the hon. member's comments that he is against our intention to notify the provinces in order not to cause any surprises and that he is trying to promote the Conservative policy of causing surprises and offloading responsibilities onto the provinces? Well, that is not our intention.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

Since the finance minister's performance aimed at shaping public opinion has gone on for too long and cost hundreds of millions of dollars because of the rise in interest rates, can the minister finally act responsibly and announce today the date of his next budget in order to end speculations hurting the Canadian economy?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, I indicated very clearly that we were following a timetable that was set a long time ago. There is a budget every year and we intend to table our budget in due course. At that time, I will be pleased to respond to the hon. member's question regarding the date.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance.

In putting Canada's credit rating under review, the New York firm Moody's based its decision partly on concerns that the next budget will increase taxes.

Will the minister admit that his inability to target tax iniquities as well as his refusal to pledge not to increase taxes in the next budget are additional sources of concern for financial markets?

• (1120)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to contradict the hon. member, but if you heard Moody's announcement, you know that the decision has absolutely nothing to do with the budget, nor with any assumptions regarding taxes. That decision was prompted by a review of federal and provincial finances.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. When the minister says that he wants to target the tax shelters available to the rich, something which we heard before in this House, is he thinking of people who earn $26,000 a year, as was the case in the 1994 budget, when he went after the tax credit for the elderly? Are these people the rich Canadians to whom the minister is referring?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the last budget, we eliminated many tax loopholes, including butterfly transactions, the $100,000 exemption on capital gains and the benefits enjoyed by corporations with subsidiaries and affiliates abroad.

I do not know how the hon. member defines the rich, but let me tell you one thing: We, Liberal members, do not consider that a person with an annual income of $26,000 is wealthy.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

He will know that despite his assurances, which are widely believed, that the government will meet its short term targets, a downgrade of Canada's credit rating now appears to be inevitable. This will lead to higher interest rates, higher borrowing rates and higher mortgage rates for all Canadians, rates that have risen considerably since the government took office.

Will the minister admit that his targets, whether or not they are met, are totally inadequate? That is what the markets are saying.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development –Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that on reflection, the member would want to think about what he has just said.

I am sure that he does not want to stand in the House and express to the world that the credit rating of this country will be downgraded. I hope that in his supplementary question he will pick up on that point.

A reading of the Moody's press release does not lead to the conclusion that the member has just drawn. Let me reaffirm that the 3 per cent target is an interim target. We are going to hit it and that is a very substantial accomplishment. Our ultimate goal is to eliminate the deficit.

Let me assure the member that we are going to hit our interim target and we are also going to hit our ultimate target.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the money markets are judging the performance of the government and they are not judging that performance favourably.

The minister must admit the 3 per cent target will add at least $100 billion in debt over the short term. At best with current growth rates and interest rates, the markets are discovering that this means a likely continued deterioration in the debt–GDP ratio.

Will the minister admit that the 3 per cent target is inadequate and must be revised on more fundamentally sound economic grounds?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will admit that the reason for the increase in the debt is not the target we have set but is the accumulation of the debt that we have inherited.

Whether it is this target or whether it is a target set by the Reform Party, a tail would exist. We have said very clearly that the 3 per cent target is an interim target.

Interim means interim. We have set a series of short term goals to make sure that we do not make the mistake of the previous government, which was to have longer term goals and allow people to postpone the day of decision.

We have set short term mileposts and we are going to hit them. We are going to continue to hit them until the finances of the country are put in a healthy state.

• (1125)

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it was the government's decision to ignore that advice and to lose the valuable first year in office. It is irrelevant to the money market whether the government hits a target of nearly $40 billion.

To help restore credibility to his fiscal policy in the budget, will the minister set definite targets beyond 1996–97 and specify the tough actions necessary to reach them?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have made it very clear that we are going to operate on a set of rolling two–year targets, that we are going to deal with the profound structural changes of this economy and the government spending needs.

As a result of the actions taken in this budget, and the actions taken in the last budget, which was the most substantive in the last 10 years, we are going to do what we have always said we would do, put the country's finances in a sound state.

I understand his advice. It is well taken. I have great respect for the question. The only question I ask is: Why did he not give the same advice when he was working for the Conservative government and it allowed this debt?

CUSTOMS TARIFFS

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Canada is now defending its tariff on agricultural products. The agriculture and international trade ministers have repeatedly suggested that Canada's legal position would not be strong enough to save its tariffs on yogurt and ice cream, most of which is produced in Quebec, where producers stand to lose more than $100 million if the government does not support them.

My question is for the Minister of International Trade. Since the GATT agreement provides that tariffs will replace all other measures at the border to protect agricultural products, how can the minister be so dubious about the strength of the Canadian position on yogurt and ice cream?

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I fully understood the question. The Canadian government intends to defend the dairy and poultry industries vigorously, as I said the other day. That of course includes yogurt and ice cream.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is all very well, but the fact remains that Canada's legal position is more or less supported by GATT and NAFTA. So why is the minister negotiating another agreement, outside GATT and NAFTA, with respect to ice cream and yogurt?

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of negotiating another agreement, if I understood the question. Our position is fundamentally, and has continued to be, that the protection afforded the dairy and poultry industry under the new World Trade Organization is the policy we are pursuing.

The United States has taken another view, that there is a commitment under the NAFTA to go to zero tariffs on those products. That is not our position. It may be the American position. Our position is clear. It is entirely defensible. We intend to pursue it vigorously, in the consultations which the United States has requested.

SOCIAL POLICY

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my questions are for the Minister of Finance.

Everyone knows that social spending, broadly defined, takes up about 70 per cent of all program spending. Therefore, budget balancing requires social spending cuts, not as a matter of Ideology but of simple arithmetic, to use the words of the Minister of Finance.

Does the Minister of Finance agree that yesterday's announcement by Moody's was caused by the absence of a clear commitment to substantial social spending cuts?

• (1130)

If you read Moody's press release, it did not assign a cause for blame in terms of social spending. It looked at the overall financial condition of the federal government and the provinces.

There is no doubt as we approach the budget that it is going to be important that we cut government spending. It is going to be important that we cut government spending in each part of its operation.

I would remind the hon. member that most studies in this area have also indicated that short term cutting of social spending hurts people's health, their ability to be trained and their ability to get work in the long run. As a leading economist I am sure the hon. member would agree that would add to the deficit. That is the balance that we have to bring to this particular exercise.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to have that answer because I think the capital markets will not like it.

A revenue increase in tax measures announced for the next budget will drive more Canadian investment abroad. The way he talks, the Minister of Finance will have a good shot at becoming the man of the year for job creation in the United States.

Does the minister not agree that it is time to stop the tired Liberal rhetoric about tax fairness, do what is right for Canada and rule out tax increases in the next budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are in the next budget going to deal with all levels of government spending in all areas. There should be no doubt about this government's determination to break the back of the deficit. We are going to do that. We are going to do it fairly because fairness is the essence of Canadians supporting a government's action in facing up to this burden. We are going to do it that way. Taxation may or may not be part of it.

The debate that I continue to have with hon. members opposite is the supposition that the current system is perfect, that there is no need for further fairness to be built in, that there is no need for further efficiency. That is wrong. The tax system must evolve. The tax system must be improved. We intend to make it happen.

In terms of job creation, 460,000–odd jobs have been created in this country. It is the best job creation record of any country in the G–7. I am damned proud of what we are doing.

CUSTOMS TARIFFS

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the agriculture minister. Milk producers in Canada should be able to count on the government standing up for their interests in respect of the Canadian customs tariffs disputed by the United States. If its past record is any indication of what is to come, one might fear that the government may give in to pressure once again.

Are we to understand from the remarks of his colleague for international trade that Canada is preparing to drop yogurt and ice cream, thereby creating a significant gap in the supply management system?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker. The answer given by the Minister for International Trade was very clear. The Canadian position through the last 16 months that we have been in office has been absolute and unequivocal. We support the Canadian supply management system. We are determined to defend that system against all comers. If the United States has a different point of view and wants to take a run at us, we obviously cannot stop it from taking a run at us, but if it does we will defend ourselves with everything we have.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Since the legal position in this dispute is straightforward and clearly established by the Uruguay Round and there is nothing to negotiate, are we to understand that the government's weakness in this matter, which affects Quebec in particular, is the price to be paid to Americans for having resolved the conflict over western wheat last summer?

• (1135)

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, absolutely not. The position of the Canadian government through all of these very difficult trade issues with the United States has been first and foremost that we will defend Canadian interest and every aspect of it and that we will not in any way engage in any form of trade–off between regions of the country or different groups of farmers or different commodity groups.

Each one of these issues is separate and distinct and must be dealt with individually on its own merits. We will not engage in any form of trade–off.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the responses of the Minister of Finance to my colleagues from Calgary West and Capilano—Howe Sound.

The minister has confirmed in this House that the government only has an interim target or goal and nothing beyond that. Moody's has given a message and the business community has given a message that there needs to be more.

Would he confirm that the government's target is a political target but not a real target in terms of economic needs today?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government's target, 3 per cent of GDP, is approximately at the level at which the growth of the economy becomes greater than the growth of the debt. The debt to GDP ratio will begin to stabilize and then decline.

That is a very important target for a country. It is not a political target. It is an economic target. I am sure the member understands that. I am also sure the member understands when I say that it is an interim target that our ultimate target is to eliminate the deficit.

I am also sure the member will understand that a country does not only live by targets, that it lives by success. If I might, as of today the fact is Canada had its most impressive year ever for trade. I want to congratulate my colleagues. Merchandise exports, imports and the trade surplus over the year are at record levels. I congratulate the minister.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister can laud those accomplishments all he wants. Was it because of the government or despite the government that those things happened?

Moody's and the business community are saying very clearly to the government that it should work toward a balanced budget and we could maintain our triple–A rating. That is not happening.

Under the current circumstances would the minister consider stopping the presses, revising his budget, increasing the expenditure reduction and bringing in a more credible budget at the end of this month, better than the one he has announced to the business community?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last spring when the House was sitting the members opposite kept standing up and saying we are not going to hit our target, will we bring in a new budget, that they are panic stricken and we have to do something. About every second day there was a new cry of gloom and doom from the other side.

At that time we said there was no necessity to bring in a new budget for this year because we were going to hit our targets. Now we are going to beat those targets by a great deal.

The hon. member is bringing in his budget next Tuesday. We all look forward to it. I find it a little difficult that he stands in this House and says that we must revise our budget, we must bring in a more credible budget when he has not even seen it.

I can understand the necessity of practising and rehearsing his lines for after we bring in the budget but I do not think he should do it publicly.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The Federal Environmental Assessment Review Panel, which is studying a proposal to increase the number of low level flights in Labrador, has not yet submitted its report to the government.

Is the Minister of the Environment aware of the negotiations currently in progress between Canada and Italy, Belgium, and the United States with a view to permitting new military training flights, even before the impact on the environment, wildlife, and people is known, and has the minister given her support for these negotiations?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how does the minister explain her government's disregard for the normal democratic process of consultation, by negotiating new low level flights now, even before the assessment report has been tabled?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we reject the hon. member's allegation. The environmental assessment is currently under way, and we will abide by the results of the assessment, which have yet to be reported to cabinet.

CAMP IPPERWASH

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Last year this government announced its commitment to return the site of Camp Ipperwash to the Kettle and Stoney Point Band. I understand that DND and the band have had discussions about a joint environmental assessment of the land before it is turned over.

Will the minister please tell me what progress is being made on returning the Camp Ipperwash land to the Kettle and Stoney Point Band?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. I know she is very concerned with the future of those particular lands.

As she will know, we decided to close Camp Ipperwash in last year's defence cuts because we believed that we could discharge our obligations at other facilities in Ontario and also because we wanted to facilitate the land being returned to the native population.

We are prepared to engage in a study with the native population of the area to decide on which approach should be taken in terms of environmental clean-up. We will give equal status to them on any particular study that is done.

Unfortunately we have yet to secure the agreement of local native leaders in this process and we are most anxious to do so.

LABOUR

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Last April the minister appointed Paul Fraser to report on current labour issues in the rail sector affecting CN, CP and Via Rail. This report has been pushed back a number of times now.

Where is the report and why has it not been able to prevent what appears to be an inevitable strike?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if I might be allowed to clarify the hon. member's assertions, we appointed Mr. Allan Hope as the conciliation commissioner, not Mr. Paul Fraser. Mr. Hope has already submitted his conciliation report which I received just last week.

We are presently reviewing it. It is going forward for translation. I expect to be able to table that report sometime next week at which time I hope it will provide the basis for a good negotiated settlement between the parties. I would not engage, as the hon. member seems to do, in prophesying a strike. I think the report can provide the basis for an agreement.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we certainly hope that Mr. Hope's report does bring hope to the situation.

In 1950, 1966, 1973 and 1987 the federal government introduced back to work legislation within days of a railway strike and had to appoint an arbitrator. Last year a grain handler strike went through the same process.

Recognizing the devastation and the consequences of another strike to industry in Canada, now that the minister expects to receive this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would hope the member would get to the question, please.

Mr. McClelland: Will the minister introduce legislation that would prevent a strike before the need for back to work legislation?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at no time did we welcome the need to use back to work legislation. The Canadian labour code was built upon the basic principle of collective bargaining, which means that parties to a dispute can arrive at a settlement that meets their mutual interests. That is on what the labour relations of the country have been built and have in fact served us.

• (1145)

Over the last year or so we have had a remarkable period of labour peace in Canada which I think we would like to see maintained. I would expect, once we table the report, that hope will spring eternal for a settlement.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the public works minister.

For a few weeks now, the people of Quebec and Canada have been living under the threat of the next budget. People in need fear that it might be worse than the last one in the area of new social and co–op housing.

Given that since 1991, Quebec received only 19 per cent of the total amount earmarked for social housing, when it has a quarter of the population, which translates into a potential loss of $100 million per year, would the Minister of Public works commit himself to correcting this unfair situation for the neediest part of the Quebec population?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. I am sure he is well aware that all ministers of the crown have to participate in cutbacks in terms of various expenditures in each of our departments.

The Minister of Finance has been extremely vigilant with cabinet colleagues to make sure that every expenditure is given due consideration.

I wish I could stand in the House today, and indeed in subsequent weeks, and give all sorts of assurances that there will be largess from the Government of Canada as it relates to housing. Quite frankly I think that would be misleading the House.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): That answer, Mr. Speaker, comes from the mouth of a minister who is well known for his patronage in the maritimes and who shells out almost $400 million a year—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Marchand: The $100 million Quebec has lost over the past few years could be even higher if it were based on a Canadian standard—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. A question, please.

Mr. Marchand: That is my question. Is he aware that the $100 million is based on population and that if it were based on a Canadian standard of need it would be much higher than $100 million a year?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can well appreciate the concerns the hon. member is expressing, but he should know that we are in a very difficult fiscal situation as the Minister of Finance has told Canadians repeatedly.

I do not think it is accurate for the hon. member to suggest in the House or to imply by his questioning that somehow we are doing inappropriate things when it comes to the province of Quebec.

I remind the hon. member that the government, in view of its limited fiscal capacity, has provided $5 million over four years in support of low income housing through the CREESOM initiative. We have provided another $5 million in terms of the RéparAction program and another $5 million in terms of landlords to upgrade rental and rooming housing. We have provided further assistance as it relates to assisting homeowners with cracked foundations.

Given the fact that the Minister of Finance and other members of cabinet have a limited capacity within which to operate, I think we have done reasonably well under the guise of fairness to provide that kind of assistance to the province of Quebec.

MEMBERS' PENSIONS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for months now we have been listening to the Liberal government rail against two–tier health care and two–tier taxation.

Imagine my surprise when the Liberals floated a two–tier MP pension: a reduced trough for the new MPs and the original pork barrel for the Liberal frontbenches.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Why does the Liberal rhetoric of equality not apply to MP pensions? Why are so many Liberal MPs reluctant to part with their gold plated pensions?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question is false.

• (1150)

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is a price to pay for floating trial balloons and this one may be shot down.

I have a supplementary question. Why will the government not bring MPs' pensions into line with those in the private sector, do it equally across the board and do it now?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the Deputy Prime Minister said it all, but let me add that the government will acquit itself of its obligation with respect to the reform of MPs' pensions and it will be doing it mighty soon.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians in general and my constituents in particular have expressed great concern that overlap and duplication at all levels of government are costly and unnecessary.

In his speech on Wednesday, the Minister of Foreign Affairs announced that from now on the federal government would concentrate on areas of federal jurisdiction, recognizing that overlap and duplication had become serious problems.

What is the government doing to reduce costly overlap and duplication among all levels of government, particularly here in Ontario?

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member and my colleagues opposite that overlap and duplication seriously impair the efficiency of our federation. Fortunately we are making some real progress.

We have concluded agreements with the provincial government in 60 cases where we have made commitments. In these 60 cases, we have eliminated the overlap and duplication that raise costs for government in such areas as food inspection, drug prosecution, environmental management and, the member for Simcoe Centre will be glad to know, the Canada–Ontario Business Centre. Canada works best when it works together.

TAXATION

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who in his pursuit for tax fairness may or may not be aware that the business entertainment tax deduction includes escort services as long as the escort services are called being a bodyguard or a tour guide.

Again in an effort to bring sanity to our tax system, would the minister indicate to the House and to the Canadian public generally whether he feels it is an appropriate entertainment tax deduction?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that the escort services to which he has referred are not permitted.

However, if there is a situation where a bodyguard is required or a tour guide is required, it might be considered a legitimate business expense when entertaining a foreign client or someone like that. An interpreter would be in the same position.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, this may put a new twist on the term bodyguard or tour around the world guide or whatever.

Again in the pursuit of tax fairness, the Minister of Finance will know full well that a number of years ago as a result of the Carter commission, a study into Canada's taxation system, he indicated that a buck should be considered a buck, a buck, a buck, referring to the fact that a buck as capital gains is not equal to a dollar earned by labour.

Would the Minister of Finance recognize that this policy is worth considering at this point, particularly when we acknowledge that $1 billion is lost each year to the national treasury as a result of this tax provision?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I commend the member and certain members on my side who continue in the pursuit of tax fairness. It brings a very important element to the debate.

I fully understand the member's question and think everything should be on the table. Obviously everything should be looked at, but I would say that one can make the distinction especially at a time when one is looking to small and medium sized business and to entrepreneurs to create jobs. We should recognize that income derived from a certain degree of risk may well be treated differently if we are going to create the capital in the country to create more jobs.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. After making important commitments during the election campaign to reduce greenhouse gases, the government has been at a standstill on the issue for 15 months. Worse yet, the federal Cabinet is divided on the issue of whether punitive measures or only incentives should be used.

Is the Minister of the Environment of the same opinion as her counterpart from natural resources and the Prime Minister that the only way to meet the red book's commitment of reducing greenhouse gases is to implement voluntary measures and incentives in the industry?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member has not yet had the chance to read the Liberal government's commitment in the red book, because in the red book, we promised a national action program that we will present in Berlin, and we are continuing to work towards that goal with all those concerned.

I am disappointed that, unfortunately, one government will not be present at the meeting in Toronto, next Monday. All of the action plans will be tabled at that meeting. And, unfortunately, the one government which will not be present at the meeting on the very important issue of the effect of greenhouse gases on all Canadians is the government of Quebec. We want to work with the government of Quebec and I hope that the member opposite will do his best to bring Quebec to the negotiating table in Toronto on Monday.

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the bad track record the oil industry has regarding environmental protection, will the minister not concede that the government is dreaming in technicolour if it believes that it can reduce greenhouse gases by virtue of incentives only?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we need stronger measures in addition to mere incentives. This was the policy we adopted in Bathurst with all of ministers of the environment and energy.

Unfortunately, I must reiterate that the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois will be the first to accuse us of stepping on the provinces' toes if we were to regulate emissions that fall under provincial jurisdiction. What we promised in the red book was to get our house in order first and also to encourage all of the provinces to put in place more than incentives. We expect the government of Quebec to take part in discussions on this issue, which transcends all politics. It concerns the health of Canadians.

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal.

Yesterday the government released part of its program review, a review that took almost a year to complete. While a number of patronage positions were reduced it was a drop in the bucket and the old system of patronage is still intact.

Canadians are looking for a change in the process of appointments and until the process is changed nothing is really different.

Why did the minister not announce a change in the patronage process during yesterday's announcement?

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

The agency review announced yesterday that the number of governor in council appointments were reduced greatly. To clarify the situation, between November 1993 and the beginning of February the Government of Canada appointed approximately 700 persons to governor in council positions. It was actually 100 less than that because 600 were new appointments. The previous government had appointed 1,819 in the same period. In effect we have reduced the appointments by two–thirds.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the patronage process has been in place in Canada for 100 years. Yesterday's announcement did not change the process at all.

We need a more orderly, a more objective and a fairer process so Canadians have faith in the appointments the government is involved in.

• (1200)

Why did the minister not change the patronage appointment process yesterday so that hundreds of these appointments do not continue to be made behind closed doors by orders in council?

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to reiterate that it is a change of process where the numbers are one–third of what they were before.

We are changing the acts to make the processes fairer. All appointments are advertised in the Canada Gazette and we look at competence and merit in our appointments.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The new firearms' legislation includes universal registration, which is seen by many as a penalty to the responsible firearm owner, sporting enthusiast, farmer, game hunter and collector. Can the minister tell the House what benefits there are in requiring responsible owners to register their firearms?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had the privilege of leading off debate on second reading of Bill C–68. I commend to the hon. member Hansard, particularly pages 9707 to 9710 on this subject where I develop the reasons why registration will enhance community safety.

Let me briefly mention three now. By the way, I met with firearms' owners and groups in New Brunswick. I am well aware of their concerns.

First, where someone has firearms which are in collections or are of value to the owner, if they are lost or stolen, registration will enable the police to return those firearms to the owners. That is very helpful.

Second, the police want to have registration so when they are responding to calls of domestic violence, for example, they know what firearms are there before they arrive.

Third, police say that when courts make orders prohibiting people from having firearms, they cannot enforce them unless they have registration to make sure they have collected all the firearms which the person in question might own.

I commend to the hon. member the views of the Catholic Women's League of Canada, which has an important provincial chapter in Oromocto, New Brunswick, which just wrote endorsing universal registration and the balance of our firearms package.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(1), I have the honour to lay upon the Table some explanatory notes and a Notice of Ways and Means Motion to amend the Income Tax Act.

This motion is part of the government's plan to raise, as of midnight, the excise tax on cigarettes sold at the retail level in Ontario and Quebec.

I ask that you designate an Order of the Day for the consideration of the said motion.

PETITIONS

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table officially, on behalf of constituents in Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, a petition with 253 signatures in which your petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to drop its plan to introduce a voice mail system for its services to senior citizens.

I agree with their position, and I think senior citizens are entitled to personalized services that meet their needs.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table three petitions signed by the constituents of Lambton—Middlesex and duly certified by the clerk of petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination, the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

• (1205)

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure of rising in the House today to present a petition on behalf of some of my constituents who request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley for export.

JUSTICE

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our hon. colleague, the member for Calgary Southeast, I rise in the House on day 10 to present petitions.

These petitions are being presented on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson. April 11, 1995 is the date set for the parole hearing.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making the streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that the streets will be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

CABLE INDUSTRY

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, of presenting the first of many petitions dealing with the cable industry.

The 114 petitioners represent people from across southern Ontario who are requesting that the federal government immediately launch an investigation by the CRTC into the way in which cable companies have been raising prices inequitably.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is with pleasure that I rise to present a petition with signatures from Beaverton, Fenelon Falls, Woodville and Cannington in the riding of Victoria—Haliburton.

The petition calls on Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

Mr. Ian Murray (Lanark—Carleton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present to the House today. The first petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, is on behalf of 150 constituents who pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

The second petition is on the same subject matter. Almost 100 constituents are calling on Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Ian Murray (Lanark—Carleton, Lib.): My last petition, Mr. Speaker, is from constituents who are very concerned about the increase in youth crime in our country.

The petitioners request that the government review and revise our laws concerning young offenders by empowering the courts to prosecute and punish young lawbreakers who are terrorizing our society by releasing their names and lowering the age limit to allow prosecution to meet the severity of the crime.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Charles Hubbard (Miramichi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition draws the attention of the House to the fact that Canada's investment climate is forcing its mineral industry to look for new opportunities abroad.

The Canadian Mineral Industry Federation has prepared a 10–point program of action to be addressed by both the mineral industry and the Government of Canada to keep mining in Canada. The petition urges Parliament to take action to increase employment in this sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining and keep mining in Canada.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Charles Hubbard (Miramichi, Lib.): The second petition, Mr. Speaker, prays that Parliament ensures that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in this law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or any activity designed to terminate a life.

ABORTION

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting four petitions from my constituents from the riding of Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe.

The first petition contains 29 signatures and calls on the government to amend the Criminal Code to extend protection to unborn children the same protection enjoyed by born human beings.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition contains 32 names and calls on the government not to amend the human rights code in relation to the recognition of same sex relations.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition contains 42 signatures and calls on the government to ensure that the present provisions in the Criminal Code with regard to assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and make no changes to the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

• (1210)

DAY CARE

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth and final petition contains 100 signatures and asks the House to oppose any legislation that increases child care expenditures or attempts to regulate day care standards at the federal level.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present three petitions on behalf of the constituents of Simcoe Centre.

The first is on the issue of euthanasia. The petitioners request that Parliament not sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or of euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition requests the Government of Canada not to amend the Human Rights Act to include the phrase sexual orientation.

The petitioners fear that such an inclusion would indicate societal approval of homosexual behaviour. The petitioners believe that the government should not legitimize this behaviour against the clear wishes of the majority.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the final petition is about section 745 of the Criminal Code.

The petitioners request that Parliament repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code so that those convicted of first degree murder will have to serve their full 25–year sentence behind bars.

BILL C–41

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present four petitions to the House today.

It gives me great pleasure to present the first one on behalf of 1,556 of my constituents who ask Parliament not to pass Bill C–41, with section 718.2 as it is presently and not to include the undefined phrase, sexual orientation, as this does not warrant special consideration in Canadian law.

VOLUNTEER FIREFIGHTERS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition. The petitioners pray and request that Parliament recognize the social commitment and dedication of all volunteer firefighters by raising the tax exemption from $500 to $1,000.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition comes from 275 people in my constituency, who ask Parliament to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act and the Criminal Code to allow dangerous offender applications to be made just prior to the expiration of the offender's sentence. Then if the court accepts the application, the court could issue an order for continued detention or supervision of the offender.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the last petition I would like to present today on behalf of my constituents asks Parliament to reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and to implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal government spending.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order concerning questions that are placed on the Order Paper.

This is the third time I have risen in the House to ask the status of the answer to question 93 which I posed last October 19. Normally these questions must be responded to by the government within 45 days. It is now 122 days.

This is a flagrant show of disrespect for the rules of the House. I have stood in the House three times to ask for an answer to my question. "Maybe next week some time" I am going to get an answer to Question 93.

Is there a way to ask the Speaker of the House to force or to at least demand that the government respect the rules and give me the answer to Question 93, which is way overdue.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary might deal with the hon. member's representations when he makes his statement.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I intend to do exactly that. This is the third time the hon. member has got up in the last seven or eight days on this particular question.

I pointed out to him on the first occasion that when he looks at the question, and he knows this perfectly well because he wrote it, he has asked for a list that must be quite substantial.

The question asked what contracts for services, supplies and leasing have been awarded by Public Works and Government Services since October 25, 1993 in all federal constituencies in Quebec and what federal government properties are located in those same constituencies? It will be an extremely substantial list.

• (1215)

In providing an answer to the hon. member, the government wants to make sure it is accurate. I have no doubt great pains are being taken to ensure a full, accurate response will be given to the member.

The hon. member has asked for an answer within 45 days. It is impossible to prepare such a lengthy reply in that time and he knows that. We are doing our best to get the answer. I assure him I am working on getting an answer for his question. I will continue to work to get an answer for his question. I hope to be in a position to table that answer soon.

In the meantime, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Shall all the questions be allowed to stand? The hon. member for Québec–Est will probably not agree.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, no, I do not agree. The parliamentary secretary spoke of 45 adays, but it has now been 122 days, not 45.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Kamloops has a petition. I do not think anyone will object if we revert to petitions.

PETITIONS

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Logan Lake, Kamloops and Ashcroft, all in British Columbia, who draw to the attention of the House the importance of Canada's mining industry.

They make a number of very forceful points which I will not repeat here. They are simply calling upon Parliament to take action that will increase employment in the mining sector, promote exploration for the mining sector, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain our mining communities, and essentially keep mining in Canada.

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having an opportunity to speak on the tax legislation at third reading. Essentially it is tax reform.

As my hon. friend from Vancouver South indicated in his presentation, there is an effort here at tax simplification as well, but we have a long way to go. This multi–volume treatise is an effort at simplifying the tax system. Imagine the size of the Tax Act of Canada and the appropriate regulations and interpretations that would go with it. It would stand two or three feet on the desk.

I am going to simply read a small portion to raise the question: Does this actually simplify our tax system or not? I am reading from page 46, number 7:

> Subsections (1), (3) and (4) apply to dividends received after February 21, 1994 other than dividends received before 1995 in the course of a reorganization that was required on February 22, 1994 to be carried out pursuant to a written agreement entered into before February 22, 1994, except that, in applying the act to dividends received before June 23, 1994 to which subsections (1), (3) and (4) apply,
> (a) Paragraph 55(3.1)(b) of the act, as enacted by subsection (4), shall be read as follows:

It goes on:

> (b) The act shall be read without reference to paragraphs 55(3.1)(c) and (d) and (3.2)(c) and (e) as enacted by subsection 4.

Page 48, number 8:

Subsections (2), (5) and (6) apply to dividends received after February 21, 1994, other than dividends received as part of a transaction or event or a series of transactions or events that was required on before February 22, 1994 to be carried out pursuant to a written agreement entered into before February 22, 1994.

17.(1) Subsection 67.1(1) of the act is amended by replacing the reference to 80 per cent with a reference to 50 per cent.

(2) Subsection 1 applies to expenses incurred after February 21, 1994 in respect of food and beverages consumed and entertainment enjoyed after February 1994.

18.(1) Subparagraph 70(5.1)(d)(ii) 2 of the act is replaced—

I could go on. And this is an effort at simplification. I cannot imagine anybody without some superhuman mind, with multiple degrees in logic being able to even pretend that they follow this.

• (1220)

Is it any wonder our tax system is so abused? By abused I refer to the many people who have lost complete faith in the tax system as being any kind of a fair system, a just system, an equitable system. They simply interpret every one of these sections to their advantage in the hopes there will not be an audit. Because of the cutbacks in Revenue Canada obviously there are very few auditors auditing out there, and if you are audited, you can challenge the interpretation.

When my friend from Vancouver South says the government has taken major steps in clarifying and simplifying the tax system, I am not certain what section he is reading because it is certainly nothing I have ever read in this area.

The hon. member goes on today as a result of this legislation to comment on the reduction of the business entertainment deduction from 80 to 50 per cent. The Minister of National Revenue confirmed today that escort services have traditionally been included as a legitimate business expense under the act, which raises a few questions just on its own terms. However, that deductibility will be reduced from 80 per cent of the escort service cost down to 50 per cent.

Because of the public furore the tax department has said it is going to redefine that. The escort services that you see listed in a telephone book will be disallowed. However if the escort service is considered to be a bodyguard, a tour guide, or an interpreter as the Minister of National Revenue confirmed today, of course they would be legitimate deductions.

I can see accountants becoming quite creative in the use of those terms to allow that business expense to continue. I could go on and on with all sorts of illegitimate uses. They would not be illegal because again, as long as an escort service is considered to be an interpreter or a bodyguard, it is a legitimate expense.

In the spirit of fairness, surely there must be some distinction when it comes to business entertainment deductions. There is a difference between a number of individuals getting together over lunch or dinner to discuss a business transaction or some aspect of carrying out their business, and some lavish entertainment where folks are visiting a number of posh clubs and wining and dining at extravagant prices. Again a certain amount of that tab is being picked up by the general taxpayers of the country. I simply point that out as one of the problems with a section of this bill.

The member for Vancouver South gives us the impression that major steps have been taken to bring fairness back into the system. However, I do not think any step at all has been taken but to put some difficulty on those individuals who are carrying out a legitimate business transaction over a business lunch.

Other than that in Bill C–59, I want to also mention the reference made by a number of speakers about the tax revolt which is taking place and the fact that people are calling for, predicting or suggesting there is bound to be a tax revolt if the minister raises taxes. There already is a tax revolt under way.

That tax revolt has been in place for many years. It is called the underground economy. People have simply said that they have have lost faith in the tax system. They are going to conduct as much business as possible underground, under the table where it is then obviously unreported and by definition, untaxed.

To what extent does this underground economy exist? Obviously there is no accurate figure, but from my study of this issue, the lowest amount I have ever come across is about $40 billion in annual business transactions and the highest has been $120 billion. I am not here to say that either one of these extremes is accurate. Regardless, it is a substantial amount of money and my guess is that it is probably even higher than these estimates would suggest.

Is there anyone in the country these days who in some form is not participating in the underground economy? I say that not suggesting anybody here or anywhere is willfully breaking the law. I refer to our neighbours to the south. Whenever President Clinton is trying to appoint someone to some official capacity under the scrutiny of Congress eventually or inevitably it is pointed out that they have participated in the underground economy by paying a nanny cash or buying wood for cash from somebody for their fireplace or participating in some barter aspect. It has become almost a Canadian way of life.

I notice that now when you walk into almost any book store in Canada right, front and centre some of the best sellers are on how to avoid tax. I noticed one the other day in which the person said forget it, leave Canada and live in the Cayman Islands and transfer everything right offshore. He has given up totally on even trying to come to any realistic approach to the tax system.

In the press today I thought were some very interesting comments. Neville Nankivell, writing under the title of nation's business for the Financial Post, reports that presently there are about $6.6 billion owed in unpaid taxes. These are simply individuals or companies that have agreed that they owe these taxes and will pay them in due time and are presently paying a penalty. There is another $2.7 billion tied up in tax appeals before the courts.

There we have $9.3 billion sort of sitting there that probably will end up one day in the treasury but this does not include all those who are simply tax evaders. Unfortunately there are increasing numbers of those folks.

For the under reporters, that is the underground economy, we might be talking here if this were to be taxed at some nominal rate at between $10 billion and $30 billion.

In other words, what this tells me, and perhaps I am naive in this interpretation, is that if we had a decent, fair and just tax system, and the economy were brought from underneath the table on to the top of the table and taxed at some realistic level, that would be the entire deficit paid down just from the additional revenues from a fair and honest system of doing business in the country.

That is a bit of a wish list but it does point out the incredible extent of the underground economy and what that is doing in terms of the future of the country regarding our debt and deficit pay down.

In the last moment or two remaining I do want to mention one aspect that I think is causing a great deal of concern to the public generally and that is the possibility of taxing dental and health plans that employers contribute to and so on.

I know this would generate a lot of money in terms of the government. So many people now have access to decent health care, I am thinking particularly of the preventative kind, certainly decent dental care and the only way that is available to them is as a result of these company plans. To tax those plans, as so many people have indicated, would obviously mean that a number of people, and unfortunately large numbers of people, would simply have inappropriate dental and health care.

I cannot imagine any member standing up and suggesting that a tax be levied on these kinds of health care plans and dental plans.

I also want to draw the attention of the House to an article in the paper the other day mentioning the whole matter of those folks who are selling property in the United States and are going to have a tax credit here in Canada. I raised this in the House with the Minister of Finance. I said that if a person is selling property in the United States over $600,000 in U.S. assets, should we be providing tax credits for that here in Canada? In other words, should we be encouraging people to buy and sell property in the United States?

I know the Minister of Finance had an explanation for this. I suppose he could have an explanation for even deducting escort services on our tax and so on. The point is as we struggle to come up with a reasonable tax system I notice in the press yesterday a whole number of what I would call tax experts are saying that this provision is simply wrong.

I am not referring to members of Parliament from most political parties who have been critical of this. People who are knowledgeable about the tax system are now saying that this whole aspect of a tax arrangement between Canada and the United States that allows Canadians selling their assets in the United States over $600,000 to receive tax credits here in Canada is simply wrong.

I would support that notion and raise this today to flag the incident for the Minister of Finance as something to consider when he introduces his budget in a few days.

While these changes in the bill before us do make the tax system somewhat more equitable, we have a long way to go. In terms of making it more simple so people have some hope of understanding it, I would ask any member to sit down for five minutes and pick any page out of this attempted simplification to see if they can understand that page. If they can, I would have to admit they are a better person than I when it comes to understanding detailed tax matters.

In closing, a lot of work has yet to be done. I appreciate that this is a small step toward improving the tax system but I would emphasize that it is only a very small step. For that reason my party will be voting against the bill at third reading.

CUBA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should condemn in the strongest possible terms the inhumane embargo of Cuba by the United States; that the condemnation be made at the United Nations, the Organization of American States and directly to the U.S. administration; and, that Canada restore full bilateral aid and trade with Cuba.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to raise in the House an issue of fundamental importance to the relationship between the people of Canada, the people of Cuba and, in particular as my motion points out, to the impact on the people of Cuba of the blockade by the United States.

The motion before the House this morning has three components basically. First, it calls on the Government of Canada to condemn in the strongest possible terms the inhumane embargo of Cuba by the United States. It calls for that condemnation to be made at all possible opportunities, both bilateral and multilateral; at the United Nations, the Organization of American States and directly to the United States administration. Finally, the motion calls on Canada to restore full bilateral aid and trade. There is trade now but we should promote, strengthen and support that trade with Cuba.

This is a significant time in the relationship between Canada and Cuba. In fact, 1995 is the 50th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between Canada and Cuba. Those diplomatic relations have remained unbroken since 1945, a fact of which I as a Canadian am very proud. Canada was one of only two countries, the other being Mexico, that did not break diplomatic relations with Cuba following the triumph of the revolution in 1959. We celebrate that this year. In fact, there will be a number of celebrations, both in Canada and in Cuba next month.

As well, 1995 is the centenary of the death of the great Cuban revolutionary hero, José Marti, who died on May 19, 1885.

This is also an important week for this motion to be debated in the House. Today the Secretary General of the OAS, the Organization of American States, Mr. Gavaria, is in Canada. Later this week the President of the United States, President Bill Clinton, will be visiting as well. I trust that the government will take the opportunity, in particular the Prime Minister, to raise directly with President Clinton the destructive impact of the United States blockade on Cuba. I hope that he will take that opportunity this week.

[Translation]

I also regret that the Bloc Quebecois will apparently not support this motion. Frankly, I find it surprising that the Bloc Quebecois, although several Bloc members are taking an active role in the Canadian parliamentary group on Cuba, will speak against a motion to lift the embargo against Cuba, to promote free trade and bilateral aid for Cuba. I can only presume that once again the Bloc Quebecois took this surprising position because of the priority it gives to relations with the United States.

The Bloc supported cruise missile testing; the Bloc supported the free trade agreement; the Bloc now supports the United States' immoral and illegal embargo. This is unbelievable and unacceptable, especially because many groups in Quebec, for example Carrefour culturel de l'amitié Québec–Cuba and Oxfam Québec, are demanding, like other Canadians, that the inhumane and cruel embargo against Cuba be lifted and that the Liberal government put this issue high on the list of items on the agenda for the upcoming meeting with the American president.

Once again, the Bloc Quebecois does not speak for Quebecers on this fundamental humanitarian issue of rights for Cubans. It is a pity that we have had to do this in their stead.

[English]

I would note as well that at a major international solidarity meeting last November in Havana, 1995 was declared the international year of José Marti and the struggle against the blockade. This is a motion which is of particular significance in this important year.

Last month I had the honour of participating in the first ever Canadian parliamentary delegation which was hosted by the National Assembly of Cuba. I see a number of my colleagues from all sides of the House who participated in that delegation.

[Translation]

Unfortunately the hon. member for Laval East was not able to take part, but she supported us. She supported the requests, as did many other Bloc Quebecois members. The member for Bourassa, for one, would be surprised to see the position taken by the Bloc today.

[English]

We met with many groups. We met with Cuban organizations, with individuals and with ministers. We had the opportunity to meet with Fidel Castro. We visited schools, hospitals and research centres. Our group was hosted on this historic visit by the president of the corresponding group in Cuba, the Minister of Education, Luis Gomes. During that same time frame, a large number of NGOs were visiting Cuba under the auspices of the Cuba–Canada Inter–Agency Project made up of some 36 Canadian NGOs and churches and 25 community based organizations.

• (1110)

These NGOs have played an extraordinary role in helping to promote greater understanding, awareness, and solidarity with the people of Cuba. They include groups such as Oxfam Canada, the Saskatchewan Council for International Co–operation, CUSO, the United Church of Canada and the Anglican Church of Canada, as well as many groups based in Quebec.

I want to take this opportunity in speaking of NGOs to also pay tribute to the many Canadian NGOs, churches, groups and individuals who have demonstrated their solidarity with the people of Cuba at this very difficult time for that country. Last August a group from across Canada, the brigadistas, travelled to Cuba to demonstrate their solidarity by working directly with the people of Cuba. The friendship groups assist in helping to provide desperately needed aid, particularly humanitarian aid, to the people of Cuba.

Many different elements of the labour movement have demonstrated concrete solidarity. I salute here the recent leadership of the Canadian Labour Congress on this issue, the Canadian–Cuban Friendship Association in British Columbia, in my own area, and many others. All of these groups, without exception, have called on the United States government to lift the illegal and immoral blockade which has been in force since 1963.

At the most recent vote of the United Nations, 101 countries voted in favour of the lifting of the blockade and only two, the United States and Israel, opposed the resolution. Instead of responding to this appeal from around the world, what is the response of the leaders of the United States congress? The new chair of the Senate foreign relations committee, Jesse Helms, says he wants to strengthen the blockade. That is absolutely unbelievable. He wants to effectively put an iron noose around Cuba. The test will come with the response of the United States president.

It is time for President Clinton to stop listening to the right wing reactionary forces based in Miami, the Cuban American National Foundation, the Mas Canosas, and start listening to the progressive voices of the American people, including a number of Cuban Americans. It is time he started listening to the voices of his closest neighbours, the Canadian government and the Mexican government, that have called for a lifting of this blockade.

It is time he started listening to some of his own legislators, democratic senators, members of the House of Representatives, like Claiborne Pell, Charles Rangel, José Seranno and others. Even the Wall Street Journal is calling on the United States administration to lift the embargo.

The impact of the blockade has been devastating. Together with the collapse of trade with Russia and eastern Europe, and some admitted inefficiencies in the Cuban economy, the impact has been devastating. Dr. Benjamin Spock, when he visited Cuba in 1993, wrote on his return: "When I visited Cuba I discovered pediatricians at otherwise splendid hospitals who spent every morning counting medication for the children. The director of a day care centre dreaded that the milk supply would dry up for her preschoolers, as it has for all Cuban children older than seven. How should we feel about an embargo that is keeping food and medicines from Cuban children?" I feel ashamed.

There are widespread hardships as a result of the embargo. One of the ironies is that these hardships even affect the American people. My colleagues and I visited a research facility in Havana which makes drugs that assist in traumatic heart attacks. These drugs, called recombinant streptokinase, would save American lives. Are Americans allowed access to them under the blockade? No. It is the same with a vaccine against meningitis B developed in Cuba. It cannot be distributed so it is hurting the United States as well.

• (1115)

In the midst of all the hardship as a result of the blockade, the Cuban government and the Cuban people have maintained a commitment to fundamental human and socialist values. For example, infant mortality rates in Cuba are the lowest in Latin America. They are lower than in many American cities. According to the most recent UNICEF figures it is about 9.9 per cent, one of the best records in the world. It is sort of ironic that the United States lectures Cuba on human rights.

Yes, we acknowledge there are concerns around human rights particularly in the areas of freedom of speech and freedom of association. There are concerns with respect to the treatment of gays and lesbians in Cuba. The situation is better but the history in that country is certainly not a happy one.

For the United States to lecture Cuba on human rights when it has a record of child poverty, of homelessness, of 37 million Americans with no health insurance whatsoever and of people with AIDS begging for funds to survive in the streets with unprecedented levels of crime, reeks of hypocrisy. It is not good enough. When they raise concerns around human rights in Cuba and are silent with respect to massive human rights violations in Guatemala, East Timor and elsewhere, it is not good enough.

In the midst of some of the most difficult economic times in the history of Cuba, Cuba is able to maintain its international solidarity. Over 13,000 children victims of the 1986 disaster at Chernobyl were assisted by the Government of Cuba. I personally saw a number of these children at a rehabilitation facility at Tarara just outside Havanah. This speaks probably more eloquently than anything else to the sense of international solidarity of the people of Cuba. Even at a time of difficult economic circumstances they are prepared to extend a hand to the poorest, to the most vulnerable in our communities.

Canada has an opportunity to play an important bridging role at this time to promote direct dialogue at last between the Government of Cuba and the Government of the United States. If the Government of the United States can maintain most favoured nation status with China, if it can end its embargo against Vietnam, if it can begin negotiations with North Korea, why this absurd and destructive obsession with Cuba?

What can we do? In the couple of minutes remaining I want to set out some alternatives. Canada can play an important role by extending and strengthening trade. I commend the Canadian ambassador to Cuba, Mark Entwistle, for the leadership and energy he has shown on this front.

We can strengthen EDC financing. We can ensure that we meet the kinds of standards other countries have set. We can promote support for environmental projects. Cuba has the opportunity to be an international environmental leader. Dr. Patricia Lane in particular from Dalhousie University has shown leadership in this regard. For example, they are trying to clean up some of the pollution in the Almendares River and others. This is the kind of role that Canada can play and play effectively.

We can promote strengthening bilateral aid and moving it beyond partnership and establishing a central co–ordination point within the foreign affairs ministry for responding to Cuba.

Perhaps one of the key components or priority in the trade area is negotiating now a foreign investment protection agreement. Other countries are far ahead of Canada in this regard. Spain, Mexico, Italy, Russia and the United Kingdom have already negotiated agreements. We have heard one message loud and clear from Canadian businesses. It is to get that in place. We have heard the same message from our diplomats. I hope the government will move soon on that.

Finally, we should ensure that Cuba is fully reintegrated into all multilateral organizations: the OAS, the World Bank and the IMF. It was shameful that Cuba was excluded from the Miami summit. I was pleased the Prime Minister spoke out against that.

• (1120)

In closing, I hope we as Canadians take advantage of this key year, the 50th anniversary of diplomatic relations between Canada and Cuba, to send a strong message to our friends in the American administration that it is time to end the illegal and immoral blockade.

We will be hosting the foreign minister in the near future, Roberto Robaino. We will be hosting the president of the National Assembly, Ricardo Alarcon, and hopefully Minister of Education Gomes as well. I hope our Minister for International Trade will be travelling soon to Cuba.

Canada has a historic opportunity here. I urge the House to join in sending a message today to the American administration and to our government that the time has come to lift the blockade, to respect the strong, proud and dignified people of Cuba and to reintegrate them fully into the community of nations.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to the motion introduced by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway regarding the United States embargo on Cuba and Canadian policy.

His motion reads at the end:

> —and, that Canada restore full bilateral aid and trade with Cuba.

I do not know where the hon. member has been over the last 10 or 20 years. We have full bilateral trade with Cuba that I witnessed personally and will mention later.

I believe Canada and the United States share similar long term goals in Cuba, including the need for peaceful political and economic reform that will allow more liberal economic policies, the development of democratic institutions and full respect for human rights. However Canada has clear reservations about how the United States policy seeks to achieve these goals. I will explain what I mean in a moment.

Let me begin by pointing out that Canada and Cuba have had an official relationship stretching, as the hon. member said, over 50 years. Even at times when we had considerable differences of view with Cuba on Africa, east–west relations, the nature of political change in Latin America and more recently human rights and good governance, we have maintained our ties and our discourse. I personally have met with the former and present ambassadors of Cuba. We keep very close ties and communications open between our two countries.

There is also a web of unofficial private links that many Canadian organizations, companies and individuals have pursued with their Cuban counterparts over the years. When our review committee was in Saskatchewan I was very pleased to hear Friends of Cuba make a presentation to the foreign affairs review committee.

Some of these unofficial links are concrete and measurable. Cuba is Canada's second largest trading partner after Puerto Rico in the Caribbean–Central American region. Our two–way trade was over $300 million in 1993. It is also a country in which a number of Canadian firms are pursuing investment possibilities.

Cuba is a country that over 120,000 Canadians visit each year. Out of 600,000 tourists 120,000 come from Canada. I was in Cuba recently to open an honorary consular office in Varadero to help Canadians in difficulty. It is a country in which a number of Canadian universities, research institutes and non–governmental organizations have longstanding linkages that benefit both Cubans and Canadians.

We enunciated Canadian objectives in Cuba in June 1994 when the Canadian government announced several policy adjustments. First, we are in Cuba to promote normal Canadian interests including commercial and cultural activities. I underline cultural because when I was in Cuba in the fall well known jazz musician Vic Vogel was teamed with Noche Habanera. It was a performance that Cubans and the Canadians who were there will never forget.

Second, we wish to support positive peaceful change in Cuba, both political and economic. We agree with Cuba on some issues, in particular in the areas of human rights and democratic development. However we will continue to pursue the discussion at appropriate levels.

Third, we wish to encourage Cuba's full, constructive participation in international affairs.

Finally, we wish to support Canadian organizations and individuals who are pursuing development activities in Cuba.

• (1125)

The Canadian government has supported Canadian businesses in their pursuit of opportunities in Cuba. Last fall at Havana International Fair we were pleased to see more Canadian companies than ever. Canadian government involvement was more visible. I witnessed 26 companies from Canada involved in this fair. Fourteen were companies from the province of Quebec. None of them had fleur–de–lis flags; they all had the Canadian flag. They were there as Canadians.

I travelled to Cuba at that time to meet these business representatives. I will never forget the warm reception the Cuban government and the Cuban people gave me. Because of the difficult economic circumstances in Cuba our trade has declined in the past year but Cuba's rank remains as I indicated earlier.

We also wish to encourage and support political developments in Cuba. Cuba has human rights accomplishments notably in the areas of economic and social rights. Cuba's health care and educational systems have been models for other countries. As a former educator I was impressed with the standard of education in that country and the standard of health care.

At the same time we have very real concerns about Cuba's respect for civil and political rights, including freedom of expression, freedom of association and freedom from arbitrary detention. We have also expressed our concern about Cuba's unwillingness to co–operate with the United Nations human rights system, in particular the special rapporteur appointed by the UN commission on human rights. We have welcomed the visit to Cuba by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and hope this can lead to greater Cuban co–operation.

Thus Canada will continue to make human rights and democratic development areas of continuing discussion with Cuba in order that Cuban accomplishments in the areas I have mentioned can be mirrored in full respect of political and civil rights.

In the area of development co–operation the government has made available the full range of partnership programs of the Canadian International Development Agency to Canadian NGOs and others in the non–governmental sector for their work in Cuba, including academic institutions and Canadian businesses pursuing developmental objectives.

By the end of the current fiscal year Cuba will have received over $1 million in Canadian development assistance through the various programs we support, again demonstrating no need for such a motion as the one tabled today.

These examples make clear that Canada is pursuing its objectives in Cuba through a policy of engagement and dialogue. I would add that this is very much in the tradition of Canadian policy regarding Cuba. As the government noted last June we are making adjustments in our policy, not turning policy around.

The United States is clearly pursuing its objectives in a different adversarial manner. We have made it clear to the United States and publicly that we do not agree with its approach. For example, during the parliamentary debate on Canada's foreign policy review on March 15, 1994 the Minister of Foreign Affairs referred to the government's hope to see the end of the American commercial embargo against Cuba.

The Canadian vote last year in support of the United Nations General Assembly resolution critical of the embargo reaffirmed that point. At that time we indicated that in this post–cold war period isolation was not the most effective means of fostering economic and political reform in Cuba.

For Canada the central concern regarding the embargo is its extraterritorial reach. The way in which the United States through its laws and regulations governing the embargo seeks to constrain the freedom of trade of third countries such as Canada is not acceptable. Canada has always taken a vigorous stand against such measures and in 1992 issued a blocking order to ensure that Canadian companies were not subjected to foreign laws on trade with Cuba.

We shall remain watchful of other efforts to bring Canadians under the ambit of U.S. laws and regulations. Accordingly I believe Canada has implemented a policy on Cuba which takes into account Canadian interests and Canadian perspectives and responds to the concerns of the member for Burnaby—Kingsway. I therefore do not believe that the motion is necessary and I do not agree with the tone in which it was cast.

I am very pleased that the Canada–Cuba parliamentary friendship group has been established and a visit has already been made. Hopefully parliamentary exchanges will be speeded up. I know that our Minister of Foreign Affairs intends to meet the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Cuba.

When I was there in October I met with five ministers. They welcome Canadians to Cuba. They welcome Canadian investment. You have to be there, Mr. Speaker, to get a feeling for the love and respect of Cubans for Canadians. I appeal to Canadians, if they want a place to invest, to invest in Cuba.

• (1130)

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois on Motion No. 281 presented by the member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

The aim of the motion essentially is to induce the Canadian government to denounce the American embargo on Cuba in the strongest terms possible at the United Nations, at the OAS and to the American administration directly. It also supports the re–establishment of full aid and bilateral trade ties with Cuba.

It is one thing to express solidarity with the people of Cuba; but it is another matter altogether to interfere in United States' foreign affairs and to support a dictatorship. The member for Burnaby—Kingsway, in an analysis that was hardly more than an expression of emotion and without even having heard our arguments, condemned the position of the Bloc Quebecois. I would ask him, therefore, to take note of the basis for our position. Perhaps he knocked down a door that was open much more than he thought.

The Bloc Quebecois will vote against the motion. Now allow me to set out the reasons behind our position. There are two reasons for our disagreement.

First, we do not believe we should force the United States to change their foreign policy to meet the objectives of Canadian foreign policy, especially because we, ourselves, are particularly jealous of our own sovereignty.

Second, we do not believe the state of human rights in Cuba would permit the re–establishment of bilateral aid with it.

With respect to our first objection, we do not see how the Canadian government could dictate rules of conduct to the American government. Canada has always refused to interfere in the internal politics and diplomatic conduct of foreign states. We do not see why Canada would change matters now, and believe, furthermore, that it would not be in Canada's interest to do so.

If Canada undertook the action proposed by our NDP colleague, we would have to be consistent and adopt a similar attitude toward a multitude of other countries whose foreign policy objectives do not coincide with our own.

In any case, the Canadian government already has enough to do to look after its own foreign affairs, without taking on the task of advising its partners.

In this regard, we would like to mention that a number of questions are currently awaiting action by the Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, such as the case of Tran Trieu Quan, which I have mentioned on several occasions in the House. The minister should do everything possible to have this Canadian prisoner released from Vietnam rather than attempting in vain to influence American foreign policy.

Moreover, while the American embargo against Cuba is certainly harming that country's economy, Castro's regime is clearly also responsible for the present economic crisis in Cuba. Would Canada not be better advised to attempt to convince Cuban authorities to truly liberalize their economy, rather than attempting to convince American authorities to raise their embargo? Cuba's state run economy carries a very high price and the few liberalization measures implemented recently, such as making the peso convertible, will not be enough to stop the Cuban economy from nose diving.

Cuba needs help in initiating the unavoidable transition to a market economy. The best thing for Canada to do in this regard is to support such reforms through dialogue and trade. Such action on the part of Canada would be welcome in view of its new foreign policy direction.

Economic reforms must nevertheless be implemented concurrently with political reforms. Dictatorship and the culture of fear must be eliminated in Cuba. Since the Bloc Quebecois strongly opposes the philosophy of trade at any price, human rights in Cuba should be taken into account in shaping our relations with this country. I will return to this later.

• (1135)

That said, we would be against Canada participating in the embargo against Cuba. The Bloc Quebecois expressed its approval when the Canadian government announced its decision to resume aid to this Caribbean state last June.

Let us keep in mind that, following Cuba's involvement in the Angolan conflict in 1978, Canada decided to stop providing aid to, while maintaining diplomatic relations with that country. Now that the cold war is over, the new international order calls for a reorientation of Canada's relations with Cuba. The time has come to end that country's diplomatic and trade isolation. At stake is the very survival of its people, who have been hit extremely hard by Cuba's severe economic crisis. Therefore, it would be quite appropriate to resume our humanitarian aid to that country.

However, this new decision by the Department of Foreign Affairs does not include restoring bilateral aid. The Bloc Quebecois agrees with the government on this. The motion put forward by our colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway calls for restoring bilateral aid. That is another reason why we cannot support it.

The Bloc Quebecois feels that Canada should give priority to partnership–based aid programs and that international co–operation through NGOs is by far the safest and most efficient way to deliver aid to needy countries. This principle should be implemented especially when human rights abuses preclude any sustainable human development effort.

In our dissenting report on the review of Canada's foreign policy, we were very clear on this. The majority of witnesses who appeared before the special standing committee agreed with us.

In this report, we recommended that "Canada discontinue all bilateral aid to states that UN agencies or any other agency recognized by the UN have identified as having committed or been responsible for gross and reliably attested human rights violations".

So far, Cuba has shown no sign of being on the road to democracy and establishing a state based on the rule of law. The Cuban government did however make real progress in some areas, particularly social and economic rights.

But as regards civil and political rights, which are systematically violated by the Cuban regime, there is still serious cause for concern, as evidenced by UN resolutions on the matter as well as constant inquiries about Cuba at the Commission of Human Rights in Geneva.

On this subject, I would like to remind the Canadian government that Cuba is not the only latin–american country to violate human rights and that, in fact, matters are considered to be even worse elsewhere in that area. In January, a slew of NGOs expressed concern to the Canadian government about the situation in Guatemala, Mexico, Columbia and Peru.

At that time, the Canadian government was asked to denounce the human rights violations going on in these countries at the 51st session of the UN Commission of Human Rights in Geneva. It matters more to us, the Bloc Quebecois, that the Canadian government take this kind of action in the case of Cuba rather than condemn the conduct of the U.S. foreign policy.

In a nutshell, it might be a better idea for Canada to provide technical assistance and to do so though NGOs, because Cuba, which is currently facing a major food shortage, really needs humanitarian assistance. Any assistance sent directly to the Cuban government is not likely to serve Canadian official assistance objectives as well as if it were granted to humanitarian and non governmental organizations.

This is basically why the Bloc Quebecois opposes Motion No. 281 and why we will be voting against this motion.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In trying to facilitate debate for and against the motion, I will now recognize the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan for a maximum of 10 minutes. Of course I will return to a member from the Reform Party, if anyone should choose to speak and I have an indication from the hon. member for Red Deer.

• (1140)

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to address this House regarding M–281, a motion condemning the U.S. embargo on Cuba proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway. It is a pleasure for me to be in a position to second that motion.

The red book states that "Canadians want their national government to play a more active, independent, internationalist role in this world of change. They do not want Canadian foreign policy to be determined solely through special personal relationships between world leaders. Canadians want a national government that takes pride in its tolerance, openness and common sense, and that reflects those values in its foreign policy".

As a member of the Canada–Cuba Interparliamentary Friendship Group, I acknowledge openly my pride in the tolerance Canadians reveal in their attempts to understand the differences between and among the nations of the world. There is also our use of common sense in defying the pressures of special interest groups as we encourage, develop, nurture and enhance our relationship with Cuba and other peaceful societies.

It is interesting to note that shortly after the freedom fighter Fidel Castro overthrew the diabolical regime of Batista, the majority of ambassadorial representatives left the island. Recognizing and doing business with the new Government of Cuba were the governments of Mexico and Canada. As a result these countries were permitted to operate from their original embassies and continue to do so to this very day.

Since the revolution, Canada's relationship with Cuba has continued to strengthen even though the Cuban government had to turn to the U.S.S.R. for substantial support. As American influence in other countries intensified and strengthened, so did its network of trade embargoes.

Due to the diminishing supply of goods, it was necessary for the Cubans to introduce rationing early in the 1960s. This practice continues to this very day.

Although the U.S. trade embargo has always deterred economic development in Cuba, it was not until the removal of the annual $5 billion Soviet aid package five years ago that the embargo began to have a dynamic impact on the lives of the Cuban people. There is a shortage of everything and there is no guarantee that the goods will appear in the near future within this tightly controlled economy. There is a serious shortage of instructional materials for the educational system. Certain medical practices must be curtailed or cancelled due to the absence of medical supplies. As people lose hope, despair overcomes and the crime rate rises.

Priorities are established and strictly adhered to in this fight for survival. As wars fan the spirit of nationalism, so grows the spirit of common good against common evil.

Although it may be classified as a third world country, as a member of the Community of Nations, Cuba has never abdicated its responsibility toward others. A good example of that is Chernobyl. Over 35,000 victims of Chernobyl have been brought to Cuba for treatment in one of the most advanced centres for the treatment of radiation. Over 13,000 of that number were children, and with the children came the mothers and fathers during the treatment period.

Three years ago the American dollar economy was introduced in order to glean as many American dollars as possible for foreign trade. This was achieved chiefly through the introduction and enhancement of the tourist business.

The free market economy is beginning to blossom in Cuba. We heard recently that privatization of land is possible. Companies can purchase the land. There are other options available as well. Investment is increasing. Canadians are investing.

The situation was further aggravated two years ago with the introduction of the Cuban Democracy Act, also known as the Torricelli act by the U.S. Congress. The main thrust of the act was that of extending the embargo to American subsidiaries abroad. This of course applied to Canadian based U.S. multinationals.

• (1145)

Lifting the embargo now would allow Cuban exports to the U.S. and permit foreign investment in Cuba, having a substantial effect on the Cuban economy.

With the election of the new Congress in the States, however, it appears that the hard line of Cuba may continue. This is unfortunate because the present embargo leads the U.S. down a very lonely path.

For three years the UN has voted overwhelmingly to end the embargo, most recently in 1994. The result was a lopsided vote of 101 for and 2 against with 48 abstentions.

Furthermore, Canada, Spain, Britain, Sweden, Germany, Italy and others are now expanding their links with Cuba. We were very fortunate in our visit to Cuba to meet quite a few representatives from these countries. They were business people who were in various stages of negotiating deals with the Cuban government.

Obviously absent from the negotiating tables were American representatives. As well, private groups across the U.S. have been sending more and more humanitarian aid intentionally challenging official American policy.

The cold war has been over now for five years. Cuba's situation in the present global context is radically different than during the 1950s and 1960s. Cuba is broke, crippled but not down. It is of no threat whatsoever to anybody and there exists no danger in lifting the trade ban.

However, there are those who still refuse to dispose of their 1950 style cold war mentality. It is time to stop trying to destroy Fidel Castro by destroying the people of Cuba. The main problem of American policy toward Cuba is that it is made in Miami, not Washington. Cuban expatriates are extremely powerful and are deemed crucial to ensuring whether the state of Florida swings in favour of the government during the presidential elections. As a result, they hold considerable clout in shaping American foreign policy vis–à–vis Cuba.

In any nation or society where within a special interest group we find that the truest form of love is self–love, where greed is the major source of energy, where avarice and gluttony are esteemed to be honourable personal goals, we find that others in their relationship with these groups usually are identified as victims in that relationship.

I find that the embargo restrictions imposed on Cuba and other societies are the results of such special interest forces. This embargo which is a blatant example of central authorities catering to special interest, provincially minded political forces, is being maintained without regard for the suffering borne by the innocent.

Our government's position with regard to Cuban foreign policy is very clear. Our ambassador to the United Nations has indicated that we need to engage with Cuba, not isolate it, in order to achieve our goals.

Also, our Ministry of Foreign Affairs and our Secretary of State for Latin America have clearly indicated the need to end Cuban isolation. I applaud our government in this regard.

However, as concerned Canadians we must increase our efforts to have this embargo curtailed and promote practices based on sound, realistic, humanitarian values and inter–relationships.

The U.S. has lifted its embargo on Vietnam, so why not Cuba? Sure enough the time is right for a change of attitude. Let us work together to encourage Mr. Clinton to repeal the three–decade old embargo on all non–military items.

The proponents of this embargo must be made aware of the fact and never forget that as man's relationship with his fellow man is positively enhanced, so is man's relationship with his spiritual leader or God.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to talk to M–281. I have had a long interest in foreign affairs and certainly in bringing Cuba into the modern world and the OAS.

I visited Cuba, travelled around and realized some of the great potential of that country.

• (1150)

This motion asks us to make a strong statement against the U.S. policy on Cuba. I do have problems making a strong statement which directly relates to the foreign policy of another country.

The U.S. is one of our most important trading partners. Even if it were not, how would we like to have another country, let alone our closest neighbour, threatening us and demanding we change our foreign policy? The preservation of one's sovereignty has been and always will be an important part of any country's foreign policy.

Let us examine Cuba. The hon. member wishes to support and commend the actions of Mr. Castro and the country. If we are going to try and change the U.S. point of view it should be done by negotiation, not by threats or innuendo from Canadian members of Parliament. Threatening the U.S. will certainly guarantee a negative response and slam the door on what else might have occurred.

Let us examine a few of the facts regarding Cuba. Why do the Americans feel so strongly threatened by that country? The history, the Kennedy missile crisis, the fact that it is 90 miles away from their boundary, the fact that the mafia used this as a headquarters for gambling, prostitution and laundering money are examples. However, when it comes to present history we must recognize that Cuba is ruled by a dictator. Cuba was not part of the summit of the Americas in Miami in December because it is the only country in the Americas that has not moved toward democracy.

Human rights abuses abound in that country. My experience in that country was there was totally no freedom of expression except that controlled by the government. The people love to talk; they are friendly, great people, but they had to talk out on the water where they were sure that their secret service would not be listening to the conversation.

I was able to visit a jail. I watched the prisoners working in a cane field and going back to their crowded conditions. It is quite different from the country club atmosphere of Canadian prisons.

I attended a three–hour speech given in Varadero by Mr. Castro. I found it very interesting that for the three hours the people were told when to cheer, when to be quiet and exactly what to do. That is not exactly freedom of expression.

People in Cuba are prepared to sacrifice almost anything to get on a board and cross 90 miles of shark infested waters just to get out. If the country had any kind of human rights or any kind of freedom of expression, I doubt that would be the case.

There are severe shortages because Russia stopped its aid because it collapsed. Sugar cane production has decreased dramatically. In 1991, seven million tonnes; in 1994, down to four million tonnes. As I have mentioned, the infrastructure is in decay. The black market is running rampant throughout the country.

I found it very interesting to visit the Tropicana show and see the people finally expressing themselves in terms of music and their culture. They were wearing 40 and 50 year old costumes. They certainly deserved some credit for at least trying to express themselves. How about a Sunday in Cuba when they take out the 1950 cars for a drive? It is just more for show than for any practical means of transportation. What about the little kids who love to play baseball? They find that one way they might have to get off the island. There are ice cream stands on every corner. People told me that milk from Canadian Holstein cows was used to make the ice cream.

The friendship toward Canada is certainly very obvious throughout that country. Anyone travelling around the country can see just how primitive the country really is. The last speaker said it was still in the 1950s. I would put it there or below.

There are flight irregularities. Nothing seems to work properly. The hotels are acceptable, usually without toilet paper, white and sterile in nature.

• (1155)

The management is also very typical of a true communist country. There is really no incentive, no pride of ownership. There is really no drive left in the country because of the socialist way.

The sanctions are not hurting the Cuban people as much as the dictator who holds them captive by military force. The hon. member should make the motion to condemn dictator Castro and demand his removal if he wants to interfere in another country's foreign affairs.

The U.S. and Canada certainly have interests in Cuba. That country could prosper. In terms of Canadian, American and South American tourist business there would be no better place. If that were instituted the jobs and money would return. There would be an incentive to work. The ideal location of that country I have mentioned before.

This sort of motion sends the wrong message. It is the mosquito approach versus the diplomatic approach to solving the really big problem. We can work and hold our own with the Americans. I do not think we have a problem. We have to help other OAS countries to deal with that American elephant.

This motion makes us sound like spoiled kids with a temper tantrum. It is full of holes and would only be accepted by those who believe socialism would ever work any place in the world. We must work to gain respect and equal status with the Americans. We can show leadership. Certainly in the OAS we have a great opportunity to show leadership.

Most of the South American countries are looking to us to show leadership in dealing with the powerful U.S. In NAFTA we have taken a role and will take an increasing role. The WTO will only increase our trade. Hopefully some day Cuba will be part of that.

It would be nice if Cuba would join the other 34 members of the OAS, joining the 21st century in the whole UN reform and the new global community we are going to create. Cuba will be left in the dark ages if it does not change the infrastructure, the government within.

As we have talked about many times, when it comes to trade there are three world areas: the European community; the Americas and Asia–Pacific. Cuba is part of the Americas and we should make it a part. Cuba is a part of our world and therefore we have a responsibility to help it get out of the dark ages of socialism. We do not have sanctions on Cuba now, never will have, and should never have.

Remember, Castro is a dictator. People are held hostage. Socialists have tunnel vision, only seeing one side of the issue. They will never reach a solution by their antagonistic approach. It is like a horse with blinders. One thing the member can take to heart is that sanctions do not really work anyway. They are probably not as effective as he might think.

Finally, to attack a neighbour, our largest trading partner, and strain our relationship for an aging dictator who persecutes his own people for the sake of the impossible socialist utopia makes no sense. I expect the next thing the hon. member might suggest is a special day for Che Guevara.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to support the motion put forward by the member for Burnaby—Kingsway regarding Cuba. It is obvious that the Reform member who spoke before me had blinders on when he went to Cuba. It certainly was a change of scenery, but it obviously did not help him change his mind.

I think that the description he gave is exaggerated and that Cubans are not slaves to a dictator. I saw people who are trying to build a future for themselves, who are standing tall instead of being down on their knees as they once were. Cubans have shown a lot of courage. I would like to say that successive governments here in Canada have had the wisdom to stay in contact with Cuba, and to maintain diplomatic and trade relations with that country.

• (1200)

They have done it because Canada is a humanitarian nation that will always stand up for justice. Of course, anybody who has had the opportunity to visit Cuba and to meet with politicians there is well aware of the situation. Those politicians did not try to make us believe that they live in a paradise. They know that they have problems. They know that Cubans are making sacrifices but that they have the motivation to succeed.

The embargo imposed on Cuba by the United States is inhumane and we hope the United States will soon come to its senses and realize that making a whole country suffer is insane. Cubans are trying to protect what they have. They know that they do not live in a paradise, but they stand tall and want to preserve their values.

[English]

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on this motion. First of all, let me congratulate the member for Burnaby—Kingsway for giving us an opportunity to speak on this subject. I am going to get right to the major points because time is very short.

We had a great opportunity to visit Cuba in January, myself along with a number of other parliamentarians. We spent a week in Cuba and met with all the major leadership there, including the president, Fidel Castro.

Back on December 5, I wrote to President Bill Clinton and asked him to remove the embargo. The embargo that is put on Cuba by the Americans really does not make sense in the 1990s. What are the reasons for the embargo?

The original reason was security. The Americans said it was for security reasons, but is that still relevant today? Is the superpower of the world, the United States of America, afraid of Cuba? Does it have something to fear? I do not think so. There is no security threat to the Americans from Cuba. That is not a reason to have the embargo.

Is the embargo there because of human rights? Are the Americans concerned that there are human rights violations? If that were the case, surely there are other countries that have serious human rights violations and the U.S. has traded with them and continues to trade with them. Therefore that is not the reason the Americans should have an embargo.

There is no logical reason that an embargo should continue on by the Americans against Cuba. The rest of the world has said that as well. Looking at the UN, 102 countries voted to have the embargo removed and the U.S. has not listened.

In conclusion, I hope we send a strong message from this House that this embargo is unjust, is not necessary and should be removed as soon as possible to help the people of Cuba.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (for the Minister of Justice, Lib.) moved that Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand in this Chamber today to talk about the youth justice system in Canada. It is a system that is going through change. It is a system that needs Canadian understanding.

I often have felt over the past years that the public perception is far removed from the reality of the legislation and of the youth and their lives in Canada as they come before the courts every day across this land. Youth 12 to 17 years of age are captured in this act. That represents roughly 8 per cent of our 28 million population.

In today's society it must be very difficult to grow up in Canada. It is much different from when I was a child. It is much different from when many members of this House were children. There is an increasing culture of violence in Canada and I believe Canadians have an increasing appetite to change that culture of violence.

• (1205)

Most kids in Canada today are good kids. We have to start with that premise. Most youth who are faced with drugs, alcohol, violence and fears for the future still turn out fine. They still manage. Their parents cope.

It is difficult to be a parent in this society as well. I have three young children of my own. The first became a teenager a couple of months ago and I have already noticed a change. He questions a lot more. He does not accept things the same way he did when he was five.

It is going to be a challenge for society, a challenge for the child, a challenge for our schools, a challenge for our court systems to cope with the difficult times these children go through.

We talk about violence in society. It is there in the fantasy life of our children. It is there in the video games they play, on TV, and in the news they see every day. And it is not only fantasy. They see the atrocities of Rwanda. They see the ongoing wars in Europe and no peaceful times. They have more knowledge of violence at an immature stage of their development. We have to work against that backdrop to send different signals to counteract the violence, to counteract the prevalence of those signals.

There is public concern both by adults and by youth. They are fearful of crime. They are fearful of young offenders. That is in part, I think, because crime sells papers. We read and hear a lot about crime in the media. Seventy per cent of the population believes everything they read in newspapers. I do not believe everything I read in newspapers and I am sure members of this House know there are often a few details added.

That is the other backdrop we have to deal with. We have to address the reality of the fear of violence and put the fear of violence from youth into perspective. With this piece of legislation and with phase two which will come after it, we have to find a way to address the concerns of Canadians.

The issue of young offenders is a hot topic. Everywhere I go people tell me that they have a problem with the Young Offenders Act and that there is a problem with our youth today. We have some problems and we can do much better.

We also have to realize that 86 per cent of violent crime committed in Canada in 1993 was committed by adults, not youth. Only 14 per cent was committed by youth. Of that 14 per cent, a full 50 per cent was the schoolyard punch and shove. A lot of that comes because of the new reporting and new zero tolerance programs in schools.

There is a gradual rise, an increase in violent crime in youth. Depending on how the stats are read and the time periods of those stats, it can be seen as a significant rise, but it is rising and we have to address that.

In this act we will delineate the very necessary harsher system for violent crime. There is a group of incorrigibles in our country who need to be given a very clear, strong message. This act in part deals with that message.

