Once again, I thank the hon. member for raising this issue ad nauseam. I am delighted he is able to pursue it in this way. I look forward to having the response soon, as I indicated the other day.

I request that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed from February 20 consideration of the motion that Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C–37, which concerns young offenders, because this is a very important and very revealing bill. If we look at all the aspects of this bill, basically, it contains all the elements of a debate on social values.

As you know, Quebec is involved in a process that is leading up to sovereignty, and often people wonder why we in Quebec are doing this. People wonder what kind of society we want in Quebec. Well, this is a good example of the kind of legislation Quebec wants to avoid, the kind of legislation that does not reflect tendencies in Quebec at all. As long as Quebec remains in Canada, however, we will never be able to introduce legislation that, in my opinion, would be fairer and more equitable than Bill C–37.

When I say this could develop into a debate on social values, I mean that, when we talk about young offenders, we talk about young people, we talk about young people in our society and we also talk about violence. These are two subjects that go to the very heart of a society and reflect what is wrong with society. When young people commit violent crimes or commit suicide or are extreme in the way they act, it is because there is something very wrong with society.

It is symptomatic and also reflects all the problems besetting society. We cannot consider the issue of young offenders in isolation. We cannot isolate young people's problems as we would do in the case of transportation or more technical problems. We are talking strictly about the human, fundamental values in society. We cannot isolate this from the fact that we have poverty and unemployment, for instance, some of the factors by which society is defined. We cannot consider the problem in isolation. We cannot find the cause because there is no single cause.

An issue like that of young offenders must be approached with an open mind. We must consider what society is to us as well as our attitude to society and our attitude to justice within that society. We cannot take a short term view of this issue.

If we are to deal with the question of young offenders, we must have a comprehensive vision of society, a long term vision. Young offenders are a very serious problem that goes to the very heart of our society.

Once Quebec is sovereign, it will be a small and, I think, well integrated society. I think it will be able to come up with a real solution. In fact, the current legislation in Quebec that deals with young offenders is more advanced than what is being proposed by the federal government. I have the impression that a sovereign Quebec will be able to pursue this approach, to deal with the problem as we will deal with other problems, and that it will have a more enlightened sense of justice than what we see in Bill C–37.

I would say that, as long as Quebec is a part of Canada, we will never find a constructive way to deal with the problem of young offenders, because Bill C–37 is an attempt to respond to the demands of people from the West, people who have a different perspective and take a different approach to the problem.

Bill C–37 is an attempt to respond to their concerns and their way of dealing with the problem. And consequently, this creates a problem for Quebec. It prevents us from going ahead with our own strategy.

As long as Quebec stays in Canada, there will be a jurisdictional tug of war, on this issue as on many others, because of the difference in vision. In this case, there is a very obvious difference between Western Canada and Quebec. Our two approaches are diametrically opposed.

This bill, which is an attempt to strike a balance, to respond to the demands of the West, will prevent the Quebec system from going ahead. It will be a waste of time and effort, it will not solve the problem, as I have been trying to explain, and will provide no remedy at all for the problem of young offenders. It is an exercise in futility and a waste of money, time and effort. I do not see anything constructive in Bill C–37.

In fact, the bill itself focuses particularly on young people 16 and 17 years of age, who are charged with serious crimes involving violence, such as murder. It would mean that these young people could be brought before adult courts. They can be sent to youth courts, but with this bill, they could be tried in adult courts.

If young people are tried in youth courts, the sentences will be harsher. The maximum sentence for murder will increase from five to ten years. The qualifying periods for parole will increase, parole will be harder to obtain, and the records of young offenders will be retained longer.

In short, this bill imposes stiffer sentences on young persons, particularly those who are 16 and 17 years of age. This is the spirit of this bill: impose harsher sentences on young offenders. But violence among young people is the work of a few. They do not represent a particular trend in society. They represent a very small proportion of young people—a few dozen.

This bill deals with a few exceptional cases, which do not represent any sort of trend in society. There is no distressing increase in violence by 16 and 17 year olds. The figures over some 15 years in this area reveal no sort of increase.

Until 1992, there was a five per cent increase in crimes involving young persons, but since then, the figure has been more like 2 per cent. This is the general crime rate among young people. This increase compared with the increase in population reveals no startling change.

All of the experts agree that the rate of serious crimes among young people, such as murder, manslaughter, aggravated assault, has remained stable or has decreased in the past decade. This is what the statistics tell us about the number of violent crimes among young people.

We cannot even say that violent crime has increased among young people, but we can say that there have been a few cases, the exception. For example, the two boys in England who killed a child of five or six, or other cases we can cite as examples of sensationalism, which were given considerable attention on television and in the newspapers.

Bill C–37 is in response to this sort of sensationalism or this perception. We are not dealing with a critical problem for society. There is no crisis; violence is not really on the rise among young people. This bill is trying to deal with very exceptional cases.

That is the nature of the problem with this bill. I would like now to address the consequences for young persons of calling for harsher sentences at this time. The consequences are, to be sure, the same as for older criminals, that is people in adult penitentiaries. The consequences are the same and every study by every expert confirms unequivocally that the sentence offenders receive has no influence whatsoever on the crime rate.

Imposing sentences of 10, 15 or 20 years will not reduce crime. Studies show this clearly. Moreover, in looking at the situation, it seems that the more sentences are increased, the greater the number of offenders. Go visit Canadian penitentiaries. I have had the opportunity to visit every penitentiary in Canada, from Dorchester to the B.C. maximum security prison, including the Saskatchewan maximum security institution. I worked for the Canadian Penitentiary Service and visited all Canadian penitentiaries and, looking at what goes on inside them. Considering the studies and statistics, one realizes that, once a person is sent to a Canadian federal penitentiary, there is a four in five chance that he will return a second time and the odds increase.

Canadian penitentiaries are training grounds for criminals, quite simply, and this is very easy to understand. If you go to Dorchester or any other prison, you will see how the law of violence rules these places. When they get out, people are already trained for violence, especially in Canadian penitentiaries as they were in my day, where there was no training of any kind, no rehabilitation or, if there was any, they were silly things such as programs to make mail bags.

Yes, there were a few little programs here and there, for training, education, but generally speaking there was no training, no rehabilitation program whatsoever. Prisoners were left to their own devices and when released from prison, the situation was clearly disastrous. There are organizations which try to help prisoners after their release, such as the Elizabeth Fry Society for women, and there is also an organization which tries to help released prisoners, I forget the name, but there is very, very little help.

In those days, the system was such that you could predict the number of criminals society would produce. In the penitentiary system, prison construction plans were drawn up for five or ten years down the road. In fact, when I was there, my job was to try to find cities where prisons could be built. The penitentiary system was a real industry within the government.

We therefore could predict when we could fill them. Obviously, that could serve some political purpose. In fact, some politicians thought that it was desirable to have a penitentiary in their riding because it created jobs.

We can agree that imposing longer and heavier prison sentences is not the solution. Nobody thinks that this is the way to help people who have committed serious crimes, especially young offenders. There is hope in setting up rehabilitation and training programs for young people. At least they can be rehabilitated. It is not by imposing heavier sentences that we can hope to rehabilitate offenders.

From the way this bill is taking shape, it seems that we will be able to send 16 and 17 year olds to penitentiaries. The 27–year olds leaving jail after 10–year prison terms will be hardened criminals. This resolves nothing.

In fact, Bill C–37 has sprung from a thirst for revenge. It was also created to please politicians from the right who think that heavier sentences will thin out the criminal element. It resolves nothing. It does not improve the lot of young people.

The bill itself is incoherent. It will create administrative problems and delays for Quebec, which has already taken the rehabilitation route. Quebec is already well on its way to helping young offenders, and Bill C–37 will slow us down in this endeavour.

It seems to me that anyone with a heart will realize that young people do not need to be put away, they need to be closely supervised. In my opinion, this is the best solution. Quebec already is on the right track, and a sovereign Quebec will be able to continue in that direction, not only when it comes to assistance for young offenders, but also when it comes to the issues of justice and violence. As a country, we will be able to propose real solutions, rather than measures like Bill C–37, which in no way resolve a very, very serious problem.

[English]

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of his speech the member talked about a more fair and equitable policy. More fair to whom, the offenders or the victims; fairer to law–abiders or lawbreakers?

He introduced a notion of values that should be upheld. He also indicated that there was no single cause of crime. He tried to turn that around to say that we need some long term global view rooted in the basic problems of society. He advocated a more insular cohesive Quebec with reduced interaction with the larger social world and that somehow that would ameliorate the young offender problem. I assert to the member that is just another version of separatist fantasy stories.

Then he talked about Bill C–37, that perhaps it was only requested because of problems arising in the west. I advise the member that the human heart is the same and the propensity for young offenders to offend is the same across the country.

It seems every comment from the Bloc is turned into a territorial turf question about who is in control and has a varied sociological view. This does nothing to constructively build a better Canadian society. The member denies the reality of youth crime in his own province. He advocates a separatist ideology of expansive social order and an inappropriate response to youth crime.

Canadians across the country have subsidized rehabilitation efforts for offenders in Quebec. We do that with transfer payments yet he wants to abandon it. He claims that a separate country of Quebec could do a lot better. I say he is mistaken about his dreams. I advise him that the polls tell us that most Quebecers also say he is just dreaming.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, thank God I am dreaming. Thank God that I can hope to improve or to speak in ways that can improve society.

The system of justice is for whom? Certain people in the House speak only about the victims. As far as I am concerned from what I have read, the system of justice was conceived to protect and improve society. People who think that hanging the person who killed so–and–so will make the family of the victim better off are not thinking clearly or do not have a grasp of the problem.

We need laws that try to improve society as a whole. It is not by imposing more severe punishment on young offenders that we will improve the lot of society.

In response again to the hon. member, in Quebec we have the capacity to bring in a better system. We already have because in Quebec we understand. We have a sense of humanity in respect of young offenders that allows us to think in terms of rehabilitating them rather than thinking exclusively of putting them into prison and increasing the punishment, which has proven to be totally useless not only for the young but for the older criminals.

We are already on a progressive path in respect of that problem. Bill C–37 is retrograde. It is coercive. It is repressive. It is like going back to the Middle Ages. That is why I say that in Quebec, and especially in a sovereign Quebec, we will probably, hopefully, be able to do things a bit better. I hope people elsewhere will also be able to do better.

It is not just a question of territorial control. Certainly it is a question of justice. It is a question of cultural sovereignty. It is a way of interpreting justice. Our way in Quebec of interpreting how young offenders should be judged is more equitable or more profitable in the long term for society than forcing young offenders to be submitted to longer terms of imprisonment, which are a total waste of human life.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my friend.

He made the comment that people who are in favour of stronger punishment for criminals and capital punishment are not clear thinking or are not thinking properly.

Does he realize that the majority of Canadians, including the majority of people in his own province, agree that we should have stronger sentences for criminals, that we should be tougher on criminals and tougher on crime, and that we should reinstate the death penalty in Canada?

• (1630)

Is the hon. member going to then stand up and say that the majority of people in his province cannot think properly? That is what he is implying with his statements.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I am not implying that by any means. I do not know which statistics the hon. member has looked at but in Quebec people are not crying out for more severe punishment. I do not believe that we are in agreement for the death penalty. We have progressed and realized that the right path is not the death penalty or severe penalties against criminals.

I think we have understood that. There are no statistics in Quebec indicating that that is what the majority of people in Quebec would want. It may be in the west, but certainly not in Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have to disagree almost completely with the comments made by the member of the Bloc Quebecois.

Bill C–37 contains provisions that emphasize rehabilitation. How can you rehabilitate a young offender who is still on the street with his group of friends and partners in crime? I still remember that, as a kid, it was not the school teacher's strap I was afraid of, it was the spanking waiting for me at home after my brothers told my father.

I remember when one of my brothers stole a 10–cent item from the store. When my father found out, he forced my brother to go back to the store to apologize and return the stolen item to the victim. This was followed by corporal punishment. I think it turned out well. My brother never had a problem with the law after that.

Throughout this debate, we have shown great concern for the criminals but very little concern for the victims. I know people who commit a crime in the fall so that they can spend the winter in prison because they eat better there than many street people.

I spoke about this with several police officers who must arrest these young offenders. Almost all of them say the same thing: Young criminals are laughing at us. We charge them with a crime and they say, "I do not care. It does not matter what you do because I will be back on the street tomorrow morning". They know they can go before a judge, who will slap them on the wrist and say, "Do not do that any more, little boy". That is why there are so many repeat offenders.

Again, I think our first concern should be to protect society. As they say, if you cannot do the time, do not do the crime. Young people must realize this.

The purpose of sentencing is not to punish young people but to act as a deterrent. If sentences are tough enough, they will have a deterrent effect and reduce crime.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the evidence is there. Studies have shown there is no deterrent effect. Increasing the sentence does not reduce the crime rate. Studies have confirmed this.

I agree that, when you are a kid and your father gives you the odd spanking, it might help. But when we are talking about putting people in prison, especially young people, in institutions that reinforce criminal behaviour, that is different. I agree we have to strike a balance, and I agree that some people will say that we are more concerned about the criminal than the victim.

Of course we have to be concerned about the victim, but it seems to me we should take a more progressive approach to the way we treat young offenders. And the way we do this reflects the values of our society. When we talk about young offenders, we are talking about a small number of people, but we need all kind of resources to help deal with what causes these young people to commit violent crimes.

The trouble is this bill imposes more severe sentences for young people who have committed a murder but, basically, the problem is the same as in the case of young people who commit suicide. There is something deeply wrong with society, and young people are saying this by their extreme actions.

• (1635)

So it is not by punishing young people who are victims of the system that we will solve the problem. We have to change the way society works. We have to make sure their father and mother have jobs and are not violent. As you know, a young person may be violent because his father and his mother are violent. That is why I say that in Quebec we will probably have less trouble dealing with the real causes of these problems because we will consider all the other factors and not just—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I am sorry, but the period for questions and comments has expired.

[English]

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Frontenac—Dairy farmers; the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River—Justice.

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too rise today to comment on Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act.

This bill was the subject of justice committee hearings from June 23 to December 8, 1994. During these hearings, victims groups, groups of offenders, witnesses from children's aid societies, as well as representatives from judges' groups, bar associations and school boards all made recommendations to the committee.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all of these individuals and groups for taking the time and effort to present their positions to the committee. I would also like to congratulate the members of the committee for their work on the bill during these hearings.

This bill is not perfect. No bill ever is. I believe that to understand the purpose of this bill one must first understand the purpose of the Young Offenders Act generally.

The Criminal Code of Canada sets out Parliament's goals and initiatives in the area of criminal sentencing for adult offenders. Conversely, we have enacted a separate statute, the Young Offenders Act, which legislates the sentencing process for young offenders. This is in recognition of the fact that young offenders often commit crimes for vastly different reasons than the motives behind adult crime.

The goals of punishment, deterrence and rehabilitation are often achieved through different methods with young offenders than with adult criminals. The primary difference often recognized by experts is that many young offenders have a much better chance of being rehabilitated and becoming productive members of society than adult offenders. Tied in with this is the idea that for many young offenders the commission of a crime is an isolated incident in their lives, whereas for adult offenders, the commission of a crime more often signifies a larger pattern of lifestyle.

Unfortunately, events over the past few years in Canada have shown that not all young offenders fit the stereotypical mould of a young person who in committing a crime made an isolated mistake. Perhaps the most striking example of this was the tragic death of Nicholas Battersby last spring here in Ottawa. Mr. Battersby was shot in a drive–by shooting in broad daylight just blocks away from this House. Four young offenders were accused of this crime. I believe one of these youths has already pleaded guilty to this offence.

We also hear of swarmings in Toronto. This is the term for a phenomenon where a group of youths harass and beat a lone individual, sometimes simply for the clothes he or she is wearing.

These and other tragic stories show Canadians one thing: Some young offenders, long before they reach the age of 18, have become hardened criminals and the Young Offenders Act is simply inadequate to rehabilitate them or to protect Canadians from them.

We hear stories of youth who state that they commit crimes without any worry of being punished for their acts. We hear young Canadians openly saying that they would continue to commit crimes because the punishment available under the Young Offenders Act until the age of 18 simply does not scare them.

It is with this backdrop that the Minister of Justice has brought forth this legislation, Bill C–37. I would like to speak now on some specific measures in the bill.

The first measures contained in the bill are, in my opinion, the most important and fundamental amendments to the Young Offenders Act. The amendments proposed to paragraph 3(1) of the present act send a clear message to the judiciary who are responsible for enforcing the act. The protection of society is a primary objective of the Young Offenders Act. This preamble is most important.

Much of the time, the varying goals of the criminal law are in conflict. Some measures while they contribute to the rehabilitation of offenders may place the public safety at greater risk. I am here today to say that Parliament, the judiciary and other stakeholders in this debate must never forget that the safety of the public can never be compromised.

While some measures may be seen as contributing to the rehabilitation process, these benefits must be contrasted with any threat they present to the public safety. This is the fundamental struggle of any criminal justice system. Nowhere is the dilemma more prevalent than it is with the young offenders system.

While studies and common sense dictate that as a group young offenders are much more amenable to rehabilitation than adult offenders, we have learned the hard way that young offenders can also be serious threats to the public safety. The Young Offenders Act therefore must recognize the dual and conflicting role that it must play. The amendments proposed to paragraph 3(1)(a) send a strong message to the judiciary that Parliament expects the judiciary to consider public safety and rehabilitation when considering the Young Offenders Act.

The other amendment which this bill proposes to paragraph 3(1) is to affirm that young persons must accept the responsibility for their actions and for their contraventions. Again, the whole purpose of the Young Offenders Act is to recognize that the young persons accept this responsibility in different ways than do adults. However, they still must accept responsibility for their actions and also the responsibility of rehabilitating themselves.

On the theme of protection of public safety, I would like to turn to the amendments proposed to section 16 of the Young Offenders Act. These amendments would provide that 16 and 17–year old offenders who commit murder, attempted murder, or manslaughter would be tried as adults unless the youth court orders that the youth be tried as a young offender. Under the present Young Offenders Act an offender can be tried in adult court, but only if the crown successfully petitions the youth court for such a transfer.

Presently, a young offender who is charged with any crime will automatically be tried in youth court unless the crown can convince a judge that circumstances merit otherwise. Under this bill a 16 or 17–year old charged with murder, attempted murder, or manslaughter will be automatically tried in an adult court unless a judge, on application, can be convinced otherwise.

I know I am repeating myself but it bears repeating. This is a very important step. Effectively, a reverse onus will lie with a young offender charged with these crimes to show a judge why he or she should not be tried in adult court.

The effect of these amendments will be to increase public safety while also recognizing that in certain cases an offender charged with these offences may be best dealt with under the Young Offenders Act.

This amendment is also consistent with the principle that young persons must accept responsibility for their actions. This amendment is of fundamental importance.

The present maximum sentence available under the act of five years for a 16 or 17–year old who commits murder is inadequate. As many of us know, some young people who have committed murder openly mock this sentence.

This amendment sends a message to all Canadians and to young offenders. That message is that while there may be valid reasons for giving a young offender a second chance, a young offender accused of these serious crimes must convince the court of these reasons.

These amendments therefore address the competing interests between public safety and rehabilitation, particularly when serious crimes such as murder are at issue.

In particular, I would like to bring the attention of the House to section 16(1.1)(b) which under clause 8(1) of Bill C–37 states that when considering whether a young offender should be tried as an adult or in youth court, the protection of the public will be paramount. If the judge is unable to reconcile this objective of public protection with other objectives, then the youth will be tried as an adult. This in my opinion is an ideal method of dealing with this dilemma of reconciling the protection of the public and other objectives of the criminal justice system.

Youth crime, like any other crime, demands a reasoned response to address all the goals of a criminal justice system such as general deterrence, specific deterrence, rehabilitation and public safety. However, when the other objectives conflict with the goal of public safety, public safety must take priority over other considerations.

I therefore support the amendment whereby 16 and 17–year old offenders must show the court why they should be tried in a youth court. In fact, it is unfortunate in my view that this amendment applies only to 16 and 17–year olds. It could easily have been expanded to all young offenders with consideration of the age of the offender becoming a key consideration which a judge would consider in determining whether or not an offender should be tried in youth court. Perhaps this could be something that might be addressed later in phase two of the study on the Young Offenders Act.

In conjunction with the amendments in Bill C–37 dealing with the transfer of 16 and 17–year olds accused of murder or attempted murder, the bill also raises the maximum penalty under the Young Offenders Act for first degree murder to 10 years from five years. In addition, the maximum penalty for anyone convicted of second degree murder will be raised from five to seven years. Again, these provisions in my opinion address the concern that we live in a society where a sentence of five years is not adequate in all cases to deter crime and to protect society, or to rehabilitate the young offender.

Bill C–37 will also provide for victims of youth crime to make impact statements at the sentencing of a young offender. Too often with our criminal justice system, victims complain that they are victimized twice, once by the crime and again during the court proceedings in relation to the crime. We hear stories of victims who are not even informed of when the offender will be sentenced. Victims complain that they have no input in the criminal proceedings.

While it is obvious that the judge in any case must be the final arbiter of a case, in order to adequately dispose of a case the judge must have the representations of all the affected parties before him or her. This includes representations from victims of crime detailing the impact the crime has had on their lives. Only with this input will judges truly be able to pass a sentence that fits the crime.

In closing, I would like to encourage all members of this House to support Bill C–37. I believe it provides amendments which recognize that the Young Offenders Act must obtain a balance of rehabilitation, public safety and deterrence. Unfortunately, in some cases the Young Offenders Act as it now stands does not adequately address the proper balancing of these interests.

This bill provides an excellent start on the process of reducing crime by youth by providing for measures that will take into consideration the issue of public safety. I encourage all members of this House to realize that any criminal justice system must have as its goal the balance of the objectives of public safety and rehabilitation. This is particularly true of any criminal system designed for young persons.

While it is true that young people are much more amenable as a whole to rehabilitation, the public must be adequately protected from all crime no matter who commits it. The amendments proposed to the Young Offenders Act as contained in Bill C–37 address the balancing of these objectives. This balance is lacking in the act as it now stands.

Finally, let me add my voice to others who have mentioned in this House that this bill does not represent the whole story of reducing crime by young persons. Most of the Young Offenders Act by definition deals with offences already committed. The other half of the equation of course is crime prevention.

In order for any initiative to reduce crime to be successful, the whole equation must be looked at. The 12th report of the Standing Committee on Justice released in 1993 pointed this out. It identified that in order to reduce crime we must attack its roots such as unemployment, illiteracy, physical and sexual abuse of children, the glorification of violence, and dysfunctional families.

Studies have shown that crimes in neighbourhoods are drastically reduced when programs designed to keep youth occupied are instituted. Similarly, programs that attempt to help young Canadians get off the streets will also help prevent crime.

It is vital that the roots of crime be addressed in order that public safety is ensured. These steps in my opinion will be wise investments in the future of this country. Therefore I congratulate the Minister of Justice and the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in taking the first steps in reforming the Young Offenders Act with Bill C–37.

I also encourage the government to continue its efforts to eradicate crime by taking the initiatives that aim at preventing crime before it is committed.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member finished off by congratulating the minister for taking the first steps. Perhaps we could say they are baby steps. Why not bring in a bill that would comprehensively deal with the problems of the Young Offenders Act?

At the beginning of her speech, the member talked about the importance of rehabilitation. The problem with youth crime is that many young offenders have never been habilitated in the first place. Society needs to respond to protect itself while respecting due process and offender needs.

Throughout her speech, the member recounted the problems very clearly, but does she believe that Bill C–37 will fix the problems identified? I think not.

She talked at length about the reverse onus provision and the whole procedure of transfers especially for 16 and 17–year olds. Perhaps she might address herself to the mind that it is basically an admission that the Young Offenders Act is fundamentally flawed for 16 and 17–year olds.

This brings up the topic that if we have to spend so much time dealing with the special problems for 16 and 17–year olds then the act is fundamentally flawed. Really it deals with the wrong set of kids and 16 and 17–year olds should be dealt with in adult court.

The member repeatedly cited the problems and the dilemmas but then made that unreasonable leap of faith that Bill C–37 is appropriate in responding to the problems that she cites.

However, I was encouraged that the member acknowledged the notion of victims in the process. I would ask her, would she then advocate or be willing to support the giving of legal standing to victims in the young offender court?

Mrs. Payne: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. As I stated at the beginning of my comments, this bill is not perfect. It is a first step toward revamping the present act.

To speak to the comment he made on the victims of crime, as we go along with this bill and the amendments that will come subsequent to this process, these facts will be dealt with in time. It is certainly a problem and one I am sure the committee will be looking at in the future.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in his latest report the Auditor General took what I consider to be a major step forward in discharging the duties of his office.

In addition to the traditional accounts of waste and questionable accounting practices, this time around he pointed out that a major cause of wasted money—and in my view this is the major cause—is not overpaid civil servants, the redecorating of offices, or the wasting of staples and paper clips. The problem the Auditor General focused on this time around is that we spend billions of dollars a year on programs without ever saying what the programs are intended to achieve, or how we measure their success in achieving their goals.

It is not hard to think of a government program to which this criticism applies. Actually it is hard to think of one that it does not apply to. We have social programs that hurt society. We have family programs that destroy families. We have aboriginal programs that keep Canada's Indians from ever achieving self–sufficiency. We have trade programs that discourage free trade. We have expenditure control legislation that allows spending to spiral out of control, and so on. It is not a pretty sight.

Every time one of these programs fails, the solution is to spend more money. We never ask what we are trying to do, how we will know whether or not we have achieved it, and when we will shut the program down if we do not see some success.

Getting to the Young Offenders Act, what is it supposed to be doing? Is it doing it? How can we tell? If it is not, at what point do we change our approach?

The purpose of the Young Offenders Act is quite clear. It is intended to draw a distinction between hardened adult offenders on the one hand and juveniles on the other. Then it is intended to separate the hardened juvenile offender from the kid who got in with the wrong crowd and made a foolish mistake. Most of us would agree that the kid who made a foolish mistake and that kid alone deserves a second chance.

I am sure many members are thinking: "Come off it, Mike. In this country we do not hold hardened adult criminals responsible either", and this is sadly true. It is difficult to pick up a newspaper today without seeing some dreadful tale of an innocent person abused or slaughtered by someone who ought still to be in prison serving out their sentence. Perhaps our governments do not take crime seriously even by adults, but the public wants them to and the Liberals ignore that desire at their grave peril.

Last time the Liberals formed the government the public got so sick of their arrogance that it reduced them to some 40 seats in Parliament in the 1984 election. Let me serve notice here and now that if the Prime Minister and the cabinet ignore public feelings about crime, that will be the good old days for the Liberal Party.

If the Liberals hope to avoid such a debacle, there are so many things they are doing that they had better not. They had better not raise taxes for one thing. They had better not keep spending more money than they take in for another. They had better apply the Auditor General's critique to their entire crime policy. Is crime being deterred? How do we measure it? If it is not, how do we change the law so that it is?

To help the Liberals in this unfamiliar exercise of considering whether what they are doing is actually working, I would like to start by applying the Auditor General's criteria to the Young Offenders Act and to these amendments to it.

The Young Offenders Act is supposed to give a second chance to those who deserve it. Is that what it is doing? Or is it just giving a licence to those under 18 to commit crimes? How can we tell? It seems quite simple to me.

If the Young Offenders Act is working, those youths who are given light sentences, who have their records sealed when they reach the age of majority, who receive no punishment at all for their misdeeds, should subsequently turn out to be better citizens than those who are selected for more severe punishment. Young people who get into trouble with the law should be less inclined to continue their criminal careers into adulthood than before there was the Young Offenders Act.

In short, if the Young Offenders Act is working, we would either have no more youth crime than we had in the past or perhaps a little bit more but a much lower rate of juvenile delinquents going on to become adult criminals. If not, if youth crime is skyrocketing and young offenders who receive a light slap on the wrist for serious acts like robbery, assault, even rape and murder go on to commit serious crimes as adults, then the Young Offenders Act is failing.

To me, the scariest possibility would be that the young thugs are manifesting an increasingly obvious awareness that they are beyond the reach of the law because of the Young Offenders Act, that they are responding rationally to the incentives government has built into its policies. That would be easy to measure too. Just look to see when the Young Offenders Act came into force and then after a few years delay when teenagers came to understand these provisions youth crime skyrocketed.

I wonder whether the government bothers to keep statistics on these questions and if it does, whether it will release them. I wonder whether we had less youth crime before the Young Offenders Act or more. I wonder what proportion of those who receive lenient sentences or have their records sealed when they turn 18 go on to commit more serious crimes as opposed to those who used to receive a stiff punishment for an evil act.

I am submitting these as Order Paper questions because as Canadians we have a right to know what is going on. That includes knowing whether the Minister of Justice knows or cares whether the Young Offenders Act is working. If it turns out that when measured adequately against clear criteria the Young Offenders Act is the failure it seems to be, then I wonder something else. I wonder what the government's priorities are.

Does the Minister of Justice think that his primary and overwhelming responsibility is protecting the lives, liberties and property of Canadian citizens and does he measure each of his initiatives against that criterion? Or is he busy trying to turn us all into socially aware, personally tolerant, cappuccino drinking, fluently trilingual citizens of the global village of the 21st century? Is he too caught up in his social engineering to protect society as it now exists?

Some will doubtless believe I am being unfair to the minister. Some will doubtless maintain that the justice minister knows exactly what the Young Offenders Act and these amendments to it are supposed to achieve. And he knows exactly how to measure success.

The Young Offenders Act, some will tell me, is part of a grand social engineering project of this and previous Liberal governments. It is the abolition of personal responsibility. These people will further tell me that the Minister of Justice knows exactly what the amendments are intended to achieve. They are intended to deceive the bumpkins out in the hinterland into thinking that crime is being punished and innocence rewarded so that the project of relieving us all of responsibility can proceed unmolested.

These people will tell me that the justice minister has very clear ideas how to measure his success on this project. They will say that if the justice minister can get the polls to say Canadians think he is cracking down on youth crime, he will not actually have to hold murderous young thugs accountable for their acts of evil. I do not think so.

I prefer to be charitable and assume that the justice minister and the Liberals are so convinced of their divine right to rule over Canadians and reshape them for their own good that they do not bother asking themselves whether what they are doing is working.

That is why I have risen in the Chamber today, to tell the justice minister as clearly and forcefully as I can that when his party was elected on the promise of a better yesterday, voters had in mind a time when jobs were more secure, the national debt was far lower and the streets were a lot safer. That is what they want to come back, not to the crazy experiments and wild excesses of the Trudeau years.

I hope the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister and the entire government understand that Canadians really do believe and cherish individual responsibility. They overwhelmingly favour the right to own property. They overwhelmingly favour politicians who listen to their constituents. They overwhelmingly favour the right of law–abiding citizens to live in freedom and in security. And they overwhelmingly favour tougher action against crime and criminals of whatever age.

I call on the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister and the government to take back this legislation and to repudiate the entire approach behind it. I call on them to recognize that the most primary duty of a government is to protect the lives, liberty and property of its citizens from force and fraud.

I call on them to develop and make public a set of standards for measuring the success or failure of the Young Offenders Act against this goal. And I call on them to amend it so that it works or abolish it if it cannot be made to work.

Enough of softness on crime. Enough coddling. Enough punishing the innocent and pardoning the guilty. Either they do it now or the Reform government does it after 1997 while they collect their undeserved pensions and write their wistful memoirs.

That would be simple justice. Simple justice is what the Canadian public wants and simple justice is what the Reform Party is going to give them.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member. He acknowledges how much we are doing positively and how many millions we are spending within the juvenile justice system to respond to juvenile crime. Sometimes we do not hear about that but a lot of wonderful things are being done and great effort is made throughout the country within the juvenile justice system. It is not a matter of either or, but a great amount of resources are being spent.

He makes the point that we must always evaluate our social programs for what is actually delivered. It is a point that must not be forgotten, and he mentions the role of the Auditor General in that.

The member reflects the experience of the community and how the message has been sent by the operations of the Young Offenders Act. He points out that we have had the Young Offenders Act for 10 years, and if it was working properly it would have acquired the acceptance of the community. The opposite is true. The community's experience with the act has resulted in the act's repudiation and a lack of confidence that it would have earned if it was working properly.

The member also pointed out the fact that the Young Offenders Act represents a Liberal social philosophy that is really not reflective of mainstream Canadian values. He talked about the issue of community accountability. The final measure of what should be done with the Young Offenders Act is, what does the public want?

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his comments and I would reiterate what I said in my intervention. We have to measure the success of our programs against clear criteria. We have to evaluate whether or not the legislation that is in effect right now or legislation that is brought into the House is actually working.

The Auditor General said in his report that so many of the things the government does, fails. It fails the test of accountability. It does not achieve the lofty goals that it sets out to achieve. The Young Offenders Act is another example of that very deep malaise that sits in our federal government and has for a long time.

The programs that are brought into the House or that are on the books right now have to be evaluated in clear terms. It has to be demonstrated they actually work and that Canadians are satisfied with them.

Clearly Canadians from coast to coast are not satisfied with the Young Offenders Act and they will not be satisfied with the amendments as proposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak on this bill, this afternoon.

[English]

We are attempting to reconcile two views; one which looks at what one would refer to as tough treatment, incarceration, dealing with young people who create situations that are unacceptable to society in a very direct and sometimes I would suggest almost brutal kind of way.

On the other hand, another group of people somehow believe that if you do not look at youth crime, and if you are patient and understanding and soft, that it will go away. Surely the answer lies somewhere in the middle. Surely there is a balance to be struck.

This is what the bill is all about. It attempts to reconcile two views. It attempts to establish a correct balance, and that correct balance would obviously vary according to the values that an individual holds.

We are asked to define what is a fair response. What is a just response? What is a correct response to a crime situation when it is undertaken by a young man or woman? That is extremely difficult. I do not pretend to have all of the answers and it would be presumptuous of me to suggest that I do.

I want to share some ideas in the spirit of debate to try to address a very serious situation. I do not believe that you can wish it away and it is simply going to disappear. I do not believe that incarceration and rough treatment is the answer either.

The government has to manage. It has to protect society. At the same time, simply putting people away does not solve the problem. It does not even come close to solving the problem.

One can look at rough treatment or direct treatment or incarceration. A lot of people would say, "not pandering to those criminals". Do they look at the success rate of reacting that way? What happens when we put people away? What are the costs when people are put away? We do not talk about that. There are costs. It costs a lot of money to detain people today. Obviously it has to be done because society has to be protected in certain circumstances. As a solution it is not only costly but I think it is extremely dysfunctional.

Look at the people who are put away. Since they are young people many of them are eventually released. Once they are released how many go on to integrate into society and lead productive lives? What is the success rate of that kind of approach?

Pretending that no problems exist will not resolve anything. We have to acknowledge that there are difficulties in society that are caused by real reasons. The real challenge to us as parliamentarians, as members of Canadian society, is to find out why it is that people commit crimes.

Some people suggest there are good and bad people. That is too simplistic. There are people who along the way, for a variety of reasons that we do not always understand nearly as well as we should, commit criminal behaviour that is totally unacceptable to society. That is where the challenge lies. If we could understand that, we could respond. In responding to that we could cut down the amount of crime in society. It would be much less costly, much less dysfunctional and a much more humane and satisfying kind of way of dealing with our fellow human being whether he or she is or is not a criminal.

[Translation]

We are trying to strike a balance between those who feel that imprisonment is the solution and those who feel that patience and education will eventually bring an end to this type of violence, abuse and criminal behaviour.

[English]

The bill includes a number of serious measures. I am not disappointed when I hear people suggest other or additional measures. That does not bother me. What does bother me is when the efforts of a very prominent Canadian are belittled, a justice minister who knows a lot about the law and criminal behaviour and who has taken the time to consult widely. Then we pose as supposed experts and simply belittle that which he has produced. That is arrogance.

Mr. Speaker, I know you would agree with me that when members on the opposite side suggest that members of our party are arrogant, there is no greater arrogance than pretending that one is an expert, that one has all of the solutions to all of the complex problems of society when one in fact does not. They come forward with simple, glib, catchy little solutions that pretend to resolve, so they can go away and suggest they are really listening to people and applying those solutions, and they are going to correct the ills of society, that is arrogance. That is the most profound arrogance that one can find.

Unfortunately we find it a great deal in some members of the House. Some of them are raising their hands. I wish the camera could catch them right now so their electors could see firsthand who they are. Unfortunately that is not possible. Perhaps they will have the courage to get up and ask question, so we can have a bit of a debate. I can say a few more things to them then.

The bill includes increased sentences. Has anyone talked about that? It includes going to adult court in certain circumstances, when the crime is sufficiently serious to warrant that kind of situation. It includes extending the time served before being considered for parole. Has anyone from the opposite side mentioned that? It includes a better sharing of information among those people who deal with youth and criminal behaviour by young people.

It also includes rehabilitation and treatment. That underlies the whole notion here. We want to rehabilitate. We want to be able to treat. We want to keep young people out of penal institutions. It is costly. It is dysfunctional. It does not do them any good as human beings. It protects society and, as I mentioned before, when protection is needed that is clearly what we would do.

The legislation includes the possibility of victim impact statements when sentencing, something that is now used in adult situations only. It talks about conditional supervision which is rare in a number of circumstances today but which is extended.

It talks about medical and psychological assessments. We no longer need to get consent. We can ask for those assessments to assist us in making better, more sensitive judgments that will be practical and address the real problems. A very important point is the possibility of restitution to the victims of crime. It has many components the opposite side has not addressed.

The major challenge to us today is twofold. It is to look at the legislation not in a partisan way but in the spirit of openness to see what merits support and what can be improved. Surely members on the opposite side see some positive features in the legislation. They can bring about suggestions that may lead to improvements. That is one of the challenges.

Another challenge before us today is to try to understand better than we do why it is these young people turn to criminal behaviour. If we could understand that we could prevent crime. Preventing crime would ensure that there is less incarceration, less cost to society and more productive lives being lived by young people.

[Translation]

I believe I am reaching the end of my speech. I will stop here, and I look forward to questions from my colleagues across the floor.

[English]

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are listening on this side of the House. Hopefully our constituents are listening at home as well.

I appreciate the hon. member's comments about Bill C–37, the reforms to the Young Offenders Act. He said that if we had any suggestions he would welcome them and that we should bring them forward to the government. We have been trying to do that at every opportunity in the debate on the Young Offenders Act and the specific bill.

It is high time young people who commit violent repeat offences are held accountable. We talk about that often. We should quit blaming society, family or peer pressure for their crimes; they have to be held accountable.

I wrote down from the hon. member's speech that he does not believe incarceration and rough treatment are the answer. Some people would differ when it comes to repeat offenders and offenders who commit horrendous violent crimes.

I would like to refer to a newspaper article and ask the hon. member if he would agree with this type of treatment and indicate whether it has some potential in Canada. I refer to an article about the Toulson Boot Camp in Maryland, U.S.A., which states:

> Offenders between the ages of 17 and 25, sentenced to five years or less, can sign up for the six–month boot camp program at Toulson. And then you're home–free on parole.
> The program at Toulson is modelled on the U.S. Marines' boot camps and about half the instructors are former marines. It emphasizes discipline and accountability.
> So lifting a log isn't about lifting a log. It's about teamwork and overcoming adversity.
> And moving a rock pile isn't just moving rocks. It's about being responsible for your actions and putting effort into work.
> Toulson is a little different than other American boot camps, however.
> That's because, in addition to the strict military regime and physical training, inmates also get job training, schooling (more than 70 per cent receive their high school equivalency diploma before they leave) and strictly supervised probation.
> Boot camps without such measures find 50 to 70 per cent of their ex–cons end up back in the clink—the same rate as for conventional U.S. prisons where inmates can do whatever they want all day.
> According to statistics compiled by Toulson officials, only 20 per cent of inmates released from the boot camp have reoffended.

• (1720)

In light of those statistics—he has asked for suggestions—would that perhaps be something that Canada should be looking at to put some of the violent repeat offenders into a structure such as that one and hopefully we would have a better success rate than we have had in our rehabilitation programs of the past?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased by the question and I shall attempt to answer it in a responsible way.

Initially there was a comment from the member's party indicating that my party was prone to attempting all kinds of programs without appropriate evaluations. Then this hon. member puts forth the suggestion of a boot camp in his question, a particular boot camp where supposedly there has been some success.

I would caution in taking one example only and extrapolating it to the whole of youth crime or the whole of Canada. Whether one calls it boot camp or an alternative way of serving a sentence or being socialized differently, certainly we can look at it and we should. I know this is happening in certain parts of Canada.

I deplore, and my colleague did not suggest it, when some members indicate that boot camps sound tough. It sounds as if we are doing something when we are not doing anything except for symbolic reasons. I think that is hypocritical. I stress again that my colleague did not suggest that was the reason, but in some cases it is hypocritical, political and has no intent but trying to respond to a group of people out there that believes it is the answer to all youth crime.

Another point I want to make is a very important one. I take issue with my colleague in this regard, at least slightly. I did not say that incarceration was not the answer. I say that incarceration needed to be the answer in certain cases to protect society. He can check the blues. I did say that.

I hope my colleagues will listen very carefully but I wanted to make a point—and I am delighted to be able to make it again because it is an important one—for those who suggest that we should simply put people into an institution and throw away the key. There are some people who suggest that because they do not know any better. They do not understand the situation. They keep hoping for simplistic solutions. I simply suggest to them that approach to incarceration, with that kind of motivation, is not the answer.

We have a greater responsibility toward our fellow human beings, whether or not we like them, whether or not they are offenders, and that is to try to find out what we can do in a responsible way to ensure that they are contributing members of Canadian society.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak today on Bill C–37 as it addresses an area of concern to me and certainly a matter of concern to my constituents.

The Minister of Justice has responded quite quickly to public concern about problems with the Young Offenders Act through the amendments he is proposing in Bill C–37. As the government has been doing with other important pieces of legislation, the public has been consulted widely on possible changes and improvements both before the bill was drafted and tabled in the House and subsequently in committee.

These amendments therefore are the reflection of wide public consultations and intended to respond to wide public concerns. That does not mean they will please everyone. Indeed critics have argued that they are either too harsh or too lenient. That usually means they are just about right.

The Young Offenders Act has had two purposes since its inception. One is the protection of society. The other is to interrupt the beginning of a criminal career and try our best to rehabilitate young offenders so that they do not become lifelong, hardened criminals.

In response to public concern the minister has amended the declaration of the principle of the act to make it clear that the primary objective of the youth system, however, must be the protection of society.

This can only be achieved if we have a real commitment as well to rehabilitation and to crime prevention. This means that for chronic serious offenders, judges are clearly authorized in the bill to have proper psychological or medical evaluations done.

It would be a tragedy, for instance, if young persons who might otherwise be entirely treatable, correctable and able to be put on a better path of life through medical or therapeutic help were simply to be punished and then released into society possibly to commit increasingly serious crimes as they become adults and lifelong criminals as they mature.

Increasing the sentences for first degree murder to a maximum of ten years and for second degree murder to seven years is something that I think has a great deal of public support. In making these sentencing changes the minister is addressing the need for sentencing for violent crimes that matches both the public's perception of the seriousness of the crime as well as the need to hold young offenders accountable for the damage their crimes have caused.

I do not mean only greater punishment but, again combining the two purposes of the bill, also more reasonable time for rehabilitation and counselling. Our party in opposition argued for these longer sentences simply because we knew there were some young offenders, even those who committed violent crimes, who could be rehabilitated. It cannot necessarily be done in the five years that the act currently allows.

As well by transferring 16 and 17–year olds to adult court when they have been charged with murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, aggravated sexual assault and aggravated assault, we are sending a message to violent offenders that they will be held accountable regardless of their age.

There is still the ability nevertheless for young persons to apply to have their cases remain in youth court if the objectives of protection of the public and rehabilitation can better be met there. The onus is on young offenders to prove that exceptional treatment rather than adult court is merited in their case.

We can see that the amendments are improvements of the current system that allow for flexibility only in exceptional cases. They will also allow police officers, school officials and welfare agencies to share information on young offenders for the better protection of public safety. It says to our communities that while the interest of young offenders must be taken into account there are other important interests and concerns.

For youth who have committed less serious crimes, alternatives to custody should be considered as the bill would allow. I return to the second purpose of the Young Offenders Act which is to ensure, wherever possible, that young offenders are given the opportunity to develop a better way of life and not continue with a life of crime.

Let us turn to fitting the punishment to the crime. The bill allows for the kinds of alternatives to custody as a method of restitution for the victim, or some type of community service that may be far more productive than the more traditional approaches of incarceration.

These amendments as presented in Bill C–37 are not perfect solutions, nor are they the end of the process. They are improvements. They show Canadians that the government is serious about protecting their personal safety and their property. At the same time they offer the opportunity for rehabilitation where possible and feasible and for crime prevention.

Moreover, as the House is aware, the minister has asked the parliamentary committee of justice to undertake a thorough review of the Young Offenders Act. We realize that this is just a first step. This will provide the forum for additional changes and improvements to meet both purposes of the act, the protection of public safety and the rehabilitation wherever possible of young offenders.

These are issues that need to be addressed. We need to know why some of our young people are falling into criminal ways. We do need to examine the relationship between youth services and the Young Offenders Act.

A very recent study has indicated that a violent child of six will become a violent adolescent and a violent adult. Right now we do not have services in our country or in our communities that are nearly adequate to turn that young child's life around at the age of six rather than waiting until the age of 16 when they are damaging themselves and others in a far more serious way.

We need to understand how the government can attack some of the underlying causes of crime such as poverty, family violence and drug abuse. Members opposite may not want to acknowledge that sometimes somebody else is responsible for the criminal behaviour of the young person. In may cases, far more than they would like to know about, criminal behaviour is very directly linked to sexual abuse as a child. Much as they would like to simply put the burden of proof on that 12, 13 or 14–year old young person, we as a society have to take some responsibility for those among that population who were abused in a society that failed to protect them.

The members opposite mentioned certain ways of dealing with young offenders. I think we have to be more open and that is why a more fundamental review can look at other methods of treating young offenders while they are in custody or under supervision of some kind. It is only by addressing these more fundamental issues that we will make real strides in keeping our youth out of the justice system and turning their lives around where possible when they come into conflict with the law.

We need to look at every possible investment toward keeping our society a healthy place for children to grow up so that future generations are not looking on our youth as a problem, a source of violence and a source of fear to our citizens and to our society.

As I said, this is the first step in that process. It is not the end of the process. I look forward to the Reform Party supporting the progress that is being made in this bill and participating fully in the ongoing debate about further improvements.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I suppose one concern of the Reform Party that I think has been fairly well expressed is the lack of success that the current YOA has had.

I wonder if the member could enlighten me on some things, for example the fact that 47 per cent of all cases where charges are made under the Young Offenders Act are for repeat offences; 19 per cent of all those charges are for the fifth offence under the Young Offenders Act.

• (1735)

In her judgment, what in the amendments is going to actually change that? What in the amendments is really going to work to the resolution of that problem or do these amendments not touch the reality of the repeat offences?

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how those statistics compare with adult crime. However, what the member has just said is that 53 per cent of charges against young offenders are laid against first time offenders. They have never offended before. The fact that only 20 per cent have then gone on to offend more than twice is a fairly good indication to me that there is a reasonably high level of rehabilitation because of the act and the effect it has had since it was first implemented.

However, in the cases for which there is the greatest public concern, the kind of amendments that I think are going to make a substantial difference is for severe and violent crime, murder, assault, aggravated assault, sexual assault and so on, and the requirement to have the young person tried in adult court according to adult rules, the possibility of longer sentences, up to double what they are now.

I also feel that oftentimes when we do incarcerate young people we put them into a school of crime. We put them into contact with people who have been in the system perhaps more than once or twice, who are much more knowledgeable about crime and living off the avails or crime. That I do not think is a desirable situation.

I certainly believe in the requirement to look at non–custodial solutions, especially where the young person is being held directly accountable through compensation to the victim directly for the harm they have done or through community service to compensate the community directly for the harm that he or she has done to the community. Those are the kinds of measures, among others, that put a direct link between the crime that has been committed and the effects of that crime. To me that kind of discipline is a productive kind of discipline.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): This concludes the period of questions and comments and also concludes this stage of debate. As we continue third reading of this legislation, members will now have a maximum of 10–minute interventions without questions or comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since June 2, 1994, when Bill C–37 to amend the Young Offenders Act was tabled, I have been unable to convince myself that the federal government is seriously trying to make those of us in Parliament and the people in Quebec and the rest of Canada believe that its proposed reform will increase public protection.

As you know, I have more than 21 years' experience in teaching and have learned to trust. I have learned that, in life, you have to offer a second chance. I learned this during all those years. The debate, this debate, is simply a public relations exercise by the government in an effort to reassure part of the population about its public institutions.

The reality is that the existing legislation contains all the provisions needed by the courts and crown prosecutors to give society proper protection. The problem is one of enforcing the provisions in the Young Offenders Act, and not a complete revision of it. In my view, changing the commas and periods in a text will not make it suddenly more effective.

Did the Minister of Justice first make sure that the existing Young Offenders Act no longer met the needs of the public and society before changing it? Did the Minister of Justice first take into account the many recommendations by the principal stakeholders?

• (1740)

Considering that most authorities concerned want more latitude in enforcing the current legislation, and not a repressive and intimidating reform of the act, why is the Liberal government nevertheless going ahead with its crusade against young people?

We can only wonder why the federal government made this one of its key issues. The Liberals' red book holds the key. In fact, the Minister of Justice is using his role in the government merely to keep a purely partisan campaign promise, without regard for its economic, social and moral impact.

It is these kinds of actions which, in my opinion, cause taxpayers to become disillusioned with politics. Such displays of disregard for institutions and the duty of the elected is revolting to the taxpayers of Quebec and the rest of Canada.

Furthermore, I do not believe that an act should be amended just because 30 per cent of the population believes that crime is on the rise and that offences are becoming more violent, especially when current statistics prove the opposite. How many times will we have to say it? We will never resolve the problem of violence in society by sending people to jail earlier and earlier on in life.

Longer and heavier sentences, lowering the minimum age for assuming criminal responsibility and extending measures available to repress young people will not resolve the problem either—they will have the opposite effect. The proposed amendments to the bill counter the ultimate goal: protection of society and of young people.

During the last election campaign, I had the privilege—and I mean privilege—of visiting a halfway house, where some 20 young men lived. I spoke with them for over an hour about their future and I left the place firmly believing that they deserved a second chance, even though they had committed reprehensible acts.

I think that the government should concentrate on crime prevention programs. That is where emphasis should be put, and these programs are our greatest challenge. That is the approach that Quebec is taking, with great success I might add.

In consequence, the bill's main objective should be reintegration. A long term crime prevention program, with the aim of deterring young offenders from continuing to act in a reprehensible way, is what is really needed.

On this issue, Quebec is sending a clear message to Ottawa: "Let us continue to resolve our problems in the way we see fit without imposing rules to follow or amendments that may satisfy other provinces, but do not fit Quebec's experience at all". This is another area where I think Quebec is distinct.

Quebec has a rich experience. Those looking for inspiration need look no further than Quebec's Youth Protection Act. In addition, the work and reports of Quebec's Department of Health and Social Services are also good sources of information. Finally, studies have been conducted recently in Quebec. These studies, the tailor made protection, the jointly devised plan, and the protection of young persons, more than legislation, bring out the valuable experience and background of the Quebec system, as well as a number of problems to be resolved to ensure more effective enforcement of the act.

In Quebec, there is a well established consensus. The consensus in Quebec is that the principles and rights accorded to the child under Quebec legislation must be preserved, while at the same time stipulating the means of implementation and the adjustments required by social change and recent legislative reforms.

In regard to young offenders, Quebec's perspective and experience are diametrically opposed to the reforms proposed by the federal government. Quebec stresses rehabilitation while the federal government's proposals are repressive and hard-line. In other words, Quebec does not regard life terms with repeat offenders as a solution for young persons who are often grappling with serious family and social problems.

In conclusion, to ease matters the Minister of Justice could grant Quebec special status to allow us to preserve this credible experience in regard to protecting young persons and this moral and social duty towards young Quebecers.

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on these amendments to the Young Offenders Act. Like most communities, Guelph—Wellington is concerned about crime and the safety of our community. Its people welcome any initiative that encourages public protection and crime prevention.

Young offenders are not new. The House of Commons enacted the Juvenile Delinquents Act in 1908. The government of the day believed that youth were not to be treated as criminals. Rather, the act stated that they should be treated as misdirected children in need of aid, encouragement, help and assistance. It sought to save children through social intervention. Almost 90 years later we are still concerned with giving children aid, encouragement and assistance.

My community of Guelph—Wellington knows the importance of children. We pride ourselves in providing quality education and preparing our children for their future. Our industry is one of the finest in the country, built to withstand radical changes in the marketplace and designed to be the forefront of technology so our children can remain in our community and become active participants in our society.

They are concerned about deficit reduction, not for their sake, but so their children and grandchildren will not be burdened by our excesses. Like almost every community in Canada, we are concerned about youth crime. We know the majority of our children are good and live their lives free of crime.

However, others do demand our attention. We are concerned about them. Programs like Guelph Change Now, a crisis and counselling service for youth, and START from the Second Chance Employment Counselling, aim to help young people, some young offenders, in housing and life skills.

My community knows the causes of youth crime are many. It wants this government here and now to deal with the issues of family violence, poverty and illiteracy. It also wants us to respond now to its dissatisfaction with the current treatment of violent young offenders.

Last June 16, I attended a community forum sponsored by the Guelph Mercury. The forum dealt with the Young Offenders Act. During the discussion it became apparent that Guelph—Wellington residents are concerned with the prevention of crime. They want more respect for the law by putting emphasis on the home, in the schools and on preventing young people from becoming criminals. They also want more money spent on rehabilitation. This was a clear message I received.

Following the forum I wrote to the Minister of Justice and informed him that these people do not see the problem with legislation. Rather, they see the problem in the court room. They look at the courts as too lenient and so much so that our young people are no longer deterred by the sentencing. They ask me in this government to make sentencing tougher so that young people will realize that their actions will be punished.

This legislation today responds to their concerns. My constituents have asked us to increase sentences for teenagers convicted of first and second degree murder. They believe that five years is not enough.

They want more young offenders tried in adult court when charged with serious personal injury offences and they want improved measures for information sharing between professionals. They know that it is often too easy for a young offender to fit between the cracks because school officials, police and child welfare agencies sometimes do not share information when the public may be at risk.

At that forum and in letters and telephone calls I received from constituents, they recognize the need for rehabilitation services. They contact me seeking ways to improve the judicial system and I have heard from parents whose children disregard their authority because they believe that they can safely hide behind provisions of the Young Offenders Act. This is not right.

These children may lose respect for authority because they believe that our system is too lenient. Mothers worry that their children from a very early age have learned not to respect the law. These parents and in many ways their children have asked us to respond. It is a clear call for help.

Guelph—Wellington residents want stiffer penalties for young offenders who commit serious crimes. They want victims to be able to make a statement if they so wish about how crime has affected them and they want stricter controls over the young offender who is in the community while serving probation and a quicker response if a youth should break the conditions of that release.

They want the courts to have as much information as possible when a young offender is sentenced. Currently young offenders must consent to treatment. This legislation responds to my constituents' concern for an effective response to chronic and serious young offenders.

I have said before that my constituents demand excellence in many of my speeches. They want legislation passed by the House that effectively deals with their concerns and improves the quality of life for them and their families.

This bill betters the Young Offenders Act and enables it to deal more effectively with serious youth crime. The changes proposed in this legislation help further protect our community where you and I live. Their aim is to make young people more responsible for their actions while recognizing the special circumstances of their youth.

They respond to the concerns of people in Guelph—Wellington and elsewhere in order to make our community better. Sergeant Brent Eden of the young offenders branch of the Guelph police force described to the people who attended the forum on the Young Offenders Act as concerned with making things better, not just blaming the system, not just blaming the police and not just blaming the government.

These people know that this legislation will make things better. They have told me that the police support this legislation. That is what they want from this government, that it is what they demand from this government.

These amendments continue our goals of offering aid, encouragement, help and assistance to our children. The goals are simple. Punish those who commit the crime and help rehabilitate these young people so that they can contribute to our society.

We want tough legislation which gives a clear message. We will not tolerate murder, assault and other criminal acts. We want to help our young people but we will not accept certain behaviour. This behaviour will be punished.

During the last federal election I promised the people of Guelph—Wellington that I would support reforms to the Young Offenders Act. It was asked many times of me. They want things to deter young people from committing crime, something to provide real justice and to rehabilitate our young people to help them build better lives. This legislation and the broad review which will be taken by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs does just that.

These deserve our support. These respond to the concerns expressed by my constituents and people across Canada.

In its own platform, the Reform Party promised Canadians adequate punishment for young offenders. I look forward to its support for this bill because it keeps that promise as well.

The majority of our young people know that hard work and education will be the key for their success. They want to contribute to making our country better and to be a part of the Canadian dream. They want children of their own.

For their sake and for ours, I will support Bill C–37 and call on this House to vote in favour of this bill; legislation that aids, helps, assists and encourages our children and our future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It now being 5.55 p.m., the House will proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of providing a fairer future for Atlantic Canada by adopting policies and programs to create jobs through initiative funds for co–operatives, encouraging small business, upgrading municipal infrastructures and diversifying single industry communities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I begin by thanking the member for Moncton for seconding my motion. Basically, as the motion indicates, I am calling on the government to consider the advisability of providing a fairer future for Atlantic Canada by adopting policies and programs to create jobs through initiative funds for co–operatives, encouraging small business, upgrading municipal infrastructures and diversifying single industry communities.

Basically this motion is broad enough to include a major reassessment of government policy toward Atlantic Canada, a reassessment of whether those policies have been successful and an opportunity to consider maybe doing things in a rather different way.

What I will do is not spend too much time on the problems but put forward some ideas for solutions. I will draw upon the recent experience in Saskatchewan and British Columbia with regard to mechanisms for bringing together diverse groups in our society with the aim of building a vision for the future to which we can all be committed and to which we can then direct government policy and regulation.

Atlantic Canada has long been a region dependent on its natural resources and on the involvement of the public sector. Both have been allowed to decline as government policies and private sector decisions have conspired to create an environment that undermines long term development and sustainability of many of the communities and economies of the region.

The economic and political policies of the past that have resulted in the underdevelopment of the Atlantic region must be challenged and overcome. Policies that have promoted the export of unprocessed and semi–processed resources along with jobs that otherwise might be involved in that value added activity must be replaced with value added production and the skilled jobs that accompany those processes.

This will require the federal and provincial governments to be much more involved with the local communities in reaching this goal. Also we have to be cognizant of the impact of federal cutbacks over the last decade to the support structure of both rural and urban life in Atlantic Canada and be prepared to respond to those extra difficulties.

The future course of economic development must begin with the involvement of people in their communities working with their governments. This will require a new partnership with the federal government, the people, the communities and institutions; a partnership unlike any relationship that currently exists in Atlantic Canada.

In order to make that relationship work we must commit ourselves to some real and achievable goals. It should not be unreasonable to expect in Atlantic Canada that we move toward full employment; that we move toward a full opportunity economy which builds on the diversity of Atlantic Canada and ensures the full participation of women, youth, aboriginal people, visible minorities and people with disabilities.

It should be within our realm of opportunity to consider the importance of community involvement and the community control of economic decision–making. We should be building an economy based on environmentally sustainable economic principles. Nowhere other than in the Atlantic provinces have we seen the impact of not ensuring that our economic policies are environmentally sustainable.

We should be able to ensure the protection and the improvement of our social programs to support Atlantic Canadians in their times of difficulty between jobs and particularly now when we see that a major resource is simply not there to support the population as it did previously.

We need a new emphasis on co–operative development, an emphasis that places people and their communities ahead of corporate profit. We also need transportation systems that meet the needs of the regions so that products made within the region can effectively be moved to markets.

Atlantic regional development is not just about increasing incomes. Development is a process by which human capabilities and natural resources combine to fulfil social, cultural, political, psychological and material needs. This is a process in which increased self–reliance, independence of individuals, communities and the region are achieved by building on the strength that thrives on the interdependence of equals.

As someone who lived in Atlantic Canada for more than a decade, there are no more independent people in the country, wanting to work together for the benefit of all rather than work against each other so that only a few benefit.

Development can only be sustained if it strengthens the social fabric, building a consensus as to goals, values and means and focusing on increased productivity and the needs and potential of those in society, particularly the most disadvantaged. An integral component of real economic development strategy for

Atlantic Canada is the reduction of the inequity of incomes and the removal of the pain of poverty for so many of our citizens. It is clear from the writings of a wide range of economists that inequality of income is a major drain on economic growth.

These goals of building together will only be achieved if the process is from the bottom up, with people participating in the decisions that affect them. People in communities must recognize that they have a capacity and a responsibility to shape and direct the development process at all levels. That capacity and responsibility must be encouraged through the planning process and through the role that government plays.

The regional development policies of previous governments have always been controlled from the top down. Surely we believe that people in the community have the best interests of that community at heart. People who are rooted in a community have the most at stake in evaluating and encouraging sustainable development. It is critical that we use that resource, that understanding and that community commitment. We should support community economic development that gives communities a true sense of ownership and increases local control over the economy.

It has been very clear that allowing people to come in from outside, reap the profits and leave is a devastating strategy and one that has long term negative effects, not long term beneficial effects. As much as possible development should be owned and managed locally, be located within the community, provide work for local people, make use of local materials and serve community needs for products and services. The best types of economic development activities are those that maintain a community focus.

Let me make one more general comment with regard to this. If economic development is to work in Atlantic Canada it must pursue the principle of economic self–reliance. It is no longer possible in this country, if it ever was possible, to maintain industries and economic units that are no longer efficient. We need to pursue a principle of economic self–reliance, harnessing all of its resources to both determine and meet the needs of the people of Atlantic Canada. As I have said, that means the control of the resources and economic institutions must be much more firmly in the hands of Atlantic Canadians.

In order to ensure that community economic development objectives are met, one strategy would be to encourage the development of locally based community development organizations. They could represent all sectors of the community. Their function could be to oversee discussions, decisions and implementation of development projects.

This would ensure that the communities, in co–operation with the private and public sectors, would be instrumental in making decisions about the kind of development that would occur and would be able to ensure the community would benefit most from that development.

They could be coalitions of local, social, business, financial and labour organizations, as well as co–operatives and governments. They could perform the function of co–ordinating development within those various regions. They could be responsible for the allocation of whatever public funds might be available within those regions to ensure that those funds are used to the best possible advantage.

One very good example of how this could work is in Cape Breton. An organization called New Dawn Enterprises, which I have visited in the past, has assisted in developing a network of firms and facilities throughout Cape Breton. This development corporation holds assets of some $10 million and has become involved in a very wide range of activities from construction to real estate to care for the elderly. There are examples within Atlantic Canada we could learn from and utilize across the whole region.

Across Atlantic Canada there is a large, effective, efficient and responsive network of co–operatives we could also build on. Atlantic Canadians have built a co–operative movement which attests to their resilience and creativity in the face of adversity. Those co–operatives maintain jobs in the communities, provide services to the communities and provide local control to ensure that local needs are met. People have a stake in those enterprises and they often are more productive as a result.

It is necessary to ensure, at both the federal and provincial levels of government, that we remove any barriers to co–operative development and that we ensure and encourage the development of co–operatives across the region.

This is clearly an integral part of the development of Atlantic Canada. In the last decade, 1980 to 1989, small firms created 90 per cent of the new jobs in Atlantic Canada, while large firms saw reductions in employment capacities.

A report that was done by Enterprise Cape Breton found it was locally based operations which were the most successful. Projects that received $100,000 or less in the form of support had a success rate of 72 per cent, at an average cost of $23,000 per job, while those projects receiving $1 million or more had a failure rate of 71 per cent, with an average cost of $154,000 per job. The proof in Atlantic Canada is that it is small business that is going to create jobs, and it is small business on which we should focus our activities.

The agencies that we have in operation in Atlantic Canada also need to be reconsidered. As I have pointed out they have not worked very well. Their support, in large sums of money, to large enterprises have not given benefit to the community as one would have wanted. However, support in small sums to small businesses have done so. We need to ensure that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency really becomes an advocate for employment creation and economic development in the region and is not used, as it has been in that past, as a political slush fund. We need to reconsider and reassess the agencies that we use as arms of government in the development of Atlantic Canada.

I have talked about co–operatives but credit unions also have an important role in Atlantic Canada and we need to encourage them as well. I will give one example of a real success story to show how credit unions can really contribute to the economic development of the region.

In 1984, in Eagle River, Labrador, the Bank of Montreal closed its branch saying it was no longer a viable operation, which is a fairly familiar picture across Canada. With the aid of the Labrador Fishermen's Union Shrimp Company the community was able to establish its own credit union. In fact, it had the co–operation of the caisse populaire located in the neighbouring Quebec community. The credit union has been able to provide basic essential financial services to people in that area.

In the less than four years that this financial institution has existed it has provided more than $3 million in loans to local residents. It is a viable, profitable and locally owned enterprise, showing that credit unions can have a major role to play in the development of Atlantic Canada and across the country.

We should do what we can to support and nurture credit unions, especially those that are small and just beginning and need some support. There are many things that we can do. For example, governments could use credit unions much more than they do now as the depositories of funds or as their current accounts.

Much of Atlantic Canada is made up of single industry towns. Those are vulnerable communities, vulnerable economic units. Atlantic Canada is fortunate to have such resources in our communities but they must be managed by those who have the greatest stake in ensuring the long term viability of those resources in those communities, the people themselves.

Several resource based industries are in crisis and we should not tolerate that situation any longer. The most obvious of course is the fishery. Many of us today received representations indicating that a stock that had not been fished all that much in the past, turbot, is now under serious threat as a result of overfishing. It is important for Canada to exert its jurisdictional power to make sure that this resource does not go the way of the cod stocks which we all know so much about.

It is important for single industry towns, based on natural resources and non–renewable resources, to be much more effectively upgraded in the interest of the communities in which they operate.

I will not say any more about the fisheries. We all know what a disaster that has been. It is primarily a disaster because of federal policy mismanagement over the last few years, something we cannot do anything about now but something we do have to remember and treat as a lesson in the future.

The same sorts of concerns can be expressed about the forestry industry. In comparison to forestry industries in the rest of the world, a great proportion of forestry in Atlantic Canada is privately owned: New Brunswick, 49 per cent; Nova Scotia, about 70 per cent. This resource has not been used for the benefit of those living in Atlantic Canada but rather to benefit the corporations that control it and, which incidentally, pursue forestry practices that in their home countries they would not be able to pursue.

Therefore, we have to ensure that resource is also one for the benefit of the communities in question and for the benefit of Atlantic Canada. It must be developed in a way that is sustainable, to provide jobs and economic opportunities for Atlantic Canadians well into the future and ensure that young people from Atlantic Canada do not have to leave their homes in order to find economic opportunity.

In my last few moments I would like to make a quick reference to developments in two provinces and two resource based provinces which might be of use in considering how to develop Atlantic Canada. Let me first take the example of British Columbia and the arrangements that have been made there in order to develop the forestry industry.

We know that in the past there has been enormous tension between the forestry companies and environmentalists, between communities and environmentalists, the workers in the forestry industry and environmentalists. We know we have to resolve those differences.

What British Columbia did in a unique way was bring those different interests together and work with them to find a vision for the future of that region. Everyone made sacrifices and everyone gained. However, in the end there was a common vision adopted to which everyone could be committed and to which everyone could work. That is the clear focus. We have to change the way in which we consider economic development. We have to make sure we all work together to the best advantage of all.

I would certainly recommend that B.C. approach Atlantic Canadians and the federal–provincial governments, labour unions within the province, the business community, the communities themselves and environmentalists within Atlantic Canada. That should be pursued as a goal for economic opportunity development in the region.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as an Atlantic Canadian it is a pleasure to speak on this motion. The motion by the NDP member strikes to the core of what we are talking about in Atlantic Canada as we try to improve our lot and to become a have part of our country.

I would like to talk about the infrastructure program. I would also like to talk about my own community of greater Moncton. It shares some of the problems alluded to in the motion, particularly having a single industry. The Canadian National Railway employed upward of 5,000 people and will effectively close. What does that mean to a community such as Moncton and what we have been able to do both on our own and with assistance? I will quickly talk about the infrastructure program and then move on to my own experiences.

The infrastructure program is near and dear to my heart. In my other life as mayor and councillor of the city of Moncton, I had the good fortune to be on the Federation of Canadian Municipalities task force dealing with infrastructure. It was a program which was advocated for many years and it took the Liberal government to actually put it into effect. We are seeing massive benefits throughout the country, particularly in Atlantic Canada.

In my own riding of Moncton we were given roughly $4 million of federal funding for the infrastructure program. To date with the projects that we have on the go in our community, we are going to see an investment of roughly $30 million.

For a Canadian federal government program, seeing an investment of $4 million turn into $30 million is an investment and not an expenditure. That is why the infrastructure program works in Atlantic Canada. That is why it is of benefit.

I would like to refer the House to some of the things that are happening as a result of the infrastructure program in Atlantic Canada. These agreements represent a total federal investment in the Atlantic region of $181 million. That in turn will generate equal investments on behalf of the provinces and the municipalities for a total investment of $540 million into the Atlantic economy resulting from the Canada infrastructure program.

It is estimated that over 9,500 person years of employment will be created in the region, both on and off the project sites across Atlantic Canada. As of December 31, 1994 over 575 projects have already been approved in Atlantic Canada. This represents a total investment of $450 million in the Atlantic Canada economy and will create over 7,300 jobs in the region.

Projects under way under the infrastructure agreements in the Atlantic region range from installation and upgrading of sewer systems to rebuilding roadways and linking up public schools to the electronic highway.

More than 60 per cent of the federal dollars committed in the Atlantic region are for water and sewer projects. Almost 12 per cent of the federal investment is to construct and repair municipal roads. Another 16 per cent is committed for community based projects. High technology projects are also being supported and account for 4 per cent of the federal government contribution.

Those are all good projects, projects that really make things happen in Atlantic Canada. That is why the infrastructure program is a success.

We are looking for partnerships. We are looking for spinoffs associated with this program. That is what we have done in my riding of Moncton and what we have done throughout Atlantic Canada.

When we see an investment of roughly $200 million in Atlantic Canada spinning off to roughly $600 million and then going higher to $800 million and $900 million, this is an investment, not an expenditure.

We listen to Reform Party members on their position with respect to the infrastructure program but mind you, they still take the dollars when it comes to their ridings. When we listen to what they say about Atlantic Canada and where we should be, the Reform Party is of the view that the only solution offered to Atlantic Canada is to tell them to move. "Get them out of Atlantic Canada," is the Reform Party solution.

To quote the Reform Party again, its finance critic says: "The rest of Canada is not prepared to foot the bill for Atlantic Canada". There is no bill. We are making a contribution in this country. We are making things happen and the Reform Party's view is: "Tell them to move". Shame on them.

To quote the Reform Party's budget on page 34: "There would be some short term costs associated with fiscal retrenchment. These costs would come primarily in the form of adjustments that economic sectors and regions of our economy most dependent on government transfers would have to make". The code words: Atlantic Canada.

Going on to page 36: "Under the Reform budget, the short term employment impact of spending and deficit reduction is negative but manageable". It will not be manageable in Atlantic Canada if it goes through with its program to eliminate ACOA, which has created 42,000 jobs in its first five years and has stimulated major private sector investments of $2.4 billion.

ACOA pays for itself. It is an investment that generates $4.2 dollars of benefit for every dollar of public funding spent.

We are not prepared to sign on to the Reform Party budget that would see 65,000 Atlantic Canadians out of work over the next five years. We are not signing on for the principle that we should move somewhere else because Atlantic Canada, in my humble opinion, is the best place in all of Canada in which to live.

I want to talk about a community that has pulled itself up by the bootstraps. That is my community of greater Moncton. We experienced the upper Canadian and western Canada view that we should just shut down everything in Atlantic Canada. We lost Eaton's catalogue, Swift's and the Canadian National Railway Company. They were all major employers in our community.

We turned around and made investments in our community. We made investments in our downtown and in a new way of doing things. Arising out of those investments now is the fastest growing community in Atlantic Canada, greater Moncton. For the edification of the Reform Party The Wall Street Journal wrote about the community of greater Moncton: "It is the call centre for North America. It is the centre that is showing the way, the new wave of the new economy, to the rest of Canada and to North America".

An hon. member: They are not real jobs.

Mr. Rideout: They are real jobs. We are employing people. On top of that, we recognized that we were a bilingual community and that was an asset. We built on l'Université de Moncton, on the bilingual nature of our community. Now we are employing people and making things happen.

These people do not want to move. They want to stay in Moncton. They want to stay in Atlantic Canada. We even have people coming from British Columbia who now want to live in our community. We are seeing a migration to Moncton rather than away from it.

I say to Reform Party members: They should rethink their budget and their approach to regional development. Recognize that Atlantic Canada is a great place to be. It is going to be a have part of this country in the not too distant future because we are taking advantage of those investments this Liberal government is giving us. That is why we support this motion.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as the official opposition critic on regional development, I rise to participate in this debate on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

First of all, I feel that elected representatives from all parts of Canada are all concerned about economic development. This is extremely important under the current economic conditions, especially since we know that it is essential to create jobs to stop stagnating and start moving toward economic and structural development.

I am a little surprised by the motion. This motion respecting federal assistance for Atlantic Canada's economic development, which was put forward by my colleague from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, touches on, among other things, the importance of a better future for the Maritimes. This concern is quite commendable, in my opinion.

With all due respect, this motion reflects a certain lack of knowledge about the federal government's regional development policies and about Quebec's traditional demands regarding regional development.

I wish to state in this House my position on this motion concerning equity in federal contributions to Atlantic Canada's regional development. The Bloc Quebecois must, of course, show some opposition to such a motion.

Allow me in the next few minutes to elaborate on some of the reasons why Quebec must give priority to its own regional development.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency or ACOA is the federal government's main regional development agency in Atlantic Canada. The ACOA mostly deals with small business, helping to launch new ventures and modernize existing companies. On November 30, 1993, the federal government's contribution amounted to $865 million out of the total $1 billion budget forecast, or $431 per capita.

Until very recently, the federal government's main regional development agency in Quebec was the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec or FORDQ. Since the FORDQ was created in 1991, its mandate has been to emphasize long-term economic development and job creation.

However, given its limited financial resources, the FORDQ will pay more attention to small business by offering information and analysis services and promoting exports. This is a far cry from the basic principles of local development.

Under these circumstances, why would Quebec want to invest additional public funds in Atlantic Canada? On July 20, 1994, the federal government's share—close to $350 million—had still not been committed in Quebec. The total budget for the economic and regional development agreement is $1.6 billion, or, and this is the total budget, $64 per capita in Quebec.

In Western Canada, in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, Western Economic Diversification Canada or WED is the main federal vehicle for regional development.

As of November 30, 1993, spending under these programs totalled $936 million. The ERDA provides for a budget of $1.12 billion or $160 per capita. That is, very briefly, what regional development looks like in Canada, and I want the hon. member to pay attention to these figures and this breakdown of federal regional development assistance.

There is no common standard for the West, the Maritimes and Quebec. The federal contribution to these agreements is $64 per capita in Quebec, compared to $160 in the western provinces and $431 in the Atlantic provinces.

So why should Quebec support a motion that would increase federal assistance to the Atlantic provinces, when some provinces seem to be more equal than others?

The 1993 and 1994 Estimates indicate that the federal government spends less on regional development in Quebec than anywhere else. In fact, the budget for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is $314 million, the budget for the Department of Western Economic Diversification is $238 million, and the budget for the FORDQ is $232 million.

However, the total population of these other provinces is less than the total population of Quebec.

In his last budget, the finance minister announced a cut of $70 million in the subsidies and contributions for the FORDQ. Quebec's regions are the big losers as far as federal funding is concerned. Since 1983, annual federal funding for regional development increased only 50 per cent in Quebec, but 250 per cent in the Maritimes and 300 per cent in the West.

In other words, through the federal government, Quebec funds regional development programs and policies it is not in a position to implement in its own regions. The 1993–94 budget for the Quebec Regional Affairs Secretariat is for $71 million, while Quebec's part under agreements concluded with the west and the maritimes amounts to $550 million, or 25 per cent of the $2.2 billion federal budget.

Ottawa's regional development policies are clearly discriminatory toward Quebec. If the amount Quebec receives from the federal government in transfer payments and for all kinds of national programs is approximately equal to the tax it pays to the federal government, this is among other things thanks to transfer payments earmarked for income security and the unemployment insurance program. In other words, for want of a true regional development policy in Quebec, the federal government is maintaining poverty and unemployment there. This is why Quebec is calling for and has for years called for the repatriation of all regional development responsibilities. The Bloc Quebecois therefore has no choice but to oppose a motion entailing an increase in moneys for regional development in the maritimes.

Regional development is of course not a distinct area of jurisdiction in the Canadian constitution, as a result of which Quebec is forced to engage in endless negotiations to arrive at agreements. Unfailingly, these agreements ultimately authorize the federal government to interfere repeatedly and awkwardly in regional development. It is interference. The regions in Quebec suffer from duplication of efforts in regional development matters and from the lack of consistency in government policy.

Which brings us back to what the present Liberal government is doing, namely structural duplication giving rise to considerable operating costs as opposed to real investments in development, as well as multiplicity of government parties involved which frequently results in confusion among regional stakeholders. Quebec has adopted an overall regional development plan, an overall plan for each of its sixteen administrative regions. This is why, and justly so, it wants to get back from the federal government the resources it should receive for regional development. Let us first establish fairness in redistributing federal moneys for regional development before broaching the subject of the gap between what Quebec and other regions in Canada receive.

[English]

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to the motion. It was not clear to me in the original motion whether or not the suggestion was being made to put more money into Atlantic Canada. If that is the case we would oppose it.

There is much talk about what Atlantic Canada needs. The proposer of the motion suggested full employment. Whilst full employment would be good for Atlantic Canada, I suggest that it would be good across the country. However the full employment goal will not be achieved. Regardless of how much is spent in the country or how good the opportunities are, full employment is unachievable.

The presenter of the motion also said that regional development policies and programs have been managed from the top down. That is so. ACOA is a prime example. Western Economic Diversification is another example as is FORD–Q.

For labour and communities to co–ordinate how we are to improve the economy in Atlantic Canada is a good avenue, but it is also a good avenue to pursue right across the country. Co–operatives are in existence so these things can happen if the people want them to happen. That kind of activity does not need government intervention.

The mover of the motion suggested the fisheries problems in Atlantic Canada were a result of government bungling. We all know that to be so on both the east coast and west coast. That is unfortunate. The less government we have in the country the better off we will be. To try to increase government is not the way to go.

The proposer of the motion also suggested that young people should not have to leave home. While that again is nice to say, the reality is that young people leave home. Young people go where there is work. Young people leave home for various reasons. To expect young people to stay in Atlantic Canada any more than they do in the towns of Ontario, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or wherever is unrealistic.

I am quite impressed with the skills of the provincial governments in Atlantic Canada. Frank McKenna in New Brunswick impressed the nation with some of his moves to get business into New Brunswick. Clyde Wells in Newfoundland is also making good innovative approaches to improve its economy. That is what really needs to happen. It is up to the people themselves. I do not think the federal government necessarily plays a big role in this activity.

One of the real potentials I see in Atlantic Canada is the cost of land and housing. For example, young people growing up in the area I come from in the lower mainland of British Columbia cannot afford to buy houses or to buy land. It is just too expensive for them. I see the day when young people will be going back to the eastern part of the country. They will look to where there are appropriate housing costs. They will look to where they can buy land, live and raise families. The potential of Atlantic Canada will be much greater in the future because of the natural evolution of the country. As a result of the younger generation moving we will see jobs being created. In areas like the lower mainland of British Columbia we will see an outflow of younger people for that reason.

Where there are successes there are failures. We only have to look at some of the activities of ACOA to see failures in the nation as far as regional development and western economic diversification are concerned. It is a presumption of government that it knows best how to spend our money.

The minister responsible for ACOA recently said that there would be no grants. A lot of that came from the pressure we put on the government. As a result we now have ACOA giving out loans that basically FBDB should be giving out. Why ACOA is not cancelled today is difficult to understand. There are institutions in the country that can look after the affairs ACOA used to look after or the new responsibilities of ACOA. We need not have that bureaucracy in existence.

I look forward to seeing what the Minister of Finance will do next Monday with the operations of ACOA, Western Economic Diversification and FORD–Q if he is truly interested in making some positive changes in the country.

Atlantic Canada needs less government, not more government.

Owners of some businesses who receive grants, and they are the minority of businesses, will not say that. When we really get down to the people who are paying the taxes for the money going to those businesses, they are saying: "Look, we would rather have the money in our pockets. Create businesses and create wealth from our perspective. Don't give it to the friends of the recipients over there".

The hon. member for Moncton talked about infrastructure. He suggested that infrastructure was an investment and not a cost. I have the greatest of difficulty with that philosophy. The infrastructure started by the Liberal government came into place as a result of its commitment to jobs, jobs, jobs.

The Liberals said that they were going to spend $2 billion at the federal level and $2 billion at the provincial level if they chipped in. Also the municipalities were to throw in $2 billion. What was not acknowledged was that there was only one taxpayer paying this money. The government took over a $40 billion deficit, $40 billion of overspending, and then said that it would spend some more. It was going to borrow another $6 billion from taxpayers to start an infrastructure program to show the whole country it could create jobs.

Yes, it did. It created short term jobs. In the long run that is unhealthy for the country. It does not help at all. Only when we have a continuous infrastructure can it be of benefit to the country. We cannot have it continuously because we are borrowing too much money. We have too high a debt load.

It was patently wrong for the hon. member for Moncton to suggest that bad Reformers over here were treating Atlantic Canadians indifferently or incorrectly because they were against infrastructure. The fact is that the infrastructure is not good for taxpayers across the country regardless of what province they live in.

I trust the motion is not asking for more money. I trust it speaks to the fact that Atlantic Canadians can help themselves just like anybody else anywhere in the country. All the more credit to them.

If we want to look at ingenuity in the country we can look at Atlantic Canada where the provinces for years have had less money than many other provinces. They seem to dig down, dig deep, work hard, innovate and come up with answers that many of us across the country should be looking at and following. We should be using some of their initiative. Hats off to Premier

Frank McKenna. He is on the right track as far as any government in the land is concerned.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to speak in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing who has spent some time in his past life in my riding of Halifax.

I thank him for his motion because it is refreshing to finally hear some understanding of Atlantic Canada being expressed by members on the other side. Also, the motion serves as an important reminder to government members as well as we enter into the final days before our budget.

The motion voices the belief shared by the vast majority of Canadians and promoted by the government that there is a vibrant future for Atlantic Canada and that it has much to contribute, as it always has, to the future of the country. Government has a role to play to ensure a fairer, more equitable and just future for Atlantic Canada by encouraging policies and programs to create jobs through initiative funds for co–operatives, encouraging small business, upgrading municipal infrastructure and diversifying single industry communities.

Never before has it been so important for government to provide the encouragement and framework for economic self–reliance. Given the current fiscal situation, government is faced with doing more for Canadians with ever fewer resources. Canadians expect their government to approach economic development with a keener business sense, expecting greater returns on their investment.

This is why the motion is so important. It underscores the innovative and productive ways in which the federal government, in partnership with the provinces, the private sector, communities and most important of all the people, can kindle and encourage the entrepreneurial spirit in Atlantic Canada.

It is also timely, coming as it does in the wake of the thinly veiled attack on Atlantic Canada by members of the Reform Party with the release of that manifesto yesterday. The Atlantic culture, its way of life, the vibrant entrepreneurial spirit, must be kindled, encouraged and recognized for what it really is: strong, proud and independent. Our national policies must reflect this reality.

Unlike the Reform Party, we cannot afford to base government policies on offensive stereotypes. The Reform Party in past comments by its MPs and in its manifesto on deficit reduction released yesterday attempts to propagate the ignorant stereotype that Atlantic Canada is a wasteland filled with dependent and enslaved welfare recipients and working stiffs who are a drain on the national treasury and economy, and the italics are theirs.

As an Atlantic Canadian I find these gross generalizations very offensive, but then again why should I expect anything different? We hear policies on women, on the family and on race that are a testament to the fact that the Reform Party prefers ideologically driven false assumptions. Sure, if stereotypes held true the world's problems would be a lot simpler to deal with but reality constantly confirms that they are not true.

When a regionally based political party from the west recommends solutions based on untrue stereotypes of a group of people who live in another region of the country we have the makings for divisive, dangerous and destructive debate.

Those of us from the region know that nothing can be further from the truth. By perpetrating these offensive stereotypes the Reform Party is attacking the very foundation of Atlantic Canada. It is maligning the region's hard working men and women. We must recognize that the people of Atlantic Canada are the key to economic development, the people who have lived and laboured and not only survived but flourished in this region over the last half millennium and longer in the case of our aboriginal peoples.

As elected representatives we have a responsibility now more than ever to promote and protect their interests here in Ottawa; their real interests, not those imagined interests seen through the lens of destructive stereotypes.

For the Reform Party the solution to Atlantic Canada is simple. It wants a government sponsored and enforced migration program. Again, this is confirmed in the document released yesterday and in statements made by members of its caucus. They advocate that UI and other benefits be dependent on the willingness to relocate.

The Reform MP from Capilano—Howe Sound is quoted as saying people should be moving to jobs and the rest of Canada is not prepared to foot the bill for the alleged dependency in the Atlantic region.

These approaches would make government a destructive force in the lives of Atlantic Canadians as opposed to a catalyst for economic and social development.

For that reason I would like to speak today about Atlantic Canada, about the diversity of its economy, the aspirations of its people and the real future that we in Atlantic Canada are working toward.

Members of the Reform would do well to listen and perhaps, although unlikely, learn something about the region. The government has a role and I would like to provide some examples of areas where we have been successful.

We in the government recognize that the people of Atlantic Canada are the key. I can think of no greater example of community based grassroots development initiatives than those of the co–operative movement which was founded in Atlantic Canada. It is recognized as one of the region's major economic players despite its modest beginnings. Today co–operatives are involved in financial services, insurance, consumer products, manufacturing, processing, housing projects and in various worker owned co–ops.

Their strength can be summarized in a few words: knowledge of the people and the community. Their innovation is reflected in some recent senior housing developments and the introduction four years ago of a venture capital funding instrument by the caisse populaire movement in New Brunswick, to cite but a few.

Experience in Europe and elsewhere demonstrates the amazing potential for this type of initiative to contribute to economic development.

Approximately 750,000 people, 30 per cent of the Atlantic population, are members of or use the services of co–operatives. Five hundred thousand Atlantic Canadians are members of credit unions and caisses populaires which administer $2.4 billion in assets in the region. They employ 2,000 people. Insurance co–ops have another 477 employees; consumer co–operatives, 2,400 employees. The major co–operative employer, however, is the producer co–operative, with close to 6,000 employees.

I want to stress that a co–operative is more than a business. Its raison d'être is the economic and social betterment of its members and the community. The human aspect takes a central role with the co–operative movement and this is a real asset. Approximately 11,000 Atlantic Canadians are employed in this system; a major employer by any standard.

In the area of small business we have great success in Atlantic Canada. It is the engine of economic growth throughout Canada, most particularly in the Atlantic region. Small business and the growth of new business is alive and well. The rate of small business start–ups has continued to grow. The number of small businesses, those with fewer than 100 employees, grew to 83,000 from 53,000 in the ten–year period from 1981 to 1991. The number of large businesses with more than 500 employees decreased marginally. We are experiencing an unprecedented increase in the business start–up rate and job creation in Atlantic Canada.

The number one priority of this government has been robust in the maritimes with the inception of the Canada infrastructure works program, a program which it seems is singularly difficult for the members opposite to grasp.

As of December 31 over 575 programs have been approved in Atlantic Canada, from installing and upgrading sewer systems to rebuilding roadways. This represents investments of $450 million and will create over 7,300 jobs in the region.

The government has made its number one priority to restore the dignity of Canadians by putting them back to work. This government received an overwhelming mandate from Canadians in every region to do just that.

The minister responsible for ACOA said recently that what is good for Atlantic Canada is good for all of Canada. I know that Reform members have difficulty with this. That is because they do not have a national vision and they do not share the Canadian belief that we must continue to work together in every region of the country toward economic and social development.

I am delighted to speak in support of this motion. I am delighted to stand in this House and explode some of the myths perpetrated about Atlantic Canadians by members on the opposite side. I am delighted to speak, in particular, about co–operatives, coming from the province of Nova Scotia, the home of Monsignor Moses Coady and Father James Tompkins, the fathers of the co–operative movement worldwide.

It is a proud thing to be an Atlantic Canadian. It is a great thing to be an Atlantic Canadian standing in this House representing other Atlantic Canadians. I invite members on the other side who do not seem to understand that pride, that heritage, that culture and that future to come see us. We will show you where the real world is.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There being no further members rising for debate and the motion not being designated as a votable item, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired, and the order is dropped from the Order Paper pursuant to Standing Order 96.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

DAIRY FARMERS

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the United States is getting ready to encroach on an area and our farmers are not at all happy about it. In Quebec, farmers know what supply management means.

In December 1993, I participated in an information session put on by the UPA in Beauce. The meeting was held in Saint–Georges. We were told, with input by Yvon Proulx, senior economist at the UPA, that, under the GATT, we were going to have to drop milk quotas, which would be replaced by import tariffs. These import tariffs would be so high that they would prevent, to all intents and purposes, the entry of supply management commodities, such as dairy products, eggs and poultry.

Both the farmers and I were sceptical, but the UPA kept on repeating that the freshly elected Liberal government had given guarantees.

However, Canada and the United States each have their own interpretation of the FTA and NAFTA. On the one hand, we have Canada, which claims that converting import quotas for dairy products into tariff equivalents, as the GATT agreements stipulate, takes precedence. On the other, we have our American friends, who claim that NAFTA prohibits the use of tariff equivalents.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister assured me "from one Chrétien to another" that he would bring the issue before a WTO panel if the Americans did not stop pestering Quebecers and Canadians. Today, I would like to remind the government that, under the GATT agreement, Canada's agricultural tariffs for each commodity will be reduced by 36 per cent over six years, with a minimum reduction of 15 per cent per commodity. That is what was promised to farmers in order to let the GATT be passed, in December 1993.

By July 1995, therefore in a few months, the tariffs should be as follows, to quote a few: butter, 351 per cent; cheese, 290 per cent; powdered milk, 250 per cent; chicken, 280 per cent; eggs, which have the lowest tariff, 192 per cent; milk, 283 per cent and ice cream, 326 per cent.

These high tariffs will protect producers in Quebec and Canada for several years to come, despite tariff reductions of 15 per cent to 36 per cent over the next six years.

The important thing for our farmers is not to produce but to secure markets for their products. That is why this government must stand up and show once and for all that, under section 309 of NAFTA, Canada can invoke section XI of the GATT agreement to protect its agricultural industry. I hope that this government will show more backbone than it did in the durum wheat dispute last summer.

Supply management is nothing new in Canada. In fact, dairy products have been supply managed since 1972. There were then 17 cows in the average dairy herd, compared with 48 today.

We must remember that, in 1971 and before, farmers had a little bit of everything. They used to keep three or four pigs, one or two horses, beef and dairy cows, sheep, chickens; it was almost a zoo.

Today, our farmers specialize in pork, dairy, poultry and other products. We asked our farmers to specialize in order to become competitive and they took up the challenge. To meet this challenge, they must have a decent income and know how much they can expect to receive in 1995 and 1996, and not a widely fluctuating income. Supply management offers dairy producers some income stability.

I know that my question will be answered by the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings on behalf of the Prime Minister, but I hope that he will take these demands under consideration. I know that the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings is very familiar with all agricultural sectors and that he, too, is very sensitive to farmers' concerns. I, for one, can tell you that farmers would never have agreed, in December 1993, had they known that this import tariff agreement would be so fragile.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments tonight. I can assure him that we heard what he has said. We heard what his representatives have said and we heard what the supply management industry has said.

Yesterday the hon. member asked the Prime Minister whether he plans on telling President Clinton that Canada has no intention of negotiating bilaterally any reduction in the tariff equivalents that were negotiated in the Uruguay round and then implemented by Canada.

As the Prime Minister stated very clearly in his response to the member, our application of tariff equivalents on supply managed commodities that were negotiated in the Uruguay round is fully consistent with our rights under both GATT and NAFTA.

We are satisfied that our legal position is sound and we will continue to hold firm on our position. This message will be conveyed to President Clinton by the Prime Minister during President Clinton's visit to Canada and to this House to speak tomorrow. The Prime Minister, as we know, will be meeting with President Clinton for the next two days.

During the FTA, NAFTA and multilateral trade negotiations, Canada's position was that we would not make any concessions that would undermine supply management. This position is reflected in all those agreements.

Tariffication was a central issue during the Uruguay round. It was clear that these tariff equivalents would apply to all imports, including those from the United States.

The United States has requested consultation and it should be seen as just that; a request to meet and discuss the issues. It is the first step in the dispute settlement process. If the United States so desires, it may eventually seek to resolve the issue by way of a panel under either NAFTA or the WTO or as it is otherwise known, GATT. This, however, does not preclude Canada from requesting a panel in either NAFTA or the WTO, if we so desire.

I would like to point out again to the member that the Prime Minister met with the representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, including representatives from supply management agencies, and including the president of the UPA who was present at that meeting on Monday of this week.

He indicated very clearly that Canada has a strong, legal case and that Canada would ardently defend its rights regarding the tariffication of import measures on supply managed commodities.

JUSTICE

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to expand on my question today to the Minister of Justice on family violence.

When I talk about family violence I am not talking only about violence against women. I am talking about violence against the elderly, violence against the handicapped, violence against children, and yes, sometimes violence against men. I am not talking only about physical abuse or physical violence. I am talking about mental abuse, emotional abuse, sexual abuse, and sometimes financial abuse in terms of dependency.

I have held two forums on family violence in my riding. They were attended by about 80 presenters from all walks of life, such as from the mental health field, family law, crown attorneys, police chiefs, counsellors, educators, and victims of violence.

One thing that came through very loud and clear from the forums is that there is definitely a lack of awareness in our society on family violence. There was consensus that as a government we have to do something to make Canadians aware of the gravity and the prevalence of violence in our society.

A lot of questions were asked. For instance, when there is a family violence situation, why do we remove the victims and the children and put them in a shelter and the abuser or offender is free?

I believe, as was the consensus during the forums, that there is a real need to conduct some national forums on family violence. The purpose of those forums would be to create awareness. In my next householder I intend to give numbers to assist people in knowing where to find help. A lot of victims do not know where to turn, especially in the rural areas of Canada.

During the course of my forums the media: radio, television and newspapers talked about them. Many victims came out of the woodwork to seek help. If we can create awareness by the forums, we will have achieved at least part of our goal.

The second goal of having such forums would be to develop, in consultation with all parties involved, a set of recommendations. What changes can we make to the Criminal Code to prevent family violence? What changes can we make to the administration of justice? What support programs can we implement, not only for the victims of family violence but also for the offenders?

I can already hear members of the Reform Party saying that this is going to cost money. These forums can be organized in a very cost effective manner. All we actually need are two co–chairs, preferably a man and a woman, a support staff from the justice department and perhaps from the minister for the status of women. We could ask members in each riding to look after the logistics of organizing the forums, to advertise and to find a venue.

We would need only a very small travelling budget for three or four persons and maybe have 20 or 25 of those forums across the country. A small amount of money like that would be well spent in protecting our children, our elderly and the lives of women in this country.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice shares the hon. member's concern and commitment to addressing the serious problem of family violence.

Recent examples of the justice minister's commitment include Bill C–42 which was proclaimed on February 15, 1995 and amended the Criminal Code peace bond provisions to help prevent acts of family violence before they occur. These amendments will allow police and others to apply on behalf of persons at risk of harm for a peace bond. They will also enable the court to specify the conditions that can be imposed as part of the peace bond including, for example, prohibiting the husband from being at or near the family home or from communicating with his wife.

These amendments also make the breach of a peace bond more serious by making it punishable on indictment and liable to imprisonment for a maximum term of two years instead of the previous summary conviction maximum of six months.

Another example is Bill C–41 introduced on June 13, 1994 which proposes sentencing reforms and would make the abuse of a position of trust or authority in the commission of an offence an aggravating factor in sentencing.

On February 14, 1995 the Minister of Justice tabled Bill C–68 which proposes significant reforms to control firearms. We know for instance from the Statistics Canada spousal homicide survey that between 1974 and 1992 a married woman was nine times as likely to be killed by her spouse as by a stranger and that 42 per cent of women killed by their spouses during this period were killed with guns. These firearms' proposals will provide a clear and effective response to prevent such use of firearms.

The Minister of Justice also acknowledges the importance and value of consulting with Canadians. Public consultations provide the government with invaluable insight into various issues.

A recent example of the value of such consultations is the June 1994 national consultation with women's organizations on violence against women issues which included family violence. This national consultation was co–hosted by the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Health and the Secretary of State for the Status of Women.

These existing efforts to address family violence by the federal government will help to protect women, children and seniors who are the primary victims of family violence. The individual efforts of members such as the hon. member's public forums will clearly contribute to the national capacity to better understand and respond to family violence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, pursuant to order made Thursday, February 16, this House stands adjourned until Friday, February 24 at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT, 1995

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (for Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.) moved that Bill C–69, an act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of second reading of this bill.

Under the procedures the House adopted a little over a year ago, we changed the rules with respect to the drafting of bills. As I indicated in my speech on the concurrence in the report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs on February 9, this bill has been drafted by the committee and has now been introduced by the government in response to the committee's recommendation which was adopted by the House.

The order of the House constituted a direction to the government to bring in this bill. The bill is in substantially the same form as what the committee recommended. There have been some minor changes in technical aspects of the language and one earth shattering change that brings the bill into force on royal assent rather than on the date of proclamation. That I am sure has not upset anyone. It is a very minor technical change and one that the committee considered but opted for what it thought was the more convenient. It turns out that the government felt the other was more convenient and made the appropriate change in the bill.

I am looking forward to the study of this bill in the committee on procedure and House affairs.

At our meeting this week, the Leader of the Opposition indicated that the Bloc Quebecois would like an opportunity to speak during second reading of this bill. We accept their request and hope that today's speech will mean a saving in time later on during consideration of the bill.

This is why we are allowing the debate today, although the Standing Orders do not provide for debate at the second reading of a bill, as a general rule.

[English]

I am happy to have agreed to the debate today. I look forward to the speech of the hon. member from the Bloc who will be speaking on this matter. I recommend the bill to the House as I did on February 9. As I said everything that I think could be said about this good bill on that date I see no need to prolong my remarks today. I support the bill and invite the House to do the same.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to speak on behalf of the official opposition, the Bloc Quebecois, a sovereignist party in Ottawa, on a matter of such importance as Bill C–69 entitled an Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries.

Why is it an honour for me to speak at this stage? Because, once again, and I invite the government to listen carefully, I have the opportunity to defend the interests of Quebec, so long overlooked by the system.

Furthermore, I have another opportunity to express one of Quebec's traditional demands in this House. I have another opportunity to criticize the big guns in the system and attack the positions held by those across the floor for whom Lord Durham's report would still appear to be bedtime reading. The strategy, of course, has changed. The federal government has become more sophisticated. Things are more subtle now. Gone are the days of the great exploits to assimilate Quebecers.

The approach now is to chip away at Quebec's rights and political weight whenever possible in order to better mix Quebecers in with the masses in English Canada. Bill C–69 is a fine example of this. I must say, though, that this bill is not all bad, on the contrary.

I am delighted by the amendments proposed to improve the mechanism for readjusting electoral boundaries. The main amendments are as follows. Changes to the electoral map following a decennial census will be adjusted five years later in order to avoid too much upheaval in electoral districts. Electoral districts may vary by some 25 per cent from the provincial quota. This is fine.

The provincial commissions will be required to get public input before starting their work. This is fine too. The provincial commissions will have to consider community of interest, the size of each district and foreseeable geographic changes in determining electoral boundaries. Finally, the provincial commissions will have to produce three draft maps and hold new hearings, as required.

These proposals are acceptable, perhaps even necessary if we do not wish to be faced with aberrations again, as with the planned new districts. Without dwelling too much on details, I would like to cite the example of the riding of Berthier—Montcalm which I have the honour of representing. During the last thirty years, this riding has been called successively Berthier—Maskinongé, Berthier—Maskinongé—Lanaudière, and finally the present designation of Berthier—Montcalm. If the proposed electoral division or redistribution plan had gone ahead, I do not know what new designation the devisors of the system would have come up with. If things went as planned, the riding would hardly have been recognizable.

Regional county municipalities would have been divided, natural business and service communities split up; one municipality would have been attached to a neighbouring riding with which it had no affinity, with absolutely no regard for the region's history, all in the interest of numerical consistency and uniform representation. In fact, it was the very epitome of Canadian federalism.

Several members of this House opposed this readjustment of electoral boundaries and rightly so. We were not dealing with apples and oranges. On the contrary, the very essence of the riding and its historical baggage were at issue here. Thus, it was necessary to be realistic, practical while at the same time ensuring that the member of Parliament could be efficient in his work. Unfortunately, legal provisions applicable in this regard did not allow for this rational redistribution.

The report prepared by the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs included a number of elements and proposals for improving the representativeness and boundaries of electoral ridings. This is why the Bloc Quebecois was in favour of the preparation of this report. Many ideas were put forward, specifically the official opposition's proposal to include in this legislation a mechanism allowing Quebec to keep 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons. Clearly, we could not in good faith vote against a traditional demand made by Quebec. The Bloc Quebecois regarded this as a fundamental element of this report and that is why we supported it.

However, the government is as usual systematically refusing to examine Canada's duality. It is postponing studying another traditional demand of the people of Quebec and is doing absolutely nothing to try to find a solution to the demand made. The bill resulting from this report includes only a tiny portion of its proposals. Indeed, Bill C–69 does not mandate a parliamentary committee with finding a solution to the problem of the erosion of Quebec's representation in the House of Commons. Worse still, Bill C–69 does not provide any guarantee whatsoever that the decline in the number of Quebec members in the House of Commons would be stopped. On the contrary, this bill maintains the formula set out in section 51 of the British North America Act, which weakens Quebec's influence within federal institutions.

Until Quebec decides on its future, and undoubtedly, it will vote in favour of sovereignty, you will understand that it is of the utmost importance that it maintain adequate representation within those institutions.

History has proven that despite the senatorial clause and the grandfathering clause, for the 127 years since it was founded, Quebec has been and still is the only province to have a smaller number of members of Parliament than it should get under representation by population.

Ontario, in contrast, was granted several extra seats at the beginning of the century. This eloquently demonstrates once again the double standard, and two occasions where the federal government has shown favouritism towards English Canada. Why should this surprise us; the tower of Pisa also always leans to the same side.

In this bill, the House fails to acknowledge that there are two founding peoples. The central government has been trying to forget this fact for 127 years too. Must I remind the House that Quebec is home to one of Canada's two founding peoples; Quebec is the cornerstone of French culture in the Americas; Quebec has its own separate culture; Quebec is the only French society surrounded by a sea of English; Quebec deserves and has legitimate claim to 25 per cent of all of the seats in the House of Commons.

Mr. Boudria: Is that what you think of francophones outside of Quebec.

Mr. Bellehumeur: In fact, this last request is not new. I know that I am probably frustrating members opposite by confronting them with the truth this morning—

Mr. Boudria: You are right, francophones outside of Quebec are frustrated, because of what you are saying.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Nevertheless, I would ask the hon. member to listen to me a while longer.

Mr. Boudria: Once again, you are abandoning them.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Just listen, Mr. Whip.

In fact, this is not a new demand, it is one that we have always made. But, once again, I am only repeating to the members of the House of Commons what the Bloc Quebecois has pointed out time and time again within these walls and what politicians from Quebec, even some of the most timid Liberals in your ranks, have been clamouring for too long.

The government would like the official opposition to vote for the bill, even though it all but ignores Quebec's demand.

No, members of the Bloc Quebecois will not help the government disregard one of Quebec's legitimate demands. We are here to defend Quebec's interests, and in the interests of Quebec, we must vote against this bill.

Mr. Boudria: But you voted for it in committee.

Mr. Milliken: This is unbelievable.

Mr. Bellehumeur: I can already hear government members mention in this House that the only way to guarantee Quebec a minimum of 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons is to amend the Constitution. At best, this amendment would be subject to the rule of the seven provinces or 50 per cent of the population or, at worst, to the rule of unanimity.

This is a smokescreen and a constitutional disinformation campaign.

In 1985—and I would urge the people across the way to listen—the principle of proportionate representation in the House of Commons stated in section 42(1)(a) of the British North America Act was altered indirectly and very subtly through a simple act of Parliament.

An hon. member: We did no such thing. This is nonsense.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Through a simple act of Parliament.

By guaranteeing some provinces a minimum of seats on the grounds that a province cannot lose seats, they altered the principle of proportionate representation in 1985 by passing this simple act of Parliament. Was this act challenged? Yes, Mr. Speaker. Was it invalidated? No, Mr. Speaker.

In the case of Campbell v. Canada (1988) 49 DLR, 4th edition, page 321—they can write this down as good reading material—the British Columbia Court of Appeal pointed out that the protection of representation despite the decline in a province's population does not affect the principle of proportionate representation and therefore does not require amending section 41(1)(a) of the British North America Act.

Mr. Boudria: That is clear.

Mr. Bellehumeur: We have a double standard, Mr. Speaker. That, too, is clear. One law for English Canada's demands and another for Quebec. That, too, is clear. But you will not hear that from the people across the way.

• (1020)

With that precedent, the government will tell me once again that it could not guarantee Quebec a maximum of 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons under Bill C–69? No, the Quebec people are not fooled and will soon render judgment.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, please note that the official opposition, proud defender of Quebec, cannot support a bill which does not provide any way to counter Quebec's loss of political weight in this House.

Bloc Quebecois members refuse to accept the gradual erosion of the power held by those representing one of Confederation's two founding peoples.

Mr. Speaker, do not ask us to go against our demands or vote against the interests of the Quebec nation. As you can understand, we will vote against this bill. I invite those who say that the bill is consistent with the report to read both the report and the bill. They will see that there is a difference.

I understand their wanting to close their eyes, their unwillingness to give Quebec its fair share of seats in this Parliament. I understand that their only goal is the assimilation of Quebec, pure and simple. What better way than to start with the House of Commons, so that francophones and Quebec cannot defend their interests in this House. That is why we will vote against this bill.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a bit of a surprise to be debating Bill C–69 this morning, but it gives me another opportunity to outline some of the problems and dangers contained in the redistribution bill.

The bill is the government's justification for wasting about $5 million of taxpayers' money in the previous readjustment process that has to be repeated now because we are reimplementing it. The government feels that the changes introduced in the legislation are excuses for the more than $5 million wasted by scrapping 11 months of work by the redistribution commissions.

The government is keen to get the bill passed as soon as possible so that the new boundary rules will be in place in time for the next election. That is the way it should be. It realizes that its unprecedented suspension of the democratic process might have caused the next election to be contested under the old boundaries based on the 1981 census. This would have put government members in a very tenuous constitutional position, not to mention having faces as red as their infamous book.

The entire debacle that began with Bill C–28 and continues with Bill C–69 has put the Liberals on very shaky ground when it comes to a politically neutral election process. The government obviously feels that Bill C–69 excuses its tampering with the electoral process. Bill C–69 fails to live up to all these claims.

Also very interestingly my friends in the Bloc have finally come to the realization that there are some problems with Bill C–69. I say finally because all through the meetings of the procedure and House affairs committee members of the Bloc seemed happy with the direction and contents of the draft bill proposed by the committee. The draft bill had been introduced by the government as Bill C–69. The Bloc presented no dissenting opinion to the Liberal report presented to the House.

On November 22, when Reform members indicated that a minority report or a dissenting report would be included, the Bloc Quebecois declined the opportunity to dissent to what the government was pushing through and voted for every clause of the bill that now appears as Bill C–69. That party was instrumental in defending the need for a 25 per cent variance. I find it peculiar that the Bloc would all of a sudden push for an unusual debate at this stage of the process. I have to wonder why it favoured the report and everything in it at committee but is now rushing to oppose the bill at this point. It seems to be a rather odd position to be taking.

It is clear the crux of the Bloc's concern over Bill C–69 is the matter of guaranteeing Quebec 25 per cent of the seats of the House of Commons regardless of population. This is obviously an undemocratic position. The make–up of the House has always been based on the principle that all Canadian citizens are equal. Equality of voting power is fundamental to Canadian democracy. I do not understand why any party would advocate giving some Canadians more political power than others. The words and actions of Bloc members on Bill C–69 betray their true motives and values.

To demonstrate how unviable that kind of approach is, one need look no further than my province of Saskatchewan. In the early 1920s Saskatchewan was Canada's third most populous province. At that time Saskatchewan had 21 seats out of a total of 225 in the House. If we were demanding to have our historical proportion of seats today, Saskatchewan would need 28 seats in Parliament as a result of the upcoming redistribution rather than the 14 we now hold.

In order for Saskatchewan to have more than its fair share of seats in the Commons, other provinces must get less than their fair share. I wonder which provinces would currently be willing to give up seats for Saskatchewan. Fourteen extra ridings have to be found, so more than one province would have to share the burden.

Would the extra seats come from Ontario which already has many ridings with well over 100,000 population? How about B.C., the province with the fastest growing population and the one most in need of the greater share of seats in the House? What about Quebec? Would our friends in the Bloc be willing to give up some seats in Parliament so that Saskatchewan could reclaim its historical share of seats in the House? I think not.

Is Quebec more special than Saskatchewan? I think not. Is Quebec superior to Saskatchewan? I think not. Is Quebec inferior to Saskatchewan? Does it need more seats to get representation in the House? I think not. Quebec is equal partners with all provinces in Confederation and the laws of the land must indicate that principle.

The reason that Saskatchewan does not have 28 seats is that population patterns have changed. It is a fundamental part of Canadian reality that other parts of the country have grown more rapidly than Saskatchewan. As a result our share of seats in the House have gone down. People in Saskatchewan accept this because it is sensible and fair. If population patterns change again our share may go up.

Why is the Bloc asking for the allotment of seats to the House of Commons on any other basis than population? To entrench such a principle in law would be dangerous. It would also create ill will, resentment and all kinds of representation problems we already see today. Provisions like the senatorial clause and creating provincial floors have led us to some of the dilemmas we face in the House and the problems created in the Senate.

As we can see, the idea of claiming a certain proportion of seats regardless of population creates many inequities. It is unfair, discriminatory and lacks common sense. I do not buy the argument that more seats in Parliament are necessary to preserve Quebec's language and culture. Quebec has a rich history and has special cultural values and traditions. I am glad it is part of Canada. The people who can do the most to foster the French language and culture in Quebec are the people in the Government of Quebec.

If the provincial Government of Quebec were given the authority and responsibility for language and culture with no interference from Ottawa, the threat or perceived threat to that culture would disappear. That would be a much more constructive way to solve the cultural issue. Taking representation and therefore political power away from other provinces would lead to resentment and ill will from the other provinces of Canada, not to mention that more MPs by themselves would not have much of an impact on cultural considerations.

Guaranteeing Quebec or any other province a certain proportion of seats would only add to the problem of the size of the House. Not dealing with the growth in membership in the House is a major flaw in Bill C–69. My Reform colleagues and I have spoken often about the need to reduce or cap the size of the Commons. We have demonstrated how the number of MPs can be capped and reduced. It is clear that the Liberals have no interest in limiting the size and cost of this place.

After only one short year the Liberals are showing their true colours. They like big government, big cabinets and big spending. I have no problem with the appointment of a new Minister of Labour. I am sure she is a very fine person and very capable, but there was no corresponding demotion from cabinet when she was appointed. The pretence of frugality is slipping away from the government. First the cabinet grew by the appointment of the Secretary of State for Parliamentary Affairs and now has increased even further with the new Minister of Labour.

The Liberals are increasing the size of cabinet while cutting the civil service. They are increasing the size of the House while not properly reducing the MP pension plan. They will increase taxes while cutting frontline services to Canadians.

The old spectres of Liberal elitism and political self–interest are reigning supreme at the expense of rank and file Canadians. Liberal elitism and favouritism can manifest itself again with the inclusion of a schedule of special ridings as provided for in this bill.

The bill makes reference to the schedule but offers no guidelines or rules as to how one is to be created. It simply states that ridings can be added to the schedule by an act of Parliament. This means the government alone can decide who gets on the list and who does not. It is possible for the Liberals to place virtually all their ridings on this schedule. Every sitting MP and every party organization would like to contest elections with boundaries they have already won with.

Establishing a loosely defined schedule of ridings exempt from the rules of redistribution, rules that are designed to ensure fairness and neutrality, makes the possibility for gerrymandering endless. The way the provisions for the schedule are worded in this bill, the government would have complete control to play politics with boundary redistribution.

Imagine what former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney could have done with this kind of provision. Constituencies would have been scheduled all over the map. Our constituency redistribution system would have been taken no more seriously than appointments to the Senate.

The current Prime Minister can now do the same should this pass without the necessary amendments. He will have the power to create special Liberal safe seats all across the country. In no time we would see ridings like Labrador or perhaps Prince Albert—Churchill River in Saskatchewan being scheduled. The irony is that if the Prime Minister pushes his Liberal arrogance this far, there will be no such thing as a Liberal safe seat.

Bill C–69 fails to place a limit on the number of scheduled ridings. When the Liberals get carried away with their new powers under this bill and schedule too many ridings in the same province, they will discover they have created all kinds of headaches for the boundary commissioners. In many cases the presence of scheduled ridings will make effective redistribution impossible, as more fixed lines will severely limit the options available to the cartographers.

I suspect that Parliament would have the legal power to remove a riding from the schedule, but politically it would be extremely difficult to do so, especially for the Liberal government.

What would happen if a northern riding that was on the schedule had a large increase in population? Populations in Canada move significantly over time. Who would have predicted the dramatic growth of the west at the time of Confederation? The political leaders at the time did not. This is obvious from the way they allocated seats to the Senate.

Population shifts could happen today even to scheduled ridings. Take for example the riding of Skeena in B.C. It is a large northern riding and a likely candidate for scheduling, apart from the fact that it is not a Liberal riding and the Liberals have complete control over the process.

Within the riding of Skeena is the Windy Craggy mineral reserve estimated to be worth between $10 billion and $40 billion. If this mineral reserve is developed, tens of thousands of highly skilled, high paying jobs could be created. However, the provincial government decided that jobs are bad and decided instead to turn the whole thing into a park.

If that unfortunate decision is reversed and those jobs are allowed to flourish, the riding of Skeena could have a population that tops 200,000. However if the riding has been scheduled, redistribution would not occur. The member for Skeena would be the busiest man on the Hill, having the largest population to serve and one of the biggest chunks of Canadian geography. This whole concept of the schedule has not been properly thought out and should be removed from the bill.

With the overly generous 25 per cent variance there should be no need for a schedule anyway. I have heard some of the Liberal members say the same thing, but when it comes time to actually do what they believe, they wimp out. They do the politically convenient thing. They go along with inequities and a variance of plus or minus 25 per cent.

This plus or minus 25 per cent allows ridings to be set up with a 50 per cent differential in population. This is at the beginning of the redistribution process. If there are population changes that occur during the period before the next redistribution, the discrepancy gets far more severe.

Surely this 25 per cent variance gives enough flexibility to accommodate any so–called special cases. We should not need scheduling. Of course without the schedule, the government will not be able to do quite as much manipulating of the electoral map.

The mention of special cases reveals another flaw in the bill. In creating this bill the procedure and House affairs committee heard from a list of rural members complaining that their ridings were too large. Even the member for Kingston and the Islands knows that several of his colleagues told him that they were afraid that the redistribution process was going to get out of hand and that their ridings would become larger than they could manage. They asked that the rural ridings be kept to a manageable geographic size, even if it meant staying below the provincial quotient.

However, the member for Mississauga West pointed out that many urban ridings experience rapid growth and should therefore be kept closer below the quotient to allow for this growth. The inherent contradiction in this bill becomes clear. How can both the rural and the urban ridings of a province be kept below the average? It just does not work.

The member for Mississauga West in this House during the concurrence debate said to me: "I must thank the member for pointing out something I had hoped would sneak by rural members". Those are the words in Hansard. "Would sneak by rural members. He knows I was hoping it would sneak by". That is found at page 9396.

The Liberals are again talking out of both sides of their mouths. They cannot have it both ways, but they are trying to do that in Bill C–69.

Does the government not realize that if all the rural ridings are kept at or below the quotient and all the urban ridings are kept at or below the quotient, that there is no one left to balance things out by being above the quotient? There is no one left. It is impossible.

Given enough time every member in this House will be able to find a reason why some special consideration should be given to his or her particular constituency. Our committee heard from many of them. The only reasonable thing to do is to apply the same rules to everyone. Otherwise we will end up with a set of rules that are effectively meaningless and useless.

The suspension of the redistribution process initiated by C–18 was a very serious breach of political non–interference. The government tried to cover its tracks by shrouding that action in a review of the system. Bill C–69 failed in its attempt to represent fundamental improvements to redistribution.

I call on all members of this House, on all sides to reconsider their support for this bill. I know that for the wrong reasons the Bloc members have changed their position on the bill. I reiterate, it was for the wrong reasons, but there are a number of correct reasons why this bill should be opposed.

I know that many members have an interest in fairness and equality in our electoral system. This bill creates and perpetuates some grave inequities. I would ask them to defeat this bill or at least help in providing some constructive amendments needed to save this legislation.

In order to come up with a good bill we need to clarify the issue of schedules. We need to tighten up the allowance variance to protect the voting powers of Canadians. We desperately need to address the growth in this House.

It was interesting yesterday when we had a visit by the President of the United States. We had a picture of what would happen in this House if we let unrestrained growth continue. These curtains would have to be removed, seats would have to be placed in the middle of the floor. That is where we will be in just a matter of a few decades.

Certainly there is no need to have to knock out walls in the House of Commons because we cannot deal with the problem of growth in the House for a country of 30 million people. Surely we can respect the wishes of Canadians for less government, smaller government, rather than for unbridled expansion of the House of Commons.

Without these improvements, no member who has an interest in fairness or common sense should support Bill C–69.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed from February 22 consideration of the motion that Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise in the House today to speak on behalf of my constituents regarding the proposed changes to the Young Offenders Act, Bill C–37.

In my riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam a rally of over 5,000 Canadians took place on September 25, 1994 to publicly demand changes to this act. This rally reflects the national demand for change to a justice system that caters to the rights of the criminal, young or old, rather than the security of society. A few brief weeks ago over 2,000 more concerned Canadians near my area marched for changes to the justice system on behalf of Melanie Carpenter.

The Minister of Justice has stated that such public outcries are an emotional response to media headlines. How wrong he is. These are the responses of people who have had enough and now realize they are not alone in their hurt and anger.

Yes, there is a shocking, tangible anger against the system. The rallying cry of the Jesse Cadmans, the Graham Nivens, the Melanie Carpenters, all tragic victims of this system, has served as the catalyst for a too long silent and threatened majority. Their concerns are real and widespread. And they, the people of Canada, must be heard.

Today I wish to speak directly for my constituents. I cannot do less. In August last year with requests pouring in, my office sponsored a meeting to respond to demands to organize a public rally following the senseless and tragic death of Graham Niven. We arranged for a room to accommodate 20 and then 50 people. That night over 300 people came to volunteer to make something happen.

Led by a core dedicated committee of about a dozen committed individuals, literally hundreds of community volunteers organized and successfully ran the rally one month later. Their message echoes the concerns of Canadians across this land.

Young offenders should be held individually responsible for harm done by their acts. They should know that they face certain consequences for breaking the laws of this land. Police officers must be given back the mandate to enforce laws designed to protect our communities. Parents must be given the authority over and the responsibility for the actions of their children. It is only thus that the very real fears of youth, women, parents and seniors, all citizens, of this rising violent attitude in our streets and in our schools can be adequately addressed.

The current Young Offenders Act has a statement of principle which recognizes that young people should have a special guarantee of their rights and freedoms. This has been interpreted by the courts to mean that any treatment of a young offender requires their consent. This same misled interpretation would still apply unless specifically addressed in this new legislation. Let me share with you some real life examples.

A Richmond court worker, a frontline worker, wrote that Bill C–37 does not go far enough. He said: "Young offenders are laughing at us and rubbing our noses in a system which leaves them unaccountable for their actions". It is not uncommon to see young offenders laugh at their sentence and wink at their buddies in the public area of the courtroom. He said that it was time that we stop giving them something to be proud of and instead give them something to think about.

The system is not tough enough and this only encourages recidivism. The statistics speak for themselves in that approximately 75 per cent of 12 and 13 year olds are first time offenders. This decreases to 58 per cent of 14 and 15 year olds and falls further to 50 per cent of 16 and 17 year olds. The study declared that those youths who did reoffend usually had far more than one prior conviction. These young offenders are obviously not deterred from continuing to violate the law. The present experience with the law and the court system obviously does not serve the offender or society. Canadian families pay the price for this failure.

Share for a moment the grief of a Langley, B.C. couple whose 17–year old son was shot and killed by a 16–year old who had just been released from custody. They wrote in their letter to me: "Ours is a lifetime loss of a young man with a brilliant future. We will never forget him or the atrocity".

Diane Sowden, a mother of a 14–year old young offender in my riding, shared her frustration with the judicial system at the rally. Her daughter at the age of 13 left home because she resented a 9.30 p.m. curfew. The police informed the parents they were powerless to do anything.

The girl was assigned to two group homes and three foster homes but she refused to stay at them because they also had rules. Diane reported that there was no curfew, no order to go to school, and no order to reside with the caregivers, completely against their request as parents. The story goes on to include pimps, drugs, schoolyard solicitation for child prostitution, heroin addiction, ignored parole violations and nothing anyone could do about it.

"We wanted stricter consequences for her actions, rather than no consequences", said Diane. "We as her parents want some say in what is happening to our daughter". Presently this 14–year old girl works the streets and the Young Offenders Act will respect her right to continue down this path of self–destruction.

We have accomplished nothing giving young people so many rights that the consequences of their actions are no longer relevant. The interests of young offenders are not best served when they cannot be required to respect the authority of law or even the authority of their parents.

Unless there is proven reason, parents should both know and have a say in their children's treatment and those children should have no choice but to face the consequence in treatment, reparation and penalty for their illegal actions.

Let me share with the House the experience of Erma and Dennis Vietorisz. Erma addressed the rally in September as a teacher and a parent who has seen the consequence of rising violence in her school and the community. She wrote me again on December 29, 1994 about an attack on her son and a friend the month before, after the rally: "There was no provocation, no argument, nor any reason for a brutal attack on these two young people. After being taken to the hospital, our son was told he had a broken jaw and had to undergo emergency surgery and spend six weeks with his jaw wired shut. His friend had six stitches to his eye. Meanwhile the attackers had gotten away without consequence. Why? Because the police said there was very little they could do to protect our son from retaliation if charges were laid. The police could not detain the attacker after they arrested him as the courts would release him back on to the street to await trial even though he was very violent in his behaviour. All the police could do to protect our son was to put a restraining order on the attacker which would only help our son if he was attacked again".

After much deliberation and consideration the parents decided not to lay charges because the judicial system could not protect him. They decided not to subject themselves to the very real possibility of more violence. The attacker had nothing to fear from a system that is powerless to restrain him from inflicting fear and violence on others.

Erma recently received a letter from Premier Harcourt of B.C. who criticized her for not giving the judicial system a chance. What mockery. On the one hand we have a brazen offender who has, and will likely continue to accumulate a history of violence. On the other we have a judicial system with a mandate from the government that puts fear into the heart of the victim and not the offender.

Bill C–37 further entrenches this deplorable pattern. According to the latest studies published in January 1995 by the forum of correctional research, youth crime is on the rise. In 1986, 179,000 youths were arrested by police and 113,000 were charged. In 1992, 211,000 and some were arrested by the police and 140,000 were charged. Violent offences have increased from 9,275 in 1986 to 20,033 in 1991. That is over a 100 per cent increase in just five years.

Take these statistics in light of the fears of victims and their families such as the Vietorisz. Take these statistics in light of the pat on the head that first, second and third offences get or the total lack of consequences or recorded incidence of crime for all those under 12 years of age in the present system. There is an epidemic out there that our justice experts refuse to recognize.

I have received over 13,000 letters and faxes and over 15,000 signatures on petitions from concerned Canadians calling for real change to the Young Offenders Act.

Like Mrs. Sandy Mahoney of Maple Ridge, B.C. whose 14–year old daughter had to move to Ontario to live with her grandmother because she was constantly beat up at school, constantly harassed by what the authority and school officials called gang members. It is very clear that young criminals are not afraid of any authority, is what she said.

Another woman, Marian Jutila from Coquitlam states: "As a community we demand you immediately follow through and begin revamping our Young Offenders Act".

Many seniors have written to me, those who fear to leave their homes and also many who fear that violence will actually break through the walls of those homes. Perhaps the most compelling was the cry at the end of one letter that concluded with a handwritten note: "You must help us".

In conclusion, let me read the words of 17–year old Jamie Lipp, a dear friend of Jessie Cadman who was killed by a young offender. Jamie spoke at the rally: "What kind of society do we live in where young people are not held accountable for their crimes? What kind of society do we live in where we must fear for our lives within a few blocks of our homes? What kind of society do we live in when there is no respect for life?"

Bill C–37 does nothing to reflect the concerns of those who have spoken up with such clarity and sincerity. I cannot in good conscience support such a bill. We need a legislative overhaul which demands accountability for the sake of society and the young offender, that teaches respect for authority and the rights and lives of others, and that reverses the trend of fear and intimidation experienced within our community.

Today I implore the Minister of Justice to listen to these Canadians. They have something to say that he must hear.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some interest to the speech of my hon. colleague.

She is from British Columbia. She would find from coast to coast and down on the Atlantic coast where I am from that there are similar sentiments with respect to safety in the community and a desire to ensure that the legislative tools we have at our disposal such as the Young Offenders Act, are balanced. That balance periodically must be reviewed.

At least the bill is a step in the right direction. What I hear from my community is that there is a legitimate concern. Individuals want to feel safe in their community. However, Canadians are also very tolerant individuals and they are not harsh in how they deal with individuals that somehow find themselves at the opposite end of the law.

As a member of Parliament I have seen over the last few years a marked change in the way Canadians view the criminal justice system, the fairness of the system and whether they believe that the rights of the accused have priority over the rights of the abused. Many times this is the case.

Dealing specifically with the Young Offenders Act, some measures in this bill are supportable by most reasonable thinking people. Certainly the move to transfer 16 and 17 year olds who are accused of very serious crimes like first or second degree murder and other crimes like attempted murder, manslaughter, aggravated assault and aggravated sexual assault to adult court is very positive.

The people I represent understand that wherever possible we have to have a system that takes young people who happen to find themselves on the wrong side of the law and wherever possible work to rehabilitate them. We do not want just incarceration for the sake of vengeance. What we truly seek is rehabilitation.

There must be a recognition that there are some cases—I stress that it is the minority of cases with young offenders—where we have individuals who are 16 or 17, dangerous offenders, repeat offenders, who have carried out the most despicable and unspeakable crimes that are still protected by the act. They are protected as a young offender when their crimes are severe enough to be treated more seriously by the criminal justice system.

The move to adult court as a requirement under this bill, with the provision that the offender or the prosecutor or the counsel for the accused can argue before the court that the offender should not be transferred, is a proper one.

I also agree with the increased sentences for first and second degree murder. Canadians want to make sure that individuals who are convicted of these most serious crimes do not find themselves being convicted and sentenced and in a few years back out on the street, perhaps to commit such crimes again.

I also support with some qualification the provisions in the bill that deal with access to youth records, particularly for repeat offenders, and particularly for young offenders who seem to have a goal in life of continuing to wreak havoc in their communities.

It is essential in certain conditions, and these conditions are outlined quite well in the bill, that law enforcements officers and peace officers have access to those records during the course of investigations when dealing with serious crimes. It is also essential that the courts, in the case of young offenders who have a long criminal record under the Young Offenders Act and are once again before the courts as a result of further violations of criminal law, have access to these records. However, this section does not go far enough. I have to agree with my colleague opposite.

I live in a community of approximately 70,000 people. By and large it is a law–abiding community. People feel relatively safe travelling the streets. I have three children. The oldest will be 11 in a few weeks. I have an eight–year old and I have an three–year old. I want to see my children grow up in a safe community. I get concerned when I hear on the street—and I can never figure out whether it is simply hearsay—that there are some violent young offenders who go through the system who actually abuse the system and who use the protection under the act to remain anonymous.

At the school my daughter attends, if there is a 14, 15 or 16 year old who has been convicted under the act of a crime with violence or aggravated sexual assault who has been known to carry a weapon, the rights of the people of the community to live safely far outweigh the right of that young offender to anonymity for the crimes he or she has committed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald: I am worried, Mr. Speaker. Members of the Reform party are actually applauding me. I may have to rethink my position.

Canadians as a caring and just people have to understand that the accused has rights but there must be a recognition in law of the right of individuals to have safe communities.

I would like to see the government look at this provision. Maybe when this bill is studied further the government will assent to look at some exceptional circumstances where the rights of the community to safety override the right of the young offender convicted of a heinous crime, of a violent crime, to anonymity.

There is one other thing that is not in this bill which I have to raise because it deals basically with young people. It deals with offences against young people. I have spoken in the House before on this. An epidemic is going through the country of criminals who are committing perhaps the worst crime possible in our society today: adults who lure young women and in some cases young men into prostitution.

I say it is an epidemic. It is an epidemic which has not been spoken about loud enough or long enough in Parliament or in provincial legislatures. We are literally seeing some of our young children being lifted off the streets and forced into prostitution.

When we deal with the crimes of young offenders, the government must give priority to dealing with crimes against young people as well. I urge the Minister of Justice to quickly bring in new laws and new regulations to deal with this most serious crime. We need strict punishment and maximum sentences for those convicted of living off the avails of juvenile prostitution.

The Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Dartmouth wishes to continue, he will have another two minutes when we resume Government Orders.

It being eleven o'clock we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

MODEL PARLIAMENT

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I pay tribute to the young men and women who participated in the annual Queen's University model Parliament in this place from January 19 to 21 of this year.

In particular I would like to congratulate Mr. Sacha Bhatia, a student at Queen's University and a constituent of mine who sat in this very chair as the member of Parliament for Victoria—Haliburton during the model Parliament.

It is also important to thank the various members of Parliament who participated in the weekend: the Speaker of the House, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Lanark—Carleton, to name a few, as well as the table officers, security guards and others who made this model Parliament very successful.

It is my understanding that the students enjoyed a fine weekend, heard an excellent speech from the throne, debated bills and participated in committee work.

Being in my constituency at the time I did manage to watch the proceedings on C–PAC along with many other constituents and noticed what a fine job these students were doing.

FRENCH–LANGUAGE SCHOOL BOARDS

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Le Droit reports this morning that the Ontario education minister is about to announce the establishment of 15 new French–language school boards.

While this is certainly good news, one would hope that Franco–Ontarians will soon have not only all the school boards they need, but also adequate funding in order to end current discriminatory practices.

The group for the development of French Ontario pointed out rightly that the degree of illiteracy among Franco–Ontarians is shamefully high; at 31 per cent, it is comparable to that of third world countries. That is the practical result of a century of linguistic and educational oppression.

It is time for a change. This is a right, not a privilege.

CHEMAINUS

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1980 the little Vancouver Island town of Chemainus was suffering economic hardship. The community's major industry had suffered a severe blow with a slumping lumber trade and the plant closure of MacMillan–Bloedel's 120–year old sawmill.

However, since those dark days the town has become an inspiration for all Canadian communities because of its bootstrap tourism project. Chemainus is now known as the little town that did for its outdoor murals that have seen tourism become a multi–million industry. Four hundred thousand tourists from around the world flocked to Chemainus last year to see its 32 murals.

Recently the architect of the Chemainus murals, Karl Schutz, was in London where he accepted the prestigious British Airways Tourism for Tomorrow Award for the America's, beating out 120 others.

I congratulate Mr. Schutz and all the enterprising citizens of Chemainus, which is now the mural capital of Canada if not the world.

CARIBOU

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the governments of United States and Canada have for a number of years supported the protection of the Arctic national wildlife refuge in Alaska.

However, a recent Alaskan legislature motion to allow oil and gas exploration in what are often called the 1002 lands puts in jeopardy that resolve. The Canadian government and the Prime Minister are on record as saying that they support the proposal to keep the Arctic national wildlife refuge safe from oil and gas exploration.

The wildlife refuge is a calving ground for the Porcupine Caribou herd which provides food for the people of northern Yukon and the U.S. The herd is an important national treasure. It is an international treasure. I have encouraged the Prime Minister to raise this issue with President Clinton during this visit to Ottawa.

Both the Prime Minister and the president are on record as saying they are in favour of no exploration on the 1002 lands. Again I encourage and urge the Prime Minister and the president to reconfirm this policy during this visit.

HEALTH

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to comment on the growing threat of infectious diseases and emerging infections.

Our civilization is at a crossroads where diseases once thought to be a menace of the past are once again becoming a health threat.

The emergence of diseases such as tuberculosis is creating concern on the public health front. The federal government along with its provincial counterparts must remain sufficiently prepared to combat this threat.

Although Canada is also at a debt and deficit crossroads, there is a great need to maintain the laboratory centre for disease control and encourage provinces to enhance public health surveillance.

To adequately evaluate and monitor vaccine issues such as new vaccine submissions, safety and efficiency, we must ensure that there is sufficient knowledgeable staff and physician expertise at the health protection branch of Health Canada.

The same problem exists for Canada's blood supply. We must be constantly alert in monitoring problems in the supply of this, our most precious resource.

I urge the federal government and its provincial counterparts to remain committed to the fight against infectious diseases and emerging infections.

REFERENDUM ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the past few days, contradictions and divisions within the separatist camp in Quebec have increased at an alarming rate.

• (1105)

The only thing separatist mouthpieces seem to agree on is the fact that their strategy is not working. The clever referendum process which was supposed to drive Quebecers to mobilize and unite in favour of sovereignty is not producing the expected results.

Instead of continuing to look for gimmicks, Premier Parizeau should hold without further delay a referendum on an unequivocal question about Quebec separation and let the people decide.

JOHN OLIVER SECONDARY SCHOOL

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to congratulate the students of John Oliver secondary school, a school I once attended, located in my riding.

The students of John Oliver have shown exemplary initiative and leadership through their active participation in the greater Vancouver crime stoppers program. These students have found a responsible and constructive way to take a proactive approach to dealing with the intimidation and harassment that can occur in our schools. By taking preventative measures they are reducing the incidence of crime in their environment and making their schools a safer place.

I commend the students of John Oliver and encourage students across British Columbia to follow their lead. I believe we should learn from our youth. What better example than the leadership shown by these students on crime prevention?

AIR TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today the U.S. President and the Prime Minister will sign the Open Sky Treaty. That agreement will significantly change the rules governing air transportation between Canada and the United States. It will open an important market for our air carriers. However, they will have to face increased competition.

Air Canada will face more competition in a market where it is currently the only Canadian carrier. The Open Sky Treaty will allow Canadian International to further consolidate its operations with American Airlines, and to provide stiff competition to Air Canada.

For reasons of fairness, the Minister of Transport must reconsider his decision and allow Air Canada to get full access to Hong Kong, the main landing point in Asia. The Bloc Quebecois will not put up with questionable political decisions which adversely affect the only world class carrier based in Quebec.

HIRAM WALKER

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the House of another casualty of excessive taxation. The Hiram Walker distillery in my riding which employs 137 people and has been in operation since 1970 will close its doors on June 16, nearly 24 years to the day since it opened.

The company cites the declining sales due to what it calls outrageously high and punitive taxes levied by both the federal and provincial governments. I could not agree more.

Hiram Walker is a producer and marketer of Canadian Club, the world's leading premium Canadian whiskey. Hiram Walker and Sons Ltd. is the Canadian business unit of the world's second largest beverage alcohol company. When companies are forced to close facilities as a result of excessive levels of taxation there is definitely a problem.

Our distillers are unable to compete with their American counterparts because of these tax levels. That means lost jobs. When is this—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lincoln.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this Monday our government will be tabling its second budget. It is an opportunity to restore fiscal soundness and integrity to the Canadian economy. However, it is equally important that this not to occur at the expense of the middle class who already pay a disproportionate share of taxes and on whose backs much of the Canadian debt rests.

Our party's history is one of providing Canadians with hope and opportunity. Unless we begin to reign in our debt and deficit, hope and opportunity will be lost. This must be unacceptable to all members of Parliament.

The ultimate goal is to eliminate the deficit entirely. Three per cent of GDP by 1996–97 is an interim target and a very important one. It is a red book commitment and it will be met. In restoring soundness to our economy we will be able to continue one of the proudest legacies of the Liberal Party, to preserve social security, a system that would be the envy of the world—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we approach budget day I would like to convey the concerns of the residents of Hamilton Mountain. While my constituents appreciate that this year's budget must be a tough one, they feel that it should not be at the expense of the most vulnerable members of our society.

• (1110)

Eliminating the deficit must not be done on the backs of seniors on fixed incomes, the unemployed and lower income Canadians. It is time that all Canadians paid their share.

On behalf of my constituents I would ask the Minister of Finance to close tax loopholes before cutting social programs. The residents of my riding are very aware of the pressing need to reduce and eventually eliminate the deficit. There must be fairness in accomplishing this goal. If all Canadians share fairly the burden of deficit reduction, I am sure there will be great support for our efforts to put the country's finances in order.

RIDING OF OTTAWA—VANIER

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this august House for the first time and I do so for two reasons.

First, I want to thank the Ottawa—Vanier constituents who gave me their support during the February 13 byelection, thus granting me the privilege of representing them in the House of Commons. I am very grateful to them for doing so and I will do my best to meet and even exceed their expectations.

[English]

The second reason is to encourage the ministry to consider an additional measure to assist communities throughout the land, particularly in the national capital region which will be seriously affected by the implementation of the program review.

The suggestion is simply that the commercialization of any public service position be conditional on that position being retained in its community of origin for at least five years. This would allow the affected individual time to adjust to his or her new work environment without having to worry about being forced to move to another part of the country.

I am very pleased that the President of the Treasury Board has agreed to seriously consider this suggestion.

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, not so long ago the Liberals were adamantly opposed to the Free Trade Agreement with the United States.

"I think you sold us out!" said their leader to Prime Minister Mulroney, during the 1988 election campaign debate. Back then, the Liberals were capitalizing on their opposition to free trade to score points in the rest of the country.

The fact that the Liberal Prime Minister is now extolling the virtues of that agreement to the U.S. President is most hypocritical, particularly since he himself made a trip to Washington, in 1991, to beg our American neighbours to renegotiate the treaty.

Let us not forget that, while the Liberals were criticizing the Americans in the process, Quebecers, who, by contrast, are open to the world, played a major role in the outcome of the 1988 federal election, which would later result in the signing of the agreement.

It might be appropriate to remind President Clinton that if, today, we can all dream of a great common market from Tierra del Fuego to Baffin's Land, it is mainly thanks to Quebec and to Quebecers.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday in Question Period the minister of Indian affairs stated that the Nisga'a of northwest B.C. won a Supreme Court decision in 1973 awarding them aboriginal land title. This is incorrect. The Nisga'a lost their 1973 appeal.

The latest word is the Delgamuukw case of 1991. This aboriginal land title case was dismissed by the Supreme Court of B.C. and subsequently by the Court of Appeal. The minister's premise is wrong.

My question was whether the intent of Nisga'a offer was to treaty protect a commercial fishery. The public deserves an answer, which the minister did not provide.

Between March 3 and 13, B.C. Reform MPs are holding a series of town hall meetings across the province to raise public awareness and understanding of the implications of current B.C. treaty negotiations.

RICHARD WEBER AND MISHA MALAKHOV

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments today to recognize two very courageous individuals: Mr. Richard Weber of Chelsea, Quebec, which is in my riding, and Mr. Misha Malakhov of Ryazan, Russia. These two courageous adventurers have been preparing for years for their return journey to conquer the 1,500 kilometres of the Arctic Ocean. They are attempting to ski to the North Pole and return without any outside assistance. They are carrying all the supplies necessary for their survival for four months.

These two explorers are presently in the freezing wilderness of the Arctic. The ongoing challenge of man to surpass himself is alive and well in these two fellows. I really envy their courage and quest for adventure.

The long journey that these two daring adventurers are accomplishing is also a great example of international collaboration. A Canadian and a Russian working together toward the same goal is a great event to witness.

Finally, I would like to extend my best wishes to Mr. Weber and Mr. Malakhov.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our government recognizes that the future of Atlantic Canada lies in its ability to diversify and expand its economic base. Our government continues to support this tradition through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

At ACOA the approach to local development lies in working with small businesses and communities to diversify and strengthen their economies. As a result 65,000 jobs have been created over the last seven years, and for every dollar put into small business through ACOA $4.20 comes back.

In my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants, ACOA's commitment has produced many excellent examples of small business growth that has led to the creation of long term jobs.

Atlantic Canadians are not enslaved or bound by psychological depression as the Reform Party claims. Instead we are seizing new opportunities. Through ACOA our government is playing an important role in promoting regional economic growth.

TAXATION

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in readiness for the forthcoming federal budget angry Canadians have put forward a strong message of no new taxes and no tax increases. They mock a government that is proving incapable of making the necessary and difficult decisions associated with spending reductions.

Taxpayers rightfully point the finger at government excesses: bloated MPs' pensions; waste, fraud and abuse in the bureaucracy; continued funding of special interest groups; and, the holy of holies, the CBC gorging itself annually on a $1.1 billion subsidy.

Canadians across the country are demanding that our spend crazy government get its act together to bring some sense to our overtaxed economy. Canadian taxpayers believe it is time they were given a break considering they now spend more in taxes than they do for lodging and food.

What are we getting in return? No one is sure. Our taxes keep going up; government services are in decline; and our debt is doubling every 10 years.

Heaven help the faint–hearted politicians who are not listening and believe that Canadians are much too passive to roll up their sleeves and take to the streets. There is nothing more in their faces than thousands of Canadians sending Liberal tax spenders a message: We have had enough. We have nothing more left to give.

FEDERAL PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board acted with extreme arrogance in his dealings with the largest public service union, which represents more than 70 per cent of federal government employees, when he rejected out of hand a counterproposal for downsizing the number of federal employees on a mutually acceptable basis.

How does the President of the Treasury Board justify rejecting union proposals only a few hours after they were received, unless his mind was already made up and he never really intended to co–operate with the union to achieve his downsizing objectives?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been in discussion and negotiation with the unions for several months. Various propositions including the ones that the Public Service Alliance has now formalized in writing have been considered over that period of time.

Quite simply they are not a way of achieving our goal. In terms of being able to get our deficit down to 3 per cent and the downsizing that is required from that, we need to target the different positions based on the programs and services we would be reducing.

Their proposition would not work in that regard and that is why I was not able to accept it.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, usually, there is room for negotiating when one's approach is not predetermined.

Although the public service must be downsized and everyone agrees on the principle, would the minister agree that his unilateral decision will result in savage job cuts and that, as a result, he will be directly responsible for the inevitable disruption of services to the public that will ensue as a result of his unspeakable strategy?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that there will be disruption to the public. I believe we will provide good quality services. We have good professional public servants who will continue to provide those services.

However we have to shrink the size of government. We have to downsize to live within our means. We cannot afford to have all these positions.

When we were discussing with the unions there was a great deal of acceptance of what we put forward. Fifteen of the sixteen unions agreed to the proposition that we put on the table. It was one; it was the alliance that did not agree with it.

