OFFICIAL REPORT

Wednesday, May 3, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house an order in council passed pursuant to the relief legislation.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER

Mr. GORDON: I also beg leave to move:

That three hundred copies in the French language of the report of the commissioner of unemployment relief, 1933, be printed, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

UNLOADING OF GRAIN, PORT OF QUEBEC

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Has the contract for the unloading of grain at the port of Quebec been renewed for the present season of navigation?
2. If so (a) were tenders called; (b) to whom was the contract awarded?
3. If not, why?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

The following information has been furnished by the harbour commissioners of Quebec:—

1. Yes.

2. (a) No. (b) Messrs. Albert G. Baker, Limited.

3. Messrs. Albert G. Baker, Limited, had the contract for the season of navigation of 1932. It was felt that no advantage would be gained by calling for tenders this year as their services were satisfactory in all respects in 1932.

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. ROBERGE:

What amount of money has the government collected by way of income tax during 1932 from individuals, companies, corporations or others who pay a tax on an income ranging from $500,000 to $1,000,000?

Mr. RYCKMAN:

$20,764,572.05.

GOLD PURCHASES

Mr. COOTE:

Since October 1, 1931, what amount of gold has been purchased by the government and what is the total amount of premiums paid for such gold?

Mr. RHODES:

2. If so, how many stationary and hoisting engineers have thus been granted entry?

Mr. GORDON:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, MONTREAL

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, resolutions and other documents exchanged between J. G. H. Duperron, president of the Delorimier Independent Labour Club, of Montreal, and the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Marine, respecting the manner in which direct relief is distributed in the city of Montreal, and protests against taxes imposed by the Rhodes budget on sugar and other foodstuffs.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS, RESTRICTED AREA

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents, in the possession of the Department of Agriculture, respecting the establishment of a restricted area for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis embracing the agricultural districts of Chicoutimi, Roberval, Charlevoix and Saguenay, from January 1, 1930, to date.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT REGULATIONS

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all documents, correspondence, letters, petitions and telegrams passing since September 1, 1932, between any member of the government, or official thereof, and any other government, persons, or associations in connection with the request for the change in the regulations of the Meat and Canned Foods Act which was embodied in P.C. 206 passed on February 3, 1933, whether before or after the passage of the said order in council.

NEW GOVERNMENT BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government if there is any truth in the report which appeared in the paper yesterday to the effect that the government was to begin construction of a $5,000,000 block on Wellington street, such construction to be financed by the issue of notes?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Any information of that sort will be made known to the house in due course, as no action can be taken without consent of the house.

COAL INQUIRY

REPORT OF REGISTRAR ON IMPORTATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF BRITISH ANTHRACITE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, some days ago I intimated to the house that I had received the report of the registrar appointed under the Combines Investigation Act with respect to his inquiry into the importation and distribution of British anthracite coal into Canada. I intimated at that time that as soon as I had an opportunity to review the report I would make a statement to the house. The inquiry was set in motion by reason of a complaint made by a member of the other chamber, and was not instituted, as is usually the case, by reason of a complaint having been made by the requisite number of consumers or others interested.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

At any rate, I instructed the registrar to make an investigation or an inquiry, as the act provides. That was done, and a great deal of evidence was taken in connection with the matter. As I indicated to the house a few days ago, the practice, and in my view a very proper one, has been not to make public the findings in inquiries under the act into business concerns. The reason of course must be obvious, namely, that if it is found after inquiry that the provisions of the act have not been invaded, then it would be highly improper that the business of anyone be made known to his competitors and others. On the other hand, if it is found that the business under inquiry falls foul of the provisions of the act and it is desirable to have a further review, that further review would of course be based upon the evidence secured by the registrar or commissioner as the case may be, and if the evidence were made public it might easily defeat the objective sought.

The importation and distribution of British anthracite coal in this country has been a subject of interest for a number of years. Efforts have been made in the past to introduce that fuel into Canada because of the fact that the supply of that sort of fuel was being obtained entirely from outside our boundaries. Until 1929 those efforts were not efficacious for reasons that probably are fairly well known to members of this chamber. Beginning with 1929 the importation of British coal was apparently made possible, and today the importation of that fuel is very considerable. No question arises as to contracts made or understandings arrived at between the importers of British anthracite and their other foreign competitors, so in that respect the inquiry made by the registrar is quite different from the usual inquiry made into matters arising under the act. The question that does arise is whether or not in the formation of the organization that is distributing the British anthracite in Canada those engaged have complied with the terms of the act. Many questions of law are involved. The registrar's report indicates that the importers' net profit for the four years, 1929 to 1932 inclusive, ranged from 39 cents a ton to 64 cents a ton. The registrar also finds that there has not been a contraction of that profit in the same ratio as retailers' profits and matters of that character. He has concluded, however, that the arrangements perfected by the importers of British anthracite coal do not in his view conform to what is contemplated by the Combines Investigation Act. Therefore, there being, as I have indicated, questions of law involved that are difficult of determination, I have decided that I will refer the matter to the appropriate authorities in the province or provinces affected, to take whatever action they think desirable in the light of the registrar's report, the evidence, and the exhibits upon which it is founded; and further review of the matter by this chamber probably will not be necessary.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. minister if the registrar's report contains any statement with regard to the advisability in the public interest of making the report public? As I remember it—I have not the act before me, but I have sent for it—the act requires that publicity be given to the report unless the registrar expressly states that it is not in the public interest that the report be published.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's recollection is not correct with respect to what the act contemplates. Section 27, which deals with reports of this character, says that the registrar at the conclusion of every investigation which he conducts shall make a report in writing which he shall sign and without delay transmit to the minister. Then, dealing with the report of a commissioner, who is an entirely different officer under the act, subsection 2 says:

> Every commissioner who conducts an investigation shall at the conclusion thereof make a report in writing which he shall sign and transmit to the registrar, together with the evidence taken at the investigation, certified by the commissioner, and any documents and papers remaining in the custody of the commissioner; and the registrar shall without delay transmit the report to the minister.

Then with respect to publicity, section 28 says:

> Any report of a commissioner, other than an interim report, shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner is of the opinion that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication . . .

That deals entirely with a report by a commissioner, and not an inquiry by the registrar.

Mr. RALSTON: The registrar was not sitting as a commissioner?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask what the decision of the department has been in regard to an application for an inquiry in reference to the combine in the city of Winnipeg?

Mr. GORDON: I assume that the hon. member has reference to an alleged combine in connection with the coal industry in Winnipeg. The distribution of coal in Winnipeg has been under review by the officials of the department. An interim report has been received. I expect to have the matter investigated further.

Mr. RALSTON: In that connection may I ask a further question? While it is true that the imperative section of the act with regard to publicity refers to a commissioner, I understand there is nothing in the act which prohibits the minister from making public the report of the registrar; in fact there is no suggestion that it shall not be made public. Will the minister lay the report on the table of the house?

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member is quite right in saying that the act is silent with respect to making public a report of the registrar. As I have already indicated, having regard to the fact that I am transmitting the report of the registrar and the evidence and exhibits upon which it is founded to the provincial authorities affected, in order that they may take such action as they deem advisable, in my view it would not be desirable to make the report or the evidence public.

Mr. YOUNG: Why not?

Mr. GORDON: Because it might defeat any action which the attorney general of the province to whom the report is submitted might take.

Mr. YOUNG: In what way?

Mr. GORDON: If there should be a prosecution the evidence would be in the hands of anyone who might be subjected to that prosecution. That has not been the practice in the past, and I think the practice that has been followed is sound.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask to what provinces the report will be submitted?

Mr. GORDON: The only provinces affected would be Quebec and Ontario, and Ontario would be affected much less than Quebec.

CANADA-GERMANY TRADE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) if the trade agreement between Canada and Germany, which I understand expired last month, has been renewed by the government and, if so, when it was renewed and for what term.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The understanding with Germany—it is not a trade agreement—was extended about a month ago, and some statement in that connection was made in the house. I think it has been extended for a period of six months.

RACE TRACK EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, according to press reports of yesterday the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) is expected to modify the restrictions against United States citizens entering Canada to work on Canadian Racing Association tracks as pari-mutuel operators. I should like to ask the minister what is the intention of the government with regard to the employment in Canada of United States citizens in this connection, in view of the fact that Canadian citizens are barred from employment on the tracks in the United States.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question of the interchange of labour between Canada and the United States, as I think every hon. member knows, has come up with respect to many industries and activities. It is difficult to adopt any course that will not at times give rise to irritation or cause some people to feel that the division is not fair as between the two countries. With respect to the employment of people on race tracks—and I may tell hon. members that I am not at all acquainted with race tracks and their operation—I had this question before me last year and again this year. I am not prepared to subscribe to what my hon. friend says with regard to the exclusion of Canadians from United States tracks, though I would not care to deny that there has been some restriction in that regard. There are many more tracks in the United States than there are in Canada, and Canadians are employed on United States tracks. The number of United States citizens employed on Canadian tracks the year before last was about one hundred. Last year that number was greatly reduced, and this year a further reduction has been made, so that there will not be more than fifteen such officials employed.

Hon. members must realize that the operation of a race track is a highly specialized business, and one cannot become acquainted with all its complexities in the course of a few weeks. For instance, a steward is a very special man, and so also is a starter; these men are trained for their work. An assistant starter does dangerous work at times, I am told, and it has been suggested to me also that sometimes the finisher finds himself in a very precarious situation. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that the whole subject has been given very careful review, having regard to the possibility of employing Canadian labour and also having regard to the fact that huge sums of money have been invested in race tracks in this country. I do not think it would be advisable for the government to adopt such a course as would be likely to render impossible the carrying on of the sport, so called. Yesterday I did take some action; it was indicated to me that a special man was necessary, and I allowed that man to enter on condition that the race track employ at once four unemployed Canadians who would be taught how to do the work. We must take action such as this at times, and as each case arises the responsibility is mine to see that the best course is followed, having regard to the interests of everyone concerned and particularly the interests of those unemployed in Canada who are capable of carrying on the work.

TARIFF BOARD—APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in regard to the new tariff board. Could the minister tell the house what applications for hearings have been received from Canadian and British firms? If the minister has not the information before him perhaps he would give me an answer to-morrow.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Obviously I will have to ask that my hon. friend's question stand as a notice, and I will give an answer to-morrow.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is desirable that we should have interim supply. Therefore I would ask the unanimous consent of the house for the purpose of voting one-twelfth of the estimates. I accordingly move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the minister whether, when this amount is voted, he will make a second motion for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the opposition): I imagine that the minister's motion is made for the purpose of obtaining what is necessary for the payment of the civil servants on the 15th of the month?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I might avail myself of this opportunity to say so, this motion rather brings up the question of whether this house will not conclude its business by that time. I may say quite frankly that so far as the opposition is concerned we have no desire to protract the session. If we could come to an agreement with regard to the business for the remainder of the session I think it might not be necessary for my hon. friend to ask for this interim supply. I just make this suggestion as an indication of the attitude of the opposition provided we can reach an agreement as to the business for the balance of the session.

Mr. RHODES: Even in that event, Mr. Speaker, there would be some inconvenience because under the new control and audit act we are practically without funds for purposes which require funds from day to day. In view of what has been said by my right hon. friend, however, and in anticipation of any possible announcement that may be made I think perhaps the motion may be withheld until to-morrow. Therefore I would withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if there has been any change in the intention of the government to proceed with the redistribution bill this session. I ask the question because there seems to be some uncertainty with regard to the matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think perhaps I can answer that question with more authority to-morrow, but so far as I know at present there is no change.

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE DATE OF PROROGATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I have no intention of asking the government to discuss a matter which they may or may not be ready to take up at the moment; if however the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) intends to take up interim supply to-morrow perhaps I might ask the Prime Minister if, between now and to-morrow, he would not consider whether it might not be possible to arrange matters so that by sitting mornings or giving up Wednesday night adjournments, or something of the sort, we may have an approximate time fixed for prorogation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): We have what I suppose is a most disputatious measure to consider in connection with redistribution. The discussion of redistribution might take some time, from the indications I have heard. I have not had an opportunity to investigate the matter fully, but I have been told that may be so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the hon. gentleman from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe); he says it is so. Therefore it follows that there may be a lengthy discussion on the question of redistribution. Apart from that I know now of no measure that will take any considerable time of the house. There is a short measure which I indicated I might introduce but which I have not yet discussed fully with my colleagues. It is probable that we shall ask the house to approve of a trade agreement between now and prorogation, and that is the reason I have not made any statement, because I cannot do so to-day with any degree of certainty. I shall endeavour, however, between now and to-morrow to get as full information as possible on all these matters and communicate it to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend refers to a trade agreement. Is it the one with France he has in mind?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

WAYS AND MEANS

CONDITION OF SETTLERS IN ROUYN DISTRICT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): The other day I was unfortunately compelled to submit to the house complaints made by certain settlers and, commenting upon this, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) said that these complaints had come from people other than those who had been settled by the federal government. To-day I have received complaints again, and every one of the settlers concerned has been assisted by the federal government as well as by the provincial authorities and the municipality. This matter is of the utmost importance and I would direct the attention of the house and of the country to the condition of these poor people who are now in dire distress. Depending on them are babies and young children who have no milk.

The Minister of Labour, the day after I brought this matter up, read the following telegram which he said he had received from Mr. J. E. Laforce, who acts for the Canadian National Railways on the committee with respect to this work:

Relative statement the Gazette this morning. No families back to land were placed Rouyn or immediate surroundings. No back to land families province Quebec in distress provided they have shown willingness to work.

J. E. Laforce.

The day before the minister read that telegram to the house I had read a telegram received from Mr. Marcel Essiambre. I will now read the letter I received from this man. I regret very much that I have not an English translation at hand, but I may say that the letter has been sworn to before a commissioner of the superior court. It speaks for itself:

(Translation)

I, Marcel Essiambre, previously residing in Montreal, married and father of nine children, residing at Rivière-Solitaire since October 6 of last year—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Where is Rivière-Solitaire situated? In what district?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): In the county of Pontiac, twenty miles from Rouyn.

—do hereby swear on the Holy Bible and make the following statement:

On October 6 last, I left Montreal to establish myself at Rivière-Solitaire, as a settler. On October 26, my wife and my nine children joined me there. I had to pay $15 for the transfer of my household effects from Ville-Marie to Rivière-Solitaire. Instead of delivering them on my lot, the driver spread them over a distance of about 12 miles. In connection with this transfer I lost for at least $100 worth of my household effects, namely, two large boxes containing new clothes which we had purchased before leaving and which were to last, at least, over two years; I also lost a mattress. No one ever reimbursed us for this serious loss. My lot is situated at a distance of half a mile from the highway. The road leading to it was cleared, that is the trees were cut, but the road bed is soft. Therefore, it is impossible to reach my lot with a summer vehicle; however, it can be reached with a "log-sled" (a kind of a sled made of logs which is dragged along the ground). Since our arrival here, we have, so to speak, no mail service, that is, any one coming from Rouyn brings us our mail. Last Sunday, Mr. Leroux, the parish priest notified us in his sermon that, in the future, those who wanted their mail, would have to get it themselves at Rouyn, as he did not intend to bring it any more.

I have not been able, for more than fifteen days, to obtain goods from the store of Mr. Bellehumeur, at Rivière-Solitaire. My account amounts to $421.53, the balance completing the $500, I am told (Mr. Joseph Morin, who is one of the agents of colonization here, so informs me) is held to cover the travelling expenses to this place, of my family and myself, also to cover the freight rate on my household effects. Yet, previous to my departure from Montreal, I was informed at the C. P. Ry. offices, Windsor station, that our train fare and freight for household effects would be free of charge. I am charged seven fares at $10 each, or $70. The only food we have had in the house, since fifteen days, for my wife, children and myself, is flour. To-day, I arrived at Rouyn on foot, after having walked 32 miles, in order to obtain some work. As we had not eaten anything, I had to beg for my food. My friend and myself, have enough for another meal before returning, on foot, to Rivière-Solitaire, as no work can be had at Rouyn.

I now appeal to Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, M.P., and ask him to draw the attention of the House of Commons to the sad plight of my family and myself and to request the government to supply us with food.

I know a number of families who are also starving; the following are the names of a few of them, all residents of Rivière-Solitaire.

Names of families: 1. Octave Larocque; 2. Amable Larocque; 3. Joseph Levasseur; 4. William Laviolette; 5. Jérémie Trépanier. There are many others who have no food whatsoever.

I would request the government to send an inspector here, you will then be able to judge whether I have given false evidence. Many of us are in a weak state and unless the government acts immediately, there will be deaths to register.

I sign,
Marcel Essiambre,
Rivière-Solitaire, Témiskaming,
(Signed) Marcel Essiambre.

Sworn before me, this 25th day of April, 1933.

(Signed) Nelson Pinder,
(Justice of the Peace for the district of Pontiac).

Note.—I have an infant 8 months old to whom milk is refused.

(Signed) Marcel Essiambre.

I forwarded this letter to the hon. Minister of Labour enclosing also mine which is as follows:

Ottawa, April 28, 1933.

Honourable W. A. Gordon, Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.
Dear Mr. Gordon:

Referring to your statement of yesterday (Hansard, p. 4644) on the condition of settlers in Rouyn and other parts of Quebec, Mr. Laforce has wired me that "no families back to the land were placed Rouyn or immediate surroundings."

Mr. Marcel Essiambre's telegram which I have read on April 26th (Hansard, p. 4615-6) was sent from Rouyn and it mentioned that a letter was to follow.

I have received that letter only yesterday and I forward you a copy of it.

You will see by that letter that Mr. Essiambre or Essiandre is one of the settlers at La Rivière Solitaire, and that man walked the whole way, about twenty miles, from La Rivière Solitaire to get some work in Rouyn wherefrom he sent his telegram.

I did not mention in the house that Mr. Essiambre was living at Rouyn, but it appeared by the telegram itself wherefrom it was sent.

Mr. Laforce, who, as you said, "acts for the Canadian National Railways on the committee with respect to this work" has added: "No back to land families province Quebec in distress provided they have shown willingness to work."

You will note that Mr. Essiambre's letter has been sworn before a justice of the peace. The only thing he asks, and it seems very fair, is the visit of an inspector. He writes: "You will then see if I perjure myself."

Therefore the sworn statement made by that man is most serious and deserves every consideration.

Mr. Essiambre says that he is the father of an eight months' child and who is refused milk. Can you expect from such a child "the willingness to work" mentioned by Mr. Laforce?

You have stated that only two settlers had been assisted by your government in my constituency and that you believed that the other settlers there had been placed by the province of Quebec; but the above mentioned wire came from Rouyn and the sender was a settler from La Rivière Solitaire.

Therefore, will you kindly let me know at once if your government had anything to do with the settlement of La Rivière Solitaire? This is my first question.

My second question is: What are the settlements to which your government has made any contribution in the province of Quebec?

My third question is as follows: If your government had anything to do by contribution or otherwise with the settlement at La Rivière Solitaire, will you kindly see to it at once that an inspector from your department is sent there to interview Mr. Essiambre and the people mentioned in his letter, in order to have a true, complete and impartial report on the matter which seems to be very serious.

In fact, this morning I have received another wire from J. D. Valiquette, dated Rouyn, but I presume that that gentleman is one of the settlers of La Rivière Solitaire. You will note that he says that his children are very weak.

I am anxious to receive his letter and I will send a copy to you as soon as I get it.

I regret not to have the time to translate some of the documents which I send you but it is easier for you to have it done at once by your staff.

My only appeal is to your sense of justice and to your good heart. This is why I expect a fair answer with great eagerness.

I wrote another letter to the hon. gentleman on May 1 but as yet I have received no answer. I desire to take this opportunity to thank the newspapers which have published the letter written by Mr. Essiambre. I refer particularly to the newspapers La Presse, La Patrie, Le Devoir and Le Droit which have brought these facts to the notice of the public. They must be known to everyone. Only this morning I received another letter, also sworn to by the same gentleman, which reads:

Sworn Statement

I, Marcel Essiambre, a settler of Rivière-Solitaire, hereby swear on the Holy Bible and make the following statement: I arrived this evening from Rivière-Solitaire, together with my nephew Frédéric Larocque, after having walked 32 miles. As we had no money and had not eaten any food, we had to make up our mind to beg for food. After having explained to a Rouyn citizen that we were poor settlers having come from Montreal and settled at Rivière-Solitaire, and that we had not eaten any dinner that day, he gave us our supper, and a bed for the night. He showed me in the newspaper "La Presse" what the minister, W. A. Gordon, had said regarding the statement I had made in my telegram; the newspaper contained the following: That my name did not appear on the files of the department, that in the back to the land scheme under the Dominion government, no settler was located in Rouyn or surroundings. I deem it my duty to furnish to the one who defends our cause in the House of Commons, Mr. J. F. Pouliot, the facts such as sworn to, in order to make known the truth and prevent those charged of resorting to lies justifying their actions. I left Montreal on October 6 last, and after reaching Rivière-Solitaire, I settled on lot 7, range 8, township of Desandrouin; my family left Montreal on October 26 to join me and ever since then we have been residing on my lot, located at a distance of 32 miles from Rouyn. To-day I am looking for work because I am certain that if I remain on my lot we shall all starve to death. I have no hesitation in advising my relations and friends who reside in Montreal not to come and settle at Rivière-Solitaire, it is a real snare and the best place to starve to death. All our surroundings here consist in deceit and hypocrisy. We are shamefully robbed of the few dollars granted to us by the city of Montreal and the Dominion government. The provincial government does not seem to have paid its quota, because the drivers who transferred our household effects have not, according to them, been paid.

I cannot vouch for these facts; I simply quote the sworn statement such as it is:

Food and other articles were sold to us at twice their value. Our letters are unsealed, taken out and lost, while the goods sent to us through the mail are stolen. We have no mail service, we must depend on every one. If the minister, Mr. Gordon, wishes to be better informed, let him send some one to hold an inquiry (some serious person) and he will discover quite a number of poor settlers who had their goods stolen, their letters opened or stolen. For months past our member, Mr. Bélec, has been promising us that mail service—

Mr. Essiambre makes certain comments about the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Belec) and out of deference to the latter I shall not read them.

If federal inspectors have held inquiries, I do not hesitate to state, under oath, that they did not fulfil their duty, they made false statements and did not endeavour to discover the truth.

First, our member, Mr. Charles Bélec, in the grand speech he recently delivered, was bold enough to state publicly that we had a well equipped hospital; I wish to state, under oath—

Mr. Essiambre uses language which I shall not repeat, however, he absolutely contradicts the statement of the hon. member for Pontiac.

—we have no hospital or even a doctor. Although I am but a poor settler, I shall take the liberty of telling our member, Mr. Charles Bélec—

Neither shall I quote the words Mr. Essiambre uses.

—that he should defend in the house his constituents so that we would not be forced to ask an outside member to request on our behalf charity for our families and ourselves.

Sworn before me, May the second, the year of our Lord, nineteen hundred and thirty-three, at Rouyn, witness,

(Signed) Nelson Pinder,
Commissioner of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec,
Abitibi district.

I sign,
(Signed) Marcel Essiambre.

I took the trouble to communicate with the Post Office department to verify the statement of Mr. Essiambre, in connection with the mail service; the following is the letter received, dated May 1, last, from Mr. Maurice Grondin, private secretary to the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

I am instructed by the hon. Mr. Sauvé, to acknowledge receipt of your letter addressed to him on March 28 last, in connection with the mail service at Rivière-Solitaire-Rouyn. There is not yet any post office located at Rivière-Solitaire. A request for one has already been made, however, the necessary arrangements have not, so far, been completed.

As the list of addresses published by the Post Office Department is arranged by each local post office, this will explain why no list of addresses has yet been made. As to the transport of mail, tenders were asked for a semi-weekly service between Rivière-Solitaire and Arntfield. The contract has not yet been awarded.

I remain, sir,
Yours sincerely,
(Signed) Maurice Grondin,
Private Secretary.

I think it shameful, sir, that the 2,800 people who reside at Rivière-Solitaire, since October last, have not yet any mail service. Is it to prevent these poor people from broadcasting their legitimate complaints against the way they are treated by the governments and municipalities? If that is the reason there is not only Mr. Essiambre who has to complain. I also received such a complaint from Mr. Joseph-Donat Valiquette in a telegram dated at Rouyn, however, this gentleman resides at at Mont-Bayard, in the neighbourhood of Rivière-Solitaire. This telegram was also sent "C.O.D." on April 27, last.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, M.P.
Ottawa, Ont.

My family and myself nothing to eat. Ask you to rise in house and request the government to send food. My children are in a weak state. Writing to-day.

(Signed) J. D. Valiquette.

Sworn Statement

I, Joseph-Donat Valiquette, previously residing in Montreal, father of four children, settled at Rivière-Solitaire, Témiskaming, on October of last year, do hereby swear on the Holy Bible and make the following statement:

I left Montreal on October 6 last to settle at Rivière-Solitaire, under the system which grants $600 to a settler. After reaching Riviére-Solitaire, I decided to take my lot at Mont-Bayard, which is the next parish, situated 12 miles from Rivière-Solitaire.

My account, I am told, amounts to $499. Now, the store of Coté, Limited, refuses to give me food for my family and myself. When I left home this morning, all my wife had in the house was half a kettle of beans and bread. We have been living for the last fifteen days on nothing else but boiled beans, without grease or pork.

Our boots are all worn out. We still have flour and beans to last us about three or four days.

I appeal to Mr. Jean-Francois Pouliot, M.P., to rise in the house and request the government to send us food in order that we may not starve to death.

The following are the names of a few families who, like myself, are starving. These families reside at Mont-Bayard: Messrs. Gravel, Gagnon, and many others whose names I cannot recall, at present.

Sworn before me, this 26th April, 1933, at Rouyn, Quebec.

(Signed) Nelson Pinder,
Commissioner of the Superior Court for the province of Quebec,
Abitibi district.

I sign,
Joseph-Donat Valiquette,
Mont-Bayard, Témiskaming, Que.
(Signed) J. D. Valiquette.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I always try to be lenient towards those who ask questions when I am making a speech, but the other day when I was saying that it was a crime to let the children of our race die of hunger, some hon. members opposite dared to shout "Hurrah." There may be some excuse for their not understanding fully what I was saying but they should not make fun of these distressing cases. It is not a pleasure to me to bring up these matters before the house; I do it because I feel it to be my duty to defend these families who have been placed in the middle of a wilderness, cut off from everyone. I feel that my action is not only in accordance with the rules of this house but in accordance with the rules of humanity. I feel sure that no man or woman in this country wants to see a human being go hungry. These men do not ask for money; all they ask is that a fair investigation be made of their cases. They do not want this investigation to be held by those who are paid according to the number of settlers they place on the land; they want it to be held by someone who is fair, impartial and independent. They want someone who will tell the truth to the Minister of Labour in Ottawa and the Minister of Colonization in Quebec. That is all I ask of the minister here and all I have been asking of the Minister of Colonization in Quebec. The latter writes me under date of the first of this month that he intends sending a man there to make an investigation. I ask the government—and I urge upon them the necessity of doing this—to send there a man who is competent, independent, fair, who will interview those people who are starving in the wilderness and report as to their condition. Then we shall find out whether Mr. Laforce is telling the truth when he says that no one is dying of hunger in Quebec. I want the minister to understand what I say. Mr. Laforce says that no one who is willing to work has been in distress. Can you expect a starving man to show unwillingness to work?

Mr. CANTLEY: Better go home and put your head to soak.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry, but I shall put the hon. member for Pictou in the same class as those who shouted "Hurrah" the other day. I pity him. A man of his age, who must have a heart in his body, should not say anything like that when I am speaking of human misery. If the hon. member for Pictou were bringing to the attention of the house the sad case of those who are suffering in his constituency, he may be sure I should not jeer at him, but I would sympathize fully with him, and I promise, when he speaks in the house I shall pay attention to him. If he has a stone instead of a heart in his body, I shall leave him alone and I shall not mention him again in my speech as I would not honour him by paying any more attention to his gibes.

I have made an appeal to the sense of justice and good heart of the minister. I am asking him something that is fair and reasonable, something that any man who has a heart in his body would do at once. I urge him to see to it immediately that an inspector is sent there to find out whether those men who sent sworn letters about their miseries and grievances, are telling the truth or not. The minister must take with a grain of salt those reports that are sent to him or to the provincial government stating that everything is well in those newly settled districts. That is all I have to say, and I say it in all earnestness and sincerity, hoping at least that the minister will believe I am not playing petty politics; that all I wish to do is to open his eyes and tell him that those who have already made reports to him have not told the truth.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on account of the fact that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has brought up this matter, I wish to say that the policy of the government in connection with the back to the land movement has placed a number of families in my constituency. I believe during the coming summer the number who will be placed by the government in conjunction with the provincial government will be nearly 400 families, so that on account of these facts the house will allow me to say a few words on this important question.

I am absolutely in favour of the movement because I believe out of it will come a great deal of good as ultimately it will help to bring about a balancing of population between urban and rural centres. I said, I believe five weeks ago, that the government should have a better follow-up system, but taking the movement as a whole, I think it is good and that some benefit has been accomplished. Of course it is always easy to single out certain individual cases and on them build up an argument before parliament, but, as I say, the movement as a whole will be of benefit. For one thing, it makes the governments, both federal and provincial, realize the serious situation that exists in our rural sections. I believe I mentioned a few weeks ago to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) the case of a man named James McLean, a very fine type of Canadian, at Frederickhouse, who has taken up a lot under that scheme, but who finds it almost impossible to make both ends meet.

In a letter which I read to the house he mentioned that he was allowed only $1.40 a head. He has eight children, so that with his wife and himself, there are ten of a family who have to live on $14 a month. Every hon. member will realize that it is absolutely impossible to keep body and soul together on such an amount. I could cite two or three others cases, but I do not believe it would be in order to do so at this time. Again I repeat: No family and certainly not a single man should be allowed to settle on the land after the end of June. No matter how well administered the scheme may be, no one should be allowed to go on the land in the fall or winter. In the last two years we have allowed many people to settle in the northern sections in the fall or late in the summer and it is impossible for those fine people to make a success. On that score, however, I believe the government is well seized of the situation.

There is another case which I want the government to understand. A number of those new farmers who have been taken away from their previous occupations and thrown into a new one are finding it impossible, even under the $600 scheme, to finance the buying of seed grain so as to put in a crop on the land which they cleared last year. I believe the government out of either the equalization fund or in some other way should find it possible to get some of the surplus grain which has been accumulating in the west for a few years and which must deteriorate, and distribute it in the northern section of Ontario. I have in mind hundreds of cases of farmers and settlers who find it impossible to put any seed into the ground for the simple reason that they have not the money to do so. I believe $500,000 would be quite sufficient to meet the requirements of those people. I have under my hand a newspaper dispatch in which I read that the provincial government is sending Hon. Doctor Robb to make an inquiry into the situation, and really this is praiseworthy because a minister of the Ontario government will find out for himself the actual situation and will see that some help must be given. The provincial government go further; they say that they are going to give to some of the settlers who at present are on relief, from ten to twenty bushels of seed grain. This is a move in the right direction. I believe the federal government in this back to the land scheme should enlarge its policy by allowing a sum of $500,000 to be voted by parliament so that not a single settler placed on the land under this scheme will suffer from lack of seed during the present season. As regards the view that they should be self-supporting, we all know that on new holdings or farms, it is impossible for these people for a number of years to make the thing go with the crop that they find there. Unless they have some seed grain placed in the soil this season, they will be in a worse position next fall than they are at the present time.

There is another matter which I believe will come under this heading, and which has a great deal to do with public health, particularly in the unorganized sections of our country, especially northern Ontario and northern Quebec. We know the doctors in the organized localities are looking after the population not only in the districts in which they live but also in the unorganized sections. I have in my hand a regulation issued by the provincial government last fall whereby it has curtailed the amount that is to be paid to the doctors for their services, extending to every section in which they are giving medical attention. I said in the house early this session, and I repeat that this regulation is actually prejudicial to the health of the individual. It is very harmful to the rural sections and every member will readily understand that a sum of $100, where each doctor has to look after a population of at least 6,000 people, is ridiculous. I believe it is in order to read the regulation so that the house may be fully seized with the situation. It reads:

> Regulations as to medical services and medical supplies. This statement is issued in order to clarify in the minds of the municipalities and the doctors the proper interpretation of the phrase "medical services and medical supplies" which appears in the order in council dated the 19th of September, 1932.
> At the outset, it must be clearly understood that the government is not forcing any policy upon the municipalities with regard to this matter. Each municipality has the right to decide for itself whether it wishes to undertake any medical services in connection with direct relief, and also as to the nature and plan of such medical assistance.
> 2. As set out in the Public Health Act (section 51, clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4) municipalities are directly responsible for the medical attendance and medical supplies of their indigent population.

This new regulation might well apply to other sections of the province of Ontario. The Minister of Labour is familiar with the northern part of that province, and must realize fully that it cannot apply to the section of the country from which I come. In that part of the province there are only a few organized rural districts. Most of them are in the colonization stage, and there are no municipal bodies to take care of them. A doctor from Timmins giving services in one of the surrounding rural districts would find it absolutely impossible to collect fees for any such services rendered. The same would apply to the district surrounding the town of Cochrane. That applies as forcibly to other sections, such as those surrounding Kapuskasing and Hearst. Then, regulation No. 3 is as follows:

Any municipality wishing to undertake the furnishing of medical services and medical supplies and desiring to secure government assistance in connection with such work under the order in council above referred to must comply with the following requirements:

(a) All medical treatment to indigent patients in their homes or in doctors' offices is included, also maternity services at homes, as well as after treatment, in major emergency operations outside of hospitals; the doctors furnishing the necessary medical supplies.

(b) For such services as outlined in the previous subsection the doctor may be allowed one-half the established prevailing fee for such service in the community.

(c) Surgical and medical treatment in hospitals or other institutions for treatment of disease and surgical operations outside of hospitals are not included.

(d) Before the medical services and supplies are given an order in writing for same must be obtained from the relief officer, except in very emergent cases where the relief officer can give such an order after some part of the services required has been performed.

(e) Accounts for medical services and supples must be rendered by the doctor in an itemized statement, and each account must show the details of the prevailing charges in the locality for such services upon which the one-half claim is based. Such account must be rendered to the relief officer and forwarded by him to this department with the monthly statement.

(f) In rural municipalities a maximum mileage fee of twenty-five cents per mile, one way, may be allowed.

(g) An amount in excess of $100 in a doctor's account for any one month will not be allowed.

(h) It will be observed that "medical services and medical supplies" is one of the items of direct relief that must be included in the forty per cent as set out in the order in council.

This rule, Mr. Speaker, is of absolutely no use to our section of the country. If my information is correct, in the city of Ottawa medical men giving their services under the relief act are allowed a minimum of $400 per month. I suppose they attend an average of 2,000 people. In our section, however, in the unorganized districts the doctors have to look after the health of at least 6,000 people. Travelling conditions are poor in a good many cases, he would have to go fifty miles each way, making a round trip of one hundred miles, for which he is allowed twenty-five cents a mile one way. While that may be fair enough in the summer months when automobiles can be used, in the winter months the amount allowed by the government is not sufficient. We know that doctors in the newer sections have a more difficult task than those in the more populated areas. I do not know of any doctor in my section of the country who through lack of money has refused to give service. Let us visualize what would happen for instance, in a maternity case: The doctor is called, but on account of the fact that the government is not willing to pay fifty per cent of the fee, he refuses to attend. Supposing that on account of such refusal death follows; who would be responsible, or who would receive the blame? It would be the doctor. I put this fair question to the house: Is a doctor more obliged to give public service than any other citizen? Must he make more sacrifice for the public than any other citizen? A hundred dollars a month to attend to 6,000 people, and to supply them with proper medicaments, is wholly inadequate. To be fair I must say that in some cases the provincial government has given more; still the payment is inadequate. We have the spectacle of that splendid profession being compelled to make a sacrifice which is not asked from any other section of the population. I know of a case where a doctor in the town of Kaspuskasing received a call from an adjoining locality. In that instance the poor settler did not have money enough to pay for the phone call, and the doctor had to pay the reversed charge of $1.40. The doctor never hesitated, but went to attend the patient. He took his car, knowing that he would never receive a single cent for the services he was going to give. Surely a government could not object to helping pay a fee in an instance such as that. The minister may urge that this is a matter with which the provincial legislature should deal. I maintain however, as I said previously, that since we are voting money for relief, out of the federal treasury something should be done by the federal authorities, and it should take a lead in such matters.

To make my point clearer, and so that the house may be fully seized of the seriousness of the situation, I am going to read a letter from one of the doctors which is typical of several letters I have received from doctors in my section of the country. As I said a while ago, we all know that professional men, whether they be doctors or lawyers, never expect to get the full amount of their fees. This applies more forcibly to doctors, because in addition to giving their personal attention they have to supply the necessary remedies for treatment. The letter before me, dated February 2, 1933, is addressed to Mr. J. A. Ellis, of the Ontario Unemployment Relief Department, and is as follows:

Two weeks ago your representative, Mr. Tackaberry, at the Northern Development office, sent me a copy of regulations as to medical services and medical supplies, dated December 29, 1932, asking me for comments on same by return post. Hurriedly, I gave him my impressions.

The flu epidemic has not given me time to go further into the subject. To-day, however, financial conditions urge me to come to you for information.

I was this morning asked by a man on relief to go ten miles to attend to his wife sick in bed for the last six days. This man walked in ten miles and back ten miles, which is not unusual here. I called the relief department for the $5 livery pay in the case. Receiving no satisfactory answer I at first refused the husband. Eventually I went, driving twenty miles with team and driver, and opened an abscess in the mouth.

The problem that presents itself is "How deep shall I sink before I stop." My expenses are so very heavy and the present returns so insignificant that I have had to borrow. My limit at the bank has been reached. I can no further risk the welfare of my family and go deeper into debt without assuring myself of the reimbursement of my expenses, and money to keep my wife and seven children going.

Like everybody else, doctors are willing to make sacrifices, but in return expect a living. On account of the population under our care, the amount of work done, and the hardships encountered in this climate, covering the distances over roads, full of impediments, the inevitable expenses are such that the amount of money allowed in the south is altogether inadequate here; and just lately the flu epidemic has intensified that condition.

Whereas I concur with subsections a, b, d and e, of regulation No. 3, I must point out that subsections c, f and g, are not at all suitable to the district. Doctors with mixed practices of medicine and surgery can, as a rule, fairly well forego their surgical fees, but when patients are so far apart that doctors cannot possibly make the round, or where homes are so unsanitary that patients cannot be left there —(settlers' homes are all of pioneer age here, log shacks, all of them, many tumbling down, previously discarded homes even being at times used)—and must of all necessity be brought to hospital for care.

The hospital here takes the place of the home down below, and we should be paid for such services. Unlike the southern hospitals there are no house surgeons here to assume responsibility of patients and our attention is constant. As corroboration to my assertions I might tell you a maternity case of mine died in her home lately because no doctor could reach her. The coroner had to investigate.

Personally I care for about 6,000 of a population in a radius of 50 miles. During this flu epidemic my professional expenses (drugs and supplies, auto or livery, office rent and care, tax, insurance and inevitable expenditure, train, travelling bills) vary between $500 and $600 a month.

[Mr. Bradette.]

To one who does not know our circumstances I will say "not one drop of medicine or one article of medical supply has been handed out that should not have been." In most cases I should have given more.

Unfortunately I have reached my limit financially and physically. (I have been practising my profession twenty-four years). It is not to be forgotten that three or four doctors in Cochrane do incomparably more work than southern doctors, and, if I may say so, undergo hardships unknown in the south.

I am now asking for information and fair treatment, commensurate with the relief work done. I only want my expenses, on relief work, and fair compensation.

I would not wish my letter to be construed as a threat, but in all justice I cannot work all day in one municipality and all night in another one, spend $20 a day to receive $3.33.

Keep in mind that there is one doctor in a city to every 600 or 800 people in a small radius, whereas I attend seven or eight times that number in a radius twenty-five times as large.

This letter is written explanatory to our conditions, and imbued I believe with good intentions. I should be pleased to give any information one might wish, any time.

I have gone to homes where five, eight or ten had la grippe, and three or four such houses in succession, fifty miles from my office. I have had to furnish those poor but honest people with requirements deemed necessary to effect a cure in as short a time as possible. There is no drug store in any of the twenty communities I have to attend to. It is absolutely out of the question to give such patients medicine for two or three days, it must be for eight, ten or fifteen days as the case may be, and for the number that are affected.

Men have skied or hiked eighteen miles each way to my office. Mothers have pulled babies six or eight miles behind them to my office and other mothers have walked ten miles to my office. One mother, chilled, drove eighteen miles at 15 degrees below zero with a sick infant in her arms to my office. That is only a few, and they must be looked after, and looked after with humanity, and I cannot support the cost alone, or any more.

I have given thirty-two ounces of cough medicine to a family of ten, fifty miles away, and as much tonic; that was not enough, it only lasted four days, and rightly so. The cost may seem high, but it is both expensive and sad in the community to see a few cases developing tuberculosis or a young father dying. I have seen both in this present epidemic. It is very heart-rending at times, but most of those people on relief do not deserve to, must not be left unattended, especially now.

Whatever it may seem to cost, I don't get it. I would welcome a relief agent from Toronto to go my round and investigate.

My yearly income tax reports to Ottawa show my expenses, professional only, at from $5,000 to $6,000 a year. They are the same now.

Quite correctly you have assumed 25 cents a fair remuneration for mileage. This is commensurate with conditions where a car can be used. Herein you will find affixed a cartoon of the country physician. Now that has happened often to me, but for displacements it is worse yet, as we have to hire a team of horses and driver whom we must pay 50 cents a mile one way (and it is very fair). You cannot allow us less than we actually pay.

There was a bad apostle among the twelve, and there must be an odd doctor who will forget himself sometimes, but our cases here are bona fide. Our neighbouring doctors are by rail 70 miles west, 92 miles east, 125 miles south (Timmins 60 miles southeast) and the north pole limit north. We cater to the municipalities of Cochrane, Glackmeyer, Fauquier, Moonbeam, besides the unorganized districts which comprise Frederick House, Hunta, Driftwood, Holland, Devonshire, Abitibi, Brower, Norembega, Genier, Clute, Gardiner, and a few others.

To fix an amount equitably for doctors' services one must take into consideration the situation as it arises in the district. There are no industries, no manufactures, no regular pay here, but what comes from the community. Nine-tenths of the settlers are on relief, and the other one-tenth has no money. This is a railway junction but the railway has its own doctor who is paid per capita.

I depend for living on the work I do, which is 95 per cent relief, requested by the relief officer, with the clear understanding of a 50 per cent usual fee.

If the minister wishes the name of the doctor I shall be glad to give it; I believe he knows him personally. I think that the health of our fine pioneer population is at present jeopardized, and that we cannot expect further sacrifice by the medical profession in the new sections of our country.

I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the attention that the house has given me. In closing I want to correct a statement which I believe has been prejudicial to our section of the country, made by a controller of the city of Ottawa a few days ago. I understand that controller visited some sections of northern Ontario and Quebec to see the progress made in the back to the land movement, and he came back here and made statements which I think are not fair to northern Ontario. In the first place, if he wanted to make a thorough investigation he should have gone to the north country when the snow was not on the ground, so that he could see the quality of the soil and the facilities we have to clear land. But he went there when the ground was covered with two or three feet of snow and then came back and said that no citizen of Ottawa should be sent to that country. I protest against that statement which cannot go unanswered. It is true that at present many of them are on relief, but I believe that with a proper policy of direction and assistance on the part of the federal and provincial authorities they will again know days of prosperity and comfort. As a representative of the new sections of Ontario I deny the statement made by the Ottawa controller, which was given much publicity, in the press of this city at any rate, because I state again that there is a future for agriculture in our northern country.

Before resuming my seat I voice the fervent wish that the federal and provincial governments will have a better follow-up system in connection with their back to the land operations. I am going to study the situation through that country all summer; I am going to spend most of my time among these new settlers to find out on the ground their requirements. I know that the great majority of those who have gone there have gone with the same spirit that animated our pioneer fathers. But again I repeat that the government will have to do more for those fine people than they have done in the past. I hope the matter will be given attention so that there may be no failure in the policy so well inaugurated two years ago, being certain that its success will prove most beneficial to the whole of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed I want to take this earliest opportunity to refer to a difference of opinion between the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and myself when the committee was in session yesterday, with respect to the total amount involved in the taxes imposed under the recent budget. Upon inquiry I find that my hon. friend was correct, and that I was in error. Perhaps I may be permitted to use language which is familiar to my hon. friend, "by way of confession and avoidance," that I was compelled suddenly to resort to my recollection, without the opportunity to refer to the actual figures. It serves only to illustrate the fact that on a spring evening after many weeks of arduous work during the session it does not do to trust to one's memory for figures. I feel that I owe it to my hon. friend as well as to myself that I should make this correction, and also for the purposes of accuracy of the record.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend will find in the record that when I corrected him last night I gave him credit for not attempting in any way to mislead the committee.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, clause 10, which includes a very long schedule of articles, refers to items which are exempt from the sales tax. The sales tax at the present time on certain articles is fixed at 6 per cent. Last year, if I remember correctly, in addition to the items enumerated on pages 12 and 13 of this resolution, another commodity that is commonly used in the household was not subject to sales tax, an article which is used by nearly every one in greater or less degree, and I am going to appeal to the Minister of Finance to have it included in this schedule of exemptions. Yesterday the minister gave certain reasons as to why it was necessary to impose a special tax of 2 cents per pound on sugar; in fact he has been giving those reasons for the last two or three days. I am not going to argue with the minister with regard to that tax, because I would be out of order and also because of the fact that last night the house passed on division that section of the proposals. But in view of the fact that a tax of 2 cents per pound is being collected from the people of this country, who have consumed sugar in much larger quantities in recent years, I appeal to the minister to exempt molasses from the tax. I remember that in my younger days molasses was used to a much greater extent than is the case at present, and I am very much afraid that as a result of this 2 cent tax on sugar the ordinary people in this country will have to use molasses to a greater extent once more. Even with the increased consumption of sugar molasses remained a household necessity. In going over my constituency and meeting the boys and girls of three, four, five and six years of age, especially between ten and eleven o'clock in the morning and four and five o'clock in the afternoon I find that nearly every child has a piece of bread covered with molasses. This makes a very palatable meal and promotes the health of the children.

Mr. MULLINS: Molasses and sulphur.

Mr. DUFF: In addition molasses is used largely by the fishermen and lumbermen together with beans and other articles of food.

I do not object particularly to the tax on sugar, but I suggest to the minister that in view of the fact that this tax will result in a greater use of molasses he should include molasses in schedule III, where it has been in previous years. This is the first time in a number of years that molasses has been subject to this tax, and I strongly urge upon the minister that after having imposed a tax of 2 cents on sugar he should not also tax the molasses which many people will be compelled to use in future.

Mr. RHODES: I have every sympathy with the viewpoint held by my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough, but speaking solely from the point of view of revenue I may say that he weakens rather than strengthens his argument when he intimates that if there were no tax placed upon molasses the consumption would be increased, with the consumption of sugar becoming less. My hon. friend will recall that the object of the tax was to raise revenue, and it was felt that since sugar was taxed molasses should properly bear at least a small tax, not comparable in any degree with the tax applied to sugar. The sales tax, as applied to molasses, based as it is upon the wholesale price, would mean an additional cost of only 2½ cents per gallon, and I fancy that a gallon of molasses would last that young lad whom my hon. friend saw on the street with a slice of bread spread with molasses, for at least a year. Even at that, however, if it were possible to devise a regulation which would permit the use of molasses by the poorer families without payment of a tax, small though the tax might be, I should be entirely agreeable to that being done. Unfortunately, however, molasses is capable of being used and is used in manufacturing processes and in many ways other than for household table use, and there is no method of division by which we could make the tax apply in the one case and not in the other. I may tell my hon. friend that I have recognized for some time that the tax would be open to the objections voiced by the hon. gentleman, but having regard to the circumstances I have briefly outlined I do not see how it is possible, in justice to those who have to pay such a heavy tax on sugar, to afford an exemption in the case of molasses.

Mr. DUFF: I quite see the point raised by the minister, and if he were exempting from the operation of the sales tax every article of common consumption used in the country that argument would be good. It seems to me, however, that when he exempts a great many other articles, some of which do not seem so important as molasses, his argument is not so strong. Not satisfied with putting a tax on sugar, which is one sweet, he is also putting a tax on molasses. I suggest to the minister that if he must raise revenue by putting a 6 per cent sales tax on molasses surely that tax should apply also to phonograph records, prayer books, hymn books and a number of other articles included in the schedule. Surely molasses is much more important to the people of this country than even hymn books or prayer books. We can go to church and listen to someone else pray and sing. I have sat behind people in church who did not know one note from another; it would have been a great deal better if they had not opened their mouths, and the same thing applies sometimes in this chamber. So I think the minister's argument would be sound if the 6 per cent sales tax applied generally, but it does not. If the minister puts a sales tax on molasses while he leaves phonograph records, prayer books and other items free of that tax his argument does not hold water. I think he should give some consideration to my plea. I am not speaking simply to take up time; I know from my own experience that hundreds of thousands of gallons of molasses are used every year by the poorer people in this country, and I think the minister would be doing God's service if he added molasses to the list of exemptions.

Mr. RHODES: If molasses were used only for household consumption I would not hesitate a moment, but I would point out to my hon. friend that the bulk of the molasses used is not consumed in that manner. It is used very largely in manufacturing processes, and a common illustration is the manufacture of denatured alcohol for use in the radiators of automobiles as anti-freeze. If we could devise some method by means of which the tax might be imposed in the one case and not imposed in the other I should be very happy, but I believe that is not possible from an administrative point of view. Of course, it can be used in the manufacture of certain forms of confection like sweets and that sort of thing, and it would so greatly increase the disproportion in cost as between molasses and sugar as to defeat the purpose of the sugar tax. I will take into further consideration the representations made by my hon. friend, although, as I have already said, we did give the matter the most careful study in the first instance. However, if it is possible to reconsider it before the committee rises this will be done, but I do not wish it to be understood that I give any undertaking in that respect. I do not think I can add anything to what I have already said except this. My hon. friend speaks about phonograph records; they are subject to the sales tax, the only exemption made being those used for educational purposes.

Mr. DUFF: The minister says he cannot exempt molasses because it is used for a great many purposes other than domestic consumption. But the same thing applies to flour; flour also is used in the manufacture of candy. Flour is exempt from the sales tax and if the minister is not going to exempt molasses for the reason he has given, then I suggest he should not exempt flour. I will leave the matter with him. I have made my plea as strongly as possible on behalf of the poor people of this country who are going to be called upon to pay 2 cents a pound on their sugar. They will have to use more molasses and I do think that they should be given some consideration. While I see the force of the minister's argument, that molasses is used for purposes other than domestic consumption, it seems to me that molasses when used by people for their tea or coffee should be exempt. I know that it is used in alcohol; I understand that you can make rum from molasses if you know how; and I do not object to the tax being imposed when the molasses is used for making candy. I agree that candy is a luxury in these times and is already taxed, but the ordinary householder is the person I am thinking of—the fishermen in the county of Richmond and in other parts of Canada as well as the lumbermen working for twenty dollars a month. They use molasses in their tea and I think that the officials of the department could devise some means whereby this very necessary commodity might be placed on the list of exemptions when used for certain purposes. In line 10 of schedule III reference is made to salt, which is exempt when manufactured or produced in Canada. We had some controversy over this last year, and perhaps the minister will say something about it. On page 13 reference is also made to salt—"Salt for use of the sea or gulf fisheries." That is exempt.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Why is it necessary to specify it in the other item? Why not simply say salt and leave out the words "when manufactured or produced in Canada?" The words "for use of the sea or gulf fisheries" should also be omitted. There is no necessity for the exemption to appear in both places when apparently the item is altogether free. As the minister knows, of course, I am in favour of abolishing the tax on salt.

Mr. RHODES: The explanation is that there are other forms of salt imported which are not used in the sea and gulf fisheries, and they are subject to the tax.

Mr. BRADETTE: The minister is right when he says that molasses is used in the manufacture of various articles, but he must bear in mind that it is graded. There is only one grade of molasses fit for human consumption, namely, the Barbados variety, which comes in in one hundred gallon puncheons or in other large containers—usually it comes in in one hundred gallon puncheons. The other grade of molasses is not fit for human food. It may be used in the manufacture of alcohol and other things and I think the department has power to distinguish between these grades and to tax accordingly. As my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) has said, molasses is used extensively in the mining and lumbering camps, and is a staple with most people in the province of Quebec. The minister will find that the per capita consumption of molasses is greater in that province than anywhere else in Canada. It ought to be a very simple matter for the department to ascertain just what is fit for human consumption and what is not, because there are only two grades known to the trade. Certainly I would make it as easy as possible for the people to obtain molasses used in the home.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says that he will consider this item, and I should be glad if at the same time he would give his attention to a minor aspect of it not touched upon by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. I refer to cheap molasses used for cattle feed.

Mr. RHODES: That is exempt.

Mr. NEILL: Nowadays, when dairying is so much in the red, it is necessary to economize at every turn, and in British Columbia they have adopted a system of supplementing the more expensive feeds by the use of screenings, which must be made palatable by the addition of molasses. The lower grades of grain and hay, off colour, can also be made palatable in this way. The molasses used for this purpose is of a low grade that could not be used either in the manufacture of candy or for domestic purposes. I know that the minister has been approached by different dairy bodies, the dairymen's association of British Columbia, for one, and I would ask him to consider very carefully their representations in this regard. There are two distinct grades, one of which I know is cheap. It could not be used for anything but cattle feed, and if the minister cannot give way in regard to molasses used for domestic purposes as a substitute for sugar, I am sure he could exempt this other grade of molasses without any loss to the treasury. Can he not see his way to exempt that grade?

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at the sixteenth line on page thirteen he will find that calf, cattle, hog, fox and poultry feed are all exempt from the tax. Where the type of feed is not specified, the interpretation can be so broad, I am advised by the officials, as to include that low grade of molasses which is used for feed purposes. In fact, it is included.

Mr. NEILL: Even when brought in in bulk by itself, when not mixed?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. The administrative difficulty does not arise there as it does with molasses used for human consumption. It is therefore quite possible to classify it as tax-exempt under these provisions.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. REID: I notice the words "beet pulp." The Minister of National Revenue is present and I would direct his attention and also his colleague's to an important point in connection with this item. In the Fraser valley we have no beet sugar factory, but beets for sugar purposes are grown extensively and taken across the line for manufacture. The farmers are paid so much per ton for their beets plus the return of some of the beet pulp. That beet pulp is returned to them in part payment, but when it comes back the customs department imposes a duty of twenty per cent plus three per cent excise. On taking up this matter with the department I was informed that regulation 709 would apply. This regulation reads:

> Articles and other goods, the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada, returned to the exporter thereof after having been exported without having been advanced in value or improved in condition by any process of manufacture or other means;

When it was drawn to the attention of the department that the beet pulp being returned to Canada had not advanced in value or had not been improved in condition, the officials began immediately to scan the act in order to protect themselves, and so they found a clause under which they could impose the duty. This was clause 1 in regulation 709, which reads:

> All articles for which entry is claimed as returned goods must be returned within five years to the person by whom they were exported, and in the case of articles the produce or manufacture of Canada the property in such articles must have continued in the person by whom they were exported.

I might say that it is impossible for a farmer who has exported beets to state that the beet pulp being returned has been manufactured from the particular beets which he exported. When this regulation was put into effect I do not believe it was ever contemplated that the farmers should be taxed upon the beet pulp which was returned to them after being manufactured from beets which were exported. The committee which investigated the investigating of sugar from beets did not approve of the building of further factories at this time. If there was a factory in the Fraser valley it could well be said that the farmers could have their beets processed in this country, but they must send their beets across the line to be manufactured into sugar. I ask both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue to consider seriously the allowing of free entry to beet pulp which has been manufactured from beets grown by Canadian farmers and exported from this country. The farmers receive this pulp as part payment for the beets which they export. This pulp now pays a twenty per cent duty plus a three per cent tax and there is some doubt whether or not the present sales tax will apply.

Mr. RHODES: The complaint of the hon. member for New Westminster has to do with customs administration and has no reference to the clause under consideration. Under the schedule now before us, dried beet pulp is specifically exempted from sales tax. I shall be happy to confer with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue upon the representations made by my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: There was no other item under which I could discuss this matter, and I took this opportunity as well as availing myself of the presence of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. EULER: It is not my desire to revert again to the matter of the tax on sugar, but I note that while bread is still on the exempted list in connection with the sales tax, rolls, buns or similar goods produced by bakeries are not exempt. I suppose this classification would also include cakes. Why should these articles be subjected to a tax in addition to that imposed on sugar? Cakes, buns and articles of the kind are used as food and a sales tax must be fairly difficult of collection. I should like to know just how much revenue is derived from the tax upon these articles. I think the minister should consider placing them upon the exempted list. I understand that representations have been made and I believe that these people have a good case to offer. Has the minister any intention of acceding to their request?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have received requests similar to those referred to by the hon. member for North Waterloo, and I should like to know just what the government intends to do in this connection. Could the minister give us any idea as to how much money he expects to receive from the tax upon the articles mentioned?

Mr. RHODES: The subject raised by the hon. member for North Waterloo and referred to by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is by no means an unimportant one. I think there have been more representations made in connection with this one matter than have been made in connection with any other dozen articles in the list. In the first place, I might tell my hon. friends that it is not a minor item so far as revenue is concerned. We receive about $600,000 per year, the great bulk of which is received from the large bakeries. Collection is free from difficulty and is made without friction. The difficulty which does arise is encountered in the case of the small bakeries. These men are in the same unfortunate position as many other small shop-keepers in the country. That is not only true to-day but it was true when times were more prosperous. The small baker who has to face the competition of new merchandising methods is the one who complains most bitterly against the sales tax on cakes and pies but it would be a manifestly unfair form of competition to exempt him to a greater extent than the heavy taxpayer. Last year the man whose business did not exceed $5,000 per year was exempted, and it was found that this exemption created a very unfair situation as regards those who were paying the tax. As business became restricted in the regular bakeries, many hands were laid off. Many of these men started up a business of their own and became keen competitors with the regular manufacturers who were heavy taxpayers and large employers of labour. This year the exemption has been lowered from $5,000 to $3,000 in an endeavour to prevent a good deal of this unfair competition. I refer to competition only from the point of view of revenue. Even though we were in a position to forego the receipt of a revenue of $600,000 per year, the matter would not stop there. In justice we could not exempt cakes and pies and impose a tax upon biscuits, cookies and other forms of confectionery. The tax upon these other articles brings in a revenue of $750,000. When we consider the sales tax as it is applied to cakes and pies, we are really dealing with a revenue—not in prospect but actually existing even under to-day's conditions—amounting to $1,350,000. That is a considerable item. I may say that I have had no deputation representative of those small bakers. I sympathize with them very keenly, but their difficulty is not the sales tax. It is one which is common to the small merchant and which has been increasing in recent years because of new methods of merchandising. Even if the sales tax were removed entirely, they would still do business subject to the same difficulties. I imagine we would find just as much flux and change in the case of small bakeshops under the old condition as we would under the new one where the sales tax obtains. If it were not for the need for revenue and for the large figures involved, this would be one of the first taxes I would wish to see removed, but in the circumstances and having regard to our necessity for revenue, I do not see how we can very well do away with it.

Mr. EULER: I do not desire to prolong the argument, but I should like again to impress upon the minister the very thing which he has admitted, that is that the situation as regards these small bakers is very difficult, even for those whose annual output is above $3,000. What makes the situation more difficult is the fact that the minister is imposing a very heavy tax on sugar which also enters into their costs. It is almost impossible for those people to add the additional cost to the value of their product. In that particular line of business there are standard prices and it is difficult in the case of buns, cakes and so on to charge the consuming public an increase in price commensurate with the increase in cost as a result of the tax on sugar and on their products. In view of the fact that the minister has imposed a tax on sugar, the fact that these people have particular difficulties now and the additional fact, which I think is of extreme importance, that these are articles of food and we should tax them as little as possible, I urge upon my hon. friend to consider doing something by way of relief for these people.

Mr. COOTE: There is a little difficulty in hearing some of the conversation carried on between the minister and the hon. member for North Waterloo, and perhaps for the benefit of hon. members who may have just come in, the minister might explain why rolls, buns and similar goods are not exempted from the sales tax. In the last line or two of schedule III, it reads:

Bakers' cake and pies when produced by any one manufacturer or producer to the value of not more than $3,000 in any one calendar year.

These are exempt. Do I understand from that that rolls, buns or similar goods if made by a producer where the value of such production does not exceed $3,000 in a year, would be subject to a tax, but pies and cake would not be?

Mr. RHODES: No; if produced by a baker whose annual production is under $3,000 a year, none of those commodities would be subject to tax.

Mr. COOTE: Not even the rolls or buns?

Mr. RHODES: No, because they are classed as cakes or pies.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to inquire of the minister the reason for amending the section and enumerating the exempted list, while leaving out of consideration altogether, except that he has been good enough to furnish us with a list, the goods removed from the exempted list and now taxable. That is one question. The other is this: Are there any additions to the exempted list that prevailed last year? I apparently cannot get that information.

Mr. RHODES: Will my hon. friend look at the bottom of page 4 of the typewritten copy which I gave to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth? Perhaps he has it before him.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have it in my hand.

Mr. RHODES: He will see there:

Complete parts for goods enumerated in tariff item 409i.

That is scythes, sickles or reaping hooks, hay or straw knives, edging knives, hoes, pronged forks, rakes, n.o.p. These are added to the exempted list; they are not taxable.

460. Materials to be used in Canada for the construction of bridges and tunnels crossing the boundary between the United States and Canada, when similar materials are admitted free under similar circumstances into the United States, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

That provision is included by reason of international arrangement. Those are the only two which are added to the list.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a considerable reduction in the exempted list. By the courtesy of the minister we have been furnished with the list of goods now taxable. The complaint I wish to register is one similar to that which has been so prevalent against the sugar tax. I have not said a word against it, but I wish to register my complaint about taking from the exempted list so many articles of food. I shall not raise so much complaint about the steel, piping and all the rest of it, although I notice shovels and forks now come under the taxable list. My objection is chiefly in regard to food used by every householder in the country. I suppose the minister's answer will be that he must have revenue. I am not going to take time this afternoon to point out where he may obtain that, because that question has been dealt with by other hon. members on this side in connection with the discussion on the sugar tax. I wish merely to supplement, if I may, the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Waterloo that the minister might very well forego the bonusing of some thirteen articles which, if I remember correctly, the minister stated might involve a charge on the revenue of from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000. As one of those who do not believe in protection but who thoroughly believe in a tariff for revenue, I also am not in favour of bonusing. I know of no reason for granting that bonus other than for the purpose of furnishing some relief to those who are perhaps taxed so heavily, by way of tariffs, on their purchases. That, however, is by the way. What I am protesting against is this: In the list furnished by the minister, we find flour, oatmeal, rolled oats, corn meal and practically all breakfast foods if the packages are five pounds or over. As the question of molasses has been discussed, I shall not say anything about that. Then I find "fuel in liquid form." I presume that means fuel oil?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That already bears a tax recently imposed in Ontario and this will be an additional tax.

Mr. RHODES: There is no tax in Ontario.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There must be something wrong, because I have been buying fuel oil and I have had to pay the tax. It was added to my last two bills for fuel oil in Ottawa.

Mr. RHODES: That was this tax.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, it is a tax by Ontario, supplemental, I imagine, to the tax on gasoline. However, I am not going to complain about that, because if we wish to have the luxury of using fuel oil we must pay for it. But I must object to the tax on food. Sago and tapioca are two very important items. Then we turn to the list where one-half the tax is imposed, or only three per cent, on such articles as boots and shoes, including rubber footwear. These are taxes which I believe the minister might very well have left alone. Then, there are several other items of canned vegetables, such as "vegetables, prepared; beans, baked or otherwise prepared; corn and tomatoes." These are foods used by the ordinary citizen. Instead of being taxed at only half the rate, as formerly, they are placed under the full rate. The list so dealt with is formidable. I should like to know from the minister if he would be good enough to have the list of articles printed in order that we may have it before us for ready reference. I am very grateful to him for what he has already done, but in order that we may know exactly what commodities are removed from the free list, particularly articles of food, and placed under the sales tax regulations, we should have the information before us. Again I protest vigorously against the tax on foodstuffs.

Mr. RHODES: The merit which may be attached to the principle underlying the stabilization fund, is one matter. I believe a discussion of that principle at this moment would not be advantageous. I mention the matter only in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton. Whether it be good or bad, such funds as may be necessary in consequence of its establishment are not taken out of revenue. They come out of unemployment relief funds. Although it may not be an important point, for the purpose of accuracy I believe I am justified in making the statement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I believe I have not understood the minister.

Mr. RHODES: Any money which is expended under the stabilization fund comes out of the unemployment relief vote, and not out of current revenue. Then, with reference to the list of commodities which have been taken out of the free list, the fact is that with a few unimportant exceptions most of the commodities were taxed up to and including the year 1926. Speaking from the standpoint of revenue, conditions to-day are far more necessitous than they were at that time. I make this reference to show that in this form of taxation we are not breaking new ground. Further, I could give a list of rather important commodities which were taxed in 1926, but which even under the necessitous conditions of to-day are not being taxed under the present proposals.

The request that a list be printed is in my judgment most reasonable, and I shall endeavour to see that some convenient form is arranged which will enable hon. gentlemen to have possession of the facts.

Mr. RALSTON: With the consent of the committee would it not serve the purpose if that information were inserted at this time in Hansard, without reading it. It would become part of the minister's budget speech.

Mr. RHODES: Is the hon. member referring to the list I have in my hand?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: If the committee is prepared to give unanimous consent, I shall give the file to Hansard. As a matter of strict procedure, however, I believe it is not competent for the committee to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: It may be put in as part of the budget.

Mr. RHODES: However, if the committee would give unanimous consent I am content that the list should be printed in Hansard. Perhaps this would be a good time to do so, because Wednesday is a short day, and we would not be unduly encumbering the record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Schedule V

Bibles;

Goods enumerated in customs tariff items 173, 364 and 460.

Mr. COOTE: What is contained in the list?

Mr. RHODES: It contains a résumé of the changes made in the sales tax, with respect to the budget.

Mr. NEILL: The minister mentioned something about the stabilization fund. It seems to me desirable that there should be some opportunity to discuss this matter. As the payments are going to be made out of relief moneys, it appears to me that unless the minister is kind enough to provide an opportunity, we will not have one.

Mr. RHODES: After we have concluded our several items in committee, and just before reporting, I should be perfectly content if by unanimous consent there should be a discussion in committee of the stabilization fund. In response to a word the right hon. leader of the opposition had with me to-day I made the suggestion that we might move the house into committee on Monday or Tuesday, thereby affording an opportunity. However, I agree with the view taken by the right hon. gentleman that perhaps we could have a better discussion in committee, when we would not be confined to a single speech. If that arrangement suits other hon. members I am content that such procedure should be followed.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): I wish to revert to the matter which has been raised by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). As hon. members may recall, the sales tax was discussed last year. If I remember correctly, the movement was initiated from a complaint made by the biscuit makers, who had been taxed three per cent. The cake and pie makers were not taxed. For that reason the biscuit makers felt they had suffered an injustice. A complaint was made, and as a result the whole matter came under consideration. To the chagrin of the biscuit makers, instead of the tax remaining at three per cent it was raised to six per cent. They are to-day feeling the pinch, the same as other manufacturers.

The minister has said that the greater part of the tax is paid by the larger manufacturers. Since Friday I have been approached by representatives from the three largest baking concerns in Toronto. They state that although they have paid the tax and have not made any objection that, as a matter of fact, it has not come out of earnings but, as one put it, has come out of capital account. As the other one said, "It is simply adding to our deficits, so that it is not coming out of earnings at all." While not objecting, the firms are paying the tax, and as a result a very large amount of money has been received by the treasury. They complain, however, that for their type of industry the tax is altogether too high. I believe they are correct. It is only necessary for us to follow the annual statements made by large bakery concerns in recent weeks or months to learn that in the majority of cases dividends have been passed not only on common stocks, but on preferred stocks and in some cases on debentures. That will show the condition of the baking industry. These men say that a tax of six per cent on the finished product is altogether too high, and the industry cannot stand it. I asked what their remedy would be, and I find it is the same as that put forward by smaller bakeries to which the Minister of Finance referred, that is that the tax should be placed upon the ingredients that are now taxable and not upon the finished product.

Now the industry to-day is not in good condition. These bakers tell me, not only the large ones but the small ones, that their greatest competition is that of the housewife who is doing her own baking. That is competition that they cannot possibly meet, it is a matter of necessity with these people, and that is where the great competition is. These small bakers are complaining that they are being forced into bankruptcy right and left. The larger bakers are finding difficulty. All that has been done this year by way of remedy as far as I can see—and it is not a remedy; I do not say that in any disrespect to the minister—is to add to the number who now pay the tax. Heretofore it was confined to those having a turnover of more than $5,000 a year; now that figure is reduced to $3,000. Those who under the new legislation enjoy exemption from the six per cent tax on ingredients are those who have a turnover of less than $3,000 a year; and two other classes concerned in the baking industry, namely the hotels who do their own baking of cakes and pastry, and the restaurants doing the same thing. They pay not on the finished product but simply on the taxable ingredients. The large bakers say they suffer from that competition and that it is an injustice to them. I have made strong representations to the minister, as strong as I could. I feel yet that he might give the question further consideration and grant to these bakers what they ask. They suggest that the government put the tax on the ingredients, that is ingredients now taxed, and if the government want to add to that list, say powdered milk or frozen eggs that enter into the manufacture of these products, they say the government would not only get all the revenue chargeable but would get it without cost and without irritation. At the present time the collection of this tax is causing a great deal of irritation among the baking fraternity. It seems unfair that that class should be unnecessarily irritated over a tax that they cannot possibly pay, because it is not coming out of revenue, it is coming out of capital or, as one individual said, it is adding to our deficit yearly. In the city of Toronto many of these smaller bakers are finding it impossible to pay this tax, large amounts of arrears have accumulated against them, and the department have found it necessary to give them some leeway. I have no doubt the minister knows it, at any rate it is true that they are accepting small weekly or monthly payments as the revenue of the concerns makes it possible to pay. In many cases even these instalments are not being paid. I know that one of the large concerns in Toronto is not paying the tax to-day because it cannot, yet it is threatened with action or penalty under the act. That is, action is taken in the exchequer court, judgment is filed against the firm and the sheriff put in if necessary. But I must give this credit to the Minister of National Revenue, that he has not pursued that course to the limit. He is extending leniency as I have just suggested, taking weekly or monthly payments.

I think the proper method would be to place that tax upon the ingredients. The department would get every cent of it because it would be collected at the source, everyone would pay, the housewife would pay, the bootlegger in the trade would pay, and it would not be necessary to have so many agents of the department out trying to collect the tax. I appeal to the minister to make a concession to these men. On Saturday they came to me in all earnestness and wanted to know whether the minister would give them a further appointment that they might discuss it with him again. I said I did not think it would be much use, that the representations had been made. But if the minister thinks his mind might be changed in that regard I would like him to give these men an opportunity to make the representation, because they feel that it is a great burden that they cannot possibly carry.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I try to exercise the virtue of patience. I have had three if not four deputations, taking a considerable time, presenting the views of the bakers of cakes and pies, and I can assure my hon. friend from Toronto-High Park (Mr. Anderson)—who has been most persistent in this matter; he has followed it up almost daily in the interests of those whom he seeks to serve,—that I can see no useful purpose in repeating ad nauseam representations which have already been made time and time again, especially by these very gentlemen in question. Of course if necessary and if time permits I will do the best I can to allow them to rake over the same straw they have raked over on previous occasions.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Can they not pass it on to the consumer?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that there is much that I can add to what was previously said in response to the query put to me in the first instance I think by my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), except to say this, and I say it with all respect to my hon. friend from Toronto-High Park and to the bakers, that when they say, put the tax upon the ingredients, they are just begging the question. The ingredients, now taxable, that go into cakes and pies are currants, raisins, peel, baking powder, flavourings, jams and yeast at the half rate. They represent a trivial fraction of the revenue which is involved in the sales tax. Of course if they say, tax all the ingredients, it means that they would like to put the sales tax on flour, salt, sugar, lard, eggs, milk, etc. We can fancy how popular that would be with the people. So I say to my hon. friend with all respect, and without desiring to say anything to which exception can be taken, that the suggestion to tax the ingredients in lieu of sales tax on these articles is simply begging the question.

I am advised by the Department of National Revenue that some of these small bakers are in arrears. But the sheriff has not been put in; they are being given reasonable latitude to enable them to pay their tax. I repeat briefly what I said a moment ago, that if this sales tax were removed to-morrow the small baker, as the small shopkeeper, would have the same difficulties they have now in conducting business in competition with the chain stores and the big establishments that have arisen in recent years. Their difficulties do not arise out of the sales tax.

Then my hon. friend says with respect to some of the larger manufacturers, who are paying their sales tax, many of them without complaint, that it is either a case of adding to their deficit or taking it from their capital. I may say that that is one of the regrettable features of taxation in many cases to-day. We are imposing income tax this year, as we have other years, not upon the income which the man receives in 1933, but the income which he had in 1932, and has spent. That income tax is being taken from people who to-day have not one cent of income. In one instance I was advised by letter that a man had to borrow the money by mortgaging his house. He may or may not have told the truth, but I know there are some extreme cases. I may say to my hon. friend that I have myself had the experience of paying income tax in one year on an income that had vanished, and I was obliged to go to the bank to borrow the money to enable me to pay the tax. But that experience is not new or unusual. If we could devise a form of taxation which could be applied by means of some instrument which we could place upon a man's head and by means of which we could tell exactly how much taxation he could pay, that might be an ideal method, but we cannot do that; we have to lay down taxation principles along some general lines, and the best designed form of taxation will cause hardship in individual cases; there is no question of that.

Then my hon. friend said he hoped we would reconsider this matter. I would give him the same reply I gave the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, who made a plea with regard to the sales tax on molasses. Without giving any undertaking I am quite content that the matter should be thought over further, but the committee will bear in mind that it involves no less than $1,350,000 of revenue, based upon the business of last year, which is a very considerable item.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Before the minister sits down may I ask him how it happens that these gentlemen are so generous that they make it a charge against their business? They have the privilege that is exercised by everyone else of passing it on to the consumer. Surely the competition of the housewife does not prevent them from doing that. I am rather glad to see an instance of this kind; it is the first that has come to my notice.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): In reply to that very suggestion may I say that the bakers tried that. The Consolidated Bakery Company tried it, but it only lasted a week; it could not be done.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For what reason?

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): I would ask the minister what was the reason for exempting the hotels and restaurants, who pay only on the ingredients. Why are they exempted? We have many large hotels such as the Chateau Laurier and the Royal York who do their own baking, and the bakers want to know why they should be exempted when the men who do nothing but baking are taxed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bakers want a monopoly of the business.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): No, they want to be on the same basis as the hotels and restaurants.

Mr. RHODES: I can hardly give a complete answer to my hon. friend at the moment, but I think the answer in a general way is comparatively simple. The hotel is not in competition with the baker; it cooks for its patrons. That is a recognized matter of hotel practice. I do not know that any other answer is necessary; they are not merchandizing cakes and pies, as are the bakers. You might as well say that we should walk into a house where the housewife is baking and apply the sales tax to the cake or pie in the oven.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): She is paying on the ingredients.

Mr. RHODES: And so is the hotel. That is a mere bagatelle.

Mr. COOTE: I have been much impressed with the statements of the Minister of Finance and I think we all should have a good deal of sympathy with him because of the deputations which he must receive in protest against these taxes. But the minister has brought it on himself.

Mr. RHODES: I am not complaining.

Mr. COOTE: I heartily agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for West Edmonton; I protest against the sugar tax and against the inclusion of all these articles under the sales tax. I want to point out to the minister what I think is a fact, that if he devoted his time and thought to the question of raising price levels in this country he could balance the budget without these drastic increases in taxation. I know some hon. members do not agree with that idea, but may I point again to the fact that Australia, which two years ago was in a worse position than Canada, balanced her budget largely through the rise in price levels. In Canada the commodity price level has dropped from 80 to 63 in the last two years, but in Australia it has remained at 80, and as a result the government of Australia is collecting more revenue, in proportion, than the government of Canada is collecting.

If the Minister of Finance will look back at the budget of 1928 he will find that the money collected that year would completely balance the budget this year, including the Canadian National deficit, the expenditures on unemployment relief and the advances to the provinces. If we could get back to anything like the 1928 price level the Canadian National deficit would not be so great, because there would be more traffic and the receipts would be greater and the expenditures for unemployment relief would not be so large, because the greater amount of money in circulation would provide more employment. I seriously recommend this suggestion to the Minister of Finance, and I hope that during the coming year he will give his attention to the problem of raising price levels. He can do it by means of a different money policy, and then we will be able to get rid of many of these taxes of which I am sure he does not approve.

One of the great difficulties in connection with a tax like that on sugar, as an illustration—and I hope I may be pardoned for referring to it because twice while it was under consideration I tried to make some remarks but did not have an opportunity to do so—is that the tax is proposed by men who do not realize what it may mean to the average family. I am sure the Minister of Finance and some of his officials do not realize that, because it is such a small item in their expenditure. To many thousands of families in Canada, however, it simply means that they will not be able to buy all the sugar they really need. Last year many families gathered wild fruit and put it down without sugar, hoping that when they came to use it they would be able to buy sugar. With the money they have at their disposal now they can buy only perhaps sixty per cent of the sugar they could have bought if this tax had not been imposed. I know this seems a small matter to many hon. members, and they get impatient when others protest, but I want to repeat that to thousands of families it means that they will not be able to purchase all the sugar they really should have. I say again that one trouble is that these taxes are imposed by men who do not realize what will be the effect on many consumers throughout Canada. I think it is absolute folly to impose a tax on buns, on self-rising flour and similar articles. Let us raise the general price level in Canada by 25 per cent; then we will be able to wipe out all the extra taxes imposed this year and the budget will be in much better shape than it is at present. I do not want to labour the point, but I think the minister would be far better employed if he devoted his time and attention to that question instead of bothering with such trivial matters as a tax on buns, self-rising flour, cakes and pies, cigarette papers and so on.

Before I sit down I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to the limitation of this tax to those producing goods to the value of more than $3,000 in a year. In deciding that question of production will the $3,000 include bread, in the case of big bakeries, or will that amount include only cakes, buns, pies and so on?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend said that if we had the 1928 price levels we would not require these new taxes, and that we would have a surplus. I hope he will think me neither facetious nor disrespectful if I say to him that the reply made on one celebrated occasion is, I think, strictly in point; I refer to that of the Irishman, who said that if he had the lakes of Killarney in Hades he could sell them for a shilling a glass. It is idle to say, "If we had the price levels of 1928." That is obvious, and if my hon. friend is serious when he suggests to me that I had better address myself to the raising of price levels, I thank him deeply for the compliment because, if I could do that, I should be worthy of a place in history along with Atlas. I say that in the kindliest spirit and without the slightest intention of making a remark to which the hon. gentleman could take exception. I submit, however, that the reply is absolutely in keeping with the nature of the suggestion. I must take exception not only to what my hon. friend has said but to his attitude in saying it. He says that the men who make up these taxes do not realize what taxes mean. I do not know whether he thinks that we dwell in a world apart. I had the idea that I occupied a common Canadian citizenship along with other members of the house.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister permit me to correct him? I was referring to the thousands of families who have to pay the tax.

Mr. RHODES: I will not yield to my hon. friend from Macleod in asserting my sympathy with the people. I say to him that my human sympathies, my desire to be of service to the people of Canada, my knowledge of conditions in Canada and of the homes and lives of the people are just as complete as his own.

Mr. COOTE: I never suggested anything to the contrary regarding the minister's attitude to the public; not at all.

Mr. RHODES: That is the reply I feel bound to make to the hon. gentleman's suggestion that he has a superior knowledge of conditions in the country, that we are looking at those conditions from a different plane from himself. Let me say to him that I know the homes of the people of this country, the common people. I sprang from them myself and I do not like the imputation from the hon. gentleman that these taxes are harshly imposed by those who have neither a knowledge of conditions nor any care about them. I do not mind telling my hon. friend that during the time I have been a public servant, and one with some experience, I have had to do many distasteful things, and nothing has been personally so distasteful to me as to be associated with many forms of taxation which we are called upon to impose at the present time. But I regard my personal feelings as something that must be submerged into what I conceive, either rightly or wrongly, to be that which is for the common good of the country. In imposing these taxes, harsh though they may be, I have in mind the welfare of those for whom the hon. member for Macleod professes to speak. I have in mind their welfare just as much as that of any individual anywhere in the whole farflung breadth of Canada.

My hon. friend asked a question as to whether the deadline of $3,000 with respect to bakers was applicable to their whole business, including bread, or only to bakers' cakes and pies. The computation is based entirely on that portion of their business which consists of cakes and pies.

Mr. COOTE: I did not intend for a moment to suggest that the minister had no concern about the hardship which taxation would impose upon the people. I do not want the committee to misunderstand what I had in mind. I was suggesting that men who are sitting in Ottawa, engrossed in this very difficult task of trying to balance the budget, were not in my opinion as closely in touch with certain classes in the country who are finding it hard to carry on as those of us who have to return to our constituencies and there see exactly the problems which the people have to face for six or eight months of the year. I did not wish to insinuate that the minister did not care as much about the welfare of the people as I do, or is not just as much a humanitarian as I am. Certainly I do not want to create that impression. I must say however that the minister was not quite fair to me when he suggested that it was as difficult to raise price levels in this country as to transplant the lakes of Killarney to the region he spoke about. I cited Australia, and again I would point out that the price level there has stood approximately at eighty during the last two years, while in that period it has fallen in Canada from eighty to sixty-three. If the minister does not wish to reply to that point, it is quite all right; but I do not think he should suggest that it is impossible now to do anything about raising price levels in this country. And I think he will agree that if price levels were raised the receipts of the government through ordinary channels of taxation would also increase.

Mr. RALSTON: The thing we object to, and the thing I feel sure the minister finds most distasteful, is the fact which has been mentioned by one or two members of the committee, that two large classes of commodities are now being removed from the list of exemptions from the sales tax, namely, implements of production—at least a large number of implements of production—and the necessaries of life. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that many, perhaps quite a number, of these articles were taxable up to 1926—I have not had an opportunity to compare the records. He mentioned that date, I presume, as the date when they were taken off.

Mr. RHODES: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: I would remind him, if I remember rightly, that they were also taxable in 1921. In other words, I think they were put on when the original Special War Revenue Act was passed, or very soon after the war. They were on in 1921 and in 1926 they were removed from the taxable class, and we had hoped that we should not find it necessary once more to tax these two particular classes of goods. In the list of implements of production I find spraying materials, materials used for disinfecting, electrical power machinery for farm uses, mining machinery, shovels and spades, and as regards the necessaries of life there appear in the list oatmeal, rolled oats, cornmeal, barley, split peas, rice, molasses, sago and tapioca, canned vegetables and fruit, boots, shoes and rubbers. We are sorry to see these things again taxable. Assuming that my hon. friend finds it necessary to impose further taxation—let us leave aside for the moment the reasons—may I ask whether he has considered the possibility of leaving goods of this description non-taxable and increasing if necessary taxation in connection with goods that might be regarded either as luxuries or as less necessary than these.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has misunderstood the reference to the sales tax on spraying materials. The situation remains precisely the same as it was prior to this budget, except that we have taken out those processed and fancy commodities which in many instances sell at prices out of all proportion to the ingredients used—disinfectants for spraying, such as household insecticides, and that sort of thing; the range is comparatively small. But spraying materials used in agriculture are not subject to the tax at all. My hon. friend will find on careful analysis that, with the exception of some items, the items which we tax to-day are those which were taxed in 1926.

Mr. RALSTON: And 1921 too.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. I mention 1926 for no special purpose except that it was the last year during which the tax was imposed.

Mr. RALSTON: And the year it was taken off.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; I mentioned it for no political reason. I was not suggesting any political significance. I just desired to indicate that as recently as that this tax had been imposed. Earlier in the afternoon I stated that the necessities of the treasury are greater to-day than they were at that time. Even as we have the list in the schedule to-day we still do not tax the number of commodities which were taxed under the sales tax as it was applicable from 1921 to 1926 inclusive. I might say to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth that I was rather surprised to find that canned fish was subject to the sales tax during that period. It is exempted under the present proposal.

Mr. RALSTON: I think it was under the original act.

Mr. RHODES: Parts of farm tools, such as reaping hooks, rakes, et cetera, were subject to the sales tax at that time while they are not to-day. Split fence posts are also in the same category. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni will be surprised to know that sinkers and floats, including trawlkegs for use in the fisheries were subject to sales tax at that time; they are not to-day. Phonograph records for educational purposes and fox feed were also subject to the sales tax at that time; they are not to-day.

Mr. RALSTON: Gopher poison.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, the ingredients for use exclusively in the manufacture of gopher poison. Apples, dried, desiccated and evaporated; hospital supplies and materials; these were all subject to the sales tax during that period while they are exempted to-day. Despite all the necessities of the case, these articles remain exempted in the list which is now submitted. I mention this only to impress upon hon. friends the necessity of considering this matter from all angles and to ask them to bear in mind the list of articles to which I have just referred. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has just returned to the chamber and I am reminded of a question he asked and which I inadvertently failed to answer. I know his absence was necessary because he happens to be the chief whip of the opposition. The articles which we have included in the list to be subject to the sales tax and which have been exempt since 1926 will, according to the best estimate which can be made by the officials of the Department of National Revenue, yield $13,000,000 per year in revenue even under existing conditions.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to paragraphs 5 and 7 of this resolution. Ordinarily I do not attempt to defend corporations but I would like to point out to the minister, as I have done already in private, what I regard to be as an injustice in the present enactment. Under the present proposals the $2,000 exemption which applied previously to corporations has been abolished. Last session the family corporation was abolished and this year the rate of taxation on private corporations has been increased to twelve and one half per cent. I am making no complaint of the principle of income tax or as to the tax as it applies to corporations, because, as I said last night, I appreciate fully the difficulty faced by the minister in raising revenue. When the minister answers me, as I believe he will, I am quite sure he will give as a reason for doing what I am complaining about the fact that he needs the money. I admit that that is a strong argument but I submit to him and to the committee that in the raising of money by way of taxation whether it be by income or any other sort of tax, some regard should be given to the principle that there should be no discrimination as between persons of the same class. The minister has wiped out the exemption of $2,000 for corporations. I have no complaint to make of that action so far as large corporations are concerned, but I want to point out that in the case of small companies which are in effect the property of one man or of one family, the present legislation practically doubles the income tax. I should like to give the committee a few figures. A corporation which makes a profit of $5,000—I think every hon. member will agree that that is not very much—will pay an income tax of $713.75 under the present proposal. I think my calculation is correct. A private person operating a similar business and making a similar profit will pay an income tax of $126. I claim that the difference is entirely too great. The man who chooses to operate his business as a corporation must pay over $700 in income tax on a profit of $5,000, whereas his competitor who is operating his business as a private concern will pay an income tax of only $126 on the same amount of profit. It seems to me that such a difference is entirely inequitable and unfair. The only result of this legislation will be that the small corporations will give up their charters and revert to ordinary partnerships or single proprietorships. If a man finds it convenient to operate his little business as a joint stock company, there is no reason why the tax should be so great. Where the annual profit is $10,000, the corporation pays a tax of $1,667.38, whereas the private concern pays a tax of only $546. I could continue my calculations but I do not propose to do so. I make no plea for the large corporation but it seems to me that my argument is sound as far as the small corporations making a profit of as low as $5,000 are concerned. The one is paying between five and six times as much income tax as the other.

I would also like to point this out to the minister: by reason of wiping out this exemption and reducing the rate, in the case of the small corporation that is making only $5,000 a year, you are under the present proposal practically doubling his tax as compared with that the man would have paid on $5,000 last year. I am not objecting to an income tax; let those pay who can. What I am objecting to is the difference and discrimination existing as between these various businesses, and against the one that is run as a little corporation for its own purposes, its own convenience, and it is entitled to run it in that way; the law provides for that. I do not see why there should be such a tremendous increase in the income tax of a man carrying on business in that way.

Mr. RHODES: May I at once thank my hon. friend for his courtesy in discussing this matter with me personally the other day in my office and for leaving with me the figures, some of which he has just mentioned. He takes the case of a man who has an income of $5,000 and who, if he were taxable as an individual, assuming he was a married man with an exemption of $2,000, would pay an income tax of $120. The figure that my hon. friend submitted was, I think, $126.

Mr. EULER: I added the surtax.

Mr. RHODES: The tax is $120. If the same man were an incorporated company with an income of $5,000, according to the figure as submitted by my hon. friend the tax would be $713.75. That is correct, but my hon. friend has overlooked the fact that the man with the income of $5,000, when he pays his income tax, receives his exemption. If he becomes incorporated, as in the instance prepared by my hon. friend, he has no provision in that to pay his own salary; he has worked for nothing.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. RHODES: Then my hon. friend is not comparing comparable things. He has given the case of an income of $5,000 obtained by an individual and that of an income of $5,000 obtained by an individual who has become an incorporated company. In the one case he is giving the instance of a married man with an exemption of $2,000 and in the other that of a company which has a straight income of $5,000—

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. RHODES: —but in that case the man has to pay himself a reasonable salary as manager of the business which he owns himself. If he does that, he will find that he is in precisely the same position as the individual with the married man's exemption. That is the fact. But let me point this out to my hon. friend, and I take no exception to his remarks: he is making a plea confined to a restricted number of individuals. He is taking the case of a man who becomes an incorporated company. The number of instances of that character would be negligible, but even if it were not, the situation would be met by the man receiving a reasonable salary and the income tax officials advise me that a reasonable, fair salary would, in those circumstances, be allowed. Otherwise, why incorporate? While my hon. friend, and quite properly, is making his plea with respect to this restricted class of companies, he must bear in mind that at the same time we are dealing with thousands of companies who, by reason of the exemption of $2,000 being removed, will pay an additional income tax and this means a substantial sum in revenue. Even if the injustice, which I do not admit, were apparent in the case instanced by my hon. friend, he must look at the picture in the large and realize that we are dealing with all companies in Canada; that they are all treated alike, that the $2,000 exemption is obliterated in every case, and lastly, and what is very important from my point of view at least as Minister of Finance, this involves a considerable increase in the revenue derivable under the income tax.

Mr. EULER: I cannot let the minister get by with the statement that the matter of salary—and perhaps his officials have so said, and I make that remark without any offence—must be considered. The matter of salary does not appreciably affect the picture that I have drawn. In the figure I gave, there was $5,000 profit in each case and I took it for granted that in each case the business had paid a salary. Supposing the salary is $3,000 a year; all you need to do in each of those cases is to add to the man's income for taxation purposes that $3,000 and the picture will not be appreciably changed at all. You cannot get away from the fact that that $5,000 for the little joint stock company is immediately subjected to a tax of 12½ per cent, or $625, which is far greater than that borne by the single proprietor. I am not making a plea for the big corporation because, the larger the profits, the less is the discrimination. I am speaking only on behalf of the smaller one and I deliberately took the figure of $5,000, as a modest figure, to show what a tremendous discrimination there was. I would ask the minister to have it figured out. The matter of a reasonable salary in both cases, say $3,000 if you like, will not greatly alter the tremendous discrimination that exists in the two instances.

The minister has made a point of the fact that he is quite consistent; that you must look at the larger picture; that this applies to big corporations. That is quite true; I am in favour of that. He also says that this means a considerable sum of money in revenue. That is very good; he needs it. But I would like to point out to him the very thing he did in a sales tax item under discussion not so long ago when he made an exemption in favour of the small baker. Even last year the small producer of cakes, pies and so on was exempted. I think in this case he will find his own argument turned against him. This year he gives an exemption to the baker who does a business of under $3,000 a year, saying that he is passing the tax on to the higher one. Should he not make the same concession to the little fellow who happens to be conducting his business as a joint stock company? As I say and as I am sure his officials will tell him, when he takes the big corporations with large profits, if there are any to-day that have large profits, he will find this difference very largely disappears or at least is not nearly as great, but it is very formidable and trying to the small chap who is endeavouring to run his little business as a joint stock company for quite legitimate reasons and not with the purpose of making tremendous profits. I would like the committee to bear that figure in mind—and I am allowing for salary paid in both cases—that the tax to the man who is running his business as a joint stock company and who earns $5,000 profit, is over $700, while to the man who is running his business as a single proprietor, the tax is $120. The difference is entirely too great; it is unfair, inequitable, and I think some change should be made to afford some relief.

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the third report of the select standing committee on standing orders and moved concurrence in the second report of the committee.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): This motion involves concurrence in the report of a committee, which permits certain bills to be considered at this stage of the session. I merely rise to say that the government cannot give any approval to this course of action being pursued with respect to at least one of the bills which might involve rather lengthy discussion. We will not oppose adoption of the motion, but there is no assurance that the legislation can possibly be considered at this session.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—WAGES

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house the return asked for by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) in regard to wage scales and agreements between the Canadian National Railways and their employees. I wish to state that I am laying on the table of the house everything that the railways agree might be given. It is not a complete return of the information as called for, but it contains everything that could be presented in justice to the public interest.

RADIO BROADCASTING

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house certain amendments to the radio regulations from Nos. 20 to 30 inclusive.

BRIGHT FAN

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I have also to lay upon the table certain information received with respect to the insurance which was effected on the ss. Bright Fan. A few days ago the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) asked for this information. Upon the previous occasion I stated from memory that I had received the information from the insurance company. I shall have to rectify that by stating that the information was received by the owners of the ship.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 84, to amend the Judges Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DUPRE: The object of the amendment is to add a subsection to section 28 of the Judges Act, which is chapter 105 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. The purpose of the change is to provide that any judge of a superior court of any province or the Yukon territory who continues or is continued in office after attaining the age of 75 shall suffer a reduction in salary to an amount equal to that which he would receive by way of retiring allowance, if he were retired at 75, less any sum which he may receive from the provincial government by way of additional remuneration. The new salary rate will commence when the judge attained or attains the age of seventy-five years, or on the first day of July, 1933, whichever is later. In the case of a judge who would not be entitled to a retiring allowance if retired at the age of seventy-five, the operation of the act will be postponed until he is eligible for a retiring allowance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RADIO ANNOUNCERS—QUEBEC

Mr. JEAN:

1. Who are the official or temporary announcers of the federal radio commission in the province of Quebec?
2. What is their nationality?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member is dropping this question?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I gave the hon. gentleman certain explanations and he is willing to have the question dropped.