It also delineates the other side of the coin. It also acknowledges that there are some less serious offences that bring youth before the courts. In fact, 60 per cent of them deal with property crime, often for the first time.

When we talk about the violent offences reported in the papers, on average over a decade there have been about 40 murders per year involving charged youth. Last year there were 22. Somewhere between 115,000 and 130,000 young people go through the young offender system every year. A lot of those youth are saved by our system. We have to acknowledge that.

We have a national law, the Young Offenders Act. We also have provincial and territorial situations that interpret the act differently.

We heard testimony in the justice committee which sat from September through to the end of November last year. The committee sat up to four times a week. We heard many different witnesses. We heard from school associations. We heard from parents. We heard from judges and lawyers and people who deal with youth in the probation and correctional facilities.

We heard from young offenders themselves. Some of them had come through the system and had been saved by it; some had been hurt by it. Their testimony was very revealing and informative. We heard from victims groups. The victims groups are now going to be more thoroughly addressed by this legislation. There will be an allowance for victim impact statements to be made.

This was a difficult task for the three–party committee. All the members sat around the table looking for appropriate solutions. I believe that very little time should be spent in saying what is bad and a lot of time has to be spent in asking what we should be doing better. We have to give credit where credit is due.

If I were a child in trouble with the law in Canada today, there is no doubt in my mind that I would wish I were in trouble in Quebec over any other province. Quebec has interpreted its young offenders acts much more progressively than a lot of other areas in this country and with much better success. It has employed more diversionary tactics away from the courtroom. We can learn from that experience. It is essential that we learn from that experience.

When I first started my law career in 1979 the Juvenile Delinquents Act was in force. I spent many days in courtrooms as duty counsel. Seven–year–olds were in those courtrooms. It is more appropriate now that there is this age. Phase two will revisit the question of age because Canadians want us to. We have had one debate in this House and the age question was defeated. Many people think we should lower the age for young offenders. I do not believe that. I think the ages are appropriate.

We have to consider the level of maturity and understanding of youth today. We are dealing with a very malleable and impressionable age in this Young Offenders Act. That has good and bad points. One bad point is that kids are impulsive. They do not think the consequences through. They think they know everything. They think the Young Offenders Act is a joke and that nothing will happen to them.

They think our system has no teeth. In fact the teeth are the same for youth as they are for adults. It is very important that youth understand that. It is very important that people understand that some of the breaks we give to adults in sentencing are not available for youth.

Many members opposite like to say that if you do the crime, do the time. In youth court that is exactly what happens. There is no mandatory supervision or early parole. When a youth gets three years, he or she serves three years for the most part. It is important to understand that time is a different concept for a child in the developmental years. A year for an adult seems to fly by, but a week drags on for a child.

Today in Canada when our youth come before the courts, of those found guilty roughly one–third will end up with a custodial sentence. I believe, along with many of my colleagues, that a custodial sentence, just locking somebody up and putting them away, is not a good short term answer and certainly is not the best long term approach.

• (1215)

It is important where we do lock people up and lock children up in a custodial setting that we provide some treatment while they are there; make sure that we are not just not warehousing, make sure the time, the money and the effort spent are directed to a change in the behaviour that in the long term will be much more effective in changing society, in safeguarding society, protecting citizens of Canada, and in changing the life of the individual who came before the court. We have to ensure that we take the time that we take from these children and put it to good use. To me that means behaviour modification.

There will be difficulties because a lot of people say that is being too soft, that is not tough enough. It is a lot tougher to sit down at a program and work through your problems and address those problems than it is to sit and watch a TV set or lull around the house or just pass the time away counting the days until you can be free again, than it is to work with the members of your community, with the members of your family, with the professionals put there for your assistance into changing behaviours.

My community of London, Ontario, works very well with the young people diverted to it through either court order or alternate sentences. In particular I would like to commend the St. Leonard's Society of London because it puts programs into effect in the community that integrate the youth who have problems back into the community, paying back the community in ways that are meaningful in situations in which they are not pulled apart but integrated into the community, often without the community realizing it. Therefore the community helps in restoring their sense of self–worth, their sense of discipline, their sense of accountability. I will give one example of a project that works well in my community for youth and has met with success.

In the spring, summer and fall a group of youths who have come into contact with the law go to plots of land in London and grow vegetables. They work those gardens. They hoe. They do the physical labour. They do the planning. They do the nurturing. They are there helping other people around them with their vegetables gardens. At the end of that time period they deliver the harvest back to the food bank.

One of the people who worked in this project last summer reported to the counsellor who was working with them that it was a very good feeling for him because he had to come to that food bank, he and his family, to get food.

A lot of our youth in trouble with the law are not all necessarily poor. Just like crime goes across all sections of society for adults, it also goes across all sections of society for youth. It is important to understand that the socialization process has an affect on youth.

I am going to point out one thing that has bothered me. Maybe it is so obvious that we do not see the forest for the trees in this point. If I could predict what is the best predictor of getting into trouble with the law in this country it has to be being male. Our federal penitentiaries, all of our penitentiaries, are predominantly housing males.

Recently in the youth system it used to be roughly 80 per cent male, 20 per cent female. We are seeing right now a significant increase in female participation coming before our courts. It is significant and disturbing.

In the committee in phase two when we go on the road after we have these amendments through for our overall evaluation looking at what we can do better, looking at the 10–year review of the act, we can also take a look at what happens in our social culture differently between males and females because there are different results.

This is a minor point but it is certainly very obvious when you look at the number of people using our systems. The problems of females with justice are on the rise admittedly but it is still substantially less than what happens to boys. I believe we are born equal, therefore something has to happen socially.

• (1220)

It does not happen socially, magically when one hits age 12. Something had to go wrong long before that and we have the expertise in this country to understand what went wrong. We can predict with very young children that they are getting into trouble, that there is aggressive behaviour that needs attention.

We have the expertise with our psychologists, teachers, preschool teachers, neighbours and parents. They can see it. What in my opinion is criminal is that they see it and nothing is done. The answer often is the criminal justice system should get in there and fix it.

There are problems putting really young kids in the criminal justice system. The problems have to do with understanding, with process. We have a very formalized process for serious offenders in the criminal justice system. It is necessary because there are rights of individuals, there are rights of youth. That was one of the big changes between the old Juvenile Delinquents Act and the Young Offenders Act, that we did give children rights.

I go back to the analogy of a parent. If my child offends the rules of my household, I do not want to say: "I am going to see you next week and we will talk about it for the first time. Then we are going to adjourn this conversation for a month. Then you come back and another month later we will look at it again and then we will do whatever". I want immediacy. I want some fast action. I want to be able to cope better and faster and that is what is necessary in our youth courts.

They have a tremendous job and when we look at the funnel of people going into this very formalized process, we have to make sure that we are funnelling in the right people, the right youth, to the more formalized, stricter process and we safeguard their rights.

With lesser offences, lesser violations of the community, we should try now through this act to funnel more of them back to the community for it is the responsibility of all of us in that community to fix the problem.

They are not our children to be shipped out of our jurisdictions and sent away and forgotten, hopefully not to return. We know in our federal system part of the reason that we want to do a rehabilitation program is that on fixed term sentencing 80 per cent of the population is going to come back and reintegrate into society. Kids for the most part are all going to be reintegrating into society unless there is an unusual case where there is a murder by a youth who gets bumped to adult court and has to stay most of his life in the adult system. If that is the case, that youth is going to be subject to stricter sanctions than are there right now for the adult who commits an offence of murder.

We have to understand that kids are open to change and how difficult changing behaviour actually is. It has to be done from a base of knowledge. There have to be values put into that base of knowledge that include words like respect and accountability. There also have to be other words present like compassion and understanding.

Retribution is part; rehabilitation is a better part. If one wants to fix in the long term one's society, then one had better put some attention to the detail of changing that underpinning, interdisciplinary approach of why things went wrong. It is not that this offence merits this amount of time and we will only talk about paying back for that crime.

As a society we really have to address more and more crime prevention which is now in the preamble. We have to address long term rehabilitation which is also in the preamble. We have heard evidence at committee level that those things are counterproductive.

I submit that they are not counterproductive. They are going to be a challenging base on which our justice system for our youth will change over time.

• (1225)

People will say we are not tough enough. There are going to be many people in this debate today who will tell us about the tough measures in this bill. I will deal briefly with them because it is important that people understand that we did address the concerns of the public. We have increased from five to seven years the time for those offences. That is a significant increase, especially given the fact that judges throughout Canada today are not even going to the maximums on the times allocated to them under the old provisions.

We have to talk about who needs to know when the youth gets in trouble. That also was a concern of the public. It wants to be aware of who is offending and why this is happening in its communities.

Again, we have taken a responsible and reasonable approach in this area. The area of providing information about offenders has been widened, has been increased. The professionals, the school officials, the welfare officials, the people who are dealing with the best interests of that offender will have an ability to get that information.

This is far removed from branding a child by a label and giving broad based public information and shaming some child back into the right course which I have heard advocated in this Chamber. That is not what we are doing. We are going to have judicious use of information. If there is a need for protection of the public there will be a vehicle through the act and through the court system to get a wider distribution of information. That is necessary in some circumstances.

I want to take a minute to make sure that I talk about another provision of the bill. We have had the ability since 1908 to take a child and move him up to the next level, to adult court. In this bill we have moved a further step. We have reversed the onus for some 16 and 17 year old offenders. It is called a presumptive transfer. It is saying that when one commits five very serious offences in this country one is going to be taken very seriously by the system: murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, aggravated sexual assault and one other in the list.

Basically in those instances we are going to make the young offender prove to a judge that he should not be transferred, that the youth system is a better system to deal with him. The presumption will be a reversal. I think that is very harsh but these are very big offences. The reality is that people need to understand that the options will be there.

We in committee heard much testimony on presumptive transfers. It is not a concept of reverse onus that I am very comfortable with. I think it should be used sparingly. Over time it has been used sparingly in our systems. It is expensive. It will create delays. It makes process very time consuming.

It is necessary in some cases but what is important is again the delineation between harsh, strong, compassionate and behaviour modification. We have streamlined very effectively in this bill two different paths that are available. Judges will have to say why they do not choose the path of community if it is not one of those very strong offences.

It is not only the offence, though. It always has to be the individual. If I say that theft under $200 is a summary conviction offence, maybe that is not that serious in the magnitude of the Criminal Code. But if it is the 15th time there has been theft under $200, maybe stronger intervention with different tactics relating to behaviour have to be changed.

This act will still give a judge the ability to look beyond the charge, to look at all the circumstances. Consent to treatment will be changed and the ability to put more programming before an individual will also be there.

I can only reiterate it is an ongoing process that will come with phase two. By the spring the Standing Committee of Justice and Legal Affairs will take the time to go into communities and talk to those groups that have knowledge and interest in youth. We will be looking for better partnerships with the people who are involved, who have strengths in these areas.

At the London Family Court Clinic in my riding they have developed a handbook for schools funded through the department of health which was distributed to all superintendents of school boards across Canada. It dealt with integrating anti–violence messages into the curriculum from the low level grades right up to high school. It has been discovered that integrating these messages into the lesson plan on a daily basis can have a dramatic effect on violent attitudes. Studies are being done all the time and if these situations are not taken care of they will show up in our prisons later on.

During these rounds of testimony we are hearing from people who are very concerned and have different ways of looking at their problems. Specifically I think of some of the First Nation witnesses that came before the committee. They talked about sentencing circles and appropriate ways of dealing with corrections for their people. It is quite different.

They do not want to see the overpopulation of their youth in our prison systems. They have an alternate system they can engage. Perhaps in our sentencing it is time for us to look at some of those alternate systems. When we are talking about sentencing circles for native youth, we are talking about responsibility to the elders, responsibility and reparation to the community. The youth are accountable before their peers and the immediate family group.

In phase two we need to figure out a meaningful way to get parents involved in their children's lives again and to restore the harmony that has been lost in a household. We have to know that justice is more than punishment. Justice for youth has to be meaningful and include reinvolvement, rehabilitation, reintegration into a community that cares for these children and wants them back as tax paying, hard working, responsible adults. We want to make sure we have more saves than losses.

Along with my colleagues I look forward to spending time trying to figure out how we can develop better systems for youth. Bill C–37 goes a long way in addressing the concerns of the public. Violent crime needs to be addressed more strongly but we must leave a door open so that our communities can deal more meaningfully with the youth justice system.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House today is the third reading of Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

This bill was tabled by the Minister of Justice on June 2 last year. The Bloc Quebecois was frank and forthright in its criticism. During the first debate, I said that I would not vote for a bill that tries to punish crime by creating criminals. I moved that the House decline to give second reading to Bill C–37, the purpose of which is repressive. Unfortunately, my motion was defeated.

• (1235)

Bill C–37 is part of the Liberal government's policy on youth crime. This strategy has two components. Bill C–37 is the phase one of the proposed reform, while phase two is to be a comprehensive review of the system by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

On June 6, 1994, the Minister of Justice said that he had asked the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to undertake a comprehensive review of the Young Offenders Act and of the youth justice system in Canada in general. He went on to invite Canadians to take part in the discussion on the subject.

The Minister of Justice should have requested the review before tabling this bill. I have already said that the Minister of Justice is a minister of consultation, and in this particular case, he is the minister of indiscriminate consultation. Whether these consultations are held before or after a decision is made is irrelevant, since they will have no effect on his decision.

The minister proposes to change some important aspects of legislation that subsequently will be the subject of a comprehensive review by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The Minister of Justice has put the cart before the horse. At this rate, the Liberal government's strategy will produce a law lacking any consistency it may have had.

The Minister of Justice was in such a hurry to table a bill in response to increasing pressure from some members of his own caucus and from the Reform Party that he forgot to apply the most elementary principles of logic, according to which changes should not be made until one has a full understanding of the problem. The Minister of Justice panicked. He decided to amend legislation without realizing what was involved.

The Young Offenders Act has been amended before. On May 15, 1992, a major amendment on sentencing came into effect. This amendment increased the maximum sentence in youth court for a young person convicted of murder from three to five years. Today, the Minister of Justice wants to increase sentencing. They would be increased to seven years in the case of second degree murder and to ten years in the case of first degree murder. Furthermore, the minister is going after a very specific group of young offenders—the 16 and 17 year olds.

They will now have to prove, if they are accused of violent crimes, that they should be tried in youth court, otherwise, they will be sent to the court that would normally have jurisdiction—adult court. This reversal of the burden of proof means, in other words, that an adolescent may no longer be considered as such, depending on the type of crime he has committed. In addition, his criminal liability increases, not as a function of his age, either, but as a function of the crime.

However, the preamble to the Young Offenders Act seems clear, and the one to Bill C–37 is even more so. This section provides that young persons should not in all instances be held accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences for their behaviour as adults. How do we explain this nonsense? On the one hand, it is agreed that degree of responsibility should be measured in terms of age, on the other, 16 and 17 year olds are being treated like adults.

Does the minister have some hidden statistics to which only he has access? Do they indicate a disturbing increase in violent crime among 16 and 17 year olds? If the answer is yes, let him show them to us, because he needs a lot of justification for proposing such a bill.

The approach of the Minister of Justice is similar to that of the members of the Reform Party. He supports the member for New Westminster—Burnaby, who stated the following in the House and I quote: "The juvenile justice system in its operation should mirror the adult system as much as possible if it is to be understandable by the community and develop general deterrents".

What is the point of having an act for young offenders when a third of those it targets could be treated as adults? We might just as well propose revoking it. At the rate things go, this could well happen in the very near future.

I shiver at the idea of a single system touted by the Reform Party. If we listen to the member for New Westminster—Burnaby, we should label young offenders in kindergarten. On June 6, he made the following statement: "Violent patterns in children are identifiable at the kindergarten level. By identifying young offenders before they graduate into the teen world of crime set before them, we drastically reduce the number of young adults we are forced to deal with six years down the road. This is social engineering at its best". I wonder where he took his courses on social engineering.

The minister did not bother to check the impact of the 1992 amendments. He did not concern himself with statistics on young people and criminality. He did not take the time to examine how all those involved were applying the Young Offenders Act. If he had, he would have understood that many of the problems stem from how the act is being implemented, and not from the act itself. But no, the minister once again caved in to pressure. The winds of hysteria made the Liberal reed bend.

Bill C–37 is premature. It cannot answer questions that have never been asked. The justice committee proposed some amendments following its study. Most of the 28 amendments it adopted were minor, and regarded style, terminology and concordance of the texts in both official languages. Some of them were more substantial, however. I do not intend to dwell on these points, but they are worth mentioning, if only to define what we are debating today.

To start, the first amendment removes aggravated assault from the list of offences leading to automatic transfer to adult court. In this way, we eliminate the danger that prosecutors lay heavier charges than the evidence available at the time would support. Without the amendment, a young person could almost automatically be transferred to adult court but be found guilty of a lesser crime which would not have merited such a transfer. That was only the lesser of the evils, since automatic transfer in principle remains intact.

The second amendment pertaining to transfers allows for parents to be heard before their child is transferred to adult court. This becomes one more element for the judge to consider. The committee also agreed that in regard to proceedings brought before a judge and jury, the Young Offenders Act is applicable to young persons. Measures of the Young Offenders Act will therefore take precedence over provisions of the Criminal Code in regard to protecting privacy. The amendment emphasizes the young person's right to legal representation when absent from proceedings as a result of poor conduct or when his competence to stand trial is being assessed.

These are significant amendments proposed by the committee. Since these amendments do not in any way alter the repressive nature of this bill or change the transfer procedure to adult court, all the while retaining the severity of sentences, I cannot believe that we are now debating an improved version of what was presented to us last June.

The Liberal government has tried to smooth things over by suggesting a few amendments at the report stage. In committee and in this House, we have stressed a great many times the procedural problems created by Bill C–37.

• (1245)

By increasing sentences for murder, the minister has given no thought to the confusion he will create. Section 11(f) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms stipulates, and I quote, "Any person charged with an offence has the right to the benefit of trial by jury where the maximum punishment for the offence is imprisonment for five years or a more severe punishment".

Thus, the justice minister would increase the sentences for first and second degree murder without considering for a moment that a young person normally subject to the Young Offenders Act, which does not allow for trial before a judge and jury, in fact has the right to a trial before a judge and jury under the Canadian constitution.

There is no provision for bridging the gap between the Young Offenders Act, which governs the appearance in court and the request for bail, and the Criminal Code, which governs crime proceedings in which the accused can choose to appear before a judge alone or before a judge and jury, while a magistrate under the Criminal Code will oversee the preliminary hearing if there is one.

The minister's feeble response to this nonsense and legal vacuum was to propose a hasty amendment at the report stage. This amendment details the Criminal Code provisions that will apply to preliminary hearings, when young people accused of murder are transferred to youth court.

No one at the Department of Justice had a stroke of genius. Although the amendment was intended to improve a lame bill, it creates more problems than it solves. Once the young person chooses or is deemed to have chosen a judge and jury trial, the preliminary hearing will be held before the youth court. Fine, but when does the defendant make the choice? When he appears before the youth court or after the preliminary hearing, when he can still choose to be tried before a judge alone?

What about the young person who is transferred to adult court? Will the preliminary hearing still be held before the youth court and will he then be summoned to appear before the adult court?

Given the undeniable seriousness of the offences listed in the section on transfer to adult court, the young person will be held in custody while awaiting trial. However, the young person is entitled to a bail hearing, which would allow him to be free on bail until legal proceedings are over.

Before which court and when will the bail hearing be held? If the election occurs when the accused appears in court, as is often the case, will the bail hearing be held before a higher court? As we can guess, the young person may well find himself in several jurisdictions even before being summoned to trial. He could appear before the youth court, have his bail hearing before the adult court, return to the youth court for his preliminary hearing, elect a judge and jury trial, and be summoned to appear before a superior court of criminal jurisdiction.

If you have followed me so far, you will understand why this bill and its amendments are nothing but hogwash to create a situation that only judges will be able to untangle, judges who should not have to take on a responsibility that falls to the legislator in the first place.

But when the legislative power does not do its job, then we have no choice but to defer to the judiciary, with the risks this may involve. Instead of the legislator, you now have jurisprudence deciding procedure and substantive law.

Bill C–37 is typical of the kind of bill moved by a government that is reactionary and repressive. This is the coercive approach this government is taking to respond to pressures from a misinformed public and a right wing group that manipulates it.

Bill C–37 cannot be justified either in terms of substance or in terms of the purposes it is claimed to have. Far from providing the appropriate remedy, it promises on the contrary to be a major source of procedural problems. It increases the costs to the provinces and substantially changes the role of rehabilitation centers in Quebec.

• (1250)

We do recognize, on this side of the House, that the rate of juvenile crime is cause for concern. Crime creates fear and jeopardizes the quality of life in our neighbourhoods and our cities. But it seems to us that the way juvenile crime is perceived is quite far removed from the reality around us.

Reformers and some Liberal members are blind to this reality. To justify their repressive stance, they cite extreme cases that reflect in no way present trends.

The inflammatory remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby on June 6 have certainly made many people jump. He said, and I quote: "We will be Her Majesty's loyal, constructive opposition with advocacy for improvements to Bill C–37 based on what the community wants". And he went on to say: "Reformers are the true opposition —Let the people speak and Reformers will bring their voice to this House".

Not only do Reformers not know how many seats they have in this House, but they crow over the idea of being the only sensible representatives of the electorate.

Instead of caving into pressure from his colleagues and their confederates in the Reform Party, the Minister of Justice should take a closer look at the report by criminologist Julian Roberts, which was commissioned by his own department.

Professor Roberts' study was about the public's perception and knowledge of crime and justice. This criminologist concluded, for instance, that crime is a serious problem in Canadian society that gives rise to a great deal of concern and controversy about the kind of preventive policies we should implement. However, before determining whether the public supports those policies, we must establish what the public really knows about crime and criminal justice.

Professor Roberts wondered about the general public's perception of the Young Offenders Act. His remarks are an eye opener: "Canadians have a very negative opinion of the legislation but are not very familiar with its provisions and impact. They do not understand the underlying principles or the specific provisions of the legislation and probably see it as another example of clemency being shown by the criminal justice system. The public and certain criminal justice professionals are wrong to think that the crime rate can be reduced by harsher sentencing".

One of the avowed objectives of Bill C–37 is to provide better protection for the public, and the means chosen to achieve this is to extend sentences for young offenders. What the Minister of Justice is proposing is the exact opposite of what all studies on the subject recommend. Those studies were done, in fact, by his own department. It is surprising, to say the least, that the minister should go the route of repressive measures to deal with crime, if only to impress the public. No one in Quebec is impressed.

Dealing with crime is not just a matter of sanctions or legal procedures. Bill C–37 is an exercise in futility. There are no statistics to justify a legislative change of this kind. Since the bill deals more specifically with young persons of 16 or 17 who have committed serious crimes, one would expect the statistics to show a disturbing increase in the crime rate among this population.

Nothing could be further from the truth. A review of the records held by youth courts since the Young Offenders Act came into effect reveals that the percentage of cases heard by the court which involve this population has not varied.

• (1255)

Another example of statistics the Minister of Justice appears to be ignoring is to be found in a document on homicide in Canada put out by the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics. It reveals that 35 young people between the ages of 12 and 17 were charged with homicide in 1993. This includes first and second degree murder, manslaughter and infanticide. The figure represents a 40 per cent reduction over 1992. Only 6 per cent of the individuals charged with homicide in 1993 were young people as against 9 per cent in 1992.

How can we justify increasing the sentences for first and second degree murder, and in such a draconian fashion, when the trend is decreasing? How can we justify such a repressive approach? Is the aim of the exercise to impress?

Nowhere does the literature indicate any effect of lengthening sentences on deterring or fighting crime. For example, robbery is liable to a sentence of life imprisonment, but statistics indicate that the percentage of robberies remains stable. The minister, however, is increasing the maximum sentence for first degree murder from five to ten years and the maximum sentence for second degree murder from three to seven years. This increase and the new provisions on parole eligibility are creating some rather extraordinary situations.

It should be noted right off that the starting date used to determine the length of detention varies according to whether a young person is tried in adult court or in youth court. Thus the confusion is compounded.

The most ludicrous situation is as follows: a 15–year old found guilty of first degree murder would be eligible for parole after five years in prison if judged in adult court. Yet this same 15–year old, if judged in youth court, would have to serve a six year prison term before being paroled.

In spite of the new measures regarding transfer, a young person in this position would do well to keep quiet, in the hope of being transferred to adult court. Ironically, he could be released sooner that way.

On the subject of transfer, the justice minister has drawn up a list of offences for which the offender may be transferred to adult court. It is odd that the justice minister has not increased sentences for such offences he himself calls serious. This list of offences seems entirely arbitrary to me and entails the real danger that crown prosecutors might be tempted to increase the severity of the charge for the sole purpose of reversing the burden of proof.

As I have already indicated, the Standing Committee on Justice has dropped aggravated assault from this list. The danger remains for other offences, however, such as in cases of aggravated sexual assault.

I would like to stress at this point the inconsistency of the bill as pertains to multiple offences. Such situations are very common, unfortunately. Consider for example a young person charged with both murder and robbery. On the count of murder, the burden of proof in respect of transfer rests with the young person, and on the other charge, with the crown. How does the justice minister envision the application of this procedure? No solution is to be found anywhere in this bill.

Will there be a joint inquiry exclusively in regard to transfers? If so, who would begin producing evidence? The young person in the preceding example might find himself in two separate jurisdictions in respect of the same events. This situation could lead us to make contradictory decisions. Imagine for example if he were acquitted in one jurisdiction and found guilty in the other.

If the minister had bothered to properly analyze the amendments he is proposing, he would have realized that the mere act of reversing the burden of proof coupled with the increase in sentences would turn the whole system upside down.

• (1300)

Bill C–37 ignores the fundamental differences between Quebec and the rest of Canada. Once again, the federal government is trying to impose legislation Canada–wide, without taking into consideration regional differences and systems already in place. The fact that the Minister of Justice does not acknowledge that our system is distinct is not so bad, but he adds insult to injury when he proposes a bill whose administration falls under provincial jurisdiction and whose reforms will have to be paid for by the provinces.

If the Minister of Justice had done things right and had undertaken a general study of the penal system for young people before amending the law, he would have noticed that Quebec does things differently. He could have improved his reforms by copying Quebec. The Quebec Bar Association presented a thorough paper to the Standing Committee on Justice, which summed up the situation in Quebec.

In an eloquent passage from the paper, the association said: "Young offenders in Quebec can take advantage of an alternative measure which entails referring the file to the youth protection branch. An agreement can be proposed and alternative measures imposed, such as reimbursement of the victim or community work. In fact, close to 47 per cent of all cases take this route. All other cases in Quebec are heard by the youth court. Once the order of the court is issued, the health and social services network carries out the sentence. Quebec's choice of sending these young offenders to institutions reporting to the Ministry of Health and Social Services illustrates its policy in this area, the ultimate goal being medium and long term rehabilitation rather than a repression oriented panacea which would probably only protect society in the short term".

That is how things are done in Quebec. I can already hear Reform members accuse us of being too soft and encouraging juvenile delinquency. They should know that the juvenile delinquency rate in Quebec is the second lowest in all of Canada. If passed, Bill C–37 would disrupt all Quebec institutions now focused on rehabilitation.

Extending sentences for murder would mobilize rehabilitation resources for longer periods. Quebec institutions will focus more on protecting society by putting young offenders away instead of rehabilitating them. On the other hand, youth court trial applications by 16 and 17–year–olds who have committed violent crimes and appeals of decisions to dismiss such applications will result in additional delays, during which the young person will be held temporarily in a rehabilitation centre. This is compounded by the delays caused by holding a trial before judge and jury.

Did the Minister of Justice try to find out if institutional resources are prepared to accommodate these new clients? I remind him that Quebec has chosen to place these young people in the care of the protection and rehabilitation system. Quebec's Youth Protection Act is a model piece of legislation which reflects a forward looking policy and should be copied by the other provinces. This approach was favoured long before the federal Young Offenders Act was implemented. The rehabilitation centre network took over the facilities used as youth correctional centres a long time ago.

Today, the Minister of Justice is bluntly asking Quebec to change its policy. He is asking Quebec to backtrack and convert these rehabilitation centres into ordinary prisons.

• (1305)

Quebec uses a different approach and methods. Convincing results show that we are on the right track and should be held up as an example. Faced with a complex problem, we opted for a multidisciplinary approach and methods that have proven effective. All in all, the Minister of Justice should have had a better look at the Quebec experience before proposing his reform.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in third reading of Bill C–37.

I begin by saying unequivocally that I am opposed to the bill because it does absolutely nothing to address the causes of rising criminal activity among the youth of our country. It does nothing to protect our sons and our daughters from the vicious attacks launched by their peers in school yards and on our streets. It does not expand the Young Offenders Act to include 10 and 11 year olds. It does not mandate the raising of 16 and 17 year olds to adult court, except through the reverse onus proposition that I will address later. Its disclosure clause is insufficient to provide members of the public with the information they need to protect themselves from violent young offenders, including sex offenders that reside within our society.

The young faces in Canada's courts and jails are like masks. They hide society's ugliest scars: poverty, drug and alcohol addiction, sexual abuse, physical abuse, neglect, learning disabilities, fetal alcohol syndrome, racial and sexual discrimination.

I am sympathetic to the many social adversities that confront the young people of the country. However it is not the role of the justice system to address what lies beneath these veils. It is not within the boundaries of justice to treat the social problems that are the root cause of crime.

I believe this government and past governments have tried to mould the justice system to deal with the causes of crime. They have tried to make the system address factors it was never designed to deal with and they have tried to fool Canadians into believing this can be achieved.

The justice system cannot prevent dysfunctional families. The justice system cannot reverse the ever increasing high level of taxation. It cannot change the fact that 50 cents out of every dollar earned by a mother or father is taken by various levels of government. It cannot stop the unacceptable level of unemployment. The justice system cannot prevent the negative aspects of society that lead to crime.

The areas where these factors must be addressed are the same areas that are responsible for creating them: poverty, a lack of money to meet the cost of living. This exists when a person is unemployed or underemployed. This falls within the human resources development minister's area. Providing Canadians with better employment prospects will help alleviate poverty. We all know how successful the minister has been in this regard with his social policy reforms.

Taxation, the single most debilitating financial factor in the country, falls squarely on the shoulders of the Minister of National Revenue, while economic conditions such as interest rates, the falling dollar and the ballooning deficit that continue to pressure Canada are responsibilities of the Minister of Finance.

• (1310)

The greatest threat to the economic stability of the family is the unrestrained power of governments to tax away the wealth of the individual. This has been going on at an enormous rate over the last 25 years.

The Minister of Health has on her plate responsibility for dealing with the problems of alcoholism and drug abuse which destroy families and greatly affect our youth. Provisions for social services and programs designed to provide counselling for families and youth remain within provincial jurisdiction.

These ministries are responsible for dealing with the negative aspects of society, the root causes of crime. The objective of the justice system is the protection of society. The justice system was designed for one purpose and one purpose only: to protect society against those individuals who move toward a life of crime.

It was designed to protect Canadians from people who lack self–discipline and respect for others. This objective can only be met through deterrence and the application of just penalties. Deterrence means ensuring penalties or the consequences of criminal behaviour are sufficient to thwart criminal activity. When crime occurs the justice system must provide penalties proportional to the offence which will protect innocent individuals within society.

The attempts by the social engineers over the last 20 years to create a dual animal of some sort within the justice system has created a sieve. It has corrupted the justice system to the point where the rights of the criminal supersede the rights of the victim, where there is absurdly light sentencing, out of touch judges, easy parole, deportation orders that are an utter joke, and an absolutely ludicrous belief that murderers should not have to serve their full life sentence.

This two–tier animal fostered by a bleeding heart mentality has led to the demise of the traditional justice system whereby it is no longer protecting the lives and the property of Canadian citizens.

It is very apparent that Bill C–37 does not move to discard this problem. In fact it reinforces its foundation rooted in the parent act, the Young Offenders Act. The first clause of Bill C–37 reads:

> (a) crime prevention is essential to the long–term protection of society and requires addressing the underlying causes of crime by young persons and developing multi–disciplinary approaches to identifying and effectively responding to children and young persons at risk of committing offending behaviour in the future;

Bill C–37, as is the Young Offenders Act, is the product of an attitude that criminals are not bad people, that they are all victims of poverty and a ruthless, competitive society who do not require punishment but the infinite application of some mysterious panacea that has never been found or defined.

The remedies are not defined within Bill C–37 as they are not defined within the confines of other justice bills. Both the causes and the treatment of criminal behaviour are beyond the scope of justice.

A counsellor and youth worker in the youth correctional system of Quebec and Alberta has provided profiles of the young offender who came under his care. He said that the kids came from homes where one or both of their natural parents did not want to have them around. Many came from single parent families, women on welfare or working at low wage jobs who lost control of their children. Many were brought up by grandparents, uncles, aunts or foster parents.

Common to all these histories was the impression that the young inmates were raised in homes that were emotional junk yards with fighting, screaming, drunkenness or drug abuse, violence and neglect. "Definitely", the author says, "not a warm and fuzzy place".

These kids grew up angry. No matter how tough, no matter how lenient, no matter what their rehabilitative efforts may be, the Young Offenders Act and likewise Bill C–37 cannot change the hostile environment that bred many of our young offenders. That environment can only be changed by powers that fall outside the justice system.

The government can move against the influences in society that attack the moral fibre of our youth, influences such as pornography. We have in Canada peep shows where adults go into a room for a fee and watch naked women dancing and gyrating through a peep hole. We have naked dancing and lap dancing in bars where our daughters are enticed into so–called occupations that contribute to moral decline.

I quote from a letter I received from one of my constituents. "Last night", he states, which was October 15, 1994, "I went to pick up my daughter and turned on CBC radio. Usually the program 'Ideas' is on. The show was about female ejaculation. In the five minutes I listened to it before picking up my daughter, a woman was describing self–stimulation in front of mirrors and how exciting it was to ejaculate in front of the mirrors".

• (1315)

The government can do something about this kind of thing and I ask that it do so. I ask the justice minister and the minister of culture to look into this particular radio broadcast. If these facts are accurate, as I have been assured they are, those responsible should be disciplined and this type of broadcasting should be eliminated from the CBC, which is financed by the taxpayers.

These are areas the government can do something about. Yet members across the way refuse to act in these areas that attack the moral fibre of our society, particularly our youth.

Until the negative aspects of society that breed delinquent behaviour are addressed, this pretence that the Minister of Justice is getting tough on crime will continue. I suggest it is only a pretence. Until the minister moves to eliminate those areas within the Criminal Code that facilitate violence, the pretence will remain.

If the minister is serious about getting tough on crime, why does he not amend the legislation that allows a statutory release of violent offenders such as Mr. Auger, who is the prime suspect in the murder of Melanie Carpenter, after serving only two–thirds of their sentence? Why not move to stop that type of release of violent offenders into society? The members of the parole system advised those in charge that Mr. Auger was still dangerous and would likely offend again.

Why does the minister not act? He could move quickly to plug that loophole. He would certainly have the support of the members within the Reform Party caucus. Why did the Minister of Justice vote against the private member's bill eliminating section 745 of the Criminal Code which gives murderers an opportunity for early parole?

Why is he voting in favour of the criminal and against a safer society? Will the Minister of Justice change his vote on this bill if he is serious about getting tough on crime? I ask all members of the House, what do they believe is a fair and just penalty for the premeditated murder of an innocent person such as Melanie Carpenter?

I can support portions of this bill. The minister has obviously been listening, if only somewhat, to the thousands of Canadians who have demanded toughening of the Young Offenders Act. Although I believe that many Canadians were looking for significant change, as were we in the Reform Party, not what we consider to be a charade.

The amendments contained in Bill C–37 are not significant. They are nothing more than a pretence that the minister is dealing with the problem at hand. I believe that people like Stu Garrioch, the father of a boy who was stabbed in the stomach with a hunting knife by a 15–year–old and the 195,000 people who signed his petition want to see major reform, not mere tinkering and amending.

The same could be said for Donna Cadman, whose 16–year old son was fatally stabbed by another youth on a street corner in Surrey in 1992. She is asking that all violent offenders be tried in adult court. We ask the same.

Yvette Steck, a 27–year old housewife in Fort St. John, B.C., has been pushing her community to call for a registry of sex offenders. She was motivated by the revelation that she had been leaving her seven–year old daughter at a neighbour's home where a convicted child molester was staying. On a petition demanding that molesters lose their right to privacy after victimizing a child, Mrs. Steck collected 6,500 signatures.

An estimated 10,000 people demonstrated on Parliament Hill on September 24, 1994 calling for crime control, not gun control. On September 25, 1994, 3,000 people marched in a rally alongside Bob Niven, whose 31–year old son was beaten to death by two teens, demanding tough reform of the Young Offenders Act.

• (1320)

In November last year 1,500 people converged on the lawns of Parliament Hill. They came out of respect for Anne–Marie Bloskie of Barry's Bay, whose skull was smashed after being sexually assaulted by a 17–year–old. They came out of respect for Melaine Deroches who was beaten to death with a wrench in Kemptville by a 14–year old classmate, for Marwan Harb, the Hull teenager who was stabbed to death during an after school rumble with three teens, and for Nicholas Battersby who was shot on Elgin Street.

They came to mark the fifth birthday of the late Joshua Baillie, a young accident victim struck dead by a youth out joy riding in a stolen van. They came out to say: "Enough is enough. We want significant change, not just tinkering and mere amendments".

The boy who sexually assaulted and murdered Ann–Marie earned three years in jail. Melaine's killer received a three–year term in youth custody. Young, innocent Joshua's assassin, after pleading guilty to criminal negligence, got one year in custody plus one year probation.

A couple of weeks ago 3,000 people from B.C. mourned the death of Melanie Carpenter and thousands more people are rallying around a campaign organized by the Carpenter family demanding reform of the criminal justice system.

Bill C–37 is a half–hearted attempt to address the concerns of Canadians. This bill, although propelled by the grassroots and not the ivory towers of this nation, does not meet the needs of Canadians. Why has the the minister not been consistent in his adherence to the wishes of Canadians? Where are all the petitions containing thousands of signatures?

Where have all the protests been held calling for the registration of rifles and shotguns? How many people marched on Parliament demanding an outright ban on handguns? I have not seen them.

I have travelled throughout the west and northern Ontario. My colleagues have been in the east. We have witnessed gathering upon gathering of thousands of people. We have in our possession petitions from every part of Canada containing thousands of signatures protesting the minister's decision to compel law–abiding citizens to register their rifles and shotguns. Yet on and forward goes the minister.

The minister is inconsistent in his adherence to the wishes of Canadians. He is also inconsistent in his approach to criminal justice. Although he has moved to increase sentencing in relation to gun offences, he was reluctant to increase sentences for youth criminal offences.

I commend the justice minister for increasing the penalty for murder from five to ten years for young offenders. However, how does he equate 10 years for murder with the same penalty of 10 years for deliberately neglecting to register a rifle or shotgun? Does this make sense? Is this fair and reasonable? What do the inconsistencies in this type of legislation do to further attack the credibility of the present justice system?

During the 1993 election campaign I heard constituents in my riding expressing concerns about the prevalence of crime, particularly about youth crime. Every day I receive letters asking for our help in restoring some sense of sanity to a justice system that seems to have run amok.

I hear about the deficit and the debt and the runaway taxes imposed by previous governments. I hear about the mounting cynicism toward politicians, particularly those at the federal level.

During the campaign people in my riding revealed that they felt betrayed. The imposition of the much hated GST and wasteful spending habits were at the root of their cynicism prior to the 1993 campaign. Today it is the result of a lack of substantive action on the part of the Liberal government.

During the campaign I did not hear one person, nor do I today hear people expressing concern that we do not have enough firearms control. In fact the Maclean's Decima poll indicated only 5 per cent of Canadians felt violent crime was due to a lack of sufficient and adequate gun control measures. However, I did hear and continue to hear that people are concerned about their safety. They are worried about the alarming rate of youth crime, particularly violent crime.

Bill C–37 is not the answer for the rising rate of crime among our youth. The answer is a complete review, an overhaul of the Young Offenders Act with a goal of restoring the traditional role of justice to our system.

Reform wants a number of amendments to the Young Offenders Act which in the absence of a complete review will be the only way to satisfy us that the protection of society will prevail. We have requested that the Young Offenders Act cover youth aged 10 to 15 inclusively rather than 12 to 17 which currently is the case.

• (1325)

I am sure members are aware that the criminal justice system cannot hold accountable youth aged 10 and 11 years for any of the crimes they might commit. That is unacceptable. We believe that there are too many 10 and 11 year olds committing crimes for which the police cannot charge nor prosecute them. As for older offenders we believe that youths age 16 and 17 are old enough to assume full responsibility for their crimes and should in all cases and in particular in the case of violent offences be tried as adults.

Under Bill C–37 the justice minister has proposed that 16 and 17 year old youths who are charged with murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, aggravated sexual assault, and aggravated assault be tried in adult court unless an application is granted for the youth's case to be heard in youth court. The onus is now on the young offender to demonstrate why he or she should not be tried in adult court and the court will have the discretion to accept or reject the application.

This amendment creates a hearing within a hearing. It will cause delays and add to the backlog of cases currently before the courts. It will be more costly. We reject the suggestion and the amendment.

The Reform Party had proposed increased sentencing. Therefore I support the provisions contained in Bill C–37 to have sentences for first degree murder increased from five to ten years. We had also recommended that amendments to the Young Offenders Act include permission to publish the names of young offenders who have been convicted of any offence involving the use of violence, who contravene any narcotic control act or food and drug act or who have been convicted previously of any two offences.

Bill C–37 has failed to provide this amendment. It is perhaps the greatest failing of the bill. I firmly believe that the publication of the names of young offenders is essential for the protection of Canada's innocent children.

For example, a school principal may not know that one of his students has been convicted numerous times for drug trafficking. A parent may not know that his child is associating with a offender convicted of a series of rapes. The young man next door who has been entrusted to babysit children could be another Jason Gamache.

Who should we be protecting, the vast majority of Canadians who are law–abiding, hard–working, caring people who will continue to be the building blocks for a productive society or the local high school's drug dealer and unknown rapist in the neighbourhood? I do not think that is a hard question to answer. Undoubtedly it is these offenders who must be made known to society.

We are not talking about the youth who makes a small mistake and comes in contact with the justice system on a single occasion. The best interest of the public may not be served by publishing the details. We propose and firmly believe that in order to make community protection the number one priority, the publishing of violent young offenders' names must not be prevented by law as it is today and continued in Bill C–37.

A successful justice system cannot have as its base the withholding and concealment of the truth. The names of victims and the horrific details of the crimes perpetrated on them are open to public scrutiny but the names of the offenders remain a state secret. The young faces in Canada's courts and jails are the masks that hide society's ugliest scars, scars that will fester if they are not exposed.

The Reform Party on behalf of our many constituents has asked the government to establish a registry of child sex abusers. The government has provided its typical response to a request of this nature. It knows there is a problem. It knows that Canadians want something done about it. It has promised to study the issue and consult the proper authorities. In other words, the government is dragging its feet and in the meantime children will continue to be sexually abused and violently attacked by repeat offenders that the government is guilty of protecting by refusing the public the information it needs to protect our children and our society from these perpetrators.

In an effort to understand the need for a child registry Health Canada, Justice Canada and the Ministry of the Solicitor General commissioned a study. The federal ad hoc interdepartmental working group on information systems on child sex offenders prepared a discussion paper.

What was the conclusion of that study? We need another study and we need further consultation. Also contained in that paper is information which clearly indicates both the need for a child registry and for the publishing of young offenders' names.

The report states: "Statistics compiled on all violent crime committed against children in Canada indicate that young offenders, those aged 12 to 17, account for approximately 23 per cent of all accused offenders. Further information indicates that from 17 to 29 per cent of those accused of child sexual abuse are under the age of 18".

It is important to note that this same age group only represents 7.9 per cent of the Canadian population. The report states that studies have repeatedly indicated that sex offenders have one of the highest rates of recidivism of any criminal group, with an estimated 40 per cent reoffending within five years of release. Furthermore, research examining the effectiveness of offender treatment programs has shown limited results.

Did the Minister of Justice not read the report of the federal ad hoc group? If he had, he would know that sex offenders reoffend. If he could do simple calculations he would know from the stats that between 17 and 29 per cent of sex offences in Canada are committed by young offenders. If 40 per cent of that 17 to 29 per cent reoffend, sadistic acts will continue to be committed against the most innocent and vulnerable members of our society. And the government could have prevented this by releasing their names to society. If they had read their own report and acted immediately on its findings, unspeakable acts on our children could have been thwarted.

Bill C–37 does not undertake to protect our children from the Jason Gaumaches of this world. It does not protect us from the faceless, nameless individuals poised behind the mask of adolescence.

Furthermore, the weight is still balanced in favour of the young offender in this country. The protection of society, the protection of our children, is still outweighed by the so–called rights of violent and delinquent young Canadians.

All we are asking is that the scales be evened out, that the rights of the victims, the rights of our children be given priority. We ask that the protection of society outweigh the protection of violent young offenders who have no respect for the lives and rights of others.

All we are asking is that the Minister of Justice listen to the people of Canada; listen to the mothers and fathers whose children have been taken from them at such an early age; listen to the grassroots of this country, not those in the ivory tower who are immune to what is really going on at ground level.

I can only support legislation that finds its roots with the people or that can be substantiated by fact, not personal agendas. In closing, I reiterate my opening remarks. I cannot support Bill C–37. I will only support legislation that meets the objective of justice: the protection of society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We will now move to the next stage of debate. During the next five hours members will be entitled to interventions of 20 minutes subject to 10 minutes of questions or comments.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): I rise today to speak in favour of the amendments to the Young Offenders Act put forward by the Minister of Justice and confirmed by the report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs as tabled in this House on December 8.

First of all, I can state that I consider the minister's two–part strategy to reform the youth justice system to be an appropriate response to the problems of youth crime.

As a lawyer and as someone who has worked with youth for many years and also as a parent, I do not support the hard line argument that a weak Young Offenders Act is leading today's youth to commit more and more crimes. I acknowledge that the act has shortcomings but I am satisfied that the amendments in Bill C–37 will begin to close the gaps, increase rehabilitation and improve public safety.

While I support the need for changes in the Young Offenders Act, I consider it imperative that any changes be based on the best available knowledge rather than on public fear and anger or on the widely held myth that harsher punishments are what is needed to bring most youth crimes and violence under control.

I believe that most criminal behaviour stems from sociological factors. I am therefore pleased that phase two, the parliamentary review of the Young Offenders Act, will include a study of the alternatives to legislative responses to youth crime. If we can prevent youth crime by gaining an understanding of the underlying causes of criminal behaviour and tackling these causes, then I think it will be proven that the Young Offenders Act is an effective tool of the justice system.

Rehabilitation should be the ultimate goal of any legislation dealing with youth crime. The act as it now stands is somewhat lacking in this area but I feel that the changes proposed in Bill C–37 will begin to address this deficiency. This legislation is an indication that the rehabilitative needs of young people are being seen in relation to the need to address issues related to public safety. I would like now to comment on the various components of Bill C–37.

• (1335)

The bill proposes two major changes to the act's declaration of principles which I feel set a more appropriate tone for its interpretation in court. This is achieved by acknowledging two truths: one, that crime prevention is essential to the long term protection of society; and two, that there is a relationship between the protection, society and the rehabilitation of offenders.

Bill C–37 proposes an increase in the maximum penalty for first degree and second degree murder to 10 and 7 years respectively. This is an important change. In fact I would support a further increase in these maximums for this most terrible of crimes.

The proposed change to the act which requires 16 and 17 year old youths charged with specified serious crimes involving violence to be tried in adult court is a significant departure from the current system of treating all youth between the ages of 14 and 17 the same way. This will ensure a more appropriate response to each young offender's transgression. For those who have to go through the process of showing the judge why they should be tried in youth court, this amendment will ensure that they are left with a clear understanding of the seriousness of the charge and the consequences of their violent action.

Section 16 of the act specifies the criteria to be considered by the youth court in making these transfer decisions. I would like to quote them because they are important. The criteria include: the alleged offence, the age, the character and criminal record of the young person, the availability of treatment in either system—that is a very important criterion—and any other factors considered relevant by the court.

In making transfer decisions, youth courts must consider both the protection of the public and the rehabilitation of the young person. Where the two objectives are irreconcilable, protection of the public is to be paramount. The young person must then be proceeded against in adult court.

There have been a lot of discussions on this change. People have raised the argument that this will be set aside on a charter argument in time. I guess we will have to wait and see on that. For certain, there is a reverse onus. We acknowledge there is a reverse onus.

Some people may have difficulty with that but I agree with it. Some people suggest there is a presumption of guilt built into this, that the young offender is presumed guilty. I reject that argument. I do not feel there is a presumption of guilt built into this section.

On balance I feel this change is good. It is appropriate. Let us not forget that it deals with only the four most serious crimes: murder, attempted murder, manslaughter and aggravated sexual assault.

The amendment which allows for victim impact statements to be made in court meets the strong demand of victims to be a part of the criminal justice process.

Two other important amendments are the changes to the record provisions of the act and the improvement of information sharing within the youth justice system. The general public and young offenders will both benefit from an increased level of co–operation among the various professionals who work with young people in the community.

The proposal that allows a judge to impose conditional probation at any time it is deemed necessary for the benefit of the youth or for the protection of the public is another amendment which should meet the demands of those concerned with public safety and those in favour of rehabilitation for young offenders. The same can be said for the change that will authorize the courts to request psychological and medical assessment of chronic and serious young offenders.

As a person in favour of measures to improve the chances of rehabilitation, I find the proposal encouraging the consideration of alternatives to custody for less serious crimes an important one. Many experts report that closed custody is the most expensive and least effective way of dealing with less violent forms of delinquency. This change responds to research which shows that non–violent young people do better when they are treated in the community away from more serious and violent young offenders. It also recognizes the widely held belief that custody often undermines rehabilitation.

By allowing for any number of alternatives to be considered, the youth system will be able to identify the most effective way of dealing with each individual offender. As well, it forces young offenders to take an active responsibility for their actions. This change is an important one because ultimately rehabilitation improves public safety.

As I stated earlier, I am satisfied that the proposed changes to the Young Offenders Act are appropriate. Most of the amendments demonstrate an underlying concern with protecting the public while allowing for the necessary conditions to encourage rehabilitation.

The Young Offenders Act is based on the premise that youth should be held responsible for their illegal actions but that young people have special needs as they develop and mature. It is therefore a balance between the need to protect the public and the need to assist young persons in conflict with the law to develop into productive law–abiding adults. The proposed amendments maintain this critical balance.

In addition to the changes I have discussed, I believe that the findings of the widespread review being conducted by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will be important to the development of a co–ordinated long term response to the general problem of crime in Canada.

Legislation is only one part of the solution however. It is becoming increasingly apparent that until we are able to effectively address the issues of poverty, alcoholism, family violence, abuse, racism and illiteracy just to name a few, our legislative efforts at reducing youth crime will continue to be deemed as insufficient.

In his presentation to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, Dr. Alan Leschied, assistant director of the London Family Court Clinic, confirmed this research by citing four major predicators as to why kids commit crime. First, he noted it has something to do with the nature of families and how we in our society function as families. Second, it reflects the impact and nature of friendships and peer influence. Third, it has something to do with how we develop certain attitudes that justify anti–social actions. Fourth, it can also have a lot to do with substance abuse.

Research has proven that there are reasonable links between crime prevention and the proper care of children. Youth who turn to criminal activity often come from an environment where poverty, neglect, substance abuse, physical abuse and unemployment are the norm. It goes without saying that the more positive influences that are present, the better.

While Dr. Leschied expressed his opinion that there is no cure for crime, he noted there are solutions that will reduce the incidents of youth crime.

For instance, a solid relationship with caring adults has been shown to deter children from developing anti–social behaviour. Therefore, where possible as a society we must ensure that youth are raised in a supportive environment. Where this is not possible we must work to ensure that there are adequate support networks to assist youths and their families.

High quality day care and an adequate education can also have a significant impact on behaviour. In addition to providing a solid basis for the future, schools can also play an important role in crime prevention by, among other things, teaching young people about the legal system; encouraging the development of social skills, including responsibility, tolerance and respect for others; teaching methods of conflict resolution; including anti– racism programs in the curriculum; and early identification of and intervention for those with serious problems.

• (1345)

As well, it may be more appropriate for those children who grow up in homes where violence, drug or alcohol abuse or emotional and mental problems are prevalent to be dealt with by the mental health system rather than the justice system. It is clear to me that in most cases it is only when all the support systems fail that the justice system is forced to respond to youth who have committed a criminal offence.

Therefore we should be focusing our efforts on improving the effectiveness of these services. I am hopeful that the results of phase two will support this argument.

For those who feel that the amendments introduced in Bill C–37 do not go far enough, I would like to quote from an editorial which recently appeared in the Chronicle Herald, a local newspaper in Halifax, Nova Scotia: "We should be careful not to equate our wishes for teenagers to have more respect for people and property with shortcomings in the Young Offenders Act or the criminal justice system. Reform of the act is not a panacea for the apparent discipline problem of our youth. Fundamental social and family problems put children in court".

Before concluding, there seems to be some misunderstanding of what the Young Offenders Act is supposed to do and perhaps some misunderstanding of what the amendments propose. In the few remaining minutes I would like to set out again for the record the major elements of the act.

There are amendments to provide that 16 and 17 year olds charged with specified serious crimes involving violence will be proceeded against in adult court unless the youth court orders that they be proceeded against in youth court. There are amendments to increase the sentences in youth court for young persons convicted of murder. There are amendments to increase the period of time that 16 and 17 year olds convicted of murder in adult court must serve before becoming eligible to apply for parole.

There are amendments that provide that young offenders should be accountable to their victims and to the public through non–custodial dispositions where appropriate. There are amendments to provide that the records of young persons convicted of specified serious offences will be retained for longer periods and that records for young persons convicted of minor offences will be retained for shorter periods. There are amendments to provide for greater sharing of information relating to young offenders with persons who require such information for safety reasons.

There is always a fine balance when trying to determine what is best for society and what is best for the individual. Every piece of legislation does not get it right every time. This, like any criminal justice legislation, is evolving. It continues to be reviewed. It has to be reviewed on a regular basis.

I feel that these amendments address some of the very real issues in front of the public today. The general public has been asking for changes and I believe the government has responded. It has responded in a reasonable way and it has listened to people who work with youth.

On a number of occasions I attended the committee hearings. The committee had experts attend to give evidence and it had experts that worked with youth on a regular basis. They were people who understand the system, who understand the youth justice system and who understand what is required for rehabilitation. I believe that to a large extent, although not in every instance, what is incorporated into this legislation reflects what the committee heard from the experts who appeared before it.

The quote I used earlier states my position and the government's position very clearly. We should be careful not to equate our wish for teenagers to have more respect for people and property with shortcomings in the Young Offenders Act or the criminal justice system. I believe that is a truism. I believe it strongly and I fully support the amendments put forth in Bill C–37.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the dissertation by the hon. member for South Shore. As I was listening to the hon. member, I was struck with the fact that there is an inconsistency between the sentencing aspects of young offenders under the provisions of Bill C–37 and the sentencing provisions under Bill C–41, another government bill having to do with sentencing circles for aboriginal Canadians.

The idea under the Young Offenders Act is that the anonymity of the young offender is the watch word of the whole thing. Once the young offender makes a mistake or does not make a mistake but does something very deliberate, creating an offence of significant magnitude against someone else, the whole idea is that we have to somehow make sure we can save this young offender from recidivism, making sure we get them started on the right track.

That is great. It is a good idea. It is motherhood and apple pie. The problem is that it demands almost total anonymity. The young offender's neighbours cannot be informed of the offence. The newspapers cannot be informed of the offence.

At the same time we have sentencing circles requiring positive peer pressure. We would return someone to their community so their sentence would be handed down by their elders. They would have to face members of the community they have injured or disgraced.

We have the whole notion of the principle that motivates human beings. Is it recognition and reputation or shame and disgrace? On one side under Bill C–37 we have complete anonymity. On the other side we have peer pressure, the opposite of anonymity. I wonder if the hon. member for South Shore would comment on this inconsistency and tell the House and Canadians how sentencing circles which would require peer pressure from the community could work for aboriginal Canadians, while non–aborignal Canadians are expected to change their ways in complete anonymity.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to comment on Bill C–41. I will comment on the provisions of Bill C–37.

What I said earlier applies. We have to find the balance. We are dealing with young offenders. We are dealing with people of a tender age, if we can use that worn expression. I do see some benefit if we are dealing with the four most serious offences that we are now treating differently for 16 and 17 year olds.

I would consider engaging in some discussion on those types of offences at that age of individual, to look at perhaps publishing the names even if the youth court decided they would remain in youth court. There is some discussion that could be had on the point that perhaps peer pressure could be brought to bear. There are some advantages in school principals and others knowing who these people are. I think that is the point being made.

I do not suggest for a minute that some of the points are not good points. I am suggesting that some of the flaws or concerns we had originally with the Young Offenders Act have been addressed in this bill.

There is phase two. We are going to go forward with a further review of the act. Suggestions you have of that nature have some merit. I would not hesitate at all to discuss the pros and cons, recognizing at the end of the day that perhaps everything you want and everything I want we may not get.

• (1355)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I hesitate the interrupt the member for South Shore but I think it is worthy to remind ourselves not to get into a dialogue between two members of the House when we are all participating. All interventions are to be directed through the Chair.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of comments I would like to make with regard to what the member has said. I would like to get his comments back.

The government seems to be quite pleased with the idea that 16 and 17 year olds are going to be charged in adult court. Then it has thrown in a little extra clause which says unless it can be proven by the defendant that it would be more beneficial for them to be in juvenile court.

To me that means that every 16 and 17 year old who gets charged as an adult will appeal and want to be charged as a youth. I would not blame them for wanting to do that. That means more court time and more nice little jobs for lawyers to take on to help fill their pockets a little more and it does not change anything. Now we are charging the youth and if they feel they ought to be in adult court, then we have court trials to fight for that. I do not see where that has changed anything. Either 16 or 17 years old are in adult court or they are not. I cannot believe the government would come out with that kind of wishy–washy legislation.

I really wonder why so many members from the justice department are constantly concentrating on the social aspect of problems. We have a social department. I want to see good prevention programs. I want to see good rehabilitation. I want to see all the things that these people want to see, but the justice department does not want to address the part called justice. It continually wants to talk about low income families, the poor mistreated child, the victims of society. It does not address the justice part. Victims of this country are so anxiously awaiting to hear what we are going to do in terms of justice. I have not heard that yet.

The Speaker: Before I give the floor to the member for South Shore, I think we are close enough to two o'clock now for Statements by Members. I wonder if the member for South Shore could think about his response and as soon as question period is over I will return to him.

It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STEPHANIE RICKARD

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to recognize one of my constituents, Stephanie Rickard of Bracebridge. Stephanie is one of 25 Ontario youth selected to participate in the 1995–96 Canada World Youth Program.

Canada World Youth is a Canadian non–profit organization which operates youth exchanges between Canada and the developing countries of Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean. Since its creation in 1971 over 42 exchange countries have been involved with a total of over 15,000 young people from Canada and exchange countries participating.

This year's program for Stephanie will run for a seven–month period with Egypt. She will spend the first half of the experience in Nova Scotia with 20 other Canadians and 21 young people from Egypt. From there the group will depart on the second half of their experience to Egypt where they will enjoy a reciprocal experience with their Egyptian host families.

I wish Stephanie and the other World Youth Program participants well as they embark on the experience of a lifetime.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, having committed a blatant injustice by closing down the college in Saint–Jean, the only French–language military college, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is now adding insult to injury.

How can the minister claim to be doing Saint–Jean a favour by giving it the same compensation as Royal Roads Military College in Victoria, that is to say $25 million over five years, when the school population, operating budget and facilities at Saint–Jean were twice that of Royal Roads?

As he crows about a few jobs saved, the minister is overlooking the 175 jobs cut in the last budget. As we say in French, we just saved the furniture in Saint–Jean.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has been reported that the Liberal cabinet is ready to reform MP pensions.

While these reported changes do not go as far as Reformers would like, they are a little nudge in the right direction. We in this House must be mindful of the anger that this topic causes with Canadians.

Vancouver Sun columnist Barbara Yaffe wrote a column asking people to express their opinions on this issue. The response within 10 days was 12,000 letters from people fed up with politicians raising taxes and cutting services for ordinary Canadians while at the same time leaving their own perks and pensions untouched.

In a time of fiscal restraint and budget cutbacks, Canadians rightfully expect their representatives to show fiscal leadership by tightening their own belts.

I ask all members of this House, regardless of their political stripe, to make and accept the necessary changes to bring MP pension plans in line with those of other Canadians.

CONTRACTING OUT

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government operations committee of which I am a vice–chairman has been reviewing contracting out practices for over six months.

[English]

The previous government's bias toward wholesale contracting for services within the public service has led to little accountability as to numbers or quality of the shadow public service. The committee continues to be frustrated by the lack of data and costing.

The $5.2 billion for contracting services in 1993 is but a guestimate and could well be twice this amount. It is my belief that the government should restrain this practice so that public service employees not lose their jobs while the shadow public service continues to grow and prosper out of control.

TRIAL PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the daily newspaper in my riding, the St. Catharines Standard, on its editorial calling for the media to examine the moral question of how visual evidence should be reported at the Paul Bernardo trial.

The editorial states:

> Does the public have a right to know every single detail of evidence that will be presented during the trial? In principle, in defence of freedom of the press, the answer must be yes. But does the public need to know every gory detail? The answer surely is no, so long as the public is assured that such evidence has been seen and weighed by the judge and the jury of 12 who will represent us all in deciding the case.
> While the media may have an obligation to inform the public, there is surely also a duty to respect the dignity of the victims and of the victims' family, neighbours and friends.

Canadians must ensure that the media coverage is handled in an appropriate and respectful way; in short, in a Canadian way.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize and applaud the aggressive approach the city of North York is taking in establishing the North York Small Business Centre.

Canadians realize that the small business sector now accounts for over half of all private sector employment. They understand, as this government does, that the impact of small business on the Canadian economy is profound. Small business will be relied upon for economic growth and job creation.

This government promised to focus on a jobs and growth agenda. The Minister of Industry's plan calls for partnerships among all Canadians and their institutions—businesses, unions, professional associations, interest groups and governments—to facilitate and create jobs and growth in the private sector.

The North York Small Business Centre realizes that growing new businesses is important, that new business people need help in marketing themselves and simply need some encouragement.

I would like to pay tribute to Mr. Lincoln Allen, the executive director, and all of the centre's staff and wish them success.

COPYRIGHT

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to boost his image before the Christmas holidays, the heritage minister announced with hoopla, on December 22, that the government planned to be reviewing the Copyright Act in the spring.

Last week, the 50 groups participating in the Canadian Conference of the Arts' cultural summit rejected government plans for gradual reform and demanded immediate action.

The minister's announcement does not help make the Copyright Act any less antiquated. The time has come for the government to be more specific about its plans with respect to the content of this bill.

• (1405)

By refusing to subject the bill to a comprehensive review, the heritage minister clearly indicates his unwillingness to take on his industry colleague, as he was supposed to do. It is clear who the real sponsor of this legislation is.

PATRICK KELLY

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the justice minister's commitment to act in the case of former RCMP officer Patrick Kelly.

As I noted in this House last year, Mr. Kelly was convicted 11 years ago in the murder of his wife. The prosecution's key witness, Dawn Taber, came forward in 1993 and admitted that she had not witnessed the murder, contrary to her testimony almost ten years ago. Ms. Taber said last Wednesday: "You cannot imagine what this has been like, to realize that what you have said has put a man in prison".

I understand that the minister has a lot on his desk: amendments to the criminal code, constituents up in arms over firearms registration, as well as constituent concerns. However, when the Minister of Justice leaves his office at the end of the day a woman will be sitting at home wanting to clear her conscience and a man will be sitting in jail awaiting a new trial. Before another day passes I challenge the minister to start the process and give Mr. Kelly a chance to state his case fairly in a court of law.

WOMEN'S INSTITUTES

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, February 19, marked a very important day for rural women in Canada and around the world. It was on that date some 98 years ago that the women's institute was founded in Ontario by Mrs. Adelaide Hoodless, Mr. and Mrs. Erland Lee and 101 members.

Now associated women's institutes around the world provide nine million rural women in 70 countries with opportunities for personal growth, community service and equality.

As former national agriculture chair for the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada I know first hand the important work the women's institute does. Therefore, it gives me great pleasure to pay tribute to our founder, Mrs. Adelaide Hoodless, for her vision and to the countless women who throughout the years have worked tirelessly with the women's institute for the betterment of themselves, their families, their communities, their countries and the world.

KINSMEN AND KINETTE CLUBS

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand here today to extend my congratulations to the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada on their 75th anniversary.

It is impossible to calculate the many direct and indirect contributions Kinsmen and Kinette members have made to their communities, provinces and Canada since 1920. However, we do know that in the past ten years Kin members have raised more than $220 million for community service work while donating countless hours of their own time to fundraising and service projects. More than 600 communities across the country have benefited from Kin initiatives.

They also have an impressive record of carrying out international development projects throughout the third world which have extended the Kin's commitment to serving the community's greatest need to include the world community.

On the 75th anniversary of Kinsmen and Kinettes they are to be congratulated on a job well done.

LONDON AND ST. THOMAS REAL ESTATE BOARD

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the London and St. Thomas Real Estate Board has adopted an initiative which we should note and applaud.

Each of its 1,450 realtors will be contributing an amount of $5 per member per year until the year 2000. The money will be deposited into a special trust fund to accumulate and accrue interest. The invested money is expected to reach $50,000, at which time it will be given to the federal government to be applied to the national debt.

The board's president, Debbie Collins, believes it is the first private sector association to undertake such an initiative. It has challenged fellow realtors across the country to do the same. It is serious about reducing Canada's deficit and debt and feels it is a very pressing problem.

Individuals and organizations are starting to take this seriously and will work out strategies along with the government to cope with our fiscal reality.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at a press conference this morning, the association representing Canada's 26,000 dairy producers made it very plain that they would not accept any concession on the part of the federal government in the present trade dispute between Canada and the United States over agricultural products. Their legal position is firm, and respects the new GATT agreements, as well as Canada's obligations under NAFTA.

The official opposition supports the agricultural producers of Canada and of Quebec and demands that the government immediately cease all discussions with the American government on this issue.

• (1410)

Canada has nothing to negotiate. It must immediately take this dispute to a GATT or NAFTA panel, which will obviously rule in Canada's favour. If it does not do so, this government will sooner or later have to explain why it is trying so hard to trade away the interests of the agricultural producers of Quebec and of Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell Canadians about a sterling record of incompetence of the justice system which released this offender on parole once and on mandatory release three times beginning in 1963:

Six thefts, one B and E, one weapons possession, one attempted robbery, escaped custody, two auto thefts, one possession of dangerous weapon, one assault, one theft and then another escape, one car theft, one possession of dangerous weapon, parole violation, contributing to juvenile delinquency, theft and escape from custody, B and E, theft over $200, mandatory release and mandatory release violation, common assault, mandatory release and mandatory release violation, assault and theft under $200, indecent assault and failure to appear, forcible confinement and two counts of buggery, mandatory release and release violation.

Two counts of sexual assault finally ended this litany of crime.

I wonder if the parole board would consider mandatory supervision one more time for this habitual criminal. Mr. Gibbs promised to clear up boondoggles such as this in the parole board.

We on this side of the House are watching and wish him well.

HERITAGE DAY

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today on Heritage Day we celebrate our unique Canadian culture, values and institutions, our shared identity.

Whether we were born here or came from across the oceans, whether we came earlier or later, together we have built this great nation.

From time to time the tentacles of disunity have threatened the virtue of national cohesion. Today Canadians are proud to live in a country that is number one in the world in quality of life, for we promote accommodation, not assimilation. We are idealistic, not ruggedly individualistic.

We pursue pleasure to enrich our lives, not simply to gain material wealth. We work to sustain peace, order and good government. We reject violence.

Today let us harness the strength of our unique nationhood. Let us preserve one geography, one national soul, and achieve one national dream for our youth of today and their children of tomorrow.

CROATIA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canada, Croatia and Bosnia–Hercegovina parliamentary group is pleased to be hosting a visit by a parliamentary delegation from the Republic of Croatia.

Members of the delegation include Dr. Zarko Domljan, Vice President of the Croatian House of Representatives; Dr. Franjo Greguric, former Prime Minister and member of the House of Representatives; Mr. Ivica Racan, Leader of the Social Democratic Party and member of the House of Representatives.

Over recent years Canadians have learned a great deal about Croatia. Last spring three colleagues from this House visited Croatia to learn about and assess developments there in the economy, administration and politics.

We are glad that Drs. Domljan and Greguric and Mr. Racan could be with us here this week. It is through these exchanges that legislators learn and share the thoughts and ideas which will guide our democracies to the common global goals of peace, security and prosperity.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

The Speaker: Colleagues, perhaps now would be the appropriate time to introduce our three parliamentary brothers from Croatia who are today in our gallery.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the Liberal government is using a smoke screen of words referring to tax increases as making the system fair or having everyone pay their fair share. Canadians denounce this tactic. A classic example from last year's budget is the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption.

The Department of Finance and Revenue Canada are currently disadvantaging thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of senior citizens who depend on OAS and guaranteed income supplements.

Revenue Canada has structured the income tax return in such a way as to disadvantage pensions at the bottom end of the economic scale. Low income Canadians are being frozen out of passing their assets to their heirs and successors in a way that middle and upper income pensioners can.

Once again the Liberal government has fallen on its own politically correct sword. While saying it is going to make everyone pay their fair share it has created gross inequities in the income tax system.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Michel Robert, spokesperson for the Security Intelligence Review Committee, the same Michel Robert who denied the existence of a secret file bearing the name of Preston Manning, said that Grant Bristow did nothing that was reprehensible. However, a recent video contradicts this statement and shows that Mr. Bristow committed acts that are unlawful and unacceptable in a democratic society like ours.

My question is directed to the Solicitor General. Will the Solicitor General finally admit that when he was a CSIS informer, Mr. Bristow acted in a way that was reprehensible and unlawful by engaging in a campaign to promote violence, more specifically against the Canadian Jewish Congress?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, SIRC thoroughly investigated all these matters and prepared a comprehensive report that was tabled in this House, and I think the hon. member should draw the attention of SIRC to any remaining concerns he may have in this respect.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a video exists that was brought to the attention of quite a few people, and it shows that Mr. Bristow was, at the time, making speeches to promote violence and the commission of unlawful acts.

How does the Solicitor General expect the public to trust the Security Intelligence Review Committee when this is the second time the committee's findings have been contradicted? After it was denied that there was a file on Preston Manning, we are now told that Mr. Bristow, and this was shown on the video, committed totally reprehensible acts when he was an informer for CSIS, although we had been given assurances this was not so.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is mistaken. The Security Intelligence Review Committee did not say that there was a file about Preston Manning but rather that the file had been mistakenly entitled Preston Manning while it dealt only with the investigation into possible election financing by another government.

The activities of the source in question were gone into thoroughly. Points were raised by the Security Intelligence Review Committee about the nature of the activities in question and how CSIS should update its methods of control of sources as a result. This has been gone into. I think CSIS has dealt with this matter in a very satisfactory manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, you must admit it does not take much to satisfy the Solicitor General.

Would the Solicitor General agree that the only way to get to the bottom of these allegations concerning Mr. Bristow, a CSIS agent, and his activities within the racist Heritage Front organization is to set up a genuine commission of inquiry to find out what is going on there, since obviously the Security Intelligence Review Committee is not well informed and its investigation techniques are not up to scratch?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the SIRC is like a standing royal commission of inquiry with a mandate to supervise the activities of CSIS on an ongoing basis, and that is what it is doing. However, I wonder why the official opposition house leader would give the Heritage Front this kind of credibility. Why?

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

We are starting to get the picture about the government's intentions with respect to the members' pension plan. The government is supposed to introduce a bill dealing with this issue, this week.

Can the Solicitor General give us the assurance that this will not be a half–baked reform which will introduce one standard for long time members and another for new members?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the government will keep its promises, based on the red book.

• (1420)

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the Solicitor General and government House leader confirm that, once the new system comes into effect, while vested rights are respected, all members, both new and old, will make the same contributions and will accumulate the same benefits?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have an answer as soon as the bill is introduced.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Minister of Finance said his deficit target of 3 per cent of GDP was an interim target and that the ultimate target was to eliminate the deficit. A target without specifics is no target at all; it is just political grandstanding and wishful thinking.

My question is for the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions. In its upcoming budget will the government specify clearly how and when it will reach its ultimate target?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to confirm for the hon. member that we will be presenting a budget showing that we will reach our 3 per cent interim target on our way to the zero deficit target.

Mr. Williams: When?

Mr. Peters: The timing of it is not certain. We will have rolling two–year targets so that we meet those targets. There is no point in going out like members of the previous government and saying that there is going to be a certain deficit in so many years when they have no intention of achieving it.

We are going to meet our targets in rolling two–year periods as the finance minister has said.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we all know about the imminent downgrade of Canadian debt by Moody's. Moody's primary concern is not the deficit for this year or next year. It is mid–term factors. It knows full well that the 3 per cent target will leave the government open and an inevitable downturn in the U.S. economy will cause an escalation once again in the debt–GDP ratio. The minister knows that.

Once again, will the minister tell the House, if he has no idea how the government is going to achieve its ultimate target, how they can assure investors that the deficit–GDP ratio will not again spiral out of control once we have a downturn in the U.S. economy?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has some economics training and knowledge. He should look at the structural pattern.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: There seems to be some disagreement among my colleagues. He should look at the structural pattern in the deficit. We have made some major changes in the structure of the deficit.

Our structural deficit is much lower than it ever was. It is a matter of the changes we made in the last budget and the changes that will be made in this budget which will make that deficit target achievable in the near term.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister who also has some economics knowledge will know that a 3 per cent GDP target at the top of a cycle is a very high structural deficit.

On Friday, once again, the Minister of Finance blamed the previous Conservative government for the problem, saying that it had left a huge accumulated debt. The House will remember that the previous Conservative government used to blame the Liberals before them for the large accumulated debt.

When will the government stop with these excuses, stop saying it suddenly discovered compound interest and abandon the go slow, go nowhere policies that caused millions of Canadians to abandon the Conservatives?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the millions of Canadians that abandoned the Conservatives gave the hon. member an opportunity to run for Parliament.

