TITANIC FUND NONE TOO LARGE FOR SUFFERERS

Report to Lord Mayor Shows That $2,500,000 Raised Will Not be More Than Sufficient for Needs—Hundreds of Dependents

London, Aug. 5.—Although the funds for the relief of the Titanic exceeded $2,000,000, reports made to the lord mayor indicate that all of this will be required to maintain the allowances now made for the relief of the dependents of the victims of the disaster.

Of 673 of the crew who were drowned, 533 belonged to Southampton and 138 to other places. Five thousand three hundred and thirty-three dependents are now being maintained.

Claims have also been received on behalf of the dependents of 461 of the 517 passengers lost in the wreck of the ship.

LONDON'S IMPERIAL EXHIBITION THE CONNAUGHTS SPEND THE DAY IN CAPE BRETON

London, Aug. 5.—Leaving the Earl Grey shortly before ten o'clock this morning His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught and the male members of his party were conveyed by the motor launch to the Stead Company's pier. There they landed and accompanied by D. H. Plummer president of the company, they proceeded to the shore.

A movement, which will no doubt, find considerable favor, has been inaugurated for the purpose of collecting in a central museum, records, portraits, statistics, trophies, relics, and literature of all British national sports, and for providing an honorable resting place for objects of historical interest connected therewith which are now scattered throughout the country.

The last of the London rookeries still survives in the gardens of Gray's Inn, and it would be interesting to know if there are any more nests there.

GOLDEN GROVE ROAD. St. John is singularly fortunate in the varied beauty of its surroundings. In whatever direction the explorer goes on the landward side the picturesque beauty of the scenery commands admiration.

There are not enough homes along the route to detract from the wild nature of the scenery, which, as the road winds along opens up new and attractive and ever changing views. The road traverses a valley where pretty lakes abound, portions of the surface of some of them beautiful with white water lilies.

WARNING AGAINST DANGER OF FRANK BEING DESTROYED

Landslides From Turtle Mountain, Alberta, Threaten—Technology Professor's Report

Towering 3,000 feet over the little town of Frank, Alberta, the giant crest of Turtle Mountain threatens to engulf and destroy every one of the 4,000 souls in the mining settlement which is the heart of the collieries of the Canadian Coal Company, Limited.

The pioneers of the town have had their warning, for in 1908 a great landslide rushed down the steep slope of the mountain, burying seventy persons and causing the destruction of a vast amount of property.

From the minister of the interior the plea of the people of Frank was sent to the Hon. W. B. Murray, minister of mines. A commission was appointed to make a thorough geological survey of the mountain to determine the actual danger.

Following the first terse and incomplete warning issued by Professor Daly, many settlers moved their belongings away from the zone of danger.

Now that the official warning has been issued by Professor Daly, in his report to the minister of mines, they are decided to vacate.

The geologists found several causes of the steadily increasing slips which will finally result in the breaking apart of the strata holding the great mass of earth, rock, coal and ore.

In summing up his conclusions, Professor Daly says: "The conditions which mining operations may be carried on are—First, the town site should be immediately abandoned and the risk to the property of the railroad that remains within the zone should be assumed."

"It is also noted that there is danger of heavy slides from the south peak and from the fissured region just to the north of it.

The present shaft and mine buildings surrounding it, also the row of buildings to the northwest of it appear to be more safe than the remainder of the town from the effect of a slide from Turtle Mountain.

COMMISSIONER WALDO DECLARES COURTS PROTECT GAMBLERS

New York, Aug. 4.—Police Commissioner Ruppeltoner Waldo tonight gave out his first formal statement relative to the Rosenthal case. The commissioner recommended an impartial and thorough investigation of the charges made relative to the alleged connection between the police and the gamblers.

While the issuance of this statement was the most important development today, it was reported at police headquarters that detectives were close upon the trail of Lefty Louis and "Gyp the Blood" Horvitz, the two remaining men sought by the police in connection with the murder.

Inspector Hughes spent his third day in personal charge of a force of detectives near Tannersville in the Catskills. It is now known positively that "Gyp the Blood," Lefty Louis and "Whitney Lewis" were in Tannersville last week.