• (1120)

I think the proposition is a good one because it treats our employees fairly and reasonably. It says at the same time that if we do not have work for them we obviously cannot pay them.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the government has failed to reach an agreement with the largest public service union, which represents over 70 per cent of all government employees. The government has come down on the side of confrontation, by rejecting the union's proposal out of hand, without bothering to negotiate, which is particularly offensive. This will lead to a showdown between the government and its employees.

I would ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he agrees that this showdown, a direct consequence of his refusal to negotiate, may well turn into a major confrontation in which all parties stand to lose: public servants will lose their jobs, the public its services and the government its credibility with its employees and the public?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the proposition that there will be a major confrontation.

I think the employees of the federal government, as indeed all people across the country, understand that the government has to get its fiscal house in order and that we have to cut government spending to do that.

Our employees expect it and we will treat them fairly and reasonably. We have gone through months and months of negotiations with the unions and examined all these propositions. It had wide acceptance from their bargaining agents except for the alliance.

We will continue to work with them in this downsizing effort to ensure that it is carried out in an efficient, effective manner and that we are fair both to the people who are leaving and to the people who will stay and continue to provide good services to the people of Canada.

PROGRAM FOR OLDER WORKER ADJUSTMENT

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

The minister will no doubt recall that her former provincial Liberal colleague, André Bourbeau, had repeatedly asked the federal government to ease the criteria of the program for older worker adjustment in order to reduce the number of older Montreal workers unfairly excluded from this program.

Does the minister acknowledge, as her former colleague did, that the rules of the POWA are too restrictive and that the program fails to satisfactorily meet the needs of older workers who have been laid off?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet been made aware of this matter by my colleagues. I would ask to take this question under consideration, if I may.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister was surely aware of this matter when she was a minister in Quebec.

Given that the government of Quebec has pushed for a number of years for changes to the rules of the program, given the strong consensus in Quebec on this matter and given that the minister is now directly responsible for this program, is she prepared to make a commitment today, in this House? Will she undertake to table within a few days amendments to the program, in keeping with the recommendations of the Government of Quebec, which it has been making since 1991, as she should know?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will of course seriously examine this question as I will deal with all matters of concern to the provinces. Quebec, like other provinces, I imagine, must be very concerned by this question of older workers. I can tell the members of this House that, yes, I will examine this question closely and I will get back to the House on this issue.

PENSIONS OF MEMBERS

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government's weak–kneed attempt at MP pension reform is a slap in the face to every taxpayer in the country.

Despite the government's rhetoric this is still a gold plated pension plan for senior politicians. For example, under the old plan the Deputy Prime Minister would receive a base pension of $48,300 a year and collect $3.3 million by age 75 if she retired in 1997. Under the new plan the Deputy Prime Minister will receive a base pension of $48,300 and still receive $2.7 million by age 75 if she retired in 1997.

• (1125)

I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. How can the government ask taxpayers to tighten their belts in the budget on Monday night when senior ministers continue to feast at the MP pension trough?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are reducing the cost of pensions to taxpayers by some 33 per cent. We are cutting over and above the commitments we made in the election campaign.

We said that we would end double dipping, and we have ended that. We said that we would put in a minimum age, and we have put in a minimum age of 55. On top of that we have also reduced the benefit level to save taxpayers 33 per cent of the cost of that pension plan or some $3.3 million annually.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the public will hardly be impressed by a 33 per cent reduction in a plan that is four to five times richer than any other plan in the country.

The fact is that the minister had to abandon real MP pension reform under pressure from senior colleagues who wanted to preserve most of the excessive features of the old plan. We now have a two–tier MP pension plan. One for the fat pack and one for the rest: trough regular and trough light.

Will the minister eliminate this two–tier system in favour of a plan that applies equally to all members of the House?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the entire preamble to the question is wrong. In fact the question is wrong too because there is not a two–tier system. It is a single tier system; it is a single plan.

Furthermore it is not four to five times richer. That is absolute nonsense. Second, there was no pressure with respect to senior colleagues. There were attempts to find a plan that would serve the needs of members of Parliament but at the same time reduce the cost to the taxpayer and to take a leadership role with respect to the forthcoming budget.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the only commendable feature of the revamped scheme is that it will allow MPs who put principles ahead of pork to opt out. My colleagues and I are opting out of this obscene plan. I trust we will be joined by the Minister of Finance, by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, by the Minister of Human Resources Development and by the Deputy Prime Minister.

Who will be the first to follow the Reform Party's lead and renounce their gold plated MP pension plan? Will the minister answer the question now by rising to his or her feet?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not too many members of the House end up getting a pension plan because the average years of service are less than the vesting years of six. I can tell the House that in the case of third party members none of them would make it to the six–year vesting period anyway.

They like to talk about the private sector, but in the private sector individuals do not get an opportunity to opt in or opt out. They are told that this is the plan and because of the actuarial integrity of the plan people are required to be a part of it. The Prime Minister has indicated to members of the third party that they will have the opportunity to opt out, and indeed they can.

When it comes to the overall compensation package for members of the House, we are lowering that compensation package. We are taking a leadership position by cutting the pension by 33 per cent.

LABOUR RELATIONS

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. The workers at Ogilvie Mills Limited, in Montreal, have been on strike for close to nine months now. In the meantime, the employer has been using scabs, with complete impunity.

Considering that she was elected in Quebec, where the use of scabs has been illegal for almost 17 years now, will the minister pledge to table antiscab legislation and, if so, when?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am following very closely the situation at Ogilvie Mills Limited and the plight of its workers. I do hope that these workers will reach an agreement with the employer.

As regards the use of scabs, my predecessor said in this House that the government was examining the issue. We are looking at the Canada Labour Code as a whole, to see how it could be improved, and that includes the issue of replacement workers. We are consulting with both corporate employers and workers' representatives to discuss the issue.

Consequently, the issue is currently being examined and we hope to come up with a satisfactory solution.

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister's predecessor spent almost 15 months examining the issue and the problem still remains unsolved.

Does the minister realize that Ogilvie Mills workers cannot wait for a new incumbent to start the whole process from scratch? The minister must settle the issue quickly, in the days to come. We are asking for a deadline, for a date.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let us be realistic and not ask that the issue be settled in the next few days. As the hon. member said, this is a complex situation which has an impact on the Canada Labour Code. The situation at Ogilvie Mills affects workers, but such problems exist everywhere in Canada. We have to look at the impact on businesses and employers. It is indeed a complex situation and, as with any complex issue, we must take the necessary time to find a good solution to the problem.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

A few moments ago he disputed the fact that the MP pension plan is far more generous than a private sector plan. Will he confirm that his plan has the following elements: a 4 per cent benefit rate that is double the rate of a very good private sector plan; full inflation protection that is unheard of in the private sector; age of receipt at 55 with full benefit that is also unheard of in the private sector; and on top of that, by lowering the MPs' own contribution rate from 11 per cent to 9 per cent, he slipped in an increase in take home pay for MPs?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, talking about take home pay, there is no increase in salary. However, the folks in the third party would be taking home an awful lot more because they plan to opt out.

We need to look at this matter in the context of a total compensation package. The consultant who was hired by the previous government and reported on the question of compensation said that in fact compensation for members of Parliament is lower than that in the private sector.

If we take it in that context and on top of that take into consideration that we are lowering the pension, members of Parliament are taking a compensation cut. The member's leader was four to five times and now he has gone down to two times. In the private sector it is very common to have additional supplementary plans over and above what is provided for under the Income Tax Act.

In terms of the inflation index, members of Parliament pay 1 per cent of their salary per year for that inflation index which does not even kick in until age 60.

The plan is not how that party is trying to characterize it. Let us again bear in mind that we are reducing the compensation package. We are reducing the size of the plan by 33 per cent.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Reformers will be taking a cut in their disposable income because Reformers and those Liberals who follow our lead will be taking care of their own retirement instead of having it paid for by the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

My supplementary question is for the same minister. How can the minister ask Canadians to make sacrifices when the Liberal government gets a handsome pension at least three times more generous than private sector pensions? How can he justify this?

• (1135)

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): What is the number?

Mr. Eggleton: The number that does work here and which is true is that this plan is being cut by 33 per cent. That provides leadership in terms of the cuts in budgets that have to be made to get to our deficit target of 3 per cent of GDP.

FIREARMS REGISTRATION LEGISLATION

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice stated Monday that he was certain that the legislation regarding the firearms registration would be enforced Canada-wide, even on aboriginal territory.

Will the minister give us concrete evidence that the government has reached an agreement with aboriginal groups and that his claims are backed up by substance, so that we can take him seriously when he states that the new gun controls will be enforced not only elsewhere in Canada, but also on aboriginal territories?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government does not need to enter into special contracts with native groups or individuals. There is one law for this country, and this applies for the gun control legislation.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Minister of Justice be so optimistic when we all know very well that even census takers for Statistics Canada are unable to get the job done on aboriginal territories?

How would the minister have us believe that registering firearms and their owners will be easier than registering citizens, which is not being done at present?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do confess to being an optimist by nature, something which I have discovered is an asset in this line of work.

I can assure the hon. member the government is entirely confident that the firearms legislation, once enacted, will not only be effective but will be complied with throughout the country.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would love to keep on the pension questions but I have a question for the minister of immigration arising from an issue in his own department.

Daljit Powar assaulted his wife for years. He defrauded the UI system. Since 1985 he has had two aggravated assaults, one while he was out on bail. He was ordered deported in 1986. He appealed and won. He broke the conditions. He has drug charges. There have been more beatings, once to his child. Finally, there was another deportation order in 1989. Out he went and that is good.

Now that we have finally kicked this fellow out of the country, why has the refugee board made a decision overriding the immigration deportation order and is now allowing him back into Canada?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned before, it is difficult for parliamentarians to speak about the facts in an ongoing case.

We are speaking about a case that is before a quasi–judicial independent tribunal. We do not discuss matters when they are before judicial courts. I am not sure we should be getting into the intricate details while the case is ongoing.

Suffice it to say, I am equally concerned about a number of cases that cause a certain degree of frustration and consternation for Canadians. That is one of the principal reasons this government has moved quickly to try to address the systematic features that could certainly be righted and could eliminate more abuse. This is one of the reasons we have Bill C–44.

Why do Reform members relish talking about individual cases and at the same time refuse legislation to improve the system which would minimize the very cases they bring forward in this House of Commons day after day?

• (1140)

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister has said to me before in this House that these are isolated cases. There have been three in my own riding. Where else do we talk about these issues if not here?

If we talk about where there is room to cut in budgets, this fellow has been ordered to pay $4,000 back to UIC after he picked up that amount of money while he was in jail. Want to look for places to cut in the budget?

This man failed to comply with the conditions laid down the last time his deportation appeal was successful. Who is going to be responsible when he comes back in? Will it be the minister or the refugee board? Or would it really be most logical and likely that the minister could now overturn this and just not let him back in at all?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not saying we should not debate the issues here. There is a difference between discussing the responsibilities that we have as legislators and parliamentarians and not interfering with, as those on that side of the House talk to us about, independent tribunals.

Let us talk about responsibility. Bill C–44 would permit the government of the day to forbid individuals like the hon. member member talks about from returning to Canada. We would not have to go through an inquiry process to get them out. It would enable a government to stop a refugee hearing and move it into an immigration inquiry. It would allow us as a government pending this legislation to forbid individuals based on national security from entering the refugee process.

I flip the question around. Who are being irresponsible by rejecting Bill C–44 and then beating their chests about individual cases?

HEPATITIS C

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Last spring, the minister said she was waiting for the Red Cross recommendations before deciding if steps would be taken to contact every person who contracted hepatitis C prior to 1992, after receiving blood products. The Red Cross has already submitted its recommendations.

Since the Red Cross has already submitted its recommendations, will the Minister of Health finally tell us whether she will systematically contact individuals infected with hepatitis C before more people are contaminated?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have already described in this House the procedure for contacting those concerned, as requested by the hon. member.

As you know, we have a multilevel system in which responsibilities are divided among several partners, such as provincial governments and hospitals. There are several steps to follow and we will certainly continue to work with all those involved to ensure the best response possible.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister realize that she is in the process of repeating with the hepatitis C problem the same mistakes that were made with contaminated blood and that her inability to make decisions is likely to have serious consequences for those infected and their families?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this minister takes her responsibilities extremely seriously.

I have been working very hard with all of the partners involved to make sure we take all action necessary to ensure the safety of the blood system and the safety of blood products. I am working with our provincial counterparts as well as many other partners to make sure everyone takes their responsibilities very seriously, as I know they do.

I wish the hon. member from the opposing party would be more responsible herself instead of spreading misinformation among the people of Canada and scaring them.

We have very difficult decisions to take and very difficult actions have been taken. I would like those members to congratulate us on the many steps we have taken.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the spokesperson for the Board of Internal Economy.

As promised in last year's budget the cost of operating Parliament Hill has been reduced by millions of dollars. Can the spokesperson tell us what measures the Board of Internal Economy will take to reduce the cost of food services on Parliament Hill?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the Board of Internal Economy has approved a business plan for the food services branch which will lead to savings of some $1.7 million per year.

Three cafeterias will be shut down and replaced with more cost effective alternatives. Staff will be reduced and re-deployed. Prices will be increased and menus diversified.

This initiative, along with other measures of the Gagliano plan, will save some $6 million per year for the taxpayers of Canada.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, next week 35,000 railway workers are legally entitled to strike. This country will hardly have time to recover from an inadequate budget, let alone the massive shutdown of vital rail services. The cabinet's economic policy committee has already approved proposed legislation for anti-scab legislation.

Will the Minister of Labour fight against this proposal? Will she refuse to take sides and will she find an effective, impartial means of resolving this dispute through such a mechanism as binding, final selection offer arbitration?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after the conciliation officer tabled his report, I understood from what the parties said that they were prepared to resume negotiations. I think that the hon. member from the Reform Party should realize that the best thing would be for both sides to agree to negotiate a settlement between themselves. Together, the parties are quite capable of resolving their problems. So, let us not talk about a catastrophe before it occurs.

The parties are presently in a very good position to sit together and figure out the best way of settling their differences. I urge both sides to go back to the negotiation table and find this solution and I hope that they will do so.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we all agree that the parties should find a solution. The minister's responsibility is to prevent a catastrophe. She has had time now to consider whether the government is going to take steps to prevent the shutdown. The clock is ticking.

Will the minister state unequivocally that there will not be anti-scab legislation on the table, that she will not support a proposal that will cause irreparable harm to our economy if there is a strike and that she is not going to be a participant in the lynching that will take place?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is clearly too early to talk about any legislation. This is a matter for the parties involved, who are best able to settle their differences together.

JOB CREATION

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. According to the latest report from Quebec's ministry of income security, the number of welfare recipients has gone up again. There are now more than 797,000 people on welfare. Although massive layoffs are announced in several sectors elsewhere in Canada, the government is clearly content to rely on the economic recovery to create jobs.

Given the significant increase in the number of welfare recipients and the fact that the results of job creation programs are well below the figures quoted by the Prime Minister, does the government realize that it cannot just sit back and let the economy do the work and that it must put in place an active employment policy to provide the jobs so badly needed by Canadians and Quebecers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the government initiated a very active job creation program last year in its budget. As a result we have had the best job creation record of any country in the G-7, over 433,000 jobs.

The hon. member should know that because in her own constituency the unemployment rate has dropped almost 3 per cent during that one-year period.

I do not take any satisfaction in that as I still think more needs to be done. That is why we very much wish that the Bloc Quebecois, rather than constantly rising to defend the status quo, would join us in a serious effort to reform our programs of training and employment so we an help people get back to work because that is where the jobs will be.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is important to know that, between 1985 and 1988, just as we were coming out of the crisis, there were over 60,000 more jobs on average than under this government, notwithstanding the increase in population. I can only conclude that the government does not care about the unemployment problem.

How can the minister explain the fact that his government is not handling the economic crisis nearly as well as the previous government did in the middle of the 1980s? Will the government finally get rid of its wait–and–see attitude, which is no longer enough?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we have said several times, a budget will be presented on Monday which will be a very definitive answer by the government to the broad crisis.

If the hon. member looks at the past record, one of the errors of omission of our predecessors is that they did not come to grips with economic reality. They did not take the decisions that were necessary to stabilize or to restructure the economy and put us in a position where we could compete effectively and create jobs in a global economy.

We have undertaken initiatives in trade. We are taking initiatives in social reform. We are taking initiatives in the whole area of developing small business programs. It is not simply a matter of reacting to rhetoric, but actually coming to grips with the hard decision.

Again, I would invite the hon. member to join us in that very important enterprise.

HEALTH

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Kingston penitentiary is in the midst of a tuberculosis outbreak. It is reported that 25 per cent of the inmates and six prison guards have tested positive for TB.

The president of the Union of Solicitor General's employees, Lynn Ray, has said that this crisis should never have happened and that Kingston officials have known for months about a possible TB outbreak.

Would the Solicitor General please explain why no action was taken earlier to prevent this situation.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Correctional Services of Canada has an active program to deal with the situation. It is working with Health Canada and other medical authorities. Its view is that it currently has the situation under control.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this outbreak of tuberculosis shows how ill–equipped Canadian prison systems are in dealing with communicable diseases.

I ask the Solicitor General if he agrees with the corrections' spokesman in Saskatoon who suggested that it might be time to considering mandatory testing.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is always something that could be looked into. In Kingston there has been an active testing program. In fact, so far the people who have shown positive in the testing have not been found to have active TB as such. Prison officials are working closely with Health Canada officials to make sure that active TB cases do not occur.

I appreciate the interest of my hon. friend in this important subject.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

A year ago the minister launched, together with the provinces, a series of strategic initiatives across Canada to test innovative ways of helping Canadians get back to work.

Given the tight fiscal environment, governments and Canadians generally will be turning more often to creative solutions and wanting to make sure that these solutions are working.

Could the minister report today on the impact of these initiatives on job creation in Canada.

• (1155)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a question that follows in part the question raised by the hon. member for Mercier. We have now negotiated with the provinces over 15 different strategic initiatives that have provided opportunities for over 30,000 Canadians to find innovative ways to go back to work.

For example, in Prince Edward Island, 2,000 Canadians who have mental disabilities are now being integrated back into the community and into the workforce. In the member's own province of New Brunswick we have been able to supply through the New Brunswick job core opportunities for over 1,000 older workers to get back into the workforce.

I would like to quote a letter I received from a gentleman who is working with a boy's club who said: "I have waited 50 years for a job like this. I really enjoy working with kids. It is the best thing that has ever happened to me. It is a real blessing". That is the kind of innovation we want to show in getting people back to work.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

I am sure that the Minister of Justice shares my concern about the issue of violence against women. I am not as convinced that the minister sees addressing this problem both legislatively and in program funding must be a central theme, not simply peripheral to other considerations.

While I know that the minister is going to introduce amendments to the Criminal Code on the so–called drunkenness defence, I want to ask the minister if he will recognize that it is not the drunkenness defence or the use of drugs that should be used as a defence in violence against women but that violence itself?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the hon. member that the drunkenness defence is only one aspect of the challenge facing government and Canadians; namely, to deal more effectively with the problem of violence by men against women.

May I say, in response to the question that has been asked, that this preoccupation affects virtually everything that the Department of Justice does in relation to the criminal justice system. Trying to assess and anticipate the impact on women of laws that we propose, trying to co–ordinate the effort with other ministries and other levels of government to provide services to victims of violence, trying through education and other proactive social means to eradicate the causes of such violent behaviour, trying to improve education for young men and boys, so that they may have a healthier view of themselves and the other gender so that—

Could the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Canadian Heritage tell us whether the minister has been in touch with the U.S. authorities and could she indicate the origin of this document?

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the buck stops with the justice minister. Last week when asked how a national gun registry would reduce crime he could not or would not answer. Instead he listed off a group of bureaucrats and organizations which he claims support his measures.

Is it not his responsibility to explain how a national gun registry will improve public safety and reduce violent crime? Does the buck not stop with him?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is entirely appropriate that I should have been in the midst of answering a question about violence against women immediately before having been asked about the registration of firearms.

The hon. member need only refer to the speeches I have made in the House as recently as last week on the subject to see the direct and demonstrable link between the registration of firearms and the reduction of violence, particularly violence against women.

TOURISM

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry.

I have active tourism committees in my riding of South Shore in Nova Scotia. They would like an update on the progress of the Canadian Tourism Commission and how the commission will help them in their job of promoting tourism.

• (1200)

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for this very important question.

As members will know, this is one area within this government where we have not only held our budget but have increased our budget because we believe that tourism marketing is one area through which we can put a lot of Canadians back to work in very short order.

To facilitate that the Prime Minister announced in early January the Canadian tourism commission. The Minister of Industry announced all the appointed members February 1 and that commission is now receiving proposals from the private sector from tourism operators.

It will consider those private sector marketing plans along with those funds. They in turn will be matched with the tourism commission's funds. Hopefully through that kind of joint venture and leveraged attempt we can—

EDUCATION

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, each year the federal government gives provincial education departments millions of dollars to subsidize French classes.

Much of this money is used by school boards as a source of general revenue rather than French language education. For example, a recent report by the Carleton Board of Education states the income from these grants supports the system as a whole and is not specifically directed to the immersion program.

Can the Minister of Canadian Heritage or his secretary of state explain why his government is permitting money intended for French immersion to be used for general administration costs by school boards from coast to coast?

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take the question under advisement.

CHILD CARE

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In its red book, the Liberal government promised to create 150,000 new child care spaces as soon as economic growth exceeded 3 per cent, at a rate of 50,000 spaces annually, a commitment that was reiterated by the Minister of Human Resources Development in his reform proposals. Last February, the Minister of Finance provided for a $120 million envelope for 1995–96 and another $240 million for 1996–97 to finance these new child care spaces.

Since there is every indication that this year, economic growth will exceed 3 per cent, is the government still prepared to act on its commitment, while of course respecting current provincial responsibility for child care?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have already started discussions with the provinces.

My deputy met with his counterparts in January. We hope to have a follow–up meeting in the spring. We have also started direct negotiations with representatives of the First Nations peoples to provide 6,000 spaces for them.

It is simply a matter of having to work in co–operation with both our aboriginal peoples and provincial jurisdictions.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all of the very hard working members from all parties of the finance committee, I have the honour to present to this House its 12th report.

This is about family trusts.

• (1205)

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues on the finance committee who attended the committee's sittings wish to thank all the groups and experts who came to testify before the committee. Since today, they are away on business in their constituencies, I will express our party's dissenting opinion.

After several attempts to reach a consensus, the Bloc Quebecois had to reject the majority report tabled by the finance committee.

The official opposition is not against the principle of family trusts as such. However, the Bloc Quebecois cannot endorse the conclusions of the committee that favour maintaining Bill C–92, which allows wealthy Canadian families to use family trusts as a tax shelter. According to the experts who testified before the committee, the tax revenues forgone as a result of Bill C–92 would be in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

The Bloc Quebecois was also surprised at the complete reversal of the position taken by the Liberal Party of Canada which, when it was in the opposition, vigorously condemned Bill C–92. Today, by tabling this report, the Liberals put their seal of approval on the deferral of capital gains tax for the next twenty or thirty years and have thus refused to abolish the tax privileges of the wealthy.

In concluding, I would like to say that, for these reasons, the Bloc Quebecois demands, in its dissenting opinion, that the family trust system be amended so as to tax the capital gains of these family trusts.

ADM AGRI–INDUSTRIES LTD. OPERATIONS ACT

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): moved for leave to introduce Bill C–310, an act to provide resumption of operations of Archer Daniel Midland Ltd.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to provide a few details on this bill.

There is a labour dispute between ADM Agri–Industries Ltd. and the Ogilvie Mills Ltd employees union affecting some 150 production employees. The parties are negotiating a new collective agreement to replace the one which expired on January 31, 1992.

A conciliator and then a mediator were appointed to help the parties resolve their differences. Unfortunately, little progress has been made up to now. The union declared a legal general strike on June 6, 1994. The strike begun eight months ago is continuing. The employer has continued its activities with the help of replacement workers.

I am therefore proposing a bill to provide for the appointment of an arbitrator to resolve this dispute, and, within 30 days, or longer, with the approval of the minister, the arbitrator should determine the issues on which the parties agreed, make an arbitration award on unresolved issues and prepare a memorandum of understanding for a return to work.

The bill contains provisions to require the parties to accept the memorandum of agreement for the return to work and the resumption of operations. It also contains sanctions in the form of fines, in the event the act is contravened. The act would come into force the day after royal assent.

UNITED STATES SUGAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS RETALIATION ACT

Mr. Paul Zed (Fundy—Royal, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–311, an act to require the Minister for International Trade to retaliate against import restrictions introduced by the United States of America on Canadian refined sugar and sugar containing products.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the name of this act is known as the United States Sugar Import Restrictions Retaliation Act.

In 1994 Canada and the United States and over 100 countries signed a new GATT agreement aimed at reducing trade barriers and increasing market access over time. However, in the face of this global trade liberalization the United States preserved its own protectionist, high priced sugar program and took the opportunity to further reduce Canada's access for sugar and sugar containing products.

On January 1, 1995 Canada's exports of refined sugar and sugar containing products were forcibly reduced to a trickle. The sugar industry estimates that this will result in a $90 million loss in export trade accompanied by substantial job losses in Canada's refining and food processing industries.

Imports from the United States are unrestricted and continue to rise as Canadian tariffs on U.S. sugar and sugar containing products decline under NAFTA.

This is one way free trade and will result in millions of dollars of lost revenue, countless job losses and the reallocation of plants producing sugar containing products to the United States.

In conclusion, our Prime Minister yesterday quoted that the Americans are our best friends whether we like it or not. Let us resolve this issue quickly as friends.

ADM AGRI–INDUSTRIES LTD. OPERATIONS ACT

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–312, an act to provide for the resumption of operations at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to table a bill regarding the resumption of operations of the company ADM Agri–Industries Ltd. As was already said, the employees of this company have been negotiating their collective agreement since it expired on January 31, 1992. The employees have been on strike now for eight months.

Despite the efforts of conciliators and mediators to put an end to this strike, it has dragged on and the employer has kept operations running by hiring outside help. Therefore, I am tabling this bill, which provides for a mediator–arbitrator to settle the conflict and which provides that employees will go back to work under the terms of a memorandum of agreement, drafted by the mediator–arbitrator.

The bill contains provisions obliging the two parties to respect the memorandum of agreement and to try to settle the current conflict. It also contains sanctions in the form of fines, if the legislation is not respected.

ADM AGRI–INDUSTRIES LTD. OPERATIONS ACT

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint–Paul, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–313, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of the operations at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to introduce a bill providing for the resumption and continuance of operations at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd., commonly referred to as Ogilvie Mills.

As you know, 150 employees have been on strike for eight months. This bill would require the two parties to negotiate and go back to work. One of the two parties would have to determine working conditions under this plan. As you know, many people with dependent children are now on strike, despite having to earn a living. This bill should solve these problems.

PETITIONS

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table in this House a petition signed by some 40 people, in addition to another petition containing about 15,500 signatures, which I sent directly to the office of the minister responsible for social housing this morning.

These petitions are signed by social housing tenants from all parts of Quebec. They were given to me by the Quebec federation of low–rent housing tenants and by the citizens' committee of Saint–Sauveur, Quebec. These petitions include the signatures of 500 residents of Saint–Hyacinthe that were sent to met by my colleague from Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot.

The petitioners wish to draw the attention of Parliament to their current precarious situation and their inability to afford the 20 per cent rent increase contemplated by the government. This increase will affect 110,000 Quebec households who live in social housing units and earn an average annual income of $10,000. That translates into an annual rent increase of $500 per household, which is totally unacceptable.

The petitioners urge Parliament to renounce any measures to save money that would impoverish tenants.

I totally and wholeheartedly support this petition and urge the government to take appropriate action.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise before the House once again to present petition number 15 in the course of action undertaken on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson.

April 11 is the date set for the parole hearing. My colleague from Surrey—White Rock—South Langley shall be in attendance with me at this hearing.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets shall be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to present three petitions to the House.

The first petition is signed by 150 of my constituents who are praying and requesting that Parliament reduce government spending rather than increase taxes.

The second petition is signed by 55 members of my constituency. The petitioners are praying and requesting that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal government spending.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is signed by members of my constituency who are praying and requesting that Parliament oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

The first petition is signed by 60 residents of my riding and deals with the Canadian Supreme Court decision that freed an alcoholic who raped an elderly disabled woman.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation to review the Supreme Court ruling file 23435 rendered September 30, 1994 and to enact legislation to address the repercussion of this ruling.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is signed by 40 of my constituents. It calls on Parliament to extend the same protection to the unborn child enjoyed by born human beings by amending the Criminal Code.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is signed by 149 people. They are asking Parliament not to amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in a way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions signed by 71 constituents that call for Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be retained without change and enforced in order that Parliament not sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or euthanasia.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Finally, Mr. Speaker, the last petition was signed by 25 of my constituents who are asking that Parliament amend the Young Offenders Act to allow the courts to punish more severely those who are convicted of crimes with violence.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions on behalf of my constituents from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

The first one contains 73 signatures. The petitioners are requesting that Parliament oppose any attempt to alter our ability to provide for a secure retirement by way of taxation of assets or income from RRSPs and pension plans.

The second and third petitions contain a total of 225 signatures and deal with the same subject matter. They are calling on Parliament to reduce the federal deficit by reducing government spending and to refrain from any form of increased taxation.

I agree with my petitioners.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, on behalf of 120 constituents of Saanich—Gulf Islands and surrounding area.

The petitioners humbly pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition on behalf of some constituents of Simcoe Centre, requesting that the Government of Canada not amend the Human Rights Act to include the phrase sexual orientation.

The petitioners fear such an inclusion would indicate societal approval of homosexual behaviour. The petitioners believe the government should not legitimize this behaviour against the clear wishes of the majority.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 104 and 110.

[Text]

Question No. 104—Mr. Hermanson:

Is there, or has there ever been an audit of the Canadian Wheat Board accounts and if so, (a) by whom, (b) are the audits publicly available, (c) how much money is owed to the CWB by foreign governments and (d) how much of that debt has been written off as uncollectable?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): (a) The Canadian Wheat Board accounts are audited by an independent external auditor, Deloitte and Touche, Chartered Accountants. In addition, management of the Canadian Wheat Board is responsible for having good internal controls and formal policies and procedures to ensure the integrity and reliability of accounting and financial reporting. Management continually evaluates policies and procedures to ensure they meet the needs of the board and comply with current Canadian accounting standards. An internal audit group independently assesses the effectiveness of internal controls and recommends improvements.

(b) Audit results are published each year in the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board which is tabled in Parliament and publicly available.

(c) As of 30 September 1994, the Canadian Wheat Board accounts receivable due from foreign customers totals $6.901 billion.

(d) The Canadian Wheat Board has not written off receivables from foreign governments. The Canadian government has, however, agreed, along with other creditor countries to implement multilateral, Paris club, debt relief initiatives for Poland and Egypt. Zambia and Ethiopia received much smaller debt relief packages. The Polish debt relief package was created to assist that country in its transition to a democratic state in pursuit of market oriented reforms. The Egyptian debt relief agreement was made to enable Egypt to recover from the aftereffects of the gulf war. In neither case was the debt relief granted because the debt was considered to be uncollectible.

About $522 million will be drawn down in this fiscal year from the allowances of the Government of Canada for general contingencies which were created in 1990. Further drawdowns will be made in fiscal year 1995–96 to complete debt relief operations for Poland and Egypt.

Poland's debt to Canadian government agencies has been reduced by about $216 million. After debt reduction, Egypt's debts will be reduced by $279 million. Egypt and Poland are servicing the remainder of their debts punctually.

Question No. 110—Ms. Beaumier:

With respect to reports by non-governmental organizations that Vietnamese refugees interned in Southeast Asian camps are being subjected to inhumane treatment by host governments, (a) is the government investigating these reports and (b) what action does the government plan to take with respect to these alleged human rights violations?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): The specific non-governmental report cited by the member in this question is Amnesty International Calls for Action to Protect Asylum-Seekers, AI Index ASA 19/WU 03/94.

Although cognizant of allegations of human rights abuses in Hong Kong refugee camps, the government was not aware of this specific report prior to the member's question.

As an active supporter of the comprehensive plan of action, CPA, on indochinese refugees, Canada recognizes that persons who are not refugees should return to their countries of origin. The group under discussion was determined by authorities not to be refugees. At the same time, the Government of Canada prefers that humane methods be used to ensure the safe repatriation of these individuals.

The Government of Canada recognizes that the protection of refugees and asylum seekers falls under the mandate of the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, UNHCR, and will continue to work with the UNCHR to bring the CPA to a successful conclusion.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 86.

[Text]

*Question No. 86—Mr. Deshaies:

Regarding service, supply and leasing contracts awarded by Public Works and Government Services Canada, (a) how many such contracts have been awarded in Abitibi since October 25, 1993, (b) what amounts are involved, (c) to whom were these contracts awarded?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): The information requested is not available in an existing document and it cannot be produced within the department's routine operations. The manual and electronic data banks of the four distinct organizations which existed prior to the merger forming the department of Public Works and Government Services have not as of yet been integrated or updated. To compile information which represents the contracting activities of the entire department, an in–depth search would have to be conducted throughout the many sectors of the department and their data banks.

The department does not currently have the capability within its routine operations to produce accurate statistical information for all of its contracting activities within electoral boundaries.

The department is presently considering the various options available to it to update and integrate its various information holdings.

As an alternative approach to providing contracting information to members of Parliament, efforts have been made to facilitate access to the open bidding service, OBS. The OBS is a user–pay electronic bulletin board which publicly advertises contract opportunities, notices of planned sole–source contracts, as well as notices of contract awards. Through the OBS, contract histories are also available, allowing subscribers to find information on OBS contracts that have been awarded in the past, to whom, and for what amount.

In addition, PWGSC's publication, "Government Business Opportunities", GBO, is published three times a week and provides similar information on federal government procurement. The GBO is available to members of Parliament free of charge through the federal government depository services program.

Please note that this type of information for the whole province of Quebec is available in the answer to question Q–93 tabled this day.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Due to the length of the answer I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if Question Nos. 21, 85, 93 and 124 could be made Orders for Return, the returns would be tabled immediately.

I want to say with respect to Question No. 21 that it is a long outstanding question on the Order Paper. I am pleased the answer has been completed and I know the hon. member will find it quite marvellous.

With respect to Question No. 93, we have had a lot of bleating and whining in the last few days from the hon. member for Quebec East. I am pleased to table the answer to the question. This is the French version. I have an English version that is of similar size. I am only tabling one copy in the House to avoid having six boxes here today.

The hon. member says that it has taken a long time to answer this question. He is correct. Over 1,000 pages of material have been gathered painstakingly by the department. When I assured him the other day that public servants were working on this matter I was correct. I know now that he will see I was correct and I hope he has a nice weekend reading the answer.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 21, 85, 93 and 124 be deemed to have been made Orders for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 21—Mr. Harper:

What are the Departmental and Ministerial guidelines that the Minister of Transport uses in the determination of awarding a specific international air route to a specific Canadian airline?

Question No. 85—Mr. Cummins:

In regard to Dr. Paul LeBlond, Joe Scimger, Dr. Dick Routledge and David Brander–Smith (members of the Independent Review Board inquiring into the government's management and enforcement effort on the Fraser River), (a) what departmental advisory committees (including the Pacific Salmond Commission) do these individuals sit on or have sat on since 1980, (b) what work, papers, reports, or the like have been or are being undertaken by these individuals, their firms, or their respective university departments on behalf of federal departments, and their agencies (including the Pacific Salmon Commission) since 1980, (c) what submissions or proposals have been submitted by these individuals, their firms, or their university departments in 1993 or 1994 to government departments, and their agencies (including the Pacific Salmon Commission) that have been approved, turned down, deferred, or have yet to be fully considered, (d) what is the amount of payment that these individuals, their firms, or their university departments have received from the Federal Crown, and its agencies (including the Pacific Salmon Commission) since 1980, (e) what remuneration will these individuals receive for their participation on the Independent Review Board?

Question No. 93—Mr. Marchand:

What contracts for services, supplies and leasing have been awarded by Public Works and Government Services since October 25, 1993, in all federal constituencies in Quebec, and what federal government properties are located in those same constituencies?

Question No. 124—Mr. Hermanson:

With regard to regional ministerial offices, for every year since 1988, (a) what is the number of regional offices, (b) where are these offices located and (c) for each office (i) what was the date of opening, (ii) what was the date of closure (if applicable), (iii) how many persons are/were employed by each office, (iv) what is/was the budget of each office, (v) what proportion of that budget was spent, (vi) what percentage of these funds were spent on office administration, salaries, capital costs, outside contracts and hospitality, and (vii) what are the guidelines under which these expenditures are made?

(Return tabled.)

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion. That Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak once more against the bill before us, Bill C–37.

I am sad to see that the government keeps wanting us to pass yet another bill tinted with a social policy that goes against the wishes and reality of the people of Quebec as well as the interests of the people of Canada.

On this issue as on many others, we, in Quebec, do not regard or live the juvenile delinquency problem the same way as English Canada does. As I said eight months ago, the rate of juvenile delinquency in Quebec is the second lowest in Canada, after Prince Edward Island. In Quebec, the detention rate for young offenders is the lowest in Canada.

When you put these two facts together, you can see that a more systematic and lengthy detention, as proposed in the bill, has no bearing on the rate of juvenile delinquency. That is what we found out in Quebec.

In Quebec, we believe that where the real problems with the judicial handling of young offenders lie is with undue delays before sentencing and a settlement rate of 29 per cent at best for problems related to crime. This means that 71 per cent of young offenders get the idea they can do it again with complete impunity.

In Quebec, we also believe that the first thing to do is to deal with the social roots of violence. We believe in eradicating poverty affecting women and their children. In Quebec, we believe in making easier the access of women and their children to shelters, so that they can escape family violence. In Quebec, we believe in improving access to social housing so that young people can brought up in a healthy environment. In Quebec, this is the approach generally favoured.

These points quite naturally demonstrate that Quebec society is opposed to any change to the existing legislation, because, if used wisely, it can achieve different results depending on the situation. Unfortunately, it is not the Quebec approach that the federal government wants to impose on us. The quick fix the government would have us adopt is a heavy–handed approach.

This government is inconsistency personified. For instance, it blithely reneges on its campaign promise that it would not reduce transfer payments to the provinces, payments which help to improve the quality of life of the neediest in our society, including women and children, while it insists on keeping those with more devious public appeal.

How do we reconcile statements by the minister that there has been no increase in violent crime in Canada with Bill C–37? The answer is simple: this bill fits nicely into the latter categories: the promises the party has to keep if it is to maintain its standing in the polls.

This is outrageous, and this so–called social policy should be seen for what it really is: a campaign promise based not on reality but on myth, a campaign promise whose impact will be extremely harmful, and finally, a campaign promise that smacks of the extreme right wing.

We condemn this clumsy attempt by the government to make political gains at the expense of minors. This is not the Quebec way. The end, the means and the probable results are equally unacceptable.

It is common knowledge that increased sentencing and the incarceration of young offenders in prisons for adults are the easy way out and are more likely to provide opportunities for the homosexual exploitation of young people than for rehabilitation and for training these people to be responsible citizens. It is also common knowledge that the amount of time spent in custody is not a factor in treatment and social reintegration, and that five years are ample, since the impact on young people is different.

Two experiments conducted in the United States, which were similar to those proposed by the Minister of Justice, produced negative results.

I would now like to discuss the position of the victims who are supposed to benefit as a result of amendments to the legislation, and I am referring to women. I have already pointed out that a number of women's groups do not support the proposed amendments.

During the six months elapsed since the second reading of this bill, the government has failed to convince women that the proposed changes will help reduce violence against women. Women know perfectly well that young boys, who constitute the vast majority of offenders affected by the legislation, do not represent a threat to women, although the legislation is also supposed to be a way to reduce violence against women. I may refer hon. members to the findings of a wide ranging survey by Statistics Canada on violence against women, published in November 1993. According to the survey, one woman out of two was a victim of violence and, in the vast majority of cases, the aggressor was known to the victim.

In this instance, aggressor refers to the spouse or ex–spouse, not an unknown adolescent. We must look at the facts. Women who fall prey to violence are the targets of someone with whom they are having or have had an intimate relationship. In discussing the problem of violence against women, a possible role of a juvenile delinquent does not even come to mind.

Other important players, by virtue of their position in society, have also spoken out against this government bill. Think for example of religious communities whose apostolic mandate permits them to evaluate social policies from a global perspective. Moreover, the Church Council on Justice and Corrections argues that these presumably draconian measures do not provide a legitimate solution to juvenile delinquency. The "law and order" approach seems to calm public fears for the time being, but it does not address the true problems of juvenile crime. What is worse, it fosters false hopes given the ad hoc and simplistic nature of the legislation.

I would like to point out that this view is shared by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Quakers, the Mennonite Central Committee of Canada, the United Church of Canada and the Oblate Community of Manitoba.

There is also the scientific community whose research on dealing with juvenile delinquency does not in any way support the conclusions reached by the justice minister.

This would be the result of the proposed amendments. They would help neither the victims nor the young persons. They do not in any way address the problems with which young Canadians are grappling.

Above all, no consideration whatsoever is given to the specific nature of Quebec. What a great example of federalism. This bill, conceived purely with elections in mind, will unfortunately harm individuals who in fact need the government's help, that is the victims and young persons. Instead of giving women's organizations the necessary funding to help deal with the effects of violence, it would imprison the most vulnerable in our society, our young people. Another opportunity wasted.

[English]

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today to address Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act.

This is an issue about which my constituents feel very strongly. That is probably true across Canada. Not a day goes by without my office receiving a letter on this subject. Two weeks ago I presented a petition with 16,300 names calling on Parliament to revise this act in a more meaningful way.

• (1235)

The organizer of the petition is a constituent of mine, Mr. Bernard Castet. Mr. Castet became involved in this issue after his young son, André, was brutally and senselessly beaten and killed by two youths.

It is hard enough for a parent to handle the loss of a child but Mr. Castet's grief was further compounded by the fact that these two young offenders would be tried in youth court for this vicious and unprovoked attack.

It is a sad reality of the current act that Mr. Castet had to go to court to fight the system in an effort to have the two youths raised to adult court where, if found guilty, they could receive the type of sentence that would match the crime. After months of hearings, the court has now ruled that these two accused killers will be tried as adults. However if the government had accepted Reform's amendments to the bill, others like Mr. Castet would not have to go through this same trauma.

One such amendment called for any young offender charged with murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, aggravated sexual assault and aggravated assault to be tried in adult court. This is also the substance of Mr. Castet's petition.

The Reform Party, along with Mr. Castet and the more than 16,300 people who signed that petition, believe such an amendment would be a positive step, not only in terms of meting out punishment to fit the crime, but also as a deterrent factor. Admittedly the justice committee did put forward a compromise amendment but it is still less than what the public demands and desires.

Reform also called for a lowering of the age definition by two years from 12 to 17 years inclusive to 10 to 15 years. Most people, except the government, seem to agree that if a person is old enough to get a driver's licence and have many other societal responsibilities, that person is old enough to be accountable for his or her actions in adult court. Such a change in age limits would also prevent young offenders from slipping through the cracks of the current legislation.

Mr. Castet and his 16,300 petitioners also agree with the Reform Party that the extra privacy provisions of the Young Offenders Act are inappropriate for violent or repeat young offenders. In these cases, the publishing of names would make protection of the community the number one priority.

Reform also supports amendments to make parents more accountable for the actions of their children. This accountability would take the form of compensating victims for property crimes if it can be demonstrated that there was not a reasonable effort to exercise parental control.

While Reform members advocate such things as stiffer penalties for serious crimes, we are not looking to lock up all young offenders nor do we believe that even the most hardened young offender is beyond rehabilitation. A further Reform amendment posed just such an approach, calling for rehabilitation opportunities to be emphasized in a disciplined environment.

I would like to take a minute to address another item that I have brought up in the House before. I would like the House to consider seriously the whole matter of the punishment of young offenders.

Looking at the situation facing us today, young offenders are put away but they lose none of their rights. They can go with their hair whatever length they want. They have colour TV. They have all the rights in the world. There is no sense of punishment or discipline. A movement was started in the United States called boot camps. I approve of the thrust of this movement because it disciplines young offenders. They cannot go into a punishment facility with their own agenda. If they are found guilty of something they have to follow the agenda of the boot camp.

I have stood here before and spoken of my experience in the past, not as an inmate of a Canadian army detention barracks but as an observer of one. The basic thing about a detention barracks was that the inmate obeyed every rule immediately. After having served his minimal time he swore that he would never go back to that facility again. He was not abused. He was not beaten. He was simply made to toe the line. This works.

The other big benefit of this scheme where inmates are disciplined and made to follow our agenda and not their own agenda is that it is cost effective. Young offenders or anyone else for that matter, even an older offender, can be put in such a facility and in 30 days they are ready to obey the rules of society. It will have an effect that 60 days or 90 days or half a year of doing what they want in a youth facility will not have.

I will wind down that portion of my pitch to the House in pleading with all members to please let us take a look at the effectiveness of such discipline on young offenders particularly, but on others as well.

In conclusion, in carefully reviewing the bill I fully appreciate the efforts the Minister of Justice has made to try and satisfy the various special interest groups which make up the Liberal Party. It is a formidable task. However, in doing so the minister has put forward yet another piece of middle of the road legislation which has become the trademark of all Liberal governments.

Unfortunately the vast majority of Canadians want decisive action on this issue, not this watered down liberalism. On behalf of Mr. Castet and his late son André, I urge the government to hop off the fence and make the necessary changes to this important legislation.

If I have two minutes left I am going to once again return to my pitch and plead with the public as well as the members of the House to consider running boot camps or military style detention camps. For a minimum period of incarceration these camps will have a disciplinary effect for life on the people subject to that sort of punishment. It does not inflict physical harm. It simply says: "You obey the rules of this establishment. You do not have rules of your own". In so doing, it brings them around to saying: "Yes. Maybe I had better pay attention and listen to what society is telling me".

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is of course my pleasure to take my turn to speak on Bill C-37. As my colleagues already mentioned several times, the Bloc Quebecois finds this bill totally unacceptable for many reasons. The short time I have been allotted only allows me to gloss over the four main reasons.

As I said, there are four major reasons why we do not accept this bill. Firstly, the bill's methodology is incoherent; secondly, in many respects, it is poorly designed and is very ambiguous; thirdly, it imposes on Quebec nation wide legislation, although we already have the best system in this area in Canada; fourthly, it is doubtful the bill will be effective.

• (1245)

This bill is incoherent. I hope that my hon. colleague will listen, and he will see what I mean. The minister is proposing important changes to the act that the committee will be carefully studying later on. Obviously, the time to do a study is before and not after the changes are made. This is a classic case of putting the cart before the horse. Furthermore, the Quebec Bar Association's paper, from which I will read a few passages, fully agrees with this analysis.

The bar association stated that, regarding this issue, it could only deplore the decision to start by amending the law, and then to backtrack and carefully study the legislation and juvenile delinquency. In addition to acknowledging Quebec's success in the area, starting at the other end would have made it easier to identify the specific mechanisms needed for the system to work well and the preliminary study of juvenile delinquency would have allowed to take stock of the outcome of the 1992 changes. This bill has already been amended. No one has evaluated the consequences, yet, we are getting ready to once again amend it and to do studies after the fact.

And the bar association ended by saying that it had reached the inevitable conclusion that Bill C–37, currently under consideration, should be withdrawn. It acknowledged that this was politically out of the question and that the minister had doubtless already made a public commitment. It proposed that the minister at least suspend consideration and first study the situation of crime among young people and look at the overall structure of the Young Offenders Act and then only return to the legislative amendments.

There is a another reason we find this awkward and highly ambiguous bill unacceptable. We have cited many ambiguities here in the House in the past few days, since we started discussing the bill. I would like to draw attention to some of them, in passing, before going on to other points.

Clause 1 of Bill C–37 introduces statements of principles into the act to the effect that crime prevention is essential to the protection of society and that a multidisciplinary approach is required to put an end to the problem.

Clause 15 of the bill provides that custody is not a substitute for appropriate child protection or health measures. It also provides that the courts should consider other alternatives before contemplating custody. Such statements are entirely in keeping with the Bloc's statements, of course. However, the bill does not speak about the actual alternatives. The bill talks of alternative solutions, but no effective measures are provided to carry them out.

Another argument is as follows. One of the major points of this bill is the amendment to arrangements for transfer to an adult court. Under the current system, youth court is supposed to bear society's interests in mind, notably public protection and social reintegration of the young person; at the same time, it must ascertain whether these two objectives can be reconciled while retaining jurisdiction over young persons. Otherwise, the young person must be transferred to adult court.

Clauses 3 and 8 of Bill C–37 introduce amendments providing for 16 or 17 year olds charged with criminal offences involving serious bodily harm to be automatically transferred to adult court. These criminal offences are first or second degree murder, attempt to commit murder, manslaughter, aggravated sexual assault and assault. Bill C–37 stipulates that a young person sent directly to adult court could nevertheless ask a youth court judge to hear his case.

In cases of 16 or 17 year olds charged with serious bodily harm, the burden of proof is thus reversed in regard to transfer to adult court. This young person would in fact have to convince the youth court that it is suited to judge his case. Under present provisions, the crown must convince the judge to transfer the young person to adult court.

Thus this serves to a create of a hierarchy of age groups in respect of the courts. However, while the legislation does not distinguish between 12 to 15 year olds and 16 and 17 year olds, these amendments will change the way they are dealt with for offences involving serious bodily harm. Certain lawyers might argue that this represents a violation of the right to equality before the law granted under section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

On the other hand, subclause 13(3) of the same bill provides that maximum sentences imposed for first and second degree murder be increased from five years to ten and seven years respectively. In cases of first degree murder, the maximum period of custody is six years to be served continuously and seven years for second degree murder, with four years served continuously.

These harsher sentences are not justified given that homicide rates have dropped since the 1970s. Furthermore, it seems that 16 and 17 year olds are responsible for the vast majority, or about 60 per cent, of murders committed by teenagers. The bill provides that they will be transferred to adult court and tried according to adult rules. The impact of these increased sentences will not be as significant as one would think at first. Everything seems to indicate that the burden will fall mostly on the shoulders of 12 to 15 year olds, something which is not justified by crime statistics.

Finally, the act was amended before in 1992, as was pointed out earlier, to increase sentences to five years in murder cases. Since statistics are not up to date, there is no way to check the effect of the 1992 amendment at the present time. How can another amendment be justified at this stage? Why not wait to find out the impact of the 1992 amendment before taking more repressive measures? That is what the bar association is wondering.

Finally, this is a Canada-wide piece of legislation, which would force Quebec to adopt procedures when Quebec already has its own rather remarkable ways of doing things. I would like to, once again, quote some of the comments made by the bar association: "It is important to note that Quebec did not address the problems in the same way as the rest of Canada. As a result, the problems are rarely experienced in Quebec and it would therefore be more appropriate to preserve the overall status quo than to modify a proven system. On the other hand, we must conclude that the same results could be achieved in the rest of Canada with adequate material resources".

The bar association recognizes that one of the major flaws in this bill is the lack of resources that we are willing to allocate to our young people's social reintegration. I would also like to mention what a colleague from the Liberal Party, the hon. member for London West, said recently. I think she is absolutely right. She said: "If I were a youth in trouble with the law today, I would much rather be in Quebec than anywhere else in Canada. Quebec takes a much more progressive interpretation of the Young Offenders Act. More diversions tactics are used to prevent young people from being tried. I think that we can and must follow its lead".

But it is not the case here. The federal government is not following the lead of Quebec, but rather trying to impose upon Quebec an unduly punitive legislation under the circumstances, since, as we know and as my hon. colleague from Quebec just mentioned, Quebec is the province who achieves the best results while using the least repression.

Finally, one can very seriously doubt the effectiveness of this legislation because nothing, at present, indicates that crime is reduced in inverse proportion to the length of sentences. I will conclude on this. At the same time, and many of our colleagues raised this point, the public is being hugely sensitized to crime nowadays.

• (1255)

Just take the United States, the best example of a place where you find both maximum repression and maximum crime. We do not think that the present circumstances justify a stiffening of legislation to solve what is more than anything else a profound social problem that requires a multidisciplinary approach. And in this respect, Quebec's lead should be followed.

[English]

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to speak to something as important as Bill C-37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and Criminal Code.

This bill is in response to the increasing tide of violent crime. It especially is in response to the cries for justice from a public that is fed up with being terrorized by criminals, youth and adult alike, and seeing a judicial system inadequate to protect them and their property. It also responds to the cries from police who find the system which has been set out to deal with convicted criminals to be completely inadequate.

The frustration has been so extreme that some individuals in my riding who have been harassed by youth criminals have even suggested corporal punishment as a disincentive. Given some of the situations these people have been in, I cannot say I disagree with them.

I agree with this bill's initiative and will support it. However, I and my party believe the bill does not go far enough. In my speech I will deal with the principles of the bill and put forth some constructive criticisms and additions that I hope the minister will consider.

I agree with the increased penalties particularly for violent offences such as first degree and second degree murder and also the movement of 16 and 17 year olds to adult court at the discretion of the judges for violent offences.

I would agree with the principle of discouraging lengthening incarcerations in secure custody for non-violent offenders as I do not think it will serve the offender nor will it serve society well. However, we must also ask ourselves what this will be replaced with. Nowhere in this bill do I see this addressed.

One of the greatest problems in youth criminal behaviour is not only the violence but also the non-violent criminal acts which encompass a much larger number of criminal behaviour. Many youths who commit these acts for example, break and enter and auto theft, often repeat them many times over. They are convicted, penalized, incarcerated and released, only to repeat the sad cycle of breaking the law once again. The public and the police are understandably frustrated.

Justice must be served in a number of functions. The first one is the protection of society. The second one is the rehabilitation of the criminal. The third is the restitution to society and the victim. There should also be a disincentive to offend. The justice system has failed in many cases on all three fronts. All you need to do, as I said before, is to speak to those individuals who work in the system to know this is so.

We in the Reform Party have suggested that the convicted must pay back to the victim or society in some substantive fashion, for example by way of work or money. Also, to effect rehabilitation part of the penalty must be obligatory; the youth must engage in school or a training program to provide him or her with the skills needed to be a productive member of society. This can similarly be applied to counselling and psychiatric services that the courts feel the offender must take. The offender must also be an active and willing participant in this, for not to do this would defeat the whole purpose of rehabilitation.

Relating to the rehabilitation of the young offender or lack thereof, many of these youths offend and reoffend. We must ask ourselves why this is so. Part of the reason is that tragically many of them themselves find that secure custody is a better environment than the one they come from.

This was graphically illustrated to me by a patient I saw not too many years ago. This young man of 15 stood in front of me prior to his release and pleaded with me to stay in the maximum security youth detention centre. He said: "Dr. Martin, if you let me go, I will go out and reoffend". That broke my heart. It was tragic. It brought to my mind that there was something desperately in need in our system if we had a young offender who had to say that. These young people need to be removed from the environment they find themselves and sent far away from the city to perhaps a setting in a rural area away from the drugs, the alcohol, the sexual abuse and the violence they are subjected to.

A change in environment is absolutely imperative for their rehabilitation. Also important is the length of time they are subjected to this change. They must be away from these destructive environments for a long period of time. I cannot emphasize that enough. It requires a long period of time to effect a change in behaviour and undo the damage of the many years of destructive influence they have been subjected to during their formative years. Repeat young offenders need stable, disciplined and constructive environments not for months but for a year or preferably longer.

Some may consider this suggestion harsh, but the idea is to get them into an secure and safe environment of normalcy where they can start to address the psychological and behavioural reasons they commit crimes. This cannot be done in the destructive environment in which many offenders find themselves, regardless how many dollars are spent on social workers and counselling. It will not work.

We will not change much by putting these individuals either into halfway houses or community rehabilitation centres for a few months, the reason being that they are in close proximity to the same environment they were in before. Therefore they are subjected to the same stresses that bred criminal behaviour in the first place that we see manifested in society.

Also the Reform Party has suggested that parents who wilfully abrogate responsibility for their children must also be held accountable. This could be in the form of fines imposed on parents.

Finally I address the penalty for violent crime. I agree with the lengthening of sentences. I suggest to the minister that another aspect is not addressed in the bill. Youth and adults who commit violent offences and are deemed to likely reoffend at the end of their sentences should continue to be held in custody until such time as they do not pose a threat to innocent people.

The rationale behind this idea comes from our belief that the rights and protection of victims in society are of the greatest importance with regard to justice. In the past I believe the rights of the victim have been violated and in our perception the rights of the convicted have been held at a higher level than those of the innocent.

The bill talks about the consideration of victim impact statements along those lines prior to sentencing. Rather than making them a consideration they should be made obligatory. It should be the right of the victim to give an impact statement at the time of sentencing.

I will address the prevention of crime. I do not have the answer but I would like to give a few insights having worked in the system both as a guard and as a physician. As we have all agreed the causes of crime are multifaceted. As I have said before many youths who commit crimes tragically come from horrendous family situations, often broken families, and are subject to the improper or inadequate parenting, sexual or physical abuse and alcohol and drug abuse often rampant in their history. Many children are born into these tragic situations and develop personality and psychological traits and behaviours that can lead to criminal behaviour.

The number of individuals subjected to such a tragic environment are increasing. Thus the number of people who suffer psychological dislocations as children that are manifested in criminal behaviour as adults will also increase. This will result in an increase in social costs in many areas, only one of which is criminal behaviour.

We should address the contributing factors that produce criminal behaviour. Children must be taught early at the beginning of their school years about appropriate behaviour, self–respect, respect for others, personal responsibility, what drugs, alcohol and sexual abuse are about, in addition to their a, b, c's. It must happen at a very early age, at the age of five or six.

• (1305)

The parents could also be brought into the classroom so that they too could learn the value of important parenting and those lessons they may not have been subjected to as children. As individuals we must learn these things if we are collectively to have a safe, responsible and law–abiding society.

If we are to address the antecedent issues to youth crime it will serve not only current youth offenders but will hopefully prevent those who normally take the path to criminal behaviour from doing so. It is an advantage to them and for the protection of society.

[Translation]

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in June 1994, the Minister of Justice proposed the second reading of Bill C–37 and its referral to a committee for review.

The standing committee on justice recently made 28 amendments which do not significantly change the original piece of legislation. Indeed, the repressive nature of the bill remains intact and the current version once again overlooks the issue of social reintegration and rehabilitation of young offenders.

Today, Bill C–37 still only meets one objective: to silence Liberal hard–liners and to try to please those of the Reform Party.

The bill is very simple; yet, its scope will greatly change the government's view of the issue of juvenile delinquency and the way to deal with it.

Indeed, this legislation significantly changes the statement of principle governing the current law by stating the following, and I quote: "the protection of society, which is a primary objective of the criminal law applicable to youth, is best served by rehabilitation, wherever possible, of young persons".

Bill C–37 also provides harsher sentences for young offenders, as well as an automatic appearance before an adult court for 16 and 17 year olds who commit serious crimes.

Finally, Bill C–37 proposes a major change to the current legislation by specifying that the professionals involved will be allowed to exchange information on young offenders, and that the records of these young offenders will be retained by police authorities for a period of ten years in the case of serious crimes and three years for other offences.

In 1984, the Juvenile Delinquents Act was replaced by the Young Offenders Act, which then applied exclusively to young people aged 12 to 17.

Its purpose was to make young offenders accountable for their criminal behaviour, even though their degree of responsibility may differ largely from that of adults. A responsibility was also put on society in the sense that, while the population has the right to be protected from acts which threaten its safety, crime prevention does remain an important social responsibility.

As a result, young offenders had the right to equitable treatment, since their youth and degree of maturity required particular assistance of a sort not available from the justice system for adults.

In this spirit, the 1984 act prohibited the media from divulging the identity of an accused young person or that of witnesses called to appear. The ban did not last long. In 1986 the act was amended to allow the disclosure of the identity of a young person sought in connection with, charged with or found guilty of an offence and considered to be a threat to public security.

In 1992 the Conservative government again amended the Young Offenders Act, increasing the sentence for murder from 3 to 5 years. Also introduced at this time was the principle that a young offender could be tried before an adult court if measures to ensure public safety were inadequate.

There is no doubt that this bill will mean harsher sentences for young persons and an important shift in the act's declaration of principle.

• (1310)

In actual fact, the harshness of sentences for serious crimes or offences will be reflected in an increase in the number of years of detention. Thus, in the case of first degree murder, the sentence will be increased from 5 to 10 years, and in the case of second degree murder, it will be increased from 5 to 7 years, during which time these young persons will not be eligible for parole.

A number of specialists and other parties interested in the field of juvenile delinquency have observed that the severity of sentences for serious crimes plays a very small role in deterring young offenders.

A number of studies, need I remind you, have shown clearly that individuals who commit serious crime are unable to contemplate the consequences of what they have done or of what they are about to do. Generally speaking, there are three categories of young delinquents involved in serious crime. The first category comprises those whose psychological state or mental health is fragile. With the help of appropriate rehabilitation programs, the young people in this category have every chance of recovering and finding their place in society.

The second category comprises young delinquents who commit misdemeanours, and, under unforseen circumstances, do the irreparable and commit murder or some other serious crime.

Finally, the third category comprises 16 and 17 year olds guilty of serious crime, because their delinquent past has led them to where they are. This is juvenile delinquency at its most serious. These young people are referred to adult court, because prevention and rehabilitation have failed.

It must be said that the majority of young offenders are in the first two categories.

A number of studies would tend to indicate that the rate of homicide among young people has hardly increased in recent years. A document published by the Department of Justice in May 1994 reveals that, in recent years, the number of people under the age of 18 suspected of homicide has been considerably lower than in the 1970s. Between 1974 and 1979, police had an average of 60 homicide suspects under 18 years of age annually, whereas, between 1986 and 1992, the average was only 46.

The public appears more sensitive to violence among young people, however. It really seems that people overestimate the incidence of acts of serious violence. Consider for example a survey carried out in 1992 indicating that "Canadians believed that violent crimes accounted for 30 per cent of all crimes committed".

In reality, only 10 per cent of crimes are violent. Reality is often distorted by the media which for obvious reasons often stress sensational crimes, thus leading the public to believe that the rate of violent crime has risen sharply.

In the opinion of the official opposition, the repressive measures contained in the present bill are far from being justifiable in all cases of juvenile delinquency. All the more so since the present legislation already includes measures to punish offenders guilty of serious offfences.

The statement of principle proposed by the justice minister in Bill C–37 leaves the door wide open for repressing crime rather than preventing it. How else does one explain that this bill does not contain a single new provision in respect of prevention, rehabilitation or reintegration.

In Quebec and certain provinces in Canada, such as Ontario, the approach to young offenders focuses on prevention, rehabilitation and reintegration. Several studies including the Boscoville study have demonstrated the advantages of this approach.

It is true that several provinces in Canada do not have sufficient structures and resources at their disposal to proceed this way. So one might think that repression is the easiest option to choose.

• (1315)

Over the last few months, everyone in the judicial sector has criticized this bill because it ignores the issue of rehabilitation and reintegration. Juvenile delinquency cannot be looked at in isolation from a strictly judicial point of view; other much deeper factors that cause delinquent behaviour in young people must be taken into consideration.

Juvenile delinquency as we now see it is like a mirror held up to society. Without facing this reality, we cannot stem delinquency at its root.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask you the following question: Does Canadian society have the right to choose the simplistic solution of punishment, and to pass this off as the fulfilment of its responsibilities in this matter?

The official opposition thinks not, and I am certain that this is not what Canada wants.

[English]

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this bill. I have had a lot of feedback from my riding that people are very dissatisfied with the way the Young Offenders Act works at present. I know from the feedback I am getting that they are also dissatisfied that the provisions of the bill do not go nearly far enough.

I conducted an electronic referendum on the Young Offenders Act, the first of its type, certainly in North America, during last year. I would like to cover a few of its results which fortify the belief that this bill does not go far enough.

I would like to cover a bit of the background on the Young Offenders Act so we know what we are talking about. The Young Offenders Act, Bill C–61 at the time, was passed in 1984, replacing the 76–year old Juvenile Deliquents Act of 1908. It had been around for a long time and it was generally recognized to be out of date and overly rigid.

Shortly after its passage the Young Offenders Act was also found to be somewhat rigid in certain aspects. Therefore, in 1986 Bill C–106 was passed, making changes to the sections of the Young Offenders Act dealing with the short term incarceration of juveniles awaiting preliminary hearings, the compilation and disclosure of criminal records of young offenders, and some other aspects of the law. Sentencing rules for first and second degree murder were toughened in 1992 by Bill C–12.

The government of the day carried out a poll in 1991 when it had made some changes to the Young Offenders Act in early 1990. The poll question asked: "The federal government has recently introduced legislation which would increase the sentences received by young offenders, 18 years or younger who commit crimes like murder. Do you approve or disagree with this legislation?" The results were remarkable. Eighty–eight to 90 per cent of the people polled felt that the sentences were not nearly tough enough.

I still see the same sort of result coming today from the referendum that I held in my riding. In answer to the question of whether there should be automatic transfer to adult court for serious crimes such as murder, over 95 per cent of the 5,500 people who responded said yes. To the question of whether there should be a special category in the Young Offenders Act for repeat and dangerous offenders, 97 per cent answered yes. There is a sense in the community that people are not safe under the present Young Offenders Act.

My office is in a building that has a McDonald's on the bottom floor, and often a crowd of young people gather there on the weekends. Sometimes graffiti, urine and other things appear over the weekend. I have spoken to the RCMP about it, as have many people who live in the area. The police seem to be very limited in their ability to deal with the situation.

The residents who live in the area are very upset that nothing gets done. They see the police arrive to try to break up minor fights and so on and they hear these young offenders telling the police to f–off and get out of there. It has reached the stage that if the average person on the street witnesses a youth crime and tries to do something about it by calling the police, the whole exercise will turn out to be totally unsatisfactory for everyone involved; for the person who reported it, for the police, and for the people who had the damage done to their property. The only person who seems to get off scot free is this young offender who gets released right away and does not seem to have to pay any penalty for what he or she did.

In a semi–famous case that was printed in our local newspaper, I recently had the mother of a young offender come to my office. Shortly after arriving she burst into tears. She could hardly tell me the story. She had a son who was a young offender. He was a repeat offender. She had pleaded with judges. She had pleaded with people to get tough on this young guy and give him a sentence.

Unfortunately it seemed this kid was constantly given another chance. His crimes progressively got worse. Finally he was picked up on a series of break and enter charges and minor assault. The mother decided this time she would not bail him out; she would not do anything to get him out. She begged that he be put in jail. Of course a lawyer was engaged to defend the young man when he appeared in the courts. He was let out right away.

The first thing he did was to set fire to his family home. That same evening he burned down the family home because his mother had stood up and said something has to be done about this young man. The next day he was back in our local area serving pizzas as usual.

It is a pretty bad situation to have that going on in our society. The people in my riding certainly feel this bill is not going to address those sorts of problems.

I go back to the referendum that was held in my riding. It was one of the biggest samples ever taken on this issue. Over 7,000 votes were cast. We provided a very comprehensive householder. I know I cannot use props in the House so I cannot hold it up for everyone to see.

We set out the background of the Young Offenders Act in the householder and gave both sides of the argument. We quoted from a speech that the Minister of Justice made in a debate on March 17, 1994:

> —the act substantially has been a success and that in principle it is the right approach. I am certain improvements are needed but I am equally certain this process will result in a confirmation of the enlightened approach which the Young Offenders Act contemplates.

That is not what the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police think. In its 1994 response to the Department of Justice report "Toward Safer Communities" we get the quote: "It is our view that the Young Offenders Act requires amendment in many areas and a piecemeal approach will prove ineffective. A comprehensive approach, which includes not only legislative change but also functional changes, is fundamental to addressing the problems of troubled youth".

I have a quotation from the working paper on the victims of violence with respect to the Young Offenders Act. It was also included in my householder: "Instead of becoming more responsible for their behaviour, young offenders are hiding behind the act. Society's right to protection from illegal behaviour has been eroded to the point that nothing short of a major shake–up of the Young Offenders Act will regain its confidence". That is absolutely true.

I have mentioned before in the House that I have gone into the schools in my area and we have discussed the Young Offenders Act. I have asked the young people there what they think of the Young Offenders Act. They think it is a sham. Many of the young people in the schools are afraid of it because it does not protect them from the gang violence that occurs in society.

I said to one young class: "Are you sure you are not just making this judgment that the Young Offenders Act is not working based on the hysteria in the community, that really you do not know what is in it and you are just making an emotional judgment?" Those hands went up again. About 35 out of 37 students in the class said: "No, it is not an emotional decision. We know what happens with the Young Offenders Act. We know how these gang members get off. We want something done about it".

Within the referendum that was held in my riding we had a separate electronic referendum for students. They too confirmed by over 95 per cent that they wanted the Young Offenders Act dramatically revised.

• (1325)

I do not think there is any question that the rate of youths charged with violent crimes per 100,000 population has increased dramatically since 1986. The rate of youths charged with violent crimes has increased by an average of 14 per cent annually.

During this time the rate of adults charged with violent crimes increased only an average of 7 per cent. Therefore youth crime of a violent nature has really accelerated away from those that are happening at the adult level. This has to be because there is no deterrent in the present Young Offenders Act. Young people can do practically anything they want.

I am extremely disappointed that this bill does not give us what we really need to make a difference. I hope that eventually the minister will see the light, change his mind and bring in some tough provisions.

Besides all that, the Deputy Prime Minister promised to resign if the GST was not gone in one year and she still has not done it.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, recently I received a letter from one of my constituents, Mr. Brian Gregory of Enderby, B.C. Although I have never met Mr. Gregory, I would like to quote from his letter. He says in part:

> As time passes, it appears that more and more people are developing a lack of respect for the law and even outright indignation— If laws are unfair or unjust, then it is up to you, the lawmakers, to change the laws. This brings me to the main purpose of my letter: the criminal justice system.
> The terrible tragedies recently involving Rodney Bell, Mindy Tran, and now, Melanie Carpenter, have exposed a weak, tattered criminal justice system.
> Last night, my wife and I sat down and brainstormed a list of changes that we think would improve our criminal justice system.
> Here is our list of changes which we'd like you to consider bringing to the attention of Parliament.
> 1. The law–abiding citizens must be protected at all costs.
> 2. An environment must be created where people regain respect and trust for the law. Justice must prevail.
> 3. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms should not apply to any criminal (including white collar) who is incarcerated. A separate set of minimum rights for criminals should be legislated.
> 4. Young offenders should attend adult court and their identities must not be hidden. Teenagers who are old enough to perform criminal acts are old enough to attend adult court and do "adult time". I do believe, however, they should be segregated from adults in separate prisons. These kids are old enough to know right from wrong.
> 5. Prisons should be located in remote areas.
> 6. Sentences for violent crimes must be increased and there should be no early release for "good behaviour".
> 7. Life sentences must mean life with no parole.
> 8. The law requiring mandatory release after serving two–thirds of a sentence must be rescinded.
> 9. If a prisoner refuses rehabilitation counselling, he should not be released even if he serves his entire sentence.
> 10. The public has the right to know if a violent offender lives in their neighbourhood.
> 11. Work camps should be reinstated so that criminals could put something back into society.
> 12. While I am not a big proponent of capital punishment, this may be necessary for violent repeat offenders or serial killers. An alternative would be life sentences with no parole.
> As we have seen recently, the human element of the justice system makes it too risky that an innocent person will be put to death.

Mr. Gregory went on to write that these are the views of an average, middle class Canadian citizen. However, I am convinced that most Canadians share similar viewpoints:

> Please do not be influenced by a few elite academics who say that the crime rate is decreasing. One preventable murder is one too many. Let us bring common sense and justice back to our justice system.

My staff phoned Mr. Gregory at 7 a.m. B.C. time this morning to ask if I could quote his letter today. His wife said that she was sure he would be tickled to have me do that. I was tickled to get such down to earth letter on the complex subject of the reforms that ordinary Canadians want to see enacted by Parliament so that law–abiding citizens will once again feel safe in their homes and in their communities.

By contrast, the puny little baby steps that are proposed by Bill C–37 do not begin to answer the need people have to see our young people regain respect for the law.

The Young Offenders Act today does just the opposite. It makes young people look at the law as if it were a joke.

In November many of us attended the justice for Joshua rally. We met here on November 3, which would have been Joshua's fifth birthday except that he died September 15 from head injuries received when a 16–year old in a stolen car fled police at high speed and rammed a van driven by Joshua's grandmother. The young offender was sentenced to one year in closed custody for criminal negligence causing death, one year in open custody, served at the same time, one year of probation and a five year driving prohibition.

In Ottawa–Hull some 10,000 motor vehicles per year are stolen, mostly by young offenders. Many of them will try to get away from police, thereby threatening public safety. Even in my own relatively law–abiding riding of Okanagan—Shuswap last year nearly 200 motor vehicles were stolen in the Vernon area, and more than 50 motor vehicles were stolen in Salmon Arm.

At the justice for Joshua rally Ottawa talk show host Steve Madely claimed that 20 per cent of young offenders have reoffended five times or more. For young victims like Joshua, there is no second chance.

Canadians are fed up with going easy on young offenders and especially violent offenders. Repeatedly they have called on us as law makers to put the justice back into our criminal justice system. Instead, Bill C–37 will not permit 10 and 11 year old offenders to be charged at an age when there is still hope of setting them straight.

The Deputy Speaker: My apologies to the hon. member but the time is 1.30 p.m. and we must proceed to private members' hour.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should initiate an amendment to section 7 of the Constitution Act, 1982, to recognize the right of the individual to enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to rise in the Chamber to move that in the opinion of this House the government should initiate an amendment to section 7 of the Constitution Act, 1982, to recognize the right of the individual to enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Nothing is more important to a system of government than this.

In rising in this Chamber today I am following many people of greater stature and ability than myself who have fought for this most fundamental right. I follow, however unworthily, in the footsteps of those who have made the glorious revolution. I follow in the footsteps of those who confronted King John and compelled him to sign the Magna Carta. I follow in the footsteps of those who for 1,000 years or more have worked and when necessary have fought and died to ensure that governments serve the rights of their citizens rather than oppress them.

I intend to continue the fight for property rights, the core of our ancient liberties. Since this is not how most people understand the concept of property rights, I have three primary purposes in my remarks today. First, I would like to begin by explaining what property rights really are. Second, I would like to outline why they are central to the problem of good government. Then I would like to explain how my motion would address that problem.

Property rights begin with the concept of self–ownership. It is vital to stress this point because when people hear the term property they generally think of real property: houses, boats, mansions and yachts. They generally think not just of real property, but of real property of a luxurious nature. They think of property rights as protecting the rich, or as protecting the existing order of things. This is fundamentally and entirely wrong.

The essence of property rights is the concept of self–ownership, of the individual's conscience and the individual's judgment as inviolable, even sacred. People have the right to make their own decisions. That is my most fundamental belief.

Our property is ourselves, our labour, our imagination and our courage. The right to control one's own actions is what property rights is all about. Only by extension is property material.

In a universe of material things and in a universe in which time passes, a respect for self–ownership of others must mean a respect for the things they make or modify. Property does mean things too, but fundamentally, the right to own property is a right to own oneself, to make one's own decisions, to trade voluntarily with others, to labour freely and for oneself and not for others as a slave.

It is therefore profoundly mistaken to believe that property rights favour the rich. Take half of a rich man's things and he will still be well off, but take half of a poor man's or a middle class man's things away and what hope do they have of one day being comfortable?

It is also unsound to say that one can be free without ownership of the things one makes with one's labour. It is unsound to contrast mere material things with higher matters such as love. However bright the eye of a beloved child, food, clothing and shelter are essential to that child, but they are not the end of that child's material needs. It is not a case of satisfying material needs and then moving to a higher plateau. Toys, games, books and the very arms with which a parent hugs a child are all material. No parent who cannot make a thing and keep it or trade it for another, whether simple food or a book of poetry can express their love effectively and freely.

The right of self–ownership is fundamental. It must imply the right to control the material things that one owns, makes or alters. However, its origin is in self–ownership: the ownership of ourselves, our labour and our imagination.

Those who deny the right to own property, deny not the right of the exploiter to hoard, but the right of the ordinary citizen to live according to his or her own lights. That right is fundamental to human dignity.

That brings me to my second point, the problem of good government. However sound the right of self–ownership may be in abstract theory, it is threatened in practice from two directions.

People may be subject to force and fraud from within their own community. Their rights may be insecure either in theory or in practice, if theft is legal or if it is unpunished. If that is the case, nothing we may do to make the world a better place as we understand it can persist. Whatever is achieved is snatched away. Then whatever a person may dream will be only a dream. It will never be realized.

People may be subjected to force and fraud from outside. Whatever system of rights they possess, an attack from outside may overwhelm that system and leave them raped and murdered in their burning houses. Whatever they have achieved may be taken away this way also.

Therefore people combine into societies and create governments. Through them they seek to define a system of rights and enforce it internally and also protect the system as a whole from attack from the outside. Sometimes they fail and if they do the results are clearly catastrophic. A government too weak to protect the lives, liberty and property of its citizens is unbearable, but the usual problem is quite the reverse.

Through most of human history the problem has been that governments wield too much power. The usual result of having a government too weak to protect people's rights is to have it displaced by one strong enough to do it, but unwilling to.

The historical problem is that governments have had the ability to protect citizens but not the will. Instead, they themselves have taken these rights away. What they have done is to treat citizens as means and not ends. They declare some higher purpose and then force citizens to seek to fulfil it, whatever it may be.

In most parts of the world the problem of government quite simply has never been solved. The Romans considered it. "Quis custodiet custodientes?" they asked. Who shall guard the guardians? But they did not solve it.

In the Anglo–American tradition it was solved, if imperfectly. The solution was partly theoretical and partly practical, but the larger and more impersonal societies and governments became the more important, the theory was. In Britain the Anglo–Saxon councils seemed somehow to have solved the problem of government, to give chiefs and leaders some power but not too much. They could defend rights but not take them away.

After the Norman conquest it seemed that government had triumphed over society, but it had not. At swordpoint at Runnymede, civil society told King John he would sign the Magna Carta or he would die and it told him he would abide by it or he would die.

When the Stuarts sought to shake free of it the people revolted. Charles I lost his head over it, literally. When Oliver Cromwell sought to use power to engage in social engineering, the people withdrew their consent to be governed. Shortly after his death the Commonwealth was abolished.

The monarchy was brought back under strictly limited terms after James II showed he would not keep the bargain. The glorious revolution brought William and Mary to the throne but also the 1689 Bill of Rights. Again the right of the citizen to be free from his or her own government triumphed.

Governments, however, have a real tendency to encroach. The guardians must be guarded. It was that which led to the revolt in the 13 colonies in the 1770s. It was the danger of another revolt that led to the Durham report urging self–government in this country. For most of our history the common law and its protection of the right to own property withstood any attempt to undermine it.

Unfortunately what wise men create clever men can undo. And so it was here. The Right Hon. Pierre Elliot Trudeau neither fully understood nor cared much about the notion of citizens as ends rather than means, nor did he understand or sympathize with the British parliamentary tradition and the supremacy of common law.

In 1982, quite casually, he traded away our most fundamental right in a slick and clever political calculation, but he should not have done it. Since 1982 things have gone downhill very fast in this country. Since 1982 we have somehow had the idea that government is the master and the citizen is the servant.

Mr. Trudeau felt very clever because he had reached agreement with the premiers to have the Constitution repatriated. However, when one level of government agrees with another to abolish citizens' protection against government, a protection 1,000 years old or more, it is not good and it is not wise. Therefore, I want this House to take steps to restore it to the Constitution.

The Canadian people were denied a chance to vote on property rights in 1982 when the Constitution was repatriated. Nobody asked them. They were denied it again in 1992 when the right to own property was deliberately omitted from the Charlottetown accord, against the wishes of the Canadian people I might add. They have been denied it here because hon. members opposite have denied the House a chance to vote on this motion, to stand up and be counted with the Commons or with bad King John. However, it is time we restored it.

What I am proposing is very precise, that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be amended to include the following:

The federal government shall take no property from any citizen, in whole or in part, through eminent domain, regulation, or any other way, except for public use, through due process and with just and timely compensation.

This does not encroach on provincial jurisdiction. It only binds the federal government. It does not paralyse public policy. It only holds it to a reasonable standard of serving the public and not abusing it. It does not forbid takings. It only insists that they must be done in a legitimate way and for a legitimate purpose.

What it does do is admit the existence of the paradox of government and to seek to apply the solution of wise men to the problems created by those who were merely clever. It seeks to restore government to its proper function: protecting the rights of citizens, not usurping them, not taking them away.

The most important of these rights is the right to own property. That right is the right to own oneself, to be a free person and not a slave. I therefore urge this House to express itself in favour of the entrenchment of the right to own private property in the Constitution.

Many of my colleagues will have an opportunity to speak to this motion today but many others will not. It is an additional unfortunate consequence of being denied votable status that the time for debate is drastically restricted.

Those of my colleagues who would like to speak but cannot have therefore asked me to read into the record a statement of their support. On behalf of the members for Calgary Northeast, Lethbridge, Mission—Coquitlam, Prince George—Peace River, Port Moody—Coquitlam, Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Vegreville and Wetaskiwin, I would like to conclude with this statement:

"Mr. Speaker, hon. colleagues and fellow Canadians, we believe the right to own property and not to be deprived thereof, except for public use, through due process and with just compensation is at the core of Canadians' ancient liberties as free people. Each of us would like to be able to rise in the Chamber today to voice our support for the entrenchment of that right in the Constitution. In case we do not have that opportunity today, we have asked our colleague, the member for Skeena, to place this statement of our support for this measure into the record".

I hope that all members of whatever party in this House will share and endorse that sentiment. This is most emphatically not a partisan issue but a matter of fundamental justice and human rights.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this motion. I want to thank the hon. member opposite for bringing this issue to the fore.

He seeks to initiate an amendment to section 7 of the great Canadian Charter of Rights to recognize the right of the individual to the enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, a right which exists.

I caution the member to recall—he seems to be quite the student of history—that there was another great revolution against the crown of Britain, the American revolution. As a result of that, it also has a constitution. It is a constitution that has created a tremendous problem in its courts with the issue of the entrenchment of property rights.

We have had a pleasant visit this week from the President of the United States. Perhaps it is timely to raise this issue today, even as he departs from our country.

It is probably a good idea to look at what happened down south when we look at the question of the entrenchment of property rights. As I understand it, the courts in the United States have extended property rights beyond traditional forms of property such as land or housing to include such things as social security benefits, drivers' licences and employment with the government; entitlements, I think they are called. These are considered to be forms of property in the United States to which constitutional property rights protections apply.

This is an interesting notion, particularly when one contrasts this with what I think is the traditional view of the Reform Party. If the reform Party in its infancy can have any tradition, surely it is its opposition to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and its opposition to what it thinks is government involvement in the activities of ordinary citizens.

I would suggest that an amendment to section 7 conflicts with those fundamental beliefs it purports to have. Certainly the American experience raises questions about how Canadian courts would interpret a property rights amendment if such rights were added to the charter.

One wonders what the impact would be. The impact would be an unwarranted interference in the property rights of Canadians. Our American neighbours also had some unfortunate experience with constitutional property rights during the first half of this century. This was under what became known as the doctrine of substantive due process. Under this doctrine the American courts, the United States Supreme Court included, struck down some important social legislation such as laws regulating the maximum hours of work, laws regulating minimum wage and child labour laws.

Child labour laws were struck down because they were seen to be violations of the employer's property rights, or should I say the slave owner's property rights.

The United States Supreme Court ultimately repudiated this approach in the 1930s. Nevertheless the American courts have continued to apply American constitutional protections in a variety of areas.

Canadian courts would be free to follow their own approach to constitutional rights issues and have done so even where provisions in our Constitution and our charter are similar to American constitutional provisions.

Given that we share so much in common with the United States in terms of our legal foundations, I would suggest to the members opposite that it would be well worth studying the American experience.

Undoubtedly this effort would be repaid in the greater understanding that we would develop about the meaning of property rights and their potential impact on our system.

The more one delves into this matter, the more one realizes that it is not easy and it is not clear. Nevertheless, the Reform Party typically puts forward the quick fix, the simple solution to a problem that exists primarily in its mind.

We should start with the simple and basic idea of the right to own and enjoy property. Your home, your property should not arbitrarily be interfered with. How could anyone dispute that?

When we start to examine the concept of property and when we start to see its actual and possible scope, when we begin to understand the range and the extent of laws that regulate or affect property, when we begin to understand all of these concepts, we need to take a step back and look at this in a concerted fashion.

It is one thing to talk about this in general and abstract terms but it is quite another thing when we consider the entrenchment of these kinds of rights in our constitution, an action that would result in power to the courts to review a whole range of laws which in some way may affect ownership or use of property.

Entrenching property rights in the Constitution would require the approval of the majority of the provinces. Given that the Constitution already gives the provinces jurisdiction over property and civil rights within their boundaries, I would assume they would have a rather prominent interest in this and certainly a real and valid one. Given that their agreement would be required for any change to the Constitution, I would argue that this is not the sort of step that could or should be accomplished through unilateral measures.

Students of the Constitution will tell members that this may be the kind of measure that a province could opt out of under the amending formulas set out in section 38 of the Constitution Act of 1982.

The parliamentary record from the debates leading up to the patriation of the Constitution and since that time indicates that some provinces have had concerns about constitutional changes that would constrain their ability to regulate property.

I do not know where the provinces stand on this issue at the present time but I am fairly certain that it is not a priority for them. The party opposite should know very well that reopening the Constitution is not a priority for the vast majority of Canadians at this time.

We have evolved elaborate laws regulating and protecting the ownership and enjoyment of property. Real and personal property laws regulate acquisition and disposition of all kinds of property and they regulate in some cases how property is managed or the use to which it is put.

The point of these laws is not, as the member opposite suggests, to burden individuals, but rather to ensure that these transactions occur in an orderly and fair fashion and to guard against mistakes or fraud in the purchase, sale and management of property.

In Quebec the civil code provides for the disposition of real and personal property and in other provinces statutes and common law deal with the same issues.

These common law rules can be traced back hundreds of years in English law. While we are on that, they can be traced back farther than the Magna Carta.

I cannot stand on this side of the House and not comment on my friend's argument concerning the glorious revolution. I would suggest that the glorious revolution and the Reform Party cannot be seen to be synonymous. The Magna Carta, which really is a predecessor and a direct line to our own charter, provided basic fundamental rights.

The Reform Party today stands in the House and seeks by this amendment to narrow those rights. The present charter for Canada was a part of and proof of the glorious revolution; the glorious revolution in Canada being the revolution that entrenched for us forever basic human rights and other basic civil liberties, my friend says the most important of which is the right to own property.

There are other views on which of these rights is more important. One of those rights is clearly the right of the citizen to live freely in this country.

The glorious revolution, an amendment to entrench property rights in the Constitution. I say that is an attempt by those who support it to limit the rights of Canadians and to prevent Canadians through their government from protecting themselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, amending the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms so as to include the right to enjoyment of property is not a new idea. The entrenchment of a property right was an objective of the former Liberal government of 1968. Indeed, the Prime Minister of the time, Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who had also been a Minister of Justice, proposed the adoption of a charter designed to ensure the constitutional protection of certain rights including, of course, the right to enjoyment of property.

As you know, that motion was rejected. In 1978, some provinces squarely opposed the idea, which was included in a bill on constitutional reform, Bill C–60. As I recall, those provinces included Manitoba and Prince Edward Island.

In 1980, the federal government proposed a new measure to guarantee the right to enjoyment of property. Again, the provinces strongly opposed the idea. Consequently, I have to tell the hon. member that, if he hopes to see section 7 of the Constitution Act, 1982, amended so as to include such a right, he has a very difficult task ahead of him. To give you an idea of how difficult this would be, assuming it can be done, it is important to look at the technical aspects of the issue for a moment.

First, since the charter is part of the Constitution, it can only be changed by way of an amendment to the Constitution itself. This first requires resolutions from the Senate and the House of Commons, something which is not easily obtained, and, second, resolutions from the legislative assemblies of at least two thirds of the provinces, the latter representing at least 50 per cent of the Canadian population. That also is not going to be easy to get.

This latter condition implies that Ontario or Quebec will have to be one of the provinces that support a draft amendment, since together, they represent more than 50 per cent of the population. Furthermore, the Constitution Act, 1982 provides under section 38(2), I believe, that the resolution must be adopted by a majority of the members of a legislative assembly, as opposed to a majority of the members present at the time of voting, if the proposed amendment derogates from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province. That would be the case here if the Charter were amended to include property rights. As the hon. member can see, his motion is practically dead in the water.

So far, judgments up to the Supreme Court, have failed to establish that property rights should be protected under the 1982 Charter. This was even ruled out in the Irwin Toys Ltd. judgment, an important decision supported by a majority on the Supreme Court, which stated that the intentional exclusion of property rights from section 7 and its replacement by the "security of the person" had a twofold effect. First, one can conclude that on the whole, economic rights, generally designated by the term "property rights", are not covered by section 7. However, that does not mean that no rights with economic overtones could not be covered by the term "security of the person".

In other words, there are some serious reservations because of the potential negative impact. Many groups have expressed their concerns about the possible entrenchment of property rights in the Constitution. I will mention some of their concerns as well as some of their priorities.

Aboriginal people are, for instance, apprehensive about the potential impact on their land claims and property rights. Nowadays this is a sensitive issue, and land claims are sacro–sanct. The unions are worried about a conflict between the rights of workers and the rights of those who own the resources. Environmental groups wonder about the legislative impact if property rights were entrenched in the Constitution, rights that are entirely legitimate.

The provinces should be concerned that entrenchment of property rights would allow the courts to obstruct the application of laws that protect important community interests, including legislation on planning and land use, ownership of moveable goods and real estate, and even legislation on health and safety.

Entrenchment would have clearly unpredictable and even absurd consequences for municipal by–laws on zoning, environmental regulations and spousal property rights in the case of marriage breakdown.

Take, for example, the case of a man and a woman who separate, who get a divorce. The family patrimony act, a provincial statute, provides that in case of marriage dissolution, the house shall be sold and the proceeds of sale divided between the ex–spouses. In the event that the Constitution is amended to include the right to property, as is being proposed by my Reform colleague, that would mean that the ex–spouse who bought the house could contest the provincial legislation under the Canadian Charter simply by saying that his or her right to enjoyment of property is being interfered with. The other spouse would thus be completely deprived of his rights under the provincial legislation. There would be no solution to the dispute. The lack of sense of such an amendment is therefore readily apparent.

The entrenchment of the right to property in the Canadian Charter is also dangerous and represents an intrusion of the federal government into an area of jurisdiction reserved exclusively for the provinces under section 92(13) of the Constitution

Act, 1867, which states that only the provinces may make laws regarding property and civil rights in each province.

Furthermore, how will the courts interpret the right to property, since in Quebec, the civil law governs this right and the courts interpret it from a civil law point of view, while in the other provinces a common law interpretation is used?

• (1405)

In conclusion, I would like to point out that no one can say that this right is less respected in Canada than elsewhere in the world. It is clear that, for the official opposition, the real interest in such an amendment probably stems from considerations of a completely different sort. It is clear that the addition of such a right to legislation transcending the powers of the federal and provincial governments, such as the Charter of Rights, and entrenching enduring values for regulating the life of society constitutes, for the federal government, a powerful means of once again interfering in an exclusively provincial area of jurisdiction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bellemare): As no government member wishes to speak, I now go to the Reform Party.

The members of the Reform Party have asked me if there is consent to split the ten minute period between the member for Yorkton—Melville and the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, allowing each five minutes.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is unusual to find champions of property rights who are active in politics.

A lot of people reacted to the Reform Party with surprise and with a sense that we did not belong in federal politics. There is a real sense in which they were right, though not for the reason that they believed. We are not typical politicians. It is that we really do not like big government. That is why we are here. We think we have to be here. It is not just because we want to be.

I have been trying to understand why Canadians are in such a bad mood these days and why government seems to be at the centre of all their complaints. I believe it is because of the issue before us today.

The right to own property means the right to live unmolested by government. I listened very carefully to the arguments of the member from Windsor, but the objections are those that are typical of the Liberal Party that believes in more big government. I listened carefully to the argument the Bloc presented, that this was a provincial matter.

Who will protect the people of Canada from more big federal government? Will it be the provinces? I think there is a real contradiction in what Bloc members are saying about their own policies and their own beliefs. In a democracy government is not them; it is us. It is not the government molesting us. It is one another through government.

We have decided we can vote ourselves free money and we can. The more we try to beat wealth out of one another and tolerance and all other virtues, the more angry we get not just with government but with one another. Democracy is the practice of voting for public authorities. That is a way of keeping government under control, not a way of legitimizing any action it may take.

The right to own and use private property means the right to live unmolested by government. It really is not the government taking our hard earned tax dollars, our property; it is all of us molesting and taking property from each other through government.

Government is not benevolent. Government is force. The more wealth we try to get from each other through government, the more angry we get not just with government but with each other. We have trouble seeing what the lack of property rights has caused us and society. Too many of us believe that democracy gives the government the ultimate authority to take away our fundamental rights and our property. However this is just using democracy as an excuse. What we have in Canada is not a true democracy. We vote every four or five years to elect another bunch of tax and spend specialists who disregard our fundamental right to own and use our own property.

That is not what democracy is. Democracy is supposed to be a way of keeping government under control, not a way of legitimizing the confiscation of private property without due process of law and without fair and timely compensation. Voting should be a way of preventing government from taking our property. Instead we have become addicted to using it as a tool to take one another's wealth. That is socialism.

This is what I think is wrong with Canada and no amount of voting can fix it. For example, if private property rights were in our Constitution, the justice minister could not implement his gun control laws and we would all be better off. Unless we hold a referendum to include the right of private property in the Constitution we have little hope of getting true democracy in Canada. We need true democracy in our country and we need it desperately.

We in the House need to amend the Constitution or hold a referendum on the subject of putting the right to own property into the Constitution.

The member for Skeena has asked me to read a statement into the record in support of the motion. The principle and policy is our blue book policy and that would therefore include all Reform MPs. Hopefully the government will consider carefully what we have presented in our reasoned argument.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I like to think Canadians live in a democratic and just society. I like to believe Canada is a country which respects the rule of law.

However when I look at our Constitution including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms I become concerned. Property rights constitute the most fundamental of rights: the right to keep what we earn, to acquire what we need through fair exchange and to enjoy those freedoms while respecting the rights of others.

Thomas Bethell wrote in Property and Justice: "There is a close relationship between the operation of a private property system and the idea of justice itself". As Canadians we believe we have an inherent right to justice. That means if a criminal steals something we expect to be compensated and we expect the criminal to be punished. If neither happens we are morally outraged.

It is our fundamental belief in justice that has motivated many Canadians to demand stiffer penalties for criminals, to demand more accountability of government spending of their tax dollars, and to demand the retrenchment of their property rights.

In a just society the weak do not have to fear the strong or the corrupt because they know their rights will be respected and the rule of law will protect them. In a just society the state will defend individual property rights from those who would take them. One reason for the state having a police force is to prevent criminals from violating the rights of other citizens.

Likewise when the state arbitrarily confiscates private property without regard to the rule of law justice has failed. Our justice system is built on the concept of private ownership, on the premise that when someone takes something from another they have broken a fundamental law of our society. This is because or possessions are privately owned, not commonly owned. Property can generally be state owned, privately owned or commonly owned. In Canada we like to think we have private ownership, but how can we guarantee it without constitutional protection?

A system of common ownership is by its very nature unjust. Anyone can take the fruits of our labours but it is not called stealing. It is called redistribution because everyone in the community owns whatever is produced. This ultimately leads to a society where justice means from each according to his ability and to each according to their need. Have we heard that one before? Inevitably under this system the needy are merely the greedy and the honest workers are the destitute.

In a society where the state claims ownership or control over property and arbitrarily denies its citizens the right to use and enjoy their property then it has broken its covenant with the people.

Individual liberty and freedom is lost and a state that does not respect the rule of law is a tyranny. Sometimes Canadians have a hard time defining what it is to be Canadian but I do not think communal or state ownership of property fits with that definition.

There is something wrong when Canadians have a fundamental belief in property rights and yet nowhere is that right expressly protected. Why does the government not recognize this right?

There is something wrong when a minister can arbitrarily impose his personal beliefs on society and enact legislation to deprive law–abiding citizens of their property because he does not like guns. This means that Canadians are being governed by people who do not believe in basic property rights. This is not comforting.

In support of M–301 I would sleep better at night knowing that my property rights were protected. I therefore wholly support this motion.

The Deputy Speaker: We would normally pass to the other side of the floor but the member I see rising has already spoken and may not speak again. Accordingly, the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster will divide his time with unanimous consent among three members.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like consent to divide my time with the member for Vancouver North and the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

The Deputy Speaker: Do we have unanimous consent for the members to do that?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: There are three and a third minutes for the hon. member.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will have your stop watch out.

I am very pleased to express my support for property rights in Canada. The issue of property rights is an important one for all Canadians. It is not merely an issue for the wealthy or for those with business interests.

It is not an issue that can be labelled left or right. It is about personal freedom which is fundamental to free societies. It is a tragedy that a mature democracy like Canada has excluded the right to own property from its constitutional and legal tradition. I will explain how the issue of property rights, or rather a lack of them, adversely affects prairie farmers.

The effect of inadequate property provisions in our legal system means that these farmers do not really own all the commodities they produce. To own something means that one can choose how one uses one's property so long as it does not harm others.

Wheat is not a hazardous substance, therefore the farmer should be able to sell his grain to anyone he pleases by the marketing mechanisms he or she with colleagues choose at whatever price the buyer and seller mutually agree to.

Moreover, the farmer would have the choice of the means of transportation and the route taken to ship the wheat. After all, it is his grain, is it not? In the prairies wheat does not belong to the farmer. It is not his because he cannot sell it freely. He is told who he will sell the grain to. He is told what the price will be and he is told how he must ship the grain. Because of the lack of property rights in Canada, farmers do not own the wheat they produce with their own labour. By implication, the farmer does not own his own labour and therefore he does not own himself.

The farmer is reduced to being an agent of the state, paid for his efforts whatever the government decides to pay him for the produce. If property rights were honoured, all farmers would have the choice whether they wanted to market collectively. I am sure many farmers would make that choice. That is fine as long as it is the farmer's free choice and not one mandated by government.

It is said all that a man owns is himself and his labour. Because of that he then owns the fruit of his labour. By introducing property rights into the Canadian legal tradition we would be freeing farmers to make their own choices about how to meet their own needs using their own resources and the fruits of their own labour. Property rights legislation would give each farmer the authority to make his or own decision as to how to meet those needs.

I would urge all members of this House, particularly members from farm communities, to support the principle of property rights in Canada.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, members of this House will know that I often use New Zealand as an example in some of my speeches on economic affairs.

I do so not because I believe that everything that New Zealand has done is right but because I believe that we have a lot to learn from looking at the experience of others who have also faced similar problems.

There are lessons to be learned from history about property rights. We need to take a look at the experiences of others in assessing whether property rights should be in our charter.

We have plenty of recorded history at our disposal. For example, we know the histories of ancient Rome, Greece, China, Egypt and Mesopotamia. We know what happened in classical times, medieval times, the industrial revolution and even modern times. Everything is documented. We know plenty about Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Russia, the United States and Cambodia. By studying the historical records of these places and times we can quickly see which government did not respect property rights and which did. We can see that those that did not respect property rights ended up with their people living in misery and poverty.

Perhaps it starts innocently enough. A government promises to regulate the economy for the common good, to redistribute the wealth more fairly, to make the rich pay their fair share and to close the loopholes. I have the feeling that I have heard these words before, a naive assumption that the government knows best and the average citizen needs to be protected from himself.

History is full of examples. Whether headed by a madman like Stalin or Hitler or by well meaning dreamers like Nehru and Nyerere, they always fail. Along the way they produce conflicts instead of peace, famine instead of plenty, poverty instead of prosperity. Instead of more and better rights than those we hold in a line from the Magna Carta, they deliver fewer and worse rights. Instead of delivering the gilded cage they deliver only the cage.

I challenge members to name one society that respected property rights where the people are not better off. I also challenge them to name one society where the government did not respect property rights where they are not worse off. The more protected the right to property, the better the living conditions and the better the societal order.

History also teaches us that when property rights are protected so are personal rights. Along with the loss of property rights comes the loss of personal rights, loss of freedom of speech and loss of decency in society. Property rights are the foundation of a decent society. They are the most important human right.

It amazes me that we have a Constitution and a Charter of Rights and Freedoms that guarantee the lengthy avoidance of deportation by known criminals who have come into Canada as bogus refugees but do not guarantee property rights to law–abiding citizens.

It amazes me that we have a Constitution and a Charter of Rights and Freedoms that permit crimes to be committed under a defence of drunkenness but do not protect the property rights of law–abiding citizens. Canadians are supposed to feel good about their Constitution. No wonder they are disgusted with it.

The motion put forward by the Reform Party member for Skeena is an excellent one which the government would do well to acknowledge and act upon.

In addition to all of that, the Deputy Prime Minister said she would resign if the GST had not gone in one year and she still has not done it.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak to Motion 301 by my colleague from Skeena.

At issue here is the case for including property rights in the Canadian Constitution. During the three years I worked in Tanzania I saw the transition from a government with a strong, ideological belief in socialism where everybody owns everything and nobody owns anything to a society which accepted that it is human nature for people to want a plot of land or a piece of equipment or a business to call their very own.

That desire had also been there but it had been subjugated by the government and it was only when the change was made that pride and productivity began to improve.

• (1425)

As Canadians we enjoy the right to property but at the moment this right is at the pleasure of our government. Our only property rights are to be found in common case law developed over centuries and recognized by our courts.

At present, federal or provincial courts can arbitrarily take these rights away, setting their own value and overriding the right of the individual to establish what he or she considers to be fair and equitable compensation.

The establishment of property right is long over due and both federal and provincial governments should take prompt action to entrench them.

Traditionally democracies have been based on four fundamental rights: life, liberty, security of the person and the right to have and hold property. Property rights go back to the Magna Carta. The United Nations universal declaration of human rights in 1948 included property rights.

Property rights were included in section 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights in 1960. The 1981 original draft of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms included property rights but they were deleted in political bargaining.

Perhaps particularly meaningful to my liberal colleagues across the floor, the Right Hon. Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau wrote in 1983: "I reiterate the full support of my government for the passage of a parliamentary resolution to entrench property rights in our Constitution".

At least 24 countries including the U.S., Australia, Italy, Germany, Sweden and Finland have protected property rights within their constitution.

No reasonable person would question the right of a government to appropriate property needed for the common good of society, but the rights of that person to be justly compensated for the deprivation should be clearly stated and protected. Entrenching property rights in the Constitution would obligate any authority expropriating property to be accountable to the citizens of our country. As a fundamental right, property should be afforded the same constitutional protection as our right to life, liberty and security of the person.

The government should provide this protection and when the necessities of the common good override this personal right, provisions should be made to ensure fundamental justice is assured.

Let us hope that there will be no lack of political will to provide this basic human right for our citizens.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I ask the unanimous consent of this House to make this important motion votable.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: The member has asked the question. There have been negatives indicated. I understand the hon. member has a second point of order.

Mr. Scott (Skeena) Mr. Speaker, I then ask the unanimous consent of this House to refer this important motion to the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons for further consideration.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: The indication has been that there is not unanimous consent to the second request by the member.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to raise a couple of points because in the few minutes I have been listening to this debate I have never heard such drivel of such total lack of logic, devious reasoning, and any lack of understanding of a people governing themselves as a community who believe that together we can have a life that is better than the dog eat dog survival of the fittest mode where only the individual and the one with the strongest fangs or the longest rifle survives.

I have heard a suggestion that not having property rights in the Constitution leads to misery and poverty. I have not heard one example of a country which I could challenge where having property rights in the Constitution leads to wealth and joy.

On the contrary, the United Nations has twice deemed this a country, which has never had property rights in its Constitution, the most blessed country in the world in which to live based on quality of life and standard of living. That alone I think belies some of the arguments we have heard in this House today.

The least we owe Canadians when we use the time of this House is logic, reason and truth. There has been a fair bit of that lacking in this debate.

The Deputy Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Accordingly, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 2.30 p.m., the House adjourned until 11 a.m. on Monday, February 27.

APPENDIX

Address
Mr. William J. Clinton,
President of the United States of America to both Houses of Parliament in the House of Commons Chamber, Ottawa on Thursday, February 23, 1995

• (1505)

[English]

Mr. and Mrs. William J. Clinton were welcomed by the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, Prime Minister of Canada, by the Honourable Gildas Molgat, Speaker of the Senate and by the Honourable Gilbert Parent, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Gilbert Parent (Speaker of the House of Commons): My colleagues, I call this meeting to order.

Mr. President, it is a great privilege for Canadians to have you address this joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons. We are honoured to have you with us today.

I now call upon the right hon. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to introduce our distinguished guest.

• (1510)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. President, it is an honour to welcome you to Parliament on behalf of all Canadians. Before speaking a word in this Chamber, I must say you have already given eloquent proof of the friendship between our two nations by agreeing to visit Ottawa in February.

I would like to tell you, Mr. President, that something very unusual occurred yesterday in this House. By unanimous vote of all members of the House of Commons it was resolved that, very rare in the month of February, we were to have a good spring day for you today.

Mr. President, the cold weather outside that we normally have may be typically Canadian, but so is the warm welcome for you inside today. It is a warmth that we reserve only for our closest friends.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: A great deal has been written and said about the friendship between our two countries. It has not always been an easy friendship which is normal considering one friend is a relatively small nation and the other is the most powerful nation in the world. As one member of this House put it three decades ago, the Americans are our best friends, whether we like it or not.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: Our relationship has grown and evolved through the years. Today, like any mature, healthy friendship, it is a friendship between equals. As friends and neighbours, we are able to separate business and friendship when we must. In the vast majority of cases, we are able to work together, as we always have, toward common goals.

The fact is, Mr. President, that both our administrations were elected on a platform of jobs and growth. We have both focused on a job and growth agenda in office. In each country our agenda has been working with strong, steady and lasting economic recoveries in Canada and the U.S.

[Translation]

You can listen to the translation now, Mr. President.

[English]

That is the way we do things in Canada, you know.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1515)

Mr. Chrétien: Our economies have strong links. More trade goes on between our two nations than any other two nations in the world— almost a billion dollars a day, every day. If one country does well, the other benefits. And if both economies are going strong, there is no stopping us. Jobs in British Columbia mean jobs in Washington State. Jobs in Ontario mean jobs in Michigan. Jobs in Quebec mean jobs in New York State.

But our shared goals go beyond our immediate relationship. Both our administrations understand that increased and liberalized trade everywhere means jobs and growth in our countries.

You and I were together in Jakarta in November, when the Asia Pacific countries committed to a free trade zone by the year 2010. And at the conference you chaired in Miami in December, where all the countries of the hemisphere agreed on a Free Trade Area of the Americas by the year 2005.

I want to salute you, Mr. President, for the role you have played in realizing this new vision. And you have not confined this vision to economic matters. You took decisive action in leading the restoration of democracy in Haiti. And you have played a key role in the remarkable breakthroughs in the peace process in the Middle East.

[English]

Mr. President, you have understood the forces shaping the modern global economy. You have worked to ensure a new unity and optimism in the hemisphere. You have worked to bring people and countries together. These are all goals that this House and the people across Canada share with you. We are committed to working with the United States and other nations to achieve them.

My recent travels to Asia and Latin America have reminded me that it is more important than ever to have a strong U.S. role in the world. The upheavals of the post–cold war world mean that the United States can and must play a bigger leadership role than ever.

Our own government has outlined our new foreign policy direction. We want to continue Canada's long tradition of promoting global peace and security. We all learned long ago that isolation is much more costly and dangerous than international co–operation.

Mr. President, you may not know it, but among your predecessors who have addressed the Parliament of Canada during your lifetime are Harry Truman, Dwight Eisenhower, Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan. They all had one thing in common. They were all elected for a second term.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Now, that might not seem like such a remarkable coincidence. But look at the recent presidents who have not addressed the Canadian Parliament: Gerald Ford, Jimmy Carter and George Bush.

[Translation]

I will, however, refrain from drawing any conclusions from that, Mr. President.

As you know, Canada adheres strictly to a policy of non–interference and non–intervention.

[English]

Any way you look at it, Mr. President, we are delighted that you have accepted our invitation.

Mr. Speaker, honoured members, senators and dear guests, I give you our friend and neighbour, the President of the United States of America, William J. Clinton.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1520)

Mr. William J. Clinton (President of the United States): Mr. Prime Minister, Mrs. Chrétien, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, hon. senators and members of the House of Commons, distinguished members of the diplomatic corps, ladies and gentlemen; I have pondered for some time the differences between the Canadian political system and the American one. When the Prime Minister pointed out the unanimous resolution you passed yesterday, I realized that in one respect clearly you are superior. We do not control the weather in Washington, D.C. and I am grateful that you do.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clinton: I also thank the Prime Minister for his history lesson. I have never believed in the iron laws of history so much as I do now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: I thank the Prime Minister and all of you for welcoming me to this magnificent capital city. The Prime Minister first came to this Chamber to represent the people of Canada when President Kennedy was in the White House. I resent that because when President Kennedy was in the White House I was in junior high school. Now the Prime Minister has less grey hair than I do. And he does, in spite of that fact that since that time he has occupied nearly every seat in his nation's cabinet. The first time I met him I wondered why this fellow could not hold down a job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: I can tell you this, we in the United States know that his service to this nation over so many years has earned him the gratitude and the respect of the Canadian people. It also has earned the gratitude and the respect of the people of the United States.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: I know it is traditional for American presidents when they address this body to speak of their affection for their ties to the Canadian people. On behalf of the United States let me stay with that tradition and say l'amitié solide, but let me say to you that it is a big part of our lives.

I remember so well more than a decade ago when Hillary and I with our then very young daughter came to Canada to celebrate the New Year. We started in Montreal and drove to Chateau Montebello. Along the way we drove around Ottawa and watched all those wonderful people skating along the canal. I come from a southern state. I could not imagine that anybody could ever get on skates and stand in any body of water for very long. I can see that Hillary has had in the back of her mind all this long time how much she would like to be skating along this canal. I think tomorrow Mrs. Chrétien is going to give her her wish. We will be looking forward to that.

My wife has visited Toronto and we had a wonderful, wonderful family vacation in western Canada in Victoria and Vancouver back in 1990. It was one of the best times that all of us have ever had together anywhere.

We are deeply indebted to your culture. Our daughter's name was inspired by Canadian songwriter Joni Mitchell's wonderful song "Chelsea Morning".

All of you know that in the spring of 1993, the first time I left the United States as president, I came to Vancouver for the summit with President Yeltsin. Both of us at that time were under some significant amount of stress as we tried to reaffirm our relationship and solidify democracy in Russia. I can say without any equivocation, the reception we received from the people of Canada as well as from the government and the Prime Minister made it very, very easy for us to have a successful meeting. For that we are very grateful.

I come here today to reaffirm the ties that bind the United States and Canada in a new age of great promise and challenge: a time of rapid change when both opportunity and uncertainty live side by side in my country and in yours; a time when people are being lifted up by new possibilities and held down by old demons all across the world.

I came here because I believe that our nations together must seize the opportunities and meet the challenges of this new age. We must, I say again, do this together.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: From the oil from Alberta that fires factories in the United States to silicon chips from California that power your computers, we are living proof of the value of partnerships and co–operation.

Technologies produced in your nation saves lives in our hospitals, while food from our farms line your supermarkets. Our horizons have broadened because we have listened in the United States to the CBC.

Our culture is much richer because of the contributions of writers like Robertson Davies, who Hillary had the pleasure of meeting last week after reading him for years, and Margaret Atwood; also, the wonderful photography of Yousuf Karsh, whose famous picture of Churchill I just saw. He took some pictures of Hillary and me that are not so distinguished, but I love them anyway.

As a musician, I have to thank you especially for Oscar Peterson, a man I consider to be the greatest jazz pianist of our time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: Ours is the world's most remarkable relationship. The Prime Minister said, "whether we like it or not". I can tell you that on most days I like it very, very much.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: We have to strengthen that relationship. We have to strengthen it for our own benefit through trade and commerce and travel. We have to strengthen it because it is our job to help to spread the benefits of democracy and freedom and prosperity and peace beyond our shores.

We are neighbours by the grace of nature. We are allies and friends by choice. There are those in both our nations who say we can no longer afford to, and perhaps we no longer even need to, exercise our leadership in the world. When so many of our people are having their own problems, it is easy to listen to that assertion. But it is wrong.

We are two nations blessed with great resources and great histories. We have great responsibilities. Our countries were built, after all, by men and women who fled the tyranny and the intolerance of the old world for the new.

We are the nations of pioneers, people who were armed with the confidence they needed to strike out on their own and to have the talents that God gave them shape their dreams in a new and different land.

Culture and tradition, to be sure, distinguish us from one another in many ways that all of us are still learning about every day. But we share core values and that is more important: a devotion to hard work, an ardent belief in democracy, a commitment to giving each and every citizen the right to live up to his or her God–given potential in an understanding of what we owe to the world for the gifts we have been given.

These common values have nourished the partnership that has become a model for new democracies all around the world. They can look at us and see just how much stronger the bonds between nations can be when their governments answered the citizens' desires for freedom and democracy and enterprise, and when they work together to build each other up instead of working overtime to tear each other down.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: Of course we have our differences. Some of them are complex enough to tear your hair out over. But we have approached them directly and in good faith, as true friends must. We in the United States come more and more every day to respect and to understand that we can learn from what is different about your nation and its many peoples.

• (1530)

Canada has shown the world how to balance freedom with compassion and tradition with innovation in your efforts to provide health care to all your citizens, to treat your senior citizens with the dignity and respect they deserve, and to take on tough issues like the move afoot to outlaw automatic weapons designed for killing and not hunting.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: I might say, since you applauded so, that you were doing it in a nation of people who respect the right to hunt and understand the difference between law and order and sportsmanship.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: Those of us who have travelled here appreciate especially the reverence you have shown for the bounty of God's nature from the Laurentians to the Rockies. In a world darkened by ethnic conflicts that literally tear nations apart, Canada has stood for all of us as a model of how people of different cultures can live and work together in peace, prosperity and understanding.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: The United States, as may of my predecessors have said, has enjoyed its excellent relationships with a strong and united Canada but we recognize, just as the Prime Minister said with regard to your relationships to us a moment ago, that your political future is of course entirely for you to decide. That is what a democracy is all about.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: Now I will tell you something about our political system. If you want to know why my State of the Union Address took so long, it is because I evenly divided the things that would make the Democrats clap and the Republicans clap, and we doubled the length of the speech in common enthusiasm.

I ask all of you to remember that we do look to you and to remember what our great President of the post–war era, Harry Truman, said when he came here in 1947: "Canada's eminent position today", he said, "is a tribute to the patience, tolerance and strength of character of her people. Canada's notable achievement of national unity and progress through accommodation, moderation and forbearance can be studied with profit by sister nations". Those words ring every bit as true today as they did then.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: For generations now our countries have joined together in efforts to make the world more secure and more prosperous. We have reached out together to defend our values and our interests in World War I, on the beaches of Normandy and in Korea. Together we helped to summon the United Nations into existence. Together we stood fast against communist tyranny and prevailed in the cold war. Together we stood shoulder to shoulder against aggression in the gulf war. Now our nations have stepped forward to help Haiti emerge from repression and restore its democracy. I thank the Prime Minister for what he said about that. When it was not popular anywhere in the world to worry about poor, beleaguered, abandoned Haiti, Canada was truly a friend of Haiti.

• (1535)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: In one international forum after another we stand side by side to shape a safer and a better world. Whether it is at the World Population Conference pushing together for an indefinite extension of NNPT in any number of ways we are working together.

We know that for Canada this history of action is a matter of deep tradition and personal conviction. The tradition runs from Lester Pearson to Jean Chrétien. It says that we must be engaged in the affairs of the world.

You have always shown the wisdom of reaching out instead of retreating, of rising to new responsibilities instead of retrenching. Your tradition of engagement continues to this day and, believe you me, it earns respect all around the world from people of all races, ethnic groups and political systems.

In places like Cyprus and the Sinai, Canadian troops have played an invaluable role in preventing more violence in those critical hot spots. Today your 2,000 peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia are courageously fulfilling their mission in the midst of one of the most intractable, difficult problems in our lifetime.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: For a half century the United States has shared your philosophy of action and consistent exercise of leadership abroad. I am determined, notwithstanding all the cross–currents in our country, that we shall preserve that commitment.

These times may be turbulent, but we have an historic opportunity to increase security and prosperity for our own people and for people all around the world. I want you to know that I intend to do everything in my power to keep our country constructively involved in the problems that we must face if we are going to guarantee that our children will live in a peaceful, sane and free world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: Imagine what the Persian Gulf would look like today if we had not risen to the challenge of Iraqi aggression. Imagine what tariffs and barriers would plague the world trading system if we had not worked so hard together over such a long period of time from the end of World War II to the events which the Prime Minister described, to the NAFTA, to the GATT, to the Asia–Pacific co–operation, to the Summit of the Americas that was held in Miami in December. Imagine how different it would have been. Imagine how much worse the horrible tragedy in Rwanda would have been if we had not been there to try to provide essential help in those refugee camps to keep people alive.

We cannot let anyone or anything break this great tradition of our nations. In our partnership we will find the key to protecting our people and increasing their prosperity and the power to reach beyond our shores in the name of democracy and freedom not only because it is right but because it is our interest to do so.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: Just before we came down here the Prime Minister and I agreed again that if we are to going meet these new challenges in the 21st century we must adapt the institutions that helped us to win the cold war so that they can serve us as well in the 21st century. We have to do that.

Some have evolved with the changing world. Some have clearly already discarded their old missions and assumed new roles. We have also seen at the end of the east–west conflict the advent of 24–hour financial markets, sudden environmental disasters, the rise of international terrorism, and the resurgence of ancient ethnic hatreds. All these things have placed new demands on these institutions that the statesmen of 50 years ago simply did not imagine.

The 21st century will leave behind those who sit back and think that automatically these problems will be solved. We simply have to face these challenges and ask ourselves what we have to change and how we are going to do it.

For example, to meet the security needs of the future we must work together to see that NATO, the most successful military alliance in all of history, adapts to this new era. That means we must make certain that the inevitable process of NATO expansion proceeds smoothly, gradually and openly. There should be no surprises to anyone about what we are about. We will work so that the conditions, the timing and the military implications of NATO expansion will be widely known and clearly understood in advance.

To parallel the enlargement of NATO we have to develop close and strong ties with Russia. I have worked hard for that and so has the Prime Minister. We must continue working together at the United Nations where our nations have together taken the lead in efforts to reform our peacekeeping operations, to control costs, to improve information gathering, and to make sure we have the right kind of command and control system before the young people who put on our uniforms are put in harm's way.

We have to continue also to work at reforming international economic institutions. We have already made some great strides in reshaping the global economy with the passage of GATT, which is the most comprehensive trade agreement in history. The work is only beginning.

At the upcoming G–7 summit in Halifax, which we are very much looking forward to, we will be working to ensure that our international trading institutions advance the cause of trade liberalization in ways that produce tangible gains for the people of the countries involved.

We also have to re–examine the institutions that were created at the time of Bretton–Woods, the IMF and the World Bank, to make sure they are going to be able to master the new and increasingly complex generation of transnational problems that face us, problems like explosive population growth and environmental degradation, problems like those that we have been facing together in Mexico and throughout Latin America and the recent financial crisis.

Real progress in all these areas will depend not only on our willingness to be involved but our willingness to lead as partners. Together Canada and the United States are striving to seize all the advantages the new global economy has to offer.

We know that trade produces high wage jobs, the kinds of jobs that give our people the opportunity to care for their families, to educate their children and to leave the next generation better off than they were, a dream that has been called into question in many advanced economies in the last few years.

The success of NAFTA, which is generating new jobs and creating new markets from Monterrey to Medicine Hat, is the proof. As the Prime Minister has said so well, we in NAFTA are on our way to becoming the four amigos. That phrase will go down in history; I wish I had thought of it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: We will soon start our consultations with Chile for accession to NAFTA and it will be a very good partner. The addition of that thriving economy will only continue to increase the benefits for all of us.

I want to take another moment here to thank Canada for its recent support and help in the financial crisis in Mexico. You understood what we had on the line, that more than Mexico was involved, that jobs and trade and future and our support for democracy and stability throughout Latin America were at issue. You understood it and we are grateful. Because we stood shoulder to shoulder we have a chance to preserve this remarkable explosion of democracy that we saw at the Summit of the Americas, and we should continue to do that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clinton: I want to say a word, if I might, about the environment. As we expand trade we have to remember we must defend that which we have inherited and enhance it if we can.

• (1545)

The natural riches of this continent we share are staggering. We have co–operated to such great effect on our continent in the past: our air quality agreement is solving the acid rain problem; the Great Lakes are on the road to recovery; the eagles have returned to Lake Erie. Now we have to build on those accomplishments.

With the NAFTA Environmental Commission located in Montreal, your country will play a key role in ensuring that we protect the extraordinary bounty that has been given to us for our children and our grandchildren. NAFTA is only one of several fronts on which we can work together to both increase our prosperity and protect our environment. But we must do both.

Our nations are building on the progress of last year's Summit of the Americas as well. It will create a free trade area embracing the entire hemisphere. Across the Pacific, as the Prime Minister said, we have paved the way for new markets and for free trade among the dynamic economies in the Asian–Pacific area. That was a very important thing for us to do because those nations are growing very fast and we do not want this world to break up into geographical trading blocks in ways that would shrink the potential of the people of Canada and the United States for decades to come.

All these efforts will only enhance what is now the world's greatest trading relationship; yours and ours. Every day people, ideas and goods stream cross our border. Bilateral trade now is more than a billion Canadian dollars every day—I learned to say that—and about $270 billion United States dollars last year. It is by far the world's largest bilateral relationship. Our trade with each other has become an essential pillar in the architecture of both our economies.

Today 4.5 million Americans have jobs that involve trade between our two countries. Those are the concrete benefits of our partnership. Between 1988 and 1994, trade between our nations rose about 60 per cent. Last year alone it increased by 15 per cent. But the statistics do not give the human reality behind the flourishing exchange of goods and ideas. Our trade is creating real jobs for real people.

In Boscawen, New Hampshire, for example, a small company called Secure Care Products produces monitoring systems for patients in nursing homes. Recently Secure Care began exporting its products to Canada. Sales are already growing fast and the company expects them to triple this year. And so Secure Care is hiring people like Susan Southwick, the granddaughter of a Quebecer, the mother of two and now the company's 26th employee, giving Susan and her husband a shot at the dream which Canadian and Americans share. That is what this partnership is all about.

Much further away from you in Greensboro, North Carolina, another small company called Createc Forestry Systems is showing how our trade helps people turn their hopes into realities. Founded by a man named Albert Jenks in his family's kitchen, Createc makes hand–held computers that track lumber mill inventories. Those computers help managers assess their needs better, so fewer trees are cut unnecessarily.

A few years ago Createc began to export to Canada, and now those sales accounts have risen to nearly 20 per cent of their total business. That means a more secure future for the company, for Mr. Jenks, for his son Patrick, who works with his father in the family business. It shows how our trade can increase our prosperity and protect the environment as well.

Your companies are thriving in our markets, bringing tangible benefits to Canadians. Whether it is repairing the engines of some of the U.S. air force's largest planes or manufacturing software to manage our natural resources or building some of the Olympic village for Atlanta's 1996 games, Canadian firms are a strong presence in the United States. Their successes there help your people to turn their hopes into facts and their dreams into reality.

The example of our biggest industry shows another side of this remarkable story. Working together, U.S. and Canadian companies have integrated North America's auto industry and staged one of the most remarkable comebacks in all the history of the industrial revolution. We have drawn on each other's strengths, and today our companies work so closely that we do not speak any longer of U.S. or Canadian content in these vehicles, but of North American content, whether it is a Chrysler Minivan made in Windsor or a Chrysler Jeep made in Detroit. I think that was the ambassador from Michigan—I mean from the United States—clapping down there.

Productivity and employment have risen to such a point that when I visited Detroit last fall the biggest complaint I heard from the auto workers in a state that was given up as being lost economically a decade ago was that they were working too much overtime. Where I come from that is known as a high class problem. The auto industry now provides more than one million jobs in our countries.

To reinforce our commitment to NAFTA and to dramatically expand an important market tomorrow, our nations will sign an agreement to open the skies between our two nations. This agreement, which allows for a dramatic expansion of U.S. and Canadian service to each other's nations, will create thousands of new jobs and billions of dollars of economic activities in our cities, yours and mine.

We have reached a fair solution that will make life easier for travellers on both sides of the border, that will profit both Canadian and U.S. airline carriers, that will increase the mutual travel and interconnections of our people. That we have done so amicably provides yet another model of how neighbouring nations can settle their differences.

Friendship and engagement. Canada and the United States have shown the best there is in partnerships between nations: all the great potential that awaits all the free peoples of this earth if they can join in common cause. We are, as the monument at the St. Lawrence Seaway declares, two nations whose frontiers are the frontiers of friendship, whose ways are the ways of freedom, whose works are the works of peace.

Every day we see the enormous benefits this partnership gives to us in jobs, prosperity and the great creative energy that our interchanges bring. We have only seen the beginning. For the Susan Southwicks who want a chance to build better lives and the companies like Createc that are trying to build solid businesses that will last, this partnership holds a great promise with all the vast horizons of our great continent.

Together we have turned our energies toward improving the world around us for nearly a century. Today, more than ever, let us reaffirm and renew that great tradition. Let us engage and confront the great challenges of the end of this century and the beginning of the next. We must sustain our efforts. We must enhance our efforts. We must maintain our partnership. We must make it stronger.

This is our task and our mission. Together we will be equal to it. A border separates our peoples, but there are no boundaries to our common dreams.

Thank you and God bless you all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President and Mrs. Clinton, monsieur le premier ministre et madame Chrétien, monsieur le Président de la Chambre des communes, Your Excellencies, membres distingués du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes, mesdames et messieurs.

• (1555)

Mr. President, it is my pleasant task to thank you but no words that I could express could thank you better than the applause and the standing ovations which you received this afternoon.

We are all honoured, Mr. President and Mrs. Clinton, by your presence and we welcome the many American friends who have joined you in this voyage to Canada.

We appreciate your warm expressions of friendship and assure you that we hold you and your great nation in great esteem, our valued neighbours.

Many statesmen from across the world have addressed both Houses of Parliament in the past, but none have been more welcome than the American presidents and all have spoken eloquently, as you have today, of the close friendship between our two nations.

Mr. President, you referred earlier today at lunch time to the words of President Kennedy when he addressed our Parliament in May of 1961. I will repeat part of his comments which you mentioned: "Geography has made us neighbours. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners and necessity has made us allies. Those whom nature has so joined together let no man put asunder. What unites us is far greater than what divides us".

[Translation]

Mr. President, the world has changed a great deal since 1961, but his remarks hold just as true today.

[English]

Mr. President, while history and nature have joined us together for many purposes, they have also made our two countries very different. It is therefore very important that we not take each other for granted.

It is important that our leaders and the members of their respective cabinets meet on a regular basis to co–ordinate policy and hopefully to iron out difficulties and disagreements before they arise.

Mr. President, we are happy to have you with us. We thank you for your inspiring words. We hope you will return.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Parent: Mr. President and my colleagues. Mr. President, when you were in my chambers a little earlier I was explaining to you how we got the name to be Speaker. For about a year now, although I have been Speaker, they have not allowed me to speak in this, our own House of Commons.

Mr. President, your words and your presence in this Chamber underscore the profound friendship that our peoples have developed over many generations. Our relationship does stem from the fact that we are neighbours but its strength, Mr. President, derives from the fact that we share more than a common boundary. The 49th parallel is not so much a line that divides us as a place where two great nations come together.

Canada and the United States were built by immigrants, men and women who shared similar aspirations, a spirit of adventure and a sense of freedom, of equality, of democracy. When these immigrants came here they were met by our aboriginal people, whom we must never forget.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Parent: Our common values are embodied in our institutions, and while Congress and Parliament may be similar, they are a study in contrast because they reflect our distinct traditions and national characters. However, Mr. President, they are built with the same mortar, democratic values and liberal values that form our common heritage.

• (1600)

Proximity also has its rewards. Like many Canadians I had the chance to attend American universities and many Americans have studied here in Canada. You may be interested in knowing, Mr. President, that five of our parliamentarians were born in the United States.

Our friendship is not based so much on our personal interests as on the values and ideas shared by our two countries. Throughout this century, we have worked together to promote these values. Our soldiers fought side by side and many of them died defending them.

Fifty years ago, we paid an enormous price in human lives to help bring peace to Europe. Together, Canadians and Americans helped create the United Nations and establish an international order dedicated to peace and democracy.

[English]

Our international co–operation has taken many forms. Together we have been liberators and we have been peacekeepers. We have liberalized world trade, promoted human rights and fostered the rule of law.

Mr. President, very gently I remind you that 15 years ago a Canadian diplomat sheltered and secured the freedom of American citizens in danger. On that occasion we were reminded that we can and we will count on each other when it really matters because our friendship is so sacred.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Parent: The men and women before you in this Chamber, Mr. President, are the face of Canada and they are the expression of our democracy. Yes, Mr. President, you do us great honour by speaking to Canadians in this Chamber.

As Speaker of the House of Commons may I offer a renewed expression of our respect and warm affection for you, for Mrs. Clinton and for all of our American friends.

Thank you, Mr. President.

I now adjourn this meeting.

CANADIAN VOLUNTEER SERVICE MEDAL FOR UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING ACT

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.) moved that Bill C–258, an act respecting the establishment and award of a Canadian volunteer service medal and clasp for United Nations peacekeeping to Canadians serving with a United Nations peacekeeping force, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Canadians take great pride in the Canadian forces record of peacekeeping throughout the world, a record which has brought praise from many quarters and has established Canada at the forefront of nations doing their part to foster a peaceful world; a world in which human values and needs are not only respected but also supported.

Bill C–258 is an act respecting the establishment and award of a Canadian volunteer service medal for peacekeeping to Canadian peacekeepers having served with a United Nations peacekeeping force. It also incorporates a clasp to be attached to the medal ribbon if the individual qualifies for the Nobel peace prize won by Canadian peacekeepers in 1988.

Recognition would not be limited to Canadian forces personnel but would also include Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other Canadian citizens who qualify.

At the moment there is no means to provide distinctive Canadian recognition for the risks they have taken and the contribution they have made. Thus, there is a deficiency in our honours and award system.

Peacekeepers do receive United Nations medals for such service. The United Nations medal awarded to Canadian peacekeepers is proclaimed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the recommendation of the Prime Minister as a Canadian medal and therefore in the order of precedence in the Canadian honours system.

Canada does not have its own peacekeeping medal. According to our honours and awards committee, the United Nations medal adequately fulfils Canada's obligation to recognize our peacekeepers' contribution to our country.

However, the Canadian Peacekeeping Veterans Association does not agree, and after substantial consultation with many other interested individuals and organizations, nor do I.

Indicative of this feeling, a request for distinctive Canadian recognition submitted to the Canadian honours and awards committee by the president of the Canadian Peacekeeping Veterans Association was endorsed by many members of this house, a goodly number of whom now sit on government benches. However, the committee denied the submission, deeming the United Nations medals to be sufficient recognition.

The honours and awards directive reads: "In Canada today granting honours is a gracious, tangible, and lasting way to pay tribute to people whose achievements are exceptional, who have performed outstanding acts of bravery or who have benefited Canada or humanity in general". To be completely up front, it also states: "Not more than one honour should be given for any specific achievement, act or service".

I assure you that I have no wish to dilute the justification, meaning or stature of a Canadian medal, but there is a Canadian precedent. In addition to the 1939–45 war medal, and the 1939–45 star, if they served in any area of conflict, those who served outside Canada during the second world war were awarded the Canadian volunteer service medal as well as any campaign medals for which they qualified.

Also, in June 1991, some 40 years after the fact, a Canadian volunteer service medal for Korea was approved by the Queen's Privy Council for presentation to Canadian military personnel who participated in the Korean war in addition to the United Nations medal won by veterans of that conflict.

It is this same recognition I now seek for our peacekeepers. Other countries like Belgium, Ghana, Ireland, the Netherlands, and the United States already have distinctive national medal awards for their UN peacekeepers.

In introducing Bill C–258, I acknowledge that similar private members' bills have been submitted in previous Parliaments but unfortunately were not drawn for debate.

During the last Parliament the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs recommended that a Canadian volunteer service medal for UN peacekeeping be established to recognize the service of Canadian military and non–military personnel who have served on peacekeeping missions. Parliament was dissolved before the government was able to respond to that recommendation.

There are Canadian awards for bravery and valour at home in peacetime, awards for bravery, valour and service in time of war, but despite the discomfort, dislocation, family disruption, danger and sacrifices made by our peacekeepers, we have no Canadian medal for peacekeeping. Regarding sacrifice, according to records maintained by the Canadian Peacekeeping Veterans Association 147 Canadian peacekeepers have made the supreme sacrifice for our country.

On June 11, 1984 a special service medal was authorized to recognize service under abnormally difficult conditions for an extended period. The medal is always awarded with one of four bars on which is engraved the nature of the special service. One of these bars is designated peace*paix and humanitas. The other bars approved and awarded with the special service medal are for service in Pakistan, 1989 to 1990; service with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization since 1951; and Canadian forces station Alert in the Northwest Territories.*

What the special service medal does in the case of the peace bar is recognize those who participated in peacekeeping or humanitarian activities which for a number of reasons, but normally for length of service, did not qualify for a United Nations medal. According to award criteria this medal may not be awarded along with another medal recognizing the same service such as the United Nations medal.

While the special service medal properly fills one gap in our recognition of service, it does not provide that distinctive Canadian recognition for our peacekeepers who have been awarded United Nations service medals. Thus, their contributions around the world with the attendant honour and stature they have brought to our country remain unacknowledged by Canada.

Yet as I said at the beginning, Canada and Canadians take great pride in the contributions that we as a country have made to peacekeeping operations throughout the world. Unquestionably most Canadians know and are proud that these efforts have added to our stature in the world community.

In September 1988 Canadians took pride in their peacekeepers' having been awarded the Nobel peace prize. The clasp proposed in addition to the peacekeeping Canadian volunteer service medal would recognize those people who won that honour for Canada.

A peacekeeping memorial monument has been erected here in Ottawa to honour our peacekeepers and that is important, but a monument does not provide individual recognition.

We Canadians should take more pride in ourselves, in our institutions, our history and our heroes. In this vein there is widespread support for unique Canadian recognition of our peacekeeping forces. We ask them to leave their friends and families to face harsh conditions, difficult situations and are consistently rewarded by their excellent responses to these challenges.

We tend to be slow to recognize our deserving citizens. It seems to be a Canadian trait: 40 years to recognize Korean veterans, 50 years to recognize Dieppe veterans, 55 years and still counting for Hong Kong veterans. A peacekeeping Canadian volunteer service medal and the clasp for the Nobel peace prize can be one of our unifying symbols. Its recipients would come from all walks of life, from every province, from Canadian citizens who represent most if not all our broad variety of ethnic backgrounds, the common denominator being their shared loyalty to and willingness to serve our country.

I want to quote from a 1943 directive issued by General Guy Simonds to his commanders in the First Canadian Division. In it he said:

> The final criterion of a good or bad award is the reaction of the troops. If the troops feel it is a good award, it is a good award. If awards are criticized by the troops, they are bad awards. Before forwarding any recommendation, at each level the commander should ask himself the question: "Would the front line soldier, if he knew the facts, consider this well deserved?".

Bill C–258 is supported by the Canadian Peacekeeping Veterans Association, by the Canadian Association of Veterans in United Nations Peacekeeping, by serving and retired members of the Canadian forces, by many members of this House and by many Canadian citizens who have written or called my office.

We need only think back to the comments made by His Excellency the Right Hon. Romeo LeBlanc, Governor General of Canada, at his installation on the eighth of this month.

Addressing the media in his remarks he said: "There is wonderful news out there and some of it you have covered magnificently. I recall the story you told us of Canadian peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia who put down their weapons to pick up and comfort orphan children, abandoned by their terrorized caregivers. This is Canadian compassion in uniform and we have seen it many times and in many places, from Gaza to Cyprus to Rwanda".

Going on, he said: "It is for this reason that I requested that former Canadian peacekeepers be among today's guard of honour, the first guard of honour I shall inspect as Governor General and as Commander in Chief."

Thus it would seem that despite the reluctance of our honours and awards committee to agree, if we use General Simonds' criteria as a measure, a Canadian volunteer service medal for peacekeeping would qualify as a good award. It would seem obvious from what our Governor General has said, that he too supports the need for Canadians to recognize our peacekeepers.

As a Reform member of Parliament it would be inappropriate for me to recommend an award without considering the cost it will entail. It is estimated that the medal will cost between $5 and $7 a copy and added to that will be the cost of administration and postal charges. As of January 31, 40,594 Canadian forces personnel have served or are serving as peacekeepers. They have fulfilled a total of 52,577 tours of duty.

Additionally, since this recognition would also be extended to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and Canadian civilians who qualify, their numbers must also be considered. I am unable at this time to determine how many they might be, but I believe it would be reasonable to project that the total qualified recipients, including the Canadian forces, are unlikely to exceed 50,000 in number.

If we double the maximum estimated price for the medal, to account for administrative and postal charges, we come to a maximum probable expenditure of $700,000; a lot of money, but it seems a small price for Canadians to pay to properly recognize those of our citizens who have brought lifesaving intervention, compassion and assistance to so many, and such great honour and credit to Canada.

I understand that when the private members' bill committee was considering the status of this bill, it might have received some erroneous information which, in turn, may have influenced its decision not to make this bill votable.

We have an obligation to conserve that which is most noble in our past, to respect the wishes of those veterans who have sacrificed so much, to maintain an honour system that both reflects our Commonwealth traditions and establishes uniquely Canadian symbols.

I want to repeat the honours award directive I quoted earlier: "In Canada today granting honours is a gracious, tangible and lasting way to pay tribute to people whose achievements are exceptional, who have performed outstanding acts of bravery or who have benefited Canada or humanity in general."

Too often in today's society we are slow or fail to give recognition which is due. If we, as parliamentarians, are to take action to afford appropriate Canadian recognition to our peacekeepers, it is important that we give this bill a status which will enable us to exert the maximum influence to achieve that aim. Therefore, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to designate Bill C–258 as a votable item.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wonder if I might seek some clarification from the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands who brought this motion to the House.

In his closing remarks he asked for the unanimous consent of the House. I want to be certain that, in fact, that request was being made by the hon. member.

Mr. Frazer: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would like to enter that motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion. The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands is asking for unanimous consent to make this motion votable. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1120)

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer my comments on Bill C–258, an act which would establish a Canadian volunteer service medal for peacekeeping.

We on this side must sincerely congratulate the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands for his diligence in bringing this important matter before the House. We share with him a strong desire to give fitting recognition to Canadians who serve in these vital and often dangerous operations.

However, I regretfully cannot support this initiative and I want to use the time allocated to me today to explain my position to my hon. colleagues.

[English]

The first and most fundamental reason is that to create a decoration in this manner would run counter to the customs, traditions and procedures by which honours are granted in Canada.

As hon. members know, the powers of the crown in this country fall into two classes. The first are the powers that the crown exercises under statute law subject to the approval of Parliament. The second class of powers are those that are encompassed in what is called the royal prerogative.

These powers, which have their ancient roots in history, are not exercised with reference to Parliament. This is not to say that they are applied arbitrarily. Normally they are exercised by the crown acting on the recommendation of the governor general in council. That is the way it is done in this country.

There are problems of substance and application with respect to this bill, not with respect to the spirit. The bill proposes a volunteer service medal. This terminology echoes the second world war. A special medal was created then to recognize those who had volunteered as opposed to those who were conscripted for service. Today all Canadian military personnel are volunteers.

The bill is also retroactive to the first UN mission in 1947. This means that more than 150,000 persons would be eligible. But there is a more basic difficulty. This approach to the creation of honours would confine us to a narrow, tunnel vision view of needs and options. This is a serious practical drawback.

In order for medals, decorations and other honours to be meaningful, decisions about their creation and criteria must be made in context. For that reason many nations have established carefully crafted systems for the creation and award of honours. Canada has done that.

We have a Canadian honours system. That system was put in place in 1967. It includes a committee which advises the government on how the system should work. The honours policy committee has a broad mandate. It looks at the whole roster of occasions for honours and decoration, peacekeeping operations included.

It surveys the total population of potential recipients of honours. The committee makes its recommendations on the basis of certain clear principles. One is the requirement that people be honoured equally in relation to their contribution and that no one be overlooked. Another function of the honours system is to avoid debasing the coinage of honours by duplication or by the indiscriminate authorization of awards.

The honours policy committee can live up to these principles because it is able to see the whole picture. It is a proactive body. It seeks to search out and eliminate any inequities in the system. Periodically it surveys the honours scene in Canada to make sure that all Canadians who contribute to peacekeeping are treated equally and recognized publicly.

The committee makes it its business to consult with veterans and other groups. It looks at these matters in an international context. It is important, as we consider these matters, to remember that peacekeepers, ours and everyone else's, are honoured not only by their nations but by the international community.

The obvious example, but not the only one, is the United Nations which has created 28 medals to recognize the service of women and men from many lands who take part in various UN actions. Medals have also been struck by organizations other than the UN and many Canadians wear them proudly as their own.

I think that, in a way, these decorations are the most eloquent. Sooner or later, after serving side by side in peacekeeping operations, these men and women return to their units in their respective countries.

By wearing these decorations on their uniforms, they celebrate a comradeship in arms that transcends the differences among nations. These decorations proclaim that we are all serving the common cause of peace.

No award system, whether national or international, is perfect.

• (1125)

It is therefore quite possible that, for technical reasons, some Canadian peacekeepers would not meet established criteria, thus missing out on awards recognizing their contribution.

[English]

One common example is air crew who quite often fly missions related to UN peacekeeping operations without becoming officially attached to those operations. The Canadian honours system recognizes these anomalies exist and precisely for that reason we have the Canadian special service medal with peacekeeping bar.

To sum up, this bill, worthy though it is in objective, would not in my opinion succeed in the goal of honouring equitably the contribution of Canadians. Indeed it would work counter to that goal. For that reason, with great regret and with very great respect for the spirit in which it has been brought forward by the hon. member, I am unable to support it.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–258 put forth by the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands respecting the establishment of a Canadian Volunteer Service Medal and Clasp for United Nations Peacekeeping is a way to recognize our military volunteers for their contribution to peacekeeping missions around the world.

I would like to take this opportunity to salute the courage and dignity with which our servicemen and women carry out their difficult task on peacekeeping missions abroad. They deserve our admiration and full support. I also have a thought for their families who also go through difficult times worrying about them.

Our forces are not new to this kind of operations. A leader in peacekeeping, Canada has gained in this area experience and expertise that has earned it respect worldwide. It should be noted that since the end of the cold war, regional conflicts and thus the need for restoring and maintaining peace have been increasing.

While a general war is highly unlikely in the present circumstances, we must recognize however that a high level conflict could erupt from any given regional confrontation, should it escalate.

The end of the cold war brought about a new world order characterized by a degree of uncertainty, instability as well as some new tensions. The democratization process under way in Eastern Europe is a good example of the ongoing changes. The instability caused by this transition is rekindling national vitality because of newly rediscovered collective identities.

So, in the context of a security policy, we must help countries such as those of Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union that choose to become democratic. It must be pointed out that the emergence of new States did not result in chaos everywhere. National emancipation movements carried out though legitimate institutions materialized peacefully.