Let me tell the hon. member that the changes we made in the last budget were the biggest changes in spending cuts that have been made in any budget in a decade. We are going to continue to move on our path to get the deficit down.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The Ottawa Sun reports that three generals intervened directly during the military police inquiry into events in Somalia implicating enlisted personnel and officers of the Airborne Regiment in Petawawa.

Can the defence minister confirm that three generals did intervene directly in the military police inquiry to protest the way the military police had conducted its activities in the case of Lieutenant–Colonel Carol Mathieu, claiming that those conducting the inquiry were going too far?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must know that it would be inappropriate for me to comment upon any matter relating to the investigations surrounding the deployment of the Canadian airborne regiment to Somalia in 1992 and 1993.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time the minister has replied. I think that is indeed pertinent to what I am asking him. I would like him to answer.

Does the minister acknowledge that this totally inappropriate intervention by three generals on behalf of Lieutenant–Colonel Mathieu discredits and seriously calls into question the military police inquiry following which Lieutenant–Colonel Mathieu was acquitted by a court martial?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have repeated the same answer a number of times.

There will be an inquiry headed by a civilian. It will be public. It will answer all questions relating to the deployment to Somalia. The hon. member should wait until that time.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people have said very clearly no tax increases.

At noon today the Canadian Taxpayers' Association presented on the Hill 230,000 petitions against taxes. Our party has received over 15 sacks full of mail strongly advising the finance minister not to increase taxes.

My question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Will he take this anti–tax message to the Minister of Finance? More important, will he vote against any net tax increases in the next budget?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Minister of Finance and other members of the government are listening with great care and attention to the public on many issues related to tax, but I can assure him that we will not be dissuaded from proceeding with our deficit reduction plan outlined, as the Secretary of State for Financial Institutions mentioned a moment ago, in last year's budget.

We will achieve those goals regardless of protests that might occur.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I really expected that answer from the minister. He was quoted in the newspaper about 10 days ago as saying that tax protesters do not make any difference to him or his government anyway.

May I ask the minister: Would he care to join me in the lobby outside following question period where I will be happy to give him 15 sacks full of messages from ordinary citizens? Will he join me in the lobby outside after?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to a statement made in Vancouver. Just for the record, I would like to read it out to him because he obviously does not understand it. I said: "Obviously we will be listening to the public and obviously I have had many meetings with groups of Canadians on tax matters, but Mr. Martin's approach to the budget will not be altered simply by protests here or there. He has objectives he must meet".

Again I repeat to the hon. member that he cannot blow and suck at the same time. Either he is in favour of reducing the expenditures of the government and meeting our deficit targets or he is not. He cannot keep saying that we must give in to every protest that might come along either on one side or the other.

The Speaker: Our expressions are getting a little more colourful as we go along.

EXCISE TAX ON CIGARETTES

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

By lowering taxes on cigarettes last year, the federal government wanted to put an end to smuggling. The Solicitor General promised at the time to set up a complete plan to stop smuggling.

• (1430)

Since the government has decided to raise taxes on cigarettes, are we to understand that the Solicitor General's plan for fighting smuggling has actually led to the dismantling of all of the smuggling networks?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we said a year ago that it would take time to dismantle the smuggling networks. We have had considerable success up to now, and this is why it is now possible to raise taxes on cigarettes to a certain extent.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to believe the minister, but I would remind him of one thing as well. He has not yet submitted a report to this House on the results of the fight against smuggling.

What assurance can the Solicitor General give us that an increase in taxes will not help rebuild the cigarette smuggling networks?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are acting on the advice of the RCMP and other police forces. According to their advice, we can raise taxes as proposed last week in the ways and means motion, in order to increase government revenues without threatening our plan to fight vigorously against all sorts of smuggling.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how quickly viewpoints change when a party becomes the government.

In opposition the Liberal rat pack railed against the Mulroney government patronage perks and pork. Now in government the rat pack has become the fat pack. They fought against changes to their lavish gold plated pension plans and they appear to have won. The Liberal government has backed off reforming the pension plans of the fat pack and any other MP with more than 10 years of service.

My question for the President of the Treasury Board is: Why will he not introduce pension reform that cuts equally across the board?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is not backing off anything. We have made it quite clear that we are going to deal with the matter of pension reform. We are going to live up to our obligations that we made in the election campaign.

The Prime Minister said in this House not more than one week ago that it would be done either before the budget or at the time of the budget and it will be done.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the President of the Treasury Board said the government will acquit itself of its obligation with respect to MPs pensions mighty soon. The only obligations in the red book deal with double dipping and the age of eligibility.

Will the President of the Treasury Board confirm today that real cuts will be made to bring all MPs pensions into line with the private sector and not just the obligatory scrapes mentioned in the red book?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my colleague has finally read the red book and understands the commitments of the government.

This whole matter though will be dealt with mighty soon.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for the bill on gun control which was tabled by the Minister of Justice last week to have its desired effect, it will have to be coupled with more aggressive measures to fight gun smuggling from the United States.

Will the Minister of Justice tell us whether he personally asked the Solicitor General and the revenue minister to have police and customs officers escalate the war on gun smuggling?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the course of the last 10 months I have worked with the Minister of National Revenue and the Solicitor General specifically on that issue.

We have developed not only the legislative proposals that are now embodied in Bill C–68 but we have also forced administrative and policy changes in the way that border controls are enforced. We expect that in the coming months and years as a result of these changes we will have even more effective border control than at present.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Justice guarantee that the measures proposed in his bill will be applied Canada–wide, without exception, including on aboriginal territory?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Of course I can, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister took pains to emphasize this time last year in another context, there is but one law in Canada and it is applied equally throughout.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at a gun control meeting in St. John's East my constituents raised concerns with the Minister of Justice about BB and pellet guns. Children have been seriously injured playing with these guns. The city of St. John's has banned them and the Newfoundland and Labrador Federation of Municipalities has unanimously asked that BB guns and air guns be classified as firearms.

• (1435)

How will the minister address the concerns of my constituents regarding the danger of BB and air guns?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I well remember the meeting in St. John's to which the hon. member referred. I met on that occasion with two mothers whose young children had each lost an eye as a result of the misuse of BB guns or air guns.

As a result of that meeting I examined the manner in which air guns or BB guns are regulated in this country. I discovered that at present some of them are classified as firearms and therefore regulated as other guns are, the distinction being the muzzle velocity of the projectile. If the muzzle velocity is above a certain threshold, then they are regulated in terms of acquisition or possession as others guns are. The question is whether that threshold should be lowered to capture the commonly available BB gun and perhaps save the eyesight of children.

A recent research study at the University of Ottawa demonstrated that BB guns are the leading cause of eye loss among children in Canada which has to be troubling to us all.

May I tell the hon. member in conclusion that I am keenly aware of the problem. We have it under consideration and I will communicate further with the House when we have completed our analysis.

FORMER YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, our peacekeepers in Croatia are soon likely to face the most difficult tactical situation given a soldier: a withdrawal under fire. Yet two weeks ago it was announced that the Canadian forces surgical team is to be withdrawn.

Now national defence headquarters has reportedly again refused our peacekeepers' request for an armoured engineering vehicle to clear mines and to facilitate their withdrawal, should it become necessary.

Will the Minister of National Defence tell this House why our troops, who have been facing mines and gunfire for the last three years and are soon likely to face even greater danger, are being denied facilities and equipment which we have but refused to provide?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of inaccuracies in the article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on Saturday.

The armoured engineer vehicle is not designed as a mine clearance vehicle. The Slovakian group, as part of UNPROFOR, is equipped to take this task on, not just for Canadians but for all other personnel. Should there be a non–permissive withdrawal from Croatia and Bosnia, this will be carried out by NATO. Obviously all of the necessary equipment will be provided by the NATO allies.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if there is one Canadian casualty resulting from this lack of support, I hope the minister will remember that.

Our forces in the former Yugoslavia have made do with outdated, unreliable equipment and have done well despite this handicap. Now, despite the situation becoming much more serious, headquarters' response is negative.

What will the Minister of National Defence do to provide our Canadian peacekeepers with all possible support to help them survive?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the specifics I answered the question, but I do resent very much the threat implied in the hon. member's answer. It is reprehensible. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that you did not rule him out of order. To make that kind of statement in the House of Commons, he should be ashamed of himself.

The Speaker: I am sure, my colleagues, that this very serious matter is the cause of a great deal of emotion on both sides of the House. Again, I would appeal to all of my colleagues to be very judicious both in the questions and in the answers.

PRIVATE DENTAL CARE PLANS

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

The Canadian Dental Association has recently launched a new campaign to nip in the bud any thoughts the federal government had about taxing private dental care plans in Canada. The minister has said many times over the past year that her mission is to make sure that the health care system in Canada remains free.

Does the minister realize that taxing private dental care plans will directly reduce accessibility to health care?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me remind the hon. member that the Canada Health Act sets the criteria regarding medically necessary services. While we know that we have some very difficult fiscal decisions to make, we must make those decisions to ensure that we can offer programs with fairness and compassion, programs which Canadians expect, and frankly, which Canadians deserve.

• (1440)

[Translation]

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister, on the eve of the upcoming federal budget, guarantee that she will keep our health system free and that she will energetically oppose the taxation of private dental care plans?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as Minister of Health, I have said that the Canada Health Act is unquestionably here to stay, and the Prime Minister of Canada has said the same. We will preserve the fundamental principles of the health care system. The promise was made in the red book, which forms the basis of our party's mandate. We will continue to do exactly what we said we would do.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last May immigration officials granted refugee status to a 25 year old Polish man. The man claimed he was discriminated against because he had HIV and the Immigration and Refugee Board granted him refugee status.

Given that this individual will pose a drain on Canada's health care system and a potential threat to the health of Canadians and that this individual was allowed into the country in direct contravention of section 19 of the Immigration Act, will the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reverse this decision by the IRB and deport this person immediately?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the member is confusing the refugee stream and the immigration stream.

The issue here is not a claim based on whether an individual is or is not HIV positive. The claim made was on the basis of being a member of a social group, in this case sexual orientation, and that there was a well founded fear of persecution.

Three years ago the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that sexual orientation constitutes a social group. The Geneva convention allows for claims to be made based on social group persecution. There have only been two cases in the system. One was refused. There is this case raised by the hon. member which was initially refused by the IRB and appealed to the Federal Court. The Federal Court of Canada ordered the IRB to rehear it.

It is not a question of being HIV positive. Each individual case must lay before the board a well–founded fear in terms of a social group persecution.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, after being granted refugee status, this HIV infected individual claimed on national radio that he came to Canada specifically to take advantage of our overburdened health care system. Meanwhile, thousands of Canadians are waiting in line to use the system they have been paying into for years.

As much as the IRB has accepted another outlandish refugee claim setting a precedent that can be abused by bogus refugees around the world, will the minister now take the advice of the Reform Party? Will he disband the IRB and put refugee determination in the hands of competent immigration officials using established admission guidelines?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this case does not set a precedent. That is why the hon. member does not understand how the Immigration and Refugee Board operates. It operates independently of the government. Also, cases are considered on their own individual merits.

I mentioned to the member that there have only been two cases in the system. One was refused because it could not demonstrate a well founded fear of being persecuted.

Also, the immigration stream does have the ability to screen for health care costs as well as danger to the public. In most cases where people are found to be HIV positive, they are denied entry into Canada.

ENDANGERED SPECIES

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Around the world, 48,000 wildlife species and subspecies are in danger of extinction. The illegal trade in endangered wildlife species jeopardizes global biodiversity.

• (1445)

Could the minister tell the House what the government is doing both in Canada and also internationally to curb the illegal trade in endangered wildlife species?

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada is approaching the Convention in International Trade in Endangered Species in three ways.

First, in training, we are conducting workshops presently in western Canada addressed to the RCMP, addressed to the customs officers, Agriculture Canada and also provincial natural resource officers to let them know about the convention, what it covers, what Canada's commitments are, identifying the endangered species which, as my colleague stated, are 48,000 in number.

Second, we are conducting an information campaign geared to travellers to advise them about endangered species so that they will make proper purchases. If there is no market for endangered species, then there is no business for poachers and traffickers in endangered species.

Finally, in the spring—

FISHERIES

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

In 1994, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans committed $1.9 billion to the Atlantic groundfish strategy. The minister claimed at the time that this amount would be sufficient to restructure the Atlantic fishing industry within five years. Today, with 80 per cent more benefits than forecast, we see that the strategy did not achieve its goals and that the funds may be depleted by 1996.

Does the minister admit that his strategy is a failure and that the funds committed will be depleted well before the deadline?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member is making a case on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois that the fishermen of Quebec be completely cut off any income assistance from the national government.

I know that there is a profound attempt by the Bloc Quebecois to sever Canadians living in Quebec from the benefits of Canada but this surely is a ridiculous proposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister realize that the way things are going, the funds aimed at restructuring the industry will be completely depleted when the time comes to shift responsibilities to the provinces, as they are requesting?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the groundfish assistance program available for the fishermen of Atlantic Canada is under some financial stress because more fishermen and more plant workers than originally anticipated have had to request assistance.

One of the reasons that there are more fishermen and more plant workers is that from an ecological point of view, more fisheries have had to be closed as recently as a few months ago.

The red fishery, which is important to the Magdalen Islands had to be closed, necessitating more assistance being paid out to additional plant workers and fishermen.

We are looking for ways of streamlining the program. For example we could reduce training programs for older workers who really will not make use of them in order to get the program back within budget. It is a program that is supported by the fishermen and by the plant workers of Atlantic Canada, including those in Quebec.

Frankly the Bloc Quebecois should be celebrating this virtue of federation, that those who have share with those who do not in times of need. That is the strength of the unity of Canada.

CRTC

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The CRTC has kicked the American Country Music Television network off Canadian airwaves. Canadian country artists used to be seen in over 32 million homes around the world but in retaliation for this decision, CMT now refuses to play Canadian artists' videos, reducing air play to two million homes.

Promoting Canadian culture by closing our borders is like stoking a fire with a wet blanket. Canadian artists themselves denounce this decision.

• (1450)

Instead of smothering Canadian culture, how does the minister expect to promote Canadian cultural exports and allow for more consumer choice?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy is to promote in every way it can the growth and expansion of Canadian culture.

One part of that policy is to ensure that while meeting our international trade obligations, we are able to give Canadians a choice of programs on television and radio, a spectrum of choice that includes not only imported material but Canadian produced goods as well.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, despite those fine words the government is moving toward a policy of protectionism in the cultural industry.

Cultural industries will be at the top of the American president's agenda when he visits this week. By closing our borders, the government has started a potential trade war with the United States. What form this retaliation will take will be announced by Mickey Kantor on March 6.

When the government meets with Mr. Clinton, will it announce what areas of Canadian trade it is willing to sacrifice to keep up this charade of cultural preservation?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are unwilling to sacrifice any area of Canadian trade. The member raises a question that will indeed be touched upon in my meetings with Mr. Kantor. On that occasion we shall continue to assure him, as we have done in the past, that the Canadian measures to promote Canadian culture are entirely consistent with our international trade obligations.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Canadians want government to take the tough decisions to meet our deficit targets. Many wonder if the deficit could also be reduced simply by collecting the taxes that are now outstanding.

What is the minister doing to ensure the government is collecting the taxes it is owed?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question which allows me to state that we collect the vast majority of accounts receivable with interest.

Of course there will always be some area of bad debts. Last year it was less than one–half of 1 per cent of gross revenue. This year, we are budgeting slightly more than that, but still well below 1 per cent.

It is very important to note that we collect the accounts receivable. They are taken into account by the Minister of Finance in his budgetary projections. There is no pot of money out there not being collected which could be used to reduce the deficit. All the moneys in accounts receivable have been taken into account.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions.

Regarding the rather lopsided debate in identifying the actual cause of the accumulated debt, would the minister confirm that today we are spending about the same proportion of our GDP on social programs that we were spending throughout the mid–1970s?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member has checked the numbers or he would not have asked the question.

I do not have the numbers with me now so I am not able to confirm them. I am sure the hon. member will, in his supplementary question, give me the right answer.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to do that. This is now turning into answer period. The minister would know if he had done his homework that the spending—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I am sure the hon. member has a question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I had a question. I will put it this way.

While the minister knows that spending on social programs is about the same proportion today as it was in the seventies, would he confirm that the reason our accumulated debt has grown since 1984 has been almost exclusively the result of the high interest rate policy of the previous government, continued by this government apparently, and the myriad of tax loopholes particularly for corporations and the wealthy?

• (1455)

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that I spoke out in the early 1990s about the high levels of interest rates and about the policies of the previous government. This government has changed those policies and we are moving not only to cure our deficit but to improve our social programs as well.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in his questions and answers booklet on the Canadian firearms registration system, the Minister of Justice tells Canadians that his new registration system will help eliminate smuggling and stolen firearms as sources of supply.

Just last Thursday the minister stated publicly that the new gun control legislation will do little to prevent smuggling. Could the minister please explain which statement is true?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the proposals we put before the house will help a great deal in reducing the smuggling of firearms. We have been through this before. Hansard is replete with detailed responses to questions that are asked daily in the House by the same members.

Let me come to the specific question the member puts. I believe, and the government believes, that its proposals will help enormously. Last week it was put to me by a provincial counterpart, the Solicitor General of Ontario, that there is much more we can do. I agreed with him. Indeed there is much more we can do and should do. With the collaboration of the provincial solicitors general, I believe we can and will do more.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this minister has had 16 months to deal with gun smuggling. He has done nothing but table a plan to register the guns of law-abiding Canadians. Registration has not proven effective for crime deterrence in any other democracy in the world.

Why does the minister not take the $85 million he has committed to gun registration and instead target it toward directly defending our borders against gun smuggling?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in large part, the registration system we propose is targeted at the borders to reduce smuggling, and we are very confident that it will have that result.

AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food.

Just days away from budget day, the federal minister of agriculture talks about reviewing all agricultural subsidies, and those for grain transportation in particular. He plans to replace existing rail carrier subsidies with direct assistance to Western grain producers.

Will the agriculture minister confirm his government's intention to stop paying rail carriers subsidies and start subsidizing Western grain producers directly instead? And if so, can he undertake before this House to—

The Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could ask one question and maybe another short one, but three is a bit much.

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the subject of western grain transportation reform has been debated for probably the better part of the last 25 years.

We intend to proceed with various aspects of that reform. Indeed some measures are already before the House in the form of proposed legislation.

Over the course of the last number of months both the Minister of Transport and I have been engaged in intensive discussions with farmers, farm organizations and other stakeholders in the industry involving all aspects of Canadian grain handling and transportation from one end of the country to the other. At the time of the budget or shortly thereafter there should be an opportunity to describe the details.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the agriculture minister give us at this time the assurance that all farm producers in Canada will be treated equally and that the measures he will be putting forth will not allow Western producers to use federal subsidies to compete with Eastern producers?

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, equity, fairness and balance are established as hallmarks of this government and will continue to be.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table today, in both official languages, a number of order in council appointments made recently by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110((1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–304, an act to amend the Criminal Code (prostitution).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague from Crowfoot for seconding my introduction of first reading of the bill. It is my pleasure to introduce the bill to this House.

The bill will increase the penalty for persons who engage in the public act to buy or sell sexual services from a summary conviction to an indictable offence. It would make the penalty of section 213 of the Criminal Code, which is public communication to obtain sexual services, parallel to that of section 212 just before it in the Criminal Code, which is procuring.

A summary conviction has a maximum sentence of only six months. While this may be appropriate for some crimes in Canada, it is most certainly not appropriate for the acts of the public prostitution trade. With the increase to an indictable offence it will allow the courts to give a sentence for the maximum penalty of up to ten years and provide the range of flexibility that is needed. By such designation it changes the category of seriousness and affects the allocation of police resources. It places more flexible tools into the hands of the police, who instead of writing a curb–side ticket may now arrest, if necessary.

Canadians are frustrated with the street trade of prostitution. They are upset that along with this comes widespread criminal drug use. I note that many Canadians want stiffer penalties for this behaviour and that is exactly what my bill attends to do.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–305, an act to amend the Criminal Code (voluntary intoxication).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to introduce a second bill. Again my hon. colleague from Crowfoot is seconding the introduction of the first reading of this bill.

This bill will create a separate punishment for those who willingly become intoxicated through alcohol and drugs and who during this self–induced intoxication commit a prohibited act.

The bill clearly defines what is meant by a prohibited act and I believe that all Canadians would concur with this.

The recent Supreme Court ruling is what began the outcry. It is interesting to note that it was a suggestion of the Supreme Court that we as members of Parliament make the necessary changes to an apparent flaw in the system.

In his minority report Mr. Justice John Sopinka stated:

> It has been suggested that Parliament should create a new offence of dangerous intoxication. Such changes are for Parliament and not for this Court to make.

I therefore encourage all parliamentarians in this House to support legislation that would put an end to further inconsistencies within the Canadian Criminal Code.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

PETITIONS

JUSTICE

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise before this House on day 11 to present petition No. 11. These petitions are being presented on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson. April 11, 1995 is the date set for the parole hearing.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murders.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, on behalf of over 3,000 constituents of Saanich—Gulf Islands and surrounding area.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation to revise the Young Offenders Act as follows: when a youth 14 years of age and above commits any crime of violence, including but not limited to murder, manslaughter, aggravated and sexual assault and armed robbery, he or she will automatically be tried in adult court with criminal records and adult sentences, taking into consideration the maturity of the offender; and public identification of a convicted young dangerous offender.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it my pleasure to introduce two different petitions into the House today.

The first one draws to the attention of the House that although the proposed anti–firearms legislation, as these people call it, will do virtually nothing to reduce violent crime it will, however, severely restrict the rights and freedoms of millions of innocent firearm owners contrary to the very principles of justice upon which this country was founded.

They ask and pray that the government refuse the anti–firearm proposals of the Minister of Justice and insist that he bring forth legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

I think that is a good emphasis.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from people in and around my riding. They ask Parliament not to amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

It is a pleasure to introduce this on behalf of my constituents.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 1,000 of the undersigned residents of Canada draw to the attention of the House that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is Canada's national public broadcasting service and an agent of Her Majesty; that the CBC is funded by the federal government with taxpayers' dollars; that the CBC plays a significant role in meeting the statutory objective set out for the broadcasting system of safeguarding, enriching and strengthening the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada; that the CBC has applied to televise the proceedings of the Paul Bernardo trial and that this application does not support the role of the CBC and does nothing to safeguard, enrich or strengthen the fabric of Canada.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to condemn the actions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to request that accordance with its responsibilities as the national broadcaster, the CBC withdraw its application to televise the Paul Bernardo trial.

CRTC

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by over 400 residents of the County of Peterborough, many of whom I know personally.

They point out that the Canadian Radio–Television and Telecommunications Commission, the CRTC, has allowed Bell Canada to increase local area calling rates by $2 per month for each of 1995, 1996 and 1997, which represents an increase of approximately 50 per cent over three years. They point out that the proposed increases far exceed the cost of living index and that the proposed savings in long distance rates will be of little benefit to the majority of senior citizens receiving the guaranteed income supplement and other low income individuals.

• (1510)

Therefore, these petitioners request that Parliament urge the CRTC to require Bell Canada to file a plan that will address the issues of accessibility to local telephone service and the affordability of local calling rates for senior citizens who are receiving the guaranteed income supplement as well as other low income individuals in our community.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two different petitions.

The first one is from very concerned citizens who would like to see a review and revision of our laws concerning young offenders by empowering the courts to prosecute and punish young offenders who are terrorizing society by releasing their names and lowering the age limit to allow persecution to meet the severity of the crime.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is from a group of concerned citizens who call upon Parliament and petition Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I have three petitions. In the first one the petitioners request that Parliament continue to reject euthanasia and physician assisted suicide in Canada and that section 241 of the Criminal Code which forbids counselling, procuring, aiding and abetting of a person to commit suicide be enforced vigorously.

In the second petition the petitioners request that Parliament ensure that the provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that there be no changes to the law to sanction euthanasia in any manner.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my third petition is a petition indicating that the petitioners believe that gay men, lesbians and bisexuals are subject to discrimination in this country and that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees that everyone has a right to protection against discrimination.

They request that Parliament amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present four petitions today. The third and fourth petitions aim to draw Parliament's attention to the consequence of legalizing euthanasia.

The petitioners request that Parliament continue to reject euthanasia and physician assisted suicide in Canada.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the 400 petitioners of the first and second petition are requesting that Parliament not attack the recreational firearms community.

They support legislation that severely punishes one who uses a weapon including a weapon other than a firearm, protects the rights and freedoms of the law–abiding recreational firearms community to own and use firearm responsibly, passes careful scrutiny to see that it will improve public safety in a cost effective manner, and repeals present firearms control legislation that features tortuous language and has been characterized by the courts as one of the most horrifying examples of ad draftsmanship.

I am pleased to submit these petitions. I support them.

MINING

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents from mining communities in British Columbia who are calling on Parliament to take action that will see an increase in employment in the mining sector, promote mining exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, in another petition the petitioners simply ask that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order pursuant to Standing Order 39, I placed a question on the Order Paper on September 30, 1994. That was 143 days ago.

As the question required a detailed response, I did not request that the answer be provided within 45 days as the Standing Orders allow.

I am seeking information on grants from the Canada Council. The government has failed to provide the information requested and the Canada Council is already exempt from access to information requests. Now it appears to be exempting itself from usual parliamentary procedures and the expectations of this member of Parliament.

• (1515)

In these times of government restraint taxpayers are demanding that government funds be used responsibly so it is my role to ask questions to ensure that this happens. However someone has chosen not to answer the question. Why is this information being hidden from Canadians?

One hundred and forty–three days is an unacceptable length of time to respond to my question which I shall pose again:

> For 1992 and 1993, what was the total amount of funds received by individuals and groups from the Canada Council, who were these individuals, for what specific projects did they receive funding and how much did they receive?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising the point. I hope I will be in a position to furnish the House with an answer to her question later this week.

I note that the reply will be lengthy because the Canada Council hands out a great number of grants to numerous individuals and bodies across Canada. The first reply was received. Certain information that the member requested was missing from the answer and it was sent back so that it would be made complete. I expect to be in possession of the complete answer later this week.

If the hon. member is so concerned about saving taxpayers' dollars I have no doubt she would have gone to the Library of Parliament and looked up the annual reports of the Canada Council wherein all its grants are listed. She could have obtained the answer there instead of putting a question on the Order Paper which will cost many thousands of extra dollars to provide to the House in the copies and in the form that she wishes to have it.

Having given that response, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth time I rise in the House to point out to the government that I have had a question on the Order Paper since October 19. This is more than 120 days ago, although normally, it takes 45 days to get a reply. It has now been four months, and I have yet to get an answer to my question, unlike the hon. member for Calgary Southeast.

The Minister of Public Works is doing everything in his power to prevent us from having access to the information I requested. I wonder whether the government is trying to keep members from having access to the information they need. I ask the Speaker to urge the government to observe the rules of this House. In my opinion, this shows utter contempt for the Standing Orders of this House. Could I have a commitment from the hon. member, a specific date on which I will get the information I requested four months ago?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same answer the hon. member was given Friday. This government does not vary its answers. The answer is always the same. We will have a reply very shortly, and when I receive it, I will table it here in the House.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

The Deputy Speaker: Before question period I understand the Chair undertook that the member for South Shore would have time to reply to the question or comment of the hon. member for Wild Rose.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe when we broke there were approximately two minutes left so I will keep my answer short.

It will come as no surprise that I disagree almost completely with the premise of the member for Wild Rose. We ignore the sociological factors at our peril.

I would be more apt to accept the views of Dr. Alan Leschied over those of the hon. member. The hon. member will perhaps remember that Dr. Leschied was at the committee hearing. I believe the hon. member was in attendance when he addressed the factors that had to be considered. If we read the transcript which is quite lengthy it would set out the views that I expressed earlier in my representations.

The Deputy Speaker: There is approximately one minute left. If the member for Wild Rose wishes to use 30 seconds of it he has 30 seconds.

• (1520)

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure the House understands that I agree we need to address those things but it should not be through the justice department. I am trying to differentiate between the two.

I also asked the member about 16 and 17 year olds and about how it is making a difference when I see it making no difference whatsoever. I would like him to respond to that part.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, the new provisions for 16 and 17 year olds are not yet law. They are simply before the House in the bill. I would ask the member to give them a chance. I think he will see that they will make a difference.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Young Offenders Act, amendments to which we are discussing today, reaches deep into the fabric of our society. When we decide to amend this act, we must try to better express the ideals, values and objectives of our society for the young people who have committed crimes.

We must remember that the very existence of a young offenders act is an expression of Canadian society's desire to offer young people an alternative to the Criminal Code, which applies to adults. Our society is aiming not only at stopping and penalizing the criminal behaviour of young people, but also at giving them training to help them learn and adjust. For this reason, responsibility for administering the Young Offenders Act does not rest with the judicial system alone, but also with the social services set up by the various provinces.

In Quebec, organized services for young people in trouble and young offenders date back to the establishment of the first industrial and reform schools in the second half of the 19th century, that is, even before the federal Parliament adopted the first juvenile delinquents act in 1908.

More than 8,000 social workers from various professions currently work in youth centres in Quebec. They are involved annually with 85,000 young people and their families, including nearly 22,000 young persons who are referred to them under the Young Offenders Act. These experts represent an extraordinary resource we would be wrong to forgo.

We are in the curious situation in the House today of discussing a bill to amend the Young Offenders Act in third reading, when almost all those making representations before the House Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs had asked that the adoption of these amendments be delayed.

These people all asked the Minister of Justice to move immediately on to the second phase of his plan of action—an in–depth evaluation of the present act and its application—before making such substantial amendments to the act.

Based on this evaluation, the amendments proposed by the justice minister could be reviewed and all members could vote with the full conviction that they are giving the parties involved in fighting youth crime the legal tool to do so, while at the same time promoting deterrence and rehabilitation.

Why is the justice minister refusing to take this logical step? Can the minister convince us that the amendments he has proposed must definitely be passed without delay?

In preparing my statement, I was struck by the fact that none of the stakeholders I met would feel any better equipped to fight youth crime if the amendments proposed by the minister were passed. On the contrary, they are convinced that their job would be even more difficult, both in respect of the public and the young persons themselves.

For instance, increasing sentences for serious offences may create a false sense of security among the public, although past experience gives us no reason to expect that such a measure would have a positive effect, either on the level of crime or on recidivism among young persons.

• (1525)

Moreover, by basically limiting detention orders to offences involving serious assault with bodily harm, the act would deprive the judicial system and social workers of an instrument sometimes necessary to the rehabilitation of certain young persons for whom recidivism, schooling, family and personal situation and other circumstances must be taken into account. In short, a prison sentence may be appropriate in certain cases even if the offences in question did not entail serious personal harm.

In other words, we can assert on the basis of present findings that passing this act would not provide any greater measure of social protection and that the quality of supervision for certain young persons would suffer. The question which naturally comes to mind is the following: Why is the Minister of Justice bent on pushing through so quickly an act that all those concerned doubt will be effective?

Many people think the answer to it is that the Minister of Justice has given in to a small but very vocal group that favours lex talionis, "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth". This group is reacting to the small glimpse they have gotten of juvenile delinquency and to the knowledge they have gleaned from the media of certain extreme but very rare manifestations of that criminality, such as crimes against persons. Left to its own devices and fanned by radio talk–show hosts, this fraction of public opinion is demanding that draconian measures be taken against juvenile delinquency.

By giving in to such pressure, the Minister of Justice shows that he pays more attention to what radio talk–show hosts say than to those working in the sector. Has he forgotten that his primary mission is to propose effective laws to Canadians that enforce our ideals of justice?

We are very disappointed that the Minister of Justice has abdicated his primary responsibility by proposing repressive and ineffective amendments inspired by ultraconservative opinions on social policy first propagated by the Reform Party, then apparently adopted by the Liberal party as their own.

The Bloc Quebecois believes that we can and must channel the legitimate concerns of the population towards a better understanding of juvenile delinquency and towards a willingness to apply adequate preventative and deterrent measures, as well as effective rehabilitation measures for young offenders.

The minister promises that he will take that approach later, while forcing us to adopt amendments which go against the spirit of the very approach he proposes. The members of this House must understand that the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice reflect a policy and values that are fundamentally different from those underlying the act itself.

By increasingly linking sentencing to the seriousness of the offences committed as the sole factor, these amendments thwart the search for measures consistent with both the seriousness of the offences and the needs of the young offenders. This search is the very basis for the existence of a Young Offenders Act distinct from the Criminal Code.

How can they ask us to renounce today the underlying principles of a law that is supposed to undergo a thorough review in the coming months?

We are well aware of the inconsistency in the approach proposed by the Minister of Justice and will vote against these amendments. We know, however, that the bill is at the third reading stage and that, unless it is withdrawn by the Minister of Justice, it will be passed by the government majority, probably with the support of Reform members.

Therefore, I ask the Minister of Justice straight out to reconsider his position and initiate his proposed review of the Young Offenders Act now before this bill is passed.

• (1530)

I am confident that such a decision would be widely supported across Canada, and it would be the only acceptable option from Quebec's point of view. In Quebec, this bill was opposed not only by those who work with young offenders but by the Quebec government, which expressed its opposition very clearly through its Minister of Justice, its Minister of Health and Social Services, and its Minister of Public Security.

As early as June 14, 1994, Roger Lefebvre, as the then Minister of Justice and on behalf of his colleagues, the Minister of Health and Social Services and the Minister of Public Security, told his federal counterpart about his deep concerns regarding Bill C–37. Quebec's position, together with a detailed analysis of the bill, was relayed to the federal deputy minister as early as September 12 and tabled before the House of Commons justice committee.

Let me read the main conclusions of this analysis: Bill C–37 does not resolve the problem adequately; Bill C–37 is unfounded; Bill C–37 is full of inconsistencies and ambiguity; Bill C–37 has undesirable and unjustified effects in terms of service organization and principles as well as in clinical and financial terms.

Quebec's position on this bill could hardly be clearer and more devastating. I want to emphasize the fact that this position was developed by members of the previous Cabinet in Quebec, a Liberal Cabinet, and that it was fully endorsed by the present Party Quebecois government. Therefore, there is no doubt that this position reflects a very large consensus in Quebec society.

The federal justice minister must understand that, should the amendments contained in this bill be passed, the justice, health and social services departments as well as those primarily responsible for their enforcement in Quebec would then be forced to put into application amendments to the Young Offenders Act that they unanimously denounced and against which the vast majority of members from Quebec would have voted.

This brings to light a serious situation where the Canadian majority would impose upon the people of Quebec values and directions to which they object.

This situation appears all the more unacceptable that most witnesses from the rest of Canada and even federal justice analysts agree that Quebec is in fact a model in combatting youth crime and rehabilitating young offenders.

While the youth crime rate in Quebec compares favourably to the rate in the other provinces, the number of cases transferred is much lower than it is in the other provinces. There are only 9.4 per cent of referrals in Quebec, with 25.4 per cent of the youth population between the ages of 12 and 17.

This is due to a large extent to the enforcement measures put in place in Quebec and a more extensive use of the alternative measures program. In addition, the emphasis put on the Youth Protection Act and its enforcement in Quebec makes it possible to deal with difficult family circumstances without resorting to the Youth Offenders Act. In short, Quebec has developed an integrated and efficient approach and the other provinces should follow suit.

How are we to explain to our fellow Quebec citizens that, if this bill is passed, we will have to abide by the wishes of the federal Parliament even though these amendments were rejected unanimously by the Quebec departments and officials in charge of enforcing them?

• (1535)

Of course we will have to mention the constitution, although the hon. member for Shawinigan and Prime Minister of Canada does not like it when we bring this up. Well, according to the Canadian constitution, the Young Offenders Act is a federal matter, although its implementation is up to the provincial governments.

Quebec will have to submit to the will of Parliament in this respect, until we change the constitution or decide to draft our own constitution, as a sovereign country.

Some members or observers may think I am just using this debate to promote the sovereignist option by stressing the differences between Quebec and the federal government. That is certainly not the case, since I have asked the Minister of Justice to delay the passage of this bill and to proceed with a review that would be beneficial to all the provinces of Canada.

If the Minister of Justice says no, I will have to conclude that we are faced with two different philosophies regarding youth crime and that the rest of Canada, by using the powers conferred by the constitution on the federal Parliament, is forcing on Quebec an approach that it cannot accept. I think that young people in Quebec who are in trouble deserve a more satisfactory response than the one proposed by the Minister of Justice, which draws its inspiration from the repressive and ultraconservative policies that come to us from Western Canada.

In any case, the Bloc Quebecois will do everything in its power to stop these policies at the Quebec border. First, by voting against this bill, and then by maintaining our support for sovereign status for Quebec, which would give it exclusive legislative powers.

[English]

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know that Quebec has a different approach to young offenders and it works quite well. I wonder if there is not enough leeway in the bill for judges to make a decision that would accommodate Quebec's option.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the government of Quebec submitted an analysis, which I could give my colleague. It was tabled with the House justice committee. Very clearly, it says first that this bill is not justified. Reasons are given for increasing sentences. Sentences were just increased in 1992, when Kim Campbell was the Minister of Justice. In 1992, she increased sentences for young offenders.

We have yet to see the results. Now we are giving in again. We are trying to be like the people of California, or just about. Their biggest budget items are prisons and the police. We want health and education to be the biggest items here, not prisons and the police.

In the bill, sentences are being increased. What is more serious in this bill from the standpoint of young people? One very important point is that, from now on, detention will be almost impossible for young people who have not committed serious crimes against individuals.

For example, young people involved in car theft networks or even in drug or cigarette trafficking, who have not been caught committing crimes against individuals, but who need to be withdrawn from their surroundings, must be detained for rehabilitation. The bill will restrict the ability of those in these situations who must intervene and remove young people from their surroundings so that they do not become hardened criminals.

On the one hand, unfortunately, sentences are being increased, while on the other, offences for which such sentences can be imposed are being restricted. Basically, however, if the system is adequate—which is unfortunately not the case in all provinces—being in custody allows for the young person to be extricated from criminal surroundings and rehabilitated before it is too late. The other aspect which seems absurd to us is that a 16 or 17–year old will have to prove that he should be heard in youth court.

First of all, I would like to point out a misconception which I hear on a regular basis from members of the Reform Party. In certain cases, young persons might clearly fare better before an adult court than under the Young Offenders Act because the Young Offenders Act also provides for extended sentences in certain cases to allow for rehabilitation and, very often, such young persons are removed from a series of measures instituted to help them, but also to supervise them.

I listened to what was said and at times I found it quite astonishing. Putting young persons into custody under the present system is no picnic for them, but it provides for good supervision and gives them a chance to make a fresh start for themselves. The bill refers to rehabilitation; the preamble has been changed. Nothing in the amendments provides for improved rehabilitation. Changing the preamble and including all the measures which appeal to the Reform Party will not improve the act.

In Quebec, we are systematically opposed to it. All institutions, departments concerned and interested parties know that it is taking us in the wrong direction.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C–37, which amends the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, I am taken back to earlier stages in my professional career as a sometime crown prosecutor and a defence lawyer. At a later stage I specialized in the teaching of Soviet law and the aspects of Soviet criminal law. I speak now of non–political crimes where that country had moved in the sentencing phase into much more of a sociological approach than a conventional criminological approach.

The bill is interesting because it comes at a time of historical transition in our society and in the world community as a whole, with the social tensions that are always present in a period of very rapid change which outstrip the ability of the social processes to accommodate to the changes.

As one who has to deal a lot with statistics, I have reservations, but it is a fact that the statistics show no substantial increase in the numbers of crimes being perpetrated in our society. It is also a fact, I think beyond doubt, that the intensity of the crimes and the violence of them are greatly augmented. This is what explains the public demand, it is certainly reflected in one of the opposition parties, for a toughening up of the criminal law, if one can use those terms.

The criminal law, not less than any other branch of public law, represents an attempt to balance the larger public interests against individual interests. Sometimes the metaphor of the pendulum has been used, but the pendulum which has swung much more in the immediate past years in favour of the rights of accused persons has swung, in the last several years certainly, much more strongly in favour of the protection of societal interests. We all reflect that.

It is reflected in the petitions presented in this House today. I note with interest that members of several different parties present petitions on this general question. All of us as members of Parliament receive letters from our constituents.

One of the very sad things in all this is that since Jeremy Bentham first formulated his plans on penal reform, on curing of the offenders, one has the terrible feeling that not as much progress has been made in that as a scientific discipline as should have been made. Therefore we come back to the issue with this bill: How has the balance been struck by the minister in approaching the demands for amendment of the existing Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code? How has he responded to the conflicting social interests?

Listening to the debate, one was struck by the difference in the attitude of the two opposition parties. The official opposition, and I take the criticisms of the hon. member for Rosemont as reflecting this, felt that the measure was too severe, that it did not adequately reflect the social interests in protecting young offenders. With the other opposition party, I think the criticism was made that it did not go far enough.

If the minister manages to build in both those criticisms of his work, it may strike many that maybe he has found the middle way. Let us have a look and see exactly what has been done.

There is the increase in the maximum sentences for teenagers to ten years for first degree murder or a maximum of seven years in the case of second degree murder. This reflects quite clearly the public concern that young offenders can commit murder and walk away from them.

I thought that the hon. member for Rosemont suggested that this was a simplistic approach and it did not take enough account of the element of recidivism which he feels is still severe in relation to young offenders who have been imprisoned. Perhaps we can take a look at that a little later when we examine other parts of the proposed bill.

The second part of the bill is significant and concerns young offenders, 16 or 17 year olds, charged with serious personal injury offences which are defined in the revised act as murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, aggravated sexual assault, and aggravated assault. These persons will be tried in adult court unless they can show a judge that public protection and rehabilitation can be achieved through the youth court. It changes the burden of carriage of the suit significantly from the preceding act which it now proposes to amend.

The bill does reflect the public interest in the public right to know the facts of offences. Parameters must be established in this regard.

In this House in recent days we have heard a certain cry of anguish from many members about what many feel are indecent attempts of some public media to open the books on recent sex offences and murders involving young people. Members know the cases without my citing the names.

The public interest, the public right to know demands increasingly that the courts be opened up. This process is reflected architecturally in the grand design of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, Arthur Erickson's design, which is literally intended to allow people to walk in from the streets and through the courts.

Courts used to be shut up. When I was a young lawyer, they were closed. It was very hard to find your way and was panelled in dark wood. The court officials seemed to do their best to keep people out. Therefore this particular aspect is certainly there. In so far as court proceedings are a part of the general public educational process in criminal law, I think this is a step forward without any apparent disadvantages to it.

• (1550)

The time that 16 and 17 year old young offenders convicted of murder in adult court must serve before they can be considered for parole is extended. This is a reaction generally to a public feeling that the parole system today is not functioning as it should. It is being addressed in a more general way by other sections of the justice ministry.

Suffice it to say, for the most serious offence of all, the extension of the time to be served in the case of young offenders responds to very clear public interest. This was expressed to all members of Parliament through petition and through direct correspondence to us.

The provision for information sharing among professional people, school officials, police, and certain public groups when public safety is at risk has been criticized by some as exposing young people to public obloquy. It has been criticized by one of the opposition parties in this debate as not going far enough. There are two things to remember.

We have moved a long way from the 18th century notion that people were exposed in the docks, in the public stocks in the village square, and made to wear a letter on their chest if they were convicted of certain offences. It reflects a reaction to this but it also recognizes awareness of the relevance of the charter of rights. The charter of rights, as interpreted in the jurisprudence in our courts, is very strict in its definition of the limits of the public right to know and the protection of the privacy of individuals.

In this particular sense, it seems to me the minister has gone as far as he sensibly can go. He is a law reformer who wants his law to prevail. He does not want it to be challenged endlessly before the courts and perhaps thrown out on the basis of the rational interpretation of the court jurisprudence that all of us as professionals in the field know how to make.

Similarly, with the provisions for rehabilitation and treatment of young offenders, I was struck by the comments of the member for Rosemont, the official opposition. I think we are all ready and willing to learn from the experience of other countries and certainly from provinces within our federal system. I was struck by the thoughtful question posed by a member of my own party to the member for Rosemont.

This exchange of information is important. As far as the federal law is concerned, it represents a significant advance on provisions as they now exist.

One very interesting area is the provision the minister makes for the private law responsibility of offenders, here specifically young offenders, where property crimes or less serious offences are what is involved. The concept seems to be the restorative one that the criminal offender, the delinquent, should not merely purge an offence in terms of suffering punishment but should also assume the burden of correcting the social situation that he or she has so rudely disturbed.

If young people wantonly destroy property, we can take the Singapore approach and you can cane them in well publicized ways. Or we can ask the young people to repair the property as part of their sentence. We can ask them to accept the responsibility for what they have done which I think is an excellent approach. I hope it will be extended more widely within our criminal law.

• (1555)

Contrary to public impression and also public impression of some public officials, the way always exists under our law for private law actions to compel just that, the restoration of the situation to as it existed before. Actions are quite common in continental European law against the parents of young offenders or against the young offenders themselves for that matter, for whom their parents would stand in responsibility.

In any case, this is innovative. It shows the attempt the minister is making to produce a coherent law that balances the old with the new social imperatives in a period of rapid change. In making compromises, it strikes a balance that takes us beyond the social problem as it has been thought to exist.

On this basis this is a valuable step forward. We have to be especially careful when dealing with young offenders in facing the reality that long incarceration with young people encourages recidivism and may be the least effective social control of all.

Nevertheless the minister, in relation to the supreme offences, first and second degree murder, has taken the step of increasing the punishment. In other areas he has recognized the public wish to be involved but within the limitation that we will not encourage prurience by publishing televised tapes that people recorded of their victims. We will go so far as to say the public has a right to know.

We will bring in the social services people to encourage rehabilitation of young people. We will accept the notion that in the protection of the public responsible public officials in schools and elsewhere need to be given information. However that information must be done in conformity with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as interpreted by the courts and as predictably applying in cases such as the present.

On this basis, I am happy to commend Bill C–37 for adoption by this House.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a hard time understanding this. A 17–year–old murders an individual, such as the mother in Edmonton. Someone else, who happens to be one year older, does the same thing. For him it is an automatic life sentence for first degree murder because he is one year older.

Why should there be a difference between a 17–year–old and an 18–year–old? Why should a 17–year–old who performs that kind of act receive three years, which is very possible, and an 18–year–old who performs that kind of heinous act receive a 25–year sentence?

I am struggling with the difference. Why do we not take 16 and 17 year olds and say they are in adult court, period? Why include something that says unless it can be proven that it would be more to their benefit to be in juvenile court? Are we trying to create more work for lawyers? That is probably one of the motives, but I would not dare suggest it.

Mr. McWhinney: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fruitful question raised by the hon. member. I would have thought the bill as presented by the minister responded to the specific cases he raised. These 16 and 17 year olds are to be dealt with in adult court under the bill. The maximum sentence is 10 years for first degree murder.

We are getting into this issue of marginal variation and where do we draw the line? Would we extend it from 16 years down to 15, or why not then 14? A life sentence and even death sentences were routinely applied in earlier periods of criminology to young children. We have obviously gone beyond that.

• (1600)

We have tried to establish a new line which reflects present societal expectations and present societal realities. It is always possible to amend this, but I would have thought that there is a significant change now made in applying this 10–year minimum sentence for first degree murder. On that particular score I think that the bill represents an advance. However, if on experience it is found that changes are needed, it can be amended again.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak again on Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act.

This matter is close to my heart, as I lived with young offender issues and their consequences long before the Young Offenders Act became the law of the land. I was a part of the more than 10 years of consultation and wrangling that occurred which finally produced Bill C–61 back in 1981, which brought us this tragic, social science experiment perpetrated upon the Canadian people.

I have a clear message for the Minister of Justice and his cabinet colleagues. I also want to wake up the policy section of the Department of Justice which has led the justice minister into the mistake of Bill C–37.

I can appreciate that the justice minister has to take what he believes is the best advice he can get from his advisers. I say to those few in the department who have misguided the minister that the shame of the country is on their shoulders.

The condescending prescriptive approach of Bill C–37 is fundamentally out of step with mainstream Canadian values and it makes one's heart sink. I do not know what I can say to drag the members opposite into the nineties, clear their heads and listen to what I am saying. They should not discount what I say because of where I stand in the House. I claim particular credibility about the Young Offenders Act.

This country does not need Bill C–37. Rather, it needs a renewed Young Offenders Act, one which will improve the safety of our streets, put Canadians' minds at ease and reflect what Canadians want.

Members of this House and the minister, listen to what I am saying and make the appropriate adjustments. Bill C–37 is wrong. Hopefully we can get it right at the 10–year review.

Since coming to Ottawa I have sat through most of the justice committee meetings which dealt with Bill C–37. I have held town hall meetings and have done widespread surveys in my riding of New Westminster—Burnaby. I have also consulted across the country. The conclusion is the same, the Young Offenders Act and the amendments proposed as part of Bill C–37 do not come close to solving the problems associated with young offenders today.

In a survey included in a recent householder of mine I asked constituents a straightforward question: Does the current Young Offenders Act need to be amended? The yes response was an astounding 96.3 per cent. At town hall meetings in my riding the consensus was to lower the age and to change other essential elements.

This feeling is widespread across Canada. However, the bleeding heart Liberals do not want to admit it. Clearly the YOA is fundamentally flawed and has not achieved the acceptance that we would expect if it were operationally appropriate.

Canadians have had it with high taxes and an uncontrollable deficit and debt. They have had it with gun control measures which do not deter criminals. Most of all, they have had it with the Young Offenders Act which does not protect innocent people or support the principles of specific or general deterrence. Instead it seems to protect the rights of the offender in a manner out of balance with that of the victims.

The Young Offenders Act makes certain that the identity of a young offender is not known even if this puts the general public at high risk. Further, the Young Offenders Act fails to recognize the rights of the victim as a needed integral part of the justice system, as there is no legal recognition of their stake in the general proceedings.

The Minister of Justice asked for consultation, such as his 1993 discussion paper "Toward Safer Communities". The public thinks that the minister really cares about what it thinks. What the public does not know is that the minister already finished drafting the bill before the last responses were received.

True consultation is something which all members of the Liberal Party need to learn. Perhaps they should take a lesson from the members on this side of the House. To consult means not only to listen but to implement what the majority wants. Canadians are being reminded again that the Liberals' definition of consultation is to appear to listen and then to follow their original agenda.

• (1605)

Before the drafting of Bill C–37 there were rallies upon rallies across the country for drastic changes to the YOA. What happened? There were no drastic changes. Now on the eve of the 1995 budget Canadians are holding tax rallies from Victoria to St. John's demanding no more taxes. What will happen? The finance minister will raise taxes and increase the deficit all in one shot. The Liberals will still have the nerve to say that this is what the general public wants or should have.

The Reform Party appreciates the grassroots and listens very carefully. Our plan of reform of the YOA is community based, with a history of a bottom up approach, rather than the traditional bureaucratic, top down, no grassroots approach. Therefore, the Reform proposals I want to present are the ones that the Canadian public wants and the ones that the Canadian public deserves.

One, lower the young offenders age of definition of young person from 10 to 15 years inclusive from 12 to 17 years inclusive. Two, any young offender who commits an indictable offence could possibly be transferred to adult court. Three, remove extra privacy and secrecy provisions in the Young Offenders Act and treat all YOA records, access to information, ability to publish in the same manner as is for adults.

Four, sentencing must emphasize victim compensation, community service, skills training, education and deterrence to others. In custodial facilities opportunities for rehabilitation must be emphasized in a disciplined environment. Medical psychological treatment orders should not require the consent of the young offender.

Five, parents of young offenders should be held responsible for compensating victims for property crimes if it can be demonstrated that they have not made a reasonable effort to exercise parental control. Six, victims must be given legal standing in youth court and be invited to be involved at all stages of court.

Constituents often ask why the government always tinkers with the YOA instead of making all the necessary changes in one try. I think we all know the answer. By changing it slightly throughout its mandate, the government makes it appear that it is really working hard for the people while basically preserving the status quo and not changing what it originally gave us.

Many members spoke on Bill C–37 at second reading stage and many more are going to be speaking at this stage. However, very few who will speak on this bill have experienced the frustrations of the Young Offenders Act firsthand. I realize that many of my colleagues in this House are lawyers but I know that only a few have ever dealt with defending or prosecuting a young offender.

As a former probation officer in the British Columbia Youth Court, I had to deal with the Young Offenders Act on a daily basis. I have lived and breathed the Young Offenders Act problems for years. As an officer of the court I did my best to administer at the street level the Young Offenders Act and its predecessor, the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1908.

Beyond the lawyer who may have defended a youth at court, I regularly made home visits with young offenders and surveyed the social context of the offender. I worked hard to promote innovative resolutions to varied crises in case management, bringing together public health, social work and psychiatry in the schools to respond to particular needs. This both pre–court and post–court effort was happening long before the Young Offenders Act became law. The reality of administering the sentences and consequences of the Young Offenders Act is far removed from court proceedings. This different world is not comprehended very well by legal drafters and policy people.

I mention this as it relates not only to what should be done to fix the YOA but in respect to the credibility of the message giver. The Bloc accused me of nostalgic fascism when I rose to speak about the Young Offenders Act on May 12, 1994.

I want to remind my detractors in this House and those few lawyers who think they know something about young offenders—it seems that everyone in this House has an opinion about youth crime—that my recommendations come within the context of years of intimate working knowledge of trying to make the system work at the level of basic application.

The Reform Party's proposals are not right wing reactionary, but rooted deeply in direct experience and a careful evaluation of the balance between community desires and specific offender concerns.

The member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce is nationally known for his misguided views about offenders. At report stage he was again attributing views to the Reform position on Bill C–37 which had more to do with covering his own guilt about what he and his colleagues did to this country when a previous Liberal administration, which included the current Prime Minister, told Canadians what was good for them and thereby gave us the Young Offenders Act.

I was involved in early consultations when the Juvenile Delinquents Act was being changed to the early version of the Young Offenders Act. Philosophies are varied. I have seen violent youth released because of minor technicalities and flaws in the act. The Young Offenders Act is terribly flawed and will only further harm Canadians if it is kept in its present state, including if the amendments to Bill C–37 are given royal assent.

I tried as a professional to defend the system with the tool box of rules and resources that I had at my disposal. I found the act at times to be very cumbersome, a liberal statement of unrealistic hope over reality, inflexible rules over common sense, a sense of government betrayal to many victims, and a carte blanche to the self–centred predator.

On a regular basis I ran into frustrated parents on both sides. Some parents wanted the law to do something with an offending son or daughter but the hands of the authorities, including mine as a court officer, were tied. Victims were always asking the same questions, why the parents of young offenders cannot be held accountable, why the guardians who are supposed to be doing their duty and who fail to act cannot be held accountable for what they allowed to happen. How many times have we all heard the comment when a young offender is caught: "Where are the parents?"

This government gave its answer to the country and it was in plain, clear English. It could not care less. In December 1994 this bill was at committee stage. At that time the Liberal and Reform parties brought forward amendments that would alter Bill C–37. Every amendment the Reform Party put forward was voted down by the Liberals, not because they may have disagreed with the amendment but because some were afraid to break party ranks. They were afraid to do what was right for the country.

One of our amendments would have included some limited parental accountability to the Young Offenders Act. The proposed change was to clause 13 of the bill. It asked the courts to order the person having custodial care and control of the young person who fails to reasonably exercise foreseeable parental duty to pay and to order such person at such time and on such terms as the court may fix an amount by way of compensation for loss of property, for loss of income or support for special damages for personal injury arising from the commission of the offence where the value thereof is readily ascertainable, but no order shall be made for general damages.

It is now a record for the whole country to see where this government stands. This government is determined to have its own way, to defend the status quo and to continue the old style way of governing this country. The Liberals only listened as they were preparing the red book. They put in the red book what the people wanted to hear but then they quickly forgot what they had heard.

The book promised changes to the Young Offenders Act. More so, it promised to deal with Canadians' concerns. It was 100 per cent smoke and mirrors, I think. Canadians' thoughts were not even brought to the table.

Let us look at what has been accomplished. The Liberals were elected as the government and the people are still suffering under an ill fated Young Offenders Act. By failing to take bold action to correct what was largely not working and introducing legislation just to mollify a restless public and fulfil an election promise with the call "trust us", this government has fallen short and let us down.

The Liberals' efforts are simply a top down, we know best answer to an increasingly aware and justifiably demanding populace. I am most pessimistic about any result from the announced 10–year review.

Members of this House of Commons may not feel the backlash from constituents just yet, but be sure that when they vie for re–election constituents from coast to coast will be asking what Liberal Party members did to improve the Young Offenders Act. When these Liberal MPs have to really defend to their constituents the inadequate improvements electors will look for the party that will truly represent the people and that party will certainly be the Reform Party.

We have a social philosophy of openness and community accountability that the old style Liberal ideology just cannot seem to comprehend. A new Young Offenders Act must be socially resonant. It must clearly demonstrate Canadian society's values and mores. It must be an instrument not only of rehabilitation and treatment but also of deterrence and orderly denunciation. It must reflect mainstream Canadian values.

Parents are concerned for the safety of our children. They are demanding an accountability of the justice system to the community and they want to have a sense of ownership in the process of justice. They are frustrated and angry that the current system seems to operate for and around a select enclave of justice professionals, the criminologists, the legal community, corrections workers, offender care agencies and the police.

Nine pages of this bill relate to amendments around a faulty premise. I say clearly to the minister let go of these outdated notions and stop the tangled bureaucratic response where one line in the act would suffice to simply state that a youth court record and an adult criminal record are one and the same of a continuum to be kept in one computer and handled like all other criminal records.

Society sees violent crime with abhorrence, needing denunciation and a sensible social defence response.

If the violent 16 and 17 year old young offender is kept within the bounds of the Young Offenders Act, the maximum penalty for first degree murder would be 10 years. If that same violent offender were dealt with in adult court, the penalty for first degree murder would be life imprisonment. While 10 years under the new proposal would seem to be sufficiently harsh, the reality is that probably only 6 years would be spent in detention at most, with the remaining 4 years to be spent under community supervision.

At the other end of the spectrum are the youngsters 10 and 11 years old who are flexing their egos and daring society to take them to task. Under the provisions of Bill C–37, they remain untouchable. By the time they are 12 years old, the hard core are street wise and becoming increasingly sophisticated in testing the system. When they finally appear as young offenders, they are already beyond being intimidated by the system. The successive warnings and breaks they receive as young offenders then become meaningless.

They often are too deeply entrenched in the game to see or desire a way out. However I believe that 10 and 11 year olds, if brought under the umbrella of the justice system, publicly denounced and placed in programs of education and rehabilitation, would be much more responsive to efforts to set them straight.

It would provide the legal tools to break the offending cycle and require the social services of public health, social work and education to deal co–operatively and resolutely with these individuals.

The Reform Party cannot support this bill. It does not represent the wishes of my constituents. Some of the members who sit across from me on the government benches represent ridings close to mine. I have received correspondence from their constituents. These constituents do not support Bill C–37 and therefore neither should their member of Parliament.

The one saving grace for this legislation is the second phase that will take place later this year. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will have the opportunity to hear witnesses from all across Canada as part of a 10–year review of not only the amendments to Bill C–37 but the entire Young Offenders Act.

I understand the committee will travel across the country and make itself available for all Canadians to provide input. I want to encourage the chairman of the committee to solicit witnesses from all groups and not stack the hearings with bleeding hearts as was done sometimes during the committee stage.

As well, the Minister of Justice must respect the wishes of those who provide the input for this 10–year review since these are the people who are affected most by such changes. The minister has a second chance to do what is right, namely lower age limits, deal with serious offenders in adult court, eliminate publication bans, put victims into the system and make parents responsible for property crimes committed by the youth.

Let the YOA become a short, clear statement in principle rather than a tangled act that is becoming a retirement plan for lawyers. Bill C–37 is off track and I call on the government to set it right during the 10–year review.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague on a very well delivered speech. He said some great words.

I too have had lots of experience with youth over a 35–year period. Could he explain or comment on his views of the young offender under the age of 12 at that time? How real was it and how informed and knowledgeable was that age of child, anywhere from 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 or whatever the age might be as compared to the idea now that they are not accountable?

I would like his comments on the people who were under age 12.

Mr. Forseth: Mr. Speaker, we know that common law tradition previously was that we would not put anyone under seven years of age through the criminal process. We had developed through common practice of the administration of the provinces under the old Juvenile Delinquents Act that no one under 10 years old was ever processed.

Our suggestions of changing the age of operation is to provide a better context where social services can be directly brought to bear on those who are most likely to benefit from those social services.

In this day and age of growing awareness and the sociological changes, by the time someone is 16 years old we grant them the privilege to drive a car and become an impaired driver. Yet we are going to still treat them as misguided children.

If the age in the Young Offenders Act was lowered to 10, probably most 10 and 11 year olds would never come before the courts. They would be dealt with through alternative measures. It would certainly put a flexible tool into the hands of the police for those exceptional cases that could be redirected at an earlier stage, rather than becoming a tragedy later in the system. We are saying that the basic change of operation is well rooted in criminological science and the experiences of social services in the community and is not a rather reactionary response.

• (1620)

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping the hon. member would delve a little deeper into the alternative measures that he started talking about.

I wonder if the hon. member is looking at the same bill, Bill C–37. I draw his attention to the summary.

> This enactment amends the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.
> The major elements of the enactment are the following:
> amendments to provide that sixteen and seventeen year olds charged with specific serious crimes involving violence will be proceeded against in adult court—
> amendments to increase the period of time that sixteen and seventeen year olds convicted of murder in adult court must serve before being eligible to apply for parole;
> amendments to provide that young offenders should be accountable to their victims—

This is what his constituents are requesting. In fairness, he should draw this to the attention of his constituents.

> amendments to provide for greater sharing of information relating to young offenders with persons who require such information for safety reasons.

Again, this is something his constituents are requesting. Sometimes I believe that members of Parliament are not serving their constituents properly if they do not share with the constituents exactly what is in the bill.

Mr. Forseth: Mr. Speaker, certainly I have made an effort to share what is in the bill. The mild gestures for opening up the system, for sharing of information, for example, is going to be a most tangled provision. It is going to be very difficult to administer.

We have heard very convincing arguments that we really do not even need a young offenders law because of the charter. I have heard some rather learned people argue successfully that way.

I am saying that Bill C–37 really does not go far enough relating to the ability to take a statement or general openness. For specific and general deterrence to work the media should have access. We have a system of rules for maintaining criminal justice records. I know how difficult it is trying to keep separate files and create a fiction to a subsequent sentence in court, trying to figure out what I am allowed to tell the judge and what I am not allowed to tell the judge because of all the tangled provisions in the Young Offenders Act. I might be misleading the judge because of the social engineering aspects of it.

I am simply saying that Bill C–37 is not workable and there is nothing that can fulfil that ideal. I can give cases where the act has worked the other way and has caused harm.

As far as 16 and 17 year olds are concerned, we basically say they should be dealt with in the adult system.

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand today to deal with the Young Offenders Act in light of some of the comments that have been made, especially the comments that seem to be based on the premise that in our society youth crime is increasing.

That is not the truth. If the Reform Party is indicating that youth crime is increasing, then the Reform Party is misleading the public. It just is not true. That is the problem. Its arguments are based on a premise that is not true.

When we deal with matters such as lowering the age, what is so magical about the age of 10? If we are going to reduce the age from 12 to 10, why not 8? Why not lower it to the age when they begin to walk? Is there any problem with that?

There lies another problem. No basis is given as to why the age should be lowed to 10. I have a 12–year old child. I cannot see that child being in young offenders court. They are young and immature. Twelve–year–olds may be physically tall, but mentally they are not mature. Putting such people into the criminal justice system is not right.

The bill provides that young offenders can be transferred to adult court. In the proposed amendments, on serious offences, 16 and 17 year olds are to be tried in adult court unless they can convince the court that they should be in youth court. Surely there is no need for change in that area.

Removal of privacy is another factor that has been brought up. What good is it to society to reveal the name of a young offender? It will ostracise the child from the rest of society. It will ostracise the child and will restrict rehabilitation. That is not what the Reform Party wants to do. It wants to know and make it a matter of gossip that a certain child was in youth court.

There is no purpose to be gained by revealing such information. In the proposed amendments we deal with it. The information can go to the essential parties. It can go to school teachers and groups such as that so they can deal with the matter as is required.

Sentencing is the fourth point raised. Rehabilitation is to be emphasized. Unfortunately for the Reform Party they must realize that this is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Young offenders are sentenced to facilities that are under the control of provincial governments. Some provincial governments deal with the matter differently than others.

In some provinces they simply put the young offender into a holding tank, lock the door, and release him or her four or five or ten months later. Open the door and out comes the young offender, not rehabilitated but simply better trained by prison to commit crime. That is the problem we have.

If the young offender leaves better trained to commit crime, then we have a problem because that young offender in short time becomes an adult and knows how to commit crime better. That young offender just goes through the system again and again.

Rehabilitation may be wonderful and should be emphasized by governments but it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. They have to deal with it more seriously than they have in the past.

Reform members want parents of young offenders to compensate the victims. One has to distinguish whether we are in a civil court or whether we are in the criminal court when we are dealing with these matters. The mixing of the two does not always mix that well.

In giving the victims legal standing one has to question whether this is an offence of a youth. Is this an offence against the state as it has been traditionally in the criminal justice system, or are we now going to have everyone from a community come in and apply for standing in dealing with matters that are before the courts? This would completely uproot hundreds of years of tradition.

Certain perceptions have been raised by members of the Reform Party. According to them there are indications that crime has been increasing by young offenders, but in reality this is not so. The only area where there has been an increase in crime are those crimes classified as violent offences. However a violent offence involves a common assault, a slapping, et cetera.

The problem we have in those particular areas is that people have been reporting more of these incidents. When two young people are fighting at school, the matter is not resolved by the young people going to the principal's office or calling the parents. The matter is resolved by calling the police and charges are laid. That is how statistics get distorted and that is how statistics show that those crimes have gone up. It has not happened. That is the problem.

• (1630)

Statistics are being used to distort reality. In fact 16 and 17 year olds in our criminal justice system have been treated more harshly than adults. Sixteen and seventeen year olds in youth court who are sentenced to six months of closed custody serve every day of that six months of closed custody. They do not get paroled; they are not released early. That is different from the way adults are treated in our system today.

Another problem that has arisen is the perception that the police cannot properly enforce laws against young offenders. Of course police can. Their rights are the same as they are for adults. If they can use the same rules they use for adult criminals when dealing with young offenders they can deal with them just as easily.

The Young Offenders Act enhanced the authority of police compared to old Juvenile Delinquents Act. The police can fingerprint young persons and maintain records of prior convictions. These matters cause young people to be treated more like adults and simplify enforcement proceedings for police in dealing with young offenders.

Young people can be transferred to adult court. Under the proposed legislation and the proposed changes, 16 and 17 year olds automatically go to adult court for serious offences. The sentences for first degree murder are doubled to 10 years. That is the maximum. Of course there is discretion on the part of the judge sentencing the person.

One has to question what would be served by increasing that sentence to a further term. What would be served by having a young person who is 16 years of age sentenced to life imprisonment? What is served by that? Many of our young people who get into problems come from dysfunctional families. Many of them come from families where the parents are drunks. They are not raised with direction. They go out into the world with the problem of not knowing how to deal with it.

These are the young people that members of the Reform Party would want to throw away, lock the doors and support forever. They want a system similar to that of the state of California where more money is spent on prisons than on education. If that is what we are going to do we have a problem. We cannot let that happen to the youth of this country. We have to help them get rehabilitated. We cannot lose faith in the youth.

Another problem we have is that anyone who tries to show that a system works or has worked over a period of time is immediately accused of being bleeding hearts.

In discussing these matters with prosecutors who have prosecuted in the field they have indicated the Young Offenders Act works well. These prosecutors are Canadians. They are in the system all the time. It is only when Canadians are given misinformation that they have different opinions. When they are given the facts they agree that the Young Offenders Act basically works well.

Most violent offences are not committed by youth. Adults commit 86 per cent of violent crimes. Of the approximate 14 per cent committed by youth, half are what we classify as common assaults: a slap or a punch. Those are the facts. Over 57 per cent of property crimes committed by youth are thefts. The majority of those are theft under $1,000. In other words most of them are offences such as shoplifting.

Let us not distort the facts. These are the facts. With these facts we have to look at the Young Offenders Act to determine whether it was working properly. I suggest the act is working very well.

In the past police often decided that charges should not be laid, especially for first time offences by young offenders. They would take the young offenders home. They would take them to the parents. The young people quite often were more embarrassed than anything. That would end the matter. That is not the way it is dealt with now. The young offender is apprehended on an offence, a charge is laid, the youth is then taken into court and the matter is dealt with in the court system.

I am not criticizing that maybe that is not the way it should be dealt with, but that is how statistics are built up. They are built up in particular areas when they should not be. As well there is an increasing willingness to report offences in the school system instead of schools taking care of matters as they have in the past.

We can all recall years ago when there would be a fight in a school yard and the principal, at least in my school, would take matters into his own hands. He would take the young people to the office. The odd one got the strap. The odd one was kept in detention. The police were not called. The way it is now the police are being called to lay charges, which is distorting the facts.

However the proportion of all persons charged from 1986 until now has remained virtually unchanged. There is not this huge explosion of an increase in crime by young offenders. It just has not happened. It only appears to have happened when distorted facts are given to the public. That has not happened. Since it has not happened we have to inform the public of the facts.

Fourteen per cent of young offenders were charged with violent offences in 1992. Almost half of those offences were equivalent to very minor assault charges. None involved weapons. The offences resulting in the most serious of personal injuries amounted to approximately 2.4 per cent. We are hearing this large furore over the way matters are being dealt with or should be dealt with. The number of youth charged with break and entry has actually decreased. It was lower in 1992 than it was in 1986. These are the facts.

The Young Offenders Act must be doing something right. Something is working. We have to fine tune it in particular areas and that is what we have endeavoured to do by increasing the sentences for teenagers convicted of first and second degree murder in youth court to ten years and seven years respectively. We hope that we have been able to deal with the matter in giving the system flexibility.

Rehabilitation was raised by the member from the Reform Party. Rehabilitation is an important factor. However rehabilitation quite often commences in the jails because the youth never got an earlier chance. They never learned how to get up in the morning. They never learned how to go to work in the morning. They never learned how to take care of their room. They never learned personal hygiene. They never learned basic things like knowing how to work. They never learned how to clean anything. They never learned how to do any basic jobs. These are matters that have to be learned and these are required parts of the rehabilitation scheme. We cannot do this by simply opening a door, throwing youth in, locking the door behind them and forgetting about them until their term is over.

I must admit that it would not hurt if some of the parents were given the same treatment because many of them do not know how to get up in the morning. Many of them have not taught their children because they have not known how. They are going through a vicious cycle. It is going from generation to generation in that direction. It has to be halted. The Young Offenders Act goes as far as we can go in halting it. The provinces have to take over at a particular point.

This is not bleeding at all. This is simply common sense. I wish it was incorporated at times in the comments being made about young offenders. Common sense plays a part and certainly goes a long way in remedying some problems that exist.

Some young offenders who are violent need extended periods of time in incarceration. That is what we are dealing with in the Young Offenders Act. This provides a chance to rehabilitate them in the institutions where they are placed. Once that is done it is up to the provinces and the workers working with them in the institutions to take over rather than advocate the holding of young people for prolonged periods of time.

In the proposals dealing with transfers to adult court we have done what many people in society have wanted. They have wanted young offenders in extremely serious offences to be tried in adult court. If those young offenders can convince a judge and demonstrate that the objectives of the protection of the public and rehabilitation can be met in youth court then they remain in youth court but only then. The young offender who has committed 10 or 15 break–ins will not be in youth court. He will be in adult court. The person who continuously repeats offences will go into adult court.

These are important factors to be dealt with. We have dealt with them in a responsible manner. The amendments are before Parliament so that the courts will eventually have more flexibility in dealing with these matters and dealing better with these matters.

The sharing of information and records is important. We do not demonstrate to the world what the young person's name is. There is no purpose in that. We do give it to the right people to be dealt with for the purpose of protecting the public such as school officials and child welfare agencies. There are people who should have the information. Such information when released is important. We have balanced the interest of the child and the interest of society by doing what we have done.

The amendments we have proposed at this time certainly meet many of the requirements of the Canadian public. The Canadian public has wanted some changes. We have come up with those changes. They are responsible changes in attempting to fine tune portions of the legislation that had to be changed. We have done this.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with rapt attention to the hon. member's discourse. When hundreds of thousands of Canadians are voicing their opinion that the Young Offenders Act needs serious reform or serious overhaul I find it absolutely astounding a member would claim as he just did that "the Young Offenders Act is working very well".

The hon. member derided the use of statistics, yet he himself went on to use statistics throughout his presentation over and over again to try to prove his own personal bias that the Young Offenders Act is working very well.

I would like to ask the member, in as few words as possible, if he feels therefore that young offenders who reoffend over and over again should be held accountable? He said that somehow it was their background, that they came from dysfunctional families. They have all sorts of societal reasons why they commit crimes and why they break the law and have no respect for it. If it is always someone else's fault how do we hold these people accountable?

• (1645)

Mr. Bodnar: Mr. Speaker, when we are dealing with repeat offenders who recommit offences over and over again, quite often we are dealing with a very small proportion of the members of the young offenders group who commit these offences.

Of course there is a need for rehabilitation. Quite often the reason they are committing these offences is that there is nothing for them in the institutions in their provinces that prevents them from doing it or rehabilitates them in any way. If nothing is done the only problem and the reason they recommit and get caught is that they were not trained well enough the second time. They are out, caught again, go in again and recommit. That is the problem we have.

Of course people do not want to be just in jail. They do not want to be just in jail for the sake of being incarcerated. That is not what they want, but they have not learned a different way of life. We have to realize this and become realistic in this direction.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions to ask the hon. member. I would like to comment on the 14 per cent of crimes being committed by youth; 12 to 17 year olds if I am not mistaken make up 14 per cent of the population, so that balances out pretty well.

Recently I went on a ride along in several places with police throughout the country, not just in one or two places. I witnessed the police dealing with youth on a few occasions. On many occasions there were no charges brought forward. Rather, the police dealt with the situation. They contacted parents and charges did not follow.