Outawa's Epidemic Outawa, Aug. 4.—The progress of the typhoid fever epidemic in the capital seems unabated, every day adding to the total number of cases. Tonight, the estimated number, according to Dr. Shirreff, the medical health officer being 750. Three deaths occurred today bringing the list up to a dozen directly traceable to the fever.

One Killed, Two Injured Smiths Falls, Ont., Aug. 4.—Engineer Joseph Muldon was almost instantly killed, Freeman T. Keller had his leg broken and Train Despatcher W. J. McCutcheon sustained serious injuries in a rear end collision on the Canadian Pacific Railway, Montreal-Toronto line at Tweed early this morning.

THE TRANSGRESSION

By Horace Hazeltine

He Stood Transgressed.

In the eyes of his community Cromwell was such a man as you are, or as I am, or as is that worthy neighbor of ours, whom we have known so long for a just and conscientious citizen. One would soon have suspected the parish priest as have suspected Cromwell. And no one knew this better than did Cromwell himself. It was this knowledge indeed that had eventually decided him. It was this assurance that had made for him transgressions possible.

Though the gastratory period had been prolonged the temptation had been born full grown and virile; yet of such strangely unaccustomed usage as to shock and frighten him. Contemplation, however, and the familiarity thus engendered, had tended, after a little, if not to make comely, at least to soften the forbidding features of his impulse, and so, by degrees, in spite of a lingering repulsion, he reached the stage of determination. He would rob Eliery Stephenson.

Enwrapped by the deep shadows of his little vine girl piazza, he sat alone. The warm midsummer night was still and breathless. The unrippled river which stretched in shallow breadth before his door was like a great slab of polished purple porphyry, reflecting the pale light of stars. Now and again on the black valance of the private hedge or amid the blacker plumes of the cedar shrubs actually flickered. To his left beyond the hedge's border, a row of gray silhouettes against the night sky, blotting out a share of its lamp, rose the ostentatious summer home of his victim; and Cromwell, leaning forward in his scarred and rickety porch chair, regarded it long and intently with the quickened interest of the hound in the quarry.

In appearance, as in character, he was the reverse of all ordinary conceptions of the outlaw. He was neither burly nor agile. He had passed his forty-fifth year post, with hair thinning and falling into a fitting frame for high, intellectual brow, gray, near sighted eyes and gentle, kindly, meditative mouth. Against the tide of adversity he had ever made but feeble buff. In a small town, humbly peopled, he had found his profession of the law, worthy vocation, and so life had been a continual putting at ends which never quite met. He was himself laured to self-denial. His own needs were small. His wife, too, was content with a miserable little. But his daughter was neither content nor considerate. The sum of her petitions was exceeded only by the sum of her desires. And thus she had come to stand for her father as an animate reminder—nay, as an animate rebuke—of his inadequacy.

For the changed conditions to which his child's unrest was due Cromwell blamed Stephenson, who had fattened his wealth until comparisons had become humiliating contrasts. He blamed him, too, for the advanced assessment on the Cromwell property—a reflection of his own improved real estate—relating with it an increase in taxation beyond reach of limited resources. And the exigency of the moment was a delinquent tax bill and a scant four days in which to save the Cromwell household from the auction block.

Planning the Deed. From behind him within the house the rasping whirr of a clock announced the relation to tell the time broke harshly into the silence, and Cromwell started guiltily, with every nerve a-tingle, and straightened abruptly, with lean hands clutching hard on the arms of his chair. But, as in a quick succession of strokes the hour of midnight was signalled, he smiled grimly behind the masking dark, commanded his resolution, stood up, and with a deep breath lifted his small, indecible chin and squared his narrow, drooping shoulders.

Another moment and he stepped from the piazza to the gravelled walk and thence to the lawn and moved away under the cedars, a shadow beneath shadows, coming eventually abreast of the private reflection of his own improved real estate—relating with it an increase in taxation beyond reach of limited resources. And the exigency of the moment was a delinquent tax bill and a scant four days in which to save the Cromwell household from the auction block.

There remains now only the year to be inspected, but he had determined on this as his point of entrance, and as he had yet to make certain preparations for his adventure, he excluded it from his preliminary survey. That the house should be entertained no doubt.