For example, the Czech and Slovak republics peacefully severed their federative ties. Similarly, Slovenia and the Baltic States achieved independence in an orderly and democratic fashion. That is how they were able to have their sovereignty readily recognized by the international community.

Another case in point is the Ukraine, the independence of which Ottawa was the first capital to recognize after the referendum won by the sovereignists.

We have no intention of burying our heads in the sand and ignore the constraints and challenges that come with the new world order.

• (1130)

Thus, Canada, as well as an eventual sovereign Quebec, must continue to actively promote democracy. It should be pointed out that, before being perceived as a thorn in our diplomatic efforts and commitments abroad—I am referring of course to the unfortunate events which occurred in Somalia—the contribution of our military personnel to peacekeeping missions made Canadians and Quebecers very proud of their forces.

The situation in the former Yugoslavia, in Bosnia, in Rwanda and in Somalia was unprecedented and here is why. The apparent futility of our efforts, the risks involved for our soldiers, the astronomical figures which circulated regarding the costs of these operations, as well as the complexity of the political and military situations in these countries undermined the public support which, until then, was enjoyed by such operations. While in line with previous similar commitments, our peacekeeping mission in the former Yugoslavia quickly took on a very different nature.

The operation in Slovenia and in Croatia was truly a peacekeeping mission. In that sense, our troops had the responsibility to ensure compliance with already concluded peace agreements. However, their role in Bosnia, Rwanda and Somalia had very little to do with traditional types of intervention. Canadian troops found themselves in a theatre of war, caught between belligerent factions. How can you maintain peace in a country where peace does not exist in the first place, where a political settlement has yet to be reached, and where every ceasefire is violated? That is when things started to deteriorate, particularly after the whole world was able to see on television unbearable atrocities which we thought no longer existed, but which are indeed very real.

There are lessons to be drawn from these operations. Canada's future interventions will have to meet more specific criteria. For example, the costs and complexities of modern–day interventions require the emergence of a new culture on the part of the strategists and the troops which will participate in future peacekeeping missions. Moreover, the recent events in Haiti reminded us of the need to base our interventions on democratic legitimacy and careful planning.

It is important to clearly define, with the United Nations, specific objectives and tasking orders. The Bloc Quebecois feels that one of the primary duties of Canadian forces on the international scene must be to support, through participation, peacekeeping operations. In the future, our troops will have to be disciplined, trained to face the rigours of armed conflicts, adequately equipped, professional in their approach, and under good command.

I will support Bill C–258, but I want to point out that the candidates who served with a UN peacekeeping force and are eligible to receive the medal and clasp must meet criteria which are still not known and which will have to be clearly defined.

[English]

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in speaking in support of Bill C–258 I have to ask the basic question of why a medal, or for that matter, why a Canadian medal. I would like to cover the ground here by trying to describe what is happening to our country in relation to this medal as an example.

• (1135)

Medals generally are a reflection and a record of our history as a country, of our independence and of our associations. The key word is independence. Looking at our history as a country over the last 100 years we find we have ties to the United Kingdom. In times of war these ties have been rather firm and very loyal. That does not necessarily change over the years but it does in another sense. The loyalties are still there but other loyalties are built up.

We can look at the issue of wartime service in World War II, the creation of a Canadian army, the creation of the third largest navy in the world, and the expansion of the Royal Canadian Air Force. This gives us a good measure of the emergence of Canada as a nation on its own without defaulting what has happened and what the ties are to the United Kingdom.

In looking at our history we have to look at our loyalties. We certainly have had a loyalty to Great Britain. We have had a loyalty to our other allies, be it the United States or France. We have developed over the years new and greater loyalties to the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. However, among all of these loyalties, associations and services we have a greater basic loyalty which is to Canada. We must allow our basic loyalty to ourselves to emerge.

The proposer has mentioned, and I would like to bring it out again, that this bill in no way attempts to usurp the royal prerogative of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada or the Prime Minister or the honours policy committee to establish honours and awards. Rather, it gives the government the opportunity to respond to the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs which recommended that such a medal be established to recognize the service of the Canadian military in peacekeeping. That is the nub of it all.

A committee of this House is saying that we are Canadians and that we must do something to recognize what Canadians are doing. I did hear the words from the hon. member for Halifax explaining that there are entanglements and we should not remove this royal prerogative. I agree with this to a degree, but our greatest loyalty once again must be to ourselves.

We are moving in the direction of being our own authority in this country. From the Statute of Westminster back in 1933 and over the years we are continuing to move in that same direction.

When it comes to the issue of medals we have already heard that we are coming up with belated recognition for things such as Korea. When I came back from Korea in 1952 I was awarded a United Nations medal and a British Commonwealth medal for service in that country.

Forty years after the fact Canada belatedly decided it should issue its own medal for this service. Several years ago it came up with the Canadian volunteer service medal for Korea. It has now also come up with other awards in recognition of Canadian service which include: the 1983 special service medal; the Dieppe clasp, Dieppe occurred over 55 years ago and we have only come to provide belated recognition of it; and for the merchant marines. Service by the merchant navy took us 50 years to recognize.

We have received belated and sometimes no recognition at all. Hong Kong has been mentioned. This country has not yet recognized the service of our people in Hong Kong 55 years ago. There is no recognition of what I believe was called the ferry command. Civilians and military alike were ferrying aircraft from Canada and the United States over to the war zone in the U.K.

We are moving in that direction but we are dragging our feet. To give another illustration of moving somewhat in the same direction, I participated in a non–United Nations peacekeeping effort in 1973. We went to Vietnam to replace the old, almost useless international commission for supervision and control. I should not say useless; it was hamstrung. Its hands were tied as to what it could do.

In any event in 1973, Canada along with Indonesia as another representative of the western world and Poland and Hungary sent a non–UN commission, a quadripartite commission to Vietnam to oversee whatever peace we could muster out of that sad country. As a result of that I was asked to head up a committee to strike a medal. It was a very interesting experience.

A committee of four got together, one representing each of the four countries. We designed a medal. We designed a ribbon incorporating the colours of the four countries involved: red–white, red–white, red–white, and red–white–green. We came up with a unique medal. It was certainly unique in its execution because it was hand forged in a back alley of Saigon. Nevertheless we came up with a medal of our own for issue to the 1,000–plus members of that specific commission.

The illustration of this is that you can do things on your own or in concert with others. We did it quickly. We did it inexpensively. We came up with a unique medal in observation of that specific enterprise.

I see that other countries have issued their own medals. Ghana, Belgium, the Netherlands, the United States, and Ireland are issuing their own UN medals. Canada is first among equals in United Nations service. Surely if there is any country in the world that must have its own UN service medal, it is Canada.

In conclusion, since my colleague was unable to get unanimous approval to designate Bill C–258 as a votable item, I would ask that we unanimously vote to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs. Let us get together and at least refer the bill to that committee so that it can assess the merits of the bill in proper time. Therefore I move:

> That Bill C–258, an act respecting the establishment and award of a Canadian Volunteer Service Medal and Clasp for United Nations Peacekeeping to Canadians serving with a United Nations peacekeeping force, be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on National Defence.

• (1145)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak today in favour of the bill put forward by my colleague from Saanich—Gulf Islands.

We hear everyone praising our peacekeepers. We talk about our peacekeepers everywhere we go. It is a Canadian tradition. Every high school student in Canada is taught that the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson invented peacekeeping in the 1950s to defuse the Suez Canal crisis. Yet it seems to me at times that we certainly as governments over the last number of years have been ashamed of that fact. We have never seen fit to give a medal to our own Canadian peacekeepers, as was mentioned so eloquently a moment ago by the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

I have listened to the debate over the last five years in the House and when we brought the matter before the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs. There has to be a better way of recognizing our military people. Canadians have served in practically every peacekeeping effort since the Suez crisis from Cyprus to Cambodia and from Pakistan to the Israeli withdrawal from Egypt.

Our peacekeepers have served Canada and the United Nations well. They have brought honour to our country and they should be appropriately recognized. For a country with our tradition it is only fitting that a government strike a volunteer service medal for those Canadians who served in peacekeeping operations.

We are not talking about special treatment of privileges. We are talking about honour. Right now, as has been mentioned many times here, our peacekeepers receive a medal from the United Nations for their service. However they do not receive a medal from their own country. That is a shame.

Some people have suggested that such a move is unprecedented. That is not so. As has been said today, the volunteers in Korea have received a Canadian medal to commemorate their service to peace. Granted, they waited 40 years and probably would never have received it except that we committed troops at the time of the gulf war in 1991. At that time it was deemed to be a special area and a medal would be struck for that. It was pretty hard for the government not to come through with a medal for the Canadian people who served in Korea.

We tend to play down this business of giving medals to our troops who serve in various areas. Maybe that has some merit at times. There are countries that some people think give too many medals. I have come to know a lot of the people who participated in peacekeeping efforts around the world in the last number of years. We have come into our own as a country. We have served in every conflict in this century. I believe the time has come to change the rules if that is what we have to do.

No one has said anything about the royal prerogative, but maybe it is time that we took a look at the way things are done. We are great people in the House of all political parties for saying it is time for change. I found last summer as we travelled the country looking at our defence policy that sometimes it was hard to change things. Sometimes it is hard to change minds, even though we all go in with grandiose plans for making things work differently.

It would be a shame if we fail to provide recognition of our peacekeeping veterans, the same recognition we gave to people who served in the Korean war and the first and second world wars. I do not think these people should have to wait 40 and 50 years for the government to give them credit where credit is due.

Canada is a country that is called on. We have more missions going now than we have had for many years. We are always ready to do our part even with dwindling resources and not the best equipment that our people should have out there. We do not hear them complain about it. We see letters from organizations across the country urging us to support the bill that we bring forward a peacekeeping medal and clasp for our peacekeepers.

We have not gone far enough in this age. We talked about it, as I said, in 1990 in the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs. Perhaps, as has been suggested, it should lie with this committee to bring forth a way of doing it without having the wrath of the government against us or the wrath of those in Parliament who do not believe these things are noble or necessary.

We should be ashamed of ourselves as governments and as parliaments for not having done something sooner. The gulf war had to come along before the Korean veterans were recognized with their own distinctive Canadian medal. I see nothing wrong with the soldiers getting the United Nations medal and one from our own country.

At the end of the day I hope there is some resolve that we can send the matter to committee and have some recommendations come forward. I do not believe for a moment we are doing anything wrong by recommending that we give this medal to our peacekeepers. It would be a great day in our country if we could do that. We can sit here and talk about all the rules to stop this legislation. They are there, but I do not see why we cannot come up with some way to change them and make this medal a reality.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise in the House today to speak to the bill presented by the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

The bill which I strongly support has as its main purpose the establishment of a volunteer service medal for members of the Canadian Armed Forces who have served in peacekeeping missions under United Nations command. In my view and that of many others this is a long overdue idea that deserves to be considered very seriously by the House and by the Canadian government.

As we all know Canada has been involved in UN sponsored operations since the 1940s. Canada has also been the most constant and faithful contributor of troops to peacekeeping missions. In return our involvement in areas like Lebanon, Cyprus, El Salvador and Cambodia has truly been a source of pride for all Canadians.

While we have taken pride in this heritage of service abroad, we have failed to adequately recognize the efforts and the courage of thousands of servicemen and women who have answered without question the call of the Canadian government whenever it has sounded.

Under present guidelines Canadian peacekeepers do not receive a distinctively Canadian medal. Ever since 1949, the year of the first UN sponsored military observation mission in India–Pakistan, Canadian service men and women have not been formally honoured by the Government of Canada by the awarding of a Canadian medal. The medals awarded to date have been issued by the United Nations thereby making them foreign awards. This oversight, which hopefully cannot be interpreted as a lack of gratitude, must be remedied.

In the words of a former peacekeeper, now a member of the Canadian Peacekeeping Veterans Association, the adoption of Bill C–258 is "an opportunity to help right the wrong". Canada's reputation as a country concerned with peace around the world is in large part attributed to the professional ability and courage of past and present peacekeepers. The role that Canadians have taken in UN peacekeeping is recognized throughout the world. It is now time for the Canadian government to do the same.

Today I will try to explain why in my personal view this is such a timely initiative. The idea of establishing a Canadian volunteer service medal for United Nations peacekeeping has a great deal of merit, not the least of which is to bring Canada up to par with other peacekeeping contributing nations such as Belgium, the Netherlands, France, the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland which already award their own peacekeeping medals in addition to those awarded by the United Nations.

The new medal would also give visual recognition of the great honour that was bestowed upon Canada by our peacekeepers when the United Nations peacekeeping operations won the Nobel prize in September 1988. Indeed the idea has a great deal of merit. However it appears all the more relevant in light of a certain number of developments both on international and national levels that in recent years have demonstrated the need to seriously question ourselves on what peacekeeping represents to us and, in that light, what level of commitment we are prepared to live up to.

In the course of the debate that has been going on in Canada over the past few years on these issues it has appeared quite clear that Canada's involvement in peacekeeping operations is a reflection of its internationalist approach to world affairs.

The recent defence white paper concluded:

> Multilateral security co–operation is not merely a Canadian tradition; it is an expression of Canadian values in the international sphere. We care about the course of events abroad and we are willing to work together with other countries to improve the lot of all manner of peoples.

The Reform Party has repeatedly echoed this international commitment. We believe that Canada's ability to play a role on the international scene rests to a large extent on our continued dedication to the principles of international co–operation and collective security.

Furthermore Canada is not blind to the lessons of history. Our historical experience has underscored the need to develop and maintain effective multilateral institutions that can confront as effectively as possible any challenge to international security and stability and, if all other means fail, respond to aggression with determination and leadership.

In so reflecting Canada's global values the Canadian forces have contributed incessantly to international security. Over the past few years the sheer number of UN sponsored interventions requiring Canadian participation has dramatically increased. The result has been to stretch Canada's peacekeeping resources to their extreme limit.

The nature of multilateral operations has also changed enormously. The range of activities these operations involve has expanded to encompass the complete set of military activities from preventive deployment and observation to enforcement and reconstruction.

This has spurred a debate at the international level about the need to more clearly determine the nature of any multilateral operation, whether peacekeeping, peacemaking or humanitarian, before deployment actually takes place.

In Canada we have become more sensitive to the need to define the conditions under which our forces will be deployed in areas of conflict.

From the perspective of those Canadian men and women who serve or who have served under UN command, and on whose behalf I speak today, these developments have meant more intensive training, increased stress and wider responsibilities. Although most of us do not have an immediate knowledge of what a soldier's job entails, it must be clear to all of us that the political and military trends in the nineties have made the soldier's job considerably more difficult than in any other era.

Not since the Korean war have Canadian servicemen and women been burdened with such a wide array of responsibilities at home and abroad. Increasingly these people are asked to move beyond their traditional role of seeing to the nation's defence into non–traditional areas such as the delivery of humanitarian aid and the reconstruction of war–ravaged societies.

The physical and psychological strains associated with immersing oneself in an alien culture and with meeting stringent performance criteria are necessary so that both the individual and the group can withstand the ultimate test of combat. While they must be ready to endure the most difficult and unfriendly working conditions, the soldiers of the nineties must also be flexible. They are asked to be diplomats, aid workers, law enforcement officers as well as warriors. They are expected to exercise an unprecedented level of self–discipline by constantly adapting to fit the prevailing situation.

In wartime, roles and objectives are clearly defined. In operations other than war, the soldier is often forced to change roles from day to day, even moment to moment. The peacekeeper must draw on his combat infantry skills if a fire fight breaks out, and then revert to his diplomatic or humanitarian self. The soldier of the nineties must be more educated than ever before. He must be acquainted with political, military and sociocultural dynamics of the crisis area in which he has been deployed. That is not an easy feat, if we consider the intractable nature of some of the conflicts which Canada has helped to monitor.

The complex security problems which confront the international community today defy easy solutions. Often those solutions, for which a multilateral response has been deemed the most appropriate, are also the most complicated. Some conflicts, such as the ones in the former Yugoslavia and Somalia, are ones for which it is very difficult to define objectives that reflect a clear sense of perspective.

Moreover, soldiers are asked to perform to the best of their ability, even in the most ambiguous and uncertain situations. They are expected to be sensitive to political, social and cultural realities on which even their superiors are unable to provide information and leadership.

It is also important for the Canadian government to recognize this state of affairs. Peacekeepers have served Canada's interests well since the end of the second world war. This contribution from our servicemen and women has become more and more costly in terms of personal commitment and loss of life.

A Canadian volunteer service medal would not compensate for the sacrifice and deprivation, whether physical or emotional, nor can it constitute a form of restitution for the families of those who have given their lives in the search for peace. The Canadian volunteer service medal must be seen as a token of our collective appreciation, as a formal recognition by the people and the Government of Canada of the increasingly perilous and arduous role demanded of peacekeepers and, as my colleague said, of "their continued display of courage and dedication to their assignments, which have been the hallmark of Canadian peacekeepers".

I certainly support this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed from February 24 consideration of the motion that Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak on third reading of this bill. I begin by reviewing the highlights of the bill and after that I would like to put special emphasis and focus on that part of the bill which has to do with rehabilitation.

• (1205)

For those who have come to the debate recently, the minister announced, when tabling the bill on June 2, the highlights would include sentences for teenagers convicted of first and second degree murder in youth court to 10 and 7 years respectively. Sixteen and 17–year olds charged with serious personal injury offences would be dealt with in adult court unless they can show a judge that public protection and rehabilitation can both be achieved through the youth court. It includes extending the time that 16 and 17–year old young offenders who have been convicted of murder in an adult court must serve before they can be considered for parole.

It also includes improved measures for information sharing between professionals like school officials and police, and with selected members of the public when public safety is at risk, as well as retaining the records of serious young offenders longer. Finally, it includes provisions to encourage rehabilitation and treatment of young offenders in the community when this is appropriate.

I want to focus on the last point. I am happy to see that the very first clause of the bill deals with the whole point of underlying causes and rehabilitation. I would like to read directly into the record clause 1(1):

> (a) Crime prevention is essential to the long-term protection of society and requires addressing the underlying causes of crime by young persons and developing multi-disciplinary approaches to identifying and effectively responding to children and young persons at risk of committing offending behaviour in the future;
> (a.1) while young persons should not in all instances be held accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences for their behaviour as adults, young persons who commit offences should nonetheless bear responsibility for their contraventions;

Clause 1(2) says:

> The protection of society, which is a primary objective of the criminal law applicable to youth, is best served by rehabilitation, wherever possible, of young persons who commit offences, and rehabilitation is best achieved by addressing the needs and circumstances of a young person that are relevant to the young person's offending behaviour;

I would like to talk about this part of the bill because I believe it is an area where we in the community are not putting enough emphasis today.

I go back to a book that I had a chance to review this morning before I came to the House. It is Father Flanagan at Boys Town. Boys Town is situated about 10 miles outside of Omaha, Nebraska.

I can remember one night flying in from Toronto with a colleague from Saskatchewan. We were talking about Notre Dame in Saskatchewan, but the subject of Boys Town came up. What has been going on for many years now at Father Flanagan's Boys Town in the United States of America is something that we as legislators should take time to revisit.

For those who do not know, Father Flanagan started this environment many years ago when he took in homeless boys, young boys without parents. However he also took about 20 per cent of the number, young offenders.

The rehabilitation record of Boys Town has been described by some of the best psychiatrists and doctors as to being almost a totally mysterious phenomena. Father Flanagan worked with these young men in developing their character. He exposed them to apprenticeship and athletics. It did not matter what their religious background was. The boys could be Jewish, Protestant or Catholic, but he made sure that a portion of their life each week had some sort of religious training.

I tell this story because the track record of the Boys Town situation applies just as much today. It is just as relevant as it was many years ago when this institution started. There are just as many young people today who are involved in situations where their family life is under great stress and strain. I believe that many of these homes that we have in our communities do not have the same sophistication as that institution has.

As we go through the process of putting more emphasis on rehabilitation, we should also be reviewing the types of institutions we have to make sure they are relevant and that we are getting the maximum impact.

So often today a young offender is put into an institution where some of the values that a Boys Town has are just not present; the values of caring and sharing with one another and being a little bit more sensitive to character building. The institutions are just not sensitive. I am not saying that our institutions should be totally ignored but that they should be re-examined.

The Minister of Justice made the following statement in his press release, which I want to emphasize: "That legislation is only one part of the answer to violence among young people. Poverty, alcoholism, family violence, racism, illiteracy and many other factors may lead to criminal acts by young people and adults alike and must be tackled as a whole". The minister said this when he issued his press release. Those words are very important.

When we go through this bill I am hoping that the whole area of rehabilitation can be given very special review and emphasis. We should look at some of the rehabilitation systems and centres that exist all over North America. I would like to refer very specifically, as I said, to the Boys Town example in the United States where the track record of rehabilitation is apparently second to none anywhere in the world. If a Boys Town environment can happen in the United States why can we not have similar institutions in Canada?

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke could also have looked at the system we have in Quebec, a system that was put in place a number of years ago and that, as far as we are concerned, has proved its worth. Unlike the bill to which the hon. member was referring, our system is not based on the premise that young people can be rehabilitated through repression.

Unfortunately, this bill leans towards repression. It gives the public the impression it will be better protected because young offenders who are 16 or 17 years of age and are tried in adult court will get longer sentences.

The public is being deluded. It has yet to be established in the literature that increasing sentences acts as a deterrent in such cases. I do agree wholeheartedly with a number of points the hon. member made. We must look at what causes crime, and even more important, we must ensure that when young people have committed a crime, they are given, considering their age, every opportunity,—this is important for society as well—to get out of the kind of life that they have chosen or into which they have been led, not perhaps altogether voluntarily, considering the problems many of them have had.

This bill is even more offensive in the case of Quebec, where we have set up a system I would urge the hon. member to come and see, and not just in the large urban centres. We really had to put a lot of work into this system; we had to call on multidisciplinary resources and take a more community–oriented approach based more on compensation for damages or on the actual rehabilitation of the young person.

The federal legislation, which will have to be administered by Quebec, will have a very disruptive impact on this system. This is true in other provinces and it is also true in Quebec. The government ignores existing systems that work well and imposes or adds a system based on repression, a system that does not connect with systems that already exist and have proved to be effective.

This is outrageous, and does not bode well for the future. I think this is just one more reason to say that as far as guidance, social justice and equity are concerned, we are perfectly capable of doing the job ourselves.

The Quebec Bar Association submitted an extensive brief to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, in which it accurately summed up the situation in Quebec. It said that young offenders in Quebec are eligible for alternative treatment of their case, which involves a referral to the Youth Protection Branch, proposals for an arrangement and the use of alternative sentencing such as reimbursing the victim or doing community work. In fact, almost 47 per cent of the cases are handled this way. Where alternative sentencing is not a possibility, all such cases in Quebec will be tried by a special youth court. Once the court has handed down a sentence, it will be up to the health care and social services network to see that it is carried out.

The choice that Quebec has made to entrust young offenders to institutions that come under the department of health and social services illustrates its philosophy in this matter. The ultimate aim is rehabilitation in the medium and long terms rather than a panacea of repression, which at best offers society only short term protection.

The crime rate among adolescents in Quebec is one of the lowest in the country, in fact, the second lowest. The adoption of Bill C–37 will upset all of our institutions whose role so far has been to promote rehabilitation.

I might add that imprisonment, by itself, while appearing to protect society, and which, even in the bill, is of limited duration, often ends up making criminals out of those who were initially only unfortunate or unlucky young individuals. If you want to be sure to turn 16 and 17 year olds into criminals, send them to prison. The longer the sentence, the better your chances of achieving that effect.

We are strongly opposed to this bill. We believe that the minister, who, in any case, had said he wanted to review all the legislation to do with young people, should have examined the overall situation before tabling this bill. Having done so, he could have offered Canadians and Quebecers, not a comforting short term system, but a medium and long term one, which would prove less costly and permit the building of a society where people would really feel safe, because young people would have the opportunity to reintegrate into society rather than risk being handed another prison term.

We will oppose this bill vigorously. We hope Canadians will appreciate our arguments. During our tour on social program reform, I heard it said everywhere in Canada, except in Quebec, that people were looking to Ottawa for an answer and for social justice through strong national standards.

It seems to me that the adoption of a bill like this one casts doubt on Ottawa's ability to show the way to social justice, fairness and hope for all Canadians and Quebecers, and particularly for young people.

[English]

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is one statement that is factual about the justice minister's attempt at dealing with young offenders: He is blindly following a political policy that became extinct the last time his party was in power.

The justice minister is trying to convince Canadians that his proposed legislation, Bill C–37, is dealing with justice. This legislation is another attempt by this government at social manipulation and social engineering. It is not legislation to deal with justice.

The justice minister should be concerned in dealing with those who have ignored and broken the established laws. The minister should be concerned in dealing with legislation that forces youth law breakers to understand that law–abiding members of society will not tolerate, condone nor accept the fact that criminal behaviour will go unpunished.

I know punishment is a foul word to the opposite side, but it is a concept that is expected by the citizens of Canada. What we have here is legislation that outlines more reasons why offending youths should not expect punishment for crimes committed on law–abiding members of society. This legislation offers youth even more reasons to believe that the justice system will find reasons to excuse their criminal behaviour.

This justice minister's first idea of justice is crime prevention. As good as that sounds, this legislation was supposed to deal with crimes already committed by young offenders. Instead, this minister wants to bypass his ministry and put the blame for violent antisocial youth on provincial social service agencies that are not fulfilling their mandate to provide youth with an alternative to criminal action.

Canadians desired and demanded that this minister address the problem of increasing violence by youth. There is an epidemic of youth who commit crimes and laugh at the justice system's inability to show them that crime does not pay. Instead of putting teeth into the criminal justice system, this minister is continuing on a path designed by his government to present high sounding words that do not change anything.

• (1225)

Canadians want change. Canadians want their concerns addressed. And once again, this government offers excuses as to why change is impossible.

The existing Young Offenders Act has the proper first priority. The first declaration of principle in the existing act states: "While young persons should not in all instances be held accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences for their behaviour as adults, young persons who commit offences should nonetheless bear responsibility for their contraventions".

What does this minister offer? An excuse that because offending youth have committed crimes, that it is a failure of crime prevention policies administered by provincial agencies. The minister just does not get it. He does not understand that until his ministry becomes interested in justice and not downloading the responsibility for his failure to do his job to the provincial agencies, violent youth will not bear the responsibility for their antisocial actions.

Canadians are not asking for excuses from the justice minister; they are asking for justice that condemns violent behaviour by antisocial youth. Canadians demand that the justice minister remove the loopholes in the Young Offenders Act which allow violent youth to kill or maim Canadians with no consequence of justice affecting the violent criminal. Instead, what do we get? Legislation that says crime prevention methods failed so we must blame crime prevention.

May I remind this minister that the consequences of death or maiming cannot be changed. Canadians expect that justice must make the accountability for violent crimes swift and sure. Instead, Canadians are offered excuses why this justice minister would rather find causes for violent crimes than offer justice for victims of violent crime.

Before this minister gets on his high horse and states that we on this side of the House are only interested in locking up all who break the law, let me remind him that I am talking about violent youth. This side of the House fully supports alternative measures for non–violent first offenders.

Another question is, where does the funding for these facilities come from? It is very noble of the minister to talk about crime prevention. His party has been doing so since the last time they were the majority in the House. Rather than putting tax dollars into preventing crime, the Liberals preferred then just as they do now, to waste tax dollars on dubious expenditures benefiting friendly special interests such as, blueberry jelly, a study of Christmas lights, or the effects of lullabies on babies.

The recommendations for social service expenditures by the provinces that this minister disguises as justice will cost his government nothing. However the citizens of the provinces that this minister will coerce into buying this bill of false goods may not be so lucky.

The justice minister has seen the studies that state provincial social services now in place to assist youth at risk of crime are under–resourced and understaffed. This justice minister knows that provincial social workers trying to prevent crime by youth are and have depended on the Young Offenders Act to provide the services they cannot afford. This justice minister knows that provincial crime prevention will not receive federal funding because his government foolishly squanders tax dollars on programs of limited benefit to all Canadians rather than crime prevention for youth.

Unfortunately, this minister and government are again using window dressing to try and convince Canadians that what is in the store is worth buying. As we all know, not only is the store empty, but the management of the store is empty of new ideas as well. Canadians will not buy this government's line that it knows best and Canadians know nothing.

The chair of the justice committee asked in the House why we on this side of the House oppose spending money on social programs that will reduce crime. May I remind those opposite that this legislation was intended to address justice. This side of the House believes that crime prevention is cost effective and beneficial to both the future criminal and victim. However, this bill is supposed to address how the justice system must deal with those who have already committed violent crimes against society, not outline the failings of provincial social services.

It is obvious we have reached the crux of this government's ability to govern. Seeing through all the flowery words and smoke and mirrors, Canadians will realize this government does not even understand the role the justice department must play in making justice mean something to violent youth.

Instead of justice this government offers a social service review. As we know, this government has already stated that reforming social services, just like changes that bring justice for victims of youth crime, is impossible.

In his last report the Auditor General took a bold step. The Auditor General said that it is time this government took a look at the legislation that was passed to see if the tax dollars are achieving the purpose of the legislation.

We have social programs that hurt society, family programs that destroy families, aboriginal programs that keep Canada's aboriginals from ever gaining self–sufficiency and expenditure control legislation that allows government spending to spiral out of control as it has. Every time one of these programs fails we spend more money. These changes to the Young Offenders Act will not deter one violent youth from crime but will cost more money.

This justice minister has neglected to answer several questions important to this legislation: What is the Young Offenders Act supposed to do? Will this legislation do it? How can we tell the difference? No one in this House will disagree that the Young Offenders Act is intended to separate hardened adult violent criminals from youth. It is further intended to separate hardened violent youth from the non–violent kid who got in with the wrong crowd and made a foolish mistake.

No one will disagree that the youth making a non–violent mistake deserves a second chance. The problem with this legislation is the same as what is rampant in the adult justice system. No one is held accountable for their violent crimes. A day hardly goes by without discovering that a violent adult or youth who should have been separated from society is back on the street and has taken another victim.

This government did not take justice seriously in the past. This legislation clearly shows the Liberals still do not take justice seriously today. Canadian society wants violent youths separated from potential victims, not reasons from this government why crime prevention fails.

Let me serve notice here and now. If the Prime Minister and his justice minister ignore public demand that violent crime by youth be addressed, the good old days for the Liberal Party will end anytime before the next election. This Liberal government must apply the auditor general's recommendation to the Young Offenders Act. It must give value for tax dollar by protecting society from violent youth, not spending more tax dollars on a failed policy of social engineering. This government must hold violent youth accountable for their violent crimes.

In conclusion, I would like to say how disappointing it is to see that after much input from Canadian citizens and many other organizations throughout the country what we have come up with is Bill C–37. In the long run it will change nothing. It is change that Canadians are looking for. It will not come through a legislation that does not get serious about violent crime.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise again in the House to share my views on Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act.

We in the Bloc Quebecois agree that youth crime is a very serious problem. The media regularly inform us of specific crimes that are so violent that no one can remain indifferent.

Examples abound and remind us constantly that violence pervades all levels and all aspects of our society. Our task is to ensure that our laws put a stop to such heinous crimes while clearly demonstrating that we have no tolerance for crime.

Unfortunately, the amendments to the Young Offenders Act tabled by the justice minister will in my opinion worsen the present situation by virtue of the repressive approach taken.

Bill C–37 proposes three fundamental amendments to the Young Offenders Act. Firstly, the bill proposes longer sentences. Secondly, it would send to adult court young 16 and 17 year olds accused of offences involving serious bodily harm.

Thirdly, the bill would improve the methods of sharing information between the police, the judiciary and certain members of the public. These three amendments to the act are fundamental and alter certain basic principles of the present legislation. To begin, then, longer sentences clearly demonstrate that the principles of prevention and rehabilitation, although mentioned in the first paragraph of the new bill, are no longer government objectives.

The proposal regarding greater accessibility of information is somewhat similar. What the minister is proposing is to make the offender realize that he is a criminal. As a constant reminder, authorities will inform the offender's community, classmates and teachers, as well as his neighbours. Instead of encouraging rehabilitation to any degree, this approach will, on the contrary, etch in the young person's mind that, from that point on, he is considered a criminal, a public enemy. This approach is like branding young offenders and dangerously compromises their chances of rehabilition.

Also, transferring 16 and 17 year olds who have committed "violent" crimes to adult court raises many concerns. Firstly, this amendment is futile since most violent cases are already being transferred to adult court at the request of crown prosecutors. In addition, these amendments go against the grain of Quebec's system.

Over the years, Quebec has developed a structure that strikes a real balance between protecting the public and rehabilitating delinquents. This structure also ensures that young people are taken in hand from the moment that they begin to exhibit behavioral problems or to compromise their health or safety. Also, under the Quebec system, young people are referred to establishments run by the Department of Health and Social Services, not by the Department of Justice. This shows that Quebec focuses its efforts on rehabilitation. In this sense, Bill C–37 undermines the very spirit of Quebec's current system.

This bill is repressive. As I pointed out at the bill's first reading, there are two competing schools of thought regarding juvenile delinquency: one that centres on the young criminal, emphasizing arrest, referral to a court, sentencing and punishment, and one that centres on reintegration, focusing on the causes behind delinquency and attempting to put juvenile delinquents back on track, without increasing the likelihood of their becoming repeat offenders.

It seems obvious to me that the second, which fosters prevention and rehabilitation, is the better school of thought. Criminologists recognize that criminal behaviour stems from more than one cause. It is most likely that crime results from a combination of related factors such as education, family situation, poverty, drug abuse, promotion of violence, unemployment or injustices. When this bill was tabled, the Minister of Justice told us that reintegration, prevention and rehabilitation would be integrated into his reforms.

Yet, after reading this bill several times, I do not see a single measure reflecting this concern. Of course, there is the policy statement in section 1 of the bill, but not a word about it in the substantive sections. Section 1 is a smokescreen that tones down the repressive aspect of this bill. It becomes obvious that the federal government must review its approach to youth crime. We need a more realistic review, which would first address the social and economic realities behind crime and implement social development programs and initiatives focused on rehabilitation and prevention.

This bill raised serious concerns in Quebec, not only among social and correctional authorities but also among politicians and academics. After Bill C–37 was tabled, Quebec's National Assembly gave almost unanimous support to a motion sending a very clear message to the federal Minister of Justice: "Let us continue to address our problems in our own way". There was also a general outcry from experts such as psychoeducators, criminologists, specialized lawyers and social workers.

Quebec has often been a leader in the treatment of young offenders. As early as 1942, Quebec brought to 18 years the minimum age for assuming responsibility, a move that some other provinces followed only in 1982. Over the years, Quebec developed a whole structure, a system to maintain the right balance between protecting the public and rehabilitating young offenders, which is just as commendable a goal.

It must be recognized that Quebec gave itself an innovative penal and social system to treat juvenile delinquency. For almost 15 years, Quebec has emphasized rehabilitation over mere repression. Our system strives to go beyond the surface to identify the underlying causes of delinquency and rejects the idea that life imprisonment is the only solution for delinquents with serious family and social problems.

The young offender is quickly placed under the care of the Ministry of Health and Social Services and the youth protection directorate, with surprising results. According to several serious studies, society recoups its financial investment in the rehabilitation of a young murderer in less than five years through the young adult's productivity, through his work, his taxes and his purchasing power.

In conclusion, we in the Bloc Quebecois strongly believe that rehabilitation and prevention are the only acceptable way to address youth crime. That is why we do not support Bill C–37.

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak again on this bill to amend the Young Offenders Act, enacted in 1984 to replace the Juvenile Delinquents Act, and the existing federal legislation governing matters related to juvenile crime and justice in Canada.

This bill sets a new legal framework to guide society's response to young people who contravene criminal law, basically. Many of its provisions are based on a legalistic approach with an emphasis on fair application of the law and the necessity for young persons to assume responsibility for their actions. However, because of their age and degree of maturity, young offenders obviously have special needs that require a level of assistance that just does not exist in the adult system. But the bill does not reinforce this aspect of assistance to young offenders.

In this bill, a young person is no longer a person between the ages of 12 and 18 but one between the ages of 10 and 15, which means that anyone over sixteen will now be tried in adult court, while it will still be possible to transfer a young offender under sixteen to adult court.

Essentially, this bill is driven by an arbitrary and unjustified wave of repression, promoting more heavy–handed judicial measures against young offenders, rather than effective preventive and rehabilitation measures.

On this subject, like my colleagues, I will quote from the conclusions set out in the brief presented to the standing committee on justice by the Quebec Bar Association. In essence, it said: "It is very clear that Bill C–37 was introduced in response to pressures by citizens demanding to be better protected through a more effective fight against serious crimes but repression did not appear to be the solution, and for good reasons we might add. Quebec found its own way of dealing with the problem and wants to continue using the successful approach of rehabilitation, or reorientation. All we are asking for is to be able to maintain the good results we have achieved so far with respect to juvenile crime".

Since 1984, the Young Offenders Act was amended twice, that is in 1986 and in 1992.

In 1986, amendments were made to allow public disclosure of the identity of a young person accused or found guilty of a crime, when that person is a threat to the public, and when such disclosure is necessary to facilitate the arrest of that person.

In 1992, the act was amended to increase the maximum sentence for murder from three to five years, that is three years in detention and two under mandatory supervision. However, if the young offender is considered to be a threat to public safety, he can be kept in custody for a period longer than three years.

Also in 1992, the provisions regarding referrals to an adult court, in the case of serious crimes, were clarified. A young offender aged 14 or more must be referred to an adult court when the penalty that can be imposed by the youth court no longer ensures public safety, nor the rehabilitation of the offender.

Consequently, since 1984, the provisions of the act have become stiffer.

However, since the increase in crime rate for the year 1992 only went up two per cent, compared to an average of five per cent in previous years, does this not confirm that the current act is sufficiently harsh and that there is no need to make it more repressive?

Why not wait to see the results of the amendments made in 1992? Since these amendments are relatively recent and also because of the statistical lag, it is difficult to evaluate their impact.

In its brief, the Quebec Bar Association deplored this decision to proceed, first with the amendments and only then with a thorough review of the legislation and a study of the youth crime rate. Reversing the procedure would have made it possible, in addition to what Quebec has been able to bring to this area, to identify the mechanisms needed to make the system efficient and effective. Furthermore, a preliminary study of the youth crime rate would have made it possible to establish the impact of the amendments adopted in 1992 and find out whether their objective had been achieved, as would seem to be the case according to the latest judgments of the Appeal Court.

The bar association concluded that Bill C–37 should be withdrawn. It goes on to say that if this is not politically feasible, the minister should at least postpone his review until he has examined the youth crime rate.

Bill C–37 does nothing to deal with the problem of youth crime, and I think that is the crux of this debate. Until effective measures are put in place to prevent crime, we will go on amending our laws to make them more severe and repressive. We must look at the whole picture. Of course, penal laws are necessary, but they cannot deal with the factors that lie at the root of crimes against persons and property.

Dealing with crime is not just a matter of sanctions but above all a matter of prevention and effective social reintegration.

In a study for the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament, Patricia Bégin writes that it is becoming increasingly obvious that the methods traditionally used to keep crime in check do not suffice to eliminate crime and the fear it inspires. There is growing support for the concept that considers the social and economic environment that leads to criminal behaviour and for implementing programs and social development measures aimed at eliminating situations that are conducive to crime.

In fact, the problem lies with the administration of justice and the application of the provisions of the Act. It seems that most violent crimes covered by the Young Offenders Act can be dealt with effectively under the existing legislation.

Everything is in place: the provisions and the means to apply them. But the persons in charge either refuse to use them or get bogged down in unacceptable backlogs.

In a story run by La Presse on June 8, 1994, Normand Bastien of the youth section at the Montreal community legal centre said that the long wait until sentencing is what really causes the problems. In Valleyfield, the average is 266 days, in Montreal, 180, in Joliette, 163. Another major contributor to the problem is that only 29 per cent of the cases are resolved.

Mr. Doob from the University of Toronto published a report called "Beyond the Red Book" following a workshop to identify amendments which should be made to the Young Offenders Act. In it he stated that there is no crisis among youth that would warrant fundamental or immediate changes to the Young Offenders Act. Amending the Young Offenders Act would probably have no significant effect on crime, he said.

Furthermore, he implied that if the federal and provincial governments really were serious about protecting the public, they would invest more in crime prevention and in public awareness of juvenile delinquency. According to him it is cheaper and more effective to prevent crime than to keep young offenders in custody.

Lastly, I would like to comment on the part of the bill on divulging information on young offenders. One of the underlying principles of the Young Offenders Act is that any information connecting a young offender to a crime is not to be divulged.

This reflects a desire to prevent an individual from being labelled as a habitual offender at an age when he does not possess adult judgement. Repeated breaches in confidentiality in respect of a young offender's record will make it more difficult for him to be rehabilitated and reintegrated into society.

In closing, I would like to point out that the former Quebec justice minister would have preferred the status quo and expressed concern and disappointment over Bill C–37. This reaction clearly shows that overlaps in the area of justice carry a high price, both administratively and in respect of the system's efficiency.

In fact, Ottawa is venturing into a dead end for Quebec, but Quebec will be responsible for administering the system. Once again, the recommendations made by Quebec and by the bar association have been wholly forgotten.

Recent statistics concerning average daily incarceration records for young offenders in 1992 appearing in the Statistics Canada publication Juristat indicate a rate of incarceration of 10.4 per 10,000 young persons in Quebec. This is much lower than the average Canadian rate of 21.3. At 32 per 10,000 young persons, Saskatchewan has the highest rate of incarceration. What do these disparities mean?

Similarly, in regard to cases heard before youth court ending in convictions, broken down by type of custody for 1992–93, the March 1994 issue of Juristat reports a total of 10,259 cases in Quebec with its population of nearly seven million, and 19,882 in Alberta with a population one sixth the size. What can account for such a great difference, almost twice as many as in Quebec?

As for cases before youth courts with guilty verdicts, broken down by province and territory, the January 1994 issue of Juristat reports a rate of 83.1 per cent in Quebec. In Yukon, the rate is 53 per cent, in Manitoba, 54 per cent and in Ontario, 61.2 per cent. Are these provinces too eager to go to trial? I think this issue merits further reflection before new amendments to the act are passed into law. We will vote against this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until tomorrow at 5.30 p.m. at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

FIREARMS ACT

The House resumed from February 16 consideration of the motion that Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak on Bill C–68. If only the people in the west could understand a little more French, they would hear the words of a Bloc member on a subject of considerable concern to them: the registration of firearms and other measures. This bill is extremely complex and has a lot of parts to it.

My first reaction, in examining the bill, was to say that I never want Quebec to become a Florida or a Texas. I am not talking about the weather, but rather the matter of carrying arms. I do not want us to do what they do in Florida or Texas, where people head out on a Saturday evening with a gun in their pocket and often end up having the misfortune of settling accounts with a gun or some other firearm.

This situation promotes violence. There is a good reason why statistics indicate a much higher rate of homicides and violent crime in the States than in Canada, even with the difference in population size. This, I feel, is one cultural difference that should be promoted in Quebec, perhaps in Canada as well. In my ideal society, with a sovereign Quebec, there will be fewer reasons for and causes of violence. I dream of a tolerant country, one that respects human values. I dream of a country where people can talk freely and democratically and where they will not need to use firearms to settle accounts.

For me, the point of supporting a sovereign Quebec, is to keep the difference, for various reasons. This is just one of many reasons, because there is a very big difference between the position taken by most Canadians and that taken by most Americans when it comes to firearms. But a similarity now seems to be arising between the two countries when we listen to the Reform Party. In their push for no restrictions on the right to carry firearms, they have advanced certain American arguments, such as the one whereby mandatory registration of firearms or limited access to them would be an attack on personal freedom. This is utter nonsense.

It is not at all difficult to understand the Americans' point of view. The right to carry firearms is part of their culture, as it were. The West was won with guns. Far more Americans carry guns than do Canadians and, if I am not mistaken, the use of firearms is a right in the States. In fact, I wonder if it is not enshrined in the American Constitution and if Americans will therefore be obliged to live with much wider access to firearms than is permitted here in Canada.

When the statistics on homicides and violence are compared for Canada and the United States, they are, not surprisingly, much higher for the United States.

In 1991, there were 753 homicides in Canada, compared with 24,000 in the United States. These statistics are mind–boggling. They moved the judicial committee of the American Senate to declare that the United States was the most violent and self–destructive nation in the world.

Being a reasonable person, I cannot rule out the fact that the very large number of firearms in the United States contributes, in some degree, to this difference, to this very high level of violence and murders in that country. When we see, for example, in Florida or elsewhere, people using rifles to shoot at drivers on the freeway, I would rather do everything in my power to build a country where people do not have to experience such extreme, absurd violence. I would rather encourage the development of a country where violence is being reduced. I know that it is no easy task. The bottom line is that we must create an environment where people feel safe and comfortable.

People who support the free movement of or access to weapons argue that pistols or rifles provide better protection against violence. This is a frequently used argument in the U.S., where the murder rate is extremely high. There are proportionally three times as many murders in the U.S. as in Canada. Again, I do not think that getting a weapon is a good way to protect oneself. On the contrary, I think that arming oneself is an incitement to violence. All human wisdom since the beginning of western civilization demonstrates that violence begets violence. All the evidence shows that those who arm themselves are getting ready for violence.

To reduce violence in society, it would be quite reasonable to try to restrict access to firearms. After all, what are firearms for, if not for killing? Firearms are designed to shoot and kill. Firearms are extremely dangerous weapons and their access should be restricted. It is normal and reasonable for a self–respecting country to want to reduce violence in society.

Of course, sportsmen who use weapons for hunting, farmers who use them to put down sick animals or for other reasons, all those with specific reasons to use firearms should have access to them. I am not arguing with that. But, in general, firearms should be abolished or access to them should be restricted at least. Handguns have no place in the cities. No one should have access to firearms without sound reasons.

The problem is that Bill C–68 does very little in that regard. It may be a step in the right direction, but it does not do what the public wanted it to do.

Surveys have been conducted on the registration and possession of firearms. They show clearly that more than 80 per cent of Canadians and 91 per cent of Quebecers wish that access to firearms were made more difficult, that it not be so easy to acquire firearms. They also wish that military assault weapons and handguns be banned and that stricter controls be imposed on the sale of firearms. That is what one public opinion poll after another has shown.

The vast majority of Canadians and Quebecers are against unrestricted access to firearms in Canada. Apparently, the government failed to represent this view in Bill C–68. We know that many interests are involved.

Besides the public at large, there are manufacturers, associations promoting the use of firearms, a number of individuals who are particularly fond of firearms, which they think are symbols of strength and power. These people seem to have a rather major influence on the government. While being in the minority, they have pressured the government into making this bill not as stringent as it could have been.

If the intent had been to come up with a serious, progressive, forward–looking bill aimed at looking after the interests of the majority, the bill would have had more teeth. I should add that Bill C–68 is not a bad piece of legislation. It contains some good provisions, while others are definitely bad.

However, it is an improvement over the current act. The intent of the bill is good. If it is felt that registering firearms will limit access to such weapons, assuming that is the underlying principle of the legislation, then it is a good thing. However, it remains to be seen whether this will indeed be the case.

This is an improvement over the old system which was absurd. In the past, anyone could buy a firearm. The buyer had to register the firearm, along with his name and address, in an inventory which was checked by the Quebec and Ontario provincial police, or by the RCMP elsewhere in the country. That was a summary verification to see if the names, addresses and serial numbers were properly indicated. However, if the register got lost or was destroyed by fire, that was it. No trace of its contents was left.

• (1310)

That registration process was really a joke. It was a mere formality which had little impact and which was useless in terms of monitoring who had access to firearms.

I should point out that, along with this very limited control over the sales of firearms, the current legislation also provides for the delivery of permits to carry and store guns. However, the existing law is essentially inadequate.

Bill C–68 contains some good and some not so good provisions. If I have time to do so, I would like to make a few suggestions to improve its content.

First of all, Bill C–68 proposes to establish a licensing system for persons wishing to possess firearms. In other words, it establishes a system for the registration of all firearms. Controls in this bill include a check to confirm the absence of public safety concerns before the transfer, transport, import or export of a firearm. It imposes restrictions on other dangerous articles such as cross–bows, certain knives and silencers. It revises the Criminal Code to impose stricter sentencing, and it includes a scheme for prohibiting, as a result of criminal conduct, a person from future possession of firearms.

I think we can say that this last restriction, which would prohibit access to firearms by criminals, is entirely acceptable and desirable.

I think that any legislation that prohibits a criminal from having access to a firearm is a boon to the general public.

As far as stricter sentencing is concerned, there might be a little more to say. There are certainly some positive aspects. I will not have enough time to discuss the firearms registration mechanism as such. I would have quite a few questions about the system for the registration and storage of information and whether the proposed system is better than what we have now. There would be a lot to say about this, but unfortunately my time is limited.

There are some very good points, and I am thinking, for instance, of the obligation to register all firearms. At least the police would have a way to enforce a court order prohibiting an aggressor from possessing firearms. In addition to criminals, this would also apply to the guy who beats his wife every Saturday night. He may not have a criminal record as a bank robber or murderer, but it seems to me he should not have a weapon, at least not a firearm, in his home. He should seek treatment if he beats his wife, of course, and at least, he should not have access to a firearm. So this bill would allow the police to prohibit certain people from possessing firearms—

Mr. Speaker, I see you are signalling that my time is almost up. I thought I had twenty minutes. Are you sure I have only one minute left? I thought I had five or ten minutes left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): If I may be of assistance, the hon. member started his speech at 12.55 p.m., almost twenty minutes ago.

• (1315)

Mr. Marchand: Thank you for that information, Mr. Speaker. I shall therefore conclude very quickly by saying that this bill contains both good and bad. In my opinion, this system will be expensive. Once again, registering weapons is not a bad thing, but in looking at this bill the following questions come to mind. Will it prevent someone from registering his weapon? Will it prevent someone from killing his neighbour if he so wishes? Will it prevent a young person from committing suicide with a gun? Will registration be truly beneficial for society in the long term? Will it reduce crime rates? I rather have my doubts, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the speech and I have heard remarks like violence begets violence, firearms are meant to kill, and access should be limited.

I do not know how much of the hon. member's speech related to the issue we are wrestling with in Bill C–68, that is bringing forward a bill that enhances the safety of our communities, homes and society.

If the member honestly believes the registration of rifles and shotguns will reduce the criminal use of these firearms, would he tell the House how that will do it?

Mr. Marchand: How will registering arms reduce the level of criminality? I do not believe it will necessarily. Bill C–68 has a great number of flaws. I really do not believe it will necessarily reduce criminality.

On the other hand registration is not such a bad thing. We register practically everything. Our cars are registered. We are registered when we are born. We are registered when we get married. Every important element and tool of one's life is registered. It is a normal fact of life. The problem is that not registering arms is abnormal. There is a certain abnormality in not registering arms particularly because arms are very dangerous tools. They are weapons.

Normally they are used to harm or kill people. I am not talking about sportsmen who hunt or farmers who use arms to protect themselves from predators. Those are very special cases. However there are other uses. I am talking about the Saturday night special, the AK–47 and other arms that are ascribed within the atmosphere of violence, protection, rights, liberty and so on. They should certainly be limited.

If registering arms could help reduce the number of arms circulating in Canada, that would be a positive step. I do not think it is harmful to anyone, even collectors who have arms or who love arms, to suggest that their arms should be registered.

As I say there are a lot of flaws in the bill, but there are positive points in the sense that the government is trying to go in the right direction.

• (1320)

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member commented that he was not sure whether or not registration would reduce crime in Canada. I would like to pose a proposition to him and possibly he might consider whether or not crime would be affected.

Statistics have shown that since 1974 some 16,000 firearms have been reported lost, missing or stolen. We can imagine how many guns are lost, missing or stolen that have not been reported. These guns are out of the control of the legal owner. They are now out there most probably in the hands of the criminal element in society.

Certainly we can imagine that the registration of firearms brings to bear a greater responsibility on the careful gun owner and should do something to ensure that gun owners take a greater level of care.

The member may also wish to know gun clubs are now reporting that many gun owners are getting rid of their guns. Many of them report that something like 60 per cent of gun owners have not fired a gun in the last year and some 40 per cent have not fired their firearms in the last five years.

In that regard, because fewer guns would be available to the criminal element, would the member not agree that registration of firearms would reduce crime in Canada?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the legitimate use of firearms for those people who have good reason such as sportsmen and farmers, to use two examples. However I have questions about whether registration would do anything to help reduce criminality.

I have a hypothetical example. If the system worked perfectly, in other words there was a control system somewhere in Ottawa where all firearms would be listed in a little computer and we would have a complete list of all firearms everywhere in the country, does the member think those people who have illegal projects in mind might be able to get their hands on that list and determine that Joe Schmoe living on such and such a street has an awful good collection of firearms? It would incite a certain number of people to go to Joe Schmoe's house and steal all his firearms. It is a way of possibly encouraging the illegal use of firearms. Registering the firearms does not necessarily have an effect on criminality.

There is another flaw in this law. If we register firearms it will not prevent Joe Schmoe from shooting his neighbour on a Saturday night. It is not because his firearm is registered that he will not kill his neighbour. It being a registered firearm will not prevent his son or daughter from killing himself or herself. It does not prevent anything at all.

However, if the minister had been conscientious and had gone the limit, he would have demanded from the moment a firearm was sold in Canada that it had a control mechanism, in other words one needed a key to be able to use it. It can be done. Technically we can control the use of firearms in the sense that a key would be needed to open it and use it. As long as it is locked, whether it is sitting on the back seat of the car or in the living room, it could not be used as readily. One would need the key to use the firearm. At least that measure would limit the misuse of firearms.

Many other suggestions could be made, but I do not believe registering firearms would necessarily have an effect on the reduction of criminality in Canada in spite of the fact that I think this measure is a step in the right direction. Despite the fact that the Bloc will suggest improvements for the proposed law we will probably support it.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to debate Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons. The debate before us is a complicated and highly emotional one for all those involved and implicated in the bill.

Aboriginal people, for instance, are worried about the potential infringement on their treaty rights. Shooters are concerned with the restrictions placed on their sport and outfitters are worried about the impact the legislation will have on their business. These are all serious concerns which if not addressed could pose some serious hardships in the north and of course in other parts of Canada.

The potential infringement the legislation could have on treaty rights and its impact on traditional aboriginal way of life are threats that aboriginal people have sought to prevent since the signing of their treaties. Treaties were signed to ensure the protection of aboriginal rights that were then entrenched in the Constitution under section 35 of the charter.

As treaty rights go or as rights go in aboriginal country, rights are considered and treated as absolute but in the reality of the political world and in the name of concessions, compromise and goodwill we are looking at some half–measures.

According to the Sparrow decision of 1990 hunting and fishing rights have been recognized by the Canadian government. It would appear to be damaging to the fragile relationship being forged between the aboriginal people and the Government of Canada if the bill infringed on these rights.

This is the concern being expressed. However I have assurances that the legislation will not infringe on these rights. Special considerations have been given to sustenance hunters and in particular aboriginal hunters who make up a large portion of all sustenance hunters.

Let me, for instance, express the concern brought forward by Mr. Sam Gargan, member of the Legislative Assembly for the Northwest Territories for Deh Cho, who said:

> I have an uncle who cannot read or write. He cannot tell you what muzzle velocity means. He cannot tell you how calibres are determined. He can however tell you that you need a .303 to shoot a moose, that it is best to use a shotgun to shoot ducks, that a .22 is the best for rabbits and upland birds. He can tell you not to carry a loaded gun with a live round in the chamber. He can tell you how to safely transport a gun in a truck or a boat.

The same would apply to a skidoo. He continued:

> Gun ownership is not rocket science. It is a matter of common sense. In the NWT the vast majority of gun owners have been taught gun safety at a very young age and I sincerely believe that any program on gun safety to be offered in the NWT has to be changed to fit the realities of the situation both fiscally and morally.

Mr. Gargan went on to say:

> I also believe that the legislation, as it now stands, violates treaty rights as guaranteed in the Charter of Rights and may well be in contradiction of the Sparrow decision—To this end I can virtually assure you that should this legislation proceed as written, there would be a court challenge from Canada's aboriginal community.

These are the words of a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories, the majority of whose constituents are aboriginal.

In the north the aboriginal people hunt to eat, not to harm other people. Many northern people living in isolated or remote communities cannot afford the inflated northern prices of meat. We cannot just go out and order half a side of beef at southern prices. The cost of living is 40 per cent higher.

Today in southern stores such as Loeb a kilogram of ground beef costs $3.95.

The same kilogram of beef in Deline in a community is $6.80. This makes hunting and owning a rifle not only a right but an economic reality. Hunting in an aboriginal community is also a community event. Food that is caught or that is hunted is shared with everyone. Hunters donate food to those who are unable to hunt for themselves such as elders and widowers and people who are disabled. Without firearms many in the north could not afford to eat.

My experience with firearms has been since I was a child, since as long as I can remember. In my family we learned gun safety. It was absolutely paramount. The camp where my parents go on an annual basis is in grizzly bear country. In grizzly bear country you do not just have a .22 rifle. You must have a high powered rifle. I must say if you are going to have a key mechanism to use, please do not do it when you are in grizzly bear country if you want to live to see another day.

The realities are very different around this country and I understand the intent of this bill. I understand the complexity. I understand the difficulty the minister has had to deal with this bill across the country.

I cannot imagine having the fortitude to go out there to meet the masses on such a complicated and emotional bill. I would like to say that I admire this man for having done that. However, the debate rolls on and the bill has gone to committee. The bill is being debated today. There are a number of special things that will happen.

My hon. colleague across the way from the Bloc Quebecois indicated that most times the use of firearms is intended to hurt or kill another person. That has not been my experience. It has allowed us to live. It has allowed us to overcome difficulties.

During the war, during the depression and during recessions in Canada our people were able to survive because we have instruments that allow us to exercise the right to be able to fend for and feed our people. Those instruments in most cases in modern terms are not bow and arrows. They are firearms. That is one of the instruments we use to exercise that right.

The Minister of Justice in his commitment not to impact treaty rights has struck a team of officials who will travel and meet with aboriginal groups across Canada to discuss how this bill can be implemented without negatively impacting treaty rights and the traditional way of life.

These consultations have been directly mandated in this legislation. Section 110 allows for the governor in council to make regulations on aboriginal people and to adapt the regulations for the purposes of that application.

Michell Adkins, a Haida lawyer, was recently hired by the Department of Justice to consult with aboriginal people. Along with other departmental officials, she will be travelling to communities to explain the legislation, to listen to their concerns and make recommendations to the minister on how to amend this legislation with respect to treaties and traditional life.

There are many issues that need to be addressed in the consultations. The Minister of Justice has suggested the necessity of finding a better definition of sustenance hunter to reflect the aboriginal way of life.

He is also committed from what I am being informed by departmental officials to decentralize the role of the firearms officer and provide community control of the implementation of this new firearm strategy, ensuring aboriginal participation.

I would like to encourage all of the First Nations, Metis and Inuit people to take full advantage of these consultations to ensure that the registration of firearms can be done in full consideration of their treaty rights, especially with respect to Sparrow and section 35 of the charter.

Some of the issues which have already been brought to the minister's attention will be addressed and among the consultations is the cost of registration. Currently under Bill C–68 there will not be a charge for sustenance hunters to obtain a firearms licence. However, there are no clear guidelines on how fees will be applied in registering firearms and the transferring of ownership of guns.

Through consultations with First Nations, Metis and Inuit, it is my hope that an amendment can be made to eliminate the cost of transferring and registration of firearms by sustenance hunters, as these costs would be an economic hardship on people who cannot afford to buy their food and use their firearms as a tool to feed themselves and their communities.

It is felt that it would be an additional economic hardship in a community that already has quite a large group of unemployed people who rely on other sources to continue living and surviving.

Borrowing and lending firearms is another very important issue for the northern and aboriginal communities across this country. Under Bill C–68 there is the provision for lending a firearm as long as the person involved lends the borrower the registration certificate for the firearm. Through consultations it is hoped that alternatives to this option can be sought. In many communities firearms are seen as a collective instrument for hunting passed on to those who need them.

Hunting rifles are commonly loaned to relatives and friends in aboriginal communities on a regular basis. Through consultation I hope that the registration program will be flexible enough to allow this practice to continue without undue and unnecessary hardship.

We understand that in the context of harvesting and hunting it is very difficult in isolated and remote communities to acquire registration and firearms acquisition certificates. When you are in a boat and you see a caribou it is very difficult to resist the opportunity to get the kill for the community or for the family, relatives or the elders. There is a general lending of firearms. It is a very big issue in the communities in terms of their traditional harvesting and hunting rights.

The transfer of ownership is another area which is of much concern. The gift of a firearm is very common in the north. Under Bill C–68 a gift of firearms can only be given once all the necessary papers are filled out and both the recipient and the donor have licences and neither one is a safety risk. Again, through detailed consultations provisions should be made to reflect the culture of First Nations, Metis and Inuit where the gift of a firearm is considered a great honour, especially when given to a youth for his or her first hunt. It is an honour and it is something that is protected, keeping in mind all the issues about safety that go along with the responsibility of owning that gun. It also entails using it safely and bearing in mind the safety of others.

On penal sanctions for people who accidentally find themselves on the other side of the law, through consultation I hope that alternatives can also be found to some of the penal sanctions for offenders who have committed an offence out of ignorance. Summary convictions are available in Bill C–68 to first time offenders which would not require that a person develop a criminal record on a first time offence.

I am also encouraged by the partial prohibition provision in this legislation. A sustenance hunter who has been charged with an offence involving a firearm may apply to a competent authority to allow for the hunter to use his or her firearms for sustenance as long as the hunter returned it to the authority, which could be the chief on returning from hunting. A great deal of trust and a great deal of respect would have to be in place and a great sense of responsibility under those conditions.

Another aspect is the purchase of ammunition. I am amazed that I have not run out of time yet because this a very emotional, very complicated and a very important matter. I do not think I can undersell the importance of this legislation to people across this country, not just in my own riding but in other parts of the provinces and territories.

In many communities those who cannot hunt will provide ammunition to hunters as a gift in hope of meat and other kinds of game when the hunters return. That is a common occurrence. I hope through consultation with aboriginal groups an amendment can be entertained allowing aboriginal people to purchase ammunition when they do not have a licence to give as a gift.

It is not uncommon for a senior citizen on pension who cannot go hunting, who does not have a skidoo, who does not have the physical stamina to go on the hunt anymore, to give to a younger person the gift of ammunition for the sake of a hunt. It is very reasonable and it is good economics for the people in the community.

These are only some of the concerns about how Bill C–68 would impact the aboriginal way of life. I am encouraged by the minister that these and other concerns will be dealt with through consultations with aboriginal people.

Northerners have also brought several questions to my attention which have either been addressed in Bill C–68 or the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has been mandated to review. I would also like to outline their concerns here.

First of all, there is always the question about why the government is attacking law–abiding gun owners. Many legal owners feel that the government is attacking law–abiding gun owners with this new legislation. However, Bill C–68 creates a new act for firearms. This new statute, the Firearms Act, removes legal gun owners from the Criminal Code. This consideration to gun owners demonstrates the government's intention not to treat legal gun owners as criminals. This new act will create a licensing system for the ownership and use of firearms and a national registration system for all firearms. As I mentioned before, special provisions have been made for first time offenders who have not used a non–registered firearm in a criminal offence.

The next concern is equipment outlawed from the Canadian Olympic shooting team. Others have asked why equipment used by the Canadian Olympic shooting team has been prohibited. The minister has acknowledged that amendments or exceptions should be made for certain handguns in the prohibited class which are used and recognized in target shooting competitions. The minister has specifically requested that the standing committee on justice deliberate on possible solutions to this current problem.

Restriction to non–residents is another major one. There are many hunting, outfitting and tourist businesses in the north and other parts of Canada that depend on hunters from other countries for their business. They have voiced several concerns that Bill C–68 will impose further restrictions on the entry of those foreign hunters and are concerned that they will choose to go to another country to hunt where the laws are not so restricting.

I have reviewed the requirements of the entry of any foreign hunter into Canada and I do not see a problem as such. A person coming from another country must declare their firearm at customs. They will be required to complete a temporary firearms licence and a registration certificate to bring the firearm into Canada.

A customs firearm declaration will act as a 60–day licence and certificate and will be validated at the border. The Minister of Justice and his departmental officials assure me that these forms will be as simple as possible. These declarations will be readily available to visitors through Canadian tourism offices abroad, outfitters, shooting clubs and hunting organizations. There will be opportunities for non–residents to apply in advance to speed up the process at the border.

In the case of sporting clubs, as has always been the case the requirements can be met before crossing the border through Canadian clubs and associations. An authorization to transport will be issued at the same time. Should a hunter lose his ammunition he will be able to present his customs firearms declaration which will act as a temporary license, enabling the hunter to purchase ammunition.

I suppose I could go on but I must be close to being out of time. Within two minutes I will attempt to deal with this really important issue.

I am going to deal with people's concern about prohibited antique gun collection. A common question is how to pass on or sell an antique gun collection. Individuals who now have a grandfathered firearm which falls into a specific prohibited category will be able to buy from and sell to individuals with firearms in the same category.

• (1345)

Also, the minister has asked the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to deliberate on the special significance possession of firearms as relics or heirlooms may have on a family and what opportunities there will be for owners to leave such firearms to their children as part of their estate.

In conclusion, I would like to take the opportunity to thank the numerous members of shooting clubs, such as Barry Taylor from my riding, who have devoted thousands of hours to teaching firearms safety. Their work in the north ensures the safe handling of many guns.

I would also like to thank all of those people who have brought their concerns on gun control to my attention. We have the minister's assurance that there will be special efforts to look at these concerns. I encourage all aboriginal people and northern people to participate in the consultations to ensure the protection of their rights. It is my hope that through these consultations a mutual respect and understanding can be forged between the consultation team and aboriginal people.

I also encourage all northerners to participate in the deliberation of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and to write to the chair of the committee, the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, or myself with their opinions on how to improve the current piece of legislation.

I would like to thank the House and you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me an opportunity to speak to the very special, emotional and complicated matter of Bill C–68.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the hon. member's speech on Bill C–68. I share some of her concerns about northerners, how they will react to increased regulation, universal registration, and in particular her comments on how aboriginal hunters will view the added regulations and restrictions being placed upon them.

My question for the hon. member deals with Bill C–34, the Yukon self–government bill, which was passed in this House last June. It was my understanding that Bill C–34 gave control and prohibition over firearms and explosive devices to the new levels of native governments in the Yukon.

Has the hon. member researched that at all? If so, does it mean they are in effect exempt from the new regulations in Bill C–68 once it is passed? If they are exempt because of the clauses in Bill C–34 which give control over firearms to the native governments, does she feel it right that some Canadian citizens should be exempt from Canada's laws based strictly on race?

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, the unique legal and constitutional rights of aboriginal people have nothing to do with race. They have to do with a legally and constitutionally binding arrangement between the Government of Canada and those said peoples.

As for the Yukon legislation, I am not a lawyer nor am I a self–government specialist. I have raised a number of issues today regarding rights and I do not think they have anything to do with any kind of racial overtones. They have to do very specifically with the traditional way of life which has been exercised and practised for hundreds of years. Perhaps the instruments to exercise those rights have changed. In contemporary terms we are talking about firearms.

I resent what the hon. member across the way is alleging. He is insinuating that aboriginal people have something which is exempt, unique and special and which nobody else can have. That is not the case. It is unique to aboriginal populations.

I am aware of the position the Council of Yukon Indians has taken and it can speak best for itself. I cannot speak for the aboriginal people of the Yukon, except that I know they have a grave concern. They will have the opportunity to speak to Michell Adkins and also present their concerns to the standing committee. They can adequately speak to that. I would probably under–represent their views.

• (1350)

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, many of the concerns expressed by the hon. member apply not only to aboriginal people but to rural people in general.

For example, she spoke of that first rifle. One of the proudest days of my life was my 11th birthday when I received my first firearm. Like the hon. member I was a sustenance hunter for a period of time. We were hard up. We ate the meat we killed.

These laws that are going to come in will be just as restrictive, just as oppressive on non–native rural people as they will be on the people who live for example in the Northwest Territories. I would hope that rather than taking up the cudgels against the rest of us who oppose this bill that she would join with us on behalf of the people of the north, on behalf of aboriginal people and realize that we are all in this together. We are all facing unreasonable restrictions in legislation here. It is not just the natives.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the same offer to the members of the Reform Party. Instead of just beating their breasts about their own rights and how hard done by they are, perhaps they would take up the issue of aboriginal rights and for a change support aboriginal people on the question of their rights which they know are legitimate and legally and constitutionally binding.

I make this offer because since I have been in this House I have never on any occasion, not on land claims, on services for aboriginal people, on programs for aboriginal people and never on self–government have I heard an expression of support for aboriginal people by that group. I am making them the offer to come and support the aboriginal people as well.

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. secretary of state on her eloquent representation of her people. I have two native reserves in my riding of Bruce—Grey, the Saugeen and Cape Croker. The member quite eloquently represented the position they find themselves in.

As a rural member I must also speak on behalf of the hunters, trappers, farmers and other rural people whose lives are different from most people. They have needs. In this case they are a minority. If we took a poll perhaps the majority of people would be against guns, but rural people have a different orientation, a different history, a real need. This bill in its current state could constitute some hardships for them.

I must compliment the minister on the smuggling penalties and the penalties for the use of a firearm in the commission of a crime. I hope that somehow the concerns of rural people can be accommodated in this bill.

Does the hon. member not feel that rural people do have similar needs to aboriginal people, particularly in ridings such as Bruce—Grey?

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I never disallowed the fact that members opposite or my hon. colleague here have legitimate concerns on behalf of their rural constituents or those people who hunt for sustenance and are non–aboriginal. I never disallowed that fact.

When I speak, the perspective I am speaking from is one I am very familiar and intimate with. It is one that I know inside out. I know the living situation, the personal experiences and human struggles of these people. I want to speak from that experience. I cannot speak as well for other groups. I can go out there to represent them if they ask me.

These are very specific issues, specific to a number of northern constituents. It could be northern provinces. It could be aboriginal people across the country. I can speak most expertly about what I know. That is the perspective I am speaking from, not to the prejudice of other groups.

• (1355)

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member spoke quite eloquently about hope for change in this legislation. I too hope for change in this legislation, but I listened to the justice minister make a very specific comment when he presented this legislation. That comment was that the consultation was literally over.

Does the member know something that I do not about the consultation process? Is it wide open? Are we in fact subject to significant change in this legislation? I would be very interested in knowing that.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member would not be so suspicious and so cynical. It does not help the whole issue of national unity or anything else for that matter.

The hon. member knows, as all members know, that there is a standing committee. The chairman is sitting in this House today as he well can see. Also, Michell Adkins and a group of officials are travelling across the country. Perhaps the members of the Reform Party will take it upon themselves to ensure that the groups in their ridings have access to both the standing committee as well as to the special group of officials travelling across the country.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member has raised a couple of interesting points that I would like to address very briefly.

First, there are two groups of aboriginal people in my constituency and I work very closely with them. My most recent meeting with the chief was on Thursday night. I object to the innuendo that we are not working with these people and that we do not treat them as equals. I take exception to that.

In terms of consultations, I do have a letter from the minister in response to my request to come to my riding for further consultation. Thousands of people would have attended. Of course I was turned down because the consultations are over.

Also you mention in your speech about rights—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member was referring to me but I did not make the speech. He must refer to the Chair. My colleagues, I am going to give the hon. member for Red Deer the floor right after question period. However, it being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSIONS

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, scientists have predicted that global temperatures could increase 1.5 to 4.5 degrees Celsius over the next century. The cause is greenhouse gases from human activities and in particular, increasing concentrations of carbon dioxide. Greenhouse gases produce shifts in climate, in forest growth and agricultural patterns.

Led by Alberta, Canada is among the highest per capita producer of carbon dioxide emissions. Yet ignoring the large problems coastal provinces would face because of rising sea levels and the further disruption of fisheries, the province of Alberta is adamantly opposed to comprehensive carbon dioxide reductions.

The federal government repeatedly asked the provinces to co–operate and introduce mandatory carbon dioxide reductions. So far however, Alberta's inflexible position makes any meaningful reduction impossible and weakens our international reputation.

FRENCH–LANGUAGE SCHOOL BOARDS

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, instead of announcing the creation of homogeneous French–language school boards in Ontario, the provincial education minister once again chose to put off that decision. In fact, he created a committee mandated to rationalize the governance of education in Ontario. This committee is to deliver its report next December, that is after the Ontario provincial elections. Moreover, this committee with a majority of anglophones has been made responsible for the future of French–language school boards.

Instead of taking action, Ontario goes on violating the Canadian Charter, which it signed of course, a charter which grants francophones the right to manage their schools.

Instead of taking action, Ontario is letting the situation deteriorate; consider the 31 per cent illiteracy rate and 38 per cent rate of assimilation among Franco–Ontarians.

During the next referendum, Quebecers will remember that those who speak about a renewed federalism are merely playing with smoke and mirrors.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, government officials, whether municipal, provincial or federal, are elected to represent their constituents. Both the Parti Quebecois and Bloc Quebecois do not seem to agree with this. Their idea of a referendum is not to find out what the people of Quebec want but rather how to force them into accepting separation.

Now the PQ and BQ want to water down the question so the issue remains unsettled. This presents a problem for all Canadians, including those in Quebec. Uncertainty is causing interest rates to rise, the dollar to fall and international credit to be re–examined. It is also likely to be partly responsible for the Liberal's failure to properly deal with the deficit for fear of upsetting Quebec.

If the Parti Quebecois does not call the referendum with a clear question on separation within its own 1995 timetable, I call on the Prime Minister to hold a federal referendum in Quebec to settle this issue by year's end. This uncertainty must not continue.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Minister of Justice for his speed in tabling a bill on the subject of intoxication as a defence.

All Canadians were outraged last autumn when a man convicted of rape had his conviction overturned by the Supreme Court on the grounds of extreme drunkenness. Many residents of my riding were concerned that this decision would be seen by some as a licence to commit offences while under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

Allowing individuals to justify their acts of violence by blaming intoxication will hamper efforts to end violence in our society and cause further victimization.

I am sure that all members of the House will join me in supporting the efforts of the Minister of Justice to eliminate this loophole in the criminal justice system.

REFERENDUM DEBATE

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint–Paul, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on March 31, 1993, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois declared in La Presse that all those who live in Quebec are Quebecers.

The fine words of the leader of the official opposition do not seem to have been heard by his peers, since, in recent weeks, racist remarks by Quebec separatists have been on the increase.

This weekend, Pierre Bourgault accused anglophones in Quebec of wanting to exercise a blatantly racist vote, while the Bloc Quebecois member for Louis–Hébert wanted ethnocultural communities to withdraw from the referendum debate and let old stock Quebecers decide the province's future.

These statements are unacceptable in a democratic society such as ours, and we invite all Quebecers to refuse to participate in a sovereignty debate that is based on intolerance and racism.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as many know, Northern Ireland is moving forward in pursuit of peace.

In the past few months, Irish and British officials have been negotiating a framework that will ultimately make the tyranny of violence in Ulster a thing of the past. Many Canadians, particularly those of Irish descent, wish the people of Northern Ireland well in this crucial transition period.

Years ago when my ancestors left that beautiful country, like all immigrants to Canada they also left behind the ancestral feuds for a more peaceful new world.

We all hope that we can soon see an emerald isle where the peace and tranquillity of the people reflect the beauty of the landscape.

MICHEL BÉLANGER

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Clearly, Mr. Speaker, there are two Michel Bélangers.

There is one Michel Bélanger, a true statesman, a man of imposing presence and influence, who can inspire in Quebecers a healthy confidence in themselves.

At the time he co–chaired the commission on the political and constitutional future of Quebec he was impervious to the exaggerations and arguments of fear still being brandished by a few federalists who lacked the fine words of terror that were the specialty of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Then there is the other Michel Bélanger. A man who heads the NO camp, whose imposing presence is withering away inside the ideological straitjacket put on him by the federalists. These days, Michel Bélanger has become the bogeyman.

This man, who had raised the debate on the national issue to the level of pragmatism and a people's belief in itself, has been reduced to visiting homes for the aged and telling the people there that a sovereign Quebec could no longer afford to pay their pensions.

This shows how little argument the man has left.

PENSIONS

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government has just introduced amendments to the MPs' pension plan but in reality has just changed troughs and given it a new look.

• (1405)

This new plan is still much more lucrative than what a person in the private sector would receive. Basically it is nothing more than smoke and mirrors.

The new package is still fully indexed to inflation, something 78 per cent of the public does not enjoy. The accrual rate is twice the amount allowed for under the Income Tax Act and is therefore illegal.

How can the government in good conscience ask overtaxed Canadians to tighten their belts while doing exactly the opposite itself?

I ask every MP in the House to join hands with the rest of Canada and make a sacrifice by opting out of this hideous MP pension plan which still says to Canadians: "We will line our pockets and tough luck to you". I also applaud every MP who is opting out, especially my colleagues in the Reform Party.

When the budget is tabled later today, Canadians will not forget that less than a week ago it was the government that chose above all else to take care of its own.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it has become apparent that this Liberal government is trying hard to stifle discussion of its gun control legislation.

The interest in, and demand for, copies of Bill C–68 is overwhelming. Initially the Minister of Justice limited MPs to just 15 copies. If that was not bad enough, we now find that the chief government whip has further ordered the House distribution centre to limit that number to five copies per member. Five copies among 75,000 or 100,000 citizens is hardly the open and honest government of the Liberal red book.

Canadians are being denied their most basic democratic right; the right to understand and discuss the laws of the land.

The last time such anti–democratic action was taken by a federal government was by the Conservative government of Brian Mulroney. The legislation—you guessed it—was gun control, Bill C–17.

I want to congratulate the Saskatchewan Association of Responsible Firearms Owners that has been making copies of this legislation available for $5 each. Surely important issues deserve open and informed debate. Surely Canadians are entitled to access proposed legislation that affects them. Why does the Liberal government want to deprive Canadians?

ONTARIO SPECIAL OLYMPICS

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this last weekend Kitchener–Waterloo hosted the 1995 winter games, the Ontario Special Olympics.

The Ontario Special Olympics are part of a worldwide charitable organization that helps meet the need for sport training and competition among 300,000 children and adults who are developmentally challenged. Two hundred and ninety–five athletes competed and they were true to their Special Olympic oath: "Let me win, but if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt".

Generous donations in excess of $156,000 and the efforts of over 700 volunteers helped to make this year's winter games a great success.

This spirit of compassion, caring and sharing was demonstrated by my community and exemplified by the 107 members of the Westvale Public School choir that sang: "Keep the Spirit Alive". This song was written especially for the opening ceremonies by their teacher Lorna Beam.

The very special athletes of the Ontario Special Olympics rose to the challenge and exemplified to all Canadians how to keep the spirit alive.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I recently attended an anti–tax rally in my riding where 2,000 people told the government they do not want tax increases in the budget.

Canadians have a right to be heard and the Minister of Finance has made it possible through an open and full budgetary process.

It is wrong however when the Reform Party, in concert with top officials in organizations such as the Canadian Taxpayers' Federation, tries to pass itself off as leading the anti–tax message in Canada.

The CTF and provincial counterparts such as the Ontario and Alberta Taxpayers' Federations are staging anti–tax rallies across the country. Unfortunately that is not the only thing they are staging.

The CTF states it is independent of all political affiliation, yet Mr. Andrew Crooks, member of the CTF board of directors and head of the Alberta Tax Federation ran for the Reform Party nomination in Calgary and contributed $3,000 to the Reform Party in 1993. Mr. Paul Pagnuelo, executive director of the Ontario Taxpayers' Federation also sought the Reform Party nomination in the riding of Durham.

Canadians have legitimate concerns about the budget and they want to see these concerns taken into consideration. However, they do not want to be taken in by these people who are trying to further their political ambitions.

REFERENDUM DEBATE

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all of the linguistic and cultural communities in Quebec, I would like to condemn the racist and intolerant comments made by the Bloc member for Louis–Hébert. He believes that ethnic communities should keep their noses out of the referendum debate and let Quebecers of old stock make the decision on our future.

He admitted to journalists that he deliberately used the expression "Quebecers of old stock" because he believes that anglophones and allophones have always systematically voted for the Liberal Party and that it is a given that they will vote against sovereignty.

● (1410)

If the only ones in this House allowed to vote were the hon. members of old stock, then the hon. member for Louis–Hébert would have to refuse this right to many among us, including the Bloc member for Bourassa, who is from one of Quebec's cultural communities.

The Bloc member's comments are a real embarrassment, and I invite all members of this House to openly condemn such words of hate.

DEFENCE SPENDING

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a study published by an employee of the Department of National Defence found that Quebec is getting literally gypped out of $650 million per year in regional allotment of defence spending.

It is simply scandalous to see that, over the past 15 years, Quebec has received 27 per cent less than its fair share of defence spending. To add insult to injury, the study confirmed that francophones are under–represented in the higher ranks of the army. For example, there is only one francophone lieutenant–general out of nine and three majors–general out of 31. There has been no change on this front for at least 10 years.

This sheds some light on the government's decision to close the only francophone military college. We are tired of seeing that, year in, year out, Quebecers have remained so poorly served by the federal system in Canada.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister has said repeatedly that he will make the taxation system fairer by increasing taxes on the rich. Here is a Canadian tale that contradicts him.

Two students did equally well in high school. One went to work at age 18. He had a good time, attended the rallies of the peace generation and spent all he earned. The other went to university and graduate school, worked during the summer, lived frugally and invested wisely. He held his first full time job as a professional at age 28.

Both men are now 50. The first makes $30,000 and pays 14 per cent of it as income tax. The second makes over $51,000. He belongs to the top 10 per cent of Canadians who pay 50 per cent of all income taxes.

This so–called rich person insists that fairness requires he pay less income taxes, not more as the minister suggests. I agree.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this past Saturday a tragic accident occurred over the Margaree River in Nova Scotia when a coast guard helicopter carrying four people crashed. The helicopter was returning home after completing a fisheries patrol along the river.

Transport Canada pilot Stephen Hemphill of Dartmouth was killed in that crash. His daughter Lindsay was injured, as were Wes Barrington and Adrian Tousenard, observers with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Hemphill was an experienced pilot and was one of the first North Americans to fly over the north pole during the 1994 Louis St. Laurent mission. In addition to his outstanding service to Canada, he devoted much of his time to helping others. He received a Medal of Bravery from the Queen in 1979 after he rescued three young boys at sea. He was very active in the community for many years with the Dartmouth Crusaders swim team and coaching minor baseball.

I would ask that the House join with me in offering our deepest sympathies to Mr. Hemphill's wife and two children and our best wishes for a speedy recovery to those others injured in the crash.

BREAST CANCER

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a Canadian woman has a one in nine chance of getting breast cancer in her lifetime.

In fact, Canada has one of the highest rates of breast cancer in the world. Each year 16,000 women are diagnosed with breast cancer and tragically over 5,000 die each year from this disease.

In November 1993 Health Canada, in conjunction with a number of organizations, hosted a national forum on breast cancer. One of the principal recommendations was that we must develop a new sense of urgency to deal with this disease.

Specifically they recommended the need for improved research funding, coupled with a need to provide women with better access to information, effective screening and treatment programs.

We can and must do more to address this urgent and pressing need. Breast cancer can and must be beaten for the benefit of all Canadians.

VISION AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my regards to the Canadian Association of Optometrists on the occasion of Vision Awareness Week, March 5 to 11.

For the second year in a row the CAO is focusing on its theme of vision connection to literacy. Although good vision is an essential building block for acquiring good reading skills, the linkage has not as yet been made prominent. For example, one in six children has a vision problem which makes it difficult to learn and read.

Through the events organized this week through the CAO Canadians will come to see that the attainment of full literacy skills depends not only on proper instruction but on good eyesight as well. A study has shown that 75 per cent of adults with low literacy skills also have vision problems.

On behalf of the residents of Lambton—Middlesex, I wish the Canadian Association of Optometrists every success.

PEACEKEEPERS IN FORMER YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to a spokesperson for the White House, President Clinton plans to send American soldiers to Croatia and Bosnia to protect UN peacekeepers during their withdrawal, if they are to withdraw, now that the president of Croatia has refused to extend the peacekeeping mission after March 31.

Could the Prime Minister tell us whether, when the U.S. president was in Ottawa, he discussed with the president the plan to send massive numbers of American troops to allow the withdrawal of UN peacekeepers from Bosnia and Croatia?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, we did discuss this problem, because I think NATO has an obligation to ensure that troops now on duty as peacekeepers in Croatia and Bosnia are able to return safe and sound. The Americans have already made a commitment to ensure secure withdrawal, and we hope they will, if Croatia asks UNPROFOR troops to withdraw from Croatian territory and such measures are necessary.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the Prime Minister intends to put pressure on the Croatian president and persuade him to reconsider his present position which, as the Prime Minister himself indicated, is to demand the withdrawal of UN peacekeepers from Croatia, once the deadline has expired?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is the option Canada has chosen, and we said so two weeks ago when a delegation of parliamentarians from Croatia came to Canada. I had the pleasure of meeting them, and I told them clearly I thought it was a mistake to ask the troops to withdraw at this point, because the risk of war was imminent once UN soldiers had left.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister for clarifying his position on continuing the peace mission in Croatia.

As far as Bosnia is concerned, I would like to ask him whether he would agree that in this case as well, the mission of Canadian peacekeepers should be extended as well beyond March 31, since a withdrawal of UN peacekeepers at this time will merely allow the conflict to escalate, while the civilian population and refugees will be totally deprived of humanitarian aid?

[English]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there will be a decision made about the continuation of the presence of our troops in Bosnia and Croatia. We have to make a decision this month and we will make it known to the House of Commons very soon.

We are of the view that it would be an error for the Croats to ask for the withdrawl of UN troops to get out of that situation but they have explained to us that they are afraid the presence of UN soldiers will create a de facto division of Croatia. They are afraid it might be another Cyprus. That seems to be their political reason to move. The danger is that if troops are out of Croatia by the end of the month there will be a direct confrontation with the Serbs which we think will cause a lot of deaths.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a study conducted by a National Defence researcher shows that Quebec and Western Canada are largely disadvantaged in the distribution of defence expenditures. In Quebec in particular, the shortfall is at least $650 million per year.

How can the minister of defence explain that, with only 3 per cent of the population of Canada, Nova Scotia alone has more military personnel and as many civilian employees as Quebec, which is eight times bigger?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, military installations were not built as part of some kind of infrastructure program to benefit various regions of the country. They were built to serve the real needs of the Canadian Armed Forces in two world wars. Since we fought two wars in Europe and since most of the troops left by ship it is natural that there would be a big military presence by virtue of the navy headquarters being in Halifax.

With respect to Quebec, obviously if the port closest to Europe is Halifax troops would not be dispatched from Montreal or somewhere else farther inland.

However, I should point out that later this year we will be opening the naval reserve headquarters in Quebec City. We have been opening a number of small naval operations along the St. Lawrence River and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence so that Quebec does have a naval presence.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, all excuses are good to justify inequity. The strategic position of Ontario, for example, is completely different from that of Nova Scotia; yet, Ontario receives its fair share of military investments.

Does the minister of defence not think that it would have been wise to go along with the proposal made by the official opposition last year and keep the military college in Saint–Jean open, in order to help correct the unfair treatment of Quebec with respect to the Canadian Forces?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been through this argument a number of times before.

We felt that with the declining numbers of the armed forces we only needed one military college in Canada, located at Kingston.

This government is very eager that Royal Roads in B.C. and St–Jean in Quebec, those military colleges, have their facilities used for the ongoing betterment of the citizens in the region. It is for that reason that my colleague, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, negotiated a very successful agreement with the local people in the St–Jean region over the objections of the Bloc Quebecois and the government in Quebec City.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today, budget day, represents a test of character for the government. Today we would like to find out if this government has the courage to reduce spending and the courage to hold the line on tax increases. More important, we will find out whether it has the courage to lead by example.

If the budget contains significant spending cuts it is obvious to Canadians that the first of these must be made at the top with respect to MPs' pensions.

My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Which members of the cabinet will be setting the example of spending cuts at the top by opting out of the obscene MPs' pension plan?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been made quite clear that when the pension bill is approved by this Parliament there will be 60 days that members will have to consider that, including hon. colleagues in the third party.

When it comes to showing leadership we have cut taxpayer contribution to this pension plan by fully one–third, $3.3 million, and we are showing leadership in expenditure reduction.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the test of the courage of these remarks is not whether they make sense in this House but whether they will make sense in the constituencies.

The Canada pension plan, according to the government's own report, will be wiped out in 20 years unless there are significant increases in contributions. While Canadians' pensions are being put at risk the financial security of senior ministers and MPs is assured by this pension plan—business as usual at the MP pension trough.

How can the minister stand here today knowing that many ordinary Canadians are in danger of getting no Canada pension at all and still defend pension provisions for senior ministers like the Deputy Prime Minister who will be collecting millions in retirement?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I think was pointed out in the consultant's report that was tabled last year at the Lapointe commission, when it comes to compensation levels overall, and it must be looked at in this context, members of Parliament are lower than the equivalent in the private sector.

• (1425)

This particular reduction in MP pensions will make them even further down the scale in terms of that comparison. On top of that, members of Parliament contribute twice as much to the pension plan in many cases as private sector plans.

The hon. member still has his RRSPs and his clothing allowance, all of which he can—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, to date at least 48 of the 52 Reform MPs in this House have confirmed they will opt out of the MP pension plan.

If the minister cannot tell the House which ministers will be opting out can he at least give us an idea of the number of members of the Liberal caucus who will be opting out of this pension plan?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a personal choice and one that members will have an opportunity to make over a 60–day period once the bill has passed through Parliament.

I want to reiterate that there is a reduction in this plan. There is no retroactivity to the plan but I noticed that the head of the National Citizen's Coalition does not think that is a good idea. It is fair that members should continue to earn what they have earned up to the point where the pension bill is passed.

Overall, every member of this House, cabinet or non–cabinet, faces a reduction in the pension benefit, an overall reduction in the compensation package. I think that is showing the leadership that we need going into this budget today.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

According to a study done for the Department of National Defence, francophones are grossly underrepresented among senior officers in the armed forces. The study shows that French–speaking officers are concentrated in nursing and chaplain services.

How can the minister explain that, in the top military ranks, francophones account for only one out of nine lieutenant–generals and three out of 31 major–generals, when his government has closed the only French–language military college in Canada?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must point out that the Canadian Forces better reflect the Canadian reality of two official languages.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the armed forces is probably the one institution in this country that reflects the duality of Canada's linguistic constitutional reality more than anything else. Thirty per cent of the armed forces personnel are francophones, about 25 per cent at the officer level. There is room for improvement and that is why when the postings and promotions for general officer level are made public shortly we will see francophones in very significant positions within the hierarchy of the armed forces.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think that the minister has just confirmed that francophones are overrepresented in the junior ranks and underrepresented in the senior ranks.

How can the minister of defence justify such underrepresentation of francophones in the Canadian Forces, where there are almost no French–speaking officers in personnel selection, security and intelligence?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member really should take a stroll over to national defence headquarters one day. I think he will be amazed at the degree of bilingual discussion and personnel there. Twenty–five per cent of all the senior officers in the armed forces are francophone.

This will be improved upon, as I said, when the postings are announced shortly.

PENSIONS OF MEMBERS

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal two–tier pension reform is inadequate, unfair and in fact illegal in the private sector. The MP accrual rate of 4 per cent is double the legal limit allowed for the rest of Canadians under the Income Tax Act.

How can the President of the Treasury Board justify this blatant double standard in light of the job losses that will have to be announced this afternoon in the budget?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the basic pension plan in accordance with the Income Tax Act is 2 per cent. As in the case in the private sector, there are many supplementary plans where additional moneys are put aside. It is quite common for that to happen in our community.

Let me also point out that what is not common is that in this case members of Parliament pay double what is normal in the private sector in terms of their own contributions. In spite of all that, we are reducing the amount of the taxpayers' contribution to the MP pension fund by a third, by 33 per cent.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the solution to a fair and proper pension plan is simple: Pass a bill in the House that would make MPs subject to the same laws as all other Canadians. That way an MP pension plan would be no better than that of any other Canadian or as good as any plan that is out there in the real world.

Why will the minister not consider abolishing his ill fated, inadequate, still gold plated, two–tier pension plan and make it the same as those in the private sector?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can understand that members of the Reform Party are taking aim at the cheapest thing they can find. Members of Parliament are terribly underpaid in this nation. At this time they are trying to undermine the institution.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): When a member of Parliament is making less money than the worst hockey player in the NHL, half of what a hockey player makes, I think I understand the problem of Reform Party members. They know they are not very good and they know they will not benefit from the plan because they will be defeated in the next election.

BLOOD SUPPLY

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Last Friday, the minister told the media that she still had not read in detail the interim report of the Krever commission, which was submitted to cabinet ten days before.

How can the Minister of Health, who said on several occasions in this House that she was anxiously waiting for the Krever report to take action regarding the tainted blood issue, justify that on Friday, ten days after the tabling of that report, she still had not read it in detail, considering that the health and lives of thousands of people are at stake?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I said that we were thoroughly reviewing judge Krever's interim report and that we would provide a detailed answer as possible.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister at least tell us that she made the necessary representations to the Minister of Finance, so that he does not cut into the funds allocated to the federal agencies responsible for the safety of our blood supply, since these agencies already lack the financial resources necessary to fulfil their mandate?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have taken my position as Minister of Health very seriously. We at Health Canada and I as Minister of Health have not waited for the recommendations of Justice Krever. We have doubled the resources of the Bureau of Biologics within the past year.

We will continue to ensure that there are adequate resources to enforce the regulatory powers of Health Canada.

PENSIONS OF MEMBERS

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon in his budget speech the finance minister is sure to ask that we all make sacrifices for the good of the country. He will lecture Canadians on the need to make tough choices. Yet Liberals are providing themselves with pensions twice as rich as the best in the private sector. They will get their pensions at age 55 even though they want to raise the age limit to receive the Canada pension plan from 65 to 67.

• (1435)

Is the Prime Minister telling Canadians to do as I say and not as I do?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, everybody knows in Canada that to be a member of Parliament is a very unusual occupation. We do not come to Parliament to be here for 50 years. That is very rare. There are only two of us who have been here pretty long: the Solicitor General and myself. The average stay in the House is less than six years. That is a reality people understand.

We have said to the Canadian people very clearly in the red book what we were to do. We went even further than that and we campaigned on that.

I understand members of the Reform Party tried to present a budget last week and it was a complete flop because they were not competent enough to prepare a competent budget. Being so incompetent they know their value is not very good and they do not want to be overcompensated.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot of rhetoric from the competent members opposite about fairness and equity.

Will the Prime Minister explain to Canadians why there is one standard of fairness for Liberal members of Parliament and another for the rest of Canadians?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think members of Parliament who were elected previously have acquired some rights. There is a rule in democracy that we do not pass retroactive legislation. When people have acquired some rights we respect the rights that have been acquired.

I know that members of the Reform Party are desperate. Since they have no policy except the same rhetoric all the time, they now choose to go for the cheap shot. You know the people who have no generosity, but the Canadian people understand that we have good members of Parliament who work very hard, are underpaid and deserve every penny we are paying for them as taxpayers of Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on February 21, the Quebec court of appeal declared the federal regulations on PCBs unconstitutional. This decision puts an abrupt end to double regulation of PCBs and leaves the field open for Quebec, whose standards are much stricter than Ottawa's.

Does the minister agree that this recognition by the courts of provincial jurisdiction in the area of toxic products invalidates a significant part of federal environmental legislation on the control of toxic products?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the court of appeal dismissed the interim order issued by the Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean.

The court decided that the interim order he issued following the incident in Saint–Basile–le–Grand was improper. The court decided not to rule on specific sections of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. The interim order issued by the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean was declared unconstitutional.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, even though the decision ends double regulation of toxic products, will the minister confirm the statement by her parliamentary secretary for the environment that the federal government will study the possibility of appealing this decision to the Supreme Court?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to clarify, the Court of Appeal ruled that the interim order put in place by the then Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean, was unconstitutional.

It ruled on the PCB interim order that has subsequently been replaced by chlorobiphenyl regulations. It specifically did not rule on the constitutionality of the application of CEPA. It protected the integrity of CEPA.

• (1440)

I think the majority of Canadians would support the notion that the federal government has a very specific role to play in the cross–border transportation of toxic materials. It did, however, rule that the interim order put in place by the then Minister of the Environment was unconstitutional.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, global warming is a problem that threatens the survival of the earth—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur has the floor.

Mr. Arseneault: I guess I have a fan club in the Reform Party. They may not take global warming seriously but we do on this side of the House. We know that it threatens the environment and that inefficient use of energy is a contributing factor.

Could the Minister of Natural Resources inform the House about the federal buildings initiative and what it is doing to reduce expenditures and at the same time get our house in order environmentally?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, the federal government has initiated a very important program called the federal buildings initiative, or otherwise known as the FBI program, that operates throughout the federal government in all departments. It is fully operational now. It speaks to increased energy efficiency through the retrofitting of all federal government buildings and installations.

Let me update the House on the success of the program to date.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLellan: As the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur has indicated, while the hon members of the third party may not be interested in energy efficiency and climate change we on the government side are.

Let me say very briefly that we have initiated 80 projects involving over 2,400 federal government buildings.

The Speaker: I am always reluctant to intervene either in a question or an answer, but probably two kicks at the can is as far as we go.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, you are doing a good job. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions reported that the Canada pension plan fund would be broke in 20 years and the projected premiums paid by workers and employers would have to more than double to keep the fund afloat. The contingent liability in the plan is estimated at $500 billion, about as big as our whole government debt.

I did not give you a compliment, Mr. Speaker, just so that I could ask a long one. Could the Minister of Human Resources Development—

The Speaker: I am always flattered by these comments and I know the hon. member will want to do as good a job as I do by putting his question.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I was asking my question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): My apologies. Could the Minister of Human Resources Development tell us why his review of social security programs did not deal with this looming crisis?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member got to put his question, but it is a question that does not make an awful lot of sense or have relevance.

He should know that the Canada pension plan is subject to the five–year annual review of federal–provincial finance ministers as part of the statutes or the legislation itself. That review will take place this fall.

One thing we have to look at, because it is a matter of some concern, is that over the past year or two there has been a substantial rise not in the income security portion but in the disability portion of the Canada pension plan, which is one of the fundamental causes for the increased outflow during the past year and a half.

• (1445)

We have to look at this matter. It is a consequence of other jurisdictions taking decisions on things like workers' compensation that as a result people become part of the CPP regime. We will be looking at this. It will be part of the review. I can assure the minister that once again, the government is in good hands.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am not a minister yet.

The Liberal Party looks after its own pensions. I wish it would do this with as much enthusiasm for the rest of Canadians. Not only will this rate increase force an increase in payroll taxes that will kill jobs, but younger Canadians will also question whether CPP is even a good investment.

MPs will be given a choice to opt out of the MPs pension plan. Will younger Canadians be given the same opportunity to opt out of this bankrupt pension plan?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a very strange and curious question. It comes from a member of a party which just a week ago tabled its own so–called budget proposal.

That proposal recommended the total abolition of all parental or maternity benefits. This would have totally denied any kind of fiscal support for close to 200,000 mothers in this country. It would have denied and abolished disability benefits for close to 200,000 Canadians. It would have taken over $3 million out of the OAS.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Quebec minister of municipal affairs and housing rejected the federal government's proposal to increase the amount individuals must pay for social housing from 25 to 30 per cent of their income.

My question is for the minister of public works. Since the Quebec government has decided not to increase the amount to be paid for social housing, can the minister tell us whether he intends to reverse his position and maintain at the current level the amount to be paid for social housing?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member be somewhat patient. The Minister of Finance has the representations and has had them for quite some time.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would have expected a better answer from the minister who has nevertheless found $600,000 to build a brick wall in his honour in his riding.

Are we to understand that, by virtue of this measure which serves to increase requirements made of individuals in social housing, the federal government would once again download the burden of its deficit onto the backs of the most destitute and that the 110,000 affected households in Quebec can expect nothing further from this federal government?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the premise of the hon. member's question, I disagree totally. Perhaps he could be a little more patient. His answer will come later this afternoon.

HEALTH

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Krever inquiry has just tabled its interim report. It has some very specific recommendations on how to decrease the amount of AIDS in our country. Since lives could be saved, will the health minister move quickly to implement those recommendations?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member will understand that we have made the report public. We are funding the Krever commission. We are very interested in taking whatever actions are necessary. The member must remember that there are other players in the blood supply system, including the provincial governments, the Canadian Red Cross, and other partners. They are also taking this very seriously.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is some degree of inconsistency in this minister's response. On the issue of testing for AIDS for immigrants, the minister said no. Since this particular issue will save lives, I simply ask: Will the minister take haste to look after these recommendations?

• (1450)

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have taken haste and we have not waited for the recommendations to take action. Many of the recommendations have already been acted on. We will take action on any others that are within our responsibilities.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Latin America and Africa.

In Pakistan, Salam Masih, 14, and his uncle Rehmat were convicted to die for writing anti–Islamic slogans on a mosque wall. I am pleased to hear that the conviction was overturned by the high court.

What action has the secretary of state taken on behalf of the Government of Canada to ensure that human rights of minorities are protected in Pakistan?

Hon. Christine Stewart (Secretary of State (Latin America and Africa), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is very pleased, as is my colleague, that the appeal court overturned the conviction and execution of Salam Masih and his uncle in Pakistan. We believe it was in part due to our government's representations to the Government of Pakistan, along with representations by other members of the international community.

We remain very concerned about the human rights abuses particularly as they are brought against religious minorities in Pakistan. We will continue to work with the Government of Pakistan along with the NGO community to correct this.

TRADE

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

As part of the Prime Minister's promise on February 14 to this House, would the Prime Minister please inform Parliament as to the outcome of his discussions with President Clinton regarding the American restrictions on Canadian sugar and products containing sugar?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was asked by many members on this side to raise that question with the President of the United States. I mentioned it to him and made it very clear that in our view there was no problem at all. It is an area where there is a perfect balance of trade. There is no surplus on either side. Therefore, we do not understand why the United States would like to undo what is working very well at this moment.

FORESTRY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the parliamentary secretary for northern affairs.

Today, budget day, we are expecting to see cuts for every Canadian. I would like to suggest that the government is overlooking a source of revenue because of its inability to act on stumpage fees in the Yukon. It would be environmentally sustainable and would in fact generate revenue.

Right now stumpage fees are 20 cents as compared to $60 in northern B.C. That is one–third of 1 per cent of what the northern B.C. stumpage fees are. The federal government could raise $19 million a year on stumpage fees. Why is the government not acting now?

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the minister is personally interested in this. The department has put aside some time to study this area. As the hon. member mentioned, stumpage fees in the Yukon are only 20 cents per cubic metre and $30 per cubic metre elsewhere. Indian affairs is now looking at the whole issue in order to ensure that the Yukon people benefit from the stumpage fees as well as to make sure environmental measures are put in place so that the Yukon forest is not decimated.

FISHERY RESOURCES

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The European Union does not accept NAFO's decision regarding turbot quota allocation between NAFO member countries. If no agreement is reached, turbot stocks could be decimated, like other overfished species in the past.

• (1455)

Does the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans see that urgent measures are needed to protect fishery resources in the Atlantic and does he intend to do all in his power to have the Minister of Foreign Affairs convince the European Community that protecting this resource makes good sense? What does he intend to do?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the member here today and thank him for his excellent question. I know he has been busy with the hearings in the province of Quebec. Obviously he has been listening and that is why he is having trouble speaking. He has come to the conclusion that the future is here in a united federation and it is where we solve our problems. We are delighted to have him back.

We had a very good decision.

[Translation]

At the NAFO conference in Brussels, we made good decisions for the fishermen of Quebec and Canada. We gave Quebec fishermen new opportunities.

[English]

I assure the member that we are not going to throw away that opportunity. We are going to preserve the stock because we have the united will of all of the fishermen, tous les pêcheurs du Canada, behind the government to solve this problem.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the youngest minister eligible for the full, unreduced pension.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: My colleagues, usually when we put questions we address the minister by his or her correct title. I know the hon. member will want to do that as he puts his question now.

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, late Friday a press release was circulated which announced officially that the minister for immigration intended to sign a treaty with the United States that would allow Canada to share responsibilities for refugee claimants with the U.S.

I ask the minister of immigration, what exactly will the terms of this treaty be and why did he refuse to sign the treaty one year ago?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): I did not know he was addressing it to me, Mr. Speaker.

We should look at what the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States did over the two days. Much was accomplished. There was a good mood among Americans and Canadians in the type of relationship we have.

The President and the Prime Minister have mandated their respective ministers to report back in six months with respect to negotiating a memorandum of understanding on asylum seekers. It will not only be on the basis of the integrity of the system so that refugee claimants can take one good kick at the can either in the United States or in Canada, but also with the view to better protecting those refugee claimants.

It is a positive undertaking. The Americans were not ready one year ago. I am confident that after six months of discussions we will be able to have an agreement that not only protects the North American context but leads the way for good agreements based on integrity and protection.

JUSTICE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Recently the government announced that the war crimes unit in the justice department would be cut from 24 to 11 employees. In January the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of Justice announced a strategy to deport war criminals currently in Canada. The minister stated that Canada would not become a safe haven for such criminals.

Would the minister say how the government can maintain these policy goals when the war crimes unit will be so drastically reduced?

• (1500)

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we can achieve those goals by taking action. That is exactly what we have done in the case of suspected war criminals.

Working closely with my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, we have identified a number of cases involving persons from the second world war in respect of whom we have instituted or will institute civil proceedings for their denaturalization and deportation.

Second, in relation to more modern wars and conflicts, we have already instituted a proceeding in respect of a suspect from the conflict in Rwanda.

We are committed to the principle that Canada will not become a haven for those suspected of war crimes abroad. We are keeping resources, both in justice and in immigration and citizenship, sufficient to allow us to achieve that objective.

GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the Standing Committee on Government Operations on Bill C–58, an act to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, without amendment.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise before the House once again to present the 16th petition in this course of action undertaken on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson. April 11, 1995 is the date set for the parole hearing.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making the streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of 30 individuals, nine of whom are from the constituency of Wild Rose. The 21 remaining individuals come from throughout Alberta.

The petition states: "Your petitioners call upon Parliament to act quickly to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adopt all necessary measures to recognize the fully equality of same sex relationships in federal law."

I present this today on their behalf. I am opposed to this idea.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have several petitions to present today, two of which relate to tax increases and the opposition of my constituents to any move by the government to increase taxes.

Altogether I have 48 sheets of names opposing tax increases. I heartily concur.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to present a petition on behalf of constituents who are opposed to the extension of same–sex benefits. I am pleased to offer the petition with my complete support.

• (1505)

RETIREMENT AGE

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a first petition on behalf of 262 residents of my riding of Bourassa and the greater Montreal area who object to retirement age being moved from 65 to 67.

This petition was signed by many seniors from Montréal–Nord and a large number of FTQ workers. These petitioners argue that every Canadian citizen contributes to superannuation and therefore has a legitimate claim to a pension upon reaching 65 years of age, which is already a lot.

REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to present a second petition. It concerns registered retirement savings plans. The 126 petitioners object to the proposed new tax on RRSPs, as such plans are the only way for Canadians to secure a comfortable retirement. Just hours before the Minister of Finance tables his budget, this proposed tax could jeopardize the financial security of thousands of Canadians and Quebecers. Needless to say I strongly support both petitions.

[English]

THE FAMILY

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting several petitions today on behalf of my constituents of Prince George—Peace River.

The first petition requests that Parliament oppose any legislation that would directly or indirectly redefine family, including the provision of marriage and family benefits to those who are not family as defined in the petition.

JUSTICE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition requests that Parliament provide a remedy, to intervene and bring forward a national public registry of past and present sexual offenders to better protect the children of our communities.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition prays that Parliament amend the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the next petition requests that current laws regarding assisted suicide be enforced and no changes be made to the law which would sanction or allow suicide or euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the last petition I have to present today asks Parliament not to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality by amending legislation to include the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two petitions signed by the constituents of Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

The petitioners call on the government to declare 1995 as a tax freeze year to show leadership to all Canadians, not to increase the tax burden on middle and low income working Canadians and to reduce the deficit by cutting wastage and by reducing the overall expenses of every government department by at least 5 per cent.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions. Two are on the same topic, asking that the privileges which society accords to heterosexual couples not be extended to same sex relationships.

I personally am pleased to support those petitioners.

JUSTICE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the next petition may be a little redundant, but perhaps the minister can accept it as encouragement to move on. Its petitioners express concern at the recent court decision allowing extreme drunkenness as a defence against serious crime.

I also support that petition and support the minister in his efforts to look after that major problem in our legal system.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, on behalf of 50 constituents of Saanich—Gulf Islands and surrounding area.

The petitioners call on Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

FIREARMS

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions that are identical. The petitioners ask that Parliament support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime.

Second, the petitioners support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms.

Last, the petitioners support legislation which will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have not proven to be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex so as to be ineffective and/or unenforceable.

• (1510)

I concur with and support these petitioners.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions today. A total of 436 petitioners from the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt call on Parliament to reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

I concur with my petitioners.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today from my constituents in New Westminster—Burnaby.

The petitioners wish to inform the government that they are already overburdened with taxation due to high government spending. They feel that the government will increases taxes in this afternoon's budget.

Therefore they pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I also present two other petitions on behalf of those in my riding and in the general area.

These petitioners request that Parliament amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as a basis for protection against discrimination and to fully recognize relationships based on financial and emotional dependency and same sex relationships.

INCOME TAXES

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions today.

The first one is signed by over 2,500 people. The citizens express concern that they are overburdened with taxation due to high government spending and that the federal government is considering tax increases in the next federal budget.

Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes.

FIREARMS

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is signed by 4,888 people from my riding.

The petitioners say that the control of law–abiding citizens and responsible gun owners is more than enough to ensure public safety, and the current and proposed laws criminalizing certain firearm activities are not necessary.

The petitioners humbly pray and request that Parliament support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime, that Parliament support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms.

Finally, they request that Parliament support legislation that will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have not proven to be cost effective.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On February 20, 1995 I brought a point of order pursuant to Standing Order 39 regarding a question that I placed on the Order Paper on September 30, 1994.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands was gracious enough to respond to my request. He indicated that I would have the answer to my question by the end of last week. It is 150 days now since I have placed my question on the order paper with no result.

Also, with all due respect to the member for Kingston and the Islands who chastised me for not going to the Library of Parliament for the information, may I tell the hon. member that the annual reports to which he referred me are bordering on useless they are so vague.

Once again I would like to place these questions on the Order Paper for 1992 and 1993: What was the total amount of funds received by individuals and groups from the Canada Council? Who were these individuals? For what specific projects did they receive funding? How much did they receive?

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a serious problem. I also placed a question on the Order Paper on October 19, 130 days ago. This question had two parts: a) and b). Finally, last Friday, after a little more than a hundred days, I received an answer to the first half of my question. You can see my problem.

I wonder if there is any hope of getting the second part of my question answered. I find this somewhat unfortunate because, frankly, the information requested in that part is simpler, shorter, yet more important to me. Can I appeal to someone to ask for some justice and get this answer?

• (1515)

Would the hon. member be so kind as to answer the question regarding federal government properties in Quebec?

The Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. parliamentary secretary first on the two points of order just raised, and then to answer questions on the Order Paper.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first point of order that was raised by the hon. member for Calgary Southeast, I indicated last week that I hoped I would have an answer by the end of the week and I am still optimistic. It obviously was not last week, but as soon as an answer is available I will provide the hon. member with an answer.

As to her allegation that reports to the Canada Council are vague, I have had occasion to look at the reports and have read them from time to time. My recollection is that there are substantial lists and no vagueness about them. They simply say who got grants. Perhaps the hon. member regards that as vague. Her question does ask who received grants. I would have thought that there was a pretty good source in those annual reports. I urge her to have a second look.

In any event, I will do my best to provide an answer for her at an early date.

With respect to the hon. member for Québec–Est, my recommendation is that he go through that box of materials I tabled in the House on Friday in response to his question.

I cannot say that I looked at all 1,200 pages before I tabled the documents, but I think he will find the answer in there. If he does not, I will take his representation as one I am prepared to raise with the minister involved. I will see if the additional information can be provided to the hon. member with dispatch.

The Deputy Speaker: I wonder if the parliamentary secretary might also make the usual observation that he does on these occasions.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I was so put off by all these points of order that I forgot that I do have a question to answer today. Question No. 115 will be answered today.

Question No. 115—Mr. Hermanson:

With respect to the $4.8 million grant to build a museum of industry in the riding of Saint–Maurice, (a) under what program was this grant awarded, (b) what guidelines were followed to the awarding of such a grant, (c) how many permanent and part time jobs were created and (d) how many contracts have been awarded and to what companies and/or individuals?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I am informed by the department of human Resources and the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, FORD–Q, as follows:

In so far as Human Resources Development Canada, HRDC, is concerned:

a) b) and c) The Centre de l'interprétation de l'industrie de Shawinigan Inc., CII, is administered by a council of community workers, comprised of a variety of citizens. The building it is operating in at the moment is owned by Hydro–Quebec. Presently funding for this building is provided by five groups: ALCAN, Stone Console–Division Belgo, pulp and paper mill, Hydro–Quebec, the city of Shawinigan and the city of Shawinigan–South.

In the last four years HRDC has been providing the centre with local employment development projects, indirect funding. The centre acts as the sponsor for these training programs.

To date Human Resources Development Canada has committed a total of $1,212,359 toward the Centre de l'interprétation de l'industrie de Shawinigan Inc.

Program	Fiscal Year	Participants	Amount challenge	1992–1993	4	$10,152
job development	1991–1992	4	$44,206
	1992–1993	4	$52,489
	1993–1994	4	$42,900
UI section 25	1992–1993	2	$10,874
	1994–1995	2	$25,500
community development	1994–1995	*	$1,000,000

*The program is just beginning and at this time it is too early to estimate the number of people who will be employed during the next three operating years.

The guidelines followed can be found in the ED component of the employment manual, which inculdes several volumes. However, all Canada employment centres are equipped with these manuals.

In so far as the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, (FORD–Q), is concerned:

a) b) and c) FORD–Q has awarded a contribution of $3.5 million to the Centre de l'interprétation de l'industrie de Shawinigan Inc., CII, under the regional development program, RDP. This CII project is eligible for assistance as a facility that will foster regional economic development and should create 300 jobs during the construction phase.

In addition, the centre will generate 40 direct jobs for its operations and 200 indirect jobs among concession holders, subcontractors and other firms in the region once it is up and running.

In the short term the centre will stimulate a variety of other tourism investments, particularly in the accommodation sector, in addition to helping to consolidate regional economic infrastructure. As well, it will contribute to preserving regional industrial heritage.

d) The responsibility for the different contracts lies with CII.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FIREARMS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thought they were going to continue with questions from before question period. Is that correct?

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I missed the question because I was speaking with the clerk.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the procedure in which we were going to complete the questions that occurred before question period, before debate ceased. Are we going to continue with debate?

The Deputy Speaker: This is continuing with debate because the secretary of state has not returned to the Chamber.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, a little over a year ago the Minister of Justice was quoted in a number of newspapers as saying that he believed that only the police and military should have guns.

We have been through Bill C–68 and it is clear to me and will soon be clear to all Canadians that the minister has taken the first step toward achieving this personal objective.

After reading this legislation it is also clear that the Minister of Justice and his cabinet colleagues have confused gun control with crime control. Anyone who studies this issue for more than a couple of hours will realize that there is no connection between controlling the legal use of guns by law–abiding gun owners and reducing crime.

The Minister of Justice cannot tell us specifically how controlling guns and registering guns will reduce crime, and the Bloc has made that similar observation.

The minister keeps saying that chiefs of police have asked for it. The minister cannot hide behind that answer forever. Sooner or later he has to be responsible for answering his own questions. He has to defend his legislation with reasoned arguments and not expect others outside this House to come to his rescue.

If I start to sound angry during my remarks it is because not only am I expressing my own dissatisfaction, disappointment and disgust with the Liberal government's costly, intrusive, bureaucratic and ineffective legislation, but I am also expressing the outrage I read in the more than 1,000 letters I have received and the outrage that I hear in the hundreds of phone calls we receive, and the outrage I hear when I walk the streets of the communities in my constituency, and the absolute outrage I hear when I attend rally after rally of responsible, law–abiding citizens, whether in Saskatchewan, Newfoundland, Alberta or Nova Scotia. The outrage that these people express to me wherever I go is something this government must consider.

I support some of the provisions in the government's proposals calling for tougher sanctions for violent criminals and its proposed attempts to control the smuggling of firearms. I support some of these measures because they will really help control crime. Laws do not make people good but they do help to restrain evil.

On the other hand, because there is no evidence or convincing argument to show that public safety will be improved I will oppose ineffective proposals to register rifles and shotguns and the banning of firearms or any measures which would further restrict the ownership of handguns, scary looking guns, semi–automatic rifles, crossbows, and the banning of firearms or any measures which would further restrict the ownership of these, even replica toy guns.

If the Liberal Party can demonstrate how registration of all firearms is the most cost effective way of improving public safety, reducing violent crime and saving the most lives I and most Canadians will support the minister's proposals if he can show that they are the most cost effective method. This he has not done. He fails to answer this challenge and therefore we must oppose this legislation.

I repeat my personal position. I support cost effective gun controls which improve public safety and reduce the criminal use of firearms and if elected I will work to repeal ineffective gun controls which do not meet these objectives.

Another Reform principle from our party constitution says that it is the duty of all members of Parliament to their constituents that should supersede their obligation to their political parties. Reform MPs are duty bound to represent their constituents' wishes on this issue. I only hope that the Liberal government has the courage to let their members of Parliament do the same.

If the Liberal Party would allow a free vote on this bill I think we would really see whether there is broad public support for this. We would see whether that is true, as the minister claims.

I think it would prove that the Liberal Party believes in true democracy between elections as well as during them. I wish it would come clean on this issue and allow that free vote to take place.

Whether a Canadian is a gun owner or not here are some principles on which this legislation should be judged. I encourage every voter to inform themselves, to judge this legislation against their own personal beliefs, not what the government, not what the media, not what the politicians are telling them. This is one nasty piece of legislation. It will affect not only our lives but also the lives of our children and our grandchildren.

The Minister of Justice is right, the legislation is about the kind of country we want to live in. Canadians owe it to themselves and the next generation to get it right. Their safety, the safety of their families, their friends, their homes and their properties is at stake.

If Canadians believe in less government and less bureaucracy then they will not support this gun control bill. If Canadians believe in less government spending then they will not support this bill. If Canadians believe in lower taxes, they will not support this gun control bill. If Canadians believe in personal freedom and personal responsibility, then they will not support this gun control legislation. If Canadians believe in every citizen's right to private property, then they will definitely not support this gun control legislation.

If Canadians believe in true equality and that the law should be applied equally regardless of their race or where they live, then they will not like what they read in this gun control bill. If Canadians believe in every citizen's constitutional right to life, liberty and security of the person, then they will oppose this gun control bill with every ounce of energy they have.

If Canadians believe in everyone's right and responsibility to defend themselves, their family, their property and their home, as described in the Criminal Code of Canada, then they will not like what they read in this gun control bill. If Canadians believe the federal government should not interfere in areas of provincial jurisdiction, then they will not support this gun control bill.

A recent survey conducted by Simon Fraser University learned that support for the Liberal Party's firearm registration system drops significantly as the respondents' knowledge of existing gun control laws increases and the full cost of the measures is understood.

In his attempts to confuse the issue of gun control with the issue of crime control, the minister has included some things in his legislation which I support. I maintain that if the Minister of Justice is really interested in public safety he will divide this bill into two parts. Part one would be crime control and part two would be gun control. Even though there are some monumental flaws with the crime control provisions of the bill, I think we could fix those and ensure easy passage through the House so that the police could use these tools to put real criminals behind bars where they should be.

Here is a list of measures in the bill which I think could be modified and amended and which I could support because they truly concern crime. I would support the four–year mandatory minimum sentence for the 10 violent offences committed with a firearm as long as the word firearm was replaced with the word weapon. More people are murdered with knives and other weapons than with guns. I think any criminal who uses a weapon in the commission of a crime should be subject to the same mandatory jail term.

I support using section 85 of the Criminal Code effectively, but again this mandatory sentencing provision should be extended to any weapon used in a crime, not just firearms.

I support the lifetime prohibition from possessing a restricted weapon for the conviction of violent crimes. I also support the inclusion of replica or imitation firearms under section 85 of the Criminal Code. I support the new offences for large scale smuggling and trafficking of firearms. I support the new offences for possessing stolen or smuggled firearms of a one–year minimum jail sentence. I support adding firearms trafficking to the list of enterprise crime offences.

I oppose the banning of 553,000 handguns. I oppose the banning of 19,000 restricted firearms. However, I support the proposed firearms possession certificate, in principle anyway. I support the offence for failing to report a lost or stolen firearm. I support the 10–year prohibition on possession of firearms to those convicted of serious firearms offences. I support the prohibition on possession of firearms for those convicted of stalking and drug offences. I support the tighter border controls, the inspection procedures by Canada customs. Also, I support the forfeiture of vehicles used in smuggling contraband and the proceeds of smuggling activities. I support the requirement for import–export permits for firearms moving across the border for commercial use.

I also support the requirement to record the entry or exit of firearms to or from Canada by tourists and outfitters. I add that these people bring hundreds of millions of dollars into our country, creating thousands of jobs and tourists should not be needlessly harassed at our borders.

I support the provision of minor's permits for persons between 12 and 18 to acquire firearms. I support the extension of authority to approve firearm safety courses to the provinces.

I also support the creation of a separate safety course for handgun users and I support the use of valuable police time and scarce tax revenues on cost effective crime control.

• (1530)

This is a list of the things I support. Because gun control measures will do next to nothing to deter real criminals from obtaining or using firearms, and because these measures are not a cost effective way of improving public safety, I will vote against the bill unless they are changed.

Here is a list of reasons why I am opposed to the gun control legislation. I oppose the mandatory registration of all rifles and shotguns and the provision that would make failing to register them a criminal offence. This will do nothing but make criminals out of law–abiding people.

Here are a few reasons why I oppose mandatory registration of all rifles and shotguns. It will cost hundreds of millions of dollars. It is not a cost effective way of improving public safety or saving lives. It will not help police investigate and prosecute violent criminals. It will not alter police procedures for dealing with domestic disputes. It will not reduce the use of firearms in violent crime.

It will keep the police off the street and in the office, not where they should be. It will require more government bureaucracy, not less. It will require an increase in taxes in the form of registration fees. It will also require other members of society to pay those taxes because the initial registration fees will be waived. It will target law–abiding responsible gun owners, not real criminals. It will help trace firearms but tracing will serve no real useful purpose.

Gun smugglers can already be identified without a registration system. Handgun registration has been in effect since 1934 and has not reduced handgun crime. Registration has been tried and failed in Australia and New Zealand. Hundreds of millions could save more lives if spent elsewhere.

It will have a negative effect on a billion dollar economy. It will undermine respect for the law. I cannot emphasize this more. There are jokes going around. There are ads in the newspapers in my province showing people how to hide their guns. They openly advocate that this law will not be complied with.

We have a huge problem when we put in place a law that everyone regards as being useless. It undermines respect for the law, and we must take that into consideration. We need to maintain that respect. People know this will do nothing to make society safer. In fact it will do the exact opposite. I do not have time today to go into them but there are very valid reasons for opposing the legislation because it will actually increase the risk for most people.

I am particularly opposed to the extreme penalties for persons failing to register their rifles and shotguns: a one–year mandatory jail term and up to 10 years in jail if one fails to fill out that little card the minister says is so easy. Denis Lortie killed three people and only spent 10 years in jail. Where is the justice in this legislation? It defies common sense.

I also oppose the added tax burden on law–abiding citizens, the responsible gun owners, through registration fees, permit fees, and renewal fees. Like I said before, I oppose the banning of legally owned handguns, scary looking semi–automatic rifles and so on, and the banning of all replica toy guns. I oppose those kinds of measures.

I oppose the restrictions on crossbows, the banning of one–hand crossbows and the additional restrictions on air guns. I oppose the prohibition and confiscation of guns without fair, just and timely compensation. I oppose the confiscation of thousands of firearms without compensation when the owner dies.

I oppose the use it or lose it provision which requires law–abiding handgun owners to re–establish their reason for owning a handgun every five years. I oppose the proposed controls on the purchase of ammunition and the additional and unnecessary controls on legitimate gun collectors. I oppose the prohibition of entire households from having firearms because of the actions of a single resident.

I oppose the exemption of certain Canadian citizens from firearms prohibition orders. All Canadians should be treated equally under the law and in this case under this law. I oppose the requirement of an import–export permit for bringing a personal use firearm into Canada.

I oppose the expanded use of orders in council to restrict or prohibit firearms. I oppose the different application of the firearms laws for remote and aboriginal communities. Canadians should be treated equally regardless of where they live, regardless of their race, and regardless of their occupation. I oppose the waste of valuable police time and scarce tax revenue on useless, ineffective gun controls.

I have 28 amendments here. At this time I will not read them all out. I have gone through a lot of things already. I think we need to have a debate because there are many things that need to be addressed. I will hold this up at a later date.

In closing, I make five recommendations to the government. I recommend holding separate votes for crime control provisions and gun control provisions. We should separate those.

I recommend early passage of crime control provisions with consideration of Reform amendments to really get tough on violent criminals.

I recommend a free vote on all gun control provisions in the bill, especially the sections relating to implementation of the universal registration system.

I recommend a delay in implementation of universal registration systems to see if increased sanctions and new criminal offences, that is the crime controls proposed by the Liberal government and Reform, are effective in reducing violent crime.

I recommend the inclusion of a sunset clause amendment that would automatically repeal any gun control provision that is not effective in reducing violent crime or approving public safety.

Finally, I have a message for seven million gun owners in Canada. They should not give up. The fight for the kind of Canada we all want to live in has begun in earnest. I encourage them to write letters to both federal and provincial politicians. They should send petitions to their MPs, write letters to the editor, phone in to hotline radio and television shows, get involved in a political party that best represents their views and help to organize and attend rallies. Whatever you do—

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The member may have forgotten that all his remarks are supposed to go to whoever is in the Chair. I would invite him to do so for the remainder of his talk.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my apologies. I get involved and forget.

My advice is not to break the law of the land but to work to change it by all legal means possible. Bad laws can be repealed if a truly democratic party is in power. If we have the support of the majority of Canadians we can do it.

I fear a government that will not listen to the people a lot more than I fear a law–abiding citizen with a gun. In conclusion I would like to move the following motion:

> That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> This House decline to give second reading to Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, because the principle of establishing a system for licensing and registration of all firearms and the principle of creating a variety of offences are two unrelated issues that should be addressed separately.

I submit this motion to the House.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair will reserve on the motion while it is being brought forward. We will deal with questions and comments while the motion is being looked at.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.):

[English]

I have a few comments before asking a question of the member opposite who just spoke. He made some reference to aboriginal people being treated exactly the same as the rest of Canadians, with which I agree on certain issues. However the hon. member will understand that the aboriginal people in the country are the only people who hunt as a way of life. They have always hunted.

• (1540)

I would like to quote Voltaire who said: "Prejudice is what fools will choose for reason". That is basically what the hon. member is saying in refusing to recognize the fact that we have always been here, longer than anybody else, and we have always hunted. We still hunt to this day. When people arrived after us we helped them to settle in.

As an aboriginal person I have some very strong feelings about the issue of hunting and about the issue of gun control. I think by and large Canadian people as a whole support some form of gun control. I believe, unlike the hon. member, that the majority of Canadians support the gun control measures being put forward by the Minister of Justice.

As an aboriginal person I view guns and rifles as having one use other than military and law enforcement, that is hunting. I have absolutely no use for handguns. Nobody can convince me that we need handguns. Basically they are used to kill people. Nobody can convince me that there is a useful reason for automatics. We are not going to hunt with automatics. Some semi–automatics may be used for hunting, but by and large most semi–automatics should not be used for hunting. If persons are using semi–automatics for hunting it means they do not have enough confidence in themselves to use a bolt action rifle which shoots one bullet at a time and then they have to reload.

It has been proven through various polls that most Canadians support some form of gun control. I read in the paper some time ago that a member of the Reform Party conducted a poll and found that 67 per cent of his constituents supported the gun control measures being put forward today. However that hon. member would still vote against gun control.

Reform members have been shouting from the rooftops that theirs is a grassroots organization. They find that the grassroots support gun control but they will not listen to the grassroots; they will vote their conscience even against the grassroots people. That seems to be hypocrisy if we are talking about democracy and grassroots. The majority of the grassroots people say they want gun control measures put in place but Reform members do not think that way.

Reform Party members should come clean and decide whether they will vote in favour of what the majority of Canadians want or vote for their individual interests rather than the collective interests of the people of Canada.

• (1545)

As an aboriginal person I have some concerns. As a member representing per capita probably the largest number of gun owners, I have some concerns. I will convey them to the Minister of Justice to ensure that they are heard.

I think the people in my riding of Nunatsiaq are ready to support the Minister of Justice to ensure that Canada is a safer place to live. Canada can be made a safer place to live.

I suggest that hon. members listen to their constituents. If the majority say to support the gun control measures then they should listen to them.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I strongly object to the allegations made by the hon. member with regard to prejudice. I would ask that he withdraw them. Because we say all Canadians should be treated equally, I do not think that is prejudice. I would ask him to withdraw that.

The Deputy Speaker: The member is welcome to say that as a response.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that the member was prejudiced. I said that the attitude put out by some members is prejudicial. When I quoted Voltaire that prejudice is what fools use for reason, an awful lot of things can be hidden under some words. I did not say that the member was prejudiced. If I did not say that the member was prejudiced, then I have no reason to withdraw my comments.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I really do not want to pursue this any further.

Is the hon. member going to vote for or against this legislation? Has he consulted his constituents as we have? We have done surveys. We found that initially, over 80 per cent of the people surveyed knew virtually nothing about this legislation. As they became more informed, opposition to this bill rose to as high as 90 per cent.

They realized how this was going to put society more at risk. They realized how this was going to give criminals access to firearms that they did not previously have. They realized how this was going to tie up the police in some useless paperwork. They realized how this was going to be a tax imposition upon them, how it would destroy more jobs and would put more young people out on the streets who probably would get into more trouble and put us more at risk.

They began to see that this was a useless bureaucratic political manoeuvre to try to put something across on the Canadian people. It would make them think the government was doing something to make society safer when in fact it is not.

As the member quotes these polls, he had better go back and find out exactly what he is doing. A very narrow view is being expressed here.

The hon. member just said that only some people of certain race subsistence hunt. That is not true. It is absolutely false. Many people in this country appreciate nature. They use handguns in many ways besides killing people. The allegation he made that guns are only for killing people is absolutely ridiculous. I do not know where this member is coming from. There are many other uses for guns. I do not accept that argument.

The member made many other statements that were not true. I ask the Canadian public to really look at this question in depth. Examine what this government has put forward. It is a convoluted complex bill and cannot be supported in its present form.

The Deputy Speaker: The time for questions and answers has expired. The member has not had a ruling on the validity of his motion. It will be provided as quickly as it can. It is being studied very carefully.

Mrs. Carolyn Parrish (Mississauga West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Brandon—Souris.

• (1550)

I rise today to speak to Bill C–68, legislation which addresses the fundamental right of all Canadians to a safe, non–violent, non–threatening society. I am speaking in support of legislative reforms carefully crafted and presented by the Minister of Justice involving amendments to the Criminal Code and the creation of a new firearms act.

For many years Canadians have watched in horror the increasing use of handguns, assault weapons and rifles in the commission of crimes. In recent years our North American society has become increasingly immune to daily doses of violence, death and injury. Television newscasts and videos feed Canadian viewers a steady stream of carnage. Some of us are shocked; many have become numb as we grow accustomed to the daily onslaught.

In the United States thousands of people are killed each year by handguns. Hundreds of thousands are injured and many are permanently disabled. Yet Americans strangely cling to the notion of a frontier mentality and the right to settle arguments with a gun. A new handgun is produced every 20 seconds in the United States to feed a voracious demand.

Our society is awash in American imagery and attitudes. The U.S. media has slowly changed our long established tradition of law, order and peaceful tolerance. The locked doors and barred windows of the United States have crept north as has the American fascination with handguns.

Thirty years ago a domestic dispute in the city of Toronto would rarely if ever involve a handgun. Now police approach every situation as potentially lethal. Thirty years ago police officers did not need SWAT teams, bullet–proof vests or increasingly powerful service revolvers against suspects who are routinely better equipped with the latest weaponry. Just this past week metro Toronto police received permission to carry shotguns inside their cruisers instead of in the trunks of their cars.

There is no doubt whatsoever that our society is becoming more violent than Canadians will tolerate. But how are we different from our friends to the south? What makes us want to take charge of this situation and return order to Canadian streets?

Fortunately, the vast majority of Canadians continue to abhor violence in all its forms. We are still shockable. We can still be touched. We are still willing to fight back. We are not ready to install metal detectors in our schools or huddle behind locked gates and barred windows after dark. From across Canada, this government and every member of this House has heard the message: Get the guns off the streets.

Ninety–six per cent of Canadians support increased penalties for the use of a firearm in the commission of a crime. This bill addresses those Canadians. Ninety per cent favour the registration of all firearms. This bill addresses those Canadians. Fully 70 per cent want tighter gun control laws, restricted access to ammunition and a complete ban on civilian ownership of handguns. This legislation addresses those Canadians.

The issue of violence affects each of us in a profound way. My late father, Ed Janozeski, was a sharpshooter, a gun instructor and a dedicated metro Toronto police officer for 37 years. He watched the use of firearms increase, especially in his last years on the force. He grew increasingly frustrated as legislators seemed unwilling to do anything about it.

Each member of this House knows of an instance where friends, family or acquaintances have been devastated by the misuse of firearms. Every year 1,400 Canadians die as a result of gunshot wounds and another 1,200 are injured. Sadly, the majority are suicides, impulsive acts committed by those who have easy access to guns. Fifty women are killed each year, shot in their own homes by a family member.

Surprisingly, homicide rates from firearms are 50 per cent higher in rural Canada. One hundred persons die accidentally each year while hunting or otherwise handling a firearm. Some of these people are children.

Three million Canadians own seven million firearms, 1.2 million in the restricted category. Vast numbers of illegal, smuggled and unregistered guns add to this arsenal. Between 1974 and 1993, 65,000 firearms were reported missing, lost or stolen and have never been recovered.

Even with all legal weapons registered, criminals will still find handguns. Accidents and suicides will still occur. Are these sensible, rational arguments for doing nothing?

Acceptance of the status quo is acceptance of defeat. The enormity of the task cannot freeze us into inaction. If we start today the net result over time will be significantly fewer handguns in private hands. Those handguns will be in the safer hands of legitimate sport shooters, hunters and collectors.

• (1555)

A highly efficient computerized system will distinguish legal from illegal firearms and will track them. Police officers when approaching a reported domestic dispute will know if there are weapons in the house. Responsible safe storage by registered gun owners will become a necessity.

Will violent crime cease immediately? No one is foolish enough to believe that. Criminals will not register their firearms or produce a licence to purchase ammunition. But the underground market fed to a great extent by smuggled and stolen firearms will begin to dry up. Registration will permit tracking of imported guns and seizure of unregistered ones. Registration will also encourage safe storage and the availability of fewer stolen firearms.

Through a series of new hard hitting penalties this government is also saying loudly and clearly: Use a weapon and you will face the stiffest penalties in the western world, a minimum of four years in jail for the use of a firearm in any of 10 specific offences.

Police will have a law with teeth enabling them to lock up criminals in possession of stolen firearms before a crime occurs. Those attempting to use replicas to intimidate and terrorize will face a minimum one year sentence.

Our border, the longest unprotected border in the world, will no longer be an easy entry for those trafficking in firearms. Now you will face 10 years in jail and forfeit all vehicles used in the commission of this crime.

The new legislation will outlaw 60 per cent of all handguns currently available for purchase in Canada, all assault–type military and paramilitary weapons, many of which are designed for concealment and terrorist activities. They have absolutely no place in Canadian society.

To acquire and keep handguns, owners will have to provide one of only two valid reasons for doing so: to add to a legitimate collection, or to use in sport or target shooting. This would have to be justified every five years. The single most objectionable requirement in the eyes of the gun lobby is simple: all firearms and all owners of firearms will have to be registered. Contrary to popular myth, the registration of weapons is not new to Canada.

The first nationwide permit system was introduced in 1892, the registration of handguns in 1932.

Of 1.2 million handguns registered to 560,000 Canadians, only 10 per cent have applied for a permit which allows for transportation of a handgun to and from a shooting club. Canadians are apparently more interested in owning than in using these firearms.

The registration of 5.8 million firearms will be phased in over seven years. Frankly, the tired old argument that registration failed in New Zealand does not hold. Modern computer technology will make this task efficient, simple and cost effective. We routinely register automobiles, mortgages, driver's licences, building permits and dogs. To argue that a national registration system would be onerous is to ignore the electronic advancement of our generation.

Registration should not pose any threat to legitimate, responsible gun owners. In fact, they should welcome it. Only the most paranoid of individuals have expressed the fear that big brother is watching.

In reality, orderly registration will deter theft and smuggling and will assist police. Ultimately, registration will bring the responsible gun owner into a partnership with the enforcement agencies. It will be a partnership based on trust, competence, access to information and accountability.

I know much has been said of the opposition to this legislation. Change is not always easy to accept. We live in an increasingly hostile and violent society. We cannot abandon it to the spiral of violence that will fundamentally change Canada for generations to come. We must take the strongest and most effective measures possible to respond to those of us who want a peaceful, safe and tolerant society.

My colleague from across the floor, the hon. member for Calgary Centre recently said in the House that if you identify your problem correctly, 60 per cent of your solution is before you. I believe Canadians have identified the problem. This legislation is an effective and necessary beginning, moving us well on the way to a 100 per cent solution.

It is a great honour for me to speak today. I have had a rather motley political career because I have always been labelled an idealist. Sometimes things happen in politics because it is doable rather than because it is right. I am very proud of our minister and to be part of this Liberal government because I believe today we are doing what is right.

• (1600)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, some moments ago the House received a motion asking that the bill not be read the second time.

I want to submit very briefly that it is my feeling, and I am sure that of many hon. members, that this motion is out of order because it does not state that it is against the principle of the bill, nor that the principle of the bill is defective. It does not address that issue.

It merely addresses the fact that because the bill deals with two separate issues we should not deal with it at that time. If the bill were dealing with two separate issues, the argument would be that the bill is omnibus or omnibus like, if you will, and that the Chair has consistently dealt with that issue in the past by agreeing that such legislation was in order. In any case, this bill would not be omnibus even if that argument were made.

The argument here has to do with two conflicting principles being in the bill and that being a justification for the substantive motion brought to the attention of the Chair. Those are not, in my submission, grounds that would enable a member to make the kind of motion which was brought to the floor of the House this afternoon.

Therefore I would ask the Chair to rule at the earliest opportunity that this particular motion is out of order.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair would appreciate hearing all representations on the validity of the motion and therefore I would call on the Reform Party to make submissions on the issue.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it was with a great deal of thought and consideration and also with a great deal of consultation with the legal counsel of the House that we did present this amendment to the motion being debated before us today. Very simply the wording is:

> That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> This House decline to give second reading to Bill C-68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, because the principle of establishing a system for licensing and registration of all firearms and the principle of creating a variety of offences are two unrelated issues that should be addressed separately.

This is a reasoned amendment and we have been informed that according to the legislative counsel of this House it is in order. It is a reasoned amendment and therefore I would put to you, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Does a member of the official opposition wish to be heard. I have been given indications that no one wishes to do so. Therefore, this concludes the debate on this issue.

[English]

The Chair will reserve on that matter and will bring back a decision as quickly as a reasoned conclusion can be brought back to the House.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am interested in some of the comments by the member for Mississauga West. Certainly having been raised in a family in which the father was a police officer would give her some insight into the concerns police officers express when it comes to criminal activity. Seeing if nothing else the breakdown in our laws and the effectiveness of what a police officer can or cannot do any more is a story in itself.

I am also interested in the comments relating to the smuggled weapons and the use of illegal weapons, that the illegal gun market would literally dry up once we have a good registration system in place and some supposed criminal sections that would deal with that.

I do not believe the member has ever been over to the Fort Erie border crossing to look at the extent of what we have as security at the border crossing. There is a joke among the customs officers and the people who live in that area. If a boat comes across from the American side and it rides low in the water, it is full of alcohol. If it rides halfway down in the water, then it is full of guns. If it rides high in the water, then there are drugs in that particular boat. When it gets over to the other side to the Canadian shore there is no one there to stop it to see what really is in the boat because our border security is at a minimum.

Resources at the front line have been cut back to the nth degree. Police departments right across the country are suffering now because of a lack of being able to hire the adequate number of police officers to look at it.

How will the illegal gun market dry up through a registration system when the front line cannot even stop the smuggling problem in this country, which is way out of hand and our police departments do not even have a finger on it? Even if they did they could not do anything about it.

Mrs. Parrish: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member opposite and I am sorry that customs officers joke about such serious things as gun smuggling, drug smuggling and alcohol smuggling.

I do not think smuggling is a joking matter and I do not wish to correct the hon. member opposite but I did not say it would dry it up literally and immediately. I think it is a step in the right direction.

I think if we do not begin somewhere we might as well all throw our hands up and say open the borders and let everybody bring whatever they want in.

The President of the United States visited here on Thursday and congratulated us on an amazing start in the direction of cleaning up illegal guns. I am very proud to be part of a team that is doing this.

My father on his deathbed talked about guns. He talked about the danger. He came home one night very sad because a rookie cop had gone up the stairs ahead of him to a domestic dispute and a shotgun blast had come through the door. It did not kill him. It knocked his eye right out. My father has always believed that if you register guns you can at least make the people who have lost them or have allowed them to be stolen out of their homes responsible for that loss.

Again, I believe this is a beginning. No one has the perfect solution. I will reiterate what I said. We cannot be frozen into inactivity by the overwhelming concern of the problem.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was impressed by what the member had to say and the concerns she expressed for a safer society. I think that is what we are all looking for. I wonder if the member would address the possibility of changing existing laws that allow violent offenders to enter society after serving only two–thirds of their penalty. That is something we could do right now.

Melanie Carpenter, for all intents and purposes, was murdered by someone who was released because of a mandatory requirement included within the statute and the laws that this Parliament has created. We can change that.

I wonder if the member would be willing to support that kind of legal initiative in this house that would prevent violent offenders from being automatically released into society before they expend their full sentence within prison to at least protect society to that extent.

Mrs. Parrish: Mr. Speaker, I always find it amusing that Reform members opposite tend to turn the conversation away from what we are trying to deal with and into their favourite locations.

I believe that violent criminals in this society will be dealt with in a reasoned and planned fashion by the minister, as he has done with the gun legislation. I think you cannot look at one incident or one piece of legislation and keep it separate from others.

I have absolute faith in the Minister of Justice that in the course of his term he will address all of your concerns and all of my concerns.

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank you and for that warm applause across the way. My friend and colleague from Crowfoot was a police officer at the time of my younger years, still living in the area where he was serving. I respect him very much since those days and even today.

It is an honour to make the point that I am speaking on this bill with the desire to pursue a fair and equitable bill that permits reasonable and equitable use of firearms in our society.

• (1610)

Having said that, I do feel that the bill the minister has presented goes a long way in achieving those types of social goals. Therefore, I deem it an honour to rise to speak on this bill respecting the use of firearms and other weapons.