If charges were being made at a ridiculous pace to include school fights et cetera, I would have thought from those nights I was involved that there would have been a real increase in crime. However, there were no charges brought forward. I wonder what basis he has to show this House that is happening, that school yard fights are being reported. Where does he get his information?

I know at my school in my district of many schools, never once were the police ever called. That was until 1992. Never once were they called for a school yard fight. As far as I know, to this day they have never been.

He said that some provinces throw them in the clink for four to ten months and then just let them go. I would like to know what provinces these are and where he got his information.

Mr. Bodnar: Mr. Speaker, I can speak fairly well from personal experience. Rehabilitation does not really function in the province of Saskatchewan. That is because money is not being put into the system to properly rehabilitate individuals.

The whole question indicated by the hon. member for Wild Rose of the number of people young offenders represent being 12 to 14 per cent of the population and therefore committing 12 to 14 per cent of the offences verifies the fact that we do not have this explosion of offences among young offenders. It has not occurred. It is not occurring. I am very pleased the hon. member for Wild Rose has just verified that fact for me.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member where he is getting his statistics from. I have statistics from the Canadian centre for justice statistics showing that since 1962 the rate of young offender offences has risen by over 300 per cent.

Since the introduction of the Young Offenders Act in 1982 the incidence of young offender violations has risen some 117 per cent. There was a small drop between 1992 and 1993 of 3 per cent. At the same time young males between 15 and 25 in our population dropped by 14 per cent.

I do not know where you are coming from. There is an explosion of youth justice, looking over the last 30 years. The Young Offenders Act simply is not working. Where are you getting your figures?

The Deputy Speaker: I would ask hon. members to put their questions or comments through the Chair.

Mr. Bodnar: Mr. Speaker, I rely on that most unreliable authority called the John Howard Society which indicates that the youths charged as a percentage of all persons charged in the period 1986–92 has not increased.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when characterizing how young offenders are placed in custody in Saskatchewan, the hon. member made a description something like open the door, put them in and then let them out.

• (1650)

I will be contacting the attorney general of that province and I will be getting the information about the millions that province is spending on juvenile offenders for social programming while they are in custody. Millions are being spent across Canada by every province. The federal government has a tremendous share of that cost sharing program.

We are doing a lot to provide social services and community resources to those who are in custody. It is an awful thing to say that in any province in Canada they would treat young offenders in the way that he is describing.

Mr. Bodnar: Mr. Speaker, I can facilitate matters for the hon. member since I live about three blocks from the youth detention centre in the city of Saskatoon. If he wishes to come to see it, contact me and I will arrange matters for him. If he wishes the attorney general's phone number it is in Saskatoon under his wife's name.

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Frontenac—customs tariffs; the hon. member for Québec–Est—social housing; the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin—citizenship and immigration.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, right off the bang, I am going to tell you that the Bloc Quebecois' position on Bill C–37 is that it is repressive and loses sight of the ultimate goal of all criminal laws: crime prevention and the rehabilitation and reintegration of offenders.

The bill will in no way contribute to stopping young people from committing criminal acts. Ottawa is going down a dead–end street, as far as Quebec is concerned. Quebec is to assume responsibility for administering the system. Our recommendations have once again been overlooked. This is yet another good example of the struggle between the legitimate goals of Quebec and those of the rest of Canada. Once again, the bill demonstrates that the federal regime has failed.

As I already said in this House when speaking about the same issue last June, I am very concerned about the situation our young people find themselves in. I am sure that many of us are also concerned, but I am less sure of what we want to do to help them.

For over 34 years, I worked with young people as a teacher in a comprehensive school. I got to know many thousands of young people, and I can assure you that the image we tend to have of them is not always true to life.

Of course, there are a few who stick out from the others because of the way they dress, because their hair is the colour of the rainbow, or unfortunately because they commit reprehensible acts.

I think it is important to remember that the current Young Offenders Act has a very special philosophy. This policy is to help and supervise young offenders, unlike Bill C–37, which tells us that young offenders must be punished. This bill caters to the feelings aroused by extreme cases, while the notion of educating, helping and supervising young people is totally forgotten.

• (1655)

The policy statement behind this bill refers to rehabilitation and social reintegration, but what about prevention? Where, in this bill, is the word "prevention"? This is a repressive bill. One of the things that strike me the most is that 16 and 17–year olds who commit serious crimes will now have the burden of proof as to whether they will be tried in adult or youth court. This makes all the difference.

I really wonder why we should favour such an extreme solution and whether it is really necessary. Under the existing legislation, a young person charged with a serious crime may be tried in adult court. This provision is used by crown attorneys when a thorough review of the young person's record by several people shows that he must be tried in adult court.

Do we really need to amend the existing legislation, when it already allows us to transfer records from youth court to adult court? We cannot afford to move toward automatism. By virtue of his age alone, a young person may now face trial in adult court. This bill raises many questions, including the following: Is a 17–year–old first time offender who injures someone while committing a robbery more of a criminal than a 15–year–old who has committed close to 100 burglaries? It is a question.

Please, let us be a little realistic. Again, it is not a matter of age. It is a matter of prevention and education. I will tell you that in my riding, for example, in January, a young man was sentenced to imprisonment for incest. His own father had gone to jail before him for the same offence. As incredible as it may sound, for this young man, incest was a normal thing. Would you not say, Mr. Speaker, it is high time we take our responsibilities as adults and as a society?

Let us stop burying our heads in the sand and delude ourselves into believing that by offloading on the judiciary, we will resolve the youth crime issue. What I mean by taking our responsibilities is giving our young people reason to have faith in the future, because we know full well that the causes of youth crime are many.

The example I gave earlier is but one of many. Other factors are drugs, movies where violence is pervasive and so on. Again, let us take our responsibilities and unite against poverty and dropping–out. Yes, let us fight together against poverty and dropping–out. Furthermore, let us provide parents and, in their absence for whatever reason, the various officials involved with means to show young people that there is nothing wrong with being young.

• (1700)

When a young person has the misfortune of committing a crime, our reaction must certainly not be to throw him or her in jail, because we all know—and no one can deny it—that jail is a breeding ground for criminals. Moreover, it is clear that custody has no deterrent effect.

Our youth should have rights, including the right to be better provided, better provided with the services of experts and better provided with shelters if need be, but certainly not with adult jail as the only alternative.

The Young Offenders Act, as it stands, contains very strict guidelines relating to the maintenance of records on teenage offenders. Access to these records is restricted. However, in this bill, the confidentiality aspect has been set aside completely. What is this supposed to achieve? I have no idea.

Bill C–37 proposes to disclose information on a young offender to representatives of the school system and other unspecified persons. I find this part of the bill very disturbing as well.

Last week, Newsweek reported that the U.S. justice system was using shame as a deterrent. Young people who had committed a crime had to ask their parents and their victims for forgiveness in front of the television cameras, to show they really felt remorse. Furthermore, the nature of the offences and identity of young offenders could also be disclosed in church.

Bill C–37 mentions revealing the identity of young offenders. It proposes to disclose information on young offenders to representatives of the school system and other persons concerned.

Again, who are these other persons? Are we going to follow the American model? Will announcements during high mass be next? This is absurd.

We can hardly expect a young person who has committed a crime to rehabilitate himself when he is acutely aware that so many people know his identity and what he did.

How will young people react when they see their privacy invaded and their record made public knowledge? We must stop punishing and looking down on people, and we must try to help our young people who, need I repeat, are the future of our society. Give them a job, because that is how they will regain their self–esteem.

On May 5, the Liberal Party of Quebec—yes, the Liberal Party of Quebec—and the Parti Quebecois agreed to move a motion in the Quebec National Assembly demanding that the federal legislation on young offenders comply with the laws and policies of Quebec with respect to youth protection.

This agreement was possible because Quebecers are aware of the need to protect the rights of the child.

In Quebec, the experience of the last fifteen years has shown that prevention, rehabilitation and readjustment are far more effective than repression.

• (1705)

We are trying to find out the causes of delinquency instead of using custody as the only deterrent. Of course, this will not solve all problems. There are a number of obstacles. The system is not perfect. Sometimes prevention and rehabilitation are not enough. On the whole, however, the approach taken by Quebec is more effective in protecting young people. How could a bill like the one before the House today ignore this fact? Should the minister not take advantage of Quebec's experience and show the rest of Canada that repression and intolerance will undoubtedly aggravate problems instead of solving them? I repeat: Young people are the future of our society. It is up to us to help them.

In concluding, you may recall that we as adults have certain responsibilities. One of our poets, Paul Piché, explains how we have an impact on the next generation. If I may, I would like to quote a passage from one of his songs: "Children are not really, really bad. They may misbehave, from time to time. They can spit, lie or steal, but after all, they can do everything they are taught".

[English]

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in one of his comments my colleague said we should look for the causes rather than lock up those who offend. There are so many cases today where young offenders do offend repeatedly. I would like to ask him whether at some point it seems a logical conclusion to lock up an individual. Whether the individual goes to a prison where adult criminals are is another question.

I would also like to ask him about his concept of looking for the causes when there is a young offender. I would also like to find out whether he thinks the publishing of young offenders' names is something that is relevant in the case of an offender or would he be more on the side of looking for the causes as well as opposed to some of the solutions to the young offender problems we have?

[Translation]

Mr. Fillion: Mr. Speaker, I thought what I said was fairly clear. First and foremost, we must find out the causes of crime. Environment is everything. When the environment is a healthy one, we give our young people every opportunity. If they do not have every opportunity, there comes a time in their life when they may well do something wrong. On the other hand, are they always to blame for such action? When the parents are not home, when there is no money and no work, these are all factors.

As to the second question, about identifying, publishing the names of offenders, I am totally against it. This is not the way to remedy things. Let us give our young people access to people who can look after them, experts in various areas, places to stay where people will listen to them and where they can go and talk about their problems.

• (1710)

Let us listen to their demands. You will see that, if we keep listening to them and giving them work, pride will come out on top, and the crime rate, although dropping now—it was at two per cent in 1992 as compared to five per cent in previous years—will continue to drop.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as chair of the justice committee which made a thorough study of this bill I would like to make a few comments.

The bill was referred to the justice committee on June 23, 1994 and was subject to hearings until December 8, 1994. Over that period of time we heard from 42 witnesses, groups and individuals from all walks of life. We heard from victims' groups, groups of offenders and ex–offenders, experts from the correctional service, witnesses from children's aid societies, witnesses from police forces, judges, bar associations, psychologists, sociologists, school board officials and representatives from the provinces. We had a very wide range of input into the work of the committee. I want to congratulate and thank members of the committee for their co–operation over those months when we had hearings on the bill.

The bill dealt with a very limited number of issues. To begin with, it added to the declaration of principles with respect to the Young Offenders Act. It pointed out in section three that crime prevention was essential to the long term protection of society and affirmed protection of society as a principal goal of the law. It also affirmed that young persons must bear responsibility for their actions and for their contraventions, although not in the same way as adults. That is one of the main reasons we have the Young Offenders Act.

The bill also dealt with transfers to adult court. Under the present law which deals with young persons from 12 to 17 years of age inclusive, a youth aged 14 to 17 can be transferred to adult court on an application from the crown for certain serious offences. The youth court will make the judgment as to whether the young person will stay in youth court or will be transferred to adult court. That is the law as it exists at the present time.

Under Bill C–37 a change is proposed whereby those who are 16 and 17 years old would be transferred automatically to adult court for certain serious crimes of violence against the person unless the young person makes an application to the court not to be transferred to adult court. That is a sort of reverse burden of proof which is being put forward in this particular bill as opposed to the present law.

The bill also deals with the penalty for murder. It would increase the penalty for murder for young offenders tried in the youth court to ten years for first degree murder and to seven years for second degree murder. At the present time the maximum penalty is five years.

The bill also provides for victim impact statements at the time of sentencing of a young offender.

It also provides that for treatment the consent of the young offender must be obtained. Under the present law treatment can be ordered for the young offender without his or her consent.

• (1715)

Another principal change the bill makes is to leave the decision with respect to open or secure custody with the provinces when the provinces have set up offices to deal with that.

Finally, the bill would provide for a greater publication of youth offence records, in particular the publication of the names of young offenders who have committed certain offences. Under the present law this dissemination of information is highly restricted.

Bill C–37 would allow for a greater dissemination of that information to people in positions of trust and administration, in schools and other places where young people study or work, so that there would be greater protection for the public.

More or less those are the changes that Bill C–37 would bring in with respect to the Young Offenders Act.

As I pointed out, during the hearings on the bill we heard from a great number of people, approximately 42 individuals and groups. I must tell the House that the great majority of those who appeared before the committee did not want us to proceed with Bill C–37 until we did a general review of the act such as was proposed as phase two of our studies.

The House will recall that the Minister of Justice, when referring this bill to the House and to the committee, stated that he also wanted the committee to do a complete review of the Young Offenders Act since it had been in force for 10 years. He wanted us not only to study every aspect of the law, but also the resources available to administer the law and the situation with respect to youth crime in this country.

A great majority of witnesses said: "If you are going to do that overall, comprehensive general study, why legislate in these few particular areas right now? Should you not complete your broad, general study and then make a judgment with respect to those matters once that study is completed?"

That made sense to many members on the committee, but to the majority it did not. The committee decided that despite these pleas it should carry on with the consideration of Bill C–37, principally because during the election campaign, the government had made a commitment to bring in those very specific changes. It felt those changes should be legislated right now despite the fact the committee was going to undertake a general study as phase two of its work.

The committee did proceed with Bill C–37 and reported back to the House and the bill is now before us. At the end of our hearings we did make 28 amendments. Most of those were technical amendments. They were corrections in the wording, improvements in the expression of the law, improvements in the French translation. However, there were a couple of substantive amendments among the 28 that were made by the committee.

One substantive amendment was to change to a certain extent the new transfer provision. I mentioned that Bill C–37 provides for automatic transfer of 16 and 17 year olds, unless the 16 or 17 year old can make a case before the court that they should not be transferred to the adult court.

An amendment was made in committee. It was agreed that it would not be necessary to hold such a hearing and go to the expense and the time consuming process when the crown attorney agreed with the defence attorney that the young person should remain in youth court despite the fact that the individual may be 16 or 17 and had committed one of the serious offences referred to.

Another amendment of substance was to curtail somewhat the dissemination of information that was provided for in Bill C–37. While Bill C–37 will now provide for greater information to the public with respect to young offender records than under the present law, it will not go as far as Bill C–37 would have gone in the first instance.

During this debate over the last few hours and when the bill was before the House at report stage, some members especially some of those from the Reform Party, have charged that the Young Offenders Act is a failure. They have charged that youth crime is out of control and that the Young Offenders Act is to blame for that increase in crime among youth.

As a matter of fact, some have blamed me, as one of the original authors of the Young Offenders Act, for this state in our country. They blame me for what they consider to be an increase in youth crime and for the failures of the Young Offenders Act. I want to respond to that.

To begin with, youth crime is not out of control and has not increased in Canada. The incidents of youth crime have not increased. As I pointed out the other day at report stage on the bill, the greatest number of homicides committed by youths 12 to 17 years of age was 68 in 1975. That was before the Young Offenders Act. The lowest number was in 1987 when there were only 35. With respect to homicides, there was a much higher number committed by those 12 to 17 years of age before the act and the lowest number was committed after the act came into force.

One could give even more precise statistics. For example, in the period from 1974 to 1978, a four–year period prior to the Young Offenders Act, there were 60 charges for murder laid against youths in Canada. From 1984 to 1989 which is a five–year period after the act, there were 40 charges. One could go on and on.

Of course, a certain phenomenon has been taking place which has led to an appearance of increase in statistics. That is what might be called the zero tolerance approach in many school board districts. School authorities now call in the police whenever there is a fight or a disruption in the school yard. In the past, when those sorts of incidents took place, the principal might call in the young people involved and discipline them, call in their parents and do something about the incident, but criminal charges would not be laid.

Now in those ordinary types of assaults in the school yard, charges are being laid in many jurisdictions. Therefore of course the statistics for charges laid has increased but the number of incidents has not. As a matter of fact, the trend has been more or less the same with respect to those kinds of assaults over the years, both before and after the act.

Let us be absolutely clear. I can refer to many documents. There is a fact sheet put out by the John Howard Society on youth crime. The title of the bulletin is "Youth Crime: Sorting Fact from Fiction". It goes into much detail and deals with violent crime rates with respect to youth over the years. There has not been a substantial or significant increase in crime with respect to young persons. As a matter of fact, as I pointed out, there were much higher rates of youth homicide before the act than there were after the act.

The act has not failed. The act is the same one from Newfoundland to British Columbia. It is the same act in Windsor, Ontario, as it is in Tuktoyaktuk in the Northwest Territories, but it is administered very differently in the different provinces and in the different territories. In some provinces and territories there is no trouble with the act; in other provinces and territories there are problems with the act.

• (1725)

I must ask, are the problems attributable to the provisions of the act or the way in which the act is administered? It so happens in some provinces such as my province of Quebec a great deal of resources, much more than other provinces, are dedicated to the administration of this act and to dealing with the causes of youth crime. There is much greater satisfaction with the act in the province of Quebec than there is in certain other provinces, but it is the same act in Quebec as it is in Alberta, as it is in Manitoba, as it is in New Brunswick.

The act is not the cause of youth crime where it does take place. I do admit there are still some horrible youth crimes taking place in this country. The perception of those youth crimes is way out of proportion to the number of crimes which are actually taking place.

In any case, the act is not responsible for the crimes. There are causes for those crimes and it is there that we must direct our attention. We must also accept the fact that there has been very uneven administration of this act across Canada and very uneven dedication of resources, both human and financial, to the whole area of youth offenders and youth delinquency.

If that is the case, if the act is not responsible for those crimes which do take place, then simple changes really will not reduce the level of crime. To suggest to the Canadian population that we are going to change section 5, or section 8, or section 25 and all of a sudden there will be a panacea and we will reduce crime is to mislead the public.

If we are serious about reducing youth crime where it does exist in Canada then we must dedicate resources to the causes of that crime, whether it is broken families, whether it is alcoholism, whether it is battered children and battered mothers, whether it is drug addiction and the trafficking in drugs, whether it is the lack of employment, the lack of recreation opportunities, latchkey kids who have nobody to come home to, a whole range of things. If we are serious about reducing the rate of youth crime, a simple amendment to the law will not do it.

However putting our minds to it and putting some resources and care into it at the level of the causes at the community level might do it because where that has been done there has been more success and less youth crime. We only delude ourselves and the public by suggesting that a few changes here and there to the act will substantially change the situation.

I want to absolutely rebut those suggestions. I am sure we will hear them again, especially from the Reform Party. We will hear that youth crime is out of control, that it has substantially increased, that the cause of that youth crime is the Young Offenders Act which is a failure. Well it is not a failure and it is not out of control. However, there are still some serious cases of youth crime in this country and if we are serious about this issue we should direct our attention to those causes.

In conclusion, I want to say that this bill has some worthwhile changes in it and they should be supported. There are other changes which I find doubtful. I will nevertheless support the bill with the understanding that when we do our phase two review we will re–examine everything that we have done under Bill C–37 as well as the entire Young Offenders Act.

As chair of the justice committee, I give lukewarm support for this bill because I feel it is a mixed bag. It has some good sections that are worthwhile. It has others which are doubtful. However we are going to have a chance to do a complete review of the act within a few months.

It will not be just a complete review of the act but a complete review of the administration across the country of the facilities for correcting young offenders, the probation systems, the secure custody systems and so on, and also the nature, level and status of youth crime in Canada. We are going to do all those things in the committee later this year. Therefore, I will reserve judgment on those matters until that time.

• (1730)

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the YOA is not the cause of crime. I do not think there are any qualms about that. I know we have been accused of saying that it is the cause but that is not the case at all. There are a number of causes. I agree with the hon. member there are causes that have to be addressed. We must address the causes in any way we can. We involve the provinces, social service and every aspect we can.

When we are trying to eliminate the causes and are doing a good job and somebody crosses the line and breaks the law anyway by committing murder, we say that the YOA is not doing its job of performing justice. The word justice is missing from our system in a number of ways.

I received 15,000 letters in one day that I will be delivering soon to the Minister of Justice. There are another 5,000 to 6,000 letters that I received in my riding and in Ottawa. I am sure every member has received letters that ask us to do something about young offenders. The government continually sits over there saying that it is all right, that Canadians like what they are doing, and that the act is good. That is baloney.

When will the government recognize what people are saying out there? It should pay attention to Canadians. The Young Offenders Act is not satisfactory to Canadians. Why does the government continually deny that? I know the member receives the same letters I do.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of his remarks I thought my good friend from Wild Rose was more or less agreeing with me. However at the end of his remarks I knew that he was not.

He asked a question and it is a serious question: What do we do with an a young person who commits a serious crime of violence after all has been done to prevent crime and all has been done to direct our attention to the causes of crime? Of course the individual has to be sent to secure custody. In some cases we would probably send him to adult court and to adult prison if the case is serious enough. The law provides for that and I support that.

However let us remember that justice in my view means protecting the public. It does not mean revenge. It does not mean an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.

In our system the overwhelming majority of youth as well as adults who are convicted will be sent back to society. If we are really concerned with protecting the public, which I believe is the purpose of the justice system, we must do everything possible with an individual in our control to rehabilitate the person and to make sure that when the person returns to society he or she will be a safer risk for society. We are not going to keep that person in prison until he or she dies. We do not have capital punishment. We are going to release the individual sooner or later, whether it is five years, seven years or ten years.

The hon. member asked what we should do. Yes, we should keep the person in custody if the person is a young violent offender. However we should work on the individual to give him or her a sense of worth, to give him or her a trade or an education, to make sure the person knows how to deal with the problems of life when released from prison, to make sure the person has contacts with family if there is family, and so on. We should build up a situation so that the person returns to society a better risk than when he or she entered the prison system.

That is what I believe. I believe in protecting society. We must dedicate our resources when the person is in secure custody or open custody to doing everything possible to rehabilitate the young person so that he or she will be better off upon return to society.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My understanding was that during questions and comments we would rotate between the established parties present. I am wondering whether or not that is the practice.

The Deputy Speaker: My practice is to give the opportunity to an opposing party of the member speaking unless there is nobody rising from an opposing party. In my experience powder–puff questions tend to be put by a member of the same party.

• (1735)

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with that. Powder–puff has been here today.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order. I hate to say this but I take exception to your statement about my question being a powder–puff type of question. I had a comment to make on the bill. I think the point you made should be retracted.

The Deputy Speaker: The comment was not addressed to the particular member. It was addressed to members in all parties in all situations.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the member that this will not be powder–puff.

The hon. member talked about not blaming the Reform Party and not blaming him. I do not think that is the case at all. After all he is only a one–one hundred and seventy–seventh part of the problem.

There is no misleading the public at all. There is a genuine concern for law–abiding Canadian citizens. My hon. colleague read demographics and statistics from various documents. He quoted the John Howard Society. I would like to quote a few items from Victims of Violence that has a big stake in the bill.

According to Victims of Violence youth crime is up 117 per cent since the Young Offenders Act took effect in 1984: 25 youth committed first degree murder in 1990, 23 youth committed second degree murder in 1990 and 6 youth committed manslaughter in 1990.

I suspect the member would say that is not very many. However the fact is that there are strings of victims in the wake of what is going on here. When one crosses the line, as the hon. member for Wild Rose has said, there must be an act in place to effectively look after that.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague this question. If he looked at the statistics from Victims of Violence, would he not agree that the tougher the measures for those who cross the line the better and more effective the fixing of the problem would be rather than looking at it from his perspective which is in my opinion is powder–puff?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the statistics I referred to come from the Canadian Centre for Justice. We had the Victims of Violence group before us in the committee. I do not know from where it got its figures.

There is no doubt there are still some serious crimes in the country. I deny that there has been an increase in violent crime among youth over the years. When we look at the statistics from the police and from the Centre for Justice statistics they show that is not the case.

Despite that I sympathize with the public that is seriously concerned with youth crime, whatever there is. He asked if it was not better, once they crossed the line and committed serious offences, to have tougher measures.

I do not agree with that and I will tell the member why. I do not agree with it because it does not work. They are doing it in the southern United States: three strikes out and you are an outlaw. They have a much higher rate of crime than we have in Canada.

The southeastern state of the United States have brought back capital punishment and have mandatory sentencing. They execute somebody in the morning and they have three or four murders in the afternoon. The countries doing exactly what the member is suggesting have the worst rates of violent crime in the western world.

What the member is suggesting has led to no improvement in the situation. That is why I am not for it. A much better approach is the approach being used in western Europe in countries like Holland, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, France, Germany, Italy, et cetera, and in Canada to a certain extent. It is to concentrate on the causes of crime, to concentrate on rehabilitation and correction, and not simply on harsh, hard, long penalties that do not protect the public. If they did protect the public we would be able to walk the streets freely in Miami, Dallas, New Orleans and many other cities which we cannot do simply because they are doing what the member suggests.

• (1740)

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to add my thoughts and concerns on the Young Offenders Act and Bill C–37 to the debate.

I would like to begin by sharing a letter from a constituent who writes:

> Last week my neighbour's son was physically assaulted in the hallways of his high school, not by a teacher or a fellow student but by a youth gang member who walked in off the street. The kids call him the "enforcer". Apparently my neighbour's son had asked the wrong fellow to stop spraying rocks when he spun out of the parking lot. This less than courteous driver had gang membership connections and sent for the "enforcer" to beat him up.
> I realize that changing the Young Offenders Act won't solve all our problems, but it would be a very good start. All of society has to take responsibility for putting an end to violence through long term teaching and learning in our education system. We must begin to give the message that the rights of victims will be protected more than the rights of criminals. The youth of today are laughing at our judicial system.
> The RCMP advised my neighbour to press charges even though he said it would take up to 18 months to go to trial and the kid would only get probation. This type of youth thinks probation is something to brag about. We need to do more than slap wrists. We have to stop this senseless violence.
> Surely the government can act to change the present state of our judicial system. An overhaul is long overdue. The rights of the average law–abiding citizen of Canada need to be protected now.
> As for my neighbour's son he is on a waiting list for a head scan as they feel the bone fragments in his head could cause permanent damage. The doctor said this was not a school kid fight but a serious attempt to do permanent damage. How many more young leaders of the future have to be maimed or killed before changes to our laws are made?

That sentiment is echoed by many letters. I am sure I am not the only MP to receive those types of concerns from constituents.

This one school yard incident illustrates much of what is wrong with our youth justice system today: youth gangs, physical assault, fear in the school yard, misplaced value systems, increasing levels of violence among youth, lengthy delays in our youth detention centres before going to trial and overcrowded courts, lack of respect of youth for the justice system, and inadequate penalties for repeat and violent young offenders.

When I speak about school yard violence I have to relate it to my own situation. We can all appreciate that as we grew up we were confronted with bullies. I know in my case my father said: "At some point in time you just have to stand up for yourself. The only language bullies understand is to meet force with force, or you will just keep getting pushed around".

I have a young son who will be 12 years old pretty soon. I hear in the news about young children getting stabbed at school or getting kicked in the head. I see some members opposite laughing about this. I do not understand how they find it humourous. I am very concerned about when my son will come to me for advice on what to do about bullies in the school. I do not know if I should tell him to stand up for himself against a bully who might bring a knife to school the next day and stab him or kick him to death.

Something has to change. Bill C–37 begins to address some of the problems but I do not think it goes nearly far enough. We cannot afford to tinker with our justice system. We must look at what works and what does not work. We must have the strength and the confidence to change what must be changed.

One out of every two young offenders who passes through the system will commit another offence. That is far too high. Obviously our current system is not working.

One significant problem that must be addressed is the enormous time delays between the commission of a crime and the court date. In some jurisdictions it takes from six months to a year. In Prince George it can take up to 18 months, and that is not acceptable. How can young offenders think we take their crimes or rehabilitation seriously when it takes so long to get their cases to trial? All too frequently if left at liberty youths will reoffend while they are waiting for their court appearance.

• (1745)

According to justice statistics in 1993–94, 9 per cent of the youth court cases dealt with young offenders who had not complied or had failed to appear for previous court dates. However, if the youth is held in a youth detention centre pending trial, they are subject to physical, mental, emotional abuse by other more violent young offenders. This is not fair either to any youth.

A lengthy stay in such an environment is not conducive to learning more socially acceptable behaviours. Eliminating trial delays must be a priority so young offenders are placed into programs appropriate for them sooner, whether community service or the so–called boot camps.

Another serious flaw of this bill is that it does not apply to 10 and 11 year olds. Child protection services in most provinces do not have the resources to meet the needs of every child they know is at risk of criminal activity. They know once the youth is finally arrested at age 12, additional resources might be available within the young offender system.

According to a preliminary study on youth gang activity done for the Solicitor General, gangs are recruiting young children to transport drugs, break into houses and rob commercial property. Children under 12 are re–enacting the violent behaviour of older juvenile delinquents in the school yard. Twelve is obviously too late.

We must get these children into the system earlier, giving them appropriate counselling, structure and values before they become set in their criminal ways. They must learn as early as possible there are always consequences for one's actions, if you're old enough to do the crime, you're old enough to do the time.

Our justice system needs to distinguish between young, first time offenders who commit minor crimes and those who engage in habitual or violent criminal behaviour. Everyone deserves a fair chance to mend their ways, to learn responsibility, accountability and a new sense of purpose.

Many of these first time offenders are trapped in dysfunctional or abusive families. Some are poor or have learning disabilities. They have low self–esteem and are looking for a way out of their cage. Some turn to a youth gang for security. They steal something to boost their own confidence, to impress their peers or simply because they are looking for help.

Our youth justice system must recognize these kids and provide them with a sentence appropriate to their needs to guide them back to the straight and narrow. That does not mean we allow them to blame their background or society for their actions. It does not mean we put them into counselling and ignore their crime.

The first step on the path to becoming a responsible citizen is to accept responsibility for one's own actions. They must be held accountable. If they are sentenced to open custody, part of that sentence must entail reparations for the damage they have done. In some cases it might mean picking up garbage. In others, more difficult work such as planting trees.

If they are going to be successful, community programs must be tailored to the needs and the punishment of the particular young offender. We must differentiate between those who deserve a chance with a lighter sentence and others who have repeatedly demonstrated they have no respect for our laws.

Despite what some advocates would have us believe, not all young offenders who commit non–violent property offences are harmless. Many are already habitual criminals with no moral conscience and a warped value system. They do not understand why they should respect the lives and property of other Canadians.

These youth need to know the punishment for their crimes will not be a slap on the wrist like raking leaves at the local park on weekends. These youth need a stronger reason to think twice before stealing another car. We need to strike a balance between deterrents and accountability, between punishment and rehabilitation.

Under Bill C–37 sentences for young offenders are inadequate and uncertain. It fails with respect to habitual delinquents. For property offences Bill C–37 advocates open custody. If a youth commits a property offence, the onus is now on judges to justify sending them to secured custody rather than to the community.

Currently there are not enough community programs to absorb these youths. The infrastructure is not yet in place. For property offences more emphasis has to be placed on whether the youth is a habitual offender. I do not think a bit of community work will be taken seriously by someone who openly flaunts the law on a continual basis. They should be dealt with very differently than other first time property offenders.

• (1750)

For violent offences Bill C–37 generally prescribes maximums rather than minimums. In the case of premeditated first degree murder a young offender is subject to a maximum six–year sentence in secured custody with an absolute maximum of ten years, including open custody.

This is a substantial improvement over the old five–year maximum but still does not go far enough. With no minimums, a young offender may still believe the sentence for murder will be a few short years. Some people do not believe longer sentences will deter youths. All I can say is ridiculously light sentences sure have not.

We need longer minimum sentences for violent young offenders so they know exactly what they will be facing when they contemplate rape, assault or murder.

When we incarcerate youths today the law says they must be provided with shelter, safety and schooling. There is also some counselling but the rest of the time they are frequently idle without constructive structure in their life.

Last summer at a justice rally in my riding one teenage girl told us that she has friends who actually look forward to detention. It was like a vacation for them with three square meals a day and no worries. They do not have to confront the reasons they are there. How can you rehabilitate a violent young offender if they do not understand there are serious consequences for breaking the law? How can they learn an acceptable value system if they view custody as a vacation?

Youth detention centres are expensive. In Alberta it has been estimated that it costs about $45,000 per year to keep a young offender. In Ontario it costs taxpayers $100,000 per youth. At least 50 per cent of all young offenders currently reoffend. For $100,000 a year Canadians have a right to expect better results.

I advocate the concept of the so–called boot camps. We do not yet have enough statistics on the various models of these camps to prove whether they are effective in all cases, but we do know that the reoffending rate is lower for many graduates of these wilderness or outbound camps, or whatever you call them.

For many youths in these camps, it is the first time in their lives they are placed in a highly structured environment with specific tasks, responsibilities and expectations. They do not have idle time to scheme or intimidate other youths.

Just south of Prince George we have one such camp. It has been around for 23 years and has a fairly good success rate. These young offenders warm up with callisthenics and go for a four mile run before breakfast. They are assigned tasks and chores around the camp, have strict school and study regimes, and almost no idle time.

They are not doing hard labour as critics of some camps might suggest. They are in a disciplined, structured environment, designed to foster more responsible behaviour.

Just this last year Manitoba has also moved toward this style of detention for youth. In Ontario it costs half as much to send a youth to Camp DARE and they are far less likely to reoffend than if they stayed in a youth detention centre.

Another problem with this bill is that it only transfers 16 or 17 year olds who commit violent personal injury crimes to adult court. It does not deal with 16 or 17 year old habitual offenders who obviously hold the justice system in contempt.

In B.C. between April and September of last year 999 of the 1,819 youths sentenced or remanded in custody were 16 or older. They are responsible for more than half the crimes committed by youths. When it comes to 16 or 17 year olds who commit crimes, I am in complete disagreement with this bill.

I believe every 16 or 17 year old knows the difference between right and wrong. They know when they are committing a crime and I believe they should be treated as adults. They do not belong in the same system as a 12–year–old, nor should they expect the same treatment for their criminal behaviour. This bill provides a loophole to keep even the most violent of older offenders in the youth system. Sixteen and seventeen year olds who commit murder or violent assaults can request that they be kept in the youth system. This bill has created a whole new field for lawyers and will tie up even more valuable court time. I do not think that is right.

I was recently reading an article in Readers' Digest by Mike Royko which originally appeared in the Chicago Tribune. It illustrates the sentiments many Canadians feel toward violent criminals who rape or murder regardless of their age. I will quote a part of the article:

> Judge McKay hears criminal cases in Trumball County, Ohio. Recently he had a two–legged beast in front of him who had kidnapped, robbed and repeatedly raped a 12–year old girl. When it was time to sentence the 22–year old villain Judge McKay said:
> "When you slithered out of your hole that day and spewed your venom all over this defenceless girl, you made this court's top ten list of the lowest scum this country has to offer. In a way the best sentence this court could give would be no sentence at all because if you left this courtroom I don't think you would be alive 10 minutes. You are nothing but a weed among wheat. When we have a weed, it is my job to eradicate it because if I don't you will choke the wheat. Therefore I am going to take you off the streets for as long as I can".
> The judge then ticked off long sentence after long sentence for each crime committed against the girl. "You won't be eligible for parole until you're 92", the judge pronounced, "that leaves only one more count, aggravated robbery. You stole this little girl's bra as a souvenir, probably to brag about it to your friends. I'm going to give you a souvenir of Trumball County justice, and that is a maximum sentence of 10 to 25 on the aggravated robbery for stealing that bra and I hope that in your last 25 years in prison you remember that souvenir. Get this scum out of here".

• (1755)

There are millions of Canadians across this country who are demanding that type of justice for that level of criminal. When a 17–year–old in Canada murders or rapes they should know they are going to face serious, severe consequences. Three meals a day in our current youth detention centres and time to practise more criminal skills does not cut it.

I believe inmates in adult prisons should not be idle either. Reform of the entire prison system is not the subject of this bill.

In summary, young offenders must know they will get caught, they will be convicted and they will be punished. Young offenders must know that justice will be swift and sure and they must know what to expect.

Bill C–37 is a start but our entire youth justice system must be overhauled now. It should include 10 and 11 year olds who are slipping through cracks of underfunded child protection agencies and becoming habitual criminals before the age of 12. It should recognize that all 16 and 17 year olds are responsible for their actions, not society. It is their choice to break the law.

We must commit the resources to implement and monitor programs for first time offenders. We must establish or expand highly structured and disciplined youth detention facilities and programs that teach habitual and violent young criminals respect for our values and laws.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the presentation of my hon. colleague with a great deal of interest as he discussed Bill C–37.

One of the points that we should recall in that bill quite obviously is the fact that 16 and 17 year olds are moved over to adult court and there is only one way as I understand that piece of legislation for them to even be considered in youth court. They must prove for some reason beyond a doubt and must have that evidence agreed to by the judge that they would be considered for youth court.

That would happen in very limited situations with extenuating circumstances. As we know also basically this new legislation would double sentences.

Further, I would like to touch on a presentation that I recently had the opportunity to attend by Dr. Fraser Mustard. The presentation indicated the research that he had done over many years. While many in this House would recognize that a few short years ago when we looked at early intervention with children we thought of kindergarten age. Today according to Dr. Mustard we are looking at a much young age. We are looking at an age as low as six months for proper nutrition, for nurturing and for assistance.

• (1800)

My question for my hon. colleague would be formed in this fashion. Does he not believe that community assistance and community help in addition to those changes in Bill C–37 to make penalties stiffer is certainly something that we all have to work for in order to prevent those crimes from happening and the necessity to punish our youth in the future?

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his thoughts on my presentation and for his question.

I will try to address my answer to the issues he raised in the same order that he did. As to the transfer of 16 and 17 year olds under Bill C–37 to adult court, he is quite correct. The onus is on the individual, on the young offender, to apply and give reasons why he or she should be kept in youth court.

As a previous speaker noted, there is also the facility that came forward by way of an amendment when it was at committee stage where the prosecutor and the defence attorney can get together and make that decision before it comes to court. This leaves the whole thing open to exactly what we have seen in cases of plea bargaining. It is of real concern to us.

As I stated in my speech, 16 and 17 year olds should not be given that option. At 16 years old, these children know exactly what they are doing. They should know the consequences of committing that crime. Therefore there should be automatic transfer with no chance to be tried in the same youth court that would try a 12–year–old.

As far as the comment about the sentencing provisions of Bill C–37 that double the sentence, my understanding is that Bill C–37 only doubles the sentence for murder.

As I said also in my speech, the sentence goes from five to ten years. I personally believe that for first degree murder, 10 years is not long enough. It certainly is not when one looks at the maximum. It can be six years in closed confinement and four years in open.

As to the comment about the community service, certainly I support that concept. I referred to it in my speech as well. We have to have all the forces that can be brought into play. That is not the answer in all cases.

The wilderness camps are not the answer either. Closed confinement is not the answer for everyone. We have to look at a wide range. However, the concern that members are hearing from Reformers is that there are those individuals out there who constantly flaunt the law.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you are familiar with a case of three young offenders last spring in Edmonton who broke into a young family's home. They knew the family was at home. The young mother woke up and disturbed their burglary. They could have ran. She was no threat to them. However they had absolutely no respect for law or even for human life. They cold bloodedly murdered her. They stabbed her to death.

That is why Reformers say we have to get tough with these people. We have to send a message that our society is not going to condone that type of behaviour.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I did not want to take part in this debate; I especially did not wish to comment on the hon. member's speech. However, given the well–known difference between his way of thinking and the mentality in Quebec, I feel compelled to speak up.

The way I view these matters is far removed from that of the Reformers. To listen to the hon. member, one would think that young people are the very scourge of society. One would think that young people 18 years of age or younger are truly responsible for the majority of crimes or that crime is increasing because of 18 year olds. We need only look at the statistics. I am a Bloc member and I will use statistics from Justice Canada: we see that the average number of persons under 18 years of age suspected of homicide has dropped considerably in recent years as compared with the 1970s.

Since the 1970s, I believe that the number of serious and abhorrent crimes committed by young offenders has decreased. There are of course the tabloids—the type of newspaper Reformers probably read—which report and in fact highlight such serious crimes. Yet that is not a true representation of what is happening in Canadian society, especially in QUebec.

Would the hon. member please say whether, in his own province at least, the present young offenders act is enforced in the spirit of its objective? Specifically, the act states that "the protection of society. . . is a primary objective of the criminal law applicable to youth". This objective is served by rehabilitating young persons whenever possible. In his own province, is the act enforced with this objective in mind at least? Is there a system to rehabilitate and reintegrate these young people? It is fine to criticize, but are the minimum instruments in place to help reintegrate these young people into society? I think not.

[English]

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I hope I will be granted as much time as was granted my hon. colleague who just rose with his comments.

I have a couple of comments. The hon. member from the Bloc finds himself a thousand miles away from Reform thinking. That is very obvious and all I can say is thank goodness for that.

The hon. member likes to quote statistics. I notice that most members seem to be using statistics that support their case. I guess we will continue to do that as long as this debate lasts.

I am referring to the Canadian Centre for Justice statistics which say: "Since 1992–93 the number of property cases has decreased by 5 per cent"—this is referring to young offenders' statistics—"while the numbers of cases in all other offence categories have either increased or remained near the same level. The number of cases involving violence has increased by 8 per cent".

We can all quote statistics. We can all say the problem is getting worse or better, depending on what side of the House we are on and what side of the argument we are on.

The point I would make to the hon. member is this. The people who are demanding justice the loudest are the children themselves, the good kids. We tend to forget that. Some seem to think that if Reformers get up and say that we have to get serious with these young offenders that we are somehow attacking youth.

We are trying to defend the youth who are the good citizens, the model citizens, the ones who are afraid to go to school, scared to walk down the street after dark because they could be attacked by some gang because the gang is not being properly dealt with by the system. The system is failing these young people.

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me say how pleased I am to have the opportunity to join in this debate on such an important issue as the well thought out and timely amendments to the Young Offenders Act that have been proposed by the Minister of Justice.

The issue of youth crime and youth in general has been a part of the Canadian political scene since the passage of the Juvenile Delinquency Act in 1908. It was completely overhauled in the mid–1980s and replaced by the current Young Offenders Act which has gone unamended since its initial passage.

The government made certain commitments and promises during the election campaign. It promised to move on this specific issue. As a matter of fact it was a promise instrumental in my election to Parliament. Once again we have delivered as we have on so many other issues. Even the media has praised us for our efforts and I admire them for doing so.

Let me quote an article by an Ottawa reporter. "The Tories talked tough on law and order, but the Liberals have acted" says Sean Dirkan of the Ottawa Sun. "Jean Chrétien's red book brigade have introduced more tough law and order legislation in a little under nine months in office than the Tories did during nine years in power".

• (1810)

He points to measures introduced by the Minister of Justice and by the Solicitor General, measures such as amendments to the Young Offenders Act, sentencing reform, a crackdown on child sex offenders and reform to the correctional and parole systems. It goes on and on.

This legislation does not stand alone, nor should it stand alone. It will no doubt have an important impact on various other portfolios. Not unlike a car engine, all cylinders must work together, one province co–operating with the other, all levels of government and political parties working together in harmony to achieve this very important goal.

The most important player is the family unit. That is where it all begins.

Several months ago my family had a frightening experience with a group of youths at the exhibition grounds in Toronto. Since that time I have urged the Minister of Justice to act swiftly to bring forward changes to the Young Offenders Act so that we can once again make our streets safe for ourselves and for our children.

Since my election to the House I have had the opportunity to speak with many of my constituents regarding this legislation. One common theme that has consistently been raised is that the crime situation has grown out of control in general and among youths in particular.

Although the crime rate has not increased according to Statistics Canada, it is the seriousness of youth crime which has been amplified both in the media and by the Reform Party specifically.

A recent article in the Globe and Mail stated:

> No longer are students simply breaking windows and stealing from corner stores, rather they are breaking into cars and carrying weapons to school.

In the city of Scarborough, school board officials have recently noted that prior to the implementation of the board's zero tolerance policy they were finding 25 weapons a month, of which half were strictly possession for self–defence and the other 50 per cent were used to intimidate, scare and assault. I find that very disturbing. Our children attend schools for educational and intellectual stimulation, not to intimidate or assault. They should be taking pens, pencils, books and calculators to classrooms, not guns and knives.

The government's real interest is in attacking the roots of youth crime, getting at the circumstances that breed crime, learning why youths have committed those crimes and ensuring that they do not happen again so as to stop the next generation of potential criminals. These circumstances include child poverty, youth unemployment, inadequate day care and insufficient counselling for high risk families and children before they fall into a criminal pattern. We must attack those roots and prevent criminal behaviour before it starts.

The 12th report of the standing committee on justice released in 1993 stated that we must attack the roots of crime, including unemployment, physical and sexual abuse and neglect, illiteracy, low self–esteem, substance abuse, glorification of violence in film, video and television, school failure, dysfunctional families and inequality.

This is not to say that we should ignore or simply pardon crimes committed by youth, who unfortunately, due to circumstances beyond their control, have violated. Youth must be held accountable. They must learn to be accountable for their actions. If they violate societal rules they should be punished. They must learn at an early age to be respectful, responsible and accountable. It is at this stage that the family plays a vital role.

We must go beyond punishment. We must rehabilitate those who break the law and that is what this legislation also does. It provides for the punishment of violators while recognizing that the most successful treatment for young offenders is not only punishment, but rather to both punish and rehabilitate so that the offender will learn that it is wrong to commit a crime, know why it is wrong and will not reoffend.

The onus to reduce crime is not just on the government to bring in and amend legislation. The onus is also on the participants of society. The family is paramount in helping to alleviate the problem of youth crime. This is the first line of defence. It is here that youth receive their earliest level of socialization and they are taught right from wrong.

The onus also falls on our educational system and our educators. They must step forward and show leadership and compassionate guidance, become once again role models for their students and motivate and encourage them to become nothing but the best. But the school system must also have the opportunity to function in an environment that is free from fear.

• (1815)

The onus also falls on our police forces to properly carry out the law. If we are going to ask them to provide and improve their performance, to take a leading role in crime prevention without seriously jeopardizing their lives, we have an obligation to provide the proper resources so they may be able to serve and protect the public.

The onus also falls greatly on the CRTC in the type of programs that are easily and readily available which so much influence our youth of today. I have an article here from the Toronto Sun about Jamie Taylor and Mark Williams who became murderers at age 17.

It states here how Jamie Taylor grew up as an abused and neglected child. When he was three Jamie was rushed to hospital after his step father severely beat him with a curtain rod. Since the age of 12 he had no supervision. He did whatever he wanted. His mother often disappeared for a month at a time without checking in on him. Jamie grew up watching macho man destructo movies, playing war games, embracing the very tough image. That was his way of having a leading role.

We also know of a case in the U.K. in which a youth watching a video took an axe and seriously injured the child he was baby sitting. We can see here how constant bombardment of this nature not only can but does influence people's minds and behaviours.

When we do apprehend, convict and incarcerate these people, let us ask ourselves is the problem solved? I do not think so. This is what I mean. Mark Williams has had virtually no treatment in six years. He has seen his case worker four times, less than once a year. Mark also states how he has had to rehabilitate himself. Is the system helping in any way to prepare this person to re–enter society? I do not think so. I am very worried because his parole comes up in 1998.

I have stated in the past that I would make the parole request contingent upon successful completion of a rehabilitation program so that the risk of reoffending can be if not eliminated, greatly minimized.

It has been said many times by many people and deserves repeating once again that our youth are Canada's future. However, it has been said recently this is the first generation that will not have a higher standard of living than its parents. For me that is truly a tragedy.

Youth should be a time of bright optimism. Today our youth find themselves facing problems that are not of their own making. Unemployment for youth is at an all time high. We are in an economy grown weak by constant tinkering, a political situation that to many seems to defy solutions, an economy weakened by constant talk of separation which has brought nothing but instability. We hear of investors in companies hesitating to expand and invest because they do not know if Quebec will be in or out tomorrow.

It is no wonder that our youth live in a perpetual sense of pessimism. I think it is time to move away from political rhetoric to concentrate on economic renewal, development and job creation for our youth.

We must work together to turn this sense of hopelessness around. We must encourage our youth to stay in school, complete their studies and become valuable members of our community. We as a government have initiated programs to do just that. However, our government or any government cannot do it alone.

In partnership with the other players in society, the businesses, the educators, the community groups as well as members of the opposition parties, we must work together to achieve this goal of eliminating youth crime.

Some of the proposed amendments to the Young Offenders Act such as doubling the sentences for those convicted of first and second degree murder go a long way in doing so. Also, victim impact statements would be allowed where victims, should they wish, would now have the opportunity to make a statement about how a young offender's crime has affected them. I believe this will certainly go a long way in helping the courts to see the broader picture in imposing proper sentences.

With respect to medical and psychological assessments, we will with these amendments give the courts the authority to request assessments be done on chronic and serious young offenders without having to request consent from the offender.

Through these amendments we have also established an information sharing system which I believe is very important. Records and information would be shared and would also allow the release of information of young offenders to affected members of the public where there might be a risk to them in the entire community. This information would be shared among professionals, for example between the police, school officials, child welfare agencies, day care centres, et cetera.

• (1820)

Again, we can see here that this will help minimize the risk and we will add more protection for all. Most important, with these new amendments the young offender who was charged with murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, aggravated and sexual assault will now automatically be transferred to adult court.

This is a very important step because the onus here will now be on the youth to prove that they should be tried in the youth court as opposed to adult court. We can see therefore that all these amendments go a long way in sending a strong message that crime at any level will and can no longer be tolerated.

In conclusion, we can clearly see that these changes, some of which I have mentioned, are a step in the right direct so as to help our youth get started in the right direction and send a strong message that violence will no longer be tolerated.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to hear government members speak on bills like Bill C–37.

The bill on young offenders was hotly discussed in Quebec. I would like the member to tell me whether Bill C–37 reflects the opinion of the Quebecers who spoke before the justice committee. Their message to summarize it in very clear terms, was "do not touch the Young Offenders Act". The act is only good if each province enforces it and, to the best of our knowledge, Quebec enforces it the most. The provinces that say the Young Offenders Act is no good are those that do not enforce it.

Is the government member aware of that and will he tell me whether Quebec's demands are respected in the government's proposed amendments to Bill C–37? Perhaps Quebec's reaction to the Young Offenders Act is an example of its distinct character.

Will the member tell me whether the amendments to the bill contain changes to meet Quebec's demands?

[English]

Mr. Cannis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. In our red book commitment when we looked at this issue we did not try to look at B.C.'s, Quebec's or Ontario's interest. We tried to look after Canada's interest because it is Canada's youth. It is not Quebec's youth, not Ontario's youth, not B.C.'s youth.

It is an overall picture that we are looking at here. I believe the members from the Bloc Quebecois and the members from the Reform Party should learn to put our differences aside for a moment and work on streamlining these amendments together collectively to bring forward the proper amendments, to send the right kind of message as a united force that violence will no longer be tolerated whether it be youth in Quebec, Ontario or anywhere in the country.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member I would like to say how much I appreciate his family values and the importance and emphasis he puts on schools and the function that they have to perform. I compliment him on his speech in that manner. He did a very good job.

I would like to ask the hon. member to comment on something that crosses my mind when we talk about what we are going to do with regard to these problems. Over the course of the last 20 or 25 years or whatever we talked about causes. The causes, we have to search them out.

I remember the drinking age being 21 and how that was lowered. That simply meant that it was lowered even lower than the illegal drinking age. Instead of 18 and 19 year olds illegally drinking, now it is 14, 15 and 13 year olds.

I think of pornography. There was a time we did not have any. Now it is running rampant. We have a lady in Alberta who is fighting hard to get rid of pornography, peep shows, nude dancing, all these things which we know contribute to the minds of our youth in a very negative way. It is a cause.

• (1825)

If you walked down the street and called a policeman a pig when you were a young man, what would happen? You would not do it out of fear, but more so out of respect. Now it is common practice. Yet there is no recourse, no way in the world that they are supposed to do any thing. We do not meet violence with violence. We listen to all of this bad mouthing—causes.

It seems like every time I address it the one thing that comes up is a wall that is put in front of me. If we want to do something about these causes, it is the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that stops us so many times. When we decide we want to do something about a problem we have to remember the rights. I think it is a hindrance in our judicial system in that regard with young offenders.

Would the hon. member comment on that?

Mr. Cannis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. As much as I would like to agree with him, I cannot. In any civilized society we need to have a basis to function around. We need a charter. We need rules and regulations. Sometimes we do not agree with them. We need obviously rules and regulations to protect us.

There have been times when people abuse these rights. I am not disagreeing with that. This is why the Minister of Justice is taking the initiative to bring forth changes. I am not saying that these changes are going to solve our problem. As we know there is ongoing consultation. The justice committee has not finished its work. It will continue.

We have often heard the saying that Rome was not built overnight. The minister cannot bring forth an amendment that will solve every one of our problems. This is a step in the right direction.

I certainly would hope that the justice committee would continue to look at the situation, monitor it and make continuous recommendations. Hopefully as time goes on we will make new changes, new amendments that will hopefully improve the system and make it safer for ourselves and our children.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to commend the hon. member for his speech. I enjoyed it very much. It is that kind of attitude that certainly we can work with on this side.

There are some things that the government can do and there are other things it cannot do to help people out. My hon. colleague from Wild Rose mentioned this point. We have a problem with pornography and these other things which eat away at the moral fibre of our society, in particular the moral fibre of our young people.

Would the hon. member be prepared to support the elimination of pornography, pass laws that would do away with peep shows where people for a fee can come in and watch girls dancing and gyrating on the other side naked? Would he be prepared to pass laws to support the elimination of naked dancing in bars and lap dancing? Would the member be prepared to support legislation, initiate legislation, on the government side to eliminate this kind of conduct that has such a terrible, negative—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough Centre has about a minute.

Mr. Cannis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his warm comments about my presentation. I campaigned on family values. I tried to reflect that in my presentation.

I personally do not approve of pornography, especially child pornography, and I certainly would like to see the elimination of child pornography and see people who engage in that type of pornography harshly penalized.

This legislation is not one that addresses this specific concern. I know there are proposals to address these concerns. I hope that the quicker we bring them forth the cleaner and safer our society will be.

There are so many justice issues that we have to address it would be unfair to spread ourselves too thin. We are attacking one specific issue and that is the Young Offenders Act in this debate.

I certainly hope that the other issues, as the member has stated, come forth as soon as possible so that we can address them with the thrust with which we are addressing this Young Offenders Act. As I stated earlier, I think this is a step in the right direction. I believe there is room in the future, but again, let us not prejudge our youth. Let us give them the benefit of the doubt.

• (1830)

In the future I would be very happy to work in the area of eliminating pornography.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CUSTOMS TARIFFS

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, worried about the federal government's unwillingness to intervene while Canadian customs tariffs are under attack from the U.S., I questioned the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food last Friday. What I was asking the minister to do was to ready his guns and get down to confronting the Americans on the yogurt and ice cream issue.

Let me remind you briefly of the cause for my concern. According to U.S. commerce secretary, Mickey Kantor, Canada is in breach of the North American free trade agreement when it imposes tariffs varying between 100 and 300 per cent on ice cream, yogurt, eggs and poultry exported to the U.S. On the other hand, under the GATT agreements, customs tariffs should be going down gradually over the next six years.

That is where I start having a problem with the Liberal government's inaction. The minister stated that the Canadian government was determined to defend dairy and poultry producers. I wish I could believe the government, but if it acts in the future like it did in the past, after seeing what it has done to Article XI of the GATT agreement, I must say that I can only doubt the good will, the genuine willingness of the minister and his government.

In response to my question, the minister also reiterated his government's support to the Canadian supply management system. In my sense, nothing is more uncertain than the Canadian government's willingness to fight for our supply management system. I would not be surprised if the government's feebleness on the ice cream and yogurt issue were the price to be paid to the Americans for resolving the conflict over Western wheat last summer.

One way to settle this dispute that may very well, in my opinion, degenerate into a trade war is to stop putting our heads in the sand and fight for recognition of GATT's precedence over NAFTA. All we have said so far is that GATT should indeed prevail, but we do not say it too loud to keep our American partners from hearing us.

Three days ago, the minister gave me the following answer: "If the United States has a different point of view and wants to take a run at us, we obviously cannot stop it from taking a run at us, but if it does, we will defend ourselves with everything we have". Incidentally, what do we have to defend our farmers with?

I do not think the minister has any effective means to defend our farmers because he has not gone to a GATT panel that could settle the Canada–U.S. dispute. Allow me to quote the Federation of Dairy Producers of Canada: "Unfortunately, the U.S.–based controversy surrounding the GATT and NAFTA regulations on tariff quotas has reached such proportions that our dairy producers are increasingly doubtful that Canada will succeed in negotiating a bilateral agreement that will benefit them". This quote does not come from me.

• (1835)

In a news bulletin, a few moments ago, I heard Claude Rivard and the vice–president of the Quebec milk producers' federation at a press conference here in Ottawa beg the government to show some guts and take action.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to respond to the hon. member's comments tonight.

On February 2 the United States trade representative, Ambassador Kantor, requested formal consultations under NAFTA relating to the U.S. access to the Canadian market for dairy and poultry products.

The Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food and the Minister for International Trade have repeated frequently and remain of the view that our application of tariff equivalents in our bilateral trade in poultry and dairy products, including ice cream and yogurt, is fully consistent with our rights under GATT and NAFTA. In fact, the ministers issued a press release on February 2 of this year setting out that view so there could be no misunderstanding on it. The Canadian position has not changed and is not changing. Moreover, both ministers stated their view again in this House last Friday.

The U.S. request for consultations should be seen as just that, a request to meet with us and to discuss the issue. The fact that the U.S. is seeking consultations under the dispute settlement provisions of NAFTA does give it a more formal character, I agree, but it does not alter its fundamental nature.

Requests for formal consultations occur quite frequently between trading partners. Sometimes they are in the form of a panel before they are over. Other times the consultations are adequate to resolve the issue. In some cases they are concluded only after lengthy discussions.

We expect these consultations to start in the next week or so. In this particular case we are satisfied that our legal position is sound and we will continue to hold our own. Our preferred approach is a negotiated solution.

It could be expected that the issue might arise in the upcoming visit of Mr. Clinton to Ottawa. If it does, the Canadian line will not change. We are acting within our trade agreement rights and we will defend those rights.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I put a question to the minister responsible for social housing about the unfair way Quebec is being treated with respect to social housing.

I wanted to ask him whether he was aware of the fact that Quebec has had a potential loss of $100 million per year for several years. On a per capita basis, Quebec should receive at least 25 per cent of CMHC spending, but at the present time, it gets only 20 per cent. One hundred million dollars annually is a lot of money. If we were to calculate this on the basis of need, Quebec should receive as much as 29 per cent of the CMHC budget.

So a shortfall of $100 million annually for Quebec is a lot of money, and that is a conservative estimate. In fact, this is all part of the government's attempt to get another $25 million or $26 million out of the pockets of people who live in so–called social housing. The government intends to raise rents by 20 per cent. It looks more like the government has no social housing policy at all.

• (1840)

Funding for social housing has been frozen since the Liberal Party came to power. Quebec is not getting its fair share, and now they want to raise the rents of the neediest group in Quebec. Would the government like to clarify this? Would it at least admit that this is unfair, and would it like to explain what it is doing with respect to social housing? Does this government have a social housing policy?

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my colleague's statement.

[English]

I want to be very clear on one point. This government is committed within the current financial climate to social housing for all Canadians in need. This includes those Canadians who reside in the province of Quebec.

In order to fully understand how existing housing expenditures are made, my friend must recognize that in the early years of public housing the province of Quebec elected not to participate. For example, under the old rent supplement program, Ontario began participating in 1971, whereas Quebec only joined in 1978. In those years, Ontario delivered 9,500 units for which it continues to receive subsidies, whereas Quebec delivered no units and as such has no subsidy.

Notwithstanding history, our friend across the way must understand that dollars for new housing commitments in Canada are now distributed according to a formula based on core need, not on population. That important distinction must be recognized. According to these principles, each region receives its share of housing dollars for new commitments.

[Translation]

In 1993–94, some $350 million was spent in Quebec, which provided assistance for more than 140,000 social housing units. Quebec also received additional funds because of special circumstances. I am referring to the $4 million provided under the RESO program established to improve living conditions in southwestern Montreal and promote local development.

I am also referring to the $5 million given to the Montreal owner–occupants whose homes were damaged by the drought.

[English]

Finally, on the point of the alleged $100 million that is not going into Quebec, my friend is aware that the number he is using is false. He knows it. It is most regrettable that the member and the Bloc Quebecois are attempting to play separatist games on the backs of those in Quebec who can least afford it. He should come clean with Canadians and Quebecers.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, earlier today the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration stated that I understood neither the Immigration and Refugee Board nor the refugee process.

As for my supposed misunderstanding of immigration law, section 19.1(a)(i) and (ii) and (b) of the Immigration Act clearly states the grounds by which an individual is to be refused admission into Canada. It states that one is not to be allowed into Canada if they are: first, likely to pose a danger to public health or safety; second, would cause excessive demands on the health care system; or third, are unable to support themselves in society.

Given Mr. Arthur Lasha fits all these grounds, he should not have been allowed into Canada and should be both stripped of his status and returned to his native Poland. In regard to the specifics of the case, according to numerous reports, this HIV infected individual was accepted as a refugee by the IRB based both on the disease he carries and the reaction the Polish people showed toward him.

Mr. Lasha's claims are ludicrous and the IRB should have known the following. First, the Polish parliament is currently in the process of passing a broadly supported bill recognizing same sex marriages. Second, a constitutional amendment recognizing the equality of homosexuality and heterosexuality is in the process of being adopted there. Therefore, the claim that there is systematic discrimination against homosexuals and, as in Mr. Lasha's case, HIV carriers, is groundless.

Clearly Mr. Lasha has not been entirely honest in describing his homeland. The minister has not accurately portrayed the facts in terms of refugee claims based on homosexuality. The minister said that only two such claims have come before the IRB.

In Newfoundland alone the claim has 90 per cent acceptance rate. According to a legal aid official in that province it is becoming a popular approach to staying in this country.

The minister spoke a great deal about Mr. Lasha being a member of a social group, that being by sexual orientation, and cited the Supreme Court of Canada as having made that decision.

In the 1993 case of Canada v. Ward, the Supreme Court set out the guidelines for assessing whether an individual was a member of a social group. There were three possibilities: first, groups defined by an innate or immutable characteristic; second, groups defined by an association so important to their human dignity that they should not be forced to forsake the association; and third, groups defined by a former voluntary status, immutable due to historic permanence.

The court also suggested possible groups for examination, including homosexuality, but added it was the job of legislators, not the courts, to decide whether or not homosexuality could be considered a social group.

Given that the question of whether homosexuality is the result of genetic makeup or environmental influence is far from being settled, the minister cannot say whether Mr. Lasha was or was not a member of a social group.

The IRB was therefore gravely misguided to make this judgment on the assumption that this individual held an innate or immutable characteristic.

To conclude, in this case the IRB was wrong on a number of accounts. It ignored several subsections of section 19 of the Immigration Act, placing an unfair burden on the health care system and Canadian society as a whole.

Second, it failed to examine Polish society and the accepting environment that the government is fostering toward the homosexual community.

Third, it failed to use the definition of social group properly, as outlined by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Given all this, it is clear that the Immigration and Refugee Board has failed those legitimately seeking protection in Canada from well founded persecution. It has failed Canadian society by allowing in those who clearly should not be admitted into this country.

Now that the minister is fully aware of the facts of this case, will he not accurately portray the facts about immigration application and acceptance? Second, will he have this individual deported immediately? Third, will he disband the IRB? Fourth, will he replace the IRB with competent immigration officials armed with well established guidelines centred around helping those from around the world truly in need of immediate protection?

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member knows, the decision was made by the Immigration and Refugee Board which is a quasi–judicial independent decision making body.

On the broad general issue of sexual orientation there are two compelling facts that may help explain the issue. In June 1993 the Supreme Court ruled that sexual orientation constitutes membership in a particular social group.

As well, the Geneva convention recognizes that in certain countries, members of particular social groups have grounds to fear persecution. It is on these grounds that individuals are eligible to apply for refugee status, not only in Canada but in all other countries that are signatories to the Geneva convention.

This case does not set a precedent. To date there have only been two cases on the basis of sexual orientation. One claim was determined to be negative. The other, the claim the member raises, was determined to be positive following an appeal to the Federal Court of Canada.,

Let me inform the member that Canada is not the only country to accept refugees on the basis of sexual orientation. In fact the United States, Germany and New Zealand have all accepted the positive claims on the basis of sexual orientation.

In conclusion, when claims are evaluated it is with a view to offering Canada's protection from systemic persecution and abuse. I remind the member that Canada has been internationally recognized for its compassion and thorough stand on human rights issues when it comes to refugee determination in Canada.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House has now been deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PRISON FOR WOMEN

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling in both official languages pursuant to the relevant standing order, the special report of the correctional investigator made pursuant to section 193 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act concerning the treatment of inmates and subsequent inquiry following certain incidents at the prison for women in April 1994 and thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, at the same time, I am also tabling the response by the Correctional Service of Canada to the recommendations of the correctional investigator made in the special report to which I have referred. This is also being tabled pursuant to the relevant standing order in both official languages.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the government's response to two petitions.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–306, an act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act (annuity following job loss).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and pleasure of introducing in the House today a bill entitled an act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act (annuity following job loss).

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act in order to address the plight of federal public servants who have lost their jobs after January 1, 1995 as a result of a public service downsizing program.

This bill would allow those public servants who have reached 50 years of age and who have at least 10 years of pensionable service to collect an annual allowance equal to the amount of the deferred annuity without penalty immediately upon losing their job.

In light of the upcoming downsizing program, many public servants will be faced with the possibility of having to raise their families on 50 per cent of their earned pension. This bill would allow these public servants, who must leave the public service through no fault of their own, to receive the full pension they deserve and have earned.

PETITIONS

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from an organization in my riding. The petitioners pray that Parliament reject euthanasia, physician assisted suicide in Canada, and consider expanding palliative care centres to ensure that they are accessible to all Canadians who are passing through the last days of their lives.

• (1010)

VIOLENCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would have a second petition to table. It concerns violence and abuse in our society.

[English]

The petitioners point out that violence in our society is a concern throughout the land. They want violence in the media, whether it be on radio or television, looked at very carefully. The petitioners ask specifically that government ensure that the CRTC do whatever it can in this matter. They acknowledge there have been some initiatives undertaken and some successes. They point out that violence is not necessary to inform or entertain. They point out that they feel it goes counter to their efforts to raise their families.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 236 Canadians across Ontario.

The petitioners recognize the importance of mining in Canada and the problems caused by depleting oil reserves. They endorse the 10 point program of action put out by the Keep Mining in Canada campaign. They pray that Parliament take all the necessary measures and steps to increase employment in this sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada. I concur with the petitioners fully.

CFB MOOSE JAW

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions to present this morning.

First, I am very pleased to present a petition signed by 3,615 residents of Moose Jaw and surrounding area. These many and concerned petitioners call upon Parliament to refrain from closing or downsizing 15 Wing, refrain from consolidating flight training to Southport, Manitoba, and refrain from moving or disbanding the world famous Snowbirds.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by 40 constituents of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre and requests amendment of the Criminal Code to extend protection to the unborn child.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the third petition, which is signed by 40 constituents of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, they ask Parliament not to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships and/or homosexuality.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth petition is signed by 39 constituents of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre who pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have four petitions this morning presented to me by constituents in my riding.

The first has to do with the use of guns. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to refrain from making further changes to existing firearm control legislation and direct the judicial system to enforce existing penalties more stringently in the effort to deliver effective crime deterrents.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition has to do with the matter of the sanctity of life. The petitioners pray that the government ensures that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the abiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition speaks about the unborn. The petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth petition has to do with sexual orientation. The petitioners are asking that the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms not be changed in any way to allow and indicate the societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

I support these petitioners.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would like to inform the House that the draw for Private Members' Business scheduled to be held today at 1.15 p.m. has been rescheduled to Friday, February 24, 1995 at 2 p.m.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—THE DEFICIT

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.) moved:

That this House reject this government's totally inadequate target which reduces the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP within 2 years and will leave Canada, at the end of the period, with a federal deficit of about $25 billion, a federal debt of over $600 billion, $50 billion in annual interest payments and higher taxes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to stand today to speak to this motion, primarily because the Reform Party has broken tradition. This is an historic day. We have presented to the Government of Canada an alternate budget before its budget has been presented.

It is a particularly historic day because opposition parties have always been noted for opposition, for saying negative things, for carping about the problems created by various governments. They have never had the courage of their convictions, nor the wisdom perhaps, to put together an alternative and bring it forward. In this way not only Parliament can see, but so can all Canadians, that there truly is an alternative to the thought processes that have driven Canada to its financial knees over the last 15 years. I am exceptionally proud of what the Reform Party has done and proud to be a part of it.

I would like to read the section from our document that pertains directly to this:

"Reformers understand that there are many compelling reasons to eliminate the federal deficit quickly and decisively. Among them are the unsustainability of the Chrétien government's current fiscal path; the twin threats of rising interest rates and a falling dollar, and the need to prepare responsibly for the next cyclical downturn in the economy."

"Two more are of particular concern to Reformers: the risk that Canada's dire fiscal situation poses to our social fabric and the need to restore the confidence of Canadians and investors in the government's ability to manage its finances."

"The greatest risk to Canada's social fabric are the threats of annual deficits and a rising national debt, which over the past 30 years have crowded out many legitimate expenditures of governments."

"As was demonstrated most vividly in the last recession the government's ability to provide some stability during periods of economic dislocation is seriously strained".

At the news conference this morning where the Reform Party revealed all of the figures and the entire thought process behind our budget, there was a rather insightful question from a news reporter. He stated to the leader of the Reform Party: "I do not understand. When you last put together your budget you were talking about a $9 billion to $10 billion decrease in non–social spending and another $9 billion decrease in social spending. Why have you just added to the social spending side? Why have you taken the social spending decreases from $9 billion to $16 billion"?

Our leader very accurately reflected the fact that since those numbers were put together in 1992, as a result of the direct spending of this government and the past government, we have now moved a further $100 billion into debt. As a consequence the reduction in the availability of funding for social programs has now been reduced a further $7 billion.

For example the member for Beaches—Woodbine went before the press gallery yesterday and said: "We are not over taxed. Companies are not over taxed. We seem to have bought into that kind of jargon and it is not true".

These people are rather out of step with reality. Reality is that the average family income is $46,488, of which $17,000 goes for food, clothing and shelter; $21,000 goes to taxes. Over the last 12 years corporations have had their tax load increased 69 per cent while their profits have decreased 10 per cent. The member apparently does not understand the concept of down loading.

• (1020)

In fact, the federal government downloads to the provincial, municipal, hospital districts and libraries. We have to pay for water, different post office charges, sewage, garbage, all of the user fees as a result of the federal government downloading. Indeed Canadians are being taxed far beyond the max.

However, the comment that particularly caught my eye was one from the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce. He, being first elected in 1965, is quoted in the Ottawa Citizen as saying: "I helped build many of these things", referring to the social programs, "I have no intention of participating in their dismantling".

As long as the government refuses to recognize that by driving us further and further into the hole, thereby raising annual interest rates, it is destroying Canada's ability to fund social programs. It is just that simple and it is what this issue is about.

It was interesting that the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, in talking about being one of the people to bring in these programs, probably has forgotten that one of the main architects of medicare in Canada, Tommy Douglas, actually delayed its implementation in Saskatchewan because he knew that his government at the time could not afford it. The government that brought in these programs, and perhaps the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, at that time did not have the size of debt that Canada has now.

We will see the consequences of the government's inability to restrain its spending and to get things under control as starting the erosion of these programs. The erosion of these programs will occur because we are going further and further into debt by borrowing money to pay the interest on the money we have already borrowed. The debt in the last year grew at a rate of 10.3 per cent. Tax revenue grew at a rate of 3.3 per cent thereby creating a 7 per cent spread.

I notice one of the members from the other side, who is knowledgeable about these things, is shaking his head. If he goes to a document prepared for the Council for Economic Education with figures from his department he will find a reflection of the figures I just gave the House. The debt is growing at a rate of 10.3 per cent and tax revenue is growing at a rate of 3.3 per cent. That growth is entirely to pay the interest on the money we have already borrowed.

It is quite fascinating to give the House an idea of how far out of step the members on the other side are when on Friday last week the member for Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe rose and said: "I rise in the House today to indicate my outrage that Moody's bond rating agency would place Canada's credit rating under review only two weeks before the federal government's budget comes down. Why did it not just place a horse's head in the finance minister's bed?" Maybe that is what needs to happen in order to get the attention of the other side of the House.

The reality is that when the Prime Minister stood in front of the nation, indeed in front of the world on January 16 and said: "We are doing all that we can on the expenditure side but we have to do something on the taxation side", the interest rate went up one full percentage point. In fact, what happened was that the dollar still dropped one–third of a point.

Last night, to show just how delicate this situation is, in a 12–hour period the Canadian dollar went up one full cent and down one full cent. We are literally on the edge. It is no wonder that Moody's and other people like the Wall Street Journal and all of the other publications that advise people who make buying decisions of our Canadian debt and our Canadian currency, are spooked. They are spooked because the government refuses to realize that we can no longer go further and further into debt.

• (1025)

One final note, and I apologize to you, Mr. Speaker and to the House. I failed to inform you that I was going to be splitting my time with another member. I have one final comment.

Mexico, the precursor of where Canada is going in this issue, today has 50 per cent interest rates. Oil payments are being confiscated by the U.S. in order to make sure that the U.S. will stand behind them. Is that really what the government wants? If it is, I can tell the House it is not what I want.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to see this alternate budget to which the member referred in his remarks.

I did see an alternate budget put out by the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives last week. It looked at balancing the budget by looking at the expenditure side and some of the tax loopholes, the foundations that have been set up for the wealthy and the tax breaks there and so on.

Yesterday I had the opportunity to go through a paper put out by the Council of Canadians which looks at the question: Are social programs to blame for the federal debt? It clearly points out in the analysis that program spending as a percentage of GDP has remained relatively constant in social programs over the years.

Your remarks seem to indicate an attack on the social program side. I am wondering if you in your budget, do you have any—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. While we are in the early stages of debate on the opposition motion, may I take the time to remind the House to make all their interventions through the Chair and not directly to one another.

Mr. Easter: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the member for Kootenay East could tell me if in the proposals, they have made any suggestions to close some of the tax loopholes. Does he have any suggestions to deal with the speculative trade in the dollar that is happening in the international financial markets.