Question dropped.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ADVANCES TO BANKS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What were the annual advances to the chartered banks and savings banks under the Finance Act from August 22, 1914, to March 30, 1933?
2. What was the rate of interest charged?
3. What was the aggregate amount of interest received by the government on these advances?
4. What were the total advances during the aforesaid period to each bank unit?

[Mr. Dupré.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) based on a long letter which I have received. The question is this: Have the Canadian National Railways sold to a private company a franchise to erect and maintain illuminated and other outdoor advertising signs on the Canadian National right of way across Canada?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to tell me he was going to ask this question, and I think one or two other hon. members of the house are interested as well, notably the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who said he was going to ask a question along this line.

In brief the facts are that the management and directors of the Canadian National Railways have entered into an agreement with a Montreal company—I think McArthur-Irwin is the name—not to erect signs across the entire right of way, as the hon. member suggests, but to place advertising signs on their bridges, under proper conditions. I am informed by the management and by the directors that this should bring in a reasonably good income which has not been enjoyed by any railway in Canada previously. I may add quite frankly that I entirely agree that this is a wise step to take, particularly in view of present financial conditions.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): May I ask the minister if he is aware of the fact that last year the province of Quebec passed legislation forbidding the placing of advertising signs along either side of the highway even on private property?

Mr. MANION: I was not aware of that fact, but I do not know what bearing it would have on this matter. I understand that the agreement relates only to bridges, and of course that advertising would have to be within the laws of the various provinces. I am informed that the agreement amply protects the railway company in every possible way, so there is no danger of any conflict with provincial laws.

Mr. MARCIL: Is that an exclusive contract, or is it open to other companies as well?

Mr. MANION: I understand that it is an exclusive contract. I do not think it could be anything else, as a matter of fact.

Mr. HOWARD: I think the minister missed the point I was trying to make. He is practically permitting the Canadian National Railways to do something that other companies cannot do with regard to the highways.

Mr. MANION: We are not permitting the Canadian National to do anything; the Canadian National itself has entered into the contract, and I assume this company, like any other corporation, will have to remain within the laws of the provinces. The contract was drawn up by the lawyers of the Canadian National, and I assume they took into account whatever laws might affect this advertising.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) directed a question to me; he wished to know what applications for hearings had been received by the tariff board from Canadian and British firms. Upon inquiry I find that my predecessor, the late Mr. Robb, took the position with respect to similar requests when the former tariff board was in existence that to give this information in the ordinary course was not in the public interest. That practice obtained during the existence of the former board. I must say that I think that position was quite sound, and it is the intention of the present administration to follow the same practice, so that any information which is desired will come from time to time as and when the hearings take place before the board.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): As I recollect it, Mr. Speaker, the former practice was to advertise these hearings so that all interested could be heard if they so desired.

Mr. RHODES: The same practice will obtain with respect to the new board, as I understand it, but my hon. friend must realize that the board is only starting its work.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I might remind the minister that when he answered my question yesterday he said he would let the house have the information today.

Mr. RHODES: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; here is what I said:

> Obviously I will have to ask that my hon. friend's question stand as a notice, and I will give an answer to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I promised yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that I would advise the house as to whether or not it was the intention of the government to proceed with the redistribution bill. It is proposed to proceed with that bill at once. The other bills on the order paper will be proceeded with also, with the possible exception of the bill dealing with admiralty courts, which may not be proceeded with this session in view of the fact that the shipping bill is not being pressed. The arrangement made in 1926, 1929 and 1930 with respect to shipping contemplated uniform bills throughout the British Empire. It was felt that when the statute of Westminster was passed and admiralty courts acts were adopted by the various dominions we would have a fair measure of uniformity having regard to the different conditions existing in the various dominions, but the shipping acts themselves, modelled on the Merchant Shipping Act, would be similar for reasons that I fancy I need not state in this house.

That was the view taken at the Imperial conference in 1926, and again in 1929 and 1930. Inasmuch as there has been no legislation of that character passed as yet by the other dominions the matter is further under consideration; the shipping bill is not being proceeded with and a further opportunity will be given to study the various provisions of our act and other acts that may be drafted by the other dominions in order that we may carry out the understanding agreed upon at the imperial conferences and the drafting committee conference in 1929. The Admiralty Court Act, therefore, following on that, will not be passed. The other bills on the order paper will be proceeded with whenever the opportunity offers. There is one other matter, namely, a short bill to grant the governor in council power to extend the duration of the New Zealand treaty beyond the 24th day of May of this year, when it expires. There is the French trade agreement, if an agreement is submitted to the house to be dealt with, and there is an amendment to the Excise Act which cannot be submitted until after the budget provisions have been entirely adopted, because they contain administrative machinery dealing with legislation that has been and will be considered by the house with respect to the budget. At the moment, after conferring with my colleagues, I do not think there is any other legislation except an amendment to the Tariff Board Act—a short amendment—which will not give my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) any work. There is the Coastal Shipping Act, which is now in the Senate and which will be brought down to this chamber, and there is also an amendment to the Insurance Act, in connection with certain investments, which by accident was left out of the bill last year. That Senator Beaubien has in the Senate and it will be submitted to this chamber in due course. I think there are some other private bills in the Senate, but apart from what I have mentioned there is no new legislation contemplated. The Soldier Settlement bill is on the order paper. The redistribution schedules will be completed as early as possible, and if unfortunately agreement cannot be arrived at in the committee, the committee will report the bill to the house and we shall have to endeavour to arrive at some conclusions with respect to legislation.

I may say that I have placed on the order paper for Monday next a notice suggesting that the house meet on Tuesday at eleven o'clock, but that is entirely in the hands of the house; whatever the house may desire in that regard, we shall be glad to accommodate our views thereto. It is also contemplated that the house shall sit on Wednesday evening next.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it the intention to bring in some amendments to the Shipping Act with respect to coastal trade?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I mentioned. That bill is now in the Senate.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does the Prime Minister intend to proceed with Bill No. 26, to amend the Exchequer Court Act? The reason I ask that question is that the Minister of Justice, before leaving, had intimated to me that it was not the intention to proceed with that bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Minister of Justice gave me to understand that he had indicated that it was not thought desirable to proceed with the Admiralty Court bill. I spoke to my colleague to-day and asked him to call the bill for committee for the purpose of hearing what observations the former Minister of Justice had to make on the matter, and we would then determine what action should be taken. If the Minister of Justice indicated that we would not proceed with it, we will certainly carry out the undertaking he gave.

COAL INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I have a question to ask the Minister of Labour with regard to the report of the registrar appointed under the Combines Investigation Act with respect to the inquiry into importation and distribution of British anthracite coal. Yesterday the minister made some remark touching this question, and according to Hansard he said that the report was not to be made public; yet I find in yesterday's press, in the Toronto Globe of yesterday—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member proceed with his question?

Mr. SANDERSON: I am about to state it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must not read from newspapers.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have not read anything, but in the Toronto Globe, in great headlines, it is reported that importers—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SANDERSON: —are using the duty to overcharge users of British fuel, and then it mentions an hon. member of the other house, the salary he has been getting—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: To ask a question it is not necessary to retail to the house what appears in newspapers.

Mr. SANDERSON: I must frame my question, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect to you, sir, I submit that if you will give me a moment I will put the question. My question is this: If the press of Canada can get part of the details of the registrar's report, is not that report to be had by members of parliament? If it is to be semi-public we might as well make it public. I would ask the Minister of Labour whether the members of this house have a right to see the report.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I do not think I can usefully add anything to what I said yesterday. I understand that there were comments in the press with respect to what was thought to be in the registrar's report. The press very frequently hazards opinions about what is contained in documents, about what governments intend to do, as well as about the intentions of individuals. I am not stating whether what appears in the press is in the report or not. Certainly I am not going to attempt to control or direct what the press may or may not say, but I feel confident that the practice and procedure outlined yesterday is the one that has been adhered to in the past. I believe it to be a sound practice, and with respect to this report it will be followed. I am dispatching the report, the evidence and the exhibits to the proper attorneys general for attention.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Unless we grant interim supply, Mr. Speaker, hardship will result to a certain number of civil servants and more particularly to those returned soldiers who are in receipt of hospital treatment. I would therefore ask the unanimous consent of the house for the passage of a supply bill granting one-twelfth of supply. I move that you do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $16,220,422.36, being one-twelfth of the amount to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1934, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1934.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. RHODES moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1934, the sum of $16,220,422.36 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 83, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1934.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Friday, April 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway system and for other purposes—Mr. Manion—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 6, subsection 1.—Vacancies.

The CHAIRMAN: There was an amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: To strike out all the words after the word "occurring" in the fourteenth line.

Mr. MANION: The amendment would wipe out the panel idea.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we are all for that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is the amendment acceptable to the minister?

Mr. BENNETT: Is it desirable that future appointments should be in the hands of the political party which happens to be in power at the moment?

Mr. EULER: Certainly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should not the same theory be applied to the first appointments?

Mr. BENNETT: It has been the custom to commence these institutions or commissions by appointments made by the government of the day. That involves the government being censured for the appointments which may be made and criticisms may be offered so as to destroy public confidence in the body. If we desire to assure ourselves that political considerations will be eliminated, the panel system offers the only method. Should a vacancy occur it is contemplated that the remaining trustees along with the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and the president of the exchequer court shall prepare a list from which the appointments would be made. It seems to me that that is as far as you can hope to get if there is an earnest desire to eliminate purely political factors. I think the view of those who are responsible was that if we could we would remove temptation which might arise from the desire of those who felt they had claims upon the government to have such claims recognized by appointment to such a position as this. It is true that the government has a majority but if a substantial body of this committee is of the opinion that the panel system as indicated in this bill is not desirable, we are not concerned about it. However, I want to put it fairly to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that my right hon. friend has used a phrase which hardly describes the situation accurately. He asks whether it is desirable to have future appointments made by a political party. I submit that what he should have asked was whether it was desired to have future appointments made by the government of the day. It is the government and not political parties that makes appointments and the government of the day is the one body to which the people have a right to look for appointments. What the complexion of the government of the day may be rests entirely with the people of the country and it seems to me that their voices should be heeded in these matters. I must say that I think it is a very unfair reflection for the Prime Minister to make when he assumes that when any political party comes into office its members are not going to be actuated by motives quite as high as those which have actuated the government of which he himself is the head. I said the other day quite frankly that we all agreed with the Prime Minister in his view that it was difficult enough to obtain for those high positions men who were equal to the task and that if such persons were secured any government, it seemed to me, would be only too pleased to retain them in office; there would not be any desire to change them. I think that is quite true. I say to my right hon. friend that I believe we might well agree that all governments will be actuated by motives equally honourable, that the obligation upon one government should be just the same as upon another, and that full responsibility should go with office in the matter either of retaining those who may in part be administering the nation's affairs or in replacing them. The government cannot free itself from that responsibility, and the only way in which it can properly be held responsible is by leaving it free to act as it thinks best.

As regards this panel, I do not think it amounts to anything; it is a mere sham, a mere pretence and for that reason it is worse than nothing. No one will believe that appointments are being made as a result of a non-political panel when those who are filling the offices that are named as those of the persons to select the panel, have all been appointees of one political party. Apart from that altogether, I submit that the president of the exchequer court, however able he may be, does not begin to have the same knowledge of the persons best equipped for the position of trustee of railway, that members of a government have. I do not see why a government should give to some group, inferior to itself, the responsibility of making what perhaps would be the most important of all the appointments to be made. I would ask that, so far as possible, the fundamental principle of ministerial responsibility be observed in these appointments.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman realizes that by his observations in the last part of his speech he contradicted the first part of it and he used exact words in contradiction. He said that appointees were the appointees of the government; then he said that the two, who would have to be half of the four, are appointees of one political party. Which does he mean? The first or the last? If he means the first, then he separates the government from a political party. If he means the last, he and I are wholly in agreement. He said that he thought I was reflecting upon the honourable capacity of governments to make selections. I was pointing out that governments selected those who generally supported their political party. The words he used were that the two would be appointees of one political party and that they would select as additions to the board men who were in accord with their party. It was in order to prevent that, if possible, that this provision was inserted. It is in order to provide that by the joint selection of four men a panel might be prepared that would not necessarily be merely the selections of one political party. It is always well to discuss practical matters in a practical way. I could cite as an outstanding illustration of what I mean the commission that constructed the National Transcontinental. It was a political commission.

Mr. MALCOLM: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is what I am trying to point out, and the results that followed are reviewed in the Gutelius report. I am only pointing out that there is no desire to avoid ministerial or governmental responsibility, but if there is a wish on the part of the house that we should have a panel of names that commended themselves to four persons, from which panel the government might make a selection—and the house may reconstitute the method of selection in any way it pleases—to escape the evils that have followed from purely political appointments, we should adopt the course I suggest. Who will say that this country has not had too long an experience of the political type of appointees that built the National Transcontinental? No man, free from political bias, who will just look at the facts, the classifications that were approved and the costs involved, will say that that is not so? It follows in the necessary sequence of things that would be so. It was to avoid such a situation that this suggestion was made. If this committee this afternoon is of opinion that an effort should not be made to divorce from politics, if possible, the class from which selection should be made, by limiting it to persons approved by a body consisting of the two trustees, for instance, who would remain, and the gentlemen named, well and good. Certainly neither I nor the government desire to press it upon the committee or the house. We only wish to carry out the purpose which was in the mind of the commission when they made their report in which they said that members of parliament should not be eligible, and which aim was to divorce the administration of the system from politics, and to say that the government must assume responsibility for all the acts of the board is to beg the question, because the hope was and is that a body will be created that will discharge all the functions of a board of directors free from control or restraint so far as governments are concerned and conduct the business of an enterprise that means so much to this country as though it were a private undertaking, with the benefits that would accrue from the exercise of the best business judgment they have in dealing with the problems before them. That is the reason the provision was inserted in the bill with regard to members of parliament, senators, etcetera. It has not been unusual in all parliaments to provide by legislation for the exclusion of certain classes from appointments to certain offices. It may not be generally known, but there was once in Great Britain a statute that all lawyers were excluded from the House of Commons. It may be interesting to some hon. members to know that it was discovered in a very short time that parliament could not get along without lawyers. I mention that merely as an illustration. There have been other restrictions of a similar character.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The ignoramus parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly the name by which it was known. Although the government has a majority with which to carry out its will with respect to this matter, we shall keep faith with the principle on which we brought this bill into the house, and if it is the wish of the opposition that the panel provision be eliminated, we shall not waste time in trying to force it through.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the Prime Minister that his argument, if it carries any weight at all, is equally applicable to the first appointments; I do not think that can be denied. I think he should be chivalrous enough to concede to his political opponents a desire to be just as fair in making these great appointments as would be the members of any other government. He has cited former commissions, I am not going to take up the time of the committee in saying what might be said on all sides of the question, but there have been commissions appointed by his political opponents that commended themselves even to my right hon. friend, for example, the board of grain commissioners who were appointed by the late Liberal administration. Hon. gentlemen opposite have retained them in office because they found that they were acting impartially and fairly. Without question one of the strongest influences to compel those likewise situated so to do would be the thought that they would wish to commend themselves to the successors of the government that might at the moment be in office as well as to the government in office.

I mentioned the other day the International Joint Commission. There again hon. gentlemen opposite had made appointments that might be regarded as very strong from the point of view of political partisanship, if you wish to term it such. One of the gentlemen appointed had been Conservative premier of his province, but he received that appointment to the commission and he was retained in that office during all the time the Liberal administration was in power. Another member of that commission who was retained throughout by the Liberal administration had been a Conservative member of this House of Commons.

The same thing is true of judges. Over and over again it had been said that judges when they assume office on the bench give up their partisan politics, although they may not altogether change their personal feelings.

Reference has been made this afternoon to what was termed an ignoramus parliament. I do not see why we should constitute ourselves an ignoramus parliament at the instance of the commissioners who have made this recommendation. I do not like any commission appointed by a government to say that the government of the day is not capable of honourable action with respect to the discharge of public affairs. That is my strongest objection, to this provision proposed, I do submit that the government ought not to try to have it both ways. Either make this panel, if it amounts to anything and signifies anything, applicable at once to immediate appointments, or if it is not of so much significance, allow to all subequent ministries with respect to the filling of vacancies the same authority and responsibility that the ministry is taking to itself at the moment.

Mr. EULER: As I have said before, if this provision of a panel for the selection of trustees ensured to any reasonable extent that politics would be eliminated in the appointment of these trustees, I would be disposed to favour it, but the objection I made previously to that clause as it stands was this, that while it does provide for a panel of eight for the filling of subsequent vacancies, the original appointments are made by the government itself, and so I think these two provisions are entirely inconsistent with each other. If the government would so alter the bill that the selections of the original trustee board would also be made from a properly constituted panel, I for one would be inclined to favour it. I know that that conflicts perhaps with the opinion of my leader in that there is not government responsibility there, but there would still be left a reasonable measure of government responsibility because after all from the panel of eight the appointments must be made by the government itself, and to that extent at least there is government responsibility. But I admit that I would go some little distance even at the sacrifice of what might be called government responsibility if thereby we could ensure that there would be very little of political influence or political patronage in the selection of that board of trustees, but I do submit that the two provisions, the first appointments by the government and future appointments from a panel, are entirely inconsistent with each other. If the government so desired to have it, and I am not accusing them of that, the first board might be an entirely political board if the government makes the first selections, and I submit that now is the time if ever that the management of the Canadian National Railways should be as free from political influence as it is possible to have it, because the railway is in the most critical period of its history. So I would say if it is not possible to amend the clause so that we may have non-political appointments from the beginning, I would just as soon have that provision wiped out altogether and let the government take the responsibility. But if the government can provide for a non-political panel right from the outset I would be inclined to support that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In view of the concluding remarks of the Prime Minister and in view of the arguments which have been advanced by the right hon. leader of the opposition, I should like to say that I think there is a very substantial body of public opinion on this side of the house as well as on the other side which, having regard to the doctrine of ministerial responsibility and the manner in which the first trustees are to be appointed, is of the view that the panel system should not be included in this bill. I have no doubt in the world that the government will be held responsible for the success or lack of success of the principles underlying this bill. Hon. gentlemen opposite will see to that if the legislation fails, and hon. gentlemen on this side of the house, if it succeeds, will claim any merit there is in it. That being the case, and human nature being what it is, I strongly suggest to the Minister of Railways that if he has evidence that there is a substantial body of opinion in this house that the panel system should be eliminated, it be eliminated forthwith.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In support of what my hon. friend from North Waterloo has said, may I say that if these trustees are going to have such an important office as has been represented, and I believe they are, I do not agree that the government should select the appointees from among the men who according to the Prime Minister would offer their services as having been good supporters of the party in power. I think that for an office of this kind conscription rather than voluntary service would be the best system. The government should go after the best men available for the office, and how can that be done by means of a panel system? How can the Exchequer court judge or the president of the railway commission properly go and ask men to accept the office who according to their own view would be the best qualified to administer the Canadian National Railways? How could they go after those fellows and ask them whether they would accept the office or not? They would have to form a panel of the persons who would be best qualified according to their views, but how would they know whether those persons would accept the office? My own experience is that for an office of this kind the minister who is responsible and his colleagues are seeking out the man who would accept, and I think that is the best way. Even in the appointment of the board of trustees we should maintain ministerial responsibility, and not entrust the task of forming a panel to those gentlemen who will merely put names down without knowing if the men will be available for the office or not.

Mr. MALCOLM: I should like to say that I appreciate very much the attitude of the Prime Minister in dealing with clause 7, in leaving the question of a panel or ministerial responsibility to the judgment of the house. I thoroughly agree with the remarks made by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, but I should like to submit to the members of the committee that there are worse kinds of patronage than political patronage. Very often there exists a good deal of executive patronage within organizations, which is harder to deal with than political patronage. If an executive is appointed with any feeling of entire independence of the government of the day, I do not think that such a relationship is desirable. I believe that whoever is appointed, if appointed by the government in power, will be the very best selection that can be made from the material available. I believe with my leader that parliament has made some of the best selections for commissions that could possibly be made, as is evidenced by the lack of criticism of many selections. Nor do I think that in a matter as important as the administration of the national railway any government of the future will select a man who is not competent and capable of administering this great trust.

My object in rising, however, was to point out to hon. members of the house what was pointed out by the senior member of the house, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) only a few days ago, and to which I referred the other evening. There is no reason why we should run Canada like a soviet. There is no reason why we should put the most important department of administration in this nation under men over whom this house would have no control.

If we are going to administer the affairs of Canada according to British parliamentary practice, we are certainly going to have parliamentary control over the administration of government. Someone said only recently that in a very few years we could turn Canada into a soviet, just by appointing a chief commissar, and that there were already commissars for every department of government. I believe the people of Canada will trust this government; I believe they will trust succeeding governments to make as good selections as can be made. If a panel were to be appointed to select names for submission to the government I can see no reason whatever for the existing commissioners having any say in recommending their favoured friends. The remaining commissioners will no doubt make friends. If future appointments were to be made by a panel, I think the chairman of the railway commission and a judge of the exchequer court could make recommendations to the government. I do not see, however, how even they would have any better opportunity of knowing the men available than would the Prime Minister and his Minister of Railways.

I do submit that the hon. member for Quebec East brought out the very point to which the Prime Minister referred only a few days ago, namely, that the men who are wanted will have to be sought after. It will not be the men who are applying for the job that the Prime Minister will want. No doubt to-day he and his Minister of Railways are canvassing the situation to see what men are available who would meet the necessary requirements. I do not believe anything is to be gained by parliament or the government giving up its responsibility for a great national asset and appointing men who do not owe their appointments to parliament, which after all represents the owners of the road, and who do not owe their appointments to the administration in power, which after all must be responsible to the people for expenditures of money on the railroad.

I believe the government will be following the wishes of the country if they maintain British parliamentary institutions, and make appointments by governor in council of the men who are to be appointed in the first place, and the men who are to succeed when the original appointments expire.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I wish to be brief and to avoid covering the ground which has been previously covered by hon. members from this side of the house. When speaking on the introduction of the bill I remember the Prime Minister made the statement that the appointments would be made much in the same manner as the appointment of judges. Undoubtedly Canada has been particularly fortunate in the appointment of judges. Naturally, when these men receive their appointments they bear the political complexion of the party in office.

Mr. BENNETT: Not always.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps not always, but there are very few exceptions. Despite that fact however, I believe I may say without fear of successful contradiction that most of them, indeed all of them, have fulfilled their duties to the entire satisfaction of the litigants appearing before them, and to the public generally. However, I look upon these appointments from a different standpoint altogether. Judges are appointed to interpret the law and to settle disputes. In this instance, the men appointed will have to spend a very large amount of money. They will have to be business men, in the real sense of the word. No doubt what the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has said is quite true. Personally, while I would not trust the judgment of the Prime Minister in all matters, in the selection of these gentlemen I should prefer his judgment linked with that of the Minister of Railways to that of a panel, as is set out by the provision in the legislation.

Moreover, if three gentlemen are to be selected who are going to spend and have control over as much money as the government of Canada spends annually, and if the enterprise is likely to remain in that position, then surely the government of Canada through the governor in council should retain control over appointments. I cannot see that any good purpose would be served by delegating to any body, no matter how worthy a body it might be, the naming of the men from whom selections are to be made. There must be governmental responsibility, if this railway system is to remain, as we now term it, a national railway. So long as it is the railway of the people of Canada the government of the day must take responsibility for it. If they do not, my fear is that we will have the privilege of voting the necessary funds for the carrying on of the railway, but will have no control whatever over its management.

For those reasons I want to voice my opposition to the suggested method of selection. I should very much prefer to leave such selection in the hands of the governor in council. May I say that I heartily agree with and concur in the provision for the reduction of the board to three members, Further, I do not believe that so-called political patronage has had very much effect upon the operation and administration of the railways. True, there is some justification for the statement made so frequently to the effect that municipalities and different parts of the country exercise some influence upon the railways. With two competing railway lines in existence, that influence will be exercised again. However, I do not believe that is the reason that the national railways have suffered. As a matter of fact I am not prepared to admit that the national system has suffered much more than the privately owned system now running in opposition. I do sincerely trust that the government will agree to have control remain where it has been, namely in the hands of the governor in council.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the Prime Minister has been good enough to ask for the opinions of hon. members in regard to this important matter, I shall state my opinion very briefly. The proposal to create a panel does not appeal to me at all, inasmuch as the two remaining trustees will have probably the greater say as to whose names shall be submitted as part of the panel. I am fully in accord with those hon. members who have suggested this afternoon that parliamentary control should continue. I am quite willing to trust any government which may be in power to find the proper men to put into these positions, when vacancies occur. One of the objections I have already voiced to the bill has been the taking away from parliament of practically the whole control over the national railways. So long as we have our present parliamentary institutions, with members of parliament responsible to their electors, parliament should exercise control. I believe the house would do well to ask the Prime Minister to accede to the request which has been made, namely that the governor in council should be responsible for all appointments made to the board of trustees, either in the first instance or to fill vacancies.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I shall not speak until the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) has spoken.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the minister is about to say that the government has decided to have the appointment of the original trustees and of those who are appointed to fill vacancies made in the same way, then it is not necessary for me to urge what I have stated on a former occasion. Having the power to appoint the three trustees, I believe the government should have power to fill the vacancies. If on the other hand the three are appointed from a panel, which I believe restricts the class from which they can be drawn, then in my view further appointments should be made in the same way.

Mr. MANION: In view of the opinions expressed from all sections of the house the government has decided to accept the suggestion of doing away with the panel. Unfortunately the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Quebec South does not fill the bill because, no doubt unintentionally, he moved that the whole clause after the word "occurring" be stricken out. Since the hon. member is not here to withdraw the amendment I shall have to ask the committee to vote it down, and then I will have an amendment moved simply striking out the words after the word "occurring" to the end of the sub-clause.

The CHAIRMAN: That is the way the amendment reads now, to strike out all the remaining words in the section.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but that means all of section 6.

Amendment (Mr. Power) negatived.

Mr. MANION: Then I have this amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that all the words after the word "occurring" in subsection 1 of section 6 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Removal from office or reduction of salary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This section reads:

> No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

We have just decided, I think unanimously, that in the matter of the appointment of trustees the doctrine of ministerial responsibility should be observed and maintained. I would submit that all that can be said in favour of maintaining that doctrine with respect to appointments ought to apply equally with respect to the continuance in office of trustees and with respect to their salaries. I think this clause ought to be struck out altogether on that ground, without mentioning other reasons that might be equally strong, if not stronger.

Mr. MANION: We held this section in abeyance, and it has been fully discussed by the government. We are of the opinion that this clause should stand as it is at present. I think the best arguments that can be advanced in favour of this provision were advanced when the section was first under consideration. They were to this effect, that if one or all of the trustees proved unworthy or unfit to fill these positions there is no doubt that the other chamber, whatever might be its composition, would be glad to help get rid of them. On the other hand if it should so happen that any government—and I do not refer particularly to the government of my right hon. friend opposite—for any unfair or unwise reason should desire to get rid of trustees who had been doing excellent work, it would be only right that the other chamber should refuse to permit that action to be taken. I do not submit this argument in criticism of any party or any group; I simply say that if such a situation should occur we ought to have that safeguard. I believe the House of Commons can feel sure that if these trustees, or any of them, should be unfit to carry on or should in some way betray their trust, both chambers of this parliament would be glad to act in unison to get rid of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the minister has just said is the equivalent of saying that one branch of parliament should be supreme as against the ministry itself, which itself is responsible to parliament as a whole and through parliament to the people; moreover the particular branch of parliament which the minister mentions is the branch which has not the immediate responsibility to the people that the elected chamber has. I do not see why it should be necessary for any minister of the crown to reflect upon a government as such, and that is what is being done in this paragraph and even in the words used by the minister this afternoon.

Mr. MANION: I did not reflect on any government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister's words were an implication, if not a reflection; he referred to any government that might be in office and that might want to do something that was not right and proper. Since when did one administration become the keeper of the conscience of its successor? I submit that so long as we have responsible government we must assume that the government which is placed in office by the people will be actuated by fair and honourable motives, and we must give that government a free hand.

I do not think it is right or fair for one government to try to bind its successors in any way, and that is what hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to do not only in this but in other measures they have put through. The government has a hard enough job in times such as these, and in fact at all times; they should be given the freest hand possible to deal with public affairs. They are always responsible to parliament and through parliament to the people. Any ministry that would take a course such as that just now suggested by my hon. friend and do what was obviously unfair in the dismissal of a trustee of the Canadian National Railways would find itself defeated at every by-election, and ultimately thrown out of office for such unjustifiable action.

Here we have at stake the whole basis on which parliamentary government rests under British institutions. It is not merely a question of how parliament may view a given matter at a particular moment; there is involved the whole question of the election of representatives to parliament and the basis upon which they are elected, namely, to carry out the will of the people. That is tested in by-elections and at general elections, and it is the one thing after all that is the controlling factor in a government's actions. It is but fair and right, and in keeping with our parliamentary institutions, to ask that a clause which would restrict any ministry in the exercise of its responsibility, I do not care what the ministry's political complexion may be, should not find a place in our statutes. I believe this section should be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has presented an amendment to strike out section 7.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Speaking to that amendment, Mr. Chairman, and following the remarks of my right hon. friend, let me say—

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion this amendment is out of order. The committee must vote for or against the section, so this amendment which would strike out the section is negative, and I declare it out of order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then speaking to the section itself, Mr. Chairman, let me say that if we emasculate this bill much further we might as well withdraw it, because it will serve no purpose at all. As I see it the report of the commission and the bill founded upon that report constitute one final effort to rescue the railway system from the bedevilment of politics. It matters not what anyone says in relation to that; go back over the whole history and you will find that politics, parliamentary politics if you like, are responsible for the situation in which we now find ourselves. Whether you can get a board of trustees that to some degree will lift this system out of that situation I grant at once to be a question, but if you are to have trustees you must get the best possible men in this country. The chairman of this board will have the biggest job ever assigned to any Canadian in Canada, and the right hon. gentleman opposite suggests that we should go out looking for that man and say to him, "We want you to take this job. Divest yourself of every other responsibility and interest you may have, but remember that you will remain there subject to dismissal in case there is a change in government." It seems to me that is the position. Can we possibly expect to get the type of man we want under those conditions? I conceive it to be impossible.

I am not going to labour that point, Mr. Chairman. My right hon. friend referred to governmental responsibility and the right of one government to tie the hands of another. What is the procedure in regard to appointments to the railway commission? Every single member of that board is appointed for a definite term of ten years. Already we have reduced the terms of appointment under this bill to five, four and three years, which to my mind simply weakens it to that extent. What is the practice in regard to judges, if you like? We might as well say that a judge appointed by one government is to be subject to the will of any other government that may follow. We have many evidences, if we wanted to go back over the past and introduce the political aspect, to show exactly what has resulted from the removal of men—and that in the case of the national railways itself—and the appointment of other men for political reasons. I say therefore that if this bill is to be further emasculated we should withdraw it altogether and wipe out the farce.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. gentleman is dreaming of a time to come when there will be no politics either in this house or in the Senate. Unfortunately, under the system we now have, the people cannot attend this meeting here but they send their delegates, and they hold us responsible whenever we go back to them; they demand an accounting on our part. The Senate is a very honourable body but it is not under that obligation; its members do not have to go back to constituents. They are merely a court of appeal as it were, and that was the reason for their appointment in the first instance, to protect the rights of minorities in the provinces. That role has not been filled but it exists nevertheless. In this case I am glad to know that both leaders have recognized the principle of ministerial responsibility. We cannot get away from that, and if the hon. member wants to escape it he will have to retire from the political field, because when he goes back to his constituency he will be accountable for everything that has taken place during his term in parliament.

The idea of sharing responsibility between the cabinet and the Senate with respect to the removal of any of these appointees is inviting discord from the inception. Suppose you have a cabinet of one political complexion and a Senate of another. That idea is all right when the appointment is made by parliament; the appointee can be removed only on a joint address of both houses. In this case however the appointments are not being made by parliament but by the governor in council, and the people will hold the governor in council responsible for what occurs. If the new policy is a success the government will boast of it and will receive the credit; if it is not a success they will be condemned by the people. Why therefore should you have the governor in council make the appointments and then compel that body to go to the Senate for approval in the removal of anyone? I do not think it is workable; moreover, it is contrary to the principles of responsible government. In the light of such experience as I have gained here in the period of a third of a century, I think that the more we depart from the old-established rule of responsible government the deeper the mess we shall fall into. The people must rule and the House of Commons are their representatives. The Senate exists for certain purposes, to revise hasty legislation and to make certain amendments which the government of the day, in view of public opinion, cannot make but which may be necessary in the face of conditions that may be inimical to the interests of the country. But the responsibility rests with this house, and when the hon. member for East Algoma goes back to his constituents he will be held responsible not only for this act but for everything that has been done in this house; he will be responsible for the report of the Duff commission if he approves of its conclusions. I can only say therefore that I am opposed to this clause in principle as it stands. I want the whole responsibility left with the committee of this house called the governor general in council.

Mr. McGIBBON: It seems to me there are only two methods of procedure before the house; one is for the government to take full responsibility in conducting the railways, having the Minister of Railways in the House of Commons responsible to the house and the people; the second method is to remove the railways as far as possible away from politics and political influence. It does seem to me that we are halting between these two methods. I do not think that anyone who has had the privilege of attending the special committee on railways and shipping can conscientiously say that in the past politics has been divorced from the management of the national railways. I am not going to discuss here the results, for they are only too apparent to-day to the taxpayers of Canada, and in my opinion will be in the lifetime of every member sitting in this house at this moment. In that I may be wrong; I hope I am. Rightly or wrongly, however, with the background and history we have had since 1923, when the national railways were consolidated, the Duff commission has taken the view that politics in the past has been evident in the management of the railways. Read the report and it will so inform you as plainly as the English language can state it. As a remedy—and it is time we were finding a remedy—the commission submitted certain recommendations which are reflected in this bill.

I say frankly, as one representing the people of this country, that of these two policies I prefer the first. Under normal conditions I should have preferred to have the minister and the government take full responsibility, but I do not believe that the people of Canada want that; I do not believe that any government could carry it out at the present time. Consequently we are left with but one alternative, namely, for the government to remove the railways as far as possible from parliamentary and governmental influence; and while I prefer the first method, I am not sure that the government were wise in withdrawing the amendment they did a few minutes ago, because that would certainly put the management a little further away from parliament than it is now.

If there is anyone here who thinks that the national railways do not present the greatest problem the country has to deal with, he is an optimist. I for one believe that the taxpayers of the country will be called upon for years to come to put their hands very deeply into their pockets to pay the deficits of the road. All I want to remind the house of at the moment is this, that only in one year did they come anywhere near meeting the interest obligations to the public, and it would take $20,000,000 more to-day of an operating surplus than they had in 1928 to meet the situation. Does anyone think that business will come back as quickly as that, with traffic on the railways falling, as it is to-day, out of sight almost every hour? Does anyone think that the railways will pay their obligations to the public? Well, I do not, and I say to the government that if I were in their place I would, on the authority of the Duff commission, unload this responsibility and get it as far away from me as I could. They have authority for that. They appointed a commission comprising the best men they could get, and that is their report. The report was well received by the public of Canada as hon. members know. I did not think very much of it, but that is neither here nor there; but having decided on a policy of divorcing the management of the railways from politics and from parliament, if I were Minister of Railways I would certainly get it as far away as I could, because I should hate to shoulder the responsibility.

Mr. EULER: Would my hon. friend, then, have supported the first appointment of trustees by the government?

Mr. McGIBBON: I gave a reason which I think is justifiable. Having appointed a commission of the most eminent men available, men eminent in railway matters, in finance, and in law, having given freely of their time and having made a report to this house, I think it would be an insult to that commission if we did not adopt their recommendation. I do not pretend to hold my judgment as being superior to theirs but probably I am not as conceited as some hon. members of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: We have a tremendous problem upon our hands and in my opinion this problem will be increased in the future by the fact that mail, express and package parcels will be carried largely by air. The busses and trucks are taking business away from the railways. They serve the thickly populated parts of the country, they stop anywhere for passengers or freight while the situation of the railways is just the reverse. I cannot see a very bright future for the railways in this or any other country. If parliament could solve this problem it would be doing one of the best turns possible to the people of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just taken his seat based his argument upon the advisability of carrying out the recommendations made by the Duff commission. He stated that as the government appointed this commission, they ought to carry out its recommendations. May I say that the Duff commission never made the recommendation which is included in this clause. The clause reads:

> No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

The words "on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada" have been added by the ministry.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely those words were a fair deduction from the recommendation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Duff commission had thought that it was right and proper that the ministry should be restricted by the addition of words of that kind, those words would have been included in the recommendations of the report. May I give an additional reason as to why they would have done so. Another commission, the Drayton-Acworth commission, investigated the question of railways and it made a recommendation that in the particulars here mentioned it should be impossible for a subsequent ministry to undo anything that a previous ministry had done. That appeared in the majority report of the commissioners. The minority report of one of the commissioners who dissented is very significant. When the Drayton-Acworth commission sought to bind succeeding ministries much in the way that this clause seeks to bind them, one of its members took exception. I shall read his words which were as follows:

> I am unable to join my colleagues in their recommendations. They propose that practically all of the railways in Canada, except the Canadian Pacific and the American lines shall be turned over to a corporation to be managed by a board of trustees appointed by the government. They insist that this board is to be permanent and self-perpetuating. I do not know by what means one parliament can bind its successors to a given policy, especially in so simple a matter as changing the organization of a government board. My friends seek to avoid government ownership and operation, in fact condemn it as inadvisable, but propose a plan which contains so many elements of danger in the direction which is sought to be avoided that I am unable to join them.

In other words, the commissioners, as set forth by one of their number, were seeking to make government ownership and operation impossible, and one of their recommendations was that the board of trustees should be self-perpetuating and after appointment not be removable by a ministry at a later date. May I point out that the governments of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden and of the Hon. Mr. Meighen had the report of this commission before them but neither government were prepared to take action in accordance with their recommendations. The Duff commission had the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission before its members but they were not prepared to recommend to the government and through the government to parliament the adoption of any such provision as this. The fact that in the circumstances the Duff commission refrained from making such a recommendation is the strongest argument that could be advanced as to why this parliament should not insert in this bill any provision of the kind. I am going to move that all the words after the word "cause" in the thirty-fourth line be struck out. Should this amendment carry, the section would then read:

No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause.

The words I am proposing to strike out are:

—and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

May I give a further reason why these words should be struck out? By the passage of previous clauses, this committee has decided that the governor in council shall make appointments and shall fix salaries. It has given to the governor in council the power to increase salaries; if the governor in council is to be given the power to increase salaries why should it be denied the power to reduce salaries? Why should the reduction of salaries as well as the removal from office be made subject to the will of the Senate as well as that of the House of Commons? It seems to me that there are two fundamental constitutional principles being sacrificed by the clause in the form in which it appears. The first is the one already referred to of the responsibility of a ministry, in other words the principle of responsible government; the government taking full responsibility for its actions and not being subordinated to the will of a non-elected house of parliament. The second and a very important fundamental principle is the control by the Commons of all matters of expenditure. By this clause the House of Commons is impliedly parting with its right of control over expenditures and the taxation incidental thereto; they are being made subject to the will of the Senate. It may be that the amount involved is small but the principle is very great. This principle, probably more than ony other, has occasioned long and acrimonious debate in the British parliament during recent years. The same statement, in fact, applies to most parliaments. For this as well as for the other reasons mentioned, I do not think that this clause should be accepted in its present form.

I fail to see just why it should be necessary to reflect in this indirect way upon any ministry that may be in office. I think that in the future, members of governments will be as honourable in their actions as their predecessors, whether those actions relate to appointments or to dismissals. Speaking the other day in connection with these appointments, I said that if at any time a Liberal administration should be returned to power and I had anything to do with it, my last desire would be to remove any trustees appointed by the present government provided they were performing their duties impartially, fairly and well. If they were not doing that, it seems to me that the ministry of the day ought not to be restricted in its attitude towards them. The ministry will have to carry the responsibility of their actions whether it wishes to do so or not.

May I say a further word about this getting rid of government control? It seems to me that here another fundamental principle is involved. Either these roads must be considered as government controlled as well as government owned roads or they should be passed over altogether into private hands. If the ministry is of the view that parliament is not the proper body to control the national railways, then let them bring in a measure which will ask parliament to transfer the roads to private control. The ministry claim that the president and board of directors under the late administration and as they exist at the present time were possessed of too great a power, but it now proposes to go a step further and give still greater power to the three trustees. The complaint has been made that the board of directors have had too free a hand, that certain expenditures would not have been made if they had been subject to greater control by the ministry, but now the ministry proposes to go even further and take away all control on the part of the ministry. These three men are to be given the power to do as they please with respect to the largest expenditure that the country will be concerned in. Reference has been made this afternoon to human nature and, knowing human nature as we do, I cannot but believe that any gentlemen who may be given appointments as trustees will be all the better in administering these national railways for realizing that they are subject to the control of whatever ministry the people may be responsible for having placed in office.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What happened in 1923?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know to what my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The gentleman brought here to be president of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If this clause had been inserted in the original act, how would the ministry of to-day have felt had they been obliged, notwithstanding whatever argument or reasons they might urge, to retain in office whoever had been appointed? The leaving of the appointment of the president of the railway as at pleasure was the only sound and sensible position to take. I do not think the ministry can do other than agree with this statement because, when they came into office, they became responsible, and they assumed their responsibility in the way in which they believed it should be assumed. If they assumed it in the wrong way, and without justification, their action is subject to criticism. The very fact, however, that as a responsible ministry they found it advisable to make a change is the strongest reason why they should hesitate in binding any subsequent ministry.

May I say this with reference to the appointment of Sir Henry Thornton. The government of the day before it was able to secure Sir Henry, had sought high and low for a president of the national railway. As I recall the circumstances, it was a matter of a search of a year or more before the person regarded as suitable could be found to take the position of president of the national railways. When we appointed Sir Henry, we believed we had secured one who was in no way associated with either the Canadian National or the Grand Trunk, who would as between these former rival systems have no preference or feeling one way or the other, and who was independent of all other former influences. He was given a free hand. He came to us from England; his experience had been largely in the United States. If there ever was a man who was ideally fitted so far as general qualifications and the like were concerned, and calculated to be impartial in the discharge of his duties once given a free hand, Sir Henry Thornton was that man. Whatever hon. members may now wish to say about him, or of his administration during the last year or two, they will have to admit that they themselves when on this side of the house were as strong in endorsation of Sir Henry Thornton's management of the road at the time as were the members of the government in office.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. McGIBBON: They could not find out anything about the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We must admit that at any rate up to a certain period there was general agreement throughout the country that the best man possible had been found for the position. But the man who was regarded the best at the time was evidently not thought to be the best man to continue indefinitely. A like situation may arise as regards any appointment. Therefore the ministry of the day, of whatever complexion it may be, should be given a free hand to assume and discharge its responsibility in its own way

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has made a reference to political interference. I am not going to bring that subject into the discussion except to put on record one statement which I think it is owing to the former administration should be on record so far as alleged political interference on the part of the government of the day is concerned. Sir Henry Thornton himself gave to the Saturday Evening Post on July 6, 1929, a statement of the circumstances under which he took office as president of the railroad, of the manner in which he managed its affairs, and of the extent to which up to that time there had been aught in the nature of governmental interference. I shall quote just one paragraph from page 9 of the Saturday Evening Post of the date mentioned. I shall say nothing at present about what Sir Henry Thornton may have subsequently said on the same subject. After mentioning the circumstances of the problem with which he was confronted he continues in this article as follows:

> But, as I have mentioned, I love a good fight. So I crossed the ocean and had a talk with the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister. He, too, said, there would be no politics. I took the job.
> There never has been any politics. But that wasn't the fault of a great many persons. Premier King kept his promise. And during the period between elections when the Conservative party was in control no one laboured harder in the real interest of the property than Sir Henry Drayton, who carried on governmental administration during the election period. Within a year a bulwark had arisen to back him—the opinion of the people of Canada. To-day there is as much chance of politics getting into the Canadian National Railways as there is of an elephant walking a tight-rope. Both have yet to be done. Last year, for instance, the railways which I am fortunate enough to administer bought $99,000,000 worth of supplies. Not one cent of those purchases was dictated politically, nor any that preceded them.

I place this statement on record because it has been before the public for some years and no exception has ever been taken to it; it was before the House of Commons at the time it was made, and exception was not taken to it then. I shall not enter into any argument over what may have taken place since, but I submit that so far as I know the situation, that was the relationship of the government of the day to Sir Henry Thornton and the railways under his management. The minister himself I think has said that, so far as politics are concerned, the kind of thing to which he had reference and which we all had in mind was not so much the possible influence of the ministry of the day or of members of parliament upon the trustees as it was the kind of influence that may be brought to bear from different sections of the country, a sectional influence that may be very real at times. That kind of influence upon the trustees is not going to be in any way affected by the manner in which this particular clause is framed. The trustees will do their duty according to their lights; making them removable for cause is only a just and fair way of proceeding, and if there is cause there should be freedom on the part of the ministry to remove them. Whether there may be cause or not, there should not be in the statute an implied reflection that the ministry of the day will do other than what is honourable in the circumstances in which they may be called upon to act.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish the committee would calmly consider this matter from another angle. I quite appreciate all that has been said, but the effort to secure good men for this position has already commenced. I know exactly what the former government had to contend with at the time they secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton. I think it is only fair to say this; the whole affair is past and gone; the gentleman himself is now no more. I came back from England and I left for the then Prime Minister, who was at the time out of town, a memorandum stating that I had been interviewed by two or three gentlemen who had spoken in the highest terms of Sir Henry Thornton's railroad experience; I thought he was admirably qualified by reason of his experience to undertake the task. I left that memorandum at the office of the Prime Minister at the time I returned from England. I was not then in the House of Commons. If we are to secure the kind of trustees that I believe are essential—and I cannot say how seriously I regard the matter; I cannot overstate the seriousness of it to the country—we must get men who will not think that by accepting office they are "conscripted," which I think is the word used by the hon. member for Quebec East. If we have to conscript them, we cannot hope that men are going to take these positions who will be subject to, shall I say, the ill treatment of any government, even the government that appoints them. The leader of the opposition says that I suggest governments will not do thus and so. I know, for instance, that the international joint commission was originally appointed by the king in council. The appointment had not been completed when Sir Robert Borden came into office, and therefore the positions were filled by three Conservatives: Mr. Powell, Mr. Casgrain and Mr. Magrath.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Sir William Hearst.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I am referring to the first ones. Then the government of my right hon. friend had the matter amended so that the governor in council could appoint them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any government.

Mr. BENNETT: I mean the government in Canada—I want to remove it from any possible chance—and the pressure upon the right hon. gentleman was very great, as I happen to know. Now under those circumstances, knowing as I do and as every hon. member knows, just what the feeling is in a young country like Canada where you have not a great reservoir to draw upon such as you have in an older country, of skilled and trained men, we face this situation, that if we ask men to take one of these positions they are going to refuse unless they know that they are not going to be kicked about like men holding such offices too often are. When we say that good cause must be assigned for their removal or dismissal I am glad to hear the right hon. gentleman say that he thinks that is fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with that entirely.

Mr. BENNETT: We say just what a board of directors would say. The House of Commons and the Senate, not simply the House of Commons, but both houses of parliament, represent the shareholders, if you will, and we say that no government weak with the frailties of political life, at least, shall be in a position either from mere caprice or what they believe to be good cause to make these men walk out. The approval of parliament must be given. If the approval of parliament is given the government is vindicated.

If parliament refuses its approval the government will have to vacate its place.

The right hon. gentleman must also realize that in determining what constitutes good cause you raise an issue of the utmost importance. The courts, for instance, have always had difficulty in deciding as a matter of law whether or not a given set of facts constitutes cause or not. Therefore in every case where an employer dismisses his employee before the termination of his period of employment the employer must face the responsibility of either paying damages or satisfying the court that he has done what he has done for good cause. The cause is a question of law. I can give one illustration that many hon. gentlemen may be familiar with. We had a case in the courts under which an employee of the Canadian Pacific Railway sued that road for damages for dismissal. The cause assigned was that he had appropriated to his own use fares on the railway received for the carrying of passengers. The railway company dismissed him. In accordance with the provisions of the schedule he appeared before his superior officers and he contended that he had made good his defence, but the company dismissed him. He then sued the company, and the learned judge decided that he had been dismissed without good cause, and awarded him $10,000. Apart from the fact that the damages were improper because the measure of damage could not be that in any event, the question at issue was whether or not that was good cause. The case went to the appeal court and finally to the privy council, where the judgment of the trial judge was reversed, as it was by the court of appeal. The issue was the sufficiency of the cause. The man himself was not permitted to say whether it was good or bad. He took the risk. Now in order that we may be able to induce competent men to accept this position we say that we are not going to leave it to the caprice of any government, our government or any other, to say that a given condition constitutes good or bad cause to exercise the power of dismissal. Therefore once a decision has been arrived at to terminate the employment by dismissal we say that before final action is taken parliament must say, just as the privy council had to say, that the cause assigned is a good cause, and if this house and the Senate say that it is not good, then the government of the day must go; but if on the other hand the commons and the Senate say it is good the government is vindicated in the position it has taken.

The reason why the Senate is introduced into this, apart altogether from the fact that the tenure of office of judges is during good behaviour subject to age and other conditions which will be before the house presently as defined by the Judges Act, is this: We want the board to be independent of the executive, just as no executive action should be capable of terminating the services of a judge. Therefore the appeal is made to parliament. In the case of the judges that is as old as the statute that provided it. It has come down through all these years, and parliament means both houses. The answer that at least one hon. gentleman would make if the commons alone were mentioned would be that the government of the day has always a majority in the commons and therefore is always sure of being sustained in that chamber. But the government has not always a majority in the other chamber, whether in this country or any other, and therefore the government of the day may not be sustained in the other house; it may not secure the joint approval of the two houses of parliament by which these men may be removed. You thus secure the possibility of men of position in the commercial world accepting at the hands of the government positions which they otherwise would not accept, and having accepted the position they know that their tenure of office is not to be subject to the caprice of any government which in its anxiety to change the personnel of the trustees may determine that a given set of facts constitutes good cause. The question must be submitted to the high court of parliament, and the government of the day having submitted its cause, not to this house alone but also to the other branch of parliament which may not conceivably support the government, and that has very often happened, if it is unable to secure the approval of that other branch of parliament, as well as the approval of the commons, it fails and the government must go.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is not suggesting that if a government measure is defeated in the other house the government must resign.

Mr. BENNETT: It would in this case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That makes it worse than ever.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a question of defeat. There must be joint action by both houses to make it complete. Both bodies must approve before you can deprive of his office a man who may be taken out of a great place in the commercial life of the country and induced as a high matter of public service to give years of his life—this house has now reduced the term to five years —to the country in this way, and giving his services to the country in this way we say that he shall not be subjected to dismissal unless the sufficiency of the cause assigned is approved by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. EULER: Just to clear up the point raised by my hon. friend from West Edmonton, I can hardly believe what I understood the Prime Minister to say. Does he say seriously that if such a joint address initiated by the government were refused by the Senate, the government would be compelled to resign?

Mr. BENNETT: In my judgment the government would certainly have to resign.

Mr. EULER: Because the Senate does not approve?

Mr. BENNETT: The government assumes the responsibility of asking the approval of parliament for the dismissal of Mr. A, the chairman of the board of trustees. The House of Commons says yes and the Senate says no. The government has failed.

Mr. EULER: Not at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, it has failed.

Mr. YOUNG: Then let us amend the bill before it is too late.

Mr. BENNETT: Parliament takes that action not on a statute but on a resolution, a joint address, and the government risks its all on the sufficiency of the cause for dismissing a man from this position. There is no doubt about that, not the slightest doubt in the world. It would not be so with respect to a statute, but this is a case in which the government has taken the risk of putting a man out of his position, throwing him out on the street for cause assigned which was wholly inadequate—the commons says it is adequate; the Senate says it is not. The government has failed. How can a government carry on?

Mr. YOUNG: Then the trustees can get rid of the government?

Mr. BENNETT: No, the trustees cannot get rid of the government, because it is a question of termination of the relations of employer and employee, the trustee as an individual. What is the good of this business of always talking high platitudes with respect to parliamentary institutions, when you have to deal with facts and realties? The reality is that if the House of Commons does not approve of the action of the government, that is the end of it; the government goes. And if you have said that the House of Commons plus the other house must approve, and it does not, the government goes equally. That applies with respect to the dismissal of the individual. That is not so about a statute at all. What is more, there are illustrations of it; it is not a new question at all. When a joint address is to be agreed upon, if one party does not agree to it, there is no joint address, and the government which initiates it must accept the responsibility for it. That is the difference between that and a statute. A government's measure may be defeated in the Senate, and that is the end of it. But that is not this case. The government has risked its fate by dismissing a man from his job. It has risked its all on that dismissal, and it has made that dismissal subject to the joint approval of two branches of parliament.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. EULER: I believe I had the floor first.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; as a matter of fact the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) withdrew for me.

Mr. EULER: I am sure the Prime Minister will believe me when I say, without in any way trying to be offensive, that the statement he made at the conclusion of his remark provides for me the strongest reason why this bill should not go through in the form in which it appears.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought you would say, and that is the reason that I made myself clear.

Mr. EULER: I cannot conceive that the life of the government, for any reason, can be dependent upon the action of the Senate of Canada. The Prime Minister laughs at that, as he so often does.

Mr. BENNETT: The Senate put the Macdonald government out.

Mr. EULER: I am looking at the matter in a common sense way, and I believe in the way that the average citizen of Canada would look at it. Like the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario I do not regard the Duff commission report so very highly. I do not believe that the bill which we are now discussing again can accomplish a very great deal. On the second reading I gave it support, which was not at all enthusiastic, but I did it because it went at least some length in the direction in which I desired action to go. It offered a certain amount of cooperation, and decrease in the expense of running the road.

If there was one clause of the bill to which I objected, it was the clause we are now discussing, namely 7. A little while ago the government accepted the suggestion that they should take full responsibility for making appointments. I was rather in favour of the panel idea, if it could be made nonpolitical —I admit it would be difficult—because I always had in my mind that if the government would change clause 7 so that it or the House of Commons would have the power to discharge these trustees, their responsibility would be very well maintained. Now they have declined to eliminate clause 7. There are two reasons given, one by the Minister of Railways and the other by the Prime Minister. The Minister of Railways gave as his reason that a politically minded government, if we wish so to describe it, might unfairly discharge these trustees. I believe I am correct in my interpretation of what he said. I have put it bluntly, but I believe that is what was at the root of his statement, namely that a politically minded or partisan minded government might unfairly desire to discharge these trustees, and that the Senate would prevent such an injustice. I contend that if it be true that for political reasons a Senate might prevent a government from discharging these trustees, it is just as fair to assume that a politically minded Senate, or a partisan Senate might prevent the removal of these trustees for the same political reasons. So that upon that score it seems to me that we are even.

The Prime Minister advanced another argument in which there may be some weight, but against which I think provision could be made. He stated that unless the men asked to take office as trustees could be assured that they could not be discharged by a politically minded government, the best men for these positions could not be obtained. If there were no safeguard, I believe there would be something in his argument. But at this point I am going to suggest a safeguard, as I did previously, upon which occasion I incurred the ridicule, if it may be so termed, of the Prime Minister. I stated that it should be the duty of the House of Commons alone, and the government—not of the Senate—to discharge the trustees, if they wished to do so. I hold to that. I stated frankly before, and I repeat it at this time, that to my mind the responsibility should not be placed upon the Senate, that this House of Commons should not share the responsibility with the Senate, because only the House of Commons and government are responsible to the people of Canada. I hold to that principle very consistently, and, I suggest, very soundly. If there is danger that, from fear of partisan governments, executives or cabinets, the best men could not be secured for the positions, and if there is fear that for political reasons they might be discharged, I believe such fear might very well be allayed and the danger very definitely averted if we inserted a provision or amended this clause so that the trustees could be removed not by the executive or by the cabinet, but by a vote of the House of Commons, not including the Senate. If the men were competent, no House of Commons or no government would dare to introduce a resolution or bill into the House of Commons providing for the removal of such trustees, unless for very good cause. On such occasion the debate in the house and the fear of the criticism of an alert opposition would prevent any government from introducing such a measure, unless it were absolutely certain of its ground. The press throughout the country would take the matter up, and in my opinion, that would be ample safeguard against that which the Prime Minister seems to dread.

I shall conclude by repeating the statement with which I began, namely, that when the Prime Minister now claims or states—and he knows more than I do about constitutional law—that because of the rejection by the Senate of a resolution initiated in and passed by the House of Commons, the government must resign, he is, if stating the fact, giving the very best reason why this clause should not be passed as it now stands.

Mr. HEENAN: I desire to commend the Prime Minister at this stage for his frankness. I recall that only a few evenings ago I was in the company of two government supporters, and while discussing section 7 I said that I thought that we might go to the point where a government in power could introduce a resolution to dismiss the trustees, and that in the event of the resolution being rejected by the House of Commons and the Senate the government would have to go to the country. I do not mind saying that although the two Conservative members were friends of mine, they laughed at me. I am very glad to sit here to-day and to hear my idea substantiated by the Prime Minister.

Why are we so solicitous of gentlemen whom we are going to appoint as trustees? Why is there the discrimination between employees of the railway and trustees? Here we have an economy measure which will result in thousands of employees being thrown on the street, but the man who will be appointed to carry out these measures of economy, the chairman of the board of trustees, cannot be put out of office unless the government stakes its life on a resolution which must be adopted by the House of Commons and the Senate. Every man working on the railroad, whether he is a section man, a carpenter, a machinist, a bridge builder, an engineer or a conductor, is just as important in the life of that railroad as the trustee will be, yet now we are going to engage a man for five years, during which time he will have to throw thousands of men on the streets without a moment's notice. We disregard their lives and the lives of their dependents, but we cannot dismiss the gentleman responsible for this unless we have an address of the House of Commons and the Senate. Why should there be this discrimination between Canadian citizens?

We heard the hon. member for East Algoma and the Minister of Railways say that we must have big men. Yes, in connection with the operation of the Canadian National we must have big men, but I think they must be big railroad men. And why should these big railroad men have their jobs ensured for five years while they have the power to dismiss the employees without notice? For the life of me I cannot see why we should be required to ensure their positions while other men, who are just as necessary for the successful operation of the railroad, may be dismissed without very much consideration being given. I believe that a really big man would not take a job such as this unless he knew he was big enough to handle it, and if he handled it to the satisfaction of the country that in itself would ensure his job. I think that is the only barometer we should have.

While we are dealing with this question of trustees I want to repeat that one man on the board should be appointed to represent the employees. I know the government takes the position that the two hundred thousand railway men in Canada should not receive greater consideration than the million or more agriculturists, but I want to point out to the minister that these railway men have devoted their lives to this work. One might say that everyone who deals with or uses the railways is interested. I believe it costs ten or fifteen cents to send a suit of clothes from Winnipeg to Regina, and the gentleman in Regina who pays that sum might be said to be interested in our railways to that extent. Surely, however, he should not be compared with the men who entered the railway service in their youth and have remained there for many years. These men have built their homes and brought up their families in that service, and surely they are entitled to representation on this board. The Minister of Railways said the door was not closed yet; I am very glad he did so, because I cannot conceive any government appointing trustees for the Canadian National without giving representation to the men who have invested their lives in this work.

The hon. member for East Algoma said that if we emasculated the bill much more it would be better to abandon it because it would mean almost nothing. On the other hand, however, I know that many amendments from this side, and even from the other side, have been refused and that the only amendments accepted by the government have been those which in their opinion would strengthen the bill, so I do not think there is very much in the argument of the hon. member for East Algoma. I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that these trustees will not be ordinary men after they are appointed; turn to section 16 and see what powers they are to have. They can form new companies, grant leases, enter into agreements, grant licences, agree on the division of earnings arising from joint operations, grant joint trackage, running rights, joint ownerships or joint operating agreements, and so on. Yet these gentlemen cannot be dismissed for five years unless the government in power stakes its life on a resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate. I am very glad the Prime Minister was frank enough to give us that information; I mentioned that fact a few evenings ago to some hon. gentlemen opposite, and they laughed at me. It is no laughing matter now, however, since we heard the Prime Minister make that definite statement on the floor of the house. Therefore I am heartily in sympathy with the amendment moved by my right hon. leader, and I hope the House of Commons will accept it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry to say that when the Prime Minister made his remarks he lost a prospective supporter of this section. I was inclined to give my support, but my right hon. friend has given an interpretation which surely we must accept, because this section is the work not of the commission but of the government. The Prime Minister says that if a government undertakes to dismiss one of the trustees for an assigned cause, for mismanagement or something else, and is supported by the House of Commons but not by the Senate, it means the resignation of the government. I cannot follow the right hon. gentleman that far, and I shall vote against the section.

Mr. YOUNG: In his remarks the Prime Minister said we must deal with facts and realities. It seems to me he is making this board of trustees a reality, so much so that the government will be reduced to a mere shadow. Let us suppose that a quarrel developed between the government and the board of trustees; naturally the government would ask for the dismissal of the board, and the Senate would have to decide whether or not that should be done. If the Senate happened to be of the opposite political complexion from the government does anyone suppose for a moment that the matter would be dealt with on its merits? The Senate naturally would want to see the government out of office. There is a very simple method of getting rid of them, and that is, simply to refuse to dismiss the board of directors. Let me give an example of what might happen. I have before me the report of the bureau of statistics showing the earnings of the two railway companies for two four-month periods. They are the latest periods I could get, November and December 1932, and January and February 1933, being one period, and the corresponding period of the year before, November and December 1931, and January and February 1932. The earnings of both railways declined in those periods but the decline in the Canadian National Railways was 24·89 per cent and on the Canadian Pacific 19·35 per cent, or a difference of 5½ per cent.

Ordinarily speaking, the Minister of Railways should call before him the board of directors and demand an explanation of such a state of affairs, and if a satisfactory explanation were not forthcoming he would naturally request the resignation of the board. He would ask for dismissal for cause, because they would have shown their incompetence. But what would happen? They would immediately canvass the Senate to see what support they could get if they decided to refuse to resign, and if they could get sufficient support they would refuse and the government would be forced to resign.

I cannot see how the government can escape responsibility for the management of the railways. Set up any structure you like and the people of the country will hold the government responsible; and if they go before the people and say, "We cannot help it; we have created a board which is beyond our control, having given them full charge of the railways," the people will reply, "You had no business to set up any such board because you are the people and the only people we hold responsible for the management of the railways, and if you cannot manage them you had better get out and let someone else do so." Public control and public ownership are inseparable, and if we cannot control the railways we have no business owning them. If the government, elected by the people, cannot manage the railway, then the sooner we find that out and the sooner we get rid of it the better. That is my opinion.

Mr. BROWN: I have had a good deal of hesitation about intervening in the debate with regard to the railways. When this clause was brought to the attention of the committee my first reaction was that I could not offer any very strong objection to it; indeed, I felt it was possibly an instance in which the Senate might discharge the functions it was originally intended to discharge in preventing hasty action on the part of the government and the House of Commons. But the statement made by the Prime Minister, that the refusal of the Senate to endorse the action of the government and the House of Commons would necessitate the resignation of the government, is a doctrine to which I could not possibly subscribe. In view of that statement I certainly agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo and the hon. member for Quebec East. I cannot support the clause in question under these circumstances and certainly I shall have to register my objection to it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I intended to oppose this clause in any event. I do not want any misunderstanding; I am opposed to it in every particular. I believe that the responsibility should rest in the hands of the governor in council. I do not insist, as my good friend from North Waterloo has done, that it shall be the responsibility of parliament, but I do maintain that the responsibility should rest in the governor in council.

Let me put this to the leader of the government and the government itself. When they felt that the interests of this institution would be better served without the services of Sir Henry Thornton, they took the responsibility in that matter and I find no fault with them. The responsibility, I say, was theirs. But do they mean to say that if there had been an adverse majority in the Senate, or if there had been a Liberal Senate, they would have succeeded in having Sir Henry Thornton dismissed, particularly if that Senate thought for a moment that they could put this government out of office on the question? The thing is almost ridiculous. With all respect to the Prime Minister, I cannot conceive that even he would suggest such an arbitrary manner of dealing with the government.

I will vote against this proposal more heartily than I did before, much more heartily. So far as I am concerned, I am bound to say that this is the worst imposition that has ever been offered the House of Commons of Canada. Are we going to be made subservient to the Senate in a grave matter of this sort? And that is exactly what will happen. The members of that body do not have to appeal to the electors at all; they are there during their lifetime and, if they saw fit, willy nilly they would maintain in opposition to the elected representatives of the people a board which in the judgment of the latter should be dismissed, a board handling, as I said on a former occasion, just as much money as the government of this country is likely to handle.

May I say to hon. gentlemen who have been critical of the railway situation that I do agree with certain things the Prime Minister has said. I agree that we have overbuilt in Canada. I would ask my hon. friend from East Algoma however this question: Would he incur again in his lumbering business the same obligations he did in more prosperous days? We all know that hindsight is always better than foresight. I would point out to this house however that notwithstanding the severe losses incurred by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific the people of Canada have enjoyed lower rates than those that have prevailed on the other side. We must admit therefore that there are advantages in the government railways, and if the government are to divest themselves of all responsibility for this institution then I say to them, turn it over to private enterprise at once and have done with the whole thing. I do not know whether the institution can be made a success or not, but I do know that no such method as is now proposed can be adopted by the government without their incurring very grave displeasure. I say that so long as the government are determined to maintain the national railways as a government institution they will have to accept the responsibility —any government will have to accept that responsibility. It cannot be otherwise. This attempt to remove it from political control is in my opinion so much hooey; it cannot be done, and that is one of the penalties we shall pay for government institutions.

Mr. ERNST: I thought "hooey" was banned.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I mean this bugaboo that is always trotted out about political control. I do not believe there has been very much political control. I do know that municipalities and communities have got what they should not have got, but they have got it from the Canadian Pacific Railway as well. I could cite dozens of instances where they received from the Canadian Pacific treatment they were not entitled to. I say, however, that if hon. gentlemen are genuinely opposed to government control they should say so outright; but if we are to have government control and operation, let the government take responsibility through the governor in council.

Mr. MANION: This clause has been debated fully to and fro but I should like to point out to the committee something that has already been mentioned by the Prime Minister. In the dismissal of any of these trustees exactly the same method is used as that which would be followed in the dismissal of a superior court judge. Let me read this extract from the British North America Act, section 99:

> The judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the governor general on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

While of course a judge holds a very high office, I would point out that from the standpoint of financial responsibility, from the standpoint of our whole financial structure, the trustees who are going to be put into power in the Canadian National Railways are in a much more important position. Without any doubt the object is to place the handling of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways as far away as possible from government pressure, from political pressure or from public pressure. That was the thought in the minds of those who drew up this clause. The right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Waterloo have, perhaps unintentionally, put an interpretation upon my word which was unfair. I was continuing the discussion which took place the other day in connection with the possibility of there being a Senate of a different political colour than the government of the day. It was stated that they might block a dismissal. Generally speaking, I think it can be assumed that the Senate will take as honourable and as highminded an attitude as this chamber. The hon. member for North Waterloo has suggested that any dismissal should be made by a resolution of the House of Commons only, but I think he will admit that any government in power having a decent majority would be able to get any reasonable resolution passed through the house.

Mr. EULER: I said that public opinion would prevent them from introducing a resolution which was not founded on proper reason.

Mr. MANION: And in the same way, public opinion would prevent another chamber of this parliament from refusing to dismiss a trustee who should be dismissed.

Mr. EULER: I was following the statement of the Prime Minister that they could put another government out of office.

Mr. MANION: I would not like to argue with the Prime Minister as to constitutional questions, but I must confess that I do not interpret the matter in the way he does. Suppose a government of the day wished to dismiss a trustee. The procedure would be something like this: the government of the day would introduce a resolution to the House of Commons in which cause would be given; that resolution would go to the Senate and if it passed the Senate, the man would be dismissed; if the Senate did not pass it, the man would not be dismissed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what we thought.

Mr. MANION: I have no desire to get into a constitutional argument with the right hon. leader of the government because he is much more capable than I in that regard; I am simply giving my interpretation of the clause. I have listened intently but I have not heard any real argument advanced as to the possibility of injustice being done by this clause either to the trustees or to the government of the day.

Mr. MARCIL: The only thing wrong with the minister's argument is the fact that these trustees will not be judges. Judges are appointed to interpret the laws passed by parliament. A judge may be impeached and brought to the bar of this house for trial. This is the high court of the nation and we merely delegate our powers to the judges of the land to interpret our laws. In this case we are appointing administrators who are going to administer these railways to the best of their knowledge and ability. We are not going to give them any directions as to how that is to be done; we are not going to pass a statute to say that this, that or the other thing shall be done. They are to be given carte blanche and will act entirely on their own volition. They are in an entirely different position from that occupied by the judges and there cannot be any comparison between the two.

[Mr. Manion.]

The assent of the Senate to the removal of an officer is quite competent when that officer is appointed by parliament. The general returning officer is appointed by joint address of both houses of parliament. The Auditor General of Canada is responsible to parliament. Parliament delegates powers to the cabinet council; the government of the day is merely a committee of parliament. Parliament has the power to remove these officials which I have mentioned but only by the assent of both houses. In the present case this argument would not apply because the trustees are not to be appointed by both houses, they are to be appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Which comprises both houses.

Mr. MARCIL: The governor in council is responsible to this parliament. I have no desire to disparage the Senate, as I have heard splendid descriptions of its responsibilities and irresponsibilities. In this instance we are dealing with a money question which comes entirely within the jurisdiction of this house. The Senate has not a word to say. The Senate can reject a supply bill holus bolus but it cannot amend it. When I was a young man this whole issue was brought to the fore in the Quebec legislature. A conflict arose between the cabinet and the legislative council and pandemonium reigned in that province for some time. Responsible government ceased to exist because the lieutenant governor arrogated to himself powers similar to those which we now seek to confer upon the Senate. The result was that the government of that province was sustained for two years by the casting vote of the Speaker. A precedent was established by the removal of the lieutenant governor by the governor in council. He was declared to be merely a federal officer and not a representative of the crown. The then governor general referred the matter to the home authorities who declared that the lieutenant governor of a province was a nominee of the dominion cabinet which had the power to remove him for cause. At the present time we are merely using our prerogatives as members of this house dealing with a money matter. We are appointing trustees to administer public property, and with all due respect to the Prime Minister, I must say that I am amazed at his stating that a government would have to resign office and go to the people merely because an adverse vote had been cast by the Senate.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has fallen three times into the same error—in spite of his wide experience in constitutional matters, he has referred to the cabinet as a committee of this house. It is not; it is a committee of parliament. Ever since confederation there has not been a cabinet in which there has not been a member of the second chamber. The hon. gentleman may easily be excused for falling into that error, but if it is corrected, the argument which he advances vanishes immediately. The cabinet is a committee of parliament and I trust it will always remain so.

The question of taxation would not arise in this case unless it so happened that the road did not earn enough to pay the salaries. I think it would be reasonable to assume that if the road did not earn enough to pay its salaries, the trustees would not come to this parliament to ask it to provide money. They are to be employees of the road and the bill is clear on that point. Their salaries are to be paid from the revenues of the road and not from the consolidated fund of Canada. There will be no charge upon the consolidated fund. The only way such a charge could be made would be in the form of an item. I cannot conceive of these trustees coming to this parliament for their salaries when the road had not made sufficient to pay operating expenses and to provide salaries. Usually that point does not arise in connection with companies of this character.

As to the point which I put to the committee a short time ago in connection with the possibility of the government falling by reason of there not being a joint address, I would state that that was predicated upon the fact that the dismissal took place before they came to parliament. Perhaps that point was not sufficiently clear in the minds of those who followed me. Assuming that the government of the day, that is the executive, took the responsibility of dismissing a trustee or trustees and assigned a cause. If, as has been suggested, that is not a true interpretation of the section but rather that the action follows a joint address of parliament, it is obvious that the government would not fall if the Senate did not agree. If the government risked its power—I am trying to make it perfectly clear—by giving notice of a dismissal from employment of John Smith and assigned cause, it is obvious the government has staked its life upon being able to carry through the action which it has initiated. That means a joint address of both houses of parliament and if one house only passes it, it follows that the government has failed. That would be a matter which should engage the attention of the administration of the day, and when I said that the government would resign, I mean only that a government that I lead would do so. Other governments might take a different view. It is always competent for the leader of the government of the day to take the view that such a situation does not constitute a termination of his office. Hon. gentlemen who have studied political biographies will remember that when Lord Rosebury resigned, it was thought that he should not have done so. He resigned because of an adverse vote on a cordite item in the estimates. It was not expected that he would resign, but all the commentators thought he was only making an excuse for doing so. I am merely expressing my personal and independent opinion that if the executive of the day, speaking through the governor in council, passed an order in council dismissing John Smith as a trustee and assigned a cause for so doing, the government then of course must face just what I said a moment ago, the joint support of both houses, that is, the Commons and the Senate, because the statute so provides, and if only one gave its approval, then the government had failed in the action which was taken by its executive.

Mr. EULER: It could still do as it liked about resigning.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; I was expressing my opinion that under those circumstances I would resign; I would have no hesitation about the matter.

Mr. EULER: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that it was compulsory.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I was only trying to express my view of what the constitutional issue would be. As I say, Lord Rosebury did resign although it was thought he should not have done so. When the vote was taken there were only a few members in the house and the vote was on a cordite item in the estimates. Each prime minister must do what he considers is his duty. In the one case a prime minister resigned, was sent back by the sovereign and consented to form a new administration. I mention that merely because the matter depends entirely—and I am sorry my hon. friends have approached it from the wrong angle—on the method of approach. If the dismissal is made by the executive, the executive must take the consequences of failure to secure approval as provided by the statute. If, however, it asks for approval before making the dismissal, it would not be bound one way or the other, but it would be an impossible situation to have a board of trustees or any member of it operating in that way.

But it all comes back to this—and I submit it to the committee with some confidence—if we are to secure the type of business men we require for the purpose of discharging this function, we must do as I have suggested. I do not desire in any sense to belittle the arguments that have been made as to political control of railways and references to public services. The fact is that as between private and public ownership, you must sharply differentiate between ownership and administration. If the public in the narrow sense is to manage and administer the enterprise, disaster is inevitable, but if the administration is to be conducted by those who are skilled and competent, under the same restrictions and with the same supervisions and safeguards as are imposed by shareholders upon their directors and as public ownership, that is the public ownership of a utility, exercises its power to ensure it that security, stability, continuity, efficiency and effectiveness in management and administration that are essential, then I believe we may succeed. But I do not think there is any chance for what I call public ownership if it is to be subject to the pitfalls that arise from purely public administration, and I draw a sharp distinction between holding administration responsible not to the whole body of the public and the delegation of administration of power by the government to the persons selected for that purpose. That has been the experience, at least in other countries. In Germany they have had for a long time a system of public administration. In Australia their railroads were so administered for a time, and it will be remembered that Sir Thomas Tait, then Mr. Thomas Tait, left for Victoria for the purpose of administering the state railways. Each state had a different gauge, so that the cars of one state could not go beyond its boundaries into another.

Many hon. gentlemen know we have had great difficulty in connection with what we describe in no offensive terms as the political effect on governments of the administration of government-owned property. I should like to give the committee an illustration of that because I should think every hon. member would be interested. One of the members of the pension appeal board brought an action against the crown for damages for his salary. It will be recalled that the position was abolished in 1930. I daresay hon. members will remember that by a joint committee we arrived at certain conclusions and they had the result of abolishing the appeal board as then existing. The consequence was that several gentlemen were out of positions; they secured a fiat and brought an action against the crown. This action was dismissed by the exchequer court and by the Supreme Court of Canada. The other day counsel applied for leave to appeal to the privy council. In reading the proceedings and the application I find that counsel said this: After this statute was passed, there was a general election in Canada and as a result of this changed condition, the appellant, not being of the political faith of the new government, did not secure a position under the new administration as he would have had the government of the day been sustained, and others who were of a different faith were more fortunate. That illustrates what counsel will say before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council regarding political matters in a country like this.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose that did not have much effect on the court?

Mr. BENNETT: I hope not, but I give it as an illustration of just how men's minds run with respect to matters of that kind. I resent the statement because as a matter of fact the legislation in question was not passed by this administration and it unfortunately became the duty of the government to give effect to a portion of it.

The word "politics" in connection with matters of this kind has of course sometimes assumed a very sinister meaning. Politics in the other sense is the science of government and in the broad sense politics has played and always will play a considerable part in connection with everything that is done in the government of the country. But in this case I assure the committee that we are more concerned than hon. members have any knowledge of in our struggle to secure competent and proper trustees. In that effort we have gone a very long way to secure to those whom we appoint some, shall I say assurance that they are not at once to be in conflict with the executive under conditions that make it possible for it to terminate their employment suddenly for good cause if you will, or for a cause that is the result of an endeavour to find an excuse. The case put by the hon. member for North Waterloo might be one in point; I can conceive that possibility, because you can always give instances where the operations of one road are not to be compared with those of another in the territory served and conditions of operating. Generally speaking, the human element is as capable in the one case as in the other; the physical equipment is as efficient in the one as in the other and results can be attributed to density of traffic and conditions of the country in which the service is being rendered. So with this hope we ask the committee to surround the employment of these people with the safeguards I have mentioned.

There is nothing I can add to what I have said and what has been said by the minister and by others on this side. All we can do is to say to the committee and to you, Mr. Chairman, that we believe it is essential in the public interest that this safeguard in this clause should be enacted, and the government is endeavouring to use the authority which belongs to government for the purpose of passing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with the Prime Minister that there is nothing further that he could add to what he has just said which would enable him to wriggle out of the untenable position that he took at the outset, I do submit however, that while he has resorted with some degree of skill to endless circumlocution in seeking to wriggle out of that original position, he is far from convincing us that the position which he originally took did not differ very materially from what he is now saying it was. May I give my reason? A moment ago he said that the latter part of a statement of mine contradicted the former part. I would say the same of what he has just said. He said in the earlier part of his remarks that these trustees did not have to come to parliament for their salaries and they did not have to come to parliament for money—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—unless they were in a hole where they were not getting sufficient to carry on with.

Mr. BENNETT: Every dollar that they get for the purposes of capital expenditure on that property this parliament gives them, and for deficits and everything else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These gentlemen do not come to parliament for their salaries; they are secure in their position, and the Prime Minister by this clause is seeking to make them absolutely secure against dismissal except by an address of both houses of parliament. If a ministry were to dismiss them before asking parliament to dismiss them—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the usual course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What then is the use of inserting a clause that they can only be dismissed by both houses?

Mr. BENNETT: To prevent any abuse of the power; just exactly that. No executive is going to dismiss people when they know that behind their action there must be the approval not only of this chamber but of the other chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When this section becomes law any action of any ministry in the direction of dismissing these gentlemen is of no avail at all until both houses of parliament have joined in an address to that end. The Prime Minister now says that a ministry that wishes to get rid of these gentlemen might get rid of them by dismissing them first, and then getting the approval of parliament. In so saying he is contradicting the language of the proposed statute because under this section these men cannot be dismissed until both houses have acquiesced. The Prime Minister might as well say at once, especially after his Minister of Railways has openly differed with him, and now that he recognizes that he has not support in his own cabinet for the doctrine he was putting forward, that his original position is untenable and that he is now recanting what he said. For that he might well be commended.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, we have had quite a lengthy discussion from all sides, the right hon. gentleman has put himself on record and other hon. gentlemen, and with all respect I would suggest that we take the vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All right.

Mr. HEENAN: I would be prepared to support this clause if the minister would take into consideration the insertion of a provision that no railway employee on the Canadian National would be dismissed except on a joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: Why the laugh? What right has a trustee to be appointed with all these safeguards, a man who has a right to dismiss employees without justification, a man who has the right to dismiss the manager of the Canadian National Railways if he does not do his bidding, a man so entrenched in power that his salary cannot be reduced or he himself be dismissed from office unless the government risks its life upon passing a joint resolution of the Senate and Commons. I never heard anything so preposterous in all my life. We have heard of dictatorships, but Mussolini and Hitler in Germany were never surrounded with all the safeguards that these trustees will have after they are appointed. The easiest way for the Prime Minister to get out of power would be to appoint these trustees as soon as we get this bill passed enacting this clause. That would be the easiest way for him to get out and go to the country, and if I thought that that would be the result I would vote for this clause immediately so that the people could pass upon the record of this government. Here we have been discussing this measure for the last three weeks, and we have now come to the point where we are asked to pass a clause providing for the appointment of a dictator with all the worst elements of a dictatorship because the government appoints this man to-day and cannot dismiss him to-morrow. This dictator has power to make an onslaught on the railroad unions of this country as provided by this measure, he can create new terminals and create new companies, fifty per cent Canadian Pacific and fifty per cent Canadian National, and he can say to the employees of these companies: You used to have rights on the Canadian National and on the Canadian Pacific, a certain wage scale and certain working conditions, but under this new company you start in as new men if you start at all. No matter what he does to these men or to other men in the employ of the Canadian National Railways, no matter what he does to all this railway property worth billions of dollars, this government cannot dismiss him unless it risk its life on a joint resolution of the Commons and the Senate. Mr. Chairman, I never heard of such a thing, and I cannot believe that the government is seriously considering enacting such a clause. I would suggest that they consider it further between six and eight o'clock. Here we have a bill with two clauses in it pertaining to labour. As I said before, section 179 of the Railway Act is not applicable to the present act.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the amendment carried?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, I heard the minister say "no" when you put the question, which indicates that the government has not changed its mind in reference to clause 7 of this bill. In view of that fact I was wondering if the minister would consent to let clause 7 stand until we had discussed other features of the bill. There is no doubt about it that the trustee is fairly safeguarded, and that he has more power than I should care to give him, if I had anything to do with it. I should like the clause to stand, however, because I would like to see what protection railroad employees would have against a man who might, while in office, use his dictatorial powers.

I have in mind two amendments to other subsections which are now standing, and which provide the safeguards for employees. So far as I am concerned my further opposition to clause 7 would depend greatly upon the consideration given the other amendments. When I have discussed this bill in public some people agreed as to the possibilities I had pointed out, but suggested that to imagine them happening was drawing considerably on one's imagination. One or two of the railway employees actually suggested that I was drawing too much on my imagination. But anyone who was in the house this afternoon and heard the Prime Minister's interpretation of clause 7 must admit that in comparison with his, my interpretations were mild indeed. In fact, as I said this afternoon, I was out with a couple of government supporters the other evening, and while discussing this measure I pointed out that if the government presented a resolution to both houses of parliament calling for the dismissal of a trustee, and the resolution were rejected, the government would have no option but that of resigning. I do not like to use the words they used, but the fact is that they laughed very heartily. I am sure they must have sat in amazement this afternoon when they heard the Prime Minister place the very same interpretation on the clause. In connection with section 16 I have offered two amendments for consideration. I do not know whether or not the minister has them before him. I believe my first amendment is disposed of by the amendment which was accepted a week ago last Thursday night. That amendment affected employees laid off as a result of economies effected. I believe they are not provided for, intentionally or otherwise, owing to the fact that the government accepted the suggestion that after the merging of services the apportionment of work would be done only through negotiations with representatives of the railway employees. My last amendment, however, is still necessary. It is to the effect that wages and conditions of employment would not be changed in an arbitrary manner.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member to keep to the clause.

Mr. HEENAN: One more sentence and I shall have finished. I am explaining why I should like the minister to allow the clause to stand. My amendment asks that wages and working conditions of employees shall not be changed, except through the usual method of negotiations. Will the minister let clause 7 stand until we have completed the rest of the bill?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, we have been letting so many clauses stand that we are not making any progress. I cannot see any association between the hon. member's proposals and the clause now under discussion. We discussed this clause for at least half of the afternoon. With all due respect to the hon. member I think the rest of the committee were ready to deal with it before six o'clock. The government takes its responsibility in the matter, and has decided to allow the clause to stand as it is. After all, the right hon. leader of the opposition and his friends have put themselves on record as opposed to it. I think that should be sufficient.

In regard to the amendment which the hon. member suggested in connection with a later section, I may say that we are trying to pick out those parts which might fairly be put into the bill. As a result we are considering putting in a subclause to section 16, which would read as follows:

The National company and the Pacific company for and on behalf as aforesaid are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company created as in subsection (2) of this section referred to shall give preference for work to employees in any services or on any works taken over by such new company.

There were legal reasons why we could not make it wider than that. While we were just as anxious to protect the men as is my hon. friend, we thought the provision I have just read would give the men as much protection as possible. I believe the hon. member's point is very well covered by the amendment which we will propose at the proper time. I should like if possible to have this clause dealt with.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Section 7 agreed to on division.

On section 9 subsection 6—Approval of His Majesty or of shareholders not required.

Mr. MANION: The wording of subsection 6 of section 9 was opposed in various parts of the house. It was pointed out, perhaps correctly, that the words "approval of His Majesty" appearing in the subsection were not clear. We therefore decided that we would strike out the words "His Majesty or that of any other shareholders" and insert the word "shareholders" the clause then reading as follows:

(6) No order, regulation, by-law, act, decision or proceeding of the trustees shall require the approval of the shareholders of any company to which this section applies.

As the government is a shareholder in certain cases, that would cover His Majesty as a shareholder. Therefore we do not need to put in "His Majesty." I believe the suggested change would cover the intention of the subclause.

Mr. BENNETT: And removes any possible ambiguity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The marginal note would have to be changed to "Approval of shareholders not required."

Mr. MANION: Yes. I move that the change I have mentioned be made.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On section 11, subsection 2—Majority votes ineffective unless the chairman included in majority.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) moved an amendment the effect of which was to make it a straight majority vote, instead of giving the chairman of the board of trustees a deciding vote. In other words, according to this clause no vote of two of the trustees shall prevail unless the chairman is one of the majority. We have discussed it very thoroughly and in all fairness, and we have come to the conclusion that it is better to leave it as it is. After all, even though it is the intention at the moment that in all probability the three trustees will work full time for a certain period at least, the chairman, whoever he may be, will have very much more responsibility and will be a man of outstanding ability, we hope, and he will be the man to whom not only the government of the day but the people generally will look for results. Without doubt the other two trustees will be of importance in the organization, but we adhere to the idea that the chairman will have a position of such outstanding importance that certainly he should be of the majority.

Some arguments have been advanced against this provision, to the effect that a certain amount of jockeying might take place, but we hope that the chairman will be sufficiently broadminded that if a thing is right and the other two members are unanimous they will be able to convince him that he should be in accord with their views, and with all due respect I think that is a reasonable attitude. I think the clause as it stands is safer for the railways generally and perhaps even for the government of the day as well, because they can look to one instead of to three. I believe the clause is better as it stands.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the government are absolutely decided on the question I suppose there is no great object in taking up the time of the committee in repeating the arguments I have advanced already. I hope the minister is not wedded to the idea, however, to such an extent that he will not change his opinion if good reason is shown.

I have already indicated, Mr. Chairman, that this is perhaps the most important board or commission the government has appointed or may appoint. It has to do with assets of the people of Canada worth many millions of dollars, and I think it most important that if the work hitherto carried on by a board of seventeen in the case of the Canadian National and a similar board in the case of the Canadian Pacific is to be carried on by a board of three, those three members should be able to exercise their power to the fullest extent. I do not know that I can impress that point upon the government more forcibly than I have already. There can be no doubt that a trustee cannot and will not function, that it is not human for him to function, in the same way if he thinks, "Well, I am able to exercise my powers on this board only when I agree with the chairman." May I point out to the minister that he is going to select three trustees. While under the act he has power to select men who will work part time, I sincerely hope the three trustees will be full time men, for this reason: The minister knows, as I think every member of this committee knows, that we are imposing upon this board of trustees the most onerous duties that have been imposed upon any board ever appointed in this country. You cannot get the best service from them if they are in a position of inequality so that one man is inferior to another. That is bound to produce dissatisfaction because it restricts the powers of the members, and I submit that this is bound to impair the efficiency of those gentlemen. It could not be otherwise.

I should like to take a moment to point out the difference between this and some of the other boards that exercise functions somewhat similar to those that will be exercised by these trustees. Under section 118 of the Railway Act a majority of the directors shall form a quorum. The section states:

> The directors at any meeting regularly held, at which not less than a quorum are present, shall be competent to exercise all or any of the powers vested in the directors; and the act of a majority of a quorum of the directors present at any such meeting shall be deemed the act of the directors.

I am bound to say that under section 119 I find the following provision:

> No director shall have more than one vote, except the chairman, who shall, in case of a division of equal numbers, have the casting vote.

If the minister cannot see his way clear to go the full distance, as I should like him to, I think the chairman surely would be vested with sufficient power if he were put in the same position as the chairman of the board of directors under the Railway Act. That is, he would only have a casting vote in case of a tie. Then take another very important commission. The Radio Broadcasting Act, which is chapter 51 of the statutes of 1932, appoints a commission to be known as the Radio Broadcasting Commission. Subsection 3 of section 3 provides that two members of the commission shall constitute a quorum, and subsection 4 provides:

> In any proceedings of the commission the vote of the majority shall govern, but in case there are only two members present the chairman or vice-chairman may cast an additional vote.

That is perhaps the next most important commission functioning in this country today. Then we have the Canada Grain Act, which sets up a commission known as the Board of Grain Commissioners, to consist of three commissioners appointed by the governor in council. By subsection 7 of section 4 two commissioners shall constitute a quorum, and no vacancies on the board impair the right of the remaining commissioners to act. Then there is the Canada farm loan board, which is to consist of four members, one of whom is to be the minister, who shall be chairman, and the other three to be appointed by the governor in council on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may prescribe. The board may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, make regulations not inconsistent with the act for the conduct of the business of the board. Those are the most important boards or commissions functioning in Canada at present. We have also the Civil Service Commission and one or two others, but I cannot understand why on this board, which will exercise the most important, onerous and difficult functions carried on by any commission in Canada, and which will have control over a vast amount of property, we should not have three members with an equality of votes. No doubt the minister will select the best three men he can get, but when he selects his chairman I do not think he will say to himself, "Well, this is the man who is going to work practically alone." I think he will endeavour to get two other good men as well. It may happen, after this board functions for a certain period, that one of the trustees other than the chairman will prove to the satisfaction of the minister and everyone else who observes the operations of the board that he is the most capable and efficient man on the board. So I say the board will work under a severe handicap if these other commissioners are not vested with full voting power. They cannot take that interest in the work which they should; it is not possible. I am satisfied that the government cannot expect to get from that commission the same results that would be obtained if there were three full grown, full fledged trustees all functioning. I do not know that there is any object in my taking up the time of the committee further. I cannot agree with the minister that we should be doing justice to this great enterprise by handicapping it in the way this section proposes. I have already moved the amendment.

Amendment negatived on division.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—Annual budget.

Mr. MANION: In connection with this section the hon. member for North Bruce proposed an amendment, adding the words "subject to approval of parliament," so that the section would read:

The annual budget of National railways shall be under the control of the trustees, subject to approval of parliament.

To this amendment we have also given full consideration. I was strongly of the opinion when it was proposed that it would not be a wise proviso, for it would give to parliament a more strict control over the national railways than has ever been exercised under any government. Let me read the sentence following the one I have just quoted, with the amendment as I have added it:

Amounts required for income deficits, for interest on obligations outstanding in the hands of the public, for capital expenditures and for refunding or retirement of maturing securities shall be submitted by the trustees to the Minister of Finance for the consideration of the governor in council prior to presentation to parliament.

In the original argument on the proposal of my hon. friend from North Bruce I read that sentence, pointing out that under that provision all branches of the railway management might, if parliament so desired, be brought under discussion inasmuch as the Minister of Finance will have to come to parliament with his estimates to cover the items indicated—deficits, interest on outstanding obligations, capital expenditures, and so forth—and in connection with those estimates the House of Commons will be able to do anything that it does to-day. It can appoint a committee to go into matters just as thoroughly as they are investigated at the present time, and if the house at any time decided that it had not received sufficient information from the trustees who were brought before the committee, the house would be in the all powerful position of refusing to pass the estimates. If, however, we are to make the budget subject to the control of parliament, we are simply putting the operation of the railways, the technical operation, absolutely under parliament; we are making it subject to the control of parliament, which is something that has never been done before. Parliament has never, under any government, had to do with the detailed operations of the railways. Under these circumstances I regret that we cannot accept the suggested amendment.

My hon. friend also said that the time was coming shortly when the national railways would not require moneys for deficits, additions and betterments voted by the house; the trustees would not have to come to parliament at all. My personal opinion is that if the Canadian National Railways within the next few years could reach that state of perfection they would have attained the ideal; in other words, it would be evidence that the trustees were handling the affairs of the railways with entire efficiency. I doubt whether it is likely that in the near future they will be in that position, but if they did succeed in getting there—and that success, attained in so short a time, would be more rapid than I expect—then the government of the day, whichever it might be, could bring in an amendment to the act to institute any greater measure of control which might be thought necessary in the public interests.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister's statement is that the government's policy is one of public ownership but not of public control; the most that one can say is that it is quasi-public control but not public control in the full or any real sense of the word.

Mr. MANION: Not control of detailed operations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The operations, I should say, are distinct from the financial aspect. Of course, in one sense everything connected with the railways must depend upon the finances; but the budget means receipts and expenditures, and I submit that you cannot have public control of any railways unless you have the entire financial affairs of those railways subject to review by parliament. Assuming that the railways are obliged to come to parliament only in so far as it is necessary to make good deficits and the like, these deficits bear a relationship to original expenditures, as well as to original receipts; and to ascertain whether or not such expenditures have been justifiable, and whether the receipts are what parliament had a right to anticipate, involves of necessity a full review. The minister says that we can discuss all these things anyhow. I say that if we can discuss them, to make our discussion of any value we ought to have the final say. Discussion means nothing if as a result of it parliament cannot voice its opinion to effect one way or the other.