The extended discussions and debates have waxed and waned throughout this country. Western Canada is certainly no exception. The first meeting I attended was with the minister and the executives of most of Manitoba's firearm associations coming together in Winnipeg in July, 1994.

In a short time thereafter I had what I cannot say was necessarily a pleasure. I have never been yelled at by 2,000 people at the same time before, so it was a unique experience. There was a rally in the Keystone centre in Brandon at which time the organizations in favour of not producing any more firearm controls brought together a number of people and we heard their concerns. Fundamentally they were persons who were trap shooters, recreational pistol shooters, but in the main they were ordinary hunting members of the public just like some members in this House.

After attending these forums I visited several clubs and ranges. I continued to meet with concerned individuals on an individual basis as well as in small groups. Any new regulations concerning firearms have deep cultural implications, gender bias and some rural–urban division of support. As well, many citizens did not wish to see our nation reach a situation where they feel we must have access to a firearm in order to feel safe.

We have had some information coming forward. I will quote a couple of excerpts. One is from the Western Producer, January 26. It was entitled "Most women for gun control: pollster".

The Saskatchewan Women's Agricultural Network had an annual meeting on January 21 and debated a resolution to oppose gun control. The resolution was not passed. The director, Elaine Kacsmar, said they were not totally against the registration of guns but that they were against having to pay an enormous amount of money to register guns.

The second point I would like to raise is that the now famous Alberta poll done by the present Government of Alberta is registered in opposition to gun control. It in turn did not believe the federal polling that was done in that province. I am sure the member for Yorkton—Melville was possibly thinking of these results when he made his remarks earlier.

On February 2 the data seemed to indicate in Alberta that there were different pockets and regions but rural Alberta was in some regions as high as 72 per cent in favour of registry. Central Alberta was about 50 per cent; we will even drop a couple to 48 per cent. Northern Alberta was 56 per cent. Overall the data would indicate at that snapshot of time that over 65 per cent were in favour.

I have enjoyed many open and frank discussions with the Minister of Justice and my caucus colleagues as well on the entire issue of the firearms proposals. Throughout these caucus discussions, some formal, some not so formal, at no point was I ordered, threatened or instructed to vote in favour of or against this bill.

Unquestionably I will be voting in favour because I sense it does show some movement to allow for a middle of the road position for all members of society.

I believe that our caucuses, regional and national, provided every member on our side of the House every opportunity to contribute and develop those components that were of concern to them.

Bill C–68 reflects the November 30 action plan but has been changed to accommodate some legitimate handgun owners' concerns. Like all other owners of prohibited firearms, individuals who possessed handguns on or before February 14, 1995 will be able to buy and sell in the same class those firearms which are now listed as prohibited.

Owners will be able to use the handguns for the purpose of which they were originally obtained whether target shooting or collecting. Might I comment that to the very avid target shooters in my riding that is the same as golf is to me. They fire off 300 rounds in a very controlled, safe environment. They tell me that they feel great. I wish them well and I hope it continues. I am sure it will.

The bill is the outcome of consultations with many individuals, groups, organizations across Canada. It is intensive work involving the justice department, Revenue Canada and the Department of the Solicitor General, among others.

Owning a firearm is a privilege. It is not a right. As such, it is subject to regulation by government because firearms can be dangerous and it is only sensible to have some degree of regulation. People can lose a privilege. In fact I am informed that 40,000 Canadians for sundry reasons have lost the right to own firearms, about 700 in Manitoba and about the same number in Saskatchewan. Of course, it will vary with the level of population from coast to coast.

It has been my desire to see that reasonable guidelines are put in place where hunters will continue to hunt, recreational and competitive programming will continue to produce world class competitors and collectors will be able to trade, buy or sell with reasonable guidelines in place.

In the end the thrust of this bill is to achieve a safer Canadian society. I hope that my hon. colleagues will bear with me while I explain the background from which I speak today.

My twin brother and I, who I am sure my colleague across the way will remember, grew up on a farm in central Manitoba. For whatever the reasons my parents saw no need to own firearms.

However rummaging in the attic one day—of course it is my twin brother who did all these nasty things—we located two old firearms. One was a shotgun with absolutely no trigger action left and the other one was an old Snider rifle which was used in one of the wars, the first world war or earlier.

We played with those for a number of years. I do not know what has become of them but obviously they were relics. If we had the same rules then that we are going to have, we would be in some legal difficulty.

I do recall however that my friends purchased .22 calibre firearms for their use when they "came of age". I would go hunting with them. The admonition from my parents at that time was to be careful.

The point that I make is that for most cases, that was enough. Most of us were. In the 1940s and 1950s, one could acquire firearms by mail order, could use them without training, could will them without any inhibiting regulation.

Those of us who survived without regulatory interference feel that we have somehow lost some freedoms and privileges in the intervening years, as we have moved into an era where because of societal difficulties we have developed a system of regulation for the training, acquisition, sale and storage of firearms.

In conclusion, I would have to say that my age group can look back to a very idyllic time where responsibility was a given, care and caution was expected. It is these memories that tend to anger the firearm owners of today.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer the hon. member to a number of reasons for which there is such growing opposition across the country to more regulations for law-abiding gun owners.

One reason is that it is costly. The minister indicated that it would cost $85 million to implement this legislation. Other estimates reach into the hundreds of millions of dollars. People on this side of the House, certainly at this time of budgetary constraint, would question why we are spending this money on the registration of firearms. The money would be better spent on health care or other social programs.

The second reason is that it is a non-secure system. If a hacker can break into the Pentagon's computer list, it will certainly make a shopping list for criminals once the information is out.

The third reason—and members opposite will say that only those who are paranoid will say this—is that this is another step toward confiscation. The minister has repeatedly said that he believes only law enforcement officers and armed forces personnel should have firearms. When he makes those statements is it any wonder that Canadians are paranoid that this is another step toward confiscation of their legally acquired firearms?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I did not really hear a question, so I will comment on his comments.

At the present time we do have a registration system. A firearm can be tracked: where it was manufactured, through the distributor, wholesaler, retailer, to the end purchaser. However, to do that requires hundreds of hours to go through the ledgers of various organizations.

The kind of system that I envision would be almost like a charge card. All the rifles would be shown in black print. We would instantly be able to locate a rifle by running it through the network, which would reduce the cost and time which is now required.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have always found the hon. member to be very reasonable.

Has he done a poll in his constituency? If he has not, will he, and will he follow his constituents' advice on this issue?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, no, I have not. Yes, I am reasonable. I will pursue the same privileges as the hon. member from Edmonton; I will follow my conscience.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C-68 respecting firearms. I am somewhat surprised with what I heard in this debate, which I have been following from the beginning. I noticed antagonistic positions. I noticed, coming perhaps a little more often from our colleagues from the Reform Party, arguments that seem disproportionate and highly questionable to me. I will get back to this in my remarks.

Let me tell you right away that I agree with the principle of the bill introduced by the Minister of Justice. I will start with a brief outline of the bill, and then move to the basis for my supporting it.

Bill C-68 establishes a licensing system for the carrying and use of firearms.

This bill also establishes a Canada-wide firearms registration system. I raise these two points immediately because, from what

I could see in the debate so far, these are two aspects of the bill that prompt people to oppose it, often fiercely.

Moreover, the bill calls for stricter controls on the import, trafficking and smuggling of firearms in Canada. It provides for stiffer sentences of imprisonment for individuals who commit serious crimes with firearms. The current minimum sentence of one year, under section 85 of the Criminal Code, would be increased to four years with this bill.

At last, certain types of handguns would now be prohibited in Canada. The bill prohibits the import or sale of handguns using .25 or .32 cartridges as well as handguns with a barrel equal or less than four inches in length. This provision applies to approximately 85 per cent of handguns in Canada.

Finally, the bill makes any violation of the provisions regarding licensing and registration a criminal offence.

There are perhaps seven million firearms in Canada today. This is an estimate, as any round figure, because no one knows for sure. Some people have had firearms for many, many years in their closets or basements. I personally have two: a small .22 calibre rifle and a 12 gauge shotgun. They are in a closet. I have not used either of these firearms in over ten years, but I think I have owned them for 20 years. No one knew that I owned firearms. Like many other Canadians, I fall in that statistical category.

It is also a fact that Canadians are in favour of firearms control. I will continue next time, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: You will have a lot of time to do so then, dear colleague.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Speaker: We will suspend the sitting of the House for a few minutes.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.27 p.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4.30 p.m.

The Speaker: Order. It being 4.30 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 83(2), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Ways and Means Motion No. 20 for the budget statement.

[English]

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am tabling the budget documents, including the notices of ways and means motions. The details of the measures are included in the documents.

• (1635)

Pursuant to an order of this House, I will introduce today a bill seeking borrowing authority for the 1995–96 fiscal year. I am asking that an order of the day be designated for consideration of these motions.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, a lot of people think I should sit down now.

Mr. Speaker, there are times in the progress of a people when fundamental challenges must be faced, when fundamental choices must be made, and a new course charted. For Canada, this is one of those times. Our resolve, our values, our very way of life as Canadians are being tested.

The choice is clear. We can take the path, too well trodden, of minimal change, of least resistance, of leadership lost. Or we can set out on a new road of fundamental reform, of renewal, of hope restored. Today we have made our choice. Today we take action.

This is a window of extraordinary opportunity. Thanks to the hard work of millions upon millions of Canadians, our economy is now stronger than it has been for years.

Last year, economic growth in Canada was the highest of any G–7 country. We are projected to lead again this year. In the past year, 433,000 jobs have been created, and Canada's exports have never been higher. As a result, our balance of payments has improved dramatically.

Productivity has surged. Our cost competitiveness is at its highest level in more than 40 years. Canada remains one of the lowest inflation countries in the world.

Canadians want to keep it that way, and so does this government. The targets that we set with the Bank of Canada will make sure that happens.

These statistics tell a story of an economy in bloom; an economy of growth and new jobs. However, there are two clouds that loom over our country's horizon.

The first is the uncertainty that some would create over the future of Quebec. Let there be no doubt—that challenge will be met. Quebecers do not want Canada, their country, torn apart. The second cloud is the debt and deficit. Dealing with that challenge is our purpose today.

[English]

This government came into office because it believes that the nation's priority must be jobs and growth. And it is because of that, not in spite of that, that we must act now to restore the nation's finances to health.

As the Prime Minister has said: "The time to reduce deficits is when the economy is growing. So now is the time". Not to act now to put our fiscal house in order would be to abandon the purposes for which our party exists and this government stands: competence, compassion, reform and hope.

• (1640)

The debt and the deficit are not inventions of ideology. They are facts of arithmetic. The quicksand of compound interest is real. The last thing Canadians need is another lecture on the dangers of the deficit. The only thing Canadians want is clear action. Therefore let me go directly to the bottom line.

Last year, in our first budget, we laid out a firm course of action. We said that we would reduce the deficit in this fiscal year, 1994–95 to no more than $39.7 billion. We now estimate that the underlying deficit for the current fiscal year will be about $35.3 billion, or $4.4 billion below our target.

We will still be well under the target, even after booking certain one–time charges related to some of the major reforms contained in this budget.

Looking ahead, we pledged in our last budget that the deficit in 1995–96 would not exceed $32.7 billion and would be reduced to 3 per cent of GDP—now estimated to be $24.3 billion—by 1996–97. It is now evident that unless we take further direct action, those deficit targets will not be met.

[English]

This is because interest rates are higher today than anyone thought they would be. Therefore based on prudent economic assumptions and with very sizeable contingency reserves in place, we could face shortfalls of $5 billion from our deficit target in 1995–96 and $10.6 billion the year after. Those gaps must be closed. With this budget, we are closing them.

We will hit our deficit target for 1995–96. We will hit our target for 1996–97. And of equal importance, the downward track established by the actions taken in this budget will continue in the years thereafter.

Taking the next two fiscal years together, this budget delivers cumulative savings of $15.6 billion, with spending cuts for $13.4 billion. Going beyond to 1997–98, the reforms we are introducing today will continue to pay off with further savings totalling $13.3 billion.

Over the next three years, the actions in this budget deliver almost seven dollars of spending cuts for every one dollar of new tax revenue. This budget will deliver cumulative savings of $29 billion over the next three years, of which $25.3 billion are expenditure cuts. This is by far the largest set of actions in any Canadian budget since demobilization after World War II.

These measures will have a very significant impact on the level of government spending in the future.

By 1996–97 we will have reduced program spending from $120 billion in 1993–94 to under $108 billion. Relative to the size of our economy, program spending will be lower in 1996–97 than at any time since 1951. The impact of these measures on the fiscal health of this country will be significant and substantial.

By 1996–97, our financial requirements, that is, what we actually have to borrow from the markets, will be down from $30 billion last year to $13.7 billion, or 1.7 per cent of GDP. That percentage is lower than what is projected for the United States, for Germany, for Japan. In fact, it is lower than what is projected for all of the national governments of every country of the G–7.

Perhaps most importantly, in that same year the debt will no longer be growing faster than the economy. The debt to GDP ratio will have begun to decline and we are committed to keeping this ratio on a permanent downward track.

We face a historic challenge in this country and this is a historic response. We have always said that meeting our targets was the least we could do, not the best we would do. That is why it is so important that this year we will have beaten our deficit target by a substantial amount. And looking ahead, building on the advice of the finance committee of this House, for which I am very grateful, we have deliberately chosen economic assumptions that are once again more cautious than those of most private sector forecasters. Once again, we are backing up our assumptions with substantial contingency reserves of $2.5 billion in 1995–96 and $3 billion the year after.

This means that even if interest rates go up next year by almost one and one–half percentage points, more than our already cautious assumption, our fiscal position will be fully protected. But it means something else which is very important. If we do not need our contingency reserve, it will not be spent. It will go to reducing the deficit further. This is what happened in 1994–95. And because of our prudent economic assumptions, one should not be surprised if it happens in 1995–96 and 1996–97 as well.

If interest rates and income growth conform to the average private sector forecast, the deficit in 1996–97 could be brought down below $19 billion, in fact some $5.5 billion less than this budget projects.

We have always said that our 3 per cent interim target was a station on the way, not our ultimate destination. Interim means interim. Canadians want more than temporary fiscal remission. They want full fiscal health. It is absolutely essential that once we meet our interim target we do not stall. We will continue to set firm, short term deficit goals, rolling two–year targets until the deficit is erased.

The Prime Minister said two days ago that balancing the books is our goal. In government short term targets are the surest way to zero. They are the most effective spending control anyone could impose on a government. They keep our feet to the fire. They make it impossible to postpone needed action and they prevent fanciful, foolish forecasts.

The government wants Canadians to be able to judge it not on its rhetoric but on its results.

[Translation]

The targets we set are crucial. But how we get to our targets is every bit as important. Because the fact is that if we are to ensure durable fiscal progress, building towards budget balance—that can only happen if we redesign the very role and structure of government itself.

If we secure that reform, it will continue to pay off in 1997–98 and every year thereafter. Indeed, as far as we are concerned, it is this reform in the structure of government spending—in the very redefinition of government itself—that is the main achievement of this budget.

• (1650)

After extensive review this budget overhauls not only how government works but what government does. We are acting on a new vision of the role of government in the economy. In many cases this means smaller government; in all cases it means smarter government.

We are dramatically reducing subsidies to business. We are changing our support systems for agriculture. We will be putting government activities on a commercial basis wherever that is practical and productive.

We will be overhauling the unemployment insurance system as part of our social security reform, and reforming the system of transfers to the provinces—putting it on a basis that is more in line with the actual responsibilities of the two levels of government.

[English]

It is essential that our effort be guided by clear principles and values. First, we believe it is crucial that the government get its own house in order. Our budget must focus on cutting spending, not raising taxes.

Second, government must define its role in a way that mirrors our priorities as a people. Blind cuts are bad cuts. Canadians need a budget designed to promote growth and jobs.

The third principle is frugality. Governments do not have money. They are given money, money from the pockets of Canadians from coast to coast to coast, and so government must behave as if every dollar counts because every dollar does.

Finally, we must never, ever lose sight of the need to be fair, fair among our regions and fair among individual Canadians.

[Translation]

If our purpose is to get the economy right, we need to redesign the role of the government in the economy to fit the size of our pocketbook and the priorities of our people. What is that role? It is to provide a framework for the private sector to create jobs, to see an aggressive trade strategy as central to Canada's industrial strategy. And it is initiatives such as the Prime Minister's, in Asia and Latin America, that will create opportunity for thousands of Canadians here at home.

[English]

What is the role of government in the economy? It is to ensure that the nation's finances are healthy. It is to do what only government can do best and leave the rest for those who can do better, whether they are in business, labour or in the voluntary sector.

This budget puts our priorities into action. It does so after a top to bottom review of all departments of government led by the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal. As a result we will be able to reduce departmental spending dramatically over the next three years while maintaining the services that are truly needed by Canadians.

[Translation]

For example, between this fiscal year and 1997–98, annual spending will go down by $1.6 billion at Defence, $550 million for international assistance, $1.4 billion at Transport.

[English]

Over the next three years spending will be cut by more than $600 million at natural resources, almost $900 million at HRD, over $200 million at fisheries, almost $900 million in the industry portfolio, more than $550 million in the regional agencies, nearly $450 million at agriculture. In short, overall departmental spending will be cut by almost 19 per cent in just three years.

Let me emphasize, this is not a slowdown in the increase of spending max as cuts. These are not the cuts of yesteryear. These are real cuts in real dollars.

• (1655)

In the last recession every household, every business, every volunteer group in this country was forced to face up to hard choices and real change, but the Government of Canada did not. In this budget we are bringing government size and its structure into line with what we can afford.

[Translation]

As a result of the cut–back and reform of programs, the President of the Treasury Board has announced that the public service will be reduced by some 45,000 positions over three years, with 20,000 being eliminated by the summer of next year.

Because so many of those affected have given so many years of valuable services to Canadians, we are committed to downsizing the public service as fairly as possible.

In some departments the scope for savings has been less than in others. For example, we are responding to Canadians' concern about public safety in their communities by strengthening gun control and largely maintaining existing levels of support for law enforcement, the justice system and correctional services.

[English]

As a second example, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has made clear our commitment to a fair, affordable and well–enforced immigration policy. Therefore, a form of financial guarantee will ensure that sponsors of immigrants meet their obligations.

In addition, a $975 fee will be charged all adults immigrating to Canada to offset the costs of immigrant services.

[Translation]

The measures in this budget share a common foundation and philosophy. For example, across government, we are taking major action in this budget to substantially reduce subsidies to business. These subsidies do not create long–lasting jobs. Nobody has made that case more strongly than business itself. In this budget, total spending on business subsidies will decline from $3.8 billion in this fiscal year to $1.5 billion by 1997–98. That is a reduction of 60 per cent in three years. Remaining industrial assistance will be targeted on the key engines of economic growth—trade development, science and technology and small and medium size business.

[English]

Transportation and direct agricultural production subsidies are being eliminated or substantially reduced. This is historic change. Decades ago, even into the last century, those subsidies were put in place to respond to Canada's transportation and agricultural needs then existing. As time has passed, those needs have evolved but the subsidy structure has not. For years governments have known about the need for change but they have hesitated to act. But we cannot postpone action any longer.

To that end, subsidies under the Western Grain Transportation Act are eliminated effective 1995–96, resulting in savings of $2.6 billion over the next five years. This subsidy evolved from the Crow rate established in 1897. It has played a pivotal role in the development of the prairie economy, but in more recent years it has come to restrict the ability of prairie farmers and their industry to adapt and to compete.

To facilitate this change we will make a one time payment of $1.6 billion to prairie farm land owners to be provided for in this fiscal year 1994–95.

We will invest a further $300 million over several years to facilitate a more efficient grain handling and transportation system. We will provide new credit guarantees to help Canadian farmers sell to non–sovereign buyers abroad.

Next, the Atlantic freight subsidies are also being eliminated, effective in the upcoming fiscal year. This will result in savings of $500 million over the next five years alone.

The elimination of this subsidy will contribute to a better transportation system. To help ensure this, the government will set up a five–year, $326 million transportation adjustment program that among other things will help modernize the highway system in Atlantic Canada and eastern Quebec.

Consistent with the recent decision of federal and provincial ministers of agriculture, a core national "whole farm" stabilization program will be developed, together with crop insurance and province–specific programs.

The costs of these initiatives will be shared between the federal government, the provinces and farmers themselves. This will replace current programs based on individual agricultural commodities. It will therefore encourage innovation and diversification, as well as resulting in a 30–per–cent reduction in federal contributions to agricultural safety nets. Next, the subsidy paid to industrial milk producers will be reduced by 15 per cent in 1995–96 and by a further 15 per cent the following year. The future of this program will be reviewed, in consultation with industry.

Finally, the feed–freight assistance subsidies are being discontinued and the Livestock Feed Bureau will be wound up. A portion of the resulting savings will be redirected on a transitional basis to help adjustment in the livestock industry.

[English]

Financial support to business should only be provided if there is no alternative and a valid national need clearly exists. That is why we have made a clear public commitment that new funding for mega projects will not take place.

In the last year I have had numerous requests for the funding of such projects cross my desk and every one of these has been turned down.

In addition, with this budget we are eliminating the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. It can no longer be justified in today's fiscal circumstances.

Small businesses are the primary creators of new jobs in this country. Removing barriers to their success is a core priority for the government and for Canadians, as is providing practical assistance for them to survive and to grow.

Last year we announced that we would review the $500,000 lifetime capital gains tax exemption for small business and for farmers. As a result of that review, we are announcing that no changes to it will be made.

We see our regional agencies as playing an important role in the creation of opportunity and long lasting jobs. However, we do not believe that handouts are the way to do it. Therefore, consistent with our new policy to sharply reduce business subsidies, assistance to firms will be provided primarily through repayable loans on terms tailored to foster genuine opportunity.

• (1705)

This government is determined that small businesses will have access to the financing they need to continue being our number one creator of jobs. While some progress has been made there continue to be very large gaps in the system. We believe that Canada's banks have a special obligation to help close those gaps. That is why between now and the fall we have told the banks that we will be working with them to hammer out meaningful performance benchmarks for small business financing. Progress during the following year will be monitored against those benchmarks.

[Translation]

It is ideas today that will generate the products and the jobs of tomorrow. That is why science and technology will become a predominant focus for our business support. In the future, our science and technology efforts will be concentrated more strategically on activities that foster innovation, rapid commercialization and value–added production.

As only one example, the Medical Research Council has mounted a promising initiative to bring together private sector capital and leading academic research efforts. That is the kind of imagination we will encourage as a government in order to stretch government's science dollars further and more effectively, so that Canada's new economy may prosper.

[English]

The government is committed to privatizing and commercializing government operations wherever feasible and appropriate. Our view is straightforward. If government does not need to run something it should not, and in the future it will not.

Today we are announcing that the Minister of Transport will initiate steps this year to sell CN. He will also commercialize the air navigation system. When market conditions are favourable the Minister of Natural Resources will sell our remaining 70 per cent interest in Petro–Canada. The Minister of Public Works and Government Services will examine divesting all or parts of the Canada Communications Group.

Let me be clear. This is not a one shot exercise. Our effort to identify other candidates for privatization will continue. This is not ideology, it is simple common sense.

Let me say one thing before leaving program review. We have accomplished a great deal over the last year. We have also confirmed something. Getting government right does not end with this budget or any other, for the essence of good government is in fact permanent ongoing program review, and we are going to provide good government.

[Translation]

Canadians make ends meet by watching their dollars every day. It is time government did the same. Last month, the government introduced a new and much tighter system to manage its spending. Departments will have to find the money for their new initiatives from existing budgets.

[English]

As another example of new and better management, in the future for the first time government departments will have to prepare three–year business plans. These plans will be subject to parliamentary and therefore public scrutiny.

Our approach to interest group funding will change as well. Some groups will continue to be funded as is. For others in a position to secure financial support from outside government, we will move toward a system based on the provision of matching funds. For still other groups, continued funding will not be possible due to our financial situation.

• (1710)

There is no more important task than to do everything we can to help Canadians get jobs, keep jobs or find better jobs. But the fact is that the existing structure of programs does not do that nearly well enough. That is why the Minister of Human Resources Development will be announcing the details of a new human resources investment fund. Many of the department's existing programs that foster employability will be combined under the umbrella of that new fund. A sharper focus on priorities, together with more efficient, streamlined services will yield substantial permanent savings.

[English]

We must also continue to improve the unemployment insurance program, building on the substantial reforms that were introduced in last year's budget.

As has been emphasized so often by the minister of HRD, we need to move away from passive support, away from dependence, toward active assistance, toward independence. In essence, a key job for UI in the future must be to help Canadians stay off UI.

Later this year the minister intends to table legislation that will build on the best elements of unemployment insurance to create a fundamentally reformed program that addresses the needs of our population. It is Canada's workers and Canada's businesses that pay for UI. The program of the future must be one they can afford.

Canada's strong economic performance and the UI reform which the government intends to have in place no later than July 1, 1996 will reduce the overall size of the UI program by a minimum of 10 per cent.

This overall reform combined with improvements in the administration of the UI program will secure savings for taxpayers of $700 million in 1996–97.

[Translation]

Improved employment conditions are rapidly eliminating the deficit in the unemployment insurance account which had reached almost $6 billion in 1993. With no increase in premium rates, the surplus in the account will be allowed to rise above $5 billion through to the end of 1996. This surplus will be maintained and used as a buffer to mitigate unemployment insurance premium rate increases during periods of slow economic growth. The result of these measures will be an unemployment insurance program that does much better at investing in people, and will lead to lower, more stable unemployment insurance premium rates that will encourage the creation of jobs.

[English]

We will never secure the kind of structural change that we need without reforming the system of transfers to the provinces.

This budget sets out some key parameters. Let me be very clear. As we go forward, we are unequivocally committed to a co–operative approach. That is why, to provide predictability, we said in last year's budget that we would not change the system of major transfers before 1996–97. That is a commitment this budget maintains.

It is also why in March of last year, as one of the first acts of this government, we renewed the equalization program for five years. We are not changing it now.

• (1715)

However, some changes in other transfers are needed, changes that will address two fundamental requirements. The first is a system of transfers that is more effective in meeting contemporary needs. The second is a system that is financially sustainable.

[Translation]

Concerning the first requirement, we believe that the restrictions attached by the federal government to transfer payments in areas of clear provincial responsibility should be minimized.

At present, transfers under the Canada assistance plan come with a lot of unnecessary strings attached. The provinces are clearly responsible for designing and delivering social assistance programs. The current cost sharing method no longer helps us to implement these programs as effectively as possible and in tune with local needs.

So we are prepared to address those issues by funding CAP in a similar way as we fund the existing EPF transfers for health and post–secondary education.

As a result, the core rationale for the present segregation of the three transfers into separate categories disappears. Therefore, we are combining all three into a single consolidated block transfer, called the Canadian social transfer, beginning in 1996–97.

Provinces will now be able to design more innovative social programs—programs that respond to the needs of people today rather than to inflexible rules.

[English]

However, flexibility does not mean a free for all.

There are national goals and principles we believe must still apply and which the vast majority of Canadians support. Our goal must be to combine greater flexibility with continued fidelity to these principles.

The conditions of the Canada Health Act will be maintained: universality, comprehensiveness, accessibility, portability and public administration. For this government, those are fundamental.

In addition, we will maintain the existing principle that provinces must provide social assistance to applicants without minimum residency requirements.

Furthermore, the Minister of Human Resources Development will be inviting all provincial governments to work together on developing, through mutual consent, a set of shared principles and objectives that could underlie the Canada social transfer.

This reform deals with the requirement for a better functioning system of transfers. But equally we need a system that can be financially sustained.

Our major transfers to the provinces currently amount to $37 billion in cash and tax points. The cash portion alone represents about 21 per cent of our total program spending.

Addressing our fiscal challenge simply does not allow us to leave that spending untouched. We must establish the fiscal parameters of a new system. However, as a matter of fairness and balance, we believe that the provinces should not be expected to bear more of the fiscal burden than we are prepared to impose on ourselves. This budget meets that test.

As we have said, no changes in major transfers are being made for next year, 1995–96, even though we are taking substantial action that year to reduce our own spending.

For the following year the new Canada social transfer will be $26.9 billion, cash and tax points combined. This will be about $2.5 billion less than the projected transfer would be under the present system.

This means that the total of all major federal transfers to the provinces in 1996–97 will be 4.4 per cent lower than they are today. That compares favourably with the reduction in spending in our own backyard, that is to say, everything except transfers to the provinces which will be down 7.3 per cent by that same year.

In 1997–98 the Canada social transfer will be $25.1 billion or about $4.5 billion less than what would have been transferred under the existing system. To keep that in perspective, such a reduction in transfers would equal about 3 per cent of aggregate provincial revenues.

To ensure that everyone shares in fiscal restraint it will also be necessary to subject territorial financing to reduced limits.

[Translation]

We believe these measures respond to the need for a more affordable and effective system of transfers. But our challenge and our commitment do not end here. With this budget, we are saying yes to the provinces' desire to sit down for a bottom–up review of the financing of both levels of government. If there are ideas to make the fiscal side of federalism more efficient, let's hear them. And if there are ways to make this federation function better, then by all means let's do it.

One of the greatest reforms ever introduced by a Canadian government has been the provision of decent support for elderly Canadians—who have given, and continue to give—so much to their families and to their country.

In recent weeks and months, there is probably no member of this House who has not received letters or had conversations with elderly Canadians who are worried that the protection their country has provided them will be eaten away.

Because of that, this government is absolutely committed to providing a fair and sustainable system of protection for Canada's seniors.

[English]

There are two pillars of the public pension system. One is the Canada and Quebec pension plans. The other is the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement.

Canadian seniors deserve to know that those public pensions will be there for them. That in turn requires reform to ensure that the pension system is sustainable in the long term.

Concerning the CPP the most recent actuarial report was released last week and it leaves no doubt that we will have to take steps to ensure that the plan continues to be sustainable. This we will do when we sit down this fall with the provinces to review the CPP.

Let me now turn to the second pillar, the OAS and the GIS. Clearly it is necessary to make these pensions sustainable as well.

To ensure that our approach to the public pension system is comprehensive, the Minister of Human Resources Development and I will be releasing later this year a paper on the changes required in both pillars of the public pension system to ensure its affordability. The focus will be on fairness and sustainability. Consultations will take place once the paper is released. It is our intention that the reforms be legislated to take effect in 1997.

• (1725)

In the meantime, we are announcing today a change in the method of payment of the OAS to high income seniors who are subject to the so–called clawback rules.

Beginning July 1996, monthly OAS payments will be calculated and paid with the clawback amount subtracted, based on the prior year's tax return. This will yield one–time savings of about $300 million.

Finally, to ensure fairness, we will be requiring Canadians who are non–residents of this country to file a statement of their worldwide income in order to continue to receive OAS benefits.

Let me turn now to the question of revenues. There is not one solitary Canadian who likes taxes. As we speak millions of Canadians pay their fair share of taxes and do so on time. However there are those who do not.

[Translation]

On a priority basis, the Minister of National Revenue will be taking the following measures to step up his department's efforts with regard to taxes that are owed. For example, the interest rate charged on over–due taxes will be increased by 2 percentage points.

[English]

Next, we are announcing steps to make the tax system more fair.

The tax deferral advantages for investment income earned by private holding companies will be taken away.

The current film incentive will be changed. Rather than being a tax shelter for high income investors, a new refundable credit will be provided directly to producers of Canadian films.

Those who earn business or professional income have a tax advantage over many other Canadians. Because of special rules that allow them to select their own year end for tax purposes, those individuals are given an ongoing tax deferral. That advantage is being eliminated subject to a 10–year transition period.

We are concerned that the rules regarding the resource allowance for the mining and petroleum industries are not working as originally intended. We will be meeting with the provinces and both industries on possible improvements to or replacement of this allowance.

We will be evaluating the entire R and D tax inventive program to ensure its effectiveness.

While this review is under way no bank or other financial institution will be eligible for these incentives related to information technology.

[Translation]

Concern has been expressed about tax advantages that may exist as a result of the establishment of trusts, trusts which largely benefit high–income Canadians.

Therefore, for foreign trusts—and indeed for taxpayers who invest in foreign holdings generally—we are introducing more stringent reporting requirements.

Second, this budget eliminates all tax advantages that flow from the establishment of family trusts. That involves eliminating the potentially unfair income spliting advantages that exist. And we are repealing the previous government's amendment that allowed deferral of the 21–year rule.

[English]

Providing tax assistance to encourage Canadians to save is an essential part of our retirement income security system. We are not prepared to compromise the integrity or the purpose of that system. But equally, we must ensure that the benefits of tax assistance are shared fairly in these times of restraint, while also adhering to the key principles and purposes of pension reform.

• (1730)

One of those principles is that tax assistance should be provided for contributions to registered saving plans based on earnings up to two and one–half times the average wage and no more. Therefore, we will be reducing the upper limit on deductible RRSP contributions to $13,500 for 1996 and 1997. That limit will then be allowed to progressively increase to $15,500 by 1999. The maximum pension limit for registered defined benefit plans will be frozen at its current level through 1998.

We are also introducing measures to improve the overall fairness of this system by tightening some existing provisions. For example, beginning in 1996, the over contribution allowance for RRSPs will be reduced from its current $8,000 to $2,000.

[Translation]

Our effort to ensure an effective and fair system of taxation does not begin—or end—with this budget.

We want to make absolutely clear our ongoing commitment to tax–reform.

If we must constantly scrutinize government spending—as we must—then let it be clear we must also constantly scrutinize the fairness and effectiveness of the tax system.

[English]

Despite the size of the savings we must secure, this budget focuses almost entirely on reducing the spending of government, not increasing taxes for Canadians. That being said, spending cuts themselves get us very near to our targets, but there is a small gap we must close. Therefore, we have found it necessary to do four things.

First, the existing large corporations tax will be increased by 12.5 per cent effective immediately in order that big companies contribute more to help bring the deficit down.

Second, we are raising the existing corporate surtax from 3 per cent to 4 per cent.

Third, effective midnight tonight, the federal excise tax on gasoline will be increased by 1.5 cents per litre, raising $500 million annually. This will restore total revenue from all federal excise taxes to approximately the level they were in 1993–94.

Finally, we are announcing today a temporary tax on the capital of large, deposit–taking institutions, including the banks. That tax will be in effect until October 31, 1996 and will raise about $100 million.

Taken together, the revenue measures in this budget are far overshadowed by the size of the spending cuts we have made. For every $1 raised in new tax revenue over the next three years, there are almost $7 in spending cuts. Furthermore, in this budget, like last year's, we are not increasing personal income tax rates one iota.

• (1735)

This budget sets this country on a sure course of fiscal responsibility and government renewal. Our task is not over and our efforts will not cease. Those who believe that the government will inevitably let up in its effort to cut costs as the next election approaches simply do not understand the conviction of the Canadian people that a deteriorating national balance sheet is no longer acceptable.

[Translation]

Constant renewal is what this country is all about. Indeed, it is the essential ingredient of a dynamic federalism.

There are those who would argue that this country, this federation, cannot change—that Canada is about the status quo. That is nonsense.

None of us is here to defend the status quo. We are here to change it. And with this budget we are.

Providing new fiscal leadership. Reducing overlap and duplication. Giving the provinces greater freedom to design and deliver services. These changes respond to positive pressures for change from across the country.

They mark a recognition on the part of us all that in this tough, competitive world, despite the differences we have, we all have so much to gain by working together—productively, rather than standing apart—destructively.

This budget faces difficult choices for all Canadians. But this year, in Quebec, some of us are also being asked to choose a country. To choose to remain proud partners in a large, reforming country. Or to become something else—smaller and alone. To embrace real change and improvement, or to join those who pretend that the road to a better future lies through fracture.

The separatist view has always been the same—its own status quo. Ignoring reform that has happened. Denying reform when it is occurring. Refusing reform when it is offered.

That is not our position. By definition, Canadian federalism is change—always improving, always progressing and today, with this budget, reaching ahead to a new phase of renewal.

[English]

It is customary at this time, when closing the presentation of a government's budget, to claim that the measures being taken have solved every problem, responded to every expectation and addressed every need. That is something we will not say today.

The fact is there is so much more that we would like to be able to do for the millions of Canadians who care little about the world of dividends and derivatives and simply worry about making ends meet. That being said, if we believed that dealing with the deficit would do nothing to protect what we value, if we believed that it would do nothing to offer hope to ordinary Canadians, we would not be acting now because it is they who suffer when government must focus its precious resources on satisfying lenders abroad rather than real needs at home.

• (1740)

For all of us who care for the social fabric of this country, who seek a better future for our children, who are committed to the protection of our seniors and to the independence of our country, the state of the nation's finances simply has to be addressed.

The choice is ours. We can either dwell on our imperfections—or work together towards real improvement.

We can leave the field to those who have given up on Canada—or we can demonstrate trust in ourselves.

[English]

We believe this is the year we can turn the corner and turn the page. It may seem like a long struggle, but the light at the end of this tunnel is much nearer than any of us might think.

Canadians can have confidence now in a government that has put the era of band-aid budgets behind it.

Canadians can have confidence now that their social programs will be there for those who need them.

Canadians can have confidence now in their country being one of the most attractive places in the world to invest, creating jobs.

For too long, governments have known the need for reform and renewal; known the need, but not the will. That has been the problem with the governments of this country. This government has made its choice and it is against the status quo and in favour of a stronger country.

Let me close by quoting from another Canadian in an earlier time, a member of a previous government who, as I remember, did not particularly like finance ministers:

> Government must not live in the past—Every day there are new needs to be met. If inflation is to be fought, unemployment countered and something done, and soon, to get Canadian prosperity back into its stride, the government must begin to plan ahead—not timidly, not tentatively—but boldly, imaginatively and courageously.

Mr. Speaker, those words were spoken by my father in 1957—for his time. That is what I believe we have done today, for ours.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1995–96

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–73, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

• (1745)

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the only thing the finance minister is decentralizing to the provinces in this budget is the deficit, and nothing else.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loubier: He is decentralizing the deficit while making cuts, as we have been seeing since last year, at the expense of the most destitute, that is to social programs, unemployment insurance and everywhere except where cuts should be made.

After the finance minister's usual generalized downloading since bringing down his budget in February 1994, we are now to witness a major downloading of the deficit and of his responsibilities onto the provinces.

The cuts in federal transfer payments to the provinces, specifically transfers for postsecondary education, health and the Canada assistance plan will not be made right away this year. That would be far too much courage to expect from this government during this referendum year. But they will be made, the axe will fall in 1996–97, eliminating $2.5 billion in federal transfers for postsecondary education, health and the Canada assistance plan.

Not satisfied with axing social programs and transfers to the provinces, in 1997–98 the federal government will cut a further $4.5 billion from transfers to the provinces, all of this under the guise of alleged decentralization, a masquerade of decentralization which is really just the finance minister downloading his responsibilities.

These cuts of $4.5 billion to social programs in 1997–98 will of course have to be negotiated after the referendum. That shows how much the government cares about clarity, honesty and being compassionate about education, health and poverty. Not only does this government show a lack of courage by downloading its problems onto the provinces, it has been so hateful as to do it on the backs of the most destitute.

As for the unemployment insurance fund, already drastically cut by $300 million last year, the minister is proposing $2.4 billion in cuts this year and another $2.4 billion next year while at the same time considering a 10 per cent cut in contributions to the UI fund. The finance minister is hateful and arrogant enough to present these deficit objectives, these deficit results for 1994–95, saying that he has reduced his objective from $41 billion to $39 billion. But he has pulled this off by taking the $2 billion surplus from the unemployment insurance plan and deducting it from his forecasts. That explains his outstanding accomplishment; he did not in any sense reduce the deficit for this year, he simply took the surplus from the unemployment insurance program to make himself look good as a public sector manager.

This is unacceptable. While $7.5 billion were already to have been cut from social programs and unemployment insurance over the next two or three years, the finance minister presents in this budget a 60 per cent cut in business subsidies over the next three years. Sixty per cent over three years, although the Bloc Quebecois and even the Conseil du patronat du Québec had suggested eliminating these business subsidies over the coming years, subsidies which most often give rise to patronage, inefficiency and unfair competition. Not only does the finance minister tell us that the $3.8 billion in subsidies will be reduced by only 60 per cent over three years—there will still be $1.5 billion in business subsidies in 1997—he is cutting more than $300 million from CMHC for social housing. That is this government's concept of social justice.

Where is the reform of the tax system? Where is this so long–awaited reform? Where? The minister has been heralding it with great pomp since he assumed the position. He did not deliver. He never had any intention of reforming the tax system.

What did he do about the taxation of businesses? What did he do to prevent a reoccurrence of the recent fact that over 70,000 profitable Canadian businesses did not pay a cent of tax to Ottawa? With what has he plugged this tax loophole? Nothing. He took no steps to collect this money that profitable businesses owe to federal coffers. He has slightly raised corporate taxes, about 1.5 per cent over three years.

What did he do about those tax agreements signed with countries considered to be tax havens? Nothing. The Auditor General said himself that hundreds of millions of dollars are being transferred through bogus Canadian subsidiaries to foreign tax havens. What did he do about this? Once again, nothing.

What did the Minister of Finance do in this budget to cut the tax breaks offered to extremely rich Canadian families through family trusts? By the way, I do thank the minister for getting rid of these tax breaks, but he should have cut them immediately, not in 1999, as is provided for in the budget. Doing it in 1999, what a sham.

By then, extremely rich Canadian families will have had the time to dismantle their family trusts and to transfer their hundreds of millions of dollars to other tax shelters to avoid paying tax on capital gains year after year. And they dare say that they met the demands of the official opposition. The Minister of Finance must be joking.

What did the Minister of Finance do in this budget to reduce duplication and waste? As the champion of restructuration, of flexible federalism, of the progressive backward status quo, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, said himself, the federal government will continue to be active in areas of provincial jurisdiction. He made this comment while referring to forestry and health services.

The budget itself tends to download deficit problems while keeping a firm central rein on areas of provincial jurisdiction. Be they known as Canada–wide standards, guiding principles or by any other name, the budget's bottom line is that over the next few years, there will be no decrease in overlap, duplication and waste in the management of public funds. We are certain that this overlap and wastage will persist because the federal government will not withdraw from areas falling under provincial jurisdiction.

This budget talks of an increase in taxes on gasoline but pays only lip service to the issue of collecting the some $6.6 billion in unpaid taxes payable to the federal government.

If we compare last year's budget to this year's, we see it contains no concrete measure regarding the collection of these unpaid federal revenues. Instead of recovering these $6.6 billion in unpaid taxes, the minister has created new taxes, new needs and imposed cuts on the most needy.

Earlier, I heard the minister talk about agriculture. It is disgusting what is happening with agriculture. To compensate the prairie provinces for the loss of the famous Crow's nest rate and of subsidies for the transportation of grain and for the drop in land values, this new budget will give western producers $1.6 billion to start. They will also receive $1 billion in loan guarantees.

To that, we can add $300 million for the transition. Close to $3 billion will be invested in Western Canada following the elimination of the Crow's Nest subsidy, while there is nothing in the budget for Quebec. On the contrary, the budget cuts the dairy subsidy by 30 per cent, which will have a major impact in Quebec since 50 per cent of dairy production comes from that province.

While giving $3 billion to Western Canada, they are cutting by 30 per cent the dairy subsidy to Quebec farmers, which amounts to between $30 million and $40 million, in addition to reducing their income security. That is a disgrace! They are perpetuating all that has been denounced for 30 years about a system that does not treat Western and Eastern Canada equally in various regards, particularly in the agricultural sector.

I could have mentioned the blind cuts affecting cultural institutions, like the CBC, and regional development, but I will not go any further since we will have the opportunity in the coming days to discuss in more detail this budget, this crock supposedly aimed at restoring some confidence among Canadian taxpayers.

Today's budget does not tackle the real problems. In fact, the Minister of Finance is not credible when he expresses his intention to eliminate the deficit, because he does not address our serious structural unemployment problem nor acknowledge the fact that there are too many levels of government in this country. Finally, he says he wants to eliminate the deficit without explaining when or how; in particular, he did not outline budgetary appropriations for 1997–98. We do not know where we are going after 1997–98. We do not know where this disgraceful reform to be achieved at the expense of the most disadvantaged and the provinces is leading us.

To deal with both duplication and unemployment, the federal government should have included in its budget a proposal to withdraw immediately from all areas of provincial jurisdiction in return for the corresponding share of our federal taxes. That would be a real reform. That was what we were expecting. As far as restructuring is concerned, that is what we were expecting on this side of the House.

In conclusion, the minister said at the beginning of his budget speech that there were two clouds looming over the horizon. Quebec nationalists are crying out that they want more power, particularly the sovereignists. The second cloud is the debt and deficit. The minister is deliberately looking for a scapegoat for his laxness. He has been lax for the past year, and all Canadians paid for it barely one month after his first budget in the form of increased mortgage or other interest rates.

We are paying for this laxness. If a cloud is looming over the horizon, the minister should have added two more to replace the constitutional cloud. His government is the looming cloud. His government has had a year and a half, but has not made the right decisions, leaving us facing huge cuts this year. And they will carry over into the coming years as well. Because the government is lax, we have this enormous problem of the federal debt before us. Another cloud looming over the Canadian horizon is unemployment.

There should have been talk of tackling unemployment, but no mention was made, because it is not a priority for the minister. It is not a cloud looming over this government, despite the fact that 1.2 million people are out of work in Canada, and people are waiting for training, who have not had it because of the government's inertia.

I therefore move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

The Speaker: In accordance with Standing Order 83(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

(Motion agreed to.)

Therefore, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 83(2).

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1995–96

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1996, was presented by the President of the Treasury Board and read by the Speaker to the House.

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to table in support of the estimates part I, the government expenditure plan.

In addition, I will table with the Clerk of the House on behalf of my colleagues part III of the estimates consisting of 78 departmental expenditure plans. We distributed these documents to members of the standing committees to assist in their consideration of the spending authorities sought in part II of the estimates.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table the expenditure plan in relation to the 1995–96 estimates for the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1995–96

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I presented the 1995–96 main estimates for the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

They are the second main estimates of the 35th Parliament containing the expenditure plans of the government for the next fiscal year.

[English]

They reflect the government's commitment, as the Minister of Finance outlines in the budget, to restrain spending, streamline operations and change fundamentally what government does and how its programs and services are delivered.

• (1010)

The main estimates lay out details of $164.2 billion in total planned budgetary expenditures for the next fiscal year. This includes $116.2 billion stemming from existing legislation and $48 billion in expenditures for which we are seeking parliamentary authority.

The main estimates are the first step in carrying out the expenditure plan set out in the budget.

Yesterday we heard the Minister of Finance announce an expenditure plan amounting to $163.5 billion in 1995–96. As I mentioned, the main estimates that I have tabled today total $164.2 billion for 1995–96.

The difference between these two figures is explained by the fact that the main estimates do not include the impact of the proposed legislation that is needed to implement some of the budget expenditure cuts that the Minister of Finance talked about yesterday, nor do they include some other technical adjustments which are set out in part I of the estimates.

Program spending in the budget which excludes the cost of interest on the public debt will decline to $114 billion in 1995–96. It will go down to $107.9 billion in 1996–97, down 10.8 per cent from $120.9 billion in 1994–95. This is as a result of the program review and previous budget measures.

[Translation]

The budget cuts spending. It demonstrates that we will continue to reduce the deficit and continue to meet our fiscal targets.

[English]

The budget focuses on the need to cut government spending and to improve the economic climate so that job creation can flourish. The program review is a central part of the budget and a key element in our jobs and growth agenda. The government launched the review to pinpoint the programs and services that are no longer useful or that could be delivered more efficiently or effectively by others.

We have seen the results in the budget reducing the federal role in some areas and highlighting the programs and services that other levels of government or the private sector could provide.

By 1997–98, and this is important, departmental spending subject to the program review will decline by some 19 per cent relevant to 1994–95 which is very key in our meeting our deficit target of 3 per cent of GDP in three years and of course going beyond that.

I will give some examples of how the government is implementing the program review in an environment of declining resources. First, the government will focus on its essential responsibilities. For example, Transport Canada will concentrate on developing policy and legislation and setting and enforcing standards for safety and security. As a result some of the department's activities such as its air navigation services will be commercialized. In addition, transportation subsidies will be reduced or eliminated and the remaining operations will be made more efficient.

Second, the government is reducing federal and provincial overlap. For instance, Fisheries and Oceans Canada will negotiate the transfer of its freshwater programs with the provinces and concentrate on conservation and the sustainable use of the fisheries and oceans and other resources.

Third, the government will use new technology to become more efficient. As an example, Environment Canada will automate its atmospheric environment services. The department will also be looking into providing weather services in a more effective and efficient fashion.

Fourth, we are promoting self–reliance by shifting away from direct subsidies to business. The regional agencies will move from direct subsidies to providing loans with more emphasis of course on small and medium size enterprises.

Fifth, the government will recover its costs by charging or increasing service fees to those who benefit directly from them, a move that is fair to taxpayers in general. Such charges include fees for immigration, agricultural inspection, drug testing and drug certification.

Sixth, we will merge similar programs for more efficiency. For instance, Fisheries and Oceans Canada and Transport Canada will take steps to integrate the coast guard and fisheries surveillance fleets.

What I have just outlined shows that we did not shy away from tough decisions. We are focusing on the key functions of the federal government and we are going to get them right.

• (1015)

Inevitably the transition from trying to be all things to all people to offering Canadians fewer but high value programs and services will mean a smaller federal workforce. As a result of reshaping the government and the transfer of some functions to other sectors, the government will reduce the public sector workforce by as many as 45,000 jobs over the next three years. That is the largest workforce reduction by the federal government since it returned to peacetime operations after the second world war.

[Translation]

I have announced a program of options that will help employees to move successfully to new lives outside the Public Service. This program, which is comparable to private sector plans, will be fair to employees as well as fair to the taxpayer.

[English]

It will allow us to make the program changes and meet the fiscal targets in the budget. For the remaining programs and services the government will provide services that balance the interests of taxpayers with those of the clients who are receiving them. It will seek cost effective ways to deliver quality programs and services that improve service and efficiency where it can.

Across the government, departments and agencies are responding to the challenge of innovation. The results of the program review and the initiatives I mentioned demonstrate that government is intent on being more efficient and focusing its energies and resources where they are most needed while living within its means, and that means what Canadians can afford. We have a very dedicated professional public service I know can deliver those services.

The government is committed to fiscal responsibility. We will continue to manage changing priorities by reallocating resources. The overhaul of the expenditure management system that I announced recently will help departments adjust their programs to operate with their reduced resources. It will also provide parliamentary committees with the information that they require to carry out their mandate to examine the future year expenditure plans and priorities of the various departments and agencies.

Our ultimate objective is to deliver quality programs and services with the resources Canada can afford. These Estimates are evidence that we are on the right track.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just tabled the 1995–96 Main Estimates. The Main Estimates represent a total of $164.2 billion in expenditures. The minister explained that program spending in the Budget will decline from $120.9 billion in 1994–95 to $114 billion in 1995–96 and $107.9 billion in 1996–97, a reduction of 10.8 per cent.

Where will the $13 billion in program spending saved over a two–year period be applied? It will be used mainly to finance rising debt charges which during the same two years will increase by nearly $9 billion, assuming that the economy is in good shape, inflation is practically zero and interest rates remain at reasonable levels. What we have is an increase of 20.7 per cent in debt charges over the next two years, almost twice the reduction in program spending announced by the minister.

Nearly 75 per cent of all these efforts, of all these program cuts will merely go towards servicing the debt, which will cost us more than $50 billion in charges in 1996–97.

In 1994–95, debt charges represent 33.6 per cent of budgetary revenues. In 1996–97, these debt charges will represent 36.6 per cent of budgetary revenues. Make no mistake, despite program review and previous budgetary measures, the debt marches on.

Program review merely transfers billions of dollars from Canadian citizens to investors who finance a debt that is increasing steadily.

• (1020)

The minister also said that by 1997–98, departmental spending subject to the program review will decline by 19 per cent relative to 1994–95. What the government did not say is that most of the money saved will be used to finance the cost of servicing the debt, as I said earlier.

The government keeps telling us it is reducing overlap between federal and provincial levels. In fact, the government is transferring the debt and the bills without transferring the corresponding authorities and tax points.

For instance, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans will divest itself of its inland waters programs. In fact, this has been going on for some time in Eastern Canada. Why not transfer authority over the fisheries outright, as requested by the provinces concerned?

The government has not withdrawn from areas under provincial jurisdiction or transferred the corresponding tax room to the provinces. There are still two departments of Health and two departments of Human Resources Development responsible for social programs in each province.

If the government had withdrawn from areas under provincial jurisdiction, it could have saved billions of dollars more on its operating expenditures, while at the same time eliminating costly overlap on the federal side.

The government wants to promote autonomy by eliminating direct subsidies to business. These subsidies, which total $3.8 billion today, will still add up to $1.5 billion in three years' time. Why not get rid of them now, since the business community and business groups, including the Conseil du Patronat du Québec, have been asking the government to abolish them outright?

The government also intends to charge fees for a number of government services. On paper this sounds great, but will charging every adult who applies for immigration to Canada a fee of $975 really reduce the deficit? Charging people this amount when they come here seeking a better life strikes us as mercenary, to say the least.

The budget proposes a 30 per cent reduction in dairy subsidies over the next two years. Quebec, which receives 50 per cent of these direct subsidies, will bear the brunt of this measure. Farmers in Western Canada whose subsidies are cut will receive compensation but not in Quebec.

We are also told that 45,000 positions in the public service will be cut in the next three years and yet this is barely enough to slow down the debt rate. The government says it is determined to be fiscally responsible, but the debt keeps growing as it did under Wilson and Mazankowski.

Why were positions not targeted for cuts in departments and organizations where there is an overlap with the provinces? A significant proportion of staff cuts will, in fact, be made in departments like National Defence and Transport, where there is no overlap with the provinces.

If the government was really serious about flexible federalism, it should have demonstrated its intention, when tabling the budget, to withdraw from areas of provincial jurisdiction. By remaining in these areas, it retains the right to impose its standards and its regulations.

Much greater cuts should have been made now, but more judiciously, so that less would have to be cut in the future and the deficit could be eliminated completely by 1997–98. This way, the cost of the public debt would not represent nearly 50 per cent of program expenditures as it will in 1996–97. The cuts planned for next year in transfers to the provinces and the cuts that will have to be made to programs in two years' time will hurt, but, unfortunately, they will serve only to maintain the cost of the public debt below $50 or $55 billion dollars at that time. Difficult decisions are always put off until later.

The main estimates for the Office of the Auditor General are down by 5.2 million dollars, a little over 10 per cent. The bulk of this reduction, $4.4 million, results from the review of government programs, whereas program review is one of the cornerstones of government operations. Is this not somewhat paradoxical?

The budget of the Auditor General is cut when the role of this department is expanding, and the government is telling us that the Auditor General will publish as many as five reports a year. The existing legislation will have to be amended, in any case. It provides that the Auditor General may publish one annual report and three supplementary reports. Let us give the Auditor General the funds he needs to do his job, instead of cutting his budget as his role expands.

• (1025)

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I noted in the statement by the President of the Treasury Board that he says: "What I have just said shows that we didn't shy away from tough decisions" and "this government is committed to fiscal responsibility".

The government thinks it is just a case of more taxes, more taxes, more taxes. Then it says: "We're going to do some cutting all across the board". However, on looking at the estimates we find the spending of the government is going up again for the second year in a row. Of course the previous government did it every year before that.

Every year spending goes up. The government says it is cutting. It is cutting the programs it delivers to the people of Canada because the amount of interest paid on the national debt is getting out of control. That is why when we add the two together, spending goes up.

Let us get the job done. Let us get the budget balanced and let us stop the growth of interest during the first three years of this Liberal government. It is going to cut services to Canadians from $120 billion down to $108 billion. However the interest on the debt will go from $38 billion to $51 billion, which more than offsets all the cuts that are going to be made. That situation is going to continue. Spending will go up and services to Canadians will go down.

Mr. Silye: In their last year they will spend more money than in their first year: 158.7 to 158.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, we also find out about the great commitment for looking after social programs. The government is going to cut social spending by 7.3 per cent. If we look at the cultural programs, it is going to cut them by 6.9 per cent.

Let us get the priorities straight here. Surely we should be protecting the core of social programs and the cultural programs should be set aside until we get the deficit under control. Surely these are the types of things that a prudent manager would be focusing on in a government that is trying to do the difficult job of balancing the budget.

I noticed the Auditor General's budget is going to get cut by 10 per cent. He manages his department responsibly. He says he can do with 10 per cent less. He is the one that points out all the waste and mismanagement right across government. Surely if he can cut by 10 per cent, every other department could get cut by 10 per cent.

That is what the Reform Party has been saying all along. There are cuts; there is waste; there is mismanagement that can be done away with in departments without cutting social programs.

We find there are some increases however. It is not just cut, cut, cut all the way. Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation in eastern Canada gets an increase of 69 per cent, from $10 million to $17 million. It seems a little difficult to explain why one particular area, one particular minister in one particular department can receive an increase of 69 per cent when everybody else has to do with a little less.

The minister tells us he is going to transfer the freshwater management of fish to the provinces. We thought: "This is going to be great. Now we are going to see some downsizing in the department". However, in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, spending goes up from $775 million to $896 million, an increase of $121 million in spending as it divests itself of its responsibilities.

Mr. Hermanson: There are no fish.

Mr. Williams: And there are no fish. However we do have 123 executives in that department. As we transfer and divest the responsibilities, the proposal does not call for any decrease in the number of executives. We have to get this straight. We start cutting at the top before we get down to the bottom.

We have talked about the other place that spends a lot of money. I see the estimates are going to give them even more money this coming year. It is a small increase but nonetheless it intends to spend more money in that other place. We have said to start at the top. Start with MPs' pensions. Start with the House of Commons, the Senate and so on.

There are a lot of unemployed people in this country. We need to help people create jobs and we find that $427 million is going to be spent on our Canadian identity. We would much rather spend this kind of money creating private sector jobs and reducing taxes than spending it to protect our Canadian identity that in many cases has withered away through the multicultural programs that we spend hundreds of millions of dollars on.

Last fall the President of the Treasury Board said that we would have to wait until the budget was announced before he would give us a report on the money we spend on special interest groups. I did not hear anything in the budget yesterday about special interest groups. Another half a billion dollars of government money is being wasted. We could have cut in that area rather than cutting back on the core social programs.

We have a bad record on megaprojects. The Lloydminister heavy oil upgrader cost over $500 million and was supposed to be a great deal. We bailed out of that a couple of months ago and sold our $500 million interest for $42 million. Not good business. With the Regina heavy oil upgrader we walked away from our loan guarantee at a cost of $125 million. Hibernia, the biggest one, is now going to cost $5.8 billion. This government is going to put in $3.6 billion, 62 per cent of the cost and we are going to have 8.5 per cent of the equity.

We have major problems in the way this government runs the finances of this country. When we go through these estimates we are going to find many things. We are going to tell Canadians about the waste, the mismanagement, the protection of jobs at the top and the elimination of jobs at the bottom. We have to tell Canadians what this government is doing. Over the next few months we will be raising these questions at committee.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Orders 81(4) and 81(6), I move:

That the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1996 laid upon the table on February 28, 1995 be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows:

Since the list is rather lengthy, I would ask that it be printed in Hansard at this point without being read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it agreed?

PETITIONS

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise before this House once again to present the 17th petition in this course of action undertaken on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson. April 11, 1995 is the date set for the parole hearing.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law-abiding citizens and the families of victims of convicted murderers.

• (1035)

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition signed by constituents of Lambton—Middlesex and duly certified by the clerk of petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Criminal Code as proposed in Bill C-41, the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality by including the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour on behalf of constituents of Vegreville to table three petitions in the House today.

In the first petition the petitioners request Parliament to support laws which will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime. They also request Parliament to support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the rights of law-abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms. They request Parliament to support legislation which will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have proven not to be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex so as to be ineffective or unenforceable.

I present this petition on behalf of my constituent, Stan Chevraux, and the people who signed the petition.

THE FAMILY

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the second petition, the petitioners request Parliament to oppose any legislation that would directly or indirectly redefine the family, including the provision of marriage and family benefits to those who are not family with family being defined as those individuals related by ties of blood, marriage or adoption, where marriage is the legal union of a man and a woman.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the third petition, the petitioners pray and request Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality. This includes not amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds for discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I present a petition today signed by 30 people, 21 from my constituency.

Although the petitioners and I do not have the same beliefs, I present to Parliament today on their behalf a petition that calls upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

I believe in complete equality with no special status to any group.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to this House a petition containing approximately 3,900 signatures.

The petition is almost presented late because the petitioners pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

It is interesting that out of an area population in the town of Golden which only has 2,371 households, four women went around and collected 2,500 of the 3,900 signatures on this petition. There was a tremendous amount of pressure on the government. The reason I say it is almost presented late is that unfortunately, although the tax increases were limited, they were nonetheless there.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present two petitions today. The first petition was circulated by Mrs. Barbara Gobbi of my riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley and contains a number of names.

The petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

I am pleased to say that I personally support this petition.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition was also circulated by Mrs. Barbara Gobbi of Prince George and contains a number of names.

The petitioners humbly pray that Parliament enact legislation which will protect the unborn children of this country. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to do so.

Here again I personally support this petition.

• (1040)

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions, both on the subject of firearms control.

The first petition asks that Parliament support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime. It also asks to support new legislation that recognizes and protects the rights of law-abiding citizens. It further asks that legislation be supported that will repeal and modify existing gun controls which have not improved public safety or have proven not to be cost effective.

The second petition on the same general subject area asks Parliament not to enact any further firearms control legislation, regulations or orders in council.

TAXATION

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting four petitions today on behalf of the citizens in my riding of Calgary North.

The first petition is asking this government not to increase taxes. The citizens who signed this petition feel they are already overburdened with taxes and are asking that the burden not be increased.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from people in Calgary North. They ask that the government not change the Criminal Code to allow assisted suicide.

SPOUSAL BENEFITS

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the third petition citizens are saying no to spousal benefits being extended to same sex couples.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the last petition, 105 citizens of Calgary North protest the inclusion of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination in the charter of rights.

I am pleased to say that I will be representing my constituents' views on these issues to this House over the coming months.

TAXATION

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36. On behalf of 72 constituents in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I wish to table a petition with respect to the subject matter of GST and income tax.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is presented on behalf of 26 constituents of Digby county, Nova Scotia.

The petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or any activity designed to terminate human life.

I concur with this petition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition contains 107 signatures. Twenty-five signatures are from Edmonton, Alberta and 82 signatures are from Nova Scotia, including Digby county.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

I concur with this petition.

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is with great pleasure that I rise today to present a petition signed by 1,025 people from such places as Minden, Haliburton, Eagle Lake, Wilberforce and Bobcaygeon in the riding of Victoria—Haliburton.

It draws the attention of the House of Commons to gun control. It asks Parliament not to pass into law any of the government action plans for firearms control which deal with the registration and prohibition of firearms and to find other and better means to reduce the incidence of violent crime in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to Question No. 93, which I tabled in this House on October 19. There are two parts to this question. Not only did it take three months to get a response, but, when I finally got it, last Friday, it was only half an answer. I am still awaiting the other half.

What I got was a short paragraph of two lines telling me to go and find it myself. The response was: "Look it up yourself". I went, in fact, to see for myself. What is in the library is a sort of dog's breakfast. Moreover, it is not even up to date. My question concerned federal government properties in Quebec in 1994, and the information I had to look for dated back a number of years.

I wonder how such flagrant disregard for the rules of this House is tolerated. How is it such long delays are permitted? How is it possible to provide incomplete answers and abuse members' privileges? Is this the result of budget cuts or is this another attempt to deny us access to information? Is silence the watchword?

I want information and I cannot get it.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Québec–Est has raised this question on several occasions, too often, I must say.

He got a good answer. On Friday, I tabled in the House a 1,450 page answer to his question. Apparently, he has not read it all.

As for the second part of his question, those 1,450 pages contained the answer. It is as follows: "The Minister of Public Works and Government Services has not identified any riding in particular. However we have a copy of the 1992 real property holdings directory, which includes a list of federal real property in the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada and can be obtained from the Library of Parliament or through a member of Parliament".

This information is available to anyone. It can be obtained from the Library of Parliament. There is no need to prepare an answer to be tabled here in the House when a copy of the same information is available at the Library just down the hall.

The hon. member can go there himself; there is no need to table such a document here in the House given the expense entailed in making copies.

Mr. Loubier: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: As the opposition finance critic, the hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot should bear in mind the costs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. I heard the parliamentary secretary's answer. Let us now get on with the other questions.

[English]

Mr. Milliken): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to answer the point of order first.

Question No. 116 will be answered today.

Question No. 116—Mr. Cummins:

With regard to Dr. Paul LeBlond, Joe Scrimger and David Brander–Smith (members of the Fraser River Sockeye Public Review Board inquiring into the government's management and enforcement on the Fraser River), (a) what benefit or remuneration did Paul LeBlond receive from the Departments of Fisheries and Oceans, Environment and Transport from the more than $1 million in contracts received by Seaconsult Marine Research Limited since 1984, (b) what benefit or remuneration did Paul LeBlond receive as a member of the fisheries and oceans Fisheries Resource Conservation Council, (c) what reports has Paul LeBlond undertaken on behalf of the government in addition to the demanning of lighthouses and cancellation of weatherships, (d) what submissions or proposals have been submitted to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and its Institute of Ocean Sciences by Joe Scrimger in 1993 or 1994 and (e) what remuneration did David Brander–Smith receive as director of the advisory board for fisheries and oceans Institute of Ocean Sciences and what recommendations and advice has the board given during his term as a member of the board?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I am informed as follows:

(a) The Departments of Fisheries and Oceans, Environment and Transport have no information on this subject.

The financial information requested is privy to the company, Seaconsult Marine Research Limited, and the parties contracted by them, and therefore the company or Dr. LeBlond should be approached directly for any clarification of these details.

(b), (c) and (d) The information requested can be found in the answer to Question No. 85 tabled February 24, 1995.

Please note that Dr. LeBlond has also assisted Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council of Canada (NSERC) staff to provide input into a Department of Fisheries and Oceans survey on the use of research platforms by co–ordinating input from the university research community. These activities were not remunerated; they were done voluntarily.

(e) The director's advisory board for the fisheries and oceans Institute of Ocean Sciences (IOS) was established in 1991, at which time David Brander–Smith was appointed chairperson. The board has conducted an extensive review of IOS programs, defined core programs, and assisted the director with prioritization of the program and development of information exchange with stakeholders. Recently, the board has been active in providing advice on coping with program reduction strategies and budget reductions. The board is composed of individuals from commercial, recreational and native fishing interests, university, other government, environmental and oil and gas sector representatives. The objective of this board is to provide a vehicle for allowing stakeholders an opportunity to input to the development and direction of the department's ocean science program. During the time that Dr. Brander–Smith was chairperson, November 1991 to November 1994, the board provided advice in the following key areas:

Program priority determination for the institute stressing the identification of scientific excellence and productivity, separating core activities from other activities, as well as how well programs address key priorities;

Development of a strategy and implementation of a critical program review (peer review/client review) of IOS;

The need for an external scientific review of programs;

Identification of key IOS clients and contacts and intensified consultation with those clients seeking feedback on client perceptions and needs, and identifying ways of improving service and developing more formal information sharing arrangements;

Development of a communications program aimed at sharing information on program activities with clients, the public and within and between government departments;

Strengthening IOS use of partnerships and networks for co–operation, information sharing and communication; and Placing high priority on initiatives to encourage efficiency and effectiveness, as well as developing innovative sources of funding.

The remuneration portion of this question has been answered in the response to Question No. 85 tabled February 24, 1995.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Milliken: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33, because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 22 minutes.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from February 27 consideration of the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise again today, the day after the budget, to state the official opposition's views on the budget brought down yesterday by the Canadian Minister of Finance.

The budget before us consists of the usual downloading of the deficit by the federal government onto the provinces, which harms not only the very poor, persons on social assistance, the unemployed, students and senior citizens but also, as of next year, will also harm all Quebec and Canadian taxpayers, all the while— and this is the most unacceptable part—sparing big business, banks which are given a further reprieve, notwithstanding a minimal increase in the taxes they must pay this year.

Businesses and banks benefit from federal tax breaks as well as from the government's subsidies while everyone everywhere, the provinces, the most destitute people, taxpayers, as of 1996, will pay more and more for the laxness and incompetence of this government.

• (1050)

This budget entails first of all a decentralization of the federal deficit, a decentralization of the federal bill starting with cuts in federal transfers for post–secondary education, health and welfare.

This government is definitely proceeding in an underhanded, harmful way in 1995. There will be no cuts in 1995. It is easy to see why, this is the referendum year. There will be no cuts so Quebecers will be led to believe that this government is doing a fine job. Because it is the referendum year, the true picture is not being given; they hide the extent of this government's failure in 1995. But as of 1996, look out, then we will feel it, then it will start to hurt. The Minister of Finance is asking us to go above and beyond tightening our belts, he is asking us to tighten them to the last notch and to avoid taking deep breaths.

In 1995, the federal axe is going to lop $2.5 billion off of federal transfer payments to the provinces; in this year, Quebec alone will be hit by a drop of over $700 million in transfer payments. Worse yet, with the referendum campaign safely behind them, the federal government will cut $4.5 billion in transfer payments in 1997; for Quebec alone this will mean a drop of approximately $1 billion.

Where are we going to get the money to make up this shortfall? There is only one taxpayer in Canada and Quebec, and he or she will have to absorb this shortfall. The tax hikes in this budget which purportedly contains no tax hikes are hidden, deferred and devious. And the provinces are forced to swallow the bitter pill.

The Minister of Finance does not talk about what will happen after 1997–98. But we know what he has up his sleeve, because year after year—and he is carefully hiding this from Quebecers in this referendum year—his government will remain as voracious, as money hungry and spendthrift when it comes to public funds as it is at present in a structure that is out of sync with Quebec's and Canada's socio–economic realities. Time and time again, taxpayers end up footing the bill for the Minister of Finance's lax approach and downloading to the provinces.

Quebecers will ultimately pay and will continue to pay because, what is left unsaid, what the federal government does not want to advertise, is that, although it downloads $7 billion in transfer payments up–front, the federal machine remains the same.

Have any departments been abolished? No. We will still be stuck with the Department of Health, the Department of Human Resources Development and all other departments that cause duplication and overlap, for which the Minister of Finance is proposing to stiff the provinces with the bill. The tax bill that Quebecers and Canadians will have to pay in the next few years will actually increase, despite the downloading of part of the deficit onto the provinces. Quebecers, Ontarians and everyone in the country will pay more because the federal government has given up some of its financial responsibilities.

What this amounts to is that, as of next year, Quebec taxpayers—because I am addressing them in particular today—will pay dearly in the year following the referendum. They will pay dearly if they do not create a real country, a normal country, a country which will assume total control for its public finances and will take the measures needed for recovery, a country totally committed to the plan, instead of a government that slowly demolishes its plan by arbitrary decisions, such as arbitrary cuts to transfer payments.

Quebecers will pay dearly if they do not make the choice this year that is in their best interests, which is sovereignty, a choice in favour of efficient budgeting and resource allocation. The situation is being hidden from them.

Nor are they being told that in 1997–98, despite all of their sacrifices and all of the tax hikes they were subjected to at the hands of the Quebec or federal government, the federal debt will still be $625 billion. Moody's has the federal government's rating under review because of the size of the debt in the mid–term and the government's lack of control over the situation.

The decision Quebecers must make is becoming increasingly clear, and became even clearer yesterday. Staying within the federal fold in the years to come pretty much boils down to this: fewer and fewer federal services and benefits; more and more offloading of deficit problems onto the provinces, which will ultimately result in tax hikes, because it is the same taxpayer; more bad news year after year; a reduction in the Quebec government's ability to do something about job creation, to put in place a plan to revitalize the economy, bring about more jobs and growth in all regions of Quebec, because we do not know what will hit us next with federal decisions. This is the scenario in 1996 if we stick with the status quo and stay in the federal fold.

Quebecers have a choice to make, a choice that will be instrumental in encouraging economic growth and employment and putting an end to the slump for which the federal government is to blame.

Not only is the Minister of Finance offloading his responsibilities onto the provinces, but he is still taking aim at his favourite targets in a feeble attempt to improve the state of Canada's finances. These targets are students, those on social assistance, the ill and the unemployed. He is still targetting the unemployed, as if they had not already paid enough since this government came to power, since this government broke its promise to help them and create jobs.

Already this year the Minister of Finance planned to cut unemployment insurance by $2.4 billion. Next year, he was going to cut another $2.4 billion, and now he has added a further 10 per cent cut, to the tune of $1.5 billion, on top of the billions in cuts already announced. Is this a pro–employment position? Is this the concern for the neediest members of our society that the red book promised? The famous red book that we heard about for months on end and that they have now forgotten.

All the talk about creating jobs does not square with what we see in this budget. As far as job creation is concerned, the only program set up resulted in precious few jobs, 45,000 temporary jobs was the figure mentioned, and yesterday the Minister of Finance decided to cut the $200 million remaining in the program. Jobs, jobs, jobs—is this what they meant?

My colleague from Rosemont pointed out to me this morning that the government's forecasts show unemployment in Canada holding steady at about 9.5 per cent over the next few years. The government has deliberately, for these forecasts are produced by the government, forgotten all about job creation. It even goes so far as to predict that unemployment will settle at around 9.5 per cent over the next few years. Do you know what that means for Quebec? It means an unemployment rate of 11 per cent that will not change as long as we stay with the status quo.

We went over the budget carefully and found a lot of things, one of the more astonishing being that this record unemployment rate will be achieved and maintained without any increase in productivity. And a good thing, or maybe not. If there had been an increase in the productivity forecast for the next few years, the unemployment rate would probably climb to 13 or 14 per cent in Quebec and in Canada.

• (1100)

At the same time, we must be increasingly productive, improve our performance, for with the globalization of trade, the new GATT agreement and the World Trade Organization, this will be essential if we want to hold our own and capture a greater share of international markets. But the Minister of Finance does not forecast any increases in productivity.

This budget is already bad news in terms of employment, especially since the Minister of Finance tells us in his projections that in the next three years and even after that—his projections stop after a while because he is certain that we will realize how bad things are in Canada—, the unemployment rate in Canada will stay 4 per cent higher than in the U.S.

By conscientiously basing his projections on such data and turning his back on measures to promote long term jobs, the minister spells disaster. While the minister picks on the provinces by shifting onto them the burden of these odious large scale tax reforms, while he picks on students, welfare recipients, sick people and perhaps seniors—he is now putting in place a committee to review all old age security programs—, this government is maintaining undue privileges for big business and the very wealthy.

As far as business is concerned, the Minister of Finance took the trouble to denounce business subsidies in one paragraph, saying that these subsidies distort competition and that they no longer have their place in the new international order, that they result in unfair competition among nearby businesses, or at least among Canadian businesses. He strongly denounces these subsidies and then what does he do? He cuts these subsidies by 60 per cent over three years when, in the opinion of the Quebec employers council, headed by Ghislain Dufour, who is certainly no lefty, he should have eliminated these subsidies completely and quickly. Although he agrees with this analysis, the Minister of Finance will maintain $1.5 billion's worth of direct business subsidies in 1997.

By then, the government will have cut social housing by more than $307 million. What compassion, what social conscience from this government, which talks about jobs, jobs, jobs, about the most disadvantaged, whose rhetoric is worthy of that of the NDP in its good years, but which, in fact, is worse than the Tories, if not very close to the Reform Party.

If at least the Minister of Finance and his government had been smart enough to slash half of the $3.8 billion in subsidies now available to business and redistribute this amount equitably among R&D efforts in Canada to improve business competitiveness and social housing, we would have understood and applauded this better distribution of resources. Instead, not only does he maintain large direct subsidies, but he also slashes social housing and pursues the shameful reforms he started last year.

The same goes for tax reform; preferential treatment is left untouched. In 1991, several thousands of big businesses did not pay a single cent in tax to the federal government, thus depriving the federal treasury of hundreds of millions, if not billions of dollars in lost revenue. These thousands of big businesses, which still make profits despite the downturns in the economy since 1990, will continue to avoid paying their fair share of taxes. There is nothing in this budget which resembles a minimum tax, precisely so that these large businesses can still enjoy all kinds of roundabout ways to avoid paying their fair share.

As far as tax agreements are concerned, as the Auditor General himself pointed out and as we have been saying for a year and a half, there are now 16 countries considered to be tax havens, which help those businesses refusing to do their corporate duty and pay their fair share to the federal treasury. These tax havens help such businesses divert hundreds of millions of dollars by reporting fictitious losses by phoney businesses and deducting them from revenues, thus diverting money from the federal treasury.

No changes were made to those tax havens. Quebecers and Canadians are asked to tighten their belts to the last notch, but nothing is done about such outrageous things. Do you not find anything wrong with that picture? I know you cannot answer, Mr. Speaker, but there is something wrong.

Yesterday, the finance minister—I do not know whether he had a horn to honk but he should have had one on hand—said that businesses, big businesses in particular, were contributing more in terms of taxation and that banks were finally going to be paying taxes to the federal government.

As regards banks, the poor banks, over the next two years, the minister plans to impose a temporary tax, not a permanent one, on them to appease public pressure. Because the public was saying: "We pay. Since 1984, that is all we have been doing: pay, pay, pay. We undergo cut after cut, while banks make profits and pay no taxes".

To respond to this public pressure and give the impression that social justice matters to him, the Minister of Finance plans, over the next two years, to collect a whopping $100 million from them. One hundred million dollars from all Canadian banks. Just to give you an idea of the order of magnitude here, the Royal Bank of Canada, this small bank, generated a record $1.2 billion profit this year. How much we will collect from this bank over two years? No wonder that interest rates went down slightly today. You scratch my back and I will scratch yours.

Where businesses in general are concerned, the Minister of Finance said that they will be contributing to put our public finances on a healthy footing. See how they will do so. Through a 1.5 per cent tax increase. Since businesses already pay $18 billion to the federal taxman, this will bring their contribution to approximately 17 or 18 per cent of the tax pie. The money filling the federal coffers really comes from the taxpayers.

The business sector will pay an additional $260 million in 1995–96, $270 million in 1996–97 and $280 million in 1997–98. The amount was indexed to give the impression that it had actually increased. Did you know that not only this effort represents a 1.5 per cent increase in the "tax burden" because businesses may seek ways to avoid paying it, but it is ten times less than the effort asked from the unemployed this year. Ten times less. And they tell us it is fair. There is something very wrong with this government. It is not the first time I tell you this, but I do think it is profoundly unfortunate. It makes me very uneasy.

The same deceitful practice, or just about, was applied to tax treaties. The Minister of Finance said he was acting on a request from the official opposition. Yesterday, the finance minister literally laughed in our faces. He laughed in our faces because he is not planning to eliminate the unjustified privileges enjoyed by the wealthiest of Canadian families—I am referring to family trusts—until 1999.

This reminds me of the story of the police officer who gives thieves two hours notice that he will be coming over to arrest them. By 1999, some family trusts, not all, because we never said all family trusts were bad, but those used as powerful tax planning instruments by wealthy Canadian families, will have been transferred in other instruments, instruments that the minister has left untouched in this budget. Any tax that should have been recovered on the capital gains made on these trusts every year will be lost. In coming up with such things, the minister is laughing in our faces.

As for duplication and squandering, it will continue. It will continue because the federal government is not withdrawing from areas of provincial responsibility. The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs himself indicated that the federal government would continue to have its say in all areas of provincial jurisdiction. It will continue to pry into these areas, while at the same time contributing less and less.

Duplication and overlap will continue because, as I mentioned earlier, those federal departments where there is a problem will remain. When has a department ever been dismantled? Never. How can one say that duplication and jurisdictional overlap will be reduced and that the federal system is undergoing a major overhaul when nothing has changed?

This brings me to these wild layoffs in the Public Service. There are two ways to trim an organization that is too fat, which is what the federal public service is, in the opinion of the official opposition. There are two ways to streamline: the good one and the bad one.

This government is going about it all wrong. I can still see the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs—I could have cried when I saw him—sitting comfortably at his desk, typing away on his computer, deciding how many jobs to cut in each federal department and crown corporation. Not for a moment did he did think of going to talk with those concerned. Not for a moment did the minister think that behind these figures on his computers there were real people. Not for a moment did he stop and think that these people have duly elected union reps, representatives from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, with whom he could have got together to discuss his plans.

It is obvious that the public service needs to be restructured. It is obvious that it is too large. It is obvious that manpower reductions are required, but there is no need to make wild, inhumane cuts, as contemplated by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, and without any guarantees. There are no guarantees.

Who says that laying off 45,000 people will result in gains, in terms of effectiveness? Who says that the low morale in the organization will not affect services to the public? What guarantee do we have, and this is important, that the Liberals across the floor, who are prone to patronage appointments, will not favour their friends by contracting work out to them? This happened in the past. Yet, there is no guarantee that it will not happen again. There is only a risk that the indiscriminate lay–offs which are taking place will result in a need to contract work out and that, instead of saving money, the federal government will end up spending more than ever before. That is also something which happened in the past.

We always forget that, within the public service, there are competent and experienced people who do a good job. If you contract the work out, it often ends up costing you more because you deal with businesses whose only objective is to make a quick profit at the expense of Canadian taxpayers. Let us not forget that.

As I have said several times, when the official opposition talks about trimming the fat in the federal administration, when it says that Canada is overgoverned, it does mean that the public service is too large and that there are too many public servants. However, there is a proper way to deal with that. We do not endorse indiscriminate layoffs. Even the Public Service Alliance of Canada told us that it was prepared to discuss restructuring, provided it was properly thought out, did not merely mean cuts which will end up costing taxpayers more for fewer services provided by disheartened public servants. This is a difficult situation.

I do hope that the government will again meet with PSAC officials to discuss that issue, something which it has not done since it came to office. The first thing the government did when it took office was to stop discussing, even though it had criticized the breakdown in discussions between the previous Conservative government and the unions representing public servants. This government should sit down with the PSAC. These people have suggestions to save money. They have ideas as to how the federal administration can be streamlined in an intelligent way. The government should rely on their expertise.

As regards agriculture, yesterday the minister avoided the real issues. He did not want to stir up old controversies.

I remember one such controversy in 1982, when there was talk of amending the Crow's Nest Pass agreement. Back then, I noted that there was a very real conflict between the interests of western cattlemen or beef producers, which even differed from those of their fellow grain producers, but which were mainly at odds with those of easterners, particularly Quebecers.

In his budget, the minister eliminates the $560–million subsidy for grain transportation to railroads in the Prairies. However, to make up for that loss, the minister will give western producers, based on their cultivated acreage, $1.6 billion to compensate the alleged loss of land value in the West. However, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture both forgot that the Crow's Nest subsidy created a healthy balance in Canadian agricultural production. Indeed, while western farmers concentrated on grain production and enjoyed subsidized transportation of their products, livestock breeding developed in the East, particularly the dairy and pork industries.

If you break that balance by eliminating the Crow's Nest subsidy, and if you give compensation for the alleged loss of value of western lands, you overlook an important element, namely the impact of such a measure on eastern producers.

Nowhere in the budget speech is there any mention of compensation for eastern producers, particularly Quebec producers, who will also suffer. Doubly so. Indeed, not only will western producers get a $1.6–billion subsidy to adjust, but they will also be able to use that federal money, 25 per cent of which comes from Quebec, to compete with Quebec livestock breeders. Is that the federal government's idea of fairness? Is that the nice balance between the East and the West? Things do not work that way.

Moreover, western producers will get a loan guarantee of one billion dollars, plus $300 million to adjust to the new situation. They will receive $3 billion to make up for the loss of the $560–million Crow's Nest subsidy. There is something very wrong right there. It is unfair to use federal moneys, 25 per cent of which is comes from Quebec, to support the competition from out west on our own markets.

While the West will get $3 billion, Quebec will lose $30 million because the Budget provides for a 30 per cent reduction in dairy subsidies to eastern producers, which will affect industrial milk, cheese, yogurt, ice cream and the rest. Fifty per cent of the dairy products we consume are produced in Quebec. So the government gives $3 billion to the West and takes $30 million away from dairy producers in Quebec. Is that fair? Is that how the government wants farmers in Eastern and Western Canada to help put public finances back on track?

Mr. Speaker, fair is certainly not the word here. As for dairy producers, this merely adds to existing pressures, because we should remember that during the past two years, under the new World Trade Organization agreements, dairy producers in Canada and Quebec have had to face increased competition. They lost one of the basic pillars of the dairy production system, referred to as Article XI. Since that time, competition has increased steadily, as the tariffs that replace protection at the border under Article XI go down and foreign products are allowed to compete with Quebec and Canadian dairy products.

And now, the government is asking them to tighten their belts even more. Yesterday, Laurent Pellerin, president of the UPA, said that farm producers were prepared to do their fair share, but this was too much. This was absurd.

I would also like to comment briefly on the international assistance envelope.

• (1120)

Time and time again, when the members of this government were in the official opposition, they condemned the Conservative position on international assistance. Time and time again, the Minister of Finance—who was not Minister of Finance at the time—and the present Prime Minister expressed their outrage because the Conservatives were cutting international aid. What they are doing is far worse.

The Budget brought down yesterday by the Minister of Finance provides cuts totalling $532 million in international assistance, thus exacerbating a situation where Canada is already reluctant to reach a helping hand out to the neediest international communities. When we talk about the neediest, we are talking about millions of children who are dying every day.

It exacerbates a situation that was already criticized under the Conservatives, and the cuts in international assistance continue. Not only is this government utterly lacking in compassion for the neediest in Canada and Quebec, it is even more so in the case of children who are dying daily throughout the world.

And now for National Defence. Another area where everyone has to do his fair share. The minister says the government will close the base at Saint–Hubert, in Quebec, and will cut back staff and reduce infrastructures in Bagotville, also in Quebec. His own analyst at National Defence believes that, in Quebec, the expenditures by the Department are short by some $650 million, on average. Six hundred and fifty million dollars. This is the minimum figure.

Year in and year out, despite the size of the population in Quebec and the significance of tax contributions—Quebecers pay $30 billion in income and other taxes into the federal coffers, we are not talking about gifts here—despite all that, defence department spending in Quebec is short annually by a minimum of $650 million.

In addition, even though Quebec has roughly 24 per cent of the population and contributes 23.5 or 24 per cent of the federal tax base, only 15 per cent of national defence infrastructures are located there. A highly disproportionate amount compared to the demographic weight and the tax contributions of Quebecers.

Despite all of this, we are told that everyone has to make an effort. We have been streamlining for years, we have been paying for it for years. In Quebec, we have had our fill of paying for it. When they say that everyone has to pay for it, they should have a look and see what we have already paid without getting our share in Quebec of the annual expenditures and investments by the Department of National Defence. They should have thought twice before they did it. Quebecers will remember because we will constantly remind them of it.

This budget is hypocritical, as I have already pointed out, because the truth has been kept from senior citizens. They have been told that things are fine and that nothing will change within the federal plan, just when a committee is being set up—and the Leader of the Opposition raised the problem yesterday—to examine the whole problem of pensions and old age security next year. As the Leader of the Opposition and member for Lac–Saint–Jean put it so well yesterday, committees are not set up to increase pensions.

However, in 1995, a referendum year, the federalists, and the Liberal Party in particular, would lose a major argument if they tackled the seniors now—the argument that seniors' pensions would decrease if they changed governments. They did not want to do this before the referendum. They are keeping the truth from Quebec seniors just the way they are keeping it from all of the people of Quebec. And the truth is that there is no more money in the till.

The finance minister has found a way to betray the Prime Minister's promise not to raise taxes during the first two years of his mandate. Last year, his strategy of cutting the age tax credit for senior citizens brought in $500 million in extra revenues. This year, taxes on gasoline and tobacco will bring in a total of some $800 to $900 million.

This budget does not address the real problems or respond to people's real needs. Maybe the federal government will get away with it this time. Maybe the bond rating agencies will allow its credit rating to stand if the government appears to have public finances in hand. But these agencies will most surely have their eye on the provinces since the federal government has offloaded all of its financial problems onto the provincial governments. So regardless of whose credit rating is dropped, there will be an increase in interest rates when the time comes to refinance the debt, whether the federal debt or the provincial debt or Quebec's debt, the burden will still fall onto the same taxpayer.

This situation, this observation is deceptive. My Reform colleagues would do well to bear this in mind. Nor does this budget in any sense set a strong, solid course in regard to the accumulated national debt in the medium term, something which Moody's bond rating service has clearly pointed out. It is precisely the magnitude of the national debt which worries investors and has a major impact on interest rates, the lack of investments, the lack of significant job creation to recover from an unemployment rate hovering around 10 per cent. As of 1997, and I am warning my fellow Quebecers, more sacrifices will be imposed on them. The federal government will continue cutting and offloading, leaving the Quebec government the hateful task of increasing taxes or cutting spending on essential services.

But that will not be the end of it since this budget has resolved nothing. We will always face a monstrous debt if we do not take steps of some sort toward renewal, true structural renewal, to create a new country and breathe new life into Quebec. If this is not done, we will pay for it and go on paying.

In Quebec we have the chance to start afresh, to create our own social plan, to make an honest general effort not to be at the mercy of this government's arbitrary measures year after year which result in higher taxes any way you look at it. We can decide to extricate ourselves from this system or to keep sinking with the big federal machine.

I think that Quebecers will choose to change governments, they will opt for renewal instead of the doldrums year in, year out, with no real social plan, without hope for job creation, without hope for enrichment, other than the enrichment of the federal debt.

I would like to suggest the following amendment to the Minister of Finance's budget speech; I move:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following:
> "the House of Commons reject the government's budget which systematically offloads the federal government's financial problems onto the provinces; makes no provision whatsoever to ease the tax burden of the middle class while preserving tax loopholes for wealthy Canadians and large corporations; and completely disregards the pressing needs of the unemployed and the most disadvantaged who will bear the full brunt of additional cuts to social programs". brev

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the budgetary policy of the government as contained in the budget presented to the House yesterday. In doing so I wish to approach the budget not so much from the perspective of an opposition party, but more from the perspective of the people whose personal and collective interests are affected by the budget.

On behalf of Canadians, Reformers will be subjecting the budget to four major tests. The first is the employment test. Does the budget address the needs of the unemployed or underemployed in the country? The second is the social security test. Does the budget address the needs of the recipients of government services, in particular, social services? The third is the fiscal test. Does the budget meet the fiscal expectations of those putting up the money, the lenders that are being asked to put up over $30 billion to cover the government's overdraft and the long–suffering taxpayers who are asked to put up almost $120 billion a year? Finally there is a character test. Does the budget demonstrate the qualities of honesty, courage, fairness, leadership and integrity which Canadians have a right to expect from their government?

My colleagues will be applying these tests to the budget in greater detail than I, but let me give a summary of the results.

The finance minister says the budget meets the partisan goals of the Liberal red book and its timid fiscal target of getting the deficit down toward $25 billion by the year 1997. While a few observers and commentators may be gullible enough to accept the red book and the 3 per cent goal as acceptable measuring sticks, at the end of the day the vast majority of Canadians will not.

If this budget is measured against the interests of the unemployed and underemployed Canadians who want real jobs, it betrays those interests because it contains no real long term stimulus to private sector job creation.

If this budget is measured against the interests of the recipients of government services who desire real social security, it betrays those interests because it does nothing to halt the diversion of funds away from social programs into massive interest payments on a growing federal debt.

If this budget is measured against the interests of Canadians who want a solid plan for deficit elimination, it betrays those interests because it only plans to get the deficit to $24 billion by the year 1997.

If this budget is measured against the interests of the long–suffering taxpayer who wants no tax increases and spending reductions which lead to tax relief, it betrays those interests because it takes over $1 billion more per year out of the pockets of taxpayers and lays the foundations for future tax increases.

In short, when this budget is measured against the public's interests; the interests of workers, the interests of those who depend on social services, the interests of investors, lenders and taxpayers, it betrays those interests at every turn. It is a betrayal of trust of the same order as the Mulroney and Wilson budgets of 1984–85 which missed the narrow window of opportunity to balance the budget, which comes only once to a new government, never to return again.

In delivering this sad commentary, I do not wish to be unfair to the Minister of Finance, nor overly disparage his efforts to bring in a better and more honest budget. If the Minister of Finance and his department had been given more freedom and support by the Prime Minister, they might have come clean with Canadians on what deficit spending is doing to destroy social programs. They would have made the target of the budget deficit elimination, not merely deficit reduction. However, the Prime Minister discouraged such frankness and directness and the minister acquiesced.

I believe that if the Minister of Human Resources Development had not utterly failed to provide a blueprint for reforming social spending, the finance minister might have presented the combination of real social reforms and spending reductions. The Minister of Human Resources Development both undermined and failed the Minister of Finance.

• (1135)

I believe that if the Liberal caucus did not contain so many members that cling to obsolete notions, such as the idea that government spending is stimulative, such as the idea that Canada has a revenue problem, not a spending problem; if the finance minister did not have these living millstones around his neck he might have done better.

To be fair we do not lay the blame for this budgetary betrayal of the public interest entirely on the Minister of Finance. We believe the blame should rest even more heavily on the Minister of Human Resources Development, on the soft–headed wing of the Liberal caucus and on the Prime Minister.

As a constructive contribution to this debate, my colleagues will be applying the other tests of the budget which I have already mentioned. For example, they will apply an employment test to the budget to show how it hurts, not helps, one million unemployed and over two million underemployed in the country. As a constructive alternative they will also offer Reform's 5–R jobs program which relies on deficit elimination and tax relief to stimulate long term private sector job creation.

The 5–R jobs program is based on the premise that a dollar left in the hands of a taxpayer or a consumer or an investor or a business person creates more jobs than that dollar in the hands of a bureaucrat, a lobbyist or a politician.

My colleagues will apply a social security test to the budget to show the damage it does, especially in the long run, to those dependent on the big federal social security programs: OAS, UI, established programs funding and the Canada assistance plan. As a constructive alternative we will offer Reform's vision of a more secure society through the empowerment of individuals and communities and the decentralization of social program delivery to the levels of government closest to the people.

My colleagues will show how by applying these principles we can get more social security for more Canadians out of $140 billion in combined federal and provincial social spending than the current government is going to get out of $155 billion in combined social spending. The Reform alternative to the welfare state is based on the premise that a dollar left in the hands of a mother, a father, a family, a student, a senior, a front line care worker is more productive, more conducive to social security than that dollar in the hands of a distant federal government.

Finally, my colleagues will apply fiscal tests to the budget to show how it undermines the confidence of taxpayers and lenders. As a constructive alternative they will put forward the premises and calculations of our taxpayers' budget presented on February 21 which achieves deficit elimination in three years through spending cuts alone without tax increases.

While we are extremely critical of both the character and content of the budget, in the name of workers, recipients of services, taxpayers and citizens, unlike the Bloc and others, we have a constructive alternative to offer. All of those are contained in the taxpayers' budget which we invite the media, the public and members of the House to compare and contrast with the Liberal budget.

Today I again repeat my challenge to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. We want a fair, no holds barred, two on two debate; the government's budget versus the taxpayers' budget. Let us pick a night sometime in the next week or 10 days—to save money let us have it in this Chamber—but let us leave our cheering sections at home, just five people on the floor; the Prime Minister, the finance minister, myself and one of our finance critics and yourself, Mr. Speaker. Let us have only two documents on the table; the Liberal budget and the taxpayers' budget. Let the TV cameras roll and let our members, the media and the public view the exchange. Let us have a real debate and a cross–examination of the fundamental assumptions behind these two budgetary alternatives and the directions in which they lead. The issue to be decided is nothing less than which course of action will get the fiscal affairs of the federal government in order for the 21st century.

As I said at the beginning, one supreme test must be applied to this budget above all others. That is the character test. Does the budget demonstrate the qualities of honesty, courage, fairness, leadership and integrity which Canadians have a right to expect from their government? Again, sad to say this budget fails the character test.

In the red book the government ignored and downplayed the damage that the deficit and the debt are doing to private sector job creation and continued to insist for months that government overspending, such as through the infrastructure program, was the key to job creation. It simply lacked the courage and honesty to tell Canadians that it was high deficit, debt and tax levels which were undermining the private sector's ability to create jobs for hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians.

Now in the budget the government continues down the same path. It ignores, downplays, even attempts to deny and cover up the irreparable damage that government overspending, the debt and the deficit, are doing to social security programs on which so many Canadians depend.

Under the budget plan the government will add over $100 billion to the federal debt. Interest payments on the federal debt will rise to over $50 billion a year, or almost one-third of the federal budget by the end of this Parliament.

Diverting taxpayers' dollars into paying $50 billion a year in interest diverts billions of dollars directly away from spending on all other government programs, in particular social spending, since social spending is the largest part of the federal spending program.

In other words, the greatest and most real threat to social programs in Canada is not supposed and imaginary attacks by fiscal reformers, it is the chronic, unrelenting, systematic failure of a Liberal government to get the deficit to zero as quickly as possible.

Until I see an addendum to the budget that clearly projects the impact of rising debt and interest costs on social spending, the impact on seniors, on people on social assistance, on people dependent on the federal government for health care, the budget is lacking in honesty and courage. It is a cowardly and dishonest budget that fails the character test at the point where it is most needed.

This brings me to the equally important character traits of fairness and leadership. The finance minister calls for Canadians to make sacrifices in order to reduce overspending and the deficit. The budget signals future cuts, for example, in unemployment benefits, seniors' benefits, and cuts to social transfers to the provinces. He insists that the spending cuts and tax increases he will impose are guided by fairness.

As the minister has said, however, the devil is in the details. Fairness and leadership call for those at the top of the government to make the first and most visible sacrifice. For this Parliament and this government that means relinquishing the gold plated MPs' pension plan which so many Canadians find obscene and which they regard as the cardinal example of excessive spending at the top of government.

What does the government do? A few days before the budget it brings out a slightly modified MP pension plan—we call it trough light—which still offers MPs the most generous pension plan in the country. It contains an opting out clause directed to first time MPs, but it offers millions and millions of dollars in pension benefits to senior ministers and senior backbenchers beyond the wildest dreams of ordinary Canadians. It declares this is pension reform. It declares this is equity and fairness. It declares this is real cost cutting when in fact it is not.

This failure to practice with respect to the MPs' pension plan the principles that the government espouses in the budget points to a flaw in the character of the government.

• (1145)

There is no way in which a government member can vote for the budget with its spending reductions and tax increases and vote for the gold plated MP pension plan at the same time, without undermining the integrity of the government itself. So what will it be?

It is the intention of Reform MPs to opt out of the MP pension plan. We call upon every other member of the House to do likewise. "Opt out or get out" will be the cry in the constituencies. It is a cry which must be respected if fairness and leadership by example and integrity are to be restored to Parliament and any budget it endorses.

In conclusion, some observers of the budget will say that it brings Canada one step closer to hitting the wall, one step closer to a crisis of confidence on the part of lenders that will drive the dollar through the floor, the interest rates through the roof, grind the economic recovery to a halt and begin the complete unravelling of the social safety net.

Some will say that the failure of the government to eliminate the deficit now, when the economy is in relatively good shape, will leave Canadians virtually defenceless in the face of an economic downturn.

Some will say that the cuts necessary to balance the budget, when they inevitably come, will now be much deeper and much more destructive because the government lacked the courage to act now. Only time will tell.

However, on behalf of Canadians everywhere—taxpayers, employers, employees, consumers, recipients of services and citizens—I say to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Finance, to every member of the Liberal cabinet, to every member of the Liberal caucus and to every senior civil servant who had anything to do with the preparation of the budget: If the country hits the wall, if the country's social programs hit the wall because of what the budget failed to do, they will be held personally, professionally and politically accountable for the consequences come hell or high water.

I move:

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after the word "budget" and adding thereafter the following words:

"for its failure to eliminate the deficit quickly and decisively within the life of this Parliament and by asking future generations to bear the cost of fiscal irresponsibility".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the address by my leader, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest. It is the only address I have heard on the budget to this point in the House that actually made any sense.

• (1150)

We saw a budget tabled yesterday that had some tax increases and some spending cuts. However the problem I find is that our total national debt, the GDP ratio, remains unchanged. It is still around 73 to 75 per cent, which means that we are not gaining any ground.

Yes, we are experiencing some pain as taxpayers. We are going to pay more to put gas in our cars. We are going to pay higher taxes and, yes, we are going to see some reduction in services. We are going to see it at the bottom. We are going to see 45,000 people cut from the civil service and very little cutting at the top. That means services to Canadians are going to be reduced.

We are going to see some pain. We are going to see some additional costs but we are not going to see any gain. We are not going to see any better future for our children in the long term.

Would the hon. member talk about the positive aspect of the Reform taxpayers' budget in that respect in light of the budget tabled by the minister yesterday?

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his intervention. He puts his finger on the core problem that has to be resolved in the House, I would hope in the course of the budget debate.

After the spending cuts that have been proposed by the minister the sad problem is that we still end up running a $25 billion deficit at the end of 1997. The federal debt is over $600 billion and the interest payments on that debt are over $50 billion.

If members would work through the consequences of those higher interest costs on the rest of the social spending, particularly the social programs, they would find that does more damage to the social services network than virtually anything that has ever been proposed by anybody in terms of spending reductions.

The taxpayers' budget we presented endeavoured to get the deficit down more quickly so that the debt stops growing and this bleeding off of social program spending through interest payments ceases.

I honestly submit to the House that if people would compare those two, the pain of the cuts to get the deficit down more quickly versus the pain that will come if nothing is done and those programs are all eroded by higher interest costs, they would find it would be more advisable, more saleable to the electorate and more acceptable to Canadians to hit the Reform target of deficit elimination in three years rather than the minister's target of cut the deficit in half by 1997.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the member for Calgary Southwest rose to his feet today he said that he would not be approaching the debate in a partisan way. Therefore I was rather surprised the leader of the Reform Party did not acknowledge the fact that there were no personal tax increases in the budget.

I read the Reform Party's budget. I realize that I cannot show it here because it is inappropriate. It would propose a flat tax idea. As members will know, this is something I personally believed in although I call it the single tax and it has a much more progressive design than the member is proposing.

In the proposal of the leader of the Reform Party for a flat tax it is absolutely inevitable under that system that many Canadians would pay more personal income tax. How does the leader of the Reform Party square that flat tax idea with his statement that there should be no more money taken out of the personal income tax envelope?

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question and I will respond to it in two parts.

First, he implied that we should be thankful for the minister not increasing personal income tax. I remind the member of the fact he knows well that all these taxes come out of the pocket of the same taxpayer. Automobiles do not pay this fuel increase of 1.5 cents a litre on gasoline; people pay it. The tax increases of over a $1 billion a year in the budget are going to be paid by real people. Ordinary taxpayers do not care much about where it is coming from. They end up having to pay it.

With respect to the member's second question on the implications of flat tax on the budgetary situation and the impact on taxpayers, I say it comes back to the concern about the total tax load. If we could get spending capped and then down to the point where we could offer tax relief, which is the whole aim of the taxpayers' budget, the total tax load on Canadians under a flat tax system or any other system would be lower than it is under the current system.

Our aim is to deliver genuine tax relief second through tax reform but first through getting the spending down, which is the root cause of high taxes.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have only a brief comment and a question for the leader of the Reform Party. Among the measures affecting farmers in the east contained in this budget, there is a cut of $32 million in funding for Quebec. Of course, the government has also made cuts affecting farmers in the west, for example the Crow rate, but it will also compensate farmers of that region to the tune of $2.9 billion.

This measure typifies what Quebec has a problem with in this country. Money is taken from some areas and given to others, and Quebec gets none of it. Before asking my question, I cite the energy sector in Canada and Quebec as an example of this. We have three kinds of energy: petrochemical, nuclear and electric. The government made massive investments, billions of dollars worth, in petrochemical energy. Hibernia is an example of this. The federal government made massive investments in CANDU reactors. The federal government's cumulative investment in this project is $12 billion, of which Quebec paid 25 per cent. Nothing was ever invested in electricity in Quebec.

This is what we say. I think that what my hon. colleague meant when he said: "We're going to hit the wall quite soon", and I fully agree with him, is that he admonishes that we are on the verge of an apocalypse, and we Quebecers say that our personal apocalypse would be to stay in this system.

Can my hon. colleague tell us his point of view on the differences between how the west and Quebec are being treated?

[English]

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, I could respond to a number of points. I thank the member for his intervention. I remind him that Quebec Hydro has paid no income taxes. Nor was Quebec Hydro ever been subject to a raid by the federal government the equivalent of the national energy program, which is one of the differences between how energy has been treated in the west and how it has been treated in Quebec.

With respect to the agricultural impacts of the budget, I have heard other comments by the member's colleagues implying that there is some unfairness in the government cancelling the Crow rate and compensating western farmers to the tune of $1.6 billion and the 30 per cent reduction on subsidies to the dairy industry, a large portion of which is in Quebec.

I remind the member that the dairy industry gets its subsidies from two sources. One is directly from the government but the other is from the high level of protection that supply management is offered. That subsidy comes directly out of the pockets of the consumer and not from the government. If we add the levels of subsidy we find the subsidization of supply managed industries in Quebec is as high or higher than the more free market grain trade and livestock trade in the west.

It is for members from the province of Quebec to consider that if Quebec is an independent country the capacity of Quebec to subsidize and protect to the degree it has in the past is gone and those farmers would be hurt infinitely more than they would be by any measure under the budget.

• (1200)

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the leader of the third party with humour, not anything else, that if he wants to speak without props I suggest he look around here, then look around behind himself where he came to this debate fully propped for his presentation.

It gives me a great pleasure to join in the debate today, which perhaps is one of the most important times of our history, the discussion of the 1995 budget presented yesterday here in the House by the Minister of Finance.

I do not have to tell the House that it not only deals with the questions of cutbacks, with the question of some of the nitty gritty and the program review. In a fundamental way the Minister of Finance has laid out for this government and for the people of Canada how we are going to go about getting government right.

This philosophy is clear. In order to fulfil the ambitions of this government—I hope of the whole House—our job here is to provide an environment for economic growth, for creating jobs for Canadians and to see that there will be new economic wealth shared by all Canadians. In this context that we have set out the first step we must take is to make sure we get government right and we do things properly here in Ottawa.

[Translation]

This budget will result in considerable savings so that we can meet our red book commitment to reduce the deficit. Furthermore, if the economy does better than forecast in our extremely prudent estimates, the deficit could go down even faster.

[English]

This will pay off not only this year, not only next year, but because we are getting it right this time, it will pay off long into the future.

As an aside, everyone in this House should be heartened by the tremendous positive reaction. This budget has been accepted by Canadians from coast to coast, by people who are concerned about our deficit but on the other hand wanted to be given hope that the government was not going to hurt their lives unnecessarily. Yes, the price is being paid by many people in many ways in many walks of life. On the other hand, it is also gratifying that Canadians have come to a point in this development where they can say this is the right step, that we are doing the right things for Canada. International observers who do have an influence on our success have also seen that the Minister of Finance has taken the right steps and is going about putting our house in order.

This budget is different, very different from the previous Tory budgets. People ask me that question all the time. We are not just making rhetorical flourishes. We are doing very precise things. We are going to be successful. It is not a budget of promises. It is a budget of commitment. We proved last year that we can fulfil our commitments. We will prove it next year, the year after and the year after that.

Most important for people on this side of the House, this is not a Conservative budget in a fundamental way. It adheres to the Liberal legacy of nation building. It is clearly rooted in the principles of economic leadership, compassion and increased fairness. We will not leave Canadians with another decade of disappointments in the development of the budget and the development of their government.

Today's budget is a call for action. It is a time for opportunity and challenge. As our Prime Minister has said on many occasions, if we have to make cutbacks in government, make them while the economy is growing. The economy is growing now and now is the time for firm action.

We have seen in the past year, not because of our actions but because of the collective wisdom of Canadians and their increased confidence, over 443,000 permanent jobs created in this economy. We have seen a growth rate that far outstrips all of our fellow countries in the G–7. We have shown the way among western industrial nations about how to grow an economy.

We do not take credit for that. We understand that it is not us but we hope that we are helping to provide the environment which makes businesses and individuals confident of the future because that is the way that this economy will continue to grow.

• (1205)

We also have an opportunity at the political level. Canadians clearly indicated that they wanted vigorous measures to reduce the public debt so that we can get rid of the crushing burden of high taxes and resulting interest rates.

The challenge we face is just as clear. Canada's economic future is in real danger because of the $500 billion debt which makes us extremely vulnerable to the brutal impact of interest rates.

These interest rates have continued to rise under pressure from the U.S. and Canada. Since October, short–term rates have risen by about 2.5 percentage points.

[English]

It is very important to emphasize this point. I want to say to all parliamentarians here today that sometimes during the course of our committee work we wonder if it has an influence, do the ministers listen, does the Prime Minister listen, do opposition members have an influence. I think the finance committee stands out in its work as a great example of how parliamentarians contribute to the development of policy.

We went through long hearings. We heard from over 650 witnesses in the fall. We came to the conclusion that the government must be prudent, that the government must pay attention to increasing interest rates, that we must take dramatic and deliberate actions to reduce the deficit. The Minister of Finance heeded those words.

Although we seemed to be on the drastic side when we made our recommendations our warnings bore out the truth, that interest rates have gone up and made the job of this government much more difficult.

To the credit of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and other colleagues in the ministry, they responded and produced a budget which showed our own willingness to reach our targets. This caution will be what propels this government to do the right thing in the years to come.

Let us stop and think. What would have happened if we had done nothing? There are voices in the country and voices on the lawn in front of Parliament which say this is really an okay situation, all this talk about deficits is some right wing plot to destroy our social programs. If we had not done anything we would have been $5 billion higher in our deficit this year and we would have missed the mark by $10.6 billion next year. In other words, we would be further behind than when we formed the government on the commitment to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP. The actions are necessary and we are in the process now of taking the necessary steps to rectify the situation.

In order to reach our budget targets as the Minister of Finance explained yesterday we are implementing cumulative savings over the next two years of $15.6 billion. Over $13 billion of these savings will be in spending cuts and there will be no increase in personal income tax rates.

As the leader of the third party said a few minutes ago, this is great news for Canada. We have to realize that we have attacked the problem of government debt while at the same time recognizing the legitimacy of middle class families, that the tax burden has shifted over the past 15 years far to much to them and therefore to their children and their ability to have economic security.

This government has listened to that message and listened very carefully and responded with prudence, responded in such a way that Canadians understand that we are putting this government in order and are calling upon them as a last resort to lend assistance.

[Translation]

We are also taking firm action to make the tax system fairer, close loopholes and increase the contribution of big business to the fight against the deficit.

[English]

Taking the next three years together, the budget delivers almost $7 in spending cuts for every $1 in revenues. These actions are changing the size and shape of the government by hard choices on priorities. By 1996–97 program spending will fall from $120 billion down to $108 billion. This is the most dramatic action seen in any government for decades.

• (1210)

The most important point of all, in 1996–97 the debt will no longer be growing faster than the economy. When the Minister of Finance says on public occasions that we are going to break the back of this, we are going to get off this treadmill, this is the key point. The debt to GDP ratio will begin to decline. That is the key for the fiscal sustainability and that will put us on a permanent downward track.

There are going to be payoffs. We want Canadians to appreciate this. This is the first step. Budgets are not made or broken on one night's announcement, they are made by Canadians adjusting themselves and departments adjusting themselves. There will be a payoff. The payoff is that we will make sure we reach our targets.

We set up substantial contingency funds: $2.5 billion this year, $3 billion the year after. Even if interest rates go another full percentage point higher we will still be able to reach our targets.

It is this type of caution in the pasture which has caused us to reach our target, to do better than we told Canadians we were doing, and that is what is contributing to the confidence of Canadians in their national government. We are saying things that we can do. We are not setting targets five years down the line or ten years down the line so that when a crisis occurs like Mexico everybody says do not worry about this particular short term problem, we can put it off and look after it in the future.

What we are saying in this House is that as a crisis occurs we adjust, we reduce our spending, we reach our target year after year. That is the confidence builder, not having some vague target in the future which says we can reduce the deficit to zero in three or four years. That does not help anybody. That just frustrates people. That leaves a bad taste in the mouths of the politicians who are over promising.

It is very important that every member in this House understand the responsibility that we have in the debate, that Canadians understand that we are going to reach targets and that those targets will be reached in such a way that it is done fairly and consistently. When people look back at the period of the mid–nineties it will not be like it was in the mid–eighties, there will be real accomplishment by their national government.

[Translation]

Our contingency reserves could play a dual role in the future. Not only will they ensure that we will meet our objectives, but, if they are not needed they will not be spent and will allow us to further reduce the deficit.

This is yet another dividend to be reaped through prudent economic forecasting.

[English]

If interest rates and growth do better than our forecast and conform to the private sector average the 1996–97 deficit could drop dramatically. It could be much less than projected in the budget. We could have a deficit under 2.5 per cent instead of 3 per cent of GDP.

The government is being very careful on this point. We want people to understand that our targets are realistic and if we do better it is through good luck. We are being prudent in each of our particular projections because we do not want to fall short. We think that the credibility, not of this government but of the nation, is based on targets reached year after year.

The heart of the process to achieve these goals was not done in the hurried up fashion of a Minister of Finance sitting around a table with a few officials. In my first year the minister would call me in from time to time and we were trying to figure out what could be done. We had only been in office for a few months and it was very much a learning process.

What the minister decided quite appropriately, which was supported by his cabinet colleagues, was to have a program review which in some respects sounds esoteric. A program review gave a group of ministers an opportunity to talk with each other about what they wanted to see reshaped in government, a new strategy within government. It was not to throw around programs and say, cut here and cut there. It was to say department by department, what is it that we have to get out of and what is it that we have to emphasize? How do we redevelop an industrial strategy? My colleague from Don Mills is involved with that. How do we develop a strategy on science? How do we reduce subsidies in the agricultural field? How do we make the transportation system more effective? These are not catch as catch can questions, these are hard to answer; nor are our answers this year the final answers.

We will find this will be a progression of innovation. We will be back again and again suggesting new ways to do things. This budget is going to energize our colleagues on this side to do the right thing and to find new ways for the government to operate. I hope the opposition parties will make suggestions that we can incorporate so that we can develop a stronger and stronger national government.

[Translation]

Of course, we did not wait for the budget to take concrete action. Our review of agencies, offices, councils, boards and commissions—which ended in early February—will lead to the abolition of 73 of these 120 organizations. The 47 remaining entities will be restructured and rationalized. This will allow us to eliminate 665 positions held by governor–in–council appointees and save $10 million a year.

[English]

We could mention a lot of examples that have proven to be really fruitful in this process. Spending by fisheries and oceans will fall $210 million over three years. We have found that there are more officials than there are active fishers. Transport will move from being an operator of the transport system to a role of regulator and policy maker.

There has been a large question raised in the minds of the public about subsidies to business.

[Translation]

In fact, business subsidies will be cut in every department. The reduction will affect agricultural and transportation subsidies that were established decades ago.

[English]

Overall the budget will cut subsidies in half, from $3.8 billion to $1.5 billion by 1997–98.

We will also do other measures on cost recovery, for example in dealing with immigration issues.

On the question of provincial transfers, we are taking action to reform the provincial transfer system. We think that our innovations will create a system that is more sustainable and more responsive to community needs.

In the last budget, to set the stage to show ourselves to be supportive of each of the provinces, we renewed equalization for five years. There is no change in that commitment in this budget.

For 1996–97, the other major programs, established programs financing for health and education and the Canada assistance plan, will be converted into a single, consolidated block transfer called the Canada social transfer.

[Translation]

It is a matter of converting the Canada Assistance Plan to the block funding system already used for EPF, thus allowing the provinces to innovate according to their priorities.

However, the budget also makes it clear that the principles in the Canada Health Act must be adhered to. And there is no change to the principle that the provinces must provide social assistance services without minimum residency requirements.

[English]

The introduction of the CST will see total provincial transfers reduced by $2.5 billion next year and the year after that by $4.5 billion. This means that the total of all major transfers to provinces in cash and tax points will be 4.4 per cent lower next year than it is today.

By comparison, the drop in federal spending will be 7.3 per cent. To put it in another perspective, the reduction by the second year will equal only about 3 per cent of all provincial aggregate revenues. We have hit ourselves harder than we are hitting anybody else.

There are two other issues which are still outstanding: unemployment insurance and support for the elderly. I will touch on them very briefly.

[Translation]

Sometime this year, the Minister of Human Resources Development will be tabling legislative proposals to put in place, based on the best features of the UI program, a reformed program the emphasis of which will be on assistance rather than dependence.

• (1220)

[English]

This reform will take place in 1996 and will reduce the size of the program by a minimum of 10 per cent. For 1996–97 this means the reform will secure savings of $700 million. I will choose another time to speak about the payments to the elderly.

This may be a difficult budget in some ways but the optimism with which Canadians received it last night and today shows that we are on the right track and that we have the support of the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest as my hon. colleague sang the praises of the latest budget, saying that this may be the opportunity we were looking for to act aggressively to put our fiscal house in order. But would he agree with me that this budget did not come down very hard on the banks and family trusts?

All banks are asked to pay over the next two years is about $100 million. This is really not very much when you think that banks are the businesses that have turned the largest profits over the past five to ten years. Last year alone, the Royal Bank's net profit was $1.2 billion. And this is just one bank.

In addition, by deferring changes regarding family trusts to 1999, or five years down the road, the wealthiest segment of our society will have ample time to find another place where to put their money away to avoid any form of taxation. Considering that the government could have brought in perhaps as much as $1 billion from these trusts alone, does the hon. member really think that his government took firm and fair action?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, the hon. member raised two issues on which I would like to comment. First, with respect to family trusts, we have removed all tax advantages related to these trusts and reduced the allowed deferral under the 21–year rule. We are beginning immediately to take action on family trusts.

[English]

There are two questions under family trusts. One is the question of income dispersed to beneficiaries which is going to be changed immediately. The other is the question of the capital tax. The 21–year rule is effective in 1999 which is the time it takes given the fact that the Conservative government eliminated the rule. There had to be a few years to allow for adjustment. On the income issue we will begin immediately; on the capital issue we begin.

[Translation]

On the other issue, the bank issue, we are raising a special tax on banks, which will bring in $60 million just this year.

[English]

We think this is a great step forward. It will begin to deal with the banks on several issues we think they should be addressing immediately.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to the transfers to provinces and said that, in his opinion, provinces would not be really affected, considering the cuts involved. This raises the whole issue of national standards. What will happen to standards?

The budget makes several mentions to such standards, but they are not very clear. I wonder if the hon. member could give us his own view on that issue. In his speech, the Minister of Finance said, and I quote: "Provinces will now be able to design more innovative social programs— programs that respond to the needs of people today rather than to inflexible rules".

Thus, and that is a step in the right direction, the minister does confirm that, in the past, there were some inflexible rules. But the sentence which follows is the one for which I would appreciate an explanation. It reads: "However, flexibility does not mean a free–for–all". That sentence appears in italics in the budget speech. What does the minister mean when he says: "flexibility does not mean free–for–all"?

It means that the federal government will continue to exert some control. Yesterday, the Minister of Human Resources Development, who was participating in a radio show with me, said that before the government had no control over funds but that would now change because the federal government would define standards, in co–operation with the provinces.

• (1225)

We all know what joint standards mean. Therefore, I wonder if the hon. member could explain the statement to the effect that flexibility does not mean free–for–all.

[English]

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question. This area is both old and new in Canadian politics, that is to say, how do we transfer money to the provinces?

Essentially the federal government's strategy since the mid–1960s has been to have a program called the Canada assistance plan. It allows the provinces to access money freely if they fulfil certain federal conditions. In the 1977 EPF program, we said to the provinces that they would have block funding for post–secondary education and health as long as they conformed to the Canada Health Act.

In several discussions going back to the early 1980s the provinces have been asking for greater flexibility in the Canada assistance plan to enable them to design more innovative social programs. At the same time there is the feeling at the national level by many national interest groups that as one moves about the country support for post–secondary education is varied. The types of services available under the Canada assistance plan are varied.

We have said to let us go back to the first principles. Let us move toward a way in which we can give the provinces a wider range of flexibility through social transfers. At the same time, as a national government we have to make sure we are true to the principles we want as a Liberal government. Through the budget consultations which normally take place when the budget laws are introduced, we will have an opportunity to discuss it. I am sure the ministers of finance and social policy as well as the prime minister will want to talk about it.

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary on his speech and tell him how much I enjoyed working with him on the Standing Committee on Finance.

He made reference to the fact that the work of the committee had a big impact on the minister and the results of his budget. I agree that I could see a direct reflection in the budget of the recommendations made by the committee and the details provided to us by individual Canadians. The committee provided an important venue for Canadians to participate in the debate on the budget which is so important to them.

Does the parliamentary secretary expect that the Minister of Finance will continue this participative process with the Canadian public? Will the minister ask the committee yet again to be involved in the process as we prepare for our next budget?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, it is going to be a much more elaborate process next year, in a good sense of the word elaborate. We all learned something last year. I think we would like to start a little earlier.

The consultations by the finance committee is a House order. We are mandated by the House to do these consultations. We will continue with them.

I can also point out that the government itself has changed the way that departments produce their budgets. Each committee is now going to be involved with the budget preparation. We are going to build upon last year's success. We are going to have a very strong process. The finance committee will be the centre of it, but unlike this year, we will not be the only participants. I welcome the work of other committees to make sure we improve the budget on an annual basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the parliamentary secretary if he shares my impression to the effect that there is very little in terms of job creation programs. The Minister of Finance is somewhat like a discouraged unemployed worker who sells his tool box because he feels he will never find another job.

I do not see any job creation initiatives in this budget. Rather, I am under the impression that the minister is selling his wood to pay for his stove. There is something wrong in all of this.

Can the parliamentary secretary tell us what miraculous solutions he sees to promote job creation?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, last year we announced our infrastructure program. That program enabled us to create many jobs and implement many projects.

• (1230)

This budget will allow us to pursue our job creation efforts right across the country. I am convinced that our strategy will be successful.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I have the honour of welcoming the Leader of the Opposition among us, once again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Madam Speaker, 16 months after the October 1993 election, the government just made a very sharp turn. Indeed, the government has now stopped claiming, as it did for most of 1994, that there was no real fiscal crisis in Ottawa and that it could just surf on the wave of economic recovery, a wave which largely came from south of the border.

When a country with a debt as huge as ours anticipates, as the federal government did in its February 1994 budget, a reduction of its deficit based on totally extravagant assumptions regarding interest rates, that does not reassure anyone, let alone creditors, whether in Canada or abroad. Because of the irresponsible action of the federal government, these creditors have become the true masters and judges of Canada's fiscal position. Since the Canadian government needs foreign lenders, the latter have had ample opportunity, in recent months, to signal the end of the party. A weak dollar and high interest rates are two phenomena that have become inseparable. At this very moment, real interest rates are among the highest we have ever known. The cause is as straightforward as it is shocking: by March 31, 1995, the federal debt will be $546 billion or 73.2 per cent of GDP. If we add to this what the provincial debt will be on the same date, $210 billion, the total equals 102 per cent of GDP.

This means that a country as rich as Canada has practically lost its monetary and budgetary autonomy. One third of federal revenues, $42 billion, will be spent this year on servicing the debt.

Perhaps I may digress at this point because there is a comment I would like to make. Two billion more or less may not be that important, but I was nevertheless surprised when in his speech on October 18, 1994 before the Standing Committee on Finance, the Minister of Finance evaluated debt charges for 1994–95 at $44.3 billion, and then reduced this to $42 billion in his budget yesterday, although interest rates had gone up considerably since October 1994, something no one could have foreseen. This is rather interesting, and I have a distinct impression that the Minister of Finance occasionally lets politics, with a small p, play a part in his financial forecast. Yesterday's budget is certainly no exception. So much for that.

Our creditors snapped their fingers and, lo and behold, the little red book drafted by the same Minister of Finance went up in smoke. Cuts in social programs, providing for a surplus in the UI account that will be allowed to rise above $5 billion, the savage downsizing of cash transfers to the provinces: none of this was on the red book's agenda.

On this side of the House, we talked about cutting the fat in the federal apparatus, a possible reduction in the defence budget, and getting rid of tax shelters and duplication of services by the federal government and the provinces. On the other side of the House, they just laughed and said somewhat condescendingly: Sure, we know the Bloc wants to dismantle the federal government. You want to cut $6 billion from the government's operating budget, plus 2 billion from the defence budget, while Canada spends less on defence than any other NATO country. Now be sensible! That is what they told us not so long ago.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance told us we were right. In three years, non statutory spending by federal departments will be cut by $9.8 billion, in real dollars. Better late than never, although the many targets of the government's program review do not necessarily deserve the kind of treatment they get in the budget, a budget that takes a hard line on social programs and tries to manipulate the public.

[English]

Listening yesterday to the Minister of Finance I was reminded of a song by Dinah Washington at the end of the fifties. Some members may remember What a difference a day makes, a nice soft ballad. Yesterday's budget could have been subtitled: "What a difference a year makes".

• (1235)

Remember last year. Who was talking about the debt crisis, the fat in the federal government, the wasteful overlapping between federal and provincial governments, and so on? Was it the Liberals? Of course not. They were all or almost all singing together from their bible, the red book. The Prime Minister was saying: "What debt crisis? Canada is okay". A year later, sobered by the money markets which are now calling the shots—he who lends to the piper calls the tune—the same Liberals are cutting with a vengeance.

The objective of a 3 per cent deficit to GDP ratio, the alpha and the omega of budget discipline in the red book, has become a simple marker on the way to a balanced budget. No date has been set aside for this new objective, but one senses that the Minister of Finance would like to get there as soon as possible and, I would add, at almost any cost.

For example, he becomes lyrical on the possibility that the deficit could be below $19 billion in the 1996–97 fiscal year. I would like to sound a note of caution here for two different reasons.

The first one refers to that inscrutable thing we call the future. The future has a way of messing things up. The Minister of Finance knows this very well. Just last year his interest rate forecasts were solidly off base barely two months after the budget was brought down in the House. Who predicted the Mexican crisis which began last December 21? Nobody, publicly anyway. On December 20, if we believed the pundits, Mexico was doing fine.

I am told that economists like many other respected professionals tend to follow the herd. This explains, at least in part, why their forecasts are very often interchangeable and consistently miss the turning points. All recessions have been predicted after the fact. To be more precise, one can feel uncomfortable with the budget assumption about real GDP growth. Last year the GDP growth assumptions for 1994 and 1995 were 3 per cent and 3.8 per cent. The first one underestimated it by a wide margin for it finally was 4.3 per cent, thanks in part to the strength of the American economy.

This year the assumption for 1995 is the same as last year, 3.8 per cent. This sounds a little strange in view of the fact that interest rates are projected to be so much higher this year than was anticipated last year. Already there are signs that high interest rates are biting into consumer demand. We certainly cannot exclude the possibility of 2.5 per cent real growth this year. In such a case the Minister of Finance's plan will be set back.

But there is another reason for our caution. Real expenditure cuts are one thing and the program review is supposed to deliver them. However there are other cuts in the budget which rather fit in the smoke and mirrors category.

[Translation]

The budget stresses the importance of a second set of reductions involving cuts in transfers to the provinces. Transfer payments basically cover three different programs: the Canada Assistance Plan, Established Programs Financing, which includes health care and post–secondary education, and equalization. Their treatment is not necessarily the same. The federal government's calculation of these payments not only includes cash payments but also the revenue yielded by tax points transferred to the provinces under cost–sharing agreements. This makes the federal government look good. However, it has no control over what the provinces make of these tax points and can certainly not take them back: there was never any question of its doing so. What the federal government controls are cash transfers, and how they change is the true measure of federal fairness.

Here is where the federal government strikes a real blow. Convinced that, and I quote from the budget speech: "At present, transfers under the Canada assistance plan come with a lot of unnecessary strings attached, which limit the flexibility of the provinces to innovate", the federal government decided to combine them with the established programs financing into a single program, as of 1996–97, to be known as the Canada social transfer.

This program will continue to include, in federal accounting, both tax points and cash transfers. And, for the federal government, this is the beauty of the thing. For three reasons.

The first reason is that this arrangement means a significant reduction in cash transfers, which are the only real expenditure for the federal government, and it means the government can show financial markets a more impressive record in deficit terms, while presenting a different image to Canadian public opinion, and this is the second advantage, thanks to the tax point transfer being included in the calculation.

Also according to the budget speech, and I quote: "This means that the total of all major federal transfers to the provinces in 1996–97 will be 4.4 per cent lower than they are today. That compares favourably with the reduction in spending in our own backyard—that is, everything except transfers to the provinces—which will be down 7.3 per cent by that same year".

The third advantage of launching the Canada social transfer lies in the date of ignition: not this year, but early in 1996–97, in other words, after the referendum. This point is revealing, unintentionally, of course, but revealing nonetheless. If this new program were so beneficial to the provinces, including Quebec, and if it really demonstrated the flexibility of Canadian federalism, should it not be operational by the start of the new fiscal year, that is by April 1? This way, Quebecers could examine the quality of the merchandise with their own eyes before making their historical choice in the referendum. In actual fact, there is no chance in the world this will happen. We will see why. All provinces are concerned.

[English]

All provinces are directly concerned about the impact of the new Canada social transfer. If one looks at the cash transfers that come with it on page 33 of the budget speech, one sees the unvarnished truth.

From 1994–95 to 1996–97 cash transfers from this program will fall from $17.3 billion to $12.9 billion, a $4.4 billion drop. One needs to take into account equalization grants, which increase from year to year, to obtain the global picture for transfer payments to provinces. When one does so there is still a drop of $3.6 billion in federal transfers to provinces over a two–year period. As a matter of fact this represents a real 14 per cent decline, not the theoretical 4.4 per cent the Minister of Finance would like us to believe, hence a more drastic decline than the one experienced by total federal program spending.

Who is going to be fooled by the pretence of such a program to define a more decentralized federal system when its sole motive is to cut federal spending? A last proof, if need be, that this is not a one–shot program but rather a constantly vanishing one. The global sum—fiscal and cash transfers—is available for the Canada transfer program in 1997–98 but not the cash transfer separately.

However, having both fiscal and cash transfers separately for each year from 1994–95 to 1996–97 makes it quite easy to produce a good estimate for the cash transfers part in 1997–98. It amounts to about $10.3 billion or $2.5 billion less than in 1996–97. Flexible federalism, maybe, but for whom?

This cut in the Canadian social transfer to the provinces represents more than 40 per cent of the reduction in federal program spending between 1994–95 and 1996–97. It allows the federal government to trumpet the achievement of a less than $25 billion deficit in that last year. It may or may not raise eyebrows in the money markets, but it is almost certain that many provinces will have to accept higher deficits in order to cope with the cold wind blowing from Ottawa.

• (1245)

For Quebec, there is more to come and there is worse still. Information on cash transfers both before and on implementation of the Canadian social transfer shows that Quebec will suffer a net loss of nearly $700 million in 1996–97 alone. For 1997–98, the loss will amount to nearly $2 billion. In view of this, the budget speech is rather comic if not somewhat ludicrous. I wondered how the finance minister could have kept from laughing when reading to this House the part of his speech praising the innovative approach the provinces could take from now on in managing their social programs.

His composure and self–control must have been seriously tested when he read the following passage, and I quote: "With the Canadian social transfer, provinces will now be able to design more innovative social programs—programs that respond to the needs of people today rather than to inflexible rules". And he continued, deadpan as ever, and I quote again: "However, flexibility does not mean a free–for–all". The federal government is creating a program which will take $2.5 billion from Quebec over three years, but wait, that is not all. There are still standards to be met. Big Brother is cutting and keeps on cutting, but is still issuing orders. Is this stupidity or sheer arrogance?

It takes a lot of nerve to speak to the provinces in such a tone, just before tying them up in a financial straitjacket. Good news, the minister tells them, I am cutting $7 billion but at the same time I am letting you use your imagination. The budget and the minister do not say so, but we know very well how provincial leaders will have to use their creativity. They will have to be creative in devising new cuts to services and racking their brains to prevent their deficits from ballooning out of control.

This will be a merciless process, with a domino effect causing one level of government to fall after another. But in the end, the taxpayer will bear the brunt of it all. For the unemployed, the poor, the sick, the minister's skilful manipulation of figures and evasion of responsibility will result in awfully concrete realities: a reduction in unemployment insurance benefits, the elimination of assistance programs, reduced health insurance coverage. That is without counting seniors, who will be informed of the results of the minister's review of their old age pensions next year, after the referendum. At the very least, seniors must be thinking that when a Minister of Finance reviews a social program, it is not to see whether he can increase funding.

Then, there is the more specific issue of fairness toward Quebec in the implementation of certain programs. I am thinking in particular about the farming sector. Quebec's dairy farmers have been hard hit by a 30 per cent cut in dairy subsidies. No compensation.

Farmers from the west are faced with the elimination of the Crow rate, a grain transportation subsidy. However, they are being very generously compensated by non–taxable cash payments. Double standard. Regrettably, there is another case. We will talk more about the other cases in the next few days. In the defence sector, for example, a recent study found that Quebec is getting $600 million less per year than the share of military contracts and spending it would get if its share were weighted according to its population.

Six hundred million dollars per year, and to top it off, Quebec does not have its quota of Canadian military bases. Already, it is getting short shrifted out of defence spending, should it not get its fair share of military bases? So what does the budget say? Another Quebec military base, Saint–Hubert, will be closed and staff at another, in Bagotville, will be cut. You may reply that there will also be cuts in the rest of Canada. No. Of course there will be cuts elsewhere, the scale is already off kilter. The latest decisions only tip the scale more in their favour. Even if we take transfer payments into account in comparing the current situation with the situation that will be created once the new transfer payment arrangements are implemented, we must draw the same conclusion.

In Quebec, federal transfers are going to shrink away: $7.4 billion today; in three years, $6 billion. Another paragraph from the budget seems to predict even darker hours: "So we are prepared to address those issues by funding CAP in a similar way as we fund the existing EPF transfers for health and post–secondary education". This statement is very ambiguous. Quebec receives approximately 35 per cent of CAP's funds and some 25 per cent of EPF transfers. But if demographic considerations take precedence over those of real need in calculating the Canada social transfer, the result will of course be an additional shortfall of several hundreds of millions of dollars for Quebec.

One paragraph in the budget plan suggests that such a reorientation is not beyond the realm of possibility. One of the justifications given for the new Canada social transfer is as follows, and I quote: "Federal expenditures will no longer be driven by provincial decisions on how, and to whom, to provide social assistance and social services". This looks very much like a pulling back from a more socially oriented approach.

And what better time to point out the very real asymmetry of Canadian federalism? If the federal government does not like the provinces forcing its hand, it could draw a line and withdraw beyond it. But for decades the provinces, particularly Quebec, have had to bow to the wishes of the federal government, with no power to keep it from interfering. It is probably in the field of health that this relative powerlessness of the provinces is the most in evidence. The budget states in no uncertain terms that the federal government will make increasingly smaller payments for health costs, while ordering the provinces, who already carry the bulk of the financial burden, to meet the standards set out in the Canada Health Act.

Less for health, less for social assistance, less for the unemployed. When we know that the elderly now account for 40 per cent of all health care needs, and that this proportion will continue to grow, we can only conclude that this budget marks a change of direction in social policy that could indeed be described as harsh and insensitive. Is Canada so poor, is social solidarity so fragile that the poorest and most helpless in our society must bear the brunt of the necessary fight against public waste?

However, this change in social policy will not take effect tomorrow but only a year from now. The government is trying not only to impress the financial community but also to influence the results of the referendum by postponing until after the Quebec referendum all projects it is about to cut and slash. When will it clear–cut transfer payments to the provinces? In one year. New UI restrictions? They will be discussed in the fall and start in July 1996. What about the debate on income security for seniors? In the fall, with major changes already proposed for implementation at the beginning of 1997, particularly for the old age security pension.

[English]

One does not need to be a rocket scientist to realize that the federal government is playing the waiting game. It would dearly love to see the referendum take place tomorrow. But how could anybody decide now between two fundamental options when the federal side does not want to clarify its position on all those dossiers that it is keeping in its bosom? Does it think Quebecers have forgotten about May 1980? The trap was sprung once. It will not happen a second time. I say to those in front of me: "Clear the air. Show us what you have up your sleeve. The people want to know what you are going to offer them".

One thing at least is clear. All the hoopla about the budget led some to believe it could rekindle the flame of a new federalism where the federal government would retire from provincial jurisdictions and send the appropriate fiscal resources to the provinces. For many people the deception must be all the more cruel. The idea of a dominant central government and of 10 "infeodated" provinces is as present as ever.

• (1255)

Canadian federalism encompasses financial and regulatory powers. For a long time, the federal government enjoyed both types of powers. Today, because of its meddling, it lacks financial power. That is why it holds on to regulatory powers in the name of a certain conception of the Canadian "nation" that the people of Quebec have always rejected. If the federal government manages to shift a significant part of its deficit to the provinces, it will clean up its finances, at others' expense, of course. It is already thinking about it, as the budget clearly shows. Many observers feel that there is an automatic link between the federal debt and the distribution of powers. Things are not so simple. Reducing the size of government is one thing, but a genuine decentralization is something else. Clearly, the federal strategy is to do the former without a serious commitment to decentralize and therefore without a coherent vision of the future relationship between Quebec and the rest of Canada. That is the budget's main lesson. It is probably a history lesson but for reasons that are the opposite of those put forward by the author.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to the budget.

Our position is very clear. International markets have reacted favourably to this budget. Of course, the Reform Party feels that the cuts do not go deep enough. They wanted the government to slash more deeply. We remember the so–called budget they tabled a few days ago—I say so–called budget because it did not generate any positive comments. They tabled this document to convince Canadians that they were competent enough to bring down a budget. All this so–called budget did was to propose deeper cuts across the country.

And then this morning, the Bloc, the official opposition, said that we cut too much or not enough. I listened to their speeches with a great deal of attention and I am not sure that I know what they want. What do they want: more cuts, fewer cuts, different cuts? I do not know.

I have just heard a comment to the effect that the Bloc's suggestion that the size of government should be reduced was held holding to ridicule by the Liberals, and now we are told that we have finally realized that there was some fat to trim after all and made cuts. Is there not a glaring contradiction between these statements?

It seems to me that there is a glaring contradiction. If I am wrong, my hon. colleagues will no doubt ask questions and clarify their position. I would be only too happy. We find ourselves today stuck between the far right and the left—I would even say the far left at times. This is not a bad position at all.

What do the people of Manitoba have to say about this budget? I thought my hon. colleagues from both opposition parties might like to know. One paper ran the headline:"Grits Axe Spending". Another headline reads: "Western Diversification to Get New Look"; this is positive feedback. This one says: "Social Safety Net Rescued", a quote from the Minister of Human Resources Development.

• (1300)

And it goes on. "Tough Plan Boosts Buck, Raises Hopes". These words were not written by Liberals, I assure you. Also, "Federal Budget Turning the Corner". And this one, from Manitoba: "Budget Draws Applause". So, the response is generally positive in Manitoba. I can see my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois are just thrilled by this positive response. I will list more positive responses in a moment.

I know how appreciative my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois are when I mention them in my remarks, pointing out their glaring contradictions, demonstrating that the whole country, except for the official opposition party, can see some good in the budget just tabled. It is not just good, it is beyond being plain good.

As you know, this is a tough but fair budget. Not one region or group of individuals is affected unfairly. Many people are affected, but can you say they are treated unfairly? If so, please let me know.

The Minister of Finance made a special effort to distribute budget cuts equitably amongst the various regions. I must add that this budget takes necessary steps, and I stress the word necessary, to bring the deficit under control. These are the most severe budget measures taken by the federal government in fifty years. This will ensure that the deficit is going to be brought back to 3 per cent of the GDP by 1996–97.

Consequently, the budget exceeded the expectations of international traders. I should add that this is not the budget of a Conservative government. This budget does not make indiscriminate cuts: it redefines the role of the government, so that every department can concentrate on the priorities of Canadians. This is something important. We are going to do what we have to do.

I do hope that Bloc members will be pleased to see that, following the implementation of the measures announced in the budget, overlap and duplication will be reduced. Bloc members will surely be pleased to hear that, since they talk so much about that issue.

Moreover, unlike the previous Conservative budgets, we did not target the poor, absolutely not. The Liberal Party of Canada made a commitment regarding social programs.

Later this year, the Minister of Human Resources Development will table a bill on a significantly revamped UI program designed to better meet the needs of all Canadians.

Our government is also determined to provide fair, financial protection to our seniors, who have made such an important contribution to this country's development.

There is more. As I mentioned earlier, this is a tough budget but, according to most observers, it is also fair. To reach our objective of deficit reduction, the following measures take effect immediately. That is very important.

First, the tax rate for large corporations goes up from 0.2 per cent to 0.225 per cent. As well, the surtax rate for companies increases from 3 to 4 per cent. Together, these two measures will generate additional revenues of $260 million annually. All large companies with capital assets exceeding $10 million will be affected by this tax rate increase.

The budget also provides for a temporary increase of the capital tax for banks and other large deposit institutions mentioned in Part VI of the Income Tax Act. That additional tax will bring in $100 million over a period of 20 months.

• (1305)

Another issue often discussed here in this House was that of family trusts. They were decried, but we are dealing with this problem. Family trusts will be eliminated as of January 1, 1999. The choice allowing one to postpone capital gains taxes according to the 21–year rule will be abolished.

The cancellation of that choice given the preferred beneficiaries will prevent people from using the trusts as an income splitting tool, a most profitable procedure.

My friends from the other side will no doubt be happy with these very progressive and, above all, fair measures. I can see it in their smiles. This is a measure they will applaud and praise.

There is no provision for income tax increases in this budget. I am surprised my colleagues have not commended on that. I am surprised they only pick out items that, according to them, will embarrass government.

I am also surprised that my colleagues from the other side have not mentioned that for each tax dollar, government programs will be reduced by $7. I am enormously surprised they have not mentioned one outstanding and very important point, which is fundamental to the process launched by the government, the fact that we ensure a simple and reasonable financing which will allow us to meet the needs of Canadians while cutting programs that are not absolutely essential.

I am also surprised they did not talk about RRSPs, an issue where we certainly found a reasonable solution. As you know, there were people on both sides: those who did not want any cuts and those who wanted RRSPs to be practically eliminated. What did the government do? It cut a little; they will be frozen and increased by 1,000 $ every year. Well–off people will be those mostly affected. I would have thought that my friends of the Bloc would have at least indicated that this was a step forward. Perhaps they will do so later on.

No taxation of dental and medical health programs. As you know, we all received letters from citizens throughout the country who did not want these programs to be taxed, and they were not. I would have thought that my colleagues across the way would have had something nice to say about that. Perhaps they forgot. It is quite likely that they will mention that very soon.

This morning I read various press clippings from everywhere in the country. I would like to quote some of them so that Canadians know about the feelings of people who are not in politics, who do not belong to any political party in the opposition, who are looking at it in a rational way in order to give Canadians some advice.

Here is from The Gazette: "Belt–tightening Impresses Markets". How interesting. And "Ottawa aims to shrink deficit. Big spending cuts, modest tax hikes will be used to save $13.6 billion".

There are others, and I know that my colleagues really appreciate the fact that I am sharing with them a rational point of view. The Globe and Mail says: "Family Trust to Lose Deferment". And it goes on, Mr. Speaker. "Department Spending Reduced by 19 Per Cent", Le Devoir, February 28. How interesting.

Then, a headline in The Globe and Mail says: "Ottawa Axes Business Handouts. Subsidies Being Cut by Nearly $2.3 Billion over Three Years".

• (1310)

Here, on the same page: "Women's Programs Dodge cuts". Surely, my colleagues are going to rise in favour of that measure. Let me go on. In today's edition of the Ottawa Citizen, one can read: "Environment Groups Offer Rare Praise to Government". How interesting.