I recognize that speculators are playing games with the Canadian dollar, but does he not see the need to try and control that in a global sense so that countries can retain some sovereignty over their finances?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate both of those questions.

Being a member of the Standing Committee on Finance—and I notice another member from the Standing Committee on Finance—he would probably agree with me that the committee has been looking at family trusts as well as at a number of different areas. In fact, these so called loopholes are really just myths.

There are some specifics where there has to be some tightening up. I attended a briefing by the revenue department yesterday where we were looking at some of the propositions within the revenue department to tighten up on certain areas. These gaping loopholes simply are a product of wishful thinking.

With respect to controlling speculation, the difficulty is that in the last 10 years the percentage of federal marketable security, that is our bonds and our debt instruments in the hands of people outside of Canada, has increased from 10 per cent of our federal marketable securities to 28 per cent.

In other words, federal marketable securities are now controlled or in the hands of people outside of Canada to the tune of 28 per cent of the total amount outstanding versus only 10 per cent 10 years ago. That has occurred because the previous government and this government refuse to get spending under control, and as a consequence we are at the mercy of these traders.

To try and get control over a trader in Hong Kong or in London or in New York is a non–starter. It is simply not going to happen. These are myths to which I am happy to speak.

• (1030)

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to talk about this most serious topic, the most serious thing to threaten Canada as we know it, our debt and deficit.

I can state in no uncertain terms that this is the number one problem facing our country and that the citizens of Canada are demanding action. As I speak our federal debt alone is over $550 billion. It is increasing at almost $40 billion per year.

This is a financial crisis. We have to stop kidding ourselves and we have to start facing reality. The sheer size of these numbers is so gigantic that most Canadians, myself included, have a tough time really understanding what they mean to us. When we bring things down to an every day level, we see just how dramatic this problem really is.

The interest on our debt is a staggering $80,000 a minute. All of that money goes up in smoke, most of it to foreign investors. If the government were allowed to spend that money more productively on necessary services, on all of the jobs that are being threatened, on the social programs now threatened by this loss, if we could just put that money toward those things, how much more productive this country could become.

To put that in common terms, if we were to give away 288,000 colour television sets every day, after a month every home and apartment in this country would have one of those colour television sets. If the month has 31 days instead of 30 days the money for that one extra day of government could buy 4.431 million cases of beer, even more if it does not have alcohol content in it. That poor suffering taxpayer could have a few cold ones while watching "Hockey Night in Canada" on his new colour television set.

The numbers are simply astounding. By the time I finish my 10–minute speech the money shelled out in interest on our debt could have paid a year's worth of university tuition for 270 Canadian students.

What is the government going to do about this ridiculous situation? What is its plan? According to the red book the government is aiming to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by the end of its term. The finance minister says with pride that he will meet his targets come hell or high water. What does it really mean to Canadians?

It means an unspeakable high debt of over $600 billion. It means we will still be overspending by $25 billion per year. It dooms Canadians to higher taxes and it begs for a financial crisis of epic proportions. I think it is safe to say that the government was not elected to do any of these things. If it wants to prevent a crisis, it had better start setting some realistic targets.

I have no doubt that the government will claim that it has inherited a legacy of the past, the accumulated mismanagement of nine years worth of Tory rule. Not only is this an unacceptable case of passing buck, it is also completely irrelevant. The government must play the hand that it has been dealt and do it to the very best of its ability. The citizens of Canada are demanding that the government take action.

It is a disgrace that on election day we had a debt of approximately $489 billion and today we have over $550 billion, $61 billion higher than it was the day we started this Parliament. That is a disgrace.

How should the government deal with the deficit? Because the Reform Party cares we have asked the people of Canada through electronic national town hall meetings, many town hall meetings across the country, in curling rinks, service clubs, chambers of commerce and people on the streets. They have told us clearly what should happen. The people of Canada are willing to bite the bullet and take their medicine. They are willing to do this because they know the price today, though painful, will be much less than if they slide and go deeper and deeper into the hole.

If only the finance minister had that message a year ago. Since his disastrously weak budget last year our dollar has dropped steadily, our interest rates have soared and now our credit rating is being reviewed.

• (1035)

Last year the finance minister refused to take on a role of leadership and it has now cost all Canadians dearly. I hope that this will never happen again. The budget must make the tough decisions and it must make them now.

Throughout the prebudgetary process the Reform Party has not only emphasized that the government targets were ridiculous, but that they were ridiculously low and inadequate. We have come up with our own suggestions as to where the cuts should be allocated. That is because we wanted to be constructive and not just adopt the traditional opposition role of criticizing the government after the fact.

Therefore this morning we have released the taxpayers' budget—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Certainly all members of the House can refer to materials, studies and texts of every nature. However, none should be used as props. I say that to caution everyone who will engage in this debate.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe this is an important point because if the opposition party is basing this on a document which it is willing to produce to Canadians, it should have distributed it. I would point out that it is not available to the government at this side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I have already dealt with the matter. Certainly while the hon. member wanted to make a point, it is not a point of order. Again I would caution members on both sides of the House that props will not be accepted in this debate or in any other debate.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, copies are available at Room 200 West Block for anyone who would like one. This morning we released this budget, which charts a course that would eliminate the deficit in three years with no tax increases. No other opposition party in history has achieved this and we are very proud of our accomplishment. We have worked hard as critics and as members of this party to make that happen.

I am sure that the government's spin doctors and certain members of the media will see this as a great opportunity to cast our party in a negative light. They will read through our 60–page budget searching for that one sentence which they think will make us look bad.

It will not work because Canadians are smart enough to know how hard the Reform Party is working to provide an alternative vision for this country, smart enough to appreciate that we are being honest with them about the size of our economic problem and smart enough to ignore the mischief of political spin doctors who think they can manipulate people with the stroke of a pen.

The days of old line party manipulation are gone. The people of Canada are now in charge. They have shown it through the referendum, they have shown it through the last election.

The targets we have set in our taxpayers' budget are real and achievable. They are tough but they are fair. They are explicit and come with explanations as to why we are making the suggestions. I urge all Canadians to get a copy of the budget or the summary and read it for themselves. The Reform Party is willing to accept the judgment of the people of Canada, not the spin doctors.

We want our alternate budget compared with the Minister of Finance's budget next week. I believe that Canadians will agree that the government's target of 3 per cent of GNP is just not good enough. When Canadians read through our document they will notice there is a wide array of expenditure reductions. I would like to talk about the ones that affect my area, foreign affairs.

Over the past year the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs has conducted a comprehensive review and made a number of suggestions for possible cuts. Although we were not successful in convincing the committee that there should be these cuts, I might summarize the three areas where we suggested them: in bilateral government to government aid; in international grants and non–mandatory contributions; dropping memberships in a number of non–essential international organizations.

We belong to hundreds of organizations. Some of them are not even functional any more. We want the minister and Prime Minister to stop using this aid package as a slush fund every time they take an international trip. We also believe that there should be a substantial cut to the operating expenditures for foreign affairs in CIDA. In total the Reform Party is proposing a cut of $1.3 billion to our international commitments over the next three years. We are proposing not only cuts but a much greater emphasis on accountability, transparency and efficiency in delivering the service.

While these cuts are steep, we believe they reflect the priorities of the grassroots of Canadians. We believe they could be implemented in a way that would preserve those programs to the greatest of their value.

In conclusion, the people of Canada are sending a clear message to cut the deficit to zero in three years and not to raise taxes. The government will either do its job and listen or it will travel the road the Tories took, the road to nowhere. This is the government's last chance. For Canada's sake I hope it will choose the right road.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak for a few minutes. I have heard all kinds of things since being elected to this House a little over a year ago and I have sincerely tried to understand our friends from the Reform Party. It sure is not easy. I sometimes get the feeling that they have rocks in the head. Something is wrong with them. Perhaps they have bats in their belfry. For whatever reason, they are not quite with us.

It is obvious that everybody wants to go to heaven but nobody wants to die. We all agree on that. When Reformers talk about cutting government spending, I agree with them that cuts have to be made. The point was made that extravagant expenditures were made in the past, on embassies, for example. It happens that certain things slip by the government unnoticed. The Reform Party estimates that the major part of government expenses responsible for the national debt approaching $600 billion are expenses the government made in an effort to help Canadians by developing social policies, in an effort to put Canada on the map with a number of social projects.

If drastic cuts were to be made in all this today, as suggested by the Reform Party, some 33 to 40 per cent of Canadians would just starve. This is unacceptable on the part of a political party, although I must admit it shows that Reformers have a lot of guts. I am impressed by their courage in tabling budget number one of the era of Reform. I am not as impressed, however, with the contents of the document. They are attacking multiculturalism, Canadian bilingualism, and Canadian subsidies. But do they know that $900 million is granted every year to Western producers, in their home region?

If this was cut overnight, what would happen to these people back home? Western farmers would simply be condemned to die slowly but surely of starvation. Now, this is not what politics is about. One has to know when and where to cut so that it is as painless as possible. It may be great fun to cut back the federal civil service by 30 per cent, but if you just drive civil servants out of A to force them onto B, B being welfare, and have no money to pay for welfare through federal–provincial transfers, I fear that Reform Party voters will have to tie their wallets to a chain, as some people have already started doing. This country will be subjected to widespread plunder.

Our social programs are also used to buy social peace. Take that away and the Reformers may well see prison populations swell, which is what they want, as a result of their fiscal policy. I do not know. I am just trying to understand.

This budget number one of the Reform Party does not strike me as a serious one. I would suggest that it goes back to the drawing board and come up with something practical, not prima facie grandstanding, something that makes sense.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, certainly there were a number of questions there.

I guess the first one is that the socialist utopia that we often hear mentioned by the other parties is just not reality any more. Therefore what we have done is attempted in our budget to empower senior citizens, students and our native people so that they can start taking care of themselves more and more.

Our program of an RPSP goes a long way in that area of taking care of people. What we have to do is target those people who need it most. That is the most important aspect.

• (1045)

We should mention as well that these cuts must be fair across the board. Most farmers in the west, as was mentioned by the member, are prepared to say: "Get government out of my face. Let me handle my own business. I am quite prepared to do that". He mentioned those cuts; we have been advocating them for years. They are nothing new. They are asking just to get government out of their lives.

Basically we want to put money in the hands of people. There will not be people lying on the streets who cannot take care of themselves; they will be taken care of. That is the whole nature of the program.

The member is welcome to review the document and discuss it at length with me or any member of our party. We would be glad to do that.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the third party for bringing the motion to the floor of the House, beginning with its press conference at nine o'clock this morning.

I will be very measured in my response. It is very rare that I can be so angered as a parliamentarian with the presentation of a case by the opposition parties. However when one cuts corners to the extent of deluding Canadians about the task that faces us, it is something that all parliamentarians should take seriously and look at closely.

This is an opportunity for Canada to turn the corner. I do not think any of us discount the anger felt by taxpayers and Canadians in general about the nature of the debt we now face. As a government we have undertaken with a great deal of pride and deliberation to ensure that our deficit is under control. We are the first government to set targets. We are the first government to meet its targets. We have approached the problem with a reasonable determination to succeed. We believe Canadians want success in deficit reduction more than anything else.

It comes as no surprise to anybody in the House that this debt is one that tragically encumbers our ability to be successful as a government. Speaking on behalf of the government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, we will succeed in these objectives.

In this context we have an opposition party that has sought to play with fire. Those of us who have been in Parliament for a while all know what happens when a parliamentarian plays with fire. Scenarios and perceptions are created perhaps deliberately or not deliberately that are simply false. People are given the impression that a solution is just around the corner or that a solution is merely writing things off with the stroke of a pen.

I come from a very poor constituency. I have seen families in economic difficulty. The hardest thing is to say to them: "Things are not likely to be better for one or two years, but if you really stick to this poor paying job and your family gets an education things will be better". It is hope for a better future that makes us all work together as Canadians.

We cannot go to families encumbered by a lot of debt and say: "In two or three months things are going be fine". We cannot tell Canadians that in one or two years things are going to be fine because I do not think they will be all better within two years. Do I think it will be better in the near future? I actually think that. The government believes that and will work toward that objective.

Let me refer to some small items. The non–votable motion before us takes the government to task for its deficit reduction targets "within two years". The taxpayers' budget, the so–called document of the Reform Party, talks about three years. On the one hand we have set out a two–year program. We have been silent on the third year except to say, again in a very determined fashion, that we will meet the new targets we set. Those targets will get us closer and closer to a balanced budget.

By this sleight of hand the leader of the third party talks about his three–year plan and juxtaposes it with our two–year plan to get within 3 per cent of GNP. That is the unfair nature of the document.

I have another point. He opened his address this morning and very carefully chose not to be in Parliament where he could be criticized and subject to scrutiny such as the Minister of Finance will be next week or the week after or whenever the budget is presented. He very publicly said that we must not be subject to the $40 billion of debt that we borrow from foreigners each year.

We did not go to the debt market for $40 billion. The opposition critic and his assistants who he very nicely complimented during his speech know that under Bill C–14 our borrowing limit was far below $40 billion. We have not come back for an amendment. At no time this year did we say we would be borrowing $40 billion. In fact, if last month continues to be as suitable as the first 11 months of the fiscal year, it will probably be closer to $30 billion under Bill C–14. That is either poor research or a deliberate effort to tell Canadians something that is substantially not what it is.

The opposition party also plays footloose with the tragedy that happened to the Mexican economy and the difficult remarks made by Moody's last week. It takes glee in telling us: "I told you so. We are almost a basket case".

Does the party opposite realize the cost to Canadian homeowners? Does the House realize the cost to the housing market or the price we all pay because of these international factors? We should not take with pride that the Mexican economy collapses. We should not join the chorus of the Wall Street Journal and some editorial writer saying: "We think Canada is just like Mexico".

When the opposition party puts that into public record, some researcher in a Wall Street office or over in London looks it up and says: "Gee whiz, there are parliamentarians in Canada who think Canada is like Mexico". That is the finance critic. Then interest rates go up another half a per cent or another per cent. The housing market gets into difficulty. Families find it difficult. Credit card rates go up and we are charged greater prices. Then they can turn around in April, May or June and say: "See, I told you that you were getting into difficulty". That is essentially irresponsible.

The opposition party went through its taxpayers' budget and it went through $10 billion of cutbacks in government programs. I thank that party, as I did during the finance committee hearings, for the directness and willingness to work on the issue. The finance minister and the government in program review are looking for significant ways to cut federal expenditures. As I said in my opening remarks, we will not in any way, shape or form back off from the objectives we have set ourselves.

There is an honest way of doing it and there are other ways of doing it. Let me suggest one point. The top item all of us on this side agree with is to reform MPs' pension plan, eliminate excessive travel of federal officials and reduce the number of ministers of state and parliamentary secretaries for a savings of $10 million. Now $10 million is a lot of money. Everybody knows that the pension plan produces no savings in the next three years. There are roughly 20 parliamentary secretaries and we all get the grand sum of $10,000. That would save $200,000. The ministers of state get a bit more. Let us say the total savings would be $500,000.

That leaves us with $9.5 million for excessive federal travel. The $9.5 million at $1,000 a trip would amount to 9,500 trips every year. That is a lot of unnecessary trips. If we look at each week, it would be 190 trips a week out of the Ottawa International Airport. This is excessive federal travel. If a deputy minister or a minister thought that level of excessive travel was happening, we would find the responsible public servants and politicians reined in. I would argue that this type of oversimplification is what brings the wave of anger across the country on to the floor of Parliament and does not filter as a responsible parliamentarian would what is honestly wrong with the system and what is not.

As long as they play to the crowd that this is corrupt place, a place where people do not work and a place where people try to rip off the system, the country will not feel good about itself.

The major transformation we have to make, which the government has taken to its Prime Minister as the primary responsibility of governing, is to ensure Canadians have confidence in their government, confidence in the way their dollars are being spent and confidence that we have a plan for the future. Each of those objectives is being met by the government. We are not about to roll over and allow cheap criticisms in any way, shape or form to pull us down from this honourable sense of purpose.

Empowering individuals, families and communities: if we read each of these items carefully we see that the Reform is promising tax relief.

Let us go back. We want to balance the budget. One of the most difficult things to do at the federal level is to protect the integrity of the fiscal base of the central government. We are under a lot of pressure. We have an underground economy about which people argue as to its depth. We have many thousands of concerned Canadians voicing their opinions. I received petitions on behalf of newspapers and the Canadian Taxpayers Federation yesterday.

There are many hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are disturbed by their level of taxation. We would be wrong to ignore that in the context of making a budget.

Empowering seniors—long term tax relief or reform. Why do Reformers include that? They announced a $3 billion dollar cutback in payments to seniors within the next three years. I know the member for Kingston and the Islands would be interested to know that they are going to do it after consultation. That means this year is lost. They also do not recognize the fact that the senior population is increasing. If we do not do anything in this government, the actual current levels of expenditures go up because of an increasing population.

They are not taking out $3 billion but $5 billion. That is fair enough, but they should say $5 billion and not say $3 billion. They should do their research to understand how people are being helped and not being helped.

Empowering families: strengthen the capacity of families to care for themselves with tax relief.

Mr. Milliken: How much is that worth?

Mr. Walker: What is the price attached to that? It is not known.

Empowering the unemployed and job creators: tax relief or reform. Empowering citizens to meet education needs: this is after suggesting that we should get out of education.

What do they say? They refer to an annual federal–provincial conference to define national standards. Have they ever gone to a federal–provincial meeting where they did not contribute anything and did not have any authority? Who is inviting them? What are they doing at the table? Nobody cares if they are there if they are not contributing something. However they have said that is what we are supposed to be doing.

Empowering those who cannot help themselves: tax relief. Those who cannot help themselves get tax relief. If I were to tell the people on social assistance in Winnipeg North Centre that I was going to help them with tax relief, they would be very curious about what taxes I was relieving them of when they cannot afford anything and they get about $400 a month on social assistance.

Empowerment for aboriginals: many Canadians are frustrated with the administration and the development of self–government in Canada. It would be wrong to deny that. The Reform Party suggests a substantial savings on the aboriginal community. It is about $500 million; I do not have it in front of me.

What do we do when that population base increases about 6 per cent per year? The baby boom within the aboriginal community is the most pronounced generational problem in the country. If we did that we would not just be freezing money, but on a per capita basis when dealing with questions of housing, education and assistance to young people within the aboriginal community there would be phenomenal cutbacks.

The Reform Party has pronounced a huge cutback in the CBC, with a savings of $375 million. Those of us who look at the CBC carefully know there have been a lot of criticisms. I am sure the CBC understands this, but to cut $375 million would probably end CBC television.

This morning when the leader of the third party stood up in room 200, what did he arrange to have? Well, well, well, national broadcast by the CBC. What does he want to use? He wants to use national broadcasting to promote the end of the company doing that national promotion. Does he ever mention it in his speech? No, he just swerves right by it and remains silent on the whole issue. That is the nature of this presentation.

This goes on day after day. Those members talk about equalization. The first thing this government did, Bill C–3, was to stabilize equalization for the poor provinces across this country. This is a very important point because as we move toward other funding and as we begin to deal with the provinces and as we can tell from the report of the federal–provincial meeting last week, these are going to be difficult times for many of the provinces which have to be given credit for the fact that they have shown leadership and produced near balanced or balanced budgets.

Pretty well all the budgets in western Canada, for example in my own region, are getting close to being balanced. Different strategies are being applied, some gradual, some very abrupt strategies but nevertheless they have been stabilized. Equalization is an opportunity for the federal government to make sure that the other provinces which have a more difficult time have some stability.

They suggest a $500 million cutback in stabilization. However, if we look at it, stabilization increases about $500 million a year. Therefore to freeze it at the level they are doing is a much more extensive cut than they have said. Sixty per cent of equalization payments in this country go to the province of Quebec. It is a very important contribution that the federal government makes.

I would suggest as we are moving into a very difficult year in fighting out the referendum. All parties should appreciate the extent to which the federal government supports the economy of Quebec and not undertake budget initiatives which destabilize that economy at a very important time in our history.

To not acknowledge in the paper whether or not they understand the relationship between equalization and the economy of Quebec, whether or not they just choose to ignore it is a moot question which I am sure they will be willing to address later on.

However, the federal government has a responsibility when it set out a program in March of one year to the next year to continue that program and to continue the stabilization.

They go on to talk about the reform of the social security structure. They have a new program to come out which is basically to disband the RRSP idea. One of the most expensive programs that we have in this country, the way the federal government helps families and individuals, is through pensions. It is through support of the RRSPs and through the support of the registered pension plans. We by most estimates allow $15 billion of contributions to go into those plans without taxes. That is one of the major tax expenditures that we have.

If one wants to have a balanced budget within three years, I would suggest that there are limits to ways that one can extend new programs. To put out the feeler or just a vague idea to Canadians that there is going to be tax relief, there is going to be tax reform, it is going to be made easier for them in the future is a subtle signal that it cannot be sustained by any logical argument.

The last part of what they talk about is a taxpayer protection plan. This has been tried in other countries. The fact is that the last government played with the idea also. We have a parliamentary system. In the parliamentary system it is very difficult to contain a government from doing what it wants to do. That goes back to Walter Bagehot and the English Constitution.

Whether one likes it or not a parliamentary system does have a lot of power. To argue that by law one can change the behaviour of a government is wrong. In reality one has to change it in the spirit of the government and by the moral commitment it makes to be reasonable with taxpayers' money.

That moral commitment, that fiscal commitment, is here in this government. To offer taxpayers protection act again puts out this phoney signal that there is a solution just around the corner: "If only the government would agree with our act".

Here is where silence is not golden. They talk about taxpayers. What do they not define? The taxpayer. Who is one of the most common taxpayers? Corporations and banks. Are they saying that tax base should never be changed, that there should never be another tax, that Canadians are happy with the corporate and bank tax structure in this country, that none of us have ever heard people ask what we are going to do about the tax on this and the tax on that? What about the foreign ownership of the Canadian economy? Are we going to remain silent on that, a taxpayer issue that we are going to put into the Constitution?

My time is limited and my comments are extensive. I have tried to contain my frustration with an opposition party which is misusing an opportunity immediately before a federal budget to give Canadians the false hope that there is an easy solution, that we can somehow magically eliminate all the problems and all the bad judgments made by governments over the last two decades. Yes, I include the government and my own party in that.

We have accumulated a lot of debt. To acknowledge the accumulation of debt is also to admit that we have a very difficult problem ahead of us. All of us will have constituents who will suffer. If any member in the House thinks that their own constituency is going to be exempt, that their own lifestyle is going to be exempt, that we will not feel the effects of this budget, they are kidding themselves. Our job is to maintain a consensus in this country, not to have a social struggle, not to have class bitterness, but to understand that we are all in this together.

I thank the House very much for the opportunity to participate in this debate and I look forward to comments from other members.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I suppose on the other side of the coin I share the member's concern about having to keep one's feelings in a proper perspective in the spirit of debate in this House.

I found it particularly difficult when he was standing and very selectively making comments and extracts from where we were talking about Canadians being able to help themselves. Rather than going through the whole process of points one through five, he chose to stay on only one point. I find that really unfortunate and I do not think it really does anything for the level of debate in this House.

He has a complete lack of understanding of the rage that there is on the part of Canadians at this moment. The reason there is a demand for a taxpayer protection act is that we currently have a government in Canada whose leader stood before the people of this country and said there would be no tax increases for two years. The election was in October 1993. That is less than two years and this government will bring in tax increases. Canadians want the ability to be able to make politicians accountable.

The Prime Minister, when he was on the stump, said there would be no tax increases except in the case of war. The last time I looked the only war was the war which this government is creating on social programs by its constant overspending.

The hon. member suggested that the Reform Party is doing a disservice, that investors somewhere or people doing research are going to take a look and say there is a member of Parliament who is actually speaking up and saying things that are said in this week's Maclean's magazine which reported:

> Nevertheless, even Canada's best run governments and companies are now bracing for the sting of a credit downgrade. The federal government's credit rating is a ceiling that no other Canadian credit can vault. And if Ottawa's rating falls, Moody's has already served notice that it will also slash those of the provinces, including British Columbia, as well as eight triple-A rated municipalities across the country. One of those is London, Ontario, which currently has a debt of $83 million. "A downgrade would have a significant impact on our borrowing costs"—

It is also going to affect Sun Life Assurance, Imperial Oil and the rest.

I do not understand how this member or any of the other members can stand in this House and say that just because the Reform Party is saying it like it is that somehow it is wrong. This is supposed to be a House of truth.

The Financial Post last Friday, quoting from Moody's Investor Service, reported:

> "We downgraded Italy in 1993 and it was very controversial", recalled Vincent Truglia, the senior analyst at Moody's Investor Service Inc. responsible for yesterday's review of Canada's debt ratings, which could result in downgrades.
> In the case of Italy, Truglia concluded that though the country's economic picture was brightening, given the nature of Italian society it would be very difficult for the government to maintain fiscal austerity in the medium term.
> "Everyone disagreed with us at the time and thought we were crazy", said Truglia, but Moody's analysis, "has in fact proven to be the case quite strongly".

● (1110)

These are warnings. I ask the parliamentary secretary to the finance minister why will the government not at least acknowledge these warnings? Even on the front page of the Vancouver Sun last Friday the finance minister said that he was surprised, he was shocked, he was outraged. These are warnings. Should we not be taking these as warnings rather than simply saying it is too bad the Reform Party is bringing up these terrible issues in the House?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I see the member for Kootenay East is doing serious reading. He started out with Maclean's, went to the Financial Post and then the Vancouver Sun. I am glad he stopped his reading list right then and there.

I think there are more serious ways of looking at what rating companies do. There is no doubt that everybody is concerned about it. The Minister of Finance expressed his own concern in answering questions in the House of Commons last week.

I am not going to downplay the concerns that we have about how the world sees us and the volatility of the money markets over the last 12 months dealing with issues such as the referendum, dealing with the national debt and the provincial debt. All these questions weigh heavily on the government. To belittle them would be self-denial.

The question becomes how we approach the country. Do we approach it as a sad sack? Do we approach it as if this is about to be the end? Or do we say to ourselves this is a strong country, we have a tremendous economy? The OECD says we will continue to lead the industrial world for the next two years in economic growth, that we have the fastest growth rate, around 4.5 per cent. This is strength. These are companies and individuals going out and doing something.

We have rates of expansion in our export markets which are second to none in the world. We have strength. What we should be doing as parliamentarians is adding to that strength and not exercising the negative.

Yes, the report from Moody's was a very negative report. That does not necessarily mean it is correct. It does not mean that we should all sort of give in and say this is a terrible country, why do families stay here, why are we bothering doing anything here. As parliamentarians our job is to say that this is a pretty good country. What we should be doing is building upon this base and not trying to destroy it.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to build on the last sentence of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, that we are here not to just talk about fiscal discipline but we are also here to talk about creating an environment for growth that will put people back to work.

As I review the taxpayers' budget put forward by the Reform Party today I felt that specifics related to job creation and putting people back to work were pretty thin.

I would like to get reassurance from the parliamentary secretary that we as a government have not wavered from our commitment and our focus on putting Canadians back to work. Ultimately I believe that the two million plus people who do not have work are a heck of a lot more concerned about our commitment to that reality.

This whole debate on deficit and fiscal discipline which has pretty much crowded that part of the debate out also needs some discussion. I wonder if I could get some reassurance from the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, this government was elected on the question of jobs. We have created over 400,000 jobs. More important, the economy has created 400,000 jobs.

We are very supportive of companies, particularly small businesses that are expanding. We will form a budget that supports the creation of jobs in small, medium and even large businesses in this economy. Our job here is to support others who create the jobs.

• (1115)

The parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for industry is very interested in the tourism industry. He believes, as does the government, that we can really create jobs by supporting our tourism industry. I have no compunction about saying in the House that we will do everything we can to support tourism.

With respect to cutbacks, there is only one area the third party will not cut money from. It is not tourism. It is not regional development. What is the one area that it will not take a penny from? Jails. Members of that party can only be positive about jails. If we stop and think about it, we wonder what kind of perverted logic that is. We are looking at the way government spends money and the only thing they can be positive about is jails.

To their credit they are also supporting the Department of Justice on gun control by allowing money for that, and it is appreciated. However, we have to be concerned with more than just jails. We have to be concerned about job creation, about creating another 40,000 jobs, building enthusiasm and showing support for the entrepreneurs and companies in this country that are trying to rebuild our economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today we have a good example of the financial trouble we are in: a government which does not do anything, which does not realize the magnitude of the problem, and an extreme right wing opposition ready to impose a drastic remedy on all citizens.

Allow me to come back to the Reform Party's motion, although I do not feel it is worthwhile spending a great deal of time on it. Many of the things we do in this House are not always very helpful, and we are maintaining this tradition this morning.

If we have a quick look at government finances, we see that, first of all, this year's deficit will still hover around $38 billion. We will continue to get into debt for the 24th year in a row. Our debt will exceed $545 billion, while interest rates will add $85,000 a minute to our debt.

Our structural deficit is $28 billion, which means that even with phenomenal growth and a fully functioning economy, this deficit would persist. The Canadian economy is plagued by many structural problems. The Reform Party's discussion paper does not have much to say on this. Interest on the debt amounted to $38 billion last year and will reach $45 billion this year.

Our external debt represents 44 per cent of our total debt. When referring to our external debt, we must also take into account provincial governments, municipalities and businesses. Forty–four per cent of our economic activity is in foreign hands. The problem with foreign debt is that our savings rate is insufficient and our economy is far from operating at its full potential.

I will also touch on what our Reform friends are suggesting this morning. I find it hard to call them "friends" when I read their document. This paper is a all–out attack against Quebec. Let us see what policy sectors they are going after. As we know, because of history and a number of factors, Quebec receives equalization payments, social assistance and unemployment insurance from the federal government.

These are the only sectors where federalists can say that they send Quebec more money than they receive from it. There is no reason to boast about sending Quebec more money in these sectors, whether it is social assistance, unemployment insurance or equalization payments.

This is how they compensate for the fact that Quebec does not get its fair share of subsidies allowing it to better structure its economy, as in research and development and other such sectors. They compensate with transfers, a kind of social assistance for the provinces.

Today, Reformers are telling us: "We will put some order into this. Not only will we not touch those sectors where Quebec is at a disadvantage, but we will cut UI, social assistance and equalization payments". The figures speak for themselves.

• (1120)

The Reform vision would include cutting a total of $15 billion from our social security system. That includes $3 billion in equalization payments. As we all know, equalization is one area where Quebec receives a fairly substantial amount. It does not work out to much per capita, for instance, but since our population is larger, the total amount is still quite substantial.

They want to cut in this area. They also want to cut $2.5 billion in welfare payments and $3.4 billion in unemployment insurance. These are the three biggest items they want to cut, but they also want to cut $6.6 billion in cash transfers to the provinces. This is incredible, and I am amazed that they failed to consider the regional impact of this so–called budget.

Perhaps the Reform Party should stop and think what the consequences and the impact of this budget would be on the Maritimes. They would also cut in other areas such as funding for official bilingualism and multiculturalism and the rest.

It is my impression that the Reform Party still acts like a regional party, a party whose vision does not go beyond the few regions it represents, a party that is incapable of looking at Canada as a whole, which is typical of the political situation in this country today. And it also says a lot about the future of a party that hopes to govern Canada someday. I would not wish this on any Canadian. In any case, we may not be around, but I would feel sorry for Canadians if they were ever governed by a party like the Reform Party. Besides, it would not be in the best interests of Quebecers for Canadians to suffer the impact of the lack of vision of these people on their social policies.

Just consider other cuts they would make. Three billion dollars cut from pension benefits. Three billion dollars, which works out to a 15 per cent cut in the income security system for senior citizens. Are they going to apply those cuts across the board? Fifteen per cent of everybody's pension cheques? Is that what they want to do? Hard to say. They do some simple arithmetic and come up with $3 billion, just like that.

They would make additional cuts totalling $3.4 billion in unemployment insurance, although they know perfectly well that this year, the Unemployment Insurance Fund will generate a very high surplus. They probably want to let the surplus accumulate or reduce premiums. It is not clear how they want to do that.

They would also make cuts of $200 million in funding for education. We know that they supported Minister Axworthy's plan that would raise tuition fees and let students pay a larger share of education costs. So it is not surprising that the Reform Party should suggest that. I am not sure what we should call this document, to do it justice. Perhaps we should call it an essay that would hardly get a passing mark.

There are another $10 billion in cuts that should be examined more closely, but basically, it is an all out attack against social programs and especially those that benefit Quebec.

What is the basis of the Reform Party's approach? It is generated by some kind of conservative ideology according to which the rich drive the economy and our social programs have burdened us with debt, and the only solution is to make drastic cuts in those programs in order to put public finances on a sound footing.

Their document does not talk about tax equity. Not at all. It does not talk much about fighting the underground economy. It does not mention the tax treatment of corporations or businesses because according to them, these are the people who generate economic activity and they should be praised for doing so. Their god is the "invisible hand" of Adam Smith at its best. Government has no place in the economy or the social sector, and if they could privatize social security completely, they would. But of course, they cannot go all out in that respect.

I heard them say in their introduction that they were proud of what they had done, proud of this document. If this document were actually in effect, however, I doubt they would be quite so proud about facing people in the street, sinking ever deeper into poverty.

Clearly they took their inspiration to some extent from the model provided by Alberta, which is going to fix up its public finances and will succeed in getting out of the deficit. However, one has to understand the Alberta model. Yesterday, there was a very good report on Le Point. If I am not mistaken, 30,000 welfare recipients have left Alberta. Where have they gone? Whose responsibility have they become? It is easy to do something in isolation, but others have to carry the cost of it. Where are they now? In British Columbia, Manitoba or Saskatchewan, and surely being provided for by another provincial government.

Some of them will no doubt re–enter the labour market, but still. So it is easy to do something in isolation when you can pass problems or costs on to others. It would be just about impossible to apply the Alberta solution to all of Canada. The additional revenues generated by the oil industry in Alberta this year could not be duplicated for Canada as a whole. The situation there is a highly specific one.

We should have a look as well at what all of this is doing to the health care system and to hospitals. I would like to quote a few passages from the Reform Party's document on decentralization, which echoes the Liberals in talk of new federalism, decentralized federalism, federalism on the move, developing federalism and everything else they would have us believe, but always with the same idea behind it all.

They suggest transferring financial problems to the provinces, which is what decentralization is all about, while maintaining national standards. Page 24 of their document provides that the federal government would use equalization to make these national standards attainable. However, further along in the figures, we see that they are going to cut equalization payments. They are therefore denying the means to those who need it to attain the national standards. Not only do we keep national standards high, but we cut the money and then we force them to meet the standards. How are the provinces, the recipients of equalization payments, going to attain these standards? This would be the worst decentralization scenario, if it were handled this way. We would of course keep all the departments on overlap service.

Further on, the document states that, in terms of the health care system, essential services must be maintained so that they may be covered. What is an essential service? What does it mean? Under this kind of health care system, does it mean that essential services will be available to anyone, at any hospital, on any given day? Do they know what the impact of all this will be? It is said that prevention is one of the weak spots in our health care system and in our society in general. I would be curious to see the impact that only covering essential services will have on that.

People with health problems that they consider minor will not get out and get treatment. What kind of health problems will that lead to? Obviously, they do not talk about this. Their approach is overly simplistic. If I were a teacher in a CEGEP—I suppose that such projects could not be considered university level—and I had to mark this project, I would be hard put to give it a passing mark.

I would like to touch on what could be done. There are some things that we should do to improve government finances, because they have been suggested. There is a difference between making things even more difficult for people, which is what the Reform Party would do, and doing nothing, which is what the current government is doing—it did nothing to reduce the deficit in its first year, then decided to put changes off for a year and is too afraid to make a move before the referendum in Quebec.

We must not think that we can fix 24 consecutive years of overspending in 15 or 20 minutes of debate, as the Reformers would have us believe, or by jotting a few things down on paper; it is much more complex than that. We must take progressive steps, like the ones we need for our tax system.

I have been lucky enough, in these times, to travel throughout Quebec with the youth commission on the future of Quebec and to hear many visions for the future; how to build the desired society and the principles on which it should be built, be it Canada or Quebec. The values and principles mentioned most frequently are those of fairness and justice.

No one has any solutions to offer, apparently. We are told to emphasize certain things. There is little mention of collecting unpaid taxes, which would reportedly amount to some $6 or $7 billion. We can certainly not collect all of it, but we could at least collect part of it, even if it is only $2 or $3 billion per year over the next two years.

As for overlapping and waste by the federal government in particular, a great deal of money could be saved in this area, perhaps a few billion more. The only matter on which we agree with the Reformers is that of business subsidies. We can indeed eliminate subsidies which are in any case not effective and which distort the market. In the area of defence, more cuts can be made; $1.5 or $1.6 billion in additional cuts could easily be made.

We would also have to look closely at certain tax rules. We have talked about family trusts ever since we came to the House, so much so that I am getting fed up with the whole subject. Talk, talk, talk, but nothing happens. We must also reconsider the approach of investing in megaprojects. A restrictive tax policy would lead to a slightly more relaxed monetary policy, especially in regard to short term interest rates. The impact on our economy would not be negligible.

Certain measures would serve, over the next two years, to restore public finances to a level which would make foreign investors more confident, decrease pressure on interest rates and improve Canada's economy on the whole.

I shall conclude with the choices available. For a good number of Quebecers, 1995 is the year for making choices. For Canadians as a whole, it is also the year to make financial choices and, as the time draws nearer, a greater number of possibilities emerge, such as the Reform proposal, a proposal which has not been put forward in Quebec. Reformers need only look at the results of the byelections in Brome—Missisquoi and even in Saint–Henri—Westmount to see that their vision of society in the future, their vision is not catching on at all in Quebec and probably never will because it is out of touch with reality.

If this vision is becoming widespread in Canada, no wonder the union between Quebec and Canada is in trouble. So, if this is how Reformers see things, let us not be surprised if this vision has an impact on the choices Quebecers make, because they see things differently. So, I really wish they would stop wanting to cut in the financial assistance provided to Quebec on account of the fact that it receives more in terms of social assistance, unemployment insurance and transfer payments. I wish that Quebecers could levy their owns taxes and spend these amounts effectively so that they would not need to be on the receiving end of such programs, so that fewer people would be in need.

But for that to happen, half the economic lever must not be left in the hands of someone who could not care less anyway about economic development. In that respect, the Quebec government has come up with a solution, a solution it is putting forward with the support of the Bloc Quebecois and perhaps even another party, the Democratic Action Party, which is making it increasingly clear it wants Quebec to be fully sovereign.

So, there is growing support in Quebec for sorting out our problems on our own and letting others do the same, but I am still not convinced that this vision of the Reformers is shared by all Canadians. I certainly hope that is not the case, because this is no way of looking at the future, this is not something desirable.

To conclude, there is a whole range of possibilities between doing nothing, which is the Liberal approach, and laying off everybody and putting everyone on the street, as the Reform Party is suggesting. Good for them. Preparing this budget has kept them busy for a few days, but I do not think it will be very useful in the long run, in the greater scheme of things, to put the fiscal house in order.

[English]

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have heard a lot of criticism of our budget from the hon. Bloc member, but I would like to ask him where the Bloc's numbers are. If you are going to criticize a solid plan like we presented here today, then you had better have something to offer in—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Recognizing, like all debates, that this one will bring some strong views, by the same token I continue to remind members to direct their interventions through the Speaker so that we can continue this debate in the finest parliamentary tradition.

• (1135)

Mr. Benoit: Mr. Speaker, I say again, if the hon. member is going to criticize, which is good, then he should offer a positive alternative as we have done with this budget. I ask the hon. member for some specifics on what the Bloc party and what he would offer as an alternative.

In particular, I am really surprised that the member from the Bloc pointed out a concern with what we have mentioned and with what we have presented in this budget in terms of transfer payments. In fact, we have proposed to give more control to the provinces. I thought this was something that Quebecers wanted.

I will read a little bit from our budget on the principle of decentralization that the member referred to. "As a general principle, government services shall be delivered by levels of government closest to the people. The federal government should respect in practice as well as in law, provincial jurisdiction over natural resources and the delivery of social programs".

The hon. member has criticized us for this. This actually means giving a lot more power to Quebec and all other provinces. I want to hear specifically why the member has a concern with this area. I ask for his suggestions, other than separation which appears to be an option that Quebecers are not going to accept.

[Translation]

Mr. Brien: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to go over the whole decentralization approach for the second time, an approach on which the Liberals and Reformers agree. It is how they see decentralization. They tell us that they will let the provinces manage social programs.

They mention natural resources. I would remind my colleague that, under the constitution, some if not most natural resources should come under provincial jurisdiction, just like health and education. How generous of them to tell us that they will let us manage these sectors in the future.

They tell us we should be happy that we will now be responsible for these sectors. We would also like to have the revenues to manage them. They cannot transfer expenditures without the revenues that go with them. While the federal government continues to collect taxes as in the past, it will transfer responsibilities but less money. They will tell us about their flexible federalism, which left them broke so that they will now return the favour by aggravating our difficulties.

In addition to giving us administrative responsibility, they will give us jurisdiction, and then impose national standards. They say that in their paper. They say "in co–operation". Talking about federal–provincial co–operation is all fine and well, but we know who always ends up setting national standards.

They also say in their paper that equalization payments will allow all provinces to meet these national standards. Their figures say the exact opposite: we cut your transfer payments and equalization but maintain the same standards. There is something wrong with their logic.

A little further, there is a statement about health care. It seems national standards would only apply to essential medical services. There is no explanation of what that means.

This is hardly decentralization. Real decentralization involves providing financial resources in amounts that are equivalent, sufficient and fair—take your pick.

There is another element missing from this document. In economics, it is very difficult to do an accurate assessment of the mathematical impact of a measure. Economic forecasts are a good example. People think economics is an exact science. Making an economic forecast is like predicting that, when I leave the House, I will either go straight ahead, to the centre or to the left, but since around noon I usually have lunch at the cafeteria in the West Block, it is far more likely I will turn right. On the basis of a number of set assumptions, one can say yes, he will turn right. However, anything can happen.

• (1140)

The document fails to consider some of the more predictable consequences of cuts in welfare payments and unemployment insurance. This money is often recirculated into the economy. People who receive welfare payments do not keep the money. They spend it. So if we cut those payments, we get the so–called negative spiral effect on the economy, and the document fails to factor in the negative impact of these cuts.

We cannot cut $15 billion in our social programs without affecting government revenues. No way. These people buy things, and the store owner uses that money to buy what he needs. That is the positive impact of dollars that circulate. Dollars that no longer circulate, that are kept by the government to reduce the deficit, have a negative impact. This aspect of the issue seems to have been ignored.

I am not saying that we should continue going into debt. I am merely saying that the negative impact of the proposed cuts has not been evaluated. I am convinced that their proposal would not lead to a balanced budget.

As for the suggestions made by the Bloc, I am sure we were agreed on one of them, the one involving business subsidies. We talk of cutting the government's administrative expenditures where overlap exists, senseless expenditures—the Senate could be completely abolished, we would not be sorry to see that, but that will be debated after we are gone—collecting unpaid taxes, the defence department, and so forth.

We are ready to consider tax expenditures, but they do not believe in such things. They think that there are only budgetary expenditures. Some expenditures are tax expenditures. Is a box at a Toronto Maple Leafs or Montreal Canadiens game a revenue generating expenditure which should be a tax deduction? I have my doubts. The tax system could be tightened up.

But there is no mention of revising anything, of changing anything to do with taxes because they are afraid—these people are very fond of such measures which allow them to make taxes less progressive. Our progressive tax system is diminished by such taxation measures. At a certain level of income, it becomes difficult to maintain the progressive nature of the system because people use the tax system to circumvent it.

This cannot be changed, these are the same people who advocate a flat rate of taxation across the board. That is their idea, it is part of what they are demanding. This is all based on a peculiar vision of society which does not allow for any redistribution of wealth whatsoever, and that is its greatest fault.

I would like them to show me how they would redistribute the money, how they would narrow the gap between high income earners and low income earners which has grown steadily in the last fifteen years. Why is this not mentioned in their document? Redistribution is not one of the Reform Party's priorities, so it is not mentioned.

It is clear and quite plain that we will never get involved in a program like that. There are other ways of going about things. All it takes is a bit of imagination and to stop repeating the theories of right–wing economists.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member from the Bloc is right. He and his colleagues in the finance committee do talk endlessly about tax loopholes. In spite of having been given the opportunity on repeated occasions to be able to point out to the finance committee what these tax loopholes are and quantifying them, they have been unable to do that to this point.

However, so that he can come up to speed on the whole concept of tax points and how they affect things, the hon. member should look at our document, if he has a copy of it before him.

On page 57 he will see the impact on post–secondary education of decreasing the cash transfers from the federal government which we have proposed of $200 million. If we transfer the tax points and give the provinces of Quebec, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island the ability to tax in place of the federal government taxing, he will see from the graph that by the year 2014 there is a very substantial net increase in funding for post–secondary education.

I recognize that we released this document just this morning. Perhaps he and some of the Liberal members have not had time to come up to speed.

As another example, if the hon. member would look at page 52 where we are talking about a 15 per cent cut in the entitlement going to seniors, he would see it. The very first line says: "Focus OAS and GIS on those most in need".

• (1145)

In answer to the question in his speech about whether this means everybody will be cut, no, it does not. However, I am really interested in the concept that we are proposing to transfer the ability of the respective jurisdictions, be they provincial or municipal, to deliver the services at the point of need and also to have the tax room for funding.

Apart from the "vive le Québec libre" kind of thing they are getting into, is that not exactly what they are after? I do not understand why there is a conflict between his and our own point of view on this issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Brien: Mr. Speaker, how very generous of them to say that, for $200 million, they will give us the equivalent tax points while at the same time they will cut something like $1 or $1.5 billion in equalization.

To my understanding, this is not about recovering equivalent tax points. So, their whole way of going about reallocating transfer payments will have a negative impact on Quebec. A two minute analysis of the document makes this patently obvious. In any case, I have no intention of spending the whole day looking at it; I have more important things to do.

The hon. member corrected what was said about seniors by saying that not everyone would face a 15 per cent cut. It is true that that is not the case. They say the focus will be on those most in need, but, here again, it is not defined, just as they do not really define either who will be targeted by the UI cuts. They do not say who is going to be affected by those.

This is how it works. When they do not have enough information to provide more details, they stick to basic principles, which do not take into account the overall impact. It is easy to talk about cutting $1, $2 or $3 billion dollars. When we start looking at the workings or into the details, we see that a lot is missing. Fine principles are easily espoused, but hard to put into practice. The Reform Party cannot get around it. This document is not worth any more than the paper it is printed on.

[English]

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we will continue in Reform to split our time.

I am pleased to rise in the House today to address Reform's opposition day motion. I am also pleased to be here as a member of a team that has the gumption, the fortitude and the imagination to come forward with an alternative budget ahead of the government's own. It indicates to Canadians and to the House there are better ways of doing business and getting us out of the crisis we are fast approaching.

For the benefit of people who have just tuned in I would like to read the motion of the day: "That this House reject this government's totally inadequate target which reduces the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP within two years and will leave Canada at the end of this period with a federal deficit of about $25 billion, a federal debt of over $600 billion and $50 billion in annual interest payments and higher taxes".

The operative word is that we reject the government's target. Many in the House may ask what is the purpose of our motion. Is it simply partisan politics? I will admit there is a political overtone to our motion. However, its purpose is anything but partisan.

Its purpose, if adopted as a motion, would be to show to Canadians and to the international financial markets that the government is serious about getting its debt under control. This is a very important goal because Canadians must know that any sacrifices they may be asked to make as a result of the upcoming budget are designed to take a serious bite out of the staggering debt and deficit situation. It is also important to show international financial markets that the government understands the severity of the fiscal situation and is prepared to take concrete action to deal with it.

• (1150)

In November the prestigious C. D. Howe Institute issued a report urging the government to move faster in the area of deficit reduction. It said the target of 3 per cent of GDP was not acceptable to the money markets. We now see that this sentiment is shared by other influential members of the financial community. To the consternation of members across the way, last week Moody's bond rating agency announced that it is reviewing Canada's AAA credit rating. In fact it was probably to the consternation of all Canadians. News of this review caused the dollar to fall and interest rates to climb. We simply cannot afford this type of reaction to the government's relative inaction.

We must renounce the government's shortsighted and inadequate deficit reduction plan by adopting the motion that is before the House today.

Why do I say that we can no longer afford to follow the government's reduction plan? It is because the problem is of such a size that we can no longer afford to ignore it. We ignore it at our peril.

That problem is a projected annual deficit of approximately $40 billion, which incidentally is about the same size as the debt financing we are paying. Think what we could do with $40 billion to spend on programs. We have to bring the deficit under control. This deficit of $40 billion will get added to the national debt, which is now more than $550 billion. It is a debt which is growing by more than $1,400 every second of every day.

The government's idea of deficit reduction is to trim a $40 billion shortfall to $25 billion. It is not enough.

Currently each Canadian taxpayer is in debt over $39,000, while the debt of every man, woman and child in this country is more than $19,000. They need relief and they need it now. We cannot afford to wait longer for the government to get serious about deficit reduction, or should I say deficit elimination.

I hope that I have established the need for us to act. I would now like to offer the government some suggestions as to how to reduce the deficit. If it does not want to take the time to go into the taxpayers' budget, here are a few things from my particular area.

First, we must get hold of the deficit by spending reductions and not by tax increases. We have said that over and over again but I think we have to say it over and over again. Canadians are already taxed to the max and they cannot, nor should they, tolerate tax increases of any type. There are many places where the government can cut back on its spending. I would like to focus on an area for which I happen to be the spokesperson in our party, official languages.

My Liberal colleagues will no doubt shudder at the idea of trimming anything having to do with official languages. However, given our dire financial straits we can no longer afford to feed this sacred cow with the same unbridled abandon that we have for almost the past 26 years.

• (1155)

Just before I detail the cuts I propose, I would like to state very clearly again that Reform supports the use of two official languages in Canada. We believe Canadians have a right to receive services from key federal institutions where there is a justifiable demand. That is why later today I will be calling on the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages to support my motion which would ensure people in minority language communities get the services they are entitled to from the federal government in the language of their choice.

People have a right to these services but, at the same time, all Canadians have a right to have their tax dollars spent wisely. This is why I believe we can reduce spending in this area without sacrificing minority language rights such as services to the public.

I have reviewed the more than $600 million in annual official, official languages spending. I say official because there appears to be more spending in this area which does not appear in the official documentation so I am just looking at the nominal book value of $600 million. I have been working on this for over a year so I know there is much more there that is out of view but I have not been able to put my finger on it yet.

My research shows that we can save roughly $300 million in a year by making the following changes to current government spending practices. This is only $300 million, but if we get $300 million here, $300 million somewhere else and $300 somewhere else we have $1 billion. If we keep doing that we can come up with the answers.

First, I propose a savings of $80 million by trimming the amount the government gives to the provinces for second language education. Education, as we all know, is a provincial jurisdiction and the federal government should stop meddling in this area. Much of this money is used for programs such as French immersion, which has in itself been called into question by several noted scholars, including Professor Hammerly of Simon Fraser University. Federal funding of immersion has also resulted in the creation of a two–tiered education system in many districts. This in itself is a good reason to discontinue this funding.

However, coupled with our desperate need to get our finances in order, it is an area of spending which must be eliminated. Under my proposal over three years we would save federal taxpayers more than $240 million.

Another area we can save in is the promotion of official languages. This program costs us more than $41 million in the current fiscal year. We can support official language groups in communities without spending copious amounts of money to do so.

I had better wind up by saying that the government's deficit reduction policy is inadequate. It is not enough to tackle our serious debt problem and it is not enough to inspire confidence among Canadians or the international money markets.

I urge the government to take this situation very seriously. We will try to help by offering suggestions such as I have just done as to the areas where we can cut.

I support the motion and I urge members and the government to do likewise.

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to glance at the budget presented by the Reform Party. It was not readily available until later this morning.

One of the concerns I have is that Reformers identify the debt as being a major problem. Certainly the government recognizes that. My concern is what their actions might do in terms of causing pressure on interest rates. They have done well in that regard because they have exerted upward pressures on interest rates. I returned from Calgary on the weekend. I had an opportunity to pick up Friday's edition of the Calgary Herald and there was a front page story about that.

• (1200)

It is important to reflect on the cuts Reform members are talking about because they affect very real people. This story talked about how the social services department cut off of welfare a 60–year old mother who was caring for her disabled 29–year old daughter. Given her medical condition, the daughter suffers from continual seizures. As a matter of fact, it talks about her having had 210 since January 17.

If the decision to cut off of welfare that 60–year old mother who has worked all her life were allowed to stand, it would have resulted in the 29–year old daughter being put in care at a cost of $100,000 a year. It seems to make little sense to have policies in place that would allow that kind of tragedy to occur.

I bring that forward because you can be penny wise and pound foolish. I think the Reform Party is rather light on analysis and is rather light on the fact that there are real people involved.

Does the member believe it is better not to pay $600 in welfare to a 60–year old mother so she can look after her 29–year old disabled daughter? Or does he think money is better spent by forcing the 60–year old mother into retraining and having the state support the 29–year old daughter in an institution at a very excessive cost?

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that the question is a serious one.

First of all, I am not a spokesman for Premier Klein of Alberta. Second, the observation, while very interesting, has nothing whatsoever to do with the presentation I have just made in this House. It is totally irrelevant. It might be directed to some of the detail in the budget, but I cannot honestly take the question seriously.

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, reference is made in the Reform Party budget to particular cuts in social security spending. In particular, reference is made to senior citizen benefits being reduced by 15 per cent. In a country where the number of seniors is increasing, there is no recommendation for stable funding in that area but rather a reduction of 15 per cent.

Could the hon. member perhaps elucidate in what manner these particular cuts are proposed to be made to senior citizens?

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, once again, this is not directly relevant to the speech I have given, but I would be happy to answer it in any event since it seems to be a sincere question.

We would target seniors, such as myself, who do not need the old age pension. That is where we would do the cuts. We would target things properly. Those who need it either continue to get it, or in some cases perhaps they should get more. Those who do not need this sort of support should not get it. I think the majority of those would agree with this analysis and say to put it where it is needed, not where it is not needed.

• (1205)

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak today as one of our party's critics on human resources development and social policy and particularly to address our motion contending that the government's 3 per cent of GDP deficit targets are totally inadequate. I would like to address it from the perspective of the impact of this policy on social programs in this country.

It was the Trudeau Liberal government of which the present Prime Minister was once a senior member and finance minister, which first sold Canadians on the myth that big governments can solve most of our problems. Government then designed program after program to take over some of our personal responsibilities and provide for our basic needs.

Government help and handouts are now regarded as a right. In fact, today when someone claims a right for something, he is probably asking for goods or help from the government. The pervasiveness of this attitude was demonstrated to me this December when, as a member of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development, I attended hearings on the social reform proposals of the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Although very few Canadians were given the opportunity to address the committee, 159 advocates for special interest groups were paid almost $4 million taxpayer dollars to come and plead their right to continued or even increased public funding. This is funding that will have to be extracted from current and future fellow Canadians, from you and me and our children, in the form of higher taxes or debt.

Sadly, the pipe dream of big government as a solution to our problems has not only brought us close to bankruptcy, it has led to an abdication of personal responsibilities and has set Canadians against Canadians. Hard working Canadians are becoming increasingly incensed to have the fruits of their labour confiscated to fund an ever growing number of non–essential programs. Needy Canadians are told that they are entitled to more help from their fellow citizens and that they can rightly resent anyone whose hard work, risk taking or good fortune has provided them with a measure of wealth.

The problems we are facing today are not just the result of a lack of money, but are directly related to the role we expect government to play in our lives. We are now beginning to realize that many government services are dysfunctional, unaffordable and have a negative effect on self–reliance, independence, responsibility, personal dignity and the social fabric of our society.

For a quarter of a century Canadians have been encouraged to increasingly rely on the government, and they have done just that. A vast amount of our national wealth goes to pay for security measures. Fully one–half of all federal government spending is on social programs. Two–thirds of all federal government spending, after it pays its interest payments, is on social programs. Spending on social programs by all levels of government is about $155 billion every year. That is over 20 per cent of our country's entire income of $750 billion.

On top of that, Canadians spend a significant amount of their own personal resources on security measures. These include additional health insurance, savings for old age, post–secondary education and training, insurance against a whole host of unforeseen adversities, and personal savings.

Even if we stopped funding any of this social spending with borrowed money, we still would spend more than adequate amounts of our national wealth to achieve the level of security we need. Yet welfare state programs are paid for not only by heavy taxation but by borrowing from future generations.

The disastrous consequences of these Liberal policies are now threatening the very programs that Canadians have been encouraged to rely on to meet their security needs. Let me explain why.

In order to borrow, someone has to lend us money. When someone lends the Government of Canada money there has to be something in it for them. That something is interest. The interest has to be paid every year until the money is returned. Our government has not been returning any borrowed money. Far from it. Instead, for 25 plus years in a row it has borrowed more and more money every single year on which it must pay more and more interest. Not only does the interest burden increase, it compounds.

• (1210)

Just think about the logic of what we have done. We have borrowed money to keep expensive, welfare state, give everybody a cheque programs afloat. Every dollar in interest paid on that borrowed money is a dollar that we cannot now spend on needy people in our country.

This year the Canadian government paid out $42.7 billion in interest. Just think for a moment how much security that $42.7 billion could have provided to the people of this country. Next year we will have to pay about $47 billion in interest. So next year we will have $4 billion less to spend on social security, and less the year after that, and even less the year after that until almost all our national wealth is consumed to service the debt that our reckless and incompetent political managers, mostly Liberals with help from so–called Conservatives, have saddled us with.

The tragedy is that it is not just us today who must face the huge drain of interest dollars endangering our future security. Shamefully, our children and our children's children will have to carry the burden of our government's lack of self–control. Their futures have been heavily mortgaged because governments were not willing to pay their own way.

For 15 months this Liberal government has allowed this incredible fiscal disaster to continue. In these 15 months it has borrowed another $61 billion. That means that every single month this government, this team which claims to be so competent, has overspent by $4 billion. Every month this government has put $4 billion more on your credit card and mine, Mr. Speaker. That is $137.93 for every single Canadian every month. That debt is the inheritance our children have to look forward to. And now the finance minister even wants to tax that.

With this kind of fiscal insanity on the record one would think this Liberal government would now be telling Canadians it has cleaned up its act, will be living within its means and has stopped the interest drain on our economy. Instead, what the government is telling us is so incredible that it has citizens across the country rising in outrage.

The Prime Minister and the finance minister say they intend to confiscate even more of our income for their own spending purposes. They also tell us with pride in their voices that they intend to continue to put us in the hole a minimum of $25 billion for every year we leave them in charge of our affairs. They refer to this incompetent management as good, honest government.

Our children will have to cough up in the neighbourhood of $8 billion every single year to pay for the spending spree of this government not to mention the $40–odd billion every single year they get to pay on the spending sprees indulged in by previous Liberal and Conservative governments. I expect our children will have quite a different name for this kind of management.

It is not hard to figure out that a dollar spent on interest is a dollar that cannot be spent on social programs. A dollar spent on interest is a dollar that cannot be used to help the poor and disadvantaged. A dollar spent on interest is a dollar that cannot be used by business to expand, to improve products, to take advantage of trade opportunities and most of all, to create real long term jobs for Canadians.

Members of this government make a big production about their commitment to helping people. They constantly wax eloquent about the virtues of fairness, equity and compassion.

I am willing to bet that every single one of these kind and caring Liberals will vote to put us and our children over $100 billion in the hole during their term in office. Every one of these Liberals will stand by and see an additional $8 billion plus sucked out of our social programs, sucked out of our job sector, sucked out of our future security over their term in office.

• (1215)

How fair is that to Canadians struggling to support themselves and their families? How equitable is it for us to spend today and hand the bill to tomorrow's citizens? Where is the compassion in eroding the sustainability of social programs because the government cannot get a grip on its appetite for borrowed money?

For 15 months Reformers in Parliament have steadfastly pressed for a change in direction and have kept the issues of our borrowing and our debt and the interest drain on our economy on the national agenda. Reformers are telling the Liberal government it is time to change direction. Canadians deserve better than to end up where the Liberals are taking us.

We need to downsize government, re–evaluate and restrict its functions, and stop living on borrowed money. We need to find better ways to effectively help those in need, ways that are affordable and encourage people to take responsibility for themselves, their families and those around them through communities, churches, schools, charities and other social groups. Public assistance should be reserved for those who need it most.

My colleagues and I in the Reform Party are doing our utmost to get the message of fiscal responsibility to those who sit across the floor of the House. Unfortunately as opposition we cannot bring about real change, a fact that is as frustrating for many Canadians as it is for me. That will not stop us from doing what we can to influence the government.

Today Reform has taken the unprecedented step of taking a government by the hand and showing it the way to a balanced budget within one term of office, within three years. I do not expect members opposite will be permitted to support such a common sense proposal, but I invite Canadians to continue to demand a return to fiscal sanity in the country.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the second opposition party for tabling what can be called a shadow budget. It becomes part of a general dialectical process of discussion that the finance minister launched some months ago and which has been highlighted by discussions of citizens' groups, household groups, learned society groups, all people putting in ideas and suggestions to the government to help the finance minister in preparing for his budget that he will table in the next week.

Members will pardon me, though, if I say—it is not intended as a criticism—that one finds in the feedback from the various groups consulted, and we could say this is true of the shadow budget from the second opposition party, that it is formulated at a fairly high level of generality and abstraction, that it lacks the tethering detail of examining concrete cases against an empirical record which is the responsibility of a government.

One is reminded of General Secretary Khrushchev celebrated rebuke to the Albanians. I will not translate what he said in Russian exactly. He referred, I think we can say in English, to people jabbering. Basically it says: "Look, it is one thing to talk without having responsibility but when you have to make decisions you have to point out concretely what this means".

In other words, if we have suggestions to make and we do not want cutbacks in our own backyard, whom would we want to cut and why? What are the criteria?

It is very easy to say without responsibility for the government that one would eliminate $40 billion or $50 billion from federal spending in three years, but a government has to justify that in the concrete cases and examine what cuts in one sector of the budget would do to other sectors of the budget and, second, what impact it would all have on federal–provincial relations which without necessarily any action other than from historical forces is with us again as a key issue in the next few years, the Quebec issue to mention only one of these things.

We were warned during the last general election by financial analysts of some reputation and by the International Monetary Fund that reckless and radical financial restructuring without proper attention to empirical detail would have unforeseen effects on unemployment and on the economy.

• (1220)

This is why the government, as its first approach to the budget, recognizes the basic truth that any budget is a balancing act. It requires balancing competing interests, social and economic interests, choosing between them and offering justification for that.

As a government we are charged with keeping Canada together. We have to recognize the conflict in economic attitudes in many parts of the country. For the economically dynamic western provinces in which my own seat is located this means cutting the deficit as top priority. In Quebec and the Atlantic provinces we are getting the message that jobs may have a higher priority than that. We have to balance those interests.

Our predecessor government, the Mulroney government that has disappeared into history, had a fixation on cutting without serious consideration of the revenue side of the balance sheet. To take one example, some economists estimate that each public sector job results in seven spinoff jobs in the private sector. For many companies, for better or for worse, the public sector today is their largest customer. They have to be weaned off public spending. Public sector jobs have to be cut at a pace at which the private sector can absorb them.

Coming back to the budget and the balancing of interests, there is a little bit of voodoo economics from the second opposition party. President George Bush's—

An hon. member: A little bit?

Mr. McWhinney: We understate, as the parliamentary secretary who intervened knows very well. It is our tradition to understate.

There is a little bit of voodoo economics in some of the proposals put forward by the second opposition party. For example, cutting provincial transfer payments with a corresponding transfer of tax points does not result in lowering the overall public debt. It is simply to transfer federal problems to the provinces.

Alberta and Saskatchewan already have their own economic houses in order but other provinces have not. I do not think they are going to appreciate a federal government abdication of responsibility.

Let us take another example. Broad brush cuts look very simple. There is a proposal that has been floated to automate lighthouses on the west coast. It is a major issue for people on the west coast. Many sincere, decent people have discussed this subject with me. I have 25,000 names on a petition in my office opposing this one budgetary cut. I accept the sincerity of the proposals, the logic of the argument, but I also recognize that we have to make cuts.

I have to pose the question: "Whom would you cut and why? Is the deficit to be cut everywhere but in one's own backyard?" These are the hard problems that a finance minister must struggle with.

The Indian affairs department has been referred to. It is a favourite target for many people who do not bother examining empirical data. It is in the process of devolution that is being spearheaded in Manitoba. The department has cut its workforce by 45 per cent in the last several years. Some bands are ready for self–government, although that is not totally defined, and some bands are more ready for self–government than others.

Consideration of further cuts in the Indian affairs department has to be related to the progress to self–government and to the concept of moving by steps which the government rightfully on all empirical political experience has accepted as the best road to self–government.

Transferring responsibility to what is called the family ignores current social structures that exist as the living reality today in Canada. I would suggest the second opposition party has a rather restricted particularistic definition of the family. One would raise the question and not simply rhetorically: "What about Canadians who do not have a well–to–do family to rely on? What about them?"

There are too many contradictions—antinomy is the technical term—in the shadow budget of the second opposition party that are simply not resolved. Empowerment of individuals is brought forward as a buzzword but is really a code word for abandoning those in need. Basically it calls for people to look after themselves whether or not they can.

• (1225)

This contradicts what in another part of the second opposition party's proposal, the shadow budget, is called equalization. Again one talks of national standards but this contradicts the principle of cutting transfer payments. If we want to impose national standards as a federal government in a domain where the federal constitutional power has to be stretched to the limit, how do we do it without using the tool of transfer payments? The contradiction is there in the shadow budget of the second opposition party. It simply has not bothered to try to resolve it or to suggest how to do it. That again stems from the fact of absence of responsibility in making the hard decisions that we must make as a government.

Again to take a further contradiction on a contradiction, the equalization principle contradicts the idea of cutting transfers to the provinces as such. I believe there is one basic truth here which all of us must recognize. The budget to be brought in by the finance minister within the next week will be the toughest budget Canadians have seen in 127 years. That is the reality. It is going to be a very tough budget. That is our responsibility.

Since I am not privy and constitutionally could not be to the finance minister's plans until he actually announces them in the House, I do not yet know what is in the budget; but I am on record, as are many of my colleagues in the government, as supporting drastic reform of the pensions of members of Parliament. I am on record, as are some of my colleagues, in advocating that Parliament bring MPs' pensions into line with those in the private sector.

There has been reference to foreign travel. I personally have not partaken of any foreign travel at taxpayers' expense since my election. Many government members are in the same position.

I support unemployment insurance reform. Indeed the most imaginative part of the green paper on social reform brought forward by the minister charged with social security concerns unemployment insurance reform. Many Canadians are paying $1,200 per annum in premiums even if they have never made a claim. The seasonally unemployed and the manufacturing industries which include unemployment insurance abuse in their business plans should be made to be more self–supporting through increased premiums, fewer weeks of benefits, more weeks to qualify and mandatory retraining.

These are the materials before the finance minister that have been given considerable consideration by committees, by task forces and by other groups. They are the sorts of decisions a government must make, big tough decisions, balancing the interests, choosing among the conflicting interests and resolving the antinomies.

I support, as do many government members, the commercialisation of as many crown corporations as possible and a rationalization of those remaining. The government accepts that responsibility. It will be reflected in the choices that it has to make in the budget.

We all support the elimination of overlapping government services. We support the transfer of powers to the provinces in such areas as natural resources, fishing and health administration, without sacrificing national health standards. These proposals have been part of our historical debate for the last 30 years since the quiet revolution.

We welcome the suggestions put forward by governments in Quebec, by the Bourassa government and by its present government, for study in this area but we recognize the impact upon the budget in adopting proposals of this sort.

I am really saying that the shadow budget of the second opposition party does not really tackle concretely the problems of making those hard choices. To the extent that it does, it seems to me that like the previous Mulroney government's approach to the economic situation there is a give it up philosophy there.

• (1230)

It is not enough to slash government expenditures. We need, and this was our proposal in the red book and in the general election, a dynamic policy of creating new jobs. We need new export industries. We need more foreign trade. We need to be competitive there.

The Prime Minister has made his trips to Asia accompanied by our leading business specialists and to South America. This is part of the new politics. We need to harness science and technology in aid of economic growth and that requires a strong federal presence. This is the key to the infrastructure program that the government has been carrying forward since its election. It is the key to areas such as western economic development, but it is a recognition. The slashing of expenditures, if that is all it is, is a descent into economic pessimism. It reminds one of the policies of the economists who failed in Germany at the end of the 1920s and who failed in the United States in the Hoover period.

The country is strong. To echo the remarks of the man who replaced President Hoover, we have nothing to fear but fear itself. What we need are new jobs, new markets and new tax revenues. This is a positive, dynamic way of controlling the deficit and reducing the external debt. Create the new jobs, build the new revenues from the new incomes. It is a new, dynamic and optimistic approach to the Canada of the next century. This will be the thrust in the budget to be presented I am sure in the next week.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am shocked and appalled when I listen to a speech like this. I think a speech like this is a symbol of what is wrong with this government.

I listened to the hon. member ramble on giving excuses for his government's inaction. He continued to explain why it cannot do anything about this or that. I think the height of irresponsibility is to do nothing. It is analogous to criminal negligence.

Why do you not have a plan after almost 10 years in opposition and after a year in government, after fighting an election campaign that you knew was there and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I want to once again remind the House that all of our interventions have to be made through the Chair, through the Speaker. It is not to engage one member with another but collectively for the House in making sure that our debate is done in a parliamentary fashion.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I am too emotional from his presentation. I feel so strongly that this issue is a key issue that we need to address.

I believe the country is tired of hearing excuses about how we have such an onerous task and it is so difficult. This is the government opposite. As a government it cannot keep criticizing Reformers for what they propose unless it can come up with a better proposition. That has to happen. When someone is drowning and is going down for the third time he or she would like to see a life preserver thrown to him or her, not another weight. Increased spending and increased debt and deficit is simply another weight. I think it is inexcusable that this kind of rhetoric continues to be spouted out by these people.

I would like to know what plan the government has? What does it propose in a positive manner that will give hope for Canadians that they will begin to see the light and not continue to be thrown more weights as this member suggests?

Mr. McWhinney: Mr. Speaker, I have waited patiently through a sea of clichés and tired metaphors for a general idea or a question. When finally the question emerged, the only response one can give is pay attention to empirical data. Read my speech when it comes out in Hansard and the responses are there. Please do not remain in the realm of cliches. Give us some empirical data. Do not be an Albanian in Mr. Khrushchev's terms.

• (1235)

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as a reflection of what my Reform colleague said, I must say that the Dr. Feelgood kind of thing this government seems to be into, trust it, everything is going to be fine, is very difficult to swallow when one realizes that this very day this government is going to the financial marketplaces all over the world, cap in hand to try and find $110 million.

I have the good fortune, if I can be permitted to be a little personal, that this week I am expecting to become a grandfather for the first time. As a consequence, it is a sincere and very personal concern for me that we have a government in power today that is prepared to encumber my grandchild to be with the spending of today.

The Reform Party came forward with its zero in three plan in 1992 and here we are just three years later. There is only so much that can be taken out of non–social spending. As a consequence for us to get to zero, which we must do in three years and what this motion is all about, we have now accelerated and gone from only taking $9 billion out of social spending to having to take a further $7 billion out of social spending. That has happened in two and a half years.

I ask the member in good conscience, and I am sure he will realize that I am being deeply sincere, whether it is really not immoral for this Parliament to go ahead and transfer the spending of today probably to my future grandchild's grandchildren. Is there not some kind of problem in the thinking of this member and perhaps in the thinking of the government that we should be doing that?

Mr. McWhinney: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the thoughtful question from the hon. member opposite. We welcome his co–operation and his party's co–operation in finding concrete ways for cutting government waste and cutting expenditure. We accept the burden of reducing the national deficit, reducing the external debt. We believe the positive way is by expanding the economy by creating more jobs. If more jobs are not created, we will never get rid of the deficit. That is why we say the two go together. There cannot be one without the other.

I welcome his co–operation and his party's co–operation in tackling the deficit.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for me to take part in this debate on the motion introduced by my Reform colleague for Kootenay East.

Today is really the tale of the threes. I added a third three after listening to the intervention by my colleague from Kootenay East. The first three I had down was 3 per cent of GDP which we are talking about today as being not sufficient to address our current problems. Another three is the zero in three plan we introduced while we were campaigning in 1993. The third three I added was my three–year old grandson Nicholas. In many ways that is what this whole debate is all about. It is about the future of our children and our grandchildren.

Let me deal with the last three first. We in this House have been part of the generation that has accumulated the tremendous debt that we are all burdened under. We are not going to be around to pay the bill. We have accumulated this debt and we are leaving it on the shoulders of future generations; taxation without representation.

I have been part of that overspending and I have not been very proud of that. I am pleased that I am here, elected to this place to do what I can to bring the government to realize that we have to start living within our means.

Let us go to 3 per cent of GDP as the target that the government has set. What does 3 per cent of GDP mean? It means after we achieve this target we will still be overspending on an annual basis by $25 billion. However, at that point we will be facing federally a $650 billion debt and the interest payments on that debt will have reached $50 billion. What is worse, there is no plan to eliminate the overspending. It is somewhere down the road but there is no definite plan in place to address it.

I would suggest that without a plan to attack it, it will not happen. The 3 per cent of GDP is too little, too late. We have already lost a year. A year ago we were looking at a $490 billion debt and as we stand here this afternoon we are in debt to $550 billion. Our situation has worsened by $60 billion.

Let us take a moment to look at our zero in three plan which we campaigned on last year. We were honest with the Canadian voter when we campaigned. We spelled out where we were going to make the cuts, the departments we were going to make the cuts in and how much those cuts would be.

I would remind members that we were the only party that did that. We actually put some numbers to paper and presented it to the Canadian voter. Two and a half million voters supported us knowing where we were coming from. The deficit at that point was $30 billion. As we stand here this afternoon we are looking at a potential $40 billion deficit.

The deficit can be eliminated within a specific timeframe and we say three years. In eliminating that deficit we will create employment. We will restore investor confidence in our economy and they will come in and they will create the jobs that our children and our grandchildren need, full time, meaningful employment.