Mr. MANION: But parliament can discuss these things as much as it has ever done. According to my interpretation of the clause, parliament can in the future discuss such matters as extensively as it has done in the past, although what my right hon. friend says is true, namely, that the loss would already have been incurred. But that has always been so; we have always dealt with the budget only in so far as deficits, betterments and additions have been concerned. Under my right hon. friend's government as under this, that has been the method pursued. My absolute conviction is that under this clause we have as full power as we have ever had to go into any matter we wish to discuss, but I do not think it would be wise to make the operating budget of the railways subject to approval of parliament. That would be carrying parliamentary interference to an extent unheard of in the past.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the government be still obliged to authorize capital expenditures?

Mr. MANION: Yes; that is distinctly indicated in the next sentence.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The situation with respect to additional capital expenditures will remain as it is.

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to me that the government and parliament are really on the horns of a dilemma in dealing with this matter. My difference with the minister is perhaps most simply stated by citing the actual facts, in the words that seem to be most applicable. I think it is a mistake to talk of public control when parliament is deliberately handing over the control of the budget to three trustees who are independent entirely of the House of Commons. I think we might as well say that the government are of the view that public ownership and public control in the full sense of the word are not possible; that the most the government are prepared to concede is that there can be public ownership with a degree of quasi public control. If the minister feels that it will embarrass the situation to have the entire budget brought before parliament, the ministry being held responsible, I will not press the matter further. My own view however is that the Minister of Railways should be continued as such and should be answerable to parliament for the action of the trustees. He should as minister, as a member of the cabinet, review the situation of the national railways in its entirety, and the budget of the railways in its entirety should be brought to parliament; whether to be discussed in detail or not, whether to be discussed in a special committee or in the committee of the whole house, are matters for the government to decide. If you are going to have public control, I think it is necessary that some minister of the crown should take responsibility for the budget framed by the trustees, and being clothed with the necessary authority the government should be prepared to stand or fall as it is supported or not supported.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if the minister has considered fully the wording of this section? I understand that his intention is that the items mentioned here, that is, income deficits, interest on obligations outstanding in the hands of the public, capital expenditures and refunding or retirement of maturing securities, shall be submitted to parliament. The minister is perhaps more familiar than I with the act, but let me point out that the act provides for the issuance of securities for equipment purposes without the approval of parliament. That is a capital expenditure which may be made without the approval of parliament. I mention this because it seems to me the section is none too clear in requiring that these expenditures shall be submitted to parliament. It is worded rather vaguely, the effect being that they shall be submitted by the trustees to the Minister of Finance for the consideration of the governor in council prior to presentation to parliament. Section 28 of the act provides for certain capital expenditures which do not have to be submitted to parliament but which may be passed by the governor in council. Section 30 provides that after parliament has authorized expenditures on equipment to the extent of twenty-five per cent of the cost, the company may make equipment issues for the remaining seventy-five per cent. Under subsection 4 of section 28 equipment certificates and other obligations may be issued without the intervention of parliament. I think the section should be worded a little more clearly so as to provide definitely that these things shall be all submitted to parliament, rather than having the nebulous provision that they shall be submitted to the governor in council prior to presentation to parliament.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member is right as to section 30 of the act. For the information of the committee, I shall read that section. It is:

> Where parliament has authorized expenditures on equipment to the extent of twenty-five per cent of the cost of such equipment, the company may make or cause to be made one or more equipment issues for the remaining seventy-five per cent of such cost.

My hon. friend is slightly in error. In the past these matters had to come before parliament. It is quite true the railway could borrow seventy-five per cent of the cost but it had first to submit to parliament the twenty-five per cent. This is known as the Philadelphia plan and is followed by all the railways on the continent in the purchasing of equipment. Let us say that a railway desires to buy $1,000,000 worth of equipment. They would get twenty-five per cent of the cost from their shareholders—in this case the parliament of Canada—and they would go out and borrow the remaining seventy-five per cent of the cost in the form of equipment trust bonds. These were usually sold in the United States but during the past year, because of the financial situation in the United States and the financial condition of the Canadian National Railways, these have had to be taken up entirely by parliament. I am afraid that for some time to come the amounts needed for equipment will have to be considered in parliament in the estimates of the Minister of Finance just the same as other additions and betterments. But in any event, twenty-five per cent of the cost would have to be approved of by parliament before the railways could go out and borrow the other seventy-five per cent. At the present time there is no chance at all of the Canadian National Railways borrowing money on their own guarantee. As my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce points out, in any event they would have to come here for twenty-five per cent of the cost. I do not think that clause 12 lessens the powers of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister just look at the section. I am suggesting that after the word "submitted" there be inserted the words " to parliament". There would then be no question at all as to these matters having to be submitted to parliament. The words "prior to presentation to parliament" would be struck out. I think that would make the section much clearer and would leave no necessity for implication.

Mr. MANION: I would point out that irrespective of the act, these matters have to come to parliament. The Minister of Finance has to provide the money and the only way he can do that is by an estimate. The money must be voted by parliament, so the matter must come to parliament.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, seventy-five per cent of the cost is raised by equipment issues without coming to parliament.

Mr. MANION: They must first come to parliament for twenty-five per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: They could not raise the seventy-five per cent without first getting the twenty-five per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: Section 30 of the act is an enabling clause. Where parliament has authorized expenditures on equipment to the extent of twenty-five per cent of the cost, the company may authorize issues for the remaining seventy-five per cent. Subsection 4 of section 28 refers to equipment certificates or obligations in any form intended to be issued to the public. Under that section they are issued by the governor in council and not by parliament. I contend that this section could be drafted in such a way as to require the submission of these things to parliament instead of stating in an indirect way that they shall be submitted to the Minister of Finance for the consideration of the governor in council prior to presentation to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: It could be made to read "and thereafter submitted to parliament."

Mr. RALSTON: Instead of "prior to"?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The section now reads:

—of maturing securities shall be submitted by the trustees to the Minister of Finance for the consideration of the governor in council prior to presentation to parliament.

I suggest that after the word "council" there be added the words "and thereafter presented to parliament", striking out the words "prior to presentation to parliament".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could not the section be further improved if instead of the word "consideration", the word "approval" was used?

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that the word usually used when anything is submitted to the governor in council? That word implies a possible disapproval, while consideration is distinct from approval. The section as amended would read:

—by the trustees to the Minister of Finance for the consideration of the governor in council and thereafter presented to parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had in mind the making sure that the governor in council approves every capital expenditure. If it is simply for consideration, capital expenditures might be made by the company in advance of any approval.

Mr. MANION: They must get the money from parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: As the right hon. gentleman knows, that did happen on one or two occasions and it caused trouble.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANION: There was an amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Bruce.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): It was only a suggestion.

Mr. YOUNG: Before the amendment carries, I would like to ask the minister whether some time before parliament prorogues he will endeavour to give an explanation of the figures I put on Hansard this afternoon.

Mr. MANION: With what was the hon. member dealing? In the lengthy discussion I have forgotten what it was.

Mr. YOUNG: I quoted figures to show that the decline in earnings on the Canadian National Railways was 24·89 per cent while on the Canadian Pacific it was 19·35 per cent, or a difference of 5½ per cent.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. MANION: I might as well dispose of that now. I noticed some time ago some of the newspapers and my hon. friend and one or two other members were making the statement that in the last few months the decline in earnings on the Canadian National was greater than on the Canadian Pacific. I naturally wondered why that should be. At that time I asked the question of the management. I shall first give the explanation briefly in my own words and then Mr. Hungerford's explanation which is in the shape of a telegram addressed to me. My recollection of the explanation was this, that the Canadian Pacific has not in the United States the connection that the Canadian National has. The Canadian National has the Grand Trunk Western in particular which in the past used to supply a very heavy traffic to the Canadian National by reason of the automobile business in particular and other commodities. The Grand Trunk Western runs from the Canadian side right through Port Huron and Detroit to Chicago, through a very heavily populated and highly developed industrial section of the United States, and because of the severe depression in that section—and Detroit perhaps has been hit harder in proportion to population than any other section in the United States—the Canadian National has suffered acutely. In other words, it was not being fed the business which it had heretofore been receiving. That in a nutshell was the explanation given to me. There was an article in one of the local Canadian papers, a paper which, while of Liberal leanings, is not unfriendly to the administration; I think, generally speaking, it desires to be fair in its criticisms, but this article was so severely critical that I telegraphed to Mr. Hungerford the same night, drawing his attention to the article and asking for his explanation. This is the telegram which Mr. Hungerford sent me in reply:

Mr. CASGRAIN: What paper was that?

Mr. MANION: That does not make any difference. The article was written on April 4, and the reply was sent to me from Montreal by Mr. Hungerford on April 5. The telegram reads:

A statement was given to the House of Commons last week showing the gross revenues of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways for the first eleven reporting periods of 1933 as compared with the corresponding periods of 1932. The fact that the Canadian National Railways returns showed a decrease of 23 per cent as compared with 1932 and those of the Canadian Pacific Railway a 17 per cent decrease has led certain editorial writers to draw unwarranted deductions. One Toronto newspaper said yesterday:

"On the face of things the Canadian National Railways is getting the worst of the cooperation deal."

The cooperative economies have had nothing to do with the fluctuations in the amount of decrease on the two major Canadian railway systems. The Canadian National management is continuously watchful of the traffic and other interests of the system and there has been no diminution in its efforts to safeguard its business. The fluctuations to which attention has been drawn are no greater than previous fluctuations which were in favour of the Canadian National. The relative traffic situation of the two properties varies from time to time in accordance with changes in the crop conditions and trade conditions in the territories respectively served by the carriers. The explanation of the present swing is to be found in two major factors. The first is that the Canadian Pacific gross earnings are at present receiving a stimulus from a comparatively good crop in 1932 in southern Saskatchewan and Alberta, in which territory that system is the chief transportation agency. For the previous three years that territory had suffered from crop failures. The second condition affecting the relative showing at this time is the falling off in traffic between the United States and Canada and the reduction in United States traffic passing through the dominion, the business disturbance which accompanied the "banking holiday" having accentuated this decline in recent weeks. The Canadian National, by reason of the location of its lines in Canada and the United States, is a larger factor in business of this character than the Canadian Pacific. The earnings of the Canadian National Railways therefore reflect more closely the conditions which have prevailed in the United States and international traffic. In the working out of cooperative measures between the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways, you may be assured that the best interests of the Canadian National system will be fully protected.

That was a telegram which, in so far as its contents are concerned, was unsolicited by me. I merely drew to Mr. Hungerford's attention this editorial which was a very severe one along the line mentioned, and asked him for an explanation. This is his explanation which is a very full one. In giving mine from memory, I had forgotten that not only he but other officers had mentioned to me the fact, to which he draws attention in the telegram, that crops in southern Saskatchewan and Alberta had increased in the last year as compared with the previous three and that the Canadian Pacific serves, as the committee knows well, the southern portions of those provinces to a greater extent than does the Canadian National, the latter having been built later and serving to a large extent the northern areas. That, I think, is a fair explanation of the figures given by my hon. friend. I thank him for mentioning the matter, because I have had this telegram since April 5, a month ago, and I am glad to have this opportunity of giving it to him and to the committee.

Amendment (Mr. Bennett) agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the section as amended is carried, I think the Prime Minister agreed with me that it would be wise to substitute the word "approval" instead of "consideration" in line 46. I would like to suggest that that be accepted if possible. I have under my hand an amendment to that effect, but I would much rather the amendment came from the ministry itself, if they deem it proper. My reason for again mentioning the matter is this: we seem to be assuming all along that the three trustees will be paragons of virtue, the ministry dark angels and all members of parliament suspect in some way. That may or may not be the case.

Mr. BENNETT: Under present conditions it might be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not go even that far at the moment, but certainly if these three trustees are going to have power for an indefinite time and to be free from any kind of supervision, I think they ought to be obliged to get the approval of the governor in council before they incur vast new expenditures on capital account.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid the right hon. gentleman did not quite follow me in my statement as to why I thought the word "consideration" would be the apt word instead of "approval." Would he be good enough to observe the language of the clause?

Amounts required for income deficits, for interest on obligations outstanding in the hands of the public, for capital expenditures and for refunding or retirement of maturing securities shall be submitted by the trustees to the Minister of Finance—

Not for his consideration, but "for the consideration of the governor in council prior to presentation to parliament." The word "consideration" involves the right to cut them down. If it is merely approval, as the right hon. gentleman will see, there would be no power in the governor in council to cut them down. The addition of another word may be necessary, but the word "consideration" is the apt word there. I quite agree with the idea of my right hon. friend, but the word "consideration" is inserted for the purpose of indicating that the governor in council may approve or disapprove and if it disapproves, obviously the use of the word "approval" would not be quite apt.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the words "consideration and approval" might be used; add the words "and approval." Otherwise I think the section will be construed by the trustees to mean, that they are free to incur fresh capital expenditures, and that only after they are incurred will they be obliged to send along a statement of what they have done for the consideration of the governor in council, not necessarily for his approval at all. Then the statement will come to parliament and parliament will be told: "Oh well, the governor in council had nothing to do with this. It was all done before we knew anything about it." I think all capital expenditures ought to be made subject to the approval in advance of the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman desires to make that clear beyond peradventure we might add after the word "consideration" in the forty-sixth line the words "and approval or disapproval in whole or in part" of the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all right.

Mr. BENNETT: It is rather long but I am perfectly willing to put that in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The leader of the opposition wants to load the government of the day with the onus of approval or disapproval. I think he speaks with feeling on that subject for my mind goes back to the days of the Scribe hotel when a capital expenditure of very great magnitude was made by the railway company without, we were told, the knowledge or consideration of the government. If that lesson has sunk in and this government will be good enough to take notice of that lesson I am heartily in favour of the proposed amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I move, Mr. Chairman, to add after the word "consideration" in the forty-sixth line the words "and approval or disapproval in whole or in part." It is rather awkward but it covers the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MANION: There is also an amendment to be made in the second line. The words "Estimates of the" should be inserted before the word "amounts."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MANION: Would you read the section as it now stands, Mr. Chairman, with the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): It reads as follows:

The annual budget of National railways shall be under the control of the trustees. Estimates of the amounts required for income deficits, for interest on obligations outstanding in the hands of the public, for capital expenditures and for refunding or retirement of maturing securities shall be submitted by the trustees to the Minister of Finance for consideration and approval or disapproval in whole or in part of the governor in council and thereafter presented to parliament. Income deficits shall not be funded. Amounts provided by parliament to meet capital expenditures shall not be diverted to cover deficits in operation unless with the express authority of parliament.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 16—Cooperative measures, plans and arrangements by C.N.R. and C.P.R.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River proposed two amendments which I shall read so that the house will get the gist of them. The amendment I read a few minutes ago takes in the better part of the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River and covers to a large extent the idea he had in mind. He proposed to add the following paragraph to subsection 2:

Employees laid off as a result of economies effected under the provisions of this section shall be given preference for employment in any terminal or other company organized for joint operations.

And then this paragraph:

Employees so transferred to or employed by any terminal or other company shall not be subject to any change in working conditions except through negotiations and shall be entitled to be represented through their labour organizations in all matters affecting their conditions of employment.

We are proposing the following in place of those two paragraphs. It will be subclause 3. The numbering will have to be changed:

(3) The National company and the Pacific company for and on behalf as aforesaid are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company created as in subsection (2) of this section referred to shall give preference for work to employees in any services or on any works taken over by such new company.

There were reasons why we could not go further than that, reasons for example which take into account cooperation, we will say, between two shops in one city with perhaps the complication of other sections of the country being brought into the dispute. If I understood my hon. friend aright, the idea he had in mind was that if two shops in Winnipeg, let us say, were amalgamated, then so far as possible the employees who had theretofore been employed in those two shops should be utilized in the new shop or the shop that was kept in operation. In our amendment we have covered that point without bringing in extraneous ideas that would complicate the matter and simply lead to difficulties between the men and the company. We have endeavoured to cover it as fairly as we could without making it wide enough to start nothing but disputes between the employees and the railway company.

Mr. HEENAN: I believe the minister has gone a long way to cover the point I had in mind, but I fear he has not grasped the full significance of all I had in mind. The minister will observe that section 16 gives the trustees the right to enter into an agreement with the Pacific company and to form new companies controlled by stock ownership between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. What the men feared was, and they have to look forward, that the new company might say to the employees that they have no seniority rights, that they are under the new company, and that therefore the new company was not obliged to take them over. The minister has covered that point. But I was not thinking so much of the merging of two shops into one as of the possibility that the new company that might be organized under subsection 2 (a) might tell the employees that they would take the men they required for the carrying on of the service but not under the old schedule of wages and conditions of employment. In other words, they could break their agreements; that is what I had in mind. The minister has gone a long way to cover the point, and if he will only add to his amendment a few words so that there will be no question as to the men having any say in the matter I shall be obliged. His amendment now reads:

> The National company and the Pacific company for and on behalf as aforesaid are directed to provide that any new company created as in subsection (2) of this section referred to shall—

Then I would add these words: "by negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected," > —give preference for work to employees in any services or on any works taken over by such new company.

I suggest the addition of only these words "by negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected." That would then be in line with the amendment accepted the other day from the hon. member for East Algoma. If the minister would approve of those words, I believe we would be satisfied.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the hon. member sent across to me the change which he had suggested. I am afraid however, that his proposed change would bring about one of the complications which we are trying to avoid. May I illustrate —I may be illustrating badly, because I do not know at all well how the two companies will go about cooperating as to terminals, shops and so on—but in my own humble way let me illustrate what might happen. I am convinced that the clause he has suggested would cause difficulty. Let us suppose that there are two shops in one terminal point where two railway companies have been operating, and that the two railway companies using two separate shops decided to operate with only one shop. I imagine that that is something which might take place at certain points. Perhaps instead of using the term shops I should use the word "terminals." At Toronto, for example, there is a joint terminal company which handles all the terminal work at that point. It is not a Canadian National terminal; it is not a Canadian Pacific terminal; it is operated by a separate and distinct company. Suppose at Winnipeg the same policy is decided upon,—and at this point may I add that I have no reason for choosing Winnipeg as an example. I have no wish to be quoted as saying that there is any suggestion of this practice being adopted at that point, but it is possible that it may be done at some points. We will suppose that in Winnipeg a terminal company is decided upon such as is operating in Toronto. Such terminal company would be separate and distinct from the Canadian National or Canadian Pacific railways. In working the terminal, by the amendment which we propose, we are directing them to employ so far as possible the men who were employed in the two terminals previously operating. But if we provide that they must negotiate with the representatives of the employees affected there is a danger that the new company would be placed in a difficult position. I may not be able to explain clearly the point I have in mind, but we must remember that it would be a new company. It would not be the Canadian National Railways and it would not be the Canadian Pacific Railway. Therefore the agreement which they had had with the men would cease to be operative for the time being. There is no reason to think that, necessarily, conditions of labour would be altered; there is no reason to believe that wages would be changed. But at the same time it would be a separate and distinct company negotiating with the men, and I am not sure that the suggestion of the hon. member would not complicate matters. After discussing the matter with the railway companies, and discussing it very fully with my officers, we came to the conclusion that we would not be justified in accepting the suggestion. As the hon. member admits, we did cover the ground fairly well by the amendment which we proposed. I ask the hon. member to accept the clause in its present form, and if it is found that in any case the men are not being treated fairly, there should be no difficulty in arranging an amendment to improve their position. I have no reason to believe that the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National would treat their men other than fairly; I believe in years gone by they have always done so. I hope the hon. member will accept the amendment which is made in the best of good faith as a reasonable compromise in regard to his two amendments.

Mr. HEENAN: I wish I could, because I am just about as tired of this debate as the minister is. However I am satisfied that the minister would be doing a good turn if he were to invite the representatives of employees to come in, because they always help rather than hinder. Let me give an illustration. We will suppose that in Winnipeg there are two shops. As a matter of fact there are four shops, namely at Fort Rouge, North Transcona, the C. P. R. shops, and the new roundhouse. We will say however, that there are two shops, and that we are forming a new company from them. As I read the clause, it is provided that preference will be given to the employees taken over. However the very fact that preference is given immediately opens up the question as to which men will be taken over, and as to whether they will be selected according to seniority, fitness, age, or for some other reason. Therefore I suggest that as in the last fifty or sixty years the railway companies should negotiate through the two channels. I believe the minister will agree that that is a helpful suggestion. I have left out all questions of wages or working conditions. The minister will note that a week ago last Thursday he accepted the very same amendment, in the following words:

[Mr. Manion.]

They are further directed that whenever they shall so agree they shall endeavour to provide negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected.

The suggestion I am making now is really the same that I made on the former occasion. I do wish the minister would accede to my request.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not know exactly what thoughts are in the mind of the minister which lead him to feel that by the inclusion of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, complications may arise. In my own judgment complications would be very substantially avoided by accepting the hon. member's suggestion. I have had much experience in connection with the amalgamation of the two railroads, the operations of two railroads, and the incorporation of the employees of the two railroads into one body. I am certain that if the minister could see his way clear to accept the hon. member's viewpoint he would be making it much easier for those who are bringing about the cooperation. The change suggested by the hon. member would be very helpful if a new company were formed where two now exist.

Mr. MANION: I am just as anxious to satisfy the men as anyone is, and I am very happy to hear the opinions expressed by the hon. member for East Algoma. I still fear, however, that the suggested change would complicate the clause. In the event of the formation of a third company, the two old companies, namely the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, are directed by our amendment to endeavour to give preference to former employees. The new company, owing to the fact that it is new, will have no agreements; I cannot understand, however, why it would not desire to pick the men according to seniority, as is done in every other section of the railway works. I am afraid if we put in the words suggested by the hon. members for Kenora-Rainy River and East Algoma we would be inserting words which might possibly give rise to difficulties. I propose that for the moment the clause stand, and that we proceed with the two other clauses with which we have to deal. We could return to this one later.

Section stands.

On section 23—Certain orders of tribunal require formal written consent of presiding officer.

Mr. MANION: We are changing the wording of this section merely to clarify it. In place of section 23 as it now stands I am proposing the following:

23. Where the execution of an order, or the carrying out of a decision of a tribunal, involves the doing of any act which by any statute requires the leave, sanction, assent or approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners, or where in the opinion of the presiding officer of a tribunal composed of not more than three members the public interests involved are of sufficient importance to warrant it, no order made by a tribunal shall be operative without the concurrence of the presiding officer and his formal written assent, and on such concurrence and assent having been given, no such leave, sanction, assent or approval of the said board will be required.

Perhaps that was a little difficult to follow, and I might explain it in a few sentences. Originally it was provided that in a case with which the Board of Railway Commissioners had a right to deal in the ordinary course of events, or in a case where the chairman thought the public interest was involved, he could veto the decision of the other members. It was drawn to my attention, I think particularly by the hon. member for Dauphin, that the chairman should not be in a position to overrule the other four members if they differed from him. I thought this was a reasonable attitude, so this change has been made. In a case where, in the ordinary course of events, the Board of Railway Commissioners would be consulted, the chairman of the arbitral tribunal, who is also the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, can veto the decision if he wishes, because he is acting in the dual capacity of chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and chairman of the tribunal. In the second place, when there are three members of the tribunal and the chairman considers the matter in the public interest he can overrule the other two members. He has that power because as chairman of the board he is supposed to be, and I think has been and is at present, more familiar with railway questions and with the public interest as it bears upon those questions than the other members may be. So when there are three members of a tribunal the chairman can overrule the other two if he considers it in the public interest that he should do so. Then, in an arbitral tribunal consisting of five members—because as my hon. friends know there are cases in which two other members may be brought in—where it is only a matter of public interest the chairman cannot overrule the other four members; if three of the other four take a certain position he has not the power to overrule them.

I hope I have made myself clear. We have endeavoured to clarify the clause and I believe we have really made it more useful and, if you like, more democratic.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This may or may not be a rather serious power to give the chairman, but I suppose these will be largely cases involving both railways with regard to the elimination of duplication and expenditure. Could the minister cite a case in which the ruling of the board might be overruled. Frankly I do not think this is very serious, but I do not like the idea of an order of the railway commission being overruled.

Mr. BENNETT: The privy council has that right now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, but this is not the privy council; this is a tribunal. If the minister could give an instance where an order of the board might be overruled by the tribunal it would help us understand this section better.

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I can give a specific case, but as my hon. friend knows there are many instances in which the railways must get the approval of the board before they can cooperate, even without this law. For example, supposing one company leases to the other company running rights over one of its lines. That agreement must be approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners. Suppose that in such a case the board took one attitude and the arbitral tribunal took another. That does not come under this clause, but suppose that happened: in such a case, where the two railways wish to carry on the measure of cooperation and the tribunal decided that they should be allowed to do so, the tribunal could overrule the decision of the board. The real point here is that the chairman of the arbitral tribunal is the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners; he knows the regulations of the Board of Railway Commissioners and, in a sense, he possesses the powers of that board except in cases of abandonment, which my hon. friend will remember we dealt with particularly. With that exception he has the powers of the board in ordinary cases, and in those cases which in the ordinary course would have been submitted to the board he has the power of veto. His agreement with the decision must be put in writing or it does not become law.

I do not think there is anything in this provision that we need fear; I think it is absolutely fair and just. As a matter of fact I believe we have made it better by the change, because we have allowed four members of the tribunal to overrule the chairman in matters of public interest.

Mr. VALLANCE: When a tribunal of five members is appointed who determines who shall be the other two members?

Mr. MANION: If it were a very serious case the two railways might ask for a tribunal of five, and in most cases the president of the exchequer court would be the man to choose the other two members.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 24—Tribunal orders prevail over orders of railway board.

Mr. MANION: This section reads:

In the event of any conflict between an order of the Board of Railway Commissioners and that of any tribunal, the order or decision of the tribunal shall prevail.

We have already adopted a clause providing that in cases of abandonment the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners must be obtained, and the right hon. leader of the opposition suggested we should make that exception in this clause. I took the attitude at the time, with the advice of my legal officers, that this provision was already made in part II of the bill, which overrode section 24. If there is any doubt about it, however, there would be no harm in including at the end of the clause these words:

except in the case of any abandonment of any line of railway.

This is really a repetition, but it will not make any difference and if the right hon. leader of the opposition thinks it adds to the safety of the railways I have no objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not pressing that; I do not think that was really what I was emphasizing. What I had in mind was the sort of thing the minister himself had in mind with regard to the previous section. The Board of Railway Commissioners is the body that more particularly represents the public. The tribunal represents the railways plus the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the final word, so to speak, in a conflict should rest with the Board of Railway Commissioners rather than the tribunal. I thought the minister had the cart before the horse, that was my point.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MANION: Then there is to be a section added, which will be clause 28, as follows:

28. This act shall come into force on the 1st day of July, 1933.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I should like to be sure as to the status of the Intercolonial railway before this act is passed and we give this unnamed board of trustees power to administer railway matters in this country.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. MANION: In my opinion there is nothing in this act that will in any way interfere with or take away the rights of the Intercolonial railway, which was built under obligations agreed upon even before the British North America Act was passed. While the British North America Act merely states that the Intercolonial railway will be built, there are at the same time understandings which have never been interfered with and which I do not think will be interfered with under this act. I do not think that any government would disturb the rights of the Intercolonial, so that my hon. friend can set his mind at rest in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the minister in a position to advise the committee what salaries will be paid the trustees?

Mr. MANION: No, I am sorry; that is a matter that has not been discussed. The opinion is that if we get the right type of men we shall have to pay reasonable salaries, but personally I do not believe that we shall have to pay any such salary as was paid the late president. I say that without any intention of reflecting on anyone. I have looked into this matter carefully and I believe the three trustees will be paid less than the amount paid the seventeen directors plus the president, because one of the trustees is chairman and acts on occasion as president. I think there will be a considerable saving, even allowing for exceptionally good salaries such as might be demanded.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Even if they give all their time?

Mr. MANION: Frankly, I cannot go into this matter fully because it has not been discussed. I have a few ideas on the subject myself but so far they have not taken definite form, and therefore I do not care to express them at the moment.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Cooperative measures, plans and arrangements by C.N.R. and C.P.R.

Mr. MANION: We have given a good deal of study to the framing of an amendment to cover the point made originally in connection with this section by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, a section in which the hon. member for East Algoma is also very much interested. Having done that, I do not like to accept any amendment of a kind which my legal adviser, two or three times in the course of the discussion, has given me to understand that, like myself, he fears will confuse the issue. If the two hon. gentlemen whom I have referred would agree—

Mr. HEENAN: If the minister will pardon me, I will make one more attempt at this stage to convince him. The proposal he is about to submit to the committee means practically that the railways shall give preference to employees. Which employees, may I ask, the senior employees, those most fitted for work, the youngest or the oldest? Many of these questions will come up, and it is absolutely necessary that the negotiations should be carried on through the representatives of the men as has been done in the past. I am not asking the minister to accept my amendment; I am not offering it as an amendment; but I would ask the minister to change his amendment in such a way as to incorporate in it the idea I am putting forward. I believe that is what he wants to do, and it cannot be done properly with the proposal as it stands. What the minister proposes would exclude negotiations with the men.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for East Algoma takes the same attitude as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, but having given a good deal of attention to the drafting of the clause I regret that I cannot accept it. I assure the committee that I am prefectly sincere when I say that if difficulties arise later on and are pointed out I shall have no objection then to considering an amendment. But I should not like on this short notice to make any change, although I am just as anxious as my hon. friend to safeguard the interests of the men. I think we have gone as far as we can be reasonably expected to go when we stipulate that the railways are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company created shall give preference for work to employees in any service or on any works taken over by such new company.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister says he has discussed this matter with the law officers, and after that discussion he is reluctant to change it. He has listened to me representing what I regard as the sentiments of the men, and he has also listened to the hon. member for East Algoma, a supporter of the government, who has had some experience in these matters; yet he hesitates to accept an amendment which is the practical working out of all these problems.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. member give a concrete illustration of his meaning?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, I will, because I believe that the minister wants to do the right thing. Suppose we created a new terminal in Winnipeg, where there are four yards at the present time, three of them operating, and three back shops. On the formation of a new company under this act, with the amendment which the minister suggests, the officials of the railway company will give preference in connection with works or services that are taken over. That means that the railway company can pick and choose among the men, and they might not place them according to seniority, because there is no provision as to what men are to be chosen, or how, or what shall govern in regard to age, seniority, or anything else. All I want is that they shall be taken over after negotiations with the men, so that the representatives of the men will come to an agreement with the company to fill the several positions satisfactorily. The minister knows that we have had a Montreal agreement which has been the subject of dispute for many years, involving the appointment of boards of conciliation, and after the expenditure of large sums of money the men are not yet all satisfied.

Mr. MANION: And never will be.

Mr. HEENAN: Maybe.

Mr. MANION: It is impossible to satisfy all because some are naturally demoted.

Mr. HEENAN: But we can satisfy as many as possible, and if we satisfy the representatives of the men that at any rate will withdraw the railway companies from further controversy. I do regard this matter as important, and I can assure the minister that I am not proposing it off my own bat, because the men really want it. The amendment now suggested by the minister however practically excludes the men from negotiations, for it instructs the railway companies to do the choosing.

Mr. MANION: It does not say so.

Mr. HEENAN: No, but it says this, to put it briefly. The national company and the Canadian Pacific company shall give preference. That is to say, the two railways shall give preference and therefore the representatives of the men have nothing to say as to who should get the preference.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is not reading it correctly. It is not the national company and the Canadian Pacific company that shall give the preference. The national company and the Canadian Pacific company are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company created shall give preference. This will be a new company and that is where the complication arises in dealing with the organizations. The new company would not have any contracts with the men. If a new company is formed, as it was in the city of Toronto in the case of the terminal, it would not have any agreement with any organization. Within the last few minutes it has been pointed out to me by an hon. member who represents one of the big divisional points that even though there is no specific mention in the bill, the men's organizations will be in just as good a position as they were formerly to deal with the new company. This clause was drawn up after much study and work in an endeavour to meet the wishes of the hon. member for East Algoma and others, and the legal officers advise me that the clause would be complicated and the men would be given no greater protection by the insertion of this amendment.

Mr. HEENAN: How would it complicate the clause to insert the words "through negotiations with the representatives of the men"? The minister and the government accepted a similar amendment last Thursday.

Mr. MANION: To what clause?

Mr. HEENAN: To clause 16. The minister will note that that section now reads:

> They are further directed that whenever they shall so agree they shall endeavour to provide through negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected.

The words "through negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected" formed the amendment moved by the hon. member for East Algoma which was accepted by the government and the committee. All I ask the minister to do is to ensure that these new companies shall give preference for work through negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected.

Mr. MANION: Can the hon. member give me an illustration of where a complication might arise through his suggestion not being accepted?

Mr. HEENAN: There might be a case where the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific were to use one terminal or one yard. A new company would be formed under this section and it would be directed to give preference to employees of the companies taken over. That means that the new company would have to take men from the Canadian Northern, from the Grand Trunk and from the Canadian Pacific. Some of these men might have seniority rights only in one district and not in another; others might have seniority rights applicable to the district generally, while others might have seniority rights applying to practically all the eastern lines. All this would have to be negotiated under some scheme.

Mr. MANION: Does the hon. member suggest that men might be brought from the eastern lines to work in Winnipeg, for example?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member mentioned the eastern lines. Let us stick to Winnipeg as an example, as both my hon. friend and myself have been using that city as an illustration.

Mr. HEENAN: There are only the two railroads running into Winnipeg and the seniority rights are fairly uniform. The situation would not be quite so complicated as it would be in the case of a divisional point into which ran three different roads. The new company would have to take men from each organization and they would have the right to say that they would not take men over forty-five years of age. They would have the right to say almost anything and yet the men's representatives would have no say in the negotiations. I think I have shown the complications which might arise and I think the minister would be well advised in the interests of the new companies and in the interests of the men to provide that any arrangements shall be made through negotiations with the representatives of the men.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he really think that the seniority rights of any member of the brotherhoods will be interfered with by this bill? If he can give me one instance where they will be interfered with, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: I would not like to see my hon. friend voting against the government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I have the courage of my convictions.

Mr. HEENAN: That fact alone would make me hesitate to give an illustration. I want to point out to the minister that these complications have arisen and will arise. I am quite satisfied that during his and my lifetime we will not see the end of these disputes. Why the minister should hesitate to incorporate in this section the provision that these things shall be done through negotiation with the representatives of the men is beyond me. I suggest to the minister that he will yet see the advisability of accepting this amendment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Are the seniority rights of the men employed by either the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National Railways jeopardized by this bill? If the hon. member will give me one specific instance, I will vote against the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the minister is aware of the Montreal agreement and he knows what complications have arisen in that part of the country through the abandonment of lines and the merging of services. I am sure that if he insists that this section pass in its present form these grievances will exist during the lifetime of many of us now sitting in this chamber. The amendment now before us would give the men no say at all in the matter.

Mr. MANION: It does not do that at all.

Mr. HEENAN: Surely the government has no intention of providing a measure whereby in Canada new railroad companies will be created that might have for their purpose depriving the railway workers of their rights on the properties of the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific. Why, this is even worse than anything that was ever contemplated! I have been talking to some of the men and I have drawn illustrations of what could happen under this bill. I have pointed out to them that new companies could be formed and the management of such new companies could call those men in and tell them that they had rights on the Canadian Pacific; they had rights on the Canadian National, but under this new corporation they had no rights at all. That is possible under this measure. I have pointed out to them that the new company could say to them: You did have a scale of wages and working conditions on the Canadian National and on the Canadian Pacific, but on this new company you have no rights, no standards of wages and no conditions of employment. That is possible under this legislation. The minister himself acknowledged that by saying that the national company and the Pacific company could create a new company.

Mr. MANION: I hope the hon. gentleman will make his own speech and not say that I acknowledge anything? I do not wish to acknowledge anything the hon. gentleman says without examining it. I do not acknowledge anything he has just stated.

Mr. HEENAN: If the minister will contain himself, I shall make my speech. He said only a few minutes ago that the National company and the Pacific company could create a new company.

Mr. MANION: At a terminal.

Mr. HEENAN: Or a new terminal, and I say: when they do that, that new company can tell the employees of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National that they have no rights.

Mr. QUINN: The hon. member is absolutely wrong and he knows it.

Mr. HEENAN: All I want to do is to protect the men from that sort of thing. I do not for a minute believe the minister or the government intends that, but under this bill it can be done. Why should we pass an act of parliament that will permit any new company, with a dictator at the head of it, to tell the railroad men that the representation which they have had for the last sixty years is now gone by the board? Some of the men have said to me: "Why, you are drawing on your imagination!" I was told that the other night when I said that my interpretation of clause 7 as it would work out was that if the government recommended the dismissal of a trustee and the Senate of Canada did not pass the resolution, the government would be practically forced to the country. Those two gentlemen with whom I was speaking, supporters of the government, laughed at me. This afternoon we had the Prime Minister from his seat in the house giving the same interpretation. Those two gentlemen are not laughing to-night, and I see both of them in their seats. Therefore one cannot draw on one's imagination sufficiently to cover all the possibilities that are contained in this legislation. We have just passed clause 7 of this bill providing that a trustee cannot be dismissed for five years; that his salary cannot be reduced unless the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada pass a resolution to that effect. He is to be entrenched with all possible safeguards and he cannot be dismissed unless the government of Canada takes its life in its hands. The government that appoints this man to-day cannot fire him to-morrow unless it takes the chance that the Senate may defeat the resolution and put the government to the country. Yet we are going to give this trustee all these powers, power to create a new terminal, a new company, which will have authority to tell the employees that they have now no more rights on the railways than has the man in the moon. Is that the intention of the government?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. HEENAN: All right; I shall take the minister's word for that and I believe that is not the intention of the government. I do not believe they ever thought of such a thing, but under this legislation there is the possibility of it and after you appoint this man to administer the legislation, you cannot dismiss him unless the House of Commons and the Senate acquiesce.

Mr. MANION: Let me point out to the hon. gentleman where there is a fallacy in his argument. He says that we are appointing a trustee to administer this measure. The trustee is only one of a group which has anything to do with the act. We are discussing the arbitral tribunal, the cooperative measures in clause 16 which the two railways work together, so that the trustees whom we appoint are only one portion of those who work under clause 16 which we are discussing. The other group consists of the Canadian Pacific, so that the hon. gentleman is not right in saying that we are appointing one man or three men to administer this legislation. The part we are discussing is the cooperative measure which is dealt with not by the trustees but by the two railway companies, by the management of the Canadian National on the one hand and the management of the Canadian Pacific on the other.

The hon. gentleman mentions the Montreal agreement. I know there have been difficulties as to that but everybody cannot be satisfied for the reason the Montreal agreement was made when the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern were all linked up together, and consequently the question of seniority of the men on the different lines of railway came into the picture. It was finally settled on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number. They did not expect by the Montreal agreement that all the men would be satisfied, and under no rearrangement under this legislation can all the men be satisfied. If men lose their positions, they will certainly be dissatisfied, so that it is impossible to put into this bill a clause that will ensure satisfaction to all classes of employees. Though the railways are not specifically enjoined in the case of a new company to deal with the organizations of the men, they will naturally deal with the organizations and the latter will look after the interests of the men. The hon. gentleman is conjuring up many things that are not at all likely to occur. Some of the dissatisfaction that has been expressed—and I say this without in any way meaning to be unfairly critical—by the railwaymen has been induced by the statement of the hon. gentleman that this bill will do such a terrible amount of harm to them. I do not agree with any of the statements of the hon. gentleman as to the immense injury this will do to the railway men. I repeat that under this legislation and a proper revival of business, men will be taken back and not dropped out, and if we do not have a revival of business, whether under this or any other legislation, the railways cannot get on their feet; this bill alone cannot save the railways unless the whole world experiences a revival of business.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANION: Does the hon. member wish me to withdraw this amendment?

Mr. HEENAN: I would just as soon he withdrew it.

Mr. MANION: Then perhaps it might be just as well, if the hon. gentleman takes that attitude. In other words he takes the position that if he cannot get his way 100 per cent, he does not want the men to have anything. That is the attitude he is taking at the moment.

Mr. HEENAN: After the minister has that outburst out of him, if he will listen a little while, we shall try to make him see reason. Neither the minister nor any other man on that or this side of the house can filibuster me into accepting anything that I do not think is in the interests of the railwaymen of this country. No threats of withdrawal will scare me out of that position. I will say to the minister right now before I go any further that I would rather see that amendment withdrawn, whether he offers the threat or not, than accept it without the provision to safeguard the railway employees of this country. It is making it even worse that it was before.

Mr. MANION: It is not doing any such thing.

Mr. HEENAN: Here we have a bill that is intended and designed to put between twenty and forty thousand railway men of this country on the streets.

Mr. MANION: Nothing of the sort.

Mr. HEENAN: There are only about two little sentences in the whole bill that refer to labour at all. We discussed the question of inserting section 179 in its entirety, and after nearly a whole day's discussion I withdrew my amendment on the word of the minister that we could take care of the matter at some future time. Then after nearly an hour's discussion on Wednesday and for the whole of Thursday afternoon we discussed the question again on the clause that we are now discussing, and the Minister of Railways was finally kindly disposed, after a member on the government side had moved practically the same amendment which I had been contending for all afternoon. But I am not going to discuss that at this time.

Here we have an amendment to section 16 which was put in, the minister says, at my suggestion, but it is not the amendment that I proposed. It is not an amendment that I consider amply protects the railroad men of this country. The minister took my amendment into his office and after discussing the matter with his legal officers brought in another amendment which I say goes a long way to take care of the situation, provided that these negotiations are carried on through the representatives of the employees affected, but when it comes to that suggestion the minister hesitates to accept it. The very fact that the minister refuses now to accept my suggestion —it is not an amendment—indicates to me one thing, that the government or the minister's officers or his legal advisers fear that there is something in those few words that will give the representatives of the railway employees some say in the matter. Consequently the amendment as now proposed by the minister practically excludes by law the representatives of the employees from negotiating with the company.

Mr. MANION: It does not do anything of the sort. The hon. gentleman is just building up a lot of straw men so that he can go out and parade them about on the hustings.

Mr. HEENAN: I would have a lot of straw men to build up before they would be as strawy as a lot on the other side of the house. I am not building up any straw men at all. The bill says that new companies may be created, and the new companies can say just what they like to the representatives of the men. The men have no say in the matter. I do not want to say it, but my mind is coming pretty close to thinking that that is what is designed by the government.

Mr. MANION: You have said worse than that lots of times. Why not go ahead?

Mr. HEENAN: I will say this: If the minister does not accept this suggestion, I will say that this was designed to be done by the government.

Mr. MANION: I do not care what you say. Go ahead.

Mr. HEENAN: I know, but there will be a time when you will care, just like the rest of us care. I would rather be elected or defeated representing the voice of the men than representing the voice of the bondholders and the money lenders of New York. I am not going to be a party, if I can help it, to sitting idly by while a law passes through this parliament which practically excludes the representatives of the employees from any negotiations in connection with these mergers. That is really the game, and we will see how far it goes. He laughs best who laughs last. The minister's amendment reads:

> The National company and the Pacific company for and on behalf as aforesaid are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company created as in subsection (2) of this section referred to shall give preference—

That is the new company shall give preference:

> —for work to employees in any services or on any works taken over by such new company.

The new company created shall give preference. What preference, and to whom? To what class of men? Will they take men in according to their age, their seniority, their fitness for service? Will they take a greater proportion from one company than from the other? All these things must be done as they have always been done for the past fifty or sixty years and that is through negotiations with the men, but the minister by his amendment practically says that the company shall discriminate, that the company's officers are the only ones with any right to a say in the matter, and consequently the men are excluded by act of parliament. This is far more serious than anyone contemplated. I challenge the minister to take me at my word when I suggest that this is being done designedly by the government. Let him show that it is not, but that on the contrary he intends to provide in a measure a safeguard so that the representatives of the men will have some say in the matter. The same argument prevailed a week ago last Thursday.

The companies under this bill are empowered to do what? To form new companies, enter into leases, entrusting agreements, or licences, or agreements for the pooling and division of earnings arising from the joint operation of any part or parts of freight or passenger traffic, and to make arrangements with respect to joint trackage, running rights, joint ownership, or joint operating agreements. The minister accepted an amendment that these things would be done through negotiations of the representatives of the men affected. But when we come to the point where a new company is created, we fear to embarrass the new company. We feel that they may call in the representatives of the employees, and because of that we now have an amendment before us to exclude entirely the heads of the railroad unions. I cannot for the life of me see yet why we should pass a law in this country which is designed, and it is of no use if it is not so designed, to throw thousands of railroad employees out on the streets. The government refuse to accept any suggestions with respect to compensation such as were made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. They refuse practically any consideration of the human element throughout the whole bill except in that one sentence which was adopted in section 16 a week ago last Thursday.

Now we are at a new stage entirely. We have a new proposal before us. We have a provision whereby a new company can be formed, and this company can say, and might say, and judging by the attitude of the government now, I am afraid that they will say, that the men on the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National will have no rights in this new company, and that if the men are taken over it will be under new wage conditions without any protection with respect to seniority or any other rights that they have earned. The minister has gone a certain distance by saying that these men will be given preference. But he has left out entirely the most important feature of the whole matter, namely that the work should be given after negotiations with representatives of the men affected. Consequently I am now concerned more than ever because I feel that the law is designed to deprive the men of certain privileges and rights. Why, such a new company could do the men out of their pension rights already earned. The new company could simply say: "You did have pension rights under the old Canadian Pacific or Canadian National railways, but you have no pension rights here." They could say all these things to the men. All I want to do is to provide that arrangements be made through negotiations with the men's representatives. If provision is not made for that, so far as I am concerned I would just as soon see the amendment withdrawn entirely.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, while I should have preferred seeing the suggestion of the hon. member accepted, yet I am wholly opposed to his suggestion that because it is not accepted the proposed amendment be dropped. I had not the privilege of reading the clause before I spoke earlier, but in the meantime the minister has allowed me to see it. Frankly I do not think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River need be alarmed if the clause is included. He has said that the amendment is designed to make it impossible for the men to secure employment and maintain their rights. I shall come to a point in a moment or two where I believe I shall be able to convince even my hon. friend that the men will not lose their rights. The amendment as we read it is simply this:

> The National company and the Pacific company for and on behalf as aforesaid are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company created as in subsection (2) of this section referred to shall give preference for work to employees—

To what employees? To whom do they give preference?

> —in any services or on any works taken over by such new company.

May I use the illustration which my hon. friend has been using this evening, namely that concerning a Winnipeg terminal? If the different shops and yards of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific in Winnipeg are taken over, the companies are directed by this provision to give preference to the employees in the shops, terminals, yards and so on, so taken over.

One other point, in relation to the brotherhoods or organizations, as they are sometimes called. These organizations are not units in relation to specific points; they cover the whole system. They cover the Canadian National Railways from Vancouver to the Atlantic ocean and the Canadian Pacific in the same way. I am not in the least degree alarmed that any of the employees who are members of these units, who are being and have been protected—units which have negotiated with the railway companies—will not be protected in the same way by the same units. In speaking to this subject the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River displayed considerable heat and made definite statements as to what the legislation was designed for. He has made definite charges against members on this side of the house in relation to their attitude towards railway men. I have stated to some railway men whom I know very well, representatives of organized labour, that if more temperate statements had been made perhaps things would have gone along more smoothly. Only last Friday night, speaking at North Bay, my hon. friend opposite made the statement that there was not a member on the government side of the house who was prepared to treat the railway employees any differently than Chicago gangmen on the streets of that city on a dark night would treat people whom they happened to meet. I say to him that hon. members on this side of the house are just as anxious as he is to see that railway employees get justice. And I believe they are getting justice. As a matter of fact the bill is designed to make it possible for the railroads to earn enough money to employ men, and pay them the wages to which they are entitled. I, for one, want to hand back to the hon. member the statements he made not only in this house but throughout the country with regard to hon. members on this side of the house. I trust the minister will not accept the hon. member's requests for the withdrawal of the amendment. Perhaps it may not go as far in some directions as one might like it to go, but it does provide that in the event of a new company being formed, the companies from which that company is formed are specifically directed to provide that employees shall be taken care of.

Mr. MANION: In addition to what the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, there are some other statements that I should like to make. To illustrate just how unfair the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has been, I should like to read another clause which he knows is in the bill, which is part of the clause now under discussion, and an amendment to which was moved by the hon. member who has just now taken his seat. If the committee will direct its attention to the first subsection of secion 16, they will find there a direction that the national company and the Pacific company shall provide for cooperative measures, plans and arrangements. I want it understood that one of these measures, plans or arrangements would be the proposed formation of a new company.

Mr. BENNETT: It is specifically stated right below that.

Mr. MANION: It is pointed out in the bill that one of the measures, plans or arrangements consists of the formation of new companies. The first subsection contains the following:

> They are further directed that whenever they shall so agree—

For cooperative measures.

> —they shall endeavour to provide—

And this is where the hon. member interjected his amendment.

> —through negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected, as part of such measure, plan or arrangement or otherwise, for a fair and reasonable apportionment as between the employees of National railways and Pacific railways, respectively, of such employment as may be incident to the operation of such measure, plan or arrangement.

Then subsection 2 continues:

> Without restricting the generality of the foregoing, any such measures, plans or arrangements may include and be effected by means of—
> (a) new companies controlled by stock ownership—

And so on. "New companies" are companies such as we have been discussing. The very thing for which the hon. member is asking is in the legislation at the present time. The amendment simply supplements and strengthens the provision already existing. Yet the hon. member states that the purpose of the legislation—I believe his expression was "the design"—was to injure the men. We have protected the men, not on the recommendation of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, but on the recommendation of the hon. member for East Algoma. He suggested, and we accepted, a change which protects the men to a greater extent than did any proposal suggested by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. The hon. member opposite ought to be fair in his statements, when he knows that there is legislation protecting the men, that the representatives have to deal with the railways and the railways in turn have to deal with the representatives.

Mr. HEAPS: If the clause which the hon. member read covers the point, is it not superfluous to move any further amendment?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I think it is. But I should like to point out to the hon. member for North Winnipeg, who has been most fair in his criticism throughout, that we have endeavoured on a dozen occasions to satisfy hon. members from all parts of the house. We have been endeavouring to compromise, and to show our interest in the men. As a matter of fact, I have a list before me which only a few moments ago I scribbled on the back of an order paper, which goes to show the amendments which we have made in our endeavour to satisfy hon. members. First there was the amendment we accepted with regard to the abandonment of lines; we included a clause to make the protection to the public in regard to the abandonment of lines stronger than it ever has been in the past. Then my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition suggested the application of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and we put in a clause in that regard. We dropped the question of a panel; we cut down the seven year tenure of office to five years; we changed the shareholders' approval in regard to the government. We inserted a clause with regard to amalgamation, though there was nothing in this bill to bring about amalgamation. We did not admit that possibility for a moment, but to show our desire to comply with the wishes of the whole house so far as possible, and to avoid if possible unnecessary fears that might obtain throughout the country that something with regard to amalgamation was hidden in this bill, my right hon. leader and myself agreed to put in the clause with regard to amalgamation. Then there was the amendment proposed by the hon. member for East Algoma, which I quoted just now. There are seven or eight amendments which we have accepted in our desire to protect the workingmen, at the same time giving the companies a fair deal, and in order to provide against any misunderstanding that might arise.

I think we have been eminently fair, Mr. Chairman. I have been in this house for seventeen or eighteen sessions, and I do not believe that in all that time I have ever seen a government measure to which so many amendments offered by the opposition have been accepted in a desire for conciliation and to show our fairness in every possible way. I submit that almost every hon. member opposite has been fair in his criticisms and suggestions with the exception of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who has not been fair. That hon. gentleman again and again charged the members on this side of the house with a desire to injure the workingmen. No man in this house, whether he sits on the other side, in the far corner or on this side, desires to do anything but help the workingmen so far as that is possible. I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River should look at the first part of that clause before he brings forward —as I suppose he will as soon as I sit down —more of his unfair criticisms.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not intended to take any part in the debate on this section, Mr. Chairman, but the minister, and more particularly the hon. member for East Algoma, seemed to feel that the ex-Minister of Labour was stressing his point unduly, and I think the minister himself said unfairly. I do not think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, the ex-Minister of Labour, has had any intention of the kind. The other day the hon. member fought pretty much all day long for a certain amendment, and at the close of the day that amendment was conceded. This evening, however, my hon. friend the minister has been giving credit to the hon. member for East Algoma as being the one who in the main was responsible for that amendment being accepted. If we are to be absolutely fair in the matter, we must admit that the amendment was finally accepted by the minister owing to the very hard fight by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I believe the hon. gentleman feels that the railway men have placed a special degree of confidence in his judgment in this matter, and I must say that I have reason to think that they have that special confidence. Within the last day or two I have received two telegrams which speak for themselves. I need not say they were wholly unsolicited. I do not so much as know the parties who signed them. The first is dated May 2, and is from Montreal. It reads:

Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Ottawa, Ont.

Gentlemen:

Whereas it has been brought to our notice that it has been expressed in the House of Commons and through the press that the Hon. Peter Heenan is not representing the sentiment of the railway employees in connection with railway bill now before parliament, the delegates representing the locomotive engineers on the Canadian Pacific railway from coast to coast of Canada and the Canadian National railways central region now in session in Montreal go on record as unanimously approving his position as taken in connection with railway Bill No. 37.

James G. Grieves, C.N.R.
D. Guthrie, C.P.R.

The next is from Quebec, under date of May 3:

Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa, Ont.

General committee of adjustment, brotherhood of locomotive engineers, Canadian National railways, Atlantic region, now in session at Quebec City, wish to advise that the position taken by the Hon. Peter Heenan, M.P., on railway Bill No. 37 is strictly in accord with our views and we therefore want to be recorded as unanimously endorsing his action in connection with the railway Bill No. 37.

F. K. Chisholm, Secretary.
J. E. Mitchell, General Chairman.

These telegrams are from leaders of the brotherhoods named; they have come in response to or as a protest against just the sort of thing that was said to-night by the hon. member for East Algoma, namely, that the ex-Minister of Labour, in what he had been urging, did not represent the point of view of the employees. I will say quite frankly that I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has perhaps reiterated his contention too often. I think he might have been content with making a strong protest and allowing it to go at that, but that he has been doing so for any purpose other than to try to get what he believes to be a necessary clause included in the amendment, I do not think should be suggested for a moment. My own feeling is that the ex-Minister of Labour has stated his position very clearly, and if I were he I would take the word of the Minister of Railways and Canals that what has been done has been with good intent and good purpose, and that he has gone as far as he thinks he can go in the matter at present. Certainly if I were the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River I would accept the amendment before the house at present and allow my own words to speak for themselves as to anything further which should have been included.

Mr. HEAPS: I have not had an opportunity to see the amendment before the committee; I have only heard it read on two or three occasions. It appears to me, however, that if we have two conflicting amendments with regard to similar matters complications may result when the bill comes into operation. In other words, if we have an amendment in the earlier part of the bill which is all-inclusive so far as the bill is concerned, and on the other hand we pass another similar amendment dealing with a particular section of the bill, we may have some difficulty in understanding what is meant. Of course I am not a lawyer and cannot speak definitely on the subject, but if the amendment now before the committee has reference to the matter dealt with by the previous amendment, which is all-inclusive, there may be conflict in the future.

I believe this is what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has in mind in pressing his point: In case a new company is created which will take over large numbers of men, the rights of those men under their agreements with the two railway companies should be protected. There is the feeling, I think, in the mind of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River—and to some extent in my own mind—that this may not be the case. A new company may come along and take over some of the employees; the old agreements may be scrapped and the rights possessed by the men under those agreements may not be worth anything.

If I were a representative of the men's organizations I should not be very happy if I had to sit in with the executives of the railway companies to consider which men should be let out of the employ of those companies. The clause itself presupposes that the service of a number of men will be dispensed with, that the railways will have no work for them. If the amendment suggested by the minister is adopted, these men representing the organizations will be asked to sit in consultation with the representatives of the companies, and between them they will determine the men who are to be kept on by the new company and the men who will have to be let out. I know this is an evil which the representatives of the men probably will have to face, and I have no doubt that the railway men would prefer to have their representatives consult with the executives of the companies and amicably adjust the question of who should remain and who should not. In other words, it is a question of retaining for the men in the employment of the company those seniority rights which they have at the present time. That I think is the main point which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is now emphasizing. As an ordinary layman, I think myself that if the other clause in the earlier part of the bill, as amended by the hon. member for East Algoma, fits in with the clause now under discussion the bill might be better without the amendment as worded now. If the minister feels that there should be in this particular clause an amendment dealing with the rights of the men, it should be all-inclusive, exactly as in the other section in the earlier part of the bill.

Mr. MANION: I sincerely believe that the men are protected by the clause which I have read. The phrase "through negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected" covers the point made by the hon. gentleman. It satisfies, I think, the objections that have been taken by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and so far as seniority rights are concerned, I do not believe that there is anything in the act that will interfere with them either on the Canadian Pacific or on the national railways.

Mr. MITCHELL: I support the position taken by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for North Winnipeg, and I do not say this critically. I believe however that the government is largely to blame for the filibuster that has developed—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well then, the protracted debate that has taken place on those sections dealing with the men engaged on the two railways. I submit that the government should have followed the precedent established by the British government when the railways there were consolidated. The position taken by the hon. members for Kenora-Rainy River and North Winnipeg is absolutely sound. As I have said before, the government must accept some responsibility in this regard. In my judgment the clause as now worded has the potential effect of wiping out seniority rights as a result of the consolidation of these companies. In this connection I wish to read into the record the opinion of a railway manager, Mr. Daniel Willard of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, given before the committee on interstate commerce of the United States Senate:

> . . . the economies to be realized eventually by consolidation—and I believe there will be very substantial economies—will come through making it unnecessary to provide as much new capital as might otherwise be necessary. That is one economy.
> The other economies which can be lumped in one item, are labour and material, less of both being needed, probably—particularly labour. In fact, the only way economies can be made to any extent in railroad service is by the use of fewer employees, and with that would always go the use of some less labour. Our figures show that the wages paid for labour constitute about sixty per cent of our total operating expenses, and material about forty per cent. It is safe to say that of that material probably fifty per cent represents wages paid to labour, so that when a railroad reduces its operating expenses by a dollar, it is a safe thought that eighty per cent of that represents less wages being paid to somebody.
> We must recognize that in accomplishing these economies that seem to have been thought desirable in the public interest, they will be brought about largely by the employment of fewer men, and that certainly does present a problem in which the men have a right to be concerned. As has been stated, I have expressed my views on that on different occasions and I have said that I thought it would only be fair and right if congress, in legislating on this whole matter, pursued action somewhat similar to that taken by the English parliament in connection with their amalgamation act. In that act, in round terms, it was provided that the men who had been in the employ of the company for five years should not be displaced, and should not be reduced in rank or in compensation, and they should be worked around in such a way as might be until they could be taken care of.

The suggestion is sound, I think, that unless there is some stipulation that the representatives of the men shall be heard in connection with any consolidation it might be better to do without the amendment. Frankly I cannot see any objection to incorporating the proposal of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River; I do not think there is any danger in it. It seems to me it would put the thing on an even keel and might set at rest the minds of men directly affected when any new companies were established, because the minister has frankly admitted that agreements would expire on the establishment of a new company. I believe that seniority rights transcend any agreement, and anything that can be humanly done should be done to protect the men.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister has asked me a few times to-night, and I have tried to satisfy him, to give him an example showing where the suggestion I have made might be necessary. Will he be kind enough now to mention anything in particular that might happen, to prove that the words I suggest would clutter up the act or provoke bad feeling. Can the minister show me where they would do any harm? I have tried to show him where they could be distinctly helpful, and I should be glad if he would show me in what way they would have the opposite effect.

Mr. MANION: I have already replied to my hon. friend on this point and I do not wish to go over it again. What he suggests is amply covered by the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for East Algoma. Something has been said with regard to credit for it, and I am not going to quarrel with anyone on that score. As a matter of fact it was my own amendment and I discussed it with the member for East Algoma. I repeat, what my hon. friend opposite has in mind is covered by the phrase "through negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected."

Mr. HEENAN: Is there any harm in repeating that?

Mr. MANION: Just the harm pointed out by the hon. member for North Winnipeg, that we should not have a lot of clauses that are redundant and unnecessary. We have already accepted a number of proposals to satisfy my hon. friends and I do not think it is necessary to put this in again. The hon. member chose to modify my amendment. My amendment covers the taking on of employees while the amendment of the hon. member for East Algoma covers the negotiations with the representatives of the employees affected. The hon. gentleman's suggestion is covered now.

Mr. HEENAN: With that explanation I am willing to take a different attitude, but I should like to point out one or two things to the minister. Had he in the first instance given the interpretation to the amendment passed last Thursday which he now gives, we would not have wasted most of this evening. Someone must have put it into his mind at the last moment. When section 16 was first introduced I expected him to say that the member for Kenora-Rainy River had placed two amendments upon the minutes last Thursday and that he considered we had the matter covered in the amendment which was accepted by the government at that time. But he did not do that. He offered another amendment and it was in order to make that amendment worth while that I added the additional words in order to carry over the provisions contained in the first part of the section. After all is said and done, this measure is not going to be interpreted by the courts of the country; it is going to be interpreted by the two railway companies and I believe the government will have some say as to what is intended. If the minister says that everything is covered by the amendment moved by the hon. member for East Algoma, well and good; I am satisfied.

Mr. MANION: Then let the section pass.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not going to let it pass before I complete what I have to say. The hon. member for East Algoma has been blowing hot and cold. First he springs these suggestions and then he blows out of the chamber.

Mr. MANION: He had to catch a train for Toronto.

Mr. HEENAN: I am leaving on a train for Toronto also.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member for East Algoma commented upon the speech I made in North Bay last Friday. I am not going to take back one word that I said in that speech. The least consideration that could possibly be given to any body of men has been given to the employees of the railways of this country by this measure.

Mr. MANION: That is not so.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister has been playing around in the most childish way possible. We spent all of last Thursday afternoon discussing an amendment to provide that these negotiations should be carried on through the representatives of the railway men after sixty days' notice. We fought the whole day and then my hon. friend got together with the member for East Algoma and they changed the wording of my amendment to suit themselves and so that it would appear that the amendment had been moved by someone on the government side. I do not know just how much the Prime Minister estimates it costs per hour to run this house, but at least five hours were wasted in order to deprive a member on this side of the credit for having made a constructive suggestion in order to protect the railway employees. Does the minister think that that is playing fair with the House of Commons, with the government of which he is a member, or with the taxpayers who have to pay the bill? Does he think it is playing fair to prolong the session by five hours in order to have an amendment, which he would not accept from this side of the house, accepted from his own side? I would like to have a picture of the people of this country sitting up in the gallery and watching the actions of some of the so-called statesmen last Thursday afternoon. It was the most ridiculous thing I ever saw in my life.

An hon. MEMBER: You were speaking.

Mr. HEENAN: With the explanation of the minister that this matter is covered, I withdraw my suggestion and accept the minister's amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Manion) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the bill is reported, may I suggest to the minister that before the third reading it be reprinted to include all the amendments?

Mr. MANION: We intended to do that before third reading.

Bill reported.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the second reading of Bill No. 45, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. RALSTON: As this has come on rather suddenly, would the minister just explain the general purposes of the bill?

Mr. GORDON: The purpose of this bill is to give some relief to soldier settlers and to civilian purchasers of land under the Soldier Settlement Act. It is proposed that the interest accruing in the year 1932 shall be entirely remitted. Section 73 provides that any settler or purchaser whose contract was made prior to January 1, 1933, and who makes payments during the fiscal years 1933-34, 1934-35, and 1935-36 on arrears or instalments due between April 1, 1933, and March 31, 1937, inclusive, shall have his account credited with an additional amount equal to such payment. Section 74 deals with what is known as the three thousand British family scheme. Heretofore settlers brought to Canada under that scheme did not receive the benefits of certain remedial legislation that was passed from time to time. Section 74 provides that the effect of this statute shall be applied to those settlers, provided, of course, that the imperial government takes such action as will permit us to take that course. As hon. members, I think, know, while the Dominion government provided the land, the imperial government provided stock and equipment. Thus there will be a division of the loss in proportion to the amount involved for each government. Generally speaking, the interest of the Canadian government in this scheme is 62½ per cent and the balance is taken care of by the imperial government. This is the way in which the loss would, generally speaking, be apportioned, if the imperial government takes appropriate action to bring their settlers within the scope of this enactment.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has there been any correspondence between this government and the British government on that point? Has the British government indicated its attitude towards this legislation or been given an opportunity to do so?

Mr. GORDON: I wrote them only a short time ago advising them of the course we intended to take and I communicated with the Minister of Justice, who is at present in London, asking him if he would lay the bill before the imperial authorities in order to facilitate bringing the three thousand British settlers under this bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How much would those various sums which are remitted under this bill amount to, approximately?

Mr. GORDON: It is difficult to determine the amount to which the various classes of settlers will become entitled, because it will depend entirely upon their ability to pay. I asked that question of the officials; I do not know whether their guess would be any better than ours, but having regard to the number and relying in a measure upon their forecast of the future, they believe that for soldier settlement loans it will run between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 for the whole of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The amount of interest will, of course, be a fixed sum.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has any computation been made as to the amount of interest itself that is involved and which, of course, is a definite amount?

Mr. GORDON: I shall have the figure in a moment.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The other part, of course, depends entirely on how much is paid in.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand the soldier settlers will benefit for three years from this year onward?

Mr. GORDON: Yes; it will be really four years; it goes to the year 1937, as will be seen by the wording of the section.

Mr. NEILL: This bill is practically only one section and if we pass it we shall be passing the whole bill. I would suggest that the minister allow each of the subsections to be passed separately. Will he do that?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister mentions $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 as being the total amount involved. That means, including the arrears of interest which are foregone for just one year. Does that also include the double credit that is to be given for payments in connection with arrears or instalments due between now and 1936?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, that includes the amount of interest involved, and the balance of it—and I want to make myself clear on that—is purely an estimated amount depending, of course, upon the settlers' ability to pay.

Mr. RALSTON: Are we on new section 72 now?

Mr. GORDON: I was just explaining the bill generally in answer to the request of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, but probably we had better start with the first subsection and continue in that way.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that we take the bill up subsection by subsection?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

On new section 72—Certain interest charges remitted.

Mr. DONNELLY: What did it cost in Saskatchewan last year for the administration of this act, for the supervisors looking after the soldier settlers, and what amount of money was collected from the soldier settlers there last year on this land scheme?

Mr. GORDON: While that is being looked up, I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Red Deer. The 1932 interest that would be remitted is $2,250,000. The bonuses as estimated are as follows:

Year	Amount
1933	$1,500,000
1934	1,500,000
1935	1,500,000
1936 (Prepayment for)	500,000

With this $5,000,000 and the remitted interest the total is $7,250,000, part, namely, the interest, a sum certain and ascertained, and the balance estimated according to the ability of the settlers to take advantage of it.

Mr. DONNELLY: I was asking for the cost of administering the act in Saskatchewan in the past year.

Mr. GORDON: The accounts of the soldier settlement board are not completely divided with respect to provinces, but the salaries in Saskatchewan amounted in the year ended March 31, 1933, to $106,915.65.

Mr. DONNELLY: What was collected by way of interest in that province?

Mr. GORDON: The collections from April 1, 1932, to March 31, 1933, amounted to $317,957.94.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the total amount owing in Saskatchewan?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Can the minister give us similar figures as to Alberta, of the salaries paid and the amounts received?

Mr. GORDON: In Saskatchewan the amount of the loans as of January 31, 1933, was $14,297,421.49. The amount of the loans in southern Alberta as of the same date was $8,076,149, and for northern Alberta, $9,229,-431.61. The amount of the collections in southern Alberta from April 1, 1932, to March 31, 1933, was $169,407.71, and the amount of the salaries $61,437.60. The amount of collections for northern Alberta for the same period was $216,400.97 and the amount of the salaries $80,584.20.

Mr. DONNELLY: When the minister speaks of salaries, does that include travelling expenses?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: They are extra?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do you supply cars for the inspectors?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, the cars are supplied by the department to the field supervisors and to those who look after the collections. The number of cars has been very greatly reduced throughout Canada, from 164 to 120. There may be some further reductions that can be made.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister gave a certain figure which under the Soldier Settlement Act was loaned to settlers in the province of Saskatchewan. Did that include advances to settlers under the three thousand family scheme?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, that included the amount loaned.

Mr. VALLANCE: How much of the amount the minister mentioned was spent in Saskatchewan with regard to the soldier settler and how much with regard to the three thousand family scheme?

Mr. GORDON: The amount of the outstanding loans for soldier settlers, as interpreted under the act, was $8,574,999.63. The amount of loans outstanding to civilian settlers was $2,784,768.83. The amount outstanding in connection with the British family scheme was $2,937,653.03, making a total, as I indicated, of $14,000,000 odd.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have a question to ask arising out of the information which the minister has just given. Does this bill apply to the soldier settler, the civilian settler and the settlers under the three thousand family scheme? Suppose the British government does not agree, as suggested by the minister, will it be applied to the 62½ per cent under the three thousand family scheme?

Mr. GORDON: If the British government does not agree, then the three thousand British families will suffer the same fate as they did under past remedial legislation. They receive no assistance, but I trust, and I think I have a fair ground for my assumption, that the British government will agree, particularly in view of the difficulties that these men are passing through.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). It is this: When will those employees in the government service who have not been paid receive the cheque they should have received on the first of this month?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I could answer that question with greater accuracy, Mr. Speaker, if I knew when the interim supply bill, which is now in the Senate, will be passed. I would anticipate, however, that it will pass the Senate on Tuesday night, and we might have royal assent Wednesday so that the money would be available to pay the salaries in question.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

The house, in committee of ways and means, resumed from Wednesday, May 3, consideration of the resolution of the Minister of Finance to amend the Income War Tax Act, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Paragraph 3 of this resolution reads:

> That the exemption for a dependent child or grandchild be $400.

This makes no reference to age. Has the age limit been changed at all?

Mr. RHODES: There has been no change with regard to the age.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I believe the age limit is twenty-one years. Under present conditions I know many people who have educated their sons and daughters, but those children are unable to find work to-day, and though they are over the age of twenty-one years they are still at home with their parents. It costs just as much to feed and clothe a boy or girl of twenty-two, twenty-three or twenty-four as it does a child of eighteen or nineteen, and under present conditions, when these young people cannot find anything to do and their parents are compelled to support them, it seems rather unfair that they do not get any exemption in regard to income tax.

Mr. RHODES: I think it must be borne in mind that we have gone a considerable distance as it is. In the earlier stages the exemption applied only to those under the age of sixteen. It was then changed to eighteen and subsequently, whether wisely or not, to the full age of twenty-one. I can understand and sympathize with the cases to which my hon. friend has referred, but I think it must be borne in mind that we must legislate in matters of this kind for at least approximately normal conditions, and we should not put into a statute of this kind methods which are designed to meet a peculiar and abnormal and, we hope, transient situation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Minister says that we should legislate for normal conditions, but it is obvious that the government is now resorting to certain taxes to meet conditions that are not normal. There are people in this country with children over the age of twenty-one, who very often find these younger members of the family coming back home when they cannot find work, with the result that the parents have to look after them. In many cases young people are charged with the responsibility of taking care of relatives such as aunts, grandmothers and others. Surely we are facing abnormal conditions to-day, and in taxing incomes the minister should bear this fact in mind, all the more when we see that in the province of Ontario and in other parts of Canada as well the taxpayers have to pay income tax not only to the dominion but to the provincial authorities as well. I think the minister should give this matter a little more consideration and recognize that we are faced with abnormal conditions at the present time.

Mr. RHODES: The exemption in respect to children is based on the presumption that they are dependent, and I think it can be said with equal force that a child over twenty-one years of age is presumably not dependent. Even if a law could be devised which would permit of exemptions in the case of those over twenty-one years of age, it would be opening the door to very wide abuses with respect to many children over the age of twenty-one who might be alleged to be dependent but who in fact were not so. I think we have gone as far as we ought to go in limiting the age to twenty-one.

Mr. DONNELLY: Under section 4 it is provided that the exemption for a dependent parent, grandparent, brother or sister shall be the actual amount expended by the taxpayer up to a maximum exemption of $400 for each such dependent person. I would point out to the minister that a man might have a son of twenty-five or thirty who because of physical incapacity might be absolutely dependent upon him. Why not make some provision with regard to such people?

Mr. RHODES: There is a distinction between parents or grandparents and children who are dependent because of physical disability, but a vigorous boy or girl of twenty-one is not to be considered in the same category. The presumption is that a child over twenty-one years of age is not dependent on the parents for sustenance.

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice that it is covered elsewhere.

Mr. RHODES: I am informed that if the child is physically or mentally incapacitated the exemption holds.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister explain for the benefit of the committee and of the people of this country the principle on which this schedule has been worked out. Would it be correct to say that it is on the principle that the rate of taxation should increase with the increase in the income itself?

Mr. RHODES: The schedule as set out has been evolved as the result of experience not only in its application but in its effect upon those who pay. It is not worked out on the principle of a percentage increase on income but on the basis of the dollars paid by the individual or the corporation as the case may be. We cannot overlook the relative rates of income tax in Canada compared with the relative rates in the republic to the south of us, and in that connection I would point out that up to a substantial proportion in the various grades in the schedule it will be found that the total income tax payable under these rates is higher than that which obtains at the moment in the United States.

Mr. COOTE: In the first few items in the schedule the rate increases apparently one per cent with each increase of one thousand dollars of income, but by the time you reach the last items in the schedule the increase of one per cent in the rate occurs with each increase of fifty thousand dollars in income. I think the principle contained in the first part of the schedule might have been continued right through, that is to say, increasing the rate one per cent on each increase of one thousand dollars in income as in the first part of the schedule. That would be much fairer to the people generally. I do not see why a lower rate of increase in the tax is carried out in the schedules affecting the higher income. I suggest that the minister should not follow the example of the United States; we ought to draw up a complete income tax schedule to suit our own Canadian needs, and it would be better to impose a higher tax on incomes in excess of one hundred thousand dollars. If this were done we could do away with a good many taxes that are so oppressive at the present time, such as the sales tax discussed the other day. The tax now before us is the best place to make increases. The principle contained in the act which the Prime Minister introduced two or three years ago but later withdrew, of increasing the rate of tax one per cent with each one thousand dollars increase of income, would be the ideal method, continuing that until it reached ninety-nine per cent on the ninety-ninth thousand dollars of income. Let us adopt that as an emergency measure to meet some of the deficits of the country. If we are to increase taxation that is the form it should take.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend were to apply in stages the percentage increase in income tax as he suggests, he would find that even if there were those larger incomes, they would in effect be practically wiped out. I think it is very unjust to take the case of a man with a small income and state that his tax will be increased by perhaps three hundred per cent because of the provisions of this bill. A man with an income of $2,500 would have paid $2 tax under the old schedule; under the new, he will pay $15. There is an increase of 750 per cent which may sound alarming when considered in terms of percentages, but in fact his tax has been increased by only $13. Looking at it from that angle, which is a practical angle, this proposal does not seem unreasonable. If we taxed all incomes of $100,000 and over even to the extent of confiscation, the result to the treasury would be practically negligible because such incomes are a very rare thing in these days.

Mr. COOTE: I did not want to suggest that there should be confiscation of anybody's income. The tax which I suggest would leave these very wealthy men with an income of at least $50,000. I am suggesting this only as an emergency measure. I think this would be a better means of obtaining revenue than by the taxing of buns, which we discussed the other day. I do not think the minister has given any justification for leaving the tax on the higher incomes as it was. He states that it is similar to the tax in the United States but I do not think we should go to that country for guidance in connection with our income tax.

Mr. RHODES: May I say to my hon. friend that I did not attribute to him the argument in favour of confiscation. I was using that merely as an illustration from my own point of view. I was referring to the yield which might be expected from such a tax. I agree with my hon. friend's suggestion that we should not be dependent upon any country for the principle which shall govern us in our own legislation. However, it must be borne in mind that this country is in close contact with the United States. Money is such a sensitive and rapidly movable commodity that if we attempted to tax incomes out of line with the taxation in the United States, we would very soon find that our capital was migrating across the line. We have to legislate with that difficulty in mind.

Mr. COOTE: There is another suggestion I would like to make to the minister. I think he should endeavour to arrange a conference with the representatives of all the provinces to discuss this matter of income tax. Some of the provinces impose an income tax while a great many municipalities do likewise and it may happen that citizens may be required to pay three different taxes. If there is no consultation between these different taxing bodies, incomes may be taxed to the point of confiscation. I do not want to see that happen. I should like to obtain the minister's interest in this matter of a conference.

Mr. RHODES: I may inform my hon. friend and the committee that this subject was raised at the last provincial conference. As a result of the discussion a committee was appointed composed of the higher officials of the different provinces and the dominion. They are now at work upon this subject and I hope that as a result of their labours some understanding will be arrived at. In any event, we will have their report within the next two or three months.

Mr. SPENCER: Replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), the Minister of Finance stated that incomes of $100,000 and upwards were very scarce. I obtained some figures six months ago which gave the number of such incomes as 132, showing an increase from 75 in four years, 1928-1932.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must bear in mind that those figures are for incomes of 1931. I can assure him that the incomes for 1932 were very much less and I think I am safe in saying that for 1933 they will be still further decreased. I had that fact in mind when I made my statement to the hon. member for Macleod. The figures disclose that the total number of incomes, not of $100,000 and upwards but of $50,000 and upwards were 614. This was the number returned in 1932 as being applicable to incomes of 1931. I venture to say that this figure will be very substantially reduced for the year 1933.

Mr. SPENCER: Has the minister the total number of incomes of $100,000 and upwards?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised by the commissioner of income tax that the policy has been not to give out these figures. The reason is this: these incomes are very rare and to give out the figures would be indicative of the incomes of individuals.

Mr. SPENCER: For the last ten or twelve years we have been able to obtain these figures, and I was able to obtain them as late as six months ago. Even if the figures showed that only one individual had an income of this size, I think the people would have a right to know. By what reasoning does the minister suggest that it is not in the public interest to give out this information.

Mr. RHODES: For obvious reasons the practice has been not to make public the incomes of individuals. I think that is a sound position to take. When the attempt was made to find out how many incomes there were of $100,000 and upwards, the question first was: How many in Canada? Then, how many in a province? Then, if in a province, in what city? It reached the point where you might just as well ask for the man's name. Naturally the department has resisted efforts of that kind and I think quite properly so.

Mr. SPENCER: But if the question is confined to the number within Canada and does not embrace a small area, it seems that the government is simply holding back information for which hon. members have a right to ask. I cannot appreciate the wisdom of the course taken by the government, nor can I see why the minister objects to giving, not names—I am not asking for names—but the number of people in Canada with certain incomes.

Mr. RHODES: There is no objection to giving that information, and if the hon. gentleman would call at the income tax office, I am sure he would be given it freely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is all printed.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, my hon. friend can get the information. I am sorry my officials do not have it here, or I should give it now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I just want to take this opportunity of stating that this type of statistics is available and I have no doubt it can be secured. But I wish to go further and register my protest against secrecy in connection with income tax returns. There should be the same freedom of information in Canada as there is in other countries, particularly in that to the south of us. After all, the minister must remember that in conditions such as these through which we are passing, more and more thought is being given to the causes that bring about such an unequal distribution of national income. A growing sense is invading every mind that interests itself in the subject, that this inequality of income is not necessarily the result of superiority on the part of the individual, but is due to advantages he is able to acquire by the possession of special privileges from governments, provincial and federal, and for other reasons including rather shady trickery in connection with commercial corporation life. The sooner this and other governments realize that they stand themselves as part of the destructive forces of modern society and modern parliamentary practice by hiding the facts that should be disclosed and not uncovering conditions that should be definitely stricken out of the society of our country, the better. As long as governments take the position of sheltering those people who without question are securing more of the national income than that to which they are entitled, just so long do governments place themselves in the position of being defenders of an unequal and unjust social order.

Mr. RHODES: I can only say that, so far as I can ascertain, the result of experience has been that governments in all countries have found it to be in the public interest not to disclose the affairs of private individuals. An attempt to do so was made in one country and publicity was resorted to, but as a result of the unfortunate repercussions which arose from that policy, they reversed themselves and reverted to the policy which had obtained previously and which has obtained since in all countries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What really were the unfortunate repercussions?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know it is incumbent upon me to give that. All I can say is that in the judgment of that country it felt the experience had been unfortunate. I am not in a position to give my hon. friend the mental processes by means of which the government of that country arrived at that decision.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is strange. The minister gives the experience of the United States—I think that is the country to which he refers—as the reason we should not do this in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I did not, not even by inference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I fail to follow the reasoning processes of the minister. I cannot see any meaning in the statement unless it is intended to be inferentially that. But leaving aside the United States or whatever other country was referred to, I would like the minister to give on his own behalf the real reasons the public should not be given this information. I think we are entitled to have the reasons. The minister simply says that the experience has been unfortunate in some other country, but he will not say why, and he gives no reason why the experience should be unfortunate or undesirable in this country. We expect him to give some particular reasons that such a course is undesirable, but the minister so far has not done so.

I take it that there is a growing conviction that the wealth of Canada is not properly distributed, and that owing to purely conventional or artificial arrangements in society, some Canadian citizens are able to enjoy very large fortunes while others are on the bread line. We have our tariffs, our special privileges of all kinds and financial manipulation which is permitted, if not in some cases almost encouraged by the government. Through all these means certain people are enabled to make large sums of money. On the other hand, some of those same people who have made the money are drawing, through their ownership of bonds, enormous revenues directly from the public. Within the last day or two we have been discussing a tax on sugar and other necessities of life and this house has been asked to impose upon the common people of the country who are struggling to keep their heads above water a still greater burden in order to contribute indirectly or directly to those people who have more than they should have. That is the way in which a large number of people are beginning to think of things. It seems as if the government is undoubtedly contributing very largely to the popular unrest and to the destruction of our so-called democratic institutions when the wealthy are permitted to continue as they are doing and are shielded by the government in their actions. The minister has yet to give any reason for publicity of this kind not being given. This whole question arose because we simply wanted to get some information for statistical purposes. We cannot get it even when the information makes no disclosure of the names of individuals. Personally I join with some other members in asking for more than that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister has just stated that the reason the increased percentage on the ratings by this year's amendments is higher on the lower incomes than on the larger is that it is feared that capital may leave the country.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what I gathered from the remarks of the minister. The 500 per cent increase on the lower incomes plus the reduction in exemption, the reduction as regards single persons being $200 and as regards married persons being $400, makes a heavier burden on the small taxpayer. The same percentage of increase has not been carried into the higher incomes. I have frequently heard the statement made that the reason the higher incomes are not taxed according to the same percentage is that capital will leave the country. That attitude is unfair. If that is the case, what is the excuse other than what the minister has said, namely, the necessity of revenue, for taxing the lower incomes so heavily? I believe in the income tax; I do not for a moment desire to say that incomes should not be taxed. This form of tax is the fairest we have imposed upon us. May I say that I am not very much concerned about it; I do not pay very much, but at the same time I cannot see any reason for the inequality. I do not blame the present minister for making that statement; it has been made before in the house. It seems to me that if we are going to have an income tax it should be applied on a fair percentage basis from the lower to the highest incomes quite irrespective of any effect that it may have in diverting capital from the country. I think that bugaboo is raised too often. There should be a fair percentage of the incomes taken all along the line, not a five hundred per cent increase just in one case, as the minister mentioned, and particularly at a time when the Minister of Finance in order to raise revenue has to resort as he has done in this budget to increased taxation that falls upon those least able to bear it. If an individual has a large income I think his income should be taxed according to the same rate as the man with a lower income, and I rise to protest that that is not being done at the present time. Certainly it is not being done now because the minister himself has informed us that there has been a five hundred per cent increase in the income tax in one grade, but he says that only means raising the tax from two to fifteen dollars, and that therefore, after all, it is not so great. Nevertheless it is a five hundred per cent increase, and it is just as difficult for the individual to provide that additional taxation as it is for the man with $40,000 or $50,000.

Mr. RHODES: May I say to my hon. friend from West Edmonton that he entirely misapprehended my reference to the United States.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not refer to the United States.

Mr. RHODES: I only referred to the United States in answer to a question raised by my hon. friend from Macleod who urged that we might have still higher income taxes. I was not referring to the individual tax paid in a given schedule. I might point out to my hon. friend from West Edmonton how impossible it would be to apply a fixed percentage. The case I cited was of an increase of five hundred per cent. What would he do in the case of a man who is already taxed fifty-six per cent of his income? How could he increase that man's tax by five hundred per cent?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There would be very few of them.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think we have any, but I am dealing with the schedule.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If you cannot make an increase in his case, why increase the tax on the lower income? Just reverse the argument.

Mr. RHODES: I am dealing first with the hon. gentleman's own argument. He says that we have increased the tax five hundred per cent in one of the schedules, and asks why we should not increase it five hundred per cent in the case of the higher income. How are you going to make an increase of five hundred per cent in the case of the man who already pays fifty-six per cent of his income? That simply shows that you cannot deal in percentages in a matter of this kind. That is why I said to my hon. friend from Macleod that the gradations were not based on percentages but upon the amount of money which the individual could afford to pay to the treasury.

Coming to the question of lowering the exemptions, my hon. friend thought that bore more heavily on the man with a lower income. Strange as it may appear, the exact opposite is the fact. It bears far more heavily upon the higher incomes than upon the lower because the higher incomes are affected through all the various stages, and in the final analysis the man who pays higher income tax has his income tax increased by a very large sum because of the lowering of the exemptions of income tax.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I did not follow the argument of my hon. friend in one or two matters. He suggested as one reason why secrecy should be maintained in connection with income tax information that the practice in that regard in the United States or some other country had been found distasteful and unsuitable. My reading in connection with the matter has not been possibly as extensive as I should have liked, but from what information I have been able to gather the real reaction in the United States was a sense of injustice on the part of the general public and a sense of deep inconvenience on the part of those who had the high incomes which were disclosed. In other words, it made those with the higher incomes feel a little ashamed of their position, and very properly so. My personal view is that in an orderly society any man who possesses an income out of all relation to that of the masses of his fellowmen ought to have a sense of shame and disgust. He ought to recognize that it is not his wealth. Goods of that kind should never be regarded as his. It is the surplus wealth produced by those who may have been in his employment or in the industries from which he draws his profits.

So far as I am concerned the argument of the minister with regard to the flight of capital, if there was an increase in the income tax, is not tenable. We have not had that experience in Canada where income tax is imposed by some of the provinces and not by others. If the minister's argument were sound, why did not capital flee from the income taxing province to the province where incomes are not subject to taxation? There are other illustrations that might be given. I have no hesitation in saying to the minister and the government that I think it is the duty of the government under present economic conditions in Canada, where we have such a terrible problem of increasing unemployment to meet, to confiscate all incomes over $50,000. Any man or any family that cannot live a luxurious life at present price levels on $50,000 does not deserve to possess more than that. It is plenty for any family. It is an ample allowance, and as it was made through the community effort of the entire state and never through the individual's own efforts—that is the most ridiculous argument anyone could put up, for no man could earn that amount alone; it depends entirely on the community—I would strongly recommend an income tax that would go to the point of confiscating all incomes over $50,000 as long as an emergency of this kind lasts.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to these new taxes, especially as they affect the workmen, the farmers who are forced to sell their products at ridiculous prices, and the unemployed whom the government should relieve. I am quite aware that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) requires revenues to balance the budget; however, in order to succeed he should call upon companies or people who are in receipt of an income to supply the necessary funds and not upon citizens who possess nothing.

A number of suggestions made by members in the opposition are worthy of consideration and, if they were given a trial it would help the hon. Minister of Finance to raise the necessary funds for the administration of this country. In a speech which I delivered in the house on April 14, 1932, with reference to the ten per cent cut in salaries of civil servants, and which was to effect a saving of $8,000,000 to the government—such were the contentions—I stated at page 2022 of Hansard:

> If the government actually requires these $8,000,000 to balance its budget, why call upon the small wage earners instead of requesting those who are making large profits and are in a better position to put up the money, for a year only? Why not increase the tax on profit from 7 per cent to 50 per cent, after deducting what the act allows for living and overhead expenses. I am quite sure that millionaires and high financiers, who boast of being so patriotic when they force small wage earners to pay, would be willing to help the government to balance its budget, since it would only be a matter of one year.

The present budget contains new taxes which are not popular and levied in numerous instances on citizens who should be exempt of such imposts. The tax of 2 cents per pound on sugar will raise a revenue of $20,000,000. The hon. Minister of Finance replying on May 2, 1933, to a question of a member on this side of the house, page 4513 of Hansard, stated:

My hon. friend wants to know what these imposts will yield. Our estimate is that altogether they will yield $57,000,000 but that figure will be subject to change, because there have been some variations.

Mr. McIntosh: That includes $20,000,000 from sugar?

Mr. Rhodes: I have given the figure that was in our minds at the time the budget was brought down. I shall now direct my remarks to the tax on sugar. I know it is not popular; no tax is popular.

Further he repeats:

The sugar tax will not be popular; I realize that.

It certainly will not be popular during an election. At page 4516 of Hansard, on the same date, the hon. minister replied to another member:

My hon. friend has suggested that the tax should be reduced. If we reduce this tax we must make up an additional sum by some other form of taxation.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), at page 4517 of Hansard, May 2, 1933, stated:

Now I come to the question of sugar. I think by this time the minister is convinced that this is not a popular tax; it strikes at everyone in the country.

And the hon. Minister of Finance replied to him by the following question:

Mr. Rhodes: Can my hon. friend name a popular tax?

At page 4527, the hon. Minister of Finance, in reply to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), added:

Mr. Rhodes: Well, who pays the tariff? The people in this country pay. Hon. gentlemen discuss that phase of the question as if they were going to relieve the people of the country of the burden of taxation.

Mr. Malcolm: The tariff is paid by those who are able to pay.

[Mr. Roberge.]

The hon. minister made the following statement at page 4558 of Hansard:

Mr. Rhodes: However, if the committee would give unanimous consent I am content that the list should be printed in Hansard. Perhaps this would be a good time to do so, because Wednesday is a short day, and we would not be unduly encumbering the record.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

1933 BUDGET

Résumé of Changes in Sales and Excise Taxes

The following goods, formerly exempt from tax, now taxable at the full rate in force:

Self-raising flour, oatmeal, rolled oats, cornmeal and rolled wheat, when in packages exceeding five pounds each in weight; buckwheat meal and pea meal; pearl barley; split peas; barley meal; pot barley; rice, cleaned; macaroni and vermicelli; bran and middlings when sold for human consumption in packages exceeding five pounds each in weight;

Molasses: corn syrup; sugar cane syrup;

To a question of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) the hon. Minister of Finance replied on May 3, 1933, page 4566 of Hansard, as follows:

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has just returned to the chamber and I am reminded of a question he asked and which I inadvertently failed to answer. I know his absence was necessary because he happens to be the chief whip of the opposition. The articles which we have included in the list to be subject to the sales tax and which have been exempt since 1926 will, according to the best estimate which can be made by the officials of the Department of National Revenue, yield $13,000,000 per year in revenue even under existing conditions.

The budget further imposes other taxes which are too numerous to enumerate. As one may judge by the above quoted list, the hon. Minister of Finance has thought proper, this year, to tax certain staple commodities among the primary necessities of life and to increase the sales tax by 6 per cent on other articles. However, there was already last year a tax on many articles the list of which is too lengthy to enumerate here.

After having closely examined the budget, I find that a large number of my constituents whom I have the honour to represent in the house, will have to face further taxation; they cannot afford it as the wages of the working class, throughout the country, have been cut 50 per cent and work has decreased 75 per cent since the government has assumed power. As to the farming classes they can neither afford this new taxation since they are selling their products at ridiculous prices.

Judging from a number of years' experience in business, I can realize that the hon. Minister of Finance requires revenues, however, he should be able to obtain them without having to resort to a tax on sugar which will bring in $20,000,000; this does not include the tax on primary necessities which will raise $13,000,000, or the 10 per cent horizontal cut in the salaries of civil servants which will effect a saving of $8,000,000 to the government making a total of $41,000,000.

According to the report of the inquiry held by the government some time ago, and which I wish to consign to Hansard the government could have, in 1932, raised $78,000,000 more had they followed the suggestion I made on April 14, 1932. The following is the report of the inquiry mentioned above:

INCOME TAX

Mr. Roberge:

1. How many persons, companies, corporations or others paid income tax in 1932 on an income of (a) $10,000 to $20,000; (b) $20,000 to $50,000; (c) $50,000 to $75,000; (d) $75,000 to $125,000; (e) $125,000 to $175,000; (f) $175,000 to $225,000; (g) $225,000 to $250,000?

2. What was the total amount of revenue collected by the government in 1932 under the heading of income tax?

Mr. Ryckman:

1.	Individuals	Corporations
(a)	8,306	849
(b)	2,867	879
(c) (d) (e) (f) (g)	614	971

It is not deemed in the public interest to answer (d), (e), (f), (g) separately.

2. $61,254,399.80.

The total amount received is $61,254,399.80. On April 20, 1933, I directed another question to the minister:

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. Roberge:

What amount did the government receive in 1932 by way of income tax from individuals, companies, corporations or others, who paid a tax on an income ranging from $10,000 to $500,000?

Mr. Ryckman:

Individuals, $21,753,463.37; corporations, $35,749,230.32.

To complete this inquiry, on May 2 last, I directed another question to the minister:

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. Roberge:

What amount of money has the government collected by way of income tax during 1932 from individuals, companies, corporations or others who pay a tax on an income ranging from $500,000 to $1,000,000?

Mr. Ryckman:

Thus the government received from individuals, companies or corporations in receipt of an income of $10,000 to $1,000,000, the total amount of $78,267,265.74.

I am sure, sir, that if the hon. Minister of Finance put into practice the suggestion that I submitted to him last year, the people of Canada would be very grateful to him, and even the individuals or companies affected would understand that, during the crisis we are passing through, those who are in receipt of the incomes mentioned in the report must pay their full quota for the country's administration.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have made some computations. I wonder if the minister can tell us the percentage of increase on the $25,000 income?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not the percentage figures, but my hon. friend will find a tabulated statement in comparative form in the budget speech. On a $25,000 income the tax formerly was $2,788.80. Under these proposals it will be $3,349.50, making an increase of $560.70.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is twenty per cent, practically. I have made some estimates rather hurriedly of the increase in percentages, and my estimate shows that on a $2,500 salary the tax was increased by over five hundred per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: On a $25,000 salary the increase is over twenty per cent. On a $100,000 salary the increase is 8·6 per cent and on a $250,000 salary it is six per cent. I would not be positive as to the accuracy of these figures but they are the percentages I obtained. I submit that those increases are in the wrong direction. I do not know that I will be able to convert my friend the Minister of Finance to this doctrine; but it seems to me that as you get higher up in the salary scale the percentage increase should be greater, just as the previous tax should be greater. Referring to the tax on which there was so much debate in this house the other night, the tax on a household commodity very much in use in this country, sugar, that tax bears upon the man with the $2,500 salary just as heavily as upon a man with a $25,000 salary having a family of the same size. I submit that the percentage of increase should be greater as the salaries increase, instead of the reduction we find.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I have sent my figures over to my hon. friend. If my hon. friend will show me how he can increase the rate of tax on an income of which the treasury already gets over half, then he will have converted me. My hon.

friend may not have heard my reply to a similar objection which was raised at an earlier stage. It is impossible to deal with this scale in percentages. The very illustration I have given him indicates that. To increase the tax on the income I have referred to even one hundred per cent would mean that the individual would have all his income taken and would have to find some more money to pay it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Pay it next year!