Stalking, with unrelaxed caution, he had effected his return, and was climbing the gentle slope of his own weed grown lawn, relieved almost to ease, when suddenly the shock of the unexpected checked him in passing fright. The next instant he was made aware that the object which had brushed roughly against him was his own Scotch colie, and as, still trembling, he whistled to the dog to attend to the matter he congratulated himself that the incident had occurred when and where it had. He would provide against repetition by locking the dog in the tool house.

The tool house was at the back, on the edge of the garden, and thither he gropingly made his way, with the dog at his heels. Now that his fright was over the animal's presence heartened him. But the squallor of the place, dimly illuminated by a lantern, inflicted a fresh wound of discontent. The tools were few and old. Some of them were broken and useless. He brushed his coat against a disabled lawn mower. The scythe, its fractured blade red with rust, stabbed his hand.

From a jumble of dusty sackings, old carpet and worn out clothes in one corner he extracted a suit of faded, frayed and stained overalls, and after removing his coat and waistcoat put it on. Then adding a limp and rusty hat that had once been black, and pulling it low on his grizzled head, he stood transfixed. From a piece of the sackings he cut a mask with two perforations to serve as eye holes and affixed bits of twine at the side to tie back of his head. Laying this for the moment at one side of the door, he proceeded to rip from an ancient overcoat the lower half of a capacious sleeve, in which, in turn, he made a three-fingered pocket. When the sleeve section was drawn down over his lantern, effectively darkening it, the incision became a flap to be lifted at will and so shed light in any desired direction—a rude imitation of the old style dark lantern.

The Masked Man.

These preliminaries completed, Cromwell adjusted his mask, with something of a qualm. It seemed to him the very sign and symbol of the outlawry in which he was about to engage. For just a moment his heart threatened to fall him. He considered postponement. In the four days remaining something might happen to make his venture unnecessary. He might be brought in the shape of a client with a liberal retaining fee. And then he remembered that to-morrow and on the night following his opportunity would be less favorable. To-morrow his wife and daughter would return. To-night, were for the presence of the old colored serving woman, who went to bed early and slept soundly, he was at home alone. If he were to act at all it must be now. He had no time to lose.

Stephenson, moreover, deserved a lesson. So man was justified in parading his riches before the unfortunate and then tempting them by leaving his back door habitually unlocked and his treasures unguarded. And this was what Eliery Stephenson had been doing. It had become a habit of his, indeed, to boast of the homogeneity of the community in which he had chosen to make his summer home.

"No one thinks of locking their doors down here," he had repeated again and again. "I never think of locking mine, and many a time I have had a thousand dollars and more in cash in the top drawer of my desk. Indeed, it's very rarely that I haven't several hundred dollars there."

Cromwell had heard him use those very words, one evening, as, walking in his garden beyond the private hedge, he chatted with a guest from town. They had suggested nothing to Cromwell then except to bestow an added emphasis upon the term "pompous braggart," which long before he had found reason to apply to his ostentatious and unsocial neighbor. Others in the village had heard Mr. Stephenson express himself in much the same manner. Some regarded it a compliment. The less conscientious considered it a reflection on their courage if not on their sagacity; and there had been threats made, which Cromwell, though he believed them idle or foolish, had nevertheless repeated to himself. And here, that which then had seemed to him too iniquitous to speak of, even in jest, he was himself actually about to perform.

With a distinct effort of will, he took up his masked lantern, opened the door just wide enough to permit the exit of his own body, and closed and latched it on the imprisoned colie. Passing to the rear of the tool house, he took the path through the garden, cut diagonally across his withered strawberry beds, and, finding a gap in the private hedge, squeezed through it into the Stephenson grounds.

The Lively Imagination.

There was here a little grove of young plum trees, which formed a convenient shield for his approach to the back of the house. Nevertheless, he moved timorously, with rapidly beating heart. His project had now become instant, and that which in theory had appeared simple and easy began to loom big with danger and possible failure.

On the edge of the grove he paused and ran his gaze up and down the high gray wall of the sleeping dwelling. The windows were, without exception, dark. From all but one the red and white awnings had been raised. This one was on the second floor, directly above the trellised kitchen porch, and the lowered awning so obscured it that Cromwell could not tell whether the sash was up or down.