By getting our spending under control we will start to offer for the first time tax relief. Canadian voters will be able to see down the road that there is some tax relief coming and that we will not continue to attempt to go deeper and deeper into their pockets.

We speak a lot about the safety nets. Getting our spending under control and eliminating the deficit is the answer to saving our social safety nets. We are not the ones out to destroy it. We are the ones facing reality and we are the ones who want to save those safety nets for those who are in need.

The budget that will be coming down next week to my mind is the most important in Canada's history. If we do not do what is right in this budget we will pay some very serious consequences. The Canadian taxpayer is concerned. The financial markets are concerned. The warning bells are going off, the red lights are flashing and yet they are being ignored. As a matter of fact, we are shooting the messenger. We are being warned that we cannot go any deeper in debt, that we have to make some spending cuts. We are being warned by the people who buy our bonds, the people who have allowed us to go deeper and deeper in debt.

We appreciate it when they buy our bonds, but we do not like the fact that they are warning us that we are getting ourselves into a position where we cannot sustain that debt and are in danger of hitting the wall.

As I said, thousands of concerned taxpayers have spoken out. The message has been unified: no more taxes, reduce government spending, they are taxed to the limit.

The Canadian Taxpayers Federation has gone across Canada holding tax alert rallies that have been attended by thousands of taxpayers.

• (1245)

Yesterday we presented petitions signed by 230,000 concerned taxpayers and as I said, the message is uniform: no more taxes. Government spending must be cut.

Small business gave us the same message. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business in its survey of small business states that 88 per cent of those that responded said the best thing the government can do to help small business is to cut spending. Get off their backs and out of their pockets.

It is happening all across Canada. In our homes and in our businesses, we have cut back in these times of restraint. We have had to make the cuts in order to survive. Government must do no less than what Canadian taxpayers and Canadian businesses have been doing.

When I was a youngster, I was told that there are only two things that were certain in life, death and taxes. What we are now finding out is that one is causing the other. The Canadian taxpayer is being taxed to death. Canadian taxpayers are fair, compassionate and reasonable but they have reached the limits. The message is that we have no more to give. The government does have room to cut its spending.

Protests have been going on across the country. Radio shows have been encouraging their listeners to phone their member of Parliament. I am sure all members have received phone calls because of the tax alert rallies or tax alert programs.

I want to relate one of the many phone calls that I got in my riding. It was from a young mother. She said: "I am 24 years old. I have three young children. My husband has a good job. He makes a good wage but we are just getting by. Please do not raise taxes. Do what you can to make sure taxes are not raised. We just have no room to move".

I said to her: "I understand where you are coming from. I will do my best to see that your tax burden is not increased". Just before she hung up she said: "There is one other thing that really bothers me. I know the social programs are important but I have a neighbour who is on social programs and in many ways that family is living much better than we are".

The message was that there are people riding in the wagon that she and her husband are pulling who are enjoying more benefits than they are. That has to stop.

Raising taxes are counter productive. For 25 years now we have told the Canadian people that we have to raise taxes and we are going to address the deficit and the debt. In fact what has happened in those 25 years is the exact opposite. While we have raised taxes, the deficit has increased and as a result, the debt has increased.

There is absolutely no justification for any tax increases. They achieve the very opposite to what they are supposed to achieve. We already have a huge underground economy because the Canadian taxpayer has said: "I am giving you more tax dollars and I am getting less service. I am going to find a way to escape this tax burden".

That underground economy is very difficult to get a handle on. I have heard figures from $5 billion to $30 billion. Whatever the number is, it is huge. By increasing the tax burden, we will only inflate that figure, whatever it is.

Today we introduced the taxpayers' budget. It is the first time this has ever happened in Parliament to my knowledge. No party in opposition or third party has come forward with an alternate budget.

We said when we were campaigning that we would offer constructive criticism. That is what we have done. We have been saying cut. In this budget we are outlining where those cuts should be made and the departments in which they should be made.

Twenty–five billion dollars in three years is not a draconian target. We are talking about $8 to $9 billion a year from a $750 billion GDP. That is about 1 per cent a year. It can be achieved and it must be achieved.

It will bring some pain but it will be short term pain for long term gain. The cuts have to be made in all sectors, not just in the social services. We have to do it in the public and in the private sectors.

I get concerned when I hear the message that we are out to destroy the social programs. That is not true. We have been spending $80 billion on these social programs. What we are talking about is $65 billion. That is not destroying the social programs.

• (1250)

If these people really wanted to protect those truly in need, they would be working with us to see that the cuts are made. There is lots of room to improve the efficiency of those programs and deliver them in a better way at far less cost to the taxpayers.

When taxpayers hear that they do not understand what they are asking for when they ask for reduced spending, you are insulting their intelligence. They do understand. The taxpayer in many ways is miles ahead of the politicians, and when taxpayers read that their protests are futile, we forget who is working for who.

We are dealing with an aroused and an informed voter. They understand. They are aware of the situation. No longer are they prepared to roll over and take it. They are speaking out. They spoke out on the cable situation and found out that they can make a difference. Government will ignore the messages that are being given to us at its peril.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I might ask the member for Simcoe Centre to indicate to the Chair if he is splitting his time.

Mr. Harper (Simcoe Centre): Yes, I am splitting my time, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There will be five minutes for the member for Simcoe Centre, subject to five minutes for questions or comments.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today I stand here with a great deal of pride in being a Reform member of Parliament who was a part of the Reform team that put together the taxpayers' budget that was presented across Canada. I am proud of that, but what we are talking about today goes far beyond partisan politics.

It goes to a problem that truly threatens the country. It deals with a problem which has come from successive flawed assumptions under which governments have been operating for some time. I will talk about those flawed assumptions later.

I would first like to talk about the warnings that have come from various sources which the government must not ignore. These warnings come from various groups and individuals across the country and from around the world. They are telling the government that its target of reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in three years simply is not good enough.

These warnings have come, as I have said, from a variety sources. Most recently they came from Moody's Bond Rating Agency. They have come over the past from the C.D. Howe Institute, and from the Fraser Institute at various times. The warnings that this target is not good enough came from the Wall Street Journal and the Washington Post just a few weeks ago.

I attended a conference in Toronto in November entitled "Hitting the Wall" at which the warning came from a wide range of speakers from various backgrounds who had been involved in governments which had gone through economic collapse and had been part of government and opposition parties who were involved in the clean up after the economic collapse. Their warning was very clear. It was that the scenario we are living right now is so similar to what they lived through in their countries that Canada should heed the warning.

The warning came at this conference from a Japanese bond buying agency that said that already Canada is paying unnecessarily high risk premiums on money that it borrows from outside the country. The reason I say that the risk premiums are unnecessarily high is that if governments in the past had been more serious about setting targets far stronger than the 3 per cent of GDP in three years, we would not be paying interest rates nearly as high as we are paying now. The warnings came from a public sector actuary who talked about the fact that the Canada pension plan is non–sustainable. It is not actuarially sound and it cannot be sustained under the present set of rules.

• (1255)

The warnings came from others, but there were several consistent messages that came from each and every one of the speakers at the conference. I know the government has heard these messages before but it should hear them again. The messages are as follows.

First, Canada has a serious overspending problem. It is a very simple and direct message and the government must hear it.

Second, the problem must be dealt with quickly. Again, this message has been given by people from across the country and around the world but it does not appear to have been heard.

The third message is that the Minister of Finance's budget is a last chance budget. The speakers at this conference, "Hitting the Wall", to a person said that this is the last chance. If the government does not get serious beyond the target of reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in three years there is a very real possibility of economic collapse.

This is a last chance budget because it will be much more difficult for government to deal with the problem next year than it is this year. It will not happen. The political will just will not be there to make the extremely tough cuts and to take the tough measures that will be necessary a year from now.

Compounding interest, rapidly increasing debt, ever–increasing proportions of government spending going to interest payments on the debt would all make it much more difficult next year. These speakers said that there is no precedent in the world where a government has taken the tough measures necessary without going through economic collapse.

The warnings are there. The Liberals should consider this Reform budget as another warning. There are a lot of measures in it that I have heard expressed as recommendations by people in my constituency and in other places across the country who I have spoken with over the past several months and years. These are not just measures which were dreamed up by a group of Reform MPs. These are measures that have been proposed by Canadians.

I would like to go through something that is presented in our budget material and talk about the flawed assumptions which have led to the mess we are in now, the flawed assumptions which this Liberal government will continue to operate under. Then I would like to go through the positive results that would arise from the new set of assumptions which the Reform Party has presented. I will begin by reading the motion which we are debating today. The motion reads:

> That this House reject this government's totally inadequate target which reduces the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP within 2 years and will leave Canada, at the end of the period with a federal deficit of about $25 billion, a federal debt of over $600 billion, $50 billion in annual interest payments and higher taxes.

That is the motion we are debating today. This motion stems from one of the flawed assumptions under which this Liberal government has been operating since it came into power a year and a half ago. I will go through these and talk briefly about the consequences which arise from them.

The first assumption is with respect to jobs. The assumption is that government can solve the unemployment problem through public spending. That is the flawed assumption we have laid out in our budget today. In fact, that assumption was presented an hour or so ago by a member from the Liberal Party when he was talking about all of the things which his government had done. One of the wonderful things that member said was that his government had created jobs. I believe he said that his government created 40,000 jobs.

• (1300)

When Reformers reminded the member across the floor that it probably was not his government that created those jobs, that it was probably the private sector, the member backed off on that statement. He realized the error of his ways, at least for the moment. The error was that government does not create jobs; private business does.

The consequences of this flawed assumption and operating under this flawed assumption are that government spending is now at an all time high and there are over a million unemployed people in the country. If government spending would create jobs I would suggest that all Canadians would have more than one and more than they need.

Governments have been overspending to a point where we have an accumulated debt today of over $550 billion. Governments have been overspending for 30 years. Has that helped to deal with the problem of unemployment? The answer is no, we have over a million unemployed Canadians today and that is an unacceptable level of unemployment.

The second flawed assumption is in the area of social security. The assumption is that government is the best provider of social security through publicly financed universal programs. I think I can fairly say that is the assumption the Liberal government and past governments have been operating under.

The consequence of operating under this flawed assumption is that despite big government programs, the social fabric of Canada is unravelling. Health care, pensions and other programs are in financial trouble. Programs like UI and welfare create a disincentive to employment.

The third flawed assumption is that government spending, deficits and debts are okay if they are incurred in the name of jobs and social security. The consequence is that government spending and overspending are the biggest threats facing Canadians with regard to social programs today.

I invite members opposite to read our budget with an open mind and to consider its contents seriously in the final preparations of the budget to be presented next week. I certainly welcome their questions.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been here for a good part of the debate today and I am dismayed to learn that Reform Party members in making their remarks are not really addressing their budget document.

Indeed I was here for the opening two speeches this morning from the Reform Party and they like the last one constituted really nothing but denunciations of the Liberal Party position which they are waiting to hear in the budget next week.

However they managed to use their document as some kind of launching pad for attacks on a non–existent government budget at this point. They are still attacking last year's budget and saying that government measures are inadequate when they have not yet learned what they are.

It surprised me that I could not get copies of the Reform Party budget for the longest time. I have finally obtained one. We were told in all the news reports this morning that their budget was going to be announced in the House. I am surprised that we have not heard more about the Reform budget.

I have some questions that I would like the hon. member to answer. I know he has very limited time, having wasted most of his presentation on attacking the government instead of dealing with the positive aspects, if there are any, in the Reform budget.

What is in his own party document that will be so popular with Canadians? Or, is it so unpopular that they do not want to talk about it in the House today? They want to use the opportunity to try to blame the government for all the ills instead of looking at the document they have produced, coming clean with Canadians and telling them what bad policies they have proposed in their budget document.

• (1305)

Why have they not discussed it? They keep referring to it but they never give specifics. Would the hon. member give us specifics and tell us what cutbacks in social programs his party proposed in their budget document so all Canadians can hear what the Reform Party has in mind?

Mr. Benoit: Mr. Speaker, the hon. parliamentary secretary commented on copies of our budget not being available. Of course they were. We announced that our budget would be unveiled in West Block, Room 200, at nine o'clock this morning. Liberal members of Parliament were more than welcome. I was pleased to see that one attended the unveiling. Copies have been readily available. They are certainly available in the lobbies now, as the member knows.

The parliamentary secretary of all people should know that when debate is on a certain topic we should try to stick to the debate as much as possible. The debate today is on the Liberal government's very weak deficit reduction target of 3 per cent of GDP in three years.

We will talk about our budget as we have been today. We have presented some important information regarding the budget. However we have to make sure it fits in with the topic for discussion today, the motion that has been presented rejecting the 3 per cent of GDP in three years as a target.

In terms of specifics, if the hon. member has read this document which is available and which he acknowledges he now has, he would know that we presented a lot of specifics. We presented detailed numbers in terms of reductions in the social program spending area and in areas outside social programs.

We cannot only look at spending when we talk about this budget. We also have to look at the empowerment measures that Reform has presented along with the numbers. The numbers are important in the budget but they are there for anyone to see. It is important to balance that. If we are talking about spending cuts in the area of social programs and other areas, it is really important to show the empowering measures to help people deal with the coming cuts.

This approach is far more valid than the Liberal approach of pretending that we do not have a serious problem and therefore not bring forward a budget to deal with the serious problem we in fact have.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am shocked at the message I have heard from Reform members opposite today. It is difficult to believe that a party would be so irresponsible as to easily play the game for international monetary traders and talk about problems that do not even exist: rhetoric and no specifics.

I have read the document and I have seen no specifics in it. I would call the paper put forward by hon. members opposite Reform draconianism. That would be a good description.

The facts are contrary to what the motion states. We have the first Minister of Finance in ages who has set targets and is prepared to meet them. He is willing to take the tough measures in a reasoned and planned way.

Could the hon. member opposite name the cuts specifically in summary? Could he bare them to the bone so that we can see what he is specifically talking about in the paper he mentioned?

Mr. Benoit: Mr. Speaker, there is a list in our budget document that explains in detail our proposed cuts and the background supporting information on why it is necessary to make cuts in those areas. As we go through our debate today these numbers will be presented. They are here to read. Surely Liberal members can read as well; I believe they can.

The hon. member for Malpeque talked about Reform draconianism. I want to talk about that. The reality is that if we continue down the path we are taking now with government overspending to the tune of $38 billion this year and a debt of $550 billion, we will lose the bulk of social programs.

Which is more draconian: losing the bulk of social programs or reducing spending on social programs by $15 billion out of total government spending of about $155 billion in that area, that is reducing federal and provincial spending together to about $140 billion? Which is more draconian: saving social programs and targeting them to the people in need or losing them?

● (1310)

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that Reformers are Tories in a hurry and we know what the Tories did to the country.

Everyone knows we must get our fiscal house in order. We must reduce spending and a draw a line on further taxation. We must reduce borrowing. We need to move toward better accountability in government programs and allow people to participate in these decisions to a greater degree.

I have been amazed by my colleagues in the Reform Party. That party supports the concept of a flat tax. We might as well call the earth flat. In a statement the leader of the Reform Party proposed a flat tax allowing lower income families to be exempt. Interestingly enough, those with average incomes in excess of $94,000 are currently paying 66 per cent of all personal income tax in the country. If one was to create a flat tax it is clear that income tax would have to be collected more from the middle class.

It certainly has been a strange week for me debating with Reformers and the Canadian Taxpayers Federation. People are saying no more taxes, while these members with their hidden agenda intend to increase the relative burdens of the middle class.

The Reform Party talks about funding of special interest groups. I object to the funding of these groups. However, what special interest groups do the Reform Party represent? I do not remember a groundswell of opinion of people in the country to transfer tax burdens from the wealthy to the middle class. The middle class is taxed beyond belief. Forty–five per cent of the average family income goes to some form of taxes. The concept of reverse Robin Hood is not supported in any progressive jurisdiction in the world.

For my own part I have initiated what I like to call a taxpayers' bill of rights which basically has three components.

It is a private member's initiative of my own. It talks about accountability, the accountability of existing and future government programs, that they must be costed in totality and on a taxpayer basis. If this legislation had been in place I believe taxpayers and the electorate in general would have made better decisions that would have possibly prevented us from being in this mess today.

I also proposed a taxpayers' ombudsman that would act as an ombudsman between taxpayers and tax collecting authorities to protect from onerous collection procedures that often occur. As members of Parliament we can all think of how acts have actually been to the detriment of many honest law–abiding people in Canada.

Another part of that bill talks about freedom from undue taxation. It basically sets a cap of 55 per cent in totality of income on which total taxes can be paid. It simply attempts to reduce that by one per cent a year for the next 15 years. It starts with a 55 per cent cap and reduces it. It is a clear solution to some of our spiralling taxation problems.

The motion is just more of the Reform Party's fantasy world. It must be nice to get up in the morning to all this glittering tinsel but, alas, it is truly a wonderland.

To move too fast in the direction of deficit reduction is just as problematic as moving too slow. As programs are cut it will reduce the federal government's share of income taxes, exacerbating the problem. Let us remember the legacy of the Tories reducing spending, increasing taxes and spiralling deficits, caught in a continual loop. This is where the Reform Party would take us but only faster.

We must break the back of deficit and debt. However we need to walk the fine line between reductions and allowing the economy to grow. We would have thought that a party from the west would be familiar with the tight–fisted policies of R. B. Bennett and how these turned the west into a virtual wasteland of the thirties.

People come to rely on aspects of government programs whether social or rapid write–offs for capital investments by businesses. That does not mean they cannot and indeed will be changed. What we are talking about here is a rapidity by which change occurs.

• (1315)

Creating uncertainty in the business sector as well as other sectors of the economy may well witness a flight of capital. To the extent that we create contraction in the economy, other countries will look more promising to invest in. An outward flow of investment will result in the loss of jobs, further exacerbating our deficit and ultimately throwing us into a recession or worse. I am talking about a situation of reverse economics. Clearly to take government moneys and contract the economy is going to create a bigger deficit than we already have.

These are the policies of the Reform Party, the policies of wrack and ruin. It has taken us 20 years to develop the situation we now have. Regrettably we have to deal with it. The question is how quickly.

A slash and burn mentality does not work. We have to maintain the underpinnings of the social fabric of this nation. More important, we cannot afford to turn the corner that is basically going to put us into a recession or worse than that, a depression. Other countries have dealt with this matter in similar circumstances and have created some of these negative spiralling effects that will actually drive the economy into worse shape.

Clearly the way to get out of a deficit problem is to slowly grow the economy. As the economy grows, revenues from governments increase. By going too fast we run the risk of contraction. That contraction will just exacerbate our problems. The Reform Party does not seem to recognize that. The Reform Party would have us driven into a recession or depression within the next three years. This is unacceptable.

What is the solution? Keep the economy growing. Gradually reduce the deficit with targeted or slightly better than 3 per cent of GDP. Increase foreign trade.

Of the component aspects of national income another very important one is our current account deficit. As we can attract more foreign dollars into our country we can deal with the deficit more aggressively. I am happy to see that during our tenure that account deficit has been reduced from $30 billion to $15 billion.

Trade initiatives such as China, South America, more trade with the United States through NAFTA, these are all positive things to bring Canada out of its deficit situation and controlling debts and deficits as they continue in the future. This is clearly the way to go, not through a tremendous contraction of the economy.

In conclusion, we simply cannot afford pushing our economy back into recession. Worse, we cannot afford the luxury of letting the upper income brackets of this country shift their taxes to the middle class.

Once again it has been amazing to me in the last two or three weeks to watch the large crowds the Reform Party has put together. People are saying to cut spending. The other day in Pickering a gentleman was sitting with a sign which read "cut spending". After the meeting he came up to me and said: "I live in your riding. I am on unemployment insurance and I need a training grant".

It is clear that Reform Party members are misleading people, that somehow these cuts do not affect their own people. Worse than that, the flat tax, or as I say the flat earth tax, is an allocation of taxes from the upper income groups to the middle income earners. Do the middle income earners really know that is the Reform Party strategy, that they will bear proportionately more of the taxes?

I can think of no other country in the OECD or any other nation on the earth that subscribes to this policy. The Reform Party will tell us this gives incentive, it creates jobs. What it really does is it lines the pockets of the rich. This is not the policy of the Liberal Party and never has been.

• (1320)

Progressivity in the income tax system is accepted throughout the western world. As I said, I do not think the Reform Party has been totally honest with Canadians and with this Parliament. In conclusion, clearly we cannot afford the Reform Party.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's suggestion that a reduction of government spending equal to 1 per cent of GDP would cause an economic contraction and downturn in this country. Surely the Canadian economy is not that feeble.

The hon. member stands there and uses the old Keynesian magic of pump priming. Just spend more money. Get the government involved as deeply as it can in the economy and everything will be fine.

If that discredited philosophy worked, this country would have no problems. Canadian governments have spent like drunken sailors for 30 years. If Keynes was 100 per cent right, then there would be no unemployment in this country. There would be no debt. There would be no deficit.

We have heard it all. The previous two governments have done it all. They have wrecked this country by abiding by their faith in this wonderful pump priming philosophy. They should have the gumption to face up to reality, see what has been happening in this country and perhaps join the new parade. Start to realize the people out there know what is going on. That is why they come to these rallies. The ordinary common people are speaking and telling us as parliamentarians to get our act together.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, once again we are talking in some similarities. We know we are going to have to cut spending. All my Liberal Party colleagues have talked about cutting spending, so this is not new.

To start off on a little study of economics, the Keynesian philosophy was basically correct. The problem with Keynesian economics is that we did not take the other side of it which is that during periods of expansion in the economy we save. We continued to spend during good economic periods and we are paying the price for that.

Having said all that, Keynes also talked about levelling off the areas of the ups and downs of the business cycle. These are the things the Reform Party does not understand. In other words, we cannot have a situation where we create a tremendous contraction in the economy so that there is no growth. In fact there would be negative growth. There would be a recession.

By moving too quickly on the deficit, this is where the Reform Party will take us. We will be going nowhere. We will be in a worse situation because we will not have any tax revenues and our deficits will continue to spiral. It is very important that we continue to foster growth in the economy, to create certainty and to keep and meet our deficit target.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Marchand (Québec-Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the question that the Reform Party asked about the federal government's deficit and debt will obviously get a lot of press because they are very serious issues. We all know it.

I think that the cuts that the Reform Party will propose will not fix the monstrous problem facing Canada. The Reformers will table their budget, a bogus budget containing $15 billion in cuts to social programs.

This is nothing new, since their policies centre on eliminating social programs, even though they have contributed the most to Canada's success up to now.

• (1325)

They propose another $10 billion in cuts to government operations, for a total of $25 billion, and they think that these cuts will stimulate an economic recovery and that the economy will create jobs all by itself.

I must concede that the Reform Party had the best intentions when it made this recommendation—the deficit and debt are very serious problems—and I must agree that when we look at these problems from a critical distance, they are very disquieting. Moody's already issued a warning to Canada last week regarding the budget. Several foreign investors are also worried, all the more because, according to the federal government's own calculations, it is projected that Canada's debt will reach $800 billion by the year 2000.

In other words, they project that it will climb by around $50 billion per year in the next six years. It is as if the federal government were stuck in a vicious circle of debt increases, and of deficit increases even, because I have yet to see tangible proof of the government's intention to reduce the deficit and to get the debt under control. We can only hope that they deliver something concrete in the next budget.

Up to this moment, we have been grappling with a debt and a deficit that are out of control. We have a federal system that, for all intents and purposes, is teetering on the brink of bankruptcy, like a ship that is slowly sinking to a watery grave. That is the situation in which the federal government currently finds itself, a serious one indeed.

I would even go so far as to say that the problem goes beyond simple economic calculations. It is also a historical issue. This debt and deficit were not created yesterday, they are not the result of poor management. A country, like a political system, is not a business like any other. There are needs and policies. We invest in programs which are not cost effective, unlike other businesses. This may be one reason among many why the current Canadian federal system is creating a debt, as well as a deficit, and is poorly managed.

There is a problem within the federal system. Right within the Canadian federal system, there is a mechanism which allows money to be wasted, to be spent in certain ways while the debt merely increases. I would like to give you a few examples. Let us consider some of the history of the federal system.

One must recognize first of all that Canada was founded on concepts which are no longer valid today. It was founded on the concept of uniting east and west. This is the great Canadian dream. This country, as we know, was shaped by an ideology which may have had validity at the time, but is now completely outmoded. We know that true, concrete and cost–effective economic trends involve a north–south dynamic, whereas for years and even a century the federal system has attempted to implement an unnatural system, basically between the east and the west, going against the natural north–south dynamic.

To achieve this goal, the federal government had to introduce several very costly policies. This attempt to keep east and west unified was of course no easy matter. It was very expensive; it has been very expensive. Considerable investments were necessary to maintain a system which was, shall we say, artificial.

In cultural matters, for example, think of the billions of dollars invested to create a Canadian culture, while most English Canadians now wonder what that culture is. But if we consider the billions of dollars spent on creating this culture, the image of a unified country, we would have to say it has been a waste of money. In the area of culture alone, we can think of cultural industries that were set up after the second world war, after the Massey commission, which set up the Canada Council and the National Film Board, and which made all sorts of demands on the CBC.

They set up, so to speak, with great panache and a lot of money, an industry to try to create an image of Canadian cultural unity. It did not work. It cost a lot, however, but it did not work. So, today, we are left with all the debts from this unfortunate undertaking, this unfortunate policy. Now we are paying these debts off and we are paying dearly. Those of us in this House are not overly concerned, because we will not be the ones to pay, really. It will be future generations, for sure. We can see from the policies of the federal government how the young people in particular will be paying.

I would like to give you another example. I could give quite a number of examples of mistaken policies by the federal system, which established these grand policies in an attempt to ensure its own survival as a system. The federal system established these policies in order to survive as a system. Not to protect the interests of the public, not to protect the interests of the regions or of communities, but to protect its own priorities here in Ottawa. It is as if the federal system in Ottawa had a life of its own. The policy of bilingualism, for example, established by Pierre Trudeau, which cost a lot, was not necessarily what was recommended by Quebec, the major stakeholder in this issue.

Of course, bilingualism cost billions of dollars and we know very well that, if we look at it analytically, that investment achieved nothing at all. There was no positive spin–off whatsoever following the investment of billions of dollars in that policy. We all know very well that anyone who knows anything about francophones outside of Quebec knows that those billions of dollars were spent with the best of intentions but they were attempts at artificially resuscitating communities gasping for their last breath. This was another unsucessful policy.

We can say the same for several other areas, including health. Just look at how the federal government has imposed itself on the provinces since the 1940s in areas falling exclusively under provincial jurisdiction, like health and education. The federal government did this in order to survive as a system. Once again, today, we find ourselves in a situation where our system is on the brink of bankruptcy, is insolvent, and is unable to continue to apply its policies because they were senseless from the start and are still senseless today.

• (1335)

I would like to say to you that one of the reasons Quebecers want sovereignty is to get out of this absurd system. It is not only weakened by a monstrous debt, but, considering all of the policies the government is trying to enforce across Canada, it is absurd.

[English]

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of my colleague from Québec–Est. I would like to ask him a question in the context of his remarks that Canada as an entity always trades north–south and that a lot of the east–west trade we have is arbitrary, expensive and not profitable.

Do I take it he would recommend the Quebec dairy producers trade only north–south, that milk marketing arrangements between Quebec and the rest of Canada, particularly Ontario, should be dismantled forthwith and Quebec would be better off if it traded only north–south in that context?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I thank the the member for his question. It is quite interesting. However, I think he has misunderstood what I said with respect to east–west economic ties in Canada.

It does not take an expert to explain and every economist recognizes that the east–west link in Canada is historically and artificially built and that the natural tendencies in our economic trade are north–south. However, this is not to say that Quebec when it becomes sovereign will not want to trade with western Canada, Ontario or the other provinces.

Those economic bonds that have developed between Quebec and the other provinces are good and should continue. It is good not only for those provinces, Ontario and the west, it is good for Quebec as well.

Let us not be simplistic in our economic approach. It is not a question of severing those good things in the system. It is a question of liberating us and all the regions in Canada to be able to develop where economic development is due.

Take Alberta for example, a province well represented by the Reform Party. If we look at its economic situation, we will see that 40 per cent of its trade is with British Columbia, and another 40 per cent is with Asian countries, with the far east; a small 20 per cent with the rest of Canada.

It is totally normal. It is not a political statement to recognize those facts. It is just normal, economic practice.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the rather passionate but highly erroneous speech by our colleague opposite.

I find it strange to hear them describe the Canadian federation as being bankrupt. I do not think this is true. I am sure that if you look around you, and I see the hon. member opposite—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I know that speeches can be passionate, but I would remind the House that all comments must be made through the Chair.

Mr. Gagnon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We must keep in mind that we can count on a secure market of almost 30 million people. It is important to stress that this market is very important for Quebec products.

That said, the Canadian federation remains a system where we give priority to financial equalization by helping those provinces always in need of financial or infrastructure support.

Let us look at Quebec, for instance. As you know, for the last year, Quebec will receive over $3 billion in equalization payments. Quebec comes out a winner as a result of belonging to the Canadian federation. I find it regrettable that they question federal government services such as Telefilm Canada, the Canada Council and Radio–Canada. The Bloc Quebecois is wrong to say that the system never worked for Quebec, when we know full well that Quebec receives nearly 40 per cent of federal budgets allocated to certain federal government services. That is something we must keep in mind, Mr. Speaker.

• (1340)

They also talk about international markets and say that things are not going well for Quebec, but we must remember that well–known Quebec businesses such as Bombardier and Tembec and many other new small businesses received help from several federal agencies. They received help because of the partnership with the federal government.

We must not forget that many of these officials are from Quebec and believe in Quebec products within Canada.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I can think of several possible ways of answering the muddled remarks of hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine.

He is telling us that Quebec always got what it asked for from the federal government. Quebec did get a number of things, but Quebec cannot be said to have been the big winner on things that mattered and here are two examples.

First, the most important industry in terms of economic development has been the automotive industry. As the people from out west will tell you, it has all been concentrated in Ontario. You know how important this industry is; it drives the economy. If you need another example, think of the energy sector in Canada.

What happened in that sector in terms of funding? Over the past decade, the federal government has invested $12 billion in the development of atomic energy in Ontario. And each year, another $100 million to $130 million in new funds are spent on atomic energy in Ontario. During this time, how much did the federal government invest in hydroelectricity in Quebec? Not a cent.

This is only one side of the story. We must think about what the people in Western Canada, and Alberta in particular, have gone through. Think how they we taken in by the federal government decision to tax oil produced in Alberta. They are certainly justified in thinking that the federal system is unfair, because we are dealing with investments made essentially to serve the petty interests of that system.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think that when they read the motion introduced by the Reform Party, many Canadians, Quebecers and foreign investors would agree.

I think the target to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP within two years is an absolute minimum. In fact, it will not be that difficult since this year, the deficit is expected to be two or three billion less than forecast.

The trouble with the Reform Party's proposal is that it is accompanied by a series of proposals to reorganize the government. We agree with some of them but on the whole, it reflects an ideological vision that focuses on government operations and government spending and ignores all other aspects of the economy.

To Reform members, any government is a problem, except for policemen and prisons, because if we look at how they want to amend the Criminal Code, soon 10 per cent of all Canadians will be in prison and they will need accommodation. Pretty soon it will be like California, where the biggest budget item is not health care but police forces and prisons. In Canada and Quebec, we still prefer to see more money spent on health care and education than on prisons and police forces.

They forgot to include a huge prison construction program in their budget.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I appreciate the fact that in the course of their speeches, members may wish to refer to certain texts, but they are not supposed to use props.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I think people realize I was referring to the budget proposals of the Reform Party. As I was saying, they forgot to include a huge prison construction program which would probably be the only job creation component of their party's platform.

Of course we are concerned. I think we have reason to be, and we share their concerns as we share those of many Canadians.

• (1345)

We must understand that, at present, the Canadian economy is operating at about 92 per cent of its potential without inflation. This means that there is room for another 8 per cent increase in production without causing any increase in inflation in Canada. How did that come about? You must know where you are coming from to know where you are going. It is simple: the 1980s saw two major recessions aimed at breaking the cycle of inflation. Because of a total lack of co–operation between the various regions and economic agents in Canada, the rate of inflation was allowed to rise during the 1970s and into the early 1980s, when it averaged 12 per cent. It was just plain insane. The Bank of Canada used the big stick because people capable of managing the Canadian economy in co–operation, like in Germany and several other countries, could not be found in this place. That is why the big stick of interest rates had to be used.

So, interest rates skyrocketed and precipitated a major recession, which in turn caused unemployment to increase sharply and, of course, inflation to fall from an average of 12 per cent to 5 per cent. Economic recovery was under way, but we never recovered from the jobs lost. In 1989, the Bank of Canada decided once again to aim for zero–inflation, at a time when the average rate of inflation was about 5 per cent. It did meet its target, but at what price? By jacking up interest rates so as to stifle the economy in Quebec and Canada. So much so that our production rate fell down to 90 per cent. It fell so drastically that for the next three years, the economy grew only marginally. There was no real economic recovery in Canada while the United States had already recovered.

So, this is a duly–considered policy, because of the lack of co–operation in this country. This must be pointed out, even though it is not at the forefront any more, now that inflation has been curbed for a little while, but this inability to co–operate, to work in co–operation in this country is still a problem.

Think back to the 1980s when the Economic Council of Canada and other agencies made it clear economic co–operation was urgently needed in order to curb inflation. As some of you may remember, at the beginning of his mandate, Brian Mulroney organized a great Canadian forum to initiate a consultation process, which was a failure, but achieved his inflation–fighting goals by using the stick approach. Ontario was very prosperous at the time but it let its spending get out of control and now finds itself saddled with an annual deficit of $10 billion. We were never able to make people listen to reason.

Part of the problem is that we have to realize our economic potential as soon as possible without causing inflation. That is why we need economic growth. We see that, in the last year, government revenue went up by between 7 per cent and 8 per cent because more people are working and therefore paying more taxes. UI benefits went down not only because of the cuts but also because more people are working. We still have a way to go before realizing our full potential.

On the other hand, the actions taken by the Bank of Canada and the stick approach that was used have made the Canadian dollar very volatile. Our dollar went from 69 cents to 87 cents, then back to 70 cents. We are playing with foreign investors' nerves by allowing the value of our currency to fluctuate by 25 per cent. This does not make any sense. We must hold economic consultations so that these fluctuations can be avoided.

If Canada's interest rates are what they are today, it is partly because of the debt, but also because confidence in the Canadian dollar has been shaken by our inflation–fighting policy.

• (1350)

I am not saying that it would have been better not to do anything about inflation. The problem is that we must use different methods to fight it. Many people say that we are living above our means. This is partly true. There is a very simple way to find out: one only has to look at our balance of international payments. And now, with our dollar at 70 cents, we have restored that balance, to a great extent.

The challenge for investors and Canadians alike is to determine if we can hold on long enough. Our tourism deficit has gone down, and this year we will have a very substantial trade surplus of $17 billion, but we still have a cumulative debt on which we pay about $30 billion annually in interest payments to foreign investors.

Even if we start living within our means, compared with other countries, we have to keep paying, because at one time we spent more than we could afford, and now we are stuck with interest payments we have to pay abroad. This situation has to be turned around as well.

What makes people worried? Why was Moody's worried last week, for instance? Did Moody's say: Listen, social programs are too expensive? Not at all. Moody's said: Structural reorganization is necessary. For instance, there are practically no more fishermen left, but the Department of Fisheries and Oceans still has the same number of employees. The department has more employees that we have cod. This does not make sense.

The same thing happened at the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The national energy policy was abolished in the early eighties, but they kept the same number of employees they had when they were still managing this energy policy.

The federal government has increased its involvement in a wide range of sectors—and not only in areas under provincial jurisdiction—to the extent that it is no longer economically feasible. We need a major reorganization, and of course we are looking forward to the budget.

Relations with the provinces are a problem, not only because structures are unwieldy but because they are inefficient in some areas. Years ago we came to the conclusion that manpower training was essential, and in this particular area there was no agreement at all between the federal government and the provinces—and not just Quebec—and there is no way we can act effectively.

Of course in Quebec the situation is even worse. Why? For the simple reason that Quebec was Canada's first industrial heartland. This means we had more mature industries in the railway sector, shipbuilding, and so forth, than in other provinces. When these industries started shrinking, new industries came in. There was a very substantial restructuring of our economy, but we did not have manpower training to ease the transition for a machinist from the railway sector to the aeronautics industry. There were no resources to provide for that transition. The situation was worse in Quebec for the very simple reason that we had a much larger share of Canada's old economy.

The problem is now becoming acute in Ontario, because while Quebec's economy has largely been restructured, Ontario has a problem with its own mature and very mature industries like the automobile industry, where like recovery is temporary, and the steel industry. They now have to cope with problems that Quebec experienced 10, 15, or 20 years ago, problems we were never able to solve with the help of the federal government.

Reorganization is needed, and here I am speaking from the Canadian, the federalist point of view. I am not talking about being capable of developing our aspirations as a society. I talked about it this week in the debate on the Young Offenders Act, when referring to the fact that Quebec's perspective was entirely different from that of the present Minister of Justice. I could have elaborated on this, but there is a big problem, even if we wanted to stay in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying to the member for Rosemont that I too share his view that the obsession with ratcheting inflation down to zero per cent during the last four years for all intents and purposes killed the economy of this country. It broke the entrepreneurial spirit of thousands of small and medium size business men and women, which ultimately led to unemployment numbers that we are still fighting to cope with and put people back to work.

• (1355)

My concern is the fact that the member did not put forward some specific recommendations on how we can fire up that economy again. I realize that the member talked about excessive numbers of public servants when we have done some downsizing in energy and other departments of government. The cost by having those public servants working or the savings that would have been made is not enough to really get this economy going again.

I wonder if the member would put a couple of specific recommendations on the floor of this House on how we could fire up this economy and get people back to work. As I have said, it is important to have fiscal discipline in this country but my concern is that we are not spending enough creative time in dealing with constructive ways, creative ways on how we put the 2.2 million people who are unemployed in this country back to work.

Could the member put a couple of specific ideas on the floor of the House?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his question. Given our time constraints, I would refer him quickly to the ten recommendations by the Bloc Quebecois which he may read himself instead of my listing them now.

I think it is clear that if we want everyone to put his shoulder to the wheel, and that is what these recommendations are based on, people must share the same concept of fairness. In our recommendations, clearly, we denounced tax situations which are totally unacceptable. I think fairness is the essential foundation upon which dialogue and the will to work together are based. I am referring for instance to family trusts, to the delay in reviewing the Income Tax Act in regard to resource companies, and to the fact that they are now to be given up to $1.2 billion. It is therefore an issue of fairness.

There is also an issue of effectiveness which involves occupational training first of all. Even if jobs are presently being created in certain sectors, we know that occupational training must definitely proceed at a faster pace to allow people to take those jobs.

My time is up, Mr. Speaker; as you can see, I could have gone on a few minutes more.

The Speaker: My colleague, you retain the right, if you wish, to resume speaking after question period.

It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we approach budget day I would like to convey the concerns of my constituents of Lambton—Middlesex.

Taxpayers in my riding say they simply cannot absorb any more tax increases. While they can appreciate that this year's budget must be a tough one it should not be at the further expense of middle class Canadians.

On behalf of my constituents I would ask that the Minister of Finance not raise personal income tax rates. He should also note that for millions of Canadians RRSPs will be their main source of retirement income. The minister should focus instead on meaningful spending cuts and more efficient delivery of government programs and services.

The residents of my riding are very aware of the pressing need to reduce and eventually eliminate Canada's deficit, but there has to be fairness in accomplishing this goal. If the sacrifices are spread fairly then I am convinced that all Canadians will support us in our efforts to put this country's financial house in order.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, many debates in this House have revealed how reticent and hesitant federal politicians are to call attention, with figures to back them up, to the shameful way too many francophones are treated outside Quebec.

Federalists never mention the 38 per cent rate of assimilation of Franco-Ontarians, the 75 per cent rate of assimilation of francophones in British Columbia or even the 8 per cent figure for Acadians. These unfortunate data clearly contradict the claims of the supporters of federalism, who say nothing about the fact that these francophones must continue to fight for schools, health services, government services and cultural services.

The rest of Canada continues to watch indifferently as francophones are assimilated, while federal politicians continue making unfounded claims about the havoc Quebec sovereignty will wreak on these communities.

This is disgraceful and cowardly.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in January I was starting a public meeting at Sicamous in my riding when a woman handed me a bag full of yellow ribbons. She said that the abduction and murder of Melanie Carpenter in mid-afternoon from her place of work was something Canadians should remember by wearing or displaying a yellow ribbon.

I then spoke about private member's Bill C-240 which would make it easier to designate convicted criminals as dangerous offenders. Had Bill C-240 been in force, Melanie Carpenter would be with her loved ones today.

Last week I received a fax from Sicamous saying that there are hundreds of yellow ribbons along the Trans-Canada Highway and down Highway 97A. People want to see a highway of yellow ribbons reaching all the way to Ottawa to prompt Parliament to act now.

I ask all hon. members to speed Bill C-240 through the justice committee and third reading so that others are protected from the tragic fate of Melanie Carpenter.

W. A. PORTER COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my congratulations to the students and staff of W. A. Porter Collegiate Institute in my riding of Scarborough

West on the grand opening of the greening of this institute. Under the environmental citizenship initiative, Environment Canada and Future Watch Environment and Development Partners have worked together to carry out this project.

What will be accomplished is the creation of a frog pond, the naturalization of school grounds, collection of indigenous tree seeds for growth in the school greenhouse for replanting in the wild, and stream clean–up.

This project is possible because of the support of community partners, in particular Canada Trust's Friends of the Environment, the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation and of course, the students and staff of W. A. Porter Collegiate Institute who are translating their environmental concerns into tangible action.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are over 550 licensed taxi and limousine drivers working from Pearson International Airport.

Insurance increases of 21 per cent, cost increases of 6 per cent and a 25 per cent reduction in fares are creating a situation where operators may be forced to apply for unemployment insurance. The real threat to the livelihood of these operators however is the illegal practice of scooping, the theft of business by unlicensed, uninsured illegal operators.

I urge the Solicitor General and the Minister of Transport to redraft the government airport concession operations regulations, put teeth into the enforcement process and curb the theft of an estimated $6.5 million in legitimate business.

GRACE PINE

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring the attention of the House to the accomplishments of Grace Pine, a constituent of mine. Grace Pine recently received the Saskatoon citizen of the year award for her contributions to Saskatoon.

Grace Pine has had a distinguished career, including the directorship of the laboratory at the Fort Qu'Appelle Tuberculosis Sanatorium and subsequently volunteering with the Saskatchewan Anti–Tuberculosis League. In 1967, Mrs. Pine helped to found the Saskatoon chapter of Save the Children Canada.

The volunteer organizations which have benefited from her time and support include the Saskatchewan Council for International Development, the Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace, the Saskatchewan Environmental Society, and the Saskatoon Native Theatre.

A colleague wrote of Grace Pine that she has been a role model for many who believe that we live in a global community and that we have a responsibility to those who have less than we do. These are truly words by which we should all live.

FÉDÉRATION DE L'ÂGE D'OR DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's seniors federation or Fédération de l'âge d'or du Québec yesterday added its voice to the debate of the draft bill on sovereignty at the Commission des aînés sur l'avenir du Québec.

• (1405)

I will repeat the warning the federation gave to all those using scare tactics, to the effect that it hopes the debate on the draft bill would be conducted in all openness and honesty and that the use of fear, real mental cruelty, whatever form it takes, would not be any part of it.

Seniors remember the fear campaigns and alarmist speeches of the 1980 referendum campaign. Never again will we be victims of this blackmail, with the cheque bearing the maple leaf as the ransom. Everyone pays for this cheque with their taxes.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, after 25 years of negative experience, affirmative action is under fire all over the United States. In June the Supreme Court may discard it altogether because of the growing body of evidence against it. However, in Canada the Liberals plod ahead in spite of evidence and public opinion proposing expansion of employment equity provisions through Bill C–64.

Employment equity encourages a mentality of victimization among Canadians. It harms morale in the public service and damages the self–esteem of designated groups. It poisons the workplace when jobs are awarded on the basis of sex or skin colour. Employment equity is costly and it overlaps with provincial and municipal programs.

While the government should ensure equality of opportunity and not equality of results, this government is now legislating offensive practices of discrimination.

Employment equity is unjust. It is expensive. It will not work. It is bad policy. Though well intentioned, it is wrong for Canada and the government must shelve this discriminatory legislation. No more C–64.

MUSHING FOR MIRACLES

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Mushing for Miracles is a community based campaign consisting of dogsledders from Ontario, Manitoba, and even Italy. They are on a 1,200 kilometre trek through communities in southern Manitoba to raise money for cancer research and camps for children with cancer.

I wish to thank Bob Draward and Doris Prefontaine from Lorette and all the people in the participating communities such as Lac du Bonnet, Whitemouth, Hadashville, Richer, Steinbach, St. Pierre–Jolys, Morris, Altona and Lorette who made financial contributions to make the challenges of young cancer victims less of a burden.

I want to let those children know that they are not alone in their battle. The people of Provencher are there to stand with them.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House this government's commitment to energy efficiency. At the same time Canadians are concerned with a secure supply of reasonably priced energy and the environmental impacts of energy supply, transportation and use.

In an effort to move toward sustainable development these objectives must be balanced. Improved energy efficiency can contribute greatly to meeting our long term environmental goals.

We have begun the process to improve efficiency in our facilities through the federal buildings initiative. Cabinet ministers are committed to this initiative. The Minister of Natural Resources has undertaken to make Natural Resources Canada the most energy efficient department in the federal government.

[Translation]

At the same time, we must strike a balance between economic development and improvements, for the environment's sake. With state–of–the–art technology and co–operation from all sectors, we can map out a strategy for Canada and rise to these important challenges.

THE LATE LOUIS P. CÉCILE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is saddened by the loss of one of its most eminent citizens, the Hon. Louis P. Cécile. A native of Tecumseh, Ontario, and lawyer by trade, Mr. Cécile was first elected to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario in 1948. He was re–elected in 1951, 1955, 1959 and 1963. During his long political career, he held three different cabinet portfolios.

After this illustrious career, he became an Ontario provincial court judge, a position he filled until he retired in 1980. On behalf of all of my constituents, I extend my heartfelt sympathy to his son Pierre and his daughters, Louise and Anne–Marie. Through his deeds, Louis Cécile will go down in the region's annals of history. His name will live on in our memory forever.

COUNCIL FOR CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to denounce the behaviour of the Council for Canadian Unity, an organization generously funded by the federal government, which is bent on systematically keeping a record of the witnesses who speak before the regional commissions on sovereignty. We do not know what exactly the council hopes this kind of tactic will achieve, but we note that those who defend Canadian unity continue to be obsessed with compiling lists of sovereignists.

• (1410)

This practice is utterly reprehensible in a democratic society and is all the more unsettling, since it is being used when democracy is being expressed at its purest, during prereferendum consultations.

No democratic society can stand for the use of intimidation tactics to erode the right of its citizens to freedom of speech. These tactics are worthy of Big Brother and have no place in Quebec and Canada.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a certain member of this House has recently reminded Canadians that he was Minister of Finance during the years 1977, 1978 and 1979. The budget deficits for those three years were $10.4 billion, $12.6 billion, and $11.5 billion for a three year total of $34.5 billion.

One can add up the budget deficits from 1976 all the way back to 1954, the first post–war budget deficit year, and only get to a total of $25.9 billion.

History tells us that two Liberal finance ministers went on a spending spree and overspent more in three years than their predecessors had overspent in 21 years. Canadians turfed that irresponsible government out in 1979.

Do you know who the Minister of Finance was for the 1978 and 1979 budgets? Why of course, it was the present Prime Minister. This country cannot afford the kind of experience that was brought to us by the present Prime Minister.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE OF CANADA

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, today I raise the issue of the Correctional Service of Canada's policy on strip searches of women prisoners and the atrocious mishandling of some of these women by male corrections officers at Kingston's prison for women on April 22, 1994.

Following an investigation by CSC officials, it was suggested that appropriate measures were taken in using the riot squad which includes male prison staff to strip and search the women and their cells.

CSC's policy states that searches should be conducted by members of the same sex, except in cases of institutional emergency. It is now clear that the female prisoners behaved in a passive manner and offered no physical resistance. This is a complete contradiction to the official version of events offered by the CSC which is nothing more than a one–sided whitewash of the incidents that occurred.

I am pleased that the Solicitor General has finally acted today to investigate this serious question. Serious issues still exist with regard to the lack of energy and speed with which the commissioner of the Correctional Service of Canada and the Solicitor General pursued this matter.

The Solicitor General needs to pay much more careful attention to the activities of the Correctional Service of Canada.

REFORM PARTY POLICY

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after having the opportunity to read what the Reform Party really plans for Canada, I believe there are some serious questions Canadians must ask about their alternative budget.

What is the true impact going to be for Canadian seniors? At what income level will benefits start to be clawed back, $40,000, $30,000 or $20,000? How can Reform members talk about national standards on one hand while large cuts to equalization payments will restrict the ability of some provinces to deliver similar levels of service to their citizens?

How do those 86 per cent of Canadians with incomes below $20,000 who already do not make contributions to RRSPs find the resources to make sufficient contributions to cover unemployment insurance, retirement, post–secondary education and personal catastrophes? And will these resources be sufficient during tough economic times?

Canadians understand that tough problems do not always have simple solutions. I hope Canadians ask these and many other questions so that they can understand the impact these proposals may have on them, their families and the very essence of Canadian society.

VETERANS

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the men and women who served our country in the two world wars have cause for concern today. They have just learned that an independent Quebec would not pay them the veterans' pension.

Jean–Pierre Jolivet, the member for Laviolette and Parti Quebecois whip said, in the context of the proceedings of the Mauricie–Bois–Francs regional commission, that Quebec would not be paying all pensions. Quebec would not be paying the veterans' pension, for example.

In addition to the veterans' pension, the member for Laviolette could perhaps tell people now what other pension plans the government of an independent Quebec would be dropping.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, with Moody's now monitoring the credit rating of the Canadian government, interest rates have moved upwards. Today, the Bank of Canada has just increased the bank rate from 8.07 per cent to 8.38 per cent.

Does the Minister of Finance acknowledge that this pressure from the financial community, which caused interest rates to rise last week, is growing and, with the approach of his upcoming budget, is he prepared to cut the operating costs of the federal system, including in the area of overlap and duplication, before interest rates rise significantly?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Finance acknowledge that the pressure from the financial community is a signal that he should tackle the deficit problem by making massive cuts in government spending, which has to be the preferred approach, rather than raise the taxes of the middle class, as he himself proposed, which would considerably delay an economic upturn?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: He is going to vote yes.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I note that the Minister of Finance favours a yes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I hope I can get a "yes" to my third question.

While tackling the deficit by significantly reducing expenditures, does the Minister of Finance intend proposing to the Bank of Canada that it adopt a monetary policy that is less restrictive, less focused on the fight against inflation and more concerned with economic development and job creation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows very well, we have established objectives with the Bank of Canada concerning inflation. This agreement has served Canada very well, and we intend to go on with this policy.

Having said this, I would like to congratulate the hon. member on his very clear questions.

TAX LOOPHOLES

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister himself stated yesterday on the CBC that he is well aware of the tax loopholes which he must close to ensure that the wealthiest Canadians do their fair share to correct the fiscal situation. Unfortunately, the minister once again targeted social programs in his strategy to combat the deficit.

Can the finance minister tell us when he will bring down the upcoming budget, and can he tell us whether he will have the courage this time to tackle the real tax loopholes of wealthy Canadians which he claims he knows so well, while leaving unscathed the unemployed, persons receiving social assistance and senior citizens?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we addressed tax loopholes in the last budget. In regard to the upcoming budget, I have indicated that this will be an important avenue to pursue.

Having said this, I shall answer the hon. member's second question. As you know, an old tradition in the House has it that the finance critic for the opposition asks the finance minister the date of the budget. Unfortunately, this tradition was put aside under the previous government and we are pleased to revive it.

I would like to answer the hon. member by saying that the budget will be brought down on Monday, February 27, at 4.30 p.m.

[English]

Once more bringing to life a tradition that existed in the House for a long time which the previous government had set aside, it is my pleasure to announce that the budget will be presented Monday, February 27, at 4.30 in the afternoon.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Minister of Finance for his only truthful answer in some time, I thank him for stating the date of the budget.

I would like to ask him whether, when his upcoming budget is brought down on February 27 at 4.30 p.m., he will tackle the real tax loopholes benefiting wealthy Canadians, including tax treaties signed with countries which provide endless loopholes and are regarded as veritable tax havens?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have many agreements with many countries. Moreover, such agreements are part of international trade, but I can re–assure the hon. member on his specific question about tax havens. We tackled them in the last budget and we intend to continue doing so.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the Reform Party outlined a taxpayers' budget that would eliminate the deficit in three years through spending cuts alone.

We did so because many Canadians believe, and the international money markets agree, that the Liberal government's deficit reduction target is too weak and that the government is squandering its one opportunity to get federal spending under control.

Will the Minister of Finance, even at this late date, even if it means putting an addendum into his budget, revise the upcoming federal budget to set a firm target date for the elimination of the deficit rather than just its reduction?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that we wanted to do when we set up the consultation process was to encourage as many Canadians as possible to participate in the formulation of the budget and to make their comments on the budget.

I would like to take this opportunity, now that we are getting very close to the ultimate thing, to thank all of those who participated, certainly members of my own caucus.

There were some very live debates within our caucus. All points of views were expressed. I would like to thank those on the outside, whether it be the senator for policy alternatives, whether it be a number of major organizations.

I would like to thank the Reform Party for its effort this morning. I think that it has tried to elevate the debate. I look forward to the opportunity of debating the details of the Reform proposition as soon as I am able to discover it.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the reply but we were asking about revising the government's deficit reduction target. The minister has repeatedly mentioned rolling two year targets for the deficit. We ask, is the minister listening to the money markets?

I quote Avery Shenfeld, senior economist at Wood Gundy, that a two–year target at the top of the business cycle is not going to satisfy creditors. The Bank of Nova Scotia vice–president stated that making non–ambitious two–year targets is really not what is needed. Moving toward a balanced budget is what investors want to see.

Given the fact that our creditors, the people that are putting up $40 billion to cover the overdrafts, have no faith in the government's fiscal plan, will the minister abandon the idea of rolling two–year deficit targets and set a firm date for deficit elimination?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I made the same comment on Friday. The problem with members of the Reform Party is that they are so desirous of rehearsing their spontaneous lines for after the budget, they cannot wait until it is presented.

Let me assure the House that when the budget is brought down, the desires of those who want to see us clean up the nation's finances in a humane way that will allow Canadians to get back to work while still respecting the values of the country, one of which is that governments should live within their means, will be very satisfied with the budget.

• (1425)

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

Since the government's last budget, the Canadian bank rate has gone up by 4 per cent. It went up again today. The Canadian dollar has fallen by three cents. Canada is in danger of losing its AAA credit rating and its social services network is unravelling. These are just four of the consequences of the government's fiscal policy.

Does the Prime Minister accept any personal responsibility for these consequences? Does he want to go down as the Prime Minister that drove the debt through he ceiling and the dollar through the floor or will he order a mid–course correction in the government's fiscal policy?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be remembered as running a very good government with a very good Minister of Finance, a government that has performed with 4.3 per cent growth rather than 3 per cent, with virtually zero inflation, with 450,000 new jobs created in a year.

This is the first government since 1990 that has managed to have an operating surplus and that predicted a deficit of $39.7 billion. The actual deficit will be lower than that.

I would like to be remembered for all of that.

DAIRY FARMERS

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Canadian dairy farmers are urging the Canadian government not to give in to Washington, which is trying to pressure the government into going back to the negotiating table for tariffs on dairy products, following the implementation of the new GATT agreements.

Does the Prime Minister plan to tell President Clinton that Canada intends to unequivocally defend farmers and to tell him in no uncertain terms that Canada has no intention of negotiating any reduction in the tariff rates approved in the GATT?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I met with farmers from my riding last Friday, and I had the pleasure yesterday of meeting with the president of UPA and other leaders of Canadian farm organizations. I assured them that Canada's position is quite clear: the GATT agreement reached last December gives us the right to maintain tariffs at their current levels and Canada's position is absolutely logical and defendable. We intend to say this clearly to the American president when he comes to this House.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the Prime Minister's reply, will he assure us that Canada will not hesitate to bring this issue before a WTO panel, if the Americans push the issue?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, from one "Chrétien" to another, yes.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this year the Canadian government paid out about $43 billion in interest. Next year we will have to pay about $47 billion in interest. That means we will have $4 billion less to spend on social security next year than we had this year.

What does the finance minister intend to cut from spending so he can pay this extra interest on the debt he is building up?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be bringing down the budget on Monday. At that point the member for Calgary North will have the answer to her question.

The member for Calgary North has just made an interest rate estimate. The interest rate estimate of this afternoon is not the same interest rate estimate that was made in the presentation this morning. I would like to know what happened in the last couple of hours.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister should re–examine the presentation.

The government talks a lot about compassion.

• (1430)

Where is the compassion in eroding the sustainability of our social programs because this government cannot get a grip on its spending? What will happen to our social programs if the interest drain continues?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member talks about compassion. Where lies the compassion in a program that says they are going to cut equalization payments to the poorest provinces in this country? Where is the compassion in a program that says they are going to decimate the health care system? Where lies the compassion in a program that the third party has put forward in terms of cuts to senior citizens that would mean that the clawback currently at $53,000 would begin for senior citizens at $11,000?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADA COUNCIL

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. In its foreign policy statement, the government clearly indicated its intention to make culture the cornerstone of this policy. Yet, the Minister of Foreign Affairs has cut Canada Council funding for the visiting foreign artists program, which will be replaced with an exchange program with the U.S. and Mexico exclusively.

Does the heritage minister recognize that redirecting this program towards the United States and Mexico will have a direct negative impact on francophone artists, whose main market is found in French–speaking countries around the world?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, any decision affecting the Canada Council will be made as part of its own budgetary process and by its own board of directors. I think that the direction taken by my colleague to spur cultural exports within North America is not at all designed to hinder our efforts with respect to Europe, and France in particular.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that the government's decision flows directly from its foreign policy, which is premised upon the existence of a single, hypothetical Canadian culture, thus denying the uniqueness of Quebec's culture, Quebec being the largest French–speaking community in North America?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that her question is based on inaccurate information and that no cuts were contemplated. It is true that inaccurate information was circulated, but contrary to what she may think, the program in question was not cut.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the Minister of Finance's attack on the Reform Party's suggestions for eliminating the deficit.

After the minister presents his budget, even if he is able to reach his weak interim targets, he will have added $100 billion to the debt or approximately $10 billion in annual interest payments and he will still have a deficit of $25 billion.

• (1435)

Is he going to tell Canadians where exactly he intends to find that $25 billion in additional cuts or is this party going to continue to try and hide the truth from Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this party has made it very clear the way that was practised by the previous government, the way the third party advocates, the setting up of wishful targets somewhere down the road, is not the way one achieves success.

The Prime Minister and I have already said within this House that this year not only are we going to hit our deficit target but we are going to do substantially better. It is the first time in a long time that a Canadian government has been able to say that.

It is going to be very clear to Canadians and those who analyse the budget that not only are we going to hit our targets but that we are going to hit our targets based on very prudent assumptions. We are going to set in place the track that is going to clean up this nation's finances. The member can put that in his pipe and smoke it.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do not smoke.

The Minister of Finance has come up with a unique explanation of the failures of the previous government. He is the first one to explain that the Tories had standards that were just too high.

Today interest rates went up, the bank rate went up to 8.38 per cent, the highest level since this government took office. This is with increased warnings from not just Moody's but now Wood Gundy, Dominion Bond Rating Service and others that the targets are not adequate.

Will the minister not admit that the markets are already saying that with this government's targets Canadians will pay millions of dollars more a year on higher interest rates, higher borrowing and higher mortgage costs?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with some difficulty that I find that the members opposite continue with doom and gloom and continue to try to attack a country which in terms of its economy is doing very well.

The member is simply not stating the facts. If he read Moody's statement he would have seen there was a general comment on the level of public debt in this country both at the federal level and at the provincial level. There was a very clear trend set out going back a number of years in terms of what previous governments had done and the failure of Canadian governments to come to grips with their problems. There was no comment on this government, our targets or the forthcoming budget.

I would ask the hon. member, if he is going to ask questions, for heaven's sake please base them on some fact.

KINGSTON PRISON FOR WOMEN

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Members of the Kingston correctional services riot squad responded to an emergency at the Kingston Prison for Women in 1994. In her report on this incident, the prison warden lied, saying that only female guards responded, when a video proves otherwise.

How can the Solicitor General justify the fact that such degrading incidents occurred at the Kingston Prison for Women and that the prison warden subsequently lied to hide the truth?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on January 20 there was a report released by an internal commission of inquiry set up by the commissioner of corrections under the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

However, just last week I received another report from the correctional investigator into the same situation which provided quite a different set of conclusions in respect of facts and interpretation.

As a result of the conflicts between these two reports, the commissioner of corrections recommended, and I agreed, that there should be an independent impartial investigation to establish the base of facts. When that is done I will see what further action needs to be taken and I will take such action.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as part of what needs to be done in order to clearly convey the message that he does not condone this kind of behaviour on the part of correctional authorities, will the Solicitor General seek the immediate suspension of the warden of the prison for women in Kingston, Ontario?

• (1440)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, matters of discipline of staff are the responsibility of the commissioner of corrections.

I think the first thing to do is carry out the inquiry that I announced today, to have a basis of fact on which to take further action inasmuch as there have been two reports both set up under the CCRA and which have reached opposite conclusions on the same situation.

This is the sensible approach and this is the one I am taking as quickly as possible.

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question which is in pursuit of compassion is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

After today's rather scary announcement the women of Canada are breathing a collective sigh of relief that the Reform Party is not the government. Women want social security reforms to be sensitive to their plight and to that of their children. I know the minister has met with many women's groups and I know he is very concerned about child poverty.

What measures has the minister taken to address the needs of Canadian women and their children?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important developments has been as a result of the changes and amendments we made to the Unemployment Insurance Act last year. Close to 200,000 low income Canadians with children and who are on UI assistance now receive close to an additional $1,000 a year as a result of the reforms to the UI system. We differentiated between the basic benefit and the benefit based upon dependency.

It shows that when we can make serious reforms and look at it properly and constructively, we can really help poor people, not blow torch them, as the Reform Party wants to do.

PROVINCIAL TRANSFERS

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers' budget released today by the Reform Party established a long term process for decentralization whereby the federal government would transfer tax points to the provinces so that the provinces could better deliver core services in the areas of health care, advanced education and welfare.

How can the finance minister consider the transfer of block funding to the provinces without clear guidelines on the best way to spend the money from the minister responsible for social programs?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to get into details of the budget which is going to be presented on Monday.

The question I have after looking at the thing this morning is how can the third party say that it is going to reduce the deficit when at the same time it is transferring tax points which are necessary to bring the revenue in so that it can reduce the deficit? There is major evidence of double counting that I would really like to understand. Perhaps the member might explain it in his supplementary.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): The minister talks about compassion. If you have cancer the best thing you can do is cut out the tumour—

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to please address the Chair.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, through you to the finance minister, I was trying to give the example that the most compassionate thing you can do if someone has cancer is cut out the tumour and not simply say: "Continue your lifestyle. Go home. All is fine".

My question is for the Prime Minister. Since the human resources development minister failed to come up with a proposal for reform of social programs, how will reforms be developed and who will do it?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development has laid out a very clear plan and a very clear concept for the reform of social programs.

The fact is that we are on schedule. The House of Commons committee on social reform has reported. There has been enormous debate within this country which is an essential part of building the consensus. We are on schedule in terms of the budget. Social security reform is going to be a very important part of the budget.

• (1445)

The continuous reforms the minister is engaging in will enable us to build a stronger and much better Canada.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General of Canada stated yesterday that last year's thorough investigation into the activities of CSIS informer Grant Bristow concluded that Bristow did not act improperly. My question is directed to the Solicitor General.

How can the Solicitor General say there was a thorough investigation into the Bristow affair when the director of the Security Intelligence Review Committee has stated that committee members did not view the videotape incriminating Brant Bristow, even if though it was available? What kind of investigation was that?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the SIRC will want to review the tape and determine if further investigation is required in the light of such activities. I think that is what we would expect from a standing commission of inquiry like the SIRC.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday it was a thorough investigation, today it is not. I just cannot understand how this service works.

Are we to understand from the Solicitor General's refusal to reopen the investigation that he does not want to fully investigate CSIS activities and that he is satisfied with Grant Bristow's decision to go away?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the SIRC operates at arm's length from the minister and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I believe the SIRC is fully empowered to conduct further investigations if it sees fit to do so.

Again, why are the hon. member and his party trying to give credibility to the Heritage Front? I am very curious to know.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Canadian Taxpayers Association presented the government with a quarter of a million signatures of taxpayers saying no tax increase. The minister will be happy to know that I was one of the people who carried sacks of mail up to the minister's office.

Has he got the message yet, that there are to be no tax increases?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I saw the hon. member's picture in the paper.

I must say that members on both sides of the House in response to their own constituents have made it very clear to the government and to the Minister of Finance that Canadians really feel they are suffering from an undue tax burden.

It is something the government is very conscious of and it is not our intention in the next budget to proceed primarily through tax increases. I have made it very clear that we are going to proceed overwhelmingly in cutting government spending.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would encourage the finance minister, when he gets through the 30,000 letters we delivered yesterday, to read our taxpayers' budget because we have balanced it without any tax increase.

What could the finance minister tell Canadians who are already providing his government with $120 billion to convince them that it should have more?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have not wanted in the House, out of due deference to the fact that it was only presented this morning, to engage in debate on the package presented by the third party.

Let us be very clear. First, it causes an enormous amount of harm to very poor Canadians who are unable to adjust. Second, it is totally lacking in details. The devil is in the details. If they are going to do a budget they should at least have the courage to say what they are going to do and not have vague concepts. Third, which is very surprising, that budget does not eliminate the deficit in three years the way the Reform Party said it would.

JUSTICE

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and is not on gun control.

[Translation]

Recently in my riding, I held two public forums on family violence. There was unanimous agreement on the need for such forums on a national scale in order to develop a comprehensive strategy to tackle this serious problem.

Is the minister prepared to endorse the principle of holding such national forums and to assign a member of his staff to help me organize them?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first may I say how highly I regard the initiative demonstrated by the member in convening and conducting the forums to which he has referred.

May I say as well that we learn from these events. I know that the member has shared with caucus some of the points made during the forums in his riding. He has set an example for the rest of us in the House of Commons of the kind of action we can take locally to increase the awareness of people with respect to the scourge in Canadian society.

I would be more than happy to endorse that approach and to work with the member in whatever constructive way possible to ensure that kind of activity is repeated across the country.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, considering the lopsided debate that has occurred regarding the fundamental causes of our large debt with some parties blaming social programs, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Would he confirm this afternoon that when it comes to funding social programs the proportion of expenditures on social programs in relation to the GDP is the same today as it was back in the mid–1970s?

It is simply nonsense to make our social programs the scapegoat for the deficit. The reason we have a very high deficit is unfortunately the curse of compound interest, the fact that successive governments have allowed that debt to build up too high.

The government is now stuck with a terrible problem. It is not a question of ideology but a question of arithmetic. The member's question is very well taken.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, we are trying to balance this lopsided debate. The minister acknowledges that social program expenditures have not caused the huge deficit and debt base in the country. He referred to the fact that one cause was compound interest.

Would the minister confirm that a 1991 study from his department indicated that 96 per cent of our accumulated debt since 1984 was the result of compound interest on the debt and, more important, a whole set of tax loopholes as well?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that tax loopholes and tax expenditures have deprived the government of needed revenue.

On the other side of the question we must really admit that a number of those tax expenditures had a very specific policy objective. In fact it was very important to accomplish those objectives.

The answer to the question is that it is not tax loopholes. It is not social programs. It is the curse of compound interest and the fact that the previous government simply did not face up to its responsibilities. We are going to do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of defence.

Senior officers in the army live in sumptuous government owned houses for which they pay a ridiculously low rent. Rear–Admiral Larry Murray, for example, pays $519 a month for a home appraised at more than $389,000, and Lieutenant–General Scott Clements spends $581 a month for a home appraised at more than $657,000.

How can the minister of defence accept that enlisted personnel pay $569 for very modest accommodations, while senior officers pay the same amount for houses four times the size and much more luxurious?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, some of the reports have been a little misleading.

In the case of the three service commanders, they live in accommodation that was paid for many years ago. They are somewhat large houses. Much of the house is used for entertaining dignitaries and others, and receptions of that nature.

• (1455)

We are trying to ensure that the portion of those houses they occupy for family reasons does accord to normal practices so that there is no disparity between what they pay and what ordinary soldiers pay.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the current state of public finances, how can the minister of defence justify retaining such financial privileges for high ranking officers, in spite of the reasons he has just stated, while the government is preparing to increase rents by 25 per cent for persons in public housing?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think I just gave the answer.

We want to ensure any regime that is in place with respect to rent applies fairly and equitably, no matter if the person is a general officer, a non–commissioned officer or a private.

I should point out that the government improved the basic pay for privates about a year ago before the freeze came on. It is of continuing concern to me that some of our soldiers allegedly are on social assistance. That matter is being looked into to see whether or not it is a pervasive problem and the reasons for it.

We hope to be able to address it through procedures that are in place.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that Polish refugee Artur Lasia was admitted to Canada not because he had HIV but because he was discriminated against based on his sexual orientation.

According to the IRB's own documents the minister was wrong. Mr. Lasia was accepted as a refugee solely because he carries the virus that causes AIDS.

At a time when our health care programs are stretched to the limit and the IRB has set a precedent for letting people like Mr. Lasia in for free medical care in Canada, how will the minister reassure Canadians that they are not losing their place in the queue for their own essential health care needs?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the preamble to the question is incorrect in a number of areas.

First, the decision made with respect to the individual is not precedent setting because the fundamental foundation upon which the IRB adjudicates is that every individual case gets decided on its own merits. Some will make it; others will be refused.

Second, he knows full well that under the Immigration Act all immigrants coming to Canada have to go through two checks: the security check as well as the health check. He also knows that the majority of those found to be HIV positive are not permitted into the country.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I find it interesting that the minister would raise both checks, particularly the health care check and HIV.

The minister opposed the Reform bill for immigrant HIV testing. The minister is responsible for the people who have made the ludicrous decision that foreign HIV carriers deserve Canada's health care and the minister stands in the House—

The Speaker: Two kicks at the can. The question please.

Mr. Mayfield: Does the minister really support his scandal plagued IRB and its decision to accept people with illnesses who will be an unwarranted drain on our health care system?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is really unfortunate that on such sensitive issues members of Parliament should twist and turn the facts that bear no resemblance to the principles involved in this debate.

What is the Reform Party saying? Is the Reform Party saying that it is okay for a member of a political group who is being persecuted to make a claim, that a member of a religious group who is being persecuted is allowed to make a claim, but somehow it is not okay for a member of a social group who is being persecuted, whether it is sexual orientation or gender, to make a claim?

If Reformers are saying that, let us be assured that this side wants to have nothing to do with their kind of world.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Next month the World Summit for Social Development will take place in Copenhagen to address the problems of global instability due to poverty and social injustice.

Will the minister say if the Canadian government has decided to support the 20:20 vision proposal and action plan at the summit? What will the government do to ensure the success of this important world meeting?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to inform the hon. member and this House that the Minister of Human Resources Development will lead the Canadian delegation to Copenhagen. Furthermore, over the next few days, the minister will meet with representatives from the NGOs that will be taking part in the conference.

Lastly, I would like to remind the hon. member that in the foreign policy statement it issued a few days ago, the government reaffirmed its commitment that 25 per cent of all of the development aid it gives will be spent on basic needs, such as education, health and housing, as well as family planning and drinking water.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a major portion of Reform's so–called taxpayers' budget has to do with its radical proposals for a $15 billion cut in social security spending. This is an ill thought out proposal which we heard before from Reform during the social security reform process.

The reform of Canada's social programs is a necessary, valuable and timely exercise. Its impact will be better programs and services that deliver the best results. Its impact will be actions that meet our highest priorities. With those outcomes in the balance, it is a process that deserves thought, care and creativity.

To date, and I include today's debate in this comment, it is not a process to which the Reform Party has added much beyond shopworn clichés and one track slogans. That unfortunate reality was exemplified by the Reform members' contribution, if I can use that term, to the recent report of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development. Much of the thinking, or lack thereof, that went into the Reform position also characterizes their interventions today.

Reform Party members appear to have a problem with social programs: they cost money. In their vision of Canada, families take care of their own and charities take care of the rest. This is just like the 1930s.

There is only one big problem for them in that vision: Canadians do not buy it. Canadians understand the value of social programs. They understand many of the flaws in the status quo and they want changes. However, they do not accept a social vision based on a déjà vu as the answer to every problem.

Today's Reform Party budget has a principle of equality of contribution which states that the burden of reduction must fall least heavily on the most vulnerable members of our society. Yet Reform's proposals would have completely the opposite effect.

Instead of helping those most in need, Reform Party members would cut seniors pensions by $3 billion. How would this help the most vulnerable in our society? They would eliminate all regional differentiation and all non–UI components. How would this help the poorest regions of the country, workers who need training or women who want maternity leave? They would cut aboriginal programs by 24 per cent. How would this help one of the poorest groups and arguably the neediest group of Canadians? They would cut equalization payments by $3 billion, or 35 per cent. How would this help the poorest regions of the country or Canadians who really need help?

These proposals would burden the most vulnerable members of our society, not help them. In the same vein, Reform's minority report was a sad collection of opinions desperately masquerading as fact. It showed the utter lack of depth in Reform members' thinking. It displayed a complete lack of attention to many of the important issues shaping our economy today, issues clearly outlined in the green paper released last fall.

Canadians deserve better and this government is determined to provide that. In my remarks I want to talk about the vision behind the government's perspectives on social security reform. I want to look at questions that face Canada and its social programs, questions for which the government has offered real proposals. I will then compare that to the silence or simplistic if not outright contradictory opinions of the Reform opposition.

Was the Reform minority report weak? This House may not simply take my word for it. Take the word of the hon. member for Calgary North. She was quoted in the Ottawa Citizen on February 8 that aspects of her party's report "were not thought through very well before they were rushed into print".