Let me continue: "Average Consumer Escapes Brunt of Budget". That can be found in today's Gazette. The Toronto Star says: "Liberals Cut Where Tories Didn't Dare". How interesting, Mr. Speaker.

Let me continue further. Jeffrey Simpson writes, in The Globe and Mail: "A Fine Start in Attempting to Escape the Deficit/Debt Trap".

And on the other side of the page, still in the Gazette: "Historic Budget Slays the Herd of Sacred Cows". Then in today's edition of La Presse, one can read: "L'économie peut de nouveau respirer". That means that the economy can breathe again. "Martin Budget Good First Step, but Canadians Still Face Tough Decisions". It is true, indeed. But it is a step in the right direction.

Finally, and this is quite interesting, in a press release, chartered accountants say that they give 4 out of 5 to the federal budget. Four out of five!

This morning, opposition party members were giving us perhaps 1 or 2 out of 5. I am surprised that they did not find anything good about the budget. It is beyond me. I know that some people would like to find us to identify issues close to their hearts and would like to make recommendations to improve the situation with regard to those issues. I understand that and I respect that. That is the role of the opposition. However, I do not understand why they cannot find anything positive in the whole budget. It is beyond me.

One thing that also surprises me about the Bloc is that they think that there is a federalist hiding behind each reduction and each operation. They say that it must be a prereferendum strategy, that, yes, there is something there, that there has to be something there. They think that even if there seems to be nothing, there is surely something. They imagine that there is a federalist lurking behing each comma, each period, each word, each sentence.

The budget is reasonable, fair and tough and it is also sensitive to regions. When you take the position of the far right—

[English]

That is the Reform Party. I talk about the extreme right, the Reform Party. The Reform Party came forward with "a budget". Of course I did not see one positive comment from any responsible journalist across the country on it. The fact that it is going to sit here and criticize this budget perhaps lacks some substance in credibility.

Again I would invite its members if I am wrong to correct me. I would invite them as well to suggest how this document can be improved. That is the challenge I offer my colleagues from both opposition parties, the official opposition as well as the third party.

Do not just stand there and shoot at this budget. Stand up and make sound recommendations so that it can be improved for the benefit of this nation and for the benefit of all Canadians. That is the challenge.

I spent some time in opposition. I rather enjoyed it I must confess because one has a responsibility obviously to critique that which comes forward. That is fair. Surely the responsibility goes beyond simply taking particular issues where one feels that the government might be vulnerable or where one feels one might have a political advantage. I accept that. However, it goes beyond that and one has a responsibility to make concrete suggestions.

• (1315)

To my friends from both parties on the other side of this House, I would like to offer this challenge. We have a number of days to debate this budget and make progress. Criticize all you want in a constructive manner but please, make suggestions that will improve what has been proposed. Make suggestions which will meet the needs of Canadians everywhere and allow us to be much more sensitive than we might have been if we had not had a chance to share your ideas and your political wisdom had you chosen to use those qualities for something else than attacking this budget. I underline that it has been well accepted up until now throughout the country, but even more important, on international markets.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member for Saint–Boniface that if we were smiling on this side, it is simply because we are always astonished to see how a government member can turn a deaf ear to politics with a small "p", as the Leader of the Opposition said earlier.

When the hon. member says that we have found no positive elements in the budget, it is not true. I wish he had understood or listened completely to the speech that the leader of the Official Opposition gave earlier. My friend would have seen that the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean referred to some positive things. However, this budget does not go far enough. It contains inequities, and I will mention only three to the hon. member for Saint–Boniface because my time is limited.

The member for St. Boniface says he saw nothing unequitable or unfair in this budget. First, does he think it is fair to cut $32 million from subsidies paid to Quebec farmers and dairy farmers and to give western farmers $2.9 billion to compensate them for cuts that are, relatively speaking, identical? Does he think such a cut is fair? He also mentioned family trusts. Is it fair to wait until 1999 to take action in this area?

By 1999, there will be no more money in family trusts. Those persons will have found other tax shelters to protect themselves. The budget should have addressed this issue immediately.

Finally, does the member think it is normal that banks, among others, be taxed a mere hundred million dollars when a single bank, the Royal Bank, made more than $1.2 billion in profits last year? Is it normal? Is it fair? I would like to hear what the member for St. Boniface has to say on those issues.

By the way, the member for St. Boniface quoted headlines from some newspapers in his riding. I suppose he should have, as a French speaking member, chosen at least a few headlines from French newspapers in his riding. I do not know. Maybe francophones are less well served in his province than in Quebec.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I will start with the last comment. No French papers were published last night or this morning. That is why I did not quote any.

As for French speaking citizens of my province, yes, indeed there have been very positive improvements. I do believe that the constituents in my riding are well served by their federal member and their provincial member, as well as their municipal councillor, since we are all French speaking. We will see. Eventually we will have to go back before the electorate. I was elected in 1988, and again in 1993, and I might get elected again in 1997 or 1998. We shall see. I will let my constituents pass judgment, rather than my friend from the Bloc Quebecois.

I might add, however, that I thought it was a bit mean on his part to argue that I only quoted English newspapers from Manitoba. I repeat that none in French were published this morning.

When I went through the press clippings, I quoted some in French which praised the government for the budget. I took what I could find. I will find some more and I will pass them on to you, so you can read them and perhaps change your opinion.

• (1320)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for St. Boniface, but I want to make sure that all comments are made through the Chair, and that hon. members do not use "you", or "vous" in French. Hon. members must address the Chair.

Mr. Duhamel: As for the three specific questions on cuts in the west versus those in the east, you know, Mr. Speaker, the people from the west—Mr. Speaker, I thank you for having reminded me to address my comments to the Chair because it is my intention to do so.

That is the problem with Bloc members. They are like that sometimes. It is sad because there are people, men and women, who are very broad–minded when they want to— Here is what Westeners are saying: We had a 100 per cent cut, while in the east they suffered a cut of only 30 per cent.

This is how people think. One member said that they would receive compensation. Of course, but if their subsidies are totally eliminated, perhaps it is only right for them to be compensated.

Mr. Speaker, they do not want to consider this: compensation for having lost 100 per cent of their subsidies. But a 30 per cent reduction is not fair. Members should think about it.

As for family trusts, we are the first government to act on the issue.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Are you?

Mr. Duhamel: Patience. You see, Mr. Speaker, they want us to do everything today, even when they are not ready. In fact, this government will ensure that it is done, but without being unreasonable. When we decided to cut transfers, we did not say right now, as of midnight tonight. We are giving people time to adjust to the change. It is the sensible way to go about it. We did not smash everything at once with the government's big hammer. We are kind. We are giving them time to adjust.

As far as banks are concerned, $100 million is a lot more than what I have presently in my bank account. It might be a significant percentage of their revenues. Could it be higher? Of course, it could. What will the impact be? If we were to increase it a lot more, will it have a negative impact on job creation? The problem is that they refuse to look at all the other sides of the medal. They only look at one. They keep on referring to something people dislike, such as the banks' huge profits, and they try to exploit it. I do not find this very honest on their part.

[English]

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Boniface read from a number of newspaper articles and quoted a variety of sources that commended somewhat the budget but not in a conclusive way. It was said that it is a good first step but Canada faces challenges.

One of the major challenges that Canada and individual citizens face is the fact that the government, in its first period of administration, by 1996–97 will have placed in the laps of Canadians another $100 billion in debt without any plan, without any indication that there is finality or an appointed time at which that debt will stop accumulating and growing. There is not one mention or indication at all to Canadians that it is going to stop.

Does the hon. member after all of his fine pronouncements have the answer to the question when the deficits will stop accumulating on the debt? Then Canadians will know the finite sum of our debt, at which point we will have to deal with it.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question. First, I am delighted that my colleague acknowledges there have been a number of newspaper articles—I remind myself I am not supposed to use those as props—that have seen the budget rather favourably. They said not only is it a good first step but that it is going in the right direction and that we are going to get there.

There is supposedly no plan. That is not accurate. I know my colleague is a honourable person and he is not trying to suggest anything Machiavellian. There is plan. We have indicated in the red book that 3 per cent of GDP was our objective. Once we have attained that then we are going to eliminate the deficit and start attacking the debt. My colleague knows that.

• (1325)

Mr. Speaker, you know that this other Mr. Speaker is aware of that which I speak. There is a plan. It is as plain as one's nose on one's face, and particularly plain when I talk of myself in that way. There is a plan. We will reach that objective. Subsequent to reaching that objective we will eliminate the deficit, attack the debt, and the country will be on a sound footing.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a brief comment. This budget is a little bit like venom to which sugar has been added to make it easier to swallow. Why is it that measures dealing with family trusts have been delayed until 1999, and that nothing is said about measures aimed at senior citizens?

If transfers to the provinces are cut, and this is my question for the member for St. Boniface, how could it not affect the least fortunate, the poorest members of society? Back home, farmers are going to suffer a great deal. The 15 per cent cut this year added to the 15 per cent cut next year is going to hurt them tremendously. Some of them told me this morning that they could hardly manage as it was, and that with these new cuts, it was going to be hell. How can you claim that this is not like venom?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his question. Of course, the budget will hurt some Canadians. Let me repeat that this budget is tough, but fair. I do not think that it is harder on any particular group.

There is another consideration. If I am wrong, what can we do collectively to try and counteract this? Now that a decision has been made, what can we do? Asking the reasons for a delay serves no purpose. We all know that, often, consultations must be held. We cannot simply say: "There, it is done." In other cases, time must be given to adjust to new measures. This is, in my opinion, a reasonable approach.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before the hon. member begins, in the last intervention we heard from the parliamentary secretary. He referred to the hon. member for Lethbridge by his name. Of course we know that is not a practice which is customary. However, I know full well that when I am in the chair and he refers to Mr. Speaker he is not speaking to himself.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in my former life as a member of the Alberta legislature I ran into the same sort of circumstance. I appreciate being recognized in the House and having the opportunity to enter the budget debate today.

Yesterday I listened very carefully and considered what the Minister of Finance presented as the government's plan for Canadians. We heard in the last election about the plan that was going to change everything for Canadians and fix all the problems. During that campaign we were presented with the red book that supposedly had all the answers to all the questions. The problem is that red book is now out of date and does not answer the questions. The red book principles were applied to the budget plan that was presented to us yesterday. It is not good enough for Canadians.

Why is it not good enough? First, if I had to define the budget and describe it, I would say that it is a budget without any conclusion, without any direction and without any real resolution of the major problem that Canadians are facing, a major problem that is only being enhanced and encouraged by the government.

When I say that there is no conclusion, I think of the Minister of Finance in his former responsibility in his private life where he had a fleet of boats on the Great Lakes. The hon. member would never have put a boat on the lake and said: "It sits there. I do not know where it is going and I have no conclusion as to the destiny of that boat". He would not do that. Nor would anybody tell a story without having a conclusion to that story so that we understood where the story was leading us as it was being told to us. This budget does not have its conclusion.

What was the conclusion that we were waiting for as Canadians? I heard it through the media. The member for St. Boniface has said to us as he quoted a number of articles about the budget that people were responding in a certain way.

In the last week to 10 days Canadians, people in the investment community and the media had one question that was paramount in their minds: when will the deficit be eliminated? When will that deficit come to zero?

The answer to that question was not in this budget. That has had a devastating effect in my mind on the confidence of Canadians investing in this country. We do not know where interest rates are going to go, what the value of the dollar will be. We do not know the type of revenue growth that we are going to have because there is a lack of confidence. This government did not have the will nor the courage to put its administration on the line and set up a plan that would reach a proper conclusion, one that must be dealt with in this country.

What did we get out of that budget? As I said a few moments ago as I raised a question in this House, we are left with $100 billion of added debt to the current debt in this country.

In three years of administration of this government by the time we get to 1996–97, $100 billion will be added to the debt. Interest payments from 1994–95 to 1995–96 have gone from $42 billion up to $49.7 billion, over $6 billion in one year of additional cost in terms of our interest.

The following year, in 1996–97, are those interest costs going down? No, they are not. They will be $50.7 billion. We can imagine what that does to the budget, how that affects social programs, how that affects other priorities, how that is going to affect this government in its decision making in terms of expenditure reduction, of reducing the services of the federal government to the Canadian people.

The interest cost is out of hand and is going to continue because there is no plan, there is no conclusion in this budget. What happens after 1996–97? That is a serious question. This government does not know what is going to happen.

It says that maybe in 1996–97 the deficit can go down to $19 billion, that the 3 per cent target is $25 billion. If we get there then we are okay in Canada. That is not true. All we need is a bit of a recession and the $25 billion deficit will start to balloon again up to $25 billion, $30 billion, $40 billion, $50 billion. What is the consequence?

The consequence is that we could add another $100 billion very quickly to the accumulated debt of this country. It will not only be in 1996–97, $603 billion as the Minister of Finance told us yesterday. Most likely by 1998–99 it could be $700 billion. Where then is our interest cost and where is the economy of Canada? We are in a disastrous position.

This governments says do not worry, it is going to be okay, that it is going to come up with a plan to deal with it, it has two years of administration to do something. It has not done anything. In this House we wasted the fiscal year 1994–95 by a do nothing budget. This budget is not much better when we clear away some of the rhetoric that we heard. Do we know what the real expenditure reductions are—$4.1 billion of expenditure reduction. It is heralding it as a great success.

By the time we reach the conclusion of this Parliament or the fiscal year 1996–97, that is not much of a start in dealing with the deficit. We are going to pay the consequences. The softer we are, the liberal approach that we are using is not going to work very well and Canadians are going to pay.

I want to make one more point in my last two minutes. Who pays for this? We are laying on our children and on the future generations of this country at least another $100 billion in debt. That is a crime.

This government stands up here and says in this budget that it did not increase personal income tax. Think of the increase in personal income tax on our next generation. That is only a few years down the road. It will have to pay to pick up this accumulated debt. Think of the imposition that this government has laid on its shoulders, another $100 billion which is its responsibility; not the Conservatives, which was the last government, it is its responsibility.

Think of the increase in personal income tax that is going to happen. Think of the corporations that will have to flee this country because they cannot pay the amount of taxes that will be imposed on them by, who knows, the next Liberal government or another government that has to come in and deal with the circumstances.

That is the crime in this budget. That is the absolute crime. Like never before we need a Reform budget, the taxpayers' budget, which said very clearly to Canadians that taxes should not be increased at this time. That is number one. Number two, we must reduce the expenditures so that the deficit is brought to zero within a three–year period.

This is the responsibility that we should be taking in this House, not this soft hand approach that has been used and one that is leading us into terrible circumstances for the future generations of this country.

I think that has to be taken into consideration. If the government does not, it has to live with the crime. Its members have been the cowards not to deal with the problems that face them, and future generations will look back at this very difficult time that was not dealt with in a responsible way by this government.

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very curious to know what kind of discombobulated crystal ball my friend had that he looks into and is able to predict the future four or five years down the road.

I expect he predicted the decline of the Mexican peso. I suspect four years ago he predicted an anticipation of feared inflation in the United States which would raise interest rates.

I expect he must know the answer to when the budget will be balanced ultimately. The minister has taken a position, right or wrong, that he wanted to do it in two–year leaps, in two–year packages, for the simple reason that he had a better chance of predicting what was going to happen in that time.

As we all know, they did not all pan out the way they had been originally predicted. By what curious vision does my hon. friend express the question or bring the challenge to the government that somehow we should be able to say in x number of months or x number of years the budget will be ultimately balanced? My friend may be surprised that it may end up being balanced before both he and I expect.

I would like to know how he projects into the future in the way he seems to be doing.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in all of the presentations we make, whether it is policy or pronouncements in this House, our whole objective is to look forward, not backward. Perhaps that is the difference between the Liberals and the Reform Party.

We all know that when we do forecasts there is a certain amount of risk. When we have the responsibility of government we have to make the best possible projects as we can.

It is obvious that this government is going to reach its 3 per cent of GDP and leave us with a $25 billion deficit in 1996–97. That is obvious. I think it is going to do that. That is not a tough target. That is number one.

Number two is at that period of time we will have added, as I said, $100 billion more to the accumulated debt. That is obvious and predictable.

Number three, after following that, has this government the will to make some kind of projection so that it brings the deficit down to zero? Does it have confidence in itself that it will bring the $25 billion in 1996–97 down to a zero base within the next two years? If the government thinks it can, why does it not say it?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The member is splitting his time with his colleague from Capilano—Howe Sound. I give an undertaking to the member of the official opposition seeking the floor on a question or comment that if he should so choose on the next intervention I will recognize him.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think that without malice it is useful on the occasion of this budget to recall what Liberals used to say on such occasions: "The budget cuts of $6 billion out of general government programs are slash and burn. They will lower the quality of government services that Canadians expect from their federal government as a matter of sacred trust. The firing of 42,000 civil servants is heartless and without compassion". The Liberals would have said it destroys forever the sanctity of labour contracts, it is equivalent to union bashing.

The biggest indignation Liberals in opposition would have reserved would be for the close to $4 billion cuts in transfer payments. They would have said: "It will make it impossible to enforce national standards on health and higher education and; heartless and without compassion on welfare. This is the proverbial slippery slope where Ottawa and the upholders of standards of compassion will lose their grip. The country will fall apart. It will become just like the United States. Oh, my god. There will be beggars on the street. The poor will have to commit crime. People no longer feel like Canadians because when they move from one province to another they will get lower welfare rates, can you imagine that, inferior universities and different health standards".

They would say the deficit problem is being solved on the backs of the poor, those least able to defend themselves. The Liberals in opposition would have said the gasoline tax increase is a tax grab and regressive because of all those with lower and middle incomes who have to use their cars to go to work. Worse, the tax measures did not tax the allegedly obscene profits of banks. They did not raise the tax on the rich or expropriate wealth by an inheritance tax.

The finance minister when he was in opposition used daily question period to ask the government to lower interest rates. He now refuses to. He did not order the governor of the Bank of Canada to lower interest rates and the debt burden. What is wrong?

• (1345)

I am sure the Liberals when in opposition would have used this opportunity to remind the government of broken election promises. The regressive, expensive, annoyingly complicated GST is still there and will be used to grab another $2 billion from Canadians, many of whom are poor. There is still no new day care facility. NAFTA is sucking jobs to Mexico.

The rat pack would have hurled the ultimate insult at the opposition. They would have said: "They are slowly eating their red book". For a summary indictment, these Liberals would have used: "This budget sounds like the agenda of right–wing think tanks and horror or horrors, like the program of the Reform Party". We proudly say that this is so.

I am not a Liberal and I will not use these slogans to criticize this budget. Its shortcomings are fundamental and frightening for anyone familiar with history and the power of compound interest.

During the 1980s my economist colleagues and I would sit at the lunch table at Simon Fraser University. We discussed the successive budgets of Michael Wilson, who sounded just like Paul Martin—like the present Minister of Finance. I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would like to remind members to not refer to one another by name, but by riding or ministry.

Mr. Grubel: Mr. Wilson would say: "We had to face financial reality. We had to take tough measures that will transform the way the Government of Canada works. In doing so we have turned the corner. We have stabilized the debt to GDP ratio. The next budget will bring it down. We are well on the road to fiscal sustainability".

I will never forget how we all agreed that the stabilization of this ratio during prosperity was not enough. Spending and tax measures to achieve this objective during prosperity will result in deficits once a recession hits again. We were right at that time, not as a matter of ideology, but of simple economic principle.

This budget is déjà vu all over again, except this time there are absolute spending cuts rather than Wilson's magic reductions in previously inflated plans for spending increases. These cuts represent a truly major achievement for which most of the credit must go to the Minister of Finance and some of his colleagues.

The tragedy is that these cuts are too little and too late. With a debt of $550 billion these absolute cuts achieve the same objective as did Wilson's phantom cuts when the debt was half that size.

The cuts of $10 billion in program spending just about match the $9 billion in higher debt service charges on the planned debt level over the life of this budget. The expected increases in revenue due to prosperity and tax measures amount to a staggering $12.7 billion. Yet, these revenue increases only keep constant the debt to GDP ratio.

These facts represent the key to understanding my negative views of this budget. Let me repeat them.

The cuts of $10 billion, however wrenching they may have been, just about match the required increases in debt payment of $9 billion on the planned increased debt over this period. The expected increases in revenue due to prosperity and tax measures amount to a staggering $12.7 billion. Yet, these revenue increases only keep constant the debt to GDP ratio.

• (1350)

The reason for this bottom line is that the biggest spending category in the budget, transfers to persons, which amounts to $37 billion is to remain unchanged. The debt to GDP ratio will never be lowered during prosperity unless this spending category is made to contribute its share to the solution of the country's crisis.

Investors who determine the fate of the dollar and the Canadian interest rate will look at the bottom lines that loom behind the rhetoric and brave actual cuts. They will ask why transfers to persons are unchanged. They will remember the traditional Liberal slogans recalled above and will connect the two. They will not be assured.

Mr. Speaker, I hope for the sake of Canada and my children and yours that my diagnosis is wrong and that Reform will never be able to say we told you so.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in listening to my hon. friend I do not know whether he is going forward or backward. He does give me the impression that he is definitely going backward.

Unfortunately there are some things I have to agree with. He does speak to the fact that this government has not really been firm enough in reducing the deficit which is already astronomical. It does not take a rocket scientist to recognize that the longer we delay in resolving the issue, the more pressure we are putting on future generations.

It is the youth of this country who will have to pay. We are being nice to ourselves by not really being more firm but that is where I do not agree with this hon. member. I do not share his lack of feeling and lack of compassion toward people who are getting the screw when there is latitude to demand for example that the banks contribute a bit more.

Would my hon. friend agree with me that it is unfair to ask that banks in Canada contribute $100 million over the next couple of years when we know they have been making incredible profits over the past few years? The Royal Bank last year made $1.2 billion net profit. We are asking these banks to contribute only $100 million and we are cutting and slashing social programs. Does he think that is fair?

Mr. Grubel: Mr. Speaker, I believe on economic policy one has to take the longer run view. It does not do to penalize success like the banks have had now for a year or so after having absorbed huge losses for many years. If we do this kind of thing, we will drive out investment in Canada.

Investment in Canada is the source of our prosperity. It is the only source that will raise our living standards by increasing productivity. Without it, it is not possible. Even new technology needs investment to be introduced.

I do not share the judgment that it is wise for the longer run fortune of this country to say to anyone, be it a bank, a corporation, a professional, a gambler, anybody who has had success: "You are not allowed to keep it because there are some people out there who did not invest, who did not have luck, who did not work as hard. They have to get their money from us".

This is not what has made this country great and it is not what will keep this country prosperous. The Reform Party and certainly I will forever defend the system that has gotten us to the standard of living to which we have proudly become accustomed.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member's remarks and noticed that he wanted to make some serious cuts to the social security program spending.

• (1355)

I have always believed that our responsibility in this Chamber is not to spend all of our time focused on those who are advantaged but to primarily make sure that governance always has a focus on those in our community who are disadvantaged.

I want to read directly from the taxpayers' budget in brief. Under unemployment insurance cuts which is currently $15.6 billion the member is proposing a cut of $3.4 billion by the end of the third year.

Does the member honestly feel that it is good public policy when people are in such a very difficult circumstance of not having a job to take almost a 22 per cent decrease—those are the member's own calculations—from those people who are going through a very difficult period, specifically being unemployed? Is that good public policy?

Mr. Grubel: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for raising this important point. The OECD issued a report in which it said that Canada's unemployment insurance system is an outstanding example of excessive generosity. The Auditor General has a graph which I recommend to the hon. member. It documents this generosity.

If someone in the United States earns $100 and goes on unemployment, he gets $20. In Europe if he earns $100 and goes on unemployment, he gets $30. Does the hon. member know what a person gets in Canada according to the Auditor General? He gets $60, twice the European amount. Is there any heartlessness in taking on the suggestions by the OECD and the Auditor General to reduce this excessive generosity a little bit?

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today marks the last day of Black History Month.

As the member of Parliament for Dartmouth I am proud to say that I represent the largest indigenous black communities in Canada, in Preston, North Preston, Cherrybrook and Lake Loon. The Preston communities have a rich and compelling history. It has contributed greatly to the culture of Nova Scotia and indeed all of Canada. Unfortunately for the rest of the country, much of this cultural heritage has been unwritten, instead being passed on from generation to generation by word of mouth.

Students of Cole Harbour High have sought to change this by using modern communications technologies. As a project for Black History Month students have created a site on the Internet's world wide web to give millions of computer users across Canada and around the world a glimpse of this rich heritage.

I ask the House to join with me in congratulating the students involved in this project for their tremendous efforts to bring Nova Scotia's black history to the world.

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ.): Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept that, in his budget, the Minister of Finance is once again attacking the poor while leaving untouched the tax privileges enjoyed by the rich in our society.

That approach, which proposes no tax reform, perpetuates inequities. There is nothing in this budget to eliminate the tax treaties signed with countries considered tax havens, thus allowing large corporations to avoid taxes. There is nothing as well about flags of convenience used by Canadian shipowners and the government itself so that they can employ foreign sailors who pay no taxes to Canada.

To top it all off, the Minister proposes to tackle family trusts only in 1999, while rich families use this loophole to avoid paying their fair share to the government. As radio anchorman Joël le Bigot said, if you hit the humble, you are ready for the federal government.

[English]

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the finance minister delivered his budget and in so doing missed a glorious opportunity.

Canadians want hope. They want truth. They want leadership. But where is the hope when we discover that the compound interest on the deficit the finance minister is projecting, on top of our already huge debt, will cancel out the savings from the cuts announced by the minister? The minister could not even muster the strength to tell us when we will have a balanced budget.

Canadians want the truth. They want to know what will happen to their social programs as compound interest continues to eat up an ever larger share of their tax dollars simply because the government could not make the hard decisions in the budget. On this issue the minister is silent.

Finally, they want leadership. They want a government that will make personal sacrifices. Canadians resent a government that cuts the public service, ups taxes and allows overspending to jeopardize old age security but does not have the character to give up what is the richest, most extravagant pension plan that taxpayers' money can buy.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the headline in the Regina Leader-Post this morning says it all in one word: devastated. This budget leaves farmers—

The Speaker: I would remind the hon. member not to use any props in the House, please.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, this budget leaves farmers reeling in western Canada. It has the effect of a hurricane on agriculture. It will leave a trail of destruction and devastation throughout rural Canada.

It will cost rural families one-third of their net income and one-third the value of their land. Farmers work hard to put food on our tables and only ask to be treated fairly. The Liberal government responds by attacking farmers with ruthless cuts.

The minister of agriculture has betrayed rural Canadians by taking away the Crow benefit, reducing dairy subsidies by 30 per cent and abandoning more rail lines.

Farmers are now trapped between dwindling incomes and little prospect of selling their farms. The treatment the government has shown to rural Canada is unforgivable and will cause permanent damage to what was once the proud breadbasket of this land. This is a devastating budget for western Canadians and a shameful day for a Liberal government that promised more.

NATIONAL FORUM ON HEALTH

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with Canada's health care system at a crossroads, the Prime Minister has wisely established the National Forum on Health to develop a vision for Canada's health system into the 21st century. This vision must be capable of achieving a balance between care and health promotion, prevention and protection measures.

From various backgrounds and regions of the country, members of the health forum are seeking to identify national priorities and encouraging dialogue among Canadians on medium and long term health issues. Over the coming months they will focus discussion and assist in developing strategies to improve the health of Canadians.

I am proud that a member of the London community was appointed to the health forum. Ms. Shanti Radcliffe brings to the forum her experience in community based health for youth, women, seniors and immigrants. I commend Ms. Radcliffe and all members of the health forum as they help to ensure Canada has the best health care system in the world.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Guelph—Wellington residents wanted responsible deficit reduction and spending cuts and the Minister of Finance has responded.

They know it is easy to cry for cuts but more difficult to ensure that any deficit reduction is fair and equitable. The budget ensures fairness. They know it is easy to criticize, but more difficult to make the good and necessary decisions which the government has made. They know that it is easy to release figures and offer ideas based on principle rather than reality. Yesterday's budget recognizes that deficit reduction will affect the lives of real people.

The people of Guelph—Wellington are not looking for the easy solutions found in 1–900 numbers and cable programs. They believe in this country and our ability to overcome our problems. They want Canada to succeed. They wanted a tough budget. They wanted spending reductions. They wanted fairness. For their sake, we have delivered.

REFERENDUM DEBATE

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a sovereign Quebec would be a country of intolerance, where democracy would be trampled on and ideological dissidence could be equated with treason, depending on the outcome.

• (1405)

When someone like Bourgault brands as racist the anglophones who would democratically vote against their proposal, that is one thing. When someone like Landry says that there is no place for multiculturalism in Quebec society, that is another, but when a democratically elected member of the House maintains that newly arrived Quebecers should not have the right to express their views or vote on such a vital question as the future of their country, that is unacceptable.

On behalf of all English–speaking and newly arrived Quebecers who have chosen to settle, to live and to raise their children in Canada and in Quebec, I demand an apology from the hon. member for Louis–Hébert.

I want to remind the Bourgaults and the Parés of this world that they also come from—

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, when making such statements or expressing such views, we must refrain from attacking individual members of this House. I would ask each of you not to use the names of the members of Parliament, just the names of their riding.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Chrétien government announced in its budget that it intends to cut pensions—

The Speaker: Dear colleague, please do not use the name of the hon. member.

Mrs. Dalphond–Guiral: Yesterday, the Liberal government announced in its budget that it intends to cut old age pensions as early as 1997. The budget tabled yesterday is proof positive that the biggest threat to old age pensions and social programs comes from the federal government, not the Quebec government.

Judging by the government's actions, this direct attack on the elderly, the unemployed and welfare recipients is only just beginning. The chairman of the no side, Michel Bélanger, who has been trying to scare people by saying that the nasty separatists want to cut old age pensions, must truly be disheartened.

We are anxious to hear his perceptive analysis of the federal budget.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General recently stated some program spending of the department of Indian affairs fails to meet strategy objectives, exhibits management inadequacies, lacks appropriate performance and evaluation information and thus impedes accountability.

In addition, the department has not published an annual report since 1992. This deprives us of an opportunity to properly scrutinize efficiency of program delivery.

The federal budget calls for spending reductions in all federal departments except for Indian affairs. The government is asking Canadians to share in deficit reduction yet is increasing spending by 12 per cent over three years for Indian affairs. Much of Indian affairs' program spending is outside of constitutional, legal or policy commitments.

Given these concerns, the budgeted increase in Indian affairs funding is unacceptable and unfair.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance tabled the government's budget yesterday. This budget, along with the one tabled in 1994, established the challenge and goal of the government: to bring the deficit and debt under control.

Canadians have requested and supported a combination of cuts in government spending and the continuation of our agenda of jobs and growth: growth that has led the G–7 countries over the past year and growth that will continue as a result of this strong budget.

The measures taken in the budget ensure we will reach our deficit target of 3 per cent of gross domestic product that was outlined last year.

The minister has produced a fair and equitable budget to provide social programs for Canadians' needs and the spending reductions they require.

Congratulations to the Minister of Finance for his dedication to controlling the deficit and debt and building the confidence of all Canadians.

AGRICULTURE

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this has been a tough budget but it had to be done. And true to our commitment it has been done fairly.

The best time to make cuts is during periods of growth. In the agricultural sector, prices are increasing, export markets are expanding and producers are in an excellent position to adapt to change.

The buyout of the Western Grain Transportation Act, the WGTA, with tax benefits, will put $2.2 billion in the hands of prairie farmers this year. We will ensure those dollars are paid out in a fair and equitable way.

I am confident that the men and women of Canadian agriculture will continue their proven track record of adapting to the constant changes of their industry to ensure that Canada remains a world leader in agricultural production.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance for the excellent budget he tabled yesterday. It seems that the money markets were pleased with the resolve the minister showed in his fight against the deficit and their reaction was quick.

Indeed, the Bank of Montreal, the Laurentian Bank and the mouvement des caisses populaires Desjardins have already announced a reduction in their prime rate. In light of this initial reaction we can expect a drop in mortgage rates in the short term, which will contribute to a much needed recovery in the construction industry.

Such good news should reassure Canadian consumers and sustain our present economic growth. Congratulations to our Minister of Finance and to our government for sticking to their commitments.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers now know what to expect from Ottawa in this referendum year.

Far from proposing a decentralisation of powers, yesterday's budget shows that Ottawa still refuses to retreat from areas of provincial jurisdiction. In fact, Ottawa seems determined to step up its interventions, particularly in the area of job training.

The only thing the federal government has transferred to the provinces is the deficit. With yesterday's budget the federal government has tried to shift the burden of the deficit to the provinces: $2.5 billion next year, $4.5 billion the year after.

The federal government wants to delay until after the Quebec referendum the bulk of the cuts in transfers to the provinces and in federal services to the public. That would be the real cost of a "no" in the referendum, the real cost of the status quo.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Reformers have always recognized the need to cut government spending and the need to empower people to take care of themselves when they are able to do so. Reformers also believe that before cuts are made, barriers should be decreased and flexibility increased so that people are able to do well in a freer market setting. Farmers share this vision.

Yesterday Department of Agriculture spending was cut substantially. Farmers and industry leaders say these cuts will be difficult but recognize they are necessary.

I am concerned however that in moving toward a more market driven system, the government has not removed regulatory barriers and has not allowed for increased efficiencies. Without these changes farmers and industry will be crippled instead of strengthened by these funding cuts.

In order for farmers to adapt to new fiscal realities they need stability, predictability and certainty. Farmers need the freedom to recoup some of the losses incurred by this budget. The government has failed to deliver.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE BUDGET

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in its prebudget marketing blitz, the government announced that it would table a budget for a new Canada. The Minister of Foreign Affairs even went as far as to say, with a reformist zeal very uncharacteristic of him, that the status quo would no longer be an issue after the budget. However, what the promised decentralization really boils down to is Ottawa continuing to withdraw its funding for health, post–secondary education and welfare.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Where is this new Canada that was announced with great fanfare when all the government did yesterday was to offload $7 billion or so more onto the provinces?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the budget tabled yesterday, we decided to give provinces much more flexibility in the administration of their programs and we are trying to improve the situation for everybody. It will be easier for provinces to establish their programs themselves, provided they respect the aspirations of all Canadians, that is that there be minimum programs for all Canadians so that the dignity of persons will be respected across Canada. I think this budget reflects the willingness and capacity of this government to propose changes.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ.): Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister have the audacity to claim that while depriving provinces of $7 billion he gives them more flexibility and more capacity to innovate in social programs, when provinces already have an extremely difficult time dealing with their growing expenses in the areas of health, social assistance and education?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, provinces had been asking us for a very long time to remove certain conditions which applied to the administration of social assistance programs, and that is what we are now proposing.

As for health care services and the five conditions set in the federal Health Act, everybody in Canada agrees that they should be maintained because they are the very essence of our society and they give people access to the same health care system, regardless of one's financial circumstances.

In any case, we had to be fair in our budget. We could not cut federal government's operating expenditures systematically and not cut transfer payments to provinces. It is only a matter of treating all government programs fairly.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said he tried to be fair in his budget. I wonder if he was thinking of Quebec when he said that, because criteria in documents of the Department of Human Resources Development already indicate that Quebec will bear the brunt of transfer payments reductions, with 41,7 per cent. Is that fair? Quebec is being taken to the cleaners.

Mr. Loubier: Yes, 41 per cent. Some fairness. Talk about fairness.

Mr. Bouchard: How can the government display that kind of arrogance, given the duplicity of its present attitude, on the one hand, proclaiming its determination to maintain the principles of universality and accessibility, and on the other, drastically cutting its contribution to programs?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, program spending is being reduced at all government levels. Last December, if I am not mistaken, members of the present Quebec government, the opposition leader's friends, cut $600 million from health programs. We are doing the same, because cuts are necessary and all levels of government must benefit from those cuts.

• (1420)

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in his budget, the finance minister announced that all transfer payments to provinces would be rolled into a single comprehensive transfer called the Canada social transfer. He set at $7 billion the amount of additional cuts in transfer payments in the next three years, but he did not specify how those payments would be distributed in 1997 and subsequent years.

How can the finance minister decide on such drastic cuts in transfers and casually postpone discussions with provinces?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of putting off the discussions. We are willing to initiate them tomorrow if the provinces are ready. This is quite clear. In fact, we said so during our meeting with the finance ministers. I invited the provincial finance ministers to join me immediately after the budget speech, and I am ready to meet them anytime they want. There is no question of postponing the discussions.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, by postponing, as the minister says in the budget, the negotiations with the provinces on the distribution of transfer payments, is the Minister of Finance trying to conceal from Quebecers before the referendum the negative impact of the new Canada social transfer because it is Quebec which will lose the most, 41 percent of the transfer payment cuts in 1997?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, the figures mentioned by the member are totally false.

Second, if you want to know, the cuts in Quebec, in 1994–95 and 1996–97, will amount to $350 million. These are not ridiculous figures like the ones mentioned by the member.

As for the discussions and the fact that he believes we will postpone them until after the referendum, we said in the last budget that we would inform them instead of surprising them like the former government did.

Is the member suggesting that we should proceed immediately? I believe Mr. Campeau will not be very satisfied with that.

Third, tell us when the referendum will be held, let us hold it and then we will be able to solve our problems.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in yesterday's budget the Minister of Finance pledged to get the federal deficit down to $24.3 billion by 1997.

Meanwhile officials of the Department of Finance have been predicting to reporters and the financial markets that the deficit will then be reduced to zero by the year 2000.

However, yesterday's budget was silent on the all important question of how the minister proposes to get from a deficit of $24 billion to zero in three years.

Will the minister tell Canadians and tell the House today how he plans to get the deficit from $24 billion a year to zero: by increased taxes, by cuts to social programs or by both?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have said countless times in this House that in terms of government by far the best way of hitting targets is through a series of short term targets that keep government's feet to the fire.

That is by far the best kind of spending control that any government can have. It is the reason that we hit our target this year. It is the reason that we are going to hit our target next year and it is the reason that we are going to hit our target the year after.

I will tell members what this government does not want to do, and that is bring in a budget like the Reform Party did based on phoney assumptions and false input which does not attain its objectives.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fundamental flaw in the minister's answer is the same fundamental flaw that was in his budget yesterday.

It does not come clean about the imminent threat to Canada's social programs from rising interest payments. Under the minister's budget plan program spending will be reduced by $12 billion over three years, yet the interest on our debt will grow by $13 billion to $51 billion a year in 1997. The reality is that the interest payments are growing faster than the ability to either cut or raise revenue.

• (1425)

My question to the finance minister, and this is just looking for a straight figure, is can he tell Canadians how many billions of dollars per year they will be paying in interest in the year that the budget is finally valid?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member opposite knows that his question is nonsense. We have said that we are going to get to a balanced budget through a series of short term targets and therefore obviously we are looking at the ultimate thing.

I cannot believe that once again this party stands up and talks about preserving social programs when last week it brought down a budget which said that the ultimate purpose of it was to make sure that every poor Canadian stays poor and that the middle class becomes poor.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister claims that his budget protects social programs from unfair unnecessary cuts, but the real social cut is lurking in the massive unnecessary interest charges that this government is irresponsibly building by not attacking the deficit more quickly.

This means that when Liberal social cuts come, as they will, they will be bigger and more desperate and more destructive than Canadians could imagine.

Will the finance minister honestly admit to Canadians that he has put social programs in the gravest of jeopardy by failing to balance the budget more quickly when he had the chance?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the way to clean up this nation's finances is to bring in a budget that brings federal spending down from $120 billion in 1993–94 to $108 billion by 1996–97.

The way to deal with the nation's finances is to have program spending at 13 per cent of the total, which is the lowest number since 1951. The way to preserve social programs is to make sure that the party which said it would claw back the old age pension from people on the guaranteed income supplement never takes power.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The budget tabled yesterday provides for additional cuts of $7 billion in payments to the provinces over the next three years. By transferring an additional $7 billion shortfall to the provinces, Ottawa is again downloading part of its deficit.

Would the Minister of Finance agree that the additional cuts his government has ordered in transfer payments to the provinces will inevitably cause either a reduction in services to the public or an increase in provincial taxes or a combination of both?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not at all. At our meeting with the finance ministers, they asked us, first, to give them at least one year's notice: no surprises. And we did that.

Second, they asked us to cut our own spending first and to cut more than we would cut in payments to them. In 1996, for instance, there will be a 7.3 per cent cut in federal spending and only a 4.3 to 4.4 per cent cut in payments to the provinces. If we consider the province of Quebec, it is only $350 million compared with this year. So these cuts are less than 3 per cent of provincial revenues, and I think that is reasonable.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister's figures are wrong. He is looking at total transfers, and he knows perfectly well he is only cutting cash transfers.

Would the Minister of Finance confirm that the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces he ordered yesterday will result in a shortfall of over $2.5 billion for Quebecers, three years from now?

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the 1980s Michael Wilson used to deliver budgets that contained the same rhetoric and projections of stable debt to GDP ratios as did the budget tabled yesterday. As analysts said then and are saying now, planning for stable debt to GDP ratios during prosperity is not sufficient.

Why would not the next inevitable economic downturn again increase the deficit and once again put the country on the unsustainable path of a growing debt to GDP ratio?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's premise is wrong. First, when Michael Wilson brought down his budget his cuts were not real. As the member knows, they were simply cuts from rising reference levels.

Second, Michael Wilson did not do it according to any kind of vision of the country or sense of priorities. They were simply blind cuts across the board.

Third, Michael Wilson never hit his targets and we have.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Michael Wilson was also in the very fortunate position of having had a debt of only $250 billion rather than $550 billion.

The absolute spending cuts of $10 billion in the budget just about match the expected increases of $9 billion in the cost of servicing the debt over the projected budget period. The expected revenue increases due to prosperity and tax increases amount to a staggering $12.7 billion.

Does the minister expect similar spending cuts and revenue increases in the next budget to simply maintain the debt to GDP ratio?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in 1996–97 the debt to GDP ratio will not only stabilize but it will commence a downward track which, may I assure the member, is going to be permanent.

The member has raised a very important question. The debt to GDP ratio is a very important target. It is one that we are very conscious of and we will keep it down.

The member refers to the level of debt that I have to deal with compared to Michael Wilson. There is another difference between Michael Wilson and me. Michael Wilson had the good fortune to take over after a Liberal government. I had to take over after the Tories.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the government did not dare reveal in its budget its real intentions with regard to old age pension reform, preferring to put off yet again a study that was to be published last year.

Would the Minister of Finance confirm that his government intends to reduce old age pension benefits for thousands of Canadians and in fact limit access to the plan for thousands of seniors?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not at all. The answer is a definite "no". What we do intend to do is study the Canada Pension Plan fund with the provinces, and, at the same time I am sure, they will look at the Quebec Pension Plan fund, because it is this fall that the necessary revision will have to be made. It is perfectly natural to look at them all together, with the provinces.

• (1435)

I can assure you and I can assure the hon. member that we intend to protect those who are most vulnerable in our society, our senior citizens.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, you understand how surprising it would be if the Minister of Finance were to set up a committee to raise old age pensions. I would be very surprised.

Will the Minister of Finance acknowledge that if he is not revealing the terms of his proposed old age security reform right now, it is because he does not want seniors to know his intentions until after the referendum in QQuebec?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, legislation has for a long time included a schedule to review the Canada Pension Plan fund and the Quebec Pension Plan fund every five years. We were not the ones who established the schedule. I repeat again, tell us when you will have the courage to hold the referendum; we will resolve the problem, and then we can go on with building the country.

As you know, there are many issues to be resolved in Canada. The economy has to be managed, and perhaps I should ask the question once again. The great thinker of the great separatist movement, Richard Le Hir, stated that he was not ready to meet Quebec's liabilities as far as the debt is concerned. Is that the position of the Bloc Quebecois? Is there still a difference of opinion?

[English]

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were promised a plan by the government to preserve and protect our future social security while dealing with fiscal reality. They never received such a plan. Yesterday the budget promised yet another discussion paper from the Minister of Human Resources Development.

My question is for the finance minister. Why should Canadians entrust social program reform a second time to a process and a minister who have done nothing but fail them in the past?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, once again with the hope of trying to obtain some kind of rhetorical response, does not know what she is talking about. I regret it because we are dealing with very serious matters.

As the budget clearly outlined yesterday, we have clear plans and initiatives on social reform. There will be major legislation this fall on unemployment insurance. We established a new human resources investment fund in yesterday's budget that will give us the flexibility to begin initiating now many of the reforms that were proposed.

We have already begun reorganizing the Department of Human Resources Development to begin to decentralize its delivery in a very different way so that we can begin to end duplication and overlap. We have initiated a new transfer program that will again eliminate duplication and overlap with the provinces.

It seems to me that is an awfully good start at social reform, much better than anything the Reform Party has offered.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I did not realize the minister expected the Reform Party to do his job for him.

Speaking of serious matters, the minister knows that every dollar borrowed today means two dollars in cuts tomorrow. Worried Canadians are asking: "What will this do to our social programs?" What answer does the finance minister have to give them?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear. The major difference between the Reform Party and ourselves is our deep belief in the social fabric of the country.

• (1440)

There are those in the House who simply feel that cutting is an accounting trick, balancing the books and not balancing the needs of a nation. That is not the view of the government.

The government is cutting the deficit, not because we think people should be without but because we want to preserve social programs and the legacy of the Liberal Party.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after making cuts to unemployment insurance of $5.5 billion over three years in his first budget—and the unemployed have not yet fully felt the effect of these cuts—the Minister of Finance is not letting up, cutting an additional 10 per cent from the unemployment insurance budget for next year.

Does the finance minister realize that these additional cuts he has announced for unemployment insurance will deprive the unemployed of at least $700 million more in 1996–97?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should first look closely at what was in the budget papers and at the kinds of initiatives we have talked about in reforming unemployment insurance.

The reform of unemployment insurance is a way of trying to change a system to help people get back to work, to take away many of the disincentives in the system, and to give people real resources to get good training, good counselling and good programs. To do that we can use the money from the savings we are about to introduce as part of the legislation.

The hon. member is totally wrong. The fact of the matter is that we want to convert unemployment insurance into an employment insurance fund to give people new hope, new jobs and new opportunities. That is what the reform is all about.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, while the Human Resources Development Committtee was travelling, we were told repeatedly that it was not merely a question of training but of jobs, real jobs. And yet this budget contains nothing about employment.

How does the finance minister dare demand an additional sacrifice from the unemployed, to the tune of at least $700 million, when he has imposed a temporary tax of $100 million over two years on banks and financial institutions although we know that the Royal Bank alone recorded profits of $1.2 billion last year?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the minister just said, the best way to create jobs in Canada is to move away from passive support toward active assistance to give workers the tools they need.

The best way to achieve this is to reduce unemployment insurance premiums so that small and medium size businesses can afford to hire new employees. Thirdly, the best way to achieve this is to keep economic recovery rolling. We created 433,000 jobs last year, and this year, we will match that number.

[English]

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry.

Yesterday's budget established a path for solid economic growth. It lived up to the commitments that were made in the election. One of those commitments was job creation through small and medium size businesses.

Would the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry expand on what the budget does to address the concerns of small and medium size business?

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the greatest hope we have for putting Canadians back to work rests with small and medium size businessmen and women in the one million enterprises that employ close to 70 per cent of the nation.

In the budget the Minister of Finance did three very specific things for small business. First, the small business corporate tax rate was not touched. Second, the $500,000 capital exemption was not touched. Third and most important, the Minister of Finance announced last night that the chartered banks of the country would be brought to task for their relationship with small and medium size business.

• (1445)

Today the chairman of the Standing Committee on Industry announced that within the next two and a half weeks the presidents of all the financial institutions in this country will come to the committee to report on what they are doing for small business.

That is how we will create jobs.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, hidden in the bowels of this Liberal budget are gas taxes, a 2 per cent interest increase on penalties, UI premium surplus revenues, and elimination of PUITTA transfers just to name a few. Does the minister admit that he is digging deeper and deeper into the pockets of middle income Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have just spent a year and have finally quite satisfactorily solved alternative fuels in terms of ethanol.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I wish I had never started on this. I am being sandbagged.

The Speaker: We have bowels on one side and bags on the other.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on a more serious note, the minister prides himself on being open. He does talk about a 1.5 cent per litre gasoline tax but surprise, surprise, there is a tax on this tax: the GST. Would he agree that this might be a tactic which would be considered deceitful by some Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker, clearly not. Canadians understand quite well those areas in which the GST is applied. With the budget now behind us, we look forward to dealing with the GST question this year.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Faced with new spending cuts, the Minister of National Defence announced yesterday that the headquarters of the land component of the armed forces and the facilities at Saint–Hubert would be closed. According to the newspaper La Presse, because of this decision, 400 people will lose their jobs, half of those civilians.

After closing the Saint–Jean military college last year, how can the Minister of Finance justify the decision to shut down these facilities and the base at Saint–Hubert, while we know that Quebec is under–represented when it comes to armed forces facilities and spending, and is getting at least $650 million less per year in this area than it should?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons and Senate special joint committee on defence recommended that to save money we eliminate one command structure within the armed forces. In yesterday's budget we did that by closing air command in Winnipeg, maritime command in Halifax, and land forces command at Saint Hubert.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Finance commit to rapidly announcing adjustment measures to help these civilians find new jobs?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in last year's budget we announced the elimination of 16,500 people from national defence. Yesterday it was just under 12,000. That is nearly 30,000 people. All of these people will be eligible for the force reduction plan covering the uniformed personnel and the civilian reduction plan covering the civil servants.

There has been a 73 per cent take up with an average payout of $53,000 for those people announced last year. We envisage that these people will be dealt with fairly and humanely and will accept the buyout packages.

• (1450)

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, according to the budget estimates tabled this morning, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation has a budget increase of 69.3 per cent. That is right, an increase of 69.3 per cent over last year. I thought the Minister of Finance stated yesterday that he was going to cut spending.

How can the Minister of Public Works and Government Services possibly justify this increase in spending in his own riding? Justify that to Canadians in the rest of the country.

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

He should be aware that the cutbacks to ACOA and Enterprise Cape Breton come to a total of $173.5 million over a three-year period. The reductions with regard to Enterprise Cape Breton are in excess of $2.5 million, with a 24 per cent reduction in personnel in that particular office.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): I thought I said it was an increase of 69 per cent, Mr. Speaker.

I also noticed in the estimates that the Department of Canadian Heritage will be spending $1.8 million on a golf course in Cape Breton.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance said: "Cut spending". He also said that the second principle of the government is that priorities must reflect the needs of the people and that the third principle is frugality, that every dollar counts.

Does the Minister of Public Works and Government Services not understand what the Minister of Finance said, or does he refuse to give up this pork barrel way of spending?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

He should be aware that regional development agencies have been cut in excess of $550 million by the Minister of Finance. All ministers of the crown and every agency of the Government of Canada has been looked at under program review. Each and every one has had to sustain a reduction.

ACOA amounts to $173.5 million over a three year period. In that category 50 full time positions will have to be removed from the books.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Science, Research and Development.

Yesterday's budget reflected the very serious fiscal situation we face as a government and as a nation. It is important in coming to terms with our deficit that we also continue to build the framework for future economic growth.

With that in mind, could the secretary of state advise the House how the budget affects science and technology funding and its future?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, science and technology was given priority treatment in the budget.

For example, while the budget of the Department of Industry Canada was cut by some 43 per cent, the cuts to the two granting councils which fall within the Industry Canada portfolio, NSERC and SSHRC, are only 14 per cent over the next three years. The cut to the National Research Council is only 15 per cent over the next three years.

Thus the budget is tough but fair. It has given priority treatment to science and technology which is important for our future.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister has stated that a cornerstone for his budget is regional fairness. Yet today if you are a farmer, a fisher, a small business person in a rural community or a miner, this has not just been a tough budget, it has been devastating.

Will the minister agree that it is small town and rural Canada that have been held hostage by Wall Street in this budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): No, not at all, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member knows we have a debt and deficit problem. Canadians wanted us to face up to it. This action has been delayed for virtually a decade. In fact it was the very industries the member refers to and small town and rural Canada that were suffering because the Canadian standard of living was declining, not because of this budget but because governments had refused to face up to it.

In facing up to this issue we have provided rural and small town Canada with an enormous amount of hope. The hope is that now our social programs will be preserved, that the basic industries will be preserved and that Canadians will continue to create jobs. That is really what we have done in this. This is a budget for Canadians.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the proposed—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1455)

The Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, this is the longest question I have had in a long time. My question for the Prime Minister concerns page 58 of the budget plan and the granny tax.

On pension reform, the government announces it will include in its changes the provision of OAS benefits on the basis of family income. That would mean that women who are 65 and over receiving OAS would lose their OAS based on their spouse's income. Will the Prime Minister confirm this to the House of Commons?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my answer is that the hon. member's claim will not come true. At this point, we want to ensure that the pension plan is reviewed. We are required, under legislation enacted by Parliament, to meet with the provinces every five years. We must meet them this year to discuss that issue. We must ensure that Canada's pension plans can continue to exist for generations to come, as the Minister of Finance indicated in his budget yesterday.

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the minister announced that the grain transportation subsidies would be eliminated, adding that a generous compensation of close to $3 billion, which includes direct subsidies, would be given to western producers. The minister also reduced by 30 per cent the subsidies to dairy producers, who are not so lucky since they will not be getting any compensation.

How can the Minister of Finance justify such an unfair double standard: dairy producers, most of whom are in Quebec, will not get any financial compensation, while western grain producers will?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, there is a fundamental difference between the two. Clearly, we just eliminated the Crow benefit. However, as regards subsidies to the dairy industry, the Minister of Agriculture is in Quebec City today to meet with association officials. We did not abolish that subsidy: we reduced it by 30 per cent. I have some problem with the member's point of view, but I do understand it. We have to be consistent. We did reduce the subsidy by 30 per cent. May I quote the Leader of the Opposition when he took part in a debate with Joe Clark? Mr. Clark said:

[English]

"We have substantial subsidies of industrial milk production. As you are going to try to make an independent Quebec more competitive, would you drop those subsidies, Lucien?"

[Translation]

And the leader of the Opposition replied, and I quote:

[English]

"If you ask me yes. Yes, we should stop doing that".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

While normal Canadians are taking a hit in this budget, this year's spending estimates reveal that the budgets for running the Senate and ministerial offices have been increased.

Why is it that senators and politicians continue to ride the gravy train on planet Ottawa while overtaxed Canadians have to tighten their belts?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Senate line in the main estimates shows a $1,000 increase.

I understand that the members of the other house are still looking at possible cuts, as has the House of Commons. The chief government whip announced just last week that cuts are being made in the budget of the House of Commons. Not to mention that yesterday in the budget the Minister of Finance announced 19 per cent cuts over three years. These are the most massive cuts which have been made in government expenditure in modern times. In addition to that 19 per cent, a 33 per cent reduction in the MPs pension plan has been made in one year.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

The Speaker: My colleagues, I would like to draw your attention to a person in the gallery who is no stranger to this House. He is a former Speaker of this House, my brother Speaker, the Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance on his presentation of yesterday's budget, a budget in my opinion that was fair and balanced. I think it meets the first test that was put down by all Canadians, that it had to be fair and balanced, fair to all Canadians, all individuals and all regions. The finance minister has succeeded in doing that, at the same time making a major effort in bringing down the deficit and the debt and getting government right for the first time in a good many years.

I rise in the House today not only to address the budget which was introduced yesterday but also to comment on a disease which I see gripping Canada, a disease which becomes more visible and widespread during events like this budget debate. It is a disease born from a lack of understanding, compassion and acceptance. It is a disease which focuses on self. It is a disease perpetuated by individuals, businesses, media types and hon. members alike. I am referring to what I call the culture of victimization.

This culture is both painted and exacerbated with brushes almost exclusively from the political right. I believe that in the last 10 years there has been an alarming increase in the perception that we, each and everyone of us, is a victim. Canadians are victims. We live in fear of further victimization. In truth, I believe that this paranoia has created a society in which we are all victims of something out of necessity.

We are victims of crime. We are victims of taxes. We are victims of government. We are victims of big corporations. We are victims of interest groups. We are victims as westerners. We are victims as Quebecers. We are victims as easterners. We are victims if we speak English. We are victims if we speak French. We are rarely just people who share a single common bond. However, we do have that common bond. We all are Canadians. It is this undeniable fact that we are all Canadians upon which the Minister of Finance has based his budget.

The $7 expenditure reduction for every dollar in new tax revenue is not a burden attributable to one type of Canadian but to all Canadians. If we are all affected, can we possibly all be victims? As I listened to some hon. members opposite I hear those ominous words reinforcing the notion that we are victims.

Some interest groups and even provinces which did not get what they wanted from this budget have said that this government has not been straight with them. Like spoiled children, our critics demand more for themselves with little or no regard for others. At the same time they demand greater fiscal restraint and usually expect someone else to shoulder their burden.

They tell Canadians to believe, really to expect that it is the government's responsibility to make things better for themselves. It is the government's job to make life happier: "If life is not the way I think it should be it is because that big, mean government machine will not let me succeed, for I am a victim". We have all in some way contributed to the creation of this culture in which we perceive ourselves as helpless victims.

For example, economic indicators suggest that Canadians are recovering from the recession of the early 1990s. Yet a certain trauma lingers. The Minister of Finance surpassed his 1994 cost cutting goals and yet the opposition howls. Program spending will be reduced by about $10 billion and that is a benefit to all Canadians. The opposition howls again: "What about me?".

In many ways, and thanks to the critics, Canadians have become more dependent on government. Government is expected to ensure that we all have jobs and also accommodate our every whim. Government is even expected to bandage our scratches. We have become less reliant on ourselves and on our own abilities. Thus we have let ourselves become victims. We cannot think only of ourselves. Nor can we accept this characterization that we live in a culture of victimization.

Kennedy was right when he said our privileges can be no greater than our obligations. The protection of our rights can endure no longer than the performance of our responsibilities.

Reformers would have us slash and burn programs and services to all Canadians; let us cut deeper and indiscriminately. The political right in this country would never have conceived the notion of compassion and human understanding as demonstrated by the introduction of the new Canada social transfer to the provinces.

It is true that money to the provinces will be reduced as a means of getting our financial house in order. This action cannot and should not be viewed as an indirect means of attacking individuals. Rather, such action demonstrates our commitment to getting government right by reducing overlap and duplication.

Canadians are being presented with the opportunity to help create and develop a more mature fiscal federalism. Through initiatives like the Canada social transfer the government has met the requirements needed to accommodate citizens' concerns for more sustainable programs and provinces' concerns for greater flexibility.

Keep in mind that the Minister of Finance has taken into account that change requires a period of adjustment. This government has not lost sight of the individual faces which will be affected in this budget. This government does not intend to perpetuate the notion that we live in a culture in which we are victims.

Reformers in their budget played on the fears of those who see themselves as victims. Some members opposite would have us believe that if we simply cut, cut, cut then everything will be better. At the same time Reformers will not commit to one course of action. If you do not like where we have made cuts, then the response is simple: make your own cuts. They had better add up to the bottom line. Such a nonchalant, bottom line approach implies that wherever the greatest burden exists according to your own criteria, cut that. Just make sure you meet the bottom line.

It is that kind of naive analysis which perpetuates our cultural victimization. It would be wonderful to look at our own personal budgets and cut those items which seem to cost the most. Why worry about food, clothing and shelter? According to some members it is only the bottom line that counts. Why concern yourself with being human? We simply must balance the budget regardless of the social cost.

These types of cuts to food, clothing and shelter are unrealistic on a personal level and are unacceptable at a federal level. We must evaluate what is important to us and from there determine where we can reduce expenditures. That is the approach taken by this government and by this finance minister.

Simply cutting to meet a bottom line would make us even greater victims. Sound reasoning and methodology were used to determine areas of waste, areas of duplication and areas lacking profitability. Through this realistic evaluation of Canada's economic house, the Minister of Finance has introduced an approach for fiscal responsibility which affirms the notion of cultural success. The government is not contributing to the disease of cultural victimization.

Essentially the third party would leave us to our own greed: "I live in the west, so I will cut services in the east". Let us be honest. Society cannot survive if we are enthnocentric. This type of self–absorbed regional attitude creates a slippery slope; we pick at the cultural threads of the Canadian fabric in a futile attempt to hang on.

What happens is that the fabric becomes warn and ripped. We must not continue to think we live in a cultural environment as victims. We must not succumb to the notion that in order to survive we must be the strongest or the most resourceful.

Reformers would have us all fall prey to this logic, a logic which would throw out the social fabric and not repair it. If use of this type of logic has as its only goal the elimination of the debt, then what this approach does is forget that each and every one of us, regardless of our province or country of origin, whether from Manitoba or Prince Edward Island, whether Yukon or Nunavut, new Canadian or native Canadian, is still a member of a community.

We cannot survive if we focus on only my needs or my wants. By virtue of our tendency as human beings to exist in groups because we are social creatures we must look beyond our own shadows.

Canadians wanted and deserved a budget which espoused the virtues of fairness and equity. The minister has accomplished that goal. Both corporations and individuals are equal partners in the fight to save Canada.

We know that the Minister of Finance is serious. That is why both individuals and corporations have been brought into alignment. Through improvements to the tax system, for example, requiring professional and other unincorporated business to pay taxes on income in the year in which it is earned, just like wage earners do, this budget has actively removed barriers which have contributed to the culture of victimization.

We are fortunate that we live in a society that enables us to exist as a synergistic entity where the whole is greater than the sum of its parts or members. I will not deny that each of us has problems, some unique to a few individuals, some to a particular region of Canada, which affect all of us.

We must be able to stretch out our arms further and run faster so that we are not borne ceaselessly into the past. We must accept our responsibilities first as Canadians. We must also realize that change is not inherently bad or negative. We must realize that we are not victims but victors.

At this point I want to congratulate the Minister for Human Resources Development and fellow federal Manitoba Liberal caucus members for their hard work and commitment with regard to this budget.

Two months ago the prospect of losing air command became a horrible possibility. However, after yesterday's budget the reality for Manitobans is less severe. Only about 350 to 375 jobs will be affected as a result of air command's closure. This is a significant difference from the anticipated number of jobs which would have been lost. Although loss of air command will be difficult for Manitobans, I am confident that once the government's reasons are understood, Manitobans will be able to accept this change.

• (1515)

Acceptance will result from a sense of fair play because it was not only air command that was closed, but naval command in the Atlantic region and army command in Quebec were also closed.

I can tell members there were people in Winnipeg who thought that we would not be fair, that we might close air command but we certainly would not close army command in Quebec. It was done because the minister and the government believe in fairness.

Manitobans will be able to appreciate that we were not singled out for cuts. All regions have been affected. We cannot forget that these closures are significant to their respective regions but we will not lose sight of the fact that an entire level of management has been removed at considerable saving to all Canadian taxpayers.

The budget introduced yesterday redefines Canada and its relationship with the provinces. Canadians are entering a new era, a significant step has been taken toward eliminating the culture of victimization which we have created. At long last, government has sought to ensure that fundamental values are preserved while appreciating the inherent differences among provinces. Through the decentralization of airports in Canada, for example, the government is preserving its role of guardian but accepts the realization that people in Winnipeg, Toronto and Barrie, Ontario are able to oversee the successful operation of their local airports.

These efforts not only remove layers of bureaucracy but also serve as positive motivation for all Canadians who are able to function within a federation and not be victims of our regional identities.

There is more to government than just cutting. There is smart government which appreciates the social, cultural and moral obligations. Perhaps now we can move beyond an attitude that asks: What do you expect in a regional country? Of course we are going to complain. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will come to appreciate the notion of fair play and understand that Quebec may receive $2 billion less in transfer payments but that all the provinces will experience the same kind of reductions.

Perhaps members opposite will learn something of fair play and refrain from trying to manipulate reality to suit a limited agenda. I am referring to comments made that immigrants living in Quebec should not be allowed to vote in a referendum, the question evolving to include the notion of who is a real Quebecer and who is not. We must work from our most common denominator. We are all Canadians and we should all be entitled to the pain and to the glory.

Ironically, most times, leadership is equated to economic performance. President Clinton is doing the very same thing across the border as we are doing here. He is trimming the bureaucracy and reducing the debt. Despite President Clinton's efforts the economic outlook is not nearly as positive as it is in Canada. Yet Americans seem to believe in themselves and in their ability to overcome any adversity.

In Canada, however, we are being convinced how bad it really is. We listen to the leader of the third party, who when talking with the media uses words like dishonest, cowardly and hypocritical. I wonder how we can forget that ever–ominous threat that the chickens will come home to roost. I suspect that the grassroots are having their gooses cooked. The political right would have issues decided by polls. It would be democracy by telephone. There would be no consultation, no research, no compromise or leadership. Opinion would reign supreme.

I suspect that the Reform leader would soon find out that burdening every Canadian with every decision would have a number of disastrous results, much like a grassroots guru attempting to split atoms like he splits economic hairs.

This may come as a surprise to members opposite but the reason behind democracy and having an elected representative is the notion of efficiency and leadership. To govern is to choose.

• (1520)

If we are to survive we must learn to believe in ourselves and in this great country. We must accept the economic and social realities and strive for tomorrow. Some would suggest that things can only get better, but I submit to the House that it is a subjective goal.

In the eyes of the United Nations, Canadians live in the best country in the world. In a recent Swiss survey four Canadian cities were considered among the 12 best places in the world to live. Other nations and other cultures believe in and envy the Canadian reality. The question now is: Why are Canadians so cranky? Why is it that the majority of Canadians feel victimized in one way or another?

Our challenge is to create a culture not of victims but of victors. We must nurture the creation of a culture in which we act out of compassion for others, not necessarily only for monetary compensation. Success should be measured by the results, not by the amount of money spent. Let me repeat, success should be measured on the basis of results. These results must be evaluated both according to economic criteria and social criteria. That is what members opposite fail to appreciate about the minister's budget of yesterday.

When has a Reformer asked us to think of others before thinking of our own individual interests? When has the Leader of the Opposition considered the wants of Quebecers when he muses about postponing the referendum date so as to be able to manipulate the results? This is not democracy. When will Canadians be allowed to seek appreciation and elevate their self–esteem, receiving joy from the notion that the receiving is in the giving?

This is a budget debate, but there is more to a budget than numbers. There are the people who are affected by change.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Madam Speaker, the hon. member used the word manipulating several times, as in manipulating facts and figures in our analysis of the budget that has just been brought down, and as in political manipulating with respect to the referendum. I may remind the hon. member that in Canada, political manipulation is what happened in 1982 when the Canadian Constitution was patriated against the will of a unanimous National Assembly in Quebec. The terms of the contract that binds us were changed. That is political manipulation.

I would like to ask the hon. member, since we have nothing to gain by staying in Confederation and, eventually, we will have a referendum, whether he thinks the budget that was brought down yesterday is likely to help matters?

[English]

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, there is a body of opinion in the province of Quebec that says we are committed to the so–called status quo, that the choice in the coming referendum will be between the status quo and sovereignty.

I submit there is another choice. It has to do with a progressive federalism, a federalism that is alive, a federalism that grows and evolves. Looking at the budget you can see how the federalism we have is flexible and how it can grow. The changes recommended under the Canada national transfer program give more flexibility to the provinces, which is something they have wanted for a long time.

We in the federal government want national standards and national principles and we will have them. The budget shows that federalism, as we know it, is a living thing. It is a living organism. It changes with the times. It adapts to new circumstances. It adapts to new conditions.

● (1525)

I know this will come as a great disappointment to the sovereignists that go around telling their friends that our kind of federalism is carved in stone or frozen in ice. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Madam Speaker, there is a lot of talk about flexible federalism. In 1980, Quebecers said no to sovereignty for Quebec, one of the main reasons being that we were told if we voted for sovereignty, we would have a terrific problem with debt, unemployment, the deficit and taxes. Of course we said no.

In 1980, Canada's debt was $80 billion, and now, 15 years later, it is $550 billion. Is that progressive federalism, is that flexible federalism? Would the hon. member not agree that this much vaunted federalism is "broke"?

[English]

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, when we came to power in the fall of 1993 after nine years of Conservative rule our fiscal house was in shambles. It was not in order. It has taken us a number of months to get to where we are today. However, this budget is going to get our fiscal house in order.

If there is disenchantment in the province of Quebec or anywhere in the country, it is because we had a federal government for nine years that simply would not address the nation's finances, that would not address our national problems.

This government will address those problems. The deficit and debt will be reduced systematically and methodically. In the not too distant future we will be in a situation where there will be no deficit whatsoever.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the budget brought down yesterday by the Minister of Finance. I want to take this opportunity to inform the public that although the Minister of Finance promised to do something about the debt and tax reform when he brought down this budget, he failed to keep his promise.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance started his budget speech by identifying Canada's two major problems. First, the Quebec referendum and second, the debt. Upon reading the budget I have to conclude that the Minister of Finance is only considering Canada's problems. Of course Quebec seems to be a problem for Canada. What is the Minister of Finance doing and what has the federal government been doing for the past 20 or 25 years? The federal government considered the problem, looked at it, examined it, thought about it, but did nothing to resolve it.

This is somewhat the case with the debt as well. For 25 years, finance ministers have been looking at the debt. Both Liberal and Conservative ministers, including Mr. Lalonde, Mr. Wilson and Mr. McEachen have had a look at it. Each one has said, "It is really too bad, we spend more in Canada than what we earn. It is too bad. We should reduce the deficit. We must reduce the debt". And if we take a look at the tables, we see that Canada's debt has been growing for the past 20 to 25 years. We looked at the tables produced by the Minister of Finance following his budget, and the debt continues to grow.

So Canada is looking at its debt problem as it is looking at the problem of Quebec, at what for it is the problem of Quebec. I think that one of Canada's greatest weaknesses is that it looks at its problems, but never resolves them.

There is another problem in Canada as well, which the minister has failed to identify. It is a problem he raised in many speeches during the elections—the problem of jobs, the problem of unemployment. During the elections, Liberal Party material spoke of jobs, jobs, jobs. Today, there is no more talk of jobs, the word is debt, debt, debt and cut, cut, cut. The problem of the unemployed is far from the mind of the Minister of Finance.

Looking at my own region, my city, my riding, an industrial area which has been under direct attack for about ten years, all the restructuring, modernization of businesses, new technology, have left unemployed people who had worked for big business for years, earning average or even above average salaries. These people have been unemployed for a year for a lack of specific policies to help them get retrained. Now they are turning to welfare.

This budget contains nothing for the unemployed. It contains absolutely nothing to give them hope for the future. There is indeed talk of possibly reforming unemployment insurance while at the same time cutting the program by 10 per cent. There is also talk of reform providing for the unemployed to train for new jobs.

This seems to be a roundabout way of presenting minister Axworthy's famous unemployment insurance reform, a two–tiered unemployment insurance system, what someone in my region described as generous UIC and miserly UIC. Some people in Canada will have to make do with the miserly version of UIC. When I look at the finance minister's budget, it is these people I think of. What is new in this budget for the unemployed, persons on welfare, fully trained young people trying to find jobs?

Training is not the issue for young people. For young people, it is a point of fact: they are trained in leading edge technologies. Take the young people trained in technical fields at the Jonquière CEGEP, for example, they have been trained in every advanced technical area. These people should not have any trouble finding jobs because they are competent and have all the necessary training. But they cannot find jobs. Why not? Because there are no jobs.

There is no work for people looking for it. Even to restore employment to levels we had before the economic crisis, we would have to create 400,000 jobs in Canada. With those jobs, we will find ourselves where we were three years ago, and furthermore, this does not include newcomers on the job market.

I was surprised when the Minister of Finance said that Canada's two biggest problems were Quebec and the debt and that he did not mention unemployment.

Now to the budget: what is the verdict? This morning's papers ran stories on people who are happy and who say the economy will finally have room to breathe. That was the title of an editorial from La Presse. Before the budget, people were saying that these were hard times, that Canada was on the road to bankruptcy and that its credit rating was going to be downgraded. After the budget, people are now saying that things have improved, and accounting associations have given the Minister of Finance a mark of 80 per cent. Therefore, all is well. But who is telling us that this is because of the budget?

• (1535)

Big business, banks and brokerage houses that sell Canadian bonds, in fact, all of the people who gain from the system. They are well paid and work in a sector where the economy is well developed: the financial sector. While this sector often does not generate much wealth, it plays with it, taking a cut from it in passing. Those people are happy.

Two insights into this comment. Firstly, these people are happy because they see that the budget contains a solution to the debt problem. Curiously, a budget that appears to close certain debt–related gaps is enough to make the other problem—that Quebec is one of Canada's major problems and may scare off potential investors—disappear. They are not saying that Canada has succeeded in solving the Quebec problem, but that Quebec is simply no longer a problem. That is something I have noted.

What do ordinary taxpayers think about the budget? I have the impression that they simply feel relieved because they avoided major cuts this time. Of course, they will pay a little more for gas. Dairy producers in Quebec will see their subsidies reduced, by $2,000 or $3,000 in some cases. It is still a significant amount. Some taxpayers may have to pay a little more in taxes but, in general, taxpayers feel that they have avoided the worst.

But what about all the others, those who have been forgotten, that I mentioned earlier, those looking for jobs or trying to improve their socio–economic status in Canada? Those people are not praising the budget in newspaper headlines. They are not heard. They are silent.

In the last few years, Canada's major newspapers, whether in Quebec or in English Canada, have been paying significantly less attention to those people than they did in the 1970s. Probably because owners have succeeded in selling a little more their philosophy that the state should intervene less and less and let the disadvantaged and less fortunate in society fend for themselves.

This philosophy has spread to the newspapers where everyone has good things to say about the budget. Where are the budgets that used to take care of the less fortunate without excessive spending? This is not done anywhere in this budget.

And there are other things that must not be forgotten. We must not forget that, according to the Minister of Finance, this budget was aimed in a way at restructuring Canada to a certain extent through decentralization. They said that Canada was too centralized, that it was too costly, that they wanted to shift some responsibilities to the provinces.

They are transferring certain things to the provinces. In the next two years, they will transfer $7 billion to the provinces for health, education and social assistance. We note, however, that they are not really decentralizing but rather transferring problems. This is not a transfer following negotiations in good faith on restructuring Canadian federalism.

More importantly, this budget will not bring about tax reform. RRSP provisions will be tightened a bit. The large corporations tax rate will rise from 0.2 per cent to 0.225 per cent, which amounts to only $145 million. The surtax on profits will go up from 3 per cent to 4 per cent, which represents $350 million over three years. There will be a temporary tax on banks.

A tax which will raise about $100 million total, from all banks, when the Royal Bank of Canada alone turned profits of $1.2 billion this past year. What is $100 million as compared to the aggregate of all bank profits? Peanuts.

Why does the Minister of Finance come up with such a measure, a proposal which is almost insulting to those who pay taxes? Actually, I think this may well have to do with the public perception of a shockingly low level of taxation. Next year, the banks will again turn huge profits. Given the current interest rates and the streamlining efforts of the past three or four years, banks stand to make huge profits. So, you can expect more hoopla in the press. What will the Minister of Finance have to say? He will be able to say: "But we did impose a temporary tax on them, a special tax to bring in $100 million". That is one hundred million dollars in taxes on profits perhaps as high as $10 billion.

That is a mere one per cent. It is somewhat insulting to those who often have to pay as much as 40 or 50 per cent of their incomes in taxes. Of course, they are probably among the wealthy.

The fact of the matter is that the budget before us has not put our fiscal house in order as it should have. The tax shelter issue remains unresolved, as do the ones raised on the French television network newscast Téléjournal, last week, where the situation of two individuals earning $100,000 was compared. One hundred thousand dollars is not peanuts. These are wealthy people. The salaried worker would pay $40,000 to $43,000 in taxes every year, while the self–employed person earning just slightly less, thanks to all kinds of tax loopholes and tricks, and with deductions for children, would end up paying $22,000 in taxes.

When Canadians see things like that—even though they often have little sympathy for those who earn $100,000—when they compare the two situations, they realize that there is something wrong with our tax system.

Consequently, we feel that this budget is unacceptable because it does not include a major tax reform.

Let us now turn to the debt. Again, it would be one thing if there were some concrete results, but such results are not obvious. The Minister of Finance, who is not making whimsical predictions, currently estimates that the debt will be somewhere around $500 billion this year, and that it will reach about $603 billion in three years. Therefore, regardless of what the minister does, the debt will increase by another $100 billion. The interests on that debt will increase from $42 to $50 billion. As well, the deficit will remain around $24 billion in 1996–97.

So, the government talks about reducing the debt, but Canadians who are watching, and who may be prepared to make sacrifices, cannot help but think: "Sure, but the debt is still there. It will still grow. We will still have to pay high interest rates on it". Where is the improvement?

Canadian taxpayers will be even more sceptical when they find out what these assumptions are based on. These forecasts are based on the prediction that the economy will continue to grow after 1997. Therefore, the debt will continue to rise even if the economy is doing well or continues to do well over the next three years.

The budget also forecasts interest rates. I am a little surprised to see the Minister of Finance forecast interest rates two years in advance when he often fails to forecast accurately two months in advance. Whatever. Nevertheless, the budget does have to contain some numbers to make it look scientific and serious.

There is another issue that is probably scandalous and that, in my opinion, will floor the average person who ponders the issue and that is that they predict a drop in the rate of job creation. This year, it will be about three per cent; next year, it will only be about two per cent.

They forecast an unemployment rate of around 9.4 per cent. That is no low rate. In fact, 9.4 per cent represents only the unemployed workers who are included in the survey, but many of them are not. This means that regions like mine will again face real unemployment rates of 15, 16 or 17 per cent.

• (1545)

The budget tabled by the Minister of Finance offers no comfort to those who want to work to support themselves and their families.

I have two last points to make. This budget does not offer solutions to the debt problem. Why not? Perhaps because the budget is based on a number of assumptions, which do not take into account the Bank of Canada's potential influence on the monetary policy.

Many financial players say that making the monetary policy more flexible would stimulate the economy by reducing interest rates so that people could invest in and revitalize the business sector. In an approach that I would describe as doctrinaire, the Minister of Finance refuses to make any change to the monetary policy, in spite of the fact that there is no inflation, so to speak, in Canada. So, it would be time to cut some slack in that area to give the economy a chance.

I will conclude on this. I suggest there is another solution that we, Quebec sovereignists, could bring about. We think Canada is in need of economic restructuring. I think that Quebec's achievement of sovereignty, which will no doubt happen within a few years, will provide a welcome opportunity to restructure the economy, start over based on new presuppositions, review our policies and build on new bases.

For all the foregoing reasons, I will be voting against the budget.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the member and noted one particular aspect. I do have a comment and one specific question for the member.

He asked about the young people and what is there for them, that there are no jobs. There is no question there are still a large number of Canadians, particularly young people who do not have jobs.

Governments in themselves do not create jobs; businesses, and particularly small businesses do. Over one million small businesses in Canada employ over 70 per cent of Canadians. They are the ones who are the engine of this economy. They are the ones who are going to help to create jobs. The member well knows that over the past year the government has assisted in the creation of over 433,000 jobs.

I looked at the economic statistics for the last year. The fact is our growth rate over the last year was 4.25 per cent, the highest in the G–7. According to the OECD, Canada will continue to lead the industrialized world in growth for the next two years. The unemployment rate has dropped below the 10 per cent level and in fact we have virtually no inflation.

The member concluded his remarks by getting back to the essence of why he is here. It has to do with sovereignty, the separatist question and the separation of Quebec.

Would the member not admit that the ability of Canada to move forward and to achieve economic growth and greater job creation depends a great deal on the confidence level of investors in Canada and the certainty that people have with regard to the affairs of Canada? Would he not agree that once the referendum question is dealt with, once this issue which has cost Canada so dearly over all these years is finally resolved, Canada's economic position will be much stronger?

[Translation]

Mr. Caron: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comment and question.

With respect to his comment, I would just like to say that, when the Minister of Finance talks about job creation or when the Liberal Party was talking about job creation during the election campaign, they never said: "We will create 400,000 jobs". What the Liberal Party said is: "We will create jobs". And what the Minister of Finance is telling us is: "We have created 450,000 new jobs in Canada". I suggest he qualify this statement by saying "we contributed to the creation of", if we follow my hon. colleague's reasoning.

• (1550)

On the issue of confidence and Quebec, I do not think that shoving our problems under the carpet will resolve anything. The Quebec issue is that of a people who wants to achieve sovereignty. I could tell you a long story, but it would be the history of Quebec, to make the point that, for us, this is a culmination. And Canada will not make this problem disappear by denying this reality. A better way of dealing with this problem would be to recognize it and look at the potential impact of Quebec's sovereignty on both Canada and Quebec.

I have the distinct impression that Canada would survive if Quebec were to secede. Why not? I think that those who say that people are reluctant to invest because Quebec wants its sovereignty are just using this as a scare tactic. Interestingly, after the defeat in 1980 and the patriation of the Constitution which was supposed to create a new order in Canada, we did not experience a major boom in the economy. I remember what happened in 1982. There was a serious recession, and that was two years after Quebecers said no in the referendum. I do not think there is a relationship between the two.

But there is something I would like to say to the hon. member in closing. As long as the issue of Quebec has not been resolved, Canada will always identify this issue as a problem. I do not think that holding people against their will, scaring them and threatening them will solve the problem. Whether the answer is yes or no in the referendum, the problem will still exist and there will still be sovereignists in Quebec who will continue to stand up for what they believe in because not only is it an emotional issue, but it is also a matter of interest for Quebec.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Madam Speaker, for many months and in fact for a number of years, federalists have claimed that all Canada's economic ills are caused by political instability. When in recent months interest rates went up and the Canadian dollar went down abruptly, people said: It is all because of those nasty separatists.

Perhaps the hon. member would care to explain why, the day after a budget that was rather well received by the financial community, interest rates seem to be going down and the dollar seems to be going up? Why, since the Quebec problem still exists? How would he explain that?

Mr. Caron: I want to thank the hon. member for his question. Madam Speaker, I would say that the connection is tenuous and as far as I can see, non existent. We heard the same excuse after the results of the referendum on the Charlottetown accord in 1992. I remember seeing certain studies, including one by the Royal Bank which said that if Canada said no or Quebec said no, that would be the end of Canada, and I remember, this was either in the study or maybe it was a political cartoon, there would be train loads of Canadians heading for the American border to take shelter in our neighbour's economic paradise. In fact, there is no connection. If you look at the economic situation and the whole issue of Quebec's sovereignty, there is no connection between the two. Often, support for sovereignty is strong while the economy is weak, but often it is the other way around.

Unfortunately, some politicians are using this issue to make political gain. I deplore that because politics is a noble art, a noble science, a noble calling, and it is the art or the science, if you will, of government. It is the art or science of guiding and moving societies. When we use all kinds of tricks and excuses to try and get at our opponents and even resort to blackmail on these issues, I think that in addition to weakening our case, we also diminish our performance as a politician.

I want to thank the hon. member for Louis–Hébert for giving me this opportunity to say that I do think economic issues are linked to the question of Quebec sovereignty. I agree, but I do not agree that this very fact weakens the Canadian economy. I would say that people are waiting. People are waiting, and if we manage to reach a decision, I am sure the economy will recover, both in Canada and Quebec, and that we will then have the resources to restructure our economies and ensure that within Canada's present borders there are two countries that are comfortable financially and whose citizens will be able to work together.

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise in the House today to express my support for an innovative budget that sets the Canadian economy and Canadian federalism on a new course, a budget that at the same time remains faithful to the most fundamental Liberal principles. I commend the Minister of Finance on presenting a budget that strikes a balance between the need for a quick return to fiscal responsibility at the federal level and the need to maintain what identifies us as a people, the compassion of our social programs.

Since the pre–budgetary consultations began, the message from my constituents has been clear: we must tackle the deficit, but at the same time, we must be fair and equitable.

[English]

My constituents have told me unequivocally that, like each household, the government must learn to live within its means. It must concentrate on reducing the deficit by significant cuts in government spending, not by increasing the burden on the middle class.

They have also told me that they wish to see increased fairness in the taxation system and a continued protection for our most vulnerable by way of efficient and modern social programs. Those same constituents conveyed to me their belief that our social programs are in need of reform to modernize them and make them more efficient and pertinent to the realities of the 1990s.

I am pleased to state that I believe this budget to be a significant first step in achieving the delicate balance requested by my constituents. However, I must say that balance is only achievable because Canadians want and are ready to support real change, a new policy direction and a new approach to governing in Canada.

Getting government to live within its means is our first challenge. Not unlike a household, a government that lives above its means eventually faces hardship.

There can be no doubt that the accomplishments of Canada and Canadians, a nation with a small population base, are unprecedented. Canadians have banded together to build the best nation in the world. Our resource base is abundant. Our population is well educated and hard working. Our private sector is dynamic and entrepreneurial spirit abounds.

Last year we led the G–7 in growth. Our inflation is low, exports are booming and jobs are being created. Our economy is on track. The fundamentals and basic ingredients for guaranteed economic success are in place.

However, our interest rates and the currency are at the mercy of the international financial markets that speculate on our ability to control public debt and deficits. Those markets have us living under a microscope and any rumour can send our interest rates upward and our dollar plummeting. Under those conditions, Canadians live under a perpetual cloud of economic uncertainty which affects personal financial decisions as well as business decisions.

• (1600)

Year after year governments have spent more than they have taken in. We have borrowed to the point where our ability to repay is in doubt. We are now at the mercy of lenders that monitor our every move. It can be said that public policy is now judged by its impact on Canadians and on our creditors, who are more concerned with our ability to repay than our aspirations as a people. In a true sense, because of the rising debt and persistent deficit we are losing control of the public policy agenda.

The budget is unprecedented in scope and comprehensiveness. It builds on last year's initiatives and sets the stage for regaining control of public finances and the public policy agenda, signalling the eventual return to our traditional focus of building a fair and just society.

The budget significantly reduces the deficit. In three years the government will have saved $29 billion. We will have reached the target of 3 per cent of GDP by 1996–97 and if private sector forecasts are correct, we will even surpass it. As the Minister of Finance has repeatedly stated, we must meet the deficit reduction target or risk remaining vulnerable to the speculation of the international financial markets.

The budget does more than set out a deficit reduction plan. It also defines a new approach to government, a new approach more in tune with the needs and challenges of the nineties.

When the government accepted the challenge of deficit reduction it rejected the slash and burn approach or the notion of across the board cuts. Across the board cuts of 20 to 30 per cent are not the key to deficit reduction for the simple reason that a 30 per cent cut in a bad program still leaves 70 per cent waste, whereas a 30 per cent cut in a good program just does not make sense.

A slash and burn approach to deficit reduction may achieve results, but more often than not at the expense of those most vulnerable. That is not our way. We believe in fiscal responsibility. We also believe in fairness. The government knows that in addition to deficit reduction, the machinery of government has to be renewed to better serve Canadians in a new economy.

The budget makes the federal government smaller while it lays the foundation for a government that is smarter, more efficient, more responsive and more focused on renewed priorities. That is the essence of a program review. Under program review the departments started with a simple question: In the nineties, what should a federal government do for the people? Those things a federal government should do are being analysed to determine the best way to deliver them.

The things a federal government should not do were either discarded as something that no government at any level should do or were determined to be best achieved by a level of government closer to the people. The end results are smaller departments, $16.9 billion in cuts from program review alone, but smarter departments with renewed mandates, a tighter focus and new priorities that will better serve the taxpayers and better support an innovative economy.

The process of reinventing the role and the machinery of government clearly demonstrates that Canadian federalism is flexible and continues to evolve to meet the changing needs of Canadians and of the new economy. We all know that well–publicized constitutional conferences at which little is produced but disagreement and divisiveness are not a viable source of change.

Change in our federation occurs incrementally, through discussion, through dialogue and through negotiation on practical issues of concern to everyday Canadians. It is at this level that Canadian federalism is flexible and responsive to the needs of all their citizens.

[Translation]

As a francophone from northern Ontario, I have witnessed this change. It is because of Canadian federalism, flexible federalism, that I am able to stand in this House today and speak in my mother tongue to talk of my heritage, which I have kept and enriched, and of my pride in being a French Canadian.

• (1605)

The road has not always been easy, and there have been struggles on a number of occasions. However, without Canada, without federalism, the battle would have been lost from the start.

[English]

A critical component of program review has always been that the level of government best positioned to deliver a service should do so. Such a bold statement clearly demonstrates that the federal government wishes to actively promote the evolution of federalism because it is in the best interest of Canadians. Federalism in Canada is not about the status quo.

That federal wish is inherent in the new transfer system to the provinces. The block funding system discards the cost sharing roles to give the provinces more flexibility in delivering programs funded in part by the federal government. This measure acknowledges the need to tailor social programs to meet the specific needs of Canadians living in different parts of the country. The 4.4 per cent reduction in transfers to the provinces is a necessary measure to help the federal government meet its deficit reduction target.

However, it must be emphasized that in 1996–97 the federal government will be transferring to the provinces $35.3 billion. I know that the majority of Canadians will agree that transfers in the order of $35.3 billion per year confirms the government commitment to equalization payments and the support of provincially run social programs. In addition, the government is always prepared to meet with the provinces to establish principles which govern the distribution and the use of those transfers.

My experience at the local level has clearly demonstrated to me that much of the funds targeted for social programs are consumed by administration. The money directed to the poor is not reaching them because of the high cost of administration. With flexibility I am hopeful that the provinces will be in a position to lower administrative costs and get more money out of the hands of administrators and down to the people who need it. If properly managed, savings could even reach the 4.4 per cent of reductions in transfers.

Some provinces or provincial governments may try to characterize the cuts and transfers as a personal attack or downloading. I would remind those people that we have three levels of government, including the municipalities, but we only have one taxpayer. In the end, that one taxpayer does not draw any benefit from a provincial budget that is balanced by way of transfers from a debt ridden federal government.

Deficits and accumulated debts are common problems throughout the federation at all levels of government. We must learn to work together to solve them in the best interest of that one taxpayer.

As many of my colleagues have already mentioned, the budget is unprecedented in scope and comprehensiveness. It puts us on the right track for deficit reduction. For every $1 of new revenues the budget will generate, there will be $7 in cuts.

No government likes to cut but we were left with limited choices. We proceeded in what we believed to be a rational and fair way. We did not cut blindly. As I mentioned earlier, we began with non–priority areas and also sought to renew the role of the machinery of government to bring about significant savings of $16.9 billion. We applied the principle of shared responsibility to the concept of deficit reduction. To protect the more vulnerable, we asked those who could afford it to shoulder a larger part of the burden.

For example, the budget sets out massive cuts to industrial programs, business subsidies, regional development agencies, transportation subsidies. There are also significant cuts to defence, natural resources and Canadian heritage. All in all, there were significant cuts in varying degrees in the vast majority of departments.

On the revenue side we have moved decisively to introduce new fairness into the tax system. We have sent a clear message to those able to pay that they will have to shoulder an increased responsibility for deficit reduction. For example, we have set temporary limits on RRSPs at $13,500, affecting only those who earn in excess of $75,000. There will be a new tax on investment income of private corporations. We will eliminate deferral of tax on business income. We will limit some incentives. We will tax family trusts. We have increased tax on large corporations. There is a new corporation surtax. We have a new capital tax on banks. Finally, there is the gasoline tax.

Looking at the overall picture of the revenue side I am sure the majority of Canadians will agree that we have met the criteria of fairness. I am sure that in the future we will move again to close more loopholes.

I would like to take a few seconds to tell the House what the budget is not about. The government has demonstrated the courage to open the budget process to let Canadians in. Throughout the process we emphasized that we would use a balanced and fair approach.

The opposition has used this consultation process to falsely suggest that the government would impose additional taxes on the middle class. Members said we would overburden the middle class with the budget. We have not. They said that there would be a health tax. There is none. They said that there would be a dental benefit tax. There is none. They said there would be a tax on RRSPs. There is none. They said there would be a tax on lotteries. There is none. Finally, they said there would be income tax increases. There are none. I would also add that there are no increases in UI premiums.

In the end, I believe we have achieved a fair distribution of restraint among all Canadians in all regions of the country.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, some individuals and groups tell us we have gone too far, while others say we have not gone far enough. I answer them by saying that we have done what we said we would: we have formulated a budget that will meet our objectives and targets for deficit reduction.

We have chosen the best route. Our budget is carefully balanced. It balances the need to control government expenditures with the need to provide the protection of social programs to our most vulnerable. Cutting too much in order to satisfy the financial circles would mean too great a cost to the disadvantaged and would weaken Canadian confidence in the economy. Cutting too little, on the other hand, would threaten our ability to pay our expenditures and make us more vulnerable to control by foreign markets.

In hard times, the provinces turn to the federal government for leadership. Unfortunately, during the last nine years, the provinces turned to the federal government for leadership, and the Mulroney government failed to provide it.

I would like to repeat the quote given by the Minister of Finance in his speech: "Government must not live in the past—Every day there are new needs to be met. If inflation is to be fought, unemployment countered and something done, and soon, to get Canadian prosperity back into its stride, the government must begin to plan ahead—not timidly, not tentatively—but boldly, imaginatively and courageously".

It is no coincidence that the person with the Prime Minister is the son of the individual who made this statement. He is the person, the son of Paul Martin, Senior, who will return stability, confidence and prosperity to Canada.

Furthermore, Canadians may be assured that their federal government will provide the leadership sought by the provinces. If we are now facing a new opposition consisting of two parties, the Reformers and the Bloc Quebecois, it is because the Mulroney government did not meet the provinces' call for leadership.

For this very reason, the Liberal team will respond to this call by the provinces and these new parties will inevitably disappear.

In conclusion, I would like to bring to the attention of the House another issue in the budget. I would like to offer the services of my riding and my region to help the Minister of Finance fulfil this commitment. Sudbury and the region of Nickel Belt have rich mines, skilled workers and all the skills and institutions in place to provide to the Government of Canada the new $2 coin that is referred to in the budget. We would be pleased to provide that service for the rest of Canada.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have heard this member and others before him make the comment that we are targeting spending better with this budget.

The most substantial spending measure in this budget is as a result of what was not done rather than as a result of what was done. That is the increase in interest payments on the debt.

Does that mean that it is the deliberate intention of this government to target spending more to interest payments than in the past?

Mr. Bonin: Madam Speaker, this question has been asked so many times in the House. I will attempt to answer it differently because it seems that Reform members do not understand.

There is a balance to be offered when there is such a huge problem as we have in this country. We inherited the problem.

I like to compare it with a program I saw on TV. In New York City the underground infrastructure of the water system is so old and rusty that they cannot check to see if a valve is working. There is so much rust that the valve will break if they turn it. I like to make that comparison.

The people I share this with, the people of my riding and other ridings and the people from my party and other parties, except for the Reform Party, seem to relate that there is a danger in overkill.

Definitely, Canadians and the Liberal government would like to say let us slash and burn and there is no more debt. The only serious difficulty is it would affect human beings. That is the part the Reform Party cannot associate with. We include it in our answers and try to explain to them that they have to have some compassion. That word is used often by a good many members in this House but it is never used by members of the Reform Party.

A society with compassion is often judged by the way it treat its seniors. Taking $3 billion out of the seniors' pockets is not my idea of compassion. I have answered the question for the people who understand. I feel like the minister or the priest who preaches to the people who do not practise. They sit there having heard the answer so many times and still they do not understand.

[Translation]

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like above all to respond to the initial remarks made by the member for Nickel Belt. He seems to regard it as quite an exploit that, thanks to Canadian federalism, he is still able to rise in this House and speak in French.

I must say, it is very difficult for me to understand how this view can be so easily accepted since the opposite would indicate assimilation. So he admits that it is exceptional that he has not been assimilated.

As he comes from a French speaking community, I find it rather difficult to understand how someone like him could say that; he is aware of the incredible rates of assimilation in Canada. In 1971, the rate of assimilation for all English speaking provinces was 27 per cent, but by 1991 it had increased to 37 per cent.

• (1620)

Equally, he is a member of a government whose language commissioner recently released a totally shocking report on this government's inability to provide francophones in other provinces with services in French. He is also a member of this government which will make cuts to the CBC, no doubt equally in the French and English networks, without realizing that the French network has been discriminated against for 20 years, although audience ratings are identical and budgets are one third higher for the English network, identical ratings and identical schedules, unless I can be convinced that the English language CBC network is on the air 36 hours a day, which I would find very difficult to understand.

I find it difficult to understand those remarks and I would like to know how he can rise in the House and praise a federal system which has created these things which are after all neither very interesting nor very praiseworthy.

Mr. Bonin: Madam Speaker, I am surprised to see the knowledge that my colleague opposite has cultivated regarding the situation of francophones outside of Quebec. When I first came to Ottawa, at the same time as he did, his party thought that I was one of their own when they heard me talk.

Most of these people have never ventured outside of Quebec. Most of these separatists were oblivious to the fact that there were any francophones outside of Quebec. My riding is 40 per cent francophone. I represent such a riding, and our separatist colleagues from Quebec do not even know we exist. At the end of 1978, René Lévesque came to Laurentian University in my riding in Sudbury and said to francophones outside of Quebec that Quebec had enough problems and had no time for us. That is what he said.

My colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois are surprised and moved that there are francophones outside of Quebec. I will give them a little background on northern Ontario. There were nine children in my family, all francophones. I organize family picnics for the Lefebvre family in my riding, and we invite all of the descendants of my grandmother and grandfather. I recall one year where 750 people registered, all francophones. So, come out of your shell! Excuse me, Madam Speaker, I meant to tell them through you to come out of the shell in which they have been hiding.

It is never adviseable to propose to separate from something you do not know. Go see the rest of Canada. Go see whether it exists, get a taste of it and you will conclude that it is worth keeping Canada together. Yes, if I rise in this House today and am so proud to speak to you in my mother tongue, French, it is because I had the opportunity to live it, to be raised in it and to speak it at university. My son is registered in a family medicine program in French in northern Ontario and my wife teaches at a French school.

Before being elected, I taught French in a French college; the new college is under construction. I was the president of a French–English school board, the majority of whose members were francophones. So do not try to tell me that francophones outside Quebec have no rights and that our rights are being taken away from us daily. We had our problems in the past, but we got to know one another instead of deciding to separate. We decided to sit down together and learn to work with one another.

I played hockey with the anglophones and I enjoyed it. They are good people. I also played in another league where everyone was French and we spoke French on the ice and in the locker rooms. We learned to work at overcoming problems, to respect one another. The respect of one person for another is very important for a federation.

The message is not complicated. For the separatists, if you wish to separate, at least know what you are separating from, because you run a very great risk of hurting the people you represent. This is not right, because the members of the Bloc Quebecois in this House do not represent the majority of Quebecers. They are playing a dangerous game and those of us from northern Ontario know it.

• (1625)

With reference to Radio–Canada, I am going to tell you about one of the problems we have in northern Ontario, because I think something needs to be said. Most of our programming comes from the province of Quebec, but we would like more local programming. The propaganda we get on the television and the radio is driving us to switch to our other francophone stations in northern Ontario.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I will be dividing my time with my colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer.

I wish to address this House on the business of the budget which was presented yesterday. I want to deal particularly with one part of that budget. It has to do with the provisions for science and technology. The hon. Minister of Finance said that the general objective of federal spending in science and technology is to build a stronger science and technology capability in Canada.

There are two funding councils through which a lot of this money goes, the National Sciences and Engineering Research Council of Canada and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada. Both promote and assist primarily university research and graduate education. Their budget was reduced proportionately less than those in other areas because, as he said, that reflects the importance and priority placement of R and D for this government.

The same thing happened with the National Research Council. It too was reduced, but not in the same proportion as were certain other parts. The National Research Council will have to eliminate activities of a lower priority.

From the above it is pretty clear government has demonstrated that science and technology is considered to be a strategic asset of government.

Let me quote directly from the Minister of Finance's budget plan: "High deficits and debt lead to higher interest rates, higher taxes and reduced confidence, which dampen investment and growth. The financial requirements flowing from chronic deficits, when not matched by increases in private sector savings, increase Canada's dependence on foreign borrowing, the servicing cost of which is a permanent drain on national income and future living standards. The constant financing of deficits also reduces the government's capacity to provide important public services and to make adequate investments in the area of strategic national importance, such as science and technology."

It should be clear to everyone that this budget, because it does not adequately deal with the fiscal problems of this government, will make it difficult to develop in precisely those areas upon which the future economic development of this country depends and which must take place if Canada is to compete in the global marketplace.

Concerns have also arisen with respect to the treatment of R and D expenditures on information technology generally, and in particular those incurred by financial institutions. I quote the minister again: "As an interim measure, all information technology R and D performed after budget day by financial institutions will be excluded from the definition of scientific research and experimental development pending the completion of the review of information technology R and D".

Is this specific act a discrimination against one of the major stakeholders in scientific and technological development? Or is it as Peter Cook stated yesterday in his article in the Globe and Mail: "Fairness to the politician does not mean burden sharing. It means goring the fewest oxen." Since there is not a large number of financial institutions and the chartered banks are by far the fewest and the largest of those, only very few oxen will be gored by this regulation.

The question, however, is a larger one. Does this action discourage other innovators in the information technology field? That is particularly problematic in light of the Auditor General's observations that we must recognize the global economy is increasingly driven by knowledge based industries and that innovation is critical.

He goes on to detail some of the characteristics of an innovative country. He states among other things that first, innovation has become a crucial survival issue. It cannot be treated as an option. Second, innovation trends do not arise by themselves. It is generated and sustained through the efforts of people. Innovation is where the innovative spirit is. It cannot be legislated or brought about by edict. It comes from individuals and from creative and interactive communities and it thrives in an environment of encouragement and support.

Three, he says government needs to create an environment that is supportive of innovation. If not, innovators will not innovate or leave to go to places where there is support for innovation. Four, partners in an innovative society include all aspects of our communities, all governments, communities, individuals, corporations and families. Five, he says Canada has the potential to be particularly innovative as a society because of the cultural diversity of its people. Canada could become known as an innovative country.

The Auditor General also observed that within the science and technology department there is an absence of strong leadership: "The government does not have a clear idea of precisely what it is trying to achieve in science and technology".

In response to that observation of the Auditor General, here is what the Minister of Finance said in his budget plan:

> Industry Canada is developing a federal science and technology strategy. The department is drafting a national vision of science and technology through external consultations, internal review as well as an independent assessment of the national advisory board on science and technology.
> Industry Canada, in conjunction with other relevant departments, is also working to increase the relevance and economic impact of the government science and technology spending; a more businesslike approach is being adopted.

This is a total statement with regard to this matter. It is vague, yet it readily admits that knowledge is where the future lies. How much money would a private investor place in a vague and wishy–washy sense of direction like that?

In this case, as in any other pursuit, it is essential that there be a clear goal as to where one is going so that one may determine the costs and know when the goal has been reached. At the moment I am afraid there is much money and a lot of activity being thrown in a particular direction but little to show for it. When resources are scarce we cannot afford such lack of accountability and irresponsible expenditure of public funds.

There are some suggestions that I would make that might be of assistance in meeting the Auditor General's message. First, in this country there are insufficient links between science and technology policy on the one hand and economic indicators on the other. Do the government policymakers ask themselves what economic indicators are being directed toward science and technology?

Second, science and technology remains internalized. While it talks about being innovative, about being an important component of economic recovery, it seems to have no idea how to activate policy to become that component. The reason for that is because any review that has come out of the department of science and technology has not had its genesis or relationship with the finance department.

In many ways science and technology and Industry Canada are having an identity crisis. They know what they want to be, an engine of fiscal recovery, but they have no idea how to get there.

We hear much about creating stronger partnerships between government and universities, government and industry, industry and university. We have not heard a whisper about the relationship that is necessary to forge between academic scientists and economists.

• (1635)

Many who comprise and compose the structure of science and technology have moved from the ivory tower of the university to the ivory tower of government. Neither is a traditional place where market value means much to the daily workings of the respective institutions.

Protected from the real world and from having to generate revenues to support their work, their objectives are fuelled by the desire to maintain the status quo. Instead they choose to believe that the granting system is sacred and necessary, that generating revenues is not within the purview of science.

However, generating revenues is a principal element in becoming an engine that drives economic recovery. We are relying on science and technology to produce products, jobs and a niche for Canada in the global marketplace. When we are told that science and technology can do that we believe it because we want it to be so. However, we want it to be happening now.

Do we have to wait another 30 years since the last science and technology review took place when nothing happened? One year from now is too long. It is time to get out of ivory towers and do it now.

We need to have a different structure, a necessary new configuration; one that places more emphasis on each knowledge worker and less concentration and centralization of services, one that joins Newfoundland to British Columbia by an information highway capable of sharing ideas of co–operative creation, of production teams equipped with expertise not limited to institutions, sectors, regions or governments. That is innovation. That will assure Canada's future. That is what we must do and we must do it now.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to give a speech that I sincerely hoped I would not have to give. In the fall the Minister of Finance promised he was going to get serious about the debt and deficit in his budget and that he realized Canadians would not accept any higher taxes.

The minister went on to conduct a much touted prebudgetary consultation process. The minister claimed again and again that he would listen to Canadians. The hopes and wishes of the Canadian public have been betrayed. It is absolutely unacceptable.

I want to talk about the tax grab of the government. Since I was elected, one of the most ironclad wishes of my constituents and the Canadian public has been that the government put a halt to increased taxes. Canadians are already taxed to death. They are bled dry by the government.

Although the government knew all about the terrible situation it is once again sticking its fingers into the wallets of Canadians and picking them clean. Only this time, since the part of Canadians' wallets that holds the bills is empty thanks to the government, the tax man is rifling through the part that holds the change, plucking the last few loonies away from the beleaguered public.

We have a tax on gas, a tax on utilities in Alberta and taxes on corporations which get passed on to the public. This is not closing loopholes. This is not taxing the rich. These are taxes on everyone who uses a light bulb, heats their home, drives a car, farmers and consumers in general.

This is totally unacceptable. The government has been told time and again it does not have a revenue problem, it has a spending problem. Last year the government spent its way to a record setting deficit. We have now racked up a debt of over $550 billion, costing the taxpayer close to $80,000 a minute in interest charges.

This is unbelievable and this is what we are leaving future generations. That is the compassion we have heard some of the members talking about. There should be some compassion shown for the future. The government seems to think that overspending by 24–odd billion dollars by 1997–98 is the greatest achievement ever accomplished. Where the government gets its priorities is totally beyond me.

What did the government not understand about the message of the Canadian public which was no new taxes and fix the deficit?

• (1640)

Even the Liberal Party's own personal cheering squad, the Toronto Star and many others, had come up with front page headlines like "Get a grip on deficit with cuts, MPs told, but don't try raising taxes, constituents say".

The government was given this message over and over again but it did not listen. I do not doubt the government has a million and one justifications for increasing taxes and I am sure the spin doctors figure they can manipulate the Canadian public into believing these taxes are in the best interests of everyone, but they are wrong.

We really feel that removing the deficit and putting in place a reformed tax system and a long term plan for the reduction of the debt will be the only way to save the programs that Canadians value.

In 1984 our debt was $190 billion. We had a fellow come along who said he was going to fix it. By 1988 he said that he was going to fix it again and then we were up to $370 billion. In 1993 we were told that there was such a terrible government and it had built up $489 billion by election day. We were again told that it was going to be fixed.

By 1997 at the next election we will have over $600 billion. All this and the government thinks that a $32 billion deficit next year is a great achievement. I am sorry, I do not think that is good enough.

In the past the government has always figured that it could formulate policy and then bring it down from on high. The government thought it knew what was best for Canadians and imposed this on the public.

The last government was particularly good at this trick but we know what happened to it. As much as the government does not want to hear this piece of news, the days when Ottawa told Canadians what to do and how to live are over. It is time for the Canadian grassroots to tell the politicians in Ottawa what to do, and they better do it.

For months now the government has made its problem even worse because it told Canadians it was listening. The public was optimistic that a new day had dawned but now it knows. Now Canadians realize that the government was going to do whatever it wanted regardless of what it heard in the prebudgetary consultations.

It is politics as usual in Ottawa. The government pretends to listen to make itself look good and assures Canadians it has turned a new leaf but the illusion never lasts. This budget is the splash of cold water to the face of the public it needed to realize where the government really stands.

Tax and grab is the name of the game and wishes of the public do not matter. Shame on you, Mr. Finance Minister. You sit on your gold plated pension while future Canadians are sacrificed. Not only is it a huge shame that the government has chosen to raise taxes, but when I ask myself if it is at least taking care of the debt and deficit properly, my answer is no.

Our federal debt is around $550 billion and it is going up by $10 billion every few months. The interest on this debt is huge and is going up by $80,000 a minute. Every time the interest rates go up by 1 per cent the deficit rises by almost $2 billion. By the time the next election is held our yearly interest payments will be over $50 billion. This is what will really threaten our social safety net and nothing else.

The international money managers are happy today because they have just been guaranteed an ever increasing source of cash. Let me put it another way. Even if there were no more interest charges on this debt ever and a single Canadian put $10,000 per year into paying off the debt they would reduce it to zero by the year 55000000 A.D.

Faced with this debt problem, what is the government's answer? What resolute action is it going to take to save our country from economic peril? It has promised to reduce its overspending to roughly $25 billion per year beyond what we can afford by the time the next election is called.

This will mean that Canadians will only have another $100 billion dollars added to the national debt, bringing it over the $600 billion mark. Wow, what commitment and responsible action. With those kinds of fiscal skills, maybe the cabinet ministers of this government should act as financial consultants when they are looking for new jobs after the next election. I am sure financial wizards like themselves should have no problem finding a job. Maybe the savings and loan companies in the U.S. are looking for senior executives.

• (1645)

In all seriousness, it boggles my mind how the government can think that it has done enough. For months now Canadians have told the government that they are willing to bite the bullet in order to address the deficit problem, but the government continues to believe that it can do things as usual; it can have its cake and eat it too. It can spend the country into the ground with big government in one breath and pretend to fight the deficit in the next.

I am sorry, but it just will not do any more. Canadians are unwilling to play the old Ottawa game. They want real change, real reform, real spending cuts and no more taxes. The message is simple but the government is not listening. The actions needed are obvious but the government is afraid to act.

Over the coming year Canada will slip further and further into debt, the dollar will struggle and upward pressures on interest rates will be the norm. As interest rates rise our growth will slow and unemployed Canadians will continue to be frustrated in their efforts to find jobs. In the past the government has been fond of blaming such problems on the previous government. That time is now over. The government has made its bed and now it is time to lie in it. The people of Canada are smart. They know the bill of goods that has been sold to them and they will not forget.

The smoke and mirrors approach of Ottawa will not sell to the provinces or to the people of Canada. Enough is enough. Start from the top. Reduce MP pensions. Reduce the number of MPs. Reform and reduce the Senate. Cut upper and middle management and stop offloading cuts on the lower end of the pyramid.

We have reached a turning point in this government, a downward turn, a turn for the worse, and the Reform party will not stand idly by. Reformers have got the message, no more tax, fix the deficit. Now is the time for us to confront the government and force it to listen. We will tell it over and over, as many times as it takes, to try to get the message through that we have a serious problem and we must address it.

The Budget

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague opposite. He said that the government did not listen, did not discuss and did not involve Canadians in the process of budget and budget reform in trying to strike a budget that at one time would deal with our financial crisis but at the same time not push the country into recession.

Canadians told us that they did not want us to raise personal income tax, that they did not want us to touch RRSPs and that they did not want us to tax dental plans. They wanted us to make substantial cuts in government so that it would function more efficiently. This government listened and that is what it did.

As I listened to the Reform budget I heard it take on the little guy and make it tough. That budget would impose a direct tax against Atlantic Canada, would attack ACOA and would attack those institutions which make Atlantic Canada function. It would attack seniors and senior women who would see their income taxes rise because of the budget that was put forward by the Reform party.

Did the Reform Party listen to anybody when it put forward its budget?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, what we have done is really listened to the people. People are saying that they are sick and tired of government from the top down. They are saying give them programs that will let them take care of themselves at the local level.

If the hon. member had read the taxpayers' budget he would see that is exactly what it does. It puts in place things like RPSPs which allow people to take care of themselves, not depend on bureaucracy to do it and not depend on government which over 35 years has failed them; failed to guarantee the social programs and failed to provide them with services. That is what the people are saying.

• (1650)

The threat is that $600 billion and that $50 billion in interest payment. That is the threat to all the social programs and it is going to hit everyone where we presented a budget which was going to be fair and equal to all and would have provided a solution. It will be too late by the time these people wake up.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I too have to comment on the member's brief speech.

The Reform Party had used the time in advance of consultation on the budget to go around stirring up so called tax revolts and really scaring Canadians by indicating the government is going to do this, the government is going to do that. As the previous member stated very clearly, the government is not taxing RRSPs or health and dental benefits. The government did not raise personal income taxes. The government did listen.

The government reduced its spending. There are $7 in spending cuts for every $1 of revenue increase. The member now, in trying to salvage some face with regard to the ridiculous tax revolt incitement, is trying to rest everything on an excise tax of 1.5 cents per litre.

I have a very simple question so that all Canadians fully understand what that means. Could the member please advise the House how much that means to the ordinary Canadian in terms of going to a gas station to fill up a tank? How much does that tax cost Canadians?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, the answer to that question is $500 million, but there is a lot more to it than that. There are a lot more areas.

There is that 12.5 per cent to corporations which is going to be off loaded on to people. There are all of the changes when the money is transferred to the provinces to allow them less money, to allow them to increase their delivery of services.

We talk about long term. I am from Alberta and we had a premier in that province, Mr. Getty, who gave a budget very much like this. It was a feel good, be happy, do not ruffle anybody's feathers, try and keep everyone kind of balanced budget.

As far as consultation with the people, I would like to say that in terms of this consultation, the number of town hall meetings and so on that come about in that consultation I would gladly compare with anything that the hon. member does.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Madam Speaker, unlike the last speaker, I think it is a great honour for me to stand today and support the budget. I am very proud of its very bold and visionary approach to fiscal management.

Throughout this budget the Minister of Finance had in effect courageously redefined Canada's system of government while at the same time maintaining the basic principles of fairness and equity.

There are some specific areas of the budget that I would like to address today, especially as they impact on British Columbians and on my constituents.

I would like to stress that this budget has fulfilled all the promises made by our government. It was tough but it was fair. This budget has ensured that the financial burdens faced by all Canadians will be distributed in an equitable manner. It started by cleaning house, by setting an example of frugality and fiscal prudence from the top.

There is no NIMBY syndrome in this budget. We started right in our own backyard. We redefined government by downsizing, by becoming lean and efficient and by enunciating a more appropriate role for government, one that enhances growth rather than manages it.

We did this by getting out of mega projects, by cutting back on subsidies to businesses, to farms, to transportation and to mining. We feel that these sectors can sustain themselves and be competitive if we just get out of their way. They have told us this often enough and now we are doing it.

We will commercialize viable sectors like transportation so that they can be self–sustaining and so that the users pay for their services rather than all taxpayers. We will still ensure that public safety and national standards are maintained.

• (1655)

This budget clearly comprises a major turning point in our economic history. In the last few years we have been straining to govern. We have been straining to survive under the cloud of a burdensome debt and a dangerous deficit.

This economic downturn we just suffered compounded the negative impacts of the deficit and the debt by affecting our credibility in world markets. Our economic sustenance was at the beck and call of investment bankers in New York and editorial writers in Washington.

We had two choices. We could continue to ride the downhill spiral toward indebtedness and even to third world status or we could take measures to change direction. We needed a revolution and this budget has provided us with one.

Over the next two years this budget will create cumulative savings of $13.3 billion, $11.9 of which will represent cuts in government spending. That equals $7 of spending cuts for every dollar of tax revenue. As a result in 1996–1997 our economic growth will finally be greater than the growth in our debt.

This is a key element. It marks the turning point in our indebtedness as a nation. It means that we will be taking in more money than we are borrowing for the first time since World War II. We have finally turned the corner.

Contrary to the rhetoric spawned by the furious and impetuous reaction of opposition parties and other groups, this budget does not reduce our commitment to social programs. I think rather it enshrines it. By taking control of our finances we have regained our sovereignty and our ability to make our own decisions about the kind of social democracy we want to live in. We have empowered ourselves so that we can make decisions based on our values as a people; values of compassion and of social justice, values that see government's role as one which creates opportunity for all, one which removes obstacles and one which protects the most vulnerable in our society.

This budget will let us protect our social programs from the investment bankers and editorialists of the world. By achieving our deficit targets we are taking action to prevent New York or Tokyo from in effect running our country and defining our social programs. A Liberal government could never allow that to happen.

I am glad to see that this budget, tough as it is, was not balanced on the backs of the poor, the sick and the elderly. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Health, I am pleased to note that his budget in no way affects the medicare standards and principles that are so dear to us and that are enshrined in the Canadian Health Act. Health care delivery across this country will continue to be comprehensive, universal, portable, accessible and administered by the public. In the red book we committed to ensuring that these principles are upheld and we are keeping that promise.

Yesterday in a typical knee–jerk reaction to the speech by the Minister of Finance, the Leader of the Opposition and his finance critic stated that the budget was merely another confirmation of status quo federalism. It is clear that the Leader of the Opposition did not read the document, or if he did he did not understand it.

The budget does the exact opposite. It clearly marks the beginning of a new era of federalism and of federal–provincial relations. It is a move in the direction of a leaner, more efficient, more accountable system which recognizes provincial responsibilities and the ability to redesign and redeliver effective services at the local level; the bottom up approach that the opposition parties so often tout but are reluctant to implement.

In reading the newspapers this morning I noticed that much of the media has focused its concerns on the new system of block funding, the Canada social transfer which will result, it says, in fewer services being provided by the provinces. On the contrary, with the new system of lump sum transfer payments, our government is in effect giving the provinces greater flexibility and greater leverage in the administration of their social programs.

The federal government's role has been redefined but in a positive way. I firmly believe that these changes will provide a window of opportunity for us to set clear national standards for all social programs. This is a move that my constituents and groups across this country have advocated for years.

Instead of balkanizing the country, this move will allow us to set national objectives for education and social security like we have done so successfully with health care.

• (1700)

Since its inception medicare has given over the management and administration of health care to the provinces governed by a set of principles enshrined in the Canada Health Act. This has created a health system that binds us together as Canadians, a system of which we are duly proud, a system that has freed the federal health department to concentrate on the broader issues that affect the health and safety of all Canadians. This is what we intend to do with the devolution to the provinces.

I trust that following his consultations with the provinces the Minister of Human Resources Development will act swiftly in proposing standards and principles that will see us act along the lines of the Canada Health Act and the standards for administration and national care we see as a nation.

The Canada social transfer will do exactly what we want it to do. We have shown by our leadership as a federal government that we can provide better, leaner and more efficient government. I believe the provinces will rise to that challenge and be able to show us that they can do just as well as we can and as we have done.

I would also like to talk a bit about the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act that I feel are very important. I believe that one of the key issues of unemployment at the moment is in keeping with our Liberal mandate, which is to get people back to work and keep them at work. If we can concentrate our efforts on employment services and training we will do exactly that.

Those Canadians who feel very vulnerable now because they are unemployed and who are concerned that this will damage their futures should not be concerned because our move is to give them the tools and skills needed to get them back to work, to stay in work and to make us a more competitive nation. We are removing the safety net but we are providing a springboard. I think most Canadians want a springboard.

We are also cutting some funding to the unemployment insurance program. By the fall of next year the funding will be reduced by 10 per cent. This is only funding that is going to be done because of downsizing of administration and because it will automatically come from the lower unemployment rates. As the House knows, we have been creating jobs and have brought our unemployment down by two percentage points, which had not been done over the last 10 to 15 years.

We are also moving to reduce some of the abuse that I hear from all over the country is endemic in the system. That will save us $200 million.

Furthermore we are looking to do something that is innovative and creative. We are looking to build a $5 billion surplus in the UI fund so that we do not have to make the same mistakes we made the last time. When the cycles of recession and downturns in the economy come we will have a buffer to start so that we do not have to increase UI premiums and therefore hamstring the businesses that need to grow, to help us to sustain the economy in bad times. This is just common sense.

By maintaining a surplus we will be able to mitigate the rates and help in periods of slow economic growth. It will also help us to encourage job creation at a crucial time when we are recovering from downturns in the economy.

In addition, I am very pleased to note that throughout the budget the government has remained totally and absolutely committed to a fair and sustainable system of protection for seniors. It recognizes the important contributions that seniors have made to Canada's social and governmental infrastructure.

I have a large seniors population in my riding. They have been very concerned that their pensions would be destroyed in the budget. I am pleased to be able to tell them that the two main pillars of the public pension system, the Canada pension and the Quebec pension plan, the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement will be maintained and improved.

In the budget the Minister of Finance has promised to sit down with the provinces in the fall to review our very shaky Canada pension plan. The Minister of Finance pledged to release a paper in conjunction with the Minister of Human Resources Development to recommend changes to the system to ensure its affordability, fairness and sustainability as many of us baby boomers move into old age.

Finally, the minister is announcing a change in the method of payment of old age security to high income seniors who have been subject to the so–called clawback. This is simply an administrative, common sense approach. If we pay out our benefits to individuals at a time every month instead of waiting until the end of the year to give in and pay back, it just prevents a lot of paperwork. That is the kind of silliness that has been costing so much money in government spending over the last few years.

• (1705)

The budget has also followed through on our red book promises to maintain fairness and equity in our taxation system. The Minister of Finance has refused to balance the budget on the backs of the poor. Rather it seeks to distribute the onus of fiscal frugality to those who have traditionally not been paying their fair share.

Reforms to family trusts are a good example. I firmly believe that in times of fiscal restraint all Canadians should pay their fair share and not escape through nice old loopholes.

The budget eliminates the cap and justly so for family trusts, changes to the family trust administration and will terminate the preferred beneficiary election for trust taxation years that begin after 1995, except where the beneficiary is physically or mentally impaired. Again the government has done a sensible thing with compassion so that we will not harm those who are most vulnerable.

I recognize that family trusts have many valid non–tax objectives such as helping with succession planning, but these changes ensure that family trusts will not be used to defer capital gains for income splitting purposes. That is the loophole we were trying to get rid of. Once again the budget has shown that we are committed to reductions as long as they are fair.

There is more good news for my constituents in the budget such as changes to the government's role in transportation. The federal government's role in transportation is evolving from that of being an operator of the system into one that is primarily a policy maker, a regulator and a landlord with only limited operational responsibilities. Subsidies are being reduced and in many cases eliminated. Major operations will be given more commercialized forms and remainder operations will be made more efficient with greater reliance on users rather than taxpayers to pay the cost of the transportation system.

Thus the budget reduces net spending by Transport Canada and related agencies by over 50 per cent in 1997–98, from $2.8 billion to $1.4 billion. As a consequence the port of Vancouver in my riding and other ports across Canada will have the opportunity to thrive under the autonomy they have sought for many years now and finally become competitive.

Changes to the mining sector will have a positive impact in the long run in B.C. In the budget the federal government has decided not to renew mineral development agreements, but it also likes to emphasize that this non–renewal does not mean it has abandoned the mining sector. The mining sector has not had a fair system of taxation to assist it in different levels of mining such as reclaimed mines versus new mines. We are going to look at these issues so that we can give that sector what it needs and remove the barriers so it can thrive and become as viable as we know it can be in Ontario and in British Columbia.

I would like to comment a bit on members of the Reform Party in the House who have attacked our budget. They have said we have not done the things we should do and they have discounted our figures. They have said that we have been hypocritical.

The budget tabled by the third party was punitive and non–creative. Throughout the history of the country the Liberal Party has always been here at times of change. Whenever the country has sought to move into new areas, has sought to become a greater country or has sought to change the way we do things, there has always been a Liberal government in place to lead us into the changes.

We are moving into the 21st century. There will be many challenges for the country. We have seen we need to be competitive. We have seen we need to look at training. We need to look at employment. We need to look at jobs. We need to look at economic growth. We are focusing on economic growth. We are focusing on the engines of growth: small business, science and technology. We are going to make the country move forward.

As always, a Liberal government has been there to help Canada to manoeuvre its way through difficult times. We will be here once again to move us into the 21st century when I know the world will look to Canada for leadership.

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Madam Speaker, I was listening to what my colleague has just said with great interest. I do believe her Liberal roots are showing.

• (1710)

It is full of sophisms. I will make a comment and then put a question to my colleague. How will it be possible to provide quality health care when transfer payments to the provinces will be cut by $700 million next year? How will it be possible to improve health care? She spoke at length about this earlier.

If I were a young graduate, I would be very concerned tonight. If I were on income security, I would be even more concerned. If I were unemployed, I would be extremely concerned. They are talking about cutting 45,000 public service jobs, about closing military bases in Saint–Hubert and elsewhere. The extremely competent workers who will lose their jobs will surely find other jobs, but for a 24–year old graduate, it is a different matter. One job means one job, not two jobs.

Tonight, I would be very happy if I had a family trust as I would have until 1999 to avoid taxes. Nothing to worry about. If I were the Royal Bank, I would be very happy, too. I would send you a dozen roses and we would sing together. The wealthy are rejoicing while the most disadvantaged are sad.

I would ask my colleague to really explain to these young university graduates and unemployed workers how and where this budget will help create jobs quickly, when we know that it takes $200 million away from infrastructure programs?

[English]

Ms. Fry: Madam Speaker, I would like to respond first to the statement the hon. member made about health. Many studies have shown now that the health care system is appropriately funded but that the health care system needs to be managed more efficiently. That is what we should be looking at doing.

We do not need to continue to pour money into the system. The system can provide the best health care in the world that Canadians need if we manage it. It has not been managed on sound management principles. We have not looked at the outcomes of the things we do to see whether they make a difference to the health status of the population.

There are enough studies now to show that we can save significant amounts of money that we can put into important aspects like prevention and helping to improve the health status of the population so our children can grow out of poverty and be healthy. We know that poverty is a major determinant of ill health in the country. We need to shift our resources where they do the best and where they improve the condition. That is what we can do if we manage the system better.

I do not see that any kind of cutbacks in funding will make our health care system worse. It is a challenge for provinces to learn how to manage the system appropriately on sound principles and guidelines. I think we can do that and I think the provinces are equal to the challenge.

With regard to young Canadians who are looking for work and any Canadian who is looking for work, the unemployment insurance system at the moment has shown us that 25 per cent of Canadians across the country are functionally illiterate. Forty per cent in the maritimes are functionally illiterate. We are not looking at the traditional student any more. We are looking at adult populations, non–traditional students, who need skills and tools to get back to work.

On one hand, the government is trying to push the engines that will drive the small and medium size business sector which will create 80 per cent of our new jobs. On the other hand, we are looking at unemployment insurance as an adjustment that will help people to get the tools and the skills they need to get back into the workforce so they can become independent contributing citizens who contribute to the competitiveness of the country. That is what we are looking to do, create opportunity; a springboard and not a safety net.

• (1715)

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, when I listen to many of the Liberal members I am reminded of Eliza Doolittle. She was getting very frustrated and she finally sang a song which I believe was "Words, words, words. I am so sick of words".

I listened to the member talk about the proposal where the government is proposing to combine the money it is transferring to the provinces for health and welfare and for post–secondary education into this Canada social transfer act, then magically make $4.5 billion disappear.

Members should know Reform made a proposal like that. However, when we talked about it, we were talking about transferring tax points, transferring the ability of the provinces to be able to fund these. This is simply downloading.

The difficulty with this plan is that the Canada Health Act and the Canada assistance plan are both etched in stone as far as the provinces are concerned. Therefore the entity under the Canada social transfer that literally goes begging with this $4.5 billion is post–secondary education. Post–secondary education simply disappears.

I have a very specific question for the member. Considering that members' pensions are such a monumental issue in the province of British Columbia, I know that her constituents, certainly all the people in British Columbia, would be interested to know if she intends to exercise her option of opting out of the members' pension plan, thereby showing the leadership that the people of Canada are looking for.

Ms. Fry: Madam Speaker, although the member made a nice little speech prior to his question that I would like to comment on, I will respond to his question first.

The hon. member is asking me if I will opt out of the pension plan because he sees it as a way of being responsible. There are many ways of being responsible. I would like to look at the whole issue. I would like to see whether it is feasible to opt out or whether I choose to do so.

Reform of pensions is a fundamental and basic issue. It has been looked at. The Prime Minister was very clear when he talked about reforming members' pensions. We have had a report from a third party that talked about a lot of reforms to pensions and to MPs incomes that I do not see the hon. member discussing in total.

It is easy to cherry pick, to take one little part of a report and comment on it. You have to look at the whole. That has been a fundamental flaw in all of the third party's policies. Its members take a little piece of a narrow strip and never look at the big picture. They never see how it impacts, whether there is a domino effect or not.

The hon. member should look at the big picture sometimes.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Madam Speaker, as the official opposition critic on human resources development, since the last election campaign, I am today faced with the Martin budget. It has been one long obstacle course.

Having come this far and despite what the minister says, I know from reading his budget and listening to his speeches that, far from giving up the idea of implementing major cuts in social programs and centralizing powers, the budget before us confirms that what the central government wants most of all is to withdraw from health, education, social assistance and other social services, but to keep the sectors where it feels it must be involved, even if they are not under its jurisdiction.

• (1720)

Now, without a word of warning, without any concern for efficiency, it is about to shamelessly increase duplication and overlap. During the human resources development committee's recent tour, many groups and individuals, more than 1,000 Canadians, came and told us basically that what they needed most was not training, although it was often requested, but rather jobs, decent jobs.

There is strictly nothing in the budget on this matter. The budget is silent for some incomprehensible reason. It is silent, while budget cuts alone lead nowhere in terms of dealing seriously with the deficit and debt problem. Yes, the minister made a step in the right direction, but you need only take a good look at the budget to see that the debt will not be reduced this year, on the contrary, and that a deficit reduction was achieved at the cost of great and extremely difficult sacrifices. Considering that a single percentage point will make $1.7 billion difference in debt charges, it is obvious that we must not look only at cuts.

We must not for the sake of the debt, of course, but above all for the people whose livelihood depends, right now, on their jobs or the hope of getting one. All over Canada, people have told us that they were prepared to talk about social programs and social reform, but not in the context of further cuts. They told us also that Canada was no leader in terms of social programs. Recent OECD statistics clearly show that Canada's social expenditures are below OECD average, at the same level as that of New Zealand's, for the information of New Zealand admirers.

What does this budget say? It tells us that another $7,5 billion will be cut in social programs between now and 1998. I say "another" because we must not forget that the previous budget passed in this House also provided for a $7.5 billion cut in social programs. So, this makes two times $7.5 billion, or a total of $15 billion, in cuts in social programs over a period of four years. That is what we learned following a leak, when the Minister of Human Resources Development announced his project. In the end, after this whole exercise and after the bickering among Liberals, we realize that what was the plan in October is now in the Minister of Finance's budget, in spite of all these consultations.

People said: "The government can no longer cut into social programs". Yet, the expected cut is being made, in spite of the problems that it will generate. What else does this budget tell us? We see that the federal government is backing away from funding in health, education and welfare.

• (1725)

I use the term "backing away" because the federal financing of these sectors is reduced to such an extent that the provinces will experience increasingly more serious problems. The merging of the old financing, education and health programs, as well as social assistance, is called the Canada Social Transfer. This transfer hides two realities mentioned in the budget. First, because of this Canada Social Transfer, if there is a recession, the provinces will have to fully assume the additional costs related to the increase in the number of people relying on welfare. That is what I mean by backing away, Madam Speaker.

The Canada Assistance Plan, which was far from being perfect, was based on the financing, by the federal government, of provincial programs designed to help the poor. The federal government is now eliminating that structure, claiming that it will provide more flexibility. But where is the flexibility for the provinces? The federal government is not transferring responsibilities to the provinces: they already had them. Rather, it is transferring costs and, in fact, leaving the provinces to look after the problems, while knowing full well that, in the end, it is Canadians who will pay the price, and in a very dramatic way.

I will repeat a comment made by the hon. member from British Columbia who spoke just before me. She said that the government was giving back to the provinces the power to spend because they are in the best position to do so appropriately. Why is it that the government is giving back to the provinces funds which are dwindling and about to disappear? The federal government is telling the provinces to use their imagination, when it is in fact dumping its problems on them.

But there is money available, even though that may come as a surprise to you. There is a hidden fund which explains why the budget may have looked better than expected. I am referring to the UI fund and the programs financed through that fund. Quebec asked for the control of the whole manpower sector, or at least as regards vocational training. There is money for that. Where will that money go? Unfortunately, when there is money available, the federal government does not think that the provinces are in the best position to show some imagination, to know what the public's needs are, and to help Canadians. No. The federal government only recognizes the ability of the provinces when they are forced to live with cuts, to make hard decisions and to look like the culprits.

However, when the provinces could have the tools to promote employment and define meaningful strategies, then the federal government prefers to remain in control.

Thanks to the UI fund, the federal government can, in its budget, make proposals which almost go unnoticed. One such proposal is the new investment fund for human resources.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt the member for Mercier. You will have ten minutes after the vote.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed from February 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C–37, an Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.30 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion for third reading of Bill C–37.

Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion, of the amendment, and of the amendment to the amendment.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Madam Speaker, it is always difficult to pick up the momentum one had in the first part of a speech. I am sure that we lost our listeners and viewers during the vote.

I just would like to add very quickly that there is something I find very surprising in this budget, and that is the role of the unemployment insurance fund. As we saw, the federal government is withdrawing from funding health care, education and social assistance. This spring, it passed Bill C–17, which tightened up eligibility criteria so that fewer people were entitled to UI, and received smaller benefits for a shorter period of time.

The UI fund allowed the federal government to pay itself back for the loan it had made during the recession and consequently to present a more favourable picture. But this is not all. Since the government did not lower premiums but reduced eligibility, it was able to make some incredible forecasts. This year and next, there will be a difference of $5 billion between expenditures and revenues.

What is this money going to be used for? Naturally, the government proposes, first, to reduce the deficit. Does it propose to reduce contributions, to help small and medium size businesses? No. It proposes to let a surplus of $5 billion accumulate. What it also proposes, to finance the creation of a human resources investment fund, as the budget calls it, through a new reform of unemployment insurance, is to divert money from UI to this new fund.

In fact, the unemployment insurance fund is the cash cow of the federal government. It will protect it from the effects of the next recession. By withdrawing from the financing of social programs and the CAP in particular, the federal government leaves the provinces in a position where they will have to deal with the consequences of a future recession and a future increase in the numbers of the poor, while insulating itself from such consequences. How? By having surpluses in the unemployment insurance fund.

Who generates such a surplus? Companies, of course. But not any company, the ones that are labour–intensive, that is the low–tech companies, those where things are done manually. The companies where wages are the lowest. These companies and these workers contribute in a large part to the unemployment insurance fund. Companies with more technology and higher wages, because of ceilings, are exempt. And this means that the fund is financed by workers and companies which are not the main beneficiaries of the fund. Not only do they help give the federal government some protection against the next recession, they also allow it to show a lower deficit since the money is added to the federal budget. We recommended that it not be included anymore.

Finally, not only do we see more cuts in social programs, nothing whatsoever in the way of employment, and continued interference by the federal government in areas where there is money to be had and where it can call the shots, but in the case of manpower training, the federal government no longer says that the provinces know best. That is not what it says. It maintains control over job training and all manpower issues. As I said, it does not want to withdraw from areas where there is money to be had.

However, the money in the unemployment insurance fund comes from labour–intensive corporations employing a lot of low–paid workers and from these workers. Let me conclude by saying that the workers are really the ones who foot the bill since the corporations pass on their costs onto the consumer.

It is really a shame to see the federal government use this fund to shamelessly guard against whatever the future holds, while workers will have to pay more taxes and will run into more problems in the areas of health, education and welfare.

There is another important issue I want to address and it is linked to the new national standards that we can expect with the Canada social transfer. Throughout the budget speech, we are told "This is the beginning of a new era in Canada. We have finally realized that provinces know best", especially, may I add, in tough times. But there is more.

With this new Canada social transfer, the federal government will be able to withdraw during the next recession and still have the power to set new standards.

• (1810)

What are we told? We are told that, for two years, this Canada social transfer will be funded at the average combined rate of CAP and EPF and that, for two years, health care standards will apply, so that the federal government will be able to withhold payments to provinces who do not comply. We are also told that the Canadian assistance plan, or CAP, the source of half of the social program funding in Canada, no longer exists. The only responsibility that remains is to make welfare payments without minimum residency requirements.

The bottom line is that the government, by dropping CAP, wants to be seen as generous and mindful, at last, of the role of provinces. But the fact is that the government is retreating because it can no longer afford CAP. It does not want to invest the money needed to give its share to Ontario, a province that suffered a lot during the last recession. The government was in a bind and either had to find more money, or penalize Quebec. So, it decided to put on a show of openness, but at the same time to prepare with the provinces new standards applicable, as Mr. Martin said, to the Canada social transfer.

No more cuts, no more centralizing. Let the people and the provinces take care of all the problems and the debt. But the federal government got itself some breathing space by using the money of workers and small businesses.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I find it strange that the opposition critic objects to this transfer of some areas of jurisdiction to the provinces. Even though the role of the opposition is to criticize the government, in this case, it is still criticizing federalism.

We talked about the surplus in the unemployment insurance fund. Certainly, these past few years, we have been forced to review our programs, to seriously reevaluate them, in order to see where we are in these programs which have existed for more than fifty years or so. We certainly must make some adjustments. We must face the new challenges of market globalization, and I believe that the federal government is fully aware of the importance of taking some corrective measures in this regard.

I would like the opposition critic to tell us what she thinks about the fact that the government has decided to do more in counselling services, in basic training abilities, as well as in training and experience in the workplace. It also intends to do more in child care services. It is even looking at the opportunities relating to the income supplement. I would like to know if, in her opinion, these are not new ways of doing or seeing things which are highly commendable and which will certainly work towards the well–being of the people of Quebec.

Mrs. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question.

First, I want to say that if I talked about surpluses in the unemployment insurance fund, it is because these surpluses are due to the cuts that have been made. However, my hon. colleague gives me the opportunity to say that what the federal government is about to do with its Human Resources Investment Fund is to provide itself with a fat account, because it will be supplied both by the programs presently financed through the Consolidated Revenue Fund and—this is made very clear in the budget—by the reallocation of the moneys saved by a new reform of unemployment insurance.

That means that the government will provide itself with a big fund to take action in areas of provincial jurisdiction. It will not even bother any longer to try to negotiate or impose its standards, it will take action.

• (1815)

The last step is the centralization in Canada of social programs since the transfer of jurisdictions, because at that time at least they sought approval by Parliament. The last step deals with direct involvement in day care services, in income supplements, because the minister's objective was to be able to take up, through federal funds, the assistance, employability and job development services, yes, but for people able to work, who from now on would not be under provincial jurisdiction but who would, because of the long term unemployed provisions, fall under the central government's control.

So, there is indeed a large reform under way, but that reform, instead of going in the direction of recognizing provincial jurisdictions, is going in the direction of giving, through funding, direct power to the central government. This government does not care about overlap and duplication. It does not care about co–ordinating its operations and setting a strategy with the provinces, which means that in fact the government will completely take over the area of manpower. Under the circumstances, it is easy to understand why it does not want to hand over manpower training to Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to make my position very clear that I do not believe for a second that the people of Quebec, given the opportunity to vote in a referendum that is fairly put to the people, will vote in favour of separation. The member and I have a very substantial difference.

I want to put that on record because I would like to ask a question that would encompass both the possibility of her achieving her dream of Quebec separating and if not. In the issue of bringing education, hospital and the Canada assistance plan together under one roof and downloading as the Liberals are trying to do, at the same time removing $4.5 billion which means that if we are going to maintain the same level of service, which may or may not be necessary, the taxes would then have to go up at the provincial level.

If we can just set that aside, I would like to ask a question in terms of concept because she did raise the issue of national standards. If, as I have already stated, I reject categorically the concept of a separate Quebec but nonetheless if that should transpire, how would the people of Quebec be better off considering that there would be absolutely no national standards; in other words there would be no joint jurisdiction between Quebec and Canada?

Second, if, as I believe is going to happen, Quebec people choose what is best for them and do stay in Canada, would Quebec and the provinces not be better off if they had the ability to raise the taxes? In other words, the federal government transfers the ability to tax the tax points to the provinces. If they were administering the programs, is that not really the fundamental problem that the BQ and the PQ are presently trying to do, to get more jurisdiction over the areas of health, welfare and post–secondary education?

[Translation]

Mrs. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, if I understood well the question of the hon. member, he is wondering if we are not asking in fact for a transfer of tax points. That was the position we adopted and the minority report of the Committee on Human Resources Development refers to a transfer of tax points.

However, it is important to make a point about standards. In all regions of Canada where the members of the Committee have travelled, il was clear that everywhere, except in Quebec, people want strong national standards. As far as they are concerned, Quebecers want, with a few exceptions, to have their own standards.

Quebecers are a people, even though they do not always call themselves that way et they want to make their own standards. Often, those standards are higher than elsewhere for reasons I will not explain here, but it is nevertheless a fact. It is true for daycare services, it is true in the case of the Act on handicapped people, and I could go on.

But being a distinct people with regional differences, it is normal that Quebec wants to create its own standards. This is what I had to say on that issue. From a philosophical point of view, the economic or social organization is different from one people to another. You only have to study peoples as a whole or even peoples having a comparable level of social expenses to see that choices are different according to peoples, their history, their priorities or simply because they are different from one another.

It is therefore on that basis, without explaining it with rational arguments, that one can understand and defend the idea that the people of Quebec wants its own standards.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I must say that yesterday, I listened to the finance minister's speech with interest. I was expecting answers to the many questions put to me in recent months and weeks by the people of Saint–Léonard.

Indeed, all the people I met with and spoke to on the phone gave me much the same advice: "Make up your mind, do something, it is time to take action". They told me: "Put your fiscal house in order, we are on the road to ruin". They said: "Downsize the government, it is too expensive". And above all, they begged me not to raise taxes. They also said not to touch seniors. They said they wanted to continue to invest in their RRSPs because they needed them. They told me to cut subsidies to businesses, to support small and medium size businesses and to tax big corporations and banks.

The electorate in Saint–Léonard is realistic. People there are reasonable and pragmatic. They know that our future depends on the choices we are making now, in the budget the Minister of Finance tabled yesterday afternoon. They know that we must take the bull by the horns and learn to live according to our means. But above all, they know that without a drastic about–face this year, our standard of living and our future chances at prosperity are in danger.

Right at the beginning of his speech, the minister said: "Today, we have made our choice. Today, we take action". Yes, indeed. Our government chose to take the most drastic budgetary measures ever seen in 50 years to control this monster that our deficit has become. The federal government will tighten its belt and cut expenditures—all expenditures at all levels.

However, we will do so in the greatest respect of the values that Canadians hold so dear. We will promote job creation and economic recovery. We will protect the most vulnerable in our society. We will cut down on our life–style. And we will do all this without raising taxes, without cutting the old age pension and without taxing retirement savings plans.

• (1825)

Today, in Saint–Léonard as in everywhere else across the country, Canadians applaud the Minister of Finance. He had the guts to do what others had promised to do for almost ten years. For too long, we have only had smoke screens. Canadians want results, solid and measurable results, and we already have some.

Last year, we promised in our first budget to reduce the deficit to under $40 billion. Once all calculations are done, our bottom line should show that our basic deficit is some $4.4 billion less than expected. Now those are tangible results. This is something new and exciting. For ten years, there were promises to reduce the deficit, but it never happened. And now we managed to make it happen, and we did even better than we expected.

It has been a long time since anyone saw a government overestimate its deficit. The results have been very encouraging as well, here in the House of Commons. As you know, Madam Speaker, a year ago the Board of Internal Economy adopted a plan to restructure the expenditures of the House of Commons. This plan, referred to by some—rather ironically, I suppose—as the Gagliano plan, was aimed at cutting our expenditures by $5 million annually.

The big challenge was to make these cuts while at the same time providing members and their staff with the tools they need to fulfil the mandate they were given by their electorate. However, times are changing, technology has become more sophisticated and, as a result, members as well as the general public must adapt their tools to changing needs.