In his nervous trepidation he could fancy Stephenson, himself sleepless because of the heat, sitting beside this rear seaward window watching through the gloom. What if those discerning eyes should pick his figure out of the black? What if, as he crawled up the three porch steps, a revolver should flash in quick report and he should drop dead or wounded to stagger away, and so be discovered and his family forever disgraced?

He stood a long while looking up at that window. Once he thought he saw something white move there and drew back in excess of fear. But after a time his reason prevailed. He told himself for cowardice. He recalled once again the urgency of his need. He reviewed the occasions on which his man, his next door neighbor, had passed him by without so much as a nod, as though he were not worth his notice; the occasions, too, when his wife and daughter had been as rudely ignored by the feminine Stephenson. He called up a mental picture of the portly pretender, with head high and shoulders back, strutting his garden path, lolling in one or another of his motor cars, driving his thoroughbred trotter to a runabout or guiding his thirty foot steel launch over the river waters. He gathered together all the crumbs of the man's history as gossips had dropped them; that he had been an errand boy, a counter boy, a floor walker, and had finally made a fortune in the wick filled acidity his nostrils. A lighted lamp had been permitted to die out unnoted. Possibly the person it had served had fallen asleep over a book, and was still present.

Fearing to breathe, lest he betray himself, Cromwell strained his hearing for that which he dreaded, and went shiveringly cold at his reward. Clearly there came to him the soft murmur of a long, deep-drawn respiration.

In crooked panic his impulse was for flight, but his faithless nerves dangled him. His limbs were powerless. From his limp fingers his lantern slipped with vicious note of alarm to the bare floor at his feet, precipitating disaster. The sleeper awoke with an exclamation; sprang up and stumbled toward him through the dark. There was the sudden shock of small order business by mixing poor soap with poor premiums to the gulling of poor people. The arrangement acted upon Cromwell and his cowardice as a counter irritant. It reawakened his indignation; it aroused his indignation; it forced him boldly forward to his reprisals. He forgot the lowered awning and all that it might hide. Briskly he crossed the tennis court, softly he passed beneath the grape arbor, and, unhesitatingly, with careful effort at quiet, unmade the three steps to the trellised porch.

The arrangement of the lower floor was moderately familiar to him. Several times during the winter, while the mansion was unoccupied, he had accepted the invitation of the caretaker to take a look through. He knew, therefore, that the room which Stephenson dignified as his "study" lay just beyond the dining room to the right, and that its windows overlooked his own premises.

Having found the kitchen door not merely unlocked but wide open, he passed a moment to remove his shoes, and then, with the lantern flapped for an instant only to get his bearings, he passed from kitchen to butter's pantry, gained in turn the dining room, skirted on tiptoe the great round mahogany

With infinite caution measuring each step with hand extended against collision with furniture; passing each second with alert ear to catch the slightest warning sound. And now, with one foot across the threshold of the study, he came to a full halt; arrested not by sight or hearing, but by smell. The reek of a smoking cigarette returned to order, really, only when he was out again under the starry sky in the still air of the summer night, running in stocking feet across the tennis court, rolled turf of the tennis court at the sanctuary of the little grove of young plum trees, his shoes and his lantern left behind him, his under-taken crime futile, his pursuit and detection still a terrifying possibility.

He named here to look back. He had small doubt that the house had been aroused by the encounter by the scuffling, the overturned chair, the heavy fall of the master.

A Tormented Mind.

He expected to see lights, to hear cries of alarm; but the darkness and silence still prevailed, unpenetrated and unmarred. And at this he was seized with a fresh torment, as memory echoed again that resounding thud of skull against unyielding floor. What if Stephenson should have been killed by the accident? Before God the responsibility would be his. Could he hope for immunity from man's discovery? They would trace him, perhaps, by his shoes. The half sleep about the lantern would be fitted to the other half in the old overcoat in the tool house. Therefore he must hide the overcoat or bury it. He must, too, blot out his shoe prints in the soft soil of the strawberry beds. And both of these precautions must be taken at once.

He hastened forward, harassed, hysterically set off with impatience. Irritably he snatched off his mask which must be disposed of, too. Perspiration was pouring from every pore of his face and neck, but it went unheeded. He squeezed roughly through the garden on his way to the tool house the frantic half with a new apprehension. He knew that excited canine nose too well to mistake its meaning. There was some one within the grounds besides himself, swift as he fancied he had been, his suspecting pursuers had been swifter. They had headed him off. They had found him absent, which would be almost equal to conviction in itself.