Canadians expect much more from their members of Parliament. I could not agree more and I can see no evidence of improvement in the position taken in today's debate. On an issue of this significance do Canadians not have the right to expect thoughtful analysis and vision? The government has done its part. Why have my hon. friends on the opposite side not done theirs?

Indeed, this government is committed to doing even more. Social security reform remains an integral component of the government agenda, rebuilding the system so that it meets the priorities of today and of tomorrow.

These are important issues and will meet the objectives set down in the green paper. What were they? It was to help Canadians get jobs and keep them. It was to help the most vulnerable in our society with the focus on child poverty. It was to do that in an affordable manner.

The report of the committee is one important contribution to determining how those changes will take place but of course it is not the only one. That takes me to the first point I want to raise in analysing the Reform's minority report.

The first issue the Reform Party raised was that of consultation. Reading Reform's comments one might think that this report was the beginning and the end of the consultation process, that some ideologically high bound government had decided to set up a sham process that would freeze Canadians out.

I ask these questions: Would this be the same government that has already received more than 40,000 social security reform workbooks from Canadians? Would this be the same government that has helped more than 200 members of Parliament hold town hall meetings on social security reform, drawing more than 20,000 people? Would this be the same government that has communicated with 7,000 people via Internet, 35,000 via a 1–800 number, as well as receiving 3,000 letters addressed to the minister directly?

• (1510)

This government is consulting. Reform Party members may not have liked to have heard from legitimate groups with valid perspectives as it travelled across Canada. They may have wished to have heard from more individuals, but you simply cannot make the leap from that complaint to the implication that there has been no opportunity for Canadians to offer comments. Far from it. This government has undertaken the most wide ranging consultation on any issue ever.

More than 100,000 Canadians have had their say in one way or another during the past year on this issue. Most Canadians do not accept the extremist views displayed by the Reform Party. They do not buy what Reform is peddling on social programs.

Canadians have made it clear that they want to see change, not destruction, and they are right. They believe governments must invest in people, address child poverty and support those individuals with low incomes. They are right. They believe we can do a better and more efficient job, and they are right. They want governments to work together and Canadians are right again. That is what the consultation process told us. That is what we, as a Liberal government, are prepared to do for the people of Canada.

The second issue the minority report raises is a complaint about the alleged lack of scope in this exercise. From the point of view of the Reform Party, all social programs are alike; they are all drains on the public purse and should be treated as such. Of course, this is not surprising.

The Reform symphony still only knows one tune, well over a year after its arrival in this House: the deficit is the only thing that matters. Of course the deficit matters. The government has been extremely clear on this issue. Our programs must be affordable. But the deficit is one consideration in designing a new social safety net. It is not the sole rationale for action or the sole test of options.

Reform's commitment to take $15 billion from social programs leaves so many unanswered questions. Time does not permit me to even start listing just a few of them. I am content to let Canadians ask Reform members instead. That is the Reform idea of scope.

For the government, the scope of this exercise is those programs and spending that relate to working, learning and security. The emphasis is on those programs that help people who are, could be, or will be in the labour market.

Health care does not fit this and it is undergoing its own study. The needs of seniors do not fit this and they will be discussed elsewhere. Canadians understand this. They understand that we want social programs that help people prepare for real jobs.

The so–called logic of the Reform Party would have included our defence and foreign policy reviews in this exercise. After all, does the deficit not matter in each of those too? No, the scope of this exercise is logical, intelligent and consistent.

That brings me to Reform's third issue of division in the committee's report and the green paper. Most of the Reform's position in both the minority report and today's debate is based on allegations regarding the government's vision of social programs and a mish–mash of ideas that Reform members trumpet as their own vision.

We can look and look through their comments and find a lot about the "how" of Reform's approach to slashing programs. What we will not see is any "why". Oh, there are claims about principles such as self–reliance and decentralization. But nowhere do we read a consistent, logical analysis of the social and economic issues facing Canadian families.

Nowhere do we find a thought through perspective on what social programs can do to help people and our economy. All we see is a series of other people's ideas and notes about programs that countries such as Chile and Singapore are trying. However, where is the social and economic vision to link them? There is not one.

What vision there might be lies between the lines. For example, Reform members continue to critique our work to expand the number of good quality child care spaces in Canada. In fact, not long ago they found one. It was an unpublished study which they claim shows that the product of child care will be a generation of depressed, stressed criminals. We are dealing here with people who read one report which has very little relationship to reality.

Given the real world, parents who must work to meet their family needs, how can they say those things? How can they ignore the mass of evidence that good child care can actually help kids, especially those from backgrounds which are far less privileged than those of the average Reformer?

Forcing women out of the workforce by drying up good quality child care is not my idea of a sound social or economic policy. However, stands such as that make the Reform vision for Canada obvious.

Now Reform members may say that is not fair, so let me ask my hon. friends to spell out the issues that face Canadians. What would be the most important priorities for social programs to address? How do we balance the competing demands for action, all of which have at least some legitimacy?

I ask this because I realize that in the world inhabited by the Reform Party there is only one issue, the deficit. There are no other challenges. Government should set aside all other priorities and just hack and hack until the debt is eliminated. That is the beginning and the end of their vision on any subject.

Obviously the deficit is a priority of the government. The need to bring expenses and revenues into line is essential. We are taking action to reach that goal, as we promised Canadians. However, Canadians expect governments to achieve many goals with intelligence, co–ordination and a sense of priority. The deficit is an important one, indeed a critical one, but it is not the only one.

Families, workplaces and the entire society have changed dramatically in the decades since many of the social programs were first envisioned. Unemployment insurance, social assistance and training programs were designed in days which were very different from today. Today workplaces are full of people who juggle home and family responsibilities, often as single parents. They take part time courses to develop new skills. They face uncertain career paths. Above all, they are required to be more flexible in every facet of their lives than ever before. They recognize their responsibilities but they also need some help.

Social programs can be improved to help people. We can identify the priorities for the limited funds that are available. That is the art of governing. It is what citizens have a right to expect from their government.

The proposals that the government has discussed with the provinces, business, labour, social action groups and all Canadians reflect that vision. All are rooted in the jobs and growth agenda which the Prime Minister set out in his speech in Quebec City at the Chamber of Commerce last September. As he noted, our social and economic priorities are linked closely together. We cannot meet the needs of Canadians without a strong economy. No strong economy is based on a society polarized into haves and have nots. We know social programs that respond to the most important needs can build our economy, even if the Reform Party does not want to believe it.

Let me discuss one aspect of our changing economy, learning. We are in a world in which skilled needs are changing faster than we can identify. We have a world in which people are challenged by new technologies and opportunities. The government's vision of social programs will realize the potential of these changes and help Canadians to harness them.

Compare that to the vision of the Reform Party.

• (1520)

I would ask my hon. friends where is their perspective on the training issues facing older workers? Where is their perspective on helping young people get real job skills that employers need in high technology fields? Where is the analysis of how to make life long learning work in an economy where people will change jobs and employers more often than ever before?

Any talk of a new economy is utterly absent in the comments of the Reform Party. The government believes in working with employers and workers to address the needs of their industries. Our work with sectoral councils has identified needs and initiated action plans.

What would Reformers do in the real world of these needs? Would they let the growth sectors of our economy wither? Would they claim that some magic tax cut will let them solve all of their problems? The government has done better.

For example, we have begun to address both the needs of industries and the employment problems facing young people through innovative partnerships. The government has entered into agreements with employers, workers and educators in fields such as horticulture, tourism and automotive repair under our youth internship program. We are working with them to develop the training that young people need to fill the skilled jobs that are available. We are working with them to create a climate that will attract even more job opportunities to our country.

Compare that to the do–nothing attitude of the Reform Party. We are working with provinces and territories to explore new and better ways of meeting the needs of people through our strategic initiatives program.

This example of federal–provincial co–operation is alive and well with many provinces. We are working with them on a pilot project called Integrated Training Centres for Youth. This is to help our young people.

I would like to conclude by saying that social security reform is a chance to recognize the real needs out there. The status quo does not meet them. It is a chance to cut today's suit to fit today's cloth and no one wants the tattered rags being flogged by the Reform Party.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, once again I am puzzled by some of the comments of yet another Liberal.

It seems as though Reformers do not have parents who are in need of OAS. It seems as though Reformers do not understand what it is to be responsible for 80–year old people, that Reformers somehow do not have friends and acquaintances who are falling through the cracks of our economic cycle.

It seems as though we live in a vacuum and only those opposite have a way of understanding. I am sorry. We do have parents in their elderly years who depend on OAS. We do have people in our families who receive GIS. We do have people in our families and acquaintances who require child care. To characterize the Reform Party as not knowing or not understanding is just beyond my capability to understand.

Perhaps I could help this member understand why these people are in that position, why they are dependent on the social welfare and the social safety net in the country. It is because the spending of the government is destroying our ability to be able to provide for them. That is why we came forward with the plan today.

I find it really unfortunate that this member, along with many others, would choose to interpret the Reform document from some kind of weird perspective, as if we had landed from another planet. We represent the people in our constituencies. We represent people in this member's constituency. I had the privilege of conducting a couple of town hall meetings and getting input from people in his constituency. I reflect many of the values of many of his constituents.

With respect to the issue of learning, I would like to ask the member if he has had an opportunity of taking a look through our document to page 47 where we show our method of lowering cash transfers but giving the provinces cash points. In fact, the amount of funding available for health and for education under our scheme actually increases.

This is not cut and slash. This is a realistic budget which is more than I can say for the pipe dream that the government is continuing to give to us.

• (1525)

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, let us talk about the pipe dream of the Liberal government. When we were elected on October 25, 1993, may I add, and I will submit to you there are some Reformers—

The Deputy Speaker: I would say this to all members. For reasons such as this we ask that members put their remarks to the Chair. Any time the word "you" is referred to, it is supposed to refer to whomever is in this chair.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, through you to the hon. member that attended a town hall meeting in my riding. There were people in my riding that voted for the Reform Party. Approximately 15,000 voted Reform and approximately 72,000 voted for me. I understand that some people may share their opinion, but we will see if we can rectify that in the upcoming election.

I would, first of all, like to address the concern raised by the hon. member, vis–à–vis the Liberal pipe dream. This is the same pipe dream that has put the economy back on its proper footing. We have created over 450,000 jobs since taking office, in co–operation and in partnership with the private stakeholders. We have increased the number of jobs for young people. We have the fastest growth of any of the G–7 countries.

These statistics illustrate to me, as an objective viewer of what is going on in Canada, that things are getting better with a Liberal government at the helm. May I also add that my thoughts are reflected far and wide throughout Canada. I was in Alberta last week and people are generally happy with the direction which the government has taken.

In reference to the deficit, we have used what I consider a more rational approach. We have targeted 3 per cent of GDP by 1996–97. It is reasonable. It is a dual track approach. It will not hurt people as much as the Reform agenda would.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we can have this debate. The Liberal government has a point of view and the Reformers have a point of view on how the finances of the country ought to be run. I hope that the people of Canada are paying very close attention because literally their future depends on it.

I did a little mathematical extrapolation. When I first started this process it was 1992. The federal debt was about $420 billion and now it is around $550 billion, an average of around 9 per cent per year. At that rate, the debt would grow to over $600 billion by the year 2000.

Interest payments would increase from $33 billion in 1992 to over $50 billion in the year 2000. That $50 billion is not available for education, is not available for health, is not available for any of the social programs or anything else.

I want to ask the member who just made the speech a question. We recognize if we do not cut spending that the debt will continue to grow. In fact, the deficit needs to be cut to zero so that we can start attacking the debt which is growing every day by $110 million.

We have to do something. Does the government have any plans at all, and if so, where is it going to get the money? The $40 billion deficit is about equal to our $40 billion interest payment. Are we going to default on our interest payments? I am sure the member would say no.

Are we going to take money out of running the government? That costs around $40 billion per year. It would mean shutting government down completely. That would balance the budget. I am sure he would say no. Let us keep at least some of it going.

What is left then are transfers payments to the provinces. To say that the budget can be balanced and bring the financial situation under control without doing that, I submit, is not facing the facts squarely. It is being very unrealistic. I think it is giving the people of Canada a false sense of security.

• (1530)

I would like the to member to respond on where he would actually cut.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member. As he probably noticed, he was answering most of his own questions. Therefore this will probably give me an opportunity to address some real issues that are the minds of Canadians.

I would like to tell the hon. member that we will continue what we have been doing up to today. I think he has seen some cuts in expenditures. We are running a more efficient government than we have had. I remember my years in opposition watching the Conservatives squander money left, right and centre. We are not doing that. We are very fiscally responsible individuals.

At the same time we are investing in people because we feel that one key role of a government is to help people get and keep their jobs, to help the most vulnerable in our society with a focus on child poverty in a very sustainable fashion.

The results to date since our election would indicate that we are on the right track. We are creating jobs. We have great growth in our economy and Canadians are generally pleased with the way the government is governing.

At the end of the day the real measuring stick of our success will be whether Canadians are happy with the way we are bringing the country forward. I would say to the hon. member that they are very happy with the Liberal government.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, sure the people are feeling happy. Do they have the correct information? Do they know what deep trouble we are in? Perhaps the government of the day with its be happy, don't worry attitude is convincing them of it but hiding from them the bitter truth of what is going to happen.

The government has stated as its goal to bring the deficit down to $25 billion. That is a cut of $15 billion from the present deficit of $40 billion. Where are there cuts of $15 billion? I have not heard one of them. It is worry about one million here and one million there. That is important but it does not begin to touch the big question.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I did not really hear anything worth nothing in what the hon. member said. I think if we have to deal with reality we can look at the state of the nation. Canadians are not happy fools, as the hon. member would have us believe. They are happy because they see all the economic indicators are looking good for the Canadian people and that hope and jobs are part of the Canadian fabric once again.

I resent the fact that the hon. member would think that Canadians are fools. They are not fools. They look at the issues and examine the issues. They see the growth in the economy and they are feeling good about it.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to discuss this issue and talk about whether 3 per cent of GDP is a valid target for the government to be aiming at in two year's time and whether that is going to restore the confidence investors need before they will continue to leave their money in this country. There all kinds of implications that flow from that.

I want to talk a little about some of the wants and desires of Canadians. I think when we design a program, when we put together a government we have to give some consideration to what Canadians want and need. If we listen to them they say things that are really just common sense.

As taxpayers, Canadians want to keep their income. They want to have lots of disposable income and they work hard every day to try and grind out a living so they have some money for their family and so that they can retire some day, or if there is an emergency they can draw on some savings. That is what they want.

As investors they want to be able to get a good return and also protect their capital. They do not want to see their capital jeopardized. As people who some day may have to rely on a social safety net, they want to know that it will be there and that it will be adequate, that it will be something they can count on.

• (1535)

As parents Canadians want to be able to know that there will always be a university there so that they can send their children. They want to know that there will be some kind of safety net in place for them as they move into their senior years. They want to know that there will be a health care system there for their children. Those are some of the desires and wants that I think government has an obligation to try to meet.

It is not necessary for government to be in conflict with those wants and desires. A responsible government must align itself with those wants and desires and come up with ways of accommodating those wants and desires. To me it is obvious that there are ways we can do that.

Reform presented a perfect example of that this morning. I would argue that this government has not got itself in line with Canadians' wants and desires. I would argue that Canadians are moving completely against that.

A situation in which the government's best effort adds $100 billion to the debt and leaves us with a $25 billion deficit at the very top of the business cycle in a couple of years, combined with the desires that I have just mentioned, creates in my judgment a very explosive situation. On the one hand we have the wants and desires of Canadians and on the other hand we have a government that in my judgment has created a business environment that is completely contrary to that.

Let me go back through the different hats people wear in their lives and talk about how their wants and desires are really in conflict with the disincentives that the government puts in their way to prevent them from achieving some of the things that they want to achieve and from getting the type of government that not only do they want but that they deserve.

As taxpayers they work hard every day to try to make a living and provide for their families. Look at what massive government debt does to them. It imposes a fantastic tax burden.

In 1963, if I remember correctly, taxes constituted about 20 per cent or a little over that of where people's income went to. People worked hard and all that hard work and effort was a tremendous positive force pushing up and providing jobs and prosperity for the country. Then we had that 20 per cent of taxes pushing down a little but not nearly enough to stop the desires and incentives that people had to create some prosperity for themselves and their families.

As the years have gone on we have seen more taxes piled on top of that positive force and now it is very difficult for that force to push up anymore. That is why a lot of people are giving up on Canada and giving up on staying in the working world. That is why we see people fleeing to the United States and other lower tax jurisdictions, particularly people who are highly skilled.

Other disincentives are the perverse incentives that are a big part of a lot of social programs today, social programs that actually pay people to remain idle. People who are responsible, work hard, want to provide for their families and work long hours every week see this. They ask themselves: "Why am I knocking myself out when the next guy over does not care and he is just laying on the system?". There is a real inequality in the system. We have a lot of disincentives now piling up on top of all those desires and wants of Canadians. It is beginning to push them down and they are getting tired.

As investors they expect to make a good return on their money but they also expect that their capital should be protected. We have been sent a message in the last seven days that investments in this country are in jeopardy to some degree because the government has not been able to get a handle on its overspending.

Now the international community is wondering whether Canada is a place where it should be putting its money. The same applies to domestic investors who have lots of options other than their own country.

• (1540)

I saw in the Globe and Mail the other day a very scary graph that showed how indebted Canada is to foreign investors compared with other countries around the world. It was frightening. We have a foreign debt load twice what the next country in the world has. I found it frightening to know that we are so tied to the whim of foreign investors because successive governments have not been able to get a handle on spending.

Now we have a situation in which this government is proposing to add another $100 billion to our overall debt load before we get down to $25 billion. That is its target and it is ridiculous.

International investors have to deal with that, as do domestic investors. Although they want to invest in this country there are a lot of disincentives and a lot of pressure pushing the other way to prevent them from doing that and to dissuade them.

As people who want to invest and want to have confidence in our social programs they are very concerned as well. In spite of the fact that we spend $150 billion a year on social programs we still have all kinds of unemployment. HRD's own studies show that social programs are contributing to unemployment, including the unemployment insurance program. In many cases we have people living at the bottom echelons of society with no hope, not because there is not a safety net there but because they are trapped in the safety net.

I think it is crazy that in a country this prosperous relative to the rest of the world where we spend $150 billion a year on social programs we have people trapped with no hope in our social programs. Something must be done to help them out of that situation.

This morning I believe that Reform came up with some alternatives that will get people out of that situation, give them some hope and give them some of the positive incentives they so desperately want to be in alignment with Canadians' wants and desires.

People in the bottom echelons of society are as desperate as anyone else to see their dreams and hopes realized. However, this government and successive governments have placed all kinds of disincentives in their way to prevent that.

The government has set no date for the elimination of the deficit. The best it can do is come up with a point two years down the road from now where it will reduce the deficit to $25 billion. It refers to its rolling two–year targets, whatever that means. Maybe it is like a moving target, one it does not want to hit and can keep moving it.

Very often the government says it does not know what the future holds so there is no point in setting a date when it will eliminate the deficit or when it will balance the budget. It is true that we do not know what the future holds but it is ludicrous for the Government of Canada to say that it does not know what the future holds and therefore is not going to set a date for when it can eliminate the deficit. That is crazy. It is almost criminally negligent when one considers how many people's lives depend on what that government decides.

It is a little like telling people who are saving for their own retirement: "Yes, you should save some money but it does not matter how much because we do not know what the future holds. Perhaps somewhere down the road you will win the lottery or you will inherit a bunch of money so don't worry about it". It is the same mentality that the government is applying.

I fear very much for Canadians if we are going to take this situation so lightly that the government, in spite of what international investors have been telling us even this week, is going to say it does not matter, it does not know what the future holds and therefore it is not going to set any targets. I think it is absolutely crazy. The government must wake up for the benefit of all Canadians and acknowledge that it has to set a hard target and take some tough action right now so that it can move toward it.

What Canadians really want is a government that is absolutely in line with their wants and needs. They want programs that encourage their deep desire to be self–reliant, not programs that work against it. They want an economy that rewards their work, not punishes them. They want a government that gets out of their face, not like this one which seems to have to have a finger in every aspect of their lives. The government has been absolutely without a single success that I can think of, in terms of really helping people over the long haul. I will talk about that in more detail in a moment.

• (1545)

Canadians want a federal government that recognizes its severe limitations. A federal government in a country this size that is so far removed from ordinary Canadians has tremendous limitations. That needs to be understood. The federal government has to allow lower levels of government, families, charities, communities and obviously, individuals themselves to take more responsibility for their lives and to empower people to do things for themselves and give them some of the hope that they truly need.

I want to talk a bit about some of the areas where government has failed dramatically and compare them with areas where individuals have absolutely succeeded.

The first example I want to use is the Canada pension plan, and I will throw in old age security for good measure. I want to compare it with how RRSPs have done, a program that Canadians fund themselves and they are joining in ever greater numbers. In fact, I saw in the newspaper today that there has been a tremendous rise in the number of people who have gone to get bank loans so they can buy RRSPs.

When the Canada pension plan was established it was done so with the belief that it would sustain people in their old age. I do not think there is anyone in the country, and probably not even anyone in all parties in this House, who believes that is going to happen. Everyone knows the Canada pension plan is woefully underfunded. It is about $510 billion in the hole, if you compare it with other actuarially sound pension plans.

Old age security started out as being a funded program. However, that was abandoned and now it comes out of general revenues. People understand that as the debt gets bigger, the amount of money that can go into OAS and other social programs is rapidly diminishing. Most people realize now, even if they did not a year ago, that they cannot rely on government programs.

More and more people are starting to set aside money for themselves. That is why we see RRSPs growing tremendously. It is not a revelation to me that people believe they can save better for their own future than the government can. People all along have had more faith in themselves than in the government when it comes to these types of programs. However, it is only now, when the fiscal situation has become so acute, that people are taking this situation very seriously. They are scrutinizing how the government spends money and scrutinizing the form social programs take.

If we ask people to compare which is more successful today, the Canada pension plan or RRSPs, people are going to say absolutely that RRSPs are much more successful. They know their RRSPs will be there and that the Canada pension plan has eroded over the years.

I am going to get off the fiscal topic for a moment to talk about another area which is indirectly related to social programs and in which the same principle applies.

The other day the minister of multiculturalism said that Canada has no Canadian heritage. I thought that was curious, but then I thought about it and I think I understand what she was saying. For 20–some years or maybe a little longer than that, the government has tried to cobble together an official heritage, some kind of an official culture for this country. It has failed miserably and I think the minister of multiculturalism truly realized that.

Concurrent with that, there is a tremendous rise in Canada in the number of people who are going back to look at their own history. They are going through history books trying to figure out where their ancestors came from, where they lived in this country, and from which countries they originated.

People are very interested in the heritage of this country, but there is a big difference in how the government or the minister defines it and how people define it. People are very proud of their personal histories. All that taken together gives us a very proud heritage in this country.

• (1550)

We could even expand on that a little bit. In many cases, people are very proud of their communities. I come from a small community in Alberta. People there take a tremendous amount of pride in some of the local sites. What they really do not get very excited about are programs like official multiculturalism. They see that as something the government created a long time ago, not in response to their concerns but it was something the government felt it should do, that it knew better than Canadians did of what constituted real culture.

The comments of the minister of multiculturalism from a few days ago indicate that those types of top down programs have completely and utterly failed. The victims were the taxpayers who had to pay billions of dollars for those types of programs to keep them going.

Let us not continue to make the same mistakes over and over again. Let us not continue to have top down government in our social programs when we have shown over and over again that Canadians are more than capable of standing on their own feet. If they are given the tools, they are empowered to do so.

I want to talk about Reform's approach to empowering individual Canadians. We spoke this morning about a new approach to handling social programs. The member for Calgary North is sitting beside me. I applaud her and members of her committee for the tremendous amount of work they did in going out to really listen to Canadians and to come up with an alternative approach to Canada's social programs and safety nets, one that is really in alignment with Canadians' wants and desires.

Reform talked a little today about how we can empower the different groups of people who make up our country. We talked about empowering seniors, how we need to focus OAS and the guaranteed income supplement on people who are most in need.

This country is in tremendous financial difficulty. We have a debt that is over $550 billion. Just about everybody realizes we are going to have to target our social programs to people who actually need them. That is what we have proposed in our document this morning.

We are going to eliminate mandatory retirement so that those who choose to work beyond 65 can continue to do so. There was an article in the Ottawa Citizen today that talked about the high suicide rate among seniors once they are forced to quit at age 65.

We are not saying that you have to keep working. We are not saying that at all. We are saying that if people want to, they can continue to work. Many people have a tremendous amount of potential and ability to still give to society when they hit 65 years. Of course people are living longer now. We see elderly MPs who make a tremendous contribution to the House. We should not write people off because they have come to an arbitrary point set some years ago. Let us make sure that people, if they want to, can continue to fulfil their aspirations.

We want to give this country long term tax relief which will help seniors and all Canadians. Seniors are just as hard hit as anybody by high taxes. We have to move away from a government and a system that really does encourage growth in taxes. To do that, we need some accountability in the system. Maybe that could be a discussion for another day.

Of course, we have talked about our registered personal security plans. That is something we can talk about in more detail when we have some time.

We have talked about empowering families, strengthening the capacity of families to care for themselves and their dependants with tax relief and tax reform. We would like to see child care assistance come in a neutral form so that people themselves can decide what kind of child care they want.

I want to make a strong point. We are calling for a national registry so that people who have dodged their obligations to their families, those who are supposed to be making child support payments but have somehow dodged them will be eventually tracked down and forced to pay up.

• (1555)

I am proud to say that my office has helped track down a lot of deadbeat spouses. Eventually these people have had to pay up. They have to pay the money back to their children through their ex–spouses.

The government has really not moved quickly enough in this area, although it has been in power for about 16 months. We very strongly advocate having a meeting with the provinces to work with them to put that registry in place. It is absolutely critical. Hundreds of millions of dollars out there are not getting to the children who really need the money. We are going to push very hard for that.

As we have mentioned before, we do have our RPS plan which we are going to consult with Canadians on and hopefully, eventually put into place. It would be a way to give some power back to families and allow them to provide for themselves.

We want to empower the unemployed and the job creators. I want to talk a little bit about the five–R jobs plan Reform has come up with. It is radically different from what the government has proposed in its infrastructure program.

We are proposing to reduce and eliminate the federal debt and deficit. We are proposing to relieve Canadians of their oppressive tax burden. We are proposing to restore labour market efficiency and reduce social program dependency. We wish to remove barriers to internal and external trade. We want to renew Canada's physical and intellectual infrastructure. Those are the five steps we would take to get Canadians back to work.

We could talk for a long time about these issues, but I know my time is up. I encourage the government to move quickly to establish a point at which it will reduce the deficit to zero and balance the budget.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech by the hon. member. He was raving on about doom and gloom and negative things. I did not hear him speak at any time of the positive things this government has done since taking power.

I did not hear him talk about the fact that Canada for the first time in 10 years has led the industrialized world in terms of economic growth. I did not hear the hon. member talk about the fact that in a matter of one year and four months this government has created more jobs than the previous government did over a period of 10 years.

I did not hear the hon. member talk about all the progressive initiatives this government is taking in terms of embarking on major reforms, the foreign policy reforms, the social program reforms, the tax reforms. There are all of the major initiatives the government has taken on in order to look at the kinds of programs the federal government is suited to offer versus the provincial governments.

I did not hear the member talk about the infrastructure program this government has put in place. Municipalities from coast to coast have endorsed it and have spoken positively about it. People have seen positive things coming out of it.

I also did not hear the member congratulate the government on the fact that for the first time in a matter of 10 years this government will meet its deficit goals.

The business community is fed up with this negativism. The business community tells us day in and day out that it wants positive talk. It wants us to stop talking negatively. When will my colleagues in the Reform Party stop talking about the doom and gloom?

I will read a quote from a newspaper in Alberta where some of my colleagues were elected. The February 7 Edmonton Journal talks about the tax revolt which is being led by the Reform Party and states: "That is why the tax revolt incited by Manning and played out by the Canadian Taxpayers' Federation has the reek of raw manipulation about it. It is a classic case of setting up a straw man, knocking it over and savouring the victory. Instead of—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

• (1600)

Mr. Solberg: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member subscribes to these conspiracy theories that the Reform Party has created the tax revolt. He should give Canadians more credit.

There are a lot of people out there who are vitally concerned about the state of this country's economy. They are vitally concerned about the fact that they are being taxed to death. We did not have to invite people to talk about this issue. When the government was floating trial balloons about RRSPs there were many letters that came to the finance minister to tell him to get the government's hands off their wallets. We did not have to do that.

The parliamentary secretary has talked about the fact that the country is leading the world in economic growth. What he did not say is it is because of the people in this country. It is not because of the government. He said the government has done this. He said the government has created jobs. Government does not create jobs. It was small businesses that created jobs. It was not because of the government, it was in spite of the government.

The parliamentary secretary talked a bit about the new initiatives that the government is taking, social program reform. That is a laugh. Even the human resources development minister admitted on national TV that it was dead, as dead as the dodo. That was a few days before the social program committee had to report. For crying out loud, the fact that it has started on an initiative is no guarantee it is going anywhere and that has certainly been the case with social program reform.

The infrastructure program that he referred to has given Canada some boccie courts in Toronto, a canoe museum in the Prime Minister's riding, another $6 billion in debt. There is no doubt about that.

There have been many things that the government has done, but let us not believe for a moment that they have been positive. They have added to our debt. They have contributed to the concerns that taxpayers and investors have around the world. That is why this government has been assailed by investors and by taxpayers over the last couple of weeks. If the member doubts me, pick up the newspaper and take a look.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the member. I cannot get over the fact that the member would try to compare the RRSP system, which is essentially a government created system, not for a large number of Canadians, with the Canada pension plan which is something that every Canadian has access to. It is probably only about 40 per cent of Canadians who have even the ability to participate in an RRSP plan.

I want to challenge the member on one particular program of government that I personally am very proud of, multiculturalism. I happen to believe that multiculturalism is one the jewels of this country and because of people being very frivolous with it we are about to lose it.

For over 20 years, since 1971, we invested, promoted and encouraged Canadians to preserve their language and culture of origin. Today because of that investment by Canadian taxpayers we are recognized as one of the greatest trading countries on the planet. One of the reasons we are and that we have that trading advantage is that we have people who have preserved their language and culture of origin and it has given us very special access to these lucrative markets all around the world. Multiculturalism has also made us a tourism asset which if we ever got our marketing act together could be another envy of the world.

I think the Reform Party should be very careful when it is criticizing these programs and just wants to sweep them away. Renew them, eliminate waste, fiscal discipline, I support all of that. We would be absolute crazies if we did anything to take away our multiculturalism policy which is the envy right now. The United States is now in the process of spending billions of dollars to try to promote a multicultural reality because it had its melting pot theory. We were so far ahead of it and the Reform Party has missed the whole point.

• (1605)

Mr. Solberg: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. parliamentary secretary must have been very discouraged when his own minister of multiculturalism acknowledged publicly that we have no Canadian heritage.

I want to talk a little about some of the things the parliamentary secretary said. He said that we should have multiculturalism so people will preserve their language and they can use that for trade. I have more faith in people than that. I think there are people who have always preserved their language so they could trade.

It is crazy to suggest that since 1971 there has been some huge jump in the amount of people who are preserving their languages so they can trade around the world. I do not have the statistics but I would love to see the statistics. I think I could convince the hon. member across the way that we did not need to spend $25 million a year for the past many years to encourage people to do that.

I think people are proud enough of their own heritage and that they will continue to preserve their own heritage at their own expense, without having some government program run by people who think they know better than individuals themselves what their lives should be like. That is crazy. It is time to give people some credit for being able to run their own lives.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. This morning I had an opportunity to pick up a copy of the Reform Party's taxpayers' budget, a plan to balance the federal budget.

I thought it was very appropriate that today in question period the finance minister was able to rise in his place and with only a very short period of time to look at this advise the Reform Party this plan would not balance the federal budget. He went on to explain why.

I want to give a few comments about what this document really means. It is important that the Reform Party has now put on the table what it really had in mind, the details it left out when it presented its balanced budget program to the finance committee last fall. It laid out $10 billion of cuts on non–social program spending, which only added up to $9 billion, showing the accuracy of the information it was given.

It did not tell Canadians about the social program side of it. It is only fair to let Canadians know now. I appreciate the Reform Party is now letting Canadians know what its real agenda is. Canadians should know its real agenda.

If you are on a guaranteed income supplement, the Reform Party is out to get you. If you are on old age security, the Reform Party is out to get you. If you are receiving Canada pension plan, the Reform Party is out to get you. If you are receiving health care benefits, the Reform Party is out to get you. If you are on socially assisted housing, the cuts in the CMHC, the Reform Party is out to get you. If you are on unemployment insurance—read the document—the Reform Party is now out to get you.

I had an opportunity to review the document this morning. It is quite simply an incomplete document. There is no information on the economic impact of the proposed cuts. It is unclear which programs are going to be cut and the numbers it will cut from several government programs are not there.

The leader of the third party admitted it this morning in the press conference. He did not have the numbers and details to support the numbers. It was simply an arithmetic exercise the Reform Party went through to say it can come up with $25 billion.

It did not cost out the impact of those cuts. It did not even take into account many fundamental assumptions that are necessary in preparing a budget. It is not being honest with the Canadian public. It is not telling Canadians the true impact of the proposals on seniors. It is not telling Canadians the truth.

It does not take into account we have a growing number of seniors. It does not take into account which seniors will be affected by the proposed $3 billion in cuts. Rents for seniors will be impacted if CMHC is privatized. It did not say how much. It did not care about seniors when it did this.

During question period there was quite a debate going on about the word compassion. I can say in all sincerity that there is no compassion in this document. Slash and burn is the title of this document. The Reform budget is based on a philosophy that says families and charities should be the ones to take the burden for social programs. The Reform Party just wants to second the responsibility for these important programs to families and to charities that already are stretched to the limit.

How many families can afford personal insurance RRSPs? Reformers are proposing that Canadians set up some sort of quasi–RRSP to provide for their own unemployment benefits, their own education, their own retirement and for their own non–essential health care.

Today most Canadians cannot even afford to contribute to RRSPs and yet the Reform Party is saying it can eliminate old age security, the Canada pension plan, all of these things that the government does. All it has to do is let people contribute to RRSPs. This is not clear thinking at all. Reformers are out of touch with Canadians and out of touch with the basic communities.

The Reform budget includes a two tier health system, the slash and burn to our health care system. It is unbelievable. There is a 25 per cent cut in transfers to the provinces. There is a proposed reduction in international aid. There is no question that there may be some cuts there but the Reform Party fails to realize the importance of international aid as it is tied into the promotion of our international trade which is a major source of new economic growth.

The Reform Party has not addressed the accumulative impact on the regions of Canada, the cuts in equalization payments that it is proposing, the regional development and support programs to industry. There is not one detail as to the impact of those cuts. Simply we can cut the spending and they do not do anything anyway so the cuts will have no impact. That is fundamentally wrong.

What are the main features? Reform has said it is going to cut $10 billion out of government operations and non–social program spending. This is the same or similar to the report of the finance committee of the House of Commons. These are the things that were dealt with, the business subsidies, et cetera. I do not think there is much argument there. However, the key component that was missing was the component with regard to the social programs and that is where it is going to cut $15 billion out of social security spending, including $3 billion from the elderly, $3.4 billion from unemployment insurance and $6.6 billion from transfers to the provinces.

Let me deal very briefly with elderly benefits. Reformers are talking about a $3 billion cut. However, if one takes into account population growth and indexation, the real cut they would have to make is something like $5 billion. They have not taken into account the fact that we do have an aging population and that there will be more people demanding those benefits presently being offered. That has not been taken into account. That is a fundamental flaw in the entire document.

In addition, the programs include income thresholds and age requirements. I think the Minister of Finance today in question period basically laid out that if one were receiving old age security, under the savings that the Reformers are proposing in their plan the threshold for clawback would be something like $11,000. That means people who are receiving GIS would all of a sudden not be getting old age security.

This slash and burn and trash people is the kind of thing that Canadians should know about, the vision and the plans that the Reform Party has for Canadians. The Reform Party is out to get you is the message this document shows.

I wanted to talk very briefly about UI reform. Reformers said they would eliminate regionally extended benefits, lengthen work requirements and shorten the benefit entitlements to lower benefit payouts for repeat users with each additional claim. Reformers count the $3.4 billion benefit reduction to the deficit because they could not let premium rates go down but rather they would run up a huge—estimated at around a $12 billion—accumulative surplus on the UI account until the overall budget deficit is eliminated.

This kind of mathematics is simply numbers. There is no substance, no vision, no explanation and no detail to the impacts. There is no compassion in this document at all.

What about the transfers to the provinces? Reformers are going to lower cash transfers under the EPF and the CAP but they are also going to transfer additional tax points.

• (1615)

In question period today the finance minister pointed out very succinctly that you cannot have it both ways. Revenue is going to be impaired simply because of the transfer. Sure it is in there. It is in there to show the arithmetic works but if you do not take all the components into account, the budget will not balance. The Reform Party has not carefully managed the revenue stream that it is going to need.

The $3 billion reduction in equalization would be a massive attack on the poorest provinces. Regional differences do not matter. The Reform Party represents Alberta. It does not care about the maritimes. It does not care about Newfoundland. It does not care about Quebec. All it cares about is, we can do it ourselves and why can you not?

Members of the House of Commons have to speak on behalf of all Canadians. We have to have a national vision, a Canadian vision. We have to speak on behalf of all Canadians, not just on behalf of our own regional interests.

The conclusion I reached in going over this document is that it is terribly vague but it does show some very important points, the most important of which is the absolute attack on seniors, on the elderly, on those who are in most need in our society. That to me represents what is contained in this document that the Reform Party says is going to balance the budget. Let us look at some of the facts.

Canada's growth rate in the last year was 4.25 per cent, the highest in the G–7. The OECD predicts that Canada will continue to lead the industrial world for the next two years. Real exports are up. The Conference Board found a positive boost in investment, with 81 per cent of firms planning more investment.

Over 450,000 new jobs have been created since the government took over. The 1994 budget laid the foundation. Today the Minister of Finance announced that next Monday, February 27 he will present the next budget for the people of Canada.

There we will see how a government shows compassion and also meets its fiscal targets of 3 per cent of GDP by the end of the third year and lays the foundation for the next two–year cycle to bring Canada's budget into balance.

That is what the Liberal Party stands for, not slash and trash, particularly seniors and those most in need in our society.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, how scared the Liberals are of the Reform Party when they make absolutely outstanding comments. This speech is just absolutely, totally off the wall.

As I said to another member from the southern Toronto area, my family and the families of the people within our party have seniors who we are concerned about. We are concerned that this government is destroying the ability of government to fund the social programs on which they depend.

He says about us: "You are just doing to slash and burn, you are going to trash seniors". I cannot imagine the fear that there must be within the Liberal Party that finally there is a party that is prepared to stand up and expose government overspending, expose its inability to get spending under control. Social programs are under threat from the Liberal government.

I do not see anything positive about coming into the House and characterizing Reform members as being uncaring and not worried about social programs. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, that is the reason why we are here. That is the reason why we made such an effort today. We want Canadians to have an opportunity to see an alternative to the silliness that is presently going on.

I ask the hon. member a question. I know he has an accounting background and must be able to read a balance sheet. Surely he must know that while revenue is growing at a rate of 3.3 per cent, debt is growing at a rate of 10.3 per cent. The 7 per cent spread is growing. Every single solitary dollar of the $110 million that we borrow today is going to pay interest on the money we have already borrowed. We are going deeper and deeper into the hole.

Perhaps the hon. member can tell us, as a professional accountant, how in the world can you possibly run a balance sheet when you are going into debt twice as fast as you collect revenue?

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member always talks as if the Reform Party would not increase the debt over the period that it is talking about. It never talks about how much it would increase the debt in implementing its plan.

Let me read from the Reform Party's document. This is what that party is going to do to seniors. To Canada Mortgage and Housing it proposes a 24 per cent cut. Does that party not believe that seniors require assisted housing? If we look at seniors' benefits, there is a 15 per cent cut in all of their benefits. Clearly those cuts would be at the lower end where people can least afford it. To unemployment insurance it proposes a 22 per cent cut, and a 34 per cent cut in welfare.

I do not have to go on. Simply look at the numbers. We can see that this document, which was prepared by the third party, represents an attack on Canadians who are the most in need.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in this life if you do not make a choice, someone will make it for you. That is what is happening to that motley crew over there.

The government sounds like an opposition party, not a leading party. My colleague has done nothing but critique the Reform's proposals. The difficulty that I am having here is, what is the Liberal Party doing?

I would like to ask the hon. member this. How much debt will the Liberals have incurred since taking office to the end of their mandate?

The second part of the question is: At the end of the mandate I believe the Liberal Party will be overspending by approximately $26 billion a year. We say zero. Which is better for Canadians in the long run?

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, the government election campaign was run in October 1993 on a platform which said that it would achieve 3 per cent of GDP by the end of the third year of the mandate. The Minister of Finance has brought down a budget. We are on track.

If members noticed, the Minister of Finance said today that not only are we going to meet this year's deficit target, we will do substantially better. I think that is important.

The hon. member asked a very important question. What would be better, zero or 25? It is the same question, the answer to which is basically that the operation was a success but the patient died. That is what the Reform Party is proposing. It is proposing an operation that will get us to zero, but at the same time Canada's social programs will die.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin—

Mr. Abbott: Now we will get some intelligent comments.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): You may not say that by the time I—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member was not in the Chamber earlier when I asked members to please put their remarks to the Chair. Anytime the word "you" is to be used it is to refer to the Chair.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I will make sure that I do that for the remainder of my 10 minutes.

I read most of this document today. My initial reaction was the following. I thought that the Reform Party had a lot of courage to put forward such a comprehensive document just before the budget. It is a great debating tool. The Reform Party will no doubt, as it will discover, face a lot of criticism for the flaws which are in it.

• (1625)

However, the essence of this Chamber is to exchange and to debate ideas. We come here with different backgrounds and ideologies. Obviously there are a lot of things in this document that I would not support. However it will be useful for me when constituents come with your proposal. I may be able to point out some of the good things, while showing some of your flaws.

The Deputy Speaker: The member who said he would not use the word you has used it twice.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Three times and you are out. I am too close to the Reform Party, Mr. Speaker.

One of the reasons I was profoundly disappointed in this document was that members of the Reform Party campaigned on comprehensive tax reform during the last election. They campaigned on restructuring the tax acts. It is no secret to members that I was delighted when there were 40–odd members returned to the House who shared—at least I thought they shared—my view, as do many other members on this side of the House that it is time to overhaul the entire personal and corporate income tax structure.

Canadians should know that in this document the only reference to proposals for a taxpayer protection act are one page, on pages 53 and 54. Canadians believed the Reform Party was truly committed to tax reform. In a document of 55 pages, to only have one page devoted to tax reform is not a serious effort.

It is a serious flaw in the document because I happen to believe, and I know a lot of Reform members believe, that Canadians are frustrated with the current tax acts. The complex tax system we have is one of the reasons why people are putting money offshore. It is one of the reasons we have such a large underground economy. It is one of the reasons we have a lot of entrepreneurs who are not investing in creating jobs. On that issue I say that the paper prepared today, the taxpayers' budget, is misleading and it falls short.

There is another thing that concerns me about this debate in total today. It is this total preoccupation with the federal deficit. I believe, as all members believe, that the deficit must be dealt with. I cannot imagine a member standing up anywhere saying that the deficit is not important.

We have had enough debates on the federal deficit and the fiscal discipline side of this equation. We are not talking about the growth side. How are we going to put 2.2 million Canadians back to work? I wish we would spend more time speaking back and forth and I think Canadians would like to see more debate in the House back and forth on how we can put people back to work.

I want to be very specific about what I mean. My colleague from Waterloo handed me a document he received today, a debating document called "The Working Nation". This is a policy paper on policies and programs from the Australian government.

The Australians have an idea that I would like to share with members and all Canadians today. It is called the job compact. This is an idea they are debating in their House right now. The job compact will apply to all those who have been in receipt of a job search or a new start allowance for 18 months or more. A job compact will include more intensive case management, training and support to ensure the unemployed person is job–ready, a job for six to twelve months primarily in the private sector, a training wage which combines employment with training, leading to recognized and transferable skills. New work opportunities will encourage local proposals for employment generation, especially in regions where other employment opportunities are limited. Intensive job search assistance and referral to suitable vacancies at the end of the job compact maximizes employment outcomes for those assisted. There will be stronger penalties for job seekers who do not meet their obligations under the job compact. The paper goes on to describe how jobs will be obtained and how employers will be further encouraged to consider the abilities of long term unemployed, et cetera.

• (1630)

That is a specific idea the government is currently putting forward to give every unemployed Australian a chance to get back to work. That is the kind of thing I personally wish we could debate in the House. We have talked enough about the deficit and the debt.

When all is said and done and the budget comes out next week, I am sure all the things in the red book will be there. However we still have to face the challenge right away of getting those people back to work. That is what I think is missing in the debate.

The whole notion of human deficit is very important. As our human deficit grows eventually it will hit us like a ton of bricks. There are 700,000 university trained and educated young people who cannot find work. That is crazy. That is what I believe our focus should be on.

I want to expand my point about human deficit. It is the reason we have a fiscal framework right now that is not very healthy. Not only are there unemployment costs and health care costs but there are all kinds of potential loss.

My appeal to the opposition parties is that they have now made their point about the federal deficit and the debt. I believe all members of the House understand it well. I am confident, as I said earlier, the Minister of Finance will bring testimony to that realization next week.

I would like to suggest to members of the House that our preoccupation in the next 60 or 90 days should be on identifying the priorities and government instruments we can use to stimulate entrepreneurship and to market the country to get the human deficit under control. Let us change our language from federal deficit to human deficit and let us attack it next.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the parliamentary secretary's speech. He certainly gives a good perspective.

We are concerned about the people of Canada. The real response to his intervention is not whether we want to look after the people but rather how to do it. The question arises: Is it good for jobs in the country to have the government spend 50 per cent of our money?

To me the answer is obviously no. It would be much better for the government to spend less of our money and to allow individuals to promote and improve themselves in job situations because the private enterprise system is working much better. That is one of our main points of debate.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary a very difficult question. He may choose to talk around it instead of answering it, in which case I will assume that either he does not want to answer it because it is embarrassing to him to be on that side of the House and to answer it, or he may be equivocating and does not know. I do not know what he will say. However if he chooses to answer I would be very pleased.

• (1635)

The item of debate today is whether the 3 per cent of GDP is an adequate target. I am really quite convinced that it would be best if we eliminated deficit spending and stopped putting the government and the people more and more into debt.

Is 3 per cent an adequate target? Yes or no.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is such a complicated question. The absolute hope and desire of every member of the House would be to go beyond the 3 per cent and eventually eliminate the deficit. If the member gave us some magical way in which we could eliminate the deficit instantly, Mr. Speaker, do you think we would not want to do it?

I want to make another point. We are debating priorities in the House right now. I would like to focus on one that I believe in passionately. Right now the Government of Canada invests $50 million in tourism marketing for all of Canada; we spend $50 million to promote Canada all over the world. Nike shoes spends $200 million in the United States of America.

As a government priority I believe it would be good not just to spend $50 million of Canadian taxpayers' money promoting Canada and filling our hotel rooms, our theatres and our restaurants. I believe it would be a worthwhile tax expenditure to spend five times that amount because it would be money we would get back in 90 or 120 days. The job creation that could result would be incalculable in the short term.

There is an ideological difference between us and the Reform Party. I do not believe the private sector alone can do all these things well. There are times when government has to intervene.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his speech today. We are down to discussing differences of opinion rather than getting involved with who loves their mother more. That is very helpful.

I also agree with him that we need some major tax revision. We were looking at the process and have come forward with a substantial difference between the way the Liberals think about government and the way we believe Canadians want to think about government. We had to do a complete shift before we could come up with these numbers.

I would like to run these assumptions on jobs by the parliamentary secretary. The Liberal flawed assumption on jobs is that governments can solve the unemployment problem through public spending. The consequences are that government spending is now at an all time high. Yet over a million people are still unemployed or underemployed.

By comparison, the Reform Party believes that the private sector and not the government is the engine of job creation in Canada. The government's role is to create a healthy economic climate by eliminating the deficit, stabilizing and reducing taxes, and reducing bureaucratic regulation and trade barriers. The result is that we would have significant increases in private job sector creation. Does the member agree?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, government does not create jobs. Government creates an environment that accelerates job creation potential.

The point I want to make is that we agree with everything the member said. No one has accelerated privatization and offloaded government instruments after using up public policy usefulness faster than the Minister of Transport.

We are not trying to build empires. We are working rigorously and quickly in many respects to try to do some of the things the member cited.

• (1640)

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to debate the subject of whether the 3 per cent of GDP is acceptable as a target in reducing the deficit. My answer to the question is no, it is not acceptable. It is unacceptable for a number of reasons, but before getting into my more formal remarks I wish to compliment the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry. Once again he has demonstrated that there is at least one member on the other side of the House who actually reads some of the material we present.

You are the parliamentary secretary of industry and not of transport. I am so happy the minister—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is a highly experienced member like his predecessor. I ask him to watch his use of the word "you".

Mr. Schmidt: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to make it absolutely clear that I was speaking to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry and not transport. I am very honoured the Minister of Transport is in his place this afternoon.

There are a couple of reasons I believe the 3 per cent of the GDP as a deficit is unacceptable. First, I was absolutely amazed to think of where that 3 per cent of the GDP came from. The following question was asked in the House: "Why is 3 per cent such a reasonable goal?" The Prime Minister answered at that point, I believe it was April 11, 1994, by saying: "We have a goal that is achievable to reduce the deficit in relation to GDP to 3 per cent per year. This goal is very reasonable because 3 per cent of the GDP is the requirement for any country to qualify in Europe to use the new currency called the ECU. If it is good enough for all countries in Europe to have that goal it should be good enough for Canada".

Why is that a problem? Is is because Europe has a totally different geography. The economies of the countries making up the European community are very different. The total debt structure is very different. The demographic distribution of population is very different. Their natural resource base is very different. Why is it that should apply it to our country?

If it is good enough for them it ought to be good enough for us only if everything else is equal. Is it really relevant in that situation? I could not help but think of an analogy in our armed services. I thought about the uniforms some of our generals wear. It seemed to me it was something like going to the tailor and saying: "If you want to make a good suit for the Prime Minister, go measure him really well. If the Prime Minister fits the suit it will automatically fit the Minister of Finance". Nothing could be more ridiculous than accepting for Canada a similar goal that is set somewhere else and saying that it should be ours as well unless everything else is the same.

Why do we not have a goal made in Canada for Canadians by Canada's government? That has not happened.

Second, this goal is not acceptable because it is financially inadequate. There is a principle that all governments should observe: governments should not be allowed to spend what taxpayers are not prepared to pay for. The violation of that principle has put us into the mess we are in today. For the last 30 years Canada's expenditures have exceeded revenues. Canada's debt has risen exponentially in the last few years.

Third, foreign investors who hold about 40 per cent of Canada's debt are becoming concerned that Canada will not be able to service its debt. It is not that they are so worried about paying the principal of the debt but they are concerned about being able to service it, that is paying the interest on it.

I am sure it comes as no surprise to anyone in the House that the deficit on an annual basis is made up of the interest payments on the principal of our debt.

• (1645)

There may be those in this House who suggest that the debt problem is really that of more than one level of government. It certainly is.

I go back to the ECU. That 3 per cent GDP figure includes all debt of a country, not just the federal debt. In Canada we are looking at 3 per cent of the federal debt and that is not sufficient.

The suggestion is also made that somehow there is support in the economic community or in the business community for that level. I want to refer to October 18, 1994 when the Prime Minister said: "We have faced up to our responsibilities. We were the only political party that put in writing in our red book exactly how we would achieve our objective. The financial community thinks that it is realistic and it is a realistic objective. A deficit of 3 per cent of the gross national product is the level required in Europe for all countries in the European community to qualify for the new European currency".

The justification is that our business community supports that. I simply refer to the suggestion that our credit rating will be dropped down. We have had since then a devaluation of the Canadian dollar. We have had an increase in our interest rates. Also I draw members' attention to the situation in November 1994 when foreigners took a net $2.2 billion out of our country. Foreign investors reduced their holdings of Canadian bonds by $4.9 billion, a record for a single month.

Some other points to observe are that by September 1994 Nomura Securities Canada Inc. said that eight of the largest Japanese life insurance companies had cut their Canadian dollar exposure by 60 per cent from the previous year's level, reflecting mainly concerns over currency losses. The Canadian dollar decreased in value while the yen increased in value.

The London based Warburg Asset Management director Tom Berger says that Canadian bonds because of the debtload no longer make up core holding in his portfolio but may be used opportunistically on a short term basis.

Further evidence comes from Michel Doucet, economist for the National Bank, who observed that foreigners sold $3.4 billion of Canadian bonds in the secondary market in November 1994 alone reflects a loss of confidence in Canadian bonds.

One of the reasons investors are worried is that the debt is rising faster than the economy. Particularly they are worried that the government will relax its hold on inflation targets and that the currency will devalue as a result.

There are serious implications of the Moody's situation. I think it was two days ago that the president of Sun Life indicated that there is enough discomfort by that sort of thing happening that we rebegin to question whether the superintendent of financial institutions through the office of the superintendent of financial institutions is inadequate to control and monitor meaningfully the financial institutions of Canada.

All we need to do here is milk the special white paper that was introduced last week by the secretary of state for finance. It is worthy to note as well that nothing has been said about the implications of the goal for our chartered banks and other deposit taking institutions of those kinds of downgradings.

Let us not forget the billions of dollars that are found in RRSPs, GICs and other debt instruments. With one stroke of the pen to decrease the value of the Canadian dollar, a lot of damage can be done to the savings of Canadians.

There is a third reason this is an inadequate target. It guarantees further indebtedness. At the rate of $25 billion per year, that means that there will be a $100 billion addition to our debt every four years.

It is already growing faster than the rate of the GDP. That means it is as if the value of one's house were going down while the cost of one's mortgage was going up, a formula for disaster.

Let us review some of the recent experiences with reducing the deficit as a proportion of GDP. In 1991 the deficit was 6.6 per cent of the GDP. In 1992 it was 9.1 per cent. In 1993 it was 7.1 per cent and in 1994 it was 6.5 per cent.

From that vantage point alone it seems a bit far fetched that all of a sudden we are going to get to 3 per cent. Canada's economy has been strong because the U.S. economy has been strong.

• (1650)

There are now some pretty clear indications that the prospect of the U.S. economy continuing to roll along is not going to happen but that it is slowing down. It is likely that we are nearing the end of the current North American business cycle. That will make it increasingly difficult for the Minister of Finance to reach the goals he has set.

Three years have been wasted. It should be no surprise whatsoever that business leaders and credit rating agencies have difficulty believing that the minister is serious about dealing with the deficit.

The other part of the problem is the composition of the contemporary welfare state. Our welfare state works at the present time so that deficits rise when recessions hit and fall when the economy grows. Let us look at this in more detail.

Canada's deficit soared nearly 7 per cent of GDP after the 1981–82 recession but was under 3 per cent of GDP in 1988–89 after several years of solid growth.

This time in this increase the economy has been growing since 1992 but because of Ottawa's position of inaction we have seen no improvement in the deficit and that is where the problem is. It affects the levels of all governments to borrow for their needs for capital expenditures such as roads, schools and things of that sort. There will always be a need to borrow money. If our credit rating drops down it will impact our ability to do so.

If we use our credit to finance current expenditures for education, health and welfare we will be unable to finance those projects that are in themselves revenue generating. That situation compounds a difficult situation into an escalating and worse position.

I think this particular goal is deceptive. It sounds so good to be able to say 3 per cent of GDP. It is confidence generating—they have a number, they have to be right. The result is that the number, as we have indicated previously, cannot improve the long term health of our financial position because it will increase the debt of our country.

It is illusionary. The deficit will never be eliminated by a goal where the deficit is a proportion of the GDP. It means a perpetual deficit and the accumulation of more debt.

It transfers more of our responsibility not to ourselves but to future generations, in particular our children and our grandchildren. Instead of providing them with a more promising future we are saying they are going to pay more and more for the lifestyle that we ourselves were not prepared to pay for.

It reduces the attractiveness of Canada as a place in which to invest money. Another reason why I believe this particular goal is inadequate is that it is manipulative. It creates the illusion as if something is being done when very little is being done that would instil confidence in investors and credit rating agencies.

While Canadians on the one hand are urged to plan for their retirement, their children's education and so on, it is clearly known by the Minister of Finance that in pursuing this particular course the government's inaction will erode the future purchasing power of those savings through inflation and increased taxes.

Thus what appeared to be a very well planned RRSP turns out to be a mere existence under the new economic conditions. Canada pension plan contributions were said to be deposits for the future of the depositor so they could retire in comfort, but the legislative provisions for the investment of those funds mitigated against them. Many of the returns on those invested dollars were uncompetitive.

For these reasons I believe that this particular goal is inadequate. It is inadequate because the target was chosen not for Canada but for another series of countries. The fact that it is a rolling goal over two years and so on is not acceptable, as we heard so aptly this afternoon. It is based on the goal that we are supposed to be able to continue to grow and develop when there is nothing in the history of Canada so far to indicate that will take place. It is inadequate because it is not an honest position of giving hope to future generations. It saddles them with the responsibility of paying for a lifestyle which they did not enjoy but which we did.

• (1655)

That is a moral question as well. I believe that I should be held accountable and responsible for the things that I enjoy and the things that I want to do. I should not go to my children and say I want to drive a new car, I want to be able to do all of these things and they are going to pay for them.

This goal is a disincentive not only for us if our taxes are going to increase, which I understand from the minister, not directly but indirectly that they will, but it is also a disincentive in the sense that it provides little or no hope for our young people who will look forward to an increasing burden of debt. Is that the legacy we want to leave them? No, that is not what we want to leave them.

Much has been said this afternoon about compassion. The greatest compassion we can have is give to our young people the hope of living a better life than the one which we have enjoyed, to give them a tax burden which is less than ours, not greater than ours, one in which they will be able to initiate their own ingenuity, their own entrepreneurship, their own aggressiveness to be able to build a life which is self–satisfying and fulfilling, better than the one we have been able to give them.

We have not been giving them the example of managing money successfully and effectively. We have given them the impression that government can answer all questions, government can do all things and government can give them jobs. The answer is that government can do none of those things. As the parliamentary secretary said so clearly, it creates the environment in which these things can happen. This goal destroys that environment. We must change that. We must stop that and bring about a deficit which will reach zero in three years. That is what our plan is. That is what our party stands for. That is true compassion.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway—China; the hon. member for Frontenac—agricultural subsidies.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to a specific section with regard to retirement in the documents presented today by the Reform Party. It says that many seniors express frustration at mandatory retirement. Despite the fact that seniors are healthier and living longer than ever before, many of them are legally obliged to stop functioning as productive members of the economy once they turn 65. To complicate matters further, federally run pension programs start paying benefits at age 65.

Specifically, I would like to ask the hon. member if this means they are proposing to raise the age at which seniors are eligible to receive Canada pension plan and whether that is something which they propose to do instantaneously or phase in over a number of years.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, there are two parts to the answer to that question. The difficulty lies not so much in seniors wanting to retire at age 65, but that it is mandatory that they do so.

The important issue here is that there be flexibility and that no person would be required by law to retire at age 65. If they are healthy and willing to work beyond 65, they should have the opportunity to do so. They should also have the privilege to retire at age 65 if they choose to do that.

The second part of the answer with respect to increasing the mandatory retirement age or the age at which benefits would cut in, that it seems to me came from a meeting at which a Liberal person made a statement somewhere in Ontario. There is nothing in this document that says that we will increase the age requirement of the mandatory retirement age.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan Centre opened up his debate by questioning our 3 per cent GDP target and spent almost 70 per cent of his time wondering whether we would achieve that 3 per cent GDP target.

• (1700)

In his preamble the hon. member stated that the 3 per cent GDP target was arrived at by looking at an area on the map of the world because of geography, demographics and natural resources. It seems to me those same criteria apply even more so to Canada.

In 1993 in terms of objectives, there was a party that had zero in five, another party that had zero in three, and another party that had three in three. Canadians spoke and said that a target of 3 per cent of GDP was acceptable to them.

I question the whole approach of the Reform Party today. Whenever we talk about the deficit, with each dollar we look at there is always one aspect we must remember as parliamentarians: there is a person, a human being behind that dollar. We are going to touch every single human being with the decisions we make.

Yes, a 3 per cent GDP target may not be ambitious for financial institutions and others, but it is an interim target. It is something Canadians can hold on to dearly. Even if we achieve that target the Minister of Finance in his address to the finance committee admitted publicly that we must strive for the day when we will have a balanced budget.

I ask the hon. member where in his party's platform do they see that compassion, that understanding for the human face that is behind every dollar? Their proposals go after the weakest provinces, after those on welfare, after the unemployed and after seniors. We must show compassion, as the hon. member said.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to address the question of compassion. The greatest compassion we can give is that of hope for a better future. There will be no better demonstration of that than to give to the Canadian people a balanced budget with the hope of reduced taxes in the future. That is true compassion.

The other part of compassion is to give to those who cannot look after themselves the wherewithal to look after themselves. If we analyse the alternative budget presented this morning, we will see very clearly as one of the major principles in the social programs that those who cannot look after themselves will be the very first to receive the social program benefits. Those who must be looked after will be looked after. That is true compassion.

It is when we kick people who are down that we have no compassion. For people who can help themselves, we let them develop the strength and empower them so they can look after themselves. That is also compassion, to let them realize what they are capable of becoming. Then we look after those who cannot do that for themselves. That is true compassion and that is the human being behind the dollar.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in our electoral red book, which became the action plan of the Liberal Party during the 1993 election, we proposed a holistic way to look at government.

We proposed to the Canadian people that the basis of funding services and programs has to be money, and budgetary considerations have to be paramount. At the same time, we proposed and suggested that there are social responsibilities a government cannot avoid.

We admit that previous government administrations, including Liberal governments, have built a huge debt for which we are now responsible. We have to attack that debt, reduce it, and reduce our huge deficit. At the same time, we suggested we cannot do so at the expense of the government's responsibility to look after social programs and all the various services only a government can give.

• (1705)

What we proposed is the formula adopted by the European community of 3 per cent of GNP after three years, the reduction of our deficit to $25 billion. As we have said, naturally this is the first phase. We will have to go farther than this. We are all conscious of that. At the same time however, we are convinced that we cannot do so at the expense of our basic fundamental responsibilities as a government.

My colleague from Vaudreuil put it very well. In all the equations, in all the formulas about deficit and debt reduction, people have to come first. People have to be the priority.

The basic argument we have with the Reform Party is not that we should attack the deficit and the debt, but how we should do it and the timeframe in which we should do it. Reform's formula is an instant formula: make the deficit disappear to zero within three years. Ours is gradual. Ours says we will reach an important target. It will take tremendous sacrifices on the part of Canadians as the budget will show next week. At the same time, we feel it is the only way to avoid the pitfall of sacrificing the services and social safety net that Canadians depend on.

I was struck by the budget presented by the Reform Party. There are all kinds of footnotes and references to economists, chambers of commerce, and institutes of actuaries in Canada. All the references, perhaps bar one, are of an economic nature. I have not seen any references to books, to social activists, to social reformists, or to community groups that might present ideas. I have not seen any references to an environmental network that might also have a say in how the affairs of a country are run. It is purely a budget relating to dollars and cents, added up and subtracted as if people do not count, as if people do not exist.

For example, there is a reference in the Reform Party's budget to the U.S. economy which has produced consistently less unemployment than Canada since the 1970s. One thing that is not pointed out which is pretty obvious to me is that the U.S. market contains a population of 260 million. It is a huge internal market whereas ours has barely 30 million people. The U.S. market and the U.S. economy are huge compared to ours, 10 times the size of ours.

At the same time the point the famous Reform budget does not make is that if the U.S. has a lower rate of unemployment, maybe it could also say that the U.S. has a lower rate of interest. What is not said is that every year, 30 million U.S. citizens go without proper health care because there is no universal health care in the United States.

We can compare countries, but if we are to make a fair comparison, we have to do it on a holistic and comprehensive basis. We do not select only the bits that are suited for our own arguments.

The Reform budget talks about Ireland and Denmark, but I noticed that it does not mention New Zealand, the latest experiment in fast track deficit and debt reduction. The New Zealanders decided that overnight Minister Douglas was going to wipe out the deficit, so they deregulated the financial markets. They cut the taxes for corporate and upper income earners by half.

• (1710)

New Zealanders drastically cut public services. In one day alone they closed 75 post offices because they cost too much. They significantly reduced any infrastructure dollars given to towns and municipalities for sewers, road works and other different infrastructure projects.

The result was that unemployment went from 4 per cent to 16 per cent. They went from being a very peaceful and safe society to one which is now experiencing a lot of violent crime. Poverty rates went up 40 per cent. New Zealanders now have to pay huge user fees to use medical services. They have no universal health care any more.

The amazing part is that this huge deficit reduction curve did not help. In fact it made life even more difficult and more painful.

We are saying that yes, let us reduce the deficit and the debt but let us do so progressively, responsibly and intelligently.

It strikes me that with this simplistic approach we can have a magic kingdom with this magic formula in three years according to the Reform Party. However, this magic kingdom I read about in its report is full of little conditions. I will just quote a few of them.

In social programs, the details of such longer run reforms of the social programs still have to be worked out. Yes, Reformers still have to work out the programs.

With regard to seniors and the famous tax back in old age security, the details of such a program requires further discussion with Canadians and seniors specifically. I would hope that if they have a tax back on seniors, they will discuss the details with Canadians and seniors specifically. Obviously they have not or otherwise they would not write it as such.

In regard to seniors, the Reform Party says: "We should abolish retirement at age 65". I was part of a commission when I was in the Government of Quebec. One minister at the time when I was in opposition decided overnight to lift the retirement age at age 65. I remember questioning him as to whether he had actuarial figures to show what the impact of this was going to be. I asked him if he had any studies to show what the impact was going to be on young people who would not get a chance to be employed if there was no retirement of seniors.

However, in the magic kingdom we just do this and retirement no longer happens at 65, regardless of the consequences to younger people who want to find a slot. I have a young daughter who is a teacher. In the first few years of her teaching life she cannot find a job because people do not retire at the top. However, Reform will do this and suddenly the magic has happened. Before proposing anything we have to know all our facts and figures.

On page 46 of the Reform Party's plan it says it would also investigate the possibility of equalizing UI premiums for employees and employers rather than making employers bear a heavier payroll burden. Reformers say they will investigate and then they tell us that their figures are watertight.

Over the long term the Reform Party is investigating a number of options for the renewal of Canada's UI system. Reformers are still investigating a number of options for renewal of Canada's UI system yet they tell us with so much cockiness and assurance: "Oh yes, we are going to wipe that deficit to zero by a great magic. You can't but we can".

Reformers talk about the principles of social reform. The principles of social reform are to have families look after themselves. They want to put the accent on families. I am for that 100 per cent because I am a family man. Let us empower people in communities and I am with that too.

In the simplistic way of looking at things, once Reformers have looked after families, once they have looked after empowerment, once they decide to only take care of the needy—they do not explain who the needy are, the needy according to the Reformers, I wonder who the real needy are according to them—then everything else will take care of itself.

• (1715)

I will give my own personal experience. I have a retarded son. For 20 years or so, I have worked in community groups relating to the intellectually handicapped. We built schools, we built pre–schools. We started with volunteer groups trying to get out of the glue, trying to raise funds by selling bricks for schools, holding lotteries and fund raising events. Eventually it was only through government programs that we were able to set up a proper network which gave the services that eventually enabled the intellectually handicapped to find a place in the sun, to integrate into society.

Perhaps what the Reform Party does not want to accept is that we are an evolving society. Twenty or 30 years ago my son would have been kept hidden behind the bushes somewhere, but today people evolve. We have autistic children, we have severely handicapped children that go to schools because we have given them the means through expert help of finding a way to better themselves, to enhance their own personalities, their own beings.

Members of the Reform Party ignore the evolution of society. They think it is a static society. They talk about seniors as if we have a static group of seniors, whereas aging in Canada is happening at a rate which is exponential: to date something like 12 per cent of the population in some areas, and tomorrow it is going to be 18 to 20 per cent. They do not provide for that. All the figures are static. We are going to make seniors carry on, working beyond 65. We will have a tax back on old age security and somehow we are going to retrieve all this money and the $17 billion that is left we are going to distribute very evenly among all those that need it without saying how this criteria is going to be built.

They do not talk about what is happening in a society that is fast evolving with problems that are immense. We never knew Alzheimer's 20 years ago. We never knew the tremendous rate of cancer in society, of AIDS. We have all sorts of fantastic problems to face today. They are so complex and require so much money, require expert services, that private institutions cannot give them. Only government can give them because only government has that responsibility to the people who need it most. Whether we like it or not, the private world is geared to profit motives mostly.

What they do not say in their document which we say in our red book is that to all the problems of society, whether they be financial, whether they be educational, whether they be illiteracy, whether they be a social dysfunction in families, have root causes. We have to address the root causes of them.

I do not see anything in their budget that addresses the root causes. It is strictly an economic document that talks about dollars and cents, that balances columns, that adds up and subtracts and arrives at $25 billion; $15 billion that they will take out of security and social systems and $10 billion in government operations and that will cure the world.

If they say it is only the Liberals that are crazy, that do not see their great magic, I will read to them that some critics from outside feel differently. "With this $25 billion in cuts to annual federal spending the deficit indeed will soon stand at nothing. So too might the country. It is here that Reform's proposals fall short. It is one thing to present some specific solutions, which the party has done, but it is another to set out the consequences, which the party has not done". That was written by the Edmonton Journal from the province from which many of them come.

It says in the Ottawa Citizen on November 29, 1994: "The Reform Party does not know what impact the deep spending cuts that it is proposing will have on the economy or on individuals, party finance critic Ray Speaker conceded on Monday".

In another editorial it states: "If you picture government spending as a runaway bicycle the Reform would jam a stick in the front spokes. It gets the job done but odds are that you will not recognize the face of the nation afterwards, nor would you want to look". That is the Ottawa Citizen.

• (1720)

"Reform Party's Preston Manning's shrill call for absolutely no tax increase sounds simplistic and irresponsible. The Liberals seem ready to chart a realistic course of how to get out of debt city and on to recovery road. It certainly beats the Reform Party's slash and burn shortcuts which would take Canada nowhere fast". That is from the Montreal Gazette.

Then the Calgary Herald: "Reform, for its part, would rapidly slash federal government spending so as to create a fiscal balance while creating a huge social deficit in the form of greater unemployment and social polarization".

I challenge Reformers to show us how they really arrive at zero deficit in three years without raising taxes. Remember, if they do not raise taxes and suddenly cut everything in sight, they arrive at zero deficit. Then in their magic kingdom, empowerment, family life, giving the community the responsibility to administer all this, suddenly everything will come right.

The amazing part is that this does not take care of fishermen out of work in Newfoundland. I see that typically all the Reform members come from western Canada. I do not know if many of them travel to Newfoundland, to Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick or Quebec, or the Gaspé coast where thousands of people are out of work, where unemployment insurance is not something that people want to have because they feel good about it, but because it is needed for them to sustain a dignified living, to try to look for some other way to recycle themselves while they have no work.

Fortunately, sadly, these responsibilities cannot be passed on to somebody else. They have to be the responsibility of governments. Governments have to continue to be involved, to be responsible.

I believe that our budget approach of reducing the budget gradually to the point of 3 per cent of GNP by the next fiscal budget is a responsible approach. Then we go on to reducing it further.

In the meanwhile, the pain, the hurdles will be formidable enough as they are. Canadians are being asked to make tremendous sacrifices already. I believe their sacrifices will be worth it but certainly we should not ask them for more and the magic kingdom of the Reform is for naught.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely respected the speech we just heard, particularly at the personal level.

Again I would like to state what we are really talking about here, to put it on a proper level of debate, is a different philosophy in arriving at the same goal. The Reform Party is not out to destroy social programs. What the Reform Party sees is the Liberal government, with its present course of action, in the process of destroying the ability to fund social programs.

I hope that the member and I could come to an agreement that we are both out for the same objective but we are attempting to arrive at the solution from different perspectives. I am sure the member is not suggesting that we do not desire to see the social programs not only continue but to be available for people.

With that in mind, I would draw this to his attention. We receive in the House a publication called "Quorum". On page 17 of "Quorum" he was quoting from the Edmonton Journal.

This quote is from the Edmonton Journal of February 18 where the energy minister, who is a member from Alberta, called the Moody's downgrade "irresponsible".

• (1725)

"It angers me when we are working very hard to get our fiscal house in order". She said Moody's should have waited until the budget is tabled, "and then if they do not think we have done enough; fine. Then they can let us have it."

"The truly important factor in all of this is that until we deal with our fiscal situation we are going to be held hostage by the Moody's and the others of this world. What they are doing is slowly undermining our sovereignty."

To me, that is a reflection of where Liberal members are coming from. They do not realize that when they look in the mirror and see broccoli on their teeth they should not smash the mirror, there is broccoli on their teeth. The problem in this case is that the Liberal government has been going out of its way to say Moody's is wrong. Moody's happens to be advising all of the people. The Wall Street Journal is wrong. All of these people are wrong and the Liberals are right.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would not agree that the remarks we are hearing from Dominion Bond Rating Service, from Moody's, and from all of these other publications are trying to tell us something, that in fact the 3 per cent level that the government has chosen will have the effect of destroying Canada's ability to be able to fund the programs that he and I want to maintain.

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the Minister of Finance several times. He has met us in various meetings. I have listened to him here in the House.

We have gone to the people of Canada during an election where we put forward our electoral platform very clearly. We set in it exactly what we were going to do. We were going to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP within three years. We are on target to do this.

We set out the various programs that we wanted to keep, the programs we wanted to maintain as a social safety net, the programs we wanted to enhance, and we have set it out in very clear language with figures backing it up.

All the various financial houses were aware of what we were trying to do. The budget is going to come down within a week. We should all wait to see what it says, what it does, what thrust and direction it takes, whether it follows in the same path as the first budget, which it will do, and whether we are on the right target.

I am convinced that once the budget is down, once the facts are known, that all the various naysayers will agree that Canada is going in the right direction and following the right path, and that certainly we are keeping to our commitments in a very credible way.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will make a couple of comments and then ask a couple of quick questions of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister.