For instance, the advent of fax machines and electronic transmission has completely changed our requirement for messengers on Parliament Hill. We sat down and methodically analysed our requirements. We suggested new approaches and implemented our recommendations carefully and diligently.

We helped our employees by proposing generous terms for voluntary departure, which a large number accepted. We redefined tasks and ask the rest of the staff to do their share, each employee being asked to do a little more with a little less.

This morning, the President of the Treasury Board reported on the results of this plan. So far, the House of Commons has saved no less than $5,719,500, compared with last year's budget. We have not only achieved our objective, we have already exceeded it.

But there is more. This exercise continues, since yesterday, the Speaker announced a reduction of $1 million in the budget of the Food Services Branch of the House of Commons. Implemented over a period of three years, this measure will help reduce the operational expenditures of the House of Commons by nearly $7 million annually.

That is what I call results. Concrete results that clearly show we mean what we say when we want to put our house in order.

We are the first to tighten our belts, and we are not asking anyone to do anything we are not prepared to do ourselves.

• (1830)

The answer is simple, and everyone knows what it is. From one end of the country to the other, Canadians are staying within their budget by watching their spending every day. The time has come for all governments, including our own, to do the same.

The Minister of Finance has clearly stated our overall plan. For every dollar of additional revenue, the government will reduce its expenditures by $7. This is an extremely bold new direction, the most cost effective seen in this country in the past 50 years.

To ensure the long term health of public finances, we must review the role and structure of government, without fail. We must centre the activities of government on the priorities of Canadians. With this budget, we are reducing the size and structure of government to a level in keeping with our means.

As the Minister of Finance put it so well, and I quote: "Our view is straightforward. If government doesn't need to run something, it shouldn't. And, in the future, it won't".

The government is therefore going to privatize and commercialize its activities whenever possible and desirable. We will progressively divest ourselves of our interests in companies such as Cameco, a uranium company, CN, Petro–Canada, the Air Navigation System and the Canada Communication Group.

We will reduce our subsidies to business by 60 per cent—I repeat, 60 per cent—within three years. Assistance to industries which we shall maintain will be targeted to the main driving forces behind economic growth, namely expanding trade, science and technology and small business.

Almost every time I rise in this House, I remind my colleagues of the important role played by small business in our economy.

It is always with great pride that I point out that small business is the main source of new jobs in our country. Small business is ever–changing, full of vitality and creativity. It helps us recover more quickly from downturns in economic cycles and makes a major contribution to community development. It should therefore be a matter of priority to provide small business with concrete assistance to ensure its survival and growth. Better yet, we should eliminate obstacles to its success, because when it succeeds, we succeed.

Last year we announced our plan to review the $500,000 capital gains cumulative tax exemption for farmers and small business owners. We have undertaken this review and have concluded that this exemption should be left intact.

I would like to go into a few details in this regard. Yesterday evening, the Leader of the Opposition tried to plant the seeds of fear and confusion in Quebec by criticizing the government for wishing to review certain issues which we must face in coming years.

True, the government does want to review and discuss with the provinces how to preserve our old age pension system, modernize our unemployment insurance system and maintain assistance programs for the poor.

The Leader of the Opposition said earlier that when governments undertake a review, it is always with cutting in mind. I say to my hon. colleague, this is not so. We must be careful not to make such generalizations. We must not plant the seeds of fear and confusion without any good reason. Reviewing means analyzing, examining. Consulting means looking for solutions.

• (1835)

The $500,000 capital gains exemption for small businesses and farmers proves it.

Last year, we said that we would review the matter. After reviewing it, we said that we would keep it, that keeping it was important. Therefore, we must not scare people and have them believe that we are going to change everything and take pensions away from people just because the Minister of Finance announced yesterday that he will be reviewing the pension plan.

These organizations, like the Federal Office of Regional Development–Quebec, play important roles in economic growth and sustainable job creation. Nevertheless, we will not reach these goals by showering businesses with gifts. Everyone agrees on this point. Therefore, we are going to reduce business subsidies substantially. In the future, most assistance will take the form of refundable loans to businesses.

The repayment conditions attached to these loans will promote true expansion possibilities. They will continue to really help our small and medium size businesses, yet get the most for our taxpayers' money.

Lastly, we are determined to give our small and medium size businesses access to the financing they need to remain the primary source of job creation in Canada. I have often repeated my deep conviction that Canadian banks in particular have responsibilities in this area.

We have already taken the initiative of working with banks to correct their current shortcomings. From now until the fall, we will continue our efforts in this area in order to draw up points of reference for small business financing. We want to see concrete results in that sector as well. This process will be reviewed next year, and we have every reason to believe that this collaboration will produce valid results for our small businesses.

The budget tabled in this House yesterday by the Minister of Finance marks the beginning of a new era. It proposes a new way to manage the Canadian Confederation. It features a simpler, more efficient approach that recognizes provincial areas of jurisdiction. That is why we can say without any doubt that this budget reflects our progressive, dynamic, co–operative and pragmatic approach to federalism.

No one can accuse the Canadian government of promoting or proposing the status quo. The provinces will now enjoy greater flexibility and fewer constraints in managing their areas of jurisdiction. The Canada social transfer, which combines into a single consolidated block transfer the three separate payments the provinces used to receive from the federal government, will greatly facilitate operations. This new approach will reduce administrative obstacles for the provinces while giving them maximum flexibility in adjusting programs to users' needs. Provincial governments will no longer have to identify eligible expenditures. They will prepare their own budgets and make their own decisions.

This initiative will simplify bureaucracy at the federal and provincial levels. There will be less red tape, fewer regulations and more results. That is what Canadians from all parts of the country expect from their federal and provincial governments alike. I admit that our budget is a tough one. The cuts announced are without precedent.

But we no longer had any choice. If we want to maintain our standard of living and preserve our children's future, the government has to take firm measures and implement them with determination.

Nevertheless, all should recognize that the budget is also fair. We have made sure that everyone participates in the effort to correct the situation. The residents of Saint–Léonard understand that, as do all Canadians. Our budget is tough, but it preserves the essential. It respects the fundamental principle of fairness between individuals and between regions which guides Canadians. That principle forms the very foundation of our federation and makes Canada one of the best countries in the world. If you will permit me, Madam Speaker, I would like to say a few words to my English speaking voters.

[English]

The budget the Minister of Finance introduced last night is definitely a strong budget. The question we have to ask ourselves today is whether we had a choice. In the last few months international financial markets and our own financial institutions had sent the message that we had to put our financial house in order.

The Minister of Finance, who has the responsibility to find a balance between restoring confidence in the market and not being too harsh in cutting measures, was able to ensure that economic growth would continue. At the same time, the financial markets were looking for a commitment from the government that it was serious and meant business about putting its financial house in order.

The Minister of Finance did a very good job in presenting his very balanced budget. This morning we saw the financial markets responding, as did the media and the people. I have been a member of the House for over 10 years. It is the first time that after the presentation of a budget I have seen such positive announcements and comments in the media and elsewhere. We owe a message of congratulations to the Minister of Finance and the government for a job well done.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Madam Speaker, after hearing the reassuring words of the minister I would like to be able to say I will sleep better tonight, but I cannot.

The minister referred in his presentation to serving up illusions. The inference is that this is no longer happening to us with the present government. We have had 25 years of illusions, 25 years of rhetoric, 25 years of telling us we are going to get tough with the deficit, we are going to really move in on it this year, next year or the year after that.

What the minister forgets is that it was much easier for previous finance ministers to sell illusions than it is for the incumbent. Previous finance ministers could actually make illusory cuts and sell them, but the present minister, in order to sell an illusion, has to make real cuts. The problem is that it remains an illusion because the cuts are not deep enough.

All that is happening is that the government is making enough cuts in the projected spending for the next three years to keep even with the additional interest that it is going to have to pay on the money it already owes. The government is standing still.

It makes me think of a sailor who has been shipwrecked and is treading water madly. He sees a lifeboat about 100 yards away. Instead of trying to make it to that lifeboat he says: "That's too tough, that's too hard. I'm just going to keep right on treading water". He does and eventually he drowns. This government is treading water and Canada is drowning in debt.

• (1845)

I ask the minister, what contingency plan does this government have for the time when the interest payments on our deadweight debt become so great that there is no money left to maintain social programs or even basic government services? This is the direction in which we are heading.

We are heading in a direction where there will be no social safety net. There will be no pensions. There will be no welfare. There will be no UIC. There will be nothing if the whole rotten house of cards comes tumbling down. What contingency plan does this government have?

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, first I want to thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to express my thoughts on this matter.

I understand the member. I have the same frustration. I have been in this House for 10 years. Every year we would see the Minister of Finance get up and promise to reduce the deficit, but he never did. Last year, for the first time in 10 or 11 years, a Minister of Finance stood in this House and predicted a deficit.

The government fiscal year end is March 31 and we are now at February 28. We are one month away from the end of the fiscal year and we are predicting, after accounting for everything, that the deficit will be reduced by more than what we predicted, $4 billion more. That was the commitment we made to Canadians in the last election. It was the commitment we made to Canadians when the Prime Minister took office. We said that what we say is what is going to happen because we made that commitment and we want to make sure that Canadians know.

That is why this morning financial markets and all the economic and financial analysts were very satisfied with the budget. They finally realize that we are going to have a deficit of $24 billion next year, which is our commitment in the red book we campaigned on, of 3 per cent of the GDP. It is important to our financial markets, our financial and economic system that we make the assurance that when we predict something, when we estimate and make assumptions that we know what we are assuming and we reach those targets.

That is the first thing the Minister of Finance did in his first budget. He has continued to do it in the second budget. He has kept our commitment of 3 per cent and also has reached beyond that.

There will be a day when we will have no deficit and we can start tackling the national debt. There will be that day with this government and with this Minister of Finance.

Also, the member should not forget that besides having a financial deficit there is a human deficit. The government is not a business that can just close the door and say: "Well, too bad". This is a government. We are running a country. Besides the financial deficit there are human beings who have to be considered.

That is what the Minister of Finance and this government are doing. We are making sure we keep our commitment to reduce the deficit so that we will be able to tackle the debt and have economic prosperity in order to assist those in need. We will be able to create jobs for the youth of this country so they will have a future.

The way the Reform Party sees things, everything is black and tomorrow is the end of the world.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, to the secretary of state, I notice in the document provided by the government yesterday called the "Budget in Brief" there is a quote on page 14: "This government is absolutely committed to providing a fair and sustainable system of protection for Canada's seniors".

I wonder if he can help us understand something here. The government has just made, I grant, real cuts of $10 billion. The payment on interest in the time that this government has been in place has increased $10 billion which means that we are treading water. Interest charges are increasing at a rate of 17.3 per cent. The governments have let our Canada pension plan get into a position of being underfunded $487.5 billion on top of the $545 billion that we are in debt at the national level; in other words, over a trillion dollars.

Considering all this, I wonder if he would not agree with me that the words in "Budget in Brief" saying, to quote the finance minister, that come hell or high water we are going to look after our seniors are not just words.

If we are going in the hole that quickly with additional interest charges which is interest being paid on money that we have already borrowed, we are going backward so rapidly that in spite of this government's words we are not going to have the capacity to be able to look after our seniors.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, let me assure the hon. member and all Canadians watching as of this moment that there will be money. The Government of Canada will be able to keep its commitments and pay pensions to seniors.

The difference is that the Reform Party sees everything black, it is the end of the world. The member acknowledged that we have made real cuts. We have a balanced budget in terms of real cuts and it will encourage economic growth. The deficit will disappear. The deficit will be reduced by creating jobs.

What the Reform does not understand is that by creating jobs people work, pay taxes and will increase the number of dollars that will come in. The government will pay the debt.

The problem that we had in the past 10 years was the previous government committed to certain targets that were never met and the expenses were higher than revenues. For the first time in Canada our operating budget is in surplus. That is what the Reform Party does not want to understand.

SAVE YOUR VISION WEEK

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, March 5 to 11 is "Save your vision week" in Canada. This is an annual event to foster public awareness sponsored by the Canadian Association of Optometrists.

This year's theme is: "Hope is in sight. Good vision and literacy: There is a clear connection".

Many Canadians are unable to read simply because they do not see well. Children do not learn to read if they cannot focus on the blackboard or on the words in a book. One child in six has a vision problem, which makes it hard for him or her to learn and to read. The key is prevention. Early detection of vision problems really helps improve literacy. It has been established that three quarters of adults with literacy problems also have vision problems.

I join, therefore, with the 2,800 optometrists in Canada to remind Canadians that good vision is a must for good reading.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the president of the Public Service Alliance called upon his members yesterday to make a decision on a work–to–rule action and other pressure tactics to protest the public service cuts.

The Liberal government refuses to enter into a constructive dialogue with the Public Service Alliance. Yet the alliance has stated its willingness to join forces with the government to ensure better management of staff reductions and to maintain services to the public. In deciding against negotiations and partnership, the Liberal government is in essence denying the very principle of collective bargaining.

With a work–to–rule action by civil servants on its hands, the government is now reaping what it has sown. All Canadians and Quebecers will pay for the contempt displayed by the Liberal government.

FIREARMS

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to recognize the mayor of Dauphin, Manitoba, Mr. Inky Mark.

This gentleman took upon himself to compile resolutions from approximately 200 municipal governments from all provinces and territories. These resolutions support the principle that all Canadians now and in the future shall continue to enjoy the lawful, responsible and safe use of all firearms.

He took these efforts upon himself because he felt the voice of the tax–paying, law–abiding citizen was seldom heard. He has consistently asked for the establishment of a national firearms advisory council whose members would be made up of a cross–section of non–partisan people.

I would like his message to be heard loud and clear and to pay tribute to his tireless efforts on behalf of responsible recreational firearms users.

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has finally admitted with his budget that his government has no intention of maintaining national standards in our health care system. Today the Prime Minister was quoted as saying: "Social programs such as medicare will revert to meeting more basic needs as they did when they were started half a century ago".

Fifty years ago someone in my family suffered from a major illness. We were fortunate as a family that it only took us 10 years to pay off the bill. Fifty years ago others lost their farms and businesses for reasons of health and health expenses. Because of that they also lost hope for the future.

It is clear now that this government is intent on doing away with national standards with the national health care system. In fact rather than building Canada, the Prime Minister has confirmed today the government has set us on a course to dismantle this country.

SIMCOE COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to announce to the House that, as of next September, the Simcoe County Board of Education's intensive French language program will be offered at Bradford West Gwillimbury elementary school.

Five out of the six major centres in Simcoe county now offer a bilingual curriculum to their English speaking students. This year, over 500 elementary and secondary school students registered for the program, which is in its sixth year. I wish to congratulate the school board, its staff, and above all, the parents of Simcoe county for participating in this program and for their contribution to bilingualism in Canada.

The intensive French language program is another example of the importance placed on the French language in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada.

MICHAEL BARNES

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise in the House to congratulate Mr. Michael Barnes, a constituent from my riding of Timiskaming—French River.

Mr. Barnes is a teacher and historian who has chronicled the history of northern Ontario. This region is as rich in exciting history as any other in Canada but is often ignored by the majority of Canadians.

Mr. Barnes has researched our history from the early days of the gold camps and the construction of the railways. In all his works Mr. Barnes has celebrated the resilient and rugged people who came from across Canada and the world to settle and prosper in this bountiful region of our great nation.

Northern Ontario and indeed Canada should be proud of Michael Barnes. I call upon all members of Parliament to join me in congratulating him today as he rightly becomes a member of the Order of Canada.

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to bring to the attention of this House a long and storied Canadian tradition, that of the lighthouse keeper. Recently, Transport Canada announced that the remaining lighthouse keepers in Canada would be replaced by an automated system.

Today I would like to speak about two historic and treasured stations located at Cape Spear and Cape Race in my riding.

Cape Spear, Newfoundland is the most easterly point in North America. It is where man meets the sea. The lighthouse station at Cape Spear, in operation since 1835, is still manned by a lighthouse keeper. Yet on the 160th birthday of this lighthouse, Transport Canada wants to have machine meet the sea at this historic point.

The second lighthouse, Cape Race located in southeast Newfoundland, has for decades been the reference point for European ships bound for the Americas. Since 1856 European ships have approached a manned lighthouse station at Cape Race.

I urge Transport Canada to re–examine its decision regarding the demanning of these lighthouses. One hundred and sixty years of history and tradition—

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a move of extraordinary cynicism, the Liberal government has decided to impose what amounts to an immigration tax. The members of the Bloc Quebecois deplore this virtual tripling of the fees required upon submission of an immigration application. In addition to the basic $500, an adult immigrant will have to pay a tax of $975 to have his application considered.

This government, which has loudly proclaimed its openness to immigration, which wants to boost its citizenship profile, which produces one overblown speech after another on Canada as the country of choice for immigrants, is practicing the exact opposite of what it preaches.

The message sent by this fee hike could not be clearer: Canada is no longer interested in taking in immigrants, and is particularly uninterested in those with low incomes. It has decided to close the door and exclude those whose contribution has been and is still so important for Quebec and Canadian society.

VISION AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, next week is Vision Awareness Week in Canada. It is an annual public awareness campaign sponsored by Canadian optometrists. This year's theme is "Hope is in sight. Good vision and literacy: There is a clear connection".

Can you imagine if all of us who wear glasses went without them for a day or even half a day? That would put us in the position of those I am addressing today.

Many Canadians cannot read well because they cannot see well. Children will not learn to read if they cannot focus on the chalkboard or on the words in a book. One in six children has a vision problem.

Not all vision problems are easy to detect, therefore the earlier problems are detected and corrected, the better. Prevention is the key. The fact is that three–quarters of adults with poor literacy skills also have problems with their vision.

As literacy critic for the Reform Party, I join Canada's 2,800 optometrists in reminding Canadians that good vision is necessary to become a good reader.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, now that the federal government has tabled its 1995 budget, a tough budget that will suit the wishes of international investors, it is time to get down to the serious business of controlling our financial destiny.

The federal government must instruct the Bank of Canada to bring the effective interest rate down from the present superficially high level. A lower interest rate will result in increased job growth for Canadians. It will greatly assist small and medium sized businesses.

Interest rates should be brought down by at least 2 percentage points. One result of this move would be lower interest payments to foreign investors. Another would be that small and medium sized businesses could afford to borrow money for expansion, thereby creating jobs.

We need a made in Canada interest rate. We have to control our interest rates in order to achieve a balanced budget in the long run.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this year, International Women's Day falls during our week off. That is why I rise today to pay tribute to all Canadian women from coast to coast.

Let us look around us. There are now 54 women sitting in the House of Commons. We have come a long way since Agnes McPhail became the first woman elected to the House of Commons in 1921; since the judiciary committee of the Privy Council finally recognized, in 1929, that women were persons in the eyes of the law; since Carine Wilson became the first woman appointed to the Senate in 1930.

Women have left their mark in all their fields of activity despite the obstacles that keep springing up in their way, simply because our society is still tainted by widespread and offensive sexism.

To our mothers, sisters, wives, daughters, colleagues and friends, to all women in Canada, I say thank you.

RODGER DUSKY

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute today in the House to Mr. Rodger Dusky from my riding in London, Ontario.

On February 16, Mr. Dusky received the Prime Minister's award for teaching excellence in science, technology and mathematics. This award recognizes teachers across Canada who have had a major proven impact on student performance and interest in these areas. Mr. Dusky was nominated for this award by one of his former students.

Mr. Dusky has been a teacher for 32 years and has been teaching science and chemistry at London Central Secondary School since 1987. Most notable in his achievements is "The Mentor Connection". This program twins high school students with professionals from the community in order to support and enhance the autonomous learning projects of the students.

This program has been a tremendous success locally. Mr. Dusky is presently in the process of trying to expand the program so more students can benefit from this unique opportunity. It is through these types of initiatives and teachers such as Mr. Dusky that our children have the skills and knowledge to effectively compete in the constantly changing workplace.

QUEBEC'S CULTURAL COMMUNITIES

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the past two days, the Bloc member for Louis–Hébert and his colleague from Chicoutimi have missed their chance to make amends for the racist and discriminatory remarks they made about Quebec's cultural communities.

After their leader had rebuked them, these two members found nothing better to do than issue releases stating that they regret any embarrassment their remarks caused the Leader of the Opposition and any harm they have caused their colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois or those involved in building a sovereign, open and profoundly democratic Quebec.

The truth of the matter is that the two Bloc members are probably not sorry they made such blatantly racist and discriminatory remarks about our cultural communities; they are just sorry their party and the separatist cause may have been hurt by their remarks.

How can the people of Quebec believe in their plan for an independent, supposedly open and profoundly democratic Quebec, when in fact the very people responsible for promoting this plan, like the two hon. members opposite, have no regard for the most fundamental of principles?

We demand no less than formal apologies to be made in this House to our fellow citizens newly established in la Belle Province de Québec.

FEDERALISM

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when he tabled his budget, the Minister of Finance said, with a smile on his face, that the era of flexible federalism had now arrived. However, we had to be suspicious of that smile, which was more akin to the kiss of Judas.

How can the minister be serious about flexible federalism when he is considerably limiting the financial margin of the provinces by reducing transfers, while at the same time maintaining national standards for welfare, health and post-secondary education?

After promising to reduce overlap and duplication between the two levels of government, the minister has now decided, despite all the opposition, to keep control over a sector as vital as manpower training.

In its editorial of today, Le Devoir says that current federalism "manages without us and clearly declares itself to be imperial".

This is what federalism has become.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present the third instalment of the Liberal's copy Reform awards.

Today's winner is the member for Vancouver Quadra whose personal proposals for pension reform are suspiciously similar to the Reform blue book. At a time when the cabinet has approved a two tier pension plan that will make millionaires out of defeated politicians, it is indeed outstanding to have a government backbench MP suggest that the treasured gold plated pension plan be based on the principle of matching funds.

Imagine a Liberal actually saying that MPs should live by the same rules as other Canadians, collecting their pensions at age 65, or that they should be forced to tighten their belts like those living outside planet Ottawa. Reformers have been calling for these changes for four years.

I commend the member for Vancouver Quadra for joining our cause. I call on the Prime Minister to stop comparing his salary and pension with professional hockey players and start comparing it to those who actually pay his salary and pension, the Canadian taxpayers.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last week, the Bloc member for Roberval was concerned by the decision of the American rating agency Moody's to put Canada's credit rating under review.

• (1415)

The opposition member said in this House, and I quote: "The pressure from the financial community is a signal that the Minister of Finance should tackle the deficit problem by making massive cuts in government spending, which has to be the preferred approach, rather than raise the taxes of the middle class".

I am pleased to see that the wish of the hon. member for Roberval was largely met in Monday's budget.

I want to further reassure the member by reminding him of the comments made by his colleague, the official opposition critic for finance, on the CBC'S French radio network yesterday morning: "The economists and the financial community seem relatively pleased with this budget —and rightly so since, from a strictly financial point of view, Mr. Martin seems to be willing or able to reach his objectives—".

The Speaker: Regrettably, I must interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for Scarborough Centre.

THE BUDGET

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Monday the Minister of Finance brought forth a trustworthy budget that will put our country in a new era of financial responsibility.

Not only do we feel this is a good budget for Canada, even the international community approved. Within two hours of the budget the dollar began to rise and the interest rates began to fall. These are signs of recognition that we are indeed on the right track. I am happy to add that most reasonable citizens have come to realize this and have accepted the budget as truly a progressive budget.

One reasonable citizen, I am pleased to note, is the Reform Party's financial critic who was so approving he led the applause in the House. In fact at one time he gave the finance minister a standing ovation, an act earning him reproval from his Reform Party colleagues.

Reform Party members accused us of smoke and mirrors during our prebudget consultations while they spread false information throughout the country. Yet the budget shows Canadian citizens that we were listening.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in its budget, the federal government is downloading part of its deficit to the provinces by cutting $7 billion from transfer payments for social programs. As a result, Quebec alone will lose $650 million next year and $1.9 billion in 1997–98. The Quebec Minister of Finance roundly criticized the negative impact of a budget that will force the Quebec government to reduce services or raise taxes or both.

Will the Minister of Finance have the basic honesty to admit to the House that cuts in transfer payments mean that Quebec will have a shortfall of $2.5 billion three years from now, including $1.9 billion for 1997 alone, which is 41.7 per cent of total transfer payments for that year?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we intend to sit down with the provinces to discuss how we will approach the changes in transfer payments. There is only one correct figure: In 1996–97, compared with this year, there will be a cut of $350 million.

If we consider the potential for eliminating duplication and overlap, I think this can be absorbed.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ with the minister on a matter as basic and simple as arithmetic. If the budget had not interfered with transfer payments this year, Quebec would have received $300 million more, according to the estimates for transfer payments. The minister cancelled the $300 million increase and cut an additional $350 million. According to what I learned in school, 300 plus 350 equals 650 million.

Mr. Loubier: The Minister of Finance cannot count.

Mr. Bouchard: The minister tells us that as far as the $2.2 billion over a three year period is concerned, there is some uncertainty, since the $4.5 billion that will be cut in the third year will have to be distributed among the provinces, after negotiations with the federal government.

If there is any uncertainty, and in fact there is not, since the technical document published by the Department of Human Resources Development says this will be done on a per capita basis, and the minister says, on page 17 of the budget speech, that he will apply the same criterion—if there is any uncertainty, then it should be cleared up.

• (1420)

Yesterday and again today, the minister said that he was ready to meet the provinces the very next day. Perhaps the minister would like to tell us whether he agrees the provinces should be summoned immediately to a formal federal–provincial conference, where he would clarify the issues and tell us what the repercussions will be for Quebec?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when I met the provincial finance ministers before the budget and we discussed the changes in transfer payments, I told them I would be ready to meet them as soon as the budget was brought down.

So the answer to your question is yes. In fact, I have already made that clear to the finance ministers. The Leader of the Opposition mentioned arithmetic. Well, there is a difference of at least one billion dollars between the figures quoted by the leader of the Bloc Quebecois and those quoted by the Quebec finance minister, so you will have to check with headquarters.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate a clear answer. I would like the minister to tell us whether he will immediately call a federal–provincial conference to discuss how the cuts in transfer payments will be distributed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I certainly intend to schedule a meeting with the finance ministers. They asked me to wait until they had all tabled their own budgets, so let me know when Mr. Campeau tables his, and I will tell you when we will have this meeting.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Transport having problems? I think this is my question and not his. If the Minister of Transport misses being in the opposition, he will be back here soon enough. In the budget speech, the Minister of Finance proposed that the funds paid into the Canada Assistance—

An hon. member: Give him his valium.

The Speaker: Order. I realize today is Wednesday, but, nevertheless, it is the hon. member for Roberval's turn to ask a question.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, in the budget speech, the Minister of Finance proposed that transfers under the Canada assistance plan for social assistance now be allocated among provinces in the same way as established program financing transfers for health and post-secondary education—by combining, in 1997, all transfers into a single one: the Canadian social transfer.

Will the Minister of Finance acknowledge that his government's intention to pay the amounts involved in the Canada assistance plan according to the criteria for the established programs will deprive Quebec, in 1997, of several hundreds of millions of dollars in social assistance, in favour of Ontario?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is as follows. In his budget, the Minister of Finance announced that he will change the bases, the criteria for allocating money under the Canada assistance plan. He said himself that the transfer will be on the same basis as for the other programs, that population will be the criterion for allocation.

If the Minister of Finance is using population as the Canada assistance plan allocation criterion in order to transfer to Quebec the money involved as a lump sum, will he acknowledge that this approach will take hundreds of millions of dollars away from Quebec in favour of a province like Ontario? If he will not acknowledge this, will he tell us what basis he is using?

• (1425)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I indicated very clearly that we intend to sit down and negotiate with the provinces. We are bringing about changes in federalism. I think that this will require face to face discussions. I have a hard time understanding the questions. I think the hon. member has been briefed by Bob Rae.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday officials of the Department of Finance were telling investors that Canada would balance its budget by the year 2000. Today they are reassuring those investors that even a downturn in the American economy will not stop the government from balancing the budget because the effects will be offset by cuts to social programs and transfers to the provinces.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Why were Canadians not given more details about the impending social cuts in Monday's budget? Will the minister reveal his real agenda for social spending reductions, a hidden agenda which must exist if the budget is to be balanced by the year 2000?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is the second day in a row on which the leader of the third party has referred to apparent briefings or statements by unnamed Department of Finance officials.

I think we should make the record clear. I do not know what the leader of the Reform Party is talking about. That makes me a fairly typical Canadian.

The fact is that I am really not able to respond. I would like to respond to the leader of the third party's statement, but I do not know about the briefings that he is raising and that he raised yesterday.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I refer to stories in a number of the financial papers about assurances being given—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Manning: There are also broad hints in the budget that the minister is obviously contemplating deeper cuts in social spending and transfers if he is going to balance the budget.

If these plans are in progress they are being developed behind closed doors, without Canadians knowing. We even wonder whether the Minister of Human Resources Development knows about them. The finance department is planning major cuts. The human resources minister yesterday said that what they were going to do was reshuffle existing funds to his department.

My question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Is that minister personally aware of the changes the finance department has in store for social programs? If so, will he share that agenda with the Canadian people and with the House?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have read very carefully the document that was tabled in the House on Monday. I am prepared to share it with the hon. member for Calgary Southwest because obviously he has not read it.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the chief financial officer of a publicly traded company put out a prospectus on Monday and it was found out on Wednesday that they had hidden plans which affected the bottom line and all the shareholders, that CFO could go to jail under Ontario securities law.

None of us would like the Minister of Finance to go to jail, so my question is: Will he come clean and tell Canadians what social program cuts the government is planning in order to balance the budget after 1997?

• (1430)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): It is somewhat incongruous watching the Reform Party trying to defend social programs. It is like watching an elephant tap dance.

The Reform Party has to be very desperate and it is quite clear it is so disconcerted by the very favourable reaction that the financial markets have given to this budget but it has lost its issue and is trying to make one up.

There is no hidden agenda. The only agenda that people are looking for today is the Reform Party's and they cannot find it.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister announced in his budget that he intends to tackle old age pensions. One of the budget documents states that the reform of old age security will be based primarily on the following principle: old age security benefits will be calculated on the basis of family income, as is the case with the guaranteed income supplement.

Can the finance minister confirm that calculating old age security benefits on the basis of family income will mean that, in the future, old age pensions will no longer be the same for everyone and that thousands of senior citizens will see their pensions drop?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to answer the question directly, the exact opposite is true.

Having said this, the federal government and indeed the provincial governments are duty bound to protect old age pensions, the Canada and Quebec pension plans. We intend to sit down no later than this fall to work out a sustainable system. You have seen the actuarial report on this subject.

So I cannot understand the position of the hon. member who would not protect Canadian seniors' old age pensions.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the finance minister protects old age pensions the way he has protected unemployment insurance, we are not out of the woods yet.

Will the finance minister admit that calculating old age pensions on the basis of family income will directly penalize for the most part women whose financial independence will be compromised?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no firm decision has been made on this matter. We intend to consult, and it is indeed our duty to do so, but nevertheless let me answer your question directly.

According to the study by the Caledon Institute of Social Policy, women are not only protected, their pensions are in fact increased. It is a good thing for women.

I put the following question to the hon. member: He is against seniors, is he also against women? The hon. member should get his numbers right before asking questions.

[English]

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a centrepiece of the government's budget is the creation of something called the Canada social transfer.

The government's motive for creating this transfer is that this government was planning to make larger and bigger cuts to sacred cows like health, post-secondary education and welfare in this and possible future budgets.

To clarify the situation and to clarify the answers that the minister just gave, will there be any additional cuts to this new super transfer beyond those announced in the current 1995-96 budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we set out a very clear plan to preserve our social programs. The Canada social transfer provides us with a basis to do that. It provides us with the basis to do that in very straightened circumstances.

• (1435)

I continue to have some difficulty understanding the nature of the question. I have a great deal of respect for the member but he must understand that he is with a party that recommended two weeks ago that we take $15 billion out of those social programs which would effectively gut them. We are certainly entitled to have a little consistency on economic policy in this country by at least one of the two opposition parties.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the answer by the hon. minister.

The Reform Party was up front. We laid it out that we would reduce by $15 billion the social program spending.

What I am asking the minister and the government of this country to do is to lay it out for Canadians and tell them the truth about what is going to happen. That is what we want.

If we look at this 1995-96 budget, the government's transfer proposals provide no additional tax points and actually cut cash transfers to provinces by 20 per cent to 25 per cent. What else is going to happen?

Is this one of the ways that the government is planning to decentralize the deficit but there is a hidden agenda that provinces do not understand?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have had numerous meetings with the ministers of finance of the provinces. The minister of HRD has had numerous meetings with his counterparts in the provinces. The provinces understand full well the nature of the federal fiscal dilemma. They understand also that it is very important that the federal government get its fiscal house in order because that has enormous benefits for them.

What the provinces said to us was no surprises and there are no surprises. They said hit yourselves first and we have. They have said hit yourself harder than you hit us and we have. We have lived up to every one of our commitments. There is no hidden agenda. There is one very public agenda and that is that we are going to preserve the social programs of this country and clean up the nation's finances.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In the budget speech, the federal government announced that it will be setting up a human resources investment fund of several hundreds of millions of dollars, which the federal government will use to meddle in the area of job training.

Will the minister concede that this fund infringes on the powers of the provinces, does nothing to decentralize government and, in fact, increases even more overlap and duplication between governments?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member arrived at that conclusion because what we are proposing to do is eliminate many of the old programs that were under the Canadian job strategy which no longer are relevant to the kind of situation we face.

By consolidating our existing resources into one human investment we can then sit down with the provinces, as we are doing now on issues of child care and literacy, and work out new partnerships and new arrangements with the provinces, the municipalities and private sector partners. It gives us the flexibility we need to now engage in a new generation of social programming that really fits both the reality and the changed circumstances the country finds itself in.

That is the same kind of flexibility we are achieving through the new form of Canada's social transfer. We are also achieving this by putting up a new form of funding resource in our own department so that we can undertake those kinds of partnerships I just outlined.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister also admit that the human resources investment fund goes in the opposite direction of where Quebec wants to go regarding job training, since, instead of withdrawing from this sector, the federal government plans to infringe more and more on Quebec's jurisdiction?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is in some strange vapour today. He is drawing a conclusion that has no basis in any kind of fact. I have just told the hon. member that creating a new kind of investment fund puts us in a position of being able to start with a clean slate to sit down with the provinces and other stakeholders and work out new partnership arrangements.

I would remind the hon. member that we have already tabled with the provinces, including the province of Quebec, offers for serious transfer responsibilities in the area of training and the province of Quebec has not responded in a positive way. Certainly other provinces have and I would issue the invitation again to sit down and we are prepared to turn over responsibility for managing institutional training. I would hope that the hon. member would use his good offices with his colleagues in Quebec to say come back to us with a good offer.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Yesterday Tony Manera, the president of the CBC, resigned because the Liberals broke their red book promise for stable multi-year funding to the CBC. Manera says that in the next three years the government plans to cut $120 million more from the CBC than the $45 million that was stated in the budget.

The minister has a secret agenda about the future of the CBC which he has failed to disclose. Why has the minister failed to provide this information to Canadians?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague is out of luck. Her assistant is no better as a researcher than he was as a candidate in Ottawa—Vanier.

The information she put forward is false. The government has given a clear indication of what it will do in the budget and that is to fix the CBC budget for next year. All the rest is invention. Mr. Manera has resigned because of personal reasons.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the minister, cheap political shots against an honourable and professional candidate in an election are clearly out of order in this House.

The Department of Canadian Heritage did send a secret document to the president of the CBC confirming its plans to cut the CBC over the next three years. That includes $120 million in the cuts that the minister has failed to report.

How can the minister justify wasting more taxpayers' dollars on another review as stated in the budget plan when according to the president of the CBC the government has already made up its mind?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, talking about cheap shots, let me quote the hon. member: "Mr. Manera is not staying to fight. It is an abdication of leadership which means that he is not up to the challenge of developing a blueprint for changing broadcasting".

The only figures that have been passed on by my department to Mr. Manera and the CBC are the figures of the program review. The government established one year of budget for the CBC, the next fiscal year. The other figures amount to 15 to 10 per cent for the next three years. They were contained in the program review of last August.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the minister of heritage. Mr. Manera agreed to become president of the CBC after the minister had assured him that there would not be any cuts to the CBC's budget.

• (1445)

Instead of claiming that Mr. Manera resigned for personal reasons, would the minister be honest enough to admit—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, it must be taken for granted that questions and responses will be honest. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw the expression she used.

Mrs. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of honesty.

Could the minister admit that this resignation is directly related—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put her question, please.

Mrs. Tremblay: Instead of claiming that Mr. Manera resigned for personal reasons, will the minister admit that this resignation is directly related to his failure to honour his commitment as heritage minister not to make further cuts to the CBC's budget?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a passage in the Gospel—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dupuy: —about "whited sepulchres". Only a few weeks ago, our colleague rose in this House, loudly demanding that Mr. Manera resign. Did she undergo a conversion? She is now defending him. Did she undergo a conversion and decide to defend the CBC, this great federalist, national institution?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the heritage minister admit that he is no longer either a friend of the corporation, as he himself claimed, nor, as heritage minister, a friend of cultural organizations and the arts community, whose interests he has been unable to protect, since culture is one of the sectors hardest hit by the federal budget?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition referred to the fact that arithmetic is taught in grade school. I am surprised that a former teacher cannot do simple arithmetic and realize that if there is one sector that was not hit hard, it is the cultural sector.

I therefore categorically deny our colleague's allegations and I can reiterate that Mr. Manera did not resign because of the budget. He said so himself in writing. She is in fact questioning the good faith of the former President of the CBC.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Since Monday's fiscally responsible and fair budget we have heard speculative statements about how the budget impacts on Ontario. After four and a half years, the current premier of Ontario will soon have to do his own accounting to the people of Ontario.

Would the Minister of Finance please clarify how the budget affects Ontario, a province with 37.5 per cent of the nation's population?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for London West for her question because it gives me the opportunity to correct the exaggerated claims being made by the Government of Ontario.

We have gone to great lengths, we have taken great pain within the budget to make sure that it is fair and equitable and does not impact disproportionately on any single region of the country.

Ontario's share of the downsizing of the public service is in line with its share of the national population. We could go one step further. Nearly 161,000 jobs were created in Ontario last year. We are going to maintain this recovery with a good budget so we can create jobs in Ontario at the same level next year. That is why we acted the way we did.

• (1450)

The member has asked me to deal with the facts. Ontario's share of budgetary actions is in the same range as its current share of federal spending and it is actually less than its share of Canada's population. If Bob Rae wants to play politics, he can do it. However, he should stop playing politics with the facts because he will never get re–elected that way.

The Speaker: May I appeal to hon. members once again? All questions put in the House are deemed to be reasonable questions. I believe that all hon. members should have the chance to hear reasonable answers. I would ask please, when questions are put to give enough time for the answer to be given.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the Prime Minister, when speaking of the budget changes said: "Social programs such as medicare will revert to meeting more basic needs as it did when it was started a half century ago".

What exactly does the Prime Minister mean by basic services?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister means what he said this morning and what he has repeated. He intends to support and maintain a universal, accessible system of health care across the country where treatment is based not on the size of your pocket book but on the serious illness you face.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Reform has stated time and time again that what health care needs is flexibility. We do not need the solutions of 50 years ago. We do not need poor technology. We do not need poor innovation.

Will the Prime Minister recognize in front of all Canadians that his budget will gut health care?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the absolute hypocrisy of the Reform Party is never more evident than when its members rise to defend the benefits of universal health care. This is the very party that would have cut the heart and soul out of the health care system.

We are not going to let them do it because they will never form the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the budget tabled on Monday, the minister decreed that a $975 fee will now be charged to every person who wishes to immigrate to Canada. This large amount of money is on top of the $500 processing fee all immigrants already have to pay.

Does the minister not realize that it makes no sense to ask prospective immigrants to pay $975, as this may represent up to a year's salary or more in their countries of origin?

[English]

Why do future immigrants have to pay for the government's deficit?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is in any position to lecture the government on how it treats immigrants when members of his party in the PQ would not even extend democratic rights to immigrants in Quebec.

The Minister of Finance said on Monday that all Canadians, fishermen, farmers, public servants, business people, Canadian families had to sacrifice for nation building and to maintain Canada's prosperity. We have chosen to extend that invitation to those wishing to join the Canadian family and also to recover some of the costs for immigration settlement.

• (1455)

There are two options. Immigrants either share with us in the cost of settlement or we go the route of the United States of America where there is no settlement. Like the commercial says: "You can pay now or you can pay much more later". We prefer settlement because it is the best way of integrating immigrants. We also believe that the landing fee is worth the price to come to the best country in the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not realize that the message of openness Canada is trying to convey to future immigrants to this country is greatly compromised by this immigration tax, which can represent more than $3,000 for a family of four?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member did not mention that the Minister of Finance has also instituted a loan program that would allow those individuals who believe that the $975 would be a hardship to apply for a loan.

Just like refugees since 1951 have been able to absorb a transportation loan, we believe that this fee will not cause hardship. We are prepared to implement the loan program.

With respect to other countries that ask immigrants to help shoulder the costs, Canada is in the middle of the spectrum where it ought to be.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources.

In the budget the government announced the elimination of the public utilities transfer tax rebate. Since 88 per cent of the $250 million tax grab hits Alberta, the elimination of this rebate is a discriminatory tax hike aimed directly at Albertans and will cost them at least $170 million.

As the senior federal minister representing Alberta, does the minister support this measure?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this nation has a very large deficit and a very large debt. It was incumbent upon the government to deal with it in the fairest and most expeditious way possible. That is what we have done.

In this case we have followed the lead of a number of provincial governments, including the Government of Alberta. I believe the member for Lethbridge was a member of the Government of Alberta when it took away the equivalent tax exemption for the public utilities in that province.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in view of the discriminatory nature of this tax grab and the fact that the socialist power companies of Ontario and Quebec get away scot free, does the finance minister view this as fair and equitable?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would simply refer the member to the statement by the premier of Alberta, in which he said that the federal government had to face up to its responsibilities. We did so and basically this is a good budget.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

The infrastructure program has been very successful and encouraged all levels of government to work together. In my riding of Vancouver East the projects were enthusiastically received and put many people to work.

Could the Minister responsible for Infrastructure inform the House of the status of the programs following Monday's budget?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the program on infrastructure is being extended from a three–year to a five–year period. This comes about as a result of two things: first, many municipalities with major projects have asked for extra construction time to be able to complete their projects and, second, the fiscal needs of the Minister of Finance as announced in the budget.

• (1500)

I am pleased to say that this coming construction season will be the biggest by far in terms of the infrastructure program. Sixty per cent of all the funds under the program will be allocated within the two years. The $2 billion from the federal level and the $6 billion in total will stay intact over that five–year period of time. It will lead to even more jobs than we had predicted: over 100,000.

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I ask the Prime Minister for a clear answer about his government's intentions on a question he was asked yesterday in the House.

Will women 65 years of age and older lose their OAS because of their spouse's income as implied on page 58 of the budget plan? Yes or no.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the single most damaging element of this week's federal budget will be the devastating effect on the regional economy of the prairies, that is the elimination of the Crow rate including declining land values and the lack of investment for value added production.

Has the minister given any thought at all to the long term implications for the prairie economy of the decision to end the transport subsidy? If so, could he identify the sources in which he has so substantially misplaced his optimism?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I note that a number of farmers in western Canada over the course of the last two days in commenting on the budget have noted that the change with respect to freight rates in western Canada has the potential to encourage diversification and value added production in the west.

I would point out that the hon. gentleman, coming from Saskatchewan, should perhaps know with respect to the $1.6 billion ex gratia capital payment that something in the order of $800 million or more of that total will find its way into the province of Saskatchewan because of that province's historical share of grain movement.

It does not include Saskatchewan's share of the $300 million adjustment fund. It does not include the capital gains tax advantage. It does not include the time cost of money that will accrue to the recipients of those payments and not to the government. It does not include the impact on efficiency in the transportation system.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Dr. Christos Lazaris, Governor of Lefkada in Greece.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS BY MINISTER

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in response to a point of order raised by the hon. member for Skeena on February 9, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development stated that I held a meeting in my riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley entitled "Let the people speak" and that natives were neither notified nor asked to sit on a panel at the meeting.

I held no such meeting in my riding. The minister has confused my riding with another and I would ask him to withdraw these remarks.

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I stand as a minister but first I stand as a member of Parliament who does not pick and choose which constituents I speak for.

One of the purposes of the House is for the views of those who have the least voice, who are the most oppressed and who need our help the most to come before Parliament. The silence of the Reform Party on aboriginal issues is so profound that it is deserving of respect.

There have been four critics; I have gone through four critics. They sit there like a Greek chorus.

Some hon. members: Order.

• (1505)

Mr. Speaker: In my view the point of order is a dispute as to facts. From time to time in the course of debate—and I am not saying this happened here—sometimes errors are made. I would hope hon. members would give each other enough latitude in debate so that if errors are made inadvertently they are accepted as such.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, I accept the explanation of the hon. member but of the two critics one represents the Nishga—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I take it from the acceptance of the statement that perhaps an error was made. I am hopeful this will close the matter as of now. I would like the matter to be closed as of now.

This point of order is finished. If the member has another point of order I would like to hear it. Is this on the same point of order?

On a point of clarification, the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of all members of the House, would you clarify whether or not it is in order for a member to ask for a retraction and either the member retracts the statement or refuses to retract the statement and then, I suggest from my understanding of the standing orders, you, Mr. Speaker, make a decision on which member had the right position?

Mr. Speaker: Sometimes the Chair is faced with both positions being correct.

In this particular instance we had an hon. member saying that it was said that he held a meeting of some kind in his riding. I now have the minister involved who says he accepts that it was an error.

I accept the minister's statement and I consider the matter to be closed.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a different point of order. I think you would agree that one very controversial issue facing the House at the moment is the gun control legislation.

Because of the imprecise nature of the discussion a lot of my constituents are wanting access to the legislation. I have been told that I am only allowed to get 10 copies. Could you indicate that this is not true and where my constituents can go to get more copies of the legislation?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the spokesman for the Board of Internal Economy I informed the House last Friday that in addition to the copies being made available by the minister, the House had taken it upon itself to purchase an additional five copies per hon. member according to a decision taken last week unanimously by the Board of Internal Economy.

Mr. Speaker: This then is the response. I do not want to get into a debate about the matter but I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to get into a debate on the issue. I appreciate the decision that has been made. I am seeking confirmation though.

In the words of the member who just spoke, he said that it was a unanimous decision. Does that mean that all political parties represented on the Board of Internal Economy agreed to limit the amounts of information given to our constituents on this critical issue?

• (1510)

Mr. Boudria: Members of the Board of Internal Economy are well known; those appointed to the board are well known. It was unanimous among members of the board as are all decisions of the board.

I believe the hon. member once sat on the board. I think he is familiar with the procedure.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, just to add briefly to this information session in the House, last week when I raised the issue in the Chamber and the member speaking on behalf of the board responded to me, he gave information about additional copies being available should I wish to purchase them out of my office budget.

I inquired about the purchase price and discovered that although I was willing to purchase copies from my office there were not enough printed in any case for me to purchase them. Then I found that the price itself would be exorbitant to absorb within my budget.

I approached the printing office on Parliament Hill and asked how much it would cost to print that number of pages, double–sided, one staple in the top, and I was informed the cost was roughly one–third the cost of buying it from the government.

I can print through the House of Commons. I have a quote from the House printing unit to print enough copies to satisfy my demands in my constituency for close to $400. I am prepared to pay that amount if the House will allow me to ask printing to produce that copy.

The Speaker: With regard to the copies that are made available to members of Parliament, these copies are available at distribution. They are for legislative use, not for general distribution.

However the point the hon. member raises might be of interest to all hon. members in terms of the costs. I would ask the House spokesperson to the Board of Internal Economy if it might be possible to have that discussion raised at the next meeting of the Board of Internal Economy.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, we could bring the issue to the attention of the board. If the member would correspond with the board, I am sure we would be pleased to receive his representation.

I have a point of order on another issue.

The Speaker: The point will be brought up at the next meeting of the Board of Internal Economy.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier in question period today an hon. member asked a question of a minister in relation to the responsibility of the minister being responsible for a province.

I want to refer members to article 412 of Beauchesne's which reads as follows:

> A question may not be asked of a Minister in another capacity, such as being responsible for a province, or part of a province, or as spokesman for a racial or religious group.

That is a 1968 decision of the Speaker. I would submit the question was in fact out of order. I believe there were a number of cries across the way as to why the minister did not respond to a question that was clearly out of order.

The Speaker: It is also clear that any question put is directed to the government. As such, it is my understanding and has been the practice for years in the House that any minister of the crown can answer the question.

Although the question may be put to a specific minister, another minister who so desires can answer the question.

• (1515)

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would just note for the Chair's enlightenment that in this case the question was put to the Minister of Natural Resources. This matter is a natural resource matter, broadly speaking.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I repeat that it is the longstanding tradition of this house that any question that is put to the government per se can be answered by any minister on the government side. I would like to let that rest at this point.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the 64th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, which concerns the list of the associate members of the Standing Committee on Government Operations. With leave of the House, I intend to move for concurrence in this report later this day.

[English]

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development concerning Bill C–54 which was adopted with amendments.

GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the Standing Committee on Government Operations on Bill C–65, an act to reorganize and dissolve certain federal agencies, with amendments.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–314, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (other pension income).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which I am introducing today is entitled an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (other pension income). It will require all pension or retiring allowance payments received by a member of Parliament that are paid from public funds to be deducted from the member's sessional allowance.

This bill will deal with another dimension of the issue of double dipping. Members of Parliament who receive publicly funded pensions while at the same time receiving a full member of Parliament salary will be affected. The bill asks that the House of Commons subtract pension income from a sitting MP's salary, thus preventing double dipping, or receiving two incomes from only one taxpayer. This bill would make all MPs declare all public pension income they receive while sitting as an elected member of Parliament.

Those members with publicly funded pensions for previous service in: provincial legislatures; municipal governments; the public service at the federal, provincial and municipal levels; or as former judges; members of the Canadian forces; former peace officers; crown corporation employees; and former employees of school boards, hospital boards or any other publicly funded organization will forgo receiving two incomes for doing one job as a member of Parliament.

Canadians believe it is unfair to the tax paying public that a member of Parliament receive a full salary while also receiving a public pension.

This bill treats municipal, provincial and federal government—

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. A succinct explanation of the bill is all that members are allowed to have.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

PROTECTION OF PERSONAL INFORMATION OBTAINED BY CERTAIN CORPORATIONS ACT

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–315, an act to complement the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals with respect to personal information about themselves obtained by certain corporations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to table my first private member's bill, an act to complement the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals with respect to personal information about themselves obtained by certain corporations.

For several years Canadians have enjoyed the protection offered under the Privacy Act giving them better access to the federally held personal information. Yet in the private sector the use and abuse of personal information continues.

In 1994 the Quebec government passed a historic privacy law, Bill 68. It gave Quebecers greater control over their personal information. My private member's bill would complement, not compete with Quebec's bill by extending privacy protection to businesses under federal jurisdiction. For the rest of Canada, citizens for the first time would be given the control they need over their privately held personal information as we speed toward the creation of an information highway.

I look forward to discussing this bill with my fellow members of Parliament in the weeks and months to come.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I move that the 64th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs presented to the House earlier this day be concurred in.

(Motion agreed to.)

HEALTH

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.) Mr. Speaker, I move:

That members of the Standing Committee on Health be authorized to travel to hold hearings and community visits in relation to the committee's study on mental health and the aboriginal peoples of Canada, in Kuujjuaq, Povungnituk, Rigolet, Northwest River, Eskasoni, Halifax, Rexton, Big Cove, Pikangikum, Winnipeg, Fort Alexander, Edmonton, Hobbema, Buffalo Lake, Vancouver and Gwa-Sala-Nakwaxda-x w, from March 19 to 24, 1995, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

PETITIONS

VOICE MAIL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by my constituents, more precisely from the town of Saint-Hubert, that I would like to table today, in the hope of obtaining a favourable response.

The petitioners ask the government to abandon its plan to introduce voice mail for seniors. The petitioners point out that seniors are naturally more at a loss when faced with voice mail technology. That is why I hope that the government will take into consideration the requests of seniors, who have a right to receive services that are geared to their needs.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my honour to present petitions today on behalf of my constituents asking that Parliament not pass Bill C-41 with section 718 as presently written, especially not to include the phrase of sexual orientation.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a series of petitions. I will name them off by title only. The first petition supports the government to overturn the intoxication defence for sexual assault.

• (1525)

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is against assisted suicide or euthanasia.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition supports the ban of BST.

CHILD CARE

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition is in support of child care expenses for stay at home mothers.

LAP DANCING

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition is against lap dancing.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition is for the protection of the unborn child.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this final petition is against same sex relationships.

ADULT ENTERTAINMENT PARLOURS

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from my constituents. They request that Parliament consider their plea to enact such amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada or such other legislation as necessary to permit local municipal councils to define their own community standards and thereby to permit municipal councils to pass bylaws to prohibit the establishment of adult entertainment parlours within their municipalities.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again I table hundreds of petitions to the House of Commons concerning the CBC.

The petitioners state that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is Canada's national public broadcasting service and an agent of Her Majesty. The CBC is funded by the federal government with taxpayers' dollars. The CBC has applied to televise the proceedings of the Paul Bernardo trial. Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to condemn the actions of the CBC and to request that in accordance with its responsibilities as a national broadcaster that the CBC withdraw its application to televise the Paul Bernardo trial.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to present a petition on behalf of the Minister of Natural Resources dealing with discrimination based on sexual orientation.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions.

The first one is from the men and women of Saskatchewan. They wish to draw to the attention of the House of Commons that the Canadian Wheat Board is vitally important to the grain producers of western Canada. A large majority want to maintain the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board, despite a vocal minority. They therefore request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in the marketing and export of wheat and barley.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is also from various people in and around Saskatchewan. It asks that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

I concur with these petitioners.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, finally, these 44 or 45 petitions are all rather similar. They come from residents in southern Ontario, the Toronto area and areas surrounding Ottawa.

The petitioners ask that Parliament support laws which severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime. They support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms. Lastly they support legislation which will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety, have not proven to be cost effective or are overly complex.

I concur with these petitioners.

[Translation]

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to table a petition signed by members of seniors' clubs or AFEAS and by other constituents from the municipalities of Saint–Ambroise–de–Kildare, Sainte–Julienne, Saint–Jacques, Saint–Jean–de–Matha, Maskinongé, Rawdon, Saint–Barthélemy, Saint–Édouard, Berthierville, Saint–Esprit–de–Montcalm, Saint–Thomas–de–Joliette and Lanoraie. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to abandon its plan to introduce voice mail systems.

Given that seniors are naturally more at a loss when faced with voice mail technology and that it is unconscionable that they be forced to use this communication medium, as you can understand, Mr. Speaker, I unconditionally support the request contained in this petition, which it is my pleasure to table.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this afternoon a number of petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first has to do with the societal disapproval of same sex orientation. The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code and not give approval to same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

• (1530)

The next petition has to do with same sex relationships. The petitioners pray that Parliament not amend the Canadian human rights code.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in this petition the petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the abetting or aiding of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

ABORTION

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in another petition the petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition relates to the gun control issue.

The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to refrain from making further changes to existing firearm control legislation and direct the judicial system to enforce existing penalties more stringently in the effort to deliver effective crime deterrents.

I support these petitions.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have one further petition in which the petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

FEMALE CIRCUMCISION

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present five petitions from the Vancouver area. The first one signed by 288 members of the community deals with the practice of female circumcision.

The petitioners feel that education is a priority for those who practice female circumcision and for those unaware of its prevalence. They therefore request that the Criminal Code of Canada be amended to penalize those involved in the practice.

[Translation]

EUTHANASIA

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition, signed by 54 people, is on the subject of euthanasia. The petitioners say that the majority of Canadians respect the law and the sanctity of human life and believe that doctors should try to save lives, not end them.

The petitioners also ask Parliament to ensure that the provisions in the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be rigorously upheld, that Parliament not amend the current laws and that assisted suicide and active or passive euthanasia remain illegal.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third fourth and final petitions, containing 72, 25, and 462 signatures respectively, deal with the issue of sexual orientation.

They state that one of the core values of Canadian society is the strong belief in equality, that equality for all Canadians includes freedom from hatred, harassment and discrimination, that all Canadians regardless of race, religion, gender or sexual orientation must be treated equitably under the same circumstances and that great misunderstandings still exist in Canada resulting in discrimination.

The final petition also requests that Parliament amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as a basis for protection against discrimination.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House again today to present petition No. 18. This course of action is undertaken on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens and they are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murders.

I have another petition to present. I am honoured to do this on behalf of Albertans. I understand that there are several petitions being presented that equal approximately 64,000 names.

These petitioners pray that the Criminal Code of Canada and the Young Offenders Act of 1992 be amended to allow for tougher sentences to deter people from committing crimes and tough enough to provide real justice.

I am pleased to state that I endorse the contents of this petition.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition on behalf of 2,359 Albertans. I understand that there are several petitions being presented that equal approximately 64,000 names.

These petitioners pray that the Criminal Code of Canada and the Young Offenders Act of 1992 be amended to allow for tougher sentences to deter people from committing crimes and tough enough to provide real justice.

I am pleased to state that I endorse the contents of this petition.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting a petition signed by approximately 3,400 people, mostly from the riding of Elk Island.

I understand that this is part of a larger petition which will total some 64,000 names.

• (1535)

The petitioners express a serious concern about and call for changes to the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act to make them serious enough to deter young people from committing crimes and tough enough to provide for real justice.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions this afternoon. The first one prays that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

It is signed by approximately 150 people in the Toronto area.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the next petition is signed by constituents of mine in Scarborough West and environs.

It prays that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from constituents of mine praying that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

I support all three petitions.

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty as a member of Parliament to present three petitions today which oppose including the phrase sexual orientation in various pieces of federal legislation.

MINING

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting 13 petitions on seven different topics all bearing signatures of my constituents and duly certified by the clerk of petitions.

I present three petitions with over 700 signatures requesting that the government take action that will keep mining in Canada by increasing employment in this sector, promoting exploration and rebuilding mineral reserves.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I present two petitions signed by 100 people praying that Parliament continue to reject euthanasia and physical assisted suicide and that Parliament consider expanding palliative care for dying persons.

RIGHTS OF GRANDPARENTS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions signed by 66 people in my riding requesting that in no case may a father or mother without serious cause place obstacles between the child and grandparents and further that grandparents with access to a child be given the right to acquire information as to the health, education and welfare of the child.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I also present a petition with 346 signatures urging Parliament to enact legislation that addresses crime control and not firearm control.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a single petition with 35 signatures requesting protection for the unborn child.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions with 332 signatures urging Parliament not to amend the Human Rights Act in any way that would indicate societal approval of same sex relationships, including any amendment using the phrase sexual orientation as prohibited grounds of discrimination.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I present a petition signed by 37 people in my riding asking Parliament to consider a referendum on accepting or rejecting two official languages.

I appreciate the opportunity to present the views of my riding through these petitions.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions today, one signed by 260 people. This is part of a 64,000 person petition.

The petitioners are calling for changes to the Young Offenders Act and want an act serious enough to deter young people from committing crimes. They feel the Young Offenders Act is not meeting the objectives set forth in a satisfactory manner.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is the second for this week on gun control now totalling over 5,000 names.

The petitioners express their concern that the control of law-abiding citizens and responsible gun owners is more than enough to ensure public safety and that the current and proposed laws criminalizing certain firearm activities are not necessary.

The petitioners humbly pray and request that Parliament support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of crimes and that Parliament support legislation that will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have not proven to be cost effective.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today pursuant to Standing Order 36.

I have one petition signed by approximately 400 members of the United Steel Workers of America, Local 5890 working at IPSCO Inc. in my constituency. This petition pertains to the Canadian Income Tax Act which states that a pension plan member cannot accrue more than one year of pensionable service in a year, thereby eliminating any way to make up pensionable service time accrued.

• (1540)

This petition calls upon Parliament to urge the government to change the appropriate regulations to allow for pensionable service to be accrued over 1,800 hours based on straight time hours worked.

It is my pleasure to present that petition to the House.

MINING

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the final petition I wish to present is on behalf of a number of citizens in mining communities in western Canada who call upon Parliament to take action to create growth in employment in the mining sector, to promote exploration, to rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, to sustain mining communities and to keep mining in Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present three petitions today, the first one being part of the 64,000 petitioners, representing individuals from my riding of Wild Rose who ask that Parliament recognize and address the concerns of the Young Offenders Act to make it serious enough to deter young offenders from committing crimes and tough enough to provide real justice.

I have a petition with a total of 200 signatures from the areas of my riding of Crossfield, Cremona and Cochrane. The petitioners identify seven major points regarding the entire judicial system which they believe need a complete overhaul. They ask for legislation to re–evaluate and amend the Canadian justice system providing protection to and giving precedence to victim rights rather than criminal rights.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition containing 5,363 names submitted from central Alberta, mostly from Edmonton. The petitioners respectfully request that our elected representatives amend the Criminal Code using their power and henceforth prohibit any type of performance, including those in live peep shows, which in any form or manner exposes to the view of any member of the public genitals, buttocks or female breasts.

I concur with and support all of these petitions.

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately the time has expired for petitions. Most of the members standing will know why I am particularly sorry they cannot present their petitions today. However, the Chair must pass on to motions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, question No. 129 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 129—Mr. Mitchell:

With a minimum security prison already located in the riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka and a medium security prison to be operational by 1997, what is being done to ensure the proper assignment of classification to prisoners who will be located at these prison facilities?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): In so far as the Correctional Service of Canada is concerned, the answer is as follows:

All federal inmates entering the Correctional Service of Canada's jurisdiction, including those coming from the courts as well as those who have violated a conditional release and whose release has been suspended, are admitted to a maximum security institution for assessment. In Ontario, all new federal inmates are admitted to the assessment unit at Millhaven maximum security institution.

All new inmates undergo a comprehensive assessment to identify those issues which have contributed to criminal behaviour and which must be addressed. Violent offenders receive psychological assessments and sexual offenders are offered a comprehensive assessment aimed at establishing appropriate treatment interventions and level of risk to public safety. The results of these assessments, and case specific information (such as documents from the police, courts, family, etc.) are examined and analysed to determine the level of security required for the management of the case. As well, a correctional plan for the inmate is produced which becomes the blueprint for the sentence, against which progress toward correctional goals are measured. At the end of the process, which may take up to eight weeks, a placement decision is made which reflects both the security and program needs of the offender.

Inmates are assigned a minimum, medium or maximum security classification. Part of the overall assessment is the custody rating scale, a tool which was developed to provide a statistically based placement opinion. The elements included in this tool are considered to be effective predictors of behaviour. On the basis of the entire assessment, including the custody rating scale, a placement decision is made by assessment staff, and the inmate is sent to a receiving institution classified at his/her level of security.

Three critical factors are taken into consideration in determining the security level of the inmate; namely, institutional adjustment, escape risk, and risk to public safety. Each factor is given a rating of low, moderate or high, and each is significant to the overall assessment of the inmate.

Once an inmate has been placed at an institution, the inmate's security classification is reviewed at least once a year. Any additional information which was not considered at the previous placement may result in a change in the classification level. New factors which may be considered are the inmate's current attitude, behaviour, motivation and progress in his/her treatment programs. In preparation for any critical decisions concerning transfer, temporary absence, or work release, CSC policy requires that the inmate's classification be reviewed and confirmed or amended. Case managers must use their professional judgment, in conjunction with available assessment tools, in reaching a final conclusion as to the appropriate security classification.

In addition to the individual inmate's classification, institutions are also classified by security level. Beaver Creek Institution, in Parry Sound—Muskoka, is classified as a minimum security prison. The new institution, to be located on the Beaver Creek reserve near Gravenhurst, Ontario, is expected to be completed in 1997, and will be classified as a medium security prison.

The rationale for placement of all federal inmates is found in section 28.i.(e) of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, which states that the Correctional Service of Canada shall take all reasonable steps to ensure that the penitentiary in which the person is confined is one that provides the least restrictive environment for that person, taking into account: (a) the degree and kind of custody necessary for (i) the safety of the public, (ii) the safety of that person and other persons in the penitentiary, and (iii) the security of the penitentiary; (b) accessibility to: (i) the person's home community and family, (ii) a compatible cultural environment, and (iii) a compatible linguistic environment; (c) the availability of appropriate programs and services, and the person's willingness to participate in those programs.

When the new institution is opened, only those inmates who have undergone careful assessment and meet the criteria for placement at the medium security level will be transferred there.

Public safety is the paramount factor in any decision relating to the management of inmate cases.

The Deputy Speaker: The question enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Milliken: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the notice of motion for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from February 28 consideration of the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before I begin, Reform members will be splitting their time today.

I cannot say I am honoured but I feel responsible to join in this budget debate and to speak against both the budget and the amendment on the floor. I remind the House that it was only one year ago that we in the Reform caucus were saying several things about a budget which had just been tabled.

Those things were that the targets contained in the budget—the target of a 3 per cent deficit to GDP—were not good enough. Even if those targets were to be achieved they would add billions of dollars in cuts to deal with the accumulated interest payments that would be realized as a consequence of adding to our national debt. In so doing, we were assured time and time again that the targets and the measures laid out in that budget were good enough and that they could be achieved with no additional budgetary action whatsoever.

What we have this week is a budget with spending cuts of $12 billion and tax increases of $1.5 billion, all in a period of exceptional economic growth, even above what was foreseen in the previous budget.

• (1545)

It is in order to achieve the very targets that we started out with, the very targets that are inadequate and that we were supposedly going to be able to achieve with no cuts whatsoever. Why? Because on this particular budget path we have added interest payments of $12 billion.

The interest costs on the government's debt will rise in this same period from $38 billion to $50 billion. We are cutting $12 billion in spending now to achieve what? It is to achieve a stable debt–GDP ratio at the top of an economic cycle, so that it will do nothing but rise when we face the inevitable downturn. It is called an achievement. It is the government's belief that this is its ticket for re–election.

This reminds me so much of what the Progressive Conservatives did in 1988. They reached exactly the same point, except at a much lower level of debt and then said all was well.

What do we say now? We say that this is not adequate. We say that this path will continue to add interest charges that will come out of program spending. What are we told? We are told that there will be no more cuts to achieve our targets, especially not in the area of social programs. We will achieve these targets nevertheless.

The finance minister knows this is not true. There is such a gap between what the Liberal government says and what it does that it is just astounding. It explains why the finance minister must on a daily basis so grossly exaggerate Reform policy in order to cover his real agenda.

In fact my Bloc colleagues in question period today were calling his statements demagoguery. That is the only way to describe his desperate defence of the course he is leading us down.

Some of the cuts in the budget should have been made a long time ago and I agree with them. However it is interesting and necessary to compare them against what the Liberal government said versus what it meant. I am not talking historically but just in recent memory.

As recently as a year and a half ago the Liberal Party said it was against free trade and it would pull out of the free trade agreement. What it meant was it would strengthen free trade, continue those agreements and expand them on a scale that was not foreseen before.

When the Liberal Party said it was committed to keeping Petro–Canada and would not privatize it, what it really meant was it would finish the job of privatization.

When the Liberal Party said it would guarantee funding for the CBC what it meant was it would guarantee that its funding would be continually cut.

The Liberal Party said a Liberal government would never cut the civil service, but what have we got here? Not only do we have retro–cuts, but what the Liberal government really meant was that it would cut the civil service at record levels and do it retroactively by reopening collective agreements.

The Liberal Party said a Liberal government would never cut transfer payments to the provinces. What it will not transfer to the provinces is additional authority or additional tax points, but it will cut the transfer payments to the provinces at a record level.

The Liberal government said it would never raise the tax burden on the middle class. That apparently did not include gas taxes which are paid by ordinary citizens of every class. It did not include limiting RRSP contributions which hit certainly at members of the upper middle class which I would distinguish from the rich. It would raise utility taxes on ordinary consumers, providing they live in Alberta and a few other select areas of the country. It is now prepared to raise tobacco taxes which fall generally on those with lower than average incomes. The Liberal Party said it would never raise taxes on the middle class but what it really meant was most of the tax increases will be on the middle class.

The Prime Minister said he would never allow a society where we see beggars in the streets. What he really meant was he would never walk to work but instead drive by in his limousine so he never sees the beggars that we all meet every single day that we come here.

The Liberal Party now says that it will never cut health care, unemployment insurance, old age security, the Canada pension plan, child care or any of those plans. It says it will never cut them like the Reform Party intends to cut them. What the Liberal government really means is that it is not going to tell Canadians what those cuts are until they come. It is not going to bring them in them until the debt and the interest has drained off every red cent necessary to have a program of any kind.

What the Liberal government also said was that generally it will never cut the social security of Canadians. What do the Liberals really mean when they say all these things about compassion and sacrifice? They mean they will never take MPs off their gold–plated pension plan and you will never see MPs begging in the streets.

The leader of the Reform Party proposed last week a plan for a balanced budget with social programs that are clearly smaller and more decentralized than we have today. These are not popular measures and we know that. Those programs are based on clear objectives and values with dollars that are available today.

As bad as the Minister of Finance will paint this, these programs are going to look very good by the time we find out what the government really plans to do with social programs.

The choice is very simple. Canadians will have accept the tough medicine necessary to get us back to fiscal to health. The alternative is to buy the same snake oil from the same snake oil salesman at a price that is going to go up and up and up.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the member speak all I heard were negatives and misinformation.

The member somehow painted the reduction of the civil service by 45,000 jobs as a negative when in fact the government is refocusing through program review the downsizing. There will be surplus staff. The member clearly cannot be opposed to eliminating surplus staff in a compassionate way.

The member complains about the transfers to the provinces, yet in the Reform alternative budget the amount of hit to seniors, to the disadvantaged, to those who need health care, is drastically heavier. He paints the RRSP alternatives as if something is wrong. The RRSP limits in fact will be increasing to $15,500 from the current year of $13,500.

An hon. member: You'll flip–flop on that one too.

Mr. Szabo: Not flip–flop. The member says the Reform Party has all the answers.

If the member feels that the budget presented on February 27 was a draconian budget, how does he square the fact that instead of cutting $7 billion from the transfers to provinces Reform was going to cut some $15 billion from the social programs of Canadians?

• (1555)

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, the member raises the issue of cuts to the civil service, asking how I can condemn a program that reduces the civil service and tries to do so in a compassionate manner.

Reformers would not try and do that. In fact, Reformers told the civil servants in this city in the last election that these kinds of cuts would be necessary. We told them we would try to do it in a compassionate manner and we lost that election.

The Liberal Party candidates who won told civil servants precisely the opposite. They guaranteed collective agreements they are now breaking. They guaranteed jobs they are now removing. They guaranteed wages they are now taking away.

Now Liberals tell us that will not cut social programs by $15 billion. By the time the Liberal government is done, the cuts proposed by the Reform Party in last week's alternative budget will look very minor and the programs we proposed will look very good.

I am not surprised at anything that comes from people who will run on one thing and a year and a half later say the opposite on every single area of public policy.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his speech referred to snake oil. What he neglected to mention was the snake oil in the budget that the hon. member's party presented last week.

The last questioner, my distinguished colleague from Mississauga South, did ask a question. Of course, the hon. member evaded the answer, as every member of his party has when pressed on this issue. What proposals did the member put forward in the budget last week to gut Canada's social programs? Tell Canadians about those. In not one speech in the House have we have heard any clear reference to those guttings of social programs proposed in the Reform budget—

The Deputy Speaker: The member for Calgary West has the same amount of time, about a minute.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, the budget proposals that the Reform Party prepared last week and tabled were done publicly and in a manner that is open and available, unlike the plans being made by the government. Any Reform member's office can be contacted by any Canadian and the information will be provided.

There were $15 billion in cuts to social programs, leaving a social program envelope of $65 billion. That $65 billion will not be available when we learn how the government is really going to eliminate a deficit of $25 billion.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the budget process has been most fascinating. For the first time in the history of Canada the people have become involved in the process. We had a member presently in the House say yesterday that Reformers were trying to create a tax revolt.

I for one—I can speak on behalf of all my colleagues—was invited to these events, as were many Liberal members who chose not to turn up because they were afraid. It is really interesting that in a small city in my constituency, the town of Golden with 2,371 households, four women I would like to name here today in one week got 2,500 signatures from those 2,371 households: Gert Shewchuk, Stephanie Braul, Cheryl Kofluk and Merle McKnight.

These are common, ordinary Canadian women who are concerned about their country. This was the kind of activity that was going on. This was the kind of involvement that Canadians were demonstrating in this process.

However, when we come to the budget where the government in its own cynical way—although over a three–year period—is taking over $3.5 billion out of Canadian taxpayers' pockets without raising individual income tax rates, it would appear as though the hard work of these women and many others who were involved in the tax protest was successful. When I woke up on the morning of the day following the budget I turned on the radio and was confronted with a song that might be familiar to some members in the House. It goes:

> Bye, bye Miss American pie
> Drove my Chevy to the levee but the levee was dry > and good old boys were drinking whiskey and rye > saying this will be the day that I die
> This will be the day that I die.

• (1600)

That was the way I felt after I had an opportunity to take a look at the budget.

This is a budget of despair. This is a budget that is not straightforward by any form of measurement. This is a budget that is to have public debt charges increase from $38 billion to $51 billion.

Government members have the audacity to say that they are to protect social program when the largest single increase at 17.3 per cent is spending on funding the public debt. How can they say they are to protect social programs when they are increasing the spending on public debt by 17.3 per cent?

I took a look at their documents. They frequently say that they do not know what the facts are. I have the budget speech of the minister and I read on page 32 that personal income tax is to go up from $51.1 billion to $56.8 billion, to $60.4 billion, to $64.5 billion in a four–year period. Corporate tax is to go up from $9.8 billion to $13 billion, to $15.5 billion, to $16.3 billion. As a matter of fact gross budgetary revenues in the same period are to increase from $116 billion to $137.4 billion. These are numbers provided by the finance minister.

We do not have a revenue problem; we have an expenditure problem. It is so obvious it is just absolutely amazing.

Another interesting point on the expenditure side is that my colleague just referred to the fact that 45,000 civil servants are to be laid off over the next three–year period. He very clearly pointed out that the government was not elected to cut 45,000 civil servants. It was elected on the promise that civil servant jobs were to remain. That promise has been broken.

Furthermore business has also taken a hit in the budget. Business grants have dropped from $3.7 billion down to $1.9 billion. While the premiums remain constant, unemployment insurance payouts are to decrease from $17.6 billion to $15.3 billion, to $14.3 billion, to $13.7 billion.

There is more and more of a take because they are not to decrease the amount they are taking from the unemployed. They are to decrease the payouts and put $5 billion into a slush fund for themselves. There we have it: we have expenditure cuts and the inevitable social program cuts.

Why do I say this is a budget of despair? In spite of all the harsh medicine and in spite of the fact it will be reducing the total amount we are going into the hole by $10 billion, the government has permitted annual interest charges in the same period of time to increase by $10 billion.

In other words we are treading water. Rather than swimming and getting somewhere, we are treading water. I think of another verse of the song:

> It's been 10 years
> I've been on my own > and moss grows fat > on a rolling stone.

It is a song of despair; it is a budget of despair.

We have to ask the following question. If we look at the cuts that have occurred to this point, where else is there to cut except in the social envelope in a responsible manner so that the people at the bottom end of the scale are protected? Where else is there to cut? There is no place else. In that respect the budget is not only a budget of despair. It is a budget of dishonesty.

• (1605)

We are taking a look at the fact that it is hidden within these documents. The downloading is where it is hidden. It is hidden because they are to combine the Canada Health Act with the Canada assistance plan and post–secondary education funding. They are to rename all those things the Canada social transfer and then they are to reduce it by $4.5 billion.

When it is transferred to the provinces and the $4.5 billion is removed we have a choice as Canadians. Either we downgrade health care, post–secondary education and the amount of funding for the Canada assistance plan, or we increase taxes at the provincial level. We cannot have it both ways. It is just that simple.

I asked myself, in listening to the budget debate, what was the problem here. Is there some difficulty in terms of understanding common ordinary English? I asked a question of the parliamentary secretary last night. His response was rather interesting. My question was exactly what I have been developing here. If we are increasing the amount we are spending from $38 billion to $51 billion in our debt service charge, where is the money to come from? That is a very valid question.

When I said that I do not see how the government could possibly do the job of continuing to fund social programs—and it keeps on saying that it is—his response as reported at page 10181 of Hansard was:

> The Government of Canada will be able to keep its commitments and pay pensions to seniors.
>
> The difference is that the Reform Party sees everything black; it is the end of the world.

No, it is just a little despair at this point.

> The member acknowledged that we have made real cuts. We have a balanced budget in terms of real cuts and it will encourage economic growth.

When the documents say that we are to be overspending $32.7 billion, how in the world could the parliamentary secretary say: "We have a balanced budget?" Obviously he does not understand ordinary English. He said: "The deficit will disappear". By magic? He also said: "The deficit will be reduced by creating jobs". That was a promise in the last election. Obviously it is another promise they believe they can drop.

I close by quoting in despair:

> I still remembered how I cried
> When I read about his widowed bride
> But something touched me deep inside
> The day the music died.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Reform Party members took a big risk in terms of the strategy they were to use with regard to the budget. They went out and incited Canadians on the issue of no new taxes and cutting spending. That is exactly what the finance minister did with $7 of cuts to $1 of increases, and those revenue increases included no personal income tax increases.

Reformers presented a budget to the House which said that we had to keep the poor poor and make the middle class poor. They said to Canadians: "Just stop eating for a year and use that money to pay down your mortgage. Then everything will be fine". That is like saying the operation was a success but the patient died.

The question I have for the member concerns the Canadian social transfer. That social transfer is a combination of the CAP and the EPF. The member would well know that as there is growth in the economy and as the value of tax points goes up, the amount of cash transferred to the provinces will go down. In some cases the amount of cash will be zero. That being the case, what leverage would the federal government have over the provinces in terms of maintaining standards?

• (1610)

Would the member not agree that consolidating those transfer programs under one umbrella allows the federal government continued leverage to ensure that the national standards of health care, environment and others are maintained in Canada, the best country in the world?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, the rhetoric of my hon. colleague is reminiscent of what we ran into during the last election: the only politicians of virtue in Canada are Liberal federal politicians; the politicians in provinces are terrible people as well as anybody who is not a Liberal.

What is this? I do not understand. Perhaps it is just a case that members of that party have been in power for so long, have been building up the debt for so long, and have had the reins of government for so long that as we slide off the edge it has gone to their heads.

To answer the member very simply, if the government is not decreasing the amount of money available to social programs, is decreasing the cash transfers by $4.5 billion, and is not transferring the tax points to the provinces, how can the government possibly try to convince Canadians that it is not simply shifting the burden and that it is able to keep its false promise of being able to look after social programs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for the last half hour or so I listened to presentations by two members of the Reform Party. I am reminded of a movie I saw recently called "The Madness of King George". We have heard a version of paranoid economics where there is a hobgoblin behind every bush and a shadow behind every budget. It reminds me very much of King George who suffered from a similar malady. He would find himself very much at home in the present day Reform caucus.

There is an interesting scene in that movie that I think is worth commenting on. James Fox, leader of the opposition at that time, was seen strolling along the lawns of Westminster with Mr. Pitt, who at the time was prime minister. He was a somewhat straight–laced and dour gentleman according to history; that certainly was how he was portrayed in the movie. As they were walking along, James Fox said to the prime minister: "Mr. Pitt, is there anything you admire at all?" Mr. Pitt said: "A balance sheet, Mr. Fox. I like a good balance sheet".

Mr. Pitt would be very happy with our Minister of Finance today because he has come up with a good balance sheet. He has been able to come up with a balance sheet to escape the malady and the problems faced by governments over the past decade that have promised much and delivered little. He has come up with a balance sheet that has now been acknowledged and recognized by financial markets both here and internationally as meeting the test of restoring integrity in our fiscal system.

A few short days ago the leader of the Reform Party, the chicken little of Canadian politics, screamed that the sky was going to fall and that the clouds were going to roll in? All of a sudden comes the budget and interest rates begin to fall, the dollar stabilizes and financial markets say that the government has met the test.

Not to be daunted by that illusion, he must now find himself a new form of vapour to chase after. He is now pretending there is "a hidden agenda". The only hidden agenda is the one we recently read about in the book about the Reform Party that says the hidden agenda of the hon. member for Calgary Southwest is to rule the world.

The message of the budget is to get beyond the immediate and the superficial, as we have heard this afternoon. We must deal with the specifics and put aside some of the grand statements of moral indignation we hear coming from certain provincial premiers such as: "woe is me, the world is gone" and get down to what the government is attempting to do.

• (1615)

It has provided in this budget the first major step in restructuring the economy of this country to provide a way of ensuring a fiscal, economic and monetary system that prepares us and gives us the kind of foundation we need upon which we can then begin to build a new social reform, a new system of cultural programs to provide certainty and stability to Canada, on which we can then begin to build the new Canada and the new economy. That is what this budget is all about.

It is very important to emphasize that modernization, re–engineering and restructuring are not the object of one day or one week. They must start and must continue. It is going to be work that I certainly believe will engage members of Parliament from our side of the House and I hope it will engage members of Parliament from all sides of the House.

This is what Canadians want and demand. They do not want the kind of voodoo analysis we are constantly hearing. They simply want people to quit playing with black magic and get down to reality and deal with the real issues such as how to maintain a balance of programs and begin to respond to the transformations in the workplace and in the global economy, how we preserve integrity economically and socially and the sovereignty in order to make our own decisions.

Clearly the statement has been made. As much as we have the fulmination of the Reform Party wishing it were otherwise, wishing and hoping that the sky had fallen as its leader predicted, hoping that there would be a cataclysm in Canada, that catastrophe would be visited upon us, as much as it has been urging and praying that the sky would fall, it has not.

What is happening is that Canadians and people internationally have seen that this government is the best economic manager this country has had in a long time.

That is why every Canadian has a crucial stake in the budget we brought forward. The government moved decisively to restore our nation's integrity and is now beginning to put us in a position where we can do the real work of rebuilding we were elected to do. We had to get the economics right and the Minister of Finance has accomplished that.

[Translation]

We want to maintain the social safety net offered by programs like old age pension, family allowance and welfare. It is absolutely essential that our financial house be put in order. We will take any action necessary to protect social programs today and in the future.

[English]

I want to illustrate to members in the House and others listening exactly how that budget has been the catalyst to begin that reformation, that new resolution of programs and developments in our country.

In the budget we announced that we were going to fundamentally reorganize the funding of programs in the very large Department of Human Resources Development to bring together, as we heard during the course of the committee hearings, a new human resources investment fund so that we could consolidate a number of existing programs that may have had value at one time but no longer had the same relevance or the same impact. We wanted to bring them together into a common pool so we could begin to organize a new social reform package.

When hon. members opposite ask where the social reform is, it is happening now. The member from Calgary when she made her presentation on behalf of her party said: "I apologize. It was not all that well thought out because I did not have much time".

We have a plan. The human resource investment fund is the beginning of that because it now gives us the flexibility to put in place a good child care program in this country, to deal with the question of literacy with our partners in the provinces, to begin working on new approaches to help people get re–employed, to sit down with the private sector as we are doing in something like 16 human resource councils in things like electronics, tourism, horticulture, logistics, car repair and auto parts.

We are now putting in place a partnership with business and labour in each of these sectors to start new training for young people. Since the summer close to 10,000 young people have been enrolled in these new internship programs in which we are sharing our resources with the private sector to begin providing new job opportunities and training opportunities.

It is not the old jurisdictional wars between federal and provincial governments. We are getting away from the old turf disputes. We are now sitting down with the private sector and community sector, the women's resource centres, the YWCA, the local communities and asking how to become partners to get people trained.

I heard from one of the Reform members "too little too late". That is coming from a party which said it was going to take the unemployment insurance fund and rip up all programs for women with children in the unemployment insurance program. He says we are too little too late. Talk about taking a dagger to the heart of the vampire. The vampire is taking the dagger to the heart of the Canadian people. That is what is going on.

Those kind of partnerships are now going to be facilitated by this kind of reorganization. The single drawer we have now put in place, which we promised to do when I stood in this House for social reform and said the first major initiative is to put a single drawer of financing in this federal department so we could being to work out these new partnerships. It has happened in this budget and social reform is well under way.

Let me talk for a minute about the Canada social transfer. There have been a lot of balloons and a lot of assumptions made about what is being proposed. Basically what we are proposing in this particular area is to ensure the continuation of an effective national approach for the funding and support of social initiatives by developing a new set of partnerships with the provinces.

We are proposing to do exactly what every single province has been asking us to do, to ensure they could have the flexibility to provide innovation and new approaches, to allow the provinces to become incubators of good social reform. That kind of freedom has been on every single premier's list until we do it.

Then they say: "Oh, God, the devil made us do it. Please do not do it to us".

Do they want the responsibility or not? We have given them the responsibility and for those who have said for some reason or other that this means there is going to be a withdrawal of the federal government from responsibilities, that is not the case.

Every member of the House knows that the present program, the existing program, is the one that creates the problems. Because it was designed 30 years ago it really means that in most cases there is no conditionality. There are no common principles. There are no standards. We simply write the cheques and they make the decisions.

As a result we have created in many cases large numbers of bureaucracies that have chewed up the money not in delivering directly to people but simply providing services for themselves.

I am most surprised by the objection of Bloc Quebecois on this matter because it is the one party which I thought would endorse fully a new system of federalism that would allow provinces to make more decisions for themselves.

[Translation]

The budget lays the foundations of a new federalism, a new partnership with the provinces and communities. At present, we have a government organization that has remained unchanged since the 1930s and 1940s; it is too centralized, too heavy and far from meeting the needs of the people.

The provinces, and Quebec in particular, have been asking that changes be made for quite some time. What the new Canadian social transfer will give the provinces is flexibility and the power to make decisions, less paperwork, yet better results.

[English]

What we are basically trying to do is ensure that we would still maintain very clearly the commitments under the Canada Health Act. We still maintain very clearly in the budget papers the responsibility to maintain full mobility. We will sit down with the provinces over the next year to work out a new framework in which we can provide more coherence to our programs, provide more co–ordination of what they are doing among themselves and with us so we can begin to tackle the high priority that Canadians have placed to deal with things like child poverty and to deal with the problems of families.

• (1625)

For the first time as the federal government we are saying let us sit down as equals to work out how we can bring all our resources together in a new way to provide a new framework for social reform.

Again, when members opposite and others say that social reform is on the shelf, they have not read the budget. It started Monday night with a brand new way of working with the provinces to bring about social reform in a collective, co–ordinated, co–operative community way which is what Canadians want. That is what the Canadian social transfer is all about.

I issue an invitation to all members of this House. It is going to be absolutely essential and important that every member representing all the regions be prepared to put forward those kinds of proposals and ideas about how they can see this new Canadian social framework taking place, the kind of priorities that are there, where we allocate the money and to encourage and endorse in their own provinces and their own regions the willingness of the provinces to come to the table.

I was encouraged this morning to hear Roy Romanow, the premier of Saskatchewan, say that we are going to sit down and talk with the provinces, to watch the kind of courage expressed by Clyde Wells, the premier of Newfoundland, last night on television when he said: "Sure, we're the poorest province in the country but we realize the federal government had to take tough steps and we're prepared to sit down and work with them".

The proposal, for example, in Newfoundland for the new income security proposal looking at a way of providing income supplements to top up basic benefits to encourage people to go back to work is one of those ideas that we can work together on, that we can come together with the province of Newfoundland and other provinces that want to engage in that same kind of joint enterprise to provide more work and more incentives for people to go back to work to restore their sense of dignity and their sense of hope. I applaud Premier Wells for the kind of initiative he has taken.

It is important that we get this right and not engage in the vocabulary and the language of old Canada, to talk about the way things used to be which I hear too many doing and by equating social reform with the amount of dollars that we spend. I heard members in the opposition today standing up saying we are going to take this money and the provinces do not have as much.

Have they never considered that by changing that program we will put an entirely new regime in place where we do not have to have duplicating bureaucracy, where we do not have to waste money on people pushing paper, where we do not have to have people stumbling over one another to administer the same program? What we can begin to do is save money that we can recycle and restore back directly to people by getting rid of the superstructure and infrastructure built up over the years. That is the key point.

This is not only a way of bringing down the expenses of government but also making it more efficient, more effective, more competent and more relevant to the people who really need help and support. That is what this budget is about.

Let me for the moments remaining speak of a third initiative that emerges directly out of the budget in terms of undertaking the kind of reform of our social network that we want to initiate. That is proposals to look at the unemployment insurance system or, to frankly use the term that the Prime Minister used, an employment insurance program, to retool, redesign the program as a way of enabling people to get back to work, which is the fundamental mandate we received as a government.

That means taking a program which over the years has allowed or acquired a certain number of disincentives that discourage people from working, that provide alternatives to working, that do not provide the resources to get the kinds of skills and the training required to meet the kinds of new challenges in our economy.

It is fascinating to see how many good ideas are out there. This country is so full of people with good innovative ideas. We have to provide the encouragement, provide the incentive and provide the framework to let them flower.

Let me speak for a moment about the New Brunswick job corps which was a joint project between us and the province of New Brunswick for older workers who had lost their jobs in the forest industry. The forest industry was shrinking. We have come together as part of our strategic initiatives plan and put together a New Brunswick job corps for older workers.

Many of them went back to the forest to plant trees, to do the reforestation, to restore the resource. Others worked in a wide variety of other areas. I received one of the most encouraging letters last week from a gentleman from Moncton, New Brunswick who as part of his job corps experience has been working with the boys and girls clubs of Moncton, sitting down with young people, using his well honed, well developed talents from his years of working in forestry to impart that same kind of skill and that same knowledge to young people.

He wrote to me saying it was the best job he had ever had because he is back working with young people, giving them the skills they need. Rather than telling a 55–year old man he no longer is of use and is simply going to draw his benefits for the next year or two and will live out his life asking where is the meaning and purpose, we have given him new hope through the New Brunswick job corps. He is now back working in a job that gives him an enormous sense of satisfaction.

That can be done not just for one, but for tens of thousands of people, if we can take money spent through unemployment insurance purely for benefits and convert it into money for things like the New Brunswick job corps.

It can provide wage supplements for people to go back to work in the private sector. It can provide earned income supplements to get people off social assistance and back into employment. It can provide better training programs working with the private sector. It can provide good counselling in our programs so that people can understand what their choices and options are.

It can provide a new labour market information system from coast to coast to coast so that people will know exactly where the jobs are. They can plug their resumes into that system and an employer will know exactly who is available. They can do it right across Canada.

That is what we mean by social reform: re–engineering our system of unemployment insurance into an employment insurance system. We would be using the resources to give people the kind of incentive, the kind of support and the kind of encouragement they need to get back to work. We believe that is what Canadians want. They want to go back to work. The best kind of social security enables them to go back to work.

There is a transformation going on in today's workplace. Technology has an enormous impact in changing the way we work and in changing the kind of work available. We have to change with it. We cannot stay with the old programs and the old ways. Reform and change are essential to enable people to understand that this new workplace is something and that they have a real place to occupy.

My plea today is to let us use this budget as the launching pad. Let us use it as the foundation upon which we build a new employment system, a new work system and a new job system in Canada. With scarce resources and by working closely with the provinces, the private sector and community organizations, we would create new job opportunities. We would create new partnerships and would combine our skills and aptitudes to give Canadians real hope. Most important, we would use those resources so that Canadians individually could have choices. They could choose what kind of job, what kind of training, what kind of school and what kind of community they would build.

We launched social reform as a public consultation. It is now coming into practice as a program as of Monday night's budget. Its whole purpose is to give and restore to Canadians the choices about the kind of work they do, the kind of community they build and the kind of country they are going to live in.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, anyone who is not aware of the government's real situation, of the figures, anyone who does not know the real intentions and the mess this government finds itself in, would be tempted to vote for a minister so eager to speak about job creation and training, would be tempted to vote for the Minister of Human Resources Development after such an enthusiastic speech.

What enthusiasm. What a man, with his desire to put young people back to work. What a man who wants post–secondary training for students. What a man who wants the transfer of funds to give the provinces the power to make their own decisions.

People do not take these political speeches at face value. People know very well that debts are being offloaded in this budget. They also know very well that these transfers mean that the provinces will receive less over the next three years. For Quebec, the shortfall will be more than $2 billion.

When the Minister of Human Resources Development speaks about putting young people back to work, giving young people the chance to be trained, how can he explain that his reform plans would send young people right into debt? Since there is no money left, student loans and grants are of course frozen. But credit is to be extended more readily. At the same time, while responsibilities are being transferred, transfer payments are being reduced. This forces the provinces to come up with very tough budgets also.

• (1635)

This dynamic minister who would offer fine training through his plans for job–related training in conjunction with employers and with the workplace, does he know that this has been planned for a long time in Quebec? Does he know that in Quebec the University of Sherbrooke has a co–operative training program in which all students are not merely trained, but are also sent on regular placements with potential employers? Does he know that this approach was taken by what some call factory schools where students get practical training, long before the minister announced his plans, long before the minister suggested that such things should exist? No, Mr. Speaker.

How can the minister, in such an ardent speech, maintain this hope for young people when his budget consists solely of reducing transfers and offloading the federal debt onto the provincial budgets?

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I sure liked the first part of his comments. I will certainly do my best to answer his question.

First, it is important to get the facts right. I know the hon. gentleman is an honourable and respected parliamentarian who never wants to get confused by misinformation. As we pointed out in the House today, the changeover in transfers in the province of Quebec for example only amounts to 3.1 per cent, not the vast figures used, but 3.1 per cent in 1996–97. It is a reduction of about $350 million, at most.

I want to underline the point I made during the course of my remarks because I know the hon. member takes this very seriously. That amount is far less than the reductions we are taking ourselves as a federal government, which is on average about 7 or 8 per cent. The national average of reduction on transfers is about 4.4 per cent and in Quebec alone it is 3.1 per cent. I would be quite happy to share further that information. It would be very useful for the member to know those are the real facts and not those that have been put forward by other sources.

It means we have to work at what I have heard the hon. member speak of quite eloquently in his own way. We need to eliminate a lot of the duplication which takes place between levels of government. We need to eliminate a lot of the build up of bureaucracies and the program administration which are in the way of the direct delivery of programs. I have always said that one of the major objectives we have in social reform is to eliminate many of those barriers and hurdles that have built up.

This puts the onus and responsibility on the provinces to figure out ways of doing that. They now have far more freedom and far more choice about how they can reorganize their programs to get those kinds of things because we are taking the restrictive rules off.

As the hon. member knows, the Canada assistance plan had a whole set of rules about what could not be done. A good example in Quebec is the APPORT program which has been a very good incentive to enable people on social assistance to go back to work. We could never fund APPORT under the old rules of the Canada assistance plan. Under our new transfer proposal Quebec can now use funds from the federal government for the APPORT program and therefore have a lot more flexibility.

It seems to be a real example of contradiction to have it being opposed by the Bloc Quebecois when it is in the interest of Quebec to have access to those funds for use in Quebec's own innovative programs.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, now that I listen to the minister I can understand why some people call him the head dinosaur in the Liberal stable of those who believe that all the solutions to the economic and social problems of Canada are found with the government.

• (1640)

The issue of this budget is one of credibility. One year ago the Minister of Finance said: "We have now made all the cuts that we have to make". It is a matter of credibility not relative to what we have proposed. I think that we have been honest. What is at issue is the untruth, the smoke and mirrors we got in the last budget. It was said that there would be no cuts and especially that social programs were sacrosanct.

The budget speech gives the expenditure reductions by category. Would anyone believe there are cuts planned in health, in Canada Mortgage and Housing which serves the poor, and in veterans affairs? The people who served this country will now be asked to make sacrifices by this government which promised there would be no cuts at all. One of the biggest cuts has been in heritage and cultural programs. There are cuts in international assistance as well. All of those things were promised to be sacrosanct.

The issue is one of credibility. I stood and applauded these cuts, but the story was given that there would be no cuts in the future. Now we are hearing all kinds of wonderful stories. Why should we believe them this time?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, by the way, I want to make an official announcement. It is well known that in the next week the Reform caucus room will be renamed Jurassic Park. I hope we will be invited to the opening.

The real question of credibility is what Canadians take as being the honest efforts of a government to balance out its priorities. Those are to make sure that we can start living within our means and using our fiscal system to restore health while at the same time maintaining the kind of justice and compassion that we have.

I think the credibility of the hon. member's own party fell apart in its alternative budget. The Reform Party talks about clawbacks of $3 billion on seniors pensions. It talks about taking away maternity benefits from women. It also talks about virtually doing away with the Canada assistance plan and turning it into some kind of investment program. Imagine a single parent with three children in downtown Toronto saying: "Yes, I have a few thousand dollars. I am going to invest in my own registered retirement savings income security program". That shows no credibility.

We are trying to balance the two off. We know we have to make some cuts. At the same time, we believe in the kind of social reform we are initiating. It enables us to sit down with the provinces and the private sector to establish partnerships for new training programs and new job programs. We all share in the cost. We eliminate unnecessary bureaucracy and we get rid of duplicated programs. It is under those kinds of initiatives that we can begin to use our valuable resources in a much more effective way.

It seems to me that members of the Reform Party have completely and entirely abdicated the notion that good, effective management can bring about better results. Maybe it is because they know they will never have the opportunity to manage anything in the federal Government of Canada at any time, anywhere. Therefore they do not focus on the requirement to ask how to do things better.

The Reform Party has given the name Reform a bad currency. The real meaning of reform is to be able to make effective changes without losing one's values. We have maintained our Liberal values and we are going to make effective changes.

The Deputy Speaker: Order. Excuse me, but I must make the following announcement before 5 p.m. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce—gun control; the hon. member for South Shore—tourism; the hon. member for Frontenac—the budget.

• (1645)

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure as the member for Richmond—Wolfe and the official opposition's critic for regional development to speak on the occasion of the tabling of the budget.

I would ask permission to first remind this House of one of the major causes of the Canadian deficit, because the aim of this budget is to resolve the problem of the deficit in order to tackle the problem of the debt. Let us have a look at one of the causes of this great catastrophe of the Canadian economy—the debt.

Liberal Pierre Trudeau came to the position of Prime Minister armed with a national vision that was impervious to the many representations made with respect to provincial jurisdiction. This national delusion of grandeur on the part of one political party would take the country of the 1970s down the road to a national debt that is today out of control.

The Liberals' Canadian nationalism formed the ideological foundation for government intervention, given the lack of a real social democratic policy. National unity in the face of rising provincialism provided one vocation for the party and its leader; the other was Canada's independence from the United States. Thus involvement by the central government with the aim of ensuring a Canadian presence in all regions of this vast country gave birth to a monstrous government apparatus, the cost of which is being felt today in the national debt.

Canada's debt is the hidden side of this national liberalism. It is the expression of the collapse of the Liberals and of Canada's economic and political systems. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party of Canada is responsible for the national debt.

Having said this, Canada's debt is now $550 billion, and will climb to $650 billion by 1997–98. The federal government's debt will continue to grow faster than the economy. The net debt will grow from $546 billion in 1994–95, to $578 billion in 1995–96 and will reach $603 billion in 1996–97. The debt, as a percentage of gross domestic product, will peak at 73.5 per cent in 1995–96 before easing off slightly to 73.4 per cent in 1996–97.

Canada's problem is structural. It is directly linked to the Liberals' desire to centralize everything and to stake out an imposing presence for itself throughout the country. Quebec should have dragged itself out of this quagmire a long time ago.

In the Minister of Finance's 1995–96 budget, the state takes a hands–off approach to this bankrupt country's economy. However, the federal Liberals still have the same desire, the same delusion of grandeur: they have stuck with the same flawed vision they had in the seventies, which was the dream of a unified nation taking its place among the greatest western capitalist countries.

In 1996–97, the government will cut $650 million in transfer payments to Quebec for health, education and welfare, but has no intention of withdrawing from these jurisdictions. The central government is beginning its great withdrawal by merging established programs financing with the Canada assistance plan to create one global transfer program, dubbed the Canada social transfer.

Despite budgetary constraints and the spectre of national bankruptcy hovering over our heads, Ottawa firmly clings to national standards. Abiding steadfastly to federal principles, that is the rampart the government is defending in the budget, with Quebec's referendum looming on the horizon. Make no mistake, this budget is, above all, about decentralizing the deficit accumulated by Liberals Trudeau, Chrétien, Lalonde and Turner, about decentralizing the Liberal debt, starting with cuts in federal transfer payments for post–secondary education, health care and social assistance.

The federal government has withdrawn from its funding role, but the departments where duplication exists remain in place. Did anyone say the Department of Health would be abolished? And when do we get this sweeping structural reform of the federal system? Despite the government's claims since the beginning of this year that it wants to decentralize, the Liberals are still flying the centralist flag. Thanks to national standards, the centralist option is alive and well.

A withdrawing from its funding role in the provinces does not mean the central government has withdrawn its administrative structures. Even if these become increasingly symbolic, they are still costly and, as such, even more damaging to the initiatives of the provinces. The trouble is, the federal withdrawal creates a vacuum. There is a lack of real job creation measures. People are upset about drastic cuts, and there is a consistent lack of regional development policies. For instance, general cuts in transfers to the provinces will have an impact on access to university. This is tough for our young people.

Certain regions may have trouble supporting their universities. This was said by Claude Lajeunesse, president of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. And he should know. The Eastern Townships, where I have the privilege of representing the riding of Richmond—Wolfe, is one of the regions that will be particularly affected by the federal government's new policy, the so–called Canadian Social Transfer, and the attendant cuts in transfer payments. This region, which has two universities and five hospitals, will suffer as a result of these cuts. Let the federal government withdraw, let it disappear and with it the departments of Health and Human Resources Development, let full responsibility be transferred to the regions, with the appropriate tax revenues.

Canada is the G–7 country that invests least in research and development, but the Minister of Finance cut the budget for research and development. In the agricultural sector in Quebec, $10 million will be cut annually over the next three years. This will have a particularly dramatic impact on the development of regions in Quebec that are known for their flourishing dairy industry. We see the same thing happening to the National Research Council of Canada, whose budget will be cut by $76 million over the next three years. Do not try to understand why. The Liberal Party which, throughout its election campaign and in its red book, focused on jobs, advanced technology and competitiveness, is now withdrawing from research and development in Quebec, making the regions poorer in the process.

Another example of a regional catastrophe. The Gaspé and the Maritimes will be particularly affected by the repeal of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, since $99 million worth of subsidies will be cut.

I would like to welcome my Liberal colleagues, who are coming from behind the curtains to listen to what I have to say.

The federal withdrawal announced in Monday's budget may be described as typical of a routed State, a government that has become so fat that it can no longer move except to reduce this government–made deficit on the backs of others: Quebec and the provinces. For example, Henri Massé, secretary general of the FTQ, reminds us that the total payroll for federal civil servants accounts for only eight per cent of the deficit and he concludes that this is a very cruel budget for the little people. It attacks the most disadvantaged segment of our society, namely the wage earners, while protecting the friends of the regime. The powerful capitalist leaders of the Liberal financial community in Canada are like the angels of the Liberal Party.

We, in the Bloc Quebecois, ask federal public service employees: "Do you not think that your jobs will be safer in a Quebec public service set to expand in a new sovereign country than in this declining federal public service?" Who says that laying off 45,000 employees will produce efficiency gains? What guarantee do we have that, as my hon. colleague from Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot said, the "bosses" across the way will not decide to replace the career civil servants who will be laid off with friends of the regime, friends of the Liberal Party?

• (1655)

Again, one of Quebec's regions will have to bear the brunt of indiscriminate federal cuts, as 12,000 federal jobs will no doubt be eliminated in the Outaouais region.

Going once more against what it had announced during the election campaign in terms of employment policies, the Liberal Party is about to cut the budget of its industry department by $560 million. This measure is all the more harmful because it affects peripheral regions.

With respect to the regions, while maintaining a presence, the Liberal government is planning to reduce the budget of regional development agencies by the modest sum of $0.6 billion over a three year period.

The Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, the FORDQ, becomes an empty shell that eventually will merge with the Federal Business Development Bank, as indicated in the budget, and play the role of a financial institution.

The implications of the budget are obvious: regional development agencies will channel their assistance to small business. Subsidies will be systematically replaced with refundable contributions and loans. Apparently, the Liberal Party of Canada thinks it can treat regional small businesses and big multinational corporations the same way, because when it cuts 60 per cent of its subsidies to business, it seems to think this should affect regional small businesses as well. And remember, they cut only 60 per cent, when everyone in the official opposition, including Quebec employers, wanted to cut them 100 per cent.

This approach will be very damaging to regional development in Quebec. That being the case, with the FORDQ an empty shell, the federal government should withdraw from regional development altogether, with full compensation for Quebec. The FORDQ is a typical example of duplication and overlap. Programs to help small businesses already exist in Quebec in all administrative regions, including a secretariat for small business at International Affairs.

Quebec cannot afford to remain in a system that maintains duplication and overlap. In any case, Quebec has generally had gained very little as a result of federal regional development policies, and the Minister of Finance's latest budget is a case in point. In fact, we are been advised by the minister that operating budgets of regional development agencies will be cut, and again, Quebec is being hit, this time to the tune of $40.3 million.

Monday's budget is typical of the Liberal philosophy of Canada's financial community. This budget does nothing to relieve the tax burden on the middle class, but maintains tax shelters for the very wealthy and large Canadian corporations. It continues to attack the neediest in this country. In 1995–96, social programs will see their budgets cut by 7.3 per cent; industrial, regional and scientific support programs, 1.8 per cent; heritage and cultural programs, 6.9 per cent; and Transport, 11.4 per cent. Meanwhile, debt charges are expected to increase by 20.7 per cent over the same period.

It is pretty obvious that Canada's financial community is not helping to pay the debt. The job market and the neediest in our society are bearing the brunt of these debt charges. The figures prove it: Over 27 per cent of the cuts to job creation and social programs will be used to pay the 20.7 per cent increase in the cost of servicing the debt.

The budget hits big business and corporations with a disproportionately small share of the deficit and debt fighting measures. Surtaxes on incomes of approximately $115 million were raised from 3 to 4 per cent, income tax rates for large corporations were raised slightly from 0.2 per cent to 0.225 per cent of capital used in excess of $10 million.

Let us not forget the banks. They do not get a permanent tax increase, but a temporary one. A minimal and insignificant tax. The Royal Bank of Canada, you will remember, pocketed $1.2 billion in profits last year. These are but a few examples of how the federal Liberal budget has spared the middle class, only to hit the big Canadian capitalists with mere micky–mouse tax measures, and thus passes by funds that are needed to reduce the deficit.

That is where the money is coming from to reduce the federal deficit. There is nothing in this budget for job creation, which is particularly dramatic for Quebec's regions. The Liberals even have the gall to say that the unemployment rate is expected to remain unchanged over the next few years, at approximately 9.5 per cent, that is to say about 11 per cent for Quebec and its regions. The people of Quebec should know the time has come to say "yes" to a sovereign Quebec. It is more important than ever that our powers and decisions be in our own hands and not in the hands of others, like the federal Liberals.

Quebecers will pay dearly if they decide against having a country of their own, a real country that will take control over its public finances and operate the administrative changes required. Unless Quebecers vote for sovereignty this year, unless they choose budget efficiency and structural change, they are headed, as a society, for a situation where Quebec will have less and less control over job creation and will loose all ability to put in place an efficient regional economic recovery plan.

A negative vote at the upcoming referendum will signal the decline of regional development in Quebec, because the present Liberal federal government is showing its true colours in this budget with disastrous consequences for the regions. What the Federal Office of Regional Development, this capitalistic small business loan agency, will become is a parody of regional development. As the Bloc Quebecois critic for regional development, I fully support the amendment put forth by my hon. colleague from Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot to defeat this budget.

In closing, what it this budget about? What does it mean? This is a pre–referendum budget that does not even let us see right away, in practical terms, that, once again, the federal government is hurting Quebec. The pain it getting pretty unbearable and this pain is like a wound, a wound that will not heal in this federal system. In order to heal, we have to decide for ourselves. Quebec has to choose its own remedies, so that it can be on its way to economic recovery.

It is up to the people of Quebec to choose a positive solution and find a cure to they own ills. To remain in this federal system is to leave our cultural and economic future, which is already seriously compromised, in the hands of individuals who look after and stand for interests other than those of ordinary people in Quebec. The unemployed, the disadvantaged, the ill, the aged, the young, these are the people for whom the federal system never does anything.

No! They work for the financial elite, the big corporations, the banks, the family trusts that will not be taxable until 1999, all close friends of this government, the majority of whom represent English Canada and the financial elite. That is what Canada has always been.

The people of Quebec must take responsibility for their own future, with confidence and openness. Confidence in themselves, in their resources, their strengths and capabilities; open to others as they always have been in their cultural and business relations with Canada, the United States, South America, Europe and the rest of the world.

Confidence and openness are Quebec's two greatest assets for the future. They are what it needs to recover from this incurable federal disease. The future of Quebec, if the people really want it, depends on pride. Pride in the fact that we decide to have a country, in the fact that we are all prepared to be responsible for our economy, our social programs and our culture, and pride in our own perception of the future, the future of generations to come, of our sons and daughters. We put our trust above all in our children, and we must do everything we can to prepare their future and ensure that our contribution in this respect is exceptional and worthy of the responsibility we have as their parents, as their elders.

History is in the making, and we should be proud to be a part of it and to make this exceptional contribution to our joint future. We say yes to this future, for the sake of our children first of all, and we want the people of Quebec to be a strong and vital force in a country that is Quebec.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech by the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe. I know he listened with interest himself to the words of the Minister of Human Resources Development earlier, when he spoke about the overtures made to the provinces to work out a new framework for the social security system, as described in part in the budget, and in other government initiatives to involve the provinces and work with them in a spirit of partnership, so that together they might develop a new social security system that will meet the needs of all Canadians.

Given these initiatives and the position the hon. member has just expressed on Quebec sovereignty, I would like to know whether he thinks there is a happy medium. Would it be possible to work in partnership with the government of Quebec in developing a new generation of social and other programs, which might, in his view, enable the people of Quebec or the government of Quebec to really participate with the rest of Canada in these programs?

Given that the referendum, if the government of Quebec ever sets it in motion, is not a foregone conclusion and that there is a good chance, if not a strong possibility, that Quebecers will say "yes" to Canada, as they have always done, and "no" to separation as proposed by their provincial government, is there any way, in his opinion, consistent with his option, to work together with the government of Canada, other provincial governments and in the other partnerships involved, to improve and renew Canada's social security system?

Mr. Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank my colleague for this very long question with its many parts. First off, I must say that the words dialogue, partnership and co–operation are not just words but are underlying principles in Quebec, underlying principles used by elected members, used in the communities. In Quebec we have always worked through dialogue, partnerships and in co–operation.

• (1710)

To my mind, this is a very clear characteristic of Quebec and in this regard, my hon. colleague, you must have seen the numerous socio–economic summits held in all regions since the 1980s, you must have seen dialogue and partnerships develop between university communities and economic communities. Since then, you must have seen strategic plans evolving for each region in response to the difficult economic situation and to meet development needs.

Yes, my hon. colleague, we have these deeply rooted qualities and we have also worked through partnerships, in co–operation and openly with a great variety of partners in Canada, the United States and other countries.

However, my hon. colleague, we are not attempting to give a history lesson, but we do have a very great deal of patience. Quebec has demonstrated that it has a lot of patience. Quebec has shown that it is a very peace loving nation. We have discussed this Canadian partnership for a very long time now. We have had repeated discussions about many areas of jurisdiction. One must consider that we have suffered heavy blows as a result of these discussions. You will remember that the greatest and most serious blow ever dealt to Quebec was the unilateral patriation of the constitution in 1982.

This unilateral patriation of the constitution, to remind you, followed a major debate in Quebec when honest people believed the speeches stating that a "no" meant "yes" to fundamental change to the system described as a partnership, involving give–and–take and co–operation, when they were told that a "no" meant "yes" to profound reform and to a serious re–affirmation of ties with Quebec. Quebec had the constitution rammed down its throat. Even though the National Assembly voted almost unanimously against patriation. There are limits.

Quebec nevertheless took the "beau risque". We tried to come back, to resume dialogue, to get back into the debate with a partner called Canada and the other provinces. We went through different stages. We survived the Charlottetown experience, we survived Meech, despite the many wounds they inflicted.

Partnership, openness and association with our neighbours are qualities that are still part of the make–up of Quebecers, but it is hard to conceive that association could coexist with renewal.

Yes indeed, dear colleague, Quebec, which will take on the qualities of a sovereign country, will be extremely interested in economic association. Please keep in mind one very important point regarding Quebec's trade balances with the other provinces. In 1989, Quebec bought goods and services for a total of $26 billion from Ontario, $2.2 billion from the Atlantic provinces and $5 billion from the Ottawa region alone. Trade links between these regions do exist.

Yes, dear colleague, we are prepared to work in partnership with friendly countries and in a spirit of openness, co–operation and collaboration, but only on the basis of economic association and only after we have established our sovereignty.

The Deputy Speaker: Dear colleague, I would ask you to address the Chair next time. This enables us to depersonalize the debate.

[English]

The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

The Budget

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, have we gone through 10 minutes with one question and answer? Did I misunderstand you?

The Deputy Speaker: The parliamentary secretary is correct. Perhaps that will be a record in this Parliament, that one question and one answer went about nine and a quarter minutes.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise you that I will be sharing my time with the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

It is my privilege to rise in the House today to participate in the budget debate. I compliment the Minister of Finance on a masterful budget the addresses the concerns of the business community, the international markets and the Canadian taxpayer. He has made great strides to bring our deficit under control and meet the targets we set in our election campaign. In 1996–97 we will reach the 3 per cent of GDP target we outlined.

• (1715)

Over the last few days a great deal of speculation about the budget has been replaced by some pretty confident and solid comments about the Canadian economy. They have been addressing the positives in terms of what we have seen in the budget.

Mr. John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Business, said that it was very believable and very credible. The powerful Canadian Manufacturers Association called the budget the first serious attempt at resolving Canada's books and balancing them properly. The Montreal based bank, the Laurentian Bank of Canada, led the way in cutting its prime rate by one–quarter of one per cent on budget night. Since then and through this week we have seen the Canadian dollar go to a solid 72 cents. At the same time most of our lending institutions announced that they would be cutting their lending rates from one–quarter to one–half per cent. Mortgage rates will be down.

What does this mean to the average Canadian taxpayer? It means that we will have more money in our pockets. Average Canadian taxpayers are making payments on loans and on mortgages. When they come up for renewal they will be paying less for borrowing that dollar. It is a positive point about the Canadian economy. It is the point that will create more spending, bring back consumer confidence and lead us to more jobs.

Over the past 10 years Canadians heard finance ministers Wilson and Mazankowski give budget speeches that promised to reduce the debt and the deficit. Their assumptions and targets were so far off base that year after year we fell well below the targets. They mismanaged the economy badly. When they were elected in 1984 the debt of the country was $168 billion. In nine short years from 1984 to 1993 they tripled the debt, going from $168 billion to $500 billion.

At the same time, the Canadian government under Wilson and Mazankowski had to keep interest rates high to attract the bulging demand for foreign capital. We as a country became more and more subject to foreign investors. We became more and more a country with rising foreign debt. As a result we needed a major change and the Canadian public was well aware of it. Our Liberal government when elected in 1993 set realistic, achievable goals.

This year's budget, with a total saving of $29 billion over three years, is realistic. It is achievable. As a result, because we based our budget on basic, realistic, achievable goals in our economy, we as a government will create a positive climate that will move forward in a very positive way. I forecast that not just three years down the line but in five years from today, by the year 2000, we will be looking at a no deficit budget. We will be looking at a balance sheet where we can start digging into the debt and reducing it.

What does the budget mean to the average Canadian taxpayer? As I said, money is going to be in their pockets through reduced interest and borrowing costs.

I have heard the opposition complain very bitterly that Canadian taxpayers will have to pay an excise tax on gasoline. Yes, we added 1.5 cents to the cost of a litre of gasoline. There is no question about that. I would suggest that when average Canadian taxpayers fill up their cars once a week they probably put 50 litres in their gas tanks. The increase will amount to 75 cents a week or the price of a cup of coffee. Would they rather pay the price of a cup of coffee and see their mortgage rates go down or, as Reformers would state, have absolutely no expenses? I do not see their logic. I do not see their reasoning. I have talked with a lot of Canadians and they are not upset by the 1.5 cents per litre increase.

• (1720)

There are, however, other people in this dimension. Over the last several months large corporations and banks have announced record profits in their businesses in Canada. They have been targeted to help reduce our deficit, as well they should be. Over the next three years we expect to generate $910 million from tax increases to very prosperous institutions. They as a group have been demanding that the government get spending under control, and they are the group that has a responsibility in helping us do so.

My riding of Essex—Kent in southwestern Ontario is very dependent upon agriculture for its livelihood. It is an industry that producers over half a billion dollars in the two counties of Kent and Essex that I represent. We are very mindful of the partnership between government and the agri–food industry working together in that sector.

The government in streamlining research has designated some areas as centres of agricultural excellence. In southwestern Ontario the Harrow Research Centre will become a national centre of excellence for research in the greenhouse industry and the food processing industry. Streamlining services in Harrow will centre the research where the high concentration of greenhouses and processing crops is. The value added and tax initiatives that very instrumental to Essex and Kent counties will help our economy a great deal.

In the Chatham area we will see an ethanol plant that will have a great impact on the economy. The plant is a result of a real desire on behalf of the government to improve value added production in Canada. The benefits of the initiative have great potential across the country. There are very serious concerns about MMT that is presently being used to boost the octane of most Canadian gasolines. Ethanol is far more environmentally friendly and will be the choice of Canadians in the future.

Liberals can take pride in our legacy of caring for people and ensuring that our seniors will be financially secure. Measures have been introduced to guarantee their incomes and to make certain that over time in the future they will have definite pension plans that will pay to support them. They can be sure that with the studies and discussions presently ongoing the old age security and guaranteed income supplements will remain. The government will remain committed to providing a fair, reasonable and equitable situation for them.

Cash transfers to the provinces have been questioned very much. I was a little appalled this morning when I saw Bob Rae on television complaining about Canadian support to the provincial government. Bob Rae, the premier of Ontario, has totally mismanaged the economy of Ontario. Between 1990 and 1994 the federal government increased its funding for Ontario hospitals, colleges and universities by 26 per cent, while Bob Rae only increased funding to hospitals, colleges and universities by 17 per cent.

What does that mean? It means that Bob Rae did not participate in those services as the federal government has and did not carry his fair share. He mismanaged the economy and downgraded services, accepting totally the transfers from the federal government but not spending them within the province with matching funds.

• (1725)

It has to be made clear in looking at the services that above all we are trying to make certain Canadians across the land get fair and equitable treatment.

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for members of the government. They talk about wanting to be fair and treating all regions of Canada fairly. I would like them to take another look at the budget and what they have really done to the Atlantic region.

The Atlantic region last time around took 27 per cent of all the cuts in the last budget and we have 8 per cent of the population. This time around someone has to tell me how they can justify taking away the freight rate subsidies to get our product to market. When they brought down the budget on Monday, 15,000 jobs were jeopardized in the Atlantic region. Members do not know this and backbenchers do not know this, but the Minister of Transport knows it. He made promises to the people in the Atlantic region. They held public meetings. Our people said they would give up ARFAA, the interprovincial subsidy, but that they must have the westbound one in order to keep working. They were led to believe the Minister of Transport agreed.

Does anyone know how they heard that the ARFAA and MFRAA were to be taken from them? They heard it from Peter Gzowski on CBC interviewing the Minister of Transport. I have a list of companies in the Atlantic region that will be affected. The Canadian Manufacturers Association wrote to the Prime Minister about the fact that there had been no dialogue from the Minister of Transport.

We want to be fair and responsible in the Atlantic region. I get tired of hearing people refer to us as have not provinces. Our people believe in the family unit and in work. They want to work.

What are they going to do for all the people in manufacturing? What are they going to do today? I represent a city that has a nuclear power plant and the largest privately owned oil refinery in Canada, and the government took away the weather office. Does the government not know what it is doing? I do not believe it does. This is a very serious situation.

I ask hon. members to revisit what they have done. What has happened to the Atlantic region is devastating to our people. The people are sitting at home today wondering what is going to happen tomorrow because they have not had all the bad news yet. They took the bad news the last time and said: "We are good Canadians. We will accept it". However we cannot accept any more.

I ask members to take another look at it. Where are the 31 members in government from the Atlantic region? Why are they not speaking out for good, honest people who want to work? That is all they are asking for. Government members say they will create jobs; we are still looking for them. They know our transportation costs have been increased by 40 per cent with what they have done by taking away the freight rate subsidies. They cannot compete. They are finished.

I ask hon. members to take another look at what they have done to the Atlantic region, a part of this country. They did not state that the St. Lawrence Seaway would no longer be ice free. When that project came into play it affected my international port. What will you do for the Atlantic region?

The Deputy Speaker: I ask all hon. members not to refer to other members as "you".

• (1730)

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, the question was a little longer than requires a brief reply.

The point to be made is that every region in this country has equal treatment in this budget. There has been a tremendous effort on behalf of the finance department, the minister and the government to make certain every section of this country does have fair and equal treatment.

It is interesting that the member did note that they are losing transportation payments. She was very upset about that. I remember the Mulroney government which took the At and East bill and destroyed travel in the east, in Ontario and all through eastern Canada. I certainly saw it destroy the economy of this country.

Jeffrey Simpson, who is really no friend to the Liberal Party, did support the Tory government and stated very clearly that if Wilson and Mazankowski under the Mulroney government had taken some reasonable action about the economy of this country in the 1980s we would not be in the problem we are today. It is a sin we are here. They created it and they got ripped by the Canadian public for it.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member for Saint John wondered where the 31 other Atlantic members were to speak on this budget. I am one of those members and I am proud to support this budget.

It is a very fair budget. It is a budget that responds to the needs of Canada, including Atlantic Canada. It is a budget that will build a strong foundation for future growth in Atlantic Canada and it is the budget that does what nine years of Tory government failed to do, which is the reason why it only has one member from Atlantic Canada in the House of Commons and only one other member in the House of Commons.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on the budget that was tabled on Monday. My remarks will come from two perspectives, as my experience as chair of the House of Commons committee which recently carried out extensive public hearings across Canada on the future of Canada's social programs and as an Atlantic Canadian.

For many, perhaps most of the hundreds of Canadians who appeared before our committee last fall, this budget and what would happen to social programs and to the historic federal commitment to social programs as a result of the growing preoccupation with the deficit was very much on their minds.

Many witnesses expressed suspicion that the comprehensive review of the social security system in Canada which they acknowledged was necessary was nevertheless being used as a smoke screen to slash spending on social programs as a way for the government to achieve its deficit targets.

They wondered about the choice of programs that were being included in this review. Why was the government not focusing more on tax expenditures, in particular about tax breaks to wealthy Canadians and corporations? Should they not be made to shoulder their fair share of the task of deficit reduction?

The report of the human resources development committee which I tabled in this House on February 6 paid careful attention to these concerns and had some specific recommendations for the Minister of Finance to consider as he prepared his budget.

In particular, we urged him to ensure that the balance of deficit reduction measures in his budget addressed the issue of tax fairness in Canada. As well, we urged the government to proceed with the reform of social programs as part of its jobs and growth agenda.

The country's difficult fiscal situation only makes the need to address the accumulated problems which have occurred in our social security system more and not less urgent. We did not say that there should never be any reduction in social spending in Canada. That would have been unrealistic in the current fiscal climate. What we did say was that savings in this area should be achieved as part of a fundamental, comprehensive reform to the system of social security in Canada.

• (1735)

It is one that would respond to today's social security needs like addressing the pressing problem of child poverty, fostering the kind of life long learning culture that will support employment and assist Canadians to find the kind of well paying jobs that have a future in this country and, most important, by stabilizing the overall finances of the federal government by removing the distortions and the disincentives that have grown up around government programs that have been built with the best of intentions for another era and by focusing the resources and the energies of government to those areas where government is best placed to be effected. In short, by getting government right.

The Government of Canada can provide the leadership and the fiscal framework needed to ensure that the social security system and the programs which Canadians across this country told the committee they were so proud of and were so necessary and so much defined our country would be preserved and enhanced for the future.

Does the budget that was released on Monday respond to the concerns of Canadians as reported by a committee? In large measure I believe it does. The committee urged the government to balance efforts to reduce the deficit with measures to promote tax fairness. This budget does that. For example, there are no increases to general income taxes, yet measures are taken to ensure that taxes that are owed are paid.

The large corporations tax is increased by 12.5 per cent and the existing corporations surtax from 3 to 4 per cent. In addition, banks and other large deposit taking institutions will pay a tax on capital, raising $100 million between now and October 1996.

The budget takes dead aim at the system of family trusts. All tax advantages that flow from the establishment of family trusts will be eliminated. The infamous amendment to the so–called 21–year rule that was introduced by the previous government to allow the wealthy to shelter tax through family trusts will be repealed.

In addition, the budget adopts a specific recommendation of the committee that would open up tax expenditures as well as direct expenditures of government to regular parliamentary scrutiny.

With the budget the government reaffirms its commitment to reform of the social security in Canada not as a reckless exercise in slashing programs but as an orderly and thoughtful process of renewal in full partnership with the provinces and in consultation with Canadians.

This budget makes no immediate cuts to the principle elements of the social safety net. What further spending cuts occur only begin in 1996–97 and then only once a framework for a renewed and reformed unemployment insurance system and the implementation of the Canada social transfer are fully in place. These reductions are less than the reductions that have been made in other areas of government. The social programs will have more room in a government which is more rationalized and where the fiscal part of the government is more organized.

The consolidation of the Canada assistance plan and the established program finance transfers into a uniformed block transfer to the provinces follow in the spirit of the committee's reports which recommended that the Canada assistance plan be made into a block transfer in order to give the provinces more flexibility and in order to design reformed and renewed ways of helping people who are on social assistance provide basic supports for their families, also to enhance their access to the job market.

In addition to that the committee also recommended that there be an enhanced effort toward working with the provinces to enhance the child tax credit, working income supplement and other measures that would be made in order to work together to provide more assistance to poor families with children.

• (1740)

In addition, the redesign of the unemployment insurance program announced with this budget is also something that is absolutely necessary. Our committee recommends ways in which the unemployment insurance program can be redesigned and rebuilt in order to foster employability, in order to promote lifelong learning, in order to allow Canadians to have access to the supports they need to get the jobs of the future.

As an Atlantic Canadian, particularly one who comes from a region where unemployment insurance and other social programs are a very important part and preoccupation, I know they realize there must be changes to this program in order to help Canadians get into the workforce and to help our people relinquish their dependence that has grown on unemployment insurance.

If we as Atlantic Canadians can participate in a renewed unemployment insurance system or an employment insurance system, which is really what it is all about, we could help to create a better foundation for our economy in Atlantic Canada, creating the kinds of jobs we need to have in order to have a stable future there.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I too was on the tour with the committee on social program reform with the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. There are some things he has not said, because what everyone talked to us about, everywhere, and the budget makes no mention of, is the matter of job creation.

One of the questions I would like to ask him is why the budget contains no objectives for job creation. There are criteria for the deficit. They decided that, to control the deficit, it had to be brought down to 3 per cent of the GDP. Why did the government not set objectives for itself in terms of job creation? There is nothing about that anywhere in the budget.

At the same time, we are told that banks are going to be taxed in the amount of $100 million. When, however, during the tour of the committee on social program reform, did people tell us that another $700 million should be cut from the unemployment insurance program? As for the block transfer, yes, a possible block transfer for social programs was recommended, but did the committee recommend cutting $7 billion in this area in the next two years? There is a difference between a block transfer and a transfer after cuts are made. There is a significant difference between the two, which I consider important.

I have another question and, in this regard, I can sympathize with the issue raised by the Conservative member who spoke earlier about transportation subsidies and the people who live in the east. It is true that they said: "They want to get us off unemployment insurance". Everyone in Canada knows that nobody goes on unemployment insurance for the fun of it. They are on it because of the way the economy is. At the same time, however, they said: "Give us a period of transition to do it".

Why did the government, in its transportation assistance program for the Atlantic region, not follow the recommendations made by the industry, by the people locally and by the economic development officers and why was there not a gradual decrease in these types of taxes, so that, in three or five years, a new economic situation could be achieved, over which the people in the community would have total control?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for his questions.

Firstly, many jobs have in fact been created since the government has been in office, more than 433,000 jobs have been created. These jobs were created thanks to the confidence the government has inspired across Canada, especially in the private sector, and the budget brought down by the finance minister on Monday evening will increase the confidence felt by the private sector, the business community, because the government is taking the necessary measures to tackle Canada's deficit directly, thereby creating jobs and lowering Canada's unemployment rate.

• (1745)

The targets the government has set its sights on are necessary to stabilize public finances and create jobs. We can see the effects already in the falling unemployment rate. Our program's objective is to create jobs.

Among the reforms suggested, we will have the opportunity to work on those relating to unemployment insurance. The new Canadian social transfer will allow the government of Canada, in conjunction with the provinces, to create a new social security net with a greater emphasis on employability.

To repeat, we are laying the foundations necessary for a strong Canadian economy which will result in new jobs being created throughout the country.

That is the government's strategy. We have forged ahead with it, it is working and it will continue to work.

[English]

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the various Liberal members who have spoken about this marvellous budget of theirs today only one thought comes to my mind, they do not understand fundamental arithmetic.

The Canadian people, the taxpayers, who have been funding all these programs that previous governments have put in based on election promises and credit card funding, have been saying that overspending has to stop. They want to see a balanced budget down the road. They want to see some tax relief down the road.

This red ink budget that the Liberals have delivered by 1997 will add another $100 billion to the debt and will increase the interest payments on that debt to some $51 billion to $52 billion. Can they not get it straight? It is the mountainous debt and the mountainous interest payments on that debt that are ripping the heart out of the social safety net of the country.

It is not enough today to nibble at the edges of overspending. We need a positive, progressive plan to decrease the deficit to a zero budget. That is what the Canadian people want. They will not get it from the government. It has not been listening to them.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ with the hon. member. We cannot start eliminating the debt until we start to get the deficit down. That is what the government is doing.

Does the hon. member actually believe that by slashing social programs in one fell swoop the deficit will be eliminated faster?

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we in the House should spare a moment of sympathy for the Canadians who, for unknown reasons, are watching the debate on television. We have members opposite saying that it is a wonderful budget, a visionary and perfect budget for the country. Then we have members of our party who are responding to the budget with grave concern and alarm. It is only fair for Canadians to know why there are real concerns about the budget.

It is true that the budget reduces the deficit. Unfortunately the budget and the so–called rolling targets that it contains substantially increase the interest burden. That is the real threat to social programs.

I do not think the finance minister should get a lot of credit for reducing the deficit. As a matter of fact, he had absolutely no choice. Not only are Canadians telling their political leaders that their number one concern is the debt and deficit, our creditors have been sending us strong, unmistakable messages that we had better get our fiscal act together. According to the Wall Street Journal Canada "has now become an honorary member of the third world in the unmanageability of its debt problem".

• (1750)

The debt is about $550 billion. By the time the government is finished with us it will be $650 billion. Where is a country like Canada going to be with that kind of debt loading down its future and its young people? Moody's has threatened to remove our coveted AAA bond rating. International lenders everywhere want assurance from the government that a $25 billion deficit is just an interim goal. In fact, the budget sets $25 billion as the goal. Then there is some very nice talk about good intentions down the road. The good intentions of the Liberals for the last 30 years have paved a lot of roads and they all lead down into the debt hole.

Our real concern, which Canadians share, is that the budget will have a profound effect on the future of social security. Contrary to popular belief, Reformers are going to get old. Some of us are quite close to that goal. Reformers get sick. Reformers have disasters strike them. Reformers become unemployed. We are very concerned about the security of every single Canadian. That is why we brought in a plan to stop the horrible interest drain on the social security resources.

The finance minister's refusal to deal with the financial mess that is being caused to social programs by ever–burgeoning interest payments is a missed opportunity for which all Canadians will pay a heavy price. Much of our social program spending is funded and has been funded for years on borrowed money. Every year we borrow money, and that has been every single year, unbelievably, for the last 25 or more years. We increase the size of our interest obligation.

Every increase in the amount we are forced to pay in interest decreases the amount we have left to fund the programs we offer to Canadians. The only hope we have to break this vicious cycle of higher interest payments and less cash for our programs is to quit borrowing. That is exactly what Reformers have proposed; to quite borrowing as fast as possible, in fact by the end of three years.

In order to quit borrowing, social program spending has to be reduced. That is because fully two–thirds of non–interest spending by the federal government is on the social side. Even if we virtually wiped out every other program and function of government, we would still barely balance the books.

Of course many essential government programs cannot be eliminated. Although there is some fat in other non–social spending government programs—and the taxpayers' budget starts by cutting government operations by a full 25 per cent for a $10 billion savings—simple arithmetic dictates that some spending reductions must take place on the social side.

Interestingly enough, even our human resources development minister has figured that out. On page 8 of his discussion paper, which as we know went nowhere, it states:

> —the interest costs on that debt are choking governments' ability to deliver services that the public needs and depends on—The larger the debt gets, the bigger the interest costs and the smaller the budget for services—The status quo is not an option.

That is the government's own minister. We have to ask ourselves why is status quo social spending precisely what the finance minister brags he has given us in the budget when another minister is saying that the status quo is not an option? The clue is in the rhetoric with which he has chosen to surround this sensitive issue.

• (1755)

Instead of providing a plan, the finance minister, like the human resources development minister, has again chosen to delay addressing Canada's ailing social programs, letting the cancer spread, letting the patient get sicker and sicker. Why? Because the Liberal government does not have the political guts and fortitude to do the job, to get social spending under control so that we can preserve social programs for the future.

The Liberal government, knowing full well that the future security of Canadian citizens is in peril, lacks the political fortitude to take bold and decisive steps to effectively address the issue. Even worse, not only are Liberals afraid to deal with the problems in this critical area, they work hard to make Canadians afraid to have it dealt with at all.

How do they do this? By telling Canadians again and again that any plan to safeguard the ability to provide long term security by some reductions in social spending today is too cruel, too heartless, too harmful even to consider. Anyone suggesting such a course of action is immediately set upon and labelled as lacking in compassion and uncaring about the poor and needy.

Clearly Liberals cannot honestly believe this to be true because they are saying, and I quote again from the human resources development minister's discussion paper: "The interest costs on the debt are choking government's ability to deliver services that the public needs and depends on". They know this. One can only conclude that the government is anxious to make a virtue out of what can only be termed a shameful failure to get a grip on its deficit spending habits.

We are treated to loud protests by members opposite. In fact, they can be heard even as I speak, in the background nattering on and on. Any suggestion of spending reductions on the social side, even though they clearly know that government must reduce its expenditures in all areas if we are to have any hope of curbing the interest haemorrhage from the national treasury, is cloaked in inaction with a lot of talk about their commitment to compassion, fairness and equity. However, Canadians are beginning to see through all this nice talk to the lack of substance within.

Nowhere is this made more clear than in last week's unveiling of the Liberal so–called reform of MP pensions. Canadians were treated to the unseemly spectacle of government ministers flatly refusing to lose a nickel of their incredibly rich pension benefits.

This year the Canadian government paid $42 billion in interest. Just think for a moment what we could have done with $42 billion to spend on the citizens of our country. It could have doubled all guaranteed income supplement payments to needy seniors. It could have cut income tax by 20 per cent. It could have given free tuition to 100,000 students. It could have provided $10,000 to 100,000 newly married couples for mortgage down payments. In addition, it could have totally eliminated the GST, something the Liberals promised to do. To put the icing on the cake, it would have paid to build a $500 million skydome in every province, including P.E.I.

We did not have that $42 billion because we had to pay it to the Liberal interest debt they have built up.

The real threat to social spending is Liberal borrowing and deficit. It is not changing in this budget. If not now, when? Canadians and their children will remember the 1995 federal budget as the one which could have and should have but failed to provide a plan to ensure personal security in the years ahead. That it failed to do so will be seen as one of the greatest tragedies of the 35th Parliament.

• (1800)

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague's comments. What she seems to ignore in her comments is the reaction from all the financial experts, both at home and abroad.

Almost universally the reaction to this budget from everyone except members of the Reform Party is very positive. In fact, in many glowing terms we hear how the finance minister has turned the corner on this country's debt and deficit problem. Yet the member says there should be no credit for the finance minister. I would remind the hon. member that for nine years the previous government was not able to meet its targets, yet this finance minister has done so two years in a row.

Quite frankly a misstatement was made that $25 billion is the ultimate goal of the finance minister. It is not even fair to say that on the floor of this House. The minister has been quoted publicly many times as stating that the ultimate goal is the total elimination of the deficit and debt. That is the ultimate goal. The minister has made that eminently clear. The research by the Reform Party seems to be awfully selective on these points.

Now to my question for the Reform Party member and the Reform members heckling as I speak. If there is such concern and compassion in the Reform Party for this country's social security system, why did the blue budget plan, the so–called taxpayers' budget of the Reform Party—if ever there was a misnomer that is one—slash so severely the seniors' pension plan? How can that be offered as some concern for the citizens of this country?

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the points raised by my hon. friend opposite because they are important issues to address. They are ones that hon. members opposite are always using to justify their position. It is important that Canadians know it does not do that.

First of all, the reaction of the financial markets was positive. It is kind of sad, is it not, that financial markets are so used to governments that do not do anything that there is great relief when there are any cuts in our borrowing.

Not only that, my friends who work in the financial industry tell me that financial markets discount government actions. They are way ahead of government. They are weeks ahead of government and they discounted this budget long ago. They did not do it the day after; they did it weeks before. That is how financial markets work. Those familiar with financial markets know that.

The hon. member brags that the government has reached its targets although previous governments have not. If you make your targets low, of course you will reach them. It is like a cigarette smoker who cuts back from two packs a day to a pack and a half and then says: "I am quitting smoking". He has a long way to go and so does this budget.

There is no plan to get to zero deficit in this budget. There is nice talk by the finance minister on the side that of course, yes, this is the ultimate goal. If it is a goal, there should be a plan. Instead, the government always refers to its red book target of a $25 billion dollar deficit which is huge.

Our plan is to cut social spending by $15 billion for the simple reason that if you do that, you get to zero borrowing. If you get to zero borrowing, the interest levels off. The interest gets flat. If you do not cut your borrowing, then the interest keeps rising. Once the interest levels off, you know you have the rest of your money to work with. However, if the interest keeps going up, then you have less and less money to work with every single year.

That is exactly what is going to happen under this plan. If members opposite think that cutting spending now to get to a zero deficit is bad, just wait until they see the cuts that will have to be made when our interest gets to $50 billion, $55 billion, $60 billion because this government will not take that kind of action.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the budget. It is a budget that in the opinion of those who get past the initial media kowtowing, the interest group moaning and the Liberal back slapping, is dishonest. It is overrated. It is underachieving and hypocritical. It fails to attack the efficiency and the internal wastefulness of the federal government.

This budget deserves no praise. It lacks will. It lacks solutions. It is not an answer. It is only prolonging the inevitable demise of our social programs, our financial security and our way of life, including that of our children.

What the finance minister has done is altogether typically Liberal. He has made some token reductions which he thinks will placate voters. He has increased taxes in such a way that taxpayers will not know they are being hit hard. Furthermore, he has done some things that, had they been done by any other party with the Liberals in opposition, would have caused the Liberals to explode in outrage and violent criticism. That is the hypocrisy of this budget.

The Reform Party's taxpayers' budget laid out a series of reasonable, manageable cuts to transfers and established programs financing, cuts that would ensure long term health and the continuation of these programs. The Liberals assailed us, as the hon. member is doing right now. They accused us of being heartless, of being uncaring, of bashing the poor. What is the Liberal alternative to this imagined Reform Party heartlessness?

The Liberals will double the fees of refugee claimants. That is really something. That is without a doubt the most blatant hypocrisy I have ever seen from this government or that party. They have done nothing in any promise for the future.

Look at what is going on within the department of immigration. Look at those increased fees that are coming. For a moment, look at the increased fees and the recipients of those fees, the immigration department. If you take an honest look, you will come away with a very different impression about the seriousness of this government, the willingness of this government and the party across the aisle to make real change. You will come away with a very different impressior of the will of that party and the intestinal fortitude of the finance minister and especially the immigration minister.

There are two reasons the finance minister together with the immigration minister have decided to increase fees. One is stated and the other is not.

The stated reason is to raise revenue to offset the cuts. In other words, they want to bring more money into the coffers. Charge a little more up front and recover more of the costs of processing and resettlement, as the minister points out. Fair enough. Why should those who apply for immigrant status not pay their way? We are not objecting to that.

There is no good reason for the taxpayer to subsidize the processing of immigrant applications. Remember that if any other party had done this, the Liberals would have fallen all over themselves moaning about taxing the poor, charging more to those who are unable to pay.

The other reason for almost doubling the fees, the unstated reason that observers from both sides of the immigration debate recognize, is to quietly cull a certain percentage of the applicants for immigration. Changing the immigrant mix is a good idea certainly. Both the C.D. Howe Institute and the Fraser Institute agree with the Reform Party that we need to do that. However, doing it this way is cowardly and devious on the part of the Liberals.

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. Hanger: Because you are not stating the reasons.

The immigration minister has had all sorts of opportunities to make changes to immigration that make sense and that are honest but he will not do it. He has had every opportunity to save the Canadian taxpayers a huge amount of money through immigration reform. He did not do it. He would not. He does not have what it takes. If the minister wanted to save money for the taxpayer, he would have saved literally hundreds of millions of dollars by taking some advice from the Reform Party on refugee determination in Canada.

A month ago, we released our proactive proposals for refugee determination. Those proposals, if enacted, would ensure that the refugee system was more fair to genuine refugees. That was our first goal. The proposal would have ensured that the system was more fair to the taxpayer by cutting back on legal aid and social services for people who had been refused as refugees and were appealing.

• (1810)

We proposed that the Immigration and Refugee Board, that $80 million a year hotbed of patronage, pork and foolish decision making be abolished. We proposed that a refugee determination system, which presently costs $1 billion or more a year to determine a handful of claims, be fundamentally restructured to reduce the number of bogus claims. Accept more genuine refugees from abroad. Doing so would have saved the taxpayers millions of dollars, but the minister would not hear of it.

Here is a short list of some other costs the immigration minister has been afraid to deal with. The total cost of the department has gone up from $581 million to $592 million. Do you call that cost cutting? The corporate service budget has increased from $33 million to an unbelievable $78 million. Is that the minister's idea of government efficiency, to double the budget in one year?

The cost of failed sponsorship is $700 million. Welfare for refugees as estimated in the Vancouver Sun a few days ago is $600 million. Teaching English or French and other settlement services for new immigrants costs $450 million. Quebec's gold plated immigration settlement program costs $90 million. No adjustments are made there at all, one year after another.

On top of all that the justice department will spend an additional $11.6 million on immigration and refugee cases. The Federal Court will spend an additional $11.9 million on handling refugee cases. The RCMP will have to allocate an additional $2.3 million to clean up the messes made by lousy immigration policies. There is $60 million in legal aid.

Of course, there was last year's stupid expenditures: $2,000 for a pizza party hosted by the minister; $2,000 for bookmarks with the minister's photo on them; $100,000 for office furniture for one member in the IRB; another $100,000 for a golden handshake to get rid of that member.

In light of all of these numbers, the increased user fees are just a drop in the bucket. Until this government and this immigration minister come to terms with the fact that Canada's immigration and refugee programs are so lax, so broad, so inefficient and so ridiculously generous as to cost Canadians up to $3 billion a year to accept and settle refugees and immigrants, we are just wasting time.