Mr. RHODES: The principle which has been followed is not to have regard to percentages but to have regard to sums, which are substantial, and which the individual can afford to pay.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I just call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that you have to get above the $500,000 income under this schedule before your fifty-six per cent is added, that is on the excess over $500,000.

Mr. RHODES: I understand that this man is a mythical person who has an income of $250,000, and he pays an income tax amounting to 48 per cent of that income. How would you increase his tax by 500 per cent? This only illustrates the fact that you can twist percentages around and come to any conclusion or no conclusion at all, according to your point of view. I am prepared to admit that we may be taking too great a percentage out of one income and perhaps not enough from another, but certainly you cannot start with the basis of a 500 per cent increase in the case of the $2,500 income and apply that percentage all the way through.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Are we to understand, then, that my hon. friend now says he thinks the increase of 500 per cent is too great?

Mr. RHODES: No, Mr. Chairman; on the contrary I said that while it sounded terrible it really meant an increased revenue to the treasury of $13 from the man with an income of $2,500. That is all it means.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to assure the minister that I do not think it sounds any more terrible than it feels to the man having that income, with the various other burdens under which he is labouring at the present time. I want to direct the minister's attention to this fact: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the man having an income of $250,000 was a mythical person?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, largely so, if not entirely. I have not seen the income tax returns for this year, but I think he is a mythical person.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then of course this 56 per cent to which my hon. friend refers will not come into operation.

Mr. RHODES: I do not anticipate that there is the slightest danger.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then this is merely window dressing, providing for a case that cannot arise.

Mr. RHODES: We have followed out the gradations as they have obtained for nearly twenty years, that is all. In former years there were incomes in some of the very high schedules, but it requires no exercise of the imagination to realize why there are none to be found these days.

Mr. BOWMAN: It might be interesting to view the remarks of the hon. member for West Middlesex in the light of the record of the previous government during the nine years they were in office. We all know that during that period family and individual corporations were formed for the purpose of evading taxation, but they were wiped out by this government. We also find, on examining the record with regard to the corporation tax, that when the King administration took office in 1921 that tax was 10 per cent on corporation incomes in excess of $2,000 and less than $5,000, while in the case of an income of over $2,000 and more than $5,000 the tax was 10½ per cent. In 1926 that tax was reduced to 9 per cent, in 1927 to 8·1 per cent and in 1928 to 8 per cent. So from 1921 to 1930 there were successive reductions in the rate of taxation on corporations, and this at a time when corporations were better able to pay a tax than they are at present. Since this government came into office, however, the rate has been increased. In 1931 it was made 10 per cent, later 11 per cent and finally 12½ per cent.

Now let us look at the record with regard to individual taxation, and I will refer to the figures mentioned in that regard by the hon. member for West Middlesex. In 1921 the tax on an income of $4,000 amounted to $80, and when they left office in 1930 that tax had been reduced to $16. By this legislation it is now suggested that this tax be increased to $70. On an income of $25,000 the tax amounted to $3,024 in 1921, and when the King administration went out of office in 1930 that tax had been reduced to $2,024. It is now proposed to increase it to $3,349.50. The next figure about which the hon. gentleman inquired was an income of $100,000. In 1921 the tax on such an income amounted to $32,749.50, and by 1930 it had been reduced to $19,064. It is now proposed that this tax shall be $27,447. The hon. gentleman also inquired with regard to an income of $250,000. In 1921 the tax on this income amounted to $133,549.50, while by 1930 it had been cut almost in half, amounting to $69,072. This government proposes that the tax be increased to $96,558.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these figures clearly show the record of the past government with regard to taxation on corporations and individuals as compared with the taxes imposed by the present government.

Mr. BROWN: It may or may not be the case that the higher incomes are not being taxed as heavily as they should. I am prepared to agree in some measure with the hon. member for Bow River, who suggested that under present conditions all incomes in excess of a given amount might be confiscated, but I do agree with the minister when he says we do not get a proper picture of the matter by dealing in percentages. I am of a mathematical turn of mind; sometimes I like to work out mathematical problems, and I have often had occasion to point out the fallacies that we hear spoken in this house based on averages and percentages. Not long ago we had occasion to deal with an item concerning the importation of poultry for breeding purposes. It was pointed out that in one year one rooster was imported and that in the next year two were brought in, an increase of one hundred per cent. I think our friends on this side of the house who have been dealing in percentages have fallen into a similar error.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move to this resolution, Mr. Chairman, as paragraph 20. It is as follows:

20. That the exemption heretofore afforded with respect to war pensions be repealed.

It will be within the knowledge of the committee that this is part of the arrangement which was arrived at after conferences with the representatives of the several veterans' organizations.

Mr. SPENCER: Before that amendment is put, Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the attention of the minister to a question which was placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge). May I read to the house the question and the answer, which will be found at page 4062 of Hansard for April 19 of this year:

1. How many persons, companies, corporations or others paid income tax in 1932 on an income of (a) $10,000 to $20,000; (b) $20,000 to $50,000; (c) $50,000 to $75,000; (d) $75,000 to $125,000; (e) $125,000 to $175,000; (f) $175,000 to $225,000; (g) $225,000 to $250,000?

2. What was the total amount of revenue collected by the government in 1932 under the heading of income tax?

Mr. Ryckman:

1.	Individuals	Corporations
(a)	8,306	849
(b)	2,867	879
(c)
(e)	614	971
(f)
(g)

It is not deemed in the public interest to answer (d), (e), (f), (g) separately.

2. $61,254,399.80.

It will be seen that from (c) to (g), both inclusive, they are lumped together, and there is the note at the bottom, that it is not deemed in the public interest to answer (d), (e), (f) and (g) separately. How long has it been the rule of the department to take that stand in answering questions? This information has been given from time to time up until a fairly late date, and although the matter does not come directly under the minister, perhaps he can inform the house whether some new ruling has been given to the department instructing them not to give such information in the future.

Mr. RHODES: There has been no new ruling. The answer was prepared in the income tax division and I am advised by the commissioner of income tax that no change has been made. The practice of the department however has been to resist requests for information leading to inquiries with respect to individual concerns. At the same time, as I intimated to my hon. friend, he can get information from the department—I would give it here if I had it—as to how many people paid last year on incomes in excess of $100,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Am I to take it that if the hon. member for Megantic had applied again to the department he would have been given as full information as he wanted?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Megantic certainly has the same rights as the hon. gentleman who submits the question, and if he had applied to the department they would have given him the information. But this information was given in conformity with the practice that has obtained hitherto with respect to replies to questions of this kind.

Mr. SPENCER: The official must have had instructions to answer the question in the way he did, because I have never yet seen an answer submitted limiting the information in this way.

Mr. MARCIL: I want to put in a word, not for the large income but for the large families. I have seen the tax changed two or three times and I come from a district where incomes are not large but families are. In the province of Quebec, and I am glad to know that in other parts of Canada as well, Canadians have the habit of raising large families, and I think the exemption with regard to children should be graded; the same rate should not be paid by the man and woman with one or two children as by parents who have families of ten, twelve, fourteen or fifteen. The greatest asset of the country is the home, and the greatest asset in the home is the child. We should encourage large families. France, Great Britain, Italy and other countries are now paying bonuses to families with more than three children, graded according to the number of children. Instead of discouraging large families, I would ask the Minister of Finance to give further consideration to this question, if not in this budget at any rate in the coming one, because in his own province families are also large. He should give the father and mother of a large family some encouragement in bringing up what is after all the greatest asset in the country, its population.

Mr. RHODES: I always listen with extreme interest to my hon. friend from Bonaventure, with whom I have had the privilege of associating in this house for many years; but it is news to me, even from him, that the good people of Quebec require encouragement to raise large families. As a matter of fact, to the extent that large families are raised are their heads spared the necessity of paying income tax, because those who receive the exemption multiply the total figure to such an extent as to wipe out any fear on the part of people who are not able to pay that they will be called upon to do so. There is this to be said. If the figure of $500, which was the exemption that obtained until this year, was a fair one having regard to the cost of living, the figure of $400 is to-day more generous. I do not think I can give a better answer than that. Turning to other countries, we find that in Great Britain the exemption to the married person is only $750, and so far as children are concerned, the first child has an exemption of $250 while for every other child it is only $200. So that, bearing in mind these various considerations, I think that on the whole it may be said that we have reached a fair figure. Certainly, under existing conditions, $400 is reasonable.

Mr. DUFF: The minister has introduced an amendment that war pensions shall be exempt from taxation. In his budget speech he said that these pensions under certain circumstances would be taxable. I am willing to admit that in that speech, acting for the government, he went too far. There are certain cases where it would be a hardship for the ordinary individual receiving a small pension to pay an income tax on it. But there are certain men in this country to-day who are receiving one hundred per cent disability pensions and in addition thereto are drawing from this country as well as from private corporations very large salaries. If a man is physically fit and competent to be in the employ of the government, taking the place of some other man who is also physically fit and able to work, he should not be exempt so far as the amount he receives in pension is concerned. I am therefore opposed to the amendment as the minister has introduced it. I am willing to go a certain distance, because I know of men who are receiving very small salaries, either in private life or in the service of the government, and it would be a hardship for them to lose part of their pensions through income tax. There are to-day, however, certain men drawing eight or ten thousand dollars as employees of the government and where they are also getting one hundred per cent disability pension they should certainly pay their fair proportion of income tax.

I congratulate the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) on the very able speech he made; there could have been no greater compliment to the late government. He said that when the Liberal government was in power they decreased the percentage of taxation imposed on private corporations and other concerns. He went down the line from the time the Liberal government came into power, when the rate was very high, until they went out of power in 1930 when the rate had been decreased considerably. I am very proud that the Liberal party were in a position to do that. The reason they were able to do that was that business, from the time they took charge in 1922 until they went out of power in 1930, was on the upgrade and consequently they did not have to resort to the methods of the present government in order to raise revenue to carry on the affairs of this country. I think he paid this government no compliment when he said that they had been compelled to increase the rate from eight to ten per cent and might be compelled to increase it still further. Let me say to the hon. member for Dauphin that if this government stays in power another two or three years, instead of the rates which appear in this item, still higher rates will be in force. This will be necessary because of the policies of this government. Trade has decreased by more than fifty per cent since they came into power and in order to raise revenue they have been compelled to increase not only the income tax but the business and other taxes.

Mr. RHODES: I am sure the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough will not expect me to follow him in the major portion of these remarks.

Mr. DUFF: I do not see how you can.

Mr. RHODES: I would be happy to under other circumstances. I rose only to touch upon one point. My hon. friend referred to the proposals as originally brought down in the budget. It may be that, in the words of my hon. friend, those proposals went too far but I would point out that whatever merit they have, they were designed to meet the very case my hon. friend has in mind. They were not intended to be discriminatory against the returned soldier. There are returned soldiers who gave valiant service at the front walking the streets to-day without either a pension or a salary whereas, on the other hand, there are a number of their comrades who are in receipt of both. We abandoned those proposals for reasons which are well known. We desired to come to an amicable and satisfactory solution if at all possible. There has always been a general meritorious desire to keep proposals touching the welfare of the returned soldier free from political considerations. Conferences were held with the heads of the various veteran organizations who agreed to the proposal that pensions should be subject to income tax. This action was taken for the very reasons given by my hon. friend. It was felt that this tax would have a bearing only upon those whose incomes were large enough to be subject to income tax. It will not touch the great majority of pensions. These proposals will not bear at all except in the case of a returned soldier who has in addition to his pension an income from private or other sources running into substantial figures. We are asking for a contribution from the individual who can well and properly afford to make one by way of income tax. With all deference to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough, I submit that he ought to support the amendment for the very reasons he himself mentions.

Mr. DUFF: If I understand the amendment correctly, those men who are drawing full time pay as officials of this government or in a private capacity and who are in receipt of one hundred per cent disability pension will not pay anything by way of income tax. I agree that the man in the ordinary walks of life who is receiving only a small pension and perhaps a very meagre salary from others sources should be exempt, but if I understand the amendment correctly, such men as are in receipt of salaries of $8,000 or $10,000 from this government as well as a pension of $2,000 or $3,000, will not have to pay a tax upon their pensions.

Mr. RHODES: Under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act pensions have been specifically exempted, and the amendment proposes to strike out those exemptions. Once the exemptions are struck out, pensions will hereafter be subject to income tax.

Mr. DUFF: This year?

Mr. RHODES: The tax will not apply to incomes of last year. The returns were passed on April 30 and it would be highly inconvenient to go back and deal with pensions received last year. However, when a man fills out his return next year he will have to pay a tax upon his pension and other income received in 1933.

Mr. DUFF: Did not the minister in his first proposal expect that all pensions would be taxed for last year?

Mr. RHODES: No, that had no reference to a tax. The proposal in the budget was merely that we should eliminate conditions which obtained where returned soldiers were in receipt of both pension and salary. I have not exactly in mind the details, but the general principle to be applied was that the returned soldier should not receive both beyond a certain amount, the object in mind being that there would be available a number of positions for other returned soldiers who to-day are without either pension or salary. But there was no provision in the budget by way of taxation.

Mr. DUFF: I do not know that I am in order, but since the Minister of Finance has brought the matter up, may I ask: Why was that proposal entirely dropped, as far as it refers to men who are now drawing $8,000 or $10,000 in salary from the government and also 100 per cent pension? I can understand their dropping it in regard to elevator men and some others, but why should the man who is drawing an $8,000 or $10,000 salary from the government still receive a pension of $2,000 or $2,500? That is wrong, and I want to say to the Minister of Finance that unless something is done with regard to this whole pension scheme, this country will be ruined. There is no question in my mind that in Canada there are hundreds of people who have no right to the pensions they are drawing, not only those men who are getting salaries of from $8,000 to $10,000 and drawing $2,000 in pension, but a number of others, and somebody must have courage enough to say to the people and to the government that there must be an entire revision of the scheme whereby money is paid out in pensions. We are to-day paying out $55,000,000 or more in pensions and part of it is going to men who are drawing large salaries in addition to their pensions. That is not fair in view of the present condition of the country. Those men have no right to draw such high salaries in addition to receiving 100 per cent disability pensions, because any man who is entitled to 100 per cent disability pension should not have any position; he should sit back and draw his pension and not draw in addition a salary. The minister would have the sympathy of the country if he would deal with the matter properly. I know I have been a coward for fifteen years and there are other cowards in this country, but the time has arrived when the minister must agree with me that $55,000,000 or more is too much to pay in pensions to hundreds of people who do not deserve it; it is true there are thousands who do. For instance, I had one case yesterday of a man receiving $3.75 a month while in the Woods building there is a man drawing a salary of $10,000 and a pension of $2,000. Why should the minister exempt that man in the Woods building from the first proposal made in the budget? That is not right and it is time for the people to get up in arms in regard to the matter.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. DUFF: Colonel Lafleche. There are others besides him and I am sorry I have to mention his name. It is neither right nor fair; there are hundreds who under the Pension Act are getting too much money, who are drawing 100 per cent disabality pensions and also receiving salaries of $5,000, $8,000 or $10,000 from this government or big corporations.

Mr. RHODES: I hope the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough will not think I desire to impart any party flavour to what I am about to say; I assure him I do not, but he will bear in mind that the financial critic of the opposition bore down very heavily in criticism on the proposals as outlined in the budget and those were designed to remedy in part the very injustice of which my hon. friend complains.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister allow me to say that I do not agree with anybody, whether it is the financial critic of the opposition or anybody else, who will load this country with a bill of $55,000,000 or $60,000,000 for pensions, where in my opinion and in that of thousands of others the pension bill is entirely too high and somebody must have the courage to have this condition remedied.

Mr. RHODES: Having made that reference, I wish to say again that I do not make it in any party sense nor do I complain of the fact, but I speak of it merely for the purpose of indicating the difficulty any government has, owing to the atmosphere which has surrounded the soldier problems, in dealing with such matters as this.

Mr. DUFF: It is cowardice that is the trouble.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will, I am sure, be the first to appreciate the difficulty. I agree with him that there are injustices of which he speaks, inequalities which, in the interest of the returned soldier himself, ought to be remedied, because I fear this, that if those injustices are perpetuated, partly as a result of the policy which has hitherto been pursued by the officials representing the returned soldiers, in the last analysis there will be a revulsion of public feeling which will recoil upon the unfortunate heads of thousands of many deserving pensioners in Canada, some of whom are even to this day not getting as good treatment as they ought to receive. The reason the government withdrew this proposal was not that it is not in sympathy with the idea enunciated by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, but rather that it hoped it might be able to deal with the matter without creating friction and bringing the soldier question into the political forum. So the government withdrew the proposal and accepted as a compromise different proposals, one of which is embodied in the amendment which is now before the committee, but it was by no means understood that the settlement we arrived at was final; it was a settlement for the moment. But our discussions went further and will call for a review of the whole position of pensions, with the result that perhaps we shall return to normalcy on these matters, if not next year certainly in the very near future. I hope—and I say this from a purely patriotic and public-spirited point of view—that we can now and in the future keep these soldier questions out of party politics, and if we do that, I believe we can, without injustice to the returned soldier who is deserving, eradicate many inequalities and injustices and in the process save a very substantial sum of money to the public treasury.

Mr. MALCOLM: On May 3, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) brought to the attention of the minister inequalities which, in his opinion, existed in paragraphs 5 and 7 of the Income War Tax Act amendment resolution. I would like to know whether the minister has given any further consideration to the representations of my hon. friend. I want to submit to the minister, in supporting the complaint of my hon. friend, that a 12½ per cent corporation tax cannot be any more just than can an even rate of income tax and that the only way whereby I believe he can correct the inequality pointed out by the hon. member for North Waterloo would be to have some graduation in the corporation tax of 12½ per cent. The minister realizes, as do all other hon. gentlemen, that small family limited companies are not in the generally accepted sense of the term corporations at all. The convenience of operating one's business under a limited credit charter is very great. It allows in case of death the willing of the interest a man may have in his business to his heirs without the official winding up of the business. As a result through a great many years the practice has grown up in this country of forming limited companies of small private businesses. Under our legislation these small limited companies are treated as corporations, and there is no difference in the rate of taxation on these small companies and on a large corporation whose stock is broadly held.

The hon. member for North Waterloo has pointed out that should any one operate a private business where the total earnings were $5,000, he would pay $126, but the same business in the form of a limited company would pay $713. A private business earning $10,000 would pay $546, but if operated as a corporation or limited company would pay $1,667. It makes no difference whether salary is credited or not. I am taking the case where a man takes the profits out of his own business. I think the minister realizes that considerable inequality does exist in that regard, and I suggest to him that the only way I can see of correcting it is to modify the corporation tax by having the corporation tax graduated, as is the income tax, with a maximum of whatever the minister decides, whether it be 12½ or 10 per cent. The fact that a straight 12½ per cent is taken from the corporation first, and then the owner has to pay income tax on the dividend, means that if you operate as a limited company you are paying three times as much taxation as if you operate as a private business. I would ask the minister if he has considered any possible amendment.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I have considered the question very, very carefully. In the first place let me point out that in the case cited by my hon. friend from North Waterloo it is a one-man company, of which there are very few, and so it is really a question of viewing the incidence of the tax as applied to corporations as a whole and as applied to just a handful. My hon. friend from North Waterloo overlooked one fact. He did not pay the manager of the company a salary, to which he was entitled. We will assume that a fair salary would be $3,000. I have a complete computation here with which I am not going to encumber the record, but which I shall send across to my hon. friend, which discloses that instead of that company paying a tax of $713.75 it would pay a tax of only $357.50.

Mr. MALCOLM: Allowing for salary?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, a reasonable salary, say of $3,000. So that even in the case cited by my hon. friend from North Waterloo and referred to by my hon. friend from North Bruce, you have the comparison of the company paying $357.50 as against the individual paying $120. But I might point out to my hon. friend that there are other incidental things to be borne in mind. If it is an incorporated company there must be some advantage in being incorporated.

Mr. MALCOLM: Convenience largely.

Mr. RHODES: It might be convenience, but it must also be borne in mind that in the case of an incorporated company the individual owning it derives all the privileges which go with incorporation. In other words, if the venture should prove unfortunate the total assets which would be available to the creditors would be the amount of capital in the business, whereas if the individual conducted that business he would be liable for all the assets he had. So whether it is done for convenience or for other purposes, all of which might be equally lawful and worthy, the fact remains that it is to the advantage of the individual to be incorporated rather than to conduct his business as an individual. Otherwise, he would not be incorporated. That being so, the difference is not so great as to cause any undue worry.

I might point out to my hon. friend, when he discusses the question of a graduated corporation tax, that he will immediately see the difficulties with which you would be confronted. The tax would have to be on a basis of percentage return on invested capital rather than on the amount of the income. A $3,000 profit, for example in a very small company, might represent one hundred per cent of the capital invested, whereas half a million dollars in the case of a larger company might be only ten per cent of the capital invested. My hon. friend will at once realize the difficulties and complications that would arise in attempting to apply a graduated scale of income tax to corporations. I think the reason is obvious why a flat percentage is taken off the incomes of all companies. In the United States it is 13¾ per cent. Here it is one-eighth or 12½ per cent, on all companies, and that has a bearing solely on their net earnings. I must say that I have given a good deal of thought to the incidence in question, not only with respect to what I have said, but other considerations, and I do not see how we can apply any amendment to the act which would afford any alleviation in the case in question without doing grave injustice in other instances and causing certain loss to the treasury.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister knows better than I do that the withdrawal of the private family corporation privilege is what has caused this inequality to exist, as was pointed out by the hon. member for North Waterloo. In spite of what has been said with regard to the advantages of a limited company in freeing a man from the danger of having to hypothecate other personal securities in time of financial stress, I do submit that the general idea of taxation seems to be to get after corporations. Provincial taxes on corporations are mounting, and I am afraid that the result will be that a great many charters will be given up. Many small businesses which have been operating as limited companies will find it impossible so to operate, and the taxation derived from companies will be lost to the provinces as well as to the dominion. For that reason I would submit to the minister, without wanting to hold up his resolution at all, that I believe the subject is worthy of considerable study. I believe the inequality could be corrected by making some graduated scale that would put taxation charges on small corporations back to where they were under the family corporation privilege.

Mr. RHODES: I shall be very glad to give consideration to the matter, and if any remedy can be found without doing injustice to corporations as a whole I shall be very happy.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: May I, Mr. Chairman, revert to the question under discussion a few minutes ago? First I would like to indicate my unqualified approval of the suggestion of the minister to remove the income tax exemption from pensions. This does not affect the small pensions and small salaries, the men we are endeavouring to protect. It will only apply where the total income comes within the range of income tax. But it brings us to the proposal which the minister put forward that was afterwards withdrawn, and I must confess that with somewhat mixed feelings I watched both the introduction and the withdrawal of that proposal. Taking it on the whole I was glad that the proposal to suspend the payment of all pensions to civil servants in receipt of the full salary of their position was withdrawn; yet at the same time I recognize, as so many have recognized, that there are and have been many apparent injustices and anomalies throughout the service that not only should be corrected if possible but that unquestionably cause a great deal of heartburning and disturbance amongst the public and amongst the returned men themselves. I refer to cases of men in receipt of substantial salaries and performing responsible work and being at the same time in receipt of substantial pensions. I am not going to mention any names, but those of us whose work has brought us into contact with pension matters have seen a great many cases that I think are obviously unjust. As the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said, where you find a man in receipt of a one hundred per cent disability pension, or indeed any substantial rate running from seventy-five per cent up, who at the same time is in a position the duties of which are responsible and onerous and drawing full salary, I think it is obvious to anyone that either the man is not entitled to that high disability pension or he is not qualified to perform the onerous duties of a high salaried position. I think there is no question that these cases scattered through the service bring to the mind of many people the inevitable contrast, which the minister recognizes, between the position of these men and that of other men whose services were just as great, whose disability is just as great, although it was impossible to prove its attributability; and who have neither pension nor employment. That tremendous and striking contrast has undoubtedly caused a great deal of disturbance and trouble.

On the whole I am glad that the minister withdrew the proposal, not because of the effect on these men with good incomes, but because of the effect on large numbers of men in the lower grades of service, who are just able to make it go with their small pension and small salary. It has been said, and quite truly, that the pension is supposed to make up the difference between a man's present earning capacity and that which he would have enjoyed had he not gone overseas; to make him stand on a par with other men. It was said by some that any man who is earning the full salary attached to some of these positions must have his earning capacity unimpaired. That is not the case with all men receiving disability pension, there are many men in the position they are in on account of their disability, who but for that disability would have been qualified to occupy a much more difficult position and earn a much higher salary, but who because of their disability are able to perform only light duties, so they are low in the salary scale. They would have suffered, particularly as many of them were using that small pension to pay for the soldiers' insurance, the only way they could provide for the future of their families. The withdrawal of that pension would have necessitated the dropping of the soldiers' insurance.

But when the minister says that the matter is not finally settled I am with him. I agree that the service itself—I am not speaking now of the whole pension scheme—the service itself should be examined, and each of those cases of men in receipt of a pension and a salary should be dealt with individually, should be examined into and the anomaly removed if possible. I think no one will accuse me of being unsympathetic towards the returned men, I think my record in the house will establish that. I have sometimes been accused of being over thoughtful of their interests. But I am satisfied from what knowledge and experience I have, and assuming that the cases with which I am familiar give a fair cross section of the whole, that if the pension payments all through were to be dealt with with absolute justice there would be a very considerable saving; probably four or five million dollars could be cut off from our pension payments. But I am of the opinion that that four or five million dollars would not be saved to the country, but would be paid to those who are not at the present time receiving what they should receive if absolute justice could be done.

Our difficulty has been this, the minister referred to it and I agree with him, that although our purpose was right and we have done our best, parliament has been meticulously careful to withdraw pension matters from any connection with politics, and I think parliament has succeeded. I think no government and as far as I know no member of parliament has been guilty of mixing politics and pension matters. I have been on the committee every year there has been one and I certainly would not have known at any time to what party any member belonged from his efforts in the committee. But one thing that has been overlooked, and overlooked perhaps to a greater degree by the returned men and their friends than any others, is that just to the degree that you eliminate politics in pension matters, to that degree you nullify any influence that any private member or the government itself may have over pension administration. To the extent that you eliminate politics you take away from parliament and from the government the influence which sometimes should be exerted over pension administration, and it is left wholly to the officials themselves, to their sense of justice, to see that pensions are properly administered. I sometimes wonder if we have not gone almost too far in our desire to eliminate political consideration wholly from pension matters. However I do not want to go into that question now, I simply want to indicate my complete approval of the minister's suggestion to apply the income tax to all pensions where the total income comes within the range of income taxation. Also I wish to indicate my agreement with him that this question of pensions to civil servants in receipt of salary, also settled for the moment, is not settled finally, but that the anomalies I have mentioned will be removed in the only way possible if justice is to be done, that is by going through the whole service with a fine toothed comb and dealing with each case on its merits. You cannot go right through with one great sweep without perhaps doing more harm than good. When that time comes I am certain that every member in the house interested in the welfare of the returned men will interest himself in seeing that those who should have pensions get them but those who should not should have them taken away.

Mr. RHODES: I would like to say a word arising out of what has just been so well said by my hon. friend from Red Deer. I think we all recognize that no one in the house is more entitled, from his experience and his service, to speak for the returned men than is my hon. friend. And few if any are better qualified than he to do so. I concur almost in toto with everything my hon. friend has said.

The reason I rose, Mr. Chairman, was to say that with respect to the proposals originally brought down in the budget we were met with the objection on the part of those who spoke for the different organizations that it was a violation of contract, and that was a difficult argument to meet. But here is where I met my first disappointment, and I should not be surprised if my hon. friend and myself are on common ground in that respect: I asked them if it would not be fair to agree that this should have application only to those in receipt of a salary in excess of $2,000, $2,500 or some similar sum. They still interposed the objection that it would be a violation of contract. Then I came back with this: I said very good, we will observe the sanctity of contract even though to do so will cause an injustice to individual returned soldiers who to-day have neither pension nor salary. Why not from now on, with regard to those who come into the service hereafter, make it applicable only when it goes beyond the sum of $2,500 per year, or $2,000 or whatever sum might be agreed upon. To that proposal they also objected, and if I may say so without reflecting upon them in any way, in my opinion they exercised bad judgment. I think it would have been a case of justice to the returned soldiers who, because of the application of that principle, might hereafter have an opportunity for employment in public service which otherwise would be denied them. For that reason I am doubly glad to hear the remarks of my hon. friend from Red Deer, and I hope that when another year rolls round we may be able to apply that principle, which I think would be fair to all concerned.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That objection was brought to me, and I could not but agree that it was a powerful objection. There was a contract; we did agree in every phase of our pension legislation that the pension should not be taken into consideration in this way. But this also is an underlying principle of the pension legislation—and I made the suggestion—that the pension is paid because of disability. That is, a man with a disability which detracts from his earning power by 20 per cent, 30 per cent, 80 per cent or 100 per cent is paid a pension to bring him up to par, to make up for that deficiency. It is obvious that if a man suffers from a disability which impairs his earning powers to the extent of 80 per cent or 60 per cent, he cannot earn a full time salary at a full time job. If the pension is held sacred we might say to him. "If you are only 50 per cent capable you will only receive a 50 per cent salary, so you may take either the full salary and a smaller pension or the full pension and a smaller salary." Then we would be doing the fair thing and no contract would be broken.

Mr. McGIBBON: I agree very largely with what the Minister of Finance said, and I think the hon. member for Red Deer predicated his remarks on a wrong assumption. Rightly or wrongly the parliaments of the past decided that pension would be paid according to a man's ability, to earn a living in the labour market, that is, with pick and shovel. It is quite obvious that a man may not be able to earn much of a living with pick and shovel though he might be 100 per cent efficient in many other lines of business. I think we must bear that in mind.

I do agree that an injustice is being done the country when we have a public servant as instanced by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, drawing a salary of $10,000 a year and a pension of $2,500. I do not think this country is under any obligation in a case of that kind. I am at a loss, however, to understand how that could happen. My recollection is that the maximum pension in the case of a private soldier was fixed at $60 per month, plus so much for his wife and so much for each child. I was wondering if the proposals of the minister could not be applied to officers, because I do not think many of the private soldiers will come under this taxation scheme in any case. A man with a total disability only receives $720 a year, so he would not come within the application of the income tax in any way, even with a liberal allowance for his wife and children. I do believe, however, that the returned men feel very strongly in the case of men drawing large salaries and large pensions. I do not think the elevator operators, for instance, should be taxed at all; I do not see how they could be taxed because I do not think their total income would be sufficient to bring them under the schedules, but I do think something should be done to protect the treasury if cases exist such as that mentioned by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. In my opinion we do not owe any man, no matter what his services may have been, a return of $12,000 or $13,000 a year.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, that for many of us it was a privilege to go overseas. It was an experience upon which we can look back and which we will never forget; we would not have missed it for anything. Personally I look upon that experience with a great deal of pride; I would rather have missed almost any other period of my life than the service I saw in the trenches. I think every returned man should be sufficiently interested in his country to share the burden that is being carried to-day by every man, woman and child in Canada, and I should like to see the minister do something with regard to these people who are receiving both high salaries and high pensions. I do not think that is just or equitable. As I said before, I do not see how the private soldier is going to be affected by this legislation; I do not think his pension and salary together would bring him under the schedules, but if his combined income is sufficient he should pay his tax.

With regard to the first proposal I have just this to say: I never saw how it could be defended, and I do not see that yet. A man went to the front and lost an arm, a leg or an eye, and the country said, "We will give you so much money to compensate you for your loss." Then we say to him, "If you enter government service and do the work that is done by another man, you must work for less money." That is penalizing him because he was injured in the war, always provided that he can do the work as efficiently as the other man. I do not believe that proposal could be defended. I do say to the minister, however, that he must do something with regard to these men drawing large pensions and large salaries. I think it is his duty to do so, and personally I will be quite willing to defend that policy at any time, because I think it is right.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It is our job to find some way of putting that suggestion into effect.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MALCOLM: Before this resolution carries, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to paragraph 11, which reads:

> 11. That a tax of 5 per centum shall be imposed at the source on all dividends or interest paid or credited by Canadian debtors to non-residents of Canada.

I understood there were some amendments to that.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps my hon. friend has reference to the statement I made in the house on March 31.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: The provisions contained in that statement are carried out to-day, but it is done administratively. No amendment to the resolution is required to effect that purpose.

Mr. MALCOLM: What method is the minister taking to carry out the promise made on March 31?

Mr. RHODES: Will my hon. friend put his question in another form.

Mr. MALCOLM: Do sections 11 and 12 cover the new interpretation of the tax on dividends of non-residents?

Mr. RHODES: Dividends are still taxable when paid to non-residents,—

Mr. MALCOLM: All dividends?

Mr. RHODES: —and interest only to the extent that it is paid in Canadian funds. There will be one or two minor amendments but they will be presented when the bill is in committee; it will not be necessary to amend the resolution. I am advised by the law officers that there is no necessity to amend the resolution itself in order to carry out fully the provisions as outlined in the statement I made on March 31. There will be some minor changes which it is thought wise to have made in committee of the whole on the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the minister indicate those minor changes?

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps I might table a summary of the proposals as applicable to this tax, which I think will answer succinctly every question which is likely to be submitted by my hon. friend from North Bruce or anyone else. I have copies in both English and French and I will table a few now, and more will be available as hon. gentlemen desire.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister will remember that when the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was speaking after the introduction of the budget he said he did not know very well how to criticize these provisions in the budget inasmuch as he had no idea what they would be when the budget was finally revised and amended. It was pretty common gossip on the street that on March 31 telegrams had reached the minister that the London stock exchange had deleted all Canadian securities from the official list and prohibited further dealings, with the result that on getting this word from London the minister took fright and set about making amendments. I am told that the idea of the minister at the present time is to exempt from payment of this tax and interest all Dominion government bonds held by non-residents, but that other bonds, provincial or corporate, will still have the tax applied. I understand also, if I am correctly informed, that all bonds payable in the currency of any other country are to be exempt. It seems to me that the exemptions are so extensive that the amount of tax that will be collected will not be considerable enough to justify the complications that will arise in the minister's endeavour to collect them.

Mr. RHODES: Let me say this, particularly with reference to that part of my hon. friend's remarks touching what was said by the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. It must be borne in mind that in this tax we are breaking new ground so far as Canada is concerned, and it is quite obvious that in doing so we shall encounter difficulties here and there. Therefore I make no apologies whatever for any changes which may have been found necessary from the original proposals—none whatever. It is certainly nothing new in this country to have changes made in the budget, because we have not had a budget in years that has not been changed materially. Instance after instance could be cited, in the case of governments which were supported by my hon. friends opposite, and I am not the least bit worried about criticism of that sort. The man who does not make mistakes never does anything, and a government that would be so timid that it could not proceed for fear it might have to retrace its steps would not be worthy of the name. So far as I am concerned therefore I have not the slightest feeling of diffidence in making changes if they are for the better. I may say to my hon. friend that the consideration we had in mind was this. Britain for years has imposed taxes of this kind—

Mr. MALCOLM: Certainly.

Mr. RHODES: —but they are in the happy position of being a rich creditor country.

Mr. MALCOLM: Quite so.

Mr. RHODES: The United States also for some years has imposed similar forms of taxation, and it too is a powerful creditor country. Now, we in humble little Canada attempt to impose the same sort of taxation and of course we must dodge the big stick. Why? Because we are a debtor country, and a small country. It is true we had to relinquish some of this tax, largely by reason of the circumstances I have outlined and partly because it was pointed out to us that we had to honour contract obligations; and I regret that my hon. friend could even be able to refer to the incident with respect to the London stock exchange, because their attitude was not in keeping with that solid, sterling character which we have always associated with Britain, especially touching matters of finance. But they went off at halfcock—

Mr. MALCOLM: They certainly did.

Mr. RHODES: —whereas our friends in the United States who were subject to the same tax kept their heads, and were calm and cool about it, prepared to wait until they found out what the full incidence of the taxation meant. Our friends in London, however, became so hysterical that they went completely up in the air. They suspended operations. They did not wipe Canadian transactions off the boards but they suspended operations, "don't you know," until they could find out what the various proposals meant, in the meantime, no doubt, fully expecting that they would frighten the poor colonial.

Mr. MALCOLM: Which they did.

Mr. RHODES: Which they were able to do in part. If my hon. friend derives any comfort from that admission, very well; I make it freely.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am sorry.

Mr. RHODES: I am happy to say that we have held a substantial portion of the tax and it will yield a substantial sum to the treasury.

Mr. MALCOLM: You should have held it all.

Mr. RHODES: In its essence, it is a fair tax as it enables us to pay into the treasury of Canada money which hitherto has gone into the treasuries of other countries. If a resident of Great Britain or the United States pays this tax he will receive full allowance for his payment.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is when he pays the British tax?

Mr. RHODES: When he pays his tax in Great Britain. I must say that the attitude taken by the London stock exchange seemed to be singularly unfair especially when it is borne in mind that we are asking only for a humble five per cent while the mother country asks for just exactly one quarter or twenty-five per cent under similar conditions. However, these are the facts and the circumstances and I recite them without any limitation or evasion whatsoever.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think the candor of the minister is to be commended. My criticism of the action taken by the minister is that there was a want of courage. He should not have been frightened by a gun at half cock. As he points out, there was no justification for this action by a country which itself taxes non-residents twenty-five per cent. It is a fair tax. The investor in a foreign country must realize that there are two entirely separate fields in which a government may operate. Because a government sells securities does not mean that it is going to give up control of taxation. The minister was perfectly justified in proposing this tax but I do not think he was justified in receding from the original position which he took.

Mr. RHODES: In part.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, in part. I think the tax was fair and I think it was needed for revenue. I join with the minister in saying that the action taken by the London stock exchange to delete Canadian securities from the list in order to frighten the Canadian government was unfair. If I had been in the minister's place I would have gone through with the taxation as originally proposed.

Mr. LUCAS: In connection with the collection of the tax upon bearer bonds, would the minister advise the committee what position an individual would be in who had not sufficient total income to necessitate the paying of the tax or who had already declared the income received from bearer bonds? Would the tax be deducted by the bank and then application made for refund?

Mr. RHODES: A man who cashes a coupon in Canada of a bearer bond payable in Canada will be called upon to attach a certificate of ownership. No money will be deducted at the moment of payment but the certificate of ownership will be attached to the coupons and will subsequently come to the income tax office. If the individual does not come within the range of those who pay income tax, no tax will be collected, but, on the other hand, if he does come within the range, a tax will be collected. The advantage of the system is that it will prevent evasions which have hitherto taken place in the case of those who have not declared their whole income from bearer bonds.

Mr. MALCOLM: In order to get at the interest rates paid on bonds there must either be reflotation or taxation. The minister's first attempt at taxation is very fair and modest and should not be complained of by anyone. There is no doubt that there is a great difference in value in the interest received to-day and that received in 1928 when the bonds were sold and there is a necessity for increased taxation upon the interest paid or a lowering of the rate of interest. As far as I am concerned, I would be entirely in favour of having the original proposals in the budget remain in force.

Mr. MacLEAN: Has the minister ever thought of having a more simple income tax form? I think most hon. members have received complaints about the forms from farmers and others, who have had to fill them out.

Mr. MALCOLM: Have the farmers any bonds?

Mr. MacLEAN: Not so many bonds but still many of them are compelled to fill out the forms. My suggestion would be that a form of questionnaire be sent to the farmers. This could be filled out and returned to the income tax office and if the individual was liable for tax, the income tax form could be filled out at a later date.

Mr. RHODES: I can quite understand the attitude of mind of an individual who is confronted for the first time with an income tax form. I do not know whether my hon. friend has ever seen the form of ballot used in some of the states of the United States, but I shall never forget the first time I saw one of these. It was just about the fiercest document I have ever seen, filled with all sorts of diagrams and hieroglyphics and whatnots. Apparently those who had become familiar with its use were not awed by its presence. I think the same thing is true to a large extent of our income tax form. While they present complexities and difficulties to one who sees them for the first time, he gradually becomes familiar with their use. I do not think it is the form that bothers us so much as the figure which appears at the lower right hand corner. The income tax officials who have been able to profit by the experience they have gained in years gone by tell me that they feel that the form is as simple as it could be having regard to the safeguards which must be utilized in the collection of a tax of this character. I can say to my hon. friend and to all other hon. members of the committee that if they have any suggestions of a workable character to offer in the way of simplification of the form, I am sure the commissioner of income tax will be ready to consider their adoption if they are at all workable.

Mr. MUNN: Referring to the bearer bond coupons, I am one of those who believe this, if carefully handled, will return to the coffers of the dominion and provincial governments a great deal of money. My opinion is that in handling the tax this year, the government should go back and see why the man was not able to pay the same tax last year. I hope the minister will have his officials instructed to have this made retroactive, because I really think a great deal of money has been lost to the dominion treasury through people who are dishonest in making up their returns.

Mr. RHODES: It was part of the object I had in mind when these proposals were brought down that not only should we collect from the individual this year, but we should find out what he was doing with his income in previous years. The law is ample to enable us to do that. It may transpire that Mr. A, in making out his income tax return this year, discloses that he has certain bearer bond coupons on which he has not made returns previously, and as a result his income bears a different proportion from the one hitherto disclosed. The question will then be put to him: When did you purchase those bonds? There will be no difficulty in finding out when the purchase was made, and if it is disclosed that he purchased those two, three, four or five years before, he will be called upon to recoup the treasury to the extent he has defrauded it in times past.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I wonder whether the minister would clarify paragraph 16. I have been reading it over and I cannot make out the real sense of it, particularly where it reads:

Provided that in no case shall such interest or taxes be apportioned against the taxpayer's income from his chief occupation or business.

Just what does that mean?

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps I could answer my hon. friend's question, at least in part, by referring to a provision in the bill itself which will be based upon this resolution:

Section 6 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

(h) Carrying charges of property the income from which is exempt, except to the extent that such carrying charges exceed the exempt income.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

The explanation on the corresponding page of the bill is as follows:

This section provides that the carrying charges of productive property producing income—

That would be property real or personal; it might be bonds or it might be something else.

—which is exempted from taxation, such as tax-free bond interest or dividends received by one company from another shall be applied first against such exempt income. Any excess of such carrying charges may be applied against income other than the income from the taxpayer's chief position, occupation, trade, business or calling.

I do not know that I can make the matter any clearer than that.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to draw the minister's attention to paragraph 12. The purpose of that is that if a man cashes a dividend cheque in the United States at a premium, he shall have to pay 5 per cent, not on the premium, but on the whole dividend. That may be all right, but it will be noticed that in the income tax return in the form that you have to make out, there is an item inserted in which you have to show any income you have received from premiums obtained in that way, so that you will have to pay not only twice, but three times. Supposing the premium on a specific cheque of $100 is 10 per cent. You do not pay 5 per cent on the $10; you pay 5 per cent on the whole dividend. Then when you come to make out your income tax return, you again have to pay whatever your income tax rate is upon the amount you have received in that way. That is certainly paying it a second time. I do not know whether the minister understands me.

Mr. RHODES: I think I do.

Mr. NEILL: Then there is the third effect. I submit it is not in accordance with the usual custom to charge for that at all. Should it not be called principal increment? For instance, if a man bought something in the United States, as he often does in the course of a year, he has to pay a premium on the money and he does not receive any allowance for that in his income tax return, so he pockets the loss. In the one case it should be called capital increment, the same as in the other it would be called capital loss.

Mr. RHODES: To answer my hon. friend's last question first, our principle of taxation in Canada has been only to tax income. We have never taxed increment. I think the experience of the past two, three or four years has abundantly proven that in that respect we have adopted the right principle, because to-day, despite the condition of the world and conditions in Canada, we are in receipt from our income tax of a total yield which is comparable with the tax which has been received in other years, whereas to take the example in the neighbouring country to the south where losses are to be taken into consideration in making up income tax returns, the result has been that the yield of their income tax has shrivelled to only a fraction of the normal amount. The result is shown in the enormous deficit which they had there last year.

Mr. NEILL: The government does not tax increment?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. NEILL: But this is increment.

Mr. RHODES: We do not take into account the increment at all; they do.

Mr. NEILL: I claim that this is increment.

Mr. RHODES: Well, coming to the first question, when the man pays his 5 per cent tax, the amount that he pays, although paid upon the total, is less than the premium he receives.

Mr. NEILL: It might not be.

Mr. RHODES: Then the tax will not be applicable; that is the answer. When in making up his income tax returns he comes to show the amount of premium he has received, that premium as shown would be less the 5 per cent which he has already paid.

Mr. NEILL: But not less the other sums he may have paid as premiums if he had bought stuff in the United States during the year.

Mr. RHODES: We could not cover a case of that kind.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister not consider the premiums as increment?

Mr. RHODES: I would not think so. If anyone were to consider as increment the amount of purchases he has made, our income tax returns would disappear very rapidly.

Mr. NEILL: I am referring to that specific case only; when you tax the increment, you ought to allow for the decrement, it seems to me.

Mr. RHODES: Apart altogther from the question whether the tax is applicable to increment as such, there is the question whether it would be wise policy for us so to regulate our income tax as to make it to the advantage of the individual to purchase in a foreign country to the exclusion of his own. That question would also arise and it has no reference to tariff or protection or anything else. The fact of the matter is that that is what we would be doing.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: There are two or three items standing in the customs schedules which I should like to take up.

PROTECTIVE SERVICE SALARIES

Mr. MACDOUGALL: While we are waiting I should like to bring up a matter which is not controversial at all. It has been brought to my attention this afternoon that members of the protective staff, charwomen and so forth, have not been paid for two weeks. I would ask the Minister of Finance if he has any idea of giving them a cheque on Saturday to bring a little happiness into their homes.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend perhaps was not in the house earlier in the day. I did all that I could, and this house did all that it could do when it passed the interim supply bill. It was sent to the Senate, but unfortunately the Senate, for reasons best known to itself—I do not know what the answer is—gave the bill only a first reading and then adjourned, so that we are now in the position that until the Senate returns and passes the bill we cannot issue the cheques. I hope, however, that the Senate will pass the bill on Tuesday, in which event I can assure my hon. friend that we shall get royal assent just as quickly as possible because it is unfortunate that the cheques cannot be paid.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to propose, Mr. Chairman, which is new, but to which I hope the committee will take no exception, and that is to add item 106d. The object of the amendment is to give to the British West Indies on grape fruit when imported in airtight cans or other airtight containers the same rate as is applicable in the case of the Australian treaty, namely, one cent a pound instead of two cents a pound, which is the ordinary rate. I beg to move that the following item, enumeration, and rates of duties, be included in the list of items indicated in resolution No. 2, of March 21, 1933, as for insertion in schedule A of the Customs Tariff:

106 (d). Grapefruit, the produce of the British West Indies, when prepared in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers in the British West Indies and imported direct from the country of growth and manufacture, per pound, 1 cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: The next is a new item of a similar character. I beg to move that the following item, enumeration, and rates of duties, be included in the list of items indicated in resolution No. 2, of March 21st, 1933, as for insertion in schedule A of the Customs Tariff:

152b. Orange juice, the produce of the British West Indies, when imported direct from the country of production, free.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: The next is an amendment in connection with tariff item 208o, which has already been passed, and which I am going to ask the committee to delete. I might explain that it is a conference item. It was agreed that it be struck out in the first instance, but it has since been ascertained that by changing the content rate we can procure this commodity in ample quantity from the mother country, and the British have asked that in those circumstances we restore the item, which we are prepared to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the commodity?

Mr. RHODES: Tartaric acid crystals. I beg to move that resolution No. 2 of March 21, 1933, being a resolution to amend Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, be amended by striking thereout tariff item 208o wherever the said item, enumeration, and rates of duties occur in the said resolution.

In a word, the effect of the motion is to restore the conference item.

Mr. NEILL: It cuts out both items?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why was it ever changed?

Mr. RHODES: Because it was found that we could not under the British content regulation of fifty per cent procure a supply in the mother country, but by making the content requirement 25 per cent, which we have done by order in council, the commodity can be fully supplied from Great Britain.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. NEILL: Does it apply to cream of tartar in crystals as well as to tartaric acid crystals?

Mr. RHODES: No, just tartaric acid crystals.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: The next is 366b, which I had asked to stand. The rates as proposed in the budget were 10 cents intermediate and 15 cents general. I now move to reduce these rates from 10 cents intermediate and 15 cents general to 5 and 10 cents respectively.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: The next item is 568.

Customs tariff—568. Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 45 per cent; and 25 cents per pound intermediate tariff, and 30 cents per pound, general tariff.

Mr. YOUNG: In regard to this item 568, the rate prior to September, 1930, was 20 per cent, 30 per cent and 35 per cent. In September, 1930, the rate was changed to 25 per cent, 25 per cent and 45 per cent. Now the proposed rate is 25 per cent under the British preference, which is not being touched; 35 per cent plus 25 cents a pound under the intermediate tariff, and 45 per cent plus 30 cents a pound under the general tariff. It is difficult to estimate what that specific rate will amount to when reduced to ad valorem, but roughly it will be 60 per cent under the intermediate and 75 per cent under the general. The minister told us that the production of these goods in Canada amounts roughly to $48,000,000, and that the work is done in 161 establishments, paying wages of $14,000,000, and employing between 17,000 and 18,000 people. He told us that the object was not to increase the price but rather to secure a larger share of the market. He also told us that the importations were $1,500,000 worth, of which $900,000 came from Great Britain. The result therefore of this increase is that only $600,000 worth of business is left that can be captured from foreign markets, $600,000 of importations mostly from the United States and entering mostly under the general rate. That amounts to only 1¼ per cent of the Canadian production, so that all that these factories can possibly hope to accomplish is to increase their sales by 1¼ per cent. They employ, so the minister told us, nearly 18,000 people. If you increase their production by 1¼ per cent you will increase the number of their employees by 225. The average wage paid in the industry is about $800 per annum. Two hundred and twenty-five new employees drawing an average wage of $800 would mean an increased wage bill of $180,000. Importations of $600,000 which at present carry a duty of forty-five per cent will pay in revenue to the treasury $270,000 per annum. The minister proposes to sacrifice that revenue in order to secure an increased wage bill of $180,000. He would be $90,000 per annum ahead if he took $180,000 out of the treasury and paid these men to sit on the sidewalk and do nothing.

An hon. MEMBER: Is this a conundrum?

Mr. YOUNG: It is not; it is the way the taxation works out. The minister wonders where the revenue has gone, why the budget does not balance; yet here he is proposing to take $270,000 out of the treasury in order that certain industries may pay an increased wage bill of $180,000. But no one believes for a moment that these gentlemen do not intend to raise prices; no one believes that they are asking an increased tariff to increase their sales one and one-quarter per cent. They do intend to increase prices. They could increase them thirty per cent under this legislation. Suppose they increase them only ten per cent, they take an additional $5,000,000 out of the pockets of the people of this country, all for the sake of paying $180,000 in wages.

How can this industry be helped? There is only one way to bring about any material increase in the sale of these goods in Canada, that is by lowering prices. Every increase in price will further restrict sales, will force people to buy some other kind of goods, and the result will be less sales rather than more. I do not believe for a moment that this industry needs this added protection. I have in my hand a report concerning the Regent Knitting Mills Limited for 1932. It is dated from Montreal, April 9, and is headed:

Sales Lower but Profits of Knitting Mills Mount

A wide increase in profits in the face of declining sales was reported to-day by Regent Knitting Mills Ltd. for 1932. While total sales declined 9·81 per cent gross profits at $317,355 were up 46·24 per cent compared with $217,003 in 1931. Operating profit at $110,993 compared with $19,958.

Increase in profits was ascribed by the president, C. G. deTonnancour, to widespread economies and attainment of greater efficiency.

I would recommend to the minister that he advise all other persons and companies engaged in that industry to adopt the policy of this mill—widespread economies. Let them look to the increased efficiency of their plant rather than to further tariff protection, which will enable them to raise prices.

I said a moment ago that the minister was sacrificing $270,000 of revenue in order to enable this industry to pay a little more in wages. That is not the only case where the revenue is being sacrificed. I know the trouble he is meeting with in trying to make his budget balance, yet here we have some examples of where the revenue has gone. Take the figures with respect to soup:

Year	Imports	Rate per cent	Amount of duty	Loss of revenue
1930	$1,974,000	25	$500,000
1932	184,000	35	62,000	$438,000

The wages paid in the industry in producing that much more soup amounted to about $250,000.

The figures for mats and hearth rugs are as follows:

Year	Imports	Rate per cent	Amount of duty	Loss of revenue
1930	$583,000		$162,000
1932	37,000		27,000	$135,000

Other examples are:

Oriental Carpets

Year	Imports	Rate per cent	Amount of duty	Loss of revenue
1930	$1,461,000	35	$488,000
1932	389,000	40+20c.	242,000	$246,000

Velvet Tapestry

Year	Imports	Rate per cent	Amount of duty	Loss of revenue
1930	$ 99,000		$ 25,000
1932	66			$ 25,000

Tweeds

Year	Imports	Rate per cent	Amount of duty	Loss of revenue
1930	$2,953,000		$755,000
1932	759,0000		381,000	$374,000

Overcoatings

Year	Imports	Rate per cent	Amount of duty	Rate of revenue
1930	$1,624,000		$436,000
1932	402,000		221,000	$215,000

The minister has in these few items sacrificed in revenue nearly one and a half million dollars, to be exact $1,433,000, in order to encourage these industries to manufacture things at home which could be much more profitably imported, and the manufacture of which did not pay in wages as much as the loss of revenue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And made the cost of living higher for everyone.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes. Is it any wonder that we find the minister, to quote the words of Sir Robert Peel, "sitting on an empty chest by the pool of bottomless deficiency fishing for a budget." I urge the minister to strike that item out. There is no sense at all in proposing in times like these to sacrifice $270,000 of revenue in order to give $180,000 in wages. Seriously I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I hope my hon. friend will not consider me in the least disrespectful if I refuse to follow him in his discourse. My reason is—

Mr. YOUNG: That there is no answer, that is all.

Mr. RHODES: Well, let us for the sake of argument say that. I was going to say that whether we are right or wrong in our tariff proposals, this item is on all fours with the woven goods tariff, which we threshed over and over, discussed and rediscussed, and which is in the statute book, although we are not going as high in the matter of protection on this item as in connection with woven goods.

Mr. YOUNG: Two wrongs can never make a right.

Mr. RHODES: If we are wrong in the former case we are wrong here. I can only say to my hon. friend—because I would like if possible to dispose of this before six o'clock—that the proof of the pudding is the eating.

Mr. YOUNG: We have the proof.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no pudding.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. RHODES: If it transpires that we are mistaken in our view as to what will be the result of our tariff in respect to woven goods, we are wrong here.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. YOUNG: No, it is not carried.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the Interest Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, under section 91 of the British North America Act interest is one of the matters placed under the control of the Dominion parliament, and the present Interest Act is chapter 102 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. The bill I am introducing proposes to repeal section 2 of that act, which reads:

> Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other act of the parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount which is agreed upon.

Because of the very difficult economic conditions existing in Canada many persons are being compelled to pay very high rates of interest, and this bill asks that a maximum rate of five per cent be established in the Interest Act. Perhaps I might read the bill to make this clear. The preamble states:

> Whereas excessive rates of interest are being charged on loans on mortgage, agreements and contracts; and whereas it is advisable under present conditions to fix a maximum rate of interest in Canada, applicable to loans, contracts and agreements of every kind: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Then the bill proceeds:

> 1. Section two of the Interest Act, chapter one hundred and two of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:—

"2. (1) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this or any other act of the parliament of Canada, the rate of interest shall not exceed five per centum per annum, and no person, corporation or company shall stipulate for, allow, exact, reserve or collect a rate of interest or discount greater than five per centum per annum, and in no case shall a higher rate of interest be recoverable.

(2) Every person, corporation or company who or which, directly or indirectly, takes, accepts and receives a higher rate of interest than is authorized by this section shall incur a penalty equal to twice the value of the moneys, wares, merchandise or other commodities lent or bargained for. Such penalty may be sued for and recovered in any court of competent purisdiction by any party injuriously affected, on proof of such excessive interest."

This principle of a maximum rate of interest is not entirely new in Canada; it was in force in the four provinces which originally came into confederation, and I think it remained on the statute books until 1890, when all the acts were repealed by a bill introduced by Sir John Thompson. Under the old act in Ontario and Quebec the maximum rate of interest was fixed at 6 per cent, except for insurance companies and religious, charitable and educational corporations, which might exact a rate not exceeding 8 per cent. Included in that section was a penalty for violation of the act amounting to treble the value of the goods or loan. In Nova Scotia the maximum rate was established at seven per cent, except with regard to loans on personal property or on personal responsibility, when rates up to ten per cent were allowed. In New Brunswick the maximum rate was six per cent, and the penalty imposed for violation was the value of the principal sum or the goods covered by the loan.

The bill I am introducing does not attempt to deal with the rate of interest on existing obligations. That question was raised in a motion introduced by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), and his resolution was referred to the banking and commerce committee for consideration. Apparently there is not very much chance of any action by the committee on that resolution during this session of parliament, but by this act it is hoped to fix a maximum rate of 5 per cent on obligations entered into in the future. According to a definition which I found in the dictionary to-day interest means money paid for the use of money loaned, or money paid for the forbearance of debt, and I am afraid that at present most of the interest that is being paid is for the forbearance of debt rather than for the use of money loaned. In many cases the money loaned has largely disappeared.

Interest is sometimes referred to as the wages of money. Money is a sterile thing; it does not increase of itself. I am not going to enter into a discussion at this time as to whether or not interest is something that can be paid; I know some economists and financial writers differ on that point. I would simply say that if interest is actually paid it must be paid out of production. This was so well stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) in this house last year that I am going to quote his words, which will be found at page 1911 of Hansard for 1932:

—let us get this as clearly as possible—interest is not something that is made by money but something that must be taken out of the productivity of the country and paid upon the money that is lent.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, interest is paid out of production; that production is sold for money and the money thus obtained is turned over to pay the interest. The rate of interest which industry can pay depends upon the price of the product. Because of the fall in price levels during the past three years the payment of interest in some cases has taken two or three times as much of the product of industry as it did three or four years ago. This increase in the general burden of debt can be well illustrated by the fall in the index prices of commodities in Canada. I find that in the wholesale commodity index price level there has been a drop from 100 in 1926 to 63.6 in February of this year, a fall of 36 per cent. In the case of the general range of farm products I find a drop from 100 in 1926 to 43 in February of this year, or 57 per cent. In the case of field products there is a drop from 100 to 36, or 64 per cent. In the case of animal products the drop has been from 100 to 54, or 46 per cent, while in retail prices and cost of services, according to the government's index figures, the drop has been from 100 to 79, or 21 per cent.

In the light of the index figures I have quoted let us look for a moment at farm mortgages. If a farmer paid the interest on his mortgage in field products, in 1926 the interest on $2,000 at 6 per cent would be $160, or 160 bushels of grain, whereas in 1932 the interest would be still $160, but it would require 440 bushels of grain. If the farmer paid in farm products generally it would take two and one-third times as much in 1933 as it did in 1926, and if he paid in animal products it would take practically twice as much. If it took ten steers to pay his interest in 1926 it would take twenty steers to pay his interest in 1933. If it took one hundred pigs to pay his interest in 1926, it would require two hundred in February, 1933. This will give the house an idea of the increase in actual interest so far as it is measured in terms of production—and it is only with production that the farmers can pay. Precisely the same principle applies to industry generally. I want to quote again from the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because he put the matter briefly and clearly. At page 1911 of Hansard of 1932 the minister is reported on this point as follows:

Precisely the same principle applies to an industry. Take one that has for its basic product copper, lead or zinc, operating in some manufacturing concern. Suppose they borrowed $50,000 three or four years ago. In the payment of interest on that money, where they formerly calculated an output of a given amount would serve to meet that payment, it would to-day take an output of two to three times as much to discharge the obligation.

Surely these illustrations prove that our industries cannot continue to pay rates of interest of six and ten per cent and sometimes as high as twelve per cent. I want to quote another passage from the same speech of the minister:

Let me turn to the third factor, that of interest. I say this advisedly; I say it after a good deal of study and thought, and I ask my hon. friends angularly opposite to accept it in regard to not only agriculturists but industrialists and merchants, because it is only by having some degree of sympathetic contact among the different branches of activity in this country that we are going to make any progress. No agriculturist, no industrialist and no merchant can afford to pay ten per cent interest for the money he uses in his business; it simply cannot be done; normal business will not permit of that rate of interest. Moreover, no bank can afford to take a loan at ten per cent, because it is too risky. When a loan justifies a rate of ten per cent, in my opinion it is too risky a loan for a bank to take at all and ought not to be accepted.

I heartily agree with that.

Whether or not that can be covered by arbitrary statutory legislation is another question. That can be discussed next year at the revision of the Bank Act. I am laying down what I consider to be sound business principles directly affecting our welfare, and the same principles are operating in every corner of the world to-day affecting the business of the world and affecting us along with the other countries. But I lay down the principle that a rate of interest around eight or ten per cent makes successful operation of the ordinary business activities impossible and unprofitable.

I am of the same opinion; I believe that rates of eight and ten per cent make the successful operation of any industry impossible and unprofitable, and it is partly for that reason that I am bringing forward this bill to-night. The fall in commodity prices has reduced the purchasing power of the people engaged in these industries and this in turn has created unemployment. Thousands of workers, factory employees, salaried and professional men have had their income cut to the point where the tax paying ability of the people has been reduced by half. This has made the burden of some municipal and provincial government debts almost intolerable. The ability of large numbers of people to pay the interest on their debts has disappeared, while in many other instances it has been greatly curtailed, and in no industry that I can think of can they afford to pay interest at a greater rate than five per cent per annum.

I would again direct the attention of the house to the question of farm mortgages. According to the recent census in Canada these mortgages amount to over $700,000,000. At the end of 1931, in respect of all mortgages held by insurance companies in the dominion, there were, in arrears of interest for one year or more, in Saskatchewan, forty-six per cent of the mortgages, in Manitoba forty-two per cent and in Alberta twenty-two per cent. It will be freely admitted I think that at the end of 1932 the percentage must have been much higher because of the low prices prevailing then. In many cases interest for three years compounded at eight or nine per cent is now arrears and the borrowers are asked to sign new mortgages in which these arrears have been added to the principal, so that the principal is being increased by from twenty-five to thirty per cent, and the people are being asked to renew these mortgages at rates of eight and even nine per cent.

There is a good reason for these large amounts of unpaid interest. Take the case of wheat producers. There are certain cash costs that must be incurred in the production of wheat and only after these are met can interest be paid. This applies to many other farm products. The selling price very often has not been sufficient to cover the cash cost, and if the interest has been paid the money has come from borrowings on insurance policies or from the sale of equipment or young live stock which should have remained on the farm. In other words, the farmer has been compelled to pay interest out of capital equipment which it has taken him years to accumulate. Very frequently the interest has not been paid because the farmer could not secure it. The fact is that the payment of interest at five per cent is for the most part a greater burden to-day than the payment of interest at twenty-five or thirty per cent would have been three or four years ago.

I have in my hand an editorial from the High River Times, which I think brings this point out clearly. It tells of a farmer who has been unable to pay interest because of low prices. He bought a section of land in Alberta in 1917, paying for it at the rate of fifty dollars per acre. I quote:

> However, in 1917, prices were good, and the price was paid on the strength of the excellent crop prospects. Unfortunately in August of 1917 the crop was completely hailed, destroying the revenue for that year through no fault of the purchaser. The following year, when wheat was still good in price, the yield was poor owing to drought. And so on, through the ups and downs of succeeding years. In the meantime, as an accommodation to the seller, the farmer got a loan from a loan company, to pay off the large part of the amount owing. He has been struggling to hold on to the land and meet the demands of the loan company. Interest charges and taxes amounted to approximately $1,400, and in recent years it has been impossible to meet this amount. Last year the company foreclosed on him.
> In the years since the purchase, this farmer has paid out over $40,000 on the original price of $32,000 (a top price by the way). Yet despite the payment of this $40,000, which represents the effort of the best years of a man's life, he has been foreclosed, and now stands well up in years, stripped of the reward of fifteen years of labour.
> He has been industrious and capable, keeping his farm clean and productive. He will probably be replaced by a man much less capable and experienced. The district has lost an excellent farmer. Moreover the man has been financially ruined through the curse of interest. There are many who maintain that under the wheat prices of the last three years, a farmer cannot pay 8 per cent interest, and survive. It is a legalized hold-up, condoned by the government.
> Back in the war years, when wheat threatened to soar to $3 the government had no hesitation in stepping in and preventing exploitation of the buyer by forming a wheat board and holding prices to a maximum of $2 a bushel. To-day, conditions are even more glaringly awry, but now it is interest which is soaring far above the ability of the primary producer and normal citizen to pay. Why is there any more difficulty in bringing interest charges under control?
> Not only have the inexorable demands of money lenders (demands sanctioned by government) brought financial ruin to thousands of Canada's finest citizens, but worse still, these demands tacitly supported by the government have produced discouraged and embittered citizens who know that under all laws of justice, they have been deprived of the labours of a life time.

I regret to say that according to all accounts a great many farmers have found themselves in the position of the man referred to in this editorial, and it is time that parliament took such action as lies in its power to restrict the rate of interest charged. Farm mortgages are being renewed to-day at eight per cent, and I believe even at nine per cent. Many machine notes carry interest rates of from eight to twelve per cent; buyers of automobile trucks and so forth, purchased on time have to pay interest rates running as high as fifteen per cent. The rate of interest paid on savings accounts has been reduced, so why should not the rates charged by banks and others be reduced. Eight, nine and ten per cent is being charged for bank loans. I received a letter recently from a man in Hamilton complaining of the loan companies in Ontario asking for higher rates of interest on mortgages now maturing than the rates paid some years ago. One case has been brought to my attention where a mortgage made in 1927 at seven per cent with a proviso that six and a half per cent would be accepted if the payments of interest were tendered on the due dates. That mortgage is now due the original principal of $3,400 has been reduced to $2,050. The mortgage company has offered to renew this mortgage but they want a straight rate of seven per cent. In effect, that is an increase of one-half per cent in the rate charged. This man states that this is a general practice on the part of the company he mentions, and he also names another company which is trying to exact higher interest rates from its mortgagors. He says:

> The mortgage and insurance companies are combined in an association to fight for what they want, whereas the average mortgagor has no one to represent his case except where he can bring his position to the notice of parliament.
> Rentals, wages and salaries have been reduced up to twenty-five to thirty-five per cent, yet the mortgagees go merrily on charging the same old rates and in some cases demanding higher rates.

Here is a paragraph which I think is very important:

> If it is left to the mortgagees to voluntarily reduce, it may be that some of them will offer a slight reduction, others will give no leaway at all and others will try to get the last nickel out of the people that it is possible to get, and I am convinced that some of the companies are and will be the worst offenders.

It appears to me that the loan companies have not done so badly during the last few years and there is no need for an increase in the rates of interest. A statement presented to the banking committee by the head of the bureau of statistics shows that the following average dividends have been paid by the loan companies of Canada:

	Per cent
1929	11.34
1930	11.64
1931	11.63

The average dividends paid by the trust companies are as follows:

	Per cent
1929	9.63
1931	10.32

I think this is evidence enough that the loan and trust companies do not need to raise their rates of interest. A few days ago I referred to a return which had been tabled in this house. This return shows the following classifications for loans made by the banks:

Class A—Loans up to $250.
Class B—Loans from $250 to $1,000.
Class C—Loans from $1,000 to $25,000.
Class D—Loans over $25,000.

This return shows that there was one class C loan drawing interest at ten per cent. It shows also that the discount rate charged on a class B loan for one month was nine per cent. It shows that twelve per cent was charged on a class B loan, ten per cent on a class C loan and eight per cent on a class D loan. These were all demand loans.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. COOTE: When I have finished I shall be glad to answer my hon. friend. The return shows that the discount rate on a class B loan for ninety days was at the rate of ten per cent, while on a class C loan for ninety-one days it was ten per cent. I do not think any industry in Canada can afford to pay such rates and they should not be charged by the banks. I notice in a return recently brought down that for the three years previous to 1931, the banks of Canada have been paying dividends of nine, ten, twelve, fourteen and sixteen per cent. I know it is argued that part of these dividends is represented by earnings on reserve funds which have been accumulated from the sales of stock, but even making allowance for that, I think the banks could earn sufficient dividends without charging these exorbitant rates of interest. Life insurance companies charge as high as eight per cent for advances to policyholders made under the non-forfeiture clause to cover premiums due. A few years ago one of these companies attempted to charge me ten per cent on a note to take care of the premium on my policy. These companies should be controlled and prevented from charging such rates to their policyholders in order to earn large dividends. I think a limitation of five per cent is very necessary and would be quite fair. Some companies and corporations realize the necessity of reducing rates of interest at this time, but unfortunately all companies do not. The managers of these companies feel that they must make as good a showing as their competitors, and it becomes difficult for any one company acting alone to reduce rates of interest. I think this offers a very good reason for parliament fixing a maximum rate.

I should like to take two or three minutes in order to direct the attention of the house to the debt situation in Canada. The question of interest is always contingent upon debts. The public debt of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities, including guarantees, is over $6,500,000,000. There are no figures to show the private debts, but I think they mght be fairly estimated at $10,000,000,000. To be conservative we will cut off $1,500,000,000 and put the estimation at $8,500,000,000. The private and public debts would then total $15,000,000,000. The interest upon these debts at different rates would be as follows:

5 per cent	750,000,000
6 per cent	900,000,000
7 per cent	1,050,000,000
8 per cent	1,200,000,000

Surely we can all see the importance of the rate of interest. It is not so much the size of the debt that matters as the rate of interest and the price level of the products with which we must pay the interest. It is just as easy to carry a debt of $2,000 at four per cent as it is to carry a debt of $1,000 at eight per cent. It was much easier for a farmer to pay interest at a rate of twenty-five per cent three years ago than it is for him to pay at the rate of five per cent to-day. There are no figures available to show the value of our total production in 1932, but in 1928 it amounted to $6,000,000,000. We know that the volume was cut down last year and with a reduced value due to lower price levels, I think it could be estimated at $3,000,000,000. That is just one half of the value for 1928. A recent press dispatch contained a statement by one of the senators at Washington that the value of the total production in the United States last year was only half what it was in 1928. I think a comparable reduction would be applicable to Canada. With a rate of five per cent applying to all debts in Canada, it would take one quarter of the value of production to pay the interest charges. Of course, many of these debts are overlapping. A debt owed by a consumer to a retailer might be represented by a debt owed by the retailer to a wholesaler. But making allowance for all the overlapping, I still contend that five per cent is as high as or higher than this country can really afford with present price levels.

There are in Canada to-day certain corporations which have voluntarily reduced interest rates; they have seen the impossibility of producers paying existing rates. I have in my hand an advertisement of the International Harvester Company of Canada in which they say that interest rates are reduced for the following reasons:

As a measure of relief to our customers in all parts of Canada, we have reduced the rates of interest for payments made on both old and new notes. The amount of reduction applicable to your particular note, covering either former purchases or new business, may be learned by inquiry of the McCormick-Deering dealer nearest you or by writing us direct. In all cases the reductions are substantial and will be welcome. As a special arrangement for payments made in 1933, the rate of interest is reduced to 5 per cent on all notes, whether future or past due, from January 1 to date of payment, including notes taken for 1933 purchases.

As I pointed out to the house a few minutes ago, some companies are willing to reduce interest rates and others are not. If a company like the International Harvester voluntarily reduces the rate of interest on notes which it holds from its customers, I think the Dominion parliament should follow that lead and say: We shall establish a maximum rate of interest of five per cent which will apply to all obligations. By the way, the obligations to which the International Harvester Company refers are existing ones. I am not asking that the rate of interest be reduced on existing obligations; that is a matter which is being inquired into by our banking and commerce committee, but I would say that the International Harvester Company is showing us a good example.

The Imperial Oil Company has made somewhat similar arrangements for the reduction of the rate of interest on debts owed to it by its customers. I would like to make this public acknowledgment to both these companies for the reductions they have voluntarily made.

I should like also to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the creditor who is still drawing interest can purchase a good deal more with his money than he could three or four years ago. While this drop in prices has added to the burden of debt and interest and increases the share of his product which the producer must hand over by way of interest, it also increases the share which the creditor receives. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) pointed this out in his address to the monetary committee of the imperial conference when he said:

Interest charges represent the most important of the fixed or semi-rigid elements in our cost structure. If prices remain on their present level, such charges will constitute an intolerable or almost intolerable burden in many cases. Even if it can be borne, the fortuitous gain to the creditor of 40 to 48 per cent in general purchasing power above what he contracted for appears to be a grave injustice.

In many cases a rate of five per cent to-day would give to the creditor as much purchasing power as he got out of eight or seven per cent, or whatever the average rate may have been, three or four years ago. With purchasing power as great as it is to-day, a rate of five per cent is, I think, very fair to the creditor. A correspondent in western Canada, who is interested in the bill which I have introduced, wrote me recently. I received his letter to-day. He points out that a bill similar to the one I have introduced has been in force in the Isle of Man for the last 240 years; it was passed in that parliament in 1691 and sets a maximum rate of interest of six per cent. I shall read only the preamble because it seems to me it fits so well present conditions in Canada. It reads:

For as much as interest of money in loan, being at so high a rate as ten pounds for a hundred pounds for a year—

The maximum rate prior to that time had been ten per cent.

—doth not only make men unable to pay their debts and continue the use of merchandise and trade, but their debts daily increasing, are inforced to sell their leases, farms and stocks at low rates, to the great hurt and prejudice of this isle; be it therefore enacted by the Right Honourable Lord of this isle, the governor, officers, deemsters and 24 Keyes.

And so forth; then it goes on to set the maximum rate of six per cent for all interest obligations. That act has remained in force in the Isle of Man to date.

I realize there may be one objection to this bill, and that is that it sets the same maximum rate for small as for large loans. Personally I would be quite willing, if this bill could get second reading, when it is in committee to have an amendment inserted which would allow a charge for small loans which would be in excess of this five per cent as specified in the bill as drafted. I thought it would be much better to allow that amendment to be made in committee than for me to insert it in this bill. I am quite prepared to accept any reasonable amendment in regard to that particular point, because I realize, as the Prime Minister pointed out the other night, in some cases in these small loans a service charge is really justifiable.

As I have only two or three minutes left, may I sum up very briefly a few reasons I am asking for the passage of this bill. First, I ask for it because interest must be paid out of production and the price level of our commodities has fallen so low as to make payment of interest at present rates impossible in many cases. I ask for it because of the tremendous volume of our debts and the huge burden which debts are upon the business community at this time.

I would like to point out one thing which I did not mention before; that is, that the burden of debt is on the retailers of Canada. In many cases they are unable to collect from their customers. They owe large amounts to the wholesalers and the latter are charging them in many cases eight per cent interest on past due accounts. In addition to that, they are making drafts against the retailers once a month and the latter are forced to pay exchange, stamp tax and a tax on each cheque which goes through the bank. Really, this burden of interest, exchange and taxes is nearly ruining many of the small retailers.

I ask for the passage of this bill because many debtors are being forced to renew obligations at rates that are ruinous, while their ability to pay is greatly reduced because not only have commodities and goods generally been reduced in prices, but salaries and wages have also been reduced, the reductions in many cases ranging from twenty to as much as fifty per cent.

I ask for the passage of this bill because of the increased purchasing power of the money which the creditor receives as interest, and finally, because I think the maintenance of the present high rates is retarding the business recovery which we are all so anxious to see in Canada. I would ask therefore that this bill receive the fair and earnest consideration of the house.

Mr. YOUNG: Before the hon. member takes his seat, I wonder if he could tell us what portion of the interest charged is being used to pay the running expenses of the lending institutions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes and he cannot speak longer unless by general consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Consent.

Mr. COOTE: The answer I would give to that is that the average dividends declared during the past three years by all loan companies in Canada have been over 11½ per cent, so while I cannot tell the hon. gentleman the amount that goes for actual running expenses, the dividends which they have been earning, are, I think, sufficiently large to indicate that they have a very good surplus over their running expenses.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. BOWMAN: Do I understand the hon. member to say that this bill does not affect contracts, mortgages and so forth at present in existence?

Mr. COOTE: I want to make it clear that this bill will not affect existing contracts. It will affect only contracts that may be entered into after the passing of this bill.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): With the object that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) has in mind I am sure that every hon. member of this house is in cordial sympathy. But there is an old adage which we must bear in mind: You may lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink. You may pass a law that no more than a certain sum may be charged by way of interest, but I know of no method whereby you can compel an individual who has money to lend it unless the interest rate is satisfactory to him. I submit in all deference to my hon. friend that excellent though his object is, if this bill were to pass it would defeat the very object he has in mind.

We sympathize, everybody sympathizes with the person who to-day, with commodity prices so low, has to pay interest rates of any size; but it is one thing to point to the difficulties under which the people labour with respect to interest, and it is quite another thing to suggest that a rigid law of the kind proposed will supply the remedy.

Interest rates have materially lowered in recent months. It is not so long since that the Dominion government itself could not borrow money at five per cent, and even to-day in the open market many of our provinces cannot secure money at that rate. I think it is fair to say that the collective credit of all the people of a province, backed by all the assets of the province, constitute an asset by way of security for a loan of far greater value in the eyes of the lender than would be the case with numerous individuals within the province; and yet the securities of Alberta, with all its great resources, are selling in the open market on a basis of yield of 6.6 per cent. If we pass a law declaring that no more than five per cent interest may be charged it would mean that Alberta would be unable to borrow, because capital is fluid and if it cannot secure the rate of return it desires within the Dominion of Canada it will go elsewhere where it can secure it. British Columbia has its six per cent issue of 1947 selling on the market to-day on a basis of yield of 6.45 per cent. Should we adopt my hon. friend's proposal we would shut out that great province from the opportunity not only of securing fresh money but of refunding its maturing issues under present conditions. Manitoba, with a six per cent issue outstanding for the year 1947, has that issue selling upon the public market to-day at a price yielding 6.76 per cent. Saskatchewan finds its issue of 1952, a six per cent issue, bearing a yield on the market of 6.79 per cent. Prince Edward Island is to-day paying 5¼ per cent for its money.

The rates I have cited indicate the price that the provinces must pay for money in the open market. If this bill were to pass, my hon. friend would deny credit to any of those provinces, and a few months ago he would have denied the opportunity to the dominion itself to borrow money. He would shut out scores of municipalities in this country if the bill were passed, and he would shut out hundreds if not thousands of industries. We have old established industries with a fine record of achievement behind them, and possessing great assets, whose securities are yielding interest returns up to as high as nine per cent. I could give a list of them. Some of the securities of our great public utility companies are selling in the open market at a price which indicates the cost of money to them, and in many cases their credit with respect to their senior securities is such that they must pay as high as nine per cent for their money. If by establishing the rate suggested credit is denied to provinces which have the opportunity of placing behind their securities all of their collective assets; if important industries with fixed and tangible assets of great mangitude have to pay these high rates of interest, how much greater will be the difficulty of the individual whose assets are slender and who seeks to borrow money?

My hon. friend, unconsciously I think, weakened his argument when he said that he was prepared to admit that the principle of his bill was subject to one objection. I may say that my hon. friend did not assert his views with that one hundred per cent assurance which so often characterizes his advocacy of his proposals when he was prepared to admit that this proposal was subject to one limitation. The one objection which he was prepared to admit had to do with small loans. He said that he was willing to consider an amendment which, by providing a service charge for the small loan, would have the effect of raising the interest rate above five per cent. In making that admission he stated a cardinal objection to the principal of the bill itself, inasmuch as he recognized the fact that there is a distinction between different kinds of loans: there is the high-class loan and there is the lower-class loan, and the rates which they must pay are in proportion to the kind of security behind them and the integrity of the people who borrow.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister permit me an interjection just there? All I said was that on small loans I thought there was justification for a service charge. I do not think the interpretation which the minister is now putting on my statement is quite fair in connection with what I said.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker I stated precisely what my hon. friend has said, and I am entitled to put my own interpretation upon what would follow if what he admits can be done is done. In other words, he admits that there is a distinction between loans, and in that he is right.

Mr. COOTE: A loan might be made on exactly the same security but it might be for a very small amount, in which case a service charge would be justified.

Mr. RHODES: There is one phase of this question which I am sure my hon. friend has overlooked, and it is one of numerous considerations which have a bearing upon the principle of the bill. My hon. friend has been an advocate of a central bank. One of the strongest arguments that can be adduced in favour of the establishment of a central bank is that it could control the flow of credit. My hon. friend knows full well that there is just as much danger in a policy of too easy money as there is in a policy which makes for dear money. The banks in the United States saw the danger of that great inflation movement, the stock market boom of 1928 and the early part of 1929, and they tried to stop it, the bank rate being raised to as high as ten per cent, if not indeed higher. I think perhaps a major feature which the advocates of a central bank claim for it is that, through its control of open market operations on the one hand and of rediscount rates on the other, it can make for a reasonable equilibrium of the ebb and flow of credit, and for a fair interest rate. If my hon. friend should fix a maximum interest rate of five per cent he would take out of the hands of a central bank the greatest lever it would have to prevent just such an inflationary movement as occurred in the New York stock market in 1928 and the early part of 1929. If there were no other objections to this bill, I think that of itself would be sufficient to condemn it in the eyes of this house.

I am satisfied that my hon. friend could do no greater injury to those whom I know he earnestly desires to serve than to have his bill passed in the terms in which it is drafted, because the effect would be to deny credit altogether to those who should have it. If they could secure any capital at all they could do so only through what I might call underground or bootleg channels, and if they got it under those conditions they would rate far higher than the open market going rate. It is idle to suggest, even with all the "isms" that are afloat to-day, that there is any other method whereby the rate of interest can be determined than the age old law of supply and demand. If this bill were to pass, apart from surreptitious methods which I have indicated the effect would be to deny credit to all others in Canada except the dominion itself, one or two provinces, and a few select municipalities and borrowers having the very highest class of security. I hope, therefore, that this house in its wisdom, having in mind the very objects which I know my hon. friend seeks to achieve and which he so earnestly believes in, will vote against the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Mr. DUFF: Is it not a fact that if there is no specific arrangement made between debtor and creditor the legal rate of interest is five per cent?

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The minister spoke of denying credit. I should like to ask him if his argument is that capital, instead of adjusting itself to changed conditions brought about by this bill, would seek investment in other countries? Or what is his argument?

Mr. RHODES: It would either seek investment in other countries or would restrict itself to the very highest class of investment in this, which as I said would be the dominion, one or two provinces and a few municipalities. I was speaking with only some haphazard notes before me; but may I emphasize again the fact that we agree entirely as to the desirability of having a lower rate of interest. This is especially desirable in a young country where large volumes of capital are required, and in times like the present when commodity prices are low—although I am glad to say that apparently the corner has definitely been turned and the movement now is towards increased commodity prices.

An hon. MEMBER: We have been told that before.

Mr. RHODES: As an evidence that the government desires that there should be an improvement by way of lower interest rates, we have for some time, as my hon. friend knows, in cooperation with the banks endeavoured to have a lower interest rate made effective on deposits. That lower rate has been put in force since the first of May. Its value will be reflected in lower interest charges. I can only repeat that the experience of the past, and I think cold logic as well, teach us that there is no sovereign remedy to compel a man to lend money at any other rate of interest than that which he chooses to demand for it. The best method is to aim for a lower interest rate through recognized and time-honoured methods.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member speaks it will close the debate.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think, Mr. Speaker, it being only half a minute before nine o'clock, it would be well to call it nine o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Customs tariff—568. Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent and 25 cents per pound; general tariff, 45 per cent and 30 cents per pound.

Mr. BROWN: There is a seeming discrepancy between what the minister has said and the rates as they appear in the tariff schedule. Perhaps that can be explained; if so I should be glad to hear it. I think the minister said the duty on this item would have been increased at the time there was a general revision of the tariff had it not been for certain provisions of the French treaty. I have here the customs tariff and amendments with index to September 8, 1930, and also the one for October 1, 1931. In the older tariff schedule we have this item which now seems to be included under 568, covering three items. For instance we have 568, knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p., all valued at more than ninety cents per pound, and the tariff rates are given, 20, 30 and 35 per cent. Then, if I understand it correctly, we had an "ex" item, which would have to do with the most favoured nations. Then there was also item 568a:

Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p., all valued at 90 cents per pound or less.

Those three items were included under the one item 568 when the tariff was revised during the short session of 1930, and it will be noticed that the tariff rates are higher than in the earlier schedule. At present they are 25 per cent, 25 per cent and 45 per cent, so it would seem that the government has already raised the tariff on this particular class of goods. I want to point out further that in the new tariff schedules the different valuations are omitted; that is, in the one case the value was fixed at more than 90 cents per pound while in the other it was fixed at less than 90 cents. Those words have been omitted in the new schedule, but we notice that in the proposed change, to the rates of 25 per cent, 35 per cent and 45 per cent are to be added 25 cents per pound under the intermediate tariff and 30 cents per pound under the general tariff. If that 30 cents per pound is applied to goods averaging 90 cents per pound it would mean an additional tariff of 33⅓ per cent which, added to the 45 per cent, would make the general tariff rate 78⅓ per cent. If that tax were levied at the 35 per cent rate given in the older schedule it would mean a rate of 68⅓ per cent.

When this matter first came up I know the minister said the government had made substantial increases in the tariff on woven goods, and certainly this is a very substantial increase in this item. On one occasion the minister said he did not concede that this was a high tariff government, and I know hon. gentlemen opposite from the prairies are very fond of asserting that they are not high tariff men. If 68⅓ per cent and 78⅓ per cent do not represent a high tariff I should like to know what does. If the minister can explain what seems to be the discrepancy in the statement he made with regard to the French treaty I should like to have the explanation, because it seems to me the government has already raised the tariff on this line of goods.

Mr. RHODES: This afternoon my hon. friend from Lisgar said that he was of a mathematical turn of mind, and I was grateful for his support of the argument I was then making, dealing with the question of percentages. May I say to him that in some circumstances 78 per cent would be a very high tariff while in others it might be a comparatively low tariff. Certainly, with the conditions that have existed for the last two or three years, a tariff of 100 per cent would not necessarily be high in some cases. That may sound rather strange to my hon. friend, but with world exchanges on a parity a much lower tariff would afford a considerably greater degree of protection than obtains to-day when we may have a tariff of 78 per cent.

The previous statement I made to the committee I think was true both in substance and in fact; at all events it was according to the advice given me by the experts of the department and I believed then as I believe now that the statement was correct. What we did in 1930 was to group together some five items, which carried different rates, under one classification with the rates as follows: British preferential rate, 25 per cent; intermediate rate, 25 per cent; and general rate, 45 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: Where did you get those figures?

Mr. RHODES: Item 568 of the existing tariff shows these rates as 25 per cent, 25 per cent and 45 per cent. This item, covering knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p., displaced five former items. The change we propose now, as my hon. friend knows, is to add a specific rate of duty of 25 cents per pound under the intermediate tariff and 30 cents per pound under the general tariff.

Mr. BROWN: Would the minister give us the five items that were grouped together?

Mr. RHODES: The first item was 542 in the schedule prior to September, 1930. It reads as follows:

Woven or knitted fabrics, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, and all such fabrics with cut pile, n.o.p., not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Then there are these items:

Customs tariff—554b. Woven or knitted fabrics, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, not exceeding in weight five ounces to the square yard, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Customs tariff—554c. Woven or knitted fabrics, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 27½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Customs tariff—568. Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p., all valued at more than ninety cents per pound: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Customs tariff—568a. Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p., all valued at ninety cents per pound or less: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

In the short session of September, 1930, these items were all united in the one item 568 which I read.

Mr. BROWN: That simply proves what I have said, that this government has already raised the tariff on all these different items now included in item 568, because the highest rate in any case in the old tariff was thirty-five per cent, the general rate. I do not think it takes a mathematician to understand that you cannot group together a number of items in which the highest rate is thirty-five per cent and get an average of forty-five per cent. And that is what has happened. The government, in the short session of 1930, did raise the general tariff—because that is what I am speaking of—on all these items that are grouped under 568, the increase being from thirty-five to forty-five per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I never suggested that we did not raise the general tariff. What I did say was that we could not raise the tariff, under the intermediate at any rate, above twenty-five per cent, owing to the French treaty. But if it is any comfort to my hon. friend to have it on the record I may say that but for the French treaty we would have increased it at that time. To-day we are only doing what we would have done then but for that treaty.

Mr. BROWN: We will accept that as regards the treaty, because I see that under the old schedules the intermediate tariff was thirty per cent on some of these articles. But this increase on this particular class of goods is an increase on top of the increase which was made in 1930. I want the public to understand that.

Mr. RHODES: That is true so far as the general tariff is concerned.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, and that is the one that principally concerns us in this matter, since the great bulk of these goods in which it is proposed to increase trade comes from the United States, under the general tariff. That is of prime importance to the consumer.

Mr. RHODES: I must correct my hon. friend in one particular. The bulk of them does not come from the United States but from the United Kingdom.

Mr. BROWN: No.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: The statistics are available. We are not increasing the rate under the British preference at all.

Mr. BROWN: That point has been made clear, that these increases do not apply to the United Kingdom. If I remember the figures rightly, approximately $900,000 comes from the United Kingdom and $600,000 from other sources. It is only the $600,000 we are dealing with now, the bulk of which is from the United States, and the duty has already been increased by the government. It was increased in 1930 on goods coming from that country, and now on top of that there is to be the increase proposed by the minister.

Mr. RHODES: Let me give the figures for last year, putting them in parallel columns with the statement of my hon. friend, that the bulk of these goods comes from the United States.

Mr. BROWN: I am referring to the $600,000.

Mr. RHODES: Of knitted goods, we imported last year $155,000 worth, of which $145,000 came from the United Kingdom and $5,000 from the United States. Of woollen underwear we imported $235,000 worth, the United Kingdom supplying $216,000 and Switzerland $11,000. Of knitted garments we imported from the United Kingdom $647,000 and from the United States $140,000, and as regards unspecified garments, that is, in addition to the ones I have cited, we imported from the United Kingdom $105,000 worth and from the United States $95,000. With regard to these figures it must be remembered that even under these proposals to-day we are not disturbing the British preference; we are not raising the duty one cent.

Mr. BROWN: That does not agree with the figures given the other night. We were told that of this particular item, knitted goods, $48,000,000 worth was manufactured in Canada. We were told that approximately $1,500,000 was imported from outside countries, $900,000 of this coming from the British Empire and $600,000 from elsewhere. I may have been wrong in asserting that the bulk came from the United States but that was the statement made and I accepted it as correct. We are dealing only with knitted goods, and my contention is that the duty on that class of goods was already increased by the tariff of 1930 by combining it along with others in this present item 568.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think that iteration and reiteration will help us at all, but the figures I have given to-night are the figures I gave the other night. The only figure I have not given has no bearing on the statement made by my hon. friend, which was so wildly at variance with the facts, namely, that we imported the bulk of these goods from the United States. Let me give the figures from the United Kingdom as compared with the United States. I cited all the figures in three ranges, and the only additional figures that can be given will not vary my statement to any appreciable degree. In addition to the knitted garments which we imported to the extent of $1,220,000—knitted garments alone—we imported from the United Kingdom to the value of $647,000 and from the United States $140,000. I cite these two figures only because of the statement made by my hon. friend. But let us take all the importations: Czechoslovakia, $93,000; Belgium, $66,000; Switzerland, $65,000; Japan, $47,000; Austria, $45,000; and Germany, $38,000. In other words, we imported more from the United Kingdom, of that class of goods alone, than we did from the United States and all the rest of the world.

Mr. BROWN: That is perfectly in harmony with what I said. There does not seem to be anything that the minister has said that contradicts my statement that the government in the short session of 1930 raised the tariff on goods on which it is now proposed to make an additional increase. That is the essential point that I want to bring out.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps I might emphasize what I consider to be the essential point. The great bulk of these goods comes from the United Kingdom and we are not disturbing the British preferential rate. In order to keep the record straight and to keep my hon. friend wholly on the rails, I may say that even in 1930 we made one reduction with respect to item 554c, covering woven fabrics. Under the previous administration this item bore a rate of twenty seven and a half per cent, and even in that shocking session of 1930 it was reduced to twenty-five per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member for Lisgar is quite right. The other evening the minister told us quite distinctly that the importations last year under this item totalled $1,500,000, of which $900,000 came from the United Kingdom and $600,000 from other places. He now tells us that the importations from other than the United Kingdom were valued at only $250,000. If that is true he is raising the tariff in order to divert one half of one per cent of the value of the production. All he hopes to get by this item is an additional market of one half of one per cent. The only benefit to be derived by the Canadian manufacturers will be an increased production of one half of one per cent. A moment ago the minister told the hon. member for Lisgar that a rate of 78 per cent might be high under some conditions but not under others. He said that where a country had a depreciated currency a rate of 78 per cent would not be considered high. I have before me the Commercial Intelligence Journal issued to-day, and I find that the countries at which this increase of tariff is directed are countries whose currency is not depreciated, but rather at a premium as compared with Canadian currency.

Mr. RHODES: What about Japan, Austria and Czechoslovakia?

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend did not mention any importations from Japan. Most of this quarter of a million dollars which he wants to shut out comes from the United States, whose currency is at a premium as compared with ours. If the minister considers a rate of 78 per cent as high when another country's currency is on a parity with ours, it must be abnormally high when another country's currency is worth more than ours. The exchange itself constitutes a considerable tariff. This afternoon when I was pleading with my hon. friend not to put through this item because it would divert $270,000 from the revenues of this country and provide only $180,000 in additional wages he replied that if he was wrong it was only in keeping with his general policy. He wanted to be consistently wrong.