Agitatedly he began to divest himself of his overalls. He discovered so clad at such an hour would lend added weight to the other circumstances. The jacket of faded jeans lay now among the withered strawberry vines, and he had started to remove the breeches, when, suddenly, the white of his socks, showing pale against the dark, proved to him the futility of his attempted disguise. The combination of these socks, with the discarded shoes, which must eventually be discovered, was too damningly condemnatory to be gambled. And so, once more, he stood, quakingly inert, peering through the somberous night for a glimpse of the moving shadows which he must be there. And all the while the dog's distressed whining bark continued without cessation.

Discretion bade him disassemble, and obediently he dropped to his knees, determined to lose himself in the dark of the garden path by lying prone upon the soil. But once more the unforeseen pervasively betrayed him; for one knee, coming in contact with the keen edge of a forgotten box, wrung from him against his will a little cry of pain as he sprang back to the upright.

At the same moment a man's figure emerged from the darkness of the lane, less than a dozen yards away, and a voice rang out in question:—"That you, Mr. Cromwell?"

"Yes," he answered. "What do you want?"

"Get a telegram for you," the voice sang back. "Couldn't find a soul about the house but your door was open thought you must be near by."

The Telegram.

Cromwell, partly reassured, joined the messenger in the lane.

"Telegram at this time of night?" Instantly his thought was of his absent wife and daughter, his own danger for the time forgotten. The man who had brought it he recognized and he told him he might sign his own book. It was too dark for him to see to write.

"All right," was the reply. "I'll make a guess at the time. Must be about twelve thirty sharp."

Cromwell, striding off in his anxious haste to ascertain the contents of the little envelope in his hand, was scarcely conscious of either remedy or posture; but later both recurred to him in all their grim significance, as fixing the moment at which he was met coming from the direction of the scene of the assault. A lawyer himself, he realized fully the importance of such evidence. What a fool he had been to fancy that he could pass a clandestine record, a past honorable and unquestioned standing, suspicion's finger would be turned aside. It was as if some cunning and malignant Nemesis had tempted him and then trapped him. At every turning he had left behind him, like the "hares" in a paper chase, the marks of his trail.

In his little, plainly furnished sitting room, alone he opened the telegram in his shaking fingers, the last feeble, tottering prop of his courage broke and crumbled, and he fell prey to an overwhelming poignant anguish of spirit. It was not only that he had tried and failed, not only that he had yielded to temptation to meet the inevitable disaster, but that he had now, at the very instant of his undoing, been proved unnecessary.

For the message which had so alarmed him had been read reaching out to lift him.

"Cousin James died suddenly this afternoon," it read. "They say you are his principal legatee."

Cousin James! He was worth a hundred thousand if he was worth a cent. Poor Cousin James, who prided himself so much on his family! Ah, well! He would be spared knowledge of his kinsman's degradation. Why, it was he who had given him the seal ring with the Cromwell arms. The seal ring which he wore on—

The Missing Ring.

And there his quaking abruptly turned again; for, extending his little finger for reverential view of the gift, Cromwell saw that the ring which he had worn habitually for a score of years was gone. And then, in a flash, he remembered the slipping, sliding hand which had run from sleeve to wrist, and from wrist to fingers; and from which he had finally jerked himself free, with a torture for that very finger joint.

He rose to his feet and began pacing the worn carpet. What could be delaying them? he asked himself. Back and forth he walked with bowed head until he grew leg weary. Then he sat down again and waited. The hours dragged their slow trains of minutes; and still he waited—waited—constantly expectant.

The dawn, painting gray the window panes, found him waiting yet, white-eyed. The sun burned through the glass in flames from the crimsoned east, and, sleepless, he waited.

When the clock struck eight he went into the dining room and sat at table, but he did not eat. As he sat there the knock sounded on the door—the knock he had waited for so long.

He rose as one joyed over a suspense ended, passed along the narrow hall, turned the key and then the knob, and flung the door wide. He was still in his shirt sleeves, still in his white stocking feet.