First of all, I want to touch on his reference to New Zealand. The parliamentary secretary in referring to New Zealand said this was an example of what tough deficit reduction can do and has done. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister should know that in fact New Zealand chose not to take tough deficit reduction action, and as a result its economy collapsed. Exactly the same thing happened there as Canada is facing right now.

One day there was no one willing to buy the bonds that New Zealand floated, and Canada is very close to that. That is what Moody's and the others are warning about. The parliamentary secretary had better do a little bit of reading on what happened in New Zealand so he can speak factually about what did happen. I thought I would correct him on that.

I would like to also talk about the target of 3 per cent of GDP in three years that he refers to as the target set in the Maastricht treaty. It was a deficit target but it was based on all government debt, not just federal government debt, whereas this Liberal target is on federal government debt only. The target the Liberals have set is nothing like the target set under the Maastricht treaty.

The Deputy Speaker: There did not appear to be a question in that. We are at 5.30 p.m. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary does not need to respond.

It being 5.30 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(19), the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, December 8, consideration of the motion that Bill C–216, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service), be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in favour of the bill tabled by the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur and tell him that we, the official opposition, truly hope that this private members' bill will become law.

It is indeed a flagrant injustice that people collecting unemployment insurance lose their benefits when they accept jury duty. It is an injustice of the kind that could compromise justice in all of the provinces and in all of Canada.

Some people have said that this provision should be covered by provincial law. I think it should be the opposite. In fact, what we have before us is an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act that would guarantee that jurors would not lose their entitlement to UI benefits because they are on jury duty. I must point out that, for the act to apply, the person submitting the claim for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act must already qualify and continue to qualify under this bill.

It is difficult to be a juror. It is certainly more difficult than being a member of Parliament who is trying to deliver a speech when everyone is talking. They have to carry out certain duties and we should at least make it easier for them. In fact, it is thanks to jurors that we have a justice system that is based on decisions made freely by citizens—

The Deputy Speaker: Dear colleagues, would you please stop talking and show a little respect for the hon. member who has the floor.

Mrs. Lalonde: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that this issue is important enough to give a member of Parliament the right to a modicum of attention, in the same way that unemployed jurors merit to qualify for benefits.

The current provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act prevent UI claimants from accepting jury duty. I believe that one factor should weigh heavy in the decision that this House and eventually the government must take, and that is that, day in, day out, including any allowances to be made for Quebec, on the average 30 per cent of all those who are able to work or have worked are on unemployment insurance. Not everyone milks the system until their benefits run dry. What is more, with the new cuts we are seeing, it is not everybody who qualifies for unemployment insurance for several months.

There is therefore a significant number of citizens who, each year, rely on unemployment insurance. Something does not make sense when the judicial system must pass over these citizens, who are available anyway, only to call on others.

Furthermore, it hardly makes any sense either that those who must serve as jurors are only paid the meagre allowance of $25 per day.

• (1805)

It is not merely a question of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act to ensure that people chosen for jury duty may exercise their right to do so—recognizing that they are not handsomely paid since, as people say, no one gets rich on unemployment insurance in any case—and continue to receive at least the minimum to which they were already entitled under the Unemployment Insurance Act, thereby allowing them to perform this function which is eminently necessary to a democratic system, namely being chosen at random from the population for jury duty.

I say to the minister that this is not only a reform worth carrying out, but rather one that should have been carried out a long time ago because of the many negative consequences for ordinary people. In that way, we would be sure at least that persons receiving unemployment insurance benefits would not try to avoid this important role which is also very demanding physically and morally.

Since certain responsibilities are already being imposed on them, we would like to allow them to keep at least some peace of mind, which is in any case greatly diminished since unemployment insurance is hardly a king's ransom.

So I would ask the House to vote for the amendment proposed by my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur and I say to him that Bloc Quebecois members will vote for this amendment.

[English]

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to speak in favour of the private member's bill of my hon. colleague which will enable those claiming unemployment insurance to receive their regular benefits while they are engaged in jury service.

First, I congratulate the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur for the thoughtfulness and thoroughness he has shown in redressing this problem in the Unemployment Insurance Act. Through his efforts the House has learned that it is difficult or impossible for unemployed Canadians to fulfil their legal responsibilities as citizens of the country when asked to perform jury duty.

However, what is most impressive is that through the efforts of my hon. colleague, the Government of Canada is now in a position to rectify an unfair situation. This is an excellent example of how people can use the system to make changes that benefit all Canadians. A constituent has voiced an important concern and as a result of my hon. colleague's actions we now have a bill before us that will redress an injustice faced by many Canadians.

I am sure we all agree that private members' initiatives such as this one provide a valuable direct link between the concerns of our constituents and positive legislative change. Furthermore, the enthusiasm of our government to support the process can only strengthen the democratic parliamentary process.

The government's support of the specific bill clearly indicates that we are open to reviewing all aspects of our social programs and correcting flaws therein. We know our current programs are far from perfect. Some may have outgrown their usefulness and others have not kept pace with time.

In this case we must ensure the system does not penalize people who are merely trying to fulfil their responsibilities and duties as Canadians. To vote in support of the bill is simply to acknowledge that UI claimants should not be penalized when they engage in jury service. They are, after all, serving their country by doing a stressful job that ultimately benefits all of us.

It makes no sense for one arm of government to force a person into service while another arm of government punishes a person for providing that service. With no alternative at hand, more and more judges have little choice but to excuse UI claimants from jury duty. This is not a solution but merely a stop gap measure. Judges have stated their disapproval with the current system to both the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of Justice. Exempting UI claimants from jury duty removes the claimants from an unfair situation. The question we must ask, however, is: Why not simply stop creating the unfair situation in the first place?

Judges have pointed out that by excusing UI claimants from jury duty on compassionate grounds it makes it more difficult to ensure the accused will receive his or her right to a trial by a fair and true jury of peers.

There are two reasons for this. In regions of higher unemployment, for instance, the routine exemption of potential jury members because they are on UI arbitrarily decreases the pool of jury members available, often to the point where it is difficult to ensure that a jury is selected from a broad cross–section of society.

Furthermore, as my hon. colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur has pointed out, in trials where the defendant is unemployed the automatic exclusion of all UI claimants from the jury could have a serious bearing on the defendant's right to a trial with a jury of peers who understand the circumstances and life situation of the defendant. Under the current system, however, judges have no other road open to them except to excuse UI claimants from duty.

There are good reasons Canadian citizens are legally obligated to engage in jury service when called upon. Each one of us has a right to trial by a jury selected from among our peers. This is a principle we cannot afford to tamper with. The principles involved and their accompanying social consequences surely warrant the small increase in unemployment expenditures that would be involved.

Finally, we must emphasize that most employees continue to be paid their normal salaries while fulfilling jury duty obligations. Their collective agreements protect them from the injustice of losing their jobs or losing income when they perform this service. It therefore seems unfair for the federal government to cut off UI claimants when so many employers are not permitted to lay off or fire employees for the same reason.

The bill will help our fellow Canadians to fulfil their civic duty without undue hardship. It will also help to ensure that the fundamental principle of a fair trial by jury is maintained. For all these reasons I am convinced all my colleagues in the House will vote in favour of the bill.

I thank my hon. colleague for bringing forward this important piece of legislation. I encourage all members of the House to support the bill before us today.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise to speak against this private member's bill. The bill would allow unemployment insurance claimants to collect unemployment insurance while serving on juries. It clearly demonstrates why the country is in such a serious financial crisis. Instead of finding ways to save millions of dollars, the government is busy running around finding more ways to spend millions of dollars.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): I hear the jeers coming from across the floor. I would appeal to members of the House to listen to reasoned debate. If every member would listen to the issues at stake in the bill and each vote according to his or her conscience, I believe the result would be very different from voting along purely party lines.

It is essential to look at the issues. I have heard the description of the problem but there are some options the government has refused to consider. That is why I oppose the bill. I will speak to it and give the reasons for opposing it.

I will say right now, and I will say it openly, that the Liberals just do not get it. Canadians are sick and tired of governments that spend more than they take in. Canadian taxpayers are sick of members of Parliament who are more concerned about paying unemployment insurance claimants to sit on juries than they are about them looking for work.

• (1815)

I listened to the hon. member's intervention. It reminds me of somebody who looks at his bicycle and sees that one tire does not look the same as the other. One is flat and one is not. He decides he is going to make them both look the same and punches a hole in the one that looks good. Then they both look the same. That is the Liberal way of solving some of these problems. If we have a problem with the justice system we do not fix it with the UI system. It is that simple. We are creating inequities. I am getting ahead of myself. Let me get into this reasoned debate that the members need to listen to.

The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur quite rightly identifies the problem with the poor compensation that provinces pay citizens to sit on juries. Rather than doing something about the specific problem, he attempts to avoid the real problem by giving jurors a handout from the unemployment insurance program.

Do you think it will ever be properly solved once you do this? The answer is obvious, no. Once we start going along this path, it will not be properly solved in the justice system where the solution should take place.

In this bill the hon. member proposes to break the fundamental insurance principle that all UI claimants should be available for work in order to collect UI benefits. The government has strayed so far from the rules of a true insurance program that many Canadians already think that unemployment insurance is a social program, and that is a fundamental mistake.

I am here to remind the hon. member, the Liberal government and all taxpayers in Canada that unemployment insurance is an insurance program, not a social program.

When the Reform Party forms the next government we will put an end to all this social engineering nonsense and return the UI program to its original purpose, an employer–employee funded and administered program to provide temporary income in the event of unexpected job loss. That was the original intent.

The hon. member says that this non–insurance measure will only cost $2 million or $3 million. Does he really think that voters want their government to spend $2 million or $3 million more to pay UI claimants in this way? Has he asked the voters in his constituency if they had $2 million or $3 million to spend if this would be their priority?

I do not think this member would get this support if he had gone to his constituents. I do not think they would support the direction of this government and the way it is heading with this bill.

He gets several individual complaints. I have talked to the member. People are giving comments across here, but I have talked to him directly and he has received several complaints. This is not a big push from across the country, believe me.

Here we are in the midst of the most serious financial crisis the country has ever faced and the best bill that this member can come up with is a bill that would spend $2 million or $3 million more. If we eliminated all the special handouts like the one proposed by the hon. member which the Liberal government has added to this UI program since 1971 we would save billions of dollars.

Why has this government got its priorities so mixed up? Again, I say it just does not get it. Taxpayers do not want to spend more. They want to spend less. Workers and employers do not want high UI premiums. They want lower premiums. This will force them up.

What kind of petitions has this member received in his office? Has he received any petitions? How many hundreds of letters has this member received complaining about this issue? Has any MP received even one petition concerning this? I receive petitions and letters complaining about the government's gun control proposals and I receive many petitions and letters opposing the government's plan to include sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act. I receive many petitions to balance the budget and not raise taxes. Is this hon. member saying that he has received these petitions? I doubt it.

If he is I have to question the hon. member on his priorities in bringing this bill before Parliament. Who supports this bill besides some Liberals who have their thinking locked into the 1970s?

• (1820)

The senior officials at unemployment insurance certainly do not think it is a good idea. Talk to the people there. They know it goes against their own insurance guidelines and they were opposed to it until it went to the standing committee.

Their claims adjudication guidelines state:

> As a general rule, a UI claimant who is on jury duty is not considered to be available for work during a trial. The unemployment insurance plan was not designed to provide compensation for lost wages in such circumstances.

The experts at unemployment insurance add that the problem is not with the UI rules on availability but rather the poor compensation provided for jurors. Reformers agree.

There is the problem. That is where it should be solved, not with the unemployment insurance plan. The research branch of the Library of Parliament also concurs with us:

> The primary issue in this matter seems to be that adequate remuneration for jury duty is the responsibility of the provinces rather than that of the employers and employees who contribute to the unemployment insurance program.

Those are the experts in the Library of Parliament.

If the government actually gave the employers and employees who pay for the UI program a real say in how their money was being spent, I do not think they would agree to provide benefits to claimants while they are serving on a jury.

If the voters are not clamouring for this change, if the experts at unemployment insurance say it goes against insurance principles, if the researchers at the Library of Parliament agree it is the responsibility of the provinces, and if the workers and employers who pay UI premiums are not asking for it, who is? Only the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur and his misguided supporters in the Liberal caucus can answer that.

The law is simple. If UI claimants are serving on a jury, they are not available for work. If they are not available for work, they are not entitled to unemployment insurance. Fix the system where it is broken.

UI claimants are supposed to be looking for work while they are receiving benefits. If they are serving on a jury, they cannot be actively looking for work. Unemployment insurance is not a guaranteed annual income and should not be treated as such.

Everyone collecting unemployment insurance must be actively looking for work and ready, willing and able to accept a job immediately. If the Liberals compromise the insurance principle of availability to allow jurors to collect UI, who is the next group they will designate as deserving special treatment and special status? They opened the door and they are going to have to accept other people with similar excuses.

Reformers say the UI program must be returned to a true insurance program. In order to do this all of the special programs, exemptions and exceptions, including the discriminatory elements such as variable entrance requirements and regional extended benefits, have to be eliminated.

If unemployment insurance ran like a true insurance program, anyone who collects UI repeatedly would have to pay higher premiums. Any employer who regularly lays off workers would also have to pay higher premiums. This private member's bill takes us in the opposite direction to where Reformers want to take unemployment insurance. This is the main reason we cannot support this bill, but not the only reason.

I hope everyone is listening carefully to this next point, because for a government that claims to be the champion of equality, it goes against that basic principle. If this bill were adopted even the principle of equality would be jeopardized. An employed person is expected to take time off work for jury duty. Often they are not compensated for their lost pay.

Now we have the situation with a worker sitting on a jury, losing money because he or she is doing public duty. Beside him is someone being paid by the public purse, a UI claimant getting paid by the government to do the same job.

No one I have heard speak from the other side or even from the Bloc has addressed these two problems. Fix the system where it is broken. Fix the justice system. What are they going to do about the inequities they create with this kind of system?

• (1825)

That answer has not been forthcoming. It should be answered before he supports this bill. The hon. member raises the point that often employers pay their employees while they are serving on a jury and that it is unfair to UI claimants to have their benefits cut off.

If this charge were allowed to pass, what does the member think will happen? If a worker is called to do jury duty, the employer will lay him off so that he can go on UI and collect payments. In other words, one is opening the floodgates to have many people collect UI who normally would not be able to do so because they are laid off by their employers when they have to serve on a jury.

Those members are creating a problem. They are not solving a problem. They are making two flat tires instead of fixing the system where it is broken. This would undoubtedly lead to an increase in UI claims for people serving on juries and therefore an increase in cost to the UI program, which is already billions in debt.

While there may be a problem of fair compensation to all persons who serve on a jury regardless of their employment status, we do not believe that tinkering with the Unemployment Insurance Act and intruding into this area of provincial jurisdiction is the way to solve it.

A simpler solution we propose is for judges to use their discretion to excuse UI claimants from jury duty, as has been done in the past, or else have the provinces deal with the problem. It is their problem.

In closing, it is obvious that jurors are not fairly compensated and on this point my hon. friend and I agree. It is inexcusable that jurors are asked to work for days, weeks and in some cases months for $15 or $20 a day.

The Reform Party was founded on the principles of equality, fairness and common sense. That is lacking in this bill. We find that this is an area that needs to be addressed, but this is an area of provincial jurisdiction. Reformers believe the federal government should not be interfering in areas that are clearly a provincial matter.

The flawed logic behind this type of thinking has this country $550 billion in debt. Every time there is a problem, they do not fix it where it is broken. They simply throw more money at it. This type of thinking costs us $40 billion in interest payments every year; it is this type of thinking, this debt and the interest payments that are the biggest threat to the future of most of our social programs.

Canada cannot afford to make these kinds of decisions with our hearts instead of our heads. Reformers will vote against this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: There being no other members who wish to speak, I will call on the sponsoring member to close the debate.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much time. It has been four years since this subject came to Parliament. Much has been said in committee and in the House. Rather than review all that, I want to take this opportunity to thank my colleagues from the Liberal Party who supported me.

[Translation]

I would like to take this opportunity to draw attention to the support provided by the Bloc Quebecois

[English]

I would also like to thank my colleagues from the Reform Party who have certainly enlightened us on their point of view in this debate. I appreciate that. They have their point of view. I appreciate their point of view, but again we have ours.

I would like to thank every one of my colleagues but I would be remiss if I did not thank the officers of the Chamber who have helped me immensely. They have guided me whenever I needed guidance with regard to the bill. Also my own staff have been very efficient in helping me with this bill. The clerks and personnel of Private Members' Business have been super in giving me information and advice. I thank them this evening and I look forward to their support on this bill.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was asking the Minister of Agriculture about agricultural subsidies, and, more specifically those allocated to grain transportation in western Canada. On the eve of the budget, my concern was to try to find out a little more about the intentions of the minister, who wants to review all agricultural subsidies.

The Minister of Finance ended the suspense this afternoon. The budget will finally be tabled at 4:30 p.m. on Monday, that is, in a week's time. We will then discover the fate of agricultural subsidies. We will discover, finally, whether existing rail carrier subsidies will be replaced by direct subsidies to western grain producers.

So, in answer to my question, the minister gave a rather vague response. He said his colleague in transport and he had been involved in discussions with the primary stakeholders and that the details of the discussions would be made available once the budget was tabled in this House.

The message is clear. We will not have any more information until next week. The minister's response to this, in a minute or two, will be, I expect, a good couple of minutes of fine speech–making, devoid of content. Why do I bother, you might ask, Mr. Speaker? I do so to protest the government's attitude in this matter.

Yesterday, the minister said that Western grain transportation reform had been debated quite often during the past 25 years. As far as I know, his party, the Liberal Party, has been in power for the past 25 years, longer than it deserves, and it never had the guts to take action in this respect. What we have been seeing lately seems to be a rerun of what happened in the past. And that is what bothers me.

Last summer, the Minister of Transport announced that the Crow rate would be abolished. His colleague at Agriculture and Agri–Food hastened to say his department would pick up the slack by making the necessary changes. The committee on payments to producers examined the question and made a number of recommendations, which included transferring the subsidy directly to producers to help them adjust to the new situation.

• (1835)

We expected the minister to let us know whether he supported this approach. Not a word from the minister.

Since that time, it seems the minister has seen talking and consulting quite a lot. That is why I am anxious to hear what kind of measures the minister will implement to make this an effective and satisfactory subsidy for producers, while meeting international trade standards.

There is a risk, however, and this will affect farm producers across the country, that the $566 million paid to Western rail carriers will be paid directly to Western producers only, who will then be able to diversify their operations and, in the process, compete with farm producers in the rest of Canada, which would improve their competitive position.

Imagine, for instance, that with the help of the subsidy, Western producers would be able to raise hogs more cheaply than producers in Quebec or Ontario. This would mean unfair competition with the help of public funds. Can you see farm producers in Quebec and Ontario paying Western farmers to compete unfairly on the hog market? I am using hogs as an example, but it could any kind of livestock that would allow Western farmers to compete with producers in Quebec or Ontario or the Maritimes.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I did not notice the hon. member's time had expired. We will now proceed with the response from the parliamentary secretary.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food meets regularly with industry leaders, including l'Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec.

These discussions have led to legislative amendments to the Western Grain Transportation Act which were tabled in December. These amendments will ensure better use of scarce taxpayer dollars as well as protect our producers from potentially damaging trade actions.

While important, Bill C–66 will not be sufficient in itself to fix all that ails our grain handling and transportation system. Broader reforms are necessary for four very strong reasons.

First, we must deal with the harsh reality of fiscal limitations and the battle against the debt and deficit. Second, we must comply with the requirements of the new GATT agreement with respect to the disciplines that apply to trade distorting subsidies. Third, we need to unlock new grain handling and transportation efficiencies leading to a lower cost and faster system overall.

Fourth, we need to foster greater agricultural diversification and a trend toward more value added processing.

To accomplish these objectives the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food and the Minister of Transport have been conducting two sets of comprehensive consultations for all the players in the Canadian grain handling and transportation system. This will go far to solving the problem.

CHINA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to follow up on a question I originally asked in this House on November 1 last and then followed up with a further question on November 16. These questions related to the visit of the Prime Minister and a group of cabinet ministers, including the Secretary of State for Asia–Pacific and others, to China and to Asia.

At that time I raised concerns, in particular on November 16, with respect to the issue of Canada's support and particularly that of the Prime Minister for the Three Gorges dam in China. I am appalled that the government would support such a project which would have an enormously destructive impact not only environmentally on China, but also on its people. This project would involve displacement of over one million Chinese from the Yangtze river area.

When the Liberals were in opposition they took a very different position. The Secretary of State for Latin America and Africa said: "While I realize the building of this dam would provide Canada with substantial business opportunities, is it worth the cost? The dam will impoverish and dislocate millions".

In addition I would note that any opposition to this dam was ruthlessly suppressed in China. The authors of a 1989 book called Yangtze Yangtze, a group of distinguished Chinese officials with scientific and technical degrees, had their book banned. One of them was jailed and fired from her job and others were taken into custody.

It is appalling, as I said, that this government would support this. I am pleased that the premier of the province of British Columbia has indicated that the province of British Columbia would not participate in any way in the contracts for Three Gorges.

I also want to take this opportunity during the time of the United Nations commission on human rights to urge the Government of Canada to support in the strongest possible terms the resolution which is coming before the commission with respect to China. I would note that resolution in its draft form includes a specific reference to Tibet as well and the concerns around the very serious human rights violations in Tibet. I hope that there will not be any attempt to water down that resolution and to refuse to make reference to Tibet.

Finally, I want to note that human rights concerns continue to be a matter of great priority. I was disappointed that the Prime Minister apparently only paid lip service to these concerns during his visit to China. The premier of Nova Scotia did not even notice that he had made reference to it. Afterwards he was reminded that perhaps he had. We saw in December of last year the fact that Chinese courts have handed down terms of imprisonment of up to 20 years, terms of 20, 17, and 15 years for non–violent peaceful Chinese dissidents. This is totally unacceptable.

I expect our government to speak out. I expect our government to speak out as well with respect to the issue of East Timor at the United Nations commission on human rights and to support a strong resolution on this issue.

I welcome an assurance from the Secretary of State for Asia–Pacific that this government will come to its senses and will withdraw its support for Three Gorges and for the sale of Candu reactors.

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interest of my colleague across the floor. He brought up quite a number of issues, but today I would like to take this opportunity to respond to his concern on the Three Gorges issue.

We have to recognize that the decision by the Chinese government on the Three Gorges dam project is not based on the support of Canada. The hon. member spoke about quite a number of reasons on the negative side, but I would also like to bring the attention of the House to the positive aspects of that project.

The Chinese have begun work on that based on several reasons, one of which is the urgent need to protect some 10 million people from flooding below the dam site and also China currently uses coal based energy sources, which we all agree have a large negative impact on the environment. Hydro electricity is a cleaner source of energy. China faces critical shortfalls in electric power which hamper the creation of jobs in a disadvantaged region of China. There is a need to improve navigation on the Yangtze River so as to allow shipping to reach Chongoing, one of China's largest cities.

In a Chinese context, the Chinese government, faced with the urgency of the region's requirements, considered the solution to be both viable and optimum. It is implementing the project. That decision is not based on what Canada has decided to do.

On balance we see the contribution of Canadian companies as positive. Canada is a world leader in the environmental technologies and services sector. Canadian companies, therefore, have an important and significant contribution to make to China as it addresses the environmental aspects of this project. Their participation could introduce management and technical features that would reduce the project's negative impact. That is why the government will support Canadian firms. Their environmental practices and expertise could positively influence the project.

Also it is important to note that the Canadian power sector has identified China as a key market to bridge flagging domestic demand and to ensure its survival over the next decade. They are using a Team Canada approach to China. Their participation in the Three Gorges project could create some 35,000 jobs in Canada, many of which would be in the troubled high value added electrical industry and SME suppliers.

Canadian hydroelectric and environmental firms are among the best in the world and are therefore well placed to win contracts. However international competition will be intense. Business and the attendant jobs in Canada will only be won with strong government support.

The Deputy Speaker: I regret to inform the hon. minister that his time has expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 38 the motion to adjourn the House is now been deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

TRIBUTE TO HON. LUCIEN BOUCHARD

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all members of this House, I wish to extend a very warm welcome to the Leader of the Opposition. All members of this House and all Canadians salute the courage and determination shown by the Leader of the Opposition throughout his recent ordeal.

I also wish to pay tribute to Mrs. Audrey Bouchard and her children for their support for him during this very difficult time, which certainly played a major part in helping the opposition leader recover so quickly.

[English]

I would like to thank all Canadians, despite the differences of opinion we might have, who have shown to the Leader of the Opposition their sympathy and moral support in praying for him to recover his health in as short a time as possible.

[Translation]

Since it is one of his fondest wishes, I would like to say to the Leader of the Opposition, on behalf of all members of this House: Welcome back to the shop.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Reform members, including myself, I wish to welcome back the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean.

We parliamentarians are all professional politicians. Although, in the course of our public lives, we often express heartfelt and varied opinions on matters of public policy, we remain human beings united by our shared love of life and health and by our vulnerability to disease and tragedy.

When the hon. member became ill, all members of this House shared a feeling of solidarity because of their common concern for their colleague.

Those of us who believe that the ultimate secret of life and death rests in the hands of the Supreme Being prayed for his recovery.

When we learned that the hon. member was out of danger at last, we shared feelings of relief and gratitude.

• (1405)

It is a tribute to the hon. member's courage and determination that all members of the House put their differences aside and showed their solidarity through their concern for his recovery and well–being.

I therefore would like to express these feelings today by welcoming the hon. member back to the House and wishing him excellent health in the future.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, upon the return of the leader of the Bloc Quebecois to the House of Commons, I would like to say, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, that we are glad to see him back in good health.

The news of the devastating disease that struck the leader of the Bloc Quebecois came as a terrible shock. Beyond all our differences, compassion is the bond that unites us.

[English]

I would like to offer my best wishes to the leader of the Bloc Quebecois and to his courageous family.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Speaker: Welcome back, Lucien.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, these past two months have taught me something about this House and its members. They taught me that one can get homesick for this place.

I return here with feelings of gratitude, with pride and confidence. I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for your constant concern throughout this difficult time. I also wish to mention the courtesy and understanding shown by the Prime Minister. His heart is in the right place. I am deeply grateful to the ministers and to the other party leaders and members of all parties who supported me with their messages of encouragement and, in so doing, perpetuated a tradition of compassion that is a credit to this House. I applaud this ability to rise above the many differences we may have, even in the midst of a debate that is about the future of Canada, no less.

Also, Mr. Speaker, it should come as no surprise to you that during the anxious days that brought me these expressions of sympathy, I felt very close to all of you.

At this point I want to thank from the bottom of my heart my friends and colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois caucus. They behaved like a family that, when one of its members is hurt, summons the courage and dignity to carry on. I want to say how much I appreciate their wonderful solidarity and the tremendous job they have done during my absence.

I am also deeply grateful for the thousands of expressions of encouragement I received from my fellow citizens. I must say I felt strengthened and comforted by their prayers and best wishes.

My illness gave me first–hand knowledge of how our health care system works. I have the greatest admiration for and am deeply grateful to the doctors and other caregivers at the Saint–Luc Hospital in Montreal who saved my life and those at the rehabilitation institute in Montreal who helped me learn to walk again. Their dedication and competence have reinforced my commitment to protecting and improving our social programs.

• (1410)

[English]

And so today we answer the call of duty and again take up the mandate that was given to us by the people.

Yes, I have been looking forward to this moment since a certain day in December when technology and destiny combined to give me another chance. If the rallying cry of democracy is stand up and be counted, I respectfully ask to be counted.

I have so much to remember, the sympathy and compassion from this and every other quarter, from Quebec and from the whole of Canada, from friends and strangers alike. In such circumstances who is really a stranger? I remember a yellow rose, a gracious gesture by a gracious lady.

In our moments of anguish my family and I were not alone. This we shall never forget. Our gratitude goes to all of those who offered us their thoughts and their prayers.

We come back to this Chamber with a renewed hunger for life. Time is so precious and there is so much left to do. And so we will concentrate on the more important things and give the best we can. Quebecers and Canadians alike can expect your faithful servant to remain true to his convictions and values, for our convictions may clash, as they do and will, but we share the same values of tolerance and respect for democracy; values that are tragically in short supply in a large part of the world. Where others fight with bullets, we fight with ballots, with arguments, with facts, with emotions and it should always be with respect for those who believe differently from us.

Let us never forget our common humanity. Let us never disallow our common need to reach out to one another so that in our times of suffering, of solitude, even despair, we can take comfort in the knowledge that in spite of our differences we share the same compassion.

There will no doubt be heated exchanges in the weeks and months ahead. At the end of the day we will remember the intensity of our debates and the passion that suffused them. It is my fondest hope that we will also recall that civility prevailed and that outside this Chamber men and women of every persuasion will proudly be able to say they profoundly disagreed but they were, all of them, men and women of peace and honour.

[Translation]

I also mentioned the word pride, and indeed I am proud to be standing here with you in this House, where we were sent by our fellow citizens.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: I also used the word confidence, and indeed I have the greatest confidence in the democratic and responsible resolution of the issues before us.

I was able to observe how compassionate and generous our fellow citizens from English Canada can be. Who would not have been moved by their expressions of sympathy? I realize this does not mean English Canada will be converted to Quebec's sovereignist option, any more than I will renege on my political commitments. On the contrary, these past few weeks during which I had time to think about these issues have strengthened my sovereignist position. However, I am confident that sovereignists and federalists can discuss their options with dignity, without impugning each other's motives.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me, with the consent of the government and the other parties, these few minutes to address the House. However, after expressing these worthy sentiments, we must go back to the cut and thrust of parliamentary debate. In fact, I was a little worried earlier that the Prime Minister's kind words would have a disarming effect on me. I am aware that I will have to revert to a more robust approach in my first questions to the Prime Minister later on.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

HON. LUCIEN BOUCHARD

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to greet Lucien Bouchard on his return. We are delighted to have him in our midst again, pleased to see that he has pulled through his terrible ordeal and is resuming his place in the House of Commons. The Leader of the Opposition knows only too well that nothing is certain in this life. And yet he maintains that the referendum should not be launched unless the sovereignist option is sure to win. This, he says, is in the interest of Quebecers.

It is indeed in the interest of the entire country that a referendum be held, and as soon as possible, not to see one side or the other win, but instead to learn the position of Quebecers and resolve the issue once and for all. That is democracy. Anything else is shameful manipulation. Quebecers deserve better than that after all.

For my part, I say yes to one clear question. I say yes to a strong Quebec, I say yes to a unified Canada.

QUEBEC FEDERATION OF LABOUR

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am still moved by the return of my leader and by his speech.

Yesterday, the Quebec Federation of Labour, which has some 450,000 members, adopted a manifesto and an action plan to mobilize workers in favour of Quebec's sovereignty. I had the honour of addressing the 1,600 shop stewards present at this special assembly.

The members of the Bloc Quebecois would like to pay tribute to Bob White, president of the Canadian Labour Congress, who spoke in favour of the democratic right of Quebecers to self–determination. He stressed that a yes in the referendum should be respected by the rest of Canada.

We would like to congratulate the Quebec Federation of Labour for its commitment at this turning point in the history of the Quebec nation.

TAXATION

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Restaurant and Food Services Association has printed more than 10,000 neon yellow cards which make the important point that when taxes go up employment goes down.

The restaurant and food services industry employs more than 667,000 people in Canada. They know firsthand the devastating effect taxes can have on their businesses and jobs in Canada.

The last time the government made a tax grab with the GST the industry lost 46,000 jobs almost overnight. An Ernst & Young report concluded that two out of every three jobs lost were directly as a result of the new tax.

The restaurant and food services sector is a huge employer of students, recent immigrants and single mothers. It has been estimated that 30 per cent of those Canadians working today had their first experience in the workforce in food service. It is also an industry that depends on disposable income and is one of Canada's most labour intensive.

If taxes go up employment will go down. It is that simple. Taxes kill jobs.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on budget day Canadians will be preparing themselves for another tax increase on gasoline prices.

The Liberal government will take the responsibility of justifying these high taxes to Canadians. However consumers have already had to deal with many increases in gas prices when oil companies hiked the prices at the pumps for no reason at all. These increases are invisible taxes on consumers by the multinational oil companies and have not been justified.

The Liberal government not only condones this price gouging but encourages it. In a recent report the Bureau of Competition Policy has said that oil companies can charge whatever they want for gasoline.

Canadians need an energy pricing review commission with the power to investigate gas price increases and when unjustified roll them back. I challenge the Liberal government in the upcoming budget to get out of bed with the oil companies and give consumers a fair deal by immediately setting up an energy price review commission.

HEART MONTH

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind members of the House that February is Heart Month.

Heart disease and stroke are the number one killers in Canada of both men and women and together are responsible for the loss of 75,000 Canadian lives each year. In fact 40 per cent of all deaths in the country are due to cardiovascular disease.

The Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada tells us that the risk factors for heart disease include high blood pressure, high blood cholesterol, smoking and physical inactivity. The foundation strives to educate Canadians about these risk facts and plays an important role in the fight against heart disease.

During the month of February more than 100,000 volunteers will be canvassing in our communities to raise public awareness and funds for research and education.

Please join me in saluting the Heart and Stroke Foundation and its many volunteers for their excellent work. So, when they come knocking on your door, have a heart.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to bring good news from the port of Halifax. In 1994 revenues of the port of Halifax were up 4.7 per cent.

• (1430)

There is more good news. There was an increase of 23 per cent in container traffic in the fourth quarter of last year. Sixteen hundred vessels called at Halifax last year. That was a big increase. It included 39 cruise vessels bringing 38,000 tourists to Halifax, the home of this year's G–7 and was a 22 per cent rise over 1993.

The future is bright for the port of Halifax. Officials there predict a 15 per cent to 25 per cent increase in container business this year.

The port of Halifax is the key to economic recovery in this area. It provides 2,500 direct and 4,500 indirect jobs to Halifax.

I am sure that members of the House will join me in commending the port of Halifax on a very successful year.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to offer my firm support to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in his efforts to conserve Greenland halibut and turbot.

The European Union has launched a formal objection to the quota decision of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. It was the European Union's use of this objection procedure in the late 1980s that led to the moratoria on flatfish and cod on the tail of the Grand Banks of Newfoundland.

Even as scientific findings showed evidence of stock decline, the Spanish ignored all warnings and actually increased their fishing efforts.

The NAFO decision is the result of a vote by the world's major fishing nations: Japan, Russia, Norway, Iceland, Cuba and Canada. Its findings are based on conservation, science and traditional shares.

It is irresponsible for the European Union to play by the rules only when the rules are in its own favour. We cannot allow further destruction of Canada's fisheries resources while communities such as those in my riding of St. John's West are suffering economic devastation in the name of conservation.

KINGSTON PRISON FOR WOMEN

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the CBC's English network aired some deeply disturbing footage of the riot squad in action last April at the Kingston Prison for Women. The humiliation the six female inmates were subjected to at the hands of the male emergency response team raises some serious questions.

In his report yesterday, the correctional investigator denounced the use of excessive force against inmates. The same report completely contradicts the findings of the internal inquiry by correctional services, which condoned the acts of the emergency response team through its complacency, to the disgust of the Elizabeth Fry Society.

The Solicitor General must assure this House that the director at the prison for women who was in charge of the internal inquiry will be suspended immediately for having hidden the truth.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a strike or a lockout is looming for the nation's railways. The negotiating parties have had 13 months to reach a collective agreement on their own and they have failed.

If such a strike or lockout were to occur, the country's transportation network would grind to a halt within days. It would devastate shippers of coal, potash and newsprint, paralyse the auto industry and, as usual, leave western grain farmers footing the bill for somebody else's irresponsibility.

The cost of such a strike to our economy is just too high and the government knows this. That is why for the 14th time in the last 29 years we will have no choice but to suspend the rules of the House in order to pass emergency back to work legislation. If and when this happens it will be the second time in two years. I hope we have not already forgotten the Vancouver port strike experience.

My private member's bill, Bill C–262, offers a permanent solution to this chronic problem. Let us pass Bill C–262 so that we do not find ourselves in the same position again this year.

BANKS

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this morning four national banking institutions raised their lending rates in reaction to the Bank of Canada's rate hike yesterday to a one year high of 8.38 per cent.

Just as last week when Moody's Investors Service put Canada's AAA domestic bond rating on a credit watch, now our own institutions have shown a complete lack of understanding of our deficit problem. It is extremely shocking and saddening when our national institutions do not have the patience and presence of mind to wait for the budget.

Maybe the finance minister will slash the budget drastically to control the deficit. I fail to understand why the bogeyman of inflation created by the previous government is being resurrected once again.

• (1435)

With inflation presently running low, there is no need for higher interest rates. The increased rates will hamper job creation and hurt small businesses, as it will thousands of Canadians who have to renew their mortgages this year.

It is time for the Bank of Canada to initiate systems policies—

TRUCK SAFETY

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during a one day blitz in Toronto, 73 per cent of trucks pulled over by police forces were deemed unfit for the road and immediately taken out of service.

This appalling level of truck safety poses a serious threat to the lives of Canadians. I ask the Minister of Transport to urge his provincial colleagues to ensure high levels of regulation enforcement and, if necessary, higher fines on trucking companies to prevent loss of life and injury.

This problem exemplifies the importance of maintaining strong enforced regulations for the protection of all Canadians.

INCOME TAX

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on March 10, 1994 I brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance the report that 20 Canadian millionaires had paid less than $100 each in income tax in 1991.

I believe that the number has increased each year since. Each and every Canadian has to pay his or her fair share of taxes. How can we as members of Parliament tell our constituents that they must pay their income taxes when they see wealthy Canadians taking advantage of tax loopholes?

If we are to fight the deficit on all fronts, I hope the Minister of Finance will take the opportunity available to him to close tax loopholes for the rich. We have to let the people of Canada know that one does not receive special tax privileges because of personal wealth.

CITY OF MISSISSAUGA

Mrs. Carolyn Parrish (Mississauga West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to proudly announce a benchmark achievement by the city of Mississauga, the ninth largest city in the country and the fastest growing at half a million in population.

Mississauga led the country in 1994 in issuing almost $1 billion worth of building permits for 4,400 new residential units and 2.2 million square feet of industrial commercial floor space.

Corporate head offices continue to find Mississauga an ideal place to locate because of the attractive tax and hydro rates and the proximity to Pearson International Airport. They include Sunbeam Corporation, Siemens Electric and Mary Kay Cosmetics.

The value of these permits represents a 37 per cent total increase over the previous year and a 30 per cent increase for the industrial commercial sector.

The prosperity and phenomenal growth in Mississauga is yet one more signal that Mississaugans and Canadians are confident in the Prime Minister and the Liberal government.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Daniel Latouche, a professor of political science, set the record straight at a hearing of the Eastern Townships commission on the future of Quebec. He unequivocally stated that there are costs associated with remaining a province, especially in this era of globalization. They must also be discussed.

A no in the referendum would mean that Quebec would not gain distinct status, different from that of the other provinces. It would also mean that the rest of Canada would continue to ignore the distinct character of Quebecers, regardless of the arrangement proposed.

We must not forget that Pierre Elliot Trudeau promised renewed federalism in exchange for a no in the 1980 referendum. His government used the opportunity to quash the legitimate hopes of Quebecers. This is what the true cost of not opting for sovereignty is.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government appears to have a hearing problem. While Canadians coast to coast are saying "no new taxes", the government chooses to hear "keep on spending".

That would explain the Liberal revenue minister's statement that the government will not listen to the anti–tax protests. "Such protests", he says, "will not change the government's position on the budget".

For a month I have been circulating an anti–tax petition. Judging from the heavy response, the tax revolt is just beginning to make itself heard. It took only a month to gather anti–tax petitions with 20,000 signatures, which I will be tabling today.

Twenty thousand more Canadians from Victoria to Halifax are joining in a revolt against a government that has yet to realize that it has a spending problem, not a revenue problem.

• (1440)

The battle over the budget is just beginning. In case the front benches have their hearing aids turned down, let me repeat the message loud and clear: no more taxes.

MINING

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Monday of this week I had the occasion to be present for the opening of the 12th annual Mine Operators Conference, held in Timmins, Ontario in my riding.

Today I inform the House of the successful conclusion of the conference at Timmins. Mine managers, operators and technicians have presented papers, sold goods and services to each other and have increased the efficiency of mining today.

Over 350 delegates and 160 exhibits from all over Canada, the United States, Australia, Sweden, Finland and Pakistan were at the conference to trade ideas for the improvement of mining efficiency.

Mining is an important industry to Canadians. Last December the natural resource committee tabled a unanimous report calling on the government to take measures to help the mining industry and keep mining in Canada.

I would like to thank all participants at the conference and invite them back to northern Ontario to trade ideas and make Canada a better place for miners and the millions of Canadians and hundreds of communities that depend on mining.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the federal–provincial finance ministers' conference, we know that Ottawa will make drastic cuts in transfer payments to the provinces while deferring the impact of these cuts until next year. The federal government is trying to pass off as renewed federalism what will amount in fact to offloading its financial responsibilities.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Are we to understand that his government chose deliberately to defer the substantial cuts in transfer payments until after the Quebec referendum in order to hide from Quebecers, on the eve of the referendum, the cost of the federal government's financial withdrawal from education and health? In other words, that the federal government is holding back but will hit as soon as the referendum is over?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the Leader of the Opposition that, when we formed the government last year, we agreed with theprovinces that we would not make cuts without giving them prior notice. Under the previous government, the minister would get up on the day of the budget and announce the cuts to come into effect the following day. We said and, furthermore we promised in the red book that this brutal approach would not be repeated.

Therefore, if the Minister of Finance must cut transfers to the provinces, we will keep our promise and give the provinces fair notice before taking action.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister not admit that the block funding formula contemplated by his government, that is, consolidating all federal contributions to health and education programs into a single payment, is not a transfer of jurisdiction but a transfer of costs to the provinces?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance must assume his responsibilities, and we intend to make substantial cuts in all public administration sectors. It is not a matter of punishing anyone. On the contrary, we want to treat everyone equally. In any case, we do not know if there will be a referendum in 1995. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition can come to an agreement with Mr. Parizeau. After the date of the referendum is announced, you will know whether or not we acted with the referendum in mind.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister claim to offer flexible federalism when, in fact, while continuing to withdraw financial support for health and education programs, he tries to put the provinces in a straitjacket by forcing them to apply national standards to services that the federal government will stop funding?

[English]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when we passed the national health legislation establishing medicare for all Canadians, it was approved by everybody. Everybody agreed.

• (1445)

We do not have control over its administration. It is a provincial matter. When the programs were established we said we would help the provinces for a number of years but that once the programs were well established we might withdraw. That was the policy discussed at that time.

As far as Canada's national health system is concerned, it is very important that we keep it because Canada has the best system. In fact a few minutes ago the hon. Leader of the Opposition referred to the very good health system that Canada has.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, things are getting clearer and clearer. Last week, in this House, the Prime Minister presented his vision of a federal Canada, for the first time.

He said, in talking about the elimination of duplication, and I quote: "Duplication comes from Quebec deciding to have its own ministry of revenue collect personal income tax, unlike the other provinces... Duplication often comes from the other side".

My question is for the Prime Minister. Are we to understand from the revealing example he chose to give us that, in his vision of federalism, Quebec would be just like the other provinces and that, for example, he wants to take over from Quebec in collecting personal income tax?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that, on the contrary, we gave the province the responsibility of collecting the federal sales tax, the GST. Why could the provincial government not do the same for the federal government with regard to income tax?

As regards income tax, in the case of Ontario, only one line has been added to the tax return, and there is no provincial tax inspector for Ontario taxpayers. If Quebec wants to continue to have two systems, that is fine with me. I am making them an offer to help them save money. The minister responsible for harmonizing programs in Canada is successfully reaching agreements with the provinces in many areas. The only province that is not interested in discussing the elimination of duplication is the province of Quebec.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not agree that his so called plan for decentralization to the provinces is not eliminating any duplication, since the federal government never intended withdrawing from areas of provincial jurisdiction, and, in each province, there will always be two departments of health and two departments of human resources all paid for by taxpayers' money?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are making offers to the provinces right now. I was speaking with the Premier of British Columbia a few minutes ago. We were discussing the possibility of harmonizing certain existing programs.

The other provinces are co–operating in trying to eliminate duplication. What is unfortunate is that only Quebec systematically wants to maintain duplication.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance attacked Reform's plan to balance the budget in three years.

The minister made unfounded comments about its impacts in a futile attempt to divert public attention away from the shortcomings of his own budget targets. Under the Liberal fiscal plan, over $100 billion will be added to the federal debt. Interest payments will amount to about one–third of the federal budget by the end of this Parliament.

Will the Prime Minister explain to seniors and to other Canadians what paying $50 billion a year in interest will do to the social programs on which they depend?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the leader of the third party mentioned old age pensioners. His document said he wanted to cut $3 billion from that program. Reform has to realize that new people come on the payroll every year because other people reach the age of 65. The leader of the Reform Party cannot stop that.

• (1450)

It costs almost $1 billion more every year. If he wants to cut $3 billion from what we have today, he will have to exclude the people who come on the payroll in the next two years. He will have to pay them another $2 billion or cut another $2 billion. The hon. member made a little mistake in one day of $2 billion.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister avoids the hard question of how the government is going to live paying $50 billion a year in interest. At the end of the day under the federal Liberal plan, the deficit will still be $25 billion a year, the debt will be over $600 billion and the government will have even less money than it has today to fund social programs.

Why does the government not screw up its courage and simply tell Canadians that the real threat to social programs is its inability to control the deficit and the debt?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is the first time in a long time, and I have a lot of witnesses on this side of the House, that a government has presented a budget, as we did last February, and has met every target it set.

It is very easy to make promises you know you cannot keep. When I saw the budget prepared by the Reform Party this week, somebody said that it was back to the future. It has nothing to do with the reality of today. On the old age pension program alone, the Reform Party made a mistake of $2 billion.

We will meet our target. We will be at 3 per cent of GDP next year. It is the first time a government in Canada has met its target and we will meet it. Do not worry about it.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government has a red book that is symbolic of the red ink that flows from its policies.

Last fall the finance minister presented a grey book which is symbolic of these grey compromises between spending cuts and tax increases. Now it is abundantly clear that the government lacks what it takes to balance a budget, just like Mulroney and Wilson in 1984.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that the colour scheme for the budget that his minister will deliver next Monday will be pale yellow?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member only has to wait until Monday. I hope he will support all the cuts we will be proposing.

I would like to have his commitment right now that his party will support all the cuts we will make. It would be easy because they would turn around and say: "You should not do this or that". It is going to be a tough budget. I hope Reform Party members will be able to do in this House what they love to say outside it.

FEDERAL PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The government plans to cut 45,000 employees from the federal public service over three years and, to this end, intends to move unilaterally to introduce legislation eliminating job security for public servants.

Can the minister responsible for the public service explain why his government has chosen to push aside the proposals made by the largest union representing nearly 70 per cent of federal public servants, without having first exhausted every possible alternative through free collective bargaining?

• (1455)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has done excellent work on this issue. For weeks now, there have been discussions with every union affected. Sixteen unions out of 17 have found these proposals reasonable. And even in the union which opposes them, we are told opinion is greatly divided. People understand very well that what the President of the Treasury Board has offered as a solution is totally reasonable and logical, given the difficult circumstances facing the government at this time.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what guarantee can the minister give people that laying off thousands of public servants will not as in the past give rise to a substantial increase in contracting–out which does not necessarily allow for savings but which is highly conducive to government patronage?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives us no joy to be downsizing the public service. However, as a result of the programs and services that we must cut in order to meet our deficit reduction targets, there are people we will have to ask to leave.

We will give them every opportunity to find other jobs within the public service before they are put on layoff status. Certainly in terms of contracting out, I can assure the hon. member that it and temporary help and other means will be explored as a way of keeping our employees who want to stay before we allow for additional contracting out and other provisions.

We value the public service. We value the kind of service that is provided to Canadians by the people we employ.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if yesterday's announcement of public service layoffs was designed to quell fears and rumours, it was a dismal failure. Today the government has rubbed salt in the wounds of the public service by increasing the size of the cabinet just one day after announcing 45,000 job cuts in the public service.

The Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal put together a top level team of managers to tell him where to make cuts in the public service. Did he also put together a team of frontline workers to tell him where to make appropriate cuts in management?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that members of the third party speak from both sides of their mouths. On the one hand they ask us to reduce the expenditures of government; on the other hand they complain when we do exactly that by reducing the size of the public service.

What we have done with the public service is in fact the best treatment that could be given. We have introduced the possibility for them to have either early retirement or cash outs. We have made it much easier for civil servants who cannot be employed any more to leave the public service in a humane way.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, obviously we have a problem with a growing cabinet in a high level of top heavy government at a time when it is making cuts at the bottom and in the front lines.

For instance 20 per cent of all public servants, that is 48,000 people, make more than $50,000 a year. There are 48,000 managers looking over the shoulders of the people who actually deliver the services.

Will the government tell us the proportion of management versus frontline cutbacks that we can see in this upcoming budget so that we can make sure that we are hammering the management, not just gutting the frontline services to Canadians?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the one addition to this side of the House is worth all of the ones and more on that side of the House.

With respect to the downsizing we are going to be carefully monitoring the situation at the different levels. If there is any disproportionate amount at any given level, then certainly we will take corrective action. We are focusing on programs and services, not on people. As a consequence, people at all levels will be part of the downsizing.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

The Privy Council published a document, which the Financial Post obtained, asking all businesses to use symbols of Canadian unity in their advertisements. The document recommends several guidelines that businesses can follow to defend the federal regime.

• (1500)

Is it to be understood that this government, which is subsidizing the Council for Canadian Unity in order to obtain a list of those who are taking part in the regional commissions on sovereignty, is now enlisting businesses, with the help of the Privy Council, to lead a campaign of fear reminiscent of the one Quebecers were subjected to in 1980?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not see how the opposition can criticize letting social groups express themselves freely, when they have wasted $5 million of their and our taxpayers' money on regional commissions whose only aim is to disseminate sovereignty propaganda.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I was talking about businesses that have contracts with the government. The $5 million is five to six times less than what the Spicer circus cost us two to three years ago.

What assurances can the minister give this House that the government is not compiling a register of businesses co–operating in this effort, for some future consideration?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, I find the opposition's questions very out of place. We are simply helping social and business groups in Quebec who wish to get information on the costs of separation. We are not intimidating banks and financial institutions which are not on our side.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources.

The country is ripe for a massive shut down in the railways, jeopardizing significant sectors of the economy. I notice he is turning to the hon. minister. We are not quite sure who is in charge there right now.

Will the minister assure us that the government will not present legislation to this House that will prevent the use of replacement workers during a labour strike and that there will be no prohibition of management employees, regardless of where they are located, replacing striking workers?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.) Mr. Speaker, concerning the problems at CN, CP and VIA, the conciliator's report was sent to the parties this morning. We earnestly hope they will sit down and discuss their differences. We truly hope that the parties themselves will find a solution. After all, they know the industry.

As for the issue of replacement workers, we are looking into the situation and will report as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the initiation of the hon. minister to this House has been in answer to a question, but it was no answer, it was another approach.

Since the 1950s the federal government used back to work legislation as the last resort in transportation related labour disputes. Each time it had significant costs to the Canadian economy as a whole.

When will the ministry acknowledge that neither back to work legislation nor anti–scab legislation adequately protects the economy from bitter transportation strikes and when will she seek effective impartial alternatives like binding final arbitration as a position?

• (1505)

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last week in the House, the Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec confirmed that his strategy for regional development would be based on providing assistance to small business. After cutting the budget of the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, the minister indicated that the new approach to helping small business would consist in providing consulting services.

Since the FORD–Q no longer has a budget for providing financial assistance to small business, will the Prime Minister admit that the Department of Industry, in other words, the minister responsible for regional economic development in Ontario, will now be responsible for the federal strategy for regional development in Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for regional development in Quebec is the Minister of Finance. Obviously, the Minister of Finance has a very good working relationship with the Minister of Industry.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister agree that, as far as regional development is concerned, the FORD–Q, which no longer has a budget, has become an empty shell and will only be used to promote the visibility of the federal government in the regions and to set national standards for regional development, while ignoring the priorities of the Quebec government in this respect?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, throughout Quebec, people are very pleased to note the presence of federal agencies that are there to help them.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Mr. Ian Murray (Lanark—Carleton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

The minister said he would let us know on or before budget day what he was doing about reforming the MPs' pension plan. The budget is next Monday. Can the minister tell the House if he has made any progress toward honouring his commitment to reform MPs' pensions?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, mighty soon has arrived. The government has agreed to a package of reforms on MP pension plans and the bill will be introduced by the end of April as an amendment to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Further information on the details will be available for members of the House later this afternoon.

The government will live up to its red book commitments. It will end double dipping for both MPs and members of the other house. It will put a minimum age in place on the basis of the Lapointe commission recommendation of age 55. It will provide for members to have a one–time only opting out—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: I would quit while I was ahead if I were you.

CORRECTIONS

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last year I was asked by constituents to investigate whether male prison guards stripped female prisoners during the recent misguided and ill conceived raid in the prison for women. I was assured at that time that no male prison guard took part in the stripping of female prisoners and that only female officers were present.

My question is for the Solicitor General. Now that a videotape clearly shows that male officers were present, will this minister please tell me why his department officials lied to a member of Parliament?

• (1510)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have already informed the House, we have two contradictory reports, one from the correctional service internal investigation and one from the correctional investigator.

Because they differ in facts and interpretation, we are convening a further independent inquiry. That will throw the light we are seeking on this difficult matter.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was assured at that time there were no male guards involved in that.

The minister stated that his government would bring honesty and integrity back to the dealings between government and Canadians.

How can Canadians trust that the results of any investigation by this minister's department will not be more lies instead of what Canadians expect?

The Speaker: My colleagues, many times the issues that we are very much seized with in this House cause us to use words a little stronger than we might ordinarily use.

I wonder if I could prevail on the hon. member for Wild Rose to withdraw the word "lies" and perhaps use another one, to rephrase his question.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I will do my best but that is really tough because I do not know what else to call these things.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: As tough as it is going to be, would the member please withdraw the word "lies".

Mr. Thompson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "lies".

Will the minister assure this House that in the future when the officials from his department are asked questions by members of Parliament we can expect to get the facts and not a bunch of fiction?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will seek further information about who told what to the hon. member.

I hope that in future he will also refrain from using fiction in his questions.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last Monday's federal–provincial meeting on greenhouse gases ended in a resounding failure. Despite the commitments it made at the Rio summit in 1992 and despite the electoral promises in the red book, Canada is stating openly that it cannot do its part in the worldwide effort to reduce greenhouse gases.

While Quebec has already achieved its objectives of stabilizing greenhouse gas emissions, how does the minister justify Canada's preparing to default on its international commitments because of a lack of political will on the part of the federal government and of the rest of Canada?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said last week. Quebec has done exactly what the other provinces have done. Through its minister of the environment, Quebec promised, at our meeting in Toronto, that it would have a Cabinet meeting in order to get an action plan to us by March.

I have not seen this action plan, because none has been forthcoming. I am waiting for Quebec to let us know its stabilization objectives. The government of Canada has its own areas of jurisdiction, and I can assure you that we will attain and exceed the objectives of our action plan.

Here is where we have problems. There are a number of jurisdictions we cannot encroach on. We cannot force a provincial government, like the government of Alberta, for example, to do more than it wants to.

• (1515)

We are, however, doing our part and are patiently awaiting Quebec's action plan, which the government has not yet disclosed, and Cabinet not yet approved, according to the press release issued this week by Mr. Brassard.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Minister of the Environment that Quebec has done its homework. So you do yours.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to always address the Chair.

Mrs. Guay: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Rather than give in to pressure from the oil industry lobby, would she perhaps agree to follow Quebec's example and ensure that the rest of Canada honours its international obligations in fighting the greenhouse effect?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may not have received the Parti Quebecois' press release. I will read it to her: "Issued in Quebec City at 2.42 p.m. on February 20, Quebec's plan of action will soon be submitted to Cabinet for approval". It has not been approved yet, and we are impatiently waiting for it, because it is not only a question of stabilization, but much more.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, HIV has taken a recent jump in the Ottawa area mostly in women, mostly in new arrivals to Canada. Does the health minister think it would make any sense to check immigrants for HIV?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we have mentioned in the House of Commons in the last number of days, all immigrants to Canada undergo the two checks of security and health in addition to the point system.

In the majority of cases where individuals are found to be HIV positive they are refused entry into Canada.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, HIV is an invisible disease; it cannot be seen. We screen for TB. We screen for hepatitis. We even screen for parasites. Why would we not screen for AIDS?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question of health checks has probably not been reviewed in the last 30–odd years.

At the end of last year the government said that one of the more important reviews immigration would be undertaking was an update and review of how health checks were done and for which diseases checks ought to be done automatically.

However, with all respect to the member of Parliament, I think we need to do the review in a sensible and sensitive way. I do not think anybody should rush irresponsibly into this subject matter.

It is being undertaken. It is being done seriously. It is being done the right way, rather than simply playing politics and exploiting diseases for particular gains.

FISHERIES

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries.

The European Union is formally objecting to the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization's imposition of quotas for turbot fishing in the North Atlantic. It may encourage European Union member countries to ignore the NAFO limits.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McWhinney: Members can listen because it affects the west coast too.

Last year, when a similar problem arose on the Pacific coast, the minister took action against U.S. salmon fishing vessels and induced the United States to return to the negotiating table.

Will the minister consider perhaps exercising similar friendly persuasion on the Atlantic coast?

• (1520)

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I think the member's expertise in the area of international law is acknowledged by everyone in the House.

The member is correct that last year we had some difficulties on both the west coast with respect to salmon and on the east coast with respect to Icelandic scallop. Canada took direct action and action by way of negotiations to try to resolve our differences.

This year Canada's jurisdictional rights over Icelandic scallop is acknowledged by the United States, not challenged. This year we have completed the negotiation of a successful agreement governing the transit of Yukon salmon as a consequence of aggressive action last year. This year we are back at the table negotiating on Pacific salmon.

We much prefer to talk. We much prefer to negotiate. We will go to the nth degree to settle our differences by agreement. However we warn all those who are listening that we will not sit and talk while the last fish is being caught.

FIREARMS REGISTRATION

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice stated on Monday that he was certain the legislation respecting firearms registration could be enforced in aboriginal territories just like everywhere else in Canada.

Since even Statistics Canada census takers claim they cannot carry out their work in aboriginal territory, how can the minister maintain that it will be so easy to register all firearms in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been engaged from the outset in discussions with the aboriginal leadership and indeed the discussions continue.

I have every confidence the system of registration of firearms that will be considered and passed by the House will apply and be effective across the country in enhancing community safety in all communities, including the aboriginal communities.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, based on leaked information surrounding the Nishga land claim in northwest B.C., which includes a settlement offer of $125 million and 1,900 square kilometres of land, I understand the negotiations also include a federal offer for a treaty protected commercial fishery. This would provide a government guaranteed industry forever as opposed to a commercial industry.

Could the minister confirm that no commercial fishery will be constitutionally entrenched under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Nishga are probably the most patient first nation in Canada.

In 1903 they started their claim, could not get funding and did it with their own money. They won their case in 1973. They have been waiting 22 years for a settlement. Everything on the table is being negotiated. Nothing is being taken off the table because it might cause the hon. member some discomfort.

I think his time would be better spent if he got behind the Nishga who are in the constituency of one of the Reform critics and help them get through this very difficult time.

MONETARY POLICY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

It is clear the government is prepared to break collective agreements with public servants and to block transfers to undermine social and health programs in the country. It is clear that we could get rid of a large number of civil servants and cut social programs and known governmental organizations but a 1 per cent to 2 per cent increase in the interest rate would wipe out any of those savings.

What is the Deputy Prime Minister's government prepared to do to finally address monetary policy and have the Bank of Canada really focus on keeping interest rates under control and below what they are now?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we intend to do that on Monday.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Scooping is the practice of unlicensed private drivers stealing business from hundreds of taxi cab and limousine drivers who are legally licensed to operate from Pearson International Airport.

• (1525)

Will the Solicitor General take measures to control this theft of an estimated $6.5 million in business and put an end to these airport pirates?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this difficult situation involves a matter of legal interpretation. I understand that the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Transport and their officials are working to find a solution. I hope it will be developed before too long.

I would be happy to work with them in arriving at this solution because I know how much distress is being caused by the situation outlined by my hon. friend.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague, the government House leader, to indicate which legislation will be considered in the next few days.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the question today because, as the House knows, our only business tomorrow will be to hear the President of the United States address a joint meeting of both Houses in this Chamber at three o'clock in the afternoon.

I might say also that the debate today will be on third reading of Bill C–37, the Young Offenders Act amendments. I have already said what we are going to be doing tomorrow.

On Friday the business will be second reading of Bill C–69, the electoral boundaries bill; followed if necessary by Bill C–37; followed by resumption of second reading debate of Bill C–69, the firearms bill.

On Monday morning of next week, the House will resume wherever it left off on Friday. However, as we already know, at 4.30 p.m. the Minister of Finance will make the annual budget presentation.

On Tuesday and Wednesday of next week the House will continue the budget debate.

On Thursday and Friday of next week the House will consider second reading of a bill respecting borrowing authority.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of last week the House will recall that I rose on a question of privilege to request that the House allow for additional printing of Bill C–68, the firearms legislation, again called for debate on Friday of this week.

I was told at that time that on Tuesday of this week a decision would be reached concerning the additional printing of copies of Bill C–68 for members of Parliament who require the bill to properly inform their constituents.

I have been informed informally that a decision has been reached. I have been told informally that decision means members of Parliament can have a measly 10 extra copies of the bill.

I would like to know if the House or a member of the government could confirm that in fact that decision has been reached and, if indeed the decision means 10 copies, I would like the opportunity to protest the decision to the House.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as spokesperson for the Board of Internal Economy I wish to inform members of the House that the board has taken a decision to provide—I know it is a limited quantity—10 copies of the bill kit to all members of Parliament.

I must as well inform the House that bill kits are worth approximately $20 each. Even that small quantity, as the House appreciates, results in a considerable expenditure that could range in the area of $400 per member of Parliament. Therefore it is a very large expenditure for the House.

• (1530)

Finally, it is my understanding that the Library of Parliament traditionally publishes notes. These notes are available to members of Parliament. They are referred to as bill summaries, and when the summaries are prepared they can be photocopied by members. That is not expensive and they can be presented to all and sundry.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, on that confirmation I wish to lodge a protest on behalf of many members of the House.

Nothing could be more important to the public than the opportunity to read the words that are contained in a bill before the House. I am not asking for the bill kits. I am asking for the opportunity to go to the printing office of the House of Commons to have a number of copies printed. This would not be the $22 that the board has determined this would cost.

It is imperative that all Canadians have access to the bills of the House. As a member of Parliament, I would like to supply my constituents with a bill presented in this Chamber.

Mr. Boudria: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I should have mentioned that members can order extra copies through their operational budgets. I recognize this has limitations because it involves expenditures for each member of Parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I think the matter is quite clear to all members of the House.

I thank the hon. government whip for responding and I thank the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake for bringing the issue back to the House following his original intervention some days ago.

At this point I would indicate to the House that if the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake wishes to choose another route to continue to raise this issue, I am sure as a well experienced parliamentarian he will find that mechanism and that route. For the time being the matter is deemed closed.

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 63rd report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the membership of committees.

If the House gives its consent I intend to move concurrence in the 63rd report later this day.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–307, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Copyright Act (profit from authorship respecting a crime).

• (1535)

He said: Mr. Speaker, my bill would amend the Criminal Code and the Copyright Act to prohibit a criminal from profiting by selling, authorizing or authoring the story of a crime.

If a person is convicted of an indictable offence under the Criminal Code, any moneys he or she may have made or may make in the future from the creation of a work based on the crime would be deemed proceeds of crime subject to seizure by the crown.

Included would be moneys paid to the convicted person for the authorship of books, articles, screen plays, recordings, et cetera. Also covered would be moneys paid for the criminal's contribution to the creation of such a work, for example, getting paid to tell a story to a news program or the joint authorship of a book.

The bill further amends the Copyright Act to provide that the copyright in any work principally based on the crime where the work is created, prepared or published by or in collaboration with the convicted person becomes the property of the crown.

In countries that have signed the Berne convention on copyright, Canada could enforce its copyright ownership of the work, including preventing the sale and other distribution of the work and applying to seize any profits, the principle being a criminal should not receive a dime for committing a crime.

ADM AGRI–INDUSTRIES LTD. OPERATIONS ACT

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–308, an act to provide the resumption of production activities at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a bill entitled "an act to provide the resumption of production activities at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd". The objective of this bill is to resolve the labour conflict between ADM, formerly Ogilvie Flour Mills Ltd., and the national union of employees of Ogilvie Flour Mills Ltd.

The company and the union are presently engaged in bargaining to renew the collective agreement which expired on January 31, 1992 and applies to some 150 employees of the milling industry. Realizing that no agreement could be reached with the help of the arbitrator appointed by the Minister of Human Resources Development, the parties faced a strike or lockout.

Union members began the strike on June 6, 1994. A federal mediator met with the parties on several occasions to help them but, unfortunately, little progress was made. During that time, the company continued operating using replacement workers to carry out the work of bargaining unit members.

In tabling this bill today, I would like to put an end to this dispute and conflict.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I was going to introduce a private member's bill on behalf of the hon. member for Red Deer. I would like to proceed with it if I could.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would ask then for unanimous consent for the member for Lethbridge to introduce the bill on behalf of the member for Red Deer.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT

Mr. Ray Speaker (for Mr. Thompson) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–309, an act to amend the Access to Information Act (disclosure of results of public opinion polls).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to introduce the bill on behalf of the member for Red Deer. This bill, an act to amend the Access to Information Act, which calls for the disclosure of results of public opinion polls, is a very important bill. It is important because it will demonstrate the commitment of Parliament to open government based on principles of accountability and transparency.

● (1540)

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I cannot find the bill on the Notice Paper. Has notice of introduction of this bill been given?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I have received information from the Table that it might be Motion No. 28.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a slight difficulty on the Order Paper for Private Members' Business since tomorrow is not a normal sitting day and there will be no private members' hour.

The hon. member for St. Albert has graciously agreed to allow his item, No. 2 on today's Order Paper, to be dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence. Therefore, the private members' hour will proceed as usual today and on Friday, No. 3 on today's Order Paper, in the name of the hon. member for Skeena, would be the item for discussion in private members' hour.

I would like to thank the hon. member for St. Albert for agreeing to do this. It is very kind of him. I think there would be consent in the House to allow that item to be dropped to the bottom in accordance with his wishes and to preserve the order of the other private members' hours for the next couple of weeks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of a group of fellow citizens, I want to table a petition regarding euthanasia. The petitioners would like Parliament to ask Canadian doctors to continue saving lives instead of ending them.

They would also like Parliament to implement an act prohibiting assisted suicide in Canada. In addition, they ask that this legislation not be amended to make active or passive euthanasia legal.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions. The first is on behalf of the Minister of Natural Resources, a petition from Edmonton calling upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, from my own riding I have a petition in which the petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the provisions in the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that no change be made in the law.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, another petition from my riding requests that Parliament not amend the human rights code dealing with sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, another petition concerns changing the Criminal Code to prohibit assisted suicides. The petitioners are opposed to that.

SEX OFFENDERS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition making the safety of our children a priority. The petitioners request that changes be made to the charter of rights to enable residents to be notified when repeat sex offenders are released into the community.

JUSTICE

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition with over 1,000 signatures calling on the government to introduce legislation that will ensure that individuals cannot use the intoxication defence to avoid prosecution for the commission of a crime.

My constituents are sending the message loud and clear. It is time for a change in the law. I wholly agree with my constituents.

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by residents of Ottawa, Nepean, Gloucester and Bristol, Quebec reminding the House that 38 per cent of the national highway system has fallen below accepted standards. Mexico and the United States are upgrading their national highway systems. The national highway policy study identified job creation, economic development, national unity, saving lives, avoiding injuries, lower congestion, lower costs and better international competitiveness as benefits of the national highway program.

They call upon Parliament to urge the government to support all measures that will make the national highway system upgrading possible.

INTOXICATION AS A DEFENCE IN RAPE CASES

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I have the honour of tabling in the House two petitions asking the government to look into intoxication as a defence in rape cases.

[English]

The petitioners representing the areas of Pickering, Ajax and Whitby call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code to ensure the excuse of extreme intoxication is never again used.

I support this petition.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions. The first is from the Toronto area and calls on Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada and the Young Offenders Act to provide for heavier penalties for those convicted of violent crime, specifically young offenders.

I am glad to note that our government is doing something about that.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition prays and requests that Parliament not amend the Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

This is signed by quite a number of people from in and around my riding in Scarborough.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the final petition is also from in and around my riding in Scarborough, praying that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

It goes without saying I agree with all three petitions.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition duly certified by the Clerk of Petitions on behalf of 171 constituents of Saanich—Gulf Islands, specifically North and South Pender Islands.

The petitioners humbly pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes, and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I present two petitions on behalf of my constituents from New Westminster—Burnaby and other residents of the greater Vancouver area.

In the first petition, 80 want it to be known that physicians in Canada should be kept working to save lives, not end them. They pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously, and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the second petition the signators call upon Parliament to immediately add sexual orientation to the list of grounds protected under the Canadian Human Rights Act, and further amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to ensure that the legislation protects our relationships and our families.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting today two petitions signed by 193 of the constituents of Prince George—Peace River.

They feel that no amount of gun control has ever succeeded in preventing criminals from acquiring guns for illegal means. Therefore, they ask Parliament to support laws that punish criminals using firearms and to support, recognize and protect the rights of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms and abolish any existing gun control laws that have proven to be ineffective.

I fully endorse these petitions.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a few petitions to present today. The first one is from Helene Windship of North Vancouver and 115 others requesting that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act.

The second petition is signed by Rene Kosak of North Vancouver and 25 others asking that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and limit federal spending with a taxpayer protection act.

The third petition is signed by D. A. Reece of North Vancouver and 30 others requesting that the government reduce spending instead of increasing taxes.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth petition is signed by Sheila Thompson of North Vancouver and 25 others asking that Parliament amend the Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

The fifth petition is signed by Margaret Dale of North Vancouver and 60 others requesting that Parliament not pass Bill C–41 with section 718.2 as presently written and in any event not to include the undefined phrase sexual orientation, as the behaviour people engage in does not warrant special considerations in Canadian law.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the final petition has 198 signatures, starting with Ronald Wells of Burnaby, and most of the others also live in Burnaby, asking that the government not increase taxes but reduce government spending and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

Furthermore, the Deputy Prime Minister promised to resign if the GST had not been abolished within one year and she has not yet done so.

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of tabling several petitions signed by people from four municipalities in my riding. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ask the government to abandon its plan to introduce voice mail systems for seniors, given that seniors are naturally more at a loss when faced with voice mail technology.

These people are from Saint–Mathieu, Saint–Cyprien, Trois–Pistoles and Saint–Jean–de–Dieu. I extend my sympathy to the citizens of Saint–Jean–de–Dieu, who lost their mayor, Mrs. Rioux, this week, and to the Rioux family.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. The first is part of my initiative on day 13 to present petition 13 which is the desire of constituents to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson. April 11, 1995 is the date set for the parole hearing.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

• (1555)

TAXATION

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is signed by 106 people living in Alberta. These people are against the taxation of dental plan benefits.

These petitioners believe that such a taxation will prove to be a discouragement to those seeking preventative dental treatment. They pray that Parliament not betray their trust by taxing health.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table two petitions in this House today, both of which I support.

The first petition calls upon Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition asks that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

TAXATION

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present two petitions in accordance with Standing Order 36.

The first is from petitioners in the Lesser Slave Lake—Westlock area in my riding. They request simply that the hon. finance minister not increase our net taxes in this year's budget.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners request that Parliament support laws that will severely punish all criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime, support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the rights of law-abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms, support legislation that will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have proven not to be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex as to be ineffective and/or unenforceable.

I concur with the petitioners.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today I have three petitions all dealing with the same subject matter regarding gun legislation.

My constituents from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt call on Parliament to oppose further legislation for firearms acquisition and possession and to provide strict guidelines for the mandatory sentence for use or possession of a firearm in the commission of a violent crime. There are 309 signatures on these three petitions which adds to a total of 1,839 of my constituents who have signed this petition to date.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present three petitions to the House today. Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to present to the House a petition signed by the constituents of Lincoln which reads: "The courts of Canada have deemed that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies to all people in Canada regardless of status. We request that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms apply to Canadian citizens and people of landed immigrant status only".

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling a second petition requesting that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relations.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of tabling a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which asks that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide are enforced vigorously and to make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

TAXATION

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do thank you for the exercise that I was able to get during this period. It was quite invigorating to be on my feet this often.

During the past month or so it has been my pleasure to distribute this petition which has been signed by over 20,000 people from Victoria to Halifax; 9,000 of these people are from my own constituency of Fraser Valley East.

The petitioners call upon the government to take notice that they are already overburdened with taxation due to high government spending. Whereas the government is considering tax increases in the next federal budget, the petitioners pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act.

Obviously these petitions are easy to get people to sign and continue to flood into my office. It is a pleasure to present them on behalf of Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The good news for the hon. member for Fraser Valley East is that he has to sign the back of each and every one of those.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Jean-Paul Marchand (Québec-Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I placed Question No. 93 on the Order Paper on October 19. It should not be so difficult to come up with a response since the question was tabled on October 19, over four months ago. Normally, as you know, such questions must be answered within 45 days. Despite what the hon. member said, I know full well that this is not a complicated question. The data requested is well documented.

Knowing the minister responsible for this department, I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, that the delay in answering this question is part of the minister's strategy of silence. They are interfering with access to information and making it increasingly difficult. That was my experience with this minister and I am convinced—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I do not think this is a point of order as such.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member—I think it was on Monday and also last Friday— the government considered his representations. We are in the process of drafting a response to this question. I am certain that there are people now working on the response.

Mr. Marchand: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, I am sure, because I made inquiries regarding this question on Monday before the hon. member raised his point of order, and I am certain that we will soon have a response for the hon. member, which I will table here in this House.