Mr. RHODES: I have the greatest respect for my hon. friend and I always listen with interest to his remarks, but he must make his own speech. He must not make speeches for me or put an interpretation like that upon what I said. I said that if we were wrong with respect to the duties we imposed upon woven fabrics, then we were wrong in what we were doing now in connection with knitted fabrics.

Mr. YOUNG: That is just what I said; you want to be consistently wrong. My hon. friend knows that he is confronted with a deficit amounting to something over $150,000,000, and he is turning greyheaded wondering how he can meet it. He does not know how to balance his budget, and yet, without the least concern, he now proposes to divert another $270,000 from the revenues of this country to an industry which will pay out only an additional $180,000 in wages. The people of Canada will have to be taxed another $270,000 next year. He has asked the people to make all sorts of sacrifices; he asked us to make a sacrifice of ten per cent in our indemnities and he asked the civil service to sacrifice ten per cent of their salaries. He is doing everything he can to raise revenue, and yet he now proposes to divert money to the pockets of private individuals. I wonder if he has any idea what this industry is costing the country. Its total production is valued at $48,000,000. The lowest tariff rate of twenty five per cent is under the British preferential. Taking that as the prevailing rate, this industry is costing us $12,000,000 per year, and it pays out only $14,000,000 in wages. Does my hon. friend consider that such an industry is a profitable one to maintain? The only way this industry can be helped is by an increase in sales. Sales abroad cannot be increased so long as they maintain high production costs; the only way that sales in Canada can be increased is by reduced prices. By this proposal the government is inviting the manufacturers to increase their prices, and increased prices will mean decreased sales because the people have no money to spend. In replying to the hon. member for Macleod a moment ago in connection with another matter, the minister said the age old law of supply and demand was the only way of proving the true value of money. I contend that the age old law of supply and demand is the only way to fix the true value of knitted goods. Let the law of supply and demand operate and it will be found that the price of these woollen goods will reach a point where the people can buy them. The manufacturers will be forced to do what the knitting mill to which I referred this afternoon did, that is, increase their efficiency, eliminate expensive equipment, and cut down expenses. If they did that they would be able to put these goods on the market at a price the people could afford to pay. With reduced prices there would be increased sales. I would get down on my knees to the minister if I thought it would do any good and beg him not to throw away this money. The country will be bankrupt unless something is done, and I beg the minister not to waste this money.

Mr. RHODES: I know that my hon. friend is a consistent believer in what he believes. I would not for one moment attempt to influence his judgment, but I do not propose to go over and over the same old ground we covered in connection with the exchange and duties upon woven fabrics. I think the safest thing for me to say is that I disagree not only with what he has said just now, but with what he said last session, and that I shall disagree with anything he is going to say. I think I can let it go at that. Let me say to my hon. friend that the worst thing that could happen under these proposals would be that more business would be deflected to the mother country. The duties in that regard have not been increased, in fact they are lower than they were when my hon. friend supported the last government. To the extent that we increase the flow of goods over the British preferential—that is the lowest rate and the one which obtained when the friends of my hon. friend were in power,—it follows that we are taking the course which will give us the most revenue. I must say that I do not agree with my hon. friend when he says that we are shutting out $270,000 of revenue.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask my hon. friend the reason for this increase when on his own statement Great Britain is getting as much business as is coming into Canada? Of course the bulk of business is in Canadian mills, but when they are already getting the business except to the very limited extent which my hon. friend has just announced, what is the necessity for the increase?

Mr. RHODES: The increase in the general tariff is not so important; the increase of greater importance is that in the intermediate, because we are being subjected at the moment to a type of competition which is very serious.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But, according to the minister's statement, it has not been so.

Mr. RHODES: It has been.

Mr. YOUNG: One half of one per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The intermediate tariff is where, in our minds, the importance of the provision rests.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My fear is that this affords an opportunity for an increase all along the line for both the Canadian manufacturer and the importer who will take advantage of the increase.

Mr. RHODES: How can he do it when we have not touched the British preference?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend has just stated that every advantage you give the British manufacturer along with the Canadian, just gives the latter a greater opportunity to take a little bit more. That is the advantage the minister gives him, particularly when the minister has just announced the fact that all the importation comes from Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: That will not be affected.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would like to call the attention of the minister to the remark he made about the rate being the same as it was when the late government was in power. When the former government was in office the rates were: British preferential, 20 per cent; intermediate, 30 per cent and general, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I was speaking of the British preference only.

Mr. MALCOLM: The British preferential rate was only 20 per cent at that time.

Mr. RHODES: There were five items; I called off only one.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Was there only one 27½ per cent?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, and I referred to that item.

Mr. BROWN: I have just been looking up the matter. The minister says that the rates which the hon. member for Weyburn supported under the former government were higher than those prevailing to-day. I take the five items he gave.

Mr. RHODES: One item, I said.

Mr. BROWN: Number 542 was 20 per cent British preference.

Mr. RHODES: I quoted all that.

Mr. BROWN: Number 544b was 22½ per cent; number 568, 20 per cent; number 568a, 15 per cent and number 554c alone, 27½ per cent.

Mr. RHODES: That is the one.

Mr. BROWN: It is very easy to fix upon one item. Perhaps, to arrive at an accurate conclusion, we would have to figure out the amounts imported under different tariffs before we reached an average, but it is not fair for the minister, in view of these figures, to make the statement that the rates were higher then than they are now.

Mr. RHODES: It all depends upon the point of view. The hon. member says that it is not fair to pick upon one item, yet as a matter of fact, while sixty-seven items are referred to under the proposals of the last budget, only five of them involve an increase in tariff.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On the British preference.

Mr. RHODES: No, under any tariff. Numbers of them lowered the tariff and numbers of them took the duty off altogether. At the moment I am merely reminding the hon. member for Lisgar of his argument that it was not fair to pick on one item. He has picked out this item we are now considering, and his friends have done so also. I have no objection to that. More time has been taken on this one item than on all the rest of them put together.

Mr. BROWN: The minister is very astute in trying to get away from the real point at issue. He made the distinct statement on this item we are now considering, that the British preferential rate was higher under the former government than it is now.

Mr. RHODES: Only on one item. I am in the judgment of Hansard; I take the record as it now appears in Hansard. I cited every one of those items and I referred specifically to only one; I said the words I say now and I am prepared to abide by Hansard that it will be found there that is what I said.

Mr. BROWN: I understood we were discussing the five items under the old tariff that are now grouped under one on which the rate is now 25 per cent, whereas the former rate on only one of the five exceeded 22½ per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I would not ask my hon. friend to break the Sabbath, but I would suggest quietly that to-morrow morning he take Hansard and read what I said to-night with respect to this item and I would be prepared to accept his judgment as to whether what I said is not precisely what I have just now said I said.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister has not changed his course, but he has changed his objective. The other night he was doing this in order that the Canadian manufacturers might capture the $600,000 worth of importations which are coming from other countries; now he wants to divert that trade to Great Britain. I would suggest to him that if he wants to divert that trade to Great Britain, he does not need to raise the general or intermediate rate; all he has to do is to lower the preferential rate and let goods come in from Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And thus get revenue.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: Then my hon. friend suggests that we would get more revenue?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, and cheaper goods.

Mr. MULLINS: I have been listening to the apostles of free trade so long that I have become somewhat tired. They are free traders when they are on the hustings and protectionists when they are in power. I wonder why they cannot be consistent. They have maintained a higher tariff than hon. gentlemen on this side of the house ever did. I should like the hon. member for Lisgar to listen to the words of a gentleman who was one of his own allies when he sat in the far corner of the house. I was a member of the house in 1925 and 1926. I am going to read what this gentleman says in his book and it will bear me out so far as the Liberal party and their tariffs are concerned. The whole thing is a joke. The Liberals are no more free traders and they do not practise free trade more than we do on this side of the house. This gentleman says:

> The Liberal party was first elected to power in 1873. The issue was lower tariff with a view to ultimate free trade; it held power for four years. No alteration in the tariff policy resulted. It was elected again in 1896. The issue was still lower tariff, with a view to free trade; it was in office for five years: result, tariff unaltered. It was in power again in 1900. The issue was once more tariff reduction with a view to free trade; it held power for four years,—result, tariff practically unchanged. Reelected in 1904, held office four years, the tariff still unchanged. Again in 1908 the Liberal party was returned to office on a policy of tariff reduction; it held power another three years without results as to low tariffs. In 1921, the Liberals once more came to power; policy, a gradual downward revision of the tariff; it held power until 1925—the result was that the tariff stood as before.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the name of the book?

Mr. MULLINS: I was in the house in 1925 when I saw the parade in front of this building and I heard the statement made from this side of the house when you occupied these seats, as to what you were going to do, and when you got those men nicely home, what did you do? You know very well what you did. You took the duties off parts for the automobile manufacturer and you gave them more protection than before. One of the manufacturers told me so in Oshawa. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that just as well as I do.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, I do not.

Mr. MULLINS: I heard the statement made from the platform of a theatre in Ottawa that you were going to stay right where you were; you had made your stand. Then when you got everything nicely quiet, what did you do? You know what you did.

What is the use of being inconsistent? Why not be honest and play the game squarely? You know you are protectionists, even more so than we are. The hon. member for Lisgar sat with the Progressives.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the name of the book?

Mr. MULLINS: This is a book by William Irvine, M.P.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: Don't laugh at that, because when they get a fair sized group you will want them. You will be running around after them as you were in this house a few years ago. I look into the faces of many of you over there, and I remember your activities very well. The hon. gentleman who sits as an independent knows how persistent you were to throw your arms around them and try to hold them. You do not want them just now, but Mr. Massey says that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation ought to join up with the Liberals, and you will want them if they become a large sized group. You know that, and you know you will then begin your activities again. I remember a gentleman coming into the office that I occupied on the sixth floor on the same corridor with these gentlemen in the far corner, and seeing my door wide open he said: "If you do not close that door you will get what is coming to you." He told me I would be bumped off. "Well," I said, "go to it." Protectionists, yes; that is what you are. The hon. member for Labelle was right when he said that you were free traders when not in power and protectionists when in power. The right hon. leader of the opposition, speaking at Kingston, Ontario, on October 20, 1925, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press, said:

> We realize that our industries here have to have safeguards with respect to competition from other parts of the world, competition from the country to the south of us—

The country that you think so much about. He went on:

> . . . competition from conditions as they are in England, and we think that is all the more reason why in these days of depreciated currency and the like we should have the benefit of expert advice and information on all these great questions of the tariff.

Now I want you hon. gentlemen opposite to be consistent. I do not want you to be using the tariff and making out when you are in opposition that you are apostles of free trade just to get it on Hansard and then go out on the hustings and use it. You have done that long enough. I am a lower tariff believer than any of you sitting opposite Not one on the opposite side believes in a lower tariff more than I do. You know very well the position of this old ship of state. You know she is struggling, and you are just talking politics. There is only one faithful free trader on the other side, and that is the hon. member for Weyburn. I give him credit. The others are just as much protectionists, and more so, than we on this side of the house.

I did not intend to speak, but I know that the man out west is struggling hard, and I know that on this side of the house nothing will be done to make his lot more burdensome. We are doing our best to save the ship and to save the mess you left to us. You know what we inherited. Oh yes, we went out after it and we got it, and now we are struggling to save this old ship from swamping. I believe the hon. Minister of Finance is doing everything that is honest and faithful, and why do hon. gentlemen opposite hold up the house and keep us sitting here when we ought to be home? They are doing it for politics and nothing else, and the gentlemen in the southeast corner know it just as well as I do. They know that the Liberals are not consistent.

Mr. BROWN: I want to correct my hon. friend in one particular, and that is in his statement that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and I were allies. I have never on any occasion sat in a caucus room or had any intercourse with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, and I have no doubt that he is just as ready to repudiate the suggestion as I am.

Mr. MULLINS: Hon. gentlemen were with him. They had him in the group. I do know you ran as a Liberal-Progressive, but I would rather have a man that comes out as a straight United Farmer than with a hyphenated name such as you have. There are only two of you left. But you are in your right place, and why don't you be honest and say, "I am a Liberal."

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: There is only one other item on the tariff list, Mr. Chairman, and that is item 682a, to which I have an amendment to move.

Customs tariff—682a. Net floats of aluminum, glass or cork, for use only in deep-sea or lake fishing, not to include floats for sportmen's use: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

In the budget provisions we included among the free items, floats of glass or aluminum. The amendment I have is to widen that to include canvas floats as well. My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni made a plea that we ought to include trawl kegs and sinkers. May I say with respect to trawl kegs that I find they are made almost entirely by the fishermen themselves. They are a home-made product, and to the extent that they are purchased it is of advantage to the fishermen that they should be purchased from themselves. With respect to sinkers, they are made of lead and they are a home-made product also. Certainly they are to a large extent in the east. At all events, I am advised that on balance there would be no advantage to the industry as a whole to amend the item to include sinkers, and for that reason I have thought it wise not to do so. I therefore move:

That tariff item 682a as amended by resolution No. 2 of March 21, 1933, be further amended by inserting therein after the word "glass" the word "canvas."

Mr. NEILL: The desire to include sinkers arises from the fact that it militates against both fishermen and manufacturers in this way. I have not the tariff item before me, but when these sinkers are attached to nets brought in in one complete entity, so to speak, they come in free. But many sinkers are used on the same net later on in the ordinary course, as the sinkers often get lost, and if the minister does not put the word "sinkers" in here he is hurting the Canadian manufacturer, which is not supposed to be his object. It is an inducement to the fisherman to buy his net from the United States complete with all the sinkers and lines and floats, because then they come in free. But a great many fishermen do not want to do that. They prefer to buy just their web and the lines and sinkers, and then put them together themselves. The people who are in the business of manufacturing these articles are handicapped because they have to pay a duty on sinkers coming in individually and which they sell retail, or wholesale and then retail and the extra cost is of course paid by the fishermen, whereas when the sinkers come in with the net they come in free. While it may be true that in the maritimes, and possibly to a limited extent in British Columbia, the sinkers are made out of lead by the fishermen themselves, there is a regular standard sinker manufactured for the purpose, of a certain shape and with a hole in it to run the line through, which is quite distinct from the home-made article which the fisherman cuts out of a piece of lead. I cannot see that it would do any harm to the revenue by inserting the word "sinkers." I was given to understand that we had a fair prospect of getting this inserted, and I so advised the fishermen. I am sorry to find it is not going to be accepted now. I have a letter here from a manufacturer quoting a letter from the department as follows:

Concerning the leads referred to in paragraph three of your letter, when attached to nets et cetera, provision is made in the act for exemption from sales tax on goods enumerated in customs tariff item No. 682, when under a class or kind and for the purpose stated therein. The exemption applying equally to similar goods manufactured or produced in Canada.

That is dealing with the sales tax, but the same principle applies. Last year the minister was good enough to exempt the sinkers from sales tax and I thought the same argument would have applied in regard to duty. I remember a delegation waiting on him, and I formed the opinion that we might have got a favourable decision then if it had not been for his desire not to open the tariff act last year. Is it not possible that the minister might leave this over for further consideration?

Mr. RHODES: I assure my hon. friend I have given careful consideration to this matter. If he was under the impression that I said this amendment would be made, I must say he had no warrant for such an impression. In that regard I am not depending only on my memory, which may not be of the best at this stage of the session, as I have full occasion to know, but if he will refer to page 4296 of Hansard he will see that I made it abundantly clear that while I allowed the item to stand there was no understanding with respect to what action would be taken. It is true that last year an amendment was made freeing these sinkers from sales tax, but it by no means follows that the same reasoning applies in relation to customs duty. I cannot speak with the knowledge my hon. friend has as to conditions in the west, but in the east there is no demand for this exemption. The fishermen there make their own sinkers, and there is no reason they should not do it in the west. It is a simple piece of lead; the crudest apparatus would enable them to make it, so I do not think it is a matter which requires much time and thought. I should like to be courteous to my hon. friend, but I think the item ought to carry.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Neill.]

1. Resolved,—That the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter thirty-nine of the acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the acts of 1930 (first session), chapter three of the acts of 1930 (second session), and chapter thirty of the acts of 1931, be further amended by adding to section six thereof the following subsection:—

(9) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the governor in council may from time to time and as occasion requires order and direct, subject to such exceptions as may be made, what shall be the rate of exchange fixed for any currency in computing the value for duty of goods imported into Canada from any place or country the currency of which is depreciated, and in case a sum in Canadian currency less than the invoice value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export, computed at the rate of exchange so ordered, be paid for the goods, the actual selling price of the goods to the importer shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption, and the provisions of this section shall apply and special or dumping duty shall apply equal to the difference between the value of the invoice computed at the current rate of exchange or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the governor in council, and the value of such invoice, computed at the rate of exchange for duty so ordered as aforesaid, or may be less than such difference as the governor in council may from time to time order and direct; and the governor in council may order and direct that in all cases of sales or consignments of goods imported into Canada, where the importer owns, controls or is interested in the business of the exporter, or the exporter owns, controls or is interested in the business of the importer, or the importer and exporter operate under a controlling or holding company, notwithstanding the expressed terms of the sale or consignment, the transaction shall be regarded as a sale and the actual selling price to the purchaser in Canada shall be taken to be the value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export converted into Canadian currency at the current rate of exchange, or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the governor in council, and shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption and the provisions of this section shall apply and special or dumping duty shall be deemed to apply equal to the difference between the value of the invoice computed at the current rate of exchange or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the governor in council, and the value of such invoice computed at the rate of exchange for duty so ordered as aforesaid, or may be less than such difference as the governor in council may from time to time order and direct.

Any order in council made hereunder may be varied, extended or revoked at any time by the governor in council.

This subsection shall be deemed to have had effect from and after the first day of September, 1931.

Resolution agreed to.

STABILIZATION FUND

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, did not the minister promise to allow a debate on the stabilization fund proposal after we passed this?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is quite right. The understanding was that by unanimous consent discussion would take place in committee prior to report. The understanding the other day when we were in committee will be found at page 4560 of Hansard:

> After we have concluded our several items in committee, and just before reporting, I should be perfectly content if by unanimous consent there should be a discussion in committee of the stabilization fund.

That was the understanding arrived at then, as against consideration that we would discuss it on a motion to go into supply, which would confine hon. members to one speech.

Mr. NEILL: I will not detain the committee long; at any rate I will not go as far afield as did the hon. member for Marquette. I just want to reiterate a plea for the inclusion in the stabilization items of pilchard meal and pilchard oil. I brought this up before in a general way, but I lacked full information, and the Prime Minister said the door was left open for further details. I just want to put a few additional facts on the record.

The request is that pilchard manufacturers of British Columbia, which is the only place in Canada where they manufacture pilchard oil and meal, should have their products included in the stabilization scheme. In speaking of it the other day I made a mistake about the valuation of the plants. Thinking of the buildings only I said they would probably be worth $5,000 to $8,000 apiece, but I am advised I was wrong in that regard; I had forgotten the expensive machinery and boats. I am told that the investment will run in each case from $50,000 to $400,000. There are twenty-seven plants, and if you multiply that number by $150,000 as a mean, it gives an investment of over $4,000,000. The industry employs some 2,000 men. I would like to state one or two facts to show the desperate condition this once prosperous industry is in. Four years ago there were twenty-four plants running; last year there were seven. Four years ago eighty-six seines were operating, that would employ at least 600 men; last year there were only twenty-two. Four years ago the selling price per gallon for the oil was thirty-seven cents; last year it was eleven cents, a fall of two-thirds. Wages of fishermen per ton four years ago were $4; last year they were $1.60.

In addition to the troubles they had at that time the government made conditions a little more onerous by putting a sales tax on fuel oil, which while it may be of benefit to the coal mines or to the revenue is going to make it more expensive to operate these plants. Hitherto the great market for pilchard oil has been in the United States, where they have a tariff against it of five cents a gallon. When the price is thirty-seven cents that is one thing, but when the price is ten or eleven cents it is a much greater thing, it amounts to fifty per cent. They state that there is no expectation of any sale in the United States this year; the only inquiries for pilchard oil now in hand are from Great Britain. The British market is an enormous one if they can get into it. Japanese shipments of fish oil to Britain last year were 4,000,000 gallons. They state that under present conditions unless something is done the industry is practically wiped out. You can imagine that if it drops from twenty-four plants down to seven it is nearly wiped out. It is impossible to reduce further the charter rates for fishing vessels; they are already so low that they pay only operating expenses. The pay of fishermen and plant workers is also so low that a further reduction would result in their going on relief. The operators suggest that the only possibility is the inclusion of these products in the stabilization fund, and they say the cost would not be excessive. On last year's products it would amount to someting like $16,500, and probably would be much less now owing to the increase in the value of the pound. They ask also that pilchard meal should be included as well. That is part of the business. The price dropped from $54 a ton four years ago to $20 a ton. The United Kingdom is a market for that also.

I might also suggest as an argument in favour of it that the usual expression used concerning these things is "fish and fish products," and I think that was at one time in the mind of the right hon. Prime Minister, because my recollection is that he used it. But it has not been so expressed; it is only "fresh and canned fish." It is a question of these people having to go entirely out of business, in which case 2,000 white people will be thrown out of work and an investment of $4,000,000 will be almost thrown into the discard. The possibility of selling in the United States is negligible because, as I was saying before the right hon. Prime Minister came in, the duty in that country now amounts to about fifty per cent of the value. Formerly it was very much lower, but it is a fixed duty and now it amounts to practically fifty per cent of the value. There is an enormous market in Great Britain, and under present conditions the expense to the government would not be very heavy. It is indicated that $16,500 would at least keep these remaining plants operating for another year, and I earnestly hope the government will give this question its serious consideration.

Mr. DUFF: For a few moments I should like to discuss the items coming under this so-called stabilization fund as well as some other items which are not included. Let me say that as a matter of principle I am opposed to this idea of bonusing the thirteen articles mentioned, but if the government are going to pay the exporters of these articles a certain amount of money, according to the value of the goods and the value of the pound, then I say that other articles should be included as well.

For instance, in regard to the fishing industry, only lobster and canned salmon shipped to Great Britain will receive any benefit. Last year we shipped 68,176 hundredweight of canned lobster to various countries, and since there are about two cases to a hundredweight that would mean about 136,000 cases. Of that quantity only 58,000 cases went to Great Britain. Large quantities went to countries whose currency is depreciated as compared with our dollar, so it seems to me that if this measure is designed to help the fishermen who catch and can lobsters the fund should apply to goods shipped to other countries. We shipped 1,229 hundredweight, or about 2,500 cases, to Belgium; about 4,800 cases to Denmark; about 17,200 cases to France and about 14,000 cases to Sweden. May I also say that a large part of the 58,000 cases shipped to Great Britain was reshipped to various European countries, and if this stabilization fund is to apply to these lobsters which are shipped first to Great Britain and later to the continent I think it should apply also to the lobsters which go directly to France, Belgium, Sweden and other European countries.

We are an integral part of the British Empire, and if the government desire to help our fisheries there are other kinds of fish which should be included under this fund, and it should be extended to exports to British Empire countries as well as those to Great Britain. While the lobster fisheries are important they constitute one of the smallest industries in the maritimes provinces, and if the government want to help the fishermen of those provinces they should include under this fund fish shipped to British Empire countries. In the British West Indies our dollar is worth only about 75 cents; people who ship goods there must accept a depreciation of from 20 per cent to 30 per cent, say an average of 25 per cent. In my opinion there should be no discrimination between goods shipped to Great Britain and those shipped to other parts of the British Empire. Last year we exported to the British West Indies 70,307 hundredweight of pickled mackerel; 32,313 hundredweight of pickled herring; 68,349 hundredweight of dried codfish and other fish as well. These exports went to Trinidad, Demerara, Barbados, Jamaica and other parts of the West Indies. I think you will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that the dried and pickled fish business is just as important, if not more so, than either the lobster business in the maritimes or the salmon business in British Columbia. In view of the fact that these countries have depreciated currencies it seems to me that before this matter is finally settled the stabilization fund should be extended to include dried and pickled fish of all kinds exported to the West Indies as well as the comparatively small amount of lobsters and canned salmon going to Great Britain

There is still another matter to which I should like to refer, Mr. Chairman; that is the matter of lumber. The lumbering industry in the maritime provinces and British Columbia is just as badly off as any other industry, and it seems to me that lumber also should be included under this fund. Lumber prices are fixed in Great Britain; they are paid in British funds, and consequently shippers of lumber must accept the currency of that country, with the result that they must take a depreciated pound. If it is fair and reasonable to give special consideration to these thirteen items by means of this fund I strongly urge that lumber and pickled and dried fish should be included as well. As I said a moment ago, I think the whole thing is a mistake; I think it is a bad principle and I do not think there was any need to establish this fund. If, when they came into power, this government had not forced people who import goods from Great Britain and other countries having depreciated currencies, and then imposed what is known as a dumping duty, there would have been no need to give special consideration to these few items. The very fact that in the first resolution, which we passed a few moments ago, this dumping duty on goods coming from Great Britain is done away with proves that it was a wrong policy.

In addition to lumber and fish going to Great Britain and British Empire countries I am going to mention the subject of apples. When the agreements were under consideration last year a great deal was said with regard to the great benefit that those agreements would be to the apple industry. I notice, however, that apples are not included among the thirteen items to which the stabilization fund is to apply. At that time I contended that the so called preference on apples from Canada was in reality not a preference at all but was a duty on foreign apples entering Great Britain, in other words that the Canadian apple was in exactly the same position after the agreements were passed that it was in before. There was never any duty on Canadian apples going into Great Britain and they are in no better position now than previously, because the price of apples, whether they are foreign or Canadian, is fixed on the London market and the Canadian shipper must take the price which the London buyer offers for the product. One of my arguments, therefore, was this. The suggestion was made that because of the so-called preference, in other words a duty on foreign apples, the Canadian producer would benefit, and I pointed out that if British goods coming into this country were not subject to the dumping duty as well as the special tax, that is to say, the difference between the pound sterling and the rate at which the pound was valued by the Department of National Revenue, the Canadian shipper would not suffer in consequence of having to accept a depreciated dollar for his apples. In other words, if we ship $1,000,000 worth of goods to Great Britain and have to take $3.80 to the pound for them, and if we buy $1,000,000 worth of goods from Great Britain at the rate of $3.80 to the pound, no one suffers by the transaction. The only trouble in connection with depreciated currency in the past has been the policy of this government. Besides putting on a dumping duty they have also made us pay the difference between the pound sterling and the rate at which they have valued the pound. There was a good deal of criticism on this score and that I presume is the reason for their doing two things in this budget. One of these was to introduce the stabilization fund to compensate shippers of certain goods exported from this country to Great Britain for the large sums of money taken from them during the last two or three years. Let me show what I mean.

Suppose you shipped £100 worth of canned lobster to Great Britain, selling them on the basis of $4.10 to the pound. You receive $4.10 to the pound for them. The pound, say, is worth $4.60, and if you receive £100 at the rate of $4.60 you get $4.60, so that you lose $50 on that transaction, and that $50 under the stabilization fund the government proposes to make good. As I said a moment ago, if business were let alone, if there were not so much paternalism and interference, there would be no need to pay that $50 to the shipper of £100 worth of lobsters. If the shipper of that £100 worth of lobsters were left alone he or someone else would buy from Great Britain £100 worth of goods, woollen or cotton or some other kind. The government, however, instead of allowing him to import these goods at the rate he would pay, namely, $4.10, compel him to pay duty on a valuation of $4.86. That is to say, if on the £100 worth of goods the duty were at the rate of thirty per cent, instead of paying thirty per cent on $4.10 he is compelled to pay thirty per cent on $4.86. Thirty per cent on $4.86 is $1.46, and on $4.10, which is what he really paid for the goods, it is $1.23, or a difference of 23 cents on every pound's worth of goods he buys. In addition to that, under the old arrangement up to the time the budget was brought down, the government fixed an arbitrary value of the pound sterling at $4.40, although the real value was only $4.10. There is a difference of 30 cents; add that 30 to the 23, the difference in the duty, and it means that the importer, on every $4.10 worth of goods, pays 53 cents more than he should pay were it not for the policy of this government. In other words, he loses $53 on every £100 and the government now propose to pay him $50.

The reason for the introduction of the stabilization fund must be the realization on the part of the government of the unsoundness of their policy in fixing the pound at a certain rate and also in making the importer pay duty on a valuation of $4.86. Now that they practically agree to take off the dumping duty and to allow goods to come in at the price people pay, there is no reason for the stabilization fund. If however the government decide to apply the stabilization fund to articles going into Great Britain and nowhere else, I say that in the interests of the Canadian exporter to British Empire countries they should extend it to goods shipped to the West Indies or New Zealand or Australia. Further, so far as apples, lumber, wheat and fish are concerned, as well as a list of other articles too numerous to mention, I submit that the stabilization fund should be made to apply to all these. If the stabilization fund is a good thing it should include them all.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member (Mr. Duff) speaks of including lumber, and as there are large lumber interests in my district I might be expected to endorse his remarks. I understand however, at least I heard the Prime Minister say some weeks ago, that it was not intended to apply the stabilization fund to lumber because he had in view other methods whereby he hoped to benefit the lumber industry. I take it I am at liberty to guess or to suggest that that means some negotiations with the United States, and that is where we in British Columbia want the market. The stabilization fund might help us to get into the British market, but that would be like trying to make water run uphill. Our natural market for the second and third grade of goods we want to sell is right at hand in the United States; we cut the product the way they want it and they are accustomed to our standards. Putting the duty back as it was last year in the United States would do us infinitely more good, so far as the lumber business in British Columbia is concerned, than including that product in the provisions of the stabilization fund. That at any rate is my individual opinion. What I do want is to have pilchard products included in the stabilization fund. That would do us as much good as applying the fund to salmon. I do not hesitate to say that the stabilization scheme will be of material advantage to the canned salmon industry of the country, and I am glad to express my appreciation of it; but the including of pilchards would do us as much good. A couple of thousand men are engaged in the industry. I have hopes in this matter, because the Prime Minister, speaking on March 24, said that the door was not closed against other agricultural and fish products. I hope therefore that consideration will be given pilchards later on.

How will this stabilization fund be put into effect? It does not appear that the Minister of Finance intends to bring in an act to carry it out. The money comes out of the general relief vote and I presume that an order in council will be passed. If it is done in that way will the minister publish the order in council so that everyone will know what is included and what the conditions are?

Mr. RHODES: It is proposed to bring the stabilization fund into effect by order in council, and it is intended that the widest possible publicity shall be given as soon as it is announced.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any limit to the fund in dollars, in amount?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. DUFF: Is the door still open for other items to be included?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. RHODES: I am sure the Prime Minister will carry out his undertaking in that respect.

Mr. MacLEAN: I desire to support the plea made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough on behalf of the people in his section of the country in connection with fish products. As hon. members well know, the largest item of export from Prince Edward Island is potatoes, but because of the embargo against this commodity by the British government, very little benefit will be derived by the producers from the stabilization fund if it does come into effect as far as Prince Edward Island is concerned. Some little benefit may be derived by the producers of cheese and meat products, but that is all. Strong representations have been made to the minister, not only from Prince Edward Island but from other parts of the country, on behalf of the silver fox industry. If any industry lends itself to the application of this stabilization fund it is the silver fox industry. Many people think that as this industry has been in operation for a great number of years it does not need any assistance, but many of the large ranches are not making a profit to-day. They are carrying on in the hope that they may get a break in later years. Shippers of silver fox pelts ship direct to the British market and separate accounts are kept, so that any money which might accrue through this fund would go direct to the shipper and not be absorbed by other interests. If the pound keeps on improving it may be that the government will not have to pay out anything through the stabilization fund. I suppose everyone would welcome that happening.

Mr. DUFF: They should make it retroactive.

Mr. MacLEAN: There is another factor to be considered in connection with this industry. It is quite possible that the operation of the stabilization fund will increase the price of meats. As everyone knows, carload after carload of meat products are sent down to the maritimes from the abattoirs in this part of the country. If the price of meat products is increased, there will be an increase in the cost of producing silver fox pelts. If this industry is not included in this fund, its operations would react against it. I hope the Minister of Finance will give this matter his special attention.

Mr. MALCOLM: Any cost that might arise from the payment by the government of the difference between the existing rate of exchange and $4.60 has now been transferred in large measure from the taxpayers of Canada to the ordinary buyer of the pound when sold on the market. It would almost appear as though the action of the American government in abandoning the redemption of her currency in gold is putting the relationship of the pound to the dollar back to the position occupied when both the pound and the dollar were on a gold basis. Nor personally do I imagine that when the market settles the relationship between the pound and the dollar will differ very greatly from the relationship that existed at the time both currencies were on a gold redemption basis. Inasmuch as the margin between the present rate of exchange and $4.60 mentioned by the government is so narrow, I submit that in order to benefit alike all products, the government might without very heavy expense to the treasury apply the stabilization to all products shipped to Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has touched upon one phase of this matter which was in my mind some weeks ago when I spoke in the house and indicated that the door was not absolutely closed. We had some reason to believe that there would be an increase in the value of the pound in terms of dollars. Perhaps that increase has come about more rapidly than was expected by most people, and speaking to-night I should not care to indicate that I was of the opinion that it is at all stabilized. I suppose I should not say more than that the figure at which sterling exchange is selling to-day is not in my judgment the true measure of what the ultimate value of the pound, as stabilized, will be. However, that is only an individual opinion and has no particular value beyond being my own view of the matter. The circumstances which have brought about the rise during the last few days are perhaps not unknown to hon. gentlemen. All I can say is that if one were certain and could predicate with some degree of authority a fixed value, I believe my colleagues would agree, as I agree, with what has been said by the hon. gentleman. It was for that reason that we did not desire to express with too much certainty a limitation upon the articles which might enjoy the benefit of this fund, and that thought is still in the mind of the government. In particular is that so of the commodities which cannot in any sense be affected at this moment, that is, commodities which will not be in condition for export until much later on in the year. I ask the committee to appreciate our position in the matter. We determined that this was the proper step to take at this particular time and we did this for reasons which I think most hon. members who have followed the trend of economic conditions will agree were apparent to every observer. Having done so, we contented ourselves for the moment with stating the articles to which it would apply. Those articles have been referred to to-night.

There are such items as apples, which has been pressed so strongly, about which we might be compelled to arrive at another conclusion in the light of crop conditions which may prevail this fall. The same is true with respect to pears, plums, and other fresh fruits which have been finding a market under very considerable difficulties in Great Britain. Apparently the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has misunderstood the effect of the preference upon apples. I think the hon. member for Hants-Kings could represent more authoritatively the views of the apple growers of Nova Scotia. I think this was indicated by his vote upon the United Kingdom agreement. The fact is that to-day apples enjoy a larger preference in the British market than they ever have before. At the moment that preference amounts to $1.25 per barrel as against apples coming from outside the empire. The strongest pressure was exercized by Australia and New Zealand with respect to apples and only last week I was told in Washington that the Argentine is capable of supplying apples which because of seasonal conditions would not conflict with those from Canada. I fancy the former Minister of Trade and Commerce is familiar with the details of the Argentine production of apples. I can only say this: I desire to make it quite clear that the movement in the value of the pound sterling has made the amount payable on the limited number of items mentioned rather small, and contemplating as we did an expenditure much larger than would be involved under existing rates, if there is a stabilized value approximating one around the figures that we have had during the last few days, I will say it might be possible to extend the list, and substantially too. The Minister of Finance and various other members of the government have received applications with respect to a very considerable number of products. I do not suppose it would greatly interest the committee but as a matter of curiosity, the committee might like to learn the views of various Canadians as to the items that might be placed upon that list. They are, for instance:

Macaroni products.
Fresh apples.
Fresh and frozen fish and fish meal industries.

Lumber.
Soft drinks.
Evaporated apples.
Dehydrated apples.
Fresh fruits.
Fresh vegetables.
Pilchard oil.
British Columbia fish oil and fish meal.
Black fox pelts.
Silver fox pelts.
Alfalfa meal.
Farm furs.
All furs.
Mining industry.
Ice cream mix.
Cattle sales made after budget speech.
Ranch raised furs.
Frozen salmon.
Raw fruits.
Canned meats.
Fresh plums.
Fresh peaches.
Fresh pears.
Fruit pulps.
Cider.
Concentrated cider.
Butter.
Pulpwood and pitwood.
Fish oils.
Dry salted fish.
Fruit preserved in sulphur dioxide for English market.
Lobsters.
Cattle exported.
Salt fish.
Wool exported to United Kingdom.
Eggs.
Cheese.

That is a list just recorded as the applications were received in letters sent to various members of the administration. I mention it because it is not as comprehensive a list as at one time I thought the application would indicate.

I do not think I can usefully say more than I have said, except with respect to the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Similar representations containing the figures he has given the committee to-night were embodied in a communication received, I think, by the hon. member for East Kootenay as well as by myself and the Minister of Finance. With respect to that there is just one difficulty which the committee, I am sure, will appreciate, and it is this: This relief or assistance does not extend beyond March 31, 1934, which is the date of the expiration of the Relief Act. The pilchard oil industry, in which considerable numbers of men are engaged and substantial capital invested, has been one of recent growth in British Columbia. One of the difficulties that we fear from the investigations that thus far we have been able to make—and they have not been exhaustive under the conditions in which life is carried on from day to day here—is this: that this might stimulate the industry merely for a few months inasmuch as the power which is conferred expires on March 31 next and the reaction might be so injurious to the new industry as to counteract any benefits that would accrue by the action suggested.

Mr. DUFF: I agree with that.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough agrees with it, puts the imprimatur of high authority upon the matter of fish.

Mr. BROWN: Extend the argument to artificial stimulus of trade.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry the hon. member for Lisgar has lived so long on the prairies that he is not able to understand the fish argument made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. But the only point I desire to make is that the matter has been considered and the question of determining the extent to which the reaction might be injurious rather than helpful has not been determined. It has not been settled that some assistance along the line suggested may not be given to the industry.

The hon. member for Lisgar suggests an artificial stimulus to industry. I can safely say that the cattle growers on the prairies do not look upon the matter in that way; they, represented at least in the other house by one of the ranchers from Alberta, do not hold any such idea as that. At a meeting of the Western Cattle Growers' Association, they passed a resolution stating that the action taken at the time it was, meant the salvation of the cattle industry on the plains. But if, as the former Minister of Trade and Commerce says, ordinary conditions bring about a value of the pound of $4.60 or any value approximating that, we shall rejoice that the necessity for relying upon the fund will have passed and that the conditions of trade in the world, world price levels and commodity prices generally will have ensured a return to some measure of prosperity that will enable the businesses to which I have referred to carry on at a profit and not under conditions that now exist.

I should have said that in regard to the pilchard oil industry there are special difficulties of which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is no doubt aware. The experimental stage has undoubtedly been passed in connection with the use of pilchard oil, but the competition is such as to make it extremely difficult to predict with any degree of certainty what conditions may be within the not distant future. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows to what I refer.

With respect to lumber, the imposition of a revenue tax upon lumber by the United States was, as will be recalled by the committee, for a limited time only, and, if my memory serves me aright, it expires next year. It was not a tariff; it was included in the revenue bill, and I think it is only fair to say that with the entire disapproval of the administration it was written in for very special reasons through the efforts of those who live in states contiguous to British Columbia and who are also engaged in the lumber industry. Undoubtedly the embargo placed by Great Britain upon the importation of Russian lumber during the last few weeks has had some effect upon the lumber industry in the eastern part of Canada. The distances are so great that the same benefit has not accrued with respect to British Columbia lumber, but some benefits have arisen by reason of that in regard to the finer qualities of fir and lumber that, as I understand the matter, are used for finishing purposes in Great Britain.

The list that was submitted to the house of course embraces a larger number than thirteen items because, for instance, meats include a large number of items, such as:

Bacon and hams, shoulders and sides.
Beef and veal, fresh, chilled or frozen.
Beef and veal, pickled in barrels.
Mutton and lamb, fresh, chilled or frozen.
Pork, dry salted.
Pork, fresh, chilled or frozen.
Pork, pickled in barrels.
Poultry, dressed.
Other edible meats.

That would be the classification involved in the use of the word "meats" with respect to the fund. The item of eggs involves three classifications:

Eggs in shell.
Eggs, dried.
Eggs, frozen.

The item of milk products embraces several classifications. I am afraid I have been very discursive in what I have had to say to the committee, but I desired only to make it clear that in the light of improving conditions with respect to the medium of exchange between the two countries we may be able substantially to broaden the list without increasing the expenditure.

Mr. MALCOLM: My observation directed to the Minister of Finance with respect to the narrowness of the spread between the existing rate of exchange and $4.60 was not based particularly on the belief that it is a wise plan to bonus all commodities exported to Great Britain, but rather on the fact that the amount of money involved being very much less with the narrower spread on account of present exchange rates, as mentioned by the Prime Minister, made it possible to extend this list to include all commodities. It is, of course, natural for everyone to have a desire to sell his commodities, whether abroad or at home, in terms of dollars with which he is accustomed to deal, and it is indeed desirable that our exporters should know how many dollars they will receive for any given quantity of their exports. It is dangerous for anyone to make any prophecy on the fluctuations of the money market, but I do feel that the rate of exchange in Canada to-day, being practically the same as it was when both England and the United States were on the gold standard, only indicates that so long as they both stay off the gold standard, or if they both come back on, the parity of exchange will not fluctuate violently from the present level of $3.90 to $4. Inasmuch as the benefits of this stabilization fund expire in March, 1934, and as between now and then the Prime Minister will have attended the world economic conference in London, I hope for the sake of the trade of the world that before next March some definite relationship will have been established between the various currencies of the trading nations. I do not estimate that the spread between the current rate of the pound and $4.60 will be very much greater than twenty or thirty cents at any time. I doubt if it will be that. To-day there is only the matter of a very few cents difference.

I do submit again that the government would be well advised to adopt the principle of giving this assistance to all exports so that the exporters may realize from the stabilization fund on their commodities, whether they be lumber, fish or any other commodity, unless through some drastic drop in the value of the pound the assistance could no longer be continued. The government, of course, has the right under the legislation giving them power to deal with emergencies to withdraw this assistance if they are not able to continue it.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman must be in error when he says that the relationship of the pound to the dollar, and the dollar to the pound, is substantially the same as it was when both Great Britain and the United States were on the gold standard. The English pound before Great Britain went off the gold standard was quoted at $4.80 to $4.90.

Mr. MALCOLM: In Canada, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: In Canada it was usually at par before Great Britain went off the gold standard. I think my hon. friend is confusing the $3.90. Par was $4.86, and the value in the United States, whether it be by cable transfer or on demand or thirty days, was usually somewhere between $4.80 and $4.90, par then being $4.86, while to-day it is only slightly over $4.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is not quite $4.

Mr. BENNETT: It ran to $4 at the close for a little while. So there is a discount of 86 cents on the American side. Here in Canada we ran to-day up to $4.52 as a maximum, I think, reflecting to a very large extent the difference between Canada and New York with respect to currency generally. I just correct my hon. friend because I think his observations were directed to the time when Great Britain was off the gold standard and America was still on.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is so.

Mr. BENNETT: What he said was when both countries were on the gold standard. It was just that, that I desired to correct.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Ever since this stabilization fund was announced by the Minister of Finance I have been in somewhat of a dilemma to know upon what basis these thirteen commodities have been selected. When the matter was under discussion shortly after the announcement was made I endeavoured then to find out the basis and failed. I will be more particular now with regard to what I have in mind.

Why were animals, for instance, chosen as one of the commodities, when we all know that anything paid out of the stabilization fund will be less likely to get back to the producer in respect of this commodity than of almost any other commodity of the thirteen you could mention? I do not need to mention the reasons. I might indicate, however, that the packing industry is pretty much one entity in Canada, and you have not the ordinary competition that you would get if there were a number of independent packers, although there are a few, of course. This exchange stabilization will not therefore reflect itself back as freely on animals as it would on many other commodities I might mention.

Again, why is cheese put on this preferred list and not butter? An attempt was made to explain that, but I certainly could not understand it. Cheese has been included among milk products but not butter. If cheese is made from a different kind of milk or a different kind of cow than butter I did not know that before. Milk products, of course, include both these commodities, and yet one gets the preference and the other does not. One is taken and the other is left for no apparent reason.

Then why should honey and maple sugar products be given this preference when both these commodities have already been given a substantial hoist because of the duty on sugar? All these saccharine products are affected by the sugar duty, consequently the tiny bee and the maple tree are very much in on this deal. There is only $16,000 worth of honey exported and $180,000 worth of maple products. A number of articles are mentioned in the return which I got from my hon. friend the minister, particularly on representations from the west, but those people had no idea under the sun when they were asking for these things that the government was going to make a selection of thirteen articles and never include one of the cereals on the selected list or butter or many other articles I could mention. I could not imagine any more teeny-weeny pinhead way of dealing with a big national question than that which the government has adopted, waiting and waiting, dilly-dallying and shilly-shallying until almost there was no occasion for the stabilization fund, and then at last under the reflected glory of the president of the United States the government emerges with some tiny degree of credit in the matter.

May I ask one or two other questions for information which will enable us to talk a little more intelligently and a little more comprehensively on Monday if this matter again comes up then? I wonder what was the lowest figure to which the pound dropped since September, 1931? Could the minister tell us?

Mr. RHODES: I would not like to give a figure offhand, but I could get it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would be interested in having that. Then another question; why should canned fruit and canned vegetables be given the benefit of this stabilization fund while the raw products are not? It is true that some of these raw products would be too perishable to export, but the fact remains that when they are manufactured they come on the preferred list. That requires some justification, I think. Then in estimating the losses we must consider not only the enormous losses that have been sustained on farm products, but also those on factory, forest and everything since September, 1931. Now when there is nothing much to be done the government comes along courageously to do something already done by nature. Let nature take her course! The law of the survival of the fittest always works, but it is a ghastly and costly process, leaving wreckage in its trail all over the country. The same with the law of supply and demand; it is sure to work, but what happens to our people in the meantime?

These are some of the cogitations I engage in on this quiet Friday night, I do not know if I can continue in the same vein on Monday. Just now the government is pretty quiescent; it knows it is vulnerable to attack on front and rear and on both flanks. If any flank is more exposed than another it is the rear, I think. I am not saying this threateningly, but if my hon. friends knew the condition of the country, especially of agriculture, the despair and distress that exist while they are dilly-dallying with this thing, I do not believe they would be able to muster a smile at all. I find great difficulty in being able to smile about it myself. If you notice, Mr. Chairman, I have been keeping distressingly quiet. You know what is said about the weather when it is very quiet; it indicates a storm brewing. I do not think there is anything like that in my case, but I feel terribly serious to think the government has waited so long to throw us even a wee lifeline. I have heard some supporters of the government telling each other what a lucky fellow that man Bennett is—

Mr. BENNETT: They don't know!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Possibly. Here he is holding on to his wheat with the backing of the Dominion government, while the rest of us, with no backing behind us, had to sell ours during last December at five bushels for a dollar. He hung on to his, but at the expense of those who had to sell. The cheaper it was the more we had to sell to get a bit of money to pay our taxes. All those things are still fresh in our minds, and will keep until Monday as far as I am concerned. I think if the minister would give us that exchange information by months from the time the pound went off gold, and maybe a month before, it would be of interest.

As to the canned vegetables, some of these of course could not be exported in the raw state, but somehow the manufacturers get in on these things pretty frequently. Of course if they passed the stabilization fund proceeds back to the growers it would not be so bad, but how much would be passed back? A great many of these products are controlled under a complete merger. A merger is not always a bad thing, but if they want to use it for bad purposes they can do so.

Another thing; will the minister provide us with an estimate of the number of commodities that we export to Great Britain? Thirteen are mentioned; I wonder if there are a thousand altogether. If there are thirteen hundred then at the rate of thirteen a year it would take one hundred years to get around to them. I do not think there are thirteen hundred, but there may be half that number, in which case it would take fifty years to cover the lot at thirteen per year.

Mr. RHODES: Would there be any objection to reporting the resolutions for the purpose of bringing in a bill, it being understood that this discussion can continue when we are next in ways and means?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that will be satisfactory.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, there is one resolution which has not been dealt with.

STATUTORY INCREASES TO CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. MacLEAN:

What is the estimated amount of money which will be required to pay the statutory increase to the civil servants under the Civil Service Act, that will have accumulated for the three years ending March 31, next, and which is now a liability against the revenues of the dominion?

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that this question be withdrawn for revision, because, in the first place, the stoppage of increases in the salaries of civil servants has continued only one year, up to March 31 last, and not three years as suggested, and secondly, because the question assumes that these reductions or stoppages of increases accumulate from year to year as a liability against the revenues of Canada. That, I think, is an assumption of fact which has never yet been accepted. The question should be revised. It is impossible for us to make estimates for the next two years as to what these increases would amount to, having regard to deaths, retirements and other changes in the civil service.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped for revision.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING AND WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Tuesday, the 9th May, next, until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day, and that, in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock, p.m., and that on Wednesday, the 10th May, next, and all subsequent Wednesdays, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, this motion is generally submitted when the full legislative program is before the house. Do we understand that apart from the redistribution bill and possibly another bill with relation to the French treaty, there will be nothing else to be presented?

Mr. BENNETT: I told the house the other day that that was my understanding of the situation. I think there is an amendment to the Excise Act which was prepared in April and which was awaiting the passage of the budget, but outside of the bills in the Senate, I know of no others.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE DOMINION AND BRITISH COLUMBIA GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), concerning certain dispatches which appeared in the press this morning concerning an agreement which has been entered into between this government and the government of British Columbia with respect to the unemployment situation in that province. If these dispatches are correct, would the minister give us the details of this agreement?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the contributions made by the federal authorities in connection with relief have been the subject of a number of conferences between myself and the representatives of the province of British Columbia. These conferences have taken place during the past two years at the end of each fiscal year. We have arrived at the terms of an agreement to be entered into with the province of British Columbia and a draft of the proposed agreement with the accompanying order in council was tabled to-day. This draft discloses the terms of the agreement which will become effective upon execution by both parties.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if the third reading of this bill will be proceeded with to-day?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The third reading of this bill will not be proceeded with until to-morrow at the request of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King).

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Would the hon. Postmaster General inform the house whether he will bring down his estimates to-day?

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): I would willingly do so, if I knew definitely when they will be submitted to the house.

I trust they will be brought down between—

Mr. HACKETT (Translation): —at the end of the session.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly, between now and the end of the session; I hope to move their adoption in the course of the present week or, at the latest, next week.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, March 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Indian Act—Mr. Murphy.—Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 7—Enquiry as to fitness for enfranchisement.

Mr. SMOKE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a few remarks concerning the Six Nations Indians. These Indians are not natives of Canada, as we understand the term. At the time of the discovery of America, or at least shortly afterwards, these Indians were settled in the Mohawk valley in the state of New York. As they are not natives of Canada, in the same sense as other Indians, I claim and they claim that they are in a class by themselves. Readers of history will remember that during the revolutionary war these Indians were allies of the British government and while that war turned out so disastrously for the British army, they remained loyal to the British Empire. Subsequently, by virtue of what is known as the Haldimand treaty, they were allowed to come over to Canada. The Haldimand treaty, so-called, is very short and I think I cannot do better than read the material portions of it. It is dated October 25, 1784, and recites:

Whereas His Majesty having been pleased to direct that, in consideration of the early attachment to his cause manifested by the Mohawk Indians and of the loss of their settlement which they thereby sustained a convenient tract of land under his protection should be chosen as a safe and comfortable retreat for them and others of the Six Nations who have either lost their settlements within the territory of the American states or wish to retire from them to the British. I have at the earnest desire of many of these His Majesty's faithful allies purchased a tract of land from the Indians situated between the lakes Ontario, Erie and Huron, and I do hereby in His Majesty's name authorize and permit the said Mohawk nation and such others of the Six Nation Indians as wish to settle in that quarter to take possession of and settle upon the banks of the river commonly called Ouse or Grand river, running into lake Erie, allotting to them for that purpose six miles deep from each side of the river, beginning at lake Erie and extending in that proportion to the head of the said river which they and their posterity are to enjoy forever.

Given under my hand and seal at arms—

In pursuance of that treaty the Six Nations Indians, or the greater bulk of them, came over from New York state where they had been living, and settled in the western part of Ontario. The British government had not at that time acquired all the land which they had agreed to give to the Six Nations Indians, but they afterwards by treaty acquired the land from the Mississauga Indians and subsequently made good their agreement to allow the Six Nations Indians to settle in that portion of western Ontario.

Following that treaty, what is known as the Simcoe deed was entered into pursuant to the Haldimand treaty. I want to read the material parts of the Simcoe deed, which is dated January 14, 1793:

Know ye, that whereas the attachment and fidelity of the chiefs, warriors, and people of the Six Nations, to us and our government has been made manifest on divers occasions by their spirited and zealous exertions and by the bravery of their conduct, and we being desirous of showing our approbation of the same and in recompense of the losses they may have sustained of providing a convenient tract of land under our protection for a safe and suitable retreat for them and their posterity, have of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, given and granted—

This is a deed; Governor Simcoe, representing the king has given and granted this land.

—and by these presents do give and grant to the chiefs, warriors, women and people of the said Six Nations and their heirs forever, all that district or territory of land—

And so forth, described as I have given it before.

Giving and granting, and by these presents confirming to the said chiefs, warriors, women and people of the said Six Nations and their heirs, the full and entire possession, use, benefit and advantage of the said district or territory, to be held and enjoyed by them in the most free and ample manner, and according to the several customs and usages of them the said chiefs, warriors, women and people of the said Six Nations; provided always, and be it understood to be the true intent and meaning of these presents that, for the purpose of assuring the said lands, as aforesaid to the said chiefs, warriors, women and people of the Six Nations, and their heirs, and of securing to them the free and undisturbed possession and enjoyment of the same, it is our royal will and pleasure that no transfer, alienation, conveyance, sale, gift, exchange, lease, property or possession, shall at any time be had, made or given of the said district or territory, or any part or parcel thereof, by any of the said chiefs, warriors, women or people, to any other nation or body of people, person or persons whatever, other than among themselves the said chiefs, warriors, women and people, but that any such transfer, alienation, conveyance, sale, gift, exchange, lease or possession, shall be null and void, and of no effect whatever, and that no person or persons shall possess or occupy the said district or territory or any part or parcel thereof, by or under any pretence or any such alienation, title or conveyance, as aforesaid, or by or under any pretence whatever, under pain of our severe displeasure.

And so on. That, as I say, places the band of Indians known as the Six Nations in an altogether different category from other Indians in this country. I want to call the attention of the committee to the definition of the word "band" in the interpretation clause of the Indian Act. Section 2, paragraph (b) reads:

"Band" means any tribe, band or body of Indians who own or are interested in a reserve—

This is not a reserve at all.

—or in Indian lands in common, of which the legal title is vested in the crown.

The legal title to those lands is not vested in the crown because, according to the Simcoe deed which I have read, it is granted to the Six Nations Indians, so that the word "band" does not apply to the Six Nations Indians.

We find the term "reserve" defined in paragraph (j) which reads:

"Reserve" means any tract or tracts of land set apart by treaty or otherwise for the use or benefit of or granted to a particular band of Indians, of which the legal title is in the crown.

Those are the same words used there. I claim that the legal title to those lands is not in the crown and therefore the present Indian Act should not be held to be applicable to the Six Nations Indians.

[Mr. Smoke.]

Let us refer again to the history of the Six Nations Indians. In the war of 1812-14 we find that they took the side of the British in fighting against the Americans. In the rebellion of 1837 they took the part of the loyal citizens of Canada of that day in fighting the battles of Great Britain. Then in the great war I can only refer to a speech made by a former Minister of the Interior in this house when he said that 600 of the Indians of the Six Nations volunteered to fight in the great war. Let us understand what 600 means in comparison with the small number of that whole Indian band, which does not comprise more than 4,000 or 5,000 people, including men, women and children. When one thinks 600 of their men of military age volunteered for service in the great war, surely one realizes that we in considering this bill in Canada owe some recognition of their sacrifices.

By the way, I understand an amendment has been proposed. I am told the legal department of the government hold that the Haldimand treaty is not a treaty, therefore the exception in this bill will not provide the remedy or help out the Six Nations Indians in their present claim. But reading the Haldimand treaty with the Simcoe deed, one cannot come to any other conclusion than that those lands belong to the Six Nations Indians and are to be held by them according to their ancient customs. I should like, if I may, to read a copy of a letter which I received and which was sent to the press, signed by W. F. Powless, who is secretary of the Six Nations council. This letter, which is dated March 11, 1933, reads:

Sir,—Allow me to give you an explanation of the objections and contentions of the Six Nations Indians with regard to the enfranchisement clause of the Indian Act now under discussion in the House of Commons, Ottawa, and of which there appears to be such little interest shown in a matter that is of vital interest to us and which threatens our very existence.

The part of the act dealing with the enfranchisement of Indians has been a matter of concern by succeeding governments, with the object in view of forcing full citizenship on a people the large majority of whom have not as yet attained that point where it would be to their advantage to be placed in business competition with the surrounding whites.

Only two or three generations ago their ancestors obtained their livelihood by the hunt having no knowledge of any other method while the whites have had hundreds of years of experience both in business and the art of farming and now the government is endeavouring to force compulsory enfranchisement on the Indian which we consider is one of the most vicious pieces of legislation ever enacted. True, there are among the Indians of Canada, outstanding men and women who have obtained a prominent place in both the literary and professional world but they are in a very small minority and the Indians are urging that there be a distinction shown and that the proposed amendment to the act relative to the compulsory enfranchisement of Indians, empowering a body of men to decide as to the fitness of an Indian of a band to take the responsibility of full citizenship without first consulting the party or parties most interested, should not be allowed to become law.

There is a feeling of discouragement among the Indians and a suspicion of the motives of the government in the measure under discussion and as long as there is no satisfactory assurance that they will remain unmolested on their reserves there will be a tendency to neglect improvements on their farms as they contend that they have no guarantee that their children will be able to enjoy the fruits of their industry.

The Six Nations, in the short time that they have taken up farming, have become entirely self supporting and I venture to say that there is less destitution on their reserve at the present time than in any other community in Canada, being less than 10 per cent of the population. This is of course not generally known but what is known among a certain class of whites and of which they take full advantage is that the Indian has not the business ability to compete with his white neighbour.

True, we have been assured that the government has no designs on the Six Nations reserve but the amendment, if passed, will confer the power and may be exercised by a succeeding government if it so desires.

Another matter that should not be lost sight of is the magnificent response made by the Indians in practically every war in which the empire has been engaged in in the last 160 years and particularly in the great war when there was a larger percentage of voluntary enlistments from them than from any other class in Canada. And what is the thanks extended to the Indian returned veterans for their sacrifice? The benefits of relief to small pensioners have been passed to the Department of Indian Affairs while participation in the Last Post fund has been entirely withdrawn although they helped to accumulate the profits derived from canteen funds and were asked to vote on the question of the disposition of said profits.

In conclusion I would appeal to the fair minded people of Canada, who have the interest of the Indian at heart, to make representations to the government urging that the proposed amendment be withdrawn. If that is done and the objectionable measure dropped they will win the everlasting gratitude of a people who never forget a kindness done them.

The Simcoe deed included all the territory from lake Erie along the Grand river, six miles on either side from mouth to source. As the years went on the Six Nations found that they could not usefully occupy the whole of that territory, and from time to time they surrendered certain portions to the crown, and now they occupy all of the township of Tuscarora, part of Onondaga and part of the township of Oneida in the adjoining county of Haldimand. The moneys paid into the Indian office in England, Indian affairs in Canada for several years having been administered in London, for the surrender of these important blocks of land are supposed to be lying somewhere down here in the treasury at Ottawa. The sum in the first place was very close to one million dollars but it has been depleted from one cause or another. I am not complaining of that depletion except with regard to one item, with respect to which I perhaps cannot do better than quote from a return that was passed by the house in 1927, and which is sessional paper 143. It says:

> The only loss which was sustained by the Six Nations fund was owing to the unfortunate investment by the British Indian office of thirty-eight thousand pounds provicial currency in the Grand River Navigation Company.

That was trust money which never should have been so invested. I have been told that over many years there have been applications sent in to this government and to the British government for a refund of that money. Being trust money it was misappropriated. The British government say: Oh well, we handed the whole thing over to Canada in 1867. The Canadian government say: We did not do it at all; it was done before we got hold of it. So they pass the buck from one to the other. That thirty-eight thousand pounds should be restored to the Six Nations Indian fund, although I must confess that the Six Nations Indians have almost given up hope that that will ever be done. I am told that the department claims that it has made that amount good to the Six Nations in various ways. The department has built a splendid hospital in Ohsweken in the county of Brant, and has built schools for the education of the Indians. But that same thing is done for the Indians throughout the whole dominion. It is the duty of the dominion government to do that, and for the department to say, "Oh, we have built hospitals and schools for the Indians of the Six Nations," when they do the same thing for Indians throughout this dominion is to put forward a contention in which I cannot see any merit at all.

I have obtained a copy of sessional paper 106 dated Friday, October 7, 1932, giving a list of the Indians enfranchised under the Indian Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1932. I find that from one end of Canada to the other there were only fifty-seven Indians granted enfranchisement during that year, and how many were there enfranchised among the Six Nations? Not one. They do not want it. Why then should legislation be passed amending the Indian Act and compelling their enfranchisement against their will provided that somebody decides that they are fit for enfranchisement? They do not want it, and are not asking for it.

The minister says that this government does not intend to enforce enfranchisement. If that is the case, why take this power and deprive the Indians of a good legal argument should the present government or any government in the future change the present policy and decide to enfranchise the Indians?

I think that an exception should be made of the Six Nations Indians, and I would offer an amendment for the consideration of the minister, that nothing in that particular section of the act shall apply to the Six Nations Indians of the Grand river.

I want again to refer to what the Six Nations Indians have done for the empire, and in that connection I cannot do better than quote a few lines from John McCrae's poem, In Flander's Fields. If justice is not done to the Six Nations Indians in this matter, I would ask if the government will not be in a similar position to that suggested in the last line of the poem:

> We shall not sleep though poppies grow
> In Flanders fields.

I appeal to the minister to do everything possible, and there is a lot possible, to relieve the Indians of the Six Nations of the necessity of being enfranchised against their will.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, as the previous speaker has said, the amendment to the Indian Act which is now being considered in committee, has been considered on former occasions. There still seems to be a misapprehension in regard to the bill before us. During the years the government of Canada has, I believe, quite properly taken a very liberal attitude towards the treatment of Indian residents in Canada. Literally millions of dollars have been spent for a certain fixed definite purpose—at least so it seems to me. Money has been spent lavishly for educational purposes; a vast educational system has been built up, residential and day schools have been established, hospitals have been built, and in times of stress, medical services provided for the sick and relief given the aged and destitute. For what purpose have these moneys been spent, especially those moneys spent so lavishly upon the education of the Indian, if not ultimately to bring him to the point where he may enjoy the full status of citizenship? In other words, these moneys have been spent to help take the Indian from a position of wardship, and place him where he may enjoy the privileges and responsibilities of self sustaining and self respecting citizenship.

May I say that at times I believe there is a mistaken public opinion sentimentalizing over our Indians to the effect that they should be spared all healthy discipline. If it is considered that the Indian must be a permanent charge upon the public, then to a great extent our present efforts are a waste of time. Is all self reliance to be drained out of the Indian? As I have stated, we have been generous with the Indian, and rightly so. Certainly he has been treated as a ward, except in cases where he has voluntarily applied for enfranchisement. But, I think, Mr. Chairman, that our efforts are justified only upon the belief that some day he will emerge from that state of dependence. I do not think that we are helping the Indian when we impress upon him the belief that he is never to be held responsible. Certain objections have been raised in committee based on the assumption that the department is going to enforce compulsory enfranchisement. That is not so, because if one reads the amendment carefully he will observe that the Indian is to be enfranchised only after his fitness for such enfranchisement has been passed upon by a board consisting of any judge of any superior court, or any judge of any circuit or county court, an officer of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian belongs. Such board shall make inquiry and report as to fitness. I believe that provision makes it perfectly clear that the Indian is not to be submitted to compulsory enfranchisement, but is to be enfranchised only after a proper investigation has been held.

At the present time an Indian may voluntarily apply for enfranchisement. Before that recommendation is passed on to His Excellency in council a most minute, exhaustive and careful investigation is held as to his fitness. To my mind, the officer or member of that board who will wish particularly to be assured beyond all peradventure as to the Indian's fitness for enfranchisement, will be the member representing the department. We do not enfranchise the Indians simply because they ask for it. We make an exhaustive analysis because we feel our responsibility in the matter, and we know that to enfranchise him before he is fit would not be in his interests, the interests of the government or anyone else concerned.

The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Smoke) speaking about compulsory enfranchisement, referred to the Six Nations Indians. He made further reference to the so-called Haldimand treaty or agreement, and the Simcoe deed. I have those documents before me, but as he has read from them to the committee I do not think I would be serving any useful purpose by reading them again. May I say however that if there is anything in any treaty or agreement which gives any Indians in Canada special privileges, it is amply provided for in the amendment now before the committee, which reads:

Provided that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty that may have been entered into between the crown and the Indians of the band in question.

I have read several of these treaties to which reference was made by the hon. member for Brant, and I am unable to find that the amendment will effect any violation of the terms of any treaty or agreement made. But if there is any such violation, it is amply covered by the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Whilst under the amendment the enfranchisement of an Indian may not appear to conflict with any treaty, would not the enfranchisement itself, in many cases, conflict with what Indians regard as their treaty rights? For example would it not conflict with certain immunities they have, such as the right to hunt in and out of season, the right to draw treaty payments, the right to live on a reserve, and the right of freedom of property from seizure. Would any of these rights be interfered with by enfranchisement?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to ask a question in line with that asked by the hon. member for Bow River. Is it the intention to enfranchise the Indian and allow him to remain a member of the band?

Mr. MURPHY: If the Indian became enfranchised certainly he would not any longer be a member of the band. I do not know whether the hon. member for Bow River has a copy of the amendment—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, I have.

Mr. MURPHY: He will find that the amendment is as follows:

Provided that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty that may have been entered into between the crown and the Indians of the band in question.

Then it will be a question for the law officers of the crown to decide as to whether or not the terms of any treaty have been violated.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then the minister is leaving it to the law officers of the crown to determine, afterwards, whether the immunities of Indians are or are not being preserved. That is quite an unfair position. I am drastically opposed to any bill which embodies a principle of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister tell the committee definitely whether enfranchisement under this legislation will, first of all, dispossess the Indian of his right to live on the reserve? Is the answer yes or no?

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, property rights will not be interfered with. If an Indian on a reserve holds a location there is provision in the act at the present time whereby he retains possession of that property. His property rights are not interfered with in the least by this amendment. He will take his share of the band funds or any other funds, his interest in the common land of the band, he will retain the location which he enjoys at the present time on the reserve.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the Indian then the right to sell that portion of the property within the reserve that is his?

Mr. MURPHY: After he receives his enfranchisement, and has title to the land that belongs to him, he is the same as any other citizen of Canada; he will be able to deal with it as may any other citizen.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is one of the points the Indian is most opposed to. You are going to permit an official of the department to say a certain Indian shall be enfranchised—

Mr. MURPHY: That is not correct.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then you are going to say that some Indian may be enfranchised, and you are going to allow that Indian to sell his property to any individual he chooses. So in a short time you are going to have your Indian reserves checker-boarded all over with white settlers perhaps. Do you think that is in the interests of the Indian?

Mr. MURPHY: I have endeavoured to make it plain to the committee on every occasion that when an Indian reaches that degree of advancement which entitles him to become a Canadian citizen he should accept the responsibilities of citizenship. I explained a moment ago to the hon. member for Bow River that the Indian becoming enfranchised will have all the responsibilities of a Canadian citizen, that he will receive title to his land and be in the same position as any other Canadian citizen, and he can deal with his land as he sees fit.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the Indian now the right, before he becomes enfranchised, to sell that portion of the reserve that is his?

Mr. MURPHY: Only to a member of the band.

Mr. VALLANCE: But when he gets title under this provision he may sell it to any Canadian he chooses, without permission of the council?

Mr. MURPHY: After enfranchisement, certainly.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is what the Indians most strenuously object to. It is going to spoil the whole Indian life.

Mr. SMOKE: Will not the result of that be to let a lot of poor whites in on the reserves?

An hon. MEMBER: White trash!

Mr. SMOKE: Will the best type of white citizen acquire farms on an Indian reserve? It is a great mistake to allow an Indian who is enfranchised to sell his land to any person who is not a member of the band.

Mr. McINTOSH: When this bill was before the house at an earlier time I made a few remarks in connection with it. I took the stand that if an Indian were fit to be enfranchised, if we are sure of our ground, it may be all right. But there seems to be grave doubt as to the wisdom of enfranchising Indians generally. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Smoke) is opposed to it. I am inclined to think that many members on the opposite side of the house are also opposed to it, as are many members on this side. The house is divided on this move by the department.

The minister in his brief statement mentioned the fact that we have spent a great deal of money on the Indians. He gave that as one reason for enfranchisement. But we have on the other side the fact that when we took over the Indian holdings in Canada we bought them at extremely low valuations, and if we have spent money on the Indians since it is only what we ought to have done. I do not think that argument ought to enter into the question at all. If we are going to enfranchise the Indians without their wishing to be enfranchised, is that in harmony with sound principles of British liberty and freedom? That is compulsion. That is not a sound position to take. Then we are told by the minister that he is setting up a board, and this board must pronounce on the question before any action is taken. I would like to ask the minister, from whom must the request come to enfranchise any Indian or Indians? Will the request come from the individual Indian?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MALCOLM: No, he has that privilege now, voluntarily.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then why take away from him that freedom which he possesses at the present time and compel him to do something that he does not want to do? That does not smack of British freedom. You are not going to build up the independence of the Indian population of Canada in that way; you are only going to weaken it.

There is another point growing out of what the minister said. He laid great emphasis upon educating the Indian. I would think that the end of education is to develop the capacity of the individual to ask questions and answer them. That is the purpose of our training institutions, to develop that power in the human mind. If we cannot do that we are not getting very far. If the Indian does not ask the question, and does not say, I want to be enfranchised, why enfranchise him? Apparently with all our culture and training we are afraid of the Indian not wanting to be enfranchised, and so want to impose it on him. To me that looks like enfranchising the Indian to get his vote. That should not be the end of any legislation; what should concern us is the welfare of the Indian.

Another matter I wish to mention is this. Does this committee think fair the stand we are taking against the Indian wearing his aboriginal costume? As I understand the law now, before he can take part in a dance or stampede or exhibition in his aboriginal costume he must have permission from the agent or the department. Now we are wiping out that provision, and it would appear that we are trying to prohibit the Indian wearing his native costume anywhere, on the reserve or off it. I cannot see why we are making a move of that kind. I believe the Indian is absolutely entitled to wear his Indian costume wherever he likes, and the disapproval of the department is simply intimidating the Indian and keeping him from developing in the continuity of freedom and liberty. We know what took place in Scottish history after the union of the parliaments in 1707. In the uprising of 1745 some small-bore politicians and public men of the period in England decided that they had better forbid the Highland clans to wear their costume—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order!

Mr. McINTOSH: And for twelve years from 1746 they were forbidden to wear their costume or carry arms. But when a man of some brains and vision, the elder Pitt, during the seven years' war came to govern Great Britain, he saw what ought to be done, and did it immediately. He removed the embargo as it were, and the Highlanders were organized and allowed to wear their costumes, and history tells the result; they went around the world and fought as they never fought before and widened the bounds of the British Empire, made the British Empire, making it a real empire. If that is true of one nationality it is also true of the Indians, and I am going to ask the minister to make a statement on this question. My own opinion is that we should give the Indian more freedom regarding the wearing of his costume, because by doing that I think we will make him a better Indian.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before the minister replies to what has already been said, I should like him to consider some observations I want to make on the effect of the act as changed by the amendment now proposed. He suggests that this takes away the compulsory feature of the enfranchisement, which is now no longer compulsory. In that, I submit, he is quite wrong. This is not the less compulsory because a judge and an official of the Indian department together with some member of the band selected by the government can make a report upon the Indian as to his fitness or otherwise for enfranchisement. If they report, as they can under this amendment, that the Indian is fit to be enfranchised, then he may be enfranchised no matter how much opposed he may be to it. If it is not compulsory why not leave it as before?

May I call attention to the provision, which I submit is a very serious objection to this legislation:

> In respect of an Indian or Indians of any band who has not or who have not made application for enfranchisement under this section or under section 114 of this act, the Superintendent General may appoint a board—

It goes on to state whom the board may consist of.

> —to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised, and such report shall have the same force and effect and shall be dealt with in the same manner as if the same had been made upon the application of an Indian or Indians under this section.

The report upon the Indian's fitness shall have the same effect as the Indian making application. If it is not compulsory then you do not need the report. I submit that this is taking away from the Indian the right to make the application himself.

Mr. MURPHY: No; my hon. friend is absolutely wrong.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I submit I am not. This is taking away from the Indian the right not to be enfranchised until he makes application for himself. Will the minister say that is not right?

Mr. MURPHY: The section of the act dealing with that now makes provision for the Indian himself to make application. He may still do so after this amendment carries; he may apply himself.

Mr. McINTOSH: He may be rushed into it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He will have the right which he now enjoys, of not having enfranchisement forced upon him unless he applies, taken away from him by this amendment. That means that it is compulsory. If it is not compulsory it is not necessary. If it is only going to enfranchise the Indian who applies for enfranchisement, or who is willing to apply, it is absolutely unnecessary. What it does is to substitute compulsory enfranchisement for voluntary enfranchisement by application of the Indian, or by the decision of the band.

I want to call to the attention of the minister the protest that has been waged by the Indians; I doubt whether there is one tribe among all the tribes of Indians which is favourable to this legislation. I very much dislike at this stage of the session taking up the time of the house reading these protests, but I do feel that the matter touches so vitally the happiness, the future comfort, and the right of the Indians to obtain a livelihood as they have done in the past that I must protest as strongly as I can. I have here, from the Chippewa council of the Caradoc reserve, a petition dated March 17, 1933, as follows:

> To the > Parliament of the Dominion of Canada,
> Ottawa, Ontario.
> Sirs,—
> On the report in the press that the government of the Dominion of Canada are in the consideration of enacting an act of parliament to force the Indians of the Dominion of Canada into compulsory enfranchisement, we, the members of the Chippewa-Thames Band of Indians of the Caradoc agency, do herein make our humble protest to such enactment of the act of parliament for the following reasons:
> The Indians of this part of the province of Ontario are not in a position of qualification to enter into such enfranchisement by education and temperament, and the fact that the smartest of our race living in the various reserves of the province of Ontario who have taken enfranchisement have in a few months, or years, lost all their property, and in most cases have had to receive help. The majority of the Indians have not even a common or public school education, and therefore cannot compete with the white people.

The Indians from the earliest times have appreciated their treatment by the British crown. Their loyalty has been traditional. In 1876 and 1812 they gave valuable military assistance to our cause. In the great war more than four thousand Canadian Indians enlisted, although they were expressly exempt from conscription. Therefore, we, your petitioners, request your favourable consideration of this, our humble petition.

I wish to have this petition in the hands of the minister so that he may consider it. Bearing on this phase of the subject, I would point out that for generations the Indian has lived a different sort of life from the commercial life of the white people. They are very clever athletes, splendid sportsmen, good hunters, and they possess absolute loyalty and devotion to the crown, as they have shown whenever the test has come. But the point is that once they obtain enfranchisement, with the right to contract with regard to their own property, that property, just as surely as they are given that right, as I said in one previous discussion, is obtained by some whites who live along the border and are not above doing the poor Indian out of what is his. I see here a number of clippings from various letters that have appeared in the newspapers. I have one from the secretary of the Six Nations council, W. F. Powless, written to the Mail and Empire of Toronto. I will not trouble the committee by reading the whole of it but I would quote this part:

This is, of course, not generally known but what is known among a certain class of whites and of which they take full advantage is that the Indian has not yet the business ability to compete with his white neighbour.

Apart from the question of good faith with the Indian, I do not think it can be denied that this is a breach of the relationship that has existed under the treaties that have been entered into at various times, even before the declaration of independence of the United States, because I believe it was before that time that the main treaties were entered into, an undertaking having been given by the king in the old treaties that the Indians would be protected, that they would have their hunting grounds and fishing rights, to quote a saying so much used by the Indians themselves, "as long as grass grows and water runs." These rights were to be preserved; they could not have their property taken away from them if the white man got a judgment against them. That is the great protection which is being taken away by these amendments to the act.

[Mr. Elliott.]

The following is an extract from a letter written on April 4, 1933, to the editor of the Toronto Globe:

Look back only a couple of generations ago and you will see the Six Nations warriors in war paint and feathers, whose means of livelihood was obtained from fishing and hunting and who are being transformed in that short space of time into agriculturists, in which, I believe, we have made greater strides than any other aborigines in the world, but we are far from being able to compete in a business way with our white neighbours.

That comes from Frank Montom, a member of the Madfourth band. Its source is entirely different but it contains the same idea put forth by hon. members of this committee who happen to know something about the habits of the Indians and the white men who have made money out of preying upon the Indians. After all, this vaunted civilization of the white men has been a detriment rather than an advantage to the Indian. The Indian of two or three generations ago who lived among his own kind was better off than the Indian of today who is living partly with whites and partly with other Indians. There is no question at all that this is a breach of faith with the Indians. At this of all times, when there is so much unrest abroad in the land this should not be done. I shall not refer to the great possibilities in times of elections, but I repeat again that this is a breach of faith and the taking away of rights which these Indians have enjoyed for generations. Besides the Six Nations Indians, the Caughnawagas, the St. Regis Indians, the Munceys and the Chippawas and the Blackfeet Indians have all sent me protests against this legislation. Similar legislation was in force for a short period, but it was repealed. These Indians got along in the past without this legislation and there is no reason why it should be forced upon them at this time. During this depression the Indians have not been such a heavy burden upon the government. In some cases they have been a less burden than many white people. They have come through these hard times very well and this legislation should not be imposed upon them. There is no use in my hon. friend saying that it will not be compulsory and will be done only after an inquiry has been held; it will be just as compulsory after an inquiry as if it were done without an inquiry. The result may not be as bad but the action will be just as compulsory.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Prime Minister says "no" but I have read the section and I say "yes." I say that most emphatically. The Indian will have just as little voice after an inquiry to decide whether or not he shall be enfranchised as he had before the inquiry. Let me put this proposition to the Prime Minister. Suppose an inquiry is held and a report is made that a particular Indian is fit for enfranchisement. The Indian receives word that he has been recommended as being a fit and proper person to be enfranchised under this act. The Indian may object but even though an inquiry has been held, the action will be just as compulsory as if there had not been an inquiry. Unless this is being forced upon the Indian against his wishes the old act answers the purposes. If the Indian is to be consulted, if this thing is not to be enforced upon him, then the old act is good enough. It is now suggested that enfranchisement shall be forced upon the Indian and his property put in the same position as that held by a white man. It will be possible to obtain a judgment against him and issue an execution against his property. This could not be done under the old act and it is now proposed to make a complete change. Those who know anything about the Indians will agree with me when I say that should this amendment pass and the property of the Indian be put in the same position as that of the white man, if he can be sued and execution issued against him, in the course of a few years at least ninety per cent of our Indians will be in the position of those referred to in the correspondence I have read. Their property will dwindle away and they will become objects of charity. I urge upon the Prime Minister and upon the minister in charge of this bill that this is not good legislation; it is not good for the people of the country as a whole and it is particularly unfair to the Indians. I do not think it should be pressed.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, had it not been that there has been such grievous misrepresentation of the purposes of this bill, I am quite sure that the protests which have been sent to the government by the Indians would not have been sent. I am satisfied upon that point. I cannot understand why this committee does not deal frankly with the main issue, which is this: should or should not the Indians be enfranchised? The law provides already, by means of complicated sections, for an Indian receiving enfranchisement (a) at his own instance, and (b) at the instance of a majority of his band. It was thought desirable that there should be a continuance of that principle without applying it in a proper sense to those who by education or other fitness should no longer be wards of the nation. Let me amplify this. Every argument to which I have listened and which has been presented to this committee with respect to the ability of the Indian to do business is equally applicable to the Indian who himself sought enfranchisement. That is number one. Number two is that section 110 of the old act—not this bill—states:

> Upon the application of an Indian of any band, or upon the application of a band on a vote of a majority of the male members of such band of the full age of twenty-one years at a meeting or council thereof summoned for that purpose, according to the rules of the band—

And so on, and then outlines the steps to be taken to enfranchise an Indian. Does this committee concede the right of an Indian to secure enfranchisement? If it does, then all the arguments to which we have listened vanish. His status—that is the technical term which should be used—is as it was at the passing of the act. Once we concede the right to an Indian to change his status and become enfranchised, every argument which has been offered over and over again as to his being imposed upon when he gets title to his land vanishes. Every Indian who sought enfranchisement obtained all the rights and privileges of an enfranchised person. Therefore, if we are going to maintain the principle suggested by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, we must repeal that section of the act which provides for voluntary enfranchisement. I think that is a fair statement. Secondly, there is enfranchisement at the instance of the band itself by majority vote, providing that it should be a factor in the case in determining whether he should be recommended for enfranchisement. That is, his attitude of mind towards the matter should be ascertained—

> Which attitude shall be a factor in determining the question of fitness.

I put this to a committee of parliament sitting here this afternoon solemnly considering this legislation that provides that a majority of the band may take steps to enfranchise an Indian: Is the department to be denied the exercise of its jurisdiction?

Mr. McINTOSH: Why tamper with the law?

Mr. BENNETT: This is in order to clear up and remove any possible objection there may be by reason of this situation arising; I do not wish to use names, because it might be inconvenient for the Indian in question. I have received an application from an Indian to be appointed to the department as a medical doctor. He is a graduate of one of our most important universities and he has a fair degree of experience. I inquired and found—I give this only for what it may be worth because it was not very carefully looked up—that he is not enfranchised. There are in the same position men who have had legal training and experience. Heretofore parliament—not the present House of Commons and Senate—provided for the enfranchisement of Indians. If I were to deal with the question de novo, I might arrive at some different conclusion, but to me it is as simple as anything in the world. The wards have given evidence that they shall no longer be wards and seized with ambition, the individual Indian says: I want to become enfranchised, and he makes his application. That is dealt with in the manner provided by the act. Under (b), the Indians say: John Smith, you should be enfranchised with all the money that has been spent on your education. Then the band meets together and by a majority vote says: We shall enfranchise you, and an inquiry has to take place such as that to which I refer.

Mr. NEILL: Is that application made by the band? Does that not apply to the enfranchisement of the whole band, not of one individual?

Mr. BENNETT: It reads:

Upon the application of an Indian of any band, or upon the application of a band on a vote of a majority of the male members of such band of the full age of twenty-one years at a meeting or council thereof summoned for the purpose, according to the rules of the band and held in the presence of the superintendent general or of an officer duly authorized to attend such council, by the governor in council or by the superintendent general, a board may be appointed by the superintendent general to consist of two officers of the Department of Indian Affairs and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised. The Indian member of the board shall be nominated by the council of the band, within thirty days after the date of notice having been given to the council, and in default of such nomination, the appointment shall be made by the superintendent general.

Mr. NEILL: Of any Indian wishing to be enfranchised.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

In the course of such inquiry it shall be the duty of the board to take into consideration and report upon the attitude of any such Indian towards his enfranchisement, which attitude shall be a factor in determining the question of fitness. Such report shall contain a description of the land occupied by each Indian, the amount thereof and the improvements thereon, the names, ages and sex of every Indian whose interests it is anticipated will be affected, and such other information as the superintendent general may direct such board to obtain.

Then there is provided:

Governor in council may enfranchise Indians, on approval of report of superintendent general.
Effect of enfranchisement.
Procedure where wife living apart.
Right of Indian to choose name, and to be known by same.
Letters patent for his land to be issued to Indian upon enfranchisement.

And so forth. The only point I desire to make is that we are not dealing with the problem whether an Indian shall be enfranchised or not. The arguments we have heard are against enfranchisement at all. The arguments are those that have been made in all courts as to whether wards should be permitted to take over their property when they are twenty-one years of age, and all that sort of thing. But this parliament has said that they may become enfranchised. This amendment purports to do merely one thing; it purports, in view of the provision that has been made, to place the matter on a much more favourable basis than could be said with respect to the law before the amendment was introduced. May I again direct attention to the amendment:

In respect of an Indian or Indians of any band who has not or who have not made application for enfranchisement under this section or under section 114 of this act, the superintendent general may appoint a board to consist of any judge of any superior court or any judge of any circuit, district or county court, an officer of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs or belong, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised—

There is where it stops, but will the committee be good enough to listen to these words:

—and such report shall have the same force and effect and shall be dealt with in the same manner as if the same had been made upon the application of an Indian or Indians under this section.

That is, the department only sets in motion the machinery to make the inquiry. When the inquiry is made, it stands in the same position as though the minister had put the last—

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister said no.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he did not.

Mr. VALLANCE: He said the disposition of the Indians' land was on a different basis.

Mr. MURPHY: I made no such statement.

Mr. BENNETT: The man is in the position of any other enfranchised Indian.

Mr. VALLANCE: I understand to-day an Indian who applies for enfranchisement can do so only by agreeing with the band that they may take over his property in lieu of what they gave for it. The minister said to-day that under this provision the involuntarily enfranchised Indian has the right to take his title and sell it to a white man.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has taken the trouble to read the statute. If he had, he would not have made that statement. He certainly misunderstood the minister as to that. The law provides that an enfranchised Indian at his own request will receive letters patent for his land; they will be issued to him and he will receive his share of the fund. Then the land and money of his children and wife are dealt with. Payments are made from the funds of the band if there is no land. Indians not members of the band, and non-treaty Indians may be enfranchised, and granted letters patent. Claims on funds of band cease on issue of letters patent.

That is the law to-day; we are not making it here. It is and has been the law of the country. An enfranchised Indian has all the rights and privileges to which I refer and receives letters patent to his land. The whole argument against his enfranchisement is that we are proposing that he shall be enfranchised. I put to the committee only this question: With the provisions of this amendment I think the Indian with whom we are now dealing is in a much better position than any of them. In the first case the Indian starts the inquiry. In the second, the band starts the inquiry for a single Indian or Indians, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said. In the third case the department starts the application, but in no case can anything be done until a report is made. The report made in the last of the three cases puts the Indian in exactly the same position as in the other two, but there has been added this which you will not find in the law as it now stands:

Provided, that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty—

And I have just suggested to the minister that, in view of what has been said this afternoon, he adds the words "agreement or undertaking."

—that may have been entered into between the crown and the Indians of the band in question.

Mr. MALCOLM: That would be necessary when you force enfranchisement on the Indian.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to be so impossible to impress upon this committee that the law with respect to this stands as it is to-day and we are not changing it except that we are providing that the department may make an inquiry, whereas heretofore a majority of the band was required, as the minister has said.

Mr. MALCOLM: The section that is being repealed starts out with these words:

Upon the application of an Indian of any band—

Mr. BENNETT: Or.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is enough to start with, but it goes on:

—or upon the application of a band—

That section is being repealed.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is the subsection to be repealed.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a subsection.

Mr. MURPHY: The amendment reads:

Section 110 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection.

Mr. MALCOLM: But section 7 of the bill says:

Subsection 1 of section 110 of the said act is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman is not reading from the amendment. He is reading from the wrong bill.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is the only copy of the bill before us. If we were favoured with a copy of the amendment we would be in a better position to discuss it.

Mr. MURPHY: I will send the hon. member a copy.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The amendment will be found at page 3399 of Hansard.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister go a little further and concede this point, that the Indian who is to be appointed by the government shall be nominated by the band to which he belongs? I think that would pretty well safeguard the rights of the Indian.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be the practice.

Mr. NEILL: But it does not say so. There might be some Indian who was a hanger-on of the Indian agent and who would be perennially employed at this job.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the suggestion is sound.

Mr. VALLANCE: This deals with a different method by which an Indian may become enfranchised. The Indian himself may apply, the band may apply, and now the department may apply. Has the minister information as to how many Indians have been enfranchised up to date at the request of the band? The Prime Minister used an illustration this afternoon of a doctor. Why did not the Indian band, knowing that this Indian was a medical man and had all the qualifications for assuming full citizenship in Canada, apply for his enfranchisement?

Mr. MURPHY: It is impossible to answer that question. Only the band themselves can say why they did not exercise their privilege.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many Indians have been enfranchised at the request of the band?

Mr. MURPHY: Not any to my knowledge.

Mr. VALLANCE: And now the department is going to exercise the right when the band itself does not want it.

Mr. MURPHY: While I am on my feet I may say that there are certain Indians to-day in Canada who have the franchise.

Mr. VALLANCE: Lots of them; lots of them went to the war.

Mr. MURPHY: Not only those who took part in the war. Others have been enfranchised who do not come within the definition in the act as Indians or non-treaty Indians. In a previous discussion in the house the hon. member for East Algoma raised the question as to the status of certain Indians in his riding, Indians who do not belong to a particular band and who are not classed as non-treaty Indians under the definition in the act. I have obtained an opinion from the Department of Justice on the point, which I shall read for the information of the committee:

419/33
Ottawa, March 10, 1933.

Dear Sir,—

I have the honour to reply to your letter of March 3rd, asking to be advised whether certain persons evidently of Indian blood, referred to by Mr. Nicholson, M.P., in the House of Commons on March 1st, are Indians within the definitions given in section 2 of the Indian Act. I observe that, to fall within the definitions of "Indian" or "non-treaty Indian" prescribed by section 2 (d) and (h) of the Indian Act, a person of Indian blood must:

1. Belong to a particular band, or
2. Be a child of such person, or
3. Belong to an irregular band, or
4. Follow the Indian mode of life.

Evidently the persons to whom Mr. Nicholson refers do not fall within the first or second categories.

Mr. Williams informs me that the department does not know of any irregular band in the part of Canada referred to by Mr. Nicholson, so that evidently not one of them can fall within the first three categories, and those persons who live in the town in which Mr. Nicholson lives and to whom he refers specifically, evidently do not follow the Indian mode of life. These persons are, therefore, not Indians or non-treaty Indians within the meaning of the Indian Act and, so far as I am aware, have the rights of citizenship as other Canadians have and are entitled to the franchise.

The Deputy Superintendent General, Department of Indian Affairs,
Ottawa.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Can the minister now tell us the number of Indians who have been enfranchised on their own application? I understood him to say that none had been enfranchised on the application of their respective bands.

Mr. MURPHY: I said not to my knowledge. On a former occasion I gave the information which the hon. gentleman now asks for, but I can get it for him in a moment. But I wish to point out that here are Indians not following the mode of Indian life but who may have ninety-eight per cent of Indian blood in their veins, and who are to-day recognized as citizens of Canada with all the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship. Then we have other Indians in Montreal and Toronto and other large cities, members of the legal and medical professions, who beyond all doubt have received a much higher education and advanced much further than the class of Indians to which I have just referred, and yet who to-day are classed as Indians and have not the privilege of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister willing to limit the legislation to those two classes of Indians?

Mr. MURPHY: I think the amendment as drafted amply covers the point in question. The board which will be appointed will certainly make full inquiry as to the fitness of the Indian. The hon. member for West Middlesex said that the Indian might not even be seen by the board and might not know anything about the matter until after the board had made its report. But the act as it stands on the statute book to-day provides:

In the course of such inquiry it shall be the duty of the board to take into consideration and report upon the attitude of any such Indian towards his enfranchisement, which attitude shall be a factor in determining the question of fitness.

Certainly the board could not determine that question unless the Indian was before them; that is if it is going to do its duty, and I cannot conceive that they would do otherwise. May I again impress upon the committee this fact, that the member of the board who from my own personal knowledge will be very careful as to the recommendations will be the departmental representative. It is not necessary for me to go over the ground which has been so well covered by the Prime Minister so much better than I, but I did wish to answer those few objections.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Replying to the Prime Minister's answer to my argument, I think the Prime Minister has not given this section the thought he usually gives to a section of an act which he endeavours to interpret. There can be no question whatever that this section puts the Indian in an entirely different category from what he ever was in before. That is what it is intended for. Why? Because as matters stand at the present time there have been no applications by the band. That is the best evidence as to whether the members of the band themselves think some of their number should be enfranchised. Secondly, because the applications made by the Indians themselves for enfranchisement have been very, very few. Perhaps the minister has the number now. At all events they are very few, a very small proportion, less than one one-hundredth of one per cent possibly. That is the best evidence as to the attitude of the Indian himself. If the Prime Minister's argument means anything, it means that by this bill we are not violating the right which the Indian now has to say that he shall not be enfranchised against his wish. That is the point I was making. I say that under this amendment the Indian may be enfranchised against his wish. That is what the amendment is aimed at. If you intend to consult him about it he can be enfranchised already under the provisions to which the Prime Minister referred. The Prime Minister argued that under section 110, which reads:

Upon the application of an Indian of any band—

That is, upon his application, or upon the application of the band—

—on a vote of a majority of the male members of such band—

There are two ways in which he may now be enfranchised. Under the bill as originally drawn, those were both cut out; the whole section was repealed. The bill as originally drawn prompted the amendment which was moved with a view partially to meet the objections made by the hon. members on this side of the house. As originally drawn the bill repealed subsection 1 of section 110, that which was read by the Prime Minister, and the following was substituted therefor:

The superintendent general may appoint a board to consist of two officers of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised.

That was the change.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the hon. member reading from the original act?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; I have made it perfectly clear that I am reading the amendment. The bill as drawn provided, and the reason is very apparent, that because the Indians themselves did not make application to be enfranchised, or because the band did not make any, we must have some new system. The amendment provided for a board, as set out in the bill. It is true that a further amendment to section 110 has been moved, but that does not help the poor Indian who is being enfranchised against his will,—not one particle; it all amounts to the same thing.

An Indian who formerly could not be enfranchised without his consent or without the consent of the band to which he belonged can now, upon recommendation, be enfranchised by the board set up by the bill.

Some discussion has taken place as to what position the Indian would be in after enfranchisement. If the minister will look at subsection 9 of section 110 he will find exactly the position in which the Indian would be.

The superintendent general shall also pay to each Indian upon enfranchisement his or her share of the funds—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the position they are in to-day.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will say that is the position they would be in to-day if they were making application under subsection 1, which they are not doing, and which this amendment seeks to change. Subsection 9 reads:

The superintendent general shall also pay to each Indian upon enfranchisement his or her share of the funds to the credit of the band, including such amount as the superintendent general determines to be his or her share of the value of the common interest of the band in the lands of the reserve or reserves, or share of the principal of the annuities of the band capitalized at five per centum, out of such moneys as are provided by parliament for the purpose or which may be otherwise available for such purpose.