But what he saw made him think he had fallen asleep and dreamed. Eliery Stephenson, fresh shaven, smartly garbed, stood before him, smiling, it seemed to him, a little embarrassedly.

"I hope I haven't disturbed you, Mr. Cromwell," he began. "You'll pardon my calling at such an hour, but I'm off for town on the 8:20 train, and I wanted—indeed, I felt I must see you before I went. You see, I've never intended to intrude upon you before. That's my way. I couldn't help feeling I'd rather you'd speak first. So, as I say, I've kept to my side of the fence. But it seems there was a third around here last night who called you first and then tried it on me. He didn't get anything at my place, though. I surprised him. We had a little scuffle, and—this is really a good joke, Mr. Cromwell. He left this ring of yours in my hand. I recognized it at once, from the cut of the Cromwell arms in that book of County Families which I think a relative of yours consulted. Mr. James Cromwell, wasn't it?"

with a view of cutting this down the present measure has been proposed.

SMITHERS TO LOOK INTO MORSE'S GRAND TRUNK ACTIVITIES

New York, Aug. 3.—A. W. Smithers, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Railway, arrived here this morning on the Lusitania. He spoke optimistically of the business situation, and admitted that he was going to make an investigation of the associations of Cass W. Morse's steamship lines with the Grand Trunk.

"I came out on my customary trip at this season to attend to the general business of the company. I shall spend a few days in New York, then go to Montreal to remain about a week, and then I go west on a trip of inspection. We are pushing the Grand Trunk extension through as fast as we can."

"Railroad companies are doing all they can toward harvesting and marketing the crop, but scarcity of laborers is at the bottom of the trouble. I look upon what is the backbone of Canadian prosperity."

STRICTER BRITISH ELECTION BILL IS INTRODUCED

London, Aug. 3.—A bill has been introduced in the House of Commons to prevent the indirect influencing of parliamentary constituencies by candidates and members of parliament by means of subscriptions to certain religious, charitable, public or semi-public institutions or enterprises. The bill would include all such payments in the candidates' election expenses, a return of which he has to make under the present law.

Payment of subscriptions to clubs or societies, of which a candidate is a bona fide ordinary member, would be excepted provided they did not exceed £20 a year, while contributions to any fund or organization which is exclusively political, are also expressly omitted from the scope of the measure.

The law against corrupt practices at elections in the British Isles is already very strict and any expenditure beyond that especially permitted by law invalidates an election. There is a feeling, however, particularly among the candidates themselves, that the cost of securing election and holding a seat is excessive and it

BISHOP CONFIRMS RUMOR

His Lordship Bishop Casey Has Been Appointed Archbishop of Vancouver — Father LeBlanc His Successor

The report that His Lordship Bishop Casey has been appointed archbishop of the diocese of Vancouver, B. C., is correct. The bishop confirmed the news this morning when he was asked by a Times reporter as to the truth of it. Further than that he said, he was unable to state at present.

The announcement of his appointment has brought mingled regret and rejoicing to the members of the Catholic church. Not only in the cathedral and other churches in St. John but in the other districts of his diocese as well regret that it will necessitate his departure from St. John, and pleasure that the honor of his higher clerical office had been bestowed upon him will be felt.

Bishop Casey succeeded to the control of the diocese of St. John some years ago on the death of Bishop Sweeney, and has capably and successfully administered the affairs of the church in these parts since that time, proving that the selection of the Holy See was wisely made. During the time he has been bishop he increased the love and respect cherished towards him while he was priest, and he has won the esteem of all in his charge, and the highest regard from those of other denominations. He has taken a prominent part in many matters of public interest, and his emphatic pronouncement and agitation against intemperance was one phase of his policy which has had far-reaching effect.

He is still in the prime of life and his appointment to the position of archbishop of such an important and extensive diocese in Vancouver is a distinct mark of the merit and esteem with which he is regarded by those in high authority in the church. His successor here is to be Rev. Father LeBlanc, who has been parish priest at St. Bernard's, Digby, N. S., for some time. Previous to his being stationed there he was parish priest at Salmon River for a time and also at Caledonia, Queen's county. He is a French-Canadian by birth and has had a bright record as a priest. He is a graduate of Church Point College, Digby. It is not known when the bishop will remove to the west nor when his successor will take office, but it is thought that it will not be for a few weeks at least.