The government is tilting at windmills. If this government really wants to fix the immigration budget it should not jack up fees before it gets on top of the real problem: Liberal immigration policy. That is the problem.

I say to the people of Canada, to the media, to interested observers of Canada's immigration system around the world, that before they congratulate the finance minister and the immigration minister for taking tough action to fix a tough problem, before this back slapping gets too intense, tell me what is wrong with this picture.

A refugee claimant has just been paid $1,000. Now he sits before an $85,000 a year patronage appointee. Each hour of hearing and preparation time is being run up as a profit by his legal aid attorney. His acceptance is virtually guaranteed since the IRB is little more than an $80 million a year rubber stamp. If he is sick, there are no worries, he has a health card.

In the extremely unlikely event that he is found not to be a refugee, there are no worries. He will just ring up a few more hours for his legal aid attorney, appeal to the taxpayer funded courts, get another hearing before another $85,000 a year IRB member. After this charade has been carried on for three years, the minister gives him an automatic amnesty. It is not a bad deal for $975. Most of us would not even get inside the courtroom door for $975. The refugee claimant and his lawyer can tie up our courts for three years.

This is no exaggeration. Members may not like the illustration. They do not like it because they know it is true. The most tragic aspect of that scenario is that all the time this charade is being played out at the taxpayers' expense, the UN tells us that the most genuine refugees from overseas are being systematically ignored by countries like Canada. Refugees we could process more easily and far more cheaply are being ignored. These are genuine refugees.

People may start realizing now how much of an opportunity there was in 1995 to really rethink government and make fundamental changes. They will realize what a golden opportunity there was to make things work better. Then they will wake up to what was not done and they will be sorely disappointed.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 6.15 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

(The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:)

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on February 10, I asked the Minister of Justice if he would ban two new hyper–destructive handgun bullets developed in the United States. One of these bullets was designed to do maximum damage to human tissue, while the second could penetrate body armour. We are told this rhino ammunition, as it is called, is designed to break into thousands of razor–like fragments when it hits flesh. The creator of these bullets stated that: "These fragments become lethal shrapnel as they are hurled into vital organs, lungs, circulatory system components, the heart and other tissues. The wound channel becomes catastrophic and death is nearly instantaneous".

• (1850)

I was pleased with the answer given to me by the Minister of Justice when he told the House that these two new types of ammunition had been banned in Canada. However this incident reminded us that if we are serious about gun control, we must also control ammunition. Without ammunition, you cannot do too much damage with guns.

It is especially important when you consider that 65,000 guns have been lost or stolen since 1974. The RCMP report that about 3,000 are lost or stolen each year. If you cannot get the ammunition with which to use a stolen gun, then you might be preventing a crime from taking place. That is why it is so important to control ammunition.

I would like to ask the government tonight whether in the new legislation which is before the House—I have examined the said legislation—it is correct that in order to buy ammunition in the future, a person will require a firearms possession certificate or a firearms registration certificate.

I ask this because in some of the publicity material accompanying the bill, there was a suggestion that a person might be able to buy ammunition simply with a driver's licence. I could not accept that but since it will be necessary to obtain a firearms possession certificate or require one to own, use or purchase a gun then I do not see why it could not be presented as well when purchasing ammunition.

I would like to have some clarification on that.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last December newspapers reported that a United States company had produced two highly destructive bullets; the black rhino, a plastic bullet allegedly capable of piercing armour and the rhino–ammo, a highly fragmenting bullet designed to cause maximum damage to human tissue.

Government officials have been in contact with U.S. officials and in fact the black rhino does not exist and technical experts highly doubt that an armour piercing plastic bullet could be produced.

As regards the rhino ammo bullets, the potential destructiveness was highly inflated and in fact they resemble hollow point bullets currently available in the United States markets and under limited conditions in Canada.

Armour piercing and exploding or incendiary cartridges are now prohibited in Canada and have been since October 1, 1992 under prohibition order number 10. The possession, sale or import of such ammunition is subject to Criminal Code penalties of up to 10 years.

I want to particularly address the question of the hon. member with respect to how ammunition is to be purchased. To purchase ammunition, it will be required to have the registration certificate once the registration certificate period of five years ending December 31, 2003 has elapsed.

Until then everybody may not have a registration certificate. In the interim, where possible it will be the requirement to provide another certificate, a driver's licence or perhaps a firearms acquisition certificate. This is yet to be determined exactly but there will be requirements.

This will be brought forward and stipulated in the regulations.

TOURISM

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to expand on my question of February 24 to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry on the matter of tourism.

Tourism plays a major role in the lives of my constituents on the south shore of Nova Scotia. It is important that tourism continue to be promoted as it is serving to revitalize communities that have been devastated by the downturn in the fishery.

• (1855)

In the South Shore tourism generates $100 million annually while providing employment for thousands of people. It is an industry that can and will play a leading role in the economic recovery of my area.

For instance, in 1994 the South Shore experienced a 20 per cent increase in room sales. This was the largest percentage increase in Nova Scotia. More than 127,000 people signed guest books at the South Shore tourist bureaus. This represented an increase of 19 per cent over 1993. The South Shore is popular but it has potential to be even more so. I say this because 30 per cent of visitors were from inside the province of Nova Scotia, 29 per cent were from other parts of Canada, 28 per cent were from the United States and 5 per cent were international visitors.

There is so much to see and do along the South Shore. I am partial to the charms of Chester, having chosen to settle down there over 20 years ago. There is colourful Lunenburg, home of the Bluenose and the Fisheries Museum of the Atlantic currently seeking a designation of world heritage status. There is Oak Island with its hidden treasure which is celebrating its 200th anniversary this year.

In Queens county there are spectacular white sandy beaches and several ecotourism sites, including the Keji seaside adjunct and the bird sanctuary in Port Joli. These treasures have been left largely untouched for the public to enjoy. At the western end of my riding is Shelburne with its historic waterfront which is gaining a good reputation as a destination for movie makers.

As a representative for an area like the South Shore, I am sure members can understand that I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister announce last fall that he had accepted the recommendations made by his special advisor on tourism. The creation of the Canadian tourism committee and the allocation of base funding totalling $50 million certainly has the potential to allow for effective marketing of Canada at home and abroad. I do, however, have some concerns about how this is all going to work.

First, in addition to the very successful South Shore Tourism Association, there are many local tourism committees that have been established to formulate strategies to increase the amount of tourism traffic in their respective areas. I am constantly being asked if and how they can access this tourism promotion money. I am having difficulty answering these questions because that has never been made clear. Media reports make it sound like there is a pot of money for these people to access. Yet the material I have received is vague on how the money will be allocated.

Second, I would be interested to know how the Canadian tourism commission will benefit rural areas like mine when to date efforts seem to be rather metro driven. Will the interests of small businesses, which comprise a large proportion of the tourism industry, be appropriately represented?

Finally, I am concerned about an overlap of effort. The Canadian tourism commission seems to be just a larger scale version of the Atlantic Canada tourism partnership which was established in late 1993. I would hope that these groups will be working together rather than at cross purposes.

In closing, I would like to reiterate that I support the intent behind the establishment of this commission. Because I have seen the positive benefits that tourism can have in an area, I want to see Canada eliminate its tourism deficit. However, first I want specifics on how this will be done.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for South Shore for his question and also his keen interest in a sector of our economy that has been sadly neglected over the last 10 to 15 years.

The tourism industry is a sector of our economy which, after automotive, employs more Canadians than any other sector. This government has made a serious commitment to not only maintaining but virtually quadrupling the tourism budget.

We did not just quadruple the budget, we also gave guidelines and said to the Canadian tourism commission that we wanted this money to be levered, joint ventured. In other words, it is not Industry Canada and the tourism team going out and doing work on their own. It is this commission which is made up of private sector experts from the tourism industry from all over Canada. The Minister of Industry appointed these people on February 1.

I have to say to the member for South Shore that this is a new commission and no doubt there will be some glitches until we get it operating perfectly. If the member, in his community of South Shore, is having difficulty in partnering or accessing his tourism operators with the commission, I would invite him to come to the House of Commons industry committee. About two weeks from now the executive of the Canadian Tourism Commission will appear before the committee. We will deal with the overall plan and objectives but, more important, we will deal with the specific concerns and the specific challenges the member for South Shore raised this evening.

I do not want to suggest that at the moment the commission has all of the answers. It is a new commission. It is a new experiment where we are partnering with the private sector.

However I invite the member to the committee. His specific concerns will be addressed. There is great hope for this sector putting Canadians back to work, which is the number one responsibility of the government.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise now at the end of the day to point out that, in my question of February 28, I spoke of the gross injustice in the budget which the Minister of Finance brought down this Monday.

To clearly define this injustice, I would like to repeat part of the question I put to the Hon. Minister of Finance this week. My question was for the finance minister and was more or less as follows: Yesterday, the finance minister announced that grain transportation subsidies would be eliminated, adding that a generous compensation of close to $3 billion, which includes direct subsidies, would be given to western producers.

I have done some research since then and have in fact found that grain producers in the west, and only in the west, would be offered between $15 and $18 per acre, or an average of some $15,000 to $18,000 per grain producer.

Of course, the Crow rate was intended for grain transportation from point A to point B, with point B located near the ocean, most often in Vancouver. Looking again at WGTA issue, we found that many producers stockpiled their grain in railway hopper cars. The railway cars went to Thunder Bay to be eligible for the subsidy before returning to Vancouver. This was costly to the government.

I would like to talk about the unjust and unfair way that farmers in the east of the country have been treated. On the one hand, the government cuts $560 million in subsidies to farmers in the west and, to clear its conscience, offers them a compensation package of close to $3 billion to help them diversify their crops; on the other hand, in the same budget, it trims industrial milk subsidies by 30 per cent.

I did my math and realized that a 30 per cent cut will result in losses. As we all well know, Quebec and Ontario produce 80 per cent of Canada's industrial milk and the cut will result in losses of anywhere from three to five thousand dollars. What compensation will farmers in the east get from the Liberal government? None.

This inequity in the budget is noteworthy, and I expect an explanation now and not a canned response.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to comment on the question of the member for Frontenac.

Yes, the annual $560 million western grain transportation subsidy is being completely eliminated on August 1. However I point out to the hon. member—and I know he realizes it—that the dairy subsidy is only being reduced by 15 per cent this year and 15 per cent next year. As of August 1, 85 per cent of that support will still be there.

Eliminating the so–called Crow subsidy addresses a long-standing equity concern that has been raised by eastern farmers. The adjustment package reflects the potential impact of eliminating a 96–year old commitment to the western grain sector.

In addition to the $1.6 billion, a multi–year adjustment package of $300 million is being put in place to facilitate the transition to a more efficient transportation system. The amount is not excessive. It is necessary to help grain producers adapt to the change and to compete effectively in international markets against subsidized foreign competition.

It is important to note the dairy industry does not face international competition because of supply management for 90 per cent of its production. Equally important, this government package of reforms to grain transportation is consistent with the position set out by the Quebec coalition on the WGTA.

The package of reforms is fair and balanced with respect to the different situations in different regions and different sectors. Everyone has done his or her share in contributing to deficit reduction. The government does not have a double standard as the hon. member for Frontenac has suggested. It is not true.

Rather, through the budget we offered all Canadians a single standard to strive for that will ensure future growth of the agriculture sector and maintain our competitiveness on the global field.

PETITIONS

MINING

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions today.

The first with 184 signators is a petition of the mining industry calling on Parliament to take action that will help the mining industry to grow and thus improve employment in this sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the next petition has 32 signators.

The petitioners request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the third petition has 37 signators. They request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley for export.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition on behalf of 213 Calgarians which I understand is one of several that has been presented to equal 64,000 names.

It calls on the government to toughen the Young Offenders Act. Many Canadians share the view that the act is not meeting its main objective of deterring young people from committing crimes.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition to table asking that Parliament not revoke section 241 of the Criminal Code and to continue to forbid assisted suicide and euthanasia.

The petition is signed by 223 signatories, bringing the total signatures thus far to 23,186.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour on behalf of the constituents of Vegreville and Alberta to table petitions in the House.

The petitioners request that Parliament amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act to deter young people from committing crime and making the Young Offenders Act tough enough to provide real justice. I understand several petitions are being presented totalling approximately 64,00 signatures.

• (1010)

I would also like to recognize Caroline Balisky of Concerned Citizens for her work in compiling these petitions.

BILL C-41

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Madam Speaker, I am presenting a petition today on behalf of 62 petitioners from the Yukon.

They call for the deletion of section 718.2 in Bill C-41. The petitioners feel this section gives undue attention and unequal treatment on the basis of sexual orientation.

I would also add respectfully, that I personally do not agree with this petition. In fact, the Yukon Human Rights Code gives more rights to people.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions to present.

The first is signed by constituents of Capilano—Howe Sound requesting that the House ensure the enforcement of the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting doctor assisted suicide and that Parliament make no changes in support of euthanasia.

BILL C-41

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the second petition asks the House to exclude the phrase sexual orientation from Bill C-41.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the third petition is a very thick set of papers. The petitioners urge strongly that the House reduce spending rather than increase taxes.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 31, it is my pleasure to present a petition of some 55 pages.

It states that since Canadians from coast to coast are calling for changes to the Young Offenders Act, the petitioners want the act changed to become serious enough to deter young people from committing crimes and tough enough to provide real justice.

Therefore, they request and pray that Parliament will amend the Criminal Code of Canada and the Young Offenders Act of 1992 to comply with this petition.

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of almost 2,500 Alberta residents, the majority of whom are from Yellowhead.

The petitioners request that Parliament amend the Young Offenders Act so that it is tough enough to provide real justice to deter young people from committing crimes.

This petition is one of several from Alberta totalling approximately 64,000 names.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1995–96

Hon. Sergio Marchi (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–73, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this historic budget debate, specifically Bill C–73, which will give borrowing authority and put into effect the measures announced by the government and the Minister of Finance on Monday evening.

I start by paying tribute to my colleague and friend, the Minister of Finance, whose budget is cradled in that wellspring of traditional Canadian thought and liberalism, compassion and integrity. His statement reflects both those important values and principles. It is a clear example of the difference between management and leadership. A manager only imitates, while a leader initiates.

• (1015)

Everyone in this country has a part to play in this economic plan, in this blueprint. We are all making sacrifices. Those who work in the public service across our country; the farmers who work the land; those who fish the seas; business people who run our shops and factories; and Canadian families every day of the week across this country, all of them are making sacrifices. That is an important principle of the fairness and equity which provides a sturdy foundation to the budget put before this Chamber by the Liberal government.

Newcomers to the Canadian family will also contribute their share to this process of nation building in the form of a landing fee, not a head tax. The landing fee will be put toward the services that help them integrate into Canadian society.

This fee is not a barrier at our borders but simply a fee that is fair and just. It is not meant to control or regulate those who come to Canada. Rather it is an effort to secure the value and tradition of settlement integration programs in Canada. It is uniquely Canadian and very much different from how things are done in the United States for instance where there is no settlement, no integration and no language training.

I ask what cost a society pays for not having a system up front that not only welcomes newcomers but integrates them into the Canadian family and then sees them flourish and move upward. Newcomers can be business people, business leaders, members of Parliament, social workers, professors, Canadians like all of us. That is the difference and it is unique to this country. This government feels it is worth the price of preserving a system that not only works for the newcomers but works for this country.

How we deliver those services will be the subject of ongoing discussions with our partners in the provinces, the municipalities and the non–governmental organizations who help deliver those settlement services. And yes, there will be discussions with those who need and would make use of those services.

It is within the context of fairness and the necessity for compassion, integrity and the need to do things better and still show fiscal responsibility that this government moves forward. Today, the government is announcing a plan to streamline Canada's process for identifying refugees who need this country's protection. In doing so, the refugee determination system will become fairer, faster and more cost effective. Canada needs these changes.

The immigration and refugee discussion is one of the more controversial and difficult public policy issues faced in this Chamber and across the country. We all hear it. We discuss it in our riding offices, in the coffee shops or on the steps of our places of worship.

This planet is awash with people on the move. Yes, I know that in the dry environment of statistics it is very easy to pluck numbers from tables, charts and graphs. However, when the United Nations catalogues the movement of more than 125 million people in one year and notes that of these, 23 million happen to be refugees, the human mind balks and stutters at the numbers. The more staggering the figure, the more difficulty we have in comprehending it.

Let me put it into perspective. We are talking about five metropolitan Torontos, ten Vancouvers. Even more simply, more than three times the entire population of Canada is on the move worldwide every year. Of course, these are not just numbers; they are men, women and children. The vast majority of refugees indeed are women and young children.

• (1020)

Refugees are the unfortunate but horribly logical consequence of a world wrestling with overpopulation, underdevelopment and politics coming from the end of a machete or out of the barrel of a gun.

There are those within the sound of my voice who by utterance, deed or innuendo have tried to make refugee a dirty word. This government and I believe the Canadian people will have none of that. Why? Because it touches on our national soul, our very sense of ourselves as a nation and as a people. So we ask ourselves: Who is that refugee? Who is that stranger among us?

Make no mistake. Canada has greeted refugees just two steps ahead of the death squads. They are people like the brave women who testified against war criminals and war atrocities in the Balkans. Otto Jelinek who served with honour in the cabinet of previous governments was a refugee. I look across the aisle at the critic from Her Majesty's loyal opposition, a refugee from Chile.

Refugees seek Canada for protection, not for charity. Canada has a record in which we can all take pride. At the same time let us not sound too altruistic because there has been a major benefit to Canada as well. We should never forget that this is very much a win–win situation. Canada is good to immigrants and refugees seeking a home, but those newcomers and eventual Canadian citizens of all persuasions are equally loyal and fiercely defend this country from sea to sea.

Yes, we want to continue to be humanitarian but we also refuse to be taken for granted. Our focus was, is and will be on resettlement. We reject outright the standards of some nations where ethnic backgrounds and ethnic backgrounds alone allow access to citizenship. That would never be the Canadian way.

Today, if we take a breath and look at the world around us, there can be some cause for worry and concern. We are vulnerable to the pressures from outside our control which can overwhelm and swamp our immigration and refugee processing systems with very little advanced warning or notice.

Canada is not alone. At this moment, western Europe is pulsating with people on the move. The figures are mind boggling. In 1993 for instance, Germany received 425,000 refugees seeking a roof over their heads. Last year the Netherlands took in 55,000 refugees. The U.S. has millions of illegal residents and has a backlog of 425,000 refugee claimants.

The world needs to work together. Quite frankly, it needs to work together in a better and more interconnected way so that we can come to grips with this massive migration, not exclusively to one country or a few countries, but all over the globe.

• (1025)

That is one reason Canada is working diligently to reach an agreement with the United States and other nations. It would stop or discourage so–called asylum shopping while maintaining and ensuring protection for those in need.

Just last week we moved closer to that reality. Our Prime Minister and the President of the United States announced an accord to improve border management. Within six months, we are to pursue negotiations on a memorandum of understanding between our two countries built on the integrity of our system and protection for those who deserve it.

An integral part of our refugee policy and program is the Immigration and Refugee Board. Since its creation in 1989 the board has evolved and matured. Its goals are to identify those in need of Canada's protection as convention refugees and to adjudicate as well all immigration appeals and inquiries.

The board's challenge has been to do that fairly and effectively in the face of changing world conditions. The IRB decision making process operates at arm's length from government. We intend to maintain it just that way.

There has been criticism directed at the board. There is no attempt on my part here today to minimize or downplay the worries or concerns of our fellow citizens.

[Translation]

This government has made changes and adjustments to Canada's refugee policy. We recently improved the adjustment assistance program.

You also probably know that at one time refugee claimants were not allowed to work while awaiting processing. Our government changed that last year in order to alleviate the burden on social services.

In addition, we are working with a number of municipalities to prevent duplication of services and multiple claims. This House recently gave third reading to Bill C–44, which will provide us with the means to address the case of criminals who, while few in number, have the potential to undermine our Canadian system.

[English]

Canadians must have faith in their system. This government has listened to their concerns and we have moved quickly, but those changes are not enough.

First, the report by Professor James Hathaway signalled a commitment to change, to improvements. In response a number of administrative and management changes will be announced tomorrow by the chairperson of the IRB as she is responsible and justifiably so, for the day to day management and operations of the IRB.

Because of the importance of this entire issue it might be an opportune time for the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration to invite the chair of the IRB to meet with them. They could not only explore and discuss some of the changes and adaptations that she and the IRB will be announcing tomorrow, but they could also look into the workings of the board in the fulsome of time and study.

Second, there are a number of policy and legislative changes that the government will make to the Immigration and Refugee Board. This is a straightforward matter of getting government right. There has been agency and program review and the IRB is part of that. Part of my job is to detail the policy and legislative changes to the IRB which we believe are needed to make it run more effectively and make better use of the taxpayers' dollars, while maintaining the integrity of the Canadian borders.

The government realized there was concern over methods of appointments to the board and to some extent over the quality and consistency of the decisions. We also knew that the in Canada refugee determination system had to be streamlined to keep pace with both fiscal restraint and world developments. It is our belief there is a remedy at hand which involves both policy and legislative changes.

In this regard the government has decided to reduce the panel size for refugee hearings from two board members to one. The reduction in the refugee division members from 175 to approximately 112 will lead to an annual savings of almost $6 million. Consistent with the strategic plan that I announced in November in the House, the savings will be targeted to helping refugees.

The appointment process for panel members has been cause for some concern. Again the government recognizes this point and as a result we have decided to establish an independent advisory committee to examine the qualification of all candidates for the Immigration and Refugee Board. The advisory committee will ensure that only qualified candidates are recommended to the government for appointment. The committee will be responsible for ensuring that a balance is met between the board's objective standards and an increasing public demand for more political accountability.

We want the top candidates for the job. It is mandatory that the best people are named to the board, because the reduction in panel size requires unquestioned and unflinching competence from every board member. This new process will be applicable to new appointments in the future.

I am also pleased to announce that Gordon Fairweather has agreed to be the chairperson of the advisory committee. As a former Conservative member of Parliament, chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board and international human rights advocate, we believe he is ideally suited for the job.

Today the government is also filling two vacant and key positions at the Immigration and Refugee Board, that of deputy chair and executive director. The new deputy chair will be Mr. John Frecker, while the duties of the executive director will be assumed by Mr. Jean–Guy Fleury.

As I mentioned earlier, there are savings in the new procedure. Our target date for full implementation is January 1996. We expect to realize annual savings of $5.7 million by 1997. In the estimates before the House and its committees, the IRB has also put on the table savings of some $6 million in addition to the savings I have announced today.

The board is not only part of the program and budget review process. It is also sensitive that it too must become a partner in putting the finances of the country first and the integrity of the system on the same level playing field. Most of the money will be utilized for settlement of refugees from abroad. We can see that this is not a project merely to camouflage cost savings so government can pocket the money.

I have a real sense that although they mean well some would build walls and allow only hand–picked refugees into our country. It is our obligation under the Geneva convention not to send back legitimate refugees. This is a country and this is a government which live up to their obligations. We are good citizens of the world and world leaders. It is not me as minister bragging that we are world leaders; it is people around the globe and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees telling us.

• (1035)

Three days ago I met with Mr. Chefeke, director of the UNHCR bureau for all the Americas, and apprised him of the government's plans. I am pleased to confirm that he is very supportive of the changes we are bringing forward this morning. Canada and the UNHCR have long been partners and friends. It has always been thus and it will continue to be that way.

In closing, let me hearken back to the Governor General's installation message when he asked us to give good news a chance. His Excellency noted that we were all immigrants to this land; it was just that some came sooner than others. He paid special tribute to the refugees of recent years and special tribute to the communities that opened their arms and their hearts and adopted the refugees. He told us how they came with their hands empty, forlorn of everything except their hopes, and how through effort and hard work they flourished.

More of these people will come. We have the will and we have the way.

Mr. Bellehumeur: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, because the minister used his speech— I did not interrupt out of politeness—on Bill C–73, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995, to make announcements—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Madam Speaker, at least let me finish.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order. I just want to advise the hon. member that, speaking on a bill dealing with such matters as borrowing authority, the government can raise just about any issue directly or indirectly related to public finances.

The hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Hermanson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Standing Orders have some descriptions of Statements by Ministers. What we have just heard more aptly fits the description of a ministerial statement under citations 348 and 349.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): As I stated earlier, on a bill such as Bill C–73 respecting the borrowing authority, the government may discuss any of its dossier.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I wish to respond very briefly to the point of order.

The Chair is quite correct. The government does not attempt by a point of order to censor opposition or any criticism toward a government borrowing bill either to increase or decrease expenditures, alter them, initiate a government program, cancel one and so on, or advocate any such change. Similarly when a government member, a member of the ministry or another member, speaks on the borrowing bill he or she has exactly the same latitude as an opposition member would have.

You are quite correct, Madam Speaker, in the way you have assessed it. It is definitely the way such bills have been handled in the past.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Before giving the floor to the hon. member, I would remind the House that a bill respecting borrowing authority is indeed a continuation of our budget debate.

[English]

Unless the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster is seeking the floor on another point of order I will continue with debate.

• (1040)

Mr. Hermanson: Madam Speaker, I am agreeing with your position. What I am asking is for unanimous consent of the House to allow a 10–minute question and comment period in light of the fact that this was more along the lines of a ministerial statement where there is a chance for the opposition parties to respond.

I believe the government would be open enough to allow a question and comment period. I am just asking for unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House has heard the request by the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster. Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: I am entitled to have the floor to ask questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order. The Chair has ruled on this point of order. Is the hon. Opposition Whip rising on a separate point of order?

Mr. Duceppe: Madam Speaker, just a comment. I think that you are quite right: the minister was in order. It is just that what he did lacks class. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, but this is not a point of order.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Madam Speaker, I apologize for the frog in my throat this morning.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order. The hon. member for Joliette has the floor.

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, thank you for your support. My voice being as it is this morning, I will have to ask my hon. colleagues to please be as quiet as possible if they want to be able to hear me.

When the budget is tabled at about this time every year, it always raises either fears or hopes in the population, some interest groups, the financial community and all walks of life depending on what is perceived as an improvement in our personal circumstances and whether individuals or organizations consider the latest budget will increase their tax burden or make their lives more difficult.

And each year, since Parliament was established I guess, the opposition has raised numerous questions during this budget preparation period to try to provide guidance to the government and point out where we would not want the budget to hit our most disadvantaged taxpayers. So, representations have been made for as long as there has been governments.

In the past 30 years however, this budget preparation period has become, in Canada and most provinces, but even more so in Quebec, a much greater source of anxiety because expectations are high. There is always a chance the federal government will use the budget to decentralize powers to the provinces and to give them the tax points that go with these powers, so that the provinces can better set their priorities, be it in education, occupational training, public health or social programs.

Finally, this whole period lets us hope for a better future. Unfortunately, budgets rarely come up to everyone's expectations and this one is no exception. Indeed, while some members of our society, some groups were reportedly pleased with the budget measures, others felt short–changed.

• (1045)

In any case, if I had to sum up the level of satisfaction derived from the budget, I, for one, would say first of all that the federal budget cuts in the wrong places. It launches a full–scale attack against the most disadvantaged and slashes social programs, unemployment insurance and the public service. It hardly touches the wealthiest, for example by sparing tax shelters and profits made by banks and large corporations. It does not cut deeply enough in places where fat remains, such as National Defence, business subsidies and duplication.

Second, it is easy to see that there is nothing at all for employment development in this budget. There are no recovery measures or job training. On the contrary, they are using the infrastructure program put in place last year by the same Liberal government to backtrack and reduce municipal subsidies.

In summary, it could be said that this budget is generally unfair, especially for Quebecers, in particular in the agricultural sector, in the area of national defence, and in terms of deficit decentralization and its impact on Quebec's economy.

In the few minutes available to me, I will elaborate on each of these points to try to explain how we arrived at this conclusion.

I said that the government picks on the most disadvantaged, as shown by its handling of social programs. The federal government contributes to social programs by transferring money to the provinces. Between 1994–95 and 1997–98, transfers for social assistance, health care and post–secondary education will go down from $17.3 billion to $10.3 billion. This 40 per cent cut will have a devastating impact on the most disadvantaged.

Next year, Quebec will lose $350 million, and cuts in transfers for post–secondary education could raise tuition fees by over 60 per cent and threaten free college education in Quebec, since the bill is always picked up by the taxpayer. In the short term, these increases would restrict access and lead to low education levels among the poorest, who cannot afford such exorbitant tuition fees.

As far as unemployment insurance is concerned, again this year, the government is cutting UI by 10 per cent. New legislation in the fall will once again slash UI by tightening eligibility requirements and reducing insurable amounts.

These drastic measures will hit those members of society who have trouble finding jobs and may well have to turn to provincially–funded social assistance if they no longer qualify for UI.

• (1050)

This is another form of offloading, since the government takes a UI beneficiary and sends him to the welfare roll. Of course, this means that the person comes under another jurisdiction, since unemployment insurance is a federal program, while social assistance is a provincial one.

Using a logic which I would call perverse, the Liberal government tells us that it considers the unemployed to be cheaters. However, Quebecers refuse to endorse such a view. Even more revolting is the fact that, while cuts are being made to the UI fund, that program shows a surplus of $2 billion and it is estimated that, by 1996, that surplus will exceed $5 billion. Yet, instead of taking that money to help the unemployed find jobs, the federal government uses that surplus to reduce its deficit. Again, this confirms that the government wants to reduce the deficit at the expense of the poor.

As regards the public service, the government intends to abolish 45,000 positions over the next three years. These cuts should be made in a fair manner, based on a prorated distribution between the various groups and also according to the number of federal public servants in each province.

The decision to go all out and cut 40,000 to 45,000 jobs is particularly illogical considering that the government continues to contract out work at an almost unacceptable level, to the tune of $7.7 billion annually, according to PSAC estimates.

In other words, what the government saves by reducing the number of public servants, it spends by contracting out work. As you know, contracting out work is a good way to reward friends of the party, something which is called patronage.

We agree that the government should cut the fat, but this streamlining exercise must not be done exclusively on the backs of public servants. There is fat in many areas, not just in the public service. I already mentioned the transportation services used by members of this House and of the other place. Why have two services? Both houses could use the same service and save money in the process. I do not want to discuss every public account, but this is a striking example. I could mention many others.

Managers should also be let go, not just members of their staff. The cuts should be spread fairly between management and the employees. This is essential if the Liberal government is going to ensure fairness, as it claims to want to do.

According to the daily Le Droit, 114 managerial positions, out of 12,642, will be cut. This represents 0.9 per cent of all the cuts. By comparison, 2,508 clerical positions out of 40,145 will also be eliminated, which amounts to 6.2 per cent of the cuts. We can see clearly that the proposed cuts will affect seven times more clerical employees than managers, once again penalizing low income workers.

Cuts affecting the wealthy are also by far too timid. First, tax shelters. Nothing has been done about thousands of businesses that do not pay taxes. About 60,000 businesses that have shown a profit for the past few years are not paying taxes on those profits. This is not a matter of tax evasion or trying to manipulate the tax people. Under the current provisions of the act, these companies can take advantage of certain tax loopholes and make a profit without having to pay taxes on those profits.

The government has done nothing to change the 16 tax treaties signed with countries considered to be tax havens. The preferential treatment given by the Liberals to the wealthiest in this country is particularly obvious in the case of the notorious family trusts. The government has deferred taxing capital gains in family trusts until 1999. The Minister of Finance has refused to act on recommendations by the Bloc Quebecois to do something immediately about tax loopholes that deprive the federal government of hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue each year, mainly from Canada's wealthiest families.

I think we should recall certain statements made by members of this House when they were in the opposition. In 1992–93, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell had the following to say about family trusts: "The 21–year rule is the Robin Hood in reverse rule. It is designed specifically to give help to those who least need it. Why does one want to give an additional tax break to billionaires?" This is still the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell: "It is kind of like having two goalies in the net. In case the puck misses the first one the rich have this extra large hockey stick which can deflect anything right at the back of the first one— It is simply bad and we should not renew those provisions at all". This was said on March 29, 1993. I am pleased to see the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is here to listen, and I hope he recognizes this quote.

Madam Speaker, there is a member of this House who occasionally sits in your chair, the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast, for whom I have every respect and who had the following to say on the same topic: "We should perhaps call it the comfort bill for family trust holders in Forest Hill Village, Rosedale, Upper Westmount, Park Lake Circle and perhaps parts of Shaughnessy in Vancouver. There is no reason why those very few Canadians who are fortunate enough to have family trusts should have preferential treatment. There is no reason to extend what was a more than generous deadline". This was said the same day, on March 29, 1993.

Another hon. member of the government, who, on May 4, 1993 was a member of the opposition, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, whom I also greatly admire, said the following: "When that kind of unfairness— is out there it affects people's spirits and it affects their attitudes in terms of the workplace. When one multiplies that right across the country, it has a devastating effect on productivity, profitability and everything else. The exemption period has been extended indefinitely, depriving us of billions of dollars in tax revenues. I find it really disgusting that we adopted this bill. I am just talking about fairness, not confiscation, about taxpayers who do their fair share". This is what the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood said on May 10, 1993.

I could go on, but there is another statement, which was made by the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. I do not want to leave him out, and I want to identify him as well. He said, on April 2, 1993, and I quote: "This government is allowing them to keep accumulating wealth at the expense of the middle class and the poor of this country. What happened yesterday in the House is a disgrace, and the day will come when people will have to answer for certain social injustices". I will quote one last member of this House, who today is a minister—the hon. member for Ottawa South. He said, on March 30, 1993, with regard to family trusts, and I quote: "The answer that was proposed— is to say 21 years is a long enough trust and every 21 years, whether the property is disposed of or not, it will be deemed to have been sold even if it has not and capital gains tax will have to be paid. I do not think we can have any idea how much tax this money could have generated under such an arrangement, but I would think it would be a tidy sum, to say the least".

These people are still around today. They sit in this House. I wonder how it is, only a year or two after making such statements, that they are unable to act on them and acknowledge what they said at the time.

Despite all these statements, the Minister of Finance is refusing to act on the recommendations of the Bloc Quebecois and take immediate action to close these loopholes, which are depriving the government of hundreds of millions of dollars in revenue every year primarily from the major wealthy Canadian families, and I believe I have identified them fairly clearly.

However, to calm widespread taxpayer indignation at the huge bank profits, the Minister of Finance is going to levy a small token tax on banks, a small additional and temporary tax. Accordingly, while billions are cut each year in unemployment insurance—the figure mentioned earlier was something like $5 billion next year—the banks are going to have to pay an additional $60 million this year and $40 million more in 1996–97. Do you think it is going to hurt the banks to be taxed this amount? One hundred million dollars over two years: $60 million the first year and $40 million the second.

I would remind you that the six largest financial institutions in Canada made over $4.28 billion in profits in 1994. The Royal Bank alone made over $1.2 billion in profits.

• (1105)

It is ridiculous to say that everyone is affected by this budget. The government is taking just $100 million from a potential tax source of $4 to 5$ billion and suggesting that this amount is equal to what is being asked of other elements in society. How utterly ridiculous. We could even say this increase is hypocritical, since it may well be passed on to consumers, which banks and large corporations usually do, because such increases are always reflected in the price of these companies' final product.

So in the end, the consumer has to foot the bill. Large corporations are facing a 12.5 per cent tax increase under this budget, which will generate additional revenues of only $460 million over the next three years. This is very small compared to the $1.5 billion to be gained from the increased tax on gasoline. In this case too, the government is trying to show people, through this measure taken by the finance minister, that everyone has to do his bit.

Everyone doing his bit apparently means in this case that some have to make drastic sacrifices while only minimal ones are expected of others. If this is supposed to be a just society, I think we are on the wrong track. Compared to a 12.5 per cent tax hike for major corporations, a very slight tax on the price of gasoline will bring in three times as much or $1,5 billion.

The government boasts that it is not increasing taxes. And yet only a third of new revenues or $900 million which the government intends to collect will come from corporations. The remaining amount of $2.8 billion will come out of taxpayers' pockets. Where is the fair budget we were promised? What happened to the minister's promises that he would above all tax the rich? That being said, Madam Speaker, I would like to quote a few figures comparing personal taxes and corporate taxes.

From 1980 to 1994, personal taxes increased by 70 per cent, a rate indexed for inflation. The source of this information should be reliable and I hope it will not be disputed; it comes from the Finance department. Only the governments in Scandinavian countries and Belgium draw a higher proportion of their revenues directly from their citizens. What has happened to corporate taxes during this period? Let us look at the period extending from 1955 to 1992. In 1955, 25 per cent of federal revenues were drawn from companies. In 1975, corporate taxes accounted for 17 per cent of federal revenues and in 1992, they made up 7 per cent of federal revenues.

So we can see that corporate tax rates are in a free fall. In 1980, the tax rate was 46 per cent for big corporations and 25 per cent for small business. From 1988 to 1995, corporations were taxed at a rate of 28 per cent and small businesses at 12 per cent. It is very clear that the trend has been reversed and that from now on individuals and not corporations will pay more tax to the government.

The latest profits make the following corporations members of the billionaires' club: the Royal Bank, with $1.2 billion, Bell Canada, with almost the same amount—$1.178 billion, and General Motors of Canada, with $1.3 billion. How much tax did they pay? It would be very interesting to see their tax bill, if Taxation would only give it. It would reveal what the government is planning when it talks about a just society.

To elaborate on what I said earlier, the federal government did not trim enough of the fat. I alluded to this earlier when I said that the public service is not the only place where fat could be trimmed—National Defence is another potential target. Its budget will be cut by $1.9 billion over three years. A cut of $4.8 billion over the same time frame is what the Bloc Quebecois has been suggesting for two years now as an alternative to cutting social programs.

Close more bases and cut defence spending more. The Auditor General mentioned that the number of bases could be reduced to 12 without compromising the army's ability to function. In addition, it apparently costs over $125 million just to relocate members of the armed forces within Canada. This was said at the defence committee and echoed at the public accounts committee: between $125 and $130 million per year, not to transport troops to peacekeeping missions, but just to relocate transferred employees. Even with the army doing the transporting, it costs $125 million. That is fat if I ever saw it, Madam Speaker.

Housing for families of members and officers of the armed forces is a losing venture, it loses $30 million per year. Since 1978, the cumulative loss in this area is $2.3 billion. All the while, some officers pay only token amounts for rent, amounts that are considerably lower than what renting a comparable house would cost on the market.

The Bloc Quebecois is happy to see that Minister Martin has cut business subsidies. He is on the right track in that regard. Congratulations! But the Bloc Quebecois believes his 60 per cent cut does not go nearly far enough.

Even the Conseil du patronat agrees that these subsidies should be dropped altogether. Here is an additional $1.6 billion that could be cut over the next three years. Even business agrees with the Conseil du patronat that these subsidies should be cut, because more often than not, they amount to a means of giving friends of the government a competitive edge.

The money such a move would save could be used to fund social housing, in order to avoid the planned cuts of $307 million over the next three years.

We also talked about the billions of dollars wasted by duplication between the federal and provincial governments. The Liberal government's budget does absolutely nothing to eliminate or even reduce this costly duplication. The federal government is not withdrawing from areas of provincial jurisdiction. It has not abolished the departments where duplication occurs: health, human resources development, natural resources, and we could name others.

It is also not withdrawing from other areas of provincial jurisdiction, such as forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation and municipal affairs.

• (1115)

The second point I made was that there is absolutely nothing in this budget for employment. In order to return to the pre–recession level of employment, more than 800,000 jobs would have to be created in Canada. During the last election campaign, the Liberal Party proclaimed loudly that job creation was their number one priority.

And yet, the budget before us contains no measures, either general or specific, to encourage job creation. There is no sign of any overall plan being implemented or even proposed. Nor does the government seem to have any intention whatsoever of taking action in the medium term to help the unemployed find jobs. Even the unemployment insurance surpluses that are supposed to contribute towards job creation will be used to bring down the deficit.

This budget is proof to us that the Minister of Finance has scrapped the red book and given up on doing anything about the present rate of unemployment. The budget forecasts unemployment rates of 9.5 per cent for 1995 and 9.4 per cent for 1996. The Liberal government's vision is cruelly insensitive to the millions of unemployed Canadians. I hope that in this area the federal government's forecasts are more accurate than its forecasts in recent years with respect to the rate of growth, because if it has made the same mistakes, we will be facing unemployment rates of 10.5, 11 or 12 per cent and not 9.5.

As regards job training, this is an area of jurisdiction over which Quebec has been requesting exclusive control for a number of years now, even under a Liberal government. In the present budget, the federal government creates additional duplication, instead of reducing it. It has announced the creation of a human resources investment fund. For the time being we are told that this should encourage solid and sustainable job creation, but we do not have many details yet. It is essential, however, that a provincial job training plan be put in place.

As long as the federal government continues to hang on to responsibility in this area, thus duplicating what is being done by the government of Quebec, many resources and precious time will be lost forever, with disastrous consequences for the job situation in Quebec.

Through its failure to act and its stubborn refusal again in this budget to let Quebec look after its own job training, the federal government is adversely affecting Quebec's economic development.

I would like to touch briefly on the infrastructure program. This $2 billion program, which was announced with great fanfare during the 1993 election, was supposed to create 45,000 temporary jobs over three years. We can only assume the program has gone very well, because the government has decided to terminate it ahead of schedule. This was the only concrete measure that would have helped the government keep its job creation promise, and even that was not followed through on. In fact, the budget cuts the $200 million that remained in this program.

The provincial and municipal governments have been told that they will not get the remaining $200 million federal subsidy that they were counting on, regardless of what they might have hoped and expected. So, $200 million for the federal government, $200 million for the provincial government, $200 million for each of the provinces.

• (1120)

This means a $600 million shortfall in Quebec's economy in terms of infrastructure projects. That is a pretty penny. This government apparently committed to creating jobs is actually pulling out of these projects, thus depriving several municipalities of funding they had been promised. The Minister of Finance would have easily won the lemon award for unkept election promises.

I will comment briefly on this budget which is unfair for the people of Quebec in particular. With respect to agriculture, the

Martin budget is plainly appalling, depriving farmers of $560 million in Crow's Nest subsidies. In Quebec however—

Madam Speaker, you are signalling that my time is up, while I thought I had five minutes remaining. I will therefore keep my other comments for another time.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to not only address the government's borrowing bill, C–73, but to also make a few comments about the budget.

The single biggest problem facing Canada today is the national debt of over $550 billion and the interest costs to service that debt. It is all too easy to think of this debt as a government problem, but it is not. The debt does not cost governments, it costs Canadian taxpayers. We pay for the debt directly every day in interest payments paid from taxes.

Whatever the party or Prime Minister or finance minister, the Government of Canada has not had a single balanced budget in 25 years. As a result, every Parliament has to pass bills like C–73, borrowing bills, to give it the ability to borrow money to service this debt.

For these two decades our governments have been living beyond their means, creating a delusion that we can live indefinitely on borrowed money.

How do they get away with it? How do they get taxpayers to fall in line when the cornerstones of our society like health care are in jeopardy because we are forced to borrow $89 million every day and $625 million every week to finance the debt? The answer in a word is sophistry, using clever but misleading arguments to justify actions.

One thing I noticed in my first year as MP was that an experienced cabinet minister could spin even the most unsound logic into what seemed to be publicly accepted government policy. The finance minister is no exception. He is an extremely clever man politically, and I often wonder what he is really doing with the Canadian taxpayer.

As a businessman and a taxpayer, I finally realized that we are all being hoodwinked. By waxing eloquent about breaking the back of the deficit and floating frightening trial balloons of higher income taxes, the finance minister has finessed many Canadians into believing that it is okay to go into debt, but just not as much as we have been in the past.

I would like to walk through the budget to demonstrate the art of sophistry at work, necessitating this borrowing bill we are debating today. Sophistry is defined as false reasoning or clever but misleading arguments. So much of what is served up in the 1995–96 budget is both politically clever but economically misleading. Is this truly a sound budget as the finance minister claims, or an unsound budget based on false reasoning?

If these walls could talk about the history of deficit fighting in this House, what would they say? They would tell of a former finance minister, now a Prime Minister, who in 1978 said significant reductions in the deficit can be expected. The deficit then was $13 billion. He is back at work now and the deficit is $39 billion. Seventeen years later he is saying the same thing, singing the same tune. When will he learn that times have changed?

• (1125)

These walls would also tell us about Liberal finance minister Allan MacEachen, who in 1982 said the government cannot responsibly add to the deficit. The deficit then was $28.7 billion. Today the Liberals continue to add to that deficit.

These walls would also tell us of Michael Wilson, who in 1990 said: "We will reduce the deficit to $28.5 billion next year. We will cut it in half to $14 billion in three years. We will reduce it even further to $10 billion the year after that". Does that sound like the current finance minister? Is that not what he sounded like the other day when he presented his budget? That deficit grew to $32 billion.

Finally, if these walls could talk they would tell us of our current Minister of Finance, who one year ago promised to break the back of the deficit and attack it head on. He had a projected deficit of $42 billion and the actual deficit that he will announce will probably be around $38 billion.

Deficit has been the focus since 1975. Meanwhile the real problems, the debt and the interest cost to service that debt, keep growing. Adding to the debt and therefore increasing interests costs, regardless of interest rates, regardless of the growth in the economy, will eventually erode program spending, reducing the amount of money for social programs and job creation initiatives.

That is what is wrong with the current direction in which this government is going. Before a single dollar of income is redistributed, before a dime goes to social programs, before a penny is spent on any other government program $2,200 must be paid yearly in interest for each and every person in Canada. Each Canadian's share of direct federal and provincial debt has risen from $4,500 in 1981 to over $25,000 today.

Here we have our clever finance minister talking about the deficit and the fact that he will spend less. He is misleading the Canadian taxpayer with the argument that by lowering the deficit through instalments he is solving our economic problem of the debt. He is not solving the problem. We have to get to a zero deficit. We have to stop adding to the debt. We should have a balanced budget as our immediate target, not somewhere down the road, that floating two–year revolving door.

In their reaction to the clever minister's budget the chartered accountants of Canada have stated: "The government has failed to set firm targets for the reduction of the deficit after 1997. Achieving a $25 billion deficit in 1997, which may well be the high point in the current economic cycle, is not sufficient. We must seize the opportunity now to break the deficit cycle and not risk facing unsustainable levels of deficit in the next economic downturn. We need a longer term plan to bring government spending under control".

Reformers have done this. We set out a clear spending reduction plan in our taxpayers' budget which would reduce the deficit to zero in three years. As our leader has pointed out, the biggest spending decision that the finance minister has made by not cutting program spending more quickly is to increase spending on interest charges from $39 billion when they first were elected to $51 billion when they are defeated in 1997 or 1998.

When the Liberals came into power in 1994 their total government spending was projected to be $158 billion. By 1997 their total projected spending will be $158.6 billion, despite all these spending cuts. On the spending side they will be right back where they started. They have failed to take the necessary steps to deal with the severity of our fiscal crisis and are leading Canada on a track destined for bankruptcy. Where is the benefit for people who have been hit with public service cuts, program cuts and cuts to transfer payments? The only purpose of these cuts, it appears, is to service the ever increasing debt. It is all going to interest.

The debt is the problem. The deficit is simply a contributing factor. It is politically clever but misleading to tell people that by slowing the digging we will fill the whole.

Another clear example in the budget of the finance minister practising the art of sophistry or false reason or clever but misleading arguments is evident when he states that the Liberals are not raising personal income taxes. Of course not. That would have knocked him way down in the polls and the minister knows that. The challenge was therefore to squeeze more money out of the taxpayer without waking them up to that fact. The minister succeeded.

I will give the House four examples. The tax rates of large corporations were raised by 12.5 per cent and corporate surtaxes increased by 1 per cent, from 3 per cent to 4 per cent. These increases will be passed on to consumers and will ultimately fall on the middle class, the very heart and soul of the support of the Liberal party, in the form of higher prices.

• (1130)

The Liberals placed a temporary capital tax on large deposit taking institutions. A temporary tax, there is an oxymoron. It is like a prominent backbencher. In 1917 income tax was originally supposed to be temporary.

Taxing banks means higher costs to Canadians for banking transactions. Watch how quickly service charges change in the next year.

A third example is the Liberals have raised gasoline taxes by 1.5 cents which will cost the average Canadian and so too will higher taxes on cigarettes which the minister sneaked in through a ways and means motion a few weeks ago.

The Liberals have eliminated the public utilities income tax transfers to the provinces which means if your utilities are provided by a private company you will see your rates jump by as much as 25 per cent because they no longer get the same treatment as fat cat government owned utilities.

This is another clever technique used by the finance minister to punish Alberta MPs. Let us punish the city of Calgary for voting six Reformers. Let us reward Edmonton for electing four Liberals. This blatant partisan political endeavour will only come back to haunt the Liberal Party. This was a selective tax grab against Alberta. The Minister of National Resources yesterday did not even have the courage to answer one of my colleague's questions about her support for the PUITTA transfers to the provinces. Eventually those provinces that are considering privatizing their utilities will not do it now because of the extra costs.

Clearly this budget is nothing more than a tax on the consumer. It is a consumer budget. It raises about $1.5 billion that consumers are going to have to pay, not on their personal income tax which they are all happy with, but through hidden taxes, through consumer taxes. It is a form of a GST.

Automobiles do not pay taxes. The people who buy them do. Once again the Minister of Finance is practising the art of sophistry by using a clever but misleading argument to make taxpayers think that he is doing them a favour by not raising their individual tax burden when he is by $1.5 billion.

Another example of sophistry can be found in the finance minister's use of soft targets in his budget projections. The real test of spending cuts from one year to the next is if we spend less than the year before. This government for the second time in a row will be spending more that it did the year before. It is up to $163.9 billion from last year's projected $163.5.

If the Liberals were truly going to spend less they would be below that $163 billion figure. Once again the minister does not sell it that way. He talks about spending cuts, lowering the deficit and that reaching his target of 3 per cent of GDP will solve all our problems. Meeting the 3 per cent target depends on the continuation for another three years of recovery in the business cycle. That is very unlikely to occur. That is why it is called a cycle.

The Liberals continue to delude taxpayers that things will turn around. They believe strongly in overly optimistic economic growth projections. Their hopes for gradual improvement lead them to delay, to defer, to minimize the need for tough and immediate action.

They think gradually they will work this through. It appears as though gradualism has become a Liberal policy. Change should not be introduced too suddenly. To avoid any shocks to the system reforms of any kind should be introduced gradually.

In an article I was recently reading the writer suggested that we use a gradual approach to introduce new traffic laws from driving on the right side of the road to the left side. Do it gradually, buses and trucks this year, cars next year. Gradualism is not going to work.

All that Liberal rhetoric about rolling two year targets does is side track us from the real problem of the debt. Once again gradualism sounds appealing but it is misleading. Interest costs continue to rise. At the end of the Liberal term they will have added another $10 billion to the interest costs of this nation. This is what they are doing. This is where their spending cuts are going. Everybody is sacrificing in this country just to pay the darn interest costs on the debt instead of getting the deficit to zero so that interest costs will not rise.

Why is it on the question of fiscal common sense finance ministers continually react by saying they will balance the budget tomorrow, they will get at it first thing next year, they will aim for a balanced budget but in the meantime they have to tackle the deficit? How would members react to someone who had cancer and planned to wait to seek treatment until he felt better? This is yet another example of a clever but misleading argument by the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance has said that small business is the engine of our economy. It creates 85 per cent of the jobs in Canada. Yet in his budget he tried to take credit for the 400,000 jobs that have been created in this past year in Canada when all the government can take credit for are the 60,000 jobs it created through its infrastructure program which has simply added to the debt.

• (1135)

It is absolutely amazing how many times we heard that the infrastructure program was a huge success, creating years of employment. It was not just short term. Now we see in the budget that funding for the program will be reduced.

If the infrastructure program was such a success, then why has it been cut? Was it not living up to its potential? Through pork barrel programs like infrastructure, the Liberals are being politically clever but, as their budget demonstrates, economically misleading.

Another example of sophistry at work can be found in the finance minister's criticisms of the Reform Party's policy on old age security. The finance minister said the Reform Party's taxpayer's budget would hammer seniors at the low end of the income scale, which simply is not the case.

During the election campaign the Conservatives accused us that this would effect seniors who made $17,000 a year. Now the finance minister has the gall and the nerve and audacity to stand in this House and tell Canadians that we will hurt and harm seniors who make $11,000 a year. That is pathetic.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Where are the cuts coming from?

Mr. Silye: I will get to that. I will show exactly why the finance minister should retract what he said at some point in the future.

These scare tactics are clever but they are misleading. In our taxpayer's budget Reformers propose that key changes to OAS would include basing the program on family income. Guess what?—that is what the Liberals are going to do as well. We say who it is going to effect. We say at what level it will effect but the Liberals do not have the courage to say what they are going to do on social programs.

In the two–year projections, the money on social programs stays at the same level of $39 billion. The transfers to provinces go down by about $2 billion without any of the tax points going over there, but they do not come clean. That is the problem. It is a budget of broken promises and it is a budget of slight of hand.

Our budget would protect those currently receiving guaranteed income supplements and not paying benefits to high income families. That is what our policy would be on the OAS. This is what the Liberals have suggested in their budget.

Let me now give a definite example. Members have been waiting for me to get to this. I am sure this is the part that is very interesting. They want to know where we get our figures. We get our figures from the government's own numbers. It is a document it produced. It is a book. I think it is coloured. It means this government is good on colours. It has the red book, the grey book, the green book, the mauve book, the white.

This is from "Creating a Healthy Fiscal Climate", page 70, annex table 26, distribution of net federal elderly benefits by household income, 1994.

Eight hundred thousand households receive less than $15,000 in income. The benefits they receive which include the OAS, the spousal portion and the GIS, are $7 billion. That would be untouched by our taxpayers' budget.

Where does the finance minister get his $11,000 figure? The next level up is $15,000 to $20,000 for 390,000 households; $2.6

billion goes there. That is nobody who receives a household income of $20,000. Even if you divide that in two, you are at 11.

Twenty thousand to twenty–five thousand dollars is the next level: 380,000 households, $3 billion goes there. Twenty–five thousand to thirty thousand dollars: 250,000 households; $1.7 billion goes there. Thirty thousand to forty thousand dollars household income: 280,000 households; $1.8 billion goes there.

Even if you took the $40,000 you would end up with $20,000. Where does the finance minister get his $11,000 number? He says if $11,000 is what we would do, I challenge the finance minister if he wants to restore and retain his credibility, because he has said this publicly, to confirm that his numbers are right in this.

If these numbers are right then there is no way that taking $3 billion out of OAS, a $20 billion envelope, and reducing it to $17 billion we going to harm one single senior who makes less than $20,000 in income. Our target is about $40,000.

I insist that if the finance minister catches wind of what I have said here today—I see that the parliamentary secretary to the finance minister is present—we deserve a correction on that. We deserve a clarification.

We are playing with peoples' lives. We do not want to scare people. We want to get to a zero deficit. We want to cut more than the Liberal government. We would cut faster than the Liberal government and you can take all the credit you want about ours being slash and burn, but we know that our projections and the way we want to do it is the right way, it is the correct way, and is the way it should be done.

• (1140)

For the government to accuse wrongly, neither party should do that. Both parties and all members of Parliament should try to be accurate. They have a responsibility to be accurate when they are talking about numbers and how they affect lives. We can disagree on philosophy but we should not disagree on numbers. I think I have said enough on that.

Let us turn to income security for members of Parliament. Has the finance minister made any sacrifices there? The answer is no. Canadians have to sacrifice but not MPs. They are not paid enough so the MP pension makes up for that. The old time politicians will benefit from the original plan to the new two tiered plan that will make millionaires out of many of them while future politicians will be asked to accept the reformed plan.

It is outstanding to sit in this House and listen to the Prime Minister compare his salary with professional hockey players' every time we ask him a question about pensions. Why does he compare his pension with the pension of a hockey player? Why does he not compare his pension to those pensions out there in the private sector?

What we are saying is that the compensation package has an imbalance. The compensation package for MPs is out of whack. The compensation package has to be revisited and the whole thing has to be looked at. The MP gold plated pension plan is too generous. The $64,000 a year is too low. However, this government is too heartless and lacks the courage to address the problem head on. It wants to protect all the old cronies from the past and will not address what should be addressed in the proper fashion.

There is no way that any member of this House should receive any more than matching contributions to what a member puts into a pension plan, one for one. I do not care if it is 5 per cent, 6 per cent or 8 per cent, it should only be one for one.

To boot, the Prime Minister has said he cannot reform the MP pension plan retroactively because there is a rule in democracy that we do not pass retroactive legislation.

Considering the fact the Liberals applied retroactive legislation to the Pearson contract, the EH–101 helicopter contract, the public service contracts and to Canadian taxpayers working overseas, why is it that these same Liberal politicians are not subject to the same rules as those Canadians? How can the Prime Minister contradict himself this way? It is a clever thing to say but it is a misleading point to make when the facts betray what he is saying. It is a double standard. It might be sophistry.

Once again the Liberals are leading the taxpayers to believe that they are actually reforming the system when all they are doing is making it less gold plated for the young MPs but still very generous. I cannot believe the number of rookie Liberal MPs who have been coerced and have just sat there. They are the strongest number in caucus and they sit there and let these veterans push them around. They sit there and are forced to go back to their constituents, most in Ontario, and say sorry, but they had to take this two tiered pension, they cannot sacrifice because the Prime Minister and cabinet will not let them. I cannot believe that.

The rookie Liberal MPs have an opportunity to set an example. The rookies have an opportunity to crack the whip and to show them in caucus what it is all about to be an MP: real integrity, real honesty and real leadership, not the old style partisan, pork barrelled system that has been going on for the last 25 years.

What has changed? We have a Prime Minister who is still going out to $1,000 parties that 99.999 per cent of Canadians are not even invited to. We still make blatant partisan appointments, not the Liberals who deserve to be there but blatant ones that should not be made. The Liberals are still spending $40 billion more a year than they bring in. They fail to recognize the real problem.

The finance minister talks of downsizing and reducing the cost of government when the fact is that in Ottawa Canadians still have a big government and a high spending government. Reformers believe that government governs best that governs least and the best government is smaller government.

Why is it that in the state of California 52 congressmen, 2 senators, 1 governor and 1 president represent at a federal level 29 million people?

• (1145)

Let us say that Canada is pretty close to 29 million people for the sake of argument. We have for the same 29 million people 295 MPs, 104 senators and one Governor General representing the taxpayers. Are we not as competent as congressmen? They can represent 500,000 people while we can only represent 100,000 people? Do we not have the intelligence? Do we not have the technology to have representation by population with a higher population base? I think we can.

Talk about downsizing the public service by 45,000 people over three years. Why do we not downsize the House of Commons? What are we doing instead? We are not going to downsize the House of Commons. While the government lays off 45,000 civil servants it is going to bring in six more MPs. There will be six more MPs in the next federal election.

Once again the Liberals want to increase the size of government. Make it big. Keep the backbenchers happy. Let a small cabinet control things. They refuse to consider more effective approaches to accommodate shifting, growing populations.

Reformers believe the House should have 265 members. Taking into account the floating nature of the population we cannot cap it because of all of the deals that have been made since Confederation. We would then have a reasonable House. We would have members of Parliament that represent more people. We would have members of Parliament that would really have some value and some input into what is going on rather than this huge size. Except for the 20 people that sit around the Prime Minister, the rest of us are just here for window dressing.

We believe the House should be reduced to a fixed number. If the size is continually expanded to match population increases, the House will reach unmanageable proportions with unsustainable overhead costs. The answer to population growth is not to increase the numbers of representatives but to periodically redraw constituency boundaries—redistricting; to redistribute seats according to population shifts—reapportionment; and introduce an elected, effective and equal Senate for regional control.

The time has come to bring back financial responsibility to government, not to make government bigger. Politicians have to be accountable to the people of Canada, to be trusted to handle their money. More faces will not improve the system. I heard a little comment about Alberta?

Mr. Calder: How many seats do you have from Alberta?

Mr. Silye: We have 27 seats from Alberta.

An hon. member: That is 26.

Mr. Silye: For instance, the city of Calgary has six MPs. I would cut two out of the city of Calgary. We only need four MPs from the city of Calgary.

Mr. Calder: Which two would the hon. member cut?

Mr. Silye: Mine and—If you have a personal problem and have to go somewhere, I think it should be respected.

The government is selling a lean, mean government but is increasing its size at a future cost to millions of taxpayers. It is sophistry, clever but misleading.

Despite the hype, the Liberal budget is not a great budget. It does not go deep enough, fast enough or is it compassionate. Liberals have not come clean with the Canadian public. They are trying to retain their popularity and are playing games with numbers.

The budget is merely acceptable compared to what we have seen in the past. It does not stop the digging fast enough. As Alberta treasurer Jim Dinning said the other day about the budget, it is like getting excited over a student that always comes home with Fs on his report card and one day brings home a C minus.

Will we consider the budget as our soft targets? Number one, soft targets. The Liberals are headed in the right direction. They have to make some cuts. They have addressed some cuts, but they have not made enough cuts.

No balanced budget is in sight. That is the target they have to set but will not set. This is why the leader of the Reform Party is going to be the next Prime Minister of Canada. Canadians are going to recognize that is where we should be and that is what will be in the best interest of saving the country.

The Canada social transfer that the government sneaked in is another example of sophistry. It is going to confuse the provinces. The Bloc Quebecois, rightly so, is screaming loudly and justifiably about how it will affect Quebec. The Liberals cannot answer. They will not answer.

The fourth problem is that the fiscal House is just not in order. The combined spending cuts in the budget and revenue increases will amount to $29 billion over the next two years. That sounds great. However, at the end of their term overall spending will have increased even higher than where they started. After four years of Liberal government overall spending will be up by about one-half billion to one billion dollars. Despite the cuts, it is not a balanced budget. Despite the cuts, the debt will grow. Despite the cuts we will be no further ahead as a nation. All that pain just to pay the interest on the debt. Why can the Liberals not get it through their heads that we have to get to a zero deficit?

• (1150)

I propose that Parliament reject the budget for its failure to eliminate the deficit quickly and decisively within the life of this Parliament by asking further generations to bear the cost of our fiscal responsibilities.

I propose that the finance minister reintroduce a new budget in the fall that reflects Reform's suggestions to balance the budget over a three–year period.

We are continuing the cycle of treading water. Eventually our arms are going to get tired. We are going to sink, sink as fast as the Titanic when we hit the wall. Hit the wall we will if we do not eliminate the deficit. No country can allow its debt to continue to grow as we are in Canada and expect to survive.

That is why we presented our taxpayers' budget, a budget that gives Canadians real hope. It gives the Liberal government a plan to adopt. It shows them the vision Liberals lack.

An hon. member: Have you been at a golf club?

Mr. Silye: I have a problem with the comment about the tan I have. My wife was rushed off to hospital in sunny California. It was an emergency. That is why I have a tan. I do not appreciate it when members keep referring to that when I am trying to give a serious address on the budget. If they just make jokes about the tan, that is fine. But once they know what it is about I would appreciate a little more respect.

Our taxpayers' budget gives Canadians hope. It shows them a vision and defines a real problem, that of the debt and the interest costs to service that debt. It offers a solution of how to get to a zero deficit so that we can manage the country's finances. We have to get our fiscal house in order so we can start looking at the debt and at ways and means of reducing it. Our children and our grandchildren should not have to continue to carry this heavy, heavy load.

I repeat one more time. Our taxpayer's budget gives the Liberal government an opportunity to adopt that approach, to get to zero within the life of its term. Because if it does not, we will get elected and we will do it.

The debt and the rising interest costs to service that debt is the problem. I have tried to point it out. I have offered solutions. Our party has pointed it out. Our party has offered solutions. Despite all the wisecracks from the finance minister, despite all the rhetoric about how the Reform Party this and the Reform Party that, the Liberals are taking some of our agenda. Why not take all of it? Stop the digging.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on second reading of Bill C–73, the borrowing authority bill.

Before I speak directly to the provisions of the bill, I would like to put this legislation in its proper context. The amount of borrowing authority requested in the bill is directly connected to the financial requirements set out in the budget. The information required to deal with the financial aspects of the bill is set out in the budget.

It is very important that this bill be passed as quickly as possible. If borrowing authority is not in place early in the new fiscal year, there will be severe constraints placed on the government's financing program. All remaining borrowing authority granted by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1994–95, will be cancelled at the end of this fiscal year except for a $3 billion non–lapsing amount.

Once this amount is depleted, the government would be limited to using section 47 of the Financial Administration Act which restricts borrowing to short–term funds.

• (1155)

In such a situation, no bonds could be issued except to fund maturing issues, of which there are two in the first quarter of 1995–96. Any delay in the passage of this important bill beyond the end of the current fiscal year, therefore, could be costly to the government and to Canadian taxpayers, and would expose the government to the additional interest rate risk implied by increased short–term funding.

Given the government's large financing program, delaying bond financing will also be potentially disruptive of the capital markets which could result in higher debt servicing charges. Therefore, it is critical that borrowing authority be secured as soon as possible.

The budget has been a topic of much discussion both in this House and elsewhere this week. And well it should be. As has been pointed out by my colleague the Minister of Finance, the budget he presented last Monday is an "historic response" to an "historic challenge".

The challenge is brought very much to our attention as we debate this bill. This country's economic future is put at risk by the $500 billion debt we have accumulated—a $500 billion debt that leaves us all too vulnerable to the harsh impact of interest rates.

And yes, we recognize that this legislation seeks to borrow even more money, adding to that debt. But in asking hon. members to support this legislation, I draw their attention to the fundamental reform of government spending set out in the budget and the commitment of this government to meet its deficit targets.

The ultimate goal of this government is a balanced budget. There should be no doubt that we will achieve it.

But we are not going to achieve this goal through the magic of long range projections as was attempted in the past. Nor will we achieve our goals by projecting overly optimistic increases in economic growth and cheerful interest rate forecasts.

[English]

Our approach has paid off in success in not just meeting the targets for 1994–95 but in fact doing better. Last year in our first budget we projected a deficit of $39.7 billion. We now estimate that the deficit will come in at about $37.9 billion, some $1.8 billion under target.

The underlying deficit, that is without the one time charges incurred in restructuring government, is $4.4 billion below target. Revenues of $1.2 billion are above the conservative estimates in program spending, a full $3 billion under our projections.

These positive effects on the deficit were only partly offset by the $1 billion in higher than expected interest rates, so the $2.4 billion contingency fund did not have to be touched.

I would like to go directly to some of the aspects of this legislation because in my short time I want to make sure that my colleagues understand exactly what the nature of this borrowing bill is.

• (1200)

With the measures we are taking in the budget announced on Monday there is no question we will achieve the target of $32.7 billion in the upcoming fiscal year and $24.3 billion or 3 per cent of GDP in 1996–97.

We are backing up our very prudent economic assumptions with a substantial contingency reserve, which next year will be $2.5 billion and the following year will be $3 billion. Looking ahead, our contingency reserve will do more than just protect our target. If it is not needed it will not be spent. It will go toward reducing the deficit even further.

This underscores one of the basic strengths of our planning assumptions. If interest rates and growth do better than our forecast—and remember that we have taken a very conservative forecast—and if we simply compare it to the private sector average, in 1996–97 the deficit could drop below $19 billion. That is $5.5 billion less than what was projected in the budget.

By that time our financial requirements, the new money we borrow from markets, will fall to $13.7 billion, a drop of more than $11 billion from the amount asked for in Bill C–73. That is substantial progress of which every Canadian should be proud. It will be just 1.7 per cent of GDP, down from 3.5 per cent of GDP in 1994–95 and a full 5 per cent in 1992–93. Based on the national budgets for 1996–97, Canada is projected to do better than the United States, Germany, Japan and every other major industrial nation.

The details of Bill C–73 contain three basic elements: authority to cover financial requirements for 1995–96, exchange fund account profits, and a non–lapsing amount. In total we are requesting authority to borrow $28.9 billion for the 1995–96 fiscal year.

First, there is a provision for $24.9 billion of authority to cover anticipated borrowing requirements to meet the net financial requirements set out in the budget.

Second, there is a provision to cover $1 billion of exchange fund account earnings, which gives rise to additional Canadian dollar borrowing requirements. These earnings, although reported as budgetary revenues, are retained in the exchange fund account. They are not available to finance ongoing operations of the government.

Third, there is the usual $3 billion non–lapsing amount, the same amount requested in borrowing authority in the past seven years. The non–lapsing amount can either be used during the course of the year to manage contingencies such as unexpected foreign exchange requirements or it can be carried forward to the next fiscal year.

There are some minor technical provisions in the bill that more clearly link fiscal year borrowing authority with fiscal year borrowing requirements. One provision provides that in 1995–96 the borrowing authority may only be used after the new fiscal year begins. Another provision stipulates that for the purpose of calculating borrowing authority usage the effective date is April 1.

Until the bill is passed the government may continue to use the $3 billion non–lapsing amount provided for in last year's Borrowing Authority Act. Any portion of the non–lapsing amount that is used will be deducted from the basic amount of borrowing authority being sought today. This prevents the non–lapsing amount from effectively adding to the borrowing authority next year. Also the bill will cancel all borrowing authority remaining from fiscal 1994–95 once it is passed.

As background information I would like to review the government's debt operation for the current fiscal year up to the end of January. So far this fiscal year in the domestic debt program the government has issued about $21.4 billion in marketable bonds, $1.5 billion in Canada savings bonds, and $1.4 billion in real return bonds. There are also net redemptions of $7.8 billion of treasury bills. This provides a total of $16.5 billion in net new market debt.

I also report to the House on last fall's Canada savings bond campaign. The government introduced two innovations aimed at revitalizing the Canada savings bond program. First, a new three–year price feature was introduced, aimed at making CSBs more attractive to retail investors. Second, the government expanded the sales window making CSBs available over a longer period of time. They were priced competitively with other products in the market, cost effective relative to other sources of financing and produced sales of $7.5 billion or a 40 per cent increase over 1993. After accounting for redemptions during the year, the net increase in outstanding Canada savings bonds was $1.5 billion, as I indicated earlier.

• (1205)

Regarding foreign currency debt, outstanding Canada bills increased by U.S. $2.2 billion to $6.3 billion at the end of January. These are short term U.S. dollar denominated bills issued from time to time in the U.S. market to fund Canada's foreign exchange reserve.

In July 1994 the government launched a $2 billion five–year Euro bond issue. The issue was used to increase reserves and diversify the sources of U.S. dollar funding of Canada's exchange reserve.

In summary, the bill is straightforward and contains no unusual provisions. All the information needed to deal with it is before the House in the budget, the main estimates and related documents.

[Translation]

I therefore urge the House to proceed with this legislation as quickly as possible so that new borrowing authority will be in place at the beginning of the new fiscal year and the government's regular borrowing program can proceed as the fiscal year begins.

[English]

Borrowing authority is a normal part of the operations of government. I urge all members of the House to support the bill.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

When talking about the budget elements in his speech he used words like would, could and should. Those are not good enough in these time. He also pointed out that his government was on track to meet its deficit target of $25 billion at the end of two more years. It is my contention and our contention that this will add to the problem. Our proposal for a deficit target is zero, not $25 billion. We believe that solves the problem. It does not add to it.

Would the member explain why a deficit target of $25 billion is better than a deficit target of zero?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and for his speech. I was listening carefully to him. I know he is concerned about these issues. He brings a real passion to seeing our debt reduced.

I assure him that every member on the government side is equally committed to balancing the budget and to making sure that future generations of Canadians are not saddled with the debt as we currently are.

The major difference between the government and the third party is the quickness related to actually delivering the savings needed to produce a balanced budget.

If the hon. member reviews his speech, I caution him not to deal with the total expenditures but to look at the amount of money spent on programs. From the beginning of the government we have been in the process of reducing it from $120 billion to $108 billion. That is significant progress.

We would like to be optimistic and say that the economy will continue to perform as it did last year at 4.5 per cent growth, but we know that in the past many governments have disappointed Canadians by making high growth and revenue projections and in the end have come back to Canadians with increased debt. We refuse to do that.

We also know that politicians are politicians. If we set objectives far down the line and say that in five or six years we will have a balanced budget, and a crisis comes up such as the Mexican peso crisis in January, people say not to worry about it too much because we can adjust further down the line. We can hold their collective feet to the fire and say our objective this year is x billions of dollars in debt and we are going to reach it. We are not going to compensate in two or three years; we are going to look after it right now.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have been very effective in bringing a discipline to the government. Through the actions we are taking, we are setting an example for many other governments across the country. At the turn of the century we will see ourselves in a very fine position, one we can all be proud of.

• (1210)

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the member from the third party who previously spoke gave a speech of almost catharsis.

I was hoping the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance could comment on the very important issue of revenue. The member from the third party had characterized the government's budget as being overly optimistic on the revenue side.

My recollection of the straw budget put together by the third party was that its revenue projections were $16 billion. They would reduce the deficit down to $25 billion, which is where the government is going. Basically that means all cuts the government is proposing would theoretically be on top of the third party's budget.

Could the parliamentary secretary clarify the situation with regard to the allegation that the revenue projections are overly optimistic?

Mr. Walker: If anything the revenue projections are very prudent. We are very cautious about 1996. The American economy has been growing very rapidly with increased interest rates. We are concerned that our export markets may be dampened somewhat because of a slowdown in the American economy. I know American economists and observers are very nervous about whether interest rates have gone up too high in the United States.

Since so much of our revenue on the corporate side is based on our export industries, to say nothing of the jobs in markets such as the automobile industry and so on, if we do not make prudent projections on the revenue side we will be caught with increased costs in UI and reduced corporate profits and will find ourselves without the revenue.

Therefore, as I said in response to an earlier question, the last thing we want to do collectively as parliamentarians—in this respect the whole House should be in agreement—is set up a situation where we disappoint Canadians again. I would much rather be in a position of surprising them with good news than coming back again with a budget that has to be redrawn based on faulty optimistic projections.

The Department of Finance, through the minister's instructions, has been very cautious in the way it has drawn up the projections. We have insisted that the more optimistic projections in the private sector be scaled down. We have been very cautious in the way we have set out the amount of money available to us in two years.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have a comment and a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. They are both related to the referendum campaign in Quebec. Is it possible that the real federal budget will be tabled in 1996, after the referendum?

The government's budget increased by $3 billion, in spite of cuts of $5 billion to programs. Moreover, the Minister of Human Resources Development intends to cut some $15 billion, over a five-year period, in social programs, a measure which has yet to be approved by this House. Again, the federal cuts in transfers to the provinces will result in higher provincial deficits.

The provinces will have no choice but to transfer their responsibilities to the municipalities without providing them with the necessary financial support. Consequently, ordinary Canadians will once again have to foot the bill.

• (1215)

Whether it is with the left or the right hand, low and middle income taxpayers end up having to pay. In the context of privatization, the federal government eliminated all subsidies to regional airports and ports or harbours. This has a major impact on every region in Quebec, whether the local economy is based on services, tourism or industrial activities.

I have a simple question for the parliamentary secretary. Is he prepared to admit in this House that the real budget will be tabled after the referendum campaign in Quebec?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance tabled our budget for this year. There will not be another budget after the referendum. The message sent to the provinces is very clear. Many changes will occur, but we did inform provincial finance ministers, including the Quebec finance minister, of our strategy. We have an agreement with the provinces to postpone changes until next year——to provide an opportunity for governments across this country to change and to adjust. The federal government is losing 45,000 employees. It is with a great deal of sadness that we are making these changes and changing many of the programs. By definition, as we change programs it affects every single province equally. There is no doubt about that.

[English]

We expect that as the provinces go about their work they will have to make individual decisions as to the best way to improve the situations in their own province. It is not for me to guess whether it would include changes in programs, cutbacks or whatever. We will have to wait for provincial ministers of finance with their respective cabinets to make their own decisions and explain it to their individual populations.

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, in the member's answer to his own colleague about the operating budget of the government, he asked that we not look at the interest costs but just look at the operating budget and how the cuts are there.

I acknowledge the cuts in government operations. They are lower. There are some cuts there. However, the member is not recognizing that the interest cost to service the debt is going up faster or as fast as the cuts that are being made. That is why I will repeat the objective is to get to a zero deficit, not to one of $25 billion.

In the member's household budget, whether he has a mortgage now or if he ever had a mortgage, are the interest costs to service the mortgage on his home not a part of his expenses? Does he have a budget which includes his income and his expenses for food and clothing, but the expenses for shelter do not count? Does he keep that aside saying that he can borrow money indefinitely on that? No. A business cannot do it either. The debt servicing costs of a corporation are also included in its costs.

The hon. member should put the interest costs and the operating costs to government together as one. Do not make the same mistakes previous finance ministers have made. Separate the two and try to offer sophistic arguments. Get to the bottom of the overall spending and lower the overall spending so that we get to zero. Does that not make sense?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, the member makes a lot of sense. If the member had included it in his original speech then my comments would not have come forward that way. I will say again that it is incumbent upon all of us to make sure the Canadian public understands that progress is being made on restructuring government.

We are as chagrined as the next person about the high cost each Canadian faces with the debt. When I stand in the House to ask permission to borrow $28.9 billion, it is not done with a lot of glee. This is a tremendous burden we are adding. We understand that.

Last year I believe we asked for $32.3 billion. It shows that we are making progress. Our demands on the international markets are becoming less each year. In this view, we are making real progress without causing widespread grief and harm.

• (1220)

I do not know if members have had a chance to look at the newspaper today, but looking at the public opinion polls, Canadians have been willing to accept a tough budget. We presented a tough budget and their reaction is very supportive.

The opposition parties should understand and appreciate the willingness of Canadians to participate in such an exercise, including the tax issues and so forth. I am very proud with the way the government is in sync with the Canadian population.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, you may have guessed that I am particularly interested in the budget's impact on agriculture.

However, I would like to start by commenting briefly on the underhanded way the provinces are being treated, the lack of job creation measures, unfair tax measures and the inequity of certain cuts. If I were to give my impression of the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance in a single sentence, I would call it next year's budget.

As usual, the budget we were supposed to set this year has apparently been postponed until next year, in other words, until after the referendum.

This budget is like a time bomb, and it will be a couple of years before we feel its full impact. Take, for instance, transfer payments to the provinces. In the budget brought down on Monday, transfers for health care, education and social assistance will be cut by $2.5 billion in 1996–97 and $4.5 billion in 1997–98. This is a cut of 40 per cent over three years.

This measure will very likely destabilize provincial budgets and force the provinces to make drastic cuts or even shift part of the burden to the municipalities, as Quebec Liberal Minister Claude Ryan did so neatly in 1992.

And on top of that, there is the obligation to meet so–called national standards. Once again, the provinces are sitting under a federal sword of Damocles.

In the last federal election, the Liberal government was elected on its promise to create jobs. However, after barely a year and a half in power, that same Liberal government decided to ignore its promise to create jobs. There is nothing in Monday's budget to create employment. Nothing but layoffs, as many as 45,000. There is nothing for 800,000 unemployed workers who are looking for work in Quebec. Nothing. The only program that has created some employment and so–called temporary jobs, the infrastructure program, will lose $200 million from its initial budget announced last year.

This is a three–way program, so that in the end, not $200 million but $600 million will be cut.

• (1225)

This budget is unfair because it maintains the preferential treatment of family trusts for another five years, which will give the parties concerned plenty of time to find other ways to evade taxes, and believe me, they will. It is unfair because it comes down relatively hard, but on the wrong people. In the short term, the public will feel the impact of tax hikes on tobacco and gasoline.

Furthermore, the Unemployment Insurance Program will be cut by 10 per cent. The government is going to take money from the unemployed to pay off our debt. This is obscene!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Meanwhile, the government has no plans for real tax reform. It will raise the corporate tax rate by 12.5 per cent or 1/8, but I used to teach math, and 1/8 of what is not much in any case barely adds up. So what it really means for the big corporations is that there will be an increase from 0.2 to 0.225 per cent of corporate capital in excess of $10 million. Let me tell you that a lot of people in my riding would be delighted to have that rate applied to their personal income tax.

That being said, as the official opposition critic for agriculture and being a farmer myself, I was particularly surprised and, in fact, appalled at the inequity of the budgetary measures concerning agriculture. Last week, the Minister of Agriculture said to anyone who would listen that his government would treat all Canada's regions on the same footing, and he said quite seriously that no agricultural sectors would be more equal than others. Now we must face the fact that the government is saying one thing but doing another.

In this budget, the finance minister cuts the agriculture department's budget by 19 per cent, or one fifth. During a time of cutbacks, it is accepted that everyone has to do his share, but what really hurts is the way the cuts are distributed. It is one thing for agriculture to be hard hit, but quite another if it is unfairly affected. The injustice from one region to the next is simply absurd.

In short, to make up for eliminating the Crow's Nest rate for Western grain transportation, the government will give grain growers $2.9 billion. But dairy producers in Quebec will see their federal subsidies cut by 30 per cent over two years. That amounts to a $32 million cut without any compensation whatsoever.

The message is clear but unacceptable: the deficit is being tackled on the backs of Quebec and Ontario dairy producers. It can even be said that if the target price for milk were increased because of these cuts, the increase would be borne by consumers and processing industries. It is tantamount to a consumption tax.

Certain cuts are inevitable, I must agree. The agriculture minister was telling me last week that so much had been said about the Crow's Nest rate over the last 25 years. Even in the opinion of farmers and people involved in grain transportation and processing, there were serious shortcomings in the Western grain transportation system, such as the detour to Thunder Bay to be eligible for the subsidy.

• (1230)

For ages people have seen the waste and inefficiency in grain transportation. And the saga has continued since the Liberal Party sitting opposite us took office. They have consulted, gone around in circles, did some fancy footwork in the House and tried to arrive at a consensus with the people in the community. Nothing has worked.

The Minister of Finance finally decided to discontinue the transportation subsidy under the WGTA. To compensate Western grain producers for this loss, the finance minister announced a number of interim measures. For example, owners of agricultural land, in the Prairies only of course, will receive a single, non-taxable lump sum payment of $1.6 billion.

Add to this the $300 million, 5 year program to help producers adapt to the WGTA. On top of this, export credit guarantees totalling one billion dollars are being offered to help producers sell their grain and other foodstuffs. The sum of these three programs is $2.9 billion. The federal government will invest close to $3 billion to compensate grain producers in the three western provinces.

And just listen to how clear and praiseworthy the agriculture minister's goals are. First, to cut costs; second—listen up all of you producers in Quebec—to encourage farmers in the West to diversify; third, to encourage them to get involved in value-added activities. In contrast, dairy producers miss out. The Minister of Finance decided to reduce the subsidies for industrial milk producers by 30 per cent. How terrible.

For all intents and purposes, Quebec accounts for close to 50 per cent of Canada's industrial milk production, so do not kid yourselves or try to tell me that Quebec producers will not be harder hit than those elsewhere. In this case, the federal government is not offering any compensation. In Quebec alone, this cut will mean close to $32 million in losses. The Minister of Finance was off target when he reduced dairy subsidies by 30 per cent over the next two years.

The more than 12,000 industrial milk producers in Quebec will see a 15 per cent drop in their current subsidy of $1.50 per kilogram of milk fat in 1995 and another 15 per cent drop in 1996. For a farmer who produces 10,000 kilograms of fat, which is the average production in Quebec, that will translate into an income loss of $2,250 this year and of almost the same amount next year. That is over $4,000 in losses.

The government will compensate these farmers by reviewing the future of subsidies in collaboration with the provinces and the industry. It is all well and good to talk about it, but that is not going to put bread and butter on the table. Contrary to the cuts in the West, the dairy sector cuts will not be implemented in tandem with any transitional measures. Talk about a double standard.

• (1235)

If we examine this question more closely, we realize that, over the long term, this measure is even more disastrous for dairy producers than it appears. With the new international figures, all sectors are going to have to adjust. In the case of sectors with quotas, like dairy production, these changes are practically already in effect. This coming July, quotas will be replaced by tariffs.

I would like to digress a moment on the subject of tariffs. You no doubt know that the United States decided it wanted to test the tariffs adopted last year, in December 1993 that is, by the 120 members of the WTO at the Uruguay round of the GATT talks. Today, they are being contested. I am really looking forward to seeing how vigorously the government will protest, just how far it will go to defend the tariff structure for dairy products, eggs and poultry.

The tariffs themselves will gradually disappear. Instead of anticipating costs and investing to provide support for dairy producers wanting to develop new niches in the market or become more competitive in order to face the music once tariff barriers relax, what do they do? They cut, they cut and they cut some more.

A dairy producer friend of mine, whom I will identify, I am sure it would please him,—Laurent Saint-Laurent—told me, when he acquired his parents' farm in 1971, that subsidies represented 25 per cent of his income. Today, they represent barely 6 per cent.

However, in the West, farmers are being compensated for the loss of subsidies by being allowed to diversify their economy so they can then compete with agriculture in Eastern Canada, which receives absolutely no financial assistance from the federal government.

They are exaggerating by cutting a number of subsidies. Western producers wanting to get into beef or pork or wanting to compete with dairy producers will therefore be able to do so with federal money. If this is what fair treatment for everyone means, I would hate to see what unfair treatment means in this country.

An hon. member: Lies.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Yes, lies, Madam Speaker.

Other budget measures will also have a strong impact, for example the 30 per cent cut in the social safety net for farmers. The Minister of Finance opposite should listen more closely, as he is the one who will cut $250 million over three years. That, too, is a three-part program. If the federal government contributes 70 cents, will the $1.00 paid by the farmer and the province be increased to $1.15? I am asking the question.

I am also concerned about the closing of two of the seven research facilities in Canada. In Quebec, two facilities will be closed, one in La Pocatière and one in L'Assomption. That is terrible.

Of the $164 billion in this year's budget, $50 billion will be used only to pay interest costs. Let me give you an example of mismanagement.

• (1240)

On April 1, 1997, after investing more than $7 million in La Pocatière in less than 10 years, Agriculture Canada will close the experimental farm in La Pocatière, the oldest one in Quebec, which opened in 1910. They are closing it now after investing $7 million. Where is this government's vision?

In closing, I urge Quebec farmers, whether they are dairy, beef or pork producers, farrow or finish operators, to open their eyes and look at the Liberal government opposite that is treating them so unfairly and inequitably.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rarely heard such grandstanding. The hon. member opposite would have us believe that we are not cutting deep enough and cutting too much at the same time, that we are cutting in the wrong places, and so on. Yet, the vast majority of the population told us again yesterday in a poll that the government's budget was just right, like just about everything else this government does.

The hon. member told us that the budget was next year's budget, suggesting that we did not cut deep enough this year. He then said that we cut too much this year, right after he accused us of postponing the cuts until next year instead of cutting this year.

He says that the government does not create jobs. Yet, 432,000 jobs have been created since the beginning of last year. According to the news we heard this morning, where was the highest rate of economic growth among all G-7 countries? As you may have guessed, Madam Speaker, right here in Canada. That says a lot about the comments made by the hon. member opposite.

As this is a question and comment period, I would ask the hon. member—I must say that I disagree with his comments and that I do not want to use unparliamentary language—if he knew what he was talking about when he alleged that Quebec dairy producers were being treated unfairly compared with Western grain farmers?

Does he know that Western grain farmers will lose 100 per cent of their subsidies, which represent a large part of their income, while dairy producers—1,000 of whom live in my riding—will lose 15 per cent of their subsidies, which account for 9 per cent of their income? Fifteen per cent of 9 per cent, all of which can be recovered under the production cost formula within the Canadian dairy plan. Does he know this already? And if he does, why did he say the things he just said, when he knows better?

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague opposite, the Liberal Party whip and hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, for his question.

It is true that he has many farmers in his riding. However, I read yesterday in a newspaper that one of his constituents, Réjean Pommainville of the FAO in the riding of Russell, said: "The withdrawal of the dairy subsidy represents 6 per cent of farm income for Ontario dairy producers". He went on to say: "We can assess at $4,500—" It is one of your constituents and not someone from Frontenac.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, but you must address the Chair.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, Réjean Pommainville is not from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville but from Russell, in the hon. member's riding. He said: "We can assess at $4,500 the loss per dairy farm in Ontario".

• (1245)

How much will the dairy producers in his riding receive as compensation? Nothing! How much will Western producers receive? An amount of $2.9 billion. That is unfair. Since forty-seven per cent of industrial milk is produced in Quebec, Quebecers will be hit hardest by this budget. Dairy producers know it and I hope that they will understand some day.

In August 1995, when the Canadian Dairy Commission is asked by producers to approve an increase in the price of milk, it will probably agree and pass on to all Canadians the increase that you did not have the courage to impose. It will be a consumption tax on butter, cheese, yogurt and ice cream.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Frontenac for his praise of a close personal friend of mine, Réjean Pommainville.

An hon. member: A former friend of yours.

Mr. Boudria: I do not think the hon. member opposite is in any position to decide who my friends are. Mr. Pommainville can decide for himself. He is a distinguished member of the community in Limoges. His father, Armand Pommainville, who is now in his 80s, was one of the presidents of the Russell County Liberal Association. I take this opportunity to thank him for his great work for the Liberal Party.

The hon. member opposite always failed to admit what all Canadians know is true and he should know as well: we have a production cost formula for price adjustment. Also, he failed to respond to the following: why did he claim that dairy producers were in a situation similar to that of grain producers and that dairy producers were being dealt with unfairly when this is not the case?

We know full well that there is a production cost formula in place, and that there is no comparison with Western grain producers, who are loosing 100 per cent of their subsidies, which is a much higher percentage. Finally, does the hon. member not know that corn producers in his region for example, as well as many other grain producers in Eastern Canada, were not all that crazy about the Crow's Nest agreement?

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, there is no question in what the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell just said. The name of his riding is so long, it reads like a newspaper. My point is that the Western Grain Transportation Act has been in force for 98 years. It has always cost billions of dollars to operate. Yes, Transport Canada did reduce the amounts involved gradually, from year to year.

If you look at the books, you will see a sum of $560 million mentioned in there. Did you know that grain was stored in hopper cars, shipped to Thunder Bay and then back to Vancouver? This system was administered by our governments, and the Liberals have been in power almost all the time since 1960. The Liberals just watched hopper cars travel back and forth at taxpayers' expense. Let us pay.

Now, they want to save $560 million in the future, while paying out nearly $3 billion. This is a disgrace.

• (1250)

How much is there for Quebec farm and dairy producers in there? Nothing, as usual; in fact, they have to make further sacrifices. Madam Speaker, our colleague, Mr. Landry, would have a question, if you would recognize him.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Only 40 seconds remain. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I listened to what my hon. colleague said and I wonder if he could tell me how he would have divided up this $2,9 billion from coast to coast. Would he have divided it fairly? I would like him to elaborate on this.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Madam Speaker, you are right, I have very little time to answer a question that would require a good 15 minutes. At any rate, I can tell you that, as far as several of my constituents are concerned, and many Quebec voters, including farm producers, this budget is totally unfair and is an example of mismanagement.

Let me remind you again, Madam Speaker, that the oldest research station, in La Pocatière, was closed after $7 million was sunk into it. It had not even been inaugurated yet.

[English]

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I wish to advise the Chair that I will be sharing my time with the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River.

It gives me great pleasure to rise today in support of this legislation and with it, to provide support for the budget presented to Canadians on February 27. I congratulate the Minister of Finance. His was not an easy task. He has worked in bringing together this country's varied interests and has delivered a budget that deserves the support of every single Canadian and every single member in this House.

The premier of Ontario has called it the most reactionary budget the country has seen in his lifetime. We had a choice. We could whine or we could take action. This budget is not reactionary but it does react to the concerns expressed by my constituents, the people of Guelph—Wellington. The Minister of Finance and the government have heard their concerns regarding tax fairness, government spending and deficit reduction.

The people of Guelph—Wellington made it clear to me they wanted action from this federal budget. They wanted a clear indication that we were to keep our promise to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of the GDP. They wanted their money better spent. They wanted a reduction in federal expenditures. They wanted most of all tax fairness.

Last December 1 I rose in this House and reminded hon. members that my constituents believed the only way to show the world that Canada was committed to real deficit reduction was to prove our commitment to fiscal discipline. On February 27 the government presented its budget to Canadians and the world. The reaction has been very positive.

Each generation has few opportunities, if any, to fundamentally change and better its public institutions. The people of Guelph—Wellington have asked me to offer them a better way of delivering public services.

In the last election they rejected politics as usual and they rejected parties that offered only a negative view of their country. My children and the children of every one of my constituents have asked me to come to this place and restore opportunity for them and for their children. This budget gives them that opportunity and challenges all of us to create a new and better Canada.

On the surface, Guelph—Wellington has fared well in this budget. We do not have a large population of civil servants, nor do we rely on a military base. My constituents welcome the news that there are no increases in personal taxes.

A recent editorial in the Guelph Tribune described my community as populated by those ordinary Canadians who are fed up with high taxes, anxious to keep their social fabric and critical of government waste and spending. For my constituents' sake, the measures before us here today and the entire budget must be approved as soon as possible so that we can continue to improve their lives and the lives of all Canadians.

● (1255)

The people of Guelph—Wellington are anxious about the future. They are not wasteful in their spending. They support the government in its efforts to not only reduce spending but to spend more wisely and more efficiently. As the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, they do not judge on the rhetoric of political parties. They judge on results.

While Guelph—Wellington may have fared better than some Canadian regions, my constituents know the budget calls on them to share the burden. They know that when the Minister of Finance completed his speech, the country changed. They know that with this change they were challenged.

The challenge they accepted is to expect less from government and to rely on resources other than government, and to work with government to redefine itself in order to make this country stronger than it has ever been. My constituents are aware that this new challenge will mean more sacrifice, and sacrifice necessary to ensure fairness, economic growth and job creation.

They have asked me to spend their money on programs that build and assist. Guelph—Wellington is a proud community. Strong and independent, it is a community whose people want what is right.

Throughout our history we have supported government that works. We have rejected the notion government should be the answer to everything that is wrong. They know government can create problems as well as solve them.

They want their federal government to serve them, to act on their behalf and to concentrate on doing what it does well. They want action and renewal, and they want us to act now.

In the last 15 months I have heard from constituents whose comments were addressed in this budget. They asked me to cut spending. Spending will be cut by $29 billion in the next three years and we have initiated the lowest program spending in relation to the economy since 1951. They wanted no taxes on RRSPs and group health and dental plans and we have for the second year in a row introduced no increases to personal taxes.

They wanted tax fairness and were concerned about bank profits, family trusts and tax evasion. We have delivered, ensuring that every region and every Canadian will pay their fair share and contribute to ensure that we will succeed.

Most of all, they wanted the deficit reduced. They were tired of governments offering unrealistic goals and giving targets that could never ever be reached.

During the election I met cynicism and skepticism at the door. Guelph—Wellington people were tired. They were fed up with representation that did not deliver and governments that could not and would not face up to the challenge.

This budget is for them. It offers them targets that can be met. It gives them goals that can be reached. It provides realistic strategies that can be measured. For the first time in years, they know government is serious about what it says and that it does what it promises.

Faced with the other option of irresponsible slashing and uncaring principles, the people of Guelph—Wellington said yes to the Liberal Party and they say yes to this budget.

It is not often that members of Parliament can debate a change so profound that future generations will look at them and thank them for making history and giving them a better country. We have this opportunity. We have the choice of criticising, of making desperate statements which support desperate policies, or we can rise above the negative and reach for the new and bold horizon.

My constituents demand nothing less of me. They demand nothing less of this government. This is not an easy budget to accept. Change is never easy. The measures announced on February 27 will be hard on Canadians.

The Guelph Mercury stated in an editorial following the budget, and I quote for the Reform Party: "The finance minister did not say it would be a painless budget. He said it would be a tough budget. And make no mistake, a tough budget is what he has delivered. Tough, but alas, necessary".

• (1300)

As difficult as these measures are, we can only imagine what failure to act would mean for us, our children and our grandchildren in the years to come.

What we do in the next few months will be judged not by us but by the people we serve and by the generations that follow. We must act and these actions will mean hardship, adjustment and pain, meted out with compassion. This is the Liberal way of doing business.

Our country, like the community of Guelph—Wellington, can survive. The people of Guelph—Wellington demand no less. It is for their sake that this bill and this budget are worthy of support. It can be done and it must be done. The best country in the world deserves no less.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Guelph—Wellington on her speech and ask her a question.

The question relates to the interest costs to service the debt which the Reform Party believes to be the major problem facing the country, with the deficit a contributing factor. Last year's interest costs are going to be in excess of $40 billion. At the end of two years interest costs are going to rise to over $50 billion.

How does the member for Guelph—Wellington propose to face her constituents and tell them that she will solve the rising interest cost problem by cutting program spending equal to the rise in interest costs? How she will resolve those two sides of the equation that have nothing to do with compassion but have a lot to do with responsible government?

It is totally irresponsible to face your constituents, telling them the deficit is the only problem and by lowering the deficit the problem will be solved. How she will reconcile the rise in interest costs from $40 billion today to $51 billion tomorrow? All the sacrifices to come eventually in her riding will have to be to just service the debt.

Mrs. Chamberlain: Madam Speaker, I will face my constituents very well. Already in my riding the budget is being received well and the hon. member across the way knows it is.

This has been a desperate attempt on the part of the Reform Party to try in some way to discredit a good budget. The budget will begin a process of honest reduction in all phases, at levels which our constituents have asked for. I am sure the hon. member's constituents have also asked for this.

I would ask the hon. member how he will face his constituents when they ask him why he would not support a budget that would support reductions in costs and reduce the deficit.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Madam Speaker, my colleague's constituents may be receiving this budget very well, but the people I represent in the riding of Matapédia—Matane are not.

The Minister of Finance told us in his speech, and he quoted his father, that it is necessary to plan ahead with courage and determination. I think that the Minister of Finance showed great courage and determination in looking to the least well off members of our society for money, and much timidity and hesitation in his treatment of the wealthy.

Very often, the members opposite accuse us of being negative. My honourable colleague, I am going to ask you a question and make a suggestion. I would like you to respond, positively I hope, to this suggestion. I will read you a few lines: "The Minister of Finance has deliberately avoided mentioning in this budget the large aquarium that is home to 104 elderly members of the same contented species, whose somnambulistic performance costs the government more than $42 million annually, not to mention the $349 million their former colleagues, also non–elected, draw in pensions".

• (1305)

Nevertheless, starting next year the government will quite happily go after the elderly. How is it that this budget does not touch the senators, who are costing us, who are costing the public, $42 million, not to mention their retired colleagues, who are costing a fortune?

[English]

Mrs. Chamberlain: Madam Speaker, as I indicated in my speech, the budget touched everyone. The hon. member knows that.

It is important to understand that we all share a pain and a burden. It is important that we all shoulder it together. It will make for a better country, as my comrade across the way said. It will make for a better country and a united Canada.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am deeply honoured to speak to Bill C–73, a bill to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1995. It will allow for the borrowing of funds by the finance minister, on approval of cabinet, to finance a shrinking annual deficit for the coming fiscal year.

I begin by extending my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Finance for a budget which has won the confidence of not only the international markets but also, and more importantly, of all Canadians. The budget displays a firm commitment to Canadian values by promoting jobs and growth and by protecting the most vulnerable Canadians by looking to government first for action. The deficit is primarily being dealt with through spending cuts in a 7:1 ratio over the next three years. This means spending cuts will amount to $7 for every $1 in revenue increase.

The budget, with its emphasis on fairness, has looked to spending cuts rather than personal income taxes to achieve its goals. We heard the Canadians who told us not to raise income tax and we have not. The budget is fair. The budget closes loopholes and tax breaks for the rich. It focuses on those who are able to contribute more and asks them to do so, like the banks. We all must contribute. It does not increase taxes for the middle class.

The budget is fair to all regions of the country. The Minister of Finance has taken great care to ensure that cutbacks to the different regions are distributed fairly and equitably. Our fiscal problem is a national one. All regions need to contribute to the diminution of our fiscal problem. We must work together.

Aspects of the budget such as the Canada social transfer will enhance the flexibility of the federal system by allowing provinces to determine to a greater degree how best they can meet their specific needs while retaining a role for the national government.

I must commend the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food for working very hard on behalf of Canada's farmers through a very difficult budgetary process. We all recognize that every Canadian must share in the reduction of the deficit. Canadian farmers are not excluded from this effort. They have shown a willingness to participate before, they have shown resilience before, and I am certain they realize the necessity of the changes before us.

Spending has been reduced. However, farmers have always said that given good opportunities they would prefer not to be subsidized. Farmers are ready to adapt and succeed and they will again. These changes outlined in the budget affecting grain transport, income support and stabilization, trade, marketing, research, adaptation and rural development will reduce the cost to government but they will also improve efficiency and competitiveness to encourage economic diversification, value added production and processing. This will give farmers the opportunities they have always wanted.

In Saskatchewan the transportation subsidy known as the Crow rate provided cheap transportation of raw agricultural products but it also created an economy of dependence and inefficiency and in some cases was detrimental to the environment.

• (1310)

We needed to change the way we think about subsidies and transportation, not least because of the realities of the World Trade Organization which limits trade distorting subsidies. Farmers need to take a leading role in adhering to the principles of the World Trade Organization. I know that European and American subsidies will also decline. It is my view that Canada has much more to gain than lose when dealing on a level playing field because Canadian farmers have the highest quality products and are already the most efficient in the world.

Our priorities are cost efficiency and effectiveness in growing, moving and selling grain. Farmers will benefit from this and they will become more and more able to determine their own financially secure futures. Their reduced reliance on subsidies means that governments will be able to focus in an efficient and effective way on the things that government does best, providing assistance for people to adjust to the changing times and providing information on new markets and new production opportunities.

We will not leave the farmers to adjust to this change alone. They will receive a one time payment of $1.6 billion to assist them in the transition.

Our fiscal realities must be addressed. The government has faced these challenges fairly and in every area. Reduced spending is the golden opportunity for economic growth. Reduced spending helps to be more acutely aware of local economic opportunities and less enamoured with regulation and control where it is not necessary.

Let me share two examples from my riding of Prince Albert—Churchill River where relaxation of government regulations will allow and promote economic growth and jobs.

First, at the federal level the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation has a monopoly at present over the marketing and processing of freshwater fish. In the past this served the fishermen well, but it has outlived its usefulness. The government must break inefficient monopolies like this one. In doing so a local fish processing plant within the riding will bring jobs and growth to the area and give greater support to northern fishermen with better prices for raw product.

Second, at the provincial level SaskPower has a monopoly over the generation of electrical energy in Saskatchewan. If this monopoly is allowed to be opened up in a sensible way, local initiatives could react more quickly and efficiently, and provide electrical energy at reduced rates. Weyerhauser Canada would be able to build an electrical co–generation plan which would make it more competitive while maintaining exacting environmental standards and enhancing environmental protection.

This may open the door for the further expansion of Weyerhauser's pulp and paper production capacity. The possibilities for economic spin–offs are great. These initiatives mean jobs, they mean growth and they mean a prosperous Prince Albert—Churchill River.

We must strike a healthy balance for the role of government in economic development. We must facilitate growth and allow for local initiatives to flourish. We must provide the context for a dynamic and innovative economy, unimpeded by the dinosaurs that have monopolized the economy in the past.

Governments cannot afford to be economic and social dictators any more. They can afford to be enablers of growth, enablers of individual community, provincial and national creativity, economically and socially from coast to coast.

Too much government money has created in us the belief that government can fix everything. It cannot. It has created economic and social dependency. The budget and this bill have set Canada on a course where people will be free to succeed. They will be free to build that sense of community, of caring and sharing that has been eroded by the misplaced belief that government can and must do everything. Governments will now be free to be true partners with one another and the people, a partnership that will result in economic growth and an even greater feeling of compassion and community.

Yes, we are all responsible one for the other. Because we borrow less money, because we use less money, we shall be free to prosper together and to help one another.

Once again, my sincere congratulations to the finance minister who has done a great job with a great budget.

• (1315)

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have two questions for the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River.

The first one is with regard to agriculture. During the election campaign I heard this member and many of his colleagues from Saskatchewan defending agricultural programs, saying they were going to defend the farmers, that these things would not change, that the funds would keep coming.

By what reasoning can he defend his government's actions of drastically reducing the funds farmers receive? We came clearly up front during the election and said that we would take these funds and there would be a reduction. However, those funds would go into an account that would help prepare the farmer and protect him from subsidies by other foreign nations. Now the farmer is left with nothing. How can the member possibly reconcile this new radically different position from what they said during the election?

The second question is with regard to the MP pension plan. I am wondering how this member can justify borrowing money to pay himself and his colleagues a huge pension.

Why is it important to opt out of the MP pension plan, a very extravagant plan? It is important that we set the example. We can always find excuses about why we deserve more and how we ought to have more. If we realize as parliamentarians what a mess this country is in, I am wondering if we do not have to start by setting the example.

I was recently asked a question after this was announced of whether the MP pension plan will hurt me personally. Of course it will. If I opt out, it is as if I had the winning ticket in a lottery and never went to pick up my million dollars. Of course it will hurt. I will always know and live with that fact, that I could have gone back to my constituents and justified the fact that I deserved that money. However, I think there is a time when principles count for something. We are opting out to signal to Canadians how serious our problems are. I am wondering how this hon. member can justify borrowing more money to pay MPs an extravagant pension.

Mr. Kirkby: Madam Speaker, the hon. member opposite indicates that he listened to me and my hon. colleagues say something different than what is happening now in relation to agricultural subsidies. It is quite obvious that he was not paying close attention to what was happening in Prince Albert—Churchill River if that is what he thinks.

It has always been my position that while we do need agricultural support programs, we need them at such a level where they are adequate and predictable, where they are not changing week after week as has been happening in Saskatchewan over the last number of years, where everybody is going to know what the rules are.

Specifically with respect to the Crow benefit, it was indicated during the election that what would happen with the Crow benefit was subject to what happened at the GATT negotiations which occurred after the election. This was clearly stated to the public, to the farmers. The GATT negotiations necessitate change and we are doing the change, which is exactly what we said during the election campaign.

With respect to the hon. member's talk about MPs' pensions, when members of the Reform Party opposite table in this House a letter from the Alberta government saying that one of its members no longer accepts a big pension while he is sitting here as a member of this House earning a salary, when the hon. Reform Party also sets forth a letter from national defence and the RCMP saying that members who are retired from those areas are not getting those federal pensions, then perhaps we can talk about the views of the federal pension plans. There is a great deal of hypocrisy within the Reform Party on the issue of pensions.

This government said exactly what it would do in the red book with respect to MP pensions and has gone even further than it said in the red book. This government lives up to our commitments. We lived up to them before. We will live up to them in the future. The judgment has been made by the international monetary markets and all Canadians as to the success of our budgetary endeavours.

• (1320)

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I will be dividing my time with other Reformers.

I really become frustrated every day as I sit in the House. Every time Reformers rise to speak on behalf of average Canadians we are met with laughter, jeers, derisive comments from the Liberal Party. I began to wonder why we are mocked and ridiculed when we have the courage to be up front and honest with Canadians.

I did not come here to be on a power trip. I came here to solve the problems. The biggest problems we face are the national debt, the annual deficits and rising interest costs.

I have four teenage children who will pay over half of their income in taxes for the rest of their lives for the mistakes made by the Liberal Party during the past 25 years. Through my work in this House I hope and pray that my grandchildren will be able to see their taxes go down.

I hear the Liberals already saying it is not their fault, that the Tories were in power for nine years. That is a very lame excuse because not once in those nine years while the Liberals were the official opposition did they tell the Conservatives to get their spending under control, balance the budget and put a cap on increasing interest payments.

The Liberals protested every cut and they wailed for more government spending on social programs that do not work. The Liberals are responsible for the fiscal mess this country is in and even now while they are in power they are unwilling to face the painful truth.

During the 1993 election Reformers told the truth about the state of the country's finances and our zero in three plan. The Liberals put out a red ink book which played politics and ignored the truth.

In the taxpayers' budget we introduced last week Reformers told the truth. This week the Liberals introduced a budget which once again ignores the truth and plays politics. Because this government keeps putting off the inevitable it is slowly destroying the country.

The Liberals keep cutting back on programs and services, increasing taxes. Because they do not cut enough to balance the budget interest costs keep going up and the federal government keeps going deeper into debt.

Reformers have proposed two plans to get off this deficit and debt treadmill and the Liberals ignore the truth when it is as plain as the numbers in the budget in front of them.

This deficit is like a cancerous tumour, eating away at our flesh. It is making us sick and preventing us from living a healthy life. The most compassionate operation one could do is a surgical removal of this deficit tumour. Instead the Liberals operate very year just cutting out a little, letting the cancerous deficit tumour keep growing. As it grows it eats up more and more of pensions, welfare, health care and the programs run by the government. It does not take a rocket surgeon to figure out that the most compassionate thing one can do is undergo the pain of removing the tumourous deficit as quickly as possible.

Bill C–73 is a disgrace. This bill is a confession of failure by this government and past governments. This bill clearly demonstrates how firmly entrenched annual deficits have become to feed the federal government's overspending addiction. This bill provides the evidence that governments past and present have been unable and unwilling to live within their means.

While many Canadians will think we are debating the budget today, I would like to clarify that we are debating a bill which shows the failure of all previous governments during each of the last 20 years to balance their budgets.

• (1325)

Each year we debate a bill like this one to give the federal government the authority to borrow the billions and billions of dollars which it says it needs to make life better. Canadian taxpayers are waiting to elect a government that will tell them the year when there will be no need for the government to introduce a bill giving it authority to borrow money.

This bill asks Parliament to give the government authority to borrow $28,900,000,000. I think it would be very interesting for Canadians to know something about the process. It has become so commonplace, so routine for the government to borrow billions of dollars each year, year after year, that it even has a permanent standing order in the House of Commons which limits debate on this bill to two sitting days during second reading. Not only does the government want Parliament to give it authority to borrow billions of dollars every year, it also does not want to give opposition parties or even taxpayers enough time to properly debate questions or propose alternatives for the government to consider.

The Liberal party says it needs money, fast; do not take too long about it either. Two days of debate is lots. How many questions can we ask about borrowing $28.9 billion anyway? No amount of debate, no amount of intelligent questions, no amount of committee meetings, votes, amendments or motions to reduce the government's estimates is going to change one thing anyway, so why bother? Why bother debating it?

Liberals think that debating the budget or this borrowing bill is a complete waste of time. They think this because they know that when all is said and done, when the debates, when the questions, when the analysis are over they will not have changed this budget one cent. All this talk that we do in here every day has absolutely no influence on what is decided in those back rooms.

This budget is a disgrace because it spends too much, it cuts too little and it gives no hope to Canadian taxpayers that the Liberal government will ever be able to produce a balanced budget. This budget is a disgrace but this budget process is an even bigger disgrace. The process is a disgrace because it goes against common sense and against democratic principles.

Why can 295 members of Parliament not enter into an intelligent debate? If the majority agrees that there are more or better ways to save taxpayers' money, why would the government not agree to implement the recommendations? Why is the most important piece of legislation which the government brings down every year set in stone? Why will the Liberal government not allow Canadians to have input through their democratically elected representatives at this most critical point in the budget process? Does it honestly believe that this budget is the best there can possibly be? Does it honestly believe that every dollar outlined in the estimates is essential?

New ideas are developed every day, but this government says that it cannot change the budget. It needs to borrow $28.9 billion and nothing we can say or do will ever change its mind. Is that any way to run a country?

Any changes which we as Reformers suggested are scoffed at, even in committee. Not one change took place from all the changes I suggested. Some of the changes were small and none of them took place in that committee, which handles more money than any other committee.

If a Reform government were in power today it would have the budget balanced by 1998 and the Government of Canada would no longer need a borrowing bill. If a Reform government were in power borrowing bills would not be a routine occurrence year after year. A borrowing bill under a Reform government would be a rarity. Under a Reform government a borrowing bill would be such a rarity that taxpayers would want to know what fiscal or natural emergency brought about the occurrence. They would be asking their members of Parliament to rise to ask the government what had happened. It would be a national news story. What we are doing here today will not get any press. I would be surprised if it did.

There are two extremes in this debate. On the one hand the Liberals want to limit debate on borrowing $28.9 billion to two days during second reading in an attempt to circumvent the democratic process.

• (1330)

On the other hand, the Reform Party is proposing to implement a taxpayers protection act that would limit the ability of majority governments to run spending deficits, raise taxes and borrow money. Our taxpayers protection act would force governments to balance their spending and taxes over the course of each business cycle. It would put a cap on government spending and taxation. Eventually our taxpayers protection act would be entrenched in the Constitution to prevent future governments from changing it.

In closing I point out the major failing in the government's budget: the government is actually transferring more to banks in interest payments than it spends on social programs.

In this fiscal year the government will spend $49.5 billion on interest payments and $49.2 billion on social programs, which include old age security and pensions, health transfers, education transfers, welfare programs, and equalization payments to the provinces.

In 1996–97 the Liberals project that interest payments will be over $50 billion a year. Not only do the Liberals have to cut more spending to balance the budget, but every dollar that Liberals spend in interest payments is a dollar they cannot spend on social programs.

This is a failure. The bill is a disgrace. The process is undemocratic. I am frustrated with the House of Commons and what goes on here. We need to be taken more seriously.

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for Yorkton—Melville for his input. Many of us on this side listen to what they have to say. I know whenever there were good ideas that previous governments sort of gobbled them up and used them as theirs.

I will make a couple of comments and then I will ask a question. One comment I hear a lot in the House from Reformers is about the red ink book. I am the member for Bruce—Grey and I want to tell them that the word redd means cleaning up a mess and getting the house in order. That is exactly what the government is doing.

In the sixties we had problems with a fuel crisis. There were mechanics who fixed old fashioned cars with carburettors. However, modern cars from perhaps 1993 onward are distinctly different; they do not have carburettors. When drivers put their foot to the floor in cars with carburettors, a certain volume of air came in through the carburettor, mixed with the fuel, and the fuel was dumped out the exhaust.

Modern cars have from one to four computers. When drivers switch on modern cars the computers react to the temperature outside. If it is zero degrees they know exactly what kind of fuel is needed. There is no RPM from the RPM gauge. There is no air flow through the manifold pressure sensing devices. The computer plugs in the value. The car starts and goes into what is called an open loop. In that open loop the computer triggers. The oxygen sensing device senses the fuel coming out of the carburettor. It knows that maybe it is too rich and sends a message back to the computer. The RPM works and so on and so forth.

I am using this analogy because the government is like the modern devices on cars. We have people with the talent and ability, such as the finance minister, the Prime Minister, members of the cabinet and members of the government including the rump over there, to adjust to new conditions.

In the case of a brand new car, if drivers want to pass they put their foot to the floor. The air conditioning system and everything that is not necessary are shut down. That is the first thing that happens.

The government found itself in the position where there was debt that had been incurred over two decades at which time no government had the political will to do what we are doing. We are chopping $29 billion over the next three years. We have contingency funds. We have gold reserves. We have dollars to back up situations when the interest rates rise to make sure that we can look after that particular eventuality.

• (1335)

In addition, we are not like members opposite who open the hood of a new car and shut it because they do not know how to fix it. They come back with old–fashioned ideas, looking for the carburettor that is not there or looking for some other device that is not there. That is their problem. If they have great ideas to suggest to the House, I assure them we will accept them.

What would the Reform Party do to repatriate our foreign debt?

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, that is an interesting question. I listened to the preamble and the question had nothing to do with what he was telling me. There was absolutely no relation. It is the typical Liberal approach to a problem.

We have a huge government problem. The Liberals tinker with it a bit, make a few minor cuts and tell everybody how great it is that they are making these cuts. They do not look at the overall picture.

I like his example of cars with carburettors. The government is choking off the economy. If they put in too much gas, if they borrow too much money and have a government that is too big, they choke off the economy. That is what the government is doing. The government really does not have much of an idea about how the economy works.

I also like his analogy of using the colour red, because very often it means bleeding, bleeding, bleeding the taxpayer to death.

In conclusion I say again that the process is undemocratic. When I go home I am overwhelmed and humbled by the support I get. It is dishonest of the government to make fun of us.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a real pleasure to stand in the House today to address the request of the government to borrow $28.9 billion, something that has become an extremely bad habit that the government must soon break before it breaks the country.

It is very important to put that $28.9 billion in perspective. As people in the House know, but perhaps the public is not aware of it, we have a debt today of $551 billion. It is one of the highest debt to GDP ratios in the world. We have huge problems with respect to the amount of overspending we have done over the last 22 years. I would point out that over that period of time mostly Liberal governments have been in place.

It is even more discouraging that the government has set a goal for itself: to spend another $100 billion more than it takes in during the four years before its mandate is up. We will have a debt of over $600 billion before its mandate is up. I find it shocking. I find it alarming. However, the government has put that into its plans. It says that somehow it is a good thing and the rational way to proceed. I reject that.

Let us talk about what happens to an economy when a government continues to overspend day after day and year after year. I invite hon. members across the way to look at what has happened to the unemployment rate and compare it to the rise of the debt and the deficit. They move in parallel courses, both rising upward very sharply. I find that quite alarming.

I invite members across the way to note that tax levels have rocketed upward with the debt and the deficit. That impedes the ability of the economy to produce jobs. By the way, I point out to my friends across the way that governments do not produce jobs. Business does. When they take credit for 450,000 new jobs being created, it is an insult to the business people who work everyday to make a living, to make a profit to support their families.

A country is a lot like a river. There is a tremendous amount of power in a river when it shoots down a river valley. It can produce a lot of good when there is a water wheel or a turbine in that river; as the river goes rushing by it produces a lot of energy. There is a tremendous amount of good out of that.

Governments are a lot like dams. The good governments are very small dams. Mostly they allow the river to keep flowing, to push forward to the sea, its ultimate goal. The bad governments are the very big dams. Those big dams are constructed when governments continue to overspend and overregulate. They build the dam up bigger and bigger. Pretty soon the river quits flowing and the economy as a parallel stops.

• (1340)

We now have a huge dam on the river. We have a lot of water sitting dormant. I equate that to all the potential productivity in the country that is not fulfilled because it has to sit there. Then there is the water that evaporates from the dam. I would equate that to all the people who have left the country. I am talking about people with high skill levels and lots of capital who can go to other jurisdictions. Many of them have. We see doctors fleeing across the border. We see businesses running across the border. I admit the NDP government in Ontario has not been a big help; it has contributed to the problem.

We also see a lot of the water ending up in a backwater in sloughs. I equate that to people stuck on social programs who see no hope coming forward because the government has created safety nets that are more like fishing nets. People get caught in them and are unable to escape.

Unfortunately the human resources development minister has failed completely to come up with a new way to provide social security for people while at the same time not remove incentives to work.

The final thing that happens with a big dam is that eventually trickles of water start to undermine the dam or go around it because they flow up over the riverbank. I would equate that to the people who have joined the underground economy and are continuing to pursue their dreams in spite of the government and not because of it. More and more of that is going on all the time.

The last subject I want to talk about is my children and everybody's children. I phone home at night and talk with my youngest little boy who is six years old. I hear his little voice on the other end of the telephone line. I find it very exciting. I sit and talk with that little twerp for a few minutes about how his day was and what kind of aspirations he has. I talk with my 10–year–old about the same sorts of things. I find that very uplifting. At the same time I find it very sad.

Like everybody in this place and like Canadians everywhere who have hopes and dreams for their children, grandchildren, nieces and nephews, I get discouraged and angry when I hear that the government is planning to load another $100 billion on to the backs of those children. Government members laugh about it. They sit there and laugh about it like they are doing right now. That makes me fighting mad.

I am telling members across the way that if they continue to do this they will have to bear it on their consciences. It is a big joke to them. They sit and laugh about it. However, Canadians do not laugh about it. They will pay a huge price the next election when they have to explain how they can justify adding $100 billion to the debt, driving people out of the country, driving jobs out of the country and destroying the social safety net.

When will they have the guts to do the right thing: start cutting, get the economy back on track and get a handle on the debt and deficit? I can hardly wait for them to stand and challenge me on questions and comments because I have some questions of my own.

Government members sit there blithely joking about the fact they will borrow another $28.9 billion. I hope they can explain it next week to their constituents who have children like I do and like most of the people in this place and are wondering how in the world they can pay back those bills after 22 years of overspending.

I appreciate the chance to talk to government members about this matter. I truly hope they get the message not only from me but from taxpayers across the country who are fed up with 22 years of overspending.

• (1345)

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's speech. Maybe he has not had a chance to read the newspapers today. In Ontario there has been a 78 per cent acceptance of the budget as it was presented. The lowest percentage of support in Canada was in Quebec and that was at 55 per cent. All the other provinces fell in between those two figures. What we have presented to Canadian taxpayers is a fair but lean budget, which is exactly what they called for. That is what my constituents called for.

I would like to challenge the hon. member because I have had a chance to read the budget which his party presented. What I read was something similar to the doctor saying to the family outside of the operating room that the operation was a success but unfortunately the patient died. The Reform party is talking about cutting $15 billion from social security. I would like to know from the hon. member where he would cut that $15 billion from something that is the fabric of this nation.

Mr. Solberg: Madam Speaker, I reject very much the hon. member's premise which is that the social safety net is somehow the fabric of this nation, as though people in this country cannot somehow create their own tremendous culture by virtue of their own dreams and aspirations and in what they contribute to the country.

Having said that, I would be happy to answer the hon. member's question. He has asked where we would cut and we laid it out explicitly, unlike the government. During the election campaign government members said not to worry about social programs, they were not going to touch them. A year later, of course, they did a tremendous flip–flop. The hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce announced that the government has flip–flopped on its red book promises. There is still $20 billion that the government will have to cut to get its deficit to zero, at least $20 billion by its own projections, and it has not laid out how it expects to get there.

Is the government telling people everything? Is it really not going to cut any more social programs, like it says, or is it going to get to zero like it tells people? It cannot be both ways.

We have been very up front with people. We said we would cut $15 billion. We would cut $3 billion out of old age security. It will go from $20 billion to $17 billion. We would make big cuts to transfers for welfare. We have said that. We are not embarrassed at all to say that. We know that we have to do that so that ultimately we will not allow social programs to completely unravel. We have to make those cuts.

I would like to emphasize again that for the hon. member to say somehow Canada is a social safety net is ridiculous. People who work every day for a living look at that. People who contribute to the economy and make great contributions to the culture of this nation look at that and say if that is the best we can do to become a country, produce some bloated government bureaucracy to come up with a bunch of social programs, that is not a country at all. That is a social welfare state. The hon. member across the way does not understand the country at all.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my friend's version of the new trickle down theory. He elaborated so much that it became a river flow for a while.

It has always intrigued me how the Reform party—and I say this with all respect because I believe it is serious when it makes these proposals—believes that somehow if we reward the rich and the wealthy the benefits will eventually trickle down to regular folks. I want to say to my friends in the Reform party that Canadians are fed up with being trickled on. For years and years there has been this trickle down approach, first from the Tories and now from the Liberals with the encouragement from my friends in the Reform party.

I listened carefully to my hon. friend's presentation today. The impression he leaves is the country with the least amount of government is the best country. By that definition countries such as Africa would be booming in terms of their economies and things would be great.

• (1350)

The fundamental reason we are the number one place out of 192 countries in the world in which to live and raise a family is government programs of all sorts.

What country in the world would he hold up as a model of his approach; in other words, an example of less government, fewer social programs?

Mr. Harris: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. While the member for Medicine Hat was on debate he was referring to his relationship with his children and the hon. member for London—Middlesex was hurling comments across the floor directed at the hon. member's children.

I find that absolutely reprehensible.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I do not believe that is a point of order. The hon. member for Medicine Hat, very briefly.

Mr. Solberg: Madam Speaker, in response to the member for Kamloops, I guess the country I would hold up is the country that Canada used to be. There was a time when people were counted on to rely on their own resources to a great extent to find their way in the world. They did that most admirably and it enabled us to build a social welfare state that would protect the people who could not look after—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Resuming debate, the hon. Minister of Public Works and Government Services.

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a real opportunity for me to participate in this debate and to share with my colleagues on all sides of the House the activities that my departments and agencies will be doing over the next 12 months and for the next three years.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague, the Minister of Finance, who tabled the budget here on Monday of this week, which addressed a number of fundamental problems that the Canadian government has been faced with not only for the last year and half but for the last nine or ten years.

I want to congratulate my colleague, the Minister of Finance, on facts which are indisputable. For instance, over the last year there have been 433,000 jobs created in this country. The unemployment rate has fallen by 1.7 per cent. I think all members will recognize that although that is encouraging it is certainly not enough. However, it is a positive indicator.

Exports are at a record breaking level, something Canadians ought to be proud of. As we export our products it means additional investment for Canadians and thereby jobs for Canadians whether they are in New Brunswick or in other parts of Canada, including Ontario and western Canada.

Inflation is the lowest in three decades, another factor that ought to be taken into consideration. Canada had the best economic growth of any major industrialized country in 1994. Canada is set to have the best job creation record and the best economic growth record of the G–7 countries in 1995.

If that is not an indication of support for the Minister of Finance and the plan that he put before Parliament in 1994, as he did here on Monday evening, I do not know what further affirmation one could get to say that we have the full confidence in the Minister of Finance and the plans he has laid before the people of Canada.

I think many members would recognize that I do not like to be partisan in debate, and therefore I will select a quote from a newspaper today which I believe stated that 78 per cent of the people in Ontario, the largest province in this country, supported unequivocally the budget of the Minister of Finance.

This budget, as I have said both privately and publicly, is a tough budget because it affects the lives of a lot of Canadians. In my own departments and agencies there are some substantial reductions. I offer to the House, as I believe I did on a previous occasion, that there would be substantial cutbacks in Public Works and Government Services Canada. Over a three–year period my department will contribute toward reducing the deficit in that particular department in excess of $350 million. There are 5,263 employees who will be dislocated as a result of this federal budget. Those who have the audacity to suggest that kind of measure is not a tough measure are missing the point.

I realize I only have a few moments but I want to share with the House a couple of important features of the budget, particularly in my Department of Public Works and Government Services. Canada Mortgage and Housing is reducing its expenditures in order to contribute toward the deficit. The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency over a three–year period will reduce its expenditures by $173 million with person years being displaced.

The Royal Canadian Mint will try to contribute to increasing the revenues for the Government of Canada by the introduction of the $2 coin and by reducing the composition of the different coins, thereby providing additional revenues.

I know members wish—

The Speaker: My hon. colleague, we are all waiting with baited breath for you to continue your words and of course when we return after Question Period you will be recognized first off.

It being two o'clock, we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

NORDIC WORLD SKI CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I inform this House that for the first time in history the Nordic World Ski Championships will take place in our country in Thunder Bay, Ontario from March 9 to 19.

Picturesque Thunder Bay and its hospitable residents will be host to over 40 nations for this 11–day sporting event, including over 800 skiers, coaches and trainers, over 500 international media, over 200 officials and 50,000 spectators. An expected audience of over 400 million viewers will observe the action by satellite, including 31 hours of prime time coverage in Europe.

This spectacular event has been made possible because of the dedication of thousands of volunteers from the area and the continuous support of the Minister of Canadian Heritage and his staff.

JOB CREATION

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, not only does the Minister of Finance's budget target the poor once again, it offers nothing to stimulate employment. The minister himself implicitly recognizes that fact, since he predicts no improvement regarding the unemployment rate, which currently stands at 9.7 per cent for Canada and 12 per cent for Quebec.

Not only does the budget include no job creation initiatives, it delays the infrastructure program, the only measure announced in the previous budget to stimulate employment. The infrastructure program, which was initially designed as an emergency measure to stimulate employment following the recession, will now be spread over five years.

One cannot help but wonder if the minister lives on a different planet. Is he not aware that, to get back to the pre–recession employment level, close to 800,000 jobs must be created in Canada? It is time for the minister to get to work on that.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today with no notice to either the press or the opposition, the immigration minister announced that in the IRB, single members will replace panels, a treaty is under way with the U.S. to stop refugee claimants at the border, and cost savings, if any, will go to overseas selection of refugees. That is amazing.

In our paper on refugee determination, we called for only one person to hear claims. We called for denying the hearings to those who had travelled through the U.S. We called for inland cost savings to go overseas. I am glad this minister read our paper. If he really wanted to reform the process then he would stand up to special interests, scrap the IRB and restore some real common sense and accountability to the system.

Today's announcement will not make the system more accountable. It does not guarantee that the world's highest refugee acceptance rate will go anywhere but up. It does not do what needs to be done. That is altogether typical of the immigration minister: lots of talk but no real reform.

CUVÉE 1995

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Cuvée 1995 is a three day celebration of Ontario's excellence in wine making. This weekend from March 3 to 5 wine makers and wine lovers from across the province will come to Niagara for the special celebration of Ontario wines.

The excellent reputation of Ontario wines continues to spread around the world. Ontario wines have received many international awards. Our own colleague, Gary Pillitteri, won a silver medal for Riesling best buy at the World Wine Championship in Chicago.

Last year, Cuvée 1994 presented a record number of wines for tasting from 30 of Ontario's wineries. This year promises to continue the great tradition which is now in its seventh year.

I invite all Canadians to Niagara to taste the excellent wines of Ontario.

The Speaker: I am sure the hon. member inadvertently mentioned the name of another member of Parliament. Sitting members of Parliament should be referred to by their riding.

THE BUDGET

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the most distressing responses that came out pursuant to our budget was the intellectual dishonesty which emanated from the premier of Ontario and his finance minister. Their answer to the budget was to inform the citizens of Ontario that it will result in fewer health benefits and fewer hospital beds, even though Mr. Laughren admits the hit means a meagre 2 per cent cut in provincial spending.

I was dismayed to hear this, but not surprised. It reveals the NDP mentality whose knee–jerk reaction is to punish the people of Ontario for electing a federal Liberal government, a government which has a post–budget approval rate of 63 per cent, an all–time high.

This does not have to be. We are giving the provinces the power to develop and apply solutions to their regional problems as they see fit. If they are not content with the amount of dollars given, let them tighten their belts as we are doing ours. However Premier Rae wants to tighten other people's belts. He would prefer to cut down on hospital beds but gives no thought to cutting his own government's waste and especially so—

MEMBERS AND PAGES HOCKEY GAME

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday we held the annual pages versus MPs hockey game. On this occasion the MPs won back the Challenge trophy which they had lost to the pages in 1993. Some Reform members suggested this was due to the fact that there were no longer any Conservatives with the team.

The game was notable in that this was a rare occasion when Liberals and Reformers co–operated in a winning effort. I must say it was also notable for the good spirit between the pages and the members.

The pages are to be congratulated for their great effort and for their accomplishments at gender balance. Several women played for the pages while none played for the MPs, although invited to do so.

Our thanks go to the members from Kindersley, Prince George, Macleod, Nickel Belt, Prince Albert, Halifax West and Algoma who all played an active role in the victory.

FEDERALISM

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the statements made yesterday in the Outaouais by some supporters of federalism are beyond comprehension.

• (1405)

How can the mayor of Hull, Yves Ducharme, seriously claim that the loss of 14,000 jobs in the Outaouais, as announced in Monday's budget, will stimulate the economy, after saying to the Commission sur l'avenir du Québec that independence would be catastrophic because it would result in job losses in the public service? How ironic!

The chairman of the Outaouais urban community, Marc Croteau, went even further by claiming that the federal budget would force the region to diversify its economy. Either these gentlemen do not understand anything about the economic issues in their region, or else they are trying to fool the public by promoting federalism in the Outaouais to further their own interests.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, just when the province of Alberta gets its own fiscal house in order, the Liberal Party of eastern Canada has once again swooped in and hammered her taxpayers.

The elimination of the public utilities income transfer tax is nothing more than a selective tax grab against Alberta's private sector which will raise gas and electric bills for all Albertans. The Minister of Natural Resources has truly shown us that Ottawa has become her primary residence. It is blatant partisan political endeavours like this that make Calgarians now question the closure of CFB Calgary.

Was this an economic decision in the best interests of the country or a political cheap shot at a city that sent six Reformers to Ottawa? Calgarians want to see the books. Show us this is truly a money saving measure and not a lesson for not voting Liberal.

Like all Albertans, Calgarians are prepared to tighten their belts as long as it is fair. As a reminder to the Prime Minister, no matter what the Liberals do politically to the west, Alberta will keep sending fiscally responsible Reformers to Ottawa.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the red book says: "Canadians with young families need a support system that enables parents to participate fully in the economic life of the country. That is why the availability of child care is an economic issue".

That is what the red book says. That is what the government promised the people of Canada. However, was child care even mentioned in the budget? Not a word. Now with the decision to proceed with block funding to the provinces, the federal government relinquishes what little influence it has to encourage the provinces to invest in child care.

Also, by slashing billions of dollars from provincial transfers, the government has reduced the ability of the provinces to offer quality child care. This is tragic. What does this say about a country that has turned its back on its children?

Children are our future. Young people are our future. Was the term youth even mentioned in the budget? Unfortunately not. Foreign bond traders and currency speculators may be happy with the budget, but what has the government done to our children and our youth, especially those in need?

ORDER OF CANADA

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night I had the honour of witnessing the appointment of John V. Basmajian to the Order of Canada as well as the promotion of the Right. Hon. Ellen Louks Fairclough within the Order of Canada at Rideau Hall.

Ellen Fairclough is widely respected and admired for her outstanding political, social and cultural contributions to Canada. In addition to representing my riding of Hamilton West in the House of Commons from 1950 to 1962, her appointment to the position of Secretary of State in 1957 made her Canada's first woman cabinet minister.

Professor Emeritus at McMaster University, John V. Basmajian greatly influenced generations of physicians in training. In addition to inventing several widely used medical devices, he is also a pioneer in the area of electromyography, which had a significant impact on the development of biofeedback techniques used for rehabilitation following injury to the central nervous system.

I know all members of this House will join me in honouring two outstanding Canadians: Professor John V. Basmajian, OC and the Right Hon. Ellen Louks Fairclough, PC, OC.

HEALTH CARE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the finance minister for maintaining in his budget the high level of national standards of our health care system. Although the member for Yukon stated yesterday in this House that the government had no intention of maintaining national standards in our health care system, nothing could be further from the truth.

Fears by the New Democratic Party of pending doom in the upcoming provincial elections should not encourage them to distort the honest truth about this government's commitment to health care in Canada. The Minister of Finance has made it clear in his budget that "the conditions of the Canada Health Act will be maintained. Universality, comprehensiveness, accessibility, portability and public administration of the Canada Health Act are fundamental for this government".

A Liberal government created our national health care program and we continue to earn the trust of Canadians by ensuring the continuation of this program.

• (1410)

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, more good news from Algoma riding.

Recently, a group of students from Elliot Lake Secondary School led by teacher Lindsay Killen invited Canadian high school students to write the leader of the Bloc Quebecois and the premier of Quebec to express their desire for a strong and united Canada. So far, the response has been tremendous. The group has received positive feedback from students across Canada.

Yesterday I had the pleasure of welcoming a delegation from Elliot Lake with over 1,000 letters from area students regarding their views on the importance of national unity and their love for Quebec.

I want to send a heartfelt thanks to the Bloc members for Portneuf, Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot and Québec Est, who graciously received these letters on behalf of their leader. They greeted the students with respect and sincerity. I was pleased with the open, caring and honest exchange of viewpoints on the issue of the future of our country.

This positive initiative demonstrates the youth of our country are genuinely concerned about the future of Canada. I salute the students of Elliot Lake Secondary School for their efforts in promoting national unity.

REFERENDUM DEBATE

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members of the Bloc Quebecois condemn the remarks made yesterday by Senator Jean–Louis Roux during "Le Point" on the French network of the CBC.

It is simply horrible that this senator from Quebec should make a comparison between the seeming disinterest in sovereignty shown by certain artists in Quebec and the silence of German intellectuals during the Nazi regime in the 1930s.

This comparison is completely wrong and absurd and is a stinging insult to Quebecers of every stripe who are engaging in the debate on Quebec sovereignty in a free and democratic manner.

In stating that he would leave Quebec in the event of a "yes" in the referendum, Senator Jean–Louis Roux is repudiating his fellow Quebecers who are trying to establish a country for themselves through democratic means. It is sad and disappointing.

POLITICAL PARTY FINANCES

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to report to the house that the Reform Party of Canada, the party that firmly believes in fiscal responsibility, completed the year 1994 with a surplus of close to $400,000.

I would also like to report that the Reform Party added the $400,000 to existing cash reserves in excess of $1 million. That is over $1 million in the bank, unlike the Liberal Party which finished 1994 with a debt of $2.5 million.

At the end of 1993 the Liberal Party, the party that is now taking inadequate steps toward federal deficit reduction, ran up its own operating deficit of $789,400.

Unfortunately, members may be confused by a newspaper account which recorded only a selected distorted portion of the Reform Party's financial picture.

Let me assure all Canadians that the Reform Party remains strongly committed to deficit reduction. The bottom line on our balance sheet proves it.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, prior to budget day, the government received a lot of free advice from the Reform Party on how to tackle Canada's debt and deficit. It still rings in our ears: Get your spending under control. Eliminate the deficit.

We now learn the Reform Party itself has slipped into the red. It is the truth. Scout's honour, cross my heart and hope to die. The Reform Party is running a deficit. The party which preaches frugality has been spending more than it earns. It has failed to balance its books. It cannot control its urge to spend.

Wait until the people back home get the news. What will their constituents think when they learn the Reformers' motto: Do as I preach, not as I do. The hypocrisy, the betrayal.

Perhaps Reform MPs need another telephone town hall. Take heed Reformers or you might just hear that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

CANADA GAMES

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the Canada Games in Grand Prairie, Alberta, the New Brunswick judo team earned a total of eight medals, with the male team placing second in the country.

With their determination to succeed and train in their sport, they displayed their fine talent and agility.

• (1415)

I would like to congratulate the judo team from the Northwest, in particular, Bruno Volpé, gold medallist; Denis Cyr, Sylvain Collin, Marco Volpé, silver medallists; Danny Beaulieu, Madeleine Bossé, Jérémie Lepage and Magalie Paquet, bronze medallists.

Congratulations. Your perseverance in training in this sport has no doubt brought its rewards.

PENSIONS

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have another example of a soft target in the much touted Liberal red book where it calls for minimal, no pain adjustments to the MP pension plan.

The government has now come up with a two–tiered plan which protects the old cronies of the Liberal caucus, just like the old cronies of the Conservative Party were coddled before.

While announcing a review of the pensions given to Canada's seniors, these fat cats are making sure that their gold–plated, over–rich, taxpayer super–subsidized pensions are kept intact. While all other Canadians are being asked to accept cutbacks and layoffs, Liberals like the Deputy Prime Minister will collect up to $2.7 million in their own special unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. Speaker, you will note that the Liberals have even failed to meet their soft red book target because of the whining and crying of these Liberals. What I really wanted to call them would probably be unparliamentary.

Canadians deserve better. It is time to end—

THE BUDGET

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in an interview on CBC radio, the Prime Minister tried to appease the wrath of the provinces by saying that they should take it as a compliment and a sign of trust that the federal government has decided to let them pay an additional $7 billion for health care, social assistance and post–secondary education. That takes guts, Mr. Speaker.

How can the Prime Minister have the arrogance to ask the provinces, especially Quebec and Ontario, to take it as a compliment that an additional $7 billion will be cut, which puts them in the unenviable position of deciding whether to cut services or raise taxes?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, several years ago, the provinces started cutting their programs for health care, social services and education, and we kept sending money to the provinces.

However, because of our present financial situation, we had to make cuts. They did and we are doing the same. Today, everyone has to put his financial house in order, both the federal government and the provinces.

For years, the Leader of the Opposition has been asking us to reduce the federal presence in these sectors. When we do, he says: Pay, but keep quiet. In a democracy, he who pays the piper usually calls the tune.

Since we did what they wanted us to do, he should be satisfied, and stop criticizing.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister thinks the federal government pays the piper, but all it does is collect the money from the same taxpayer who, in the end, is stuck with the bill for these transfer payments.

[English]

Does the Prime Minister not realize that he has fooled nobody by dumping the deficit in the backyard of the provinces? This tactic has already produced a negative side, as is seen in the decision by the Dominion Bond Rating Service to put Ontario's credit rating under review following the federal budget cuts in transfer payments?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we prepared the budget to squarely face the fiscal reality of the nation. At the moment I know the Canadian people support the tough action the government took because it was the right thing to do.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister be as frank as his Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs was yesterday in Quebec City, when he admitted that budget cutbacks mean that Quebec will have a potential loss of $3.5 billion three years from now, something his Minister of Finance refused to admit yesterday in this House?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is true that there will be a loss of revenue in some provinces. As in many other sectors in this country where we have made cuts, people will have less money. That is what management is. When we can no longer afford to pay, we have to cut, and that is what we have done. We did not walk away from our responsibilities. There are people who blame us, and we are prepared to take the blame, but on the other hand, I know the Canadian public realizes that this government has not neglected its responsibilities and that we have done what the people wanted us to do.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the government wanted to make the $7 billion reduction in transfer payments to the provinces for post–secondary education, health and welfare look like a decentralization measure to demonstrate the flexibility of federalism. In a case of real decentralization a transfer of additional responsibilities is accompanied by the means to assume them, that is, tax points.

How can the Prime Minister have the gall to ask the provinces, as the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs did yesterday, to clean up their finances? He dumps an additional $7 billion charge on them and asks them to do for him the clean up job that he is incapable of doing in federal spending.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have in fact cut 19 per cent of federal government operations. Transfers to the provinces are cut, I believe, by 14 per cent. We were not as harsh on the provinces as we were on ourselves. I think the hon. member should recognize this. There is no difference between tax points and cash payments; they represent a transfer of resources from the federal government to the provinces.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the more we ask, the more we learn. Yesterday the Minister of Finance admitted that the cuts to the provinces represented 4 per cent. Today it is 14 per cent. Tomorrow, maybe—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: It is the truth.

Mr. Gauthier: I prefer to believe the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bouchard: He is just as honest as his Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Mr. Gauthier: Will the Prime Minister admit at least that the reduction in transfer payments is not decentralization, since, as the Minister of Finance said yesterday, the federal government is refusing to transfer the corresponding tax points, because it does not want to give up any of its leverage in post–secondary education, health care and welfare? Will he acknowledge this?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance spoke of 3 per cent, he was talking about 3 per cent of a provincial budget. The figure of 14 per cent is the cut in transfers. That is the distinction.

It is a funny thing about money transfers. For years, the opposition has been telling us to get out of these areas of jurisdiction. And when we do so, they tell us to keep on paying. But the more we stay in these areas, the more federal taxpayers have the right to insist that we be involved in such matters. We are saying to the provinces that, with the new system, we are giving them more flexibility, as they have been requesting for years.

HEALTH

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in an interview yesterday on the CBC, the Prime Minister suggested that medicare needs to be reduced and revert to meeting more basic needs.

The Liberal budget includes further reductions in federal transfers for health care and the intergovernmental affairs minister has apparently told the Quebec government that Canada's health laws need to be opened up. All of these things are completely opposite to the promises in the red book on health care.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Is there a federal plan to restructure health care and health care funding? If there is, why did the government choose to omit that plan from Monday's budget?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the House of Commons when the health care system was introduced. The five conditions written into the act will remain. I will not jeopardize the medicare system in Canada.

It is a very good system and we want to maintain it. We are holding discussions with the provinces at this time to see what can be done to make sure that while we reduce the cost of medicare we maintain the quality of service. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

• (1425)

The five conditions which are written into the act are there. They were in the red book and as long as I am Prime Minister they will remain in the laws of the land.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one of the cornerstones of integrity in government is full disclosure. If the federal government has plans to reduce spending on health care in the short run in order to save medicare in the long run, it should simply say so. That is what the Reform Party did in its taxpayers' budget. Canadians have a right to expect the government to be equally frank and up front.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Is the government planning further reductions in health care spending, yes or no?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do not spend money on health care. The provincial governments spend the money. It is not us. We have no control over the spending of the money.