Where does that leave your Indian? It leaves him with the money in his pocket, money which he cannot keep in his pocket or anywhere else. It makes him—

Mr. BENNETT: He would be in the same position as he is to-day, if he were enfranchised.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But he is not being enfranchised to-day. Can the minister tell—

Mr. MALCOLM: He does not want it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is for the country's sake.

Mr. MURPHY: During the ten year period from December 31, 1922, to December 31, 1932, under sections 122a of the old act and 114 of the new, 793 Indians were enfranchised.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How many under section 110?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 110 is in the old act.

Mr. MURPHY: Under section 110 of the old act 61 Indians were enfranchised during the same period.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is that during a ten year period?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, under section 110.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Sixty-one Indians were enfranchised under one clause, and none under the other, in a ten year period.

Mr. McINTOSH: Not much urge there.

Mr. MURPHY: Altogether there were 793.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And that is the position they are in now. There are some pieces of legislation which look worse, the more you examine them. This is one of the worst examples. Under those two clauses in ten years only 61 Indians received enfranchisement, or an average of six and one-tenth Indians per year. That figure is from a total of about 100,000 Indians. Hon. members will note that enfranchisement which may take place would be against the wish of the Indians. That is the situation. The more we examine and discuss the legislation, the worse it appears. It is absolutely useless for the Prime Minister or anybody else to attempt to argue that the Indian will be in anything like the position he was in before. His rights are being taken away from him. He will have money paid to him, and there is no hon. member in this committee who is not familiar enough with the Indian mind to know that money just slips through his fingers as quickly as it does through the fingers of some white people. To put into his hands cash representing the lands he formerly owned and of which he could not deprive himself is, in my view, an abandonment of a duty which for generations the government of Canada has observed. Assuming he gets one, two, three, four or even five thousand dollars for his rights, you may depend he will be on the road inside of a year. That is what will happen to him. His land and his money will be gone.

Mr. BENNETT: The time to say that was before the law was changed to permit enfranchisement at all.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Anybody knows that. An argument such as the hon. member has made would be laughed at in any court of law.

Mr. MALCOLM: It would be impossible to add much to what has been said by the hon. member for West Middlesex, but after reading the amendment I feel exactly as I did when I rose to answer the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MALCOLM: Under the existing act the Indian must ask for enfranchisement. Under the amendment that privilege is left, but it is also the privilege of the superintendent general, if he wishes, to enfranchise Indians.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not; why say that, when you know it is not so?

Mr. MALCOLM: I have read the amendment.

Mr. MURPHY: The superintendent general may not do it.

Mr. MALCOLM: Then the amendment of the minister simply provides that section 110 shall be left, and states further that the superintendent general may appoint a board—

Mr. BENNETT: That is another matter.

Mr. MALCOLM: Such board will report on the fitness of any Indian. And it shall have the same force and effect, and shall be dealt with in the same manner as if it had been made upon the application of the Indian himself.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: If that does not provide that the same procedure shall follow the action of the superintendent general as follows the application of the Indian himself, then I am afraid someone else will have to interpret the language of the section.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what you said. Of course it does.

Mr. MALCOLM: I cannot argue anything else than that the change enfranchises the Indian through the superintendent general in the same way as he would have sought enfranchisement himself. I cannot add anything to what has been said by the hon. member for West Middlesex to clarify that point. I join with him however in protesting to the Minister of the Interior that so far as my experience in the province of Ontario has been, he would do well to accept the advice of the hon. member for West Middlesex.

Mr. BENNETT: Ten or twelve years ago was the time to give it.

Mr. MALCOLM: Probably so. I agree with the hon. member for Brant that the lands of these Indians so enfranchised will pass into the hands of white men who are not necessarily desirable on the reserve, and that the reserves will run down. I believe that some reserves in Ontario are improving greatly. The Indians have some splendid teachers, some splendid missionaries. The Cape Croker reserve I know sent practically every able-bodied man to the war. Those men are voting now. They are improving year by year under good guidance. I do not believe they are going to do as well if a number of whites are allowed to get possession of land now held by the Indians. For my part I agree with the hon. member for West Middlesex that the best evidence that the Indians do not want enfranchisement is the fact that they have not applied for it, and I think the minister will have to show us some other reasons why enfranchisement for which they do not ask should be forced upon them.

Mr. BROWN: It may be presumption for a layman to enter into discussion with lawyers on matters of this kind, but the way the matter appears to me is simply this. There are now two methods whereby an Indian may secure enfranchisement and this amendment proposes a third. If the amendment has any purpose whatever it must be that more Indians should be enfranchised. Evidently under the two methods now existent they are not being enfranchised in sufficient numbers and the object of the amendment is to increase the number. Whether deliberately or not, the Prime Minister only confuses the issue when he says that the results following enfranchisement by this new method will be just the same as those which follow to-day. Naturally they will, so why raise the point? The results will be the same no matter what method is employed. I say again that the purpose of this amendment is that more Indians should be enfranchised. Few are being enfranchised, on application by the individual himself, and none, I understand on application by the band. For some reason the department wants more Indians enfranchised so they propose this new method. I think the hon. member for West Middlesex and others have made it very clear that it is not desirable that any more Indians than at present should be placed in control of their property. That is how it appears to me, and the argument of the Prime Minister has absolutely failed to show me any reason why I should change my opinion.

Mr. McGIBBON: I rise for only one purpose, to express the wish of the Indian bands in my riding, of which there are two, that they should be enfranchised. I think there must be a great diversity of intelligence among the Indians in the ridings of different members, or there would not be such diversity of opinion on this question in this house. The Indians in my riding are quite intelligent people, I would say their intelligence is almost as high as that of the average white man. They have asked me time and again to try to get them enfranchised. I think they should be enfranchised wherever they are intelligent enough. I think when an Indian has reached the stage of education and intelligence at which he is qualified to shoulder the responsibilities of citizenship they should be given to him.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Would he tell the committee how many applications came during the last ten years from Indians in his riding who are anxious to be enfranchised? I understand there were just sixty-two in the whole of Canada, so I wondered how many came from that riding.

Mr. McGIBBON: I have not the figures, I know there have been a certain number. I tell the committee this, that my trouble has been to get them enfranchised. I have handled some applications myself, and have had to threaten the officials, not only of this government but other governments, that I would go over their heads to the minister to get them enfranchised, and I have done so. The present minister will bear me out in that statement. In my experience there seems to be a prejudice on the part of the officials against enfranchising these men. I think I told this committee on a former occasion of a man who came to me and protested that he could not get work on account of being a ward of the government. He had saved enough money to buy himself a large motor truck, and was as capable of earning a living as anyone else. Why shield these people after all? If they have the degree of intelligence and education to fit them for full citizenship why should they not have it?

Mr. POULIOT: They cannot wear their full regalia!

Mr. McGIBBON: That is the kind of answer I would expect from the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). Further, I would say that I think a great deal of the objection to this proposal comes from people who want to keep the privilege of being wards of the law. I think there is no doubt about that, they want to hide behind the law so they do not have to pay their debts. I say this parliament and this country have a duty to these people, and when they are ready for full citizenship but will not seek it we ought to make them take it. How are you going to develop responsible, self-respecting people unless you make them take the responsibilities of citizenship?

There are some things about the bill that I do not like or I am not clear about. I do not like the idea of allowing whites to mix with them and get their land, I think that is detrimental to the interests of this country, but I gather from the discussion that that is not a new thing. If it can be prevented I think it is desirable to do so, not only in the interests of the Indian but in the interest of that lower strata of white people who seem to want to mix with any inferior class. I would like to see that prevented if possible. But I would support the minister by telling him that the Indians in my riding have told me time and again that they want to be enfranchised and become full citizens of Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand 62 Indians were enfranchised by their own request?

Mr. MURPHY: There are different sections of the act which apply.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: I mean under section 110.

Mr. MURPHY: During the ten year period from December 31, 1922, to December 31, 1932, under section 122a of the old act and section 114 of the new, that is the act now before us, 793 Indians were enfranchised. Under section 107 of the old and section 110 of the new act 61 were enfranchised during the same period. I may say that practically all Indians that are enfranchised to-day are enfranchised under section 114 rather than section 110.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What amount did these various Indians receive out of the moneys of the band, under subsection 9 of section 110?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not that information at hand but doubtless I could get it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should be greatly obliged if the minister could give it because it has a very material bearing. We were wondering whether it would be one thousand, two thousand or five thousand that each would get, and I am advised that frequently it did not amount to even one thousand. When it is pointed out to the minister that this legislation is taking away the Indian's land and home and the protection afforded him, giving him one thousand dollars in cash, I think it will be apparent at once that the Indian will be on unemployment relief.

Mr. MARCIL: There are in my county two Indian bands and I have never yet known of any Indian who applied for enfranchisement and was refused. The Indians on the reserve enjoy certain rights with respect to their land and property and I remember one attempt that was made in 1917 to expropriate the lands of the old Indians in Restigouche opposite Campbellton and to settle them in the northern country, the purpose being to take those lands as an annex to Campbellton and to set up building lots. That was prevented by the parliament of Canada. The Indians have been left on their reserves for their own protection, and I can recall that when a law was passed to enfranchise the Indians it was immediately repealed. Some Indians are competent to vote, and those who served overseas vote to-day in my constituency as in other parts of the country. But so far as Bonaventure is concerned I think it would be a great misfortune to enfranchise these Indians, leaving them to roam about away from the reserves, taking the little money they might get and spending it. It would merely add to the ranks of the unemployed, which are already numerous enough. I think the law should stand as it is now.

Mr. McINTOSH: I asked a question with regard to the costumes of the Indians under the proposed legislation, and I wish the minister would be good enough to amplify his statement on that point.

Mr. MURPHY: That clause was considered by the committee and passed several weeks ago.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not asking what was passed; I am asking the minister for a definite statement on the situation.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not wish to be discourteous to the hon. member, but if he would frame his question differently I might possibly be able to give him the information. He spoke some minutes ago but I am not clear as to what information he does want.

Mr. McINTOSH: The proposed measure, I understand, will interfere with the right of the Indian to wear his Indian costume off the reserve. Does this legislation further prohibit him doing so? Does it interfere with that aboriginal right? If it does, it is absolutely wrong.

Mr. MURPHY: That question was thoroughly discussed in the house and if the hon. member was not present I can only regret the fact. But the section having been passed, I do not think we should be asked to rediscuss the matter now.

Mr. MARCIL: For some years I have been receiving an interesting illustrated catalogue advertising the so called stampede at Calgary. Would this legislation interfere with such an exhibition, where the Indians are allowed to roam in their Indian costumes?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is the question I have asked and which the minister refuses to answer. He says it has already been answered.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that the various suggestions that have been made might be embodied in an amendment as follows:

In respect of an Indian or Indians of any band who has not or have not made application for enfranchisement under this section or under section 114 of this act, the superintendent general may appoint a board to consist of any judge of any superior court or any judge of any circuit, district or county court, an officer of the department and a member of the band to be selected by the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs or belong, or failing the selection of such member for a period of thirty days after the date of notice having been given to the council, the member shall be appointed by the superintendent general—

That will be found in subsection 2 of section 110 now in respect of other questions of a similar character.

—to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised, and such report shall have the same force and effect and shall be dealt with in the same manner as if the same had been made upon the application of an Indian or Indians under this section: Provided that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty, agreement or undertaking that may have been entered into or made between or by the crown and the Indians of the band in question.

So far as the effect of this proposal is concerned, it merely recognizes the existing laws and protects the Indian against any possible undertaking that may have been given in any treaty or agreement, and the provision for selecting a member of the band is exactly what the law now is with respect to the case in which an Indian makes his own application, namely, subsection 2 of section 110. I move that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Is this amendment to replace the one before the committee?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Do I understand that the amendment we have been discussing is withdrawn?

Mr. BENNETT: With the consent of the chamber, yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would the minister consider adding to the amendment just offered something which I shall propose? I realize that a good deal of the time of the house is being taken up with this question, which to some hon. members may seem of no importance. I do not look upon it in that way at all; I think it is important, for it means everything to the people involved. With regard to the provision that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty, I want to point out the difficulty of applying this, assuming that a case arose, as it would. An Indian comes and says, "This is in violation of a treaty". Unfortunately these treaties were made long before Canada had a government of its own. They were made in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Some of the first treaties were entered into in the seventeenth century, long before the declaration of independence, and involved the Indians who were in what is now the United States as well as those then in what is now Canada, because it was then all British territory. It is very difficult to get hold of these old treaties. If I understood the minister correctly, he is unable to tell us at the present time, and I doubt whether any hon. member can tell us, what the treaty rights all are. I think there would be difficulty in establishing precisely what the treaty rights are under these old treaties of several hundred years ago. There is however one fact which he will not have much difficulty establishing and that is that for centuries under these treaties these rights have been recognized, including the right of protection given the ward of the government, not permitting him to alienate his property. I wonder if the Prime Minister and the minister would agree to the amendment reading like this:

No enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty, agreement or undertaking that may have been entered into or made between or by the crown and the Indians of the band in question, or against the will of the Indian whom it is proposed to enfranchise.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot make it negative.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Unless he is willing to consent, he should not be enfranchised.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member overlooks the fact that for fifteen years the law has contained provisions for the enfranchisement of Indians.

Mr. MALCOLM: Voluntary enfranchisement.

Mr. BENNETT: Not voluntary; by action of the band, if necessary. This committee will be made up of a member of the band, a representative of the superintendent general, and a judge of the superior or county courts. That is a precaution which does not exist with respect to the other two cases. Inasmuch as no such provision as that mentioned by the hon. member for West Middlesex has heretofore found its place in the law, the suggestion I have just made in the amendment with respect to treaties, agreements or undertakings made between or by the crown and the Indians would be ample to protect the interests of the Indian in the view of the judge who would have to be a member of the committee to determine the matter. The judge would be the impartial member, while there would be a member appointed by the government and one by the band. If the judge and the Indian say "no" there would be no doubt about the fact that there would be no enfranchisement. The answer to all the arguments which have been made this afternoon about the terrible white trash that is going to take away the people's land—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They cannot take the lands away from them.

Mr. BENNETT: —the terrible white trash that might settle upon them, is the fact that the Indian's anxiety to secure money or land has not been evidenced by a desire to secure enfranchisement. I think it may be taken that the exercise of this power, provided it is done with caution and care, will not act unfairly in the determination of the fitness for enfranchisement. The judge of the county or superior court will be the impartial member on the committee. I think the amendment as it now stands makes the four principles much more fair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The department has always to face the serious question as to whether or not certain individual Indians should be enfranchised. I found that there was opposition sometimes by the band itself against the desire of an individual Indian to be enfranchised. There was always difficulty in getting settlement with the band for his share of the fund and his interest in the lands. I think there must be the same difficulty in that regard as was stated by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, because when I had the honour to preside over the department I found that there was a desire to allow Indians to become enfranchised. The logical outcome of Indian life is his merging into the life of Canadian citizenship, but it should not be forgotten that we allow individuals to come to Canada from all over the world without forcing enfranchisement upon them.

Mr. MURPHY: They are not wards.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Up to date we have not done so.

Mr. BENNETT: We put prohibitions against them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The chairman of this board which is to pass upon the fitness of an Indian to be enfranchised may be a judge, but the whole say as to whether or not final action shall be taken will be in the hands of the superintendent general. Under the present act he cannot do that unless the Indian is willing or an application is made by the band. Hon. gentlemen opposite are proposing something different from that at present in the act. As to the lands or property owned by the band passing into the hands of white men, that cannot happen. The band takes good care of that. Before an individual becomes enfranchised they see that a settlement is made and an amount arrived at to represent his interest. That is given to him and the lands of the band are preserved. I do not think that principle should be interfered with. So far as the precautions set out in this subsection are concerned, they refer merely to the fitness of the individual Indian to be enfranchised. Whether or not he desires it, his case will be in the hands of the superintendent general. I doubt very much if this action will prove to be popular with the Indian. So far as securing votes are concerned, I think the superintendent general will be out of luck.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite so.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do not impute motives.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Personally I think the government are making a mistake. I regret the slowness with which enfranchisement takes place and I know the difficulties of Indians having property and being on the highways and all that; it is rather a difficult situation, but I doubt the advisability of leaving the final say in the hands of the superintendent general. There is always the possibility of a favourable report by the board despite the protests of the individual or possibly of the band itself. If this is the case, the Indian will not be a very happy individual, and I do not think the Indians as a whole will consider that their interests are being protected.

Mr. BENNETT: We will withdraw the original amendment which did not contain the necessary safeguard. Perhaps the chairman would read the last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The amendment reads:

That section 110 of the said act be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

14. In respect of an Indian or Indians of any band who has not or have not made application for enfranchisement under this section or under section 114 of this act, the superintendent general may appoint a board to consist of any judge of any superior court or any judge of any circuit, district or county court, an officer of the department and a member of the band to be selected by the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs or belong, or failing the selection of such member for a period of thirty days after the date of notice having been given to the council, the member shall be appointed by the superintendent general to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised, and such report shall have the same force and effect and shall be dealt with in the same manner as if the same had been made upon the application of an Indian or Indians under this section: Provided that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty, agreement or undertaking that may have been entered into or made between or by the crown and the Indians of the band in question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As the amendment is pretty long and was not read sufficiently audibly for me, at least, to hear it, and much less to understand it, perhaps I may be excused if I do not discuss it at all and make my remarks refer to other phases of the matter. I suppose that will be quite in order, otherwise, we shall have to hear the amendment read again first.

There is one point on which I find myself in agreement with the minister and that is that some of the Indians, not now enfranchised, should be. I refer to the sons and daughters of Indian returned men who, by reason of their war service, were made eligible to vote. The returned men vote, but their sons and daughters do not. That matter would, I think, properly come under the election act and not under this. But lest some of my Indian constituents may have heard of the threatening redistribution bill hanging over their representative's head, and think, because of that, I may have lost all interest in my constituency, I believe I should say what I am about to say now. I am in favour of the sons and daughters of returned men having the same rights as have their fathers. Fancy, at this time when we are all trying to renounce war and we hear of the Kellogg-Briand pact and so on, enfranchising someone because he killed, or tried to kill, some fellowman in war! The son comes of age, becomes eventually a father himself and finds that neither he nor his wife can vote. His father has killed a man possibly; he is entitled to vote and he goes to the polls. The son says to himself: I have not killed or been given the opportunity of killing in war a man so I have not the franchise; I cannot vote. Whom shall I kill? He will look around and his keen hunter's eyes may light upon the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Upon the member for the riding.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Nobody knows upon whose person the lynx-like eye of this Indian who cannot vote, may light. Whom shall he select to massacre?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member seems to indicate whom he will select.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have to take one of them and I have taken the one who seems to be the better prepared to pass away.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This matter is no joke, although we may for the moment make a joke about it. That is the actual condition on the reserve under the federal government. I have never discovered the solution to the knotty problem, but when one of these Indian boys came to my place and stayed there till twelve o'clock midnight explaining why his son should be enfranchised; that he was a good citizen; that he had taken up the peaceful occupation of pastoral as well as tillage farming and yet he could not vote, I had no answer and nobody has any answer to this complaint. If that situation could be corrected in the election act I would hold up both hands for it. I do not want to cause any more annoyance to the government than I can help; that is the spirit in which I make these comments. I know the Prime Minister does not care a snap of his finger about precedents; he is not governed by the hoary precedents of other countries, and he is right; in these days you have to break new ground. But I would like to know whether any other country under the sun ever forced its natives into enfranchisement. The whole history of native populations from time immemorial to the present day is that they have wanted the franchise before their mandatory government was ready to give it to them. This government is going to form the extraordinary precedent of compelling the natives of our country to become enfranchised with all that goes with that. The hon. member for West Edmonton pointed out that we do not do that to white people. So far as I know there are people who have lived from manhood up and died in Canada without taking out their naturalization papers. Why should we take, above all others, the sons and fathers of our own natives, and compel them to become enfranchised?—because that is what the government is doing, describe it how they like. It is putting into the hands of this board the power to enfranchise these people. What is the only argument that I have heard in favour of taking this extraordinary step? I am speaking earnestly and sincerely because I know the Indian population of my constituency; I have known many of them since childhood, since they were in the cradle, and have seen them grow up and become useful citizens, following mainly agriculture. The band in my constituency is an excellent one—I do not mean the Six Nations—it is a musical band; they are accomplished in much that we call the culture of the white people, and these Indians are superior to some whites. Why then should we treat them any differently from the way we are using white immigrants in the way of voluntary enfranchisement?

The argument was that they had become so qualified in certain of the professions, I think it was law and medicine; that they had become too keen competitors for their white brothers. If that is so, it is not a great tribute to the work of the Indian department during the past decade, that these people should have been taken from the primitive condition in which we found them, roaming over the prairies, and been placed in our schools, eventually in our universities, so that now they have become so accomplished that they make the white men scratch gravel to compete with them? If so, let us continue that course of education further before we compel them to become citizens. If the argument advanced by the government is valid, I have not heard of any cases. I do not know in my experience of a single Indian who has gone into any of the professions and embarrassed the white man by his competition. There may be such cases, but the general policy of the department has been rather the other way. Life on the farm seems to be natural to the normal outdoor life of the Indian and he was discouraged from going into the professions for that reason and also because, if he did so, he had to meet some white man's prejudice against an Indian. Consequently this helped to cripple his activities in his competition with the white man. But if he is such an outstanding Indian that he can overcome the prejudice that some people of other colours than his hold against him, this is a great tribute to him and surely because of his attainments in this respect he should not be penalized by being enfranchised against his will. I think the government is making a terrible mistake and being unfair to itself. There is only one explanation of its conduct; though I do not like to suggest motives, there is only one conclusion—

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member is coming to it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, and I am going to get there yet. The conclusion is that this government is going to follow the example of the government that preceded the election of 1896, that I remember so well, in the heinous enfranchising acts they had that enabled the returning officers and scrutineers to do everything almost but hang an elector. While we have got away from that by thirty or thirty-five years, my thoughts go back to that time and in the absence of any other objection or purpose I am driven to the conclusion that this government, by means of this law, will be enabled to go out before an election and convert Indians into voters wholesale. If not, let them put up some valid reason why they are passing this act. I have not heard any so far. I do not think you can quote a precedent on top of this earth where native people have been compelled to be enfranchised. I have had several conversations with the minister, some of them jocular and some serious, and he knows that I entertain this pretty well grounded suspicion, but if he insists upon putting this through I do not think we will waste an awful lot more time trying to prevent him. This is the fifth time this bill has been up before the committee. I spoke on three of the other occasions, and when this order was called this afternoon I went out. I had business of a most pressing nature with a party who wanted to see me, but when I came back into the chamber I found that we were at the exact section that we were discussing two months ago. It is true that there have been some changes. I have been moved for the reasons I have indicated to make these few observations, and when the time comes to amend the elections act I shall be delighted as I have already intimated, to support my hon. friend the minister or whoever has charge of it in giving the franchise to the sons and daughters of the returned men, even if they have not killed or tried to kill anybody in war.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I realize that the discussion has taken longer than I fancy most members of the committee anticipated. I have listened with a good deal of attention to what the Prime Minister said with regard to the amendment that he proposed. It does make a change in that the third member of the board shall be selected by the band, but it still leaves it in the position that that member is all right if the judge is with him, and he is all wrong if the judge and the other member of the board are against him. If he is seeking to protect the representatives of the band I wonder if the Prime Minister would not agree to putting in a provision that no resolution would carry unless it was supported by the vote of the representative of the band? But I do not suppose there is any use in advocating that. I want, however, to move an amendment that there shall be added to the section as proposed to be amended, the following words:

or against the will of the Indian whom it is proposed to enfranchise.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be out of order, Mr. Chairman. It would negative the proposal.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are amending subsection 110 by adding a subsection and what I have proposed is not a negative of anything in the proposed subsection. I wonder if the minister could now give us an idea of the amounts paid to the Indians.

Mr. MURPHY: I have not been able to obtain it up to the present.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will be given before the third reading of the bill?

Mr. MURPHY: I shall endeavour to get the information for the hon. member. I want to deal with one point which was raised by the hon. member for Melville with reference to the enfranchisement of the Indians on the eve of an election. He indicated, as he did on a former occasion, that there might be some ulterior motive in the mind of the minister or of the department in proposing this amendment; in this case I suppose it would be the minister. May I say that his position is very illogical because if the Indian is to be enfranchised against his will, as hon. members to your left, Mr. Chairman, suggest, certainly he will not vote for the government that puts such voting power in his hands. Secondly, it cannot be done in that manner because subsection 5 of section 110 already provides:

On the report of the superintendent general that any Indian, male or female, over the age of twenty-one years, is fit for enfranchisement, the governor in council may by order direct that such Indian shall be and become enfranchised at the expiration of two years from the date of such order or earlier if requested by such Indian.

And so forth. That disposes completely of the point raised by the hon. member for Melville, that some government might enfranchise a number of Indians on the eve of an election. It simply cannot be done.

Mr. MALCOLM: The section which the minister has just quoted has a very much fuller meaning than he has given to it. It says:

On the report of the superintendent general that any Indian, male or female, over the age of twenty-one years, is fit for enfranchisement, the governor in council may by order direct that such Indian shall be and become enfranchised at the expiration of two years from the date of such order or earlier if requested by such Indian.

Those last few words just knock out the two-years argument altogether. Enfranchisement may be granted at once if the Indian asks for it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The question is on the subamendment.

Mr. BENNETT: That cannot be in order, Mr. Chairman. You cannot move an amendment that is a negative to an existing proposal. By voting against it hon. members vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: How many people with both their lugs all right have heard that and understand what it is?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We heard it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right. I do not know if my hon. friend from Pictou heard it with his auricular appendage on, but I did not. If I was right on top of it I could not understand it. It is not fair to the committee. We do not know what they are agreeing to. Will someone interpret the amendment in language we can understand, not draftsman's language, but every day language?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Does the hon. member say he does not understand the subamendment moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let it go.

Mr. MALCOLM: I consider that the subamendment moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex simply repeats section 110 of the act. I am opposed to the amendment which was submitted by the minister on the ground that section 110 does provide for enfranchisement at the instance of the individual or of the band. The amendment moved by the minister simply provides that the superintendent general may initiate the inquiry to determine whether the Indian shall be enfranchised. I am opposed to the amendment on the ground that the Indians do not want enfranchisement as is evidenced by the fact that they have not applied for it under the original section as it now stands. I also submit that the minister misrepresented subsection 5 of section 110 when he pointed out to the hon. member for Melville that even if an Indian were enfranchised before the election he would have to wait for two years. Either deliberately or innocently the minister left out a few words in the subsection which point out that if the Indian so desires, such enfranchisement may take place at once. So the minister's answer to the hon. member for Melville is not an answer at all. I think the committee might just as well vote. We are opposed to the amendment as offered by the minister and we may as well record ourselves as being so opposed.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am glad I did not hear it.

Subamendment negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Bennett) agreed to, on division.

Section 7 as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

The house resumed from Friday, February 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 26, to amend the Exchequer Court Act—Mr. Guthrie.—Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur) in the chair.

Mr. DUPRE: This bill was discussed last on February 17. As pointed out at that time by my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), it is a well known principle of British law that moneys paid in settlement of a claim or of a litigated matter, when there has been no fraud or threat of any kind made, cannot be recovered. It is further a principle of British law, as my colleague pointed out, that money paid in mistake of law cannot be recovered. The Minister of Justice added that the object of the amendment is to declare that in Canada, in actions or proceedings taken before the exchequer court, the common principle of British law shall apply, and that the law in that respect shall be general throughout the length and breadth of Canada. The effect would be that in all matters coming within the jurisdiction of the exchequer court no party would be able to set up a claim to the effect that he should get his money back because he had paid it under a mistake of law.

Last February the hon. member for Montmagny and the ex-Minister of Justice expressed some doubts as to whether or not there would be some encroachment upon the rights of the province of Quebec. They expressed the opinion that Bill No. 26 relates to property and civil rights in the province of Quebec and for that reason might be ultra vires, in so far as it might come into conflict with property and civil rights of that province. On the other hand my colleague the Minister of Justice stated that in his opinion the amendment did not in any way come into conflict with the laws of the province of Quebec. There are provisions in the Quebec code through which moneys can be recovered when paid in mistake of law, and no one for a moment proposes to disturb that provision. But the exchequer court is a federal court having jurisdiction in all parts of Canada. The Minister of Justice added that it is not intended in any way to disturb the operation of the law of the province of Quebec, as it applies to residents of that province, or to any matter which arises in that province. However the discussion on the bill was adjourned in order to allow the hon. member for Quebec East to express his views. The committee would be pleased at this time to hear from him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am very happy indeed that the government agreed not to proceed with the bill upon the first occasion. At that time I had doubts which have since changed into a certainty. This bill would do indirectly what parliament cannot do directly. Its true title ought to be: An Act to Supersede the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec. I believe I will have no difficulty in demonstrating that assertion. As is shown in the explanatory note, section 18 of the Exchequer Court Act gives exclusive jurisdiction to the exchequer court in respect of any matter which might be the subject of a suit or action against the crown, and so on.

Section 5 of the Petition of Right Act, which is chapter 158 of the revised statutes of Canada, enacts that all petitions of right must come before the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. DUPRE: That is the procedure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. The Minister of Justice claimed that the bill would not take away any rights enjoyed by citizens of the province of Quebec. Well, it does not take the rights away; they will have the rights, just the same, but they will have no tribunal before which they may appear, because the exchequer court is the only one before which their rights could be presented. A petition of right must come before the exchequer court; by this bill the exchequer court will be deprived of jurisdiction in the matter of claiming amounts which have been paid to the crown in mistake of law. The purpose of the bill is pretty clearly stated, although it is not said that it is for the purpose of preventing the provisions of the civil code of the province of Quebec from operating. It is said in the explanatory note that the object of the bill is to effect uniformity of the law throughout Canada in regard to the recovery of any money paid to His Majesty voluntarily in mistake of law. My hon. friend has been honest and sincere; he says it is a principle of British law that there is no recovery of moneys that have been paid in mistake of law, and he wants this British principle to apply everywhere. Well, I know it is the law in all the provinces which are under the common law, but it is not the law in the province of Qeuebec.

Mr. DUPRE: You mean on account of articles 1047 and 1140?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of articles 1047 and 1140 of the civil code, which I am going to read:

If the person receiving be in good faith, he is not obliged to restore the profits of the thing received.

1140. Every payment presupposes a debt; what has been paid where there is no debt may be recovered.

There can be no recovery of what has been paid in voluntary discharge of a natural obligation.

I do not want to discuss the advantage or disadvantage of the law, whether the provisions of the civil code are better, more equitable, than those of the common law. I personally believe that when through a mistake in law a man has paid money which is not due there is much in favour of the law that says he has the right to claim it back. It is not the law elsewhere but it is in the province of Quebec. It is the French law; it is a matter of property and civil rights. A man in the province of Quebec who in mistake of law has paid an amount which he does not owe has a civil right to claim it back, and parliament cannot take that right away from him. Parliament cannot take it away from him directly, and parliament should not take it away from him indirectly by depriving him of the only tribunal before which he can lay his claim.

Section 94 of the British North America Act is very interesting in the discussion of this matter, because according to the explanatory note this bill is for the purpose of making the law uniform in all the provinces of Canada. Section 94, which deals with uniformity of laws, says:

Notwithstanding anything in this act, the parliament of Canada may make provision for the uniformity of all or any of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and of the procedure of all or any of the courts in those three provinces, and from and after the passing of any act in that behalf the power of the parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to any matter comprised in any such act shall, notwithstanding anything in this act, be unrestricted; but any act of the parliament of Canada making provision for such uniformity shall not have effect in any province unless and until it is adopted and enacted as law by the legislature thereof.

But this section does not apply to the province of Quebec. Parliament has the constitutional right to enact measures for the uniformity of laws in Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and certainly in the other provinces which have since entered the confederation, and are under the common law; but even then such measures enacted by this parliament would have to be ratified by the provinces concerned. The province of Quebec is excluded from the operation of this section.

Section 101 of the British North America Act gives to this parliament the right to create federal courts. This section does not give to parliament the right to change the laws; it gives it the right to apply the laws. I submit that parliament has not the right indirectly to use the Exchequer Court Act, which creates this federal tribunal, for the purpose of taking away a civil right from any citizen of any province, as would be done if this bill becomes law; because, although as I say the right would still exist under the civil code, there would be no tribunal before which claims could be made; for petitions of right cannot now be tried by the superior court of the province as they were before the Exchequer Court Act was enacted. There has been no change of the law, but there has been a change of the locus. It is the tribunal that has been changed. This amendment would, I submit, take away the jurisdiction in the province of Quebec in matters of recovery of money paid in mistake of law. While the claim under the law would still exist, there would be no court where it might be entertained. So as I said at the opening of my remarks, parliament would do indirectly what it cannot do directly, namely interfere with the law of the province of Quebec in matters pertaining to property and civil rights.

Now the civil law, "répétition de l'indu," recovery of moneys paid in mistake, applied as well against the crown as against ordinary persons. I do not believe anybody can contradict that, and it has been well recognized by the house.

Mr. DUPRE: That is the case of the Exchange Bank vs. the Queen?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, it was decided in that case, and in a case of rather recent date, Ross vs. the King, the supreme court was unanimous to the effect that as the duties were paid at the port of Montreal the case was to be determined by the laws of the province of Quebec. And quite recently in the case of the King vs. Cutting, 1932 S.C.R., 410, the petition of right was maintained for the recovery of $13,513 paid to the province of Quebec for succession duties in mistake of law.

Mr. HACKETT: That was against the crown in the right of the province; it was not disputed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But I believe the principle is the same. The crown in the right of the dominion is subject to the laws of the province of Quebec in matters pertaining to citizens of the province.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will conclude my remarks in a very few words. I have submitted and, I think, fairly shown that it is the right of a citizen of the province of Quebec who has paid money under a mistake of law to recover such money. This is a civil right which cannot be taken away by this parliament. Indeed, this bill shows that that is the opinion entertained even by its authors, because it is not being done in a direct way; they are not taking the right away from the citizen but the tribunal, the forum, the locus where he could state the claim to recover that money.

The other objectionable feature of the bill to which I direct attention is its retroactive aspect. The bill reads, "to entertain any action heretofore or hereafter commenced." As a matter of fact, there are actual petitions of right, or at least requests for petitions of right pending against the crown, and even in respect of which fiats have been granted. If this bill becomes law it will be confiscatory, and I think it would be equivalent to expropriation without compensation.

I wish to read to the committee a resolution unanimously adopted by the council of the bar of Montreal, protesting against the bill. I will read it in French, as it has been sent to me:

(Translation)

Whereas Bill No. 26: "to amend the Exchequer Court Act" constitutes an infringement on the civil laws of the province of Quebec, in that it tends to render inoperative the provisions of the Civil Code in respect to recovery of moneys paid in error.

Whereas this bill might affect cases that are pending and that in principle all legislation infringing on acquired rights is contrary to equity and public order;

Therefore, the Council of the Bar, Montreal section, deem it their duty to protest against said bill and respectfully pray the Hon. Hugh Guthrie, Minister of Justice, not to proceed further in this respect Unanimously.

I will read also a letter I have received from the assistant attorney general of the province of Quebec:

(Translation)

Quebec, February 24, 1933.

Hon. Ernest Lapointe, K.C., M.P.,
56 St. Peter Street,
Quebec.

Dear Sir,—

Your letter of February 20th instant, relating to the amendments of the Exchequer Court Act, and addressed to the Hon. Prime Minister, was handed to me in order that I might examine the question to which it gives rise.

We are of the opinion that this act, after the amendment proposed by Bill No. 26, inasmuch as it affects persons resident in the province of Quebec, would in this respect constitute an infringement on the legislative powers of the province of Quebec as provided by subsection 13 (Property and Civil Rights in the Province) of article 92 of the British North America Act, 1867.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
The Deputy Attorney-General.

Under the circumstances, I think the committee will see that it is no whim on my part but that the stand I am taking against this bill is supported and indeed set forth by the bar of Montreal and by the provincial authorities of Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: That there is an arguable question at issue in this case goes without saying. The civil law of the province of Quebec does provide that money paid under a mistake of law may be recovered equally as though it were paid under a mistake of fact. That is not the law in the other provinces, nor is it the law in England, although the Lord Chancellor, delivering judgment in a case in England, Cooper v. Phipps, many years ago said that under some circumstances a mistake of law might be a question of fact. However, that issue does not arise in this case.

That the civil rights of the citizens of Quebec are not to be in any sense restricted or taken away from them by legislation of this parliament is perfectly clear; they are guaranteed by the constitution and will be maintained by this parliament. As to that I think there is no question. The only issue is this. Is it competent for this parliament to enact legislation that will secure uniformity of treatment with respect to actions brought for recovery of money paid the crown under mistake of law? Undoubtedly the action could not be maintained in Ontario by an Ontario company, but the same company maintaining an office in Montreal and making payment there might, if the civil code is to be applied, recover the money.

Is that the general purpose of a federal court? I think not. I think the federal court idea, namely, the idea behind the exchequer court, was that all actions brought against the crown, of whatever character, should have general legal principles applied to them with respect to the statute of limitations and with respect to matters of that kind, unless there were a provision to the contrary in express terms. In this case the reason, for instance, that the retroactive feature is found in the act, is a simple one. The persons who are concerned have received the money; they have charged the money against their customers, and the subsequent decision of the courts would indicate that the principle on which the crown claimed from them was wrong. But they having claimed it from their customers and being unable to give it back, the individuals through whom it was recovered should not be able now to recover it and pocket that much more profit. That is a short way of putting it. If parliament adopted retroactive legislation under these circumstances, it would be pursuing the course pursued in Quebec itself with respect to election contests in provincial elections.

I have two suggestions to make to the hon. gentleman. I understand that the Minister of Justice and he discussed the matter, and I gather that he was of the opinion that it would not be proceeded with. If he was of that opinion we will respect his views in that regard. On the other hand, I suggest to him that this matter must ultimately be determined by the courts and we might enact this legislation, adding to it a section to provide that it should not come into force except on proclamation, with the understanding that in the meantime the statute would be referred to the supreme court for the purpose of having its validity determined. I leave either alternative to my hon. friend, but it does occur to me, in view of the questions that are at issue and must ultimately be settled—and the hon. gentleman has placed them before the committee in a most reasonable and fair way—that it might be desirable that we should pass the legislation, providing, as I have said, that it should not come into force except on proclamation and after it had been referred, under the provisions of the Supreme Court Act, to that court for determination. That I suggest would meet the situation. In view of the discussions which the hon. gentleman had with the Minister of Justice, however, I repeat, if that course does not commend itself to him we will discharge the order for the moment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am grateful to my right hon. friend for his suggestion, but I should prefer the first alternative, because I should not like to seem to agree to the principle underlying the bill, even if we have to submit it afterwards to the Supreme Court of Canada. I suggest to my right hon. friend that he let this bill sleep for another year. In the meantime he might confer with the provincial authorities and next year if the government think they should proceed with it, it could be again presented. In the meantime I think it would be better to let the bill stand.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does this bill apply to any province other than Quebec, and does it place any limitation upon the rights of the citizens in provinces other than Quebec to proceed before the exchequer court for the return of money paid in mistake of law?

Mr. DUPRE: I understand it applies to all provinces, but if we agree to the views expressed by the hon. member for Quebec East, it would apply only to the provinces other than Quebec. This would be so because of the civil rights guaranteed to the citizens of that province by the British North America Act.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I do not pretend to have anything but a very superficial knowledge of the situation, but as I understand it, the citizens of the province of Quebec have the constitutional right of proceeding against the crown for the recovery of money paid in mistake of law. Apparently this bill would nullify that constitutional right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As far as the provinces other than Quebec are concerned, the law will remain as it is.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is why I was wondering if this bill would limit the rights enjoyed at the present time by provinces other than Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They have no such right at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: The English law does not permit one who has paid any money under a mistaken idea as to what the law is to recover that money. Let us take the gallonage tax as an example. Suppose I pay money under this tax and it turns out subsequently that my appreciation of the law is erroneous. In the eight provinces other than Quebec that money could not be recovered by an action in the exchequer court. If I paid $10 when the correct computation was $4, that could be recovered because that payment was made in mistake of fact. I am giving a simple illustration without going into technicalities, and I think the distinction between a mistake of fact and a mistake of law is illustrated by what I have just said.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

In the province of Quebec, under the civil law, the question of the recovery of money paid in mistake of law is in exactly the same position as though it were paid in mistake of fact. In either case the litigant can bring his action. As the former Minister of Justice has pointed out, the effect of this legislation would be that no money could be recovered in any part of Canada, if paid in mistake of law. There would be a universal rule applied to all provinces. The question as to whether this is a matter dealing with substantive law under the authority given by the British North America Act to set up a federal exchequer court or a matter dealing with property and civil rights and remedies that are appropriate for the purpose of enforcing claims in connection with property and civil rights is disputable and arguable. I think that these matters could be settled by the courts in the manner I have indicated but I appreciate the point raised by the former Minister of Justice. If he has relied upon the conversations he had with the Minister of Justice to the effect that the issue was of such a doubtful character, this matter had better stand for further consideration. The Solicitor General will not press the bill for the Minister of Justice in his absence, and he can move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: As I understand it, at the present time the exchequer court has the right to hear such cases only when they come from Quebec?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that the committee rise.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, February 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 30, to amend the Customs Act—Mr. Ryckman—Mr. Stirling in the chair.

On section 2—Special permission for lightening vessels and unlading goods.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like to reiterate the objection I made against this section when the bill was last before the committee. I do not think there should be an exception made for the lightening and unloading of vessels on Sundays. The explanatory note reads:

By permitting lightening and unloading on holidays and Sundays and after and before hours, heavy demurrage loss, amounting in many cases to $2,500 per day, can be avoided.

This explanation does not seem to justify the change being made in the laws of the country. I think this amendment comes in conflict with the Lord's day act, and I urge the minister to withdraw this particular part of the bill.

Mr. RYCKMAN: In view of the very pleasant way in which my hon. friend puts his request, I find it difficult not to accede. I should like to tell the committee how it came about that this proposed amendment was inserted. I am told that there are instances where a loss of $4,000 per day has been incurred which could have been saved merely by attaching a coupling to a ship which was ready to unload. I am told that the Sabbath was made for man and I believe that if such a situation were a personal one to any hon. member of the committee he would be against incurring a loss of $4,000 when it could be saved by attaching a coupling to a pipe line. I can understand this still less when I recall—I am sure the former Minister of Justice will forgive my saying this—that down in his very city on a Sunday afternoon you will find a gang of twenty hired ball players occupying the whole block; that is all right, but silently to attach a coupling to a ship—it cannot be done. Having said this much, I would just like to say, if it is a matter of principle with the hon. member and with anyone else in the house, and if they understood the situation as I have tried to put it in but a few words, that this money will be lost, that a distinguished counsel of Toronto came to Ottawa to see me and said: You do not know what this means in cost to us which is passed on to the consumer, because we have to take care of it. Having stated the facts shortly, I am agreeable to amending the bill.

By the way, let me say that the Lord's Day Act, chapter 123 of the revised statutes of Canada, takes care of this whole matter in railway transportation. If it were the unloading of a train, there would be no trouble; there would be no application to Ottawa for what is sought in this amending bill, but the reason for it is that the unloading of ships has not advanced as fast as train dispatching or unloading. Again I put it to anyone who is really troubled about this: I have personal knowledge of the facts as I have tried to relate them, but I am quite willing to amend the bill so that section 2 will read as follows:

2. Subsection 2 of section 8 of the said act, is amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided that the collector or other proper officer at the port at which entry of the goods is to be made may give permission in writing for the lightening of a vessel and unlading of goods,—

(a) on a statutory holiday other than a Sunday;

(b) after sunset and before sunrise;

(c) at a place other than a port;

but such unlading shall be done only in the presence of an officer detailed for such service and under such conditions and upon such terms as the minister may authorize or prescribe.

If that is acceptable, I will ask the Solicitor General to move it.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to me, in any event, the committee might amend it in this way, that if the vessel is unloaded on a Sunday, no action shall be instituted except by the attorney general of a province and no attorney of a province is apt to do so under the circumstances.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is already provided under the Lord's Day Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Prohibited or smuggled or unmanifested goods found in any vessel.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to point out what this section really means. The ostensible purpose of the amendment is to make the master liable to a penalty not exceeding $200 in one case and not exceeding $1,000 in another. That may or may not be justified in order to give the master a very particular interest in checking smuggling on his boat. But what I wish to draw attention to is the unjust provision in the part that is not being amended. The part that was there before states that if any prohibited or smuggled goods, or goods not in the manifest, are discovered on board the vessel, the whole boat with its sails, rigging, tackle, is liable to be seized and forfeited, with apparently no trial at all. Perhaps people think in terms of a little gas boat smuggling something, but supposing this were a big liner worth $300,000 or perhaps $400,000, and one of the crew smuggled some dope, and you can smuggle enough dope in the heel of your boot to give you a living for a year; or suppose a packet of cigarettes or a prohibited magazine were smuggled. In such a trivial case as that, in the discretion of the customs official the whole boat may be seized and forfeited. I do not think that is reasonable. We insert these provisions rather glibly or casually, more or less on the understanding that they will not be enforced, and certainly they should not be, but why put them in? Is such a proceeding fair and just, supposing a member of the crew has committed a petty infraction of the law? Let us suppose these boats carry Chinamen; in every trip of a boat there are new placed devised to smuggle dope which goes into small bulk; you can put enough heroin into a fountain pen to make it profitable, and because one of the crew does such a thing, the whole boat may be seized and forfeited What would the Canadian Pacific ocean services say if one of the Empress boats were seized and forfeited for such a reason?—and so far as I can see this can be done without even summary conviction. I would like the minister, if he can, to explain such an extraordinary provision.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would just like to say to the committee that this clause is in the spirit of the Customs Act. If my hon. friend will permit me, I hardly think he was fair in limiting the charge to the master of the vessel. What appears is that:

> The master or person in charge of such vessel and any other person concerned in such breach or violation, shall be liable—

And so forth. In the case of a Canadian Pacific liner or any other craft, however large or small it may be, the person liable would be the one who was responsible. As my hon. friend knows, if a vehicle or a vessel, because vehicles and vessels of all kinds are covered in the Customs Act, is found carrying what I will call contraband of the act, it is forfeited, but what always happens is this, that the customs official ascertains who is to blame; the one who is to blame is proceeded against and the vehicle or the vessel is released. This penalty clause which appears in section 4 appears in six other sections of the Customs Act. I may tell the hon. gentleman I know of no case in which one who has been innocent has been saddled with the loss of his conveyance, be it vessel or vehicle, and I would not expect, if a clause such as this were put into the act, there would be taken by the Department of National Revenue any action which would be unfair to a man who was not guilty.

Mr. NEILL: The argument in reply to my remarks was exactly as one would anticipate: First, that it was in the act before. I anticipated that and said that that did not make it any better. Secondly, the minister says that it occurs in six other sections. That certainly does not make it any better. If I had murdered a man, it would not be my defence that I had murdered six other men. Next the minister goes to the very opposite extreme and says that this is never used. That is what I was contending; if it is never used, why put it in? And if it should not be put in, why not eliminate it? Finally, the minister says that the procedure will be that they will seize the boat and ascertain the guilty party and release the ship. It is nothing to me whether they seize a Canadian Pacific boat or not; but would the minister tell me, and I ask in all seriousness, having once legally seized and forfeited the boat, apparently without trial, where he gets power to release it? He has no such power. He is going to seize the boat under this desperately arbitrary power, which he says is never enforced; but where does he get authority, once the boat is seized, to give it back?

Mr. BENNETT: The governor in council may do that. The first case of this kind that I recall was when, as a youth, I stepped into the court house in the little village in which I was born. A member of a crew had landed from a ship some goods which technically constituted smuggling. A collector of customs had seized the vessel and an action had been brought against the collector of customs. I well recall the counsel in that case, afterwards Mr. Justice Hannington. The plaintiff was non-suited, for the first time in his life, he said. This legislation is intended to operate as a deterrent and to prevent looseness in connection with the inspection of crews' quarters by the master and officers of the ship, so that narcotics will not be stored and taken ashore, as they might easily be if the severity of the penalty did not in itself ensure the strictest supervision by those chargeable with the responsibility.

Mr. NEILL: Would not personal liability to a fine of $1,000 be sufficient?

Mr. BENNETT: No, the master is responsible for his ship. A provision of that character has long been in the British law, not that that makes it good, but it has been found that a deterrent of this character is the only deterrent that will ensure the master and officers of the ship searching and inspecting and taking every step to guarantee against the use of the vessel to which a member of the crew is articled for the purpose of promoting an illegal practice, the landing of goods that constitute smuggling. In practice it has been found a salutary deterrent, and in my judgment it should be extended.

Mr. NEILL: While this is a severe punishment for the guilty party, would it not also be severe for the innocent owners of the vessel?

Mr. BENNETT: There has never been any complaint. If the innocence of the owners is established an order in council is always issued releasing the ship.

Mr. YOUNG: It seems to me that this section would apply not only to the crew but to the passengers on the vessel who were found with contraband, and the vessel would then be subject to seizure whatever might be the intent of the act. In the administration it works out something like this. I have had no experience with vessels other than prairie schooners, but when anybody in an automobile is found with contraband the car is seized and remains under seizure until the case is settled, generally several months after. If you seize a ship and hold it for several months before releasing it, that would entail a tremendous loss to the owners. No matter what may be the intent of the act some customs officers are very strict and live up to the letter of the law, conceiving it to be their duty to find every possible means of getting convictions. They always take advantage of a strict interpretation of the act to make a seizure wherever possible, and in this case hardships would be worked. I do not give all customs officers throughout the country credit for having more than average intelligence, but it is a fact that some of them seem intent on getting convictions, just like some policemen, and very frequently cars and boats will be seized which in the end have to be released, but in the meantime very great inconvenience is caused to the owners.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I had a case brought to my attention recently, which I turned over to the department. A man, was coming back across the boundary with his wife who had received some presents to the amount of less than five dollars in one of the American cities. They passed the customs officer but were detained by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. The car was searched and seized. Before it was released they had to pay $18.60, which they have never recovered. That seems to me to be carrying things entirely too far.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This relates only to carriage by sea.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite appreciate that fact, but I am pointing out that the same hardship applies in the seizure of automobiles, only to a greater extent. They are not likely to seize a large vessel because one of the crew is found trying to smuggle, but a car is often seized and is tied up at once. I think the penalty is too severe for the small amount involved in such cases, and I think the penalty in this case is also too severe.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that the captain be sentenced to death. That would be a still greater deterrent. He could afterwards be revived and released.

Mr. YOUNG: What about the shareholders?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 45, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act—Mr. Gordon—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1—Certain interest charges remitted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When the resolution which preceded this bill was before the house I inquired of the Minister of Labour whether or not he had given consideration to the possibility of closing up the soldier settlement board and turning the land over to the settlers. I asked him at that time for information covering the total costs of revaluation of land, revaluation of equipment and other losses entailed by the board, together with the total expenses of the board since the scheme was inaugurated. Has he that information now?

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, I have the information for which the hon. member asked. I had prepared a statement giving the information in detail, and when the deputy in charge of this matter is on the floor of the house I shall provide the hon. member with that information. Meantime I should like to draw the attention of the committee to figures for which a request was made when the bill was before the committee on May 4. A number of hon. members asked me concerning receipts and expenditures with respect to various provinces. The answers given then were from such material as I had before me. The information I gave however was by no means complete, and I am sure did not convey the full information desired. For that reason I had three short statements prepared showing administration costs in each province prior to the reorganization of the department in 1930, and figures showing the present decrease in costs both in dollars and in percentages. The tables show, further, the decrease in dollars and in percentages of what are known as controllable expenditures. As a matter of fact these controllable expenditures embrace practically the total expenditures, because in a measure all expenditures are controllable.

The second statement gives details of administration costs in each province, and a break-up of the first statement, showing salaries, travelling expenses, motor cars and sundry expenses. A further short statement gives collection returns by provinces during the last fiscal year 1932-33. If hon. members will bear with me I shall read the statements into the record so that there will be no misunderstanding of the figures I gave on the previous occasion.

The following is a statement showing the administration costs:

Indian soldier settlement.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is this for the land settlement scheme, or just the soldiers?

Mr. GORDON: This covers all the settlers, I believe.

Mr. McINTOSH: Up to what date in 1933?

Mr. GORDON: The figures are for the fiscal year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the minister if he has the receipts for 1929-30?

Mr. GORDON: I have not them before me but I could supply them. Hon. members will see that after the reorganization of the department a general reduction in administrative expense has been accomplished of 41 per cent.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister give a statement of the relation in percentages of revenue and expense? That is very significant.

Mr. GORDON: I have the receipts for 1932-33:

Soldier Settlement of Canada
Receipts 1932-1933

District—	Total
British Columbia	$ 234,469 35
Edmonton	216,400 97
Calgary	169,407 71
Total Alberta	$ 385,808 68
Saskatchewan	$ 317,957 94
Manitoba	122,151 61
Toronto	148,642 36
Quebec	37,180 84
Maritimes	86,257 78
Indian settlement	8,374 69
Total	$1,340,843 25

Mr. NEILL: Could we have the receipts for 1929-30 and the percentages?

Mr. GORDON: I have not those.

Mr. NEILL: The picture is not complete without that. There is a very substantial and commendable reduction in expense but the real test is what percentage of the money collected went in expenses.

Mr. DONNELLY: I would like to ask in regard to Saskatchewan how much of the land that was bought by the soldiers has been taken back and sold to other settlers; and what proportion of these receipts was from the soldiers and how much from this other land that was taken back and sold.

Mr. GORDON: I do not know that I can cover all the information the hon. member asks for. The number of soldiers established was 24,715. I cannot supply the actual acreage. The number now on the land is 19,241. I believe when the resolution was before the house a question was asked as to loans repaid in full. I might give that information now. The number of loans that have been repaid in full in cash is 2,390, and the number taken over by resale, 2,568, making a total of 4,958.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the total number of soldiers who have been put on the land?

Mr. GORDON: 24,715.

Mr. REID: Has the minister the number for British Columbia?

Mr. GORDON: 2,251.

Mr. McINTOSH: What is the number for Saskatchewan?

Mr. GORDON: I have to correct the figure I have given for British Columbia; the number there is 3,515.

Mr. NEILL: Now on the land?

Mr. GORDON: That is the original number.

Mr. NEILL: How many are on the land at the present time in British Columbia?

Mr. GORDON: 2,643.

Mr. McINTOSH: What is the number on the land at present in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GORDON: 5,036.

Mr. REID: The minister gave 3,515 for British Columbia. Is that the original number?

Mr. GORDON: The original.

Mr. REID: When this bill first came up I intended to make a few remarks regarding the situation in British Columbia, but not wishing to delay the bill then I thought I would reserve what I had to say until the matter was in committee. The bill, while it is very desirable and is a good measure as far as it goes, is based I think on the problem as it affects the soldier settlers on the prairies. I am not sure whether the minister has obtained any information from British Columbia with regard to conditions there, but the information that has been supplied me would seem to indicate that the rulings and the bill itself are based on the problem as it affects the soldier settlers on the prairies.

I wish now to direct the attention of the minister to the condition of the settlers in British Columbia. I have here a brief issued by the soldier settlers' organization in British Columbia, and while I do not intend to read it all, there are one or two salient points which I think should be submitted to the minister. I quote:

For years we have urged that provision be made for settlers' heirs; the reply has been that the board always permits a settler's widow or other next of kin to carry on. In many cases children are not old enough to operate the farm, and where they are old enough they are also old enough to recognize the futility of attempting to carry on. Few of the younger generation will attempt what their parents did. There are very few instances where a sale has been made to return anything to the heirs. Revaluation and thirty per cent reduction made the possibility of an advantageous sale more likely. Now for the past two years during which, owing to conditions, the settler has been unable to make payments, the debts are with accrued interest charges practically as high as they ever were. This together with the fact that all values are greatly reduced below what they were two and three years ago, makes it out of the question to hope for a sale which will bring even the amount of the debt.

When I left British Columbia they were urging then to have the matter looked into, and in this document they maintain that the time is more than ripe for review. Since the bill has been on the order paper communications have reached me from some of the organizations in British Columbia to the effect that while the bill might offer an inducement with respect to payments, this does not nor can it at the moment help the soldier settlers in the Fraser valley. They point out that even if the inducement were five dollars for every dollar paid, they would be unable to obtain any benefit for the simple reason that they have not the dollar to pay. They continue:

We still maintain that the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company gave its purchasers interest exemptions warrants the government giving consideration to the request of the soldier settler. The government is not a commercial organization having to show profits to its shareholders; in fact the policy is apparently to show deficits, and there would be much less criticism of a deficit caused through something which benefited this class of Canadian citizen. The people of Canada with knowledge of the extravagant buying of land by the government, saw the need for concessions to the soldier settlers. The Canadian Pacific Railway could and did sell its lands at much lower prices. The amounts involved in British Columbia land purchases are much higher than in the Canadian Pacific Railway prairie lands.

We acknowledge that the board has carried out its undertaking not to press for payments—

This is something commendable at the moment.

—and all settlers appreciate this, and have continued to pay to the best of their ability directly and also through assignments still in force; but we cannot agree that the question should be left in abeyance until conditions stabilize.

[Mr. Reid.]

Prices to the farmer for beef, mutton, pork, poultry, eggs, milk, fruit, roots and grain are down to the lowest level ever known in British Columbia, and have been at this level so long that one is inclined to the belief that conditions are stabilized.

They offer some comments regarding conditions in the prairies, pointing out that the present bill is based on prairie conditions rather than on conditions in British Columbia.

The general situation with respect to the soldier settler has always been judged by conditions existing in Alberta and Saskatchewan, and whatever opinion is expressed from these provinces, particularly Saskatchewan, is apparently accepted as criterion for all. Why can't our headquarters acknowledge what it well knows to be the vast difference, and not remain always bound by the opinions of Saskatchewan?

Weather conditions have very little to do with success or failure on the farm in British Columbia, whereas in Saskatchewan it has practically all to do with it. We are very glad to know that in general the crop has been good in Saskatchewan.

Had conditions in Saskatchewan been as they were in 1931, some general readjustment of agricultural credits would have been necessary to enable our farming population to carry on, and the soldier settler will have to ask for whatever general measure of relief is necessary. With a good crop in Saskatchewan this general readjustment of agricultural credits may not be necessary for Saskatchewan, and British Columbia can again fight a lone hand.

I will not read the whole of this brief because it is rather long. I am picking out the salient points. Many of these men say in all sincerity that they have rued the day they took up land in British Columbia. That statement has been made wherever I go and at every meeting that I have attended. Many claim they were induced, even against their better judgment, to take up land. Rosy pictures were painted and the government of the day regarded it as their duty to reestablish hundreds of these men on the land immediately after demobilization.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Surely my hon. friend does not think that British Columbia is an exception in that regard.

Mr. REID: I am sorry to say it is not an exception. It is stated that pictures, books and pamphlets were distributed in the camps overseas and these men were even asked where they would like to locate to take up this choice land. They were told they would become independent and the most glowing future was held out to them. They were almost compelled to take up this land. They claim the scheme was actually forced upon them. I know from personal contact with some of these settlers in British Columbia that many of them even assigned or commuted their pension as payment. However, in many cases dire necessity has forced them into a terrible position. I maintain these men cannot take advantage of the inducements offered by this bill. It is stated that one dollar will be given by the government for every dollar paid by the settler, but these men have no money with which to make payments. They now think it strange that the unemployed should be given $600 without any arrangements being made for repayment. This is being done in the various provinces as a relief measure. Many of these soldier and civilian settlers would be glad to leave the land if they only knew where to go, and they would not ask for any $600.

Many of these settlers are under a greater debt to-day than they were when they took up the land originally. This is a rather serious matter. In some cases they have sold their farm in the hope that they could obtain some recompense, but the purchasers have in many cases quit-claimed the land and so it has come back upon the original settler. The soldier settlers in British Columbia ask that all interest payments be waived for a few years. If they had any money at all they could obtain advantage under the provisions of this bill, but they have not nor have they hope of getting any. Interest charges are piling up and will pile up, and these men are asking that these interest charges be not held against them or the property. The conditions in British Columbia are entirely different from those that prevail on the prairie. I know that many of the settlers in my constituency are in a very serious plight. In many instances they assigned their cream cheques but they have been compelled to ask them back in order to live as the merchants in some instances have refused to grant them further credit. This plea is not put forward by the soldier settlers alone; it is wholeheartedly supported by all citizens. I am going to ask the minister seriously to consider this matter and see if something cannot be done to provide for the waiving of interest charges for a few years, if not for all time. I ask him also to consider the fact that in many cases the load of debt to-day is much heavier than when the original purchase was made. Could the minister tell me how many civilians have purchased land in British Columbia under the soldier settlement scheme, what amounts they have paid and what amounts are outstanding?

Mr. GORDON: In British Columbia there are 1,511 soldier settlers as defined by the act, 902 civilian settlers and 230 settlers under the British family scheme. This makes a total of 2,643 settlers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has the minister the information he promised me a short time ago?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. I will send it across to my hon. friend.

Mr. DONNELLY: How many farm supervisors are there in Saskatchewan under this scheme and what are their duties at the present time?

Mr. GORDON: There are 23 supervisors and 3 chief field supervisors. Their duty is to collect the instalments as they fall due, to keep in touch with the settlers to see that they are not proceeded against when they are trying to get along, and when their account falls due to see that they are treated with fairness having regard to their ability to pay. At the present time these men are engaged in general land settlement work under the relief legislation. They are working in conjunction with the officials of the department.

Mr. DONNELLY: As I understand it, these men were hired originally to teach the settlers how to farm. They have been employed for sixteen or seventeen years and surely the settlers should know how to farm by now. I imagine that the necessity for this sort of work has ceased and I cannot understand why such a large body of men is required just to collect the money due. It seems to me that a much smaller number could handle this work.

Mr. GORDON: A very considerable reduction has been made in the staff in Saskatchewan. I am not well enough acquainted with the details of their duties, but they have other duties to perform besides the collection of money. They were able to sell or lease to others some 800 farms during the last fiscal year. The crown has a very large interest in these lands and it is desirable that they be protected as much as possible.

Mr DONNELLY: Some time ago I asked the minister what proportion of the $201,000 collected last year was collected from soldiers and what proportion from the settlers on land which had been taken back and resold.

Mr. GORDON: I regret I have not the figures broken up to that extent, to give the information requested.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister be kind enough to bring down, say to-morrow on the orders of the day, a statement giving just two sets of figures, first, the total revenue and, second, the total expenditure for the fiscal year 1929-30?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I just want on behalf of the settlers in my district to put on record a little matter so as to prevent misunderstanding. When the resolution on which this bill is founded, was in committee, the minister referred to a Mr. Price who, he said, was president of the Soldier Settlers' Union, and he quoted a letter Mr. Price had written on February 14. I am not quite clear that the gentleman who, I understand from those who know him, is a man of high character, is really president of a general soldier settlers' union, or rather just of the local union where he lives; at least I have before me no record, certainly not as regards British Columbia, of there being any conference of locals appointing such officers, but there may have been some more or less local arrangement. I mean no deprecation of him in that connection, but it somewhat weakens the strength of his presentation.

What I was going to say was this: The minister quoted a letter from Mr. Price in which the latter indicated that he would practically guarantee that the soldier settlers would keep quiet for the next five years and have no criticism to make of this policy as now brought down, if the minister put it through. There is, as I say, some misunderstanding about that, because that was on February 14, and on March 16 Mr. Price was writing—I think it is as president himself—signing himself as such, to the local in my district and taking a wholly different attitude. Instead of saying that he was satisfied with the proposed legislation such as we have it now before us, he said:

> Our main objective is to secure legislation that will obtain for us a much more equitable arrangement than we are at present working under. This would, of course, include the total abolition of interest.

Further on he said:

> We also made it quite clear—

Presumably that was the conference with the minister's officials.

> —that any scheme for final adjustment that did not include a total abolition of interest, would not be acceptable to us.

That does not exactly jibe with the statement he made in the letter quoted by the minister. I presume the explanation is that the letter quoted by the minister was dealing with the temporary matter of relief, whereas this gentleman was writing to this local saying that the ultimate policy of all the unions was the total abolition of interest. I want to have it clearly understood, at least so far as the men I represent are concerned, that they are not satisfied; while they may be grateful for this temporary measure of relief, they believe it is not of a permanent character. When one is dealing with a matter like this it is not a very good thing to give merely a temporary measure of relief; it would be better to take a long view and give them something that not only would afford them hope to continue making payments, such as they may be on a reduced scale, but also allow the minister to deal with the matter finally, so that these men would know, so to speak, where they stood. There is no doubt that is their view, because I quote just a couple of lines from the local union:

> The proposed act is only a form of temporary relief, which in our opinion is not the wish of the majority and which we consider will only temporarily relieve matters. In the meantime the settler has no more incentive to remain on the land than before, as private debts being unavoidably contracted now will hang over his head for years, and, providing a more permanent form of relief is not provided, we are afraid many will be forced to abandon their holdings and go on relief.

Let me say there, that is what I was speaking about a moment ago, that fear or discouragement might lead them to go off the land, whereas if they knew now they would get this further rebate, they might be encouraged to struggle along. Perhaps in five years the minister will give this relief to those who are left, but in the meantime many may become discouraged and go off the land. This man points out that he believes that is the view in the northwest also. He says also:

> There is no doubt in our minds if the interest is cancelled, a large number of appointments of board officials could be cancelled with it.

That is, the overhead can be reduced. The point of view of the settlers and my point of view from my knowledge of them is that the interest should be wiped out from now on, because the government will not get it in any case, and if the government tell them now that it will be rebated, they will be encouraged to continue, whereas while it is hanging over their heads it will be a matter of discouragement; a number will go off the land and it will only be a residue who will get relief along the line suggested. Would it not be better to say now that a permanent settlement of the situation will be made? The government from time to time have been liberal; they have made a revaluation rebate on their land and 40 per cent rebate upon their stock and so on. They have not been ungenerous; I am not charging the government with not being generous; I am dealing with the situation as it is and will be. It is sometimes the part of a wise creditor to wipe out the bigger portion of his debt and thereby be sure of getting a part of it, rather than to try to force his debtors to pay, saying: You must pay, and in the end getting nothing. That, at least, is the view of the settlers, and unless prospects change most remarkably in the next three or four years there will be no hope of the government getting this interest in any case. It would be the part of wisdom to make now whatever pronouncement they think and believe they will make ultimately. That is the view of the men I represent.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the section carry?

Mr. NEILL: I just want to explain that we are not passing the section. It was agreed when someone was in the chair before you, Mr. Chairman, we were not going to pass the bill which consists of one section; we were going to deal only with the individual subsections, and we are now dealing with subsection 72.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much is owing in Saskatchewan for equipment and how much is owing on land?

Mr. GORDON: I am sorry I have not the figures broken up in that way.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister give the total amount outstanding at the present time on all accounts?

Mr. GORDON: The amount is $63,753,868.07.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has the minister those figures broken up into so much for equipment and so much for land?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask the minister whether subsections 72 and 73 apply to both soldier and civilian contracts? I understand they do. Am I correct?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: If I am correct, then in 1930 certain adjustments were made in regard to the soldier contracts. I understand from a letter that I have under my hand from Leask, Saskatchewan, that since the soldier settlers in 1930 had their contracts adjusted to current prices, no adjustments have been made in regard to civil contracts, and that in the vicinity of Leask to-day the Indian department and soldier settlement board are offering land for $20 an acre, while many civilian contracts were entered into at $30 an acre. What I want to ask the minister is this: These civilian contracts apparently cannot be adjusted; when a settler who has a civil contract wants his land adjusted as the soldier settlement land was in 1930, he is told that the law is so and so and there is no power to make an adjustment. Could an inspector not revalue that land, and if that revaluation is sanctioned by head office or by the minister and his department, could there not be an adjustment made in those civil contracts where the men are heavily indebted? Could there not be certain readjustments made, especially in cases where the revaluation would be greater than the debt?

Mr. GORDON: Answering first the question of the hon. member for Willow Bunch, I find that in 1922 the statute consolidated the debt as between land, implements and so forth, and from that time on the debt has been carried as a single loan.

With reference to the point raised by the hon. member for North Battleford, the subject matter referred to in section 70 of the legislation in the early spring session of 1930; I was not in the house at that time. There was no provision that would cover the cases to which reference had been made. There is no power either in the director or in the minister to make the adjustment to which the hon. member refers. I have been told, and I believe it to be the fact, that in many instances the civilian purchaser was in a much more favoured position than the soldier purchaser, that he bought at current prices on competitive tenders, and took his chances, as it were, of getting value for his money when he purchased his farm. At any rate, the legislation of that year made no provision for the same sort of adjustment with respect to the civilian purchaser that it made with respect to the soldier.

With regard to what the hon. member for New Westminster said, comparing the treatment between the soldier settler and those whom the provinces have endeavoured to place on land, granting them each $600, if the matter is to be judged on the basis of money adjustments, the soldier settler by remedial legislation has in every case received very much more than $600. Reductions have been made by this parliament in years past amounting to almost $32,000,000. I feel certain that we all have one objective with respect to the soldier settler, and that is not to discourage him, but at the same time we must bear in mind that the people have a huge investment in these lands. I believe we are all in agreement that that course should be followed which on the one hand will ensure that the settler is ultimately able to pay for his farm and on the other that in the course of doing it the government shall not adopt any measures that will make it more difficult for the soldier. In dealing with this whole problem, which is not a simple one by any means, we must bear this in mind: Some people, both in this house and outside of it, have advocated that the soldier settler should be legislated into ownership. From what I can learn from the soldier settler himself, he does not desire that. We must also bear in mind that less than three per cent of those who went overseas are represented by the soldier settler, and many more returned soldiers went into other vocations and found themselves, and find themselves to-day in great difficulty. So far as possible the same treatment must be given to the soldier settlers as to other soldiers who find themselves in difficult positions. I have had many communications from soldiers who went into other lines of work and became the owners of businesses that were heavily mortgaged or the owners of city homes heavily mortgaged, and who are seeking from the government, relief with respect to these debts. In principle I doubt if they are not entitled to receive the same consideration as the soldier settler. Remember, they also invested their money which was probably borrowed from friends or relatives, and many of them probably involved themselves with loan companies and banks. That class of soldier received no assistance in remedial legislation. He had to deal with a common creditor, and in many instances perhaps with the sheriff. The soldier settler, if he has fallen on evil times, at least cannot be sheriffed, if I may use the phrase, out of his farm. The soldier settler, in common with others, has had and is having a difficult time, but the course to be followed I think is to grant such relief as we can, having regard to the rights of the state in the matter, and at the same time in regard to the settler himself to encourage him not to disavow but to discharge his debt, because he has had considerable assistance by way of the legislation to which I have made reference. The principle of this bill is perhaps based on the old principle, he pays the half who does confess the debt, and this is giving him the opportunity to do it.

Reference has been made to what the Canadian Pacific has done with respect to its lands in western Canada? This bill is more than the Canadian Pacific has done. After examining the results of what the Canadian Pacific did a year ago, and having consulted with their officials charged with the administration of those lands, I believe we shall find that many people heretofore discouraged because of the low prices for their products and for other reasons will take a great deal of encouragement from this bill. I have received scores of letters from soldier and civilian settlers in all parts of Canada, commenting upon this legislation, not all complimentary, but the great majority so, and hopeful that with this measure of assistance in the remission of interest and the credit of dollar for dollar for the period named in the bill they will, with any considerable improvement in commodity price levels, be well on their way to paying for their farms. That is the aggregate of the views I have received as a result of the communications which have been directed to me from all over Canada.

There is another aspect of the situation to which I should like to draw the attention of the committee. This bill applies with equal force all over Canada. On March 29, 1930, western Canada was particularly favoured over eastern Canada with respect to the payment of taxes; payments were made and apparently obligations assumed by what was said to be an agreement with the western provinces, in the face of advice which was then upon record, and is still there, that it was illegal to do what was being done. However I presume pressure of the times and the necessity of assisting the settler was apparent to such an extent that the government of the day thought it desirable to take such action. That action however applied only to western Canada. Why it should have been so restricted, I do not know, and there is nothing on record to indicate the reason. The legislation now before the committee, however, applies with equal force throughout Canada, and I am hopeful that the assistance here given the people on soldier settler lands combined with any considerable improvement in prices, will give that kind of encouragement which will be gratifying to every hon. member.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister for the statement he has given, but I do not believe he has answered my question in regard to any revaluation requests of settlers with civil contracts. Suppose a request comes from a settler under a civil contract to have land revalued that he bought at $25 or $35 an acre, when the same land can now be bought for $20—and is now being offered by the soldier settlement board and the Indian department—in certain sections of northern Saskatchewan, will he consider revaluation of that land and the adjustment of the debt, if the value is greater than the debt?

Mr. GORDON: If a request such as has been indicated came to me, of course I would consider it. But under the legislation I am powerless to make a revaluation, because I assume that is what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is the difficulty; settlers are told that.

Mr. GORDON: I am powerless to make any such revaluation.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am anxious to find out what the soldier settlement scheme has cost the country. The minister has told us about $63,000,000 is still due, and about $32,000,000 of the debts already owing by soldiers had been written off. I should like to know the original cost of this scheme and how much has been paid in by soldiers, so that we may be able to arrive at an estimate of just what the scheme is costing the country?

Mr. GORDON: The principal investment amounted to $117,670,711.02. The interest as accrued amounted to $22,688,651.10, making a total of $140,359,362.12.

Mr. MacLEAN: That is for land and equipment?

Mr. MALCOLM: Everything.

Mr. GORDON: As of January 31, 1933, there have been repayments of $50,968,482.79. That sum could be broken up into principal and interest, the principal being $34,590,-697.50 and the interest $16,377,785.29.

Mr. DONNELLY: How many soldiers does this amount look after?

Mr. GORDON: Something over 19,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: I believe the minister gave the exact figure of 19,241.

Mr. DONNELLY: In Saskatchewan we have a number of supervisors travelling about the country. They are able to collect only an amount which would equal the cost of maintaining them. Practically all the money they collect goes to them. It seems to me that with conditions such as now exist in western Canada we might do away with these supervisors, and that the payments due by soldiers to the government might be eliminated, or at least the interest thereon. Under present conditions in western Canada prospects of getting any money back from the soldier settlement scheme are very remote indeed. Until conditions improve my advice to the government would be to call in the supervisors and take them off the road entirely. They are going about from one soldier settler to another, bothering and worrying them in an effort to collect money from them, when in fact the soldiers have no money to pay. They make a nuisance of themselves, and continual complaints are being made in respect to them. They are doing no good whatever, and are making trouble instead of helping.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have some more facts to take up in connection with this bill. I do not know whether I shall be able to complete them to-night, but I shall attempt at least to do so—to give one or more instalments, thereof. But before leaving the question of revaluation of land bought under the soldier settlement board by settlers other than soldiers, I have also a few observations to make. The minister said he would take this matter into consideration. May I impress upon him the importance of considering the matter fully? When men bought land at $30 or $35 an acre which can now be bought for $20 I think the men interested have a strong argument for some adjustment. The minister said he would consider the matter. May I impress upon him the importance of having his department give the matter the most complete consideration as quickly as possible.

Following that, may I take up with the minister one or two further points? A few days ago in the house I asked him about a complaint made by Stanley Lawrence of Huntoon, Saskatchewan, and other soldiers throughout the province. The question I put to the minister was this: I said I had received information from northern Saskatchewan that certain soldier settlers could not procure seed or feed oats. I also said these men had applied to the municipality, to the Canadian legion, to the soldier settlement board, and to the minister himself, and up to the time I received the information no action had been taken. Therefore I thought that as a member of this house from Saskatchewan I should ask the minister a straightforward question about this condition of affairs, and I did so. The minister replied the next day something like this; that the settler asked about was located not in the constituency of North Battleford, but, he thought, in the constituency of Weyburn. I did not say that Lawrence was located in North Battleford federal riding; I said I had information regarding this complaint from northern Saskatchewan. I did not even say that the person from whom I received the information was living in the North Battleford federal riding, but I said that I had the information from that part of the province.

Now the minister says this man is living in the riding of Weyburn. I understand he is not living in that constituency but in the riding of Assiniboia, though under the new redistribution bill he will be in Weyburn. Of course the redistribution bill is not law yet, and in its present form may we hope it never will be. However, leaving that point aside for the moment, the information was that feed and seed oats were not got last year by this man Lawrence until June. The minister says he did get the seed in plenty of time. Lawrence says he did not. Whom are we to believe? Lawrence says he did not get the seed, did not sow it and did not reap a harvest. The minister says he got it in time. If he did not get a crop the chances are that he did not get the seed in time, and I am told Lawrence is of the opinion that the reason he did not get the seed in time was that he was a Liberal in politics and therefore was discriminated against.

Mr. GORDON: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not in a position to verify that statement because Lawrence is not present, but—

Mr. GORDON: You do not believe it, I am sure.

Mr. McINTOSH: His own opinion was that he did not get justice because his politics were not right. I hope he will get justice this year, because I understand he is still Liberal. I have confidence in the minister that he will not hold back seed and feed oats because the man differs politically from himself. Surely not!

But let me continue. This man applied to the municipality, to the settlement board, to the Canadian legion and to the minister, and he got no action until too late last year, and it appeared that he was not getting very quick action this year, therefore he thought the matter should be brought up in the house, and I brought it up. The minister says he has directed him what to do. Well, I am thankful to the minister, but the fact remains that up to the time the information reached here this year this man was in need of seed and had not got it. If action has been taken since I compliment the minister for setting the departmental machinery going so that this man may get the justice to which he is entitled.

Next, let me go back to the dying days of the first part of the present session. It will be remembered that last fall when the question of land settlement and soldier settlement was before the house I put a statement on Hansard, and later the minister also put a statement on the record, saying among other things he had given to parliament all the information he could, from all over Canada. He did give a good deal of information I admit. But he said he had listened to addresses, especially from members from western Canada, which he thought would be more helpful and dependable and effective if the information had been got from the department and not from newspaper clippings and letters. Apparently the government must always have a fling at the newspapers, whether it be the weekly press or the daily. They would have us believe that information given to the house obtained from weekly and daily papers is often unsound information. I do not take that view at all. I believe that a government or a minister can often be put right by information got first-hand by newspapers. I think a statement of that kind was absolutely unnecessary, and would not have been required had we had in Canada a non-political unemployment advisory council for the last three years, national in character, that would have gathered all the information on soldier settlement, unemployment and land settlement generally which would have been available to any member on request. As it is now we have to dig up this information ourselves from whatever source we can get it, from letters and other first-hand information, newspapers and government departments. I believe that on the whole the information daily obtained by a member is just as authentic as anything that can be got from any department of government.

Secondly in that speech the minister said that the department of soldier settlement had been completely reorganized, and so he said it commended itself to the great majority of settlers under its control. Well I only hope that is true, but I do not think it is one hundred per cent true, indeed it is far from it. I know many soldier settlers in northern Saskatchewan feel that although the department has been reorganized it is by no means as efficient or as aggressive as it might be in ways apart from collecting money. I do not want to find fault with the present director; in fact I would like to encourage him, and in turn ask him to encourage the men on the land—the soldier settlers. But the fact that the department has been reorganized is no proof that there are not grievances which ought to be adjusted as completely and as quickly as possible.

Thirdly, the minister further made certain criticisms of myself,—and I am not finding any fault; it was ligitimate criticism and I do not mind anyone criticizing me so long as the criticism appears sound. I had occasion in that address in the house to put on record a report of a meeting at Medstead, Saskatchewan, in connection with land settlement. The settlers concerned received $600 a year, $200 from the municipality, $200 from the province and $200 from this government, and some of these were soldier settlers. A meeting was arranged at which four or five municipalities were represented. I was invited to that meeting, and I thought it only right that, as a member, I should attend. The meeting was attended by thirty or forty reeves, secretaries, and councillors. As far as the meeting was concerned I put on record a very straightforward statement about the existing condition of affairs in northern Saskatchewan in regard to soldier settlement and land settlement generally. When the minister discovered that that report had been published in my own paper, the North Battleford News, that I had personally attended the meeting, that I had written the report myself and that it appeared in the North Battleford News, controlled by myself, he suggested that the statements could not be proven in that way. That, I submit, is a lame argument; it is about the least plausible argument anyone would wish to hear. If a report appears in a newspaper, weekly or daily, owned by a certain individual, that report being written by the owner of the newspaper, is it more authentic or less authentic then a report written by someone acting simply as a reporter? Any schoolboy would answer immediately that the report of a meeting, written by the owner of a newspaper, a meeting attended by the owner himself and at which he heard every speech delivered, every statement made, every argument put forward touching the question at issue—in this instance the land settlement scheme—would be an absolutely authentic report, a report much more authentic than one written by some person without any interest in the paper and without considering anything apart from a mechanical report of the proceedings. I would say there was no proof necessary. The facts were self evident, and although they were stated in the North Battleford News they were not written to prove anything but to give information to all who wanted to learn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Will the hon. member be good enough to stick to the point?

Mr. McINTOSH: I am sticking to the point, and I am not going to take up very much of the time of the committee. If this matter cannot be fully discussed now, Mr. Chairman, then it will have to be discussed on the third reading, so that it does not make much difference. May I say, then, that one of the reeves present at that meeting said that in his district there would be no crop and no cash. How then could a soldier pay for land without either crop or cash?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Surely the hon. member must know that his remarks are not relevant to the section under consideration.

Mr. McINTOSH: We have not been confining ourselves to one section, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): We are discussing section 72.

Mr. McINTOSH: I introduced my remarks under section 72.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I trust the hon. gentleman will use his good judgment and not wander too far.

Mr. McINTOSH: I submit that my remarks are relevant, Mr. Chairman. Another reeve, Mr. Comerford, said that settlers had been dumped into his area of the country and that fifty school children were without school accommodation. These soldier settlers were also in a hopeless situation. The reeve of Medstead, Mr. Soderberg, said that the land the soldiers were put on was hopeless and that it would be impossible for them to succeed. Perhaps I had better give briefly the statements of one or two of these men. Mr. Grimes, the reeve of Parkdale, pointed out clearly that the costs were piling up against these men. They were supposed to pay their taxes but could not; they were supposed to pay for hospitalization but could not; they were supposed to pay for medical attention, and that was impossible. They had no money with which to discharge any of these obligations, and as a consequence the department at Regina requested the reeve and secretary of the latter municipality to interview each settler, and report, which they refused to do. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, I would say that the report placed on Hansard was informative; it did not require to be proven because as I have said, it was self evident, and it was essential that that information should be given to parliament and the country.

With regard to another question which the minister dealt with, he said that the Soldier Settlers' Union sent out an alarming circular, and that these soldier settlers wanted to put something across.

Mr. GORDON: I did not say that.

Mr. McINTOSH: These are the minister's words:

An organization was formed there among the soldier settlers; they communicated with me and sent out rather an alarming circular as to what attitude they intended to adopt with respect to discharging their obligations to the crown. But when they met, there apparently was sound sense among most of the settlers, and those who organized the union were not able to put across the sentiments expressed in the circular.

I do not think there is anything alarming in the circular. I have the circular here and I cannot see for the life of me why the minister characterized as alarming the actions of the men who organized the Soldier Settlers' Union in Saskatchewan, nor do I understand why he should suggest that they were trying to put something across. I for one certainly do not believe that they were trying to put across anything but what was right. I know personally the secretary, Major H. F. Packman, and the secretary, Lieutenant-Colonel H. J. Price.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Packman was one of the representatives at the meeting when these amendments were discussed—

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand that.

Mr. GORDON: —and he approved of them and abandoned the proposition set out in the circular.

Mr. McINTOSH: Here are some of the points with which the organization dealt in that circular, and I will leave it to the minister to say which of them are alarming and which are not. We may have a difference of opinion about what is alarming. I hope we have.

Mr. ERNST: So do I.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am glad the hon. gentleman has some opinions—also hopes. First of all, the chairman says that the organization is non-political. That should suit the minister. Further, the statement is made that the organization has been formed for the sole purpose of enabling all soldier settlers to get together. Let me quote precisely what is said:

The Soldier Settlers' Union is a non-political organization, which has been formed for the sole purpose of enabling all soldier settlers to get together as a strong, united body, so that we may be able to demand and obtain justice and common sense in the administration of our affairs by the soldier settlement board.

Is there anything wrong with that? Where is the alarming sentiment? There is nothing whatever alarming in that statement. Take the next:

For years there has been a growing feeling of dissatisfaction amongst soldier settlers, both at the terms of our contracts and at the treatment accorded us by the board. This has culminated, in Lloydminster district, in the formation of the union.

In other words, the organization of the Soldier Settlers' Union came about as a result of the dissatisfaction that existed between the soldier settlers and the soldier settlement board; because there was that dissatisfaction, because of unsatisfactory treatment, these men made up their minds to organize. I should like to know what is wrong about any body of men organizing when they have a grievance. Are not assembly and organization two of the fundamentals of what we might term British liberty? I think so. If we have not the right to organize when we have a grievance, then we have no democracy that is worth while. If we cannot assemble to state our grievance, what freedom do we enjoy? None whatever. I say therefore that there is nothing alarming in that statement. Let me quote the third:

Our farms were purchased at highly inflated prices, and in spite of some reduction and concessions made by the government, the amount still owing on them is, in the majority of cases, out of all proportion to their earning power.

That is true, and if it is, even though it is a little alarming, what is wrong with it? Nothing at all so far as I can see. It is a perfectly justifiable statement by men who are anxious to improve their position. Take the next:

It is realized by most of us that it is impossible for us to repay our loans, as they now stand. We are steadily going behind, and piling up a debt of principal and interest, which we can never hope to liquidate.

They are going behind and they do not hope to be ever able to pay up. This is what they tell the minister in this circular, and the minister describes it as alarming. Well, it may be alarming to the department, but the sooner some action is taken by the department to allay that discontent the better. Statement number 5 reads:

This situation is due to no fault of ours, and exists in spite of every effort we have made to clear off our liabilities to the board.

They have done their best but they have gone behind and cannot pay up. They told that to the board, and the minister now says that that was an alarming statement. There is no question about it, it is a statement of fact and if it is alarming, all the more reason why the department should take action. The next statement reads:

Although our present position is obviously due to factors over which we have no control, the government insists that we shall repay our loans in full.

Listen to that! They have made their complaints to the department and they have been told that they must repay their loans in full. They were told at that time, which was August 20, 1932, there would be no hope of any concessions or adjustments held out, they would have to pay the principal and pay the interest. If they did not do that, more than likely they would be evicted.

Mr. GORDON: I know the hon. member would not consciously make a statement—

Mr. McINTOSH: I would not make a statement which I could not back up.

Mr. GORDON: —not in accordance with the facts. I think I stated before that the seizures all over Canada were less than three-tenths of one per cent. These seizures were not evictions in any sense of the word, and in no case was there justification for the attitude taken by the settlers. I am absolutely certain that the action taken by the department in the very small number of cases was the correct action under the circumstances. I believe that that action was proper and I believe it would have been taken by every hon. member of this committee under similar circumstances. The statement has been made by the hon. member with respect to evictions taking place if payment was not made, but that has not been the policy of the government since this depression commenced. The soldier settlers knew that and I think they have done very well considering the difficulties which have confronted them in common with all others in almost every walk of life.

Mr. McINTOSH: My statement was that the thought present in the minds of these soldier settlers was that if they did not pay up in full, in all probability they would be evicted. I did not say that that was the policy of the department.

Mr. GORDON: There was no reason for any such fear.

Mr. McINTOSH: If the minister will listen for a little while I think I can show him that there was a foundation for such a fear. It was because of that fear that these men organized. They satisfied themselves that the quicker they got organized, the better for themselves.

The next statement made in the circular is to the effect that they had received every reasonable reduction and concession from the government and need expect no further help from that source. That is, they got every desirable concession and reduction. They felt that if the information they got that day was correct, then they had no great reason to expect any further reductions or concessions. That was the reason they organized. The next statement has some bearing upon the eviction question. The minister should listen. It reads:

> It was made perfectly clear by these officials that the policy of the board would be to demand full payment of our loans, and that in the event of our failure to meet the payments from any cause whatsoever, eviction proceedings would be taken.

That is the statement made by the secretary of the Soldiers Settlers' Union who writes this circular.

Mr. GORDON: When this circular first came to my attention I read it over carefully and made inquiry with reference to that particular paragraph. I can assure the hon. member that no such statement was ever made by any official of the department. If such a statement had been made at that meeting, does the hon. member think for one moment that the department would not have been deluged by letters and telegrams? Of course that would have happened, but we never heard a word of it until we received this circular. I am absolutely satisfied that the party responsible for the printing of this circular, perhaps not by design but certainly in some way or another, has included a statement which is absolutely in contradiction of the facts. I made certain that no such statement had been made.

Mr. McINTOSH: I will take the word of the minister and the officials of his department. I want to take the word of the minister that eviction proceedings were not in his mind or in the minds of his officials. I am very glad to receive that information but my point still stands that the feeling which prompted these men to organize was that if they did not get busy and organize to protect themselves—as organization always does—they would more than likely be evicted. Another statement reads:

> It would be well for every soldier settler to clearly understand the situation. Unless some means is adopted of changing the present policy of the government, we must pay up our loans in full—an obvious impossibility—or eventually lose our farms.

That statement amplifies the idea of eviction. As the result of that feeling, the soldier settlers organized.

When they organized they had two objectives. The first objective was the finding of a solution for the problem which confronted them last fall. That was their immediate objective. They wanted to find out how they could stay on the land and how they could keep themselves from being evicted. But their main objective was one which brings us more closely to the provisions of this bill. They asked for a better and more equitable deal for all soldier settlers. This legislation attempts to meet that objective in a modified form. The soldier settlers feel that if they cannot get a new deal they will never be able to pay off their loans and will never be free from the threat of eviction. As this circular states, that threat is constantly before them. There is another statement made in the circular which should be put on the record. I want to be fair to the department, so I will quote this statement along with the others. It is stated that the feeling was that as soon as grain prices went up these collectors would be on their backs again with more fury than ever, dragooning them to pay the last cent of their obligations. That is followed with the thought that the more thoroughly they are organized, the less unreasonable will be the demands they will have to meet. They state quite plainly that they want to meet their obligations. They want to remain on their farms if it is at all possible, and they do not want to cheat the government out of one cent. These are some of the facts in connection with the organization of the Soldier Settlers' Union as found in the preliminary statement of the secretary.

I stated before in my address that there was a certain soldier settler, A. J. Sibley, living over ten miles out of North Battleford. This man had a grievance. As the minister said, officials from Saskatoon were sent to visit that man. On their way to visit him they called at my home and they asked me to go out with them. I went along with them to see what was going on. These officials had an interview with Mr. Sibley that day; they came to a certain understanding; they left and I returned with them. Because I did this, the minister put it on record in a very improper manner. Fancy a minister of the crown putting stuff like this on Hansard! This is what he said:

> The superintendent took him—
> That is myself.
> —right down to that settler and let him investigate the condition for himself.
> I did not investigate the condition.

Mr. GORDON: What did the hon. member do?

Mr. McINTOSH: The superintendent from Saskatoon went out and investigated. The only reason I went with the minister's officials from Saskatoon was that I was asked to go and that if my presence could be of any help in any way to get the two parties together, I was willing to go. I did not even hear or want to hear what was said; I do not know what their understanding or agreement was. Yet the minister makes this statement in the house:

> He knew the arrangement at that time—
> I certainly did not know the arrangement.
> —and after seeing the condition for himself he drove home with the superintendent and did not have a single word of criticism to offer.

Then he says that after not having a word of criticism to offer, I came to Ottawa and placed critical statements on the record of the house.

Mr. MacMILLAN: The hon. member certainly did.

Mr. McINTOSH: I certainly did place proper criticisms on Hansard, and, if necessary, I will do so again. Such a statement by the minister is absolutely unfair; that report is a departmentally coloured one and not worth the ink with which it is written. I went out merely to help the soldier settlement board to find, if possible, common ground with the settler to have his grievance adjusted. I did not take part in the conversation; I did not know what the settlement was, but I thought my presence there would help and I was willing to go. Because I went, I am told by the minister that I went out and knew all about the matter and then I came down here and found fault. I want again to repudiate that statement in this chamber and to say that it is made out of whole cloth; there is nothing exact about it.

Mr. GORDON: What statement?

Mr. McINTOSH: The statement I have just referred to. Let me go a step further. Further on the minister says that statements made by myself and other western members in connection with soldier settlement were really breaking down the financial structure of Canada; that men who had invested in western bonds, sold them and bade good-bye to Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba as investment areas. I can only say this, that if telling the truth and putting on record the grievances of our soldier settlers who fought in the war to win liberty and who are entitled to redress, will scare away from western Canada some superficial investors, the quicker they are scared out of western Canada the better. So far as I am concerned, I am going to put on record statements of that kind just when I feel they ought to be made public. I do not think by putting them on record, we interfere with western development; in fact I think, by putting these facts on record and telling the truth about western Canada, we help western development.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. McINTOSH: There is no time limit in committee, is there?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Yes, forty minutes.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, I shall have something to say a little later on.

Mr. GORDON: If we could get on with this bill, all this discussion can and, I think, probably will take place when the estimates of this department come before the house later on. I would like, if possible, to advance this bill because I want to take the necessary course the legislation contemplates to take care of the various soldiers' accounts and settlers' accounts that will have to be adjusted in conformity with the legislation.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, I can put on record the rest of my information on the third reading of the bill, if necessary; I do not want to delay the minister too long to-night.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for North Battleford has raised the question of seed and feed oats for the settlers. I understand there is no seed and feed oats being put out by the government. When I have been approached, I have given that information. There is one thing in this bill to which I should like to refer, and that is in regard to the interest that is being cancelled. I am sorry that it is being cancelled for only one year. The hard years of 1929-30, 1930-31 and 1931-32, as the minister well knows, have been the most difficult years for the settler and I regret very much that this legislation has not been drawn so that more interest could be cancelled than for the one year. I suppose the minister would not consider an amendment at this time, but although there is a great deal of good in the bill, it would have been more acceptable if the government had been able to cancel more than the interest for one year.

Mr. McINTOSH: I presume I can now speak for another forty minutes, if necessary, but I do not expect to do so. I believe it is better to put on record now the remainder of what I want to say on this bill; it will be more connected.