ALLOTMENT OF WEST SIDE BERTHS FOR THE WINTER SEASON

Recommended by Commissioner—
Change in Wharfage Rate—
Sewerage Extension for Douglas Avenue and Adelaide Road

At the regular weekly meeting of the council this afternoon a number of important matters were brought before the commissioner of harbors, ferries and public lands reports that he has had applications for berths in the harbor, from the steamship companies and recommends the allotment of berths to the C. P. R., Donalson line and Manchester line. It is also recommended by the commissioner of water and sewerage that the sewer be laid in Douglas avenue and Adelaide road in conjunction with the water extension on those sections. The reports follow:

The commissioner of harbors, ferries and public lands recommends that berths be laid out on the west side of the harbor, between the Douglas and Adelaide roads, for the winter season of 1912-13 the tariff fee on general goods be made 15 cents per ton, and that the other items remain as at present.

Your commissioner also reports that he has considered the several applications for berths at West St. John for the coming season and recommends:

That warehouses Nos. 1, 2, and 3 be allotted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the same terms as last year, but subject to increased toll on general goods, the company to do its own heating and lighting.

That warehouse No. 4 be allotted to the Robert Reid Company, Ltd., of the Donaldson line on the same terms as last year, but subject to increase toll on general goods, upon condition that the company heats the offices and lights the warehouse at its own expense, such heating, however, to be provided to the satisfaction of your commissioner.

That warehouse No. 5 be allotted to Messrs. William Thomson & Co. for the Allan line on the same terms.

The commissioner of finance and public affairs recommends the payment of the following department accounts as certified by the comptroller, namely:

Treasury Department	$778.20
Public Safety Department	1,932.30
Public Works Department	1,114.10
Water and Sewerage Dept.	1,247.50
Harbors, Ferries and Public Lands	2,214.46

Your commissioner also reports payments made for the month of July amounting to $44,833.07, and as will appear more fully from the statement hereto annexed.

The commissioner of water and sewerage recommends that a sewer be laid on Douglas avenue in conjunction with the water extension, according to annexed plan.

That a sewer be also laid on the Adelaide road in conjunction with the water extension, provided free right of way can be obtained.

That the fire hydrant at the corner of Ludlow and Water streets be removed to the Hunter estate, corner of Brunel street, be given a permit to enter the sewer on Brunel street without payment of fee.

THE LOG DRIVES.

The last section of the corporation drive, comprising about 2,000,000 feet, is expected to be in the hands of the lumber cut on the St. John river, the total for the season which has been driven into the booms of the St. John Log Driving Company amounting to about 100,000,000 feet.

BIG SHAKE-UP IN MARATHON BASEBALL TEAM

New Players Being Signed and Present Members Released—Making a Determined Effort to Get Out of the Cellar

It is altogether likely that this week will see many important changes in the line-up of the Marathon baseball team, in fact it is understood that the management of the team contemplates making several changes for the game with the Woodstock team here tomorrow. White will very likely be called upon to do the pitching and Steve can be counted upon to make a good showing. It is just possible that a new battery may be in for tomorrow, and if they arrive in time there is a chance that they will be called upon to get into the game. The new battery is supposed of a pitcher named Malcolm and a catcher named Mayfield. Malcolm has been signed up for some days ago and was supposed to report here today. The management of the team, however, received a telegram this morning stating that he had decided not to report here this season. The management have been led to believe that Malcolm would not come because they would not sign up his catcher, with whom he has been playing ball for several years at night, however, Manager George Winter wired Mayfield making him an offer to come this way along with Malcolm and a telegram is expected sometime today from him in reply. Both players have been playing good ball this season and would be a source of strength to the Greeks.

The Greeks' management have also secured the services of a fast infielder named Devine, and also several hard hitting outfielders. Several of the new players will be coming from the big leagues, one of them from the Boston Nationals. These players are expected to arrive during the week.

Jack Epper, the shortstop of the Marathons, who is the property of the Chicago White Sox, has been signed up by the St. Joseph's team in the Western League, and may report there soon. His transportation was wired him several days ago, but Jack has been playing good ball and has made many friends here, and it is possible that he may remain until the end of the season. It is understood that Einker, who is the property of the Wichita Club, has also had an offer from an outside team and may accept.