We help the provincial governments with their health care systems and in exchange we ask for the five conditions to remain. It is the pride of Canadians to have a health care system which is universally free for everyone, not a system in which the rich have better services than the poor. That is why we are still spending money on medicare, to ensure that these principles remain.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister began his answer by saying that they were not spending money and ended up by saying that they were spending money. Every time the Prime Minister gives an evasive or political answer to this question it just heightens the suspicion that the federal government has some alternative plan.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Again, I ask for an honest, straightforward, one–word answer.

Some hon. members: Order.

The Speaker: I am sure that all hon. members take for granted that both the questions and the responses will be honest. That goes without saying. We need not ask either for the question or the answer to be honest.

Mr. Manning: I ask the Prime Minister again for a straight, forthright, one–word answer. Is the government planning further reductions in health care transfer payments to the provinces, yes or no?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when I see the leader of the Reform party getting up to talk about the protection of medicare I wonder if Colonel Sanders has become a vegetarian.

What we intend to do with the transfer payments and everything else is clearly written in the budget. If the hon. member reads it he will have the answer.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. The minister told Parliament yesterday that he never sent Mr. Manera any letter, nor did his deputy minister, regarding figures other than those contained in the budget. However, today, Mr. Manera claims that, one hour before the budget was tabled, the deputy minister of heritage sent him figures regarding budget cuts hitting the CBC over the next three years to the tune of $266 million.

How can the minister reconcile the statements he made yesterday with those Mr. Manera made today and which are totally contradictory?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that will not be difficult. You already know what decisions the government made in the budget. As I explained yesterday, the CBC's budget was drawn up for the coming fiscal year. The remaining figures come from the program review that was undertaken last August.

• (1430)

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister keep on pretending that only the budget figures were given to Mr. Manera, while the document he received from his deputy minister contained information regarding a cabinet decision for the next three years?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague is quite tenacious. She bounds off on a fishing expedition with lots of energy, yet comes back with nothing more than the refuse from the lake floor that her hook happened to catch on to. The decisions are contained in the budget and the other documents that Mr. Manera may have in his possession must be documents on program review.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

The government knows that the days of billion dollar budgets for the CBC are gone but has failed to admit it to Canadians. The Reform Party has been consistently honest and open about downsizing the CBC.

Yesterday the chairman of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage stated publicly that it would have been more straightforward with Canadians to have included future cuts to the CBC in the budget and that it should have given all of the bad news up front.

Why does the minister not recognize, as does his colleague, that they should have come clean with Canadians about their plans for cutting the CBC?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made clear that in a budget which is a rigorous one all the agencies of the Canadian government have to participate in bearing the load.

We have done so with the CBC. We have indicated very clearly that there will be a cut next year. We have not removed the cuts which go back to the Mazankowski budget.

There is a clear situation in which the CBC has to bear part of the load and we think that it will be able to do so.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, despite the Prime Minister's promises not to cut the CBC as outlined in the Liberal red book and despite what the hon. minister said, the cuts that have to be made to the CBC must be up front and honestly stated.

The Reform Party has said that the CBC cannot continue as we know it today and the figures in this secret document from the minister—

The Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member not to use a prop and to please put her question.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, instead of sounding the death knell for the CBC by making blind cuts, why does the hon. minister not realize that a viable future for the CBC lies in the private sector?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we know that our colleague would like to see the disappearance of the CBC as a public broadcaster in spite of the great credit it has earned itself over the years for Canada.

This does not surprise me. Not such a long time ago when the issue she raised was that of a country program with one Canadian program and channel to be defended against an American channel, she took the side of the American channel. Not only that, the Canadian channel was located in her own riding.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In his budget plan, the Minister of Finance says he must ensure that the old age security program is financially sustainable. Yet, in response to a question on the changes planned by the government to the old age pension plan, the minister deliberately tried to dodge the issue by talking about the Canada Pension Plan, which is something else entirely.

• (1435)

Since the Minister of Finance claims that the current old age pension plan has become unsustainable, can the Prime Minister confirm his government's intention to reduce benefits and access to this plan?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have no intention of reducing benefits and access to this plan. However, all social programs must be reviewed. That is what the Minister of Human Resources Development is doing.

Studies were conducted in other areas, and the Canada Pension Plan, which is the pension paid to citizens in Canada, needs to be reviewed at this time. It is something we have to do in any case, in preparation for an upcoming meeting with provincial governments, and because programs are dovetailed to a certain extent.

The Minister of Human Resources Development intends to review the whole question, which is very important for the future of seniors in Canada. This government does not favour the status quo. It has the capacity to review all elements of the social policy.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, changing the status quo may affect benefits and access, as well.

Since the study on old age pensions, which had been scheduled for last year, has been deferred once again, are we to understand that the government does not want to debate publicly, before the Quebec referendum, its plan to cut old age pensions?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would really like to know when this referendum will be held and whether there will even be a referendum. After reading in the newspapers about the differences and contradictions among opposition members on this subject, how can I know when the referendum will be held? We are not influenced by that, since they are not even able to agree on a question.

If they want to win the referendum, all they have to do is ask the very short, very clear question that I am suggesting. If they want a guaranteed "yes", they only have to ask the following question: Do you want to stay in Canada? And Quebecers will say yes.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has severely criticized the department of Indian affairs for its lack of financial accountability, its lack of program monitoring and its lack of program evaluation. Yet instead of being cut back like all the other departments in the government, Indian affairs actually received a $447 million increase in its budget.

Considering that it is well documented that Indian affairs spending is out of control and has a serious lack of accountability, how can the minister even begin to justify an increase in his department's budget?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member asked that. The Reform party has attempted to get quite a bit of misinformation throughout the country, but not with very much success. Most people who have looked at the budget, and obviously the Reform has not, will know that the birthrate in the aboriginal community is two and half times that of the white community. Next year per capita the aboriginal person will receive less than they do now.

To do those things as we said in the red book, in addition to the 442 people we already laid off, we will be laying off another 300 people. We will be freezing salaries at the ministry, as the member knows. We will also be freezing salaries in the aboriginal communities and we will be cutting $15 million from the northern development program.

That is the reality, not the myths that the member and his party are spreading throughout the country.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let us be clear about this. Mismanagement is the problem, not money. Both the Auditor General and the Indian affairs department's own internal audits have reported a plague of serious financial mismanagement both at the departmental level and at the band level.

How can the minister of Indian affairs stand and defend this $447 million increase in his budget without first getting the mess in his department cleaned up?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this member has 23 First Nations in his riding. Maybe for once he will stand and defend one of them.

• (1440)

This member will talk about those bands that have troubles. Sure those bands have troubles. However, over 80 per cent of the 600 bands in this country are managing their affairs. For the 152 that require help, we are giving them help. Eight–five per cent as of January have remedial action plans in place which means they, like us, are cutting staff. They are deferring housing. They are cutting much of their infrastructure and they are dropping programs. That is the reality.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister said that the federal government had no intention of giving up its control levers over the health sector. Meanwhile, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs alluded for the first time to the possibility of reviewing the Canada Health Act.

How does the Prime Minister reconcile the comments made by his minister, who clearly mentioned the possibility of amending the Canada Health Act, with his own statement to the effect that the government intends to keep all its control levers over the health sector?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is easy. We, on this side of the House, keep repeating it. The minister said it: the five principles governing the Canada Health Act will remain in force.

There may be circumstances where some amendments could be made. However, we will not compromise on the principles: they are there to stay. There is no contradiction between that position and the possibility of discussing certain changes which could benefit both the federal government and the provinces. However, the five principles will not be changed.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since, according to the Prime Minister, the Canada Health Act will not be opened up, how does he explain the statement made by his Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I said very clearly in Quebec City is exactly what the Prime Minister stated, namely that the five standards governing the Canada Health Act would remain in effect.

What I said regarding the Canada social transfer was that we could, through mutual consent, change existing conditions applicable to social assistance. This is absolutely true and in accordance with what was said. Again, as I said yesterday during the press conference, the five standards governing the Canada Health Act will not be touched.

FISHERIES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries. Canada is standing firm on its position that the European union must adhere to NAFO's set quotas for turbot on the Grand Banks. However, the Europeans in a continuing campaign of misinformation are telling anybody who will listen that Canadian fishermen do not need, do not want and cannot catch the Canadian quota for turbot.

I ask the minister to confirm whether this is fact or fiction. Are Canadian fishermen ready, willing and able to take the rightful quota that has been set for them through NAFO?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Canadians have shown a tremendous interest this year in taking 60 per cent of the quota assigned to Canada by NAFO.

I am informed that in the 35 to 40–foot category somewhere between 200 and 500 boats are now gearing up to participate in the fishery. From the sixty–five to one hundred foot category, five vessels are now gearing up. From the fifty–five to sixty–five foot category, forty vessels are now gearing up.

For the first time in a decade Canadian offshore vessels, vessels from fisheries products, internationals and national sea, are going to the offshore to catch turbot to take the Canadian share. One left yesterday at noon. One will leave in 45 minutes. They are going out on the continental shelf beyond 200 miles and they are going to take Canada's share of the turbot quota.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal budget eliminates the WGTA subsidy by August 1 of this year, cuts the dairy subsidy by 30 per cent, cuts safety net programs by 30 per cent, and eliminates the feed freight assistance.

The government has taken away the funding but has not taken away the unnecessary regulation that would cut costs, allowing farmers to recoup some of these losses.

I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food. When will the minister reduce unnecessary regulation and specifically how will he make the system work better for less?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman will know, over the course of the last year or so some good progress has been made in dealing with regulatory issues. We have passed in the House new legislation pertaining to the Canada Grain Act, which is a step in that direction, to improve the regulatory situation.

Certainly a major part of our western grain transportation reform plan is an efficiency package, which is being worked upon by the Minister of Transport and myself in consultation with all stakeholders in the western Canadian grain handling system, to develop a system in western Canada that is substantially lower in cost overall, certainly much more efficient than it is today and faster in getting our grain to the markets where it needs to be.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadian farmers would expect a little better answer than that. Certainly any farmer would know that the minister better have a plan in place before cutting the WGTA funding.

How many years will it take the minister to hold the discussions as laid out in the discussion paper and prepare a plan to replace the current system?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the discussions with respect to the efficiencies package have been ongoing now for several months with the active involvement of 14 or 15 farm organizations in western Canada, together with a variety of other stakeholders in the industry.

We have indicated to the stakeholders participating in the discussions that as soon as the fiscal framework was tabled in the House in the form of the budget, which of course happened on Monday of this week, we would want to proceed very quickly with the finalization of the details.

Therefore, as far as the efficiencies package is concerned to the extent that it requires legislation, that legislation can be concluded conceptually within the course of the next month. It can be presented to Parliament this spring and enacted into law before June 1995.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

This morning, La Presse reported that Libertina Rizzuto and Luca Giammarella, suspected by the Swiss authorities of trying to launder $3 million through Swiss banks, were released, although the investigation continues. It seems their release came as a result of the half–hearted assistance the RCMP gave Swiss police authorities.

Could the Prime Minister explain why the RCMP failed to give the Swiss authorities their full co–operation when they refused to provide information crucial to legal proceedings in Switzerland?

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have just been advised of this case, and I will make a note of the opposition critic's question.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. What explanation does the Prime Minister have for the fact that the only officer familiar with the case involving Mrs. Rizzuto and Mr. Giammarella was on holiday when the Swiss authorities had to release these two individuals, failing the co–operation of the RCMP?

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the operations of the RCMP. I think it is clear there will be an investigation, and the Solicitor General will be able to respond to the opposition member's question in due time.

FISHERIES

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Notwithstanding the blustering of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, 45 to 50 European vessels are currently fishing Canadian turbot just outside Canada's territorial limit. Reports indicate that they have exceeded their NAFO quota and have unilaterally established an EU quota of 70 per cent of the total allowable catch.

• (1450)

When will the Prime Minister recognize that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has failed to protect Canada's fish stocks, intervene and try to negotiate a settlement with the EU?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians think the Minister of Fisheries has been the best fighter that we have ever had for the fisheries.

Some hon. members: More, more.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): I cannot carry on. I do not want to inflate his ego too much.

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Europeans have exceeded their quota under NAFO and the minister is fiddling while Rome burns or the dory sinks.

When will the Prime Minister intervene and get some action on this problem?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see that my colleague has taken an interest in the matter, because for the last year we have been working very diligently to put an end to overfishing.

As part of the process of putting an end to overfishing, last year we did not have this bellicose noise. We had the co–operation of the Reform Party and the co–operation of the Bloc Quebecois. I recognize that last year was a rare time when the House was unanimous and passed Bill C–29 to take the necessary measures to throw flag of convenience vessels off the nose and tail. They left last May and they have not returned.

The cabinet and the national caucus from sea to sea to sea are united behind the cause of the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. We will be calling upon them for their support again in the days and weeks ahead.

MONTREAL ECONOMY

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we all know, the Montreal area has had more than its share of economic hardship over the past decade. But things have been looking up lately.

Can the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources Development update this House on the economic conditions in Montreal and the regions since the various elements of the human resources development programs have been put in place?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I publicly thank the member for Outremont for the excellent job he did during the parliamentary committee hearings on social security review.

In the Montreal area the economy is making substantial gains. Between January 1994 and January 1995 the number of jobs in Montreal increased by 47,000. The number of unemployed workers decreased by 18,000. The unemployment rate is down by 1.3 per cent.

The red book promises are working very well in Montreal.

COAST GUARD COLLEGE IN SYDNEY

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On October 18, I asked the minister how he could justify spending nearly $10 million a year to keep the Coast Guard College in Sydney open when the Marine Institute in Rimouski, Quebec, the Pacific Maritime Training Institute in Vancouver and the Marine Institute in Newfoundland, among others, offered the same services. I never heard back from him on that.

How can the minister contemplate, as outlined in the last budget, imposing higher rates on Coast Guard service users, when he does not have the courage to end needless duplication, as in the case of the college in Sydney, which costs the taxpayers $10 million per year?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every institution my hon. colleague mentioned makes a significant contribution to the Coast Guard and other services within Transport Canada. We have no intention of changing the status of the Coast Guard College in Sydney, Nova Scotia.

• (1455)

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, why did the minister not take advantage of the budget to announce the closure of the Coast Guard College in Sydney, since provincial educational facilities can provide the same services at a lower cost?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the coast guard academy at Sydney, Nova Scotia, produces people who are highly skilled and world recognized. We understand the role played by the various provincial institutions referred to by the hon. member.

I would hope the hon. member would understand that the presence of a coast guard academy such as the one at Sydney is absolutely essential to maintain the level and the standards that are well known around the world which have been maintained by the coast guard for a century now in Canada.

TREASURY BOARD

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, according to the estimates tabled on Tuesday, the Treasury Board secretariat will be creating 10 more management positions at a cost of $3.5 million to the taxpayer. That is $350,000 for each executive. The President of the Treasury Board must have some spectacular executives in mind for that kind of salary.

How can the President of the Treasury Board pad his executive suite with 10 more managers while in the same breath cut 45,000 jobs from the rest of the civil service?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to look into the specifics of the matter the hon. member mentions.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that overall the executive ranks in the public service have been reduced over the last four years by some 26 per cent.

As the Minister of Finance announced the other day, in our budget expenditure plan over the next three years there is a reduction of some 19 per cent in government spending. As part of the reduction in staff there will be proportional representation at the different levels: executive, middle management and frontline workers. The executive level will be part and parcel of the government's overall plan of reduction.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): I am not sure the minister heard my point, Mr. Speaker. I said that he was going to increase his own departmental executives by 10.

He said the other day: "We will continue to manage changing priorities by reallocating resources". This is not my idea of reallocating resources by adding more to his department. It seems to me that the resources will be reallocated not toward a reduction of the deficit but to his own department.

Does the President of the Treasury Board need to increase his executive staff by 15 per cent when he is reducing the total number of the federal civil service by over 20 per cent?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know from where the hon. member gets those figures. There is no increase in the staff at Treasury Board.

In fact there is a reduction as there is in all departments as part of the overall plan to get the deficit of the country down. That has been part of the government's program as announced by the Minister of Finance.

HEALTH

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. As the minister knows, as cash transfers to provinces go down the tax point shares go up.

Yesterday the Prime Minister, speaking straight from the heart, said: "When you transfer tax points you lose all leverage after that because you don't collect the money. The day that you don't have any more cash, you can't use the leverage". That suggests to me that it is straight through the heart of the health care system.

I want to ask a question of the minister whose major responsibility to the Canadian citizen is to protect the national health care system. Clearly she has not been successful. Will she do the right thing and resign?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I explained very clearly it is because we want to maintain the five conditions of the health act that we have to make sure we transfer cash. That is why we decided to have a system of block funding so that we could have some influence.

When they have tax points the provinces are not obliged to listen to us any more. I recognize that we need some leverage because if we did not have leverage some provinces would have already cut into the five conditions. We need to have the means to make sure they do not use the fact that they have only tax points to destroy medicare.

We will keep what is needed for medicare to stay as it is.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

Monday's budget, as has been mentioned, announced a reduction of 45,000 positions within the public service over the next three years. There is much uncertainty about the impact of these reductions.

• (1500)

Could the minister indicate what measures will be offered to these employees and assure the House that every effort will be made to accommodate employees through early retirement, early departure and other programs?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is yes. We value our employees, the ones who will be leaving and the ones who will be remaining.

We certainly want to provide those who are leaving every opportunity to adjust back into the community. There will be early retirement provisions and early departure incentives that involve training and counselling. A wide range of services will be available to them which will help in terms of the adjustment.

They have been hard, dedicated workers for the people of this country. We want to make sure that we treat them fairly and reasonably.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question from the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, I believe I said he had 23 First Nations and he has 11. Once again, it is the other critic, the hon. member for Skeena, who has 23.

The Speaker: The clarification is noted.

I have a point of privilege from the hon. member for Sherbrooke. Might I ask the hon. member if this point of privilege arises out of this question period?

Mr. Charest: No, Mr. Speaker, it does not arise out of question period.

The Speaker: Pursuant to the rules of the House, the hon. member would know, being a respected parliamentarian, that the Chair should have at least one hour's written notice. I am sure the hon. member will want to proceed according to the rules and do just that. His question of privilege will be heard at the earliest possible time.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thank the Chair for its patience and for the clarification on the question of privilege.

This question of privilege arises out of an article published today in a paper which is well known on the Hill, the Hill Times. I wanted to advise the House immediately.

Point of Order

The Speaker will know, as all members of the House know, that a member also has the duty to inform the House and his fellow colleagues as soon as he or she is aware of the question of privilege, which I chose to do today. It relates to the secrecy of the budget process.

The Speaker: The hon. member is absolutely correct that there should be notification given to the Chair as soon as possible. As such, I know the hon. member will want to follow the rules and take the time to put his point of privilege, in all its fullness, at the earliest possible time. However, because it did not arise from question period today, I would rule that the point of privilege will be put off until later.

I thought the hon. member was going to introduce a point of order or did I misunderstand?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, for the record and to accommodate the rules and all members of the House in fairness, may I suggest that I raise this point of privilege tomorrow after question period so that all members of the House will know that this issue will be raised?

The Speaker: The hon. member would know that in accordance with the rules the answer would be yes.

The Speaker: My colleagues, we will now proceed to Thursday's usual question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult question to ask but I will ask my colleague, the Secretary of State for Parliamentary Affairs, to tell us about the business planned not only for the coming days but also for the week following the recess.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I will answer the question.

[English]

Today we will continue with second reading of the borrowing bill. When we adjourn tomorrow, we will stand adjourned until Monday, March 13. On that day we will consider the firearms bill. On Tuesday, March 14 and Wednesday, March 15 we will conclude the budget debate.

Mr. Speaker, we intend to designate March 16 and 17 as opposition days.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1995–96

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–73, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when I began earlier today, I started off with Madam Speaker, was interrupted by Mr. Speaker, and now I have a different Mr. Speaker in the Chair. I would like to be certain that this Mr. Speaker will remain in the Chair for the duration of my short intervention in this debate.

As I said earlier to my colleagues in the House, the Department of Public Works and Government Services has had to sustain some significant reductions. I note my colleague from the Reform Party. No doubt he will have numerous questions for me when we go before committee. I might add he usually asks very good questions.

I want to share with him and other members of the House that we will be commercializing the Canada Communication Group, an aspect of public works and government services. We will be doing away with the stock item supply. We will be going to direct deposit across the board to save the taxpayers significant amounts of money. Cheque production sites will be consolidated in order to save costs to the taxpayer, contributing to the savings we are putting toward the deficit over a three year period of $353 million.

In addition, public works and government services, Treasury Board and all agencies of the Government of Canada have been, presently are and will continue to look at ways in which to make additional savings in terms of the reduction in office space which houses a variety of government departments.

Program review was conducted by my colleague the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and had a number of aspects associated with it. One was a vertical examination of all expenditures in each of the departments. As a consequence of that examination, there will be less need for additional space.

I want to be very careful and very prudent. I welcome suggestions from members across the way in terms of how we can do public–private partnering in this regard and how we can have additional savings as it relates to the space requirements we need as a national government across the country.

These savings, as I indicated earlier, will total $353 million and will dislocate 5,263 employees over a three year period. It is very difficult to try to sugarcoat tough decisions, but I want to be clear. Although there will be some dislocation of jobs, many of those jobs will reappear in the private sector. We ought not to downplay the significance the private sector can play in terms of handling some of these services and activities which, prior to the budget, were being conducted by government departments.

The Department of Public Works and Government Services is a common service department. We act in relation to the requests made to us by other departments and agencies of the Government of Canada. Where the opportunity exists, our objective and goal is always to try to get value for the expenditures within our department. We will be vigilant in reaching that goal in the coming months and years. Again I invite the co–operation and suggestions of members opposite to make certain we abide by that objective of value for our money. Where the opportunity exists I hope they will provide us with good, meaningful suggestions.

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is another agency which comes under my responsibility. It has a historic, national and international reputation in the housing sector. Cabinet and the Minister of Finance, in view of the fiscal capacity of the Government of Canada, are giving savings to reduce the deficit in excess of $300 million.

We will be closing over 20 offices across the country. We will be cutting back on our research efforts as a national housing institution. We will be doing away with the scholarship program which has been part and parcel of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for quite some time. If anyone were to suggest that those are not tough, difficult measures, I would think they were being less than candid with themselves and with the House.

I do want to say that the Minister of Finance has given us a balance. On the one hand we still have 600,000 units. It is an expenditure by the government of over $2 billion annually, housing one million Canadians who need the assistance of the state as they try to provide dignity and opportunities for their families and their communities. That expenditure is significant.

It is hoped that over an additional three year period we will be able to have additional savings and will be able to do some things in other sectors. However, I do not want to give a false impression to the House because it would be misleading and very unfair to suggest otherwise.

With the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the government over a three year period will be reducing its contributions to that agency. I would like to take a moment to explain the mandate of ACOA. The mandate of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is to effectuate where possible economic activities in the Atlantic region.

Those of us who come from the Atlantic region, such as my colleague the hon. member for Dartmouth, will attest to the fact that economic growth in many of our communities is not what we want it to be. We are continually trying to find ways to foster economic growth. We have moved away from a previous set of targets in terms of providing grants to small and medium sized businesses. We have done away with that. We have moved to a system of repayable loans which provides more accountability for all.

There is still a lot of partnering. As an agency of the crown we can partner with the provinces, universities and non–profit organizations. This is done not for the sake of having announcements but for the sake of trying to get communities, the intellectual side, the business side and the non–profit side together, forging a coalition to try to meet the challenge of creating economic activity in the poorer regions.

Much has been said about regional economic development in the past. I am sure much more will be said by those who oppose that forum. Let it be understood that as the minister responsible for one small agency, ACOA, I believe as the red book and the 1994 and 1995 budgets have identified, that regional economies are the backbone of the nation.

There is no question there are differences between the economy of Atlantic Canada and that of Quebec. There are differences between western Canada and the Atlantic region. There are differences between Ontario and the west, be it the prairies or British Columbia. They are different. We must acknowledge that factual thing: a small population base, a widely dispersed people over a large geographical mass. It is our task not to put the blame on those that have come before us and tried to seize the moment and the opportunity by creating through partnerships something that will provide some hope and some dignity to individuals in that region of the country.

• (1515)

All agencies of government were asked to provide moneys to cut the deficit. Fifty person years will be reduced at the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, 15 person years at Enterprise Cape Breton. All aspects are being reviewed.

As members opposite find opportunities to either ask questions or put before me as the minister responsible, as my colleagues in the Atlantic Region do, ways in which we can improve, to cut things and to add to things, I would be happy to hear from them.

I want to make something very clear to those members who sit in the House. I make no apology to any member, any political party, and any representative of the press for standing up for a region which has historically sustained a lot of economic difficulty. As I say to my friends and as I shared with caucus colleagues, we in Atlantic Canada do not want handouts. We want a hand up. Regardless of where they live, Canadians are entitled to that kind of opportunity from the national government.

In the time that I have remaining, I want to briefly touch on the subject of the Royal Canadian Mint. Colleague opposite knows that I have umpteen different agencies for which I am responsible so I am just hitting the highlights of some of them.

With regard to the Royal Canadian Mint, I want to clarify a rumour. It was circulating in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia that the $2 coin we will be issuing will have the picture of the hon. member for Dartmouth on the coin. I want to make it perfectly clear it was a difficult decision I had to make personally, but given what I had to work with I think everyone can understand why I reached the decision I did.

Let the House be aware that the new $2 coin will save taxpayers over a 20–year period a quarter of a billion dollars.

We have gone one step further. We are looking at all of the coins and their composition. We are going to change the composition of those coins in order to reduce their cost, thereby increasing the revenues which will total almost an additional $12 million per year for the 20–year duration of an average coin. That is new revenue for the national government. It is new revenue for the purposes of writing down the deficit of the Government of Canada.

I want Canadians to know that these measures have been taken because we listened to them. I am the minister responsible for public works, government services, and a host of other agencies. I have gone before the standing committee for a record number of times for any minister; three times. I have had good questions from opposition members. I have had good suggestions from opposition members. Equally so, I have had very good quality questions and suggestions from government members. I want to thank them for their help and assistance.

I throw out a challenge to all members of the House. If we are sincere, which I take as a given, of reducing the deficit of the government in the years ahead, they should come forward with solutions. Yes, criticize too because that is part and parcel of the political process. As I have told my exempt staff as well as all of my deputy ministers, it is fine to identify problems but it is more important to identify solutions to those problems.

I know that my time has come to an end but I would be happy to attempt to answer any questions my colleagues may wish to raise at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works said that using $2 coins would result in savings of some $225,000. I wonder how much it will cost to repair our pockets though, because it is going to be a heavy load to carry. My comment is somewhat in line with the sense of humour displayed by the minister when he alluded to the possibility of having his face appear on the new $2 coin.

The closing of some CMHC offices is a more serious issue. I agree that the government must reduce spending. However, I find it hard to understand why the minister decided to close the CMHC office in my riding of Longueuil, since some 1.2 million people live in the Montérégie. I think it would have been justified to keep an office to manage CMHC affairs in that region. That region has a larger population than the province of Nova Scotia where, I imagine, there must be at least one CMHC office. So, I ask the minister: Why he is taking that step and, second, from where will he manage all the properties in the Montérégie?

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. It is a very legitimate and important question that one would ask of a minister.

My colleague is quite right in making representations to me on the issue. However, I say to him as I say to all members, difficult decisions had to be made by the government relating to the reduction of expenditures.

In the riding adjacent to mine that members refer to quite often as being my district but really is not, we closed the office as well. I do not take any joy as the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing for having to shut down offices.

Administratively it is important that Canada Mortgage and Housing make those kinds of decisions in order that we can contribute to bringing down the deficit of the Government of Canada. I have had numerous meetings with my colleague the Minister of Finance who did not cherish the fact that we had to reduce those offices.

I want to tell my colleague opposite that his constituents, which he ably represents, will still have the services of representatives from Canada Mortgage and Housing from neighbouring communities.

Notwithstanding reductions at Canada Mortgage and Housing, I received no less than seven or eight interventions from his party. I thought he was to congratulate me on the rent geared to income which was rumoured to go from 25 per cent to 30 per cent. The Minister of Finance and the cabinet have maintained it at 25 per cent.

On the one hand it was difficult to close the office in his constituency. He will still receive quality service from neighbouring communities. On the other hand we have been fair. We have not increased the rent geared to income for those citizens who are occupying our social housing units across the country.

• (1525)

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping the minister would put to rest the terrible rumour I heard that the figure on the new proposed $2 coin might be a soft walled, shiny topped dingy. That did not happen and it is unfortunate.

I want to get down to the matter of his responsibility with regard to ACOA. We know there are several regional development agencies flowing from the federal government: ACOA, western economic diversification, FORD–Q and other northern development agencies.

If someone with a grade five education sat down and thought about it, he or she would realize this whole concept is wrong. First, history tells us it is wrong. It has not worked in his region of Atlantic Canada. We have seen DREE grants, ACOA grants and loan programs for not years but decades and they have not worked. They have been part of a continuation of a depressed economy. In some of these regions they have not solved the problem.

If we think about it, the reasons are obvious. First, the payback of taxpayers' dollars going through the administration here in Ottawa and then back out to the regions is very costly. They are very expensive departments with gold windows that have to be replaced and huge staffs. It is also an opportunity for ministers to have undue influence in the tendering process. It tends to have people come to ministers hat in hand, asking for a grant or a loan.

I know that recently the minister responsible for ACOA has removed the granting program. I believe that is due in large measure to criticism from the Reform caucus that pointed out the blatant pork barrelling and the problems with the whole program of grants.

Now ACOA is restricted to lending funds to business. In fact, they have reduced the lending. However, businesses can get loans from other institutions such as banks and credit unions. Why would we need ACOA to grant loans? It is a very costly way for the taxpayers to help businesses. Also the amount lent out is reduced. Yet we still have the department and the minister responsible as well as his staff. There are not the cuts at the top we need because we are doing less with more.

How can the minister stand in the House and justify ACOA, western economic diversification and other regional development agencies that have failed miserably. They have added poverty to Canada and have been an opportunity for pork barrelling and misuse of federal funds.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, such an easy question from an easy representative. The hon. member's assertion is factually incorrect.

Mr. Hermanson: Make some sense for once.

Mr. Dingwall: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking. Maybe he can give me the same courtesy.

Let him remember and understand history. Yes, regional economic development programs have not been a raving success. To suggest there have been no successes is factually incorrect. It is factually incorrect to suggest that they have not benefited certain regions. The hon. member should travel the country extensively before he states false and misleading information of that nature.

The hon. member makes the statement that somehow we changed the programming of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency because of the interventions of the Reform Party. The people who changed that program from grants to loans were the business community and business representatives in Atlantic Canada. When I travel Atlantic Canada, which is extensively, I meet with them time and time again. I have listened to what they have said and listened to what the Atlantic Liberal caucus has said and that is the reason we moved from grants to repayable loans.

Finally, the hon. member made reference to a dingy on the coin.

• (1530)

Let me say to the hon. member that yes, the students at the University College of Cape Breton have referred to this wall that they have constructed under an infrastructure program as the "Dingwall".

I want to tell my hon. friend that just the other day I drove by the "Dingwall" in a car with white walls. I want to assure the hon. member that the "Dingwall" is a hell of a lot more effective and durable than the white walls on that car. I think the hon. member knows who I am referring to when I talk about the white walls.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, before the Minister of Finance tabled his budget, I was worried because I realized Canada was bankrupt.

This was not my opinion but that of the New York Wall Street Journal, in an article that appeared on January 12, this year, under the heading "Bankrupt Canada". I also knew that Moody's in New York had put us under a credit watch and was waiting for the right moment to reduce our credit rating, which would put upward pressure on the deficit and the national debt.

Considering these facts, I knew the Minister of Finance would have to turn the situation around. I thought he would be fair to all taxpayers, however. I would have liked to discuss the main cuts introduced by the Minister of Finance, which are not, in every case, appropriate and transparent, but I am sure my colleagues will do a better job, since these subjects are not my specialty.

As the official opposition critic for transport, I was expecting cuts but I had no idea the Department of Transport was up for sale. I found that out last Monday.

As a result of program review, budgetary cuts will total $1.1 billion or 50.8 per cent of total expenditures forecast from 1995 to 1998. If we include cuts announced in the previous budget, the Department of Transport's spending levels will be reduced by 1.4 billion during the same period. In fact, budgetary savings as a result of program review will total $2.6 billion over three years.

Take, for instance, the transfer of airports to local authorities. The problem, since this is about downloading the deficit to the provinces, is that these transfers to local or provincial authorities will not include the corresponding tax points. That is the problem.

Air Canada was sold, and now Canadian National is on the block. Means of transportation that our ancestors put in place are now being sold off, not as a face saving gesture but to make the government's failure in this respect less palpable. What can we say about all this? Is this supposed to be a spring sale by the federal government? Is this a closing out sale or a panic sale?

Since the Bloc Quebecois arrived in force in Ottawa, we have been in favour of big projects to jump start the economy and replenish the government coffers. In this regard, I spoke a number of times in this House to encourage the government to set up and invest in rapid transport, a high speed train in the Windsor—Quebec City corridor. The budget made no mention of this project. In fact, it indicated that there would be no more mega–projects.

From the start of the budget speech to the end of it, I watched the Department of Transport crumble. I watched the legacy of a century disintegrate. I kept waiting for the comforting announcement of a project that would get the economy moving—a high speed train. But no such luck.

Let us have a look at the coast guard now. We are presented with the integration of the Coast Guard into the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. At first glance, it would seem to be an interesting arrangement, because there is a promise of greater efficiency. But we must look carefully. Even though the budget contains no concrete measures, other than those affecting the fleet, the federal government plans to change the operations and level of service of the Coast Guard. These changes will take the form of cost recovery measures and increased fees.

These measures may jeopardize the competitiveness of ports along the St. Lawrence and of the shipping industry as a whole. Furthermore, part III of the budget estimates includes provisions to merge the Canadian Coast Guard fleet with Fisheries and Oceans, to delegate certain ship inspection activities to classification societies, to transfer to the provinces responsibility for inland waters of lesser importance and for more sound management of public ports, with the potential elimination of certain facilities.

This budget also provides for an increase in service fees, which is tantamount to a hidden tax to be paid by people using such services. This measure targets shipping services of course. Services provided by the Coast Guard benefit the public and for this reason fees for such services should not be increased. An increase in fees for these services, which limit the number of ice jams on the St. Lawrence, would prevent the Coast Guard from saving Canadian lives, ensuring navigation safety and would increase the risk of ecological accidents on the St. Lawrence.

In conclusion, such a fee structure would limit the competitiveness of Quebec ports vis–à–vis their American counterparts and the transport minister and the federal government have known this for a long time. The transport committee, of which I am deputy chairman, is currently undertaking a tour of the country's principal ports. In particular, we have visited Montreal, Quebec City and Mont–Joli in Quebec. We have heard clearly that higher rates would put an end to traffic on the St. Lawrence. Shipowners will prefer to unload their cargo in Halifax, or to forge on to ports in Boston, New York or Baltimore.

Is that the end result the minister hopes to attain? Stem traffic on the St. Lawrence? Steer traffic towards Maritime or American ports? Could it be that he is trying to scare Quebecers by a vision of what could be in store if they separated? It is not fear that has kept Quebecers in confederation for so many years, but the hope that they would be treated fairly, which decision–makers have failed to keep alive.

Quebecers are intelligent enough to figure out what the current government is up to, in particular the Liberal Party of Canada, which has always tried and is still trying to ruin Quebec and to play favourites with other provinces. My case in point is the closing of the Coast Guard college in Sydney, while the Quebec Marine Institute in Rimouski or, for that matter, other institutes in other provinces could have very easily done the same work. This duplication is costing $10 million per year to provincial institutions which could easily have taken over the job.

Now, on to privatizing CN. Canadian National is a Crown corporation that has served Canadians for many years. It is one of the institutions that has made it possible for Canadians from coast to coast to communicate with each other. If it were not for the railways, Western Canada probably would not have been developed to the extent that it has. The government now intends to sell CN, under the pretense that the decision will give society the flexibility needed to quickly make strategic decisions on operations and investments.

Is this an admission by the Minister of Finance that his government is not in a position to make strategic decisions? The sale of CN could cause many problems. Before selling off our economic development tools, we must take several precautions. According to the Nault report, some preparation work must be carried out before CN can be sold, namely reducing the debt, increasing profits and rationalizing the network.

First of all, the eventual buyer must be required to protect the rights of the Canadian people. Let us also keep in mind that the Nault report favours an Air Canada–like privatization process. We will have the opportunity to review these issues and to question the Minister of Transport both in the House and in committee. With regard to the national airport policy, we are told that airport commercialization will continue. Six national airports have already been transferred to local management.

The Quebec government will have to support local groups from small municipalities who want to enter into negotiations with Ottawa. As you can appreciate, Quebec taxpayers will again have to foot the bill for this federal policy.

• (1540)

In conclusion, from what I just said, you can understand that I am far from enthused by the budget trends regarding the Canadian air, sea and ground transportation sector.

This government shows its total lack of imagination. International financial players called for cuts, but the government cut indiscriminately, hitting seniors and the disadvantaged especially hard.

For over a year, we have been asking the minister to establish an integrated transport policy in Canada. This policy would determine what should be transported by rail, by ship, by plane and by road. Without being authoritarian and inflexible, this policy could provide for fiscal incentives favouring the best means of transportation.

Most of the countries in the world are developing rail transportation because it is the cheapest. Here in Canada, we remove rail tracks everywhere and convert them to bike paths. We let trucks with excessive loads onto our roads. The roads are being destroyed and the provinces must invest enormous amounts to maintain them.

Yesterday, I read an editorial by a great Quebecer and Canadian entitled "Imperial Federalism". What an appropriate headline to describe the federal government, whether Conservative or Liberal. They act without consulting, lead by fear, and always repeat the same mistakes. That is Canadian imperialism for you.

This government may feel that Quebecers rejected the Charlottetown Agreement by mistake or because they were in a bad mood. But it would be wrong. Quebecers can see clearly. They want to be part of the solution and not part of the problem. As long as they are in this imperialistic Confederation, the rest of Canada will think that Quebecers are the problem.

The Minister of Finance tried to convince us that his budget was a new form of federalism by attempting to decentralize some areas of jurisdiction, without transferring tax points, providing that Confederation partners comply with national objectives.

Quebec is a nation, a people. It has its own objectives and will never agree to be led by an imperial federalist government.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his excellent speech. I think he takes the interests of the Quebec transportation industry at heart, and he represents them well.

I would like him to touch on the possible implications of these cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, which the Minister of Finance indicated will be to the tune of $7 billion over the next three years. Transfer cuts mean less money being paid to Quebec. At the same time, the federal government continues to tax Quebec at the same level. Moreover, tax hikes are imposed on Quebecers, representing a deficit of about $6.5 billion for Quebec in taxes alone. Add to that some $2.5 billion less coming back to Quebec every year, and this makes a shortfall of $9 billion for the people of Quebec.

Instead of cutting taxes in Quebec, the federal government is cutting the share Quebec used to get. This makes for a rather significant shortfall, in fact a very significant shortfall for Quebecers. How can this be offset? As the Minister of Finance said, Quebec will have to either reduce public expenditures further or impose tax hikes Quebec taxpayers who are not only seeing their taxes go up instead of down, but receiving about $2.5 billion less from the federal government every year, which is utterly unfair. It is important that the people of Quebec be reminded over and over again of this fact.

How does the transport critic see the transportation industry in Quebec being affected by this drastic drop in overall revenue?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Having been more than generous with the 10 minute period allotted to the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, I would ask that we get back on the right track, speaking of transportation. So, if he could keep his answer as short as possible, under two minutes in any case.

Mr. Guimond: Thank you Mr. Speaker for being so understanding.

I will answer the hon. member for Longueuil. The question comes unexpectedly, even though the member and I belong to the same party. We can make a comparison. I am convinced that when a Liberal member asks a question to a Liberal minister during question period, viewers in Canada and Quebec can tell that the answer has already been prepared. However, this is not the case here. I did not expect the question from the hon. member for Longueuil. However, I will try to answer it to the best of my knowledge.

Some hon. members: Ah, Ah!

Mr. Guimond: You can laugh if you want.

My colleague raises an interesting issue. I already had the opportunity to tell the Minister of Transport, in committee, that if the federal government privatizes or commercializes airports, ports and the St. Lawrence Seaway, Quebecers will have to ask themselves this crucial question during the upcoming referendum debate: Are we getting our money's worth, considering that we pay $28 billion in taxes every year to Ottawa?

When the federal government is investing in Quebec, it is not giving anything to Quebecers. When elderly people receive a cheque with the maple leaf on the stub, it is not a donation from the federal: it is money which these people, their spouse or their children have contributed through taxes. Consequently, this question is very much to the point, as is the whole issue of how the provinces will be able to provide the required financing.

For example, the federal government wants to transfer some regional airports. These airports will be managed by the local community, because the provinces have clearly indicated that they do not want those regional airports, and indeed I think they would have been ill–advised to take on that responsibility. I received confidential minutes in which the following issue was raised: If the local authority cannot make a profit with the airport in Sept–Îles, which currently makes $1.9 million in profit annually, what will happen? The federal airport in Sept–Îles will close. Consequently, will our taxes be adjusted accordingly? That is a very good question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for his co–operation. The hon. member for La Prairie.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by drawing the attention of this House to the size of the federal government's debt and the fact that government measures have done so little to change a situation that has now become chronic. The government must balance its budget as soon as possible, because its credit is fading fast.

The 1995–96 estimates tabled by the Minister of Finance show that public debt charges now represent 30 per cent of government spending, while 22 per cent goes to payments to persons and 16 per cent to payments to other levels of government.

The last two payments combined represent 38 per cent of total spending, barely exceeding public debt charges as a percentage of the total budget. I think it is clear we have a problem when the cost of servicing the debt is only 8 per cent less than what the federal government transfers to Canadians and to the provinces in the form of transfer payments.

Considering the decline in program spending over the next few years and the expected increase in public debt charges, we will soon reach the point where debt charges alone will exceed total transfers to persons and the provinces. In other words, a larger share of our tax dollars will go to investors and people who buy government bonds than to the citizens of this country. Is that the kind of flexible federalism the Minister of Finance wants?

It is clear that the minister's budget has done nothing to stem the growth of the debt. The deficit for the year ending on March 31 would have been $41 billion, not $39.7 billion as forecast in the last budget, if the government had not used the surplus in the Unemployment Insurance Fund to absorb part of the deficit. Normally, the surplus should have been applied to job creation and dealing with the structural unemployment.

The government is still putting off the real decisions until later. The cost of the public debt will increase from the $42 billion it will be at the end of this year to nearly $51 billion in two years' time.

We have to conclude that Liberal carelessness has brought this prosperous country to the brink of bankruptcy. Under the most optimistic scenario, the deficit will not be eliminated before the turn of the century. At that point, the cost of servicing the public debt will be over $60 billion. What waste and what wealth lost. Imagine what we could do with another $60 billion in the government coffers annually.

The government is adding insult to injury. It continues to invade provincial jurisdictions, but without paying any more for the programs for which it imposes national standards on the provinces. Quebec will have the unpleasant job of taxing its citizens in order to comply with the federal standards pertaining to the block funding planned by the present government.

In the end, Quebec will pay, but Ottawa will set the rules. The funding will be decentralized, but decision making power will remain in Ottawa. The federal government is not transferring any tax points in exchange for the reduction in transfer payments to the provinces. The government is doctoring the truth and putting the real decisions off until after the Quebec referendum. The federal contribution to social assistance, health care and education will drop by $7 billion in the next two years. This is a huge amount in terms of health care and education, but, unfortunately, too little to put an end to the deficit.

Overlap with the provinces will not disappear. Program review and efforts at streamlining have focused particularly on departments and agencies that are strictly under federal jurisdiction, where there was no overlap or duplication with the provinces. These departments include the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, National Defence and the Department of Transport.

The federal government is not getting out of areas under provincial jurisdiction, where little streamlining efforts have been focused. While it is chipping away the unemployment insurance program little by little, the government is imposing a temporary tax on bank capital, which will bring in $100 million over the next two years.

During this same period, the unemployed will be contributing $3 billion to deficit reduction, that is, 30 times what is being asked of the banks. This temporary tax represents only a little more than 1 per cent of the banks' annual profits, while the middle class remains overtaxed. Two sets of rules: a temporary tax on bank capital and a permanent tax of up to 50 per cent on the income of middle class families.

There is also the excise tax. The federal excise tax on gasoline is increased immediately by 1.5 cents a litre to help reduce the deficit. Why, then, wait until 1999 to reinstate the 21–year rule for family trusts? Doubtless, to enable these families to find another tax shelter. Always a double standard: one for the monied, another for the workers, the unemployed and the middle class.

The impact of the budget on Montérégie and the riding of La Prairie, which I have the honour to represent in this House, is also devastating. While the Auditor General was saying that we could save close to $1 billion if national defence were better managed, the government decides to close the base at Saint–Hubert, even though Quebec only has 15 per cent of the country's military facilities.

After losing the Royal Military College in Saint–Jean, Quebec and the Montérégie region are losing the base at Saint–Hubert.

Almost 40 per cent of the inhabitants of the town of Brossard, which makes up 55 per cent of the federal riding of La Prairie, are of an origin other than Canadian. Several are recent immigrants, others are political refugees. The budget would impose a fee of $975 per adult immigration request on future immigrants. We should bear in mind that this amount is more than the average annual income in several countries. Is the government opening the door to rich immigrants only? We should ask ourselves this question. Why impose an entrance toll on people who want to come here to improve their economic situation? There is something despicable about reducing the deficit on the backs of people who have yet to set foot on Canadian soil and whose financial situation is often unstable. Is this the image Canada wants to project as a land of welcome?

Are Canadians so powerless to resolve their deficit problem that they have to tax people who are thinking of settling here? This measure is revolting and should be rejected by Parliament.

In conclusion, I would like to add that the government's borrowing power must be limited and nearing its saturation point if we have to enforce such deficit reduction measures. It is from this perspective that we should examine Bill C–37.

• (1555)

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the remarks made by my colleague from the Bloc Quebecois. It is obvious that when measures taken by the governing party are good ones—because they are in the interest of Quebec as well as Canada—such measures will always be disparaged by the party in opposition whose views are exclusively separatist.

We all know that the business and international communities have responded favourably to the budget brought down by the finance minister. In other words, it is the most responsible budget possible.

The current government said it would control the debt and the deficit, but I would also like to draw to the attention of this House remarks made during the last election campaign by the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada who stated that the debt and deficit must be controlled but also that a fair balance must be struck between the government's social role and the reality of budgetary constraints.

To my mind, the finance minister's budget is in every respect consistent with the Liberal philosophy of a fair balance. We will get the deficit down. Indeed, we have reached and ever surpassed our objectives because the deficit is lower than anticipated. In saying that the government has a social role to play which must be maintained, well, with this budget we have fundamentally reconsidered the role of government.

People are saying that block transfers to the provinces are disastrous, I say that is pure grandstanding. I myself was a member of the parliamentary committee on the reform of social programs and I must say that, throughout Canada, people were asking for greater flexibility for the provinces. In Quebec and everywhere, people asked for block transfers. And so when the finance minister says he is rethinking the role of government, it is in fact to restore greater autonomy to the provinces through these block transfers.

What else could people ask for? The block transfers obviously entail some cuts, but we must not lose sight of the fact that the cuts we are imposing with this transfer in regard to the Canada assistance plan, health and post–secondary education is not as harsh as the measures we have imposed on ourselves. We must remember that by making a block transfer to the provinces, we are eliminating some overlaps, thereby reducing administrative costs.

Needless to say, this budget could be described as exemplary and that is why opposition members are trying to discredit it, but they are having a hard time doing so because that is not consistent with their views. This budget has something for Quebec and the other provinces, it gives them greater autonomy. That is what Canada will be like tomorrow and it is the Liberal Party, the present government, which will bring Canada into the next century.

And now, my question. In Quebec, people talk about wanting to regain autonomy in budgetary matters, returning taxation power to the province of Quebec, about having more budgetary capacity come separation. Considering that equalization works to Quebec's advantage—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. I must take into account the fact that the hon. member was allotted ten minutes with five minutes for questions and comments; that time has almost run out.

Mr. Bélisle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member for Outremont that what the federal government will be transferring to the provinces in terms of block financing is a thinner envelope, a teeny weeny envelope.

• (1600)

When I mentioned in my remarks that the federal government was adding insult to injury, I was referring to the fact that, historically, as the Prime Minister said earlier today, to have a say, you have to pay. Up until now, the federal government paid. But in the future, while withdrawing financially, thereby passing on to the provinces the dirty job of cutting back social programs, the federal government wants to continue laying down standards, national standards. That is the problem.

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): That is not true. Read the budget carefully. Go ahead.

Mr. Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): If the hon. member for Outremont will let me finish. Naturally, some social programs have to be maintained, but the problem is this: at this rate, certain cuts have been so poorly targeted that, if you tie program spending to debt charges and the debt continues to grow at the same rate, there will come a time, five or six years down the road, when program spending cuts to the tune of $75 billion will become necessary to match debt charges of $75 billion. The federal government will then be paying as much on debt service as on all programs provided to individuals and the provinces. We will have a crisis on our hands. That is what this government is leading us into.

[English]

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join in the discussion today. For too long in Canada we have been living in a context which ignores the future implications of our actions. The government has done much more than sit back and wring its hands about the serious economic situation of our country.

Canadians and the governments they elect, whether locally, provincially or nationally, have for a long time been well aware of the impact of the deficit, of how it undermines consumer confidence, of how it diminishes our ability to compete internationally, and of how it robs our children of an economically viable future.

More often than not governments did not act, refused to act. On February 27, 1995 the government demonstrated its willingness to act. The government demonstrated its courage and commitment to make the necessary sacrifices to ensure a better future for Canadians. The Liberal government has submitted to the House a framework that will deliver back to our country and to its citizens the confidence and optimism needed to create a strong, dynamic economy, which is necessary in the context of market globalization.

To listen to the members across the way we would think that point has been missed on them. As a member of the human resources development committee of Parliament I am in a position to say that the strong actions taken in the budget reflect our determination to maintain our commitment to the principles of the Canada Health Act and reinforce our commitment to work with the provinces to provide better and more affordable services.

The provinces have always argued that they are closer to the people, that it is their constitutional prerogative to administer social programs in a cost effective way. The Canada social transfer will be negotiated by the Minister of Human Resources Development and will allow them to do just that.

The bottom line is that Canadians want both government levels to work together to manage social programs better. The budget continues the fundamental structural reforms needed to do that. If we do not act now, our social programs will not survive in the future. We care about our systems of health and education. We care about protecting seniors and the most vulnerable in society.

I would like to share with the House some recent experiences in my riding of Etobicoke—Lakeshore. My constituency office receives numerous calls on a daily basis. In the recent days preceding the budget I received well over 800 calls from constituents asking me to convey their thoughts to the minister that personal income taxes should not be raised. This was a message that I as well as other members of the House communicated to the Minister of Finance.

I knew the finance committee had been around the country. We heard Canadians tell us what should be done. I am here to say that the process worked. The views of Canadians are reflected in the budget. I will give some instances.

• (1605)

In my own riding one of my constituents, Mr. Ted Morris, said:

> Income tax remains the same, thank God. This is a budget that seems to have deflated indignation.

Mr. Morris also brought the message of a local bank manager happy about the increased value of the Canadian dollar, a local real estate broker pleased with the national unity implications, and a retired department store employee wondering whether the provincial government would follow suit.

To some of the residents in a popular Etobicoke donut shop yesterday morning there was an understanding that governments in the past have lived off their credit cards and that this government was ready to start correcting spending habits.

I have a letter here sent today by fax from a constituent, Mr. Michael Kern. He said:

> I am pleased that personal income taxes did not increase. For the moment I feel that the new gas tax is acceptable.

He went on to say:

> Over the past several days the media has been monitoring the opposition to the new budget. I am sure that you have seen news reports of the opposition parties giving their critique of the budget. However on the same news reports reactions from the public are usually shown. My opinion of the budget seems to be in line with that of the general public. We are satisfied. It seems that the only people upset are the opposition parties.

I can go on and refer to several other points that he said. He referred to the new immigration policy. He said:

> That is not bad, not as bad as groups would make it out to be.

He said:

> When you join a social club you have to pay an initiation fee and I believe that the privilege of immigrating to Canada should be no different. The bottom line is this. Mr. Martin has taken the initiative to reduce the deficit, something that previous federal governments seemed to dance around. In addition, Mr. Martin has done so through sensible cutbacks and corporate taxes. I am happy to see that the working Canadian finally does not have to shoulder the responsibility alone. Mrs. Augustine, please accept my congratulations to your government on a practical budget that I feel we can all accept.

I am not certain what messages the Reformers get.

Our government is committed to providing a fair and reliable system of protection for seniors. I know there are several seniors in my riding wo are watching the debate today and who are concerned about protection for seniors, equality, balance and all the things required to ensure the pension system is sustainable in the long term.

The budget states the basic principle for reform in terms of seniors programs is to ensure the system continues to be affordable and that we have some goals for changes in 1997. The budget states these basic principles: undiminished protection for all seniors who are less well off, including those receiving the GIS; continuing full indexation to protect seniors from inflation; the provision of OAS benefits on the basis of family income, as is now the case with the GIS; greater progressivity of benefits by income level; and control of program costs.

The bottom line remains that Canada is still the best country in the world and remains a model for other nations. With the budget the government has demonstrated leadership. Canadians know that we will continue to benefit from a number of social programs that reflect our understanding of community. These programs are implemented in a way that permits governments to take into account changing times and changing needs.

It is in the spirit of federal–provincial co–operation and to provide the greatest possible opportunity for our economic recovery that I join in the debate and support the budget.

As someone who is an immigrant to the country, I know there are concerns by all who are in the process of applying for permanent residence. As the minister of immigration said, we are all in this together, those who are joining us, those who are here and those who want to be here.

• (1610)

The fee is set out in typical Liberal fashion. As a caring and compassionate government we ensure that no one will be turned away as a result. Loan programs and other ways of assisting are also included in the process.

This is an excellent budget and I call on everyone in the House to endorse it.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, who told us about the interesting things she sees in the budget. I had the opportunity to travel with the hon. member when the Committee on Human Resources Development criss–crossed the country. I would like to know if the hon. member is as satisfied with the measures announced in the budget as with the lack of certain measures.

Was she not hoping that something would be provided for social housing? Indeed, it is clearly established that the best way to fight poverty in Canada is to provide a dwelling, at a reasonable cost, to people who often have to spend 40, 50 or 60 per cent of their budget on housing, because other forms of assistance are inadequate. Does the member not think that the budget should have provided something in that regard?

During the committee hearings held across the country, did the member hear anyone say that the government had to take $700 million out of the UI fund, as provided in the budget? Did anyone ever tell the committee that cuts should be made to the UI program? When the committee travelled to Rivière–du–Loup, did anyone ask that all transportation subsidies be eliminated immediately, that the whole economic structure of the region be changed without any transition period to adjust, and that the UI fund also be reduced, thus leading people to leave the region? Did the member hear any such thing and is she pleased with this budget as regards social housing and the cuts affecting the unemployment insurance fund and the transportation subsidies?

[English]

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recollect for my hon. friend our experience across the country. Over and over we heard the messages. Maybe we interpreted them with different ears. However, people told us over and over about jobs and the creation of jobs. They told us that the best social security for individuals was the ability to find work and the ability to provide for their families.

It is also important to note that the individuals who spoke to us on a number of issues stressed quite strongly the fact that they wanted the involvement of the federal government. They wanted some principles, some national standards, and some way of operating that would ensure protection and security in the fact that the federal government would provide the necessary support.

As federal legislators, the expectation from us is to ensure that we provide the kind of economic climate in which individuals will find jobs.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of one of the toughest budgets in Canadian history. A tough budget was needed to keep the country on track. It is a budget that Canadians have been calling on the government to table and I am proud to stand in my place today to support it.

We have answered the demands of Canadians with a tough but fair budget. We have taken the necessary fiscal action in a sensitive manner that addresses the priorities of all Canadians. No doubt there is pain involved, but the pain does not hit like a sledgehammer. A sledgehammer would devastate everything around the target. Rather, it is like a bow and arrow. We hit the targets dead on without devastating everything around us.

• (1615)

This budget is the arrow that will hit our deficit target without destroying the foundation we have built.

That is the difference between the budget that was tabled by the finance minister on Monday versus the budget we saw by the Reform Party the week previous. You can cut, but there are ways to cut. I would emphasize that this is the difference between the Liberal Party philosophy and the one across the way.

The 1995–96 the federal budget has gained widespread support. Yes, there is opposition that this budget is too strong or does not go far enough or will spell the end of Canadian society as we know it. The answers to those criticisms are easily found.

The budget comes down squarely at a crossroad for this country. It must be a strong budget as Canada meets the economic and fiscal challenges leading into the next century. If this budget went any further, slashing and burning government spending with reckless abandon, that is just where Canadians would find themselves, abandoned by their government.

As I said before, Liberals do not abandon people. By taking this sensible approach to our fiscal situation, it is this government that will ensure social programs and basic services remain apart of Canadian society.

This is a make or break budget for our deficit situation. We must not impede economic recovery and the potential for growth. By taking the steps contained in this budget, we are directly acting on our fiscal position so that Canada can maintain and not destroy the universal social programs that define this nation.

This budget must satisfy demands of international markets, a reality of living in a global trade environment. The financial community quickly graded this budget with high marks.

Interest rates have dropped and our dollar immediately climbed in the markets. The government did not panic. We listened to Canadian taxpayers, to international markets, to dozens and dozens of interest groups. Then we acted with sensible, intelligent and compassionate approaches.

We are, as the finance ministers says, breaking the back of the deficit. The international community has acknowledged we are on the right track. Many of my constituents have told me that they are impressed with this budget. Canadians obviously approve.

The budget takes necessary steps to secure Canada's fiscal position. The federal budget is just strong enough. The minister of finance has found the right mix of spending cuts and revenue measures to ensure a fiscal trend of deficit reduction.

This budget significantly reduces government spending but is crafted in a way that is fair to all regions of the country. We must bring our finances in order. To do that Canadians everywhere must share, quite frankly, in the price we must pay for fiscal responsibility.

I hasten to add that sharing in the cost of reducing our deficit will not involve paying more tax. We will meet and exceed our deficit reduction targets without an increase in personal taxes.

The government has taken on the challenge of fiscal prudence while maintaining steady economic growth. This is not an easy task. Our choice is to fundamentally change the structure of government. Our focus is on reduced spending and a smaller, smarter government.

I have been a long time supporter of our public sector service. The reality we face as Canadians, and one that must be shared by our public servants, is that government must be streamlined. The public sector must find a way to become more efficient. It is a tough assignment but I am confident that Canada's public servants can bring government into the next century.

If anyone is capable of meeting that challenge, it is the men and women working in the public sector. These professionals are embarking on a difficult transition. I urge our public servants, many of whom I know personally, to apply their skills and to contribute to Canada's future.

We all know that the public sector will lose about 45,000 positions, but last year alone there were almost a half a million new jobs created in Canada. The objective of this delicate budget is to bring the government house in order without upsetting the balance of economic stimulus. A healthy economy will provide jobs for skilled people such as those who will be leaving the public service.

Government supports the creation of new jobs but it is business that does most of the hiring. We will realize savings from cutbacks in government spending but there is also increased revenue from newly created jobs.

My riding is located in northwestern Ontario. It is a region of Canada that can be used as an example of how the budget will impact Canadians. Northwestern Ontario will suffer from spending cuts and revenue measures. We will lose forestry and mining developing funding shared by the federal and provincial governments. The decrease in dairy subsidies will affect us and the gasoline tax will hurt.

I realize, as my constituents do, that we will survive. I think everyone of us realizes that we have to share the burden in one way or another. My riding has never depended on government for its survival. I think the majority of my constituents would rather see government get its act together instead of receiving a handout.

Northwestern Ontario has carved an economic foundation from the resource sectors such as forestry, mining and tourism.

Comprehensive diversification of our regional economy is a long term goal which is progressing.

I am encouraged that this budget, while reducing or eliminating subsidies, is keeping business support programs in place. Small business loans, export and marketplace services and technology support all remain a part of the federal mandate. We are also optimistic about the future of tourism initiatives that have become a federal priority.

The relationship between small business and the banking sector has been a longstanding concern in my riding. When I was in opposition it was something we talked about on numerous occasions, that small business is still not getting a fair shake from the financial institutions in the country.

In the budget the access to capital for the reasonable ventures essential to the economic growth in my region is again going to be a priority of the finance minister. I am still hopeful that sooner or later the banks in this country will realize that without them we cannot get this economy rolling to the extent we believe it can.

Recent increases in the Small Business Loans Act are a positive sign. A region such as northwestern Ontario is dictated by unique circumstances. I also feel the privatization of crown corporations will be received well in this House and in the riding I represent.

I chaired a government task force to study the future of the Canadian National Railway. The commercialization of CN is one of the recommendations in our final report. This action and other commercializations such as Petro–Canada has great potential for the private sector. It puts business in the hands of business people and leaves government with the task of regulating, not operating.

The fearmongering on the issue of social programs is something I want touch on a little. The issue of Canada social transfers does not hold much water in my riding. If we changed the system my constituents would applaud that simply because they are not satisfied with the current structure of social programs as they exist today.

Like many members of the House, I have conducted a survey on social security. The overwhelming response was that social policy must change. This budget sets social policy changes in motion and I applaud that. Once again, the government has not pressed the panic button.

The other side tends to press the panic button to make people concerned about the fact that we are not moving quickly enough. Those who have been here around here a little longer will realize that if we take our time and put the right programs in place those will be the programs that will survive the test of time and they are the kinds of programs that built this country and made it the great place we live in.

If we are to change our system we have to make sure it is a change for the better and not for the worse.

• (1625)

This budget makes it clear that this party is responsible for universal social programs in Canada. It will be this party that brings social policy into the 21st century. Of course the only way we will do that is to ensure we can afford it and this budget does just that.

This is a responsible budget. We are attacking the deficit but we are planning our attack without undue casualties. The social fabric of our nation will survive. We are setting a responsible pace of deficit reduction to preserve economic growth and stability.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the hon. member saying his constituents have been very pleased with the budget, especially when the Prime Minister and a number of other Liberal MPs have been saying how this is not a budget they wanted to bring in, that it is an anti–Liberal budget.

I wonder if this actually means the people in central and eastern Canada voted Liberal because they had no other choice and that they actually do not want traditional Liberal budgets or traditional Liberal policies. Polls taken on things like justice and the budget show that Canadians actually want Reform style policies and budgets.

I ask the hon. member whether the fact that he is getting compliments about the budget actually means people do not support Liberal policies.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, as I have on numerous occasions in this place, let me make very clear to my friend across the way that I do not come from central Canada. I come from western Canada. I happen to be the member of Parliament for Kenora—Rainy River, which is in a vast riding in northern Ontario. It is on central time and is so close to Winnipeg we have very western ideas. The riding has been voting Liberal long before I was alive and, yes, there was a Reform candidate who ran in my riding. He was lucky to get his deposit back, the lucky soul that he was.

I can assure this House that my riding, being of very western flavour, believing very strongly in Canada's social programs and fabric, would not have been voting Liberal since the turn of the century if it did not believe in Liberal principles.

If this budget, as is being suggested by the member, were not a Liberal budget I would have heard about it first and foremost in my riding because my riding, as I said, only voted one other way in its history and that was when it lost its way in 1984 when everybody was foolish enough to vote Tory and it went with the NDP. I can assure members that my constituents learned their lesson that one time and now have gone back to the Liberal fold.

I have received five phone calls on the budget from people who were concerned about social programs. The remainder of the people in my riding have called to say this is a great budget because it sends us down the track. It also recognizes that we did not get into the mess in three years, like the Reform Party seems to suggest, and we will not get out of it in three years as it suggests.

It took us 20 years to get into it and it will take us some time to get out of it. We should use our good, common sense and not tear and gut the heart and soul out of Canada by doing that, but take our time and restructure the economy the way it should be restructured.

[Translation]

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I would simply like to add to the comments of my eloquent colleague, who clearly, has done a fair analysis of the budget situation. I would like to add, on the matter of national standards, as I mentioned earlier, that the Minister of Finance created a new transfer in the budget to be called the Canada social transfer.

The opposition is saying that again we are setting national standards for the Canada social transfer. I see nothing wrong in setting national standards. The problem with national standards—and again the opposition is trying to doctor the truth—is that, in the past, the standards were set unilaterally by the federal government. Now what we are saying, and it is in black and white in the budget, is that we are inviting all of the provinces to work together to set national standards jointly and in a spirit of co–operation.

This is the new Canadian federalism, flexible federalism, co–operative federalism. We are not trying to hide the truth or use some form of trickery to take away what is in fact in the budget and what was requested by all of the provinces.

• (1630)

[English]

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I want to quickly say to my colleague and to other colleagues in the House that federalism is by far one of the best systems in the world. There is a reason for that. The reason federalism works so well and why other countries wish they had a federal system like ours is because it is fluid. It is not static. The reason federalism works is its ability to be flexible.

Anyone who has analysed where we were when we first became the country of Canada and where we are today with the changes that have taken place has found that we have been able to adapt to tremendous change when necessary. It is the reason this country has been so successful.

If this government keeps on track the way the finance minister has been going, I predict as I did in the last election that by the end of the 1990s we will have our deficit under control. We will be paying off our debt. We will be back on track. We will still be the best country in the world. Our fiscal and monetary policy will be back to where it would have been had we not had that 10 years of Tory rule which messed it all up for us.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to debate this borrowing bill, I must flag a historic event for the House. We have finally witnessed a budget that, however timid, at least attempts to cut federal spending in real terms.

It has been decades since we have seen this kind of budget and it marks a great victory for the Reform Party of Canada. This budget would have been unheard of only a few years ago. It indicates a stunning conversion on the part of the Liberal Party.

I am delighted the financial markets have reacted positively so that things may go well for our country. Above all, I wish for prosperity and stability for Canada. When that happens I am pleased, no matter who brings down the budget.

However, just as a leopard cannot change its spots, I cannot believe the Liberals have really been converted. The budget was an act of pure necessity, not something done out of the courage of their convictions. The Liberals did the bare minimum they could in order to avert a national financial disaster. Had he had his way, the Prime Minister would have increased spending and taxes even more than he did. He said as much on the CBC program "Morningside" yesterday.

In this respect there is no denying that the presence of the Reform Party of Canada in this House is a bulwark in defence of the taxpayer, a stronghold of protection of the public interest. The Reform Party, working with Canadian taxpayers, can take the credit for this change in direction.

Fifty–two members of this House put sustained pressure for a year and one–half on this government to reduce spending. The government finally responded by adopting a plank from the Reform Party agenda, just as it adopted the agenda of the NDP when that party was a factor in this House.

Although the Liberals have formed the government, there is a new game in town. Today the government is forced to respond to the criticisms from a fiscally responsible opposition, no longer from the loonie left. They still form the government and they still have the numbers in this House to pass any laws they choose, but they no longer possess the moral or political mandate from the people to complete their leftist agenda. The political mandate is passing to the Reform Party of Canada. The Reform Party is now driving the national policy agenda. In that reality, I take great satisfaction.

There is so much more left to be done. So much of the public interest was ignored in this budget. The government went half way, but it could not bear to bring itself all the way in order to defend our economy, to defend our social programs and our future prosperity. I am truly dismayed by several aspects of this budget. All things politically correct were left virtually untouched.

My constituents have indicated clearly, for example, that they want the CBC to be downsized by two–thirds. Instead, it was cut by 4 per cent. Through an extensive survey process my constituents told me that they want the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to be substantially reduced. Instead, the government increased that budget by 12 per cent. Special interest groups are left virtually untouched. The Canada Council was cut by a mere 2 per cent. The National Film Board was cut by just 5 per cent.

I find it disgusting that the government can go ahead and cut UI but not make dramatic reductions to these other agencies. The government has not dealt equitably with the people of Canada in leaving so many institutions unscathed. How can the Liberals start cutting our social safety nets when they refuse first to abolish their own gold plated MP pension plan?

• (1635)

Many budget items simply reflect the power of individual ministers. Why did Cape Breton Development Corporation receive a 69 per cent increase? The fact that it is in the riding of the Minister of Public Works and Government Services may have something to do with it. Why will CIDA be downsized by only 30 people? The Minister of Foreign Affairs swings a lot of weight in cabinet.

As I have already stated, this budget was not about fairness. It is not that I am in disagreement with all of its decisions, but the hypocrisy of this budget makes me question everything the government says. This budget was all about broken promises. The examples are legion.

The government promised never to change the workforce adjustment directive without union consent. It is breaking it. It promised massive changes to social programs. There are none, though there must now be massive changes down the road. It promised not to increase taxes on the middle class but it did it anyway. It promised to reform the GST, but the GST is unchanged. The Prime Minister was to repudiate the NAFTA. Today he praises it. He promised to increase foreign aid to .7 per cent of GDP. On Monday he slashed it by $500 million.

Two years ago the Reform party proposed cutbacks in the public service totalling 30,000 to 35,000 employees, cutbacks which would have been over and done with by now. The Liberals called us callous and uncaring. Now they are gleefully laying off 45,000 public servants. The Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal says that even more layoffs are in the works. That is callous and uncaring.

Farmers will remember the broken promises. Remember how the Liberals would never sign the GATT without strengthening article XI(2)(c). They signed it anyway. Western grain farmers lost the Crow subsidy. They can add to that a new fuel tax and major cuts to farm programs in the agriculture department itself.

This government quite happily kicked farmers in the teeth, but not until after it had won the election. Farmers are willing to do their part, but if cuts in other areas were as serious as the agricultural cuts, we would now have a balanced budget within our sights.

My own constituency is presently facing a grave economic situation because of this budget. It will take a hit all out of proportion to its own numbers. The Hope weather station will be closed next month. More important, Canadian Forces Base Chilliwack in my riding will be closed over the next four years. This will mean $105 million or 7 per cent of all economic activity in Chilliwack will be cut out.

Perhaps the Minister of Finance did not see the study that was released on Monday. It showed that in terms of regional distribution, British Columbia gets $700 million per year less than it should, given its share of the population. Again, we are ready and willing to make sacrifices in B.C., but why would the government increase the regional disparity by taking $100 million more out of British Columbia?

With the possible exception of Cold Lake, Alberta, there is no community in Canada that will suffer more from this budget than Chilliwack. And the Liberals call that fair? I call it shameful. The people of B.C. will one day pass judgment on Liberal policy.

No longer will there be a land forces presence west of the Rocky Mountains. In the case of a natural disaster or civil disorder there will no longer be that natural resource that the people of B.C. can count on. This is short–sighted. It is bad policy in a civil, military and an economic sense. The third largest province in Canada deserves better.

Now I must come to the bill before us. The fatal weakness of the budget is that this bill will work great harm in Canada. In two years Canada will pay $51 billion in interest alone. Program spending will decline to $108 billion and interest payments will increase to half of our program spending. That borrowing bill is nothing more than an enormous social program for foreign investors.

The Minister of Finance decries the Reform taxpayers' budget, but Reform alone faces up to the truth. Because of the interest payments on our national debt, the frightening prospect of the total destruction of many of these programs is looming directly ahead. We are choking the life out of them by continuing to run huge budget deficits.

After all the Liberal fanfare, the deficit is still huge. It will still be $25 billion two years from now. By then we could well be in the middle of a recession. The American economy is already showing signs of a slowdown. If that continues, or if it happens, our economy will be in a meltdown.

The Minister of Finance criticizes Reformers for suggesting that we adjust social programs now while there is time. In the next breath the government admits it is conducting its own study into the pension situation. By the time it screws up its own courage to act, the cuts it will make to old age pensions will truly be devastating. They will leave seniors in real poverty.

The Liberals can see the numbers as well as anyone. They know what needs to be done to protect our social programs in the future, but they are going to put off action because they do not have the guts to make the tough decisions today. In fact they will heap abuse on Reform suggestions, even if these suggestions are in the public interest, even if they are quietly undertaking to do exactly the same things themselves in an underhanded way.

Last week I tabled a petition with 20,000 names, calling for no new taxes. In a few days I will table 13,000 more names. I personally delivered 2,000 letters from my constituents to the office of the Minister of Finance calling upon him to balance the budget without raising taxes. These people did not get their wish. Canadians wanted a timetable for a balanced budget but the government failed to deliver.

There are simple tests of good government: conscientious control of the public purse; a strong clear vision of and commitment to the public interest that reaches far into the future; attention to regional fairness; and equitable reductions in government spending. I am disappointed that the government has failed these tests.

This budget has failed the Canadian people. No matter how well it is accepted by the markets in the short term, the numbers predict our future in the long term. The government had a chance to mend our social safety net on Monday, but through Bill C–73 it will allow interest payments to tear it to shreds over the coming years.

Shame on the government that it has squirrelled away the past year and a half making budget balancing all that much more tougher than it needed to be. It is a shame it is planning to saddle our nation with another $90 billion in new debt, a debt which will be a pox on our social programs, a curse on our taxation levels, a drag on our job creating businesses and a millstone around the necks of our children and grandchildren, forever and ever, amen.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night I had the opportunity to review the base closures on television. The Chilliwack base is being closed which I understand is part of the member's riding.

There is not a member of Parliament on this side of the House who did not feel the pain that was expressed on that show last night. That is why many of us on this side of the House for the last few months have been trying to communicate to the opposition, to the Reform Party that we should not just be talking about the federal deficit. We should be talking about the human deficit.

What bothers me is that the debate has not expanded beyond the deficit in traditional terms. We have to figure out what we are going to do in the long term. Not only our country but other countries around the world have been faced with fluctuating interest rates. Capital is being pushed around by people who are shorting their own currencies and playing with derivatives and everything else. We as one nation in the G–7 are almost victims of this international game which is being played.

I wish that with the Reform Party members we could expand this debate. Let us not just think about the budget and the tough decisions we have had to make on this side. Make no mistake, we feel the cuts on this side as much as they do. I would venture to say many of us feel them even more. As Liberals it goes against the very grain and soul that brought us to this place, whereas the Reformers seem to be much more conditioned to deep cuts regardless of the human side of it.

• (1645)

Would the member be willing when we return after question period, along with his other colleagues, to maybe enter into a debate on a new and improved Bretton Woods agreement? We should start looking at what we can do to change interest rates, not just for Canada but for all the world. At the rate we are going it is not just Canada that is in trouble. It is the whole world.

Mr. Strahl: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his presentation. I understand his first point about the base closures. I realize that base closures have affected many ridings and cross party lines. Some of the Bloc members have had ridings affected. I know many of the Liberals have had closures in their ridings as well.

With the closure of CFB Chilliwack there will no longer be an army base in all of British Columbia. There are 12 bases in Canada. There is not even one in B.C. To me that is a concern. Emergency preparedness is a concern. Even more so, it is a concern that there be a national armed forces presence.

I am concerned that people from B.C. get an opportunity to be trained in Quebec, as I am that Quebecers get an opportunity to be trained in B.C. It is just a matter of equity. I realize I am not singled out in one sense, and yet on the other hand it is a mistake in the long term not to have a land forces presence anywhere in British Columbia. It is short sighted. I realize I share that hurt with many members on both sides of the House, but it is short sighted.

The member talks about the cuts we want to make regardless of the human side. Reformers have consistently said it is because of the human cost that we have advocated change. It is no fun to be the guy who says we have to make severe cuts and we even have to readjust our expectations in the pension plan. What fun is there in that? The reality is I want to preserve the core of that for people who need it.

By preserving it now in a relatively short order, we can preserve the parts that make Canada great. It is because of the human side. The last point about the Bretton Woods institution, I have a private member's bill on the Order Paper about the accountability of international financial institutions—

The Speaker: I regret the member's time has expired.

Mr. Strahl: It is because of the time that he took.

The Speaker: With the greatest of respect to members on both sides of the House, the total time is five minutes and I think that has been fulfilled.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the day when I will not have to rise to speak about a borrowing bill.

Liberal members of course, have spent the last few days claiming that the finance minister's budget is the greatest thing to ever bless Canada. They claim that the world financial markets love it and that their constituents love it and all is well. In fact, I would like to thank the member for Broadview—Greenwood for confirming that the budget that the people like so well is not Liberal policy. It simply confirms that people do not want Liberal policies.

Members opposite for the last two days have been claiming the dollar is going up and interest rates are coming down. They say: "Don't worry. Be happy". I think the decline in interest rates has a lot more to do with the amount of money people have put into GICs in the last few days for their RRSPs. It has given the banks a surplus of money that they have to get rid of.

Today the dollar did not continue to go up the way members opposite had hoped. It continued to slump, down to 70.92 today, which is more than a cent and a quarter below the high the day after the budget.

Perhaps this means that the international markets have had time to look a little more closely at the budget and they can see that most of the cuts are deferred until next year while all of the big tax increases occur this year. However, I do think we really have to wait a few weeks before either side decides they have the answer to whether the dollar is going up or down. We need to give the markets time to really continue to study this document.

There are tax increases in the budget that are really going to hurt the average Canadian very much. Liberal MPs must be the only people in the country who think that a penalty tax on banks is not going to affect the loan rates or the service fees or something else that people use at banks.

• (1650)

Liberal MPs must be the only people in the country who think that a 1 per cent increase on the surcharge tax for corporations will not trickle down to price increases or service charge increases.

Liberal MPs must be the only people in the country who think that a 1.5 cent a litre increase in the tax on gasoline will not mean higher prices at the pumps.

Despite all of these deceptive increases in taxes that will hit the average Canadian, the ship is still going down, albeit a little more slowly and with a few less crew on board. In three years the interest payments on the debt will have consumed every single cent the finance minister has saved in his latest budget.

The minister was quoted in the Vancouver Province as saying: "The light at the end of the tunnel is much closer than any of us might think". That light is getting larger because there is a locomotive bearing down on us. The finance minister may be going in the right direction but he is on the wrong track. Increased taxes will not bring confidence to the job creators of the country, that is businesses.

I know members opposite think the government creates jobs but it is actually business that creates meaningful and real, long lasting jobs. If businesses do not feel good about the economy they will not expand and create jobs.

Let me compare the finance minister's performance with that of some of the governors in the United States. A constituent in my riding, Mr. John Dickenson, provided me with a tape of a speech made by Governor Carol Whitman of the U.S.A. She is the governor of New Jersey.

Governor Whitman cut business and income taxes three times over a two–year period, a 30 per cent cut in taxes at the same time as she slashed spending to comply with a balanced budget amendment. Opponents, for which we can read Liberals, said: "The sky is falling. The economy will be destroyed". Instead, 60,000 new private sector jobs were created by the private sector and tax revenues actually increased.

The same pattern is evident in state after state. Governor Bill Weld of Massachusetts cut spending by $1.7 billion in his first month in office. He also cut taxes five times and now has the lowest unemployment levels in the United States.

The same month that President Clinton signed the biggest tax increase in history for the American people, Governor John Ingler signed the biggest decrease in Michigan history, bringing the lowest unemployment rate to Michigan in 20 years.

New Zealand has also had similar results from its program of massive cuts to government spending at the same time that the tax system was revised and taxes were reduced.

The proof is there. Zero in three actually works. These examples show that the very best way to put more money into the hands of the poor, of families, of businesses and of everyone is to cut spending and taxes. Tax cuts and spending cuts make it easier for people to buy a home and to improve their standard of living. Things work better when people make their own spending decisions instead of having their spending decisions made by good, old Uncle Liberal government back here in Ottawa.

There is nothing moral, compassionate or virtuous about increasing taxes. I will say that again in case any members opposite were sleeping. There is nothing compassionate, virtuous or moral about increasing taxes. High taxes punish those people who are the most productive in our society. High taxes are a symptom of a government's failure, incompetence and inability to recognize the damage that those high taxes are doing to society.

Even some Liberals have come to realize something is wrong. They realize there is too much crime, too much family violence, too much poverty and too high a debt. Some are even starting to realize that the biggest single social program is the transfer of all that interest payment to the creditors of Canada's debt every year. That is one social program that is still growing.

The government has not realized yet that Liberal policies have caused these problems and these problems will not be solved by throwing even more government money, especially borrowed money, at those problems.

I heard another member talking about compassion earlier. Compassion is something one cannot buy. It is something that comes from within. One does not buy it by throwing dollars at a problem.

• (1655)

I would like to change tack a little and relate a little more about my experience in New Zealand over the Christmas break. I was in New Zealand visiting relatives and I had the opportunity to meet for an hour and a half with the Right Hon. David Lange, who was Prime Minister of New Zealand at the time of the debt crisis in 1984.

I would have laughed if anyone had told me a decade ago I would one day sit with a Labour minister of finance and actually enjoy speaking to him. I came away from the meeting with a great deal of respect for a man who has faced the debt monster, came to grips with it and realized that a free market economy is the best way to deliver healthy social programs.

Mr. Lange said: "We have passed through the age of left and right wing governments to a time where we have maintenance and reforming style governments". Those are the terms we should be using today. This new set of labels put into words a concept I have been struggling with for some time because I knew despite the accusations of the other side of the House, the Reform Party is not a crazy right wing party. We are not either right or left wing.

I will use an example. The members opposite can jeer. I use the example of the 1992 referendum on the Charlottetown accord when all three traditional parties; the NDP, the PCs and the Liberals lined up on the yes side and Reform on the no side. Does that make us left or right? Which one? Neither. It made the three traditional old line parties maintenance style parties. They did not want to change the status quo. We were the reformers, the ones that wanted to change the status quo, make the necessary changes.

Mr. Lange's Labour left wing government became a reforming style government when it had to face the debt monster. During the period following that debt crisis from 1984 to 1994 the National and Labour parties took turns in office, but they were all reforming governments. They continued the program of government spending cuts and tax decreases to generate the necessary stimulus to the economy.

Today New Zealand has a maintenance style of government, National by name, which has projected a $2.5 billion surplus for this year. Last year they had a $900 million surplus and put $800 million more into social programs because of it.

Mr. Lange predicts that New Zealand will have a maintenance style government for the next decade. Unemployment is down to 6.5 per cent and the economy is growing at an annual rate of 6 per cent.

I can see the puzzled looks on the faces of the Liberals. "Please tell me it is not so", they are saying. "Please do not say that the private sector actually creates jobs. Please do not tell us it is better if government is smaller and that it makes spending cuts". Mr. Lange told me that the Canadian Liberal Party is a maintenance style of government. It is just used to keeping things running when things are good and if Canada had to face its problems it needs a reforming style of government to do it.

Mr. Lange also told me in retrospect he wished he had moved faster on the cuts because it was so stimulating to the economy. A decade later, New Zealand has a diversified, free market economy competing in the global marketplace. Exports now include plastic bottles to Japan; wooden boxes to the U.S.A., mozzarella cheese and hamburger beef to Canada; furniture to Singapore; metal castings to Taiwan; aircraft parts to Boeing in Seattle. The free market economy will solve our problems. We should not be borrowing more money. We should be cutting spending.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, World Summit for Social Development; the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, The Budget; the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, The Budget.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the comments of my colleague. I have heard the same comment day after day from the Reform Party that the Liberals are really very unrealistic about what is happening.

• (1700)

Why did John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Business, state that our budget was very believable, very credible? Why did John Fund, who wrote a highly critical editorial about Canada's $540 billion debt, congratulate the government for being on the right course?

Could the member please inform me why the powerful Canadian Manufacturers' Association called our budget the first very serious attempt at balancing this country's books? Why is it that yesterday the chartered accountants association in this country congratulated the Liberals and said that we scored four out of five on their questions? We were at the top of the list in the way we responded to the debt and the deficit in this country.

The Canadian bond raters raised Canada's status. Each financial group, each authority on business in this country has come forward one after another. It is not the Liberals. They are not people who have been friends to the Liberals. They are representing very specific business and financial interests in this country. They applaud the steps taken by the minister.

Mr. White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member opposite for pointing out once again that a successful budget receiving praise from many areas is not a Liberal budget. This confirms what I have been saying time after time this afternoon. People wanted a budget that was not a Liberal budget. They were very pleasantly surprised by the general direction, although not quite far enough. The international markets seem to be telling us that.

Everybody out there wanted a budget that was nothing like a Liberal budget. All the member has done is confirm yet again that people do not want Liberal policies. They do not want Liberal financial answers. They want real reforming budgets, reforming policies and a Reform government.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is never good for me to get up to speak after I have listened to the nonsense and the rhetoric form the other side, particularly the Reform Party.

I have sat in the House for quite a few years. I have listened to a lot of rhetoric in the House. The hon. member's rhetoric is perhaps the most unbelievable I have ever heard. He gave his entire speech talking about experiences in Michigan and New Jersey and the wonderful things that are happening everywhere else but in Canada.

I want to let him know something because he obviously has been out of the country for quite a while. There has been a revolution happening in Canada. It has been a revolution the Liberal Party has created about putting government back where it belongs, serving the public, allowing the free market to proceed.

Guess what? The Canadian public has looked at what we have done. It has not just given us a thumbs up. It has given us a resounding vote of confidence. Today the Angus Reid poll indicated the path we have taken with the recent budget is supported by over 70 per cent of Canadians polled. This was despite the doom and gloom and the nonsense the Reform Party spouts like a loose water cannon daily in this place.

Those members came into this place not because the Canadian public wanted a Reform style of politics but, with the greatest of respect, they came into this place in many ridings because the Tories simply lost the ridings, not because anybody agreed with the policies they had.

I consider myself to be a left leaning Liberal. I happen to believe that the New Democratic Party has a voice that Canadians need to have heard in debate. I look across at the Bloc Quebecois and I have listened to the members opposite. Other than the fact they are horribly misguided with respect to their bent on sovereignty, most of these individuals opposite are Liberals by philosophy. One has to listen to them. They may want to take their province out of Canada but they have an underlying concern for the individuals, for the social policy, for the programs of this country.

I would not call the Reform Party left or right. That would put it on the continuum of common sense. It is right off the mark when it comes to being responsible and reflective of Canadians.

• (1705)

I want to talk a bit about the budget and this borrowing authority. I know the member is new here but even if there were a balanced budget there is still the need for a borrowing authority of government. The taxes do not come in every single day. They come in mostly at one point in the year. The borrowing authority bill is a time that we can stand up in the House and talk a bit about the fiscal reality of Canada.

When we took over government we took over a government that had lost the confidence of investors not just in Canada but around the world. We took over a government and an institution that had lost the confidence of Canadians.

The Prime Minister said time and time again when he was on the campaign trail that if he did not do anything else as Prime Minister of this country he would put respect back into politics. What we say we will do, we will do. He put most of the main ideas in a thing called the red book. Much to the chagrin of the Reform Party and members opposite, almost daily there is another commitment in the red book fulfilled by the Prime Minister, the cabinet and the Liberals in this government.

That is probably one of the reasons that Canadians, international investors, people who buy Canada savings bonds, people from all over this country and beyond finally sat up and said it is amazing, they can finally have a government in power in Ottawa that says what it means and does what it says it will do.

Let us be realistic here. I have been here seven years. We used to watch and wait for the Tory finance minister to get up and it was like throwing darts with a blindfold on his deficit projections, whether they were going to hit. We wonder why the international community lost confidence in the Canadian dollar. We wonder why it lost confidence in the Canadian economy. It is because the previous ministers of finance who were on the right wing of the spectrum, the Reformers of late, could not add up.

Every time they came in with a projection the international money markets and consumer confidence went right down the toilet. We could hear the big flush every time one of those budgets came in.

Our finance minister put a budget last year and he has not only met the projections, and that is the first time in recent history that has been done, he exceeded the projections. When he walked in this time and put a budget forward and the Canadian public and the people who invest and buy our bonds in the international community and who invest in business in Canada said finally they have somebody in government who is credible. So did the Canadian public in the poll released today.

I want to talk about how we have not abandoned our principles as Liberals. I am a Liberal. During the lead up to this debate and this budget I harboured grave concerns about where we were going as the Liberal Party.

I am one of those individuals who believe in the principles of liberalism, of fairness and equity. I believe the people of this country have a collective right of ownership of the resource that is Canada. While one of the roles of government is to ensure that the free market system works and is attractive to people to come and invest, the Government of Canada has a fundamental responsibility to ensure that wealth is redistributed. That is absolute horror to the ears of the Reform Party. I believe that with every ounce of my being.

When this great debate started and we had this deficit that had to be brought under control I thought we were going to lose our principles. I thought as the Liberal Party we were going to find ourselves following a right wing Reform–Tory agenda. We did not.

I have discovered something. I discovered that we can stand up and defend the vehicles that deliver the programs until the cows come home but if the vehicles are broken they are not going to be able to deliver the programs. The programs are merely a manifestation of the principles. The principles of those programs, our social programs, our transfers to the provinces, our equalization program, EPFs and health care, unemployment insurance, all of those things and all of those programs that we provide as government are merely a way to deliver the Liberal principles of wealth, regeneration and redistribution, of going in and making sure that government has the ability to help those who are least able to help themselves.

I was more than pleased when I heard the budget announced the other night. I was worried there would be an adverse regional impact. I guess once bitten twice shy. To be quite honest, last year I felt that the budget disproportionately hit some of the regions like Atlantic Canada.

• (1710)

I was extremely vocal in my concerns and in my criticisms. Over the last 12 months we have grown as a government and we have learned to listen. We have had the most massive prebudget consultations in the history of this country. We listened, not just to people out on the hustings but also to people in this party and people in the House.

The Minister of Finance has crafted a document I did not think could be done. First, he has satisfied the international investor community that Canada is serious about its deficit and eventually dealing with the debt. Second, he said that we are still a country that believes in the greatness of the resource that is this nation and the rights of the individuals to have their government give them a hand up when necessary. Third, he recognized this country first and foremost is a regional country. The economies in this country because of our geography and our history are regional economies.

The finance minister came in with a budget that did not disproportionately hit any part of this country, that recognizes that the real future of this country is getting our debt and deficit under control while at the same time not throwing the baby out with the bath water and wherever possible preserving those basic and fundamental principles of Liberalism.

I am not happy that as a result of the burgeoning deficit some of our public servants who have done a tremendous service for Canada have had to go. The President of the Treasury Board has listened. He has come in with a package which is fair and in most cases more than reasonable. We have said to the public servants of Canada that times have changed. Yes, government has to do more with less and our priorities must shift.

With those individuals who have helped to build this country and deliver the programs we are prepared to sit down and be as generous as we can with early retirement, early departure and transfers, if possible, to other programs. No, we are not perfect as a government and this budget is not perfect, but it is the closest thing to perfection in a budget that I have seen and that the Canadian public has seen in many years.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend, the hon. member for Dartmouth, a few questions. I had the opportunity to take a trip with him to Japan, during which we had long discussions. Despite that opportunity, I was still a little surprised to see that he was so proud and happy today, and so impressed with the Minister of Finance's budget.

I fail to see how anyone could be proud, for example, to say that most of the deficit reduction measures will be achieved by offloading the problem onto the provinces. Responsibility for a large part of the federal deficit will be squarely put on the province's shoulders. For example, the Minister of Finance says that Quebec will receive almost $7 billion less from the federal government, which will, of course, continue to tax Quebecers as much as ever.

How can he be proud to see that, in two years' time, Canada will have tacked on another $50 billion to its debt? How can he be proud of that? How can the hon. member for Dartmouth be proud to see that, in two years, Canada's accumulated debt will have climbed to $611 billion? How could we be proud of that? This does not make me in the least bit proud. Therefore, I would simply like the hon. member to answer my question.

Instead of making fiery speeches, he may be better advised to come down from the clouds and realize that, in two years, Canada will obviously have to collect more income tax and impose other taxes. The country will give much less to its citizens, since the interest payments on the debt alone will be at least $50 billion. How could we possibly be proud of that?

[English]

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his questions. I have a great deal of respect for the work that he does in Parliament. We have had discussions. I think he should drop this bit about sovereignty because he knows that Canada is a great place and I know he feels that fundamentally.

My colleague has asked me two questions. On the one hand, he has raised a concern about debt downloading to the provinces, that there are cuts in the transfers. I have to say to him that I am concerned about the cuts to transfers. The province of Quebec is much more able to withstand those types of cuts in transfers than places like Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia the provincial ministers of finance said the number one wish they had on their wish list going into this budget was not that they did not have their transfers cut, but that the federal government come up with a credible plan for getting its finances in order. If that was not done it would have a major negative impact on the stability of the dollar and interest rates. Every province in the country is individually financing a debt. Their number one priority was to have some credibility from the Minister of Finance.

• (1715)

On transfers to the provinces we cut them by 4.4 per cent. That seems like a lot of money. It is 3 per cent of the revenue of the provinces. However, we cut our own programs, the ones we take credit or blame for, by 7.3 per cent. We cut ourselves more than we cut other people.

With respect to the second question about the debt being too high, I agree with him 100 per cent. However, I do not agree with members of the Reform Party that it is a debt monster and that we should dance to their tune.

We have tried to recognize that the debt is too high but that in order to control the debt we must control the deficit first. We are not prepared to sacrifice that fundamental nature of Canada to satisfy those on the far right, the ones who are off the mat. We are not prepared to go in and sacrifice ourselves to the big debt demon, as the former member said, by slashing programs and dismantling those things that are fundamental to the nature of the country.

I would think the hon. member opposite in a quiet moment would reflect on what we have done. We have probably created another good argument as to why Quebecers would want to stay in Canada. At this point in time, for the first time I might add in a long time, Quebecers just like Nova Scotians have a government in Ottawa that says what it means and when it says something it does it.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, does the member who just spoke have any sense of embarrassment whatsoever for saying that the red book was still their Bible?

I heard throughout the campaign and many times here that the immigration level would be 300,000 and it is 200,000; that the GST would be gone; that there would be a renegotiation of NAFTA; and there would be no cuts in social programs.

Unfortunately I am running out of time, but the list is so embarrassingly large that if I had made those comments I could not speak for blushing.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the member that there are some embarrassing things going around today, the most embarrassing of which is the dismal performance of the Reform Party's response to the budget that has resulted in its popularity in the country going right down the you know what, Mr. Speaker. We can hear it flushing.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the debate and have come to one conclusion, that Liberals are the only Tories left in Canada.

[Translation]

This budget represents a profound change in Canada's basic structures and a total break with the principles that built this country. At issue here is much more than just a simple budget. This is about the kind of country we want to leave to our children. It is about the very essence of our national identity. The Liberal government has just set the parameters of policies that will take us into the 21st century, not as a strong and united Canada but as a fragmented Canada.

The Liberals maintain that we have no choice and that there is only one way to reduce the deficit. The New Democratic Party agrees that debts and deficits are unacceptable and that we cannot continue to live on credit, but we absolutely disagree that this is the way to do it. The Liberals are wrong. There is an alternative.

There are two ways to reduce the deficit: one way is to make decisions collectively, and the other way is to turn the regions, social groups and interest groups in this country into rivals, all competing for the same dollar.

[English]

The budget is not straight from the heart. The budget is straight through the heart of the future of the country that I believe the majority of Canadians thought they were going to get when they voted for the government.

• (1720)

The minister has said that this is a tough budget. However, it is much more than that. It fundamentally breaks the social consensus that has been built up over a number of years, often through vigorous debate, to build a country based on bilingualism, multiculturalism and a sense of community that by working together we will accomplish more for each individual.

Many parts of the budget will not be felt by Canadians for one or two years down the road. There is no question that the government has turned its back on much of the Liberal tradition. In a year or two Canadians will be asking what it means to be a Canadian. We should all be concerned about whether we will be citizens of a country or simply citizens of one region or another?

As I mentioned earlier, there is no disagreement about the need to address the debt and deficit. We do not see any serious attempt to deal with the inequities in the tax system. There is some work around the fringes, but there could be much more fundamental work done in the budget.

On the day after the budget individuals earning $100,000 with a nice subsidized box at the SkyDome and who eat in expensive restaurants were happy because their lives were not touched at all. However there was great cause for concern by senior citizens, single mothers and young people.

A country is more than a bond market or more than just how the economy functions, although that is obviously important. It is about how the economy functions for the people. I want to address very briefly in the time I have several ways in which I feel the budget has made us a lesser nation.

How ironic it is that just two weeks ago we celebrated the 30th anniversary of the Canadian flag. The question people might be asking two years from now is: What kind of Canada will that flag fly over?

Several aspects of the budget have fundamentally changed the social consensus I spoke of earlier. One is the issue of globalization. Globalization is not just economic. It is about Canada's role as an international citizen. It is about the common security between other countries and ours. In many ways the budget largely turns its back on the poor of the world.

A very important part of any country is freedom. I ask my friends on the other side whether they can truly say that the budget has given more freedom to Canadians. Certainly a mother living in poverty has no freedom. An elderly person who cannot get adequate health care has no freedom. A young person who cannot attend college, university or technical school has no freedom. The budget limits freedoms and the potential of citizenship for many groups. Also the budget limits the freedom of such fundamentals as collective bargaining by breaking collective bargaining with the public servants.

The budget does not mention poverty, job creation or youth. It is important to point out that unemployment is not free. It costs the country approximately $42 billion a year in direct payouts. If the government would have set a target to reduce unemployment by 1 per cent, $5.16 billion would have been added to the tax revenue and social spending would have been reduced by $1.24 billion. There is another way.

Turning to other areas, the government has completely abandoned child care and universality. Independence for the elderly as a principle has also been abandoned, as the previous member spoke about.

Community and regional fairness is another hallmark of what it is to be a country. The flag is not just fabric. It is what we weave together. It is how we make sure that a Canadian standard of service will be available in Newfoundland, Yukon or central Canada. There is no question that as the government has proposed block funding this is gone.

• (1725)

Sustainability of the environment is a very important area. Cutbacks to the environment are quite severe in the budget. I think they should be of concern to every Canadian. If we look at countries internationally, for example east bloc countries that ignored the environment to build their economies, we see that they are paying a dreadful price.

Similarly part of the social consensus of Canada has been that we are a country that respects human rights, the dignity of individuals and gender equality. It takes much more than words to achieve that.

In the abandoning of national standards and in the abandoning of a national vision the Liberal government is abandoning us to a balkanized and regionalized country, which will not stand us in good stead in international markets, as we discussed earlier.

[Translation]

Aspects that until now were considered essential to our society are no longer important. Children will not enjoy what we considered to be fundamental principles: they will have no national medicare, they will have no national railway linking communities across the country. Healthy and vigorous rural communities will be a thing of the past. They will not know what it is like to have good public services and a government for all Canadians.

[English]

In summary, the budget has failed the country. It is beginning to dismantle much of what was done to make the country first in the assessment of the United Nations or one of the best places in the world to live.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleague from Yukon will agree that the budget is doing something unusual by proposing cuts to special interest groups.

One such special interest group that may be subject to cuts is the Canadian Labour Congress, which we learned this past week is supporting the Quebec Federation of Labour in its campaign to support the separatist cause in Quebec. Some of the money the Quebec Federation of Labour is using is money that comes from the Canadian Labour Congress. It was about $500,000 and in turn came from Ottawa and the labour education program that pays the CLC $3 million a year.

In the past the CLC has spent $1.5 million on supporting the NDP's election campaign, the biggest donor of any political party in the country.

Does my colleague from Yukon feel that cutting special interest groups with a political agenda not in keeping with the majority of the Canadian public is a good thing or a bad thing?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite has been strongly speaking out against what he calls special interest groups. I am not clear whether the member has been equally as strong in including in special interest groups the Business Council on National Issues, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers Association. If he has, he will have done a service.

I object to his term special interest groups. It has now become a Reform Party slogan. Often it is used to marginalize people rather than to include them.

There is a place in a thriving democracy for different points of view to be presented vigorously. As a good Liberal I am sure he would agree that it is necessary to have a functioning democracy in which every part of society has the ability to participate in helping to shape public policy not just during an election but throughout.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

GRAIN EXPORT PROTECTION ACT

The House resumed from November 24, 1994, consideration of the motion that Bill C–262, an act to provide for the settlement of labour disputes affecting the export of grain by arbitration and to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act in consequence thereof, be read a second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on this bill to providing for the settlement of labour disputes affecting the export of grain by arbitration and amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act in consequence thereof.

First of all, I think it is important to ask ourselves if this bill is beneficial to Canada. Is it worthwhile? Will it improve labour relations in this industry which is vital to Western Canada's economy and that of Canada as a whole?

We, in the Bloc Quebecois, do not think so. We think that imposing arbitration will only make the conduct of collective bargaining more complicated in an industry that had bad experiences in the past. Let us bear in mind that this Parliament has already had to bring in special legislation to impose the terms of the final offer to settle labour disputes in this industry and there has been no significant change since. The climate has remained tense and continued to deteriorate for several years, precluding any compromise solution where both sides come to an agreement, which is the ultimate goal of the bargaining process.

This bill also contains ambiguous provisions. For example, clause 3 reads as follows:

> —no trade union of employees shall declare or authorize a strike, and no employer of such employees shall declare or cause a lockout, if the strike or lockout would cause cessation of work by any employee whose work is essential to any stage of the progress of grain from the premises of the producer of the grain to export.

This wording is rather vague. It could be open to interpretation as to who these employees are and whether or not their work is performed at any stage of the progress of grain from the premises to export. So, in our sense, such ambiguity is dangerous and could make labour relations more difficult instead of making them easier.

The second point I want to make concerns compulsory arbitration. A typical example people hear about every day is the situation in professional sports. Police forces in Quebec have used the procedure as well. It seems that repeated use of this procedure does not improve labour relations, which tend to deteriorate. There is also a tendency to avoid putting all one's cards on the table, which one should normally do when two parties negotiate, in order to reach an acceptable settlement.

Compulsory arbitration tends to make the parties reason along the following lines: I am not going to show my hand right away, because if I do, when we go to arbitration, the arbitrator will make even more concessions to the other party and I will be the loser in this process.

Compulsory arbitration does not seem to offer any advantages for either party and does not seem to be a satisfactory way to solve these problems.

From past experience, and I speak as a former director of personnel in an educational institution, I would say that prohibiting strikes offers no guarantee that people will not walk out just the same. In this field, for a law to be successfully enforced, justice must be done and must appear to have been done.

• (1735)

The mere fact of imposing arbitration and prohibiting strikes will not work if there is a major stumbling block for the workers or the employer. The employer insist on imposing a lockout or a virtual lockout, or the employees may decide to walk out just the same, which puts them in an illegal position. While in a normal bargaining process they would not have that problem and it would simply be a matter of letting the market decide. We must realize that sometimes good intentions do not achieve the expected results.

We must also find ways to avoid a decline in productivity. My point is, that by prohibiting legal strikes, we may encourage behaviour that is even more damaging and that without necessarily leading to a work stoppage, will be detrimental to production and create a conflict situation in the workplace, which is tantamount to giving the parties a kind of leverage that goes well beyond what is traditionally provided in the legislation.

The last back–to–work legislation passed by Parliament, in the case of the Port of Vancouver, is a good example. Wages were the only item that remained to be settled, but the parties could not agree. When the final offer was put on the table, both parties refused to budge. In this particular case, the employer's offer was accepted, but it could have been the other way around. There have been such cases in other sectors. If the union's offer were accepted because it was reasonable, theoretically speaking, it would not necessarily suit the employer and could interfere with efficient operations, so that the result could be damaging both to the company and the employer.

So these are also things we must consider, and we should realize that, with all our good intentions about settling disputes through arbitration, we may be creating situations that are far more complex. The bill before the House today is an example of the kind of well–intentioned approach that will fail to achieve what we ultimately want, which is better relations in the workplace.

Compulsory arbitration also takes away any interest the parties may have in negotiating, in finding compromises together. A period of negotiations between an employer and a union also includes periods of exploring solutions, which are not formal bargaining sessions but rather periods of exploring how solutions may be reached. Compulsory arbitration will stymie this exploration, because both parties will refrain from putting interesting solution proposals on the table, discussions will be formalized. In the end, people will be more dissatisfied than if they had been able to take the negotiations to their conclusion.

We therefore need to create a different climate in this industry, a climate in which labour relations will lead to much more interesting results. An example of this is what happens in Canada's major ports. Labour relations there have often been difficult. In the smaller ports, however, agreements are reached because the parties talk to each other and succeed in reaching interesting conclusions.

This House must therefore reject this bill, not because of its intent, but because of the terms proposed in it, which will not improve the situation and which, before long, will require us to reconsider this sort of situation. In conclusion, I will describe the situation with the police force in Quebec, as one example. Compulsory arbitration was commonplace; decisions were made. In the end, the solutions did not permit the employer to assume its obligations satisfactorily. The reverse could have been true as well, with union members finding themselves in an unacceptable situation.

• (1740)

The Bloc Quebecois is therefore opposed on the principle that the parties' right to negotiate must be respected. There is also a concern for pragmatism and for reaching solutions that lead to joint agreements. When the parties have a signed collective agreement, the parties must bear in mind, during the life of the agreement, that they agreed to the solution reached by both of them. When there is compulsory arbitration, however, one of the parties wins and the other loses. Labour relations between winners and losers is not the way to the future. Rather, we must make the parties face their responsibilities squarely and really oblige them to negotiate.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the constituents of Hamilton West, I have the privilege to speak to Bill C–262, the grain export protection act introduced by the member for Lethbridge.

This bill seeks to make it illegal for anyone, employee or employer, to cause any cessation of work at any stage of the progress of grain from the premises of the producer of the grain all the way to export. It should be obvious that this bill would affect a large number of Canadians, indeed everybody who comes near grain, from the farmer who grows the grain to those on the trains and ships which carry the grain.

At this time I want to focus on one particular aspect of this bill and what it brings to the labour relations atmosphere with the government's own employees. That is the provision in this bill which would amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act by adding new criteria limiting the right to strike.

This bill seeks to add to the Public Service Staff Relations Act in section 2 and section 78(1) words which would have the effect of prohibiting employees from engaging in any strike activity in areas related to the orderly progress of grain from the premises of the producer of the grain to export.

When the Public Service Staff Relations Act was introduced almost 30 years ago, the legislators included a unique concept to labour legislation. That was the notion of designating employees as essential and denying them the right to strike. That is to say that employees whose duties included functions which were performed in the interests of the safety and/or security of the Canadian public could not engage in a strike. If one was to search the Canada Labour Code or other labour codes, one would not find many examples of such a concept.

In my opinion this is a good, reasonable and justifiable concept. Employees of the federal government and numerous other federal institutions should not be in a position to withdraw services which would cause harm to the safety or security of Canadians. This provision has stood the test of time.

When public servants engage in a strike activity a number of their colleagues continue to work and provide essential services to the public. The last public service strike provided us with many examples of this particular provision.

Both air and marine search and rescue operations continued. Ice breaking continued. Mariners' charts and maps continued to be produced and updated. The all important function of providing notices to shipping carried on. As well, fisheries patrols were maintained and employees involved in this function continued to provide a service to the public.

Air operations continued and airport facilities were maintained. Weather observations continued. Forecasts were prepared and communicated to the users and of great comfort, notification bulletins affecting aviation safety continued to be produced and disseminated.

Naturally, prison guards and correctional services are deemed as essential services and continued to perform their tasks. All those employees, including those who provide care and security for inmates, medical care, food, heating and all those functions necessary to maintain the system continued to perform their duties.

Health care was maintained by designated employees in such areas as poison control, hazardous product identification, medical support at federal hospitals, ambulance drivers, and dental and chronic care in isolated areas. Also designated were some employees who were involved in research related to health care which used laboratory animals.

Essential to Canadians, income security programs such as UI, family allowance and the Canada pension plan continued. This included the processing of new claims as well as the issuance of benefits.

Employees involved in customs and immigration control remained on the job. Included among these essential jobs were employees responsible for the primary inspection of meat and fish products imported to this country.

• (1745)

Not surprisingly, the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act also precluded those involved with national security from striking. Included among those were the civilian federal employees who provide support to RCMP operations.

Of interest to my colleagues in this place, parliamentary operations were designated as an essential service. Hansard continued to be printed, along with committee reports and other parliamentary publications. Simultaneous translation services also continued to be offered.

These are some examples of the services considered as essential for the safety and security of the public and for which the public service employees could not withdraw services. The central theme throughout this list is: These services are essential for the safety and security of the Canadian public.

It is evident that the current provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act have by and large served the Canadian public well. By tinkering with these provisions and including the notion of economic hardship in the grain industry, are we trying to fix what ain't broke?

It is an unfortunate but accepted reality that strikes will cause inconvenience and maybe even economic hardship to some. However, if we are to accept that employees have the right to strike to put pressure on the employer, then we must accept the results. If it is our view that strikes should not cause hardship to anyone, then it is my suggestion that all strikes be declared illegal.

This bill starts along that road. It is headed in a direction that can only bring grief to employer–employee relations in this country. I would not argue that the movement of grain is not important to Canadians. Obviously it is, but I do not believe the production or movement of grain is essential for the safety or security of the public.

The movement of grain is, like other commercial activities, an important economic activity in this country. If we were to introduce the idea that there can be no strikes or lockouts in the grain industry, which sector would be next? Would it be the auto industry? The shipping industry? How about forestry services? In a certain section of the country, ore production is extremely important. Should we consider banning work stoppages there too?

If we are able to use economic criteria, I am confident that every member of this House could cite an enterprise worthy of consideration for a bill such as this. I would like to remind members that in many jurisdictions police services are given the opportunity to withdraw from their jobs. Medical practitioners and teachers also have this ability.

As I mentioned, if we accept that employees have the right to strike and to exert pressure on their employer, then they must be permitted to do so. The introduction of a provision in the Public Service Staff Relations Act prohibiting strikes in any one specific area, be it grain handling or some other industry, begins to erode this right. Employees either have the right to strike or they do not. The provision restricting the right to strike in the federal public service to those performing services essential for the safety and security of the public is a restriction, but I think it can be reasonably argued.

In addition, this provision has been in place for almost 30 years and still allows the public service employees to withdraw services. As we saw during the last public service strike, employees still have the ability to exert considerable pressure on the employer.

Times, they are achanging. We have to roll with change. I do not feel the way to begin a positive and co–operative renewal of labour relations is by introducing legislation which begins to erode what labour considers a basic right. If we are going to give labour the right to withdraw services in order to exert pressure in collective bargaining, then we must allow this withdrawal of service to have some effect.

I am sure the member for Lethbridge did not intend anything sinister but was simply advancing a proposal that would protect the interests of the grain industry. While the reasons for desiring protection from strikes or lockouts are noble in themselves, we must look at how we propose to do this and the results such a proposal would bring.

While I agree with the member that the grain industry is an important aspect of this country, as many other industries are, I cannot accept the notion that Parliament legislates protection at the expense of the rights of other Canadian citizens. Despite what I believe are good intentions, the results would be inappropriate and I cannot support this bill.

• (1750)

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today and support Bill C–262. In the course of my speech I will probably deal with some of the things mentioned by the member for Hamilton West.

Going back to the speech by the Bloc Quebecois member, it seemed by the way he spoke that he misunderstood the difference between basic arbitration and being legislated back to work, and having compulsory arbitration and the concept of final offer selection arbitration.

I am surprised the member for Hamilton West so eloquently spoke against this issue, because the Liberal Party imposed this on a strike last year in the Vancouver docks. I am speaking in favour of this type of settlement, but I first want to explain where the Liberal government made two mistakes in the way it did it.

First, the government waited until there was already significant hardship being imposed, not just on a few people and a few on the sidelines who were involved in the strike, but on the whole economic well–being of Canada. Something that started in the port of Vancouver spread across to farmers on the prairies. It almost shut down mills in the interior of British Columbia that were on the edge. It affected hundreds of thousands of people. It is something we have to examine and decide whether there is a better way. As I said, the first problem was that the government took so long to do something about it.

The second mistake is that the employer and employees in that strike situation negotiated. They then took their strike option and were still considerably far apart.

If we are to impose a change of rules, we should give the people an opportunity to readjust to the new rules. The game was changed in midstream. The parties were not given the time to go back to the table to try and resolve it, to see if they could work together more closely.

That is what final offer selection arbitration is inclined to do. It is not a matter of picking and choosing a piece of this or a piece of that when arbitrating a settlement. The way this works is that the final offer is laid on the table by both sides and the arbitrator then picks either one side or the other. In labour negotiations this tends to move the two sides very close together. This is because if one makes an outlandish proposal and the other is being reasonable, the reasonable side's offer will be accepted virtually every time.

I suggest we look at this in terms of protecting the grain industry in Canada. As the member for Hamilton West said, by all means we should start looking at it in a broader sense.

For example, consider that a house is burning down. A fireman stands by on the sidewalk watching the house burn, perhaps while a young child is inside. He does so because the fire department is on strike. All of us accept that as being absolutely unthinkable. So does the fire department and it accepts this kind of responsibility.

Can we accept the concept of a police officer standing by watching someone get mugged or raped because the police department was on strike? We cannot accept this either.

However let us go to the other end of the scale to a small business with little impact on the community and no impact on the national economy. In that situation we say it is okay for it to be a battle of wills and an economic situation for the two forces at work there. We will let the employer or the employee, depending on who comes out the victor, use their position of relative unimportance to negotiate a higher wage or to force the employee to take a lower wage.

The difference between the two is the degree of importance. We are saying that if you are important, we will not let you have the same rights as people who are unimportant. Not only for the sake of the grain industry, I suggest it is time we actually started to look at the whole concept of how we settle labour negotiations in this country.

Unlike what the Bloc member said, this is not an unfair type of action that will cause the relationships between employers and employees to deteriorate. If anything, it may turn it the other way and cause them to negotiate in much better faith and try to resolve the differences between them.

• (1755)

Employees will not be asking for a 100 per cent raise and the employer saying he wants them to take a 50 per cent cut. They are going to try to move to the most reasonable position possible, so that if it comes down to this final offer selection arbitration they are going to have a fairly reasonable offer on the table in the hopes it will be selected. If they are unreasonable, they are likely going to lose. That is the whole concept of this.

The member for Hamilton West talked about how the Public Service Staff Relations Act works. Let me give an example of how it works.

The air traffic control system in this country is not designated as an essential service. The air traffic control system has the right to go on strike, but if it does, it shuts down the entire air industry in Canada.

The government instead said it had the right to go on strike, but in the event of a strike the government has the right to designate a number of employees to maintain the essential service within the air traffic control system. The controllers said they certainly wanted to maintain the safety of this country, hospital flights, food flights to the north, emergencies and these types of things. They would deal with these, and so they said they had no problem with this concept of designating employees.

Then the government turned around and designated every single employee in the air traffic control system and said that the essential duties were everything that they did. It went to court and the court upheld it. A wonderful system. Now the air traffic controllers can go on strike, which means their contract is no longer valid. The government can pay them anything they want to and they still have to report for duty.

We have to find another system. Without getting into the budget argument right now, we are in a very fragile situation economically speaking and we cannot shut the industry of this country down. In the event of strikes, who loses?

The public loses. They are the number one loser. The second loser is usually labour. No matter what kind of settlement they get, if they are off work for any period of time they are likely not going to make that wage back up. The problem is they have to have some kind of hammer to use as a threat if everything else fails. The majority of the negotiations end up with settlement, but when they do not they always have to have that hammer.

We have to invent a new type of hammer, one that is fair for labour and one that is fair for management. We need some system that says you must move your negotiations very close together or chances are you are going to be the loser in this negotiation.

This is a step in the right direction, examining it in the case of the grain. We do not want to come at this all at once as a total revolutionary system for this country. This is a good place to start. This is a good place to work some of the bugs out of the system.

We do have to look for alternatives. Strikes are something that went on in the 1800s. Surely we have to evolve from something that maybe worked last century. We are about to go into the next one. Maybe we need to find new solutions for this country. This is a system that can work, that the unions will look at and I believe they will accept. The primary objector is going to be one or two people at the very top. I believe the worker in Canada will benefit rather than lose from this type of legislation.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the debate on second reading of the bill proposed by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

The proposed legislation, Bill C–262, would seek to ban work stoppages involving the movement of grain from producer to export and to provide for arbitrated settlement in those cases where parties involved in the grain handling and transportation industry were unable to resolve contract differences.

On the surface one cannot argue against the general object of the bill, that is, to keep Canadian export grain flowing smoothly to overseas markets and not to be stalled or halted by labour dispute. Unfortunately, while my honourable colleague and I share a particular desire to see Canada's reputation as a reliable exporter of grain maintained, we are obviously in disagreement as to how that end is achieved.

The banning of legal strikes and/or lockouts and the imposition of arbitrated settlements are measures which only serve to exasperate labour management relations. It will do little to bring long term solutions to problems which we are attempting to address.

• (1800)

I would like to share with hon. members a unique initiative currently under way in the western grain storage and handling industry, one which exemplifies the type of positive and forward thinking which labour and management are capable of applying to human resource issues in the industry.

Following three significant work stoppages in the grain handling and transportation sector, in the fall of 1991 a dialogue was initiated with industry representatives to review the need for improvement in labour–management relations and to consider ways of minimizing disruptions to the movement of grain to export markets. Discussions with the parties led to the conclusion that there was little in the way of support for essential service legislation governing dispute resolution in the grain handling industry. Any system of partial designation would be cumbersome to administer and likely to lead to interminable disputes. A complete prohibition on work stoppages would involve third party determination of contract impasses and effectively remove control of the process from both sides of the industry.

There were two key problems which were identified during discussions with the parties involved in the grain handling industry. First, there was the expectation that government would intervene rapidly to terminate any work stoppages, thus enabling one or both parties to avoid its responsibilities for settlement. Second, there existed a problem of inadequate communications between the parties at appropriate times and levels during the period between bargaining rounds on the longer term issues which, if left unaddressed, might rebound negatively at the bargaining table.

Hon. members will be encouraged to hear that both labour and management expressed agreement on the utility of exploring ways to improve their dialogue and to ensure the future competitiveness of the industry in their own mutual interest, as well as in the interest of the Canadian farmers and the Canadian economy.

At a subsequent labour–management conference for officials of the western grain elevator industry agreement was reached on pursuing the possible establishment of a sectoral council on the industry. A working group with equal representation from labour and management chaired by a neutral government official was established to discuss the possible format in terms of reference for a human resources study which could eventually lead to the establishment of such a sectoral body.

The working group held a series of meetings over the course of the next year which culminated in the submission of an application to the sector studies directorate of the former Employment and Immigration Canada for assistance in carrying out a human resource issue study of the industry. Approval for the study was received and the firm of Deloitte & Touche was chosen by the working group to carry out the industry study.

Following an initial meeting between the consulting firm and a larger steering committee, representing not only management and labour interests but various agencies concerned with grain handling and transportation, the study was initiated. The process consisted of several phases ranging from employee questionnaires and focus groups through to the establishment of surveys and interviews with senior human resource personnel. The study focused on the educational and skill requirements of the industry and the training and reskilling available to meet such needs. It also looked at various methods of dealing with workforce adjustment within the industry and drew on the industry knowledge of the respondents to assist in predicting industry trends of the future.

During the course of the consultants' work there were regular meetings with the steering committee to ensure that the study was following the direction intended and that the methodology agreed to was being followed. The study has been finalized and will now be turned over to the original working group for consideration and action, including the possible establishment of a sectoral council for the grain storage and handling industry.

This initiative, involving both labour and management in the grain handling industry, is but one example of the co–operative approach which is being pursued by industry participants to meet the challenges they are facing. The fact that the two sides have met and constructively reviewed major human resource issues speaks volumes. Hon. members on both sides of the House should welcome this display of co–operation which we naturally hope will translate into improved labour relations within the industry.

• (1805)

Both the Ministers of Human Resources Development and Agriculture and Agri–Food should be commended for ensuring that labour has had an opportunity to play a significant role in respect of department initiatives. The Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food has ensured that the representatives of unions involved in the grain handling and transportation system are active participants in this May 16 group which meets regularly to ensure that Canada's export grain commitments are being met and that the system is functioning well.

The Minister of Human Resources Development, in addition to the support shown for the possibility of a sectoral initiative in the western grain elevator industry, has encouraged ongoing consultation with labour unions and employers in the federal jurisdiction concerning possible amendments to the Canada Labour Code.

Earlier this year when a work stoppage involving longshoremen at the west coast ports threatened this country's reputation as a reliable exporter of grain and other commodities, the Minister of Human Resources Development introduced legislation to bring about an end to the disruption and provide for a final settlement of issues separating the two sides. While not a popular measure, the bill introduced by the minister demonstrated the government's commitment to ensuring the well–being of western Canada's agricultural economy.

In conclusion, I would simply suggest that the measures contained in the bill before us are inappropriate and do not reflect current reality in the grain handling industry. Removing the collective bargaining rights of workers and replacing them with imposed arbitration will do nothing to further the positive thrust of the initiatives mentioned earlier.

This government is a strong supporter of free collective bargaining but recognizes that there are occasions when lengthy work stoppage in the grain handling industry could pose significant economic losses for the agricultural economy, as was the case in the recent longshoring dispute. In such cases the government is prepared to intervene in disputes and ensure the resumption of operations and the settlement of the dispute. This type of commitment should preclude the need for the measures proposed in Bill C–262.

I would therefore urge all hon. members not to support the proposed legislation.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that I do support the private member's bill C–262 because I think there has come a time for real action in the labour management disputes that we have seen in the handling of grain for export markets.

To think that since 1966 the government has had to legislate these workers back to work tells us that the current system is not working. As much as the previous speaker would tell us that they do not want to deny anybody the right to collective bargaining, the point is that we want to enforce and give some motivation for management and labour to arrive at a negotiated settlement within the collective bargaining process. This whole bill is designed to give that a whole push forward. It is to say that if one does not bargain within the collective bargaining system then one may not enjoy the rules imposed by the arbitration process.

What we are talking about here is a simple dispute settlement mechanism. Right now when the two sides cannot agree they appoint an arbitrator. He then sits down, looks at the one side, looks at the other side, sees what is being offered and makes some kind of reasonable determination somewhere between these two sides. It fosters a desire by one side or both to make exorbitant demands or to deny reasonable demands. The arbitrator then has to choose and make a settlement.

If they cannot come to some conclusion within the negotiation process that is free and open, if they agree not to agree, then this bill will require that each put forth their final proposal. Whatever that is they will put forth a final proposal, free, open, entirely their own.

• (1810)

The arbitrator will pick one or the other with the intention that he would pick the one that is most reasonable. It is an incentive to both sides to be very reasonable in their final offer. The arbitrator will pick the one that is most reasonable. Therefore the desire to be as close as possible to reasonableness only makes simple common sense.

That is why when I hear the speeches from the other side, from the government side, the side that runs this country, saying this bill is going to deny free and open collective bargaining I am wondering if those members have even read the bill or even thought about the bill, to see that this is some direction to the arbitration process once everything has broken down and that these decisions do not fall within the parameters of the arbitrator but that he has a choice of one or the other, whichever is most reasonable. That is the incentive that this bill is going to provide.

I will split my time with the member for Wetaskiwin. I am going to stop at this time and allow him to share his views as well.

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will pick up where my colleague left off.

Witness the labour dispute at the port of Vancouver in January and February, 1994. For 11 days the grain shipping process was paralysed. Some estimates place the loss to Canada's grain industry at hundreds of millions of dollars.

It is absolutely ludicrous that such losses were allowed to occur. These losses came about as a result of a failed collective bargaining process.

We cannot allow one sector of the grain shipping process to harm everyone else in the chain. When there are disruptions in the grain marketing system individual farmers are not the only ones to suffer. Workers everywhere else along the shipping chain are affected. It has a domino effect on the whole industry.

When a strike occurs grain starts to back up in the system. The system becomes, if you will, constipated. The grain stops its otherwise perpetual flow from farm to market. This is detrimental to numerous people. Whether at the grain elevator or somewhere along the railway many people are forced to endure pain because of the actions of a few. This is not acceptable.

With many unions that are involved in the grain transportation process we are left with the never ending threat of strike action. All too often strikes do occur. When they occur they disrupt the economy.

More than just accepting the measures suggested in Bill C–262, we might also look at further legislation that would require all union contracts affecting grain handling transportation to come due at the same time. This would simplify things and perhaps put an end to the rotating type of strikes.

No one benefits from a strike. Unionized workers suffer losses of income while on strike. While they may win an increase in their pay, all too often the net result is a loss of income. Employers lose in a strike. They lose money, they lose contracts and they pay demurrage on waiting ships. Besides that, no work gets done.

In the case of grain transportation strikes there are an incredible number of people who are directly harmed: railway and all its workers, dock workers, shipping companies and their employees, and of course farmers are harmed.

This represents only the direct impact of a strike action. Countless others are harmed indirectly as well. The ultimate casualty is the whole Canadian economy. Exports represent a huge sector of our economy. Canada's balance of trade continues to tilt in our favour. We must ensure that we retain this favourable balance.

As borders become more and more meaningless Canada must be prepared to take on the entire world. That means we must achieve competitiveness to attain a dominant position in the global economy. When Canadians are unable to access the world market we all suffer. The thrust of the bill is final offer selection arbitration. I believe these measures will be fair to all sides.

Legislation such as Bill C–262 provides a reasonable answer to endless strikes in the grain transportation sector of the economy. Further it represents a reputable solution when considering legislation that could apply to other areas in the labour market.

• (1815)

Historically strikes affecting grain movement take place when markets are good and when prices are up. The use of binding arbitration to settle labour disputes is a good way to avoid unnecessary and crippling strikes. This would go a long way to foster good relations and co–operation between labour and management. With management and labour working hand in hand, our reputation as a reliable supplier of grains and oilseeds would improve with the possible result of increased demand, increased price and perhaps an increase in employment.

Since 1966, as my colleague has already alluded to, we have gone through this process 13 times when the federal government has had to intervene and introduce back to work legislation to keep the grain flowing to market. We need to ensure that never again are such measures necessary.

The bill provides for a dispute settlement process that I believe will be fair to all parties. This bill could not be of more immediate importance or more timely. The looming threat of a strike on the national railways again threatens the process of grain handling.

Above all, grain must be able to continue its orderly flow to market. The principle of keeping the economy flowing should be our number one priority. We need legislation like Bill C–262 to ensure that the economy does not face unnecessary crippling work stoppages. Disruptions in the market hurt everyone.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for several decades industrial relations in industries under federal jurisdiction in the private sector have been governed by the Canada Labour Code, Part I.

Part I of the Canada Labour Code is a model of how industrial relations should be governed in a democratic country. It has been functioning well and has been an important element at the basis of the political and economic structure during many decades of economic prosperity.

I draw attention to the fact that the grain transportation system has been functioning very well of late. Last winter was one of the most disruptive winters imaginable. It was a winter which reduced the flow of grain from farms to the country elevators. It slowed railway operations. Limits on the availability of grain hopper cars was also a constraint. Still the grain transportation and handling system recovered from a low level of grain exports early in crop year 1993–94 and recorded a 4.7 per cent gain over the previous crop year.

Today the grain handling and transportation system is moving ahead at an impressive pace with new records being set for grain shipments. The Regina Leader Post reported early in November on the fact that Canada's grain ports are moving at a pace well above average.

Vancouver and Prince Rupert in October set a new record for the west coast which was 27 per cent that the average for October over the previous five years. Thunder Bay reached a pace not seen since 1991–92. Its handlings for October of this year were 35 per cent above the previous five–year average. This is encouraging news which should impress on us the resilience of the grain handling and transportation system and its ability to cope effectively with adverse conditions.

When the legislation that established the code was adopted by Parliament in 1972, it replaced the industrial relations and disputes investigation act of 1948. It recognized there has been a long tradition in Canada of labour legislation and policies that are designed to promote the common well–being through the encouragement of free collective bargaining and the constructive settlement of disputes.

When it passed the legislation that established the Canada Labour Code in 1972, Parliament indicated that it supported "labour and management in their efforts to develop good industrial relations and constructive collective bargaining practices" and "it deemed the development of good industrial relations to be in the best interests of Canada in ensuring a just share of the fruits of progress to all".

• (1820)

These principles were so fundamental to industrial relations that they were specifically mentioned in the preamble to the code. The bill before us proposes to make a very radical departure from these principles. It proposes to significantly alter industrial relation practices in the federal private sector.

Bill C–262 zeros in on the dispute settlement mechanism as it would apply to industries involved in grain handling and transportation. It would remove the right to strike or lockout and replace the present dispute settlement mechanism with a final offer selection of compulsory arbitration.

This might be an appropriate point to take a closer look at arbitration and see what the ins and outs of the process might be. Typically a hearing is conducted and is presided over by a third party neutral. The parties present their positions in an established, formal procedure. The neutral listens to the positions of the parties, weighs the evidence carefully and drafts a decision that he or she feels to be fair to both parties involved. In an arbitration proceeding the decision of the arbitrator is final and binding on both parties.

There is a certain advantage to arbitration in that it brings a sense of finality to the bargaining process. The parties may not be happy about the results that will be imposed on them but it does provide for a solution.

Some very clear weaknesses to the arbitration process should not be overlooked. First, it is not inconceivable that one party or the other could reject an arbitrator's award. It might possibly resort to strike or lockout action to vent frustration or to express rejection of the result of the process. For that matter, it is very possible that both parties may be dissatisfied with the arbitrator's ruling and not have recourse to any other dispute settlement process. The arbitration process is not perfect.

While evidence supports the perception that the use of arbitration can reduce the number of strikes, it is not likely that strikes or lockouts can be eliminated entirely.

A further disadvantage of arbitration that we are likely familiar with because it has been repeated over the years, is the fact that in adopting or having arbitration imposed on them, the parties have to give up their authority to make decisions concerning the issues in dispute.

Union leaders give up their right to seek the support of their membership on key issues and management gives up its ability to control costs as it sees fit in the course of company operations. This leads me to believe that management and labour in the grain industry are likely to have serious reservations about their support for a bill such as the one we have before us.

A further consideration that I feel is very significant to the whole collective bargaining process is the fact that compulsory arbitration is very likely to undermine the collective bargaining process between a particular company and a union. If arbitration of final settlements is imposed on the parties, fewer and fewer items will tend to be resolved by the parties themselves before going to arbitration. The tendency is for the number of outstanding issues to build up before reaching the arbitration stage with each successive round of bargaining.

Evidence suggests that labour and management tend to use the same approach to dispute settlement with each round of bargaining. This means that the parties may tend to become addicted to arbitration and this can undermine an otherwise health collective bargaining relationship.

Another area in which arbitration takes some criticism is on the size of monetary awards. The charge is sometimes heard that wage settlements are higher in arbitrated settlements than in negotiated settlements. The evidence on this point apparently is inconclusive but I would suggest it is a point on which management in the grain handling and transportation industry is likely to object to Bill C–262.

I do not want to leave the impression that there is not a role for arbitration in our system of collective agreement dispute settlement mechanisms. The Canada Labour Code, Part I, already contains provision for the peaceful settlement of disputes during the term of collective agreements by arbitration or some other mechanism. Our system of compulsory collective agreement settlements during the term of agreements through arbitration or some other peaceful means contributes to a high degree of stability in our industrial relation system.

• (1825)

I would like to draw the attention of the House to section 7(1) of Bill C–262. It reads:

> An arbitrator appointed under section 6 shall forthwith require the union and the employer to provide to the arbitrator, in writing, within fifteen days
> (a) a list of the matters agreed upon, and a proposal in contractual language to give effect to them; and
> (b) a list of the matters remaining in dispute and a final offer in contractual language in respect of the settlement of all of them.

It appears to me that there is very little, if any, room in this process for the parties to negotiate a settlement even if they wanted to. Neither does there appear to be room for the arbitrator to assist the parties to come to a negotiated settlement. In fact, there does not appear to be any room for negotiation at all, aside from the arbitrator being provided by the parties with a list of matters they agree on and a list of matters they do not agree on.

If we continue on with section 7(2), it indicates that the arbitrator has 60 days within which to determine the matters on which the trade union and the employer are in agreement, determine the matters remaining in dispute and then, according to the wording in section 7(2)(c), "decide the matters in dispute by selecting either the final offer submitted by the trade union or the final offer selected by the employer". Again there does not appear to be any room for negotiations between the parties when they appear before the arbitrator. If there is, why is it not provided for in the process?

I have to ask why the process would be structured in this way. Presumably the bill would ensure that any disruption to the flow of grain would be brought to an end by invoking the legislation if the bill were passed. That being the case, I fail to see why allowance could not be made for the parties to negotiate under the guidance of an arbitrator, acting more like a mediator early in the process, and yet retain the authority to render an award on unsettled issues. All the advantages of negotiated settlements on particular issues could be retained in the interests of the parties collective bargaining relationship. At the same time we would have the certainty of a final solution being worked out through arbitration.

We should take a further look at the form of arbitration that is proposed by the bill. Earlier we heard about some of the advantages and disadvantages of arbitration in general. Other considerations should be mentioned specifically in connection with final offer selection and this might be a good time to do so.

It seems that final offer selection was developed to deal with some of the criticism that traditional arbitration acquired over the years. For example, in conventional arbitration in which the arbitrator is free to determine the content of an award, arbitrators sometimes get accused of splitting the difference in the parties' positions. Conventional arbitration encourages the parties to stay as far apart as possible during negotiations, especially on wages and other monetary items.

It has been argued that final offer selection, in contrast, is supposed to provide encouragement to the parties to move closer together in the course of bargaining. Under final offer selection there is said to be an incentive for either party to know as much as possible about the other's bargaining goals and their real bargaining position.

It should be noted that there are several variations on the form of final offer selection that we find being practised. For example, there is a form of final offer selection in which the total package of items forms the position of either party. The arbitrator takes the package of either labour or management, in total, and cannot mix and match as he or she might consider advisable in the interests of the parties. This form of final offer selection on a package of issues may be more easily applied to a few monetary items at any one time but it is less well suited when an arbitrator has to deal with the package that includes matters of principles to either side.

• (1830)

For this and many more reasons I have no hesitation in recommending that the bill not be passed by the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on February 21 I asked the Minister of Foreign Affairs if Canada would support the 20:20 vision proposal and action plan to be considered at the World Summit for Social Development which will take place in Copenhagen later this month.

The goal of the summit is to attack global instability due to third world poverty and social injustice. The challenge is enormous. At this time 1.3 billion people in the world live in debilitating poverty; 550 million people end each day hungry; 1.5 billion people lack safe water and sanitation; and 800 million living in developing countries and 335 million in industrial countries are unemployed or underemployed.

As I said at that time these conditions threaten world stability and peace. It is in the interest of all countries to take action against them. The 20:20 vision proposal and action plan must be supported by Canada and all countries at the summit.

Will the minister or the parliamentary secretary state clearly that Canada will support these proposals and that the overall goals of the summit will be supported as well? I would also like to know that Canada would give the work of this summit and its goals the highest priority.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to respond to the hon. member's comments and expansion on the question directed to the minister some days ago.

The World Summit for Social Development is to take place next week in Copenhagen. It will be the first major international event to propose a vision for social development that has taken place in the 21st century.

Over a period of 18 months the federal government has been working with provincial and territorial governments, labour, business, aboriginal organizations and non–governmental organizations to prepare the Canadian participation and make the summit a success.

Many Canadian objectives are incorporated in the summit documents. I would like to list some that Canada will be supporting: reduction of poverty through job creation; economic security for people through productive employment; respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms; respecting women's equality; respecting and valuing cultural diversity; and spending less worldwide on military hardware and more on investing in people, in other words to be less concerned about the security of the state and more concerned about the economic and social security of individuals.

In this context the 20:20 formula the member referred to will be discussed in Copenhagen. It is certainly of interest to Canada. Donors would allocate 20 per cent of their official development budget to meeting the basic needs of other countries. Recipient countries would allocate 20 per cent of their national budget to programs aimed at meeting the human needs of people. However in Canada we plan to allocate 25 per cent of the CIDA budget to meeting basic human needs.

In an increasing global environment international security and stability have an important impact on Canadian people and Canadian prosperity. Actively promoting social justice, poverty alleviation, good government and human rights at home and abroad is an investment in Canada as well as assistance to those in greater need.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House of Commons I expressed my concern and outrage over the pending loss of the Crow benefit.

As far as a great number of Saskatchewan farmers and I see it, the federal government's abandonment of its responsibilities under the terms of the Western Grain Transportation Act is the single most damaging element of this week's federal budget.

In fact the headlines in Saskatchewan newspapers this week bear this out. The Regina Leader–Post states it best with its single word headline "Devastated", followed by the subheading "Budget leaves farm leaders reeling".

In today's newspaper the premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Romanow, is quoted as saying:

> If this goes through in the next four or five years we will see the most massive restructuring of rural Saskatchewan with respect to trading patterns, towns, villages, cities—since 1905.

We all remember it was the Liberal Party that originally began the process of getting rid of the Crow rate. The names Otto Lang and Jean–Luc Pepin still bring out emotions full of hard feelings on the prairies.

Although the Liberals failed originally to destroy the Crow, they did succeed in weakening it enough so that today just one decade later they could finish it off. This is absolutely horrible.

The loss of the Crow benefit is bad enough by itself, but the government has compounded our prairie anger in two other ways. First, it has abandoned the farm economy without any plan or structure in place to help the economy recover. Second, it has offered a one–time payout which is not only inadequate but is inappropriately targeted only to land owners.

I have already argued elsewhere that loss of the Crow benefit without a long term plan to replace it could lead to the erosion of land values, a loss of farmers and farms, a reduction in the rural tax base and therefore a reduction in the support for the maintenance of the rural infrastructure, and with this a further loss of quality of life in rural Saskatchewan.

The Crow benefit just two years ago was providing a net annual benefit to the province of Saskatchewan of $400 million. It will take a pretty hefty investment in diversification and value added production to replace that $400 million just to remain economically stationary.

The Liberals have made no provision for that investment. Our problem on the prairies has never been the Crow rate. It has been a lack of investment capital. The will has always been there for value added production but the money to make it happen has been absent.

The fight to save the Canadian Wheat Board has not been considered in all of this and if the supply of wheat is threatened then so too is the future of the board. Can we consider this in our long term equation?

I want to know if the federal Liberals have taken any time at all to properly think out the long term implications of this decision. If they have, I want to see their documented evidence and reasoned conclusions. If they have not, shame on them.

At the same time I want to note that the Liberals are preparing to pay out $1.6 billion in compensation, even though they know that $7 billion to $9 billion is required if there is to be any fairness in the system at all.

Not only has the government failed to meet this fairness test, but it has also said that the money will be paid only to land owners. Does the government not realize that about one–third of the seeded acreage is currently under lease to banks or other financial institutions including the Farm Credit Corporation?

The people who have been paying and will continue to pay the freight costs of grain sold for export and are leasing their land from a government owned corporation will not see a single cent of this payout, no matter how important it is.

The Liberals have demonstrated a complete lack of understanding of the prairie farm economy. With this single move in the budget I hope they are prepared to reconsider now what they have done before it is implemented and before the ultimate damage is done.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to respond to the hon. member's comments. I only regret that it is two minutes and not twenty, because I think I could help him understand. I am sure in the end he would understand and appreciate the action we have taken.

The hon. member is suggesting that the elimination of the Crow will have a damaging effect on the prairie economy. In fact, this government is certainly committed to restoring the economy in western Canada to its full potential. The document that has been put forth for discussion purposes, and I stress that, would see approximately half or about $800 million of the $1.6 billion ex gratia capital payment going to Saskatchewan.

• (1840)

The share will be representative of Saskatchewan's share of prairie grain movement. Farmers will also benefit from the capital gains tax advantage.

The government's assistance however is not limited to that. There will also be a share in the $300 million adjustment fund. That will be available for some areas in Saskatchewan as well.

These initiatives are only part of this government's plan to restore the prairie economy and help make this region an integral economic force in an increasingly competitive global marketplace. Changes with respect to freight rates have the potential to encourage diversification and value added production throughout the west.

I might interject here. I just got off the phone with a friend in a riding next to mine whose company is in the livestock industry. It had three orders from pork producers in western Canada today to increase and make some changes in those operations because of what this is going to do. It is indeed going to follow up on diversification.

Only days after the announcement, and the above is a good example, that potential is being recognized. Industry groups are already talking about moving into other crops and diversifying their operations.

It is not only farmers who are adjusting. Transportation industries ranging from trucking companies to seaports are closely examining the services they offer in order to increase their efficiencies. Some are already offering suggestions for alternate commodities based on the transportation costs of these products.

These activities, coupled with the government's assistance to help farmers adjust to the short term impact of the loss of the WGTA will inevitably lead to long term economic growth in the prairies.

I ask the hon. member not to underestimate the skills and resources of all those involved in the prairie economy. These factors along with the financial assistance being provided will ensure a rapid adjustment to changes in the WGTA and the long term economic benefits for the prairies and for all Canadians.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, March 1, I received an unsatisfactory response from the Minister of Human Resources Development.

I asked him whether the human resources investment fund infringed on the powers of the provinces and perpetuated the inefficient management of the labour force.

The minister's answer was very vague. He told me that my question had nothing to do with the fund's goal.

Since then, I acquired a copy of an information sheet for the staff of the human resources department which gave examples of some activities that could become part of the human resources investment fund. I will list them: putting more emphasis on employment development services, literacy and basic skills training, training and on-the-job training, assistance for child care and the earned-income supplement.

If the human resources investment fund will be covering these kinds of activities, how can the minister say that the fund will not infringe on the provinces' jurisdiction over manpower?

When it comes down to it, we can say that the minister made the same error during the debate on Axworthy's social program reform: the situation was properly diagnosed, they realized that the current system did not work, but they prescribed the wrong treatment.

Once again, they have decided that Ottawa must manage the fund, even though it is well known that the provinces manage areas directly related to manpower training much more efficiently.

Another possible activity is implementing a national strategy based on the job market. How can the minister suggest such an option when we all well know that, for years now, there have been 1.5 million jobs available in Canada for approximately 500,000 unemployed people, and that the breakdown in the equation lies between the job market and training.

The solutions suggested to us are the same old solutions, the federal government will come and tell the provinces how to do their job in their areas of jurisdiction. Does the minister not realize that this kind of attitude is entirely out of touch with our solutions for the future, for the 21st century, a future in which the idea that "small is beautiful" will be much more relevant than huge structures with national bureaucracies telling the local workforce should adjust?

With this fund, is the minister not going to perpetuate the same vision he has today, so that at a local level, in each community, manpower management committees will have to be devised to try to bring together again all the stakeholders and achieve what this federal system is unable to achieve, assuming of course that it can be done at a local level at least? Could the minister not take another approach, an approach to truly put manpower training back into the hands of the provinces who express such an interest, as Quebec has, where there is a consensus among unions, employers and the education sector.

All stakeholders involved in the manpower sector in Quebec have been saying for a long time that the best way to address the unemployment problem is to ensure a good fit between training, job creation measures and the unemployed who are waiting for a job. So could the minister not reconsider his decision and ensure that people at the grassroots who have the means to find solutions are allowed to do so, that is in Quebec and in the other provinces seeking the same types of responsibilities in the area of manpower training?

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond to the question posed by the hon. member on the human resources investment fund that was recently announced in the budget.

The human resources investment fund will build on the strengths of its initial program components. Those program components include employment programs and services, social development programs in such areas as literacy and participation of disabled persons, the Canada student loans program and youth programs such as Youth Service Canada and Youth Internship.

The terms of the fund's operation will be developed in the coming months in consultation with the provinces with whom the government has already indicated its willingness to work.

The objectives of the fund may in some cases be best achieved through the direct delivery of services by the federal government. In other cases provinces or at times even local authorities may be best placed to achieve our common goals.

Based on what we have learned through the broad consultation process associated with social security reform, the new fund will establish certain principles. It will help create opportunities for people to develop skills, secure employment and adapt to change. The fund will better equip Canadians to keep their jobs in a changing world and provide the skills to find a new job quickly if it becomes necessary.

The new fund will focus on individual and local needs instead of trying to fit people into programs with rigid eligibility criteria. Programs will be tailored to meet the needs of the individual. At the same time the fund will encourage people to take charge of their own lives, establishing mutual responsibility. Individuals, employers and local communities will have as much at stake in the employment initiatives as governments.

The human resources investment fund will strengthen partnerships and create an effective division of responsibility between levels of government as well as among governments and the private sector.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).