Coming now to the bill that is before the committee, may I refer to the meeting that took place in Saskatoon when the president and secretary of the soldier settlement union and other representative soldier settlers convened in that city and, I understand, met the soldier settlement director. A general discussion took place about the complaints that I have put on Hansard, and as to what ought and should be done, otherwise these men would lose their farms. In other words, these men had to have a new understanding with the department and they were out to have it. The department very kindly arranged a meeting which was held in Saskatoon, as I said, and a very free and full discussion took place in regard to soldier settlement questions. What transpired at that meeting? Well, the memorandum that was presented at the meeting by the soldier settlers was made up of eight points which bore entirely on the problems of the soldier settlers in the prairie provinces.

The first was that because of unprecedented low price levels of agricultural products, coupled with drought, soldier settlers have been operating at serious loss during the past three years. They were not paying operating expenses because of the low price level of agriculture products and because of the serious drought in western Canada. That was one point which they put in the memorandum.

The second was: The accumulation of debts was so great that the average settler would be unable to overtake his liability even with the return of normal times.

As soon as normal times return and price levels would rise, the soldier settlers felt they would be called upon to make payments they could not make and therefore they were very anxious to bring this important aspect of the question before the department. They made the statement that even with the return of normal times, they were quite hopeless about overtaking their liabilities.

The third point was: As a result of these conditions surrounding soldier settlers, discouragement, hopelessness, a lowering of their morale and a loss of their incentive to work had been brought about. Because they were losing their morale and their initiative, becoming hopeless and discouraged, they welcomed the opportunity of laying their whole case before the department at Saskatoon.

Now for number 4. The soldier settlers agree among themselves that to carry on with any assurance of ultimate success some adjustment of debt is necessary in order to remove anxiety and uphold their faith in the future.

If they are going to carry on there must be a remission of interest from the government and there must be some debt readjustment. Paving the way for this bill, Mr. Chairman, for a bill which a few months before they were told would not be brought down because the department had given the soldier settlers to understand that they would have to pay the last cent and that no action would be taken by the department.

Mr. GORDON: I have already said that no such statement was made a few months previously.

Mr. McINTOSH: I will accept the minister's word, but the soldier settlers got that idea, and I understand that they got it at the organization meeting, and that they were told that. I am not to blame. I am merely putting on record the facts of the case.

Mr. GORDON: Might I interrupt again, because I am afraid there is going to be a misconception, whether it is of importance or not. I have a copy of the minutes of the meeting covering all these points, and I find that what the hon. member is referring to was not presented to the meeting at all. It was after the discussion at the meeting that this memorandum of these various points was drawn up and subscribed to by everybody present at the meeting including the director himself, who assisted in the preparation of what the hon. member is reading from, and it was upon this memorandum together with subsequent conferences that the present legislation was founded.

Mr. McINTOSH: Exactly what I am coming to if the minister would allow me to do it.

Number 5 says that the soldier settlers keenly appreciate the concessions already made on their behalf but these concessions were necessitated not merely because of the inability of the settler to meet his obligations but because of the fundamental defects of the soldier settler scheme which made it impossible for the soldier settler to farm profitably enough to make his payments.

That is a very fair statement, and it entered into the discussions later.

Number 6. It was realized that the soldier settler could not reasonably expect to receive concessions simply as a soldier settler.

That is quite fair, Mr. Chairman, Number 6 continues:

But since the provincial governments are taking steps to relieve the debt burden of the civilian population it was thought the Dominion government, as the authority to adjust soldier settlement schemes, should also effect a general measure of debt adjustment on behalf of soldier settlers.

Mr. GORDON: I must ask the hon. member to permit me to interject again. I am following the certified copy of the report of the meeting, and number 6—there has been some subsection from other topics—

Mr. McINTOSH: I am giving just the essence of each part of the memorandum.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. GORDON: Number 6 has been emasculated beyond all recognition.

Mr. McINTOSH: No, I am coming to that if the minister will allow me. He is in too much of a hurry.

Number 7. Any relief suggested should be devised on an absolutely equitable basis, and not framed to help the improvident. Only in this way can the soldier settlers secure maximum returns at minimum of expense.

The last statement in their memorandum was to the effect that the question of a free grant was discussed, and the soldier settlers said in conference that they did not favour it. The soldier settlers went on record as being desirous of paying for their farms. I have made that statement before, but may I say to the minister that I believe that on the whole the sentiments among the soldier settlers are to the effect that they cannot pay for their farms. They say so. They say that even with a return to normal prices they feel they will be unable to overtake their liabilities. If that is the case I echo the sentiments expressed here to-night by other members from western Canada, that if the soldier settlers cannot pay for their farms, then instead of keeping a certain number of officials in their positions and in the collection field, the quicker something eminently satisfactory is done the better.

May I also say to the minister that if the department demands payment in full, the feeling among the soldier settlers is that the payments could be made just as well to any postmaster in the district, to be forwarded by him to the department. The soldier settlers urge that if that can be done, it should be done, and then these men who are covering the country in their cars, using up cars and gasoline and costing the nation a great deal of money, can be taken off and the soldier settlers can make their payments to some body like the Post Office Department, and the money be forwarded to the soldier settlement department. It would save a great deal of expense, and it would have the effect of giving the soldiers a different feeling towards the department from what they have at the present time.

In conclusion, as the minister said, after this memorandum was presented to the meeting certain action was taken and the point of view of the soldier settlers was given very emphatically. One point of view was this, that there should be a total abolition of interest retroactive to 1929, and that any interest payments that should be made should apply on the amortized debt, that is on the principal plus the interest up to 1929. By this bill only one year's interest is taken off the debt of the soldier settlers—1931 to 1932.

Mr. GORDON: Is my hon. friend still reading from the same minutes of the same meeting?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, the same meeting.

Mr. GORDON: I have a certified copy here and it is entirely different.

Mr. McINTOSH: This must be all right because it is in your bill only you have not gone far enough.

Mr. GORDON: The recommendation with respect to interest is clear and cannot be misunderstood:

> That the interest on outstanding loans for the year 1932 should be remitted, and in any case in which any settler has already paid his interest that payment should be applied on his principal debt.

That is signed by my hon. friend's friends, including Colonel Harry Price, Mr. Packman, General Ross of Yorkton and all the representatives that attended the meeting, and the recommendation was unanimously carried. So that the record will not be hopelessly confused and uninteresting to anyone who wants the facts, I would earnestly suggest that my hon. friend should stick to what the minutes of the meeting say.

Mr. McINTOSH: Here is the statement I have here, Number 1, the same as the minister is reading from, and it is exactly as I have given it, only I have given it in a briefer way.

Mr. GORDON: You have gone back to 1929.

Mr. McINTOSH: The statement is this:

> Total abolition of interest retroactive to 1929, also any interest payment made to apply on principal debt.

Now I understand that the soldier settler wants a total abolition of interest from the year 1929. This bill eliminates only one year's interest, and therefore it is not satisfactory. More than that, I believe that the wish of the soldier settlers is that no more interest be paid on these debts, and the reason simply is that the soldier settlers figure they cannot pay it. That is why they want the interest clause in this bill retroactive to 1929. That is where the bill falls short. I would like to see the bill amended to provide for the total abolition of interest not only back to 1929 but forward through the years, so that these men will be given at least a fair chance to pay their obligations. Otherwise they say they cannot pay, and it is hopeless to expect any interest.

Now, number 2, and I am coming to the clause you are so anxious about, Mr. Chairman, and that is the double credit clause, by which if a man pays one dollar he gets credit for two dollars, and this is to go on for four years. May I compliment the minister and his department for making this for a period of four years? I am not anxious to find fault with the minister or his department. I wish merely to place the facts on Hansard so that they may be recorded on behalf of these men who feel that they ought to have someone in the House of Commons —in fact, many members—speak on their behalf. The clause of the bill which gives a double credit for four years was debated at the conference. I believe the wish of the director, who is present with us to-night, was to make it active for two years. Now in the bill it has been made four years, or just double the suggestion made at the meeting. I congratulate the minister upon taking new ground, and going forward. I like to see people go forward, and in the formation of legislation I like to see departments go ahead. Therefore in that regard the extension of the double credit for four years is, in my view, a sound part of the bill, and will be satisfactory to soldier settlers.

Lastly, the lien on equipment was released. Again I believe this is a sound step in advance, and I thank the minister and his department for taking it. In 1930 the lien was taken off stock. In this bill we are making null and void any lien on equipment, and by doing so I believe we will be helping the soldier settlers.

In closing may I ask the minister to consider very carefully one of the outstanding points in connection with help to soldier settlers, namely the total abolition of interest retroactive to 1929, with provision for no more interest payments in the future. Secondly, I recommend that full consideration be given to the problems of soldier settlers generally, so that if the soldiers cannot pay for their land, something constructive be done to leave them in possession of their property, or, better still, hand their farms back to them free of all encumbrances. If the government will adopt these suggestions perhaps some of the ill-advised expenses now obtaining in connection with staffs collecting moneys from soldier settlers and selling their crops—all but a third, when debts are not paid up to the minute—might be eliminated. When soldier settlers feel it is impossible to pay any more than they are paying, and when officers have not other work to do, but pester the life out of them to pay! pay! the government would do well to call off these highly paid collecting officials and have soldier settler problems more constructively and economically dealt with.

On subsection 73—Additional credit on payments of arrears of instalments.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to ask a question which may have been asked before in an earlier part of the discussion, respecting the relief from interest payments of purchasers from settlers. Supposing a civilian purchased from a soldier settler, what would be the arrangement with respect to interest? As I understand it under this legislation he would receive the same relief as the soldier settler would have received. Is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Carrying out that idea, I suggest we should go farther and define the term "settler." In the explanatory notes I find the expression "any settler or purchaser." But in the bill are the words "any settler or person." In the interpretation clause we find that "settler" is defined as:

> A person who at any time during the war has been therein engaged on active service in a military force.

Then various conditions are given.

Mr. GORDON: That is the reason it is so worded in section 73 of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Apparently the words "or person" are used but I suggest they are capable of a dangerous interpretation. I would certainly appreciate it if the expression "any settler or civilian purchaser" were used. But when we come to the word "person" we are confronted with the argument that a settler is a person. Is there anywhere in the act a definition of what a person is? It might be argued that a person eventually means a settler, and a settler means a man who has been in active service. The wording may create very great hardship, if there be any doubt as to the application to a civilian purchaser. I do not believe any harm would be done by making a change, even if it were only to allay apprehensions of possible difficulty. I recall a few years ago that on a bill similar to this one I asked the minister then at the head of the department a question in connection with revaluation, as to whether so and so would mean so and so, and I was told most emphatically that it would. The minister's answer appeared in Hansard. Six months later the department absolutely repudiated the assurance I had been given by the minister, and said they were not bound by it. As a result a number of people suffered an injustice. When we come to interpretation, we cannot go by what someone may say; we must take what is expressed. If the minister could see his way clear to put in the words "or civilian purchaser" he would relieve the minds of a good many people, and I believe would be doing no harm to anybody.

Mr. GORDON: That very point was in contemplation when the bill was drawn. From a purely legal standpoint I gave it consideration. In order that there might be no doubt that the word "person" would cover people other than settlers as interpreted in the act, I submitted the section to the officers of the Department of Justice, and their judgment was that the words now appearing amply covered all others indebted under the act, because a settler is interpreted to mean as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has read from the act. Other persons not being settlers who have purchased under the act are taken care of by the language appearing in the first line of the section.

Mr. NEILL: But you do not say "persons other than settlers."

Mr. GORDON: I do not know how we can make it any clearer than we have. "Civilian purchaser" would confuse the issue.

Mr. NEILL: You could say "settler or person other than a settler." How would that do? Then, would the word "arrears" in the twenty-second line of the bill cover a payment made by the government for taxes? Would that come under the things for which he could get a dollar for dollar rebate?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, taxes paid prior would come under the operation of the statute.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister use the language "or person other than settler'?

Mr. GORDON: I should like to defer to the judgment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but as a lawyer I say we are using the broadest possible term we can use. I have submitted the matter to the law officers of the crown and they agree with me. I very much fear if we used any other expression we would be more likely to contract than to expand the meaning.

Mr. NEILL: Very well; you are a lawyer.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In subsection 2 I find the words:

No such additional credit shall be accorded in respect of moneys the proceeds of alienation of any property charged under this act or of fire insurance.

And so on. Then in the explanatory clause on the opposite page I find the following:

Moneys received from the disposal of the department's security and credited to the account of the settler or purchaser will not be augmented by the bonus.

Will the bonus be granted to the present occupant of the land under one of those tripartite agreements?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Then in the case of an agreement that is about paid up, if the purchaser under one of those agreements makes the final payment or close to the final payment, he will get a credit of an equal amount, and that will be lessening the equity that the soldier setter had, will it not?

Mr. GORDON: No I do not think it lessens his equity.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Suppose the balance owing on a contract was $500; the soldier settler has an equity in that land of $250. The purchaser pays $250 and gets credit for $500. The $250 would wipe out the equity that the soldier settler himself had in the tripartite agreement?

Mr. GORDON: No, I think the hon. member has a misconception. It would not disturb the equity of the soldier settler at all. The civilian purchaser, if we so call him, would be credited dollar for dollar of the amount he owed the department. It would not destroy or affect any equity that the soldier settler has in the land. I am confident that that is the interpretation.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I doubt whether the minister is correct in that, or whether he understood the question I put. When it comes to the final payment it seems to me that all that civilian settler needs to pay is one-half the amount, and he gets credit for the other half. That other half may be a part of the soldier settler's equity. It seems to me some change should be made in this section to take care of such cases.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 27, an act to amend the Bank Act.

He said: The amendment is the change of the title to The Bank Charters Continuation Act, 1933. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) had intended to offer that as an amendment because the original bill was entitled An Act to Amend the Bank Act, when as a matter of fact it is an act respecting banks.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

ADMIRALTY ACT, 1933

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house, I move that order number 28, for the second reading of Bill No. 66, an act respecting courts of admiralty be discharged, in accordance with the arrangement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie).

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: To-morrow we will proceed with the second readings of bills, and possibly, depending upon the work the Secretary of State has to do, we will take Bill No. 77. We propose to get royal assent to-morrow to the supply bill, and Bill 77 might be disposed of, as a number of organizations desire to have provisions made to deal with creditors, by arrangements that could not be carried out under the Bankruptcy Act. Then perhaps to-morrow evening we will take some supply. It is just possible that it may be necessary to introduce an amendment to the Radio Act. I told the house some time ago that Major Gladstone Murray had been asked to come out and make a report. I received the report on Saturday, and it is likely that one or two amendments will have to be made. If we can avoid them we will.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The other afternoon the Prime Minister indicated that some financial bill might come up.

Mr. BENNETT: No, in view of the approaching conference it was thought that it might be left, that it was undesirable to disturb credit by any legislation at present. There is a loan bill; that is on the order paper.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 9, 1933

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, May 9, 1933.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 5 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

REDISTRIBUTION

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) presented the first report of the special committee on Bill No. 2, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. gentleman if this report means that something has been decided. If it means nothing, I have no objection but if it means something to which my electors may object, I must oppose this concurrence.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I hope it will mean a good deal more than nothing. It is the intention to get this bill through this session. My hon. friend appeared before the committee this morning and made his representations and he was promised that they would be given consideration. All this report asks for is permission to sit while the house is in session.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

RAILWAYS

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough) presented the third report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) moved concurrence in the second and third reports of the select standing committee on standing orders relative to the suspension of standing order No. 92.

Motion agreed to.

PETITION

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York) presented a petition from the municipality of New Toronto, supported by resolutions of councils of fourteen other municipalities, requesting the enacting of contributory unemployment insurance.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) to the fact that the documents he has filed do not constitute a petition.

COMPANIES AND CREDITORS

BILL TO FACILITATE COMPROMISES AND ARRANGEMENTS IN CASES OF INSOLVENCY

The house in committee on Bill No. 77, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between companies and their creditors—Mr. Cahan—Mr. Cotnam in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Compromise with unsecured creditors.

Mr. BENNETT: The marginal note should read "unsecured" creditors; it reads "insecured."

Mr. COOTE: As very little explanation has been given on this bill; in fact, as I think it was given no explanation on second reading but was simply sent to the committee, I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to explain to this committee the purpose of the bill. I do not believe any explanation has ever been given to the house.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought the bill was quite fully explained on the first reading. Clause 3 provides for a compromise between a debtor company and its unsecured creditors. The gist of the whole bill is this, that any class of creditors of an insolvent or a bankrupt company may by a three-fourths vote among themselves agree to a compromise between the company and that class of its creditors. Each class of creditors who have the same interest may decide by a three-fourths majority with respect to any proposed compromise and, if approved by the court, such compromise becomes effective. It is very simple. I cannot explain it any more clearly than that.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Compromises to be sanctioned by court.

Mr. CAHAN: An objection has been raised that the wording could be made clearer by striking out the words in the tenth line:

Class of creditors, including.

And inserting in lieu thereof the words:

the class of creditors as the case may be, and on.

The suggestion is that it should be made clear that each class of creditors having the same interest shall decide among themselves as to the terms of the compromise, and I think this proposed amendment makes the matter very much clearer.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move that amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Scope of act.

Mr. CAHAN: As regards clause 7, the committee on banking and commerce reported in favour of striking out the word "force" and inserting the words "force and effect," but as we have used in another clause of the bill, clause 15, the term "full force and effect," I would suggest that this amendment should read "full force and effect."

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 8 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—In Yukon territory.

Mr. CAHAN: This bill was widely circulated throughout Canada and the question arose that inasmuch as it specifically provided for an appeal from a decision in the Yukon territory, that might seem to imply that there should be no appeal from any provincial court, and it was deemed advisable to make it clear that there may be an appeal from a provincial court to the Supreme Court of Canada in order that the procedure under this measure may be regulated, if necessary, by the same judicial authority, throughout all the provinces. I therefore propose this amendment which will be moved by the Minister of National Revenue:

That section 14 of Bill No. 77 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

14. An appeal shall, by leave of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, lie to that court from the highest court of final resort in or for the province or territory in which the proceeding originated.

2. The Supreme Court of Canada shall have jurisdiction to hear and and to decide according to its ordinary procedure any appeal so permitted and to award costs.

3. No such appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada shall operate as a stay of proceedings unless the judge who permits such appeal shall so order, and to the extent to which he shall order, and the appellant shall not be required to provide any security for costs, but unless he provides security for costs, in an amount to be fixed by the judge permitting the appeal, he shall not be awarded costs in the event of his success upon such appeal.

4. The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on any such appeal shall be final and conclusive.

This same provision appears in the Bankruptcy Act in section 178 and also in the act with respect to the winding up of companies. I am introducing no new provision. The theory of the Bankruptcy Act with regard to giving security for costs was this, that, though a bankrupt who might have good grounds for an appeal might not be able to provide the security for such an appeal, his right of appeal was maintained, but, in case he gave no security for an appeal to the other party, he could not obtain costs even if the decision on the appeal were given in his favour. That is a principle which has been enacted in other statutes, but particularly in the Bankruptcy Act, and in order to make it clear I am suggesting this amendment which my colleague the Minister of National Revenue will move.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 15 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. FACTOR: I believe that the provisions of this bill are very beneficial to companies and I am wondering whether it is possible constitutionally or otherwise to extend them to individuals. The minister knows that under the present provisions of the Bankruptcy Act the individual is unable to make a compromise unless he becomes insolvent or a receiving order is obtained against him. I should like to have the minister's opinion on that phase of the problem.

Mr. CAHAN: Such an amendment to the law as the hon. gentleman proposes would not come within the scope of the present bill which deals with companies and is really an amendment to the Companies Act. So far as the individual is concerned, if he is declared bankrupt or insolvent under the Bankruptcy Act provisions are made there for a compromise between such bankrupt individual and his creditors. To go further than we have gone would require very considerable amendments to the Bankruptcy Act and involve very delicate questions indeed as to the right of this parliament to interfere with the legislative jurisdiction of the province, which deals with civil rights. Some of the provinces of the west, I understand, have already introduced and, if my memory is correct, have passed legislation affecting the rights of individuals and their creditors, and I think that some of them even contemplate going further. At the present time while such provincial legislation is under consideration we did not feel disposed to ask this parliament to infringe upon the legislative jurisdiction of the province.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 94, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Sections 1 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—Penalties for sale of spirits unlawfully manufactured.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There is a typographical error in line 29. The word "two" appears instead of the word "three." I would ask my colleague the Secretary of State to substitute the word "three" for the word "two."

Mr. CAHAN: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORIZATION OF PROVISION OF MONEYS TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS

The house in committee on Bill No. 73, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1933, and to authorize His Majesty to make loans and advances to the Canadian National Railway Company —Mr. Manion—Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are the provisions of this bill similar to those of previous bills for the same purpose?

Mr. MANION: There is some slight modification, but they are all in accord with the new legislation. The arrangements are slightly different. By the way, this bill has been before the special committee on railways and shipping.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And has been approved?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very well.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

ABANDONMENT OF RAILWAY TO BE APPROVED BY RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the third reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway system and for other purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MANION: Carried on division.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No; there must be a vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Call the yeas and nays.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I should like to say a few words on the third reading of the bill. My reason for speaking is to emphasize that which I stated in the committee stage of the bill, and to make a last plea for those men who are going to be vitally affected by the provisions of the bill.

During the progress of the bill in the committee stage I took the opportunity of moving an amendment providing compensation for employees who, as a result of the changes being made, would lose their positions. My amendment however was ruled out of order. Upon this occasion I should like to outline one or two of the criticisms made against proposals I submitted to the committee. Some hon. members claimed that in asking for compensation for railway employees who would lose their positions as a result of the operation of the legislation I was establishing a new principle. I do not agree with hon. members who take that stand. On many previous occasions this house has adopted the principle of giving compensation to those who lose their positions as a result of acts of parliament. This house has given compensation to employees who have left the service of the government. After members of the judiciary have served the country for a number of years they are entitled to a pension from the dominion. Only recently when civil service commissioners were retired from their positions the government made provision for very handsome retiring allowances.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a recommendation of the committee in that regard.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, but the principle was established. I am glad that there was a recommendation of a committee which favoured the principle. Then, there are those men in the military service of the country who after giving a number of years' service are entitled to pension. I claim the people engaged in the railway service of Canada are giving as good service as are some in other services I have enumerated.

There is now before the house a resolution asking parliament to approve of a very substantial pension or retiring allowance to members of the tariff board who have given ten years of service. When at this time I ask parliament to approve the principle of giving retiring allowances or some form of compensation to those who have given service to the country, I am not in any shape or form introducing a new principle, but I am merely asking for an extension of one already established by usage and custom. I do not know that I can add anything further at this time to what I have said on previous occasions. I do however take this opportunity to move an amendment to the third reading of the bill. My former amendment was ruled out of order on a technicality. I now move, seconded by Mr. MacInnis:

That the said bill be not now read a third time but that all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"That the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole with the request that the government consider ways and means of providing compensation for such persons whose services will be dispensed with as a result of any of the provisions of this act."

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the amendment is in order. I will look into it. In the meantime the main motion is before the house.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say on this bill. I made some observations when the bill was in committee, but I have something else to say now in regard to the colonization scheme of the railways. The other day the Minister of Labour read a letter from Mr. J. E. Laforce, colonization agent of the Canadian National Railways. That gentleman lives in Montreal. He says the condition of the settlers throughout the country is very good. Sir, the only observation I have to make about this colonization scheme is that it is a mixup. Too many cooks spoil the broth. We have people engaged by the province, others employed by the railway company and others employed by the federal government. The first land grants that were made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were mostly in the west, and after these grants were made by the Macdonald government the Canadian Pacific was interested in settling the western plains, and there we have the beginnings of immigration in this country. Afterward they had a steamship company that carried immigrants from other countries to Canada, and thus immigration came mostly to the west. Now that that field for immigration is closed to a certain extent they have a colonization scheme for the wild parts of the eastern provinces. I wonder what the real instructions are that are given to Mr. Laforce, and what is the work done by him. He writes letters that are like school-boys' exercises, published in many papers, telling people that they should go back to the land. Every time there is a complaint about the way settlers are treated in this country we have a letter from Mr. Laforce painting everything in rose-pink colours, saying these settlers are not suffering at all. The other day a paper in Montreal said I should be more careful about securing affidavits from settlers in the north. I did not write first to these men. I did not know them. They wrote to me telling me about their troubles. And the Minister of Labour answers with a letter from Mr. Laforce saying everything is well in the best possible world. I have no petty political motive in this matter, but what I find strange is that when people are suffering and enduring hardship we have this gentleman writing to the Minister of Labour in Ottawa or to the Minister of Colonization in Quebec, saying that everything is going well. I am surprised. I wonder if that gentleman is working to keep his job. I do not see why a colonization scheme organized by the Canadian National Railways is putting people twenty miles from a main highway. Not only twenty miles from the main automobile highway, but farther than that from the railway. They are sent out as prisoners were during the war, worse off than prisoners in concentration camps—not those in this country because here they were fairly well treated, but in other countries, Germany for instance.

I would like to have the truth about the whole matter. As the Minister of Labour is interested in it, because he subscribes to it; as the Minister of Railways is interested because he has the high supervision of all business done by the Canadian National Railways; as the Minister of Colonization for Quebec is interested also, because some of his employees put these people on the land, I ask them to stand together in order to get the truth of the matter. I appeal to the kind heart of the Minister of Railways, as I did to the kind heart of the Minister of Labour, that they will together arrange to ascertain the truth of the matter at once, and, if these people need food, to supply it to them. I ask the Minister of Railways to see to it that, if their employees paint everything in pink in order to keep their jobs, justice shall be done to them, and if they give unreliable reports that they shall be dealt with at once.

Sir, I do not wish to insist on this point any longer. I bring it to the attention of the house for the last time this session, and I hope the good influence of the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Colonization in Quebec will be exerted to see that the right system is provided for these settlers in the north.

Then I have one more thing to say in regard to the trustees of the Canadian National Railways. I do not know who they may be, and if I have used vehement language in this house it was to prevent a bad appointment to the board. I leave it to the wisdom of the government to appoint fairminded men, independent in character, and having experience that qualifies them to achieve success. Then I have a warning to give to the trustees. If we want to trade with other countries we need vessels and steamship lines. We have very good steamships in the Canadian National fleet, such as the Lady Nelson and other ships of that class. Now with a smaller trade moving there is an increase in unfair and cutthroat competition by private concerns. Every member of the government knows what I allude to. In the maritime provinces, especially in Halifax, there are private firms who try to discriminate against the Canadian National steamships. It is a well known fact, it is superfluous for me to give names, but I warn the government and the trustees against those private firms who want to destroy the trade of the Canadian National steamships between Canada and the West Indies.

My last word is that I hope the trustees will give a fair hearing to complaints of employees who have been suffering injustice in the past, will see to it that they have no grievances in the future. For instance, an engine exploded on the Transcontinental railway not far from Quebec. Why? Because no sufficient inspection was made at the shops. Those who are responsible for that lack of inspection are really guilty of manslaughter, whether they be high officials of the Canadian National railways or whoever they are. May I tell them that it is most important for efficient and economical operation that the rolling stock of the railway be kept in good repair, instead of indulging in high capital expenditures. It will save money to the railway and supply work for the men.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, may I add my word of support to the amendment that has just been moved. I do so not only because I am in favour of the principle enunciated therein, but because I realize more and more that this house and this country will have to recognize in the near future that industry, private industry, must be made more responsible for the well-being of the persons who are employed in it. I recollect that it is not long ago that the Minister of Railways himself made a very eloquent plea at a public meeting, suggesting precisely that principle, that industry could not and must not be permitted to discard its men in the callous, cold-blooded way in which men have been and are being discarded by industry. In my opinion the human element in production is more sacred than dividends or profits. The welfare of the men and women in industry should come before the interests of the investors. Until that principle is recognized we are not going to have either justice or safety in this country.

There is one other matter to which I desire to direct the attention of the minister and the house. That is, within the ranks of the Canadian National system at this moment there are men who are almost directly responsible for any disgrace that may have come upon the system in the last few years and who still hold remunerative positions, who have not been corrected, disciplined or dismissed. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, for over two and a half years this system has been subjected to not only an unfair but a very striking and prolonged attack, and the result has been to bring into disrepute the whole principle of public ownership and the management of the national system. The men themselves feel very hurt in regard to this matter, especially in view of the fact that the principle itself has not been successfully assailed, and because most of the criticism that has been directed against the national system should have been directed against individuals connected with the administration thereof. As for the rank and file of the men, all hon. members have been very generous in their praise, and I can only attribute to them the highest zeal, the greatest efficiency and the most praiseworthy loyalty. It is not the rank and file of the men who are to blame; there are some men on the staff who have not been as zealous in regard to the public interest and the welfare of the Canadian National system as they might have been, and it is to those few individuals that I wish to address my remarks at this time.

Within the ranks of the technical staff, Mr. Speaker, there are some men who should be brought to book. There are persons in that department upon whom much blame should rest. The engineering department of any railway system is one of the most important departments. The engineering department of the Canadian National, as is the case with some other roads, has almost complete control over construction. The operating and mechanical departments of this line, so far as I can ascertain, have nothing to do with the actual construction of branch lines, and that has been the case particularly in western Canada. The construction department of the western division is under the immediate supervision of the chief engineer of western lines at Winnipeg, and under the general control of the chief engineer at headquarters. This construction department had its origin back in the old Mackenzie and Mann days, and it has been maintained by the chief engineer of western lines almost unchanged since that time. It was carried into the so called public ownership form of operation and was continued even during the period of little or no construction. It was used exclusively in the rehabilitation and construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and looked after the construction of branch lines in the west. It was permitted to become very much over-staffed; the organization embraced within its ambit not only engineers but engineers of various and terrible designations. We had engineering experts, supervising engineers, specialty engineers and so on. What has been the result of all this overloading of the technical staff? The Duff report definitely indicates what has been the result. I wish hon. members would turn to page 21 of that report and study paragraph 54, which discloses probably the greatest single source of waste in connection with Canadian National history in our time. The Duff report says:

> It will be observed that the average cost per mile in the case of the Canadian National has shown a progressive increase rising from $40,214 to $51,640 over the period, while the average cost per mile of the Canadian Pacific over the same period has declined from $35,470 to $30,229. The cost of individual branch lines varies not only as between the two systems but as between branches of the same system; nevertheless, a majority of the lines were built in similar territory for like purposes. This difference in costs represents an addition to the annual interest charge of almost $800 per mile.

It must be clear, Mr. Speaker, to any student of railway affairs that an unjustifiable overload of that kind places the Canadian National system in almost a hopeless position. I wonder what has been done; I wonder why these men remain on the staff. After all the chief engineer of the western division must have been responsible for the specifications and construction at the time these lines were built which showed the appalling increase commented upon in the Duff report. I am at a loss to understand why such men should escape while the loyal, hardworking, efficient member of the running trades or the maintenance or operating staff is fired out on his ear without thought of compensation.

It may be suggested that the character of the country through which the lines were constructed differs, but that is not the case; the Duff report so states. It may be argued that construction on the Canadian National was better than construction on the Canadian Pacific, but that argument will not bear examination either. It happens that the grade, the type of construction and everything else differs very little, and there is practically no difference in regard to the specifications. If hon. members would care to go further into the matter they might examine the conditions which attended the construction of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, making allowance for the infinitely different type of construction required because of the bush and muskeg country. I believe it will be found that the Canadian Pacific cost of construction, which showed a decline over a period of years, was closer to the mark than the cost of construction on the Canadian National.

I do hope the minister will take this matter into consideration, if only from the point of view of the rank and file of the men, who know these facts and who know that after all the technical experts, who are supposed to know so much, have been responsible for the appalling excess cost of Canadian National construction, amounting to over $30,073,000. That sum has been thrown into the sink by an over-staffed engineering department, apparently filled with its own authority and sense of power. The men responsible for that condition of affairs are retained in their jobs, and that is the point I want the minister to appreciate. I want to ask him to use his good offices to see that the men who have been responsible for these conditions are dealt with properly, and in the meantime I propose to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps).

Mr. SPEAKER: When this amendment was presented I remarked that in my opinion it was not in order. I think I had better give my ruling on the amendment before any further debate takes place on the assumption that the amendment is properly before the house. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) is that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole with a request to the government, and for that reason the amendment is not in order. If it is to be sent back to committee of the whole it should be with instructions to amend it in certain particulars, not with a request to the government; or it could be referred back to the committee of the whole for further consideration. If it is desired to amend the bill, such amendments can be proposed on the motion for third reading, but an amendment referring the bill back to the committee of the whole with a request to the government to consider ways and means of providing compensation certainly is not in order. Therefore I rule the amendment out of order.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. HEAPS: I must dissent from Your Honour's ruling because just listening to it I cannot grasp its logic. The inference of the ruling is—

Mr. SPEAKER: That may be regretted but I have given my ruling.

Mr. HEAPS: I want to appeal if Your Honour will allow me to give my reasons.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has a right to appeal from the ruling but he has not a right to enter into a debate.

Mr. HEAPS: If I had known that Your Honour was going to rule against my amendment, I would have given my reasons. The inference is that we cannot—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There were other amendments which could have been moved and probably the hon. member could have accomplished his purpose by other methods. This amendment is not in order.

Mr. HEAPS: I must appeal against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) having moved an amendment to the motion that this bill be read a third time and The Speaker having ruled said amendment not to be in order, an appeal is made against the ruling.

Ruling sustained on division.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I imagine that the house and especially the government would be quite dissatisfied if I did not say something more in connection with this measure. I feel that this measure is the most important piece of legislation ever considered by this parliament, that is, as far as the railway employees of Canada are concerned. This bill gives no consideration to the employees of the Canadian railways. From the very commencement of the railway controversy, the employees have received very little consideration. The Duff commission was appointed to deal with the railroad problems of Canada. The slightest recommendation made by that commission would of necessity affect the employees of the railroads, and yet there was not a representative of the employees appointed to that commission. All through the discussions on this question we find that the matter of wages and the working conditions of the men have been discussed only from the standpoint of the investor. When the bill was introduced in the Senate it contained practically nothing by way of protection for the employees. It is true that a couple of slight amendments were made in that chamber but I think it has transpired from the discussion in this house that in the main the employees were not protected as they should be. After a considerable controversy in this house, amounting almost to a fight, a few amendments in the interests of the employees were adopted, but in my estimation these amendments do not go nearly as far as the men expected the government would go. For instance, subsection 3 of section 16 contains a very indefinite statement. I ask the minister to follow me while I read this subsection. It reads:

The National company and the Pacific company for and on behalf as aforesaid are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company, created as in subsection two of this section referred to, shall give preference for work to employees in any services or on any works taken over by such new company.

Surely the words "to endeavour" have no place in that subsection. I have an amendment to refer this bill back to committee which I will send over for the minister's consideration. It is quite evident that at this stage any suggestion coming from this side of the house will not be considered very closely. I submit in all earnestness that the words "to endeavour" have no place in this subsection and I suggest that they be struck out before the bill finally passes. The amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) covering compensation has been ruled out of order, and the amendment which I proposed to compensate employees for property losses due to economic measures which might be adopted was refused. It is true that the minister has stated that if section 2 of the bill was found to work out unjustly to the men, an amendment would be considered at a future session, but the section as it now stands does not go nearly far enough. An amendment moved by the leader of the opposition to provide that one of the trustees shall be a representative of the employees was also refused. The board of trustees is now surrounded by all safeguards possible and it is entrenched in a position where it can do almost anything with the road and, in my opinion, almost anything with the employees. It is only fair that one of the trustees should be a representative of the employees. The minister has said that the door was not closed, and I am living in hopes that the government may yet decide to appoint a representative of the employees as a member of this board of trustees. Representations against this measure have been made from many points by many organizations. I have under my hand a petition from Fort William which was sent to:

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, Right Hon. R. J. Manion—

I think the minister ought to take note of this when they address him as the "right honourable." I know I would if I were in his place.

—Right Hon. Mackenzie King, Hon. W. A. Gordon and Joseph H. Harris, chairman of railway committee.

This comes from the joint organizations in and around the head of the lakes, as follows:

Third Mount McKay Lodge No. 298, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America.
Shuniah Lodge No. 347, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America.
Thunder Bay Division No. 536, Order of Railway Conductors of America.
Thunder Cape Division No. 631, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.
International Association of Machinists No. 820.
Port Arthur Lodge No. 626, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.
Silver Islet Lodge No. 593, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers.
Port Arthur Division Order of Railway Telegraphers.
Lake Head Division No. 32, Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees.

I should have added that the petition was also addressed to:

Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa.

Together with those representations came a petition in the form of a photostat copy from practically seventy-three business men from the head of the lakes.

Mr. MANION: What was the gist of the petition? It was against amalgamation, was it not?

Mr. HEENAN: It was against amalgamation, yes, and the number of unemployed this measure would create. It is true that the petition was against amalgamation, but it added that this bill would create quite a number of unemployed, and also, in the last paragraph, it says:

It would not eliminate the tax burden of the citizens of Canada. The Canadian National Railways as shown in the Duff report, had an earning power from 1923 to 1931 inclusive, of $281,211,847 in excess of its operating expenses, but cannot take care of the interest on borrowed money. This bond indebtedness would not be taken over by the privately owned railway, but would still be chargeable to the people of Canada and paid for by them through taxation. Therefore, we maintain, it is far more desirable and businesslike to operate the Canadian National Railways in its entirety, and permit it to earn its operating expenses rather than sacrifice its most productive parts to a privately owned railway and still retain, for the taxpayers of Canada, the debt of borrowed money and the disastrous and far-reaching results of further unemployment of such gigantic proportions.

Mr. MANION: Of course that petition has been complied with in the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister says so. I am sorry I have to disagree with him.

Then we have resolutions from the town of Kenora, the town of Sioux Lookout, from Hornepayne, Nakina and Port Arthur, and from many organizations. Many of these have asked that the bill be left over for at least a year, so that the government might make a survey and take into consideration what the railroad companies, or the government which in the long run is responsible, propose to do with the number of railway men who will be discharged under this measure.

I also consider that this legislation is a breach of faith with the electors of Canada, and manifestly so, because the present government, the Prime Minister and his followers, promised from one end of the country to the other that there would be amalgamation never and competition ever. The minister says that this is provided in the bill. This is, to my mind, merely a very pious wish, but in order to satisfy the opposition there was incorporated in the measure part IV, section 27:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to authorize the amalgamation of any railway company which is comprised in National railways with any company which is compromised in Pacific railways nor to authorize the unified management and control of the railway system which forms part of National railways with the railway system which forms part of the Pacific railways.

That, I think, is what the minister alluded to a few moments ago. But my contention is, that notwithstanding that, section 16 of the bill and the authority given to the trustees under it, practically amalgamates the operations of the railroads of Canada; giving the trustees power to form:

> New companies controlled by stock ownership, equitably apportioned between the companies.

What is that but amalgamation? It gives them power to grant:

> Leases, entrusting agreements, or licences, or agreements for the pooling and division of earnings arising from the joint operation of any part or parts of freight or passenger traffic, or express, telegraph, or other operating activities or services;
> Joint trackage, running rights, joint ownership, or joint operating agreements, depending upon the nature of the property—

And so forth. What provision can be put into the law stating that there will be no amalgamation when there is right in that section a direction to the trustees that they shall amalgamate these services? I have been advised—I have not seen this—that the railroad companies are now selling joint tickets and they have their time cards arranged for consolidation of train services. What is the difference between calling it amalgamation, consolidation or cooperation? So far as the practical working out of the railways is concerned, the terms all mean the same thing. While it is true that section 27, which I read a little while ago, provides that the trustees can make no amalgamation of the finances of the companies and so on, yet the practical working out of the bill is an amalgamation of the railways. But even at that, it is a breach of faith because the present Prime Minister, when he was leader of the opposition, not only promised amalgamation never but said: Competition ever. This is just the opposite of competition; we are practically eliminating competition and in its elimination we are sacrificing, as I have said, between 20,000 and 40,000 employees. I am still of the opinion that by this measure at least 20,000 good citizens of Canada will be thrown out of employment. We are sacrificing them without any consideration as to what we propose to do for the future of those people or their families and other dependents. We are sacrificing them for what purpose? In the interests, as I have said before, of the money lenders of New York. We are throwing out from their employment between 20,000 and 40,000 Canadian citizens, men who were encouraged to enter railway service many years ago, and we are doing so to pay the money lenders of New York. When the time comes to take sides in this parliament, so long as I have a seat in this chamber I am going to take the side of and vote for the labour men of this country, our own good citizens, rather than taking the side of the money-lenders of New York and other parts of the world so that they get their last pound of flesh.

Mr. MANION: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Would he mind offering to the committee some method by which we can get rid of the obligation of paying interest to what he terms the money-lenders, whether in New York or Canada or England?

Mr. HEENAN: I thought I had done that before, Mr. Speaker, but now that the minister has asked the question, and in the hope that he is really desirous of getting my opinion I shall give it to him. These are days of world depression. No one will deny that now. The only people who did deny it were the Conservative party in 1930, when they said it was a Canadian depression and that if they were elected they would remedy conditions within a very short time. But not even the members of the government will deny to-day that these are days of a world depression, days when every person is called upon to make sacrifices. The Canadian railroad men through the economies to be effected by this measure are called upon to make sacrifices, and for what purpose? So that we can pay the interest on our bonded indebtedness. Now is it not feasible and is it not right that we should tell the money-lenders of New York—I would do it whether it is right or wrong if the minister wants to know—that during this time of depression and until it has rolled by they could not get their interest?

Mr. MANION: Which, of course, is repudiation of our debt.

Mr. HEENAN: I would not care whether you called it repudiation of our debt or not. Do we not also owe the citizens of Canada some debt? Have we not indebtedness to the workingmen of this country, to provide them with proper safeguards? When you talk of repudiation, must we always see that there is no repudiation of our indebtedness to the men who are lending the money, while at the same time we repudiate our debt to our returned soldiers who went overseas and fought for this empire and came back to their old positions on the railroads, and many of whom are going to be discharged under this bill? They have not got seniority enough to ensure them being kept on, and they are now going to be thrown off, many of them without a war pension because some of them were not injured and others did not ask for a pension. They are to be thrown into the discard so that some foreigner who loaned a million dollars to the Canadian National Railways will receive his last ounce of flesh. Yes, repudiate if you will, and when it comes to the time when I have to decide whether I am going to repudiate our debt to the man who has millions or repudiate our debt to the man who has nothing, I am going to keep faith with the workingman who has helped to build up these roads to the condition they are in to-day. When the minister talks about repudiation, why does he not think of the promise given to the railroad men in 1930? The promise to end unemployment, the promise that those engines that were standing idle on the side tracks near the roundhouse would soon be belching forth smoke again and hauling commodities back and forth across this country, creating employment for Canadian railroad men at higher wages than were prevailing at that time. Are we not repudiating our word of honour to these people who voted for the government on the assurance that they would get consideration? This bill is the repudiation of everything that was promised to the electors of Canada. It means just the opposite of competition. It is amalgamation in the operation of the railroads of Canada. It will create unemployment instead of ending it. There is no provision made to take care of the men who will be thrown off, no provision for financial compensation of any kind. It is simply a case of breaking faith with the railroad men of this country, and I have no apology to make for saying that I am going to vote against the third reading of this bill, and that if I had a hundred votes they would all go against its third reading.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have it very clearly understood that we in this corner are not opposed to public ownership of the railroads, which ultimately will involve amalgamation. We believe in public ownership, but we believe in a genuine public ownership, and not in a public ownership which gives control very largely if not entirely to the financial interests, and which permits a private road to run in competition with the public road, and very often, it seems to us, throws the advantages to the privately owned road. We think the time is coming when in this country we shall have to have complete public ownership of our roads involving amalgamation at least, and including probably under one transportation commission not only the railroads but the motor transportation services and possibly the air transportation services.

At the present time we are not opposed to all economies which may be brought forward. We think that it is inevitable that some economies should be made, but according to this bill the economies are to be made in the interests of the bondholders. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has denied that, but not very successfully; I do not think he was on good ground. It is undoubted that under the present set-up the bondholders are in danger of losing and because the Dominion government has to pay the deficits on the road the Canadian public is under the necessity of carrying a very heavy load. Economies should be effected if possible, but what we claim is that the rights of the individuals who have helped to build up this system, the employees of the railways, should not be neglected. I think the position which we take is a sound one.

We would say that the care of the people who are thrown out of work by means of the economies under this bill should be a first charge on the savings effected. The minister tries to evade that by saying that there will not be a great many men thrown out of work. Well, I think everyone will recognize that the payroll of the employees is one of the largest items of railway expenditure, and if we are to have economy which will amount to anything it must be made as a result of laying off a very considerable number of men. That must be in contemplation. I quoted Mr. Beatty to that effect on one occasion, and I think his opinion still stands and is reasonable.

Further, the minister says that we ought not to make this provision ahead of time—wait until we see that men are thrown out of work, and how many will be thrown out. I do not think that is the way in which legislation should be put through the house. When the avowed purpose is to effect economies which can be made only through throwing people out of work, the time to safeguard these people is not at the next session of parliament, but now.

A good deal has been said in recent years with regard to the interference by government in business. I think we may as well frankly face the fact that the whole of our railway enterprise is decidedly what might be termed an interference by government in business. The Canadian Pacific railway would not have been built in the first instance had it not received very large subsidies from the public. Later on the Canadian Pacific railway and other roads that were constructed were able to maintain their freight rates because of legislation passed by this house and by decisions of the Board of Railway Commissioners. It was the failure of private ownership, as we all know, that brought the Canadian National railway into being. There is a constant "interference" in business by the government, if you like to put it that way. The fact is that this interference has been pressed upon parliament and the public by the roads affected. I believe the evidence is clear that the present bill based on the Duff report is the result of pressure from the roads. In fact we were told by the minister that Mr. Beatty had suggested a commission should be appointed to consider the whole matter. So that if parliament is taking action at this time it is upon the request of the railways. There is no question of the government simply interfering in private affairs without any proper reason for so doing. In effect the railways have come and said, "You arrange matters so that we can make these savings possible; arrange matters so that the bondholders will be protected." We now say that parliament has a perfect right to lay down the conditions under which this measure may go through.

The minister asked the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River how it would be possible for us to finance the matter if we did not continue to pay the bondholders.

Mr. MANION: No, I asked him how he would get rid of the interest payments on the bonds,—payments which we have to meet.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is taken for granted, of course, that we have to meet interest payments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The rights of the men come first.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Our point is that the rights of the employees and the general public of Canada take priority over the rights of the bondholders.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That means a repudiation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not necessarily a repudiation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Absolutely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it does not necessarily mean a repudiation.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what they are doing in Russia.

Mr. MANION: I ask this question in all good part: How would the hon. member get rid of these interest payments that we owe to bondholders and mortgage holders of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister has recently been in consultation with the President of the United States, and I suggest that he might have extended his investigations into the way the American president is proposing to deal with financial matters.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Quite an answer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it is an answer. It is not the Russian method; it is the American method. I think we have to come to act more or less along the lines being followed in the United States to-day.

Mr. MULLINS: What about the Canadian bondholders?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Canadian bondholders will have to take their loss, as most other men are doing.

Mr. MULLINS: And you propose giving them common stock in the railways; is that what you propose?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some of the bondholders are tremendously concerned with what we are going to do with them. I would point out that if the bondholders are adversely affected by the present depression and the policies of the present government it is a good thing, because all the rest of the population for some years has been adversely affected. I come back to my original point, namely, that I can see no reason why the bondholders should always be given priority over those of other sections of the community? I believe I am here on solid ground. If other sections of the community have had to take losses, the time has come when the bondholders will have to take their losses. It seems to me that in a matter of this kind the needs and the rights of the employees on the roads have priority over those of the bondholders.

Mr. LENNOX: And make a legal obligation a scrap of paper?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When it comes to a conflict between what are termed legal obligations and what I would term moral obligations, the moral obligations take priority.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What would become of the credit of the country?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Where is it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, where is it to-day?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are trying to sustain it, and you are trying to break it up.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Where is credit to-day? I would point out that as a matter of fact the bondholders to-day, as we have said in other connections, are receiving considerably more than they are entitled to receive, when we consider the purchasing power of the dollar at the time the debts were contracted in contrast with the purchasing power of the dollar to-day. Actually, bondholders are receiving an increase in wages.

Mr. MULLINS: Not at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is all very well for members to shake their heads, but what I have said is so. We know that the bonds issued many years ago were issued when the dollar had not the purchasing power that it has to-day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Prime Minister said so.

Mr. MANION: Some of the bonds of the Canadian National Railways were issued away back fifty or sixty years ago, long before present conditions existed.

Mr. MULLINS: Sure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, that may be so.

Mr. MANION: I refer to some of the Grand Trunk bonds.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And some of them were not. No doubt in absolute justice that would involve a very complicated arrangement. In the meantime we face an actual situation in which to-day, under conditions of depression which have gone on for some time, we cannot possibly pay the interest on our bonded indebtedness and at the same time give what is due to the employees of the road. I say that when that situation is faced in my judgment there is no alternative but to recognize frankly the priority of the claims of men and women of this country. If that involves repudiation, I say repudiate. By all means, if it involves repudiation, repudiate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what your friends in Russia say.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is easy to speak about Russia; that is the cheapest kind of thing to do. What is in effect repudiation has taken place in almost every country of the world. I shall give an illustration: I happened to be in England when Great Britain went off gold. I had invested good Canadian money in sterling, and when I came to cash my sterling cheques I found they were discounted twenty-five per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty per cent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; at that time it was only twenty-five per cent. There was repudiation on the part of the British government to the extent of twenty-five per cent.

Mr. MANION: That was not repudiation; that was a loss on exchange.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All right, call it a loss on exchange, if you would like it that way. Remember this, the word "repudiation" was not introduced into this discussion by me, but by some hon. member opposite. If hon. members wish an illustration of repudiation, I am giving them one.

Mr. MANION: But the hon. member has not given an illustration of repudiation; that is our point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This road has been called a government road, we have been told that this legislation would practically turn it over into the hands of receivers. But we cannot escape responsibility for the conditions under which it is to be turned over. I believe that is clear. As my colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has pointed out we have recognized the principle of the rights of men in the cases of the civil service commissioners, judges, the military and so on. We have recognized the rights of people who have been doing service for the government. Although in the direct sense of the word the railways have not been a government concern, we have all regarded them as such and have taken the responsibility for their losses. At this time we cannot lightly relieve ourselves of responsibility for the people this legislation will affect. We have given instance after instance of what is happening in poolings which have already taken place, of people who because of this legislation and arrangements for economy have already lost equities in their homes, people who because of having been transferred are to-day out of jobs, people who are too old to hope under present conditions to find new jobs. I urge these men have certain claims upon the Canadian National Railways and upon the government. For that reason my colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) sought by his amendment to place this question fairly before the house. I think we have a right to do so. I have tried to alter that amendment into such form as I think brings it within the rules of order, and I would move the following, seconded by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell):

That the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that the following clause be inserted:

"That the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway Company shall provide compensation to those whose services will be dispensed with as a result of the operation of any of the provisions of this act.

I think that is eminently fair in principle. It is the least that we can do as representing the general public. If it involves certain heavier expenditure, and that will interfere with payment of interest on the bonded debt, that is something that we cannot help; we regard these rights of the people as prior, and we think that they should be recognized as the legislation is being passed.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I desire to say only one word. I represent a constituency in which there are many railway employees of both companies. I have received, especially during the last few days, from labour unions in my constituency, resolutions of protest against this bill and approving of the stand taken by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan). I want to register my vote against the bill.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the amendment is put I would say in reply to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that I represent a constituency in which there is a whole town of railway men. I saw some of them on Saturday, and I saw more of them last night, and they have not one word to say against the bill.

An hon. MEMBER: Those you saw!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only representation they have ever made is that which I mentioned here on the second reading of this bill, namely that they are against the principle of amalgamation. As good citizens of this country they are willing to let this bill go through and see what economies may be effected in order that the railways of the country may live, otherwise there may be no railways and no jobs for any of them. I venture to suggest that all the whirlwind of talk and debate that we have heard in this house, led by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, is so much propaganda. That is what it is considered to be by the level-headed men of this country, and I want to tell the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the railway men I have talked to concerning this matter repudiate the member for Kenora-Rainy River as their spokesman.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Like fun they do!

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member represents forty-five railway men in his riding!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A whole town of 1,800 people.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion this amendment would involve the expenditure of public moneys and therefore could only be moved by a minister with the approval of the crown. It is therefore out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I cannot think that this amendment involves expenditure of money by this government. Two companies are involved, the companies will have to pay the money, not this government.

Mr. SPEAKER: The argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is not sufficiently conclusive to cause me to alter my opinion that the amendment as moved by him involves the expenditure of public money which must be raised by taxation. Legislation of that sort can only be introduced by a minister with the approval of the crown. To say that it is a private company is in my opinion merely quibbling, because the money spent by the Canadian National Railways must be voted by this parliament. And money votes of that sort are preceded by resolutions to refer them to the committee of the whole where they must be considered before they can be considered by the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under those circumstances I must appeal against the ruling of Your Honour.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being charged by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), as he charged the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) with speaking for propaganda purposes, I intend to make a few remarks at this time, the last opportunity of speaking on this bill before it becomes law. I have in my hand a copy of the Canadian Unionist which came to me this morning. It contains the full speech of the hon. member for Kenora taken from Hansard, upon the second reading of the railway bill I have never seen reported in any press on this continent any such full and favourably reported speech of my own since coming to this house. That is how the speech of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, with his photo attached, has been referred to in this labour paper. I have only been able hurriedly to review this speech, but I believe it speaks not only for the railway men and the people of this country but for the Liberal party as well. That is all I can say with regard to the rather measly accusation made by the hon. member for Sunbury and some place else.

I am going to oppose the third reading of this bill although it is a much better bill than it was when it first started on its jaunt through parliament. As we know, it was originally defined by the Duff commission. It then went through the fanning mill of the upper house. It did not receive a very thorough screening there, the screens were too large and they let a lot of objectionable stuff through. It was given another fanning in the Commons. This was a more thorough fanning machine, it got out more dross and screenings but there is still some vicious stuff and refuse left in. I want to get after that.

There is one objection, sufficiently important as I see it to condemn the bill to perdition forever, which can be made to this legislation. I refer to the abdication by the government of any safety control over the Hudson Bay railway. After this bill becomes law, the Hudson Bay railway can be taken over by these twin railway boards. The day after that it can be dismantled by the same twin boards. No restraining hand can be held out by this government to prevent this action.

Mr. MANION: The Hudson Bay railway does not come under this bill at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, no, but it can be brought under. That is a very nice interjection but unfortunately I am on my feet yet and I can puncture it right away. The Hudson Bay railway can be taken over at any time by this trustee board which has no railway president thereon. The national railways is still headless, as far as having a president is concerned. This trustee board has even more authority than the old presidency. It can take over that railway to-day and dismantle it to-morrow. Someone may say: even though the government has abdicated all authority over this great national railway which is the property of the men, women and sons of Canada, it will use a restraining influence upon any possible depredations by these twin boards. If it exerts any influence at all, what kind will it be? This government decapitated the railway by retiring Sir Henry Thornton; having done that, do you think it will refrain from doing less in connection with the remaining body of this headless railway? Certainly not. We know a tree by its fruits, and the fruits of this government, as far as the national railway is concerned, have been such as will turn sour in the mouths of the people of Canada who believe in the future of this railway. How can I back up that statement? I do it by referring to the penchant this government party has had for destroying this Hudson Bay railway as well as the National. It attempted to send this railway to Port Nelson when every engineer in Canada knew that that port was a useless and hopeless outlet or inlet for the citizens of western Canada. If the road had been sent there it would have been ruined, and I invite anyone to challenge that statement. I invite any hon. member, including the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) to challenge that statement. If I attempt to read anything by way of proof the chances are the members of the press gallery will take a hike for their other rear quarters; they do not like to hear anyone reading anything. However, I may be obliged to read something if challenged but I will be prepared for their immediate exit. Perhaps I had better keep this opportunity and proof for another day. "He who fights and runs away will live to fight another day," if no one accepts his challenge now. It will be a fine thing for a subsequent occasion, and I have the dope to prove my statement. I have more to say but they cannot bear it.

There is very little use going over the past. I made only one note for my speech, and I made that on the back of this precious bill. That was the word "Pilate," not "pilot." Our hon. friends in the government have been the modern political Pilates in their attitude towards this national railway. They have washed their hands of this fine property of ours, they have abdicated their power over this railway and have handed it over to Herod. Both the original Pilate and Herod were afraid to do what in their hearts they desired to do. They had no Duff commission or Senate to which to pass the buck in those remote days.

Mr. STEVENS: They had the sanhedrim.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The action of the original Pilate and Herod finally resulted in the crucifixion which was ordained from the beginning of the world. These modern Pilates and Herods have been afraid like the originals to do what they would have liked to do. They took off the head of Sir Henry Thornton but they did not know how to mutilate the body sufficiently so that it would not be restored to life. The government have passed the buck to the national railway board and a tragedy is about to be enacted. As I see it, though parabolic this is mighty true to life.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I hear the ignorant guffaw of hon. gentlemen opposite who do not seem to see the parallel between the two.

I will stop now and give them an opportunity to let this filter through their thickened craniums into which you could not jamb a Liberal idea even with the use of a ten-pound sledge hammer.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to my hon. friend. We have campaigned together for more than forty years in western Canada and his speech to-day is the same old red country schoolhouse one that he used to deliver most effectively in the west, all the time misleading the struggling masses on the western prairies. Representing as I do the most outstanding agricultural constituency in western Canada, what do I care what is done with the railroads as regards cooperation or anything else so long as we are given cheaper freight rates so that we may get the products of the land to the markets of the world? During all the years the hon. gentleman sat on the government benches there was not a single reduction in freight rates, either by sea or land; nothing but higher and higher ocean and land rates. No man can farm in western Canada under the conditions to which he is subjected to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. MULLINS: Yes, but this is the result of the actions of hon. gentlemen who occupied government benches during the last eight or ten years. Let me for a moment draw the attention of the house to the Petersen commission. What a fiasco it was! I was brought as a witness from western Canada to try to get a reduction in freight rates. With what result? Nothing at all, not one iota of reduction. Forty years ago in western Canada we had lower freight rates than we have to-day. When the Canadian Pacific was the only railway operating in the west, freight rates were 40 per cent less than they are to-day. But hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, gradually raised and raised the rates until now they are prohibitive for the farmer who wants to deliver his products to the markets of the world. How insincere hon. gentlemen opposite are! This is impressed upon me when I think of one gentleman who made a speech in Montreal in reference to the Hudson Bay railway and of my hon. friend opposite who a few minutes ago talked so kindly of that railway. What did the gentleman say in talking to an audience in Montreal? Let me read this:

> The Conservatives adopt a different attitude. The finances are upside down, yet they spend millions on projects which can wait a year or two years, or even five years, without harming the stability of the country. What is happening to-day as regards Port Churchill? We have Hon. Doctor Manion acting like a beggar in the street, begging people to ship some grain over the Hudson Bay railway to Port Churchill.

That is the kind of speech hon. gentlemen opposite make when they get down to Montreal; then when they come into the House of Commons they talk differently for the benefit of the man out west.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the gentleman's name?

Mr. MULLINS: Yes, hon. gentlemen opposite use the soft pedal here, but this gentleman did not when he was making that speech in Montreal. Do hon. gentlemen opposite want his name?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It does not matter.

Mr. MULLINS: I have his name; it is Cardin.

Mr. CARDIN: May I ask the hon. gentleman to give the date?

Mr. MULLINS: I will answer the hon. member when I have finished.

Mr. CARDIN: What is the date of that speech?

Mr. MULLINS: That is the hon. member's speech in Montreal.

Mr. CARDIN: When?

Mr. MULLINS: June 18, 1932. That shows the insincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CARDIN: I did not speak at that time; that is a mistake.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) assumes to speak on behalf of labour. I have ridden the freight trains in the pioneer days of western Canada and I have associated with those railway men. Far be it from me to do anything that would be detrimental to the men who operate the road. I was travelling over the Canadian Pacific when the line was coupled up at Jackfish many years ago. I know the hardships endured by the men who pioneered in those days. To-day the answer of the railroads as to why they do not give a lower rate, is: Look at the wages. The reason is not wages at all. In those days they had five of a crew and when we asked for fourteen cars for cattle, they gave us a trainload rate of sixty and a half cents a hundred from Winnipeg to Montreal. To-day we are paying eighty-five cents a hundred and the crew of a train still numbers five; they are hauling five times the tonnage, seventy-five cars of cattle, with just five of a crew. So the reason is not wages. But when I look at the head officials, I think of Winnipeg with Sir William White, who came from the track up; I think of Robert Kerr, George Shaw and William Stitt. Their entire salaries did not amount to as much as one railway official is getting to-day in western Canada. It is the head officials who are getting the high salaries. Those salaries should be withdrawn so that the farmer out west may have some chance in shipping his products.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are insincere so far as the Hudson Bay railway is concerned, and if this government had not been in power, I do not believe we would have had the Hudson Bay railway to-day. In western Canada we have great hopes as regards that outlet; it can be developed and because of its coolness it is one of the best outlets for the live stock industry of the west. At times the port of Montreal is extremely hot, but up north we have good cool weather and the cattle will ship to the British market far better than they will out of ports down east. We want, however, all the outlets we can get; we want to be able to ship out of the country and at a lower freight rate.

I say to the railroads: I do not care what you do about cooperation or amalgamation but I do not want to see you build these luxurious trains between Toronto and Montreal and Toronto and Ottawa, trains de luxe for the crême de la crême of eastern Canada, while the man out west is struggling on side lines, sitting on ribbed seats so that when he gets up his back is like a washboard. That is the condition to which we are subjected on the branch lines in my constituency, but we are putting up with that. I want these luxurious trains withdrawn so that the man out west may have a chance to get back to conditions as they were in the pioneer days out west, when, over forty years ago freight rates were 40 per cent less than they are to-day. Under present conditions a man cannot carry on. The salary list on the Canadian National Railways—and there are some from the United States amongst the officials—is terrific; no farmer in a lifetime makes as much as these men were making in a year. These conditions will be righted by this government and through this cooperation. We say and I say: Amalgamation never, competition ever. That will be carried out and by it I hope the commodities of western Canada can reach the markets for which they are destined.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I do not intend to delay the house more than a few minutes. A number of hon. gentlemen have spoken and there are a few remarks I should like to make.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) took up the question of compensation for the men laid off. That question has already been dealt with very fully, and it has been pointed out, and I can only repeat, that when the time comes to look after all classes of men who are out of employment the railway men should be looked after at that time, but I do not believe that now is the time to pick out one particular class of men and give them compensation while other men, and even men in that same particular class, railway men who have been laid off previously, are not being taken care of.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) mentioned one item in the Duff report which so far as I know has not been mentioned before in the house, and that was the cost of branch lines. He touched upon a very important statement made by the Duff commission to the effect that the cost of branch lines in Canada on the Canadian National had been very much heavier than the cost on the Canadian Pacific, by the amount of some $30,000,000 in the last ten years. That was not overlooked by the government. I myself asked the Canadian National to give me an explanation of the difference in costs, and I hold in my hand a report which they gave to me some six or seven months ago, some time after the Duff report was tabled. They claim in that report that the branch lines went through different types of territory. It has been argued that that was not the case. I am not going to enter into a technical discussion of that kind, but I would point out to the hon. gentleman who stated that some of the officers now in charge of construction were the same as those who were in charge when the Duff report was made and during that construction period, that very heavy cuts have been made in the salaries of the officers higher up. For instance, a few of them who were drawing $30,000 are to-day receiving $18,000, or not much more than half of what they were getting. The engineer in charge of that construction work was not one of those getting that high salary, but he has been cut in proportion. After all it must be pointed out that the government has not the power and had not the power to dismiss any of these men, whatever officers they were. The government, through myself as minister, did draw the matter to the attention of the directors, and the directors and the present management did bring about the economies which have been effected, and I submit that those economies were very marked and emphatically large. I pointed out in another address that I made in this house that apart from the wages for the men, with which we had nothing to do, the economies among the officers drawing over $3,000 amounted alone to something like $2,000,000 in 1932 as compared with 1930.

I do not think the hon. member for Bow River was quite fair in saying that there was a campaign against public ownership. Certainly there was not so far as the government was concerned. There was a campaign of education to tell the people of this country what it was necessary for them to know, the immense taxation which they had to pay to meet the deficits on the government roads. That is all that was done. So far as the government was concerned, there was certainly nothing at all in the shape of a campaign against government ownership.

So far as the amendment of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) is concerned it seeks to amend the clause dealing with the creation of new companies reading as follows:

> The National company and the Pacific company for and on behalf as aforesaid are directed to endeavour to provide that any new company, created as in subsection two of this section referred to, shall give preference for work to employees in any services or on any works taken over by such new company.

The hon. gentleman proposes to wipe out the words "to endeavour." My legal officers advise me that so far as the companies can legally be forced to carry out this—shall I say—admonition to them they are forced to do so under this clause, and that to wipe out "to endeavour" would have no effect whatever. Therefore there is no reason for accepting the amendment. My hon. friend repeated not once, but many times, that no matter what we may say this bill is for the purposes of amalgamation. I can in reply only refer him to the last clause of the bill in which it is specifically stated that nothing in this act shall be deemed to authorize the amalgamation of the two companies. I do not wish to argue or harp upon that question any further.

I was satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) frankly came out in the open and said, particularly the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that they believed we were looking after the moneylenders and ignoring the human element, and that we must repudiate our debts. I wish to point out in a sentence that the bonds of the Canadian National Railways or rather the mortgages of the Canadian National Railways, because that is what the bonds of the Canadian National Railways guaranteed by the Canadian government are, are just as much the debts of this dominion as are the ordinary bonds which have been issued by the government of Canada at various times since confederation, and when the government of Canada takes the attitude that it will repudiate the payment of interest on the bonds of the government railways which it has guaranteed, then the government of Canada will have to take the position also of repudiating its ordinary debt, and I simply submit without further argument that that is the position taken by Russia, and Canada has not yet come to the position of repudiating its debts.

I would further point out to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and some other members on both sides of the house who have made a very strong argument in regard to the human element, that because we have not accepted everything they proposed, although we have accepted a great deal, does not in any way alter the fact that we are just as anxious to look after the men as is the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River or other hon. members of the house. But it is worth pointing out that the Canadian National Railways in January, February and March, and I think April of this year, has not covered its operating expenses, let alone paying interest on its debt to the public. That in itself shows the seriousness of the situation and the need for the economies which have been made. It also shows the difficulty of complying with every request that is made by some hon. member of the house.

I have two other points to make and then I will sit down. May I point out that the pooling arrangements which have taken place in connection with the services between Ottawa and Toronto, and Montreal and Toronto, were not brought about under this bill at all. Both the railways to-day, without this bill at all, have the right to go ahead and make the pooling arrangements which they have made, and those pooling arrangements had nothing whatever to do with this bill.

One last word about the speech of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), who said that we were in a position and implied that we would likely take advantage of it, to dismantle the Hudson Bay railway. I cannot quite understand why he should say that except for the obvious reason that he thinks it is pretty good political propaganda.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is what the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said.

Mr. MANION: And he said the truth. Why would this government for the last three years have been spending millions on the Hudson Bay railway to complete it and get it ready for operation and for opening this year if we were going to dismantle it? The statement is too foolish to waste time on.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the government is going to stand by the bill as it is submitted.

Mr. THOMAS F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this bill will in any way be a solution for the present difficulties in which our railways find themselves. I believe, and have done so for some months past, that if the railways were left alone to themselves they would be compelled by the present hard times to cut down their expenses and a great curtailment in expenditures would take place. I would not have spoken at any length on the third reading of this bill but for some remarks that were made in this house recently. One was made just a few moments ago by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). He pointed out how low the freight rates had been in this country forty years ago, and compared them with the rates to-day. I hardly agree with his comparison, and would point out that any low freight rates which we had we obtained under a Liberal government, and those rates continued up until 1910.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, ho, ho. When a Conservative government came into power in 1911 the freight rates were raised, and they were raised higher than they are now. That was done under a Conservative government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose you remember there was a war on.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, I know there was a war, but I am telling the hon. member that it was under a Conservative government that the rates were raised, and it was a Conservative government that was in power during the time of the war. Is that not so?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: After the war, when the Liberal government were in power and we tried to have a reduction of freight rates under what is known as the Crowsnest pass agreement, where did my hon. friends stand? Where did the Conservative party stand in those days? They stood for raising the rates; it was a Liberal government that endeavoured to bring them down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DONNELLY: If you wish to speak, speak after.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot do it; you are asking for it. Take your medicine.

Mr. DONNELLY: The same contention arose with regard to the Hudson Bay railway. We have heard the Minister of Railways and Canals tell how much the government has done for that railway. I say to him that the Hudson Bay railway was about completed when this government came into office; it was practically completed by a Liberal government. Yes, and why was it sent to Churchill instead of to Nelson? When the hon. member for Melville said that the railway should be built to Churchill instead of to Nelson he was condemned not only in the House of Commons but in the western provinces. The railway has been completed to Churchill, and is in operation, but many of us in western Canada believe the same interests which condemned the Hudson Bay railway, and which attempted to send it to Nelson, are beginning to condemn it again. When the measure before us becomes law we do not want the board of trustees to have control over that railway. With that in mind I move the following amendment:

That this bill be not now read a third time but be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of including the following amendment:

That the Hudson Bay railway as now administered by the Department of Railways be not permitted to pass under the jurisdiction of the railway trustees as in this bill constituted, or under any other authority than that of the government of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: We will have to take the amendments one at a time. There is one amendment before the house now, is there not? On third reading one amendment must be disposed of before another may be taken up.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think there is any amendment before the house.

Mr. MANION: Did not the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River move an amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was ruled out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: I sent it over merely as a suggestion.

Mr. MANION: Then it was my fault that the Prime Minister was wrong in his assumption. I thought the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River had moved an amendment.

Amendment negatived.

The house divided on the motion (Mr Manion) which was agreed to on the following division:

STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER

LEGISLATION TO GIVE EXTRATERRITORIAL OPERATION TO ACTS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 74, respecting extraterritorial operation of acts of the parliament of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Mr. DUPRE: This question of extra-territoriality is of primary importance, and was dealt with by the Imperial conference of 1926. The problem was afterwards referred to the committee of experts, which later became merged in the conference on the operation of dominion legislation which met in 1929. That conference, after very careful examination of the whole question, recognized that in view of the state of uncertainty, and the differences in the dominion constitutions themselves, which were reflected in the legal opinion in these dominions, it was desirable that legislation should be passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom to make it very clear that the constitutional limitation did not exist. Accordingly a clause was recommended for inclusion in the statute of Westminster, and that action was approved by the Imperial conference of 1930. That clause is section 3 of the statute of Westminster, which is printed in the explanatory note to this bill, and reads as follows:

> It is hereby declared and enacted that the parliament of a dominion has full power to make laws having extraterritorial operation.

As a result of this enactment, there can be no doubt that all legislation enacted by the parliament of Canada since December 11, 1931, which is the date on which the statute of Westminster came into force, has extraterritorial operation in all cases in which that intention of parliament has been clearly indicated. The statute however has no effect upon Canadian enactments prior to that date. There undoubtedly are on the statute books laws concerning which the question might be raised, giving rise to unnecessary litigation. The question arose with regard to the case of Dunphy v. Croft, which was based on a seizure under chapter 16 of the statutes of 1928, which authorized the seizure of Canadian registered vessels hovering within the twelve mile limit. The Supreme Court of Canada decided that the legislation not coming within the provision of the statute of Westminster, by reason of having been enacted prior to the coming into force of that statute, was ultra vires of the parliament of Canada. This position was reversed by decision of the privy council in the same case, and the legislation was upheld in terms that justified the views expressed by the successive governments in this country throughout the period covering this controversy. Accordingly the enactment might fairly be regarded as a sort of declaratory enactment, and can be justified as placing beyond controversy the validity of Canadian legislation. Its object is to settle definitely this controversial question and prevent unnecessary litigation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am pleased to support this bill. I have always been of the opinion that this parliament had the right of extra-territorial jurisdiction in its legislation, but the decisions of the courts in the matter have varied in such a way that possibly it is better to have this bill made law in order to remove any doubt. As the language of the statute of Westminster indicates, it is declaratory:

> It is hereby declared and enacted that the parliament of a dominion has full power to make laws having extraterritorial operation.

It was not a statute giving power but rather to declare that parliament has that power. However it is better, as my hon. friend has said, that there should be no doubt as to past legislation, and this bill should be made law.

Section agreed to, bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

AMATEUR BOXING CONTESTS—PROTECTION OF CHILDREN—THEFT OF LOGS

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 71, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Sections 1 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On the title:

Mr. LAPOINTE: I introduced a bill to re-enact part of section 1024 of the criminal code, and it was stated at the time that the government would take charge of the bill and include it in the amendments to the code.

Mr. DUPRE: The amendment reads as follows:

Subsection (4) of section 1024 of the said act is repealed and is hereby reenacted as follows:

4. Notwithstanding any royal prerogative, or anything contained in the Interpretation Act or in the Supreme Court Act, no appeal shall be brought in any criminal case from any judgment or order of any court in Canada to any court of appeal or authority, by which, in the United Kingdom appeals or petitions to His Majesty in council may be heard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is satisfactory.

Mr. DUPRE: Then I move this amendment as section 11.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: Some amendments have been made in the province of Quebec with regard to the grand jury, and we have been requested to amend our criminal code accordingly. The amendments I am about to suggest were drafted this morning by the deputy minister of justice, acting with the respresentative of the attorney general of the province of Quebec, Mr. Amyot, K.C. I have the amendments agreed upon by these two gentlemen. The first is as follows:

Subsection (5) of section 873 of the said act, as enacted by chapter VII of the statutes of 1932, is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:

(5) In the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, it shall not be necessary to prefer any bill of indictment before a grand jury, but it shall be sufficient that the trial of any person charged with a criminal offence be commenced by a formal charge in writing setting forth as an indictment the offence with which he is charged.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do I understand that this has been suggested by the attorney general's department of Quebec?

Mr. DUPRE: A bill has been passed by the legislature, and we have been asked to make our criminal code consistent, so far as Quebec is concerned, with the new provincial law. The amendments I am reading have been suggested by the attorney general of Quebec. I move the amendment I just read.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: The next amendment, which I move, is as follows:

Subsection (6) of section 873 of the said act is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:

(6) Such charge in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta may be preferred by the attorney-general or an agent of the attorney-general, or by any person with the written consent of the judge of the court or of the attorney-general, or by order of the court.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: The next amendment, which I move, and which will be section 13 of the bill, is as follows:

Section 873 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:

(7) Such charge in the province of Quebec may be preferred by the attorney-general, or the deputy attorney-general, or by any person with the written consent of the judge of the court or of the attorney-general.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: Then I move the next amendment:

(1) Notwithstanding the provisions of sections 10, 11 and 12 of this act, if in any proceeding or prosecution under the criminal code begun in the province of Quebec before the coming into force of the present act, a true bill has been rendered by a grand jury against a person charged with a criminal offence, such true bill shall continue to have full force and effect, and the trial of the person against whom such true bill has been rendered may be commenced or recommenced, as the case may be, as if the present act was not in force.

(2) If, in the province of Quebec, a person against whom a true bill has been rendered by a grand jury before the coming into force of this act is convicted and upon appeal is granted a new trial by any court of appeal having jurisdiction, or if such person is granted a new trial by the Minister of Justice under section 1022 of the criminal code, such new trial will be commenced in the manner enacted by subsections (5) and (7) of section 873 of the criminal code, as respectively amended and enacted by this act.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: There are further amendments to be offered. In order to make these sections consistent with the amendment proposed to section 8, the following amendment is moved:

By inserting immediately after section 9, the following as section 10:

Subsection 1 of section seven hundred and seventy-six of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

776. When any person is charged before a magistrate, other than one of those mentioned in section seven hundred and seventy-four, with theft or with having obtained property by false pretences, or with having unlawfully received stolen property, and the value of the property stolen, obtained or received exceeds twenty-five dollars, and the evidence in support of the prosecution is, in the opinion of the magistrate, sufficient to put the person on his trial for the offence charged, such magistrate, if the case appears to him to be one which may properly be disposed of in a summary way, shall after the charge has been reduced to writing, read it to the said person, and shall explain to him that he is not obliged to plead or answer before such magistrate, and that if he does not plead or answer before him, he will be committed for trial in the usual course.

This amendment simply changes the amount from ten dollars to twenty-five dollars.

Amendment agreed to.

53719—300

Mr. DUPRE: I have another amendment, which will be section 11 of the bill. It is:

That paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 777 of the act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(c) In the provinces of British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory and the cities of Saint John, Fredericton and Moncton in the province of New Brunswick where any person is charged with an offence mentioned in any of the paragraphs of section seven hundred and seventy-three, except paragraph (h);

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that the last section be repealed, and the following be substituted therefor:

This act, except sections ten, eleven, twelve and thirteen, shall come into force on the first day of July, 1933. Sections ten, eleven, twelve and thirteen shall come into force on such date subsequent to the first day of July, 1933, as may be fixed by proclamation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why?

Mr. DUPRE: This is necessary because of the changes made in the bill. It has been indicated that the provincial laws will come into force at a time fixed by the lieutenant governor in council by proclamation, and our proclamation will be issued at the same time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think there is some mistake in the numbering of the sections.

Mr. DUPRE: We will have that straightened out.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA-NEW ZEALAND TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 97, to authorize the governor in council to agree to extend by proclamation the duration of the trade agreement made between Canada and New Zealand, dated the twenty-third day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two, as approved by chapter 34 of the statutes, of 1932, entitled an act respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Power to extend duration of agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be remembered that this treaty was for a year which expires on May 24. It has been arranged that it will be extended for a period of time to be agreed upon and this bill will authorize the governor in council to make the necessary proclamation.

Mr. MARCIL: Could we be advised of the quantity of butter which has been imported into Canada from New Zealand since 1930, when this treaty came into effect?

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is not present, and I have not that information before me. It has been placed upon the records of this house at least twice during this session in answers to questions asked. The last importations of butter arrived at Vancouver but under the provisions of the treaty they were held until such time as the necessities of our market required them for our consumption, when they were disposed of.

Mr. MARCIL: I was rather anxious to have these figures. This matter was used as an argument during the last elections. The farmers were fooled on that occasion and they want to know why this New Zealand butter is still coming into the country when the consumer has to pay five or six cents per pound more.

Mr. BENNETT: I will endeavour to obtain the information and put it on Hansard.

Mr. MARCIL: Could we have also the amount of customs duties paid?

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved the third reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE BASED ON SPACE OCCUPIED BY ADVERTISEMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to provide that the advertising portion of newspapers and periodicals transmitted for a greater distance than forty miles from their place of publication, or of which the publication is of greater frequency than once a week, shall be subject to postage of two cents a pound where the space devoted to advertisements exceeds 20 per cent but does not exceed 30 per cent of the total space; of 3 cents a pound where such space exceeds 30 per cent but does not exceed 50 per cent; and of 4 cents a pound where such space exceeds 50 per cent.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: This resolution was placed on the order paper in my name by accident and so I am proceeding with it.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Not by accident.

Mr. BENNETT: It was an accident. There was no name on it and I initialed it. I am going to say something about it in a moment and make it very simple.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The Postmaster General should be in charge of it.

Mr. BENNETT: So he should.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suggest that the Postmaster General should be here to listen at least to his chief's argument on the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: This resolution is very simple. After the representations that were made on behalf of those who where interested were heard, it was decided that only the latter part of the resolution would be proceeded with, so that it will read:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to provide that the advertising portion of newspapers and periodicals transmitted for a greater distance than forty miles from their place of publication, or of which the publication is of greater frequency than once a week, shall be subject to postage of four cents a pound where the space devoted to advertisements exceeds 50 per cent.

That is all; it is to meet a situation in which the Post Office Department has been cumbered and bothered with handling newspapers containing sixteen to eighteen pages of purely advertising matter, taking the place, in many instances, of catalogues. The Post Office authorities advise that the loss in handling newspapers in this country last year through the post was somewhere between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. It would be impossible under existing conditions to correct the whole of that loss, but in so far as it may be possible to dispense with the handling by the Post Office Department of very heavy papers containing from sixteen to eighteen pages of advertising, it is proposed to do so by charging four cents a pound for such handling. The matter really resolves itself into the handling of catalogues through sixteen to eighteen page issues of newspapers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Prime Minister explain the representations which led to the dropping of the other portions of the resolution?

Mr. BENNETT: It was established beyond question that under existing economic conditions the newspapers were operating at a loss unless their advertising content was equal to 50 per cent. Newspaper representatives waited on the government and made a very clear statement showing the facts in connection with existing conditions. The really determining factor was the placing of the sales tax upon newsprint, a tax which had not been previously imposed. The result is that the revenue derived from that source will be equal to, if not exceeded by the revenue that might be derived from this.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What is the estimated additional revenue under this postage?

Mr. BENNETT: The officials of the department say that it will be difficult to estimate what the additional revenue will be, because it is believed that the probable result will be that people will resort again to the use of catalogues rather than the utilization of newspapers, but if the same quantity were carried, the additional revenue would be in the vicinity of $100,000.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What would it have been under the first part of the resolution which is dropped?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not ask for the figure, after the representations that were made, and after it was decided to impose a sales tax on newsprint.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will this afford protection to Canadian newspapers as against papers coming from the United States?

Mr. BENNETT: There is already in that regard a tax which is not changed. The bill has not yet been distributed, but the explanatory note says that there is no change with respect to that. It says:

The effect of the proviso will be as follows:
(A) Free circulation, no change.
(B) Newspapers and periodicals when the space devoted to advertisements does not exceed 20 per centum, no change.

And so on up to 50 per cent, there is no change. After that the rate is four cents. Up to 50 per cent the existing rates, which were increased, as it will be remembered two years ago will still be continued; that is, they will be one cent or one and one-half cent as heretofore, but after 50 per cent, the rate will be four cents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Many United States newspapers contain a large number of pages of advertising. I was wondering whether the effect of this particular legislation would be to prevent to any extent the importation of United States publications.

Mr. BENNETT: I should not think there are any United States newspapers with over 50 per cent advertising content coming into this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Magazines.

Mr. BENNETT: As will be recalled, that is all covered by existing legislation. This does not change that.

Mr. NEILL: Can the Prime Minister indicate from the representations that the delegation made to him what the advertising content of the average country newspaper would be?

Mr. BENNETT: This, as will be observed, does not touch the ordinary country newspaper; it touches only the daily newspaper. The daily newspapers have an association and its representatives produced figures to show that under present abnormal conditions a newspaper could not be said to be profitable until its advertising content approximated 50 per cent. But under existing conditions it will be remembered that the newspapers, except in a few instances, do not carry such advertisements daily; they sometimes carry them once or twice a week for a page or two and then for the remaining days a smaller portion of space is taken. The old rule, I was told, used to be—and I asked that question—that 40 per cent advertising and 60 per cent news was profitable. Under present conditions, with the taxes such as they are, this rate had risen to practically fifty-fifty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would this affect, for example, the Saturday Evening Post from Philadelphia?

Mr. BENNETT: That was covered by the legislation passed two years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not affected by this?

Mr. BENNETT: My understanding was that none of that class of papers was affected. The section as it reads is section one as amended in 1931 and, as I say, there was no change made in that except the one I have just indicated. I shall, however, make inquiry and ascertain between now and to-morrow whether it makes any difference in the postage payable by that paper.

Mr. YOUNG: It seems to me that if this legislation goes through, the newspapers will sit down and figure whether it will be cheaper to pay four cents extra postage or to increase the reading matter so as to bring the paper under the lower postage rate. In this way the department may find itself in the position of carrying an increased weight without an increased remuneration.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that difficulty will arise.

Mr. MARCIL: Is any change made in regard to the printed matter coming by express into Canada? If you go down street on Sunday morning in Montreal or anywhere else, you will see truck loads piled with United States papers that formerly would have gone through the mails.

Mr. BENNETT: They pay some contribution to the revenues of the country, although the exact basis I do not carry in my mind. It was discussed in 1931. There is no method at the present moment by which we can prevent Canadian newspapers from circulating their issues by trucks; in fact in the country in which I live, in western Canada, and I suppose it is so in many other parts of the country, newspapers are now distributed by motor trucks where the postal service is not quite convenient in view of the hour of publication. I believe that the magazines and newspapers that come into this country pay customs duties at the border, and distribution is a matter which is arranged between them and their distributing agents. They come in usually by express to large cities like Montreal and Toronto where there is a substantial Sunday distribution, but not in the case of the smaller communities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did not the Prime Minister suggest that he wished to amend the resolution?

Mr. BENNETT: I was just going to suggest that I would amend the resolution or amend the bill. I move, Mr. Chairman, to substitute the word "four" for the word "two" in line five of the resolution and the figure "50" for the figure "20" in the same line, and to strike out all the words after the word "cent" at the beginning of the sixth line. The resolution will then read:

> That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to provide that the advertising portion of newspapers and periodicals transmitted for a greater distance than forty miles from their place of publication, or of which the publication is of greater frequency than once a week, shall be subject to postage of four cents a pound where the space devoted to advertisements exceeds 50 per cent.

The officers of the department tell me that the effect will probably be a deterrent to trying to unload upon the postal service of the country a larger burden than it should carry.

Mr. NEILL: It seems to me that as the resolution reads it would include weekly newspapers. It says:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to provide that the advertising portion of newspapers and periodicals transmitted for a greater distance than forty miles from their place of publication—

That covers the weekly newspaper. Then there is another class, "or of which the publication is of greater frequency than once a week." The weekly newspapers are frequently transmitted for a greater distance than forty miles from their place of publication in the west where the distances are great.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will let that question stand until the bill is before the committee I shall show him what the facts are.

Resolution as amended reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is the bill also in the name of the Prime Minister through a mistake?

Mr. BENNETT: The bill follows the resolution. My friends seem to think there is something very strange about this. As a matter of fact when I found it was in my name I spoke to the Postmaster General, and he said to go on with it as it stood. I will ask the Postmaster General to take the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, we are quite satisfied.

Mr. JACOBS: I think the Prime Minister is doing very well.

Mr. BENNETT: If the house would give the bill its first and second readings to-day I would not move the bill into committee until I get the answers to the questions that have been asked because I want to be sure myself with respect to them.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to have the Postmaster General here. The other day in the absence of the Prime Minister a bill dealing with radio was brought in by the acting minister, and the minister in charge of radio was left to one side. Now an act affecting the post office is brought in by the Prime Minister, and the Postmaster General is not here. The Post Office is one of the most important departments. It reaches every man, woman and child in Canada. There is no corner of Canada which is beyond the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General, and I think he should be here to answer the numerous complaints that are prepared for him.

Mr. BENNETT: They would not be discussed until his estimates are up, in any event. Let us be fair about this thing.

Mr. MARCIL: He was not here when his estimates were called, and now he is not here when the bill has been called.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure that there is no reason why hon. gentlemen, in their political anxiety, should not be fair. The Postmaster General will be only too glad to answer questions regarding the conduct of his department when his estimates are called, as they will be this evening or this afternoon if it is preferred. He will be here to answer for himself. So far as this bill is concerned I have explained the circumstances in which my name was put on, and I agreed that it should remain there. If hon. gentlemen will agree to the bill being given a second reading this afternoon I will let it stand without moving it into committee so as to be able to answer the questions which the leader of the opposition and other hon. gentlemen have asked me.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

TARIFF BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Tariff Board Act, chapter 55 of the statutes of 1931, to provide that the salary of the chairman shall be $15,000 per annum; and that any member of the board who has served for a period of ten years, and is, on completion of such period, of the age of sixty years or over, may be granted an annuity equal to one-half of the annual salary of such member.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: The purpose of this resolution is to provide that the chairman of the board, who was a member of the high court of justice of the province of Ontario and who left that position to accept the position of chairman of the board, shall be placed in substantially the same position financially as he was had he not done so. The chairman did not seek the office; the office sought the chairman. I need hardly say to this committee that the appointment of a chairman to this board was a matter of very great difficulty. To secure one with judicial qualities of mind, and who would commend himself to all those who were concerned in the matters with which he had to deal was not the easiest matter in the world. I consulted in many quarters as to where a judge might be obtained because I believed it was desirable that the chairman should be one who had judicial qualifications.

Mr. Justice Sedgewick was not disposed to accept the position; he took some time to consider it. After consulting with some of his friends he was finally prevailed upon by his sense of public service and duty to accept the position. He was appointed judge in December of 1930, and had been on the bench something over two years. He is now of the age of fifty-five years, and was something over fifty-three at the time of his appointment to the bench. After taking some time to consider the matter he finally concluded, as an act of public service, to accept the position. He desired however that his financial position should not be worse than it would have been had he remained on the bench. This resolution is an endeavour to give effect to that purpose.

I think perhaps the only amendment would be that of changing the word "sixty" to "sixty-four," because it is desired to have regard for the fifteen years of service that he would render if he were on the bench, to secure an annuity. Two of those years are now passed and do not count for anything. We would provide that if he serves ten years as chairman and has reached the age of sixty-four or over, he will receive the annuity mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The resolution as it reads relates to the chairman of the tariff board, irrespective of who he may be?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister's remarks had reference to the present chairman, Mr. Justice Sedgewick. Probably the resolution should not be limited in its application in the first place to the individual mentioned. However, other and quite different circumstances may arise on obtaining a successor.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite appreciate the point which the right hon. gentleman has made. As a matter of fact it has given me much concern as to whether or not that would be the proper thing to do. If the committee is of the opinion that it is proper, under the circumstances, to place the name in the resolution, instead of leaving it as it is, I am perfectly content. I thought, however, that it was better under all the circumstances to put it in the form in which it appears and to change the figure "sixty" to "sixty-four" so that it could refer to no one else except the present chairman, he having put in something like two years and three months on the bench.

It may be that it would be thought desirable to make a change hereafter, but I believe the explanation I have given and the circumstances under which this condition has arisen might obviate the necessity for putting the name in the bill. However if the right hon. gentleman would like the change, I would not oppose it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not advocating it. I was drawing attention to the right hon. gentleman's remarks because I had objections quite apart from the one he has mentioned.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What was his salary in Ontario?

Mr. BENNETT: He received $9,000 from the dominion and $1,000 from the province.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend states that it was not fair to ask the present chairman of the tariff board to prejudice his financial position by accepting the chairmanship. I should like to know in what way his financial position would be injured by accepting a position with a higher salary. A salary of $15,000 a year is much higher than the salary he was paid as a judge of the supreme court of Ontario. I should like to learn from the right hon. gentleman how the present chairman would have suffered by accepting the position at the statutory salary?

Mr. BENNETT: I put it this way: Any person who occupies a position of judge of the high court of justice of Ontario, who has his home and is established in the city of Toronto and who under ordinary circumstances, if his health is good, would be entitled to keep that position until he had reached the age of seventy-five years, and to retire upon an annuity of two-thirds of his salary, with a likelihood of promotion, so far as he was concerned, on the bench, would not be as well off financially by accepting the chairmanship, as if he had remained in his former position. That view was supported by business men whom he consulted, and with whom he discussed the matter as to whether or not he would be wise in making a change at this particular time in his life. Nothing but a desire for fairness to himself and his family induced him to accept it under conditions such as indicated in the resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot agree with my right hon. friend. Mr. Justice Sedgewick drew a salary of $9,000 from the dominion, and $1,000 from the province of Ontario. He could not retire and be superannuated, except for cause, illness or inability to fulfil his duties of office. That superannuation would have been at the rate of two-thirds of his salary as a judge, or $6,000 per year. Under the resolution before us there is provision for a salary of $15,000 a year. Then after ten years, even though he be only sixty-two or sixty-three years of age—

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —he would be entitled to one-half of his salary, namely $7,500. It certainly is an improvement in his position. I desire to discuss this matter briefly irrespective of who is to be the incumbent of the position. I have no doubt that the present chairman is well qualified and may be a very good chairman of the tariff board, but I desire to protest against the practice which seems to have established itself in recent years, namely that of taking a judge from one of the high courts, placing him on some board and giving him a salary much higher than that received by the chief justice of the high court of the province from which he came, or judges of the appeal courts. It is a salary even higher than that received by judges of the supreme court of Canada. I do not believe that a man occupying the position of chairman of the tariff board must have better qualifications than one occupying the position of chief justice of the province of Ontario, or a justice of the supreme court of Canada. I do not think it is fair to the other members of the judiciary. Also I object to it on another ground. I do not think it makes for the respect which is owing to the bench that judges should appear as aspirants to these new positions being created in the way of tariff board, railway board, radio board and other similar boards, at higher salaries than their brothers on the bench. I desire to protest against this practice and I am opposed to this resolution.

Mr. CASGRAIN: For the same reason that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has just stated I desire also to register my protest against this legislation. I find here according to section 8 of chapter 55 of the statutes of 1931 that pensions are provided for these people on the tariff board:

> Every member who has served on the board for a period of at least ten years may be granted an annuity for the term of his natural life equal to one-fourth of the annual salary received by him during such period, and if he has served for any period less than ten years but more than five years, he may be granted an annuity equal to one-fifth of the annual salary received by him during such period.

Then subsection 2 states:

> The chairman of the board shall be paid an annual salary of twelve thousand dollars, and the other two members shall each be paid an annual salary of ten thousand dollars.

And the secretary is to be paid $6,000. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the country will support our contention that at the time those salaries were fixed and these pensions provided we were dealing most fairly and even generously with the people sought for to serve in those high positions. I understand that Judge Sedgewick is a very prominent man, I have had occasion to meet him myself, and I would not say anything disparaging of him, but, being elevated to that high position, if this bill is passed he will receive a higher salary than any judge of the supreme court, higher than any judge in the land. I think in years past we have made a mistake in paying such big salaries as we have. For instance we increased the salary of the Auditor General from $9,000 to $15,000. I think it was a mistake. I think a judge of the court of appeal is entitled to a high salary, but if we now put the salary of this gentleman at $15,000 we are giving him as high a salary as the chief justice of the supreme court of Canada and the Prime Minister of Canada. We must not forget this, that the tariff board is only a fact-finding body, which moves only at the instance of the government, the Minister of Finance. They are not in the position of administering justice as judges sitting in any appellate court in Canada, who move because they are seized with cases that come before them from all parts of the land. This board is nothing more than a tool in the hands of the government. I think we are paying too much in increasing this salary to $15,000 a year. I want to register my protest most strongly, more especially in view of the fact that in all big business concerns at present it is the practice to reduce salaries as much as possible. And what did we see on the 30th of March last? This government which is asking us to-day to increase this salary to $15,000 passed an order in council at the instance of the Minister of Finance requesting all departments of the government to keep within bounds and seek to reduce expenses and not incur any expense unless absolutely necessary for the better administration of the country. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he thinks it is absolutely necessary that we should increase this salary $5,000—

Mr. BENNETT: Only $3,000, not $5,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If he thinks it necessary to increase the salary $3,000 to have better service from this gentleman who is going to sit on that board?