It was learned, on good authority, today that at least one of the team is to be suspended and will occupy a position on the bench for several days. The cause for suspension, it is said, is nonobedience to the training rules of the club and the orders from the management. The player in question had been playing only fairly good ball of late, and according to the management, has not been conducting himself properly either on or off the field. Several other players have been cautioned by the management that they must adhere more strictly to the rules of the club in the future.

Joe Foley, the Holy Cross pitcher, who has made a very poor showing with the St. Joseph's team on Saturday, Foley came down here with quite a reputation as a hitter, but was hit out of the box by the Fredericton team in the first game he pitched.

It is understood that Foley means out of the running yet, and the owners expect to be able to pull the team up out of the cellar position before long.

It will be of interest to the local ball fans to know that Al. Swest, who was playing here with the Marathons at the first of the season is playing good ball with the Des Moines club. According to reports he is pitching and batting to great style and making a great showing with the team. It is understood that Joe Tashell, who was also with the Marathons, and who later went to Cleveland, had been released to the Jersey City team in the International League several days ago, but did not remain long with the Skeeters and is again back with the big league team.

The movements of both players will be watched with great interest by the St. John fans.

A HENNERY IN THE WILDERNESS

To find a modern hennerly, with some three hundred fowls of select breeds, and great numbers of chickens, hid away in the wilderness beside Lake Minot, a dozen miles from the city, was one of the summer excursions that awaited the Natural History Society on its Saturday excursion. There was also a surprise in store for Arthur T. Thorne, who had kindly invited the members to enjoy an outing at his cottage at Lake Minot. Fully hundred and twenty-five persons went out, about one hundred of them in the morning. But Mr. Thorne had made ample provision for all, and they dined and supped with him, the admirable arrangements having been made under the direction of Mrs. Harrison, who, with Mr. Thorne and W. H. Thorne welcomed the guests. Among well known citizens present were Senator Ellis, Judge Forbes, Dr. G. F. Matthew, Dr. G. U. Hay, T. H. Estabrook, T. C. Lee, J. R. Stone, James A. Estey, W. G. Clavson, W. J. Parke, and many others, with a large number of ladies.

All of the visitors, while with the aid of Dr. Matthew and Dr. Hay, they received valuable information respecting the geological formation and the flora of the region, were not less interested in the hennerly and its noisy occupants. Mr. Thorne has devoted a great deal of attention to this experiment, as a relief from business cares, and has a competent man always in charge. The hennerly is of the best construction, a long two story structure with runs in front and every provision made for the comfort of the fowls. There is a cottage for the care-taker, in addition to Mr. Thorne's cottage by the lake, and some acres of land are under cultivation, showing excellent crops. The whole place is hidden from the public eye, being reached by a road which winds through the woods for some distance, but once there the visitor is charmed with the joyous beauty of the surroundings.

POLICE COURT

In the police court this morning, four prisoners charged with drunkenness were remanded to jail, and one other, a woman, was fined $8 or two months in jail. It is likely that a charge of violating the liquor laws will be brought against a Water street liquor dealer in connection with one of the arrests. Roy Kierstead charged with allowing his cow to run at large in Douglas avenue was fined $2.

SALOON-KEEPER FINED.

William Lannon, proprietor of a liquor saloon in Water street, was arraigned in the police court this morning, charged with allowing drunkenness on his premises. He was fined $20.

Washable Suits 1-3 Off

The time of year so anxiously looked forward to by all mothers of boys from 2½ to 10 years—the time when all Boys' Washable Suits reach their lowest prices.

We want to decrease the size of our stock very materially within the next few days, which brings to you the saving chance of the year. The bargains are better than ever before. Plenty to choose from. All tastes can be satisfied. Shrewd management suggests liberal buying at the new prices.

After Saturday's Big Rush

We Are Ready for Another Big Week

This week will find prices cut still deeper as we find lots of odds and ends that have accumulated by the big sales which have been immense.

Don't Miss This Opportunity

Your prudent neighbor was here last week and went away laden with bargains and perfectly delighted. And this week is your last chance. If you live in the city we pay your car fares.