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

SOLDIER AND GENERAL LAND SETTLEMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Amount required for soldier land settlement advances, for advances under the British family schemes recoverable from the British government, for the cost of administration of soldier settlement and general land settlement, and for the cost of administration of soldier settlement staff performing investigations for the war veterans allowance committee, $1,173,600.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Last evening when the bill went through I was unfortunately called out of the chamber and therefore was not able to present the case in connection with the suggestion I made to the minister that he should take into consideration the possibility of wiping out the whole soldier settlement board administration and turning the land over to the settlers. He was kind enough to provide me with figures which strongly support the idea I have in mind. Although I am not at present advocating it, as naturally the fullest information is not at my disposal. I find that the cost to the country to date is as follows:

Live stock revaluation	$ 2,927,869 99
Land revaluation..	7,479,343 75
Thirty per cent reduction (some years ago)..	11,296,632 03
Interest exemption in 1922..	10,269,108 87
Total of exemptions. ..	$31,972,954 64

The administration costs during that period amounted to nearly two thirds of that amount, or $21,709,929.35.

I pause at this point to direct the attention of the house to that enormous cost of administration of the Soldier Settlement Act. The cost to date, as I have said, is $21,709,929 and on top of that is entailed a loss to the country of nearly $32,000,000 or a grand total of $53,682,883.99.

The case would not be complete if I were not able to show that the total collected did not reach that amount. The total amount collected in the whole period is only $50,968,482.79, so that we have collected $3,000,000 less than the cost to the country. I was informed by the minister yesterday that the total amount outstanding is $63,753,000 in round figures.

Now let me ask this question: If it cost $21,709,000 for administration to collect $50,000,000 when the prices for agricultural products were comparatively high, certainly much higher than they are at present and higher than prices are likely to be for some time to come, how much will it cost to collect the $63,753,000 outstanding? Yesterday I think the government demonstrated good sense and tolerance in regard to the condition of the settlers, and this house did itself justice in passing the bill which was brought in at that time, but the whole question must be dealt with by this government or by the government which will immediately follow it—and I can assure hon. members that it will not be of the same political stripe. We must consider whether this whole act is to be continued. For my part I feel that the government would be well rid of a white elephant and the country would escape appalling losses on the transaction at present prices if the land were turned over free to the settlers. Then we could do away with this whole board and save this cost of administration. I am not sure whether the minister discussed this point yesterday in dealing with the question; if he did so I am sorry I did not hear him. I understand that the original cost of land and equipment was given as $117,000,000, and that the interest lost has amounted to about $2,688,000. Now I should like to know the total interest arrears to date.

Mr. GORDON: In connection with soldier settlers, as interpreted by the act, and civilian settlers the interest arrears amount to $4,175,820.63.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I take it that the two items are combined and there is no way of separating them?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the separate items.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is a recommendation I should like to make to the minister. I noticed that in his replies to several questions, especially dealing with statistics, he included both activities. I seriously suggest that an attempt should be made to separate the costs as between the general land settlement and the soldier settlement, because they are two entirely different matters. One was started in order to absorb the demobilized soldiers; it had in view a definite and praiseworthy objective. The other was a settlement scheme, partly British and partly Canadian, and I think the minister would be well advised to take into consideration separating the two accounts so that next year we may get the exact figures.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, I did carry on an investigation about a year and a half ago along the lines suggested by my hon. friend; I thought it would be advisable to separate the two classes of settlers. I found, however, that the expense in the accounting branch would be very considerable, and in fact would outweigh any advantage that I could see resulting from a separation, although I readily understand that there would be an advantage in having that information available.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think it is unfair to both branches, because in turn each branch is blamed by critics of the other branch. For the sake of peace within the ranks of the settlers themselves it would be advisable to separate the items. Perhaps the department knows that the soldiers do not like to have these costs jumbled up in this way, so that no one knows whether or not the cost of administration in connection with soldier settlement is unnecessarily high. In my opinion that cost has been absurdly high; it has been out of all proportion to the service rendered. It seems perfectly ridiculous that it should cost $21,709,000 to collect $50,000,000. I think the items should be separated, even though it may cost a little more.

Mr. GORDON: I am not prepared to take the position that the cost has not been high. Of course it has been too high; that was abundantly apparent to me in 1930. I could not understand why it should be so high, but, as the hon. member knows, that cost has been reduced by about half so that to-day the cost of administration is less than one per cent, which compares very favourably with the cost of administration of loan companies handling similar business. I hope it can be held at that ratio, and it may be possible to make the cost even lower.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that one per cent of the amount collected or of the total debt?

Mr. GORDON: That is comparing the amount of the investment with the administrative cost.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does that mean one per cent of $117,000,000?

Mr. GORDON: No, one per cent of $63,000,000. No one needs to labour the point with regard to the cost of administration. I do not say this in any endeavour to stir up political matters, but we found field supervisors who had driven the cars of the board across the continent on their holidays, and all that sort of thing; we found men employed by the board who were of absolutely no value. In the reorganization the endeavour was to select from the officials those with actual experience in pioneer settlement and agricultural work, and a review of the personnel of the board at present will show that almost one hundred per cent of the employees are returned men. In almost every case the men in charge have had very considerable experience in agriculture as well.

The history of this effort is well known to every member of the committee. Whether or not it was a proper effort to be made at the time perhaps does not matter now in discussing the situation as we find it, but I believe there should be a constant reduction in the cost of administration. I do not know that I can promise that there will be a very great reduction in each succeeding year, but it should be reduced to the point where the staff will be able to take care of land settlement generally, and the administration of these lands will be practically incidental. I have a very high regard for those who are at present employed as officials of the board; I believe hon. members will agree that politics did not enter into the reorganization at all.

SUPPLY

SOLDIER AND GENERAL LAND SETTLEMENT

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Amount required for soldier land settlement advances, for advances under the British family schemes recoverable from the British government, for the cost of administration of soldier settlement and general land settlement, and for the cost of administration of soldier settlement staff, performing investigations for the war veterans allowance committee, $1,173,600.

Mr. GORDON: As I had just pointed out, the cost of administration has been reduced very considerably, and at the present time, as I said, it will compare favourably with that of loan companies and others carrying on similar work. When the bill was before the committee yesterday I promised the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that I would put on Hansard the receipts and cost of administration in the fiscal year 1929-30 together with the total expenditure for that year. The figures are as follows:

Total revenue..	$4,570,190 99
Total expenditure..	2,435,255 38

Perhaps it might be desirable to put on record the figures for the next year so that they will make a continuous picture of the board's operations. These are the figures for the fiscal year 1930-31:

Total revenue..	$2,382,243 28
Total expenditure..	2,182,591 85

The plan of reorganization of the board did not of course come in until the following year. During the years 1928 and 1929, many seizures were made. I have not had an opportunity or the time to inquire into the causes and the justice of that course and therefore I shall not undertake either to commend or to criticize it, but it was so generally the practice that the law existing at that time was changed so as to give the settler the right to apply to the judge of the district or county court in order to secure relief in such cases. The main reason the receipts have fallen off may be found in the fact that it is and has been the policy of the government, during this time of depressed prices, to encourage the settler to stay upon the land and, as I have said before in this chamber, not to adopt an attitude that might prompt him in discouragement to abandon his holdings. The receipts have fallen off because we have not adopted an attitude of severity with respect to collections. Of course we all hope the collections will come in more easily in the future than they have in the immediate past.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. LUCAS: Have there been any foreclosures during the past year?

Mr. GORDON: My information is that there have been no foreclosures except in the case of absentee settlers, but there have been some quit claims. I am told that there may be half a dozen foreclosures across Canada.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister turn to page 4704 of yesterday's Hansard and explain the difference between the figure of the total administration cost for the year 1929-30, which is there given covering both soldier land settlement and general land settlement as a total of $1,362,121.86, and the figure below that which reads: Controllable expenditure, $2,435,255.38? The minister just now gave the figure of $2,435,255.38 as the expenditure; would he explain the difference between the figure of $1,362,121.86 and that of $2,435,255.38?

Mr. GORDON: I should have broken up that item. The total expenditure includes advances as well as administration costs.

Mr. NEILL: Advances can hardly be called expenses of administration. The minister a few minutes ago gave the expenses as $2,435,255.38. The figures should be $1,362,121.86.

Mr. GORDON: If we break up the figure of $2,435,255.38, the cost in 1929-30 for administration was $1,362,121.86, and the advances amounted to $1,073,133.52. That makes the total.

Mr. REID: Can anything be done for those who sold a portion or all of their farms to another party and where that has been returned on quit claims, making, in some cases, a greater debt owing to the board by the original soldier settler than he contracted for in the first instance? There are quite a few such cases in British Columbia. Since I came to Ottawa this session, I have had at least three brought to my attention.

Mr. GORDON: I shall be glad to look into the situation generally and see if anything can be done.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I have listened to discussion coming from this part of the house, especially with reference to the cost of administration in relation to the amount of collections, and I am just a little afraid that in face of that criticism the tendency under present conditions will be to try harder than ever to enforce collections. I have no objection to enforcing payment where it does not reduce the standard of living of the soldier settler below what is reasonable. I may say that in cases which I have brought to the attention of the director or the minister, they have taken a very reasonable attitude, but settlers are constantly writing to tell me that they have so many bushels of grain, for instance, and that they have signed an agreement to deliver a certain proportion to the board; one man, for example, writes that if the agreement which he has signed is enforced he will be left with $234 with which to provide a living for himself, his wife and ten children for a year.

Mr. GORDON: We would not enforce collection in such a case.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I sent him a copy of Hansard containing a statement made by the minister, and I suppose he took the matter up with the officials of the board at Edmonton. I have not heard from him since, so it is possible he has reached a settlement in the meantime. I submit that under present conditions, when practically every farm product in western Canada, at all events, is being sold at a loss, it does not matter whether it is wheat or oats or cattle or hogs, regard should certainly be had to the question of leaving the soldier settler sufficient for a reasonable living, provided of course that he is doing his best to see that the property and all his assets are kept up in first-class condition.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES

To provide for payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $2,000,000.

Mr. YOUNG: When this item was last up the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth had the floor. As he is not here to-day I will say what he probably would have said if he were here. During last session and the session before, the government have from time to time appealed to the opposition to assist them in trying to balance their budget and pilot the country through its present difficulties. I think this is a case where we can be of material assistance. Here is a proposal to spend $2,000,000 in subventions to the railways for carrying coal an uneconomic distance. This $2,000,000 must first be taken out of the pockets of the people, and when you take that $2,000,000 out of their pockets you reduce their purchasing power by that much. When you reduce their purchasing power by $2,000,000, it means you create just that much unemployment in the country. This is not adding one iota to employment.

Mr. STANLEY: Oh yes, it is.

Mr. YOUNG: How is it? You are going to force people to buy Canadian coal to give employment to Canadian miners, but in order to do that you are going to reduce the people's purchasing power by $2,000,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And you increase the miners' purchasing power.

Mr. YOUNG: By how much?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You can tell us.

Mr. YOUNG: You reduce the purchasing power of the people of this country by $2,000,000. My friend says that you increase the purchasing power of the miners by the same amount. In that case there would be no result.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Things would be even.

Mr. YOUNG: No, they would not be even, because when you prevent that amount of coal from coming into this country, you shut up within this country $2,000,000 worth of our products which would otherwise go out to pay for that amount of coal—products which the constituents of my hon. friend from Bow River have a surplus of to sell. You have reduced our foreign market for our surplus products. You have reduced the purchasing power of the people of this country, and you have forced the government to raise $2,000,000 of taxation when they do not know how to balance their budget. I cannot see any justification for the item. I do not know why it was ever instituted. I say that it has no business there whatever, and I move that it be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. NEILL: There is an amendment before the chair, Mr. Chairman, and if we are going to pass the amendment without any discussion I would certainly want to put in a word of protest against it. The hon. member for Weyburn puts the argument that is so well known for his point of view, but I would remind him of the fact that a prominent feature of the Conservative policy adopted at Winnipeg in 1930, which platform was boiled down to eight outstanding items was that such compensating adjustments would be made so as to ensure justice to the various sections of Canada under the above mentioned policy. This is one of those compensating adjustments which we require to afford a meagre measure of justice to some of the coal fields in the west, and for that reason I would certainly oppose any motion to strike out the item. Of course, I know the government has no intention of striking it out.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It would be out of order to strike it out, but quite in order to reduce it.

Mr. NEILL: We do not want it reduced by even one dollar. It is all very well to indulge in fiscal—

Mr. GORDON: Technocracy.

Mr. NEILL: —fiscal theories, which other things being equal might be all right, but we are dealing with conditions under which there is a high tariff in this country. As I said before, this must be considered as one of those compensating adjustments which helps the consumer who has to buy high tariff priced goods. I assume that the minister is not willing to make any remarks upon that phase.

I would ask him this question. When this item was up before on March 30, some five or six weeks ago, the minister said that only the day before he had spent a couple of hours with the heads of the mining companies, both east and west, looking into the whole situation in the hope that a solution might be found, favourable to them, of course. Can the minister tell me if any such solution has been found?—because I have heard no word of it. I have the press reports under my hand, and they indicate that nothing was arrived at, and the report given out by the principal coal operator on his way home was to the same effect. I wonder if the minister can give us any definite information or hold out any prospect of any policy in the immediate future looking towards an increased bonus, or the imposition of dumping duties to keep out British coal, or possibly some measure of reciprocity with the United States, or whatever his policy is. If he has anything of the kind that will be of assistance to our coal mines, now running three days a fortnight in some cases, it will be very gratefully received.

Mr. GORDON: During the last two and a half years I have had many conferences with the coal producers with respect to this most complex problem. Those who come from mining areas are well aware of the fact that in the last twelve years, so far as coal mining in Canada is concerned, the whole picture has been entirely reversed. Twelve years ago we had a consumers' problem; to-day it is a producers' problem.

Mr. YOUNG: It is still a consumers' problem. People do not know how to pay for their coal.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. GORDON: Of course, I am speaking broadly, so far as the fuel situation of Canada is concerned. Many factors, some of which have been worldwide, have contributed to a contraction in the consumption of coal. If one cared to look at the figures for the United States, Great Britain, Germany, Poland or other large coal producing countries, he would find that in the consumption of coal Canada stands in quite a favoured position, although it is a fact that consumption has very considerably dropped off. Other substitute fuels have contributed to a reduction in consumption. We have had milder temperatures during the last two winter seasons, and this factor has contributed to the lack of production and consumption of coal in Canada. Railroads both here and in the United States have greatly reduced the amount of coal they consume. These factors, along with some others, have placed the coal miner in a most difficult position. As the hon. member for Weyburn probably would say, it may be better not to support the production of coal in Canada if such production cannot be justified on a strictly economic basis.

Mr. YOUNG: Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON: There are many arguments, however, in favour of the proposition that that viewpoint should not prevail. If we placed ourselves again in the position we occupied between 1918 and 1923, and were paying as high as $27 a ton for anthracite coal—as I have done—then the consumer would find that the efforts the previous government made, and which we have continued in a larger way, are giving the consumer a protection he never had before. The figures cannot be denied; they are plain and their effects are self-evident.

We were entirely at the mercy of one source of fuel, namely, Pennsylvania anthracite. To-day there are many competitive lines of fuel. It is the desire of this government and, I believe, of the members of the committee generally, that this or any other government should take such action as it can take, by way of assisting the coal mining industry, which will permit the carrying on of that industry at least in the mines of Canada which are best able to carry on at a cost per ton which is reasonable and which reflects efficient mining effort. If one of the coal mining communities shuts down by reason of the closing of the coal mines, the people dependent upon the industry will find themselves in a very difficult position. Perhaps among all the various members of our population there are none so helpless as the coal miner, if I may put it that way, in turning to any other vocation. That has been the history of coal mining since historical records of the industry have been kept. As I say, it is a difficult situation. The hon. member for Weyburn said he intended to express the views that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth would have expressed.

Mr. YOUNG: Should express.

Mr. GORDON: I thought the hon. member said "would". Had he said "would express", then I would say that the principle underlying this assistance was one of which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was certainly an outstanding proponent and advocate. Holding the views that I do with respect to bonusing industries which cannot struggle along on their own feet, it is difficult at times to subscribe to the principle here involved. Yet, with respect to the coal mining industry of Canada I believe any government would be justified in giving such relief as would permit efficiently operated mines to continue. Because, as I said a few moments ago, if we close our coal mines in Canada and revert to the position we were in ten or fifteen years ago, when we were relying upon a source of supply from one country, the consumer will be back just where he was before and will have to pay the price demanded.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Or through the eastern combine.

Mr. GORDON: Quite, the eastern—and western—combine, if one cares to turn to those subjects. Whether or not there is a combine within the meaning of the act, in the east or in the west, has yet to be determined. Competition unquestionably reduces the price of coal to the consumers of Canada. I do not wish to labour this point. However, that is one of the problems with which this country has been and will always be confronted. It is a challenge to the wisdom of those who laid down the political boundaries of the country, and it is again an acknowledgement that the Infinite Being did not place nature's resources where we poor humans could take advantage of them with the least possible effort. It challenges the ingenuity of anybody to make the Canadian coal fields available to industrial centres. The government is doing the best it can. Conferences I have held with coal producers and consumers have not resulted in any solution of the problem.

Mr. YOUNG: No, they have not.

Mr. GORDON: I am quite prepared to admit that. I have not heard any suggestion from anyone that I consider would be a solution of the problem of keeping the coal mining industry on its feet and going. As I say, no solution has been arrived at; I doubt very much if there is any complete solution, because there is certainly a limit to the extent to which one can resort to the treasury for moneys to be devoted to such purposes. No doubt there is a limit. I trust the government will not exceed that limit but will at the same time give such assistance as in the eyes of the taxpayers of Canada will be justified.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I really was sorry—and I do not speak sarcastically—to hear the reply of the minister. If ever there was a case of asking for bread and getting a stone, it was this. His remarks, with which because of their obvious truth, we must all agree, would have been very suitable in giving a lecture to the Young Women's Christian Association, or something of that kind. But in dealing with a condition as vital and desperate as that which we have in the west, I do submit his remarks were inadequate. Really, on my word of honour, I did hope that he had at least some hope for us in the west. He says he has no solution of the problem, and that no one has ever offered any.

Mr. YOUNG: I offered one just now.

Mr. NEILL: Would my friend who is afflicted with fiscal fanaticism mind letting me handle this? I know he is unique in his own sphere, but we are dealing with the world of reality, hungry miners and starving women, and we cannot feed them with fiscal fanaticism. Now the minister says no one could present a solution. I am not here nor is it my business to present a solution for the whole of Canada; that is the minister's problem, but in some small measure I may be able to present a solution for the miners that I represent. I submit that there is a way by which the immediate troubles affecting the coal mines of Vancouver island at least may be relieved, namely by putting a dumping duty on British coal subsidized by the British government, brought out largely as ballast, and under conditions that call for dumping restrictions if ever such restrictions are justified.

I want to speak, now, for a moment, of another matter. When this vote was up before I called the attention of the minister, as will be found at page 3572 and following pages of Hansard, to the manner in which the coal problem had been dealt with in Great Britain. I pointed out that they had discovered or developed a new form of fuel known as colloidal fuel, a mixture of oil and coal dust, which enabled coal dust to be used in a way that it had never been used before. They had some process that prevented the heavier particles from sinking, and it gave promise of creating an enormous demand for a very low grade of coal and to compete with fuel oil. I also pointed out, having got this information from the British press, that this process had been developed to the stage where the British admiralty, always a most conservative body—if you make a deal with the British admiralty you have got to show you have the goods and continuity of supply of that quality and price—had made a contract for twelve months with some local firm, I think, in England, for the supply of fuel developed from coal for use on one of the British warships, a destroyer called the Westminster. Since then I see they have also adapted it for use on aeroplanes. Everyone knows that aeroplane gasoline must be of the very best quality, and if the British have developed an oil from coal that can be used in aeroplanes it certainly points the way for us to follow as a means of solving the question of the use of this coal. The day has gone by when we can dig and sell it "as is," as run of mine. We have to put it in a form to meet the competition of fuel oil and other competing fuels. I suggested that the government might have put this information before the coal miners of Canada, and asked them if they had any bulletin of the kind. The minister replied:

> Obviously the hon. member has not read the annual report of the mines branch, which deals at great length with the subject to which he has made reference. . . .

Naturally that coming from the minister was supposed to make me feel squashed by the dignity and weight of his authority, but, I could not remember anything of that kind in the report. I thought perhaps I had missed it, so I looked it up. I have the report here. It consists of fifty pages, and when the minister said that the subject I referred to had been dealt with in the report at great length, how many pages would you expect to be allotted, in a pamphlet of fifty pages, to a matter that was dealt with "at great length"? Would you say fifteen, twelve, ten, or what? Or would it be like the man who was striving to save the people of Sodom from the vengeance of Jehovah? Perhaps even one page would justify the expression "at great length": But what are the facts? There is no reference whatever to the term "colloidal fuel." Reference to low temperature carbonization occurs in two instances, one less than two lines, and the other two and a half lines; that does not deal with the matters I was speaking about, the practical use of this fuel to the extent I indicated on British warships. One is simply a casual reference, and the other merely a statement that scientific men had continued work on the development of the new F.R.L method for the low-temperature carbonization of coals. But the British people have gone far beyond that. I suggest that it was a wholly improper statement to make, that the subject had been dealt with at great length, when the only reference thereto was as I have indicated.

This subject of colloidal fuel and the production from coal of gas or oil sufficiently fine to be used in British warships or aeroplanes belonging to the navy is certainly a subject of practical constructive importance, one to which it would well become us to pay the very closest attention with a view to stimulating its development in Canada. I do not believe that even my hon. friend from Weyburn would object to spending public money on developments along these lines, because it would be helping the coal industry to help themselves. Once turn run of mine coal into products such as these and a vast market is opened up, and perhaps the coal mines would not need government subventions thereafter. I am quite sure I would have the support of the hon. member for Weyburn in that regard. As I say, these are constructive ideas leading to permanent improvement of the industry, and it is in that respect I complained about the coal mines branch. I do not blame the minister wholly; he is only the head of it, but the coal mines department is slack in looking after these developments.

The minister also said, and I have no doubt he was correct, that the principal coal operator on Vancouver island had written to him that he regretted my taking this matter up, that he was getting along much better without my interference. A case of butting in! Well, I did keep out of the matter until patience and abstention ceased to be a virtue. I left it to the minister and to the coal operator on Vancouver island to adjust it. Coal was coming in last year and in the early months of this year to a dangerous extent, but I did nothing; I was waiting, partly to be asked to take the matter up and partly to give them an opportunity to get together, as he said he was doing, and find a solution. If I did butt in it was only when I was asked by a representative elected body from the coal mine that is in my district, and when I found that there was nothing doing. And what did I do then? Did I take any unlawful or improper action by way of butting in? I hardly think it. I took the regular line; I wrote to the minister under date of January 23, presenting the matter reasonably and temperately to him, and the answer I got under date of January 31 was in part:

I cannot say at the moment just what steps may be contemplated to deal with the situation.

That was in January. Three months later, on March 29, the subject came up again and I did feel that I was justified in asking what if anything had been done or what was contemplated. The minister on that occasion said he had had a meeting just the day before. A week later I found in the press under a name known to be close to the government, an intimation that it was not anticipated that anything would come out of the negotiations, which was proved to be all too true by the statement the minister made this afternoon. Then I find that Colonel Villiers, the largest coal operator on Vancouver island, gave an interview in Winnipeg on his way home; he said the minister had expressed his views in the house, and that was all there was to it. He also remarked that he employed 2,000 men at present on a part time basis, and he stated:

They are fine, stout hearted fellows and deserve much credit for the fine way in which they are making the best of difficult times.

I entirely endorse that statement, but for the very reason that they are fine fellows and are making the best of present conditions it is more necessary than ever that the coal operators, the minister and the department exert themselves in an endeavour to find a solution to this very difficult problem. It is all very well to say they are fine men; that hardly meets the situation, which is getting worse. I have a letter here from a very prominent man in one of the coal mining towns on the island, a well known Conservative; he says that during the last fortnight in March the mine worked for three days. So I say matters are getting worse. I have before me the record of the coal output for March of this year. As compared with March of 1932 the coal output of Vancouver island dropped from 70,391 tons to 49,663 tons, a drop of 25 per cent. In view of this ever decreasing production on Vancouver island is it not time for me, even at the risk of being told that I am butting in and that I lack propriety and dignity, to stir up the dead ashes and try to find some solution, or at least get some action?

I have already suggested some steps that might be taken. Great Britain subsidizes her coal; the exchange is against us, and it is convenient to bring coal in ballast as a result of the conference agreements. These are all factors which enter into the situation, and I suggest that the time has arrived when we should apply those dumping duties that have been so readily and quickly and gladly imposed by the Minister of National Revenue in matters affecting indutries in Ontario. They hardly need to wait a day to get that dumping duty slapped on. We have seen these dumping duties applied with such haste that they have had to be removed after two or three days because it was found that they did not meet the situation. Now I should like to deal with another matter, and perhaps at this time we might call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, May 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Coote for the second reading of Bill No. 81 to amend the Interest Act.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of traversing the ground covered in the debate on Friday evening, but I would like to say a few words in reply to some of the statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes): It seems to me that the attitude taken by the minister might be summed up in this way: he sympathizes with any person who has to pay interest rates of any size with commodity prices at the present levels, but he feels that nothing can be done about it. His attitude would lead us to believe that there is just so much money in Canada, a fixed sum, and therefore the borrowers will have to do the best they can under the circumstances. It is the duty of the federal government to see that there is sufficient money available at all times for the carrying on of industry and trade and commerce. There should also be sufficient available for the payment of interest charges as these charges enter largely into the cost of conducting every business and industry. Money is of no use unless it circulates and if the government takes the attitude that industry must be carried on with the money now in existence, it should take steps to see that the money now in Canada is circulated and at rates of interest which industry can afford to pay. If the minister would put a tax on unspent balances, the money in the country would soon be put to work. The minister states that capital is floating and that if it cannot secure the rates of interest it desires in Canada, it will go elsewhere. I am sorry the minister did not tell us just where it would go. Where could it get better returns than in Canada? Would it go to the United States? I went to the library to-day to look up the financial papers to see what rate of interest government bonds in the United States were returning. I found that Liberty 3½'s were quoted in New York at 101. Surely our money would not go there to earn that very low rate of less than three and a half per cent. Would it go to Great Britain? According to the London Times, British government 3½'s are quoted at from 100 to 101. Evidently our money would not go there. Treasury 2's due in 1935 and 1938 were selling in London at 99¾. Canadian capital could not go to Great Britain and obtain higher returns than is being asked for in this bill.

Very little capital could be taken out of Canada in any event as there is a very small amount that could really be moved. I think there is a good deal of misunderstanding with regard to this moving of capital, I do not see how it could be moved. When the Dominion government cannot secure money at five per cent, I think it is the duty of the government to use some of its own money. The Dominion government is the source of all real money; the only legal tender in Canada is issued by the Dominion government. The rate of interest paid on Dominion government bonds is the chief factor in fixing interest rates, and in my opinion any Dominion government that pays five per cent or more than five per cent for money is surrendering its natural right to the money trust. The government should always bear in mind the fact that the rate of interest which it pays on its bonds sets the interest rates for other bonds. In 1927 the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) adopted a different attitude when he suggested to the late Hon. Mr. Robb, then Minister of Finance, that he should float a four per cent bond issue and compel the banks and insurance companies to subscribe to that issue. I shall not take the time to read all of the Prime Minister's remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not quite correct. I said that a percentage of the reserves of the insurance companies, to be decided by the minister, should be invested in these four per cent securities.

Mr. COOTE: I accept the correction of the Prime Minister. I think he proposed a very proper practice when he suggested that a certain percentage of the reserves held by the banks and insurance companies should be invested in that four per cent issue. I should like to read briefly from his proposal. He said:

> Therefore I propose that the Minister of Finance should, after creating his four per cent consolidated Canadian securities, provide by legislation that a percentage, to be hereafter determined, of the revenue of the insurance companies, amounting to a net total of over $110,000,000 this year, and from the deposits of the Canadian people in our savings banks, amounting approximately to at least another billion and three-quarters, should be utilized for the purpose of paying off this $100,000,000. This four per cent security I would maintain at all times at par—a very simple process.

I think the Prime Minister made a very useful suggestion at that time, one which the government of that day might very well have acted upon. The Minister of Finance referred to the bonds of Alberta and British Columbia which he said were selling on a basis to return 6.6 and 6.45 per cent respectively. I want to say without any mental reservation that no province in Canada can afford to pay such rates of interest. It was current gossip at that time that the provinces were held up by the bond houses and told that if they would not accept the offer made at that time they would not be able to sell their bond issues at all. It is to be regretted that the Dominion government did not tell the money authorities at that time that they must take up those bond issues at a lower price. Either that, or the provinces should not have floated any issues. However, the provinces were helpless and they had to accept the bids made by the bond houses or do without.

I think it all comes back to the fact that in 1931 the Canadian government floated the national service loan at a price which returned over five per cent. When that loan was issued the price of all other bonds outstanding in Canada was depressed. Bond prices fell almost immediately afterwards. Practically every financial institution in Canada had millions invested in these bonds and the depressed prices had a serious effect upon their balance sheets. Later on in the year the government passed an order in council authorizing the banks and insurance companies to value their securities at higher prices than those at which they were quoted on the market. There would have been no need for that action had the government insisted that the national service loan be taken up at four per cent. Then the provinces could have easily financed their needs at five per cent. In 1927 the Prime Minister did not hesitate to say that he would insist upon the banks and insurance companies investing a certain percentage of their reserves in the bond issue at four per cent, and I think he should have insisted upon the same thing in 1931. In 1931 commodity prices had fallen off by at least thirty per cent as compared with those prevailing in 1927. Yet every province in Canada has been compelled to pay interest rates much higher than they paid before.

The minister then went on to say that setting a maximum rate of interest would interfere with control of credit and interest in Canada by a central bank. I would say that when the minister establishes a central bank in this country he can repeal this legislation if it should have become law. Further than that, may I say I have asked for years that a central bank should be established. If we had had a central bank properly established and operated, the government would never have had to pay five per cent interest in times of low commodity prices. If we had had that central bank I would not be bringing in this bill to-night. But the question in my mind is: Is the government going to establish a central bank, and, if so, when is it going to be established? I have waited until practically the end of the session to bring in this bill. I hoped the government would take some action to raise commodity prices, to bring about lower interest rates. I hoped the banking committee might before this have recommended that some action be taken in regard to interest rates on existing obligations. But nothing happens; the committee does not report. The government does nothing; it does not establish a central bank or do anything to raise commodity price levels. Are we to sit here doing nothing and see our people left at the mercy of the money changers? Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said:

> No agriculturist, no industrialist and no merchant can afford to pay ten per cent interest for the money he uses in his business; it simply cannot be done; normal business will not permit of that rate of interest. Moreover, no bank can afford to take a loan at ten per cent, because it is too risky.

Then again he said:

> But I lay down the principle that a rate of interest around eight or ten per cent makes successful operation of the ordinary business activities impossible and unprofitable.

The Minister of Finance said the other night that old established industries in Canada are paying nine per cent. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said last year: They cannot do that. The Minister of Finance said that great public utilities with long records of good service behind them are paying ten per cent. Is it not time that we do something about this? The Minister of Trade and Commerce said last year that business cannot pay these rates and we know they cannot. Evidently something should be done about the matter, but the Minister of Finance does nothing. He says:

> It is idle to suggest, even with all the "isms" that are afloat to-day, that there is any other method whereby the rate of interest can be determined than the age-old law of supply and demand.

Well, we could take some steps to increase the supply. In the last three years the supply has been lessened by $700,000,000 and this house has done nothing about the matter. If we would increase the supply by the $700,000,000 that has disappeared in the last three years, we would be doing something. If there is anything in the argument of the Minister of Finance that there is only so much money; that we must pay that rate of interest and that the rate is determined by the law of supply and demand, let us increase the supply; the demand, we will take it for granted, remains the same, and according to the minister's argument, the rate will come down. I think that naturally follows.

Let us look for a moment at what is being done in the United States. In a dispatch in the Ottawa Journal two or three days ago, I find this:

> Inflation bill is passed by the United States house.

These are the chief provisions as listed in the press dispatch:

> The president is authorized to arrange with the federal reserve banks and board for the banks to purchase in the open market up to $3,000,000,000 of government obligations, including stock in corporations of which the United States is the majority stockholder.
> If the president is unable to arrange this operation, or if it be found inadequate to raise prices to the desired level, the president may.
> Direct the issuance of United States notes up to $3,000,000,000 to buy government obligations, and make provisions for retiring four per cent of this amount annually through congressional appropriations.

If our government is prepared to take similar measures in Canada, it can reduce the rate of interest on all government obligations. The president is also given power to:

> Reduce the gold content of the American dollar by as much as 50 per cent.
> Provide for the unlimited free coinage of silver at a fixed ratio with gold.
> In addition, the president is authorized to accept silver up to $200,000,000 in payment of war debts during the next six months, valuing the silver up to fifty cents an ounce, to be used as the basis for the issuance of silver certificates.

I do not think our government can afford to sit back and say: We can do nothing about the matter. This government could very well take similar measures.

Mr. ERNST: Does the hon. member's bill apply only in future, or does it apply to past due interest? I want to ask possibly three questions.

Mr. COOTE: I intended to mention that before I sat down. The bill applies only to future borrowings. The reason that I have not asked that it apply to existing obligations is that that matter was definitely referred to the banking and commerce committee and I did not like to go to the length of asking the house practically to take that matter out of the hands of the committee.

Mr. ERNST: It was not made retroactive because of the fact that possibly legal opinion had arrived at the conclusion that past due interest was a matter of civil contract.

Mr. COOTE: I would not like to answer the hon. member on that point; I am not a lawyer. I know there are conflicting opinions, but I understand that the majority of the opinions given to the committee by the authorities to whom they sent a questionnaire are to the effect that jurisdiction over interest on existing obligations also rests in the dominion house.

Mr. ERNST: One more question. With reference to the future, I assume the hon. member will agree with the proposition that capital is fluid. Supposing we fix in this country an interest rate beyond which one cannot go and the interest rate in the country to the south becomes higher; will the money be loaned in Canada or will it be loaned in the United States or any other country where there is a higher interest rate than that in Canada? If that condition arose, what would the hon. member do to meet it?

Mr. COOTE: The Prime Minister has very wide powers under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, and, if necessary, he could correct any situation which might arise such as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. ERNST: Surely the hon. member, being a free trader, would not agree to the restriction of capital.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is second reading, not committee of the whole house.

Mr. COOTE: I am glad to have the hon. member's question and, sir, I do not object, so long as you will allow it, to any question which may be asked in regard to the bill which I have introduced. If the hon. member will make a thorough study of this question of the movement of capital, he will find there is not in Canada very much capital that can be moved out. Most of the capital that is invested in this country is invested in factories, plants, railroads and similar assets of one kind or another; there is not very must of what is generally referred to as liquid capital which can be moved out of the country.

Mr. ERNST: In case a situation did arise where capital could profitably be invested outside of Canada, is the hon. member in favour of an embargo on capital in order to meet such a condition?

Mr. COOTE: That is a situation which I do not think will arise, and I do not think at the moment—

Mr. ERNST: Suppose it did arise.

Mr. COOTE: I do not think it can.

Mr. ERNST: But the banks to-day have hundreds of millions of dollars on deposit.

Mr. COOTE: If the hon. member will allow me to put the matter in this way: Were I adviser to the Minister of Finance at any time and such a condition arose, I would say to him: Let those people take their capital out if they know any way of doing so and we will supply the deficiency by drawing on our national credit; we will replace that capital with national credit borrowed from our central bank. I think that is the best kind of capital we could have in Canada.

Mr. ERNST: In other words, the hon. member would inflate our currency?

Mr. COOTE: That would not be inflation; it would be reflation; it would be replacement of capital taken away with capital raised on our national credit. That national credit would cost us nothing and we would get rid of capital that is costing us high rates of interest.

Mr. ERNST: But there is the question of the currency that has gone out of the country.

Mr. COOTE: If we can print any currency that will go out of the country and stay out we shall be that much to the good, but this currency has a habit of coming back to Canada just about two days after it gets out, and we have to redeem it. If we send out too much and it comes back to be redeemed, our dollar would soon be depreciated in outside countries. Then we would get a rise in the commodity price level which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg himself will admit is badly needed.

Mr. ERNST: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: So the more capital goes out of Canada under those conditions the better for his constituents and mine.

I have perhaps dealt with this question a little longer than I had intended. Before I leave the position of the United States and the action that has been taken there, I want to draw to the attention of the house the effect which that action has already had in raising commodity price levels in the United States. These figures are taken from the New York Times which I saw in the library to-day. According to Moody's commodity price index in the United States, using the index figure of December, 1931, as 100, on March 31, 1933, which was five or six weeks ago, the index figure stood at 86.3, and on May 5 at 110, a rise of 24 points inside of six weeks. That shows what can be done by a man who is determined to get action. It is a result of the action of President Roosevelt of the United States, and I only wish that Canada had a Roosevelt in power here.

I have introduced this bill more particularly because of the position of mortgagors in Canada. Their mortgages are falling due, and as I said the other night, I have the proof in my files that mortgage holders are forcing people to pay a higher rate of interest now when they are renewing their mortgages. Mortgage companies have been paying dividends of 11½ per cent for the past three years. Borrowers on mortgage cannot afford to pay any higher rate of interest now than they have paid in the last three years. Many of them find it almost impossible to pay interest at all, and why they are held up in this way when they have to renew their mortgages is more than they can understand. Because I cannot get action in any other way I finally came to the conclusion that I should introduce this bill. The United States congress has passed a bill to set aside a fund of two billion dollars for the financing of farm mortgages, and any mortgage holder can go to the federal land bank in the United States and exchange his mortgage up to fifty per cent of the value of the property for bonds bearing interest at the rate of four per cent, which are guaranteed by the government of the United States. The mortgagor then pays to the land bank 4½ per cent, regardless of the rate stated in the original mortgage and this bill has been amended so that small home owners with mortgages on homes valued at $10,000 or less can get exactly the same advantage under the bill as farmers. Are we doing anything to assist mortgagors in Canada? I say frankly that this interest bill is not the kind of bill I would really like to introduce into this house, but everyone knows that the rules of the house prevent private members introducing any bill which calls for the expenditure of a dollar. So we are precluded from bringing in many bills which we should like to see enacted here. We have urged the government repeatedly to bring in a money bill of some kind which would give us a little inflation or reflation in Canada. We have asked them for that so often that I am not going to do it any more. We have also asked them to establish a central bank. We cannot bring in a bill for that purpose. I would also like to see established some kind of public finance corporation to make an advance of even fifty per cent against these farm mortgages as well as urban mortgages at a rate of perhaps 3½ or 4 per cent. But as I said, we cannot introduce such bills, and the government so far has refused to do anything at all along that line. As the rules will not allow me to introduce such a bill there is only one thing left for me to do, and that is to introduce this bill asking that a limitation be placed upon the rate of interest which can be legally charged in Canada. I have already said in answer to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg that I do not ask that this legislation be retroactive or apply to existing mortgages. That was referred to the banking committee.

There is, of course, some question as to whether or not this house has jurisdiction. In my humble opinion it has, but I do not pretend to know because I am not a lawyer. I think it is beyond doubt that we have the power to fix a maximum rate of interest for new obligations.

I admitted the other night that there might be a very proper objection taken to this bill in the case of small loans. I think we should allow a service charge to be made in the case of small loans, not because large loans are safer than small loans, for the majority of the losses which have been made in this country have been made on large loans. I think on the average the small loan is the safer, but sometimes the interest charge on a very small loan is so small that a service charge in addition is justified, and I said to the house that I would be very willing to have an amendment made to the bill providing for that if the bill were allowed to go into committee.

There may be another objection in the minds of many members, and that is in asking for a maximum rate of five per cent. I have set that rate in the bill after a good deal of thought. I finally felt that five per cent was as high as people could afford to pay, and if we are going to fix it on that basis I think five per cent is about as high as we ought to go. I have heard some members say that they would agree to the bill if the rate were higher than five per cent. As far as I am concerned I would be glad to have the bill go into committee and let the committee decide what that rate ought to be, although I have set five per cent in the bill. If the house is willing to allow the bill to go into committee, perhaps the committee can agree on a higher rate that might be fixed as a maximum, and then the house can decide on the third reading whether the bill should be passed. But I certainly feel, seeing that we have not taken any action to raise commodity price levels or lower interest rates or make more money available, some action should be taken by this house for the protection particularly of those whose mortgages are falling due. There are many people, of course, with other money contracts, and these money contracts they are, in some cases, being forced to renew for a period of years at a higher rate of interest than in the old obligation. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the bill the most favourable consideration possible by this house.

The house divided on the motion of Mr. Coote, which was negatived on the following division:

DEPARTMENT OF MINES

Miscellaneous—To provide for payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof $2,000,000.

Mr. NEILL: At six o'clock I had not concluded my remarks on this item. This afternoon I urged upon the minister to develop or announce a policy which would in some measure tend to rehabilitate the decadent coal mining industry in British Columbia, and more particularly on Vancouver island. In reply to his request for some suggestions I made one or two which I shall briefly summarize under four headings. The first, and the one which I think holds best promise of a permanent solution of the difficulty, would be that of following the lead given by Great Britain along the line of development. If necessary, money should be spent, because money spent in that way would be used to better purpose than if it were spent for subventions. We would be enabled ultimately to be independent. The money would be spent in the development of methods of presenting the coal in what might be termed modern up to date forms. It could be processed in such ways as colloidal fuel oil, or as gas obtained from coal, so that it could compete with other fuels. As I indicated this afternoon, if such fuel could be used on government warships or government aeroplanes it would develop a great general demand. Secondly,—and this is only a temporary expedient—greater subventions should be granted in respect of the coal mined on Vancouver island. Such subventions should be in line with those granted to other areas in Canada. It is notorious that the subventions granted to Vancouver island are out of all proportion smaller than those granted to other coal areas in Canada. Third, I suggested that before the matter has gone too far, and before it has reached the status of an established industry with large sums invested, we should stop the development of trade with Great Britain on coal imported into British Columbia under the advantages of subsidies, low exchange and use as ballast. My fourth suggestion was that we might negotiate some form of reciprocity with the United States in connection with coal trade. I made the same suggestion in the house last year regarding coal and fish, but I did not receive much support from hon. gentlemen opposite. However, the idea seems more popular just now.

None of these suggestions is unreasonable, and if any of them would help they should be accepted. Half of them would, I believe, put the coal mining industry on its feet, so that it would not need to go cap in hand to the government asking other areas and industries to contribute to its support. Had the minister in his speech given us any suggestions along these lines there would have been some comfort for us in British Columbia. I specifically asked what hope he could hold out. However, anyone who reads Hansard will readily see that he had no solutions whatever to offer.

For a moment I should like to turn to another feature of coal mining in British Columbia, concerning a condition which obtains in a constituency I do not represent. On April 5, more than a month ago, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre asked if the attention of the Minister of Mines had been called to the serious condition of the coal industry at Fernie. The whole industry, in fact the whole town, was in the process of being wiped out, owing to the closing of the local mines. The minister replied that the question of what could be done, if anything, had been taken up with the government of British Columbia, upon whom responsibility rested, if there were any responsibility. He went on to say that if it were possible for the government to assist, of course that assistance would be given. The suggestion that the responsibility rested upon the province of British Columbia would apply only to taking care of relief. The minister overlooked, however, or did not seem to realize, the greater responsibility resting upon the dominion of adopting a policy to take care of the situation, especially, as I shall proceed to show, it was the policy of this government which brought Fernie to the desperate point it has now reached. I say that at least in part—and I think a large part—the government policy brought about that situation. Hon. members from the east will understand better if I explain that Fernie is in that part of British Columbia bordering on the United States and practically ninety per cent of its coal output went to that country. The government's policy adopted last year of raising the duty on coal coming into Canada, which automatically raised the duty on coal going into the United States, resulted in the total loss of that foreign trade, which amounted to about ninety per cent of the total. I quote from a well known Conservative paper in British Columbia:

> The manipulation of reciprocal tariffs on coal, while beneficial to eastern Canadian coal operators, Fernie mines suffered severely as 90 per cent of its markets which were export, were completely shut off.

Another says:

> One of the contributing causes for the railroads doing this—

That is ceasing to take the coal.

> —may be assigned to the imposition of increased duty on coal going into the United States, which was put into force as a countervailing duty on Canadian exports. The application of this duty reduced the number of employees at Coal Creek to the extent of 300.

The town, which numbers some 4,000 inhabitants, is practically bankrupt. People will have to move away or be kept on relief, because it is just a one industry town.

Now we were told—until I was sick of hearing of it—on every platform in my riding during the last election, that it was not right to take the narrow view I was taking of looking after the interests of Comox-Alberni first. The electors were invited to take a broad national view; a broad national policy was the idea. I predicted at that time, with almost alarming accuracy as it has proved, that that would merely mean the sacrifice of the British Columbia miners for the benefit of Alberta or of eastern coal areas. That is exactly what has taken place. "Wide is the road and broad the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that walk therein"—principally I think because it is the easiest; they follow the line of least resistance. That is what happened in this case.

Mr. YOUNG: Did you say the other road is straight?

Mr. NEILL: I did not deal with the other road; I leave that to the member for Weyburn—I wish he were on it now. I do not say the result was the government's fault; they certainly did not do it deliberately, but as part of a national policy which may have secured great advantages for Nova Scotia and Alberta. I do not even say that the policy was wrong, but when they saw the situation that was likely to arise they should have acted on item 8, I think it was, of the policy of the Conservative party in the last election, and provided compensating adjustments. That could easily have been done by increasing the bonus on the Crowsnest coal so that it could have got into some of the central Canadian markets.

That then, is the situation. What are we doing about it? As far as I can make out, nothing. As far as I can make out, we are going to do nothing. The days are passing into weeks, the weeks into months and the months into years, yet we are dallying along the primrose path, taking the line of least resistance. We stop here and there and gather a flower of trite truisms or pick a posy of platitudes; we go on down the path of dolce far niente into the great Never-Never land where it is always afternoon, where the shadows are always long, where people live in a vague, misty haze, a narrow confined area surrounded by nebulous and unsubstantial hopes, where "man never is but always to be blessed." When I refer to the minister in this connection I do not know that that is fair, I should perhaps say his department; and even then I should limit it—I mean the coal mines branch of the Department of Mines. They seem always to have the backward look; they are the apostles of precedent, ever looking timorously behind them for some precedent to guide them. But these are days of change; why do they not get out and make precedents? Instead of being, and leaving us to be, the victims of circumstances, why do they not seize the circumstances and compel them to serve their end and ours, compel them to produce a policy that will meet the situation? Why do they not make things happen? The Prime Minister on an occasion in his earlier career immortalized himself, pounded the desk, I am told, and said that either he or the government would make things happen. That is what we want done. To use a vernacular expression, the minister needs to shake up his department and tell them to get a move on. I suggest that his department requires a new motto, a new slogan. The motto should be "requiescat in pace," and the slogan: "yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep." Yes, and it needs only some sympathetic friend to put a lily in its hand; then the coal mining industry of Vancouver island would be in a position to say: Don't it look nat'ral? —and I might add, appropriate.

In my opening words this afternoon I did not go any further than ask the minister if he could give us any suggestion, any encouragement, any hope of any policy or any action in this regard. Had he done so I should have been satisfied and said no more. But anyone who will read the minister's reply will be compelled to admit that surely it is time someone butted in, that someone stirred up the stagnant waters, that—someone endeavoured to galvanize the Dead sea fruit of inefficiency and inactivity into energized action. I am not one of those who say I think the government ought to do something, but is unable to suggest what that something should be. I have suggested it.

What more can I say? I see the Prime Minister is in his seat; I will appeal to him. I wonder if he can hold out some hope of reciprocity with the United States that would help us. I know that any view to which he would give expression would not be an accomplished fact, it would be nothing more than a hope, but even hope, however slight and distant, would be better than the black despair which now hangs over the coal mining industry of Vancouver island and British Columbia generally. I am not speaking for the sake of attacking the minister; I have nothing to gain by that. I am only making an earnest endeavour to galvanize if possible the government into action, to impress upon the government—I wish I had greater power to express it—the desperateness of the situation, in case happily I might bring the government to a realization of the extreme importance of taking early and speedy action in this matter.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister tell us whether in addition to this $2,000,000 that is being provided by the tax payer for the moving of this coal, the railways contribute anything in the form of lower freight rates?

Mr. GORDON: No, there has been no contribution as far as lower freight rates are concerned with respect to coal.

Mr. YOUNG: The regular rate is applied. Can the minister tell us further if all of this money has been spent on freight rates or if some of it has been spent in other ways? How much has gone for administration? Has anything gone for research or any other kind of work?

Mr. GORDON: Out of an expenditure of $1,750,000 an amount of $15,000 has gone for administration.

Mr. YOUNG: And all the rest has gone to the railway companies?

Mr. GORDON: No, to the producers of the coal, but applied towards the reduction of the rate, of course.

Mr. YOUNG: I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the suggestions he made for improving the situation of the coal mining industry in western Canada. He made four suggestions: first that the government lend assistance to devising some way of processing the coal so that it will be more acceptable to the market. Something might be said in favour of that, but our experience with processing coal has not been very fortunate in the past. Some years ago the federal government in conjunction with the Manitoba government and the Saskatchewan government established a plant in southern Saskatchewan to experiment in the processing of lignite coal with a view to making it more marketable. I think millions were spent in that enterprise. Finally when they thought they had something accomplished they handed the whole plant over to a syndicate of capitalists—gave it to them for a dollar, I believe, the government withdrawing from the field. This syndicate, not satisfied with getting the plant for nothing, then asked the government to buy their output. I know the Saskatchewan government undertook to supply their public building with the product at a price profitable to the owners. But still they were not satisfied; I never yet knew any industry built on subventions and grants to be satisfied, and I doubt if anyone else in this country ever heard of such a thing. Feed them on pap, subventions, favours of one kind and another, and they always come asking for more.

The member for Comox-Alberni also suggested increasing the subventions. I say again, when can you satisfy an industry by increasing subventions? The more you give them the more they want. They seem to have only one word in their vocabulary; that is the word "more". No matter what you give them they always cry for more, and these industries are always in distress. Look at what has been done for the steel and coal industry in Nova Scotia, but has there ever been a session of this parliament when they have not been crying for more? Certainly there has not been such a session since I came here. Then the hon. member for Comox-Alberni also suggested that we might stop the importation of cheap coal from Great Britain.

Mr. NEILL: To the Pacific.

Mr. YOUNG: Why should we prohibit the importation of cheap coal from any country? When Great Britain became the leading industrial country in the world it was largely because she had the cheapest coal. When Germany became a great industrial nation one of the main reasons was that she had great coal deposits within her own borders. When the eastern central United States developed the same industrial enterprises it was also largely because they had cheap coal. Why should we deny our people this essential to the building up of industry? I think it would be folly in the extreme. If Great Britain sees fit to bonus her coal exports, so much the better for us; if she wants to tax her people in order to give us the cheap fuel we need, so much the better for us.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni made one suggestion, however, and because of that I am willing to forgive him all the rest; he suggested reciprocity with the United States with regard to coal. Think what it would mean to this country if we had reciprocity with the United States, even if it were only with regard to coal. Look at the great industrial portion of Canada just across the lakes from some of the richest coal deposits in the world. Coal can be brought in from the United States at a cost of a little over $1.50 per ton. Then look at the western coast where the coal deposits are on our side of the line and the natural market is on the other side. It is reported that the Prime Minister is going to arrange some sort of reciprocity treaty with the United States. One of the very best provisions he could include in that treaty would be reciprocity in coal.

Mr. NEILL: And fish.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, and fish if you like. That would give central Canada the cheap coal from the United States, and it would afford the people of western Canada a market for their coal.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: In that case what would happen the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia?

Mr. YOUNG: In what condition is the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia at present?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It would be wiped off the map.

Mr. YOUNG: The coal mines in Nova Scotia are on the seaboard. If we had reciprocity would there be anything to stop the exportation of coal to the United States?

Mr. GORDON: Certainly; they cannot land it in the United States to compete with their domestic coal.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it not true also that United States coal is more suitable for the purposes for which it is required?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it not true that the people of Nova Scotia burn United States coal in their stoves?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, it is true; they prefer it. If the people of Nova Scotia persist in bringing coal from under the sea when they can get it cheaper somewhere else I do not know that it is the duty of this government to encourage them in that uneconomic practice. This afternoon the minister spoke of the high price he had to pay for United States coal at one time, and he said he did not want to bring about that condition again. I also paid those high prices, but I know—and I think the minister knows—that it was war time, and we were paying war prices. I can also tell the minister that while commodity prices have been going down the price of coal has not gone down to nearly the same degree.

Mr. GORDON: If I might interrupt my hon. friend to say so, the main reason is that throughout the world the wage scales of coal miners have not been reduced, and I do not think the hon. member would suggest that they should be reduced.

Mr. YOUNG: Then the minister says that the coal miners are getting better wages, that they are the only basic producers whose wages have not been reduced?

Mr. GORDON: They have been reduced, but not to the same extent.

Mr. YOUNG: Why should they be reduced when we are voting $2,000,000 out of the treasury to assist that industry?

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps their wages have not been reduced but their working hours certainly have been cut down. In one case men have been working only three days in a fortnight, and I should say that was quite a reduction.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, but perhaps if they were working at a lower rate they would get more work. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni spoke of hungry miners; that is what he is thinking of. I am thinking of shivering consumers, people who cannot buy coal in a country where they need it, people who cannot buy fuel and who do not know where to get the money with which to keep themselves warm. Here we are taxing ourselves to the extent of $2,000,000 extra in order to keep coal out of this country. The minister says he is afraid of a monopoly. What is he doing? He is closing one source of supply in the United States; he has closed another source in Russia and now it is suggested that he should close still another source in Great Britain and deliver us into the hands of the Canadian coal producers. This afternoon the minister made reference to an eastern and a western coal combine, but now his proposal is to deliver us into the hands of these combines. If he is afraid of a monopoly why deliver us into their hands?

Then there is another point to be considered. If we were getting in coal from the United States the boats carrying grain down the lakes could bring coal back; they would have a cargo both ways, and the result would be lower freight rates on wheat. But when you prohibit the importation of coal from the United States the boats have to come back light, so they must make enough going down to pay for both trips. The result is higher rates on wheat and higher prices for coal. Because of this legislation the farmers of the western provinces, and particularly the farmers of Saskatchewan, will have to sit at their doors and see trainloads of coal passing by going to the eastern provinces, on which they are paying the freight rates though they get no assistance in connection with their own coal, for which they have to pay the full rate.

The remarks of the minister this afternoon bring up the question as to how far it is the duty of a government to guarantee that industry shall never change. When new methods come into being or new commodities come on the market to compete with those we have been in the habit of using, is it the function or the duty of the government so to arrange things that these new commodities shall not have a chance, by forcing the people to continue to use the old? Let us consider for a moment what would have happened a country whose government always assumed the attitude that they must never allow any change or any progressive thing to happen. What would have happened to a country if, we will say, when printing was first invented they had promptly proceeded to bonus the old fashioned writers in order that the old methods might not be done away with? Supposing when the spinning jenny and loom were invented the same country had promptly proceeded to bonus the old fashioned method of making cloth by hand; what would have happened? What would have been the result if, when matches were invented, they had put a subvention or bounty on the manufacture and use of flint and steel? When steamboats were invented what would have happened if they had started to pay subventions or bounties on boats propelled by oars, or if when railroads were invented, in order to encourage the old industry they had granted subventions on ox carts in order to keep us travelling in that way? When electric lights were invented what would have happened if governments had said, "We will stick to the old tallow candles and force the people to use them"? Where would we be to-day if, when the binder was invented, the government had decided to pay bounties on the old scythes or if, when the thresher was invented, they had decided not to use this modern invention which might throw somebody out of work and had put a bounty on the old fashioned flail? What would have happened if a nation had consistently followed that policy? You may say it could not have happened, because no nation could have survived under those conditions, and that is quite true. Any nation that attempted to do so would have passed on its way long ago, like the mammoth and the dinosaur, and would have been replaced by something more modern.

So I ask the question, Mr. Chairman: Is it the function of the government to preserve the obsolete in industry and say to the people that no matter what new thing may come along they will see that the existing industry is not harmed? Would it not be much better to say, "If you cannot compete with this new process your industry is out of date and you had better get out of it"? That is the only true law of progress and it is not the function of government to stand in the way of progress and perpetuate the obsolete. It seems to me that the only way to help any industry is to allow it to make progress and expose it to whatever competition the world provides.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Would that be correct with regard to the wheat industry of western Canada?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Then you should have received better prices than you did receive in the past year.

Mr. YOUNG: Are you going to raise prices by your tariffs?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: We have raised them already.

Mr. YOUNG: You put on a duty of thirty cents and the price went lower than ever. For several years past every government in the world has been bending every effort to try to bolster up the price of wheat. The net result of all these efforts has been lower prices than ever. This afternoon I made a motion which I understand was out of order; I moved that this item be struck out entirely. I am now going to make one which is in order; I move that it be reduced to one dollar.

Mr. GORDON: I shall not take up the time of the committee at any great length in connection with this item but I would like to make a few observations on what the hon. member for Weyburn has said with respect to this industry. In the first place, the hon. member advocates the removal of duties on coal and claims that this action would result in Nova Scotia coal being burned in the eastern United States. I suggest that the hon. member look at the prices prevailing in the consuming markets along the Atlantic seaboard in the United States. He will find that it would be impossible for those states to provide a market for Nova Scotia coal. The hon. member then argued that by taking off the tariff the coal from British Columbia could go down to Washington, Utah and other western states and provide a solution for the whole problem.

Mr. YOUNG: No, I did not say that.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. GORDON: An examination of the cost of producing coal at Bellingham will show that the general costs are much lower than those of British Columbia, including Vancouver island.

Mr. NEILL: The Seattle coal is very inferior.

Mr. GORDON: The Bellingham coal may be inferior but the Utah coal certainly is not. I have reviewed this matter and I feel sure that that market would not be available to us.

I do not know that I would care to quarrel very much with the theory advanced by the hon. member of making every industry and every vocation, public or private, stand upon its own feet and get along without assistance. When time has permitted, I have listened to the debates in this house and I have come to the conclusion that it all depends upon where a man lives or where his interest may be when it comes to deciding to what extent he will stamp with his approval an invasion of the public treasury. I did not hear the hon. member for Weyburn stand up—he may have done it—and deplore the paying of a bonus on wheat.

Mr. YOUNG: He did, though.

Mr. GORDON: If he did, then I compliment him upon his consistency. During the debates which have taken place in this house upon tariffs, bonuses and things of that character, there has been disclosed an attitude of silence by hon. members when such matters touch their particular geographical locality or something in which they are interested.

Mr. YOUNG: I might tell my hon. friend that we have coal deposits in my constituency.

Mr. GORDON: Yes. I understand the Truax Traer property is located in my hon. friend's constituency. We find the hon. member for Comox-Alberni impeaching the government for everything it has done with respect to the assistance given to the coal industry on Vancouver island.

Mr. NEILL: For what they have not done.

Mr. GORDON: I do not expect anything else because that has always been his attitude ever since I have had anything to do with the administration of the Mines department. From year to year I have had occasion to examine into the difficulties facing this industry and, as I have said before, I realize that there is a limit to which the government can go in giving assistance to the coal or any other industry. As I said a moment ago, I am not quarrelling with those who condemn the bonusing of industries and things of that character, but we must realize that there are industries which are vital to the life of this country, particularly during times like these. If these industries cannot prevail without something more than sympathetic interest on the part of the government, if they are left to get along on their own at a time like this, then I would fear greatly for the tens of thousands of workmen who are dependent upon them for their livelihood. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has always adopted a consistent attitude with regard to these matters. Perhaps that is his duty, occupying the position he does in this house. I have discussed this question with those most vitally interested, with those who have huge investments on the island and although it may not be the fault of those at present in control of the industry, the fact is that the past history reveals that the expenditures and expansions which have taken place were not to be commended. I have had many conferences with those in control of this industry. Is it possible that they are not interested in their mines? Of course they are. Is it possible that they are not doing their best to make their mines pay? Of course they are. But it is equally true that in common with the rest of the world, Canada's consumption of coal has been going down for almost four years. However, as I said this afternoon, the figures disclose that Canada has not suffered as much as other countries. I had a conference with the operators of Vancouver island over three years ago. They asked for certain assistance which would enable them to maintain their men in employment. That assistance, which may be in definance of the theory advocated by the hon. member for Weyburn, was granted by the government. Unfortunately they did not properly forecast the future, and the consumption of coal fell off. As everyone knows, they again approached the government asking for further assistance and this was granted with respect to bunker and export coal. The export market is mainly in South America because in order to ship in the United States they would have to meet the same duty which we impose. It was the considered view at the time of those in charge of those operations on Vancouver island that the assistance given by the government to those mine owners would enable them to keep their workmen employed and to maintain that industry on its feet. Again consumption fell off and to-day they are having an extremely difficult time.

When I made reference a few weeks ago, when this item was before the committee, to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I did not do so or intend to do so in a way that would cause him to feel aggrieved; if I did, I am indeed sorry for it. But when this matter was engaging the attention of the Canadian Collieries Limited and myself, I received unsolicited a letter from the general manager. I shall not place it on Hansard, but it was a letter to which I made reference before. In the view of those who are in charge of the coal mining industry on Vancouver island, the efforts of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni were not helpful and they so state in their communication to me. They may be wrong and his efforts may have been very helpful, but that was their opinion. I have it from the producers of coal on Vancouver island that as a result of the assistance which the government has given them, they have been able to keep their miners working at least on part time. It is true that they are having great and serious difficulties.

So far as the importation of British coal is concerned, that has amounted to only some 9,600 tons. That in itself is not of any great importance.

Mr. NEILL: In two months.

Mr. GORDON: Yes. I do not care to dwell on that any further.

Since I have come into the house the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has not dealt with me in any particularly friendly way in connection with any of these coal matters. On almost every occasion, with his facility of expression and his subtlety in debate, he has turned his attack on me and he has never failed, when matters in connection with the coal industry have come up, to go the whole length in condemning anything the government sought to do. I have no doubt this industry and the predicament in which the workers find themselves are close to the heart of the hon. member, but not more so than to my own. I am just as keenly interested as he is in these workmen or in any other workmen in this country who under the stress of the times find it difficult properly to maintain themselves and their families. I do not think there is in the house a member who has not been and is not giving his earnest attention to all these questions which are so baffling; and I do not believe it comes with good grace from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to arrogate to himself every possible suggestion of sympathy towards those who may be suffering. I listened, of course I had to listen, to his sepulchral address to-night; and he did extremely well, but so far as I am concerned

I intend to continue to pursue the present course, which is that this government, as need arises, will to the best of its ability give such support as it can to the maintenance of the coal mining industry and the miners at work in it.

Mr. YOUNG: I have a suggestion to make to the minister. I want to suggest that he carry his policy to its logical conclusion. He argues that he can increase employment by taking money out of the pockets of the taxpayers and paying it to men to mine coal, when we could get just as good or better coal elsewhere at a lesser price. I have not the slightest doubt that he can take money out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country and pay it to a certain class, thereby keeping that class employed; but what would be the effect on the whole of Canada? Will $2,000,000 in the hands of the coal miners give any more employment? Will it create any more purchasing power when it is in their hands than it would in those of the people from whom the minister takes it? It will not; in fact, that purchasing power will thereby be decreased by $15,000 because it takes $15,000 to distribute that amount.

But if the minister can do that, can he not do this: Let him build a roof over the whole of Canada and shut out the sun, because the sun is the greatest competitor of our coal miners; from the sun we get heat and light free. He could employ every man, woman and child in this country building such a roof and after this was done every Canadian coal miner would be working overtime to keep us warm. In this way the minister would have solved the unemployment problem; but what would be the standard of living of the people of Canada? This is only giving them any kind of useless work the government can invent for them to do. But what we want is fuel to keep us warm, houses to live in, clothes to wear and food to eat. The minister is taking money out of the pockets of the people who need it and who know better than he does how to spend it, and putting it into the pockets of some other people who should be in some other industry. Is it any kindness to any man to keep him engaged in an industry at public expense when that industry will not support itself? Certainly it is not. The man will always have to come to this parliament with his hat in his hand asking for a handout. It is no kindness to a man to maintain an industry on that ground. The minister cannot do better than accept the amendment I have moved that this item be reduced to one dollar.

Amendment (Mr. Young) negatived.

Item agreed to.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the hon. Postmaster General a question?

(Translation): Would the hon. Postmaster General be so kind as to inform the house whether he has brought a sample of Mr. Amédée Lesieur's rural mail boxes?

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): The proper sample to place on the table of the house is this one. I, therefore, deposit a photograph of these boxes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, this seems to me more like a picture. I shall therefore broach another subject. I shall be brief.

On May 5, 1933, "Le Droit" published the following speech of the hon. Postmaster General, which was also broadcasted, on that date, in Montreal:

All agree that Society and the State have never been so much in need of leaders and organizations directed by men, peace makers, having a true conception of the national spirit and requirements. It is in the hour of need that the country must depend on the patriotism of its citizens.

The Minister continues:

To serve other interests than those of the bonne entente existing among the citizens linked by birth to Canadian traditions, would mean, the prostitution of its fundamental conception and the proclamation of its unworthiness. This entente can only be reached through a correct interpretation of what constitutes mutual respect, right and justice; by contact with one another and congenial means, by mediation well planned, an opportunity well chosen, an honesty of purpose and then with a firmess favourably impressive.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Quite so.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Let us proceed as quickly as possible. I have here a few notes in which are summarized a large number of questions asked in connection with what transpired at the Post Office Department within the last two years, as well as the answers given. Various means have been resorted to since then, in order to dismiss postmasters.

Proceeding No. 1: The minister as a letter-writer:

Since August 1930, the Post Office department notified 662 postmasters (374 in Quebec and 288 in other parts of Canada) that complaints of political partizanship had been lodged against them. As a consequence of these circulars, only 19 postmasters sent in their resignations (6 from Quebec and 13 from the other provinces). (Order of the House, November 16, 1932. Laid on the table, January 31, 1933. Ref. No. 95; S.P. 207a).

Proceeding No. 2: The minister as a turnkey. Since August 1, 1930, 606 post offices have been closed, 321 new post offices have been opened, of which only 117 met their expenses. Fyle S.P. 164; Ref. 21, November 14, 1932; Hansard, p. 4359, April 19, 1933.

British Columbia	41	24

(Hansard p. 751, October 31, 1932 and p. 4359, April 19, 1933).

Proceeding No. 3: The minister as a surveyor. 96 postmasters lost their position, in every province, since August 1930, owing to the change of post office sites, ordered by the Postmaster General.

Proceeding No. 4:

The Minister as an inquisitor.

Since August 1930, 287 postmasters were dismissed for political partizanship in Quebec and 235 in the rest of the country (Hansard p. 751, October 31, 1932 and p. 4392, April 20, 1933.)

Since August 1930, 25 employees of the Post Office department have been dismissed for political partizanship in provincial elections.

New Brunswick	8
Nova Scotia	4

(S.P. 173, Ref. 94, November 18, 1932.

Since August 1930, in 197 cases a postmaster charged with political partizanship has been replaced temporarily or permamently by the person who made the charge or gave evidence against him. (Hansard, p. 1000, November 8, 1932 and p. 4392, April 20, 1933).

The following is the cost of inquiries for political partizanship since Mr. Bennett assumed power S.P. 148, November 10, 1932.

The minister as a business man.

The last yearly total revenue (gross) of the post offices where inquiries were held in connection with political partizanship of postmasters, since August 1930, amounted to $289,-630.17;—their last yearly net revenue—after deducting salaries of postmasters, allowances and expenditure for mail transportation—was nil (sic). (Order of the House, November 21, 1932.—Laid on the table January 30, 1933. Ref. No. 104; S.P. 203).

The sum of $44,499.05, which is the cost of the inquiries held for political partizanship, has therefore increased the actual deficit of these post offices. Problem: On how many bags of sugar will the tax of $2 have to be paid to cover said amount?

Let us summarize: voluntary resignation or dismissal after receipt of threatening letter, 19; post offices closed, 606; change of site, 96; dismissal for political partizanship, 522. Total of those beheaded since May, 1930, 1,243.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): I trust that yours is still on your shoulders.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am luckier than my hon. friend, the member for Lake St. John, because he has no head.

I often heard the hon. Postmaster General state that he was a follower of Macdonald. I hardly can credit this statement because in answer to an inquiry from my hon. friend the member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Thauvette) he said he had dismissed a Mr. Adélard Ménard, of St. Justin Station, who had been appointed by Sir John A. Macdonald. Since he dismisses a postmaster appointed by Sir John A. Macdonald, how can he contend to be his disciple?

I wish to point out another fact. After that we shall examine a very interesting case in which His Majesty, King George V, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the hon. Minister of Pensions (Mr. MacLaren), the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) play a part, and also with reference to future appointments by the Civil Service Commission.

I was greatly interested in an article published by a Quebec newspaper, with reference to the different part that was played by the hon. Postmaster General and his predecessor.

The first question I wish to put to the hon. Postmaster General is whether he will state what was the total amount of postal stamps sold in connection with excise?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I understand that the hon. member for Temiscouata has further remarks to make; I shall answer after, if possible, the questions he may ask.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): At present, Sir, I am putting a serious question to the minister, and, in order to proceed with method, we must advance step by step; I need beacons.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

For the last two years the act in connection with excise stamps has been changed. Previously, we were obliged to use special excise stamps; now the act permits us to use postal stamps. I beg of the hon. Postmaster to kindly inform the house what has been the increase in the revenue of his department since the act was changed, namely, since we are allowed to place postal stamps on cheques, promissory notes, etc.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We have no statistics in that connection, it is impossible to keep any. The quantity of excise stamps sold by the Post Office department is unimportant. The sale of these stamps takes place specially in rural post offices. In Montreal very few excise stamps are sold in post offices. The hon. member has had too much experience and is too anxious to show his good will and intelligence to make such a statement.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The question of stamps is most important. If the hon. Postmaster General had not the sale of stamps under his control he could not show any returns. It becomes a most important question when one contends that the hon. Postmaster General deserves a great deal of credit because he has succeeded in making both ends meet, while I wish to prove to the house that what he has gained in the sale of excise stamps the department of National Revenue has lost. I shall not insist any further as the hon. Postmaster General does not seem willing to answer.

There is another very important question. I know that the hon. Postmaster General will admit that there are now fewer employees in the Post office department. Will the hon. Postmaster General corroborate this statement that there are now fewer employees than in the past?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not catch the question.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster General inform the House whether there are fewer employees now in his department than there were in July 1930?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Since the horizontal cut of 10 per cent, does the Post office department pay less in salaries than in July 1930?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As the committee is aware, we pay 10 per cent less.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, sir, if the hon. Postmaster succeeded in balancing his budget, this year, it is because, he sells, to affix on cheques and promissory notes, postal stamps which replace excise stamps and that the revenue which the department of National Revenue would receive is now collected by the Post Office department. Secondly, there are fewer employees than in July 1930, and, thirdly, it pays less in salaries. That is why the hon. Postmaster General is able to balance his budget, at present.

Mr. SAUVÉ (Translation): The hon. member is aware that the department, this year, has reduced its expenditure by $1,122,725; he will not deny the fact.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not wish to contradict the hon. minister; I simply wish to put questions to him.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We have reduced expenditure by $1,122,725.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster General inform the House whether that amount comprises the cut in salaries and the other expenditures?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, it includes the cut in salaries and the other expenditures.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What does the cut in salaries amount to and what do the other expenditures also amount to?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member postpone this question until to-morrow; I shall then be in a position to give him these details.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): As long as the hon. minister will give me these details, to-morrow, I shall be quite satisfied. His request is only fair and I shall be very pleased to wait for this information.

The hon. Postmaster General, sir, made a grand speech at the Viger Hotel, on September 9, 1932. I shall read the report of "Le Devoir" of that date. The incident took place after last session and his idea was to explain the change made in the Civil Service Act as it affected the Post Office department. The following is what he stated—he was right, and he told the truth that time:

> The only amendment provides that post offices with a revenue less than $3,000 shall come under the control of the Postmaster General, however it is still stipulated that preference must be given to veterans who, according to the inspector's report, receive 60 per cent or more of the marks for efficiency. It is the new Article 57a of the act as amended.

A very prominent newspaper from Toronto, the "Globe", for which I have great consideration, published the following excerpt, on October 21, 1932:

Mr. Sauvé Still Dumb

Hon. Arthur Sauvé has not yet chosen to tell parliament, the Canadian Legion, or the country at large why he permitted, or perhaps perpetrated, a gross injustice in the case of the Shelburne postmastership.

A war veteran, Mr. James Hill Kennedy, was appointed postmaster at Shelburne after regular examination by the Civil Service Commission. He was later ordered by the Post Office Department to report for duty on a specified date. Naturally, he resigned his civilian job in order to take up his duties at the post office. Mr. Kennedy's employers filled his old position. But two days before the date he had been ordered to start work the Post Office cancelled its instructions. To this day no explanation has been made for the crude actions by Mr. Sauvé's department. A resolution passed by the provincial convention of the Canadian Legion was ignored.

There is, of course, no mystery about the matter to those who know what actually occurred. Mr. Sauvé cannot tell parliament that a war veteran was cheated out of the appointment because the hungry hounds of patronage had once again put decency to flight.

Apparently it is nothing to Mr. Sauvé that the laws of Canada were flouted at Shelburne. Apparently his philosophy is that when the law interferes with machine politics the law should be treated as a mere scrap of paper. Apparently, also, it is a matter of no importance that the lawlessness by the Postmaster General's department not only deprived Mr. Kennedy of his public appointment, but deprived him of his private position as well. At least, Mr. Sauvé has not stopped halfway.

I do not wish to insist, sir, on the Shelburne case which seems very interesting although sad; however, I came across certain information in questions passed as orders for returns on November 2, 1932, and tabled on January 31, 1933, order of the House No. 69 S.P. No 219:

> Returned soldiers who have applied for positions of postmaster since August 1, 1930, 335, of whom 282 were successful, and those appointed number 208.

That means 74 returned soldiers were not given positions or were replaced by civilians. The Sully case is especially an interesting one. It is the case which I alluded to a short while ago where reference is made to His Majesty, George V, the Governor General for Canada, the right hon. Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of Pensions and the hon. Postmaster General. I have a number of questions to put to the hon. minister in this respect. The drama comprises a number of scenes. To depict the first scene one would have to go back to the days of the great war; we would have to view, on the walls of the House of Commons, the paintings hanging in the Upper Chamber, the red chamber as the Senate is called. There we witness scenes of Flanders; we discover soldiers in the woods of Flanders; it is on that battlefield that King George V went to raise the spirit of Canadian soldiers

Among them, was to be seen a brave soldier by name, Isidore Jean, who had done his bit in the trenches. He bore the regimental number 2245410. One amongst the hundreds of thousands that were there. When His Majesty, the King of England reviewed the Canadian troops, he smiled on Jean as he passed by, and Jean treasured this gracious act of His Sovereign as a token of good luck. On his return to Canadian soil, Jean reposed his faith in the hon. Postmaster General and the right hon. Prime Minister; this induced him to put in an application for the position of postmaster. His file contains numerous documents:

S.P. 142, March 1, 1932; S.P. 142A, April 4, 1932; S.P. 142B, April 4, 1932; S.P. 172, November 21, 1932; S.P. 172B, March 15, 1933; Total 173 pages.

We shall go no further back than March 15, 1933, because it is the date the last return was tabled. There are so many extraordinary things in that file that I will request the hon. Postmaster General to kindly give us some explanation, shortly. Two candidates aspired for the position of postmaster at Sully, a charming parish located in the county of Temiscouata, close to the borders of New Brunswick and Maine.

Andria Tardif, postmaster (temporarily from January 20, 1932, and permanently since October 20, 1932) is a labourer who has not done his military service. (S.P 142A, p.4). Nothing in the files tabled proves that he has a better education than the veteran Isidore Jean. According to the reply of Mr. Sauvé (Hansard, page 334 October 18, 1932), Jean and Tardif have received the same education.

The only difference is that Tardif is a civilian and Jean a returned soldier. I am not going to repeat the excerpt taken from the speech delivered at Place Viger Hotel, last year, by the hon. Postmaster General. What first strikes us in these returns, after recalling the service of Jean at the front and the solemn statement of the hon. Postmaster General, at the Place Viger Hotel, in Montreal, is that the department replied, on various occasions, to Jean that the appointment would have to be made by the Civil Service Commission.

On October 24, 1931, there was an inquiry held over the charges of political partisanship lodged against the postmaster J-B. Plourde, of Sully.

On November 4, 1931, the Deputy Minister acknowledges receipt of a letter from Mr. Isidore Jean, attached to it were letters of recommendations by the parish priests of Sully and Rivierè-Bleue, which were referrred to the department by the secretary of the Minister of Pensions and in which Mr. Jean applies for the postmastership at Sully. Mr. Gaboury adds:

The recommendations on your behalf have been noted by the department; however, as you are aware, no doubt, the permanent appointment in this case is entirely under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission.

On November 4, 1931, the Postmaster General submitted to the Governor General in Council a memorandum recommending the dismissal of Mr. Plourde.

On November 10, 1931, Mr. C-E. Dubé, of Rivière-du-Loup, writes to Mr. Sauvé, as follows:

When the appointment is made permanent, should Mr. Jean be chosen by the Commission, I shall conform myself to the decision graciously.

On November 23, 1931, Mr. Gaboury again writes to Mr. Jean:

I have noted your application, however, I must inform you that if a vacancy occurs in that post office, the permanent appointment of the new incumbent will be entirely under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission.

The deputy minister again reiterates that the appointment is entirely under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. There is something very strange about this matter, sir, and you will hardly be able to repress a smile. On January 20, 1932, Mr. Underwood writes to Mr. Green as follows:

The Postmaster General has authorized the suspension of Mr. J. B. Plourde, postmaster of Sully, who, according to the findings of an inquiry, was guilty of political partisanship during the last Dominion election.

He is found guilty, but he is not punished, he is simply suspended. You will note why he was suspended instead of being punished.

The District Superintendent is instructed to place the office in the temporary charge of Mr. Andrea Tardif, on the usual understanding that his temporary employment will not give him any special claim to the position when it becomes vacant.

The permanent appointment will rest with the Civil Service Commission.

Another official of the Post Office department repeats the same thing. May I inquire, sir, from the Postmaster General why the previous postmaster, after being found guilty, was simply suspended instead of being dismissed?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I first wish to state that when I said that the Sully case came under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. I simply stated the truth. The hon. member for Témiscouata well recalls the fact that in the course of last session an amendment to the Civil Service Act was adopted by the house, placing under the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General all post offices with revenues not exceeding $3,000 per year; the Sully post office came, therefore, under the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General. It is then, acting under representations made by citizens of Témiscouata, also of Sully, with reference to Mr. Jean, I authorized the Inspector General of post offices—not the local inspector—to examine the candidate, Mr. Jean, and a report was received that he had not the required education and qualifications to fill the post of postmaster. That is why he was not appointed postmaster.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is not the question that I put to the minister. He goes much further than my question, he robs me of the facts of my case. I wish to inquire from the minister why Mr. Plourde, the late postmaster was suspended and not dismissed. There are 1,200, 1,300 or 1,500 postmasters who were dismissed. I wonder why Mr. Plourde was suspended instead of being dismissed. That is the direct question which I put and I should like to have some explanation from the minister.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The reason was, it was asserted, that the inquiry held by Mr. Achille Jolicoeur, on October 24, 1931, was not complete. It was pointed out that certain charges had not been proved against the accused, namely, that the postmaster had participated in a political triumph, in 1931; that he had made use of his official position to actively favour the liberals. It was asserted that these charges had not been proved against him.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is not satisfactory. Does the hon. Postmaster General assert that he did not take an immediate decision with reference to Plourde? Does he contend that he suspended Plourde without finding him guilty? We have here a letter from Mr. Underwood to Mr. Green which states:

> The Postmaster General has authorized the suspension of Mr. J. B. Plourde, postmaster of Sully, who, according to the findings of an inquiry held, was guilty of political partisanship during the last Dominion election.

He was found guilty and suspended. Why did he suspend Plourde after finding him guilty? Did this happen in many cases?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have no further details. If there are others I shall be very pleased to give them to-morrow to the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is my second question. I would request the two officials here assisting the hon. Postmaster General to kindly make a note of the information required as I have no doubt that the hon. minister will endeavour to answer my questions, to-morrow.

On November 4, 1931, the hon. Postmaster General submitted his memorandum to the council, to the effect that Plourde had been found guilty of political partisanship. Why did the Postmaster General not get immediately in touch with the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I beg pardon, I did not quite catch the hon. member's question.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): On November 4, the hon. Postmaster General submitted his memorandum to the council, to the effect that Plourde had been found guilty of political partisanship. Why did the Postmaster General not get in touch with the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata will admit that we have not only one case to deal with in a department where there are over 12,000 postmasters. Naturally, we seek our information from the various officials, either inspectors or district superintendents. We are obliged to consult these officials, heads of districts, previous to arriving at a definite decision.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is so, however, on the other hand, I wrote to the secretary of the hon. minister on April 25, to request him to produce certain returns, and I added: "Moreover, the day the hon. Postmaster General submits his estimates, kindly request him to bring to the house all the returns relating to postmasters of the county of Témiscouata, especially those of Sully, Notre-Dame-du-Lac and St. Arsène."

To-day we are discussing the Sully affair. The hon. Postmaster General knew that I would bring up this matter. We wish to find out how his department is managed and whether a uniform policy is followed in connection with postmasters. It should be an easy matter for the hon. minister to give me an answer without obliging his officials to work all night in order to concoct an answer for the following day. It seems to me that the hon. minister who was notified that we would discuss these cases to-day, should be ready to pass the test and answer the questions submitted to him. He should be in a position to justify his acts from A to Z.

Is the minister going to reply or will he have an answer prepared by others, for to-morrow, to the third question which I put to him and to which he gave no satisfactory answer—he admitted, himself, that he was unable to give an answer.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall give every explanation possible.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Plourde was found guilty of political partisanship; he was suspended. Why was he not dismissed? The answer is very clear, it is because one of the candidates to the position, a person by the name of Jean, was a returned soldier, and the hon. Postmaster General did not care to submit the case to the Civil Service Commission, because he feared that Jean would be appointed in preference to Tardif. That is why he did not notify the Civil Service Commission of the vacancy existing in that post office. If Mr. Plourde was suspended instead of being dismissed, it is because the hon. Postmaster General did not wish to submit the case to the Civil Service Commission. He will have no need of replying to this question to-morrow; that is the answer he would have given, had he answered candidly and sincerely this evening.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan) (Translation): I would request the hon. member to withdraw the words he has just uttered.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, what are the words I have uttered and which you find unparliamentary?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan) (Translation): The last words uttered by the hon. member are unparliamentary.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What are those words?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan) (Translation): Ask the stenographer to read them.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall tell him, sir. I contend that I am not a dishonest man and it is not the member for Témiscouata who can tarnish my reputation here this evening.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If my utterances are not parliamentary, I withdraw them graciously. I will say: that is the answer which the hon. Postmaster General would have given had he taken the trouble of examining the returns before coming to the house. Is that not parliamentary, sir?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata accepted my offer, namely, that I would furnish him with all information to-morrow. Why does he further insist? Is it to insult me?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Poor martyr! Aurora, the child martyr!

Mr. LARUE (Translation): Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall say something very unpleasant to the member for Matane (Mr. Larue) if he persists. I shall put him in his place, it will not take long.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): Very well, fire away.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): First, I shall point out, Sir, that I had no intention to tarnish the reputation of the hon. Postmaster General. I never had that intention no more than to show disrespect for the rules of the House; however, we are entitled to know what is transpiring at the Post Office Department, and it is not because a member, whose voice is never heard, pounds the cover of his desk that I shall desist.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): That desk cover may, perhaps, have more intelligence than the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall be very lenient towards the hon. member, because it is his maiden speech.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): That is not so. Silence is more impressive than your utterances.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): We shall have to deprive him of his nipple: "Baby wants his Castoria."

Mr. LARUE (Translation): I would prefer to have a nipple than to show a lack in intelligence.

Mr. COTNAM (Text): Address the chair.

Mr. POULIOT (Text): I am speaking to the chair all the time.

(Translation): On January 30, 1932, Mr Gaboury writes to Mr. Jean:

I am instructed by the hon. Mr. Sauvé to acknowledge receipt of your telegram of the 29th renewing your request to be appointed postmaster of Sully.

May I state in reply that the arrangements made are of a temporary nature and that the permanent appointment comes under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. Gaboury again reiterated to Mr. Jean, returned soldier, that the permanent appointment came under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission and this took place in January, 1932.

Pursuant to the usual practice, this vacancy will be advertised in the near future, at Sully, the applications of candidates should reach the office of the Postal District Administrator of Quebec within the time limit specified on the notice.

On February 1, 1932, Mr. Green, Postal Superintendent, writes to Mr. Underwood:

Postmaster Plourde of Sully suspended. Departmental authority 20th January asks transfer to Andrea Tardif be deferred pending discussion of partisanship with Postmaster General. Stop. Are we to proceed nevertheless?

On February 1, 1932, replies to Mr. Green:

With reference to his telegram of the 1st February the District Superintendent is requested to proceed with the temporary transfer of the Sully post office to the charge of Mr. Andrea Tardif as instructed.

Document 172, November 21, 1932: On May 18, 1932, an order in council (P.C. 1178) dismissed J. B. Plourde as postmaster, four months after being suspended, on January 20, 1932, in order that the case might not be submitted to the Civil Service Commission.

Hansard contains the following, page 3413, May 20, 1932:

Mr. Pouliot (Translation): I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General a question in connection with the Sully post office. I have been told that the postmaster in charge there had not been dismissed but suspended. I would like to know whether the hon. Postmaster General intends reinstating Mr. Jean-Baptiste Plourde as postmaster at Sully?

Mr. Sauvé (Translation): I understand a returned soldier by the name of Jean is a candidate. His name is before the Commission.

Note.—I am addressing myself directly to you Sir—that the hon. Postmaster General stated on May 20, 1932, that the name of Jean was before the commission.

Mr. Pouliot (Translation): I would also ask the hon. Postmaster General and if his answer is favourable that will be my last question in connection with this file, if the Commission is aware of the vacancy, if the Commission published the necessary notices so that the appointment of the postmaster be made with the least possible delay.

Mr. Sauvé (Translation): Certainly.

On June 1, 1932, that is ten days later, Mr. Foran, Secretary to the Civil Service Commission, writes to Jean-François Pouliot, M.P.:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated the 30th of last month—

Ten days after the hon. Postmaster General had made his statement in the House.

—and in reply I wish to state that the Postmaster General did not request the Civil Service Commission to fill the vacancy in the post office at Sully.

That is the hon. Postmaster General states in the House, on May 20, that the name of Jean is before the commission, and on June 1, ten days later the secretary of the Civil Service Commission states that the name of Jean was never submitted to the commission. Why did the hon. Postmaster General not state in the House, on May 20, 1932, that Jean-Baptiste Plourde had been dismissed by an order in council, two days before, instead of leaving the House under the impression that he was still suspended? I beg of the hon. minister to explain.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If I gave that answer, at the time, it is because I had not the information mentioned by the hon. member. Sometimes, an official information in the department only reaches the minister a few days after it is received. I had no intention to induce the hon. member in error, he may be certain of that. I gave the information which I had at the time.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Why did the hon. Postmaster General state, in the house, on May 20, 1932: "I understand that there is a candidate by the name of Jean, who is a returned soldier." His name is "before the commission" since the secretary of the commission admitted that the hon. Postmaster General had not requested the Civil Service Commission to fill the vacancy of postmaster at Sully for which Mr. Jean had put in an application?

I would ask the hon. Postmaster General whether Mr. Foran, the secretary of the Civil Service Commission, lied or whether Mr. Foran told the truth when he stated that the name of Mr. Jean had never been submitted to the commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am not called upon to state whether Mr. Foran is a liar or whether he states the truth. What I state is that when I made this statement, I was so informed and I had no intention to mislead the house at the time, because my statement was based on the information received, on the notice received. I had been notified that the name of Mr. Jean was before the commission. If it were not, in no way did I interfere.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Would the hon. Postmaster General inform the committee who told him that the name of Mr. Jean was before the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The officials of the department I presume. The incident took place over a year ago, surely the hon. member will not urge that I should remember the names, because there are numerous officials, numerous persons who communicate with the minister.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General, I presume, does not contend that Mr. Foran did not tell the truth when he stated that the name of Mr. Jean had never been submitted to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not wish to accuse Mr. Foran, I would not want to show discourtesy towards him.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have no doubt as to the hon. Postmaster General's great courtesy.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am not in the habit of doing so.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not doubt that the hon. Postmaster General is the essence itself of politeness; however, I wish to put the question in another way: Does the hon. Postmaster General state to the committee that Mr. Foran for one reason or another, perhaps with the very best intentions, did not state the truth when he said that the case was never submitted to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is not what I mean.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): On May 24, the hon. Postmaster General had, however, written to the member for Temiscouata, the following letter:

> Your letter of May 21, received in connection with the post office at Sully. I wish to inform you that the question of the permanent appointment of the new postmaster is now under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. I issued orders to advise the commission to that effect.

That is, four days after the statement which the hon. Postmaster General had given to the house and the country, he wrote to me personally that he had issued orders to submit the question to the Civil Service Commission.

On what date, sir, did the hon. postmaster issue such orders? Has the hon. minister that date before him?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member must have it.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have not the file, I have only the returns tabled in the house. It is quite different.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member will recognize that it is impossible to bring all the files of the department in case questions might be asked. There are more than one file.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is not what I alluded to. I say that I wish to have the complete returns in connection with Sully, Notre-Dame-du-Lac and another which I mentioned in a letter. The hon. Postmaster General has no excuse for not having these returns here, inasmuch as his secretary gave me to understand that these returns would be brought down.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What secretary.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have no complaints to make against the secretary. I simply state what transpired between the Post Office Department and myself. When the hon. member for Berthier Maskinonge (Mr. Barrette) becomes a minister, we shall also have questions to put to him.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Thank you.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is quite possible.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Or Senator.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Or Senator. Immediately after prorogation, I shall request that favour for the hon. member.

Mr. ST. PERE (Translation): What luck!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Was the order issued by the hon. Postmaster General transmitted to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What order?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The order to submit the case of the Sully post office.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Probably.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Probably! That is not what Mr. Foran says. He states that he never heard of it.

On May 31, 1932, Mr. Coolican notifies Mr. Plourde that he is dismissed. Yet, Mr. Plourde, suspended since the preceding autumn, was not notified before May 31 of his dismissal.

On June 12, 1932, Mr. Jean wrote to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett):

> I have a letter from you, dated October 5, 1931, which informs me quite clearly that as regards the application in question, returned soldiers have a preference over all other candidates, pursuant to the Act. I depend on your kindness for protection.

This is a letter bearing the heading of the Prime Minister's Office and dated Ottawa, October 5, 1931. In the left corner, there are the following words: (Text) To be brought to the minister's attention please. (Sgd) A. W. Merriam, Private Secretary.

(Translation)

Mr. Isidore Jean,
Sully, Témiscouata, P.Q.

Evidently a copy was forwarded to the Postmaster General.

Dear Sir,

I am instructed by the Prime Minister to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated September 25.

You are aware no doubt that the position of postmaster comes under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. The vacancy for such positions are announced by the Commission and the candidates must address their requests within the limit of time specified in the notice. Returned soldiers are always given preference over other candidates, pursuant to the Act.

The Prime Minister confirms exactly what the hon. Postmaster General stated himself, and which is, moreover, perfectly true.

I would therefore suggest that you address yourself directly to the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission, at Ottawa and the Postmaster General, who has complete juridiction over his department.

At all events, I am immediately forwarding your request to him.

Sincerely yours.

(Signed) A. W. Merriam,
Private Secretary.

Fyle 142B.
April 4, 1932.

So that the attitude taken by the Prime minister's secretary on the former's instructions, was perfectly correct. He informed Mr. Jean of two things: the first, was that returned soldiers were given preference, and, the second, that these appointments were under the control of the Civil Service Commission.

Let us see what happened. At the request of the right hon. Prime Minister, the hon. Postmaster General appointed Mr. Jean, returned soldier. On June 21, 1932, Mr. Merriam wrote to Mr. Sauvé:

(Text) The Prime Minister has directed me to forward to you the attached letter addressed to him by Mr. Isidore Jean and which is self explanatory.

Mr. Bennett has promised to bring it to your immediate attention.

(Translation)

Here we have the Prime Minister who instructs his private secretary to write to his colleague, the hon. Postmaster General, and cites the case of Jean, returned soldier, which is self explanatory. And the secretary adds that the Prime Minister has promised to bring the case to the immediate attention of the Postmaster General.

On June 30, 1932, reply of the hon. Postmaster General to Mr. Merriam:

I duly received your communication of the 21st of June enclosing a letter from Mr. Isidore Jean, returned soldier, who has applied for appointment to the vacancy at Sully, P.Q.

As the Civil Service Act gives preference to returned soldiers in the matter of these appointments, I have given instructions for the transfer of the Sully post office to the charge of Mr. Isidore Jean.

That was very good. It was done under the personal instruction of the Prime Minister himself, given through his secretary.

On June 30, 1932, Mr. Underwood notifies Mr. Green, Post Office Superintendent, at Quebec, of the resignation of Mr. J.-B. Plourde and the appointment of Isidore Jean, returned soldier.

On July 2, 1932, Mr. Green writes to Mr. Tardif to notify him of the appointment of Mr. Jean. The same day Mr. Green writes to Mr. Jean:

I have received instructions to put you in charge of the post office at Sully, county of Témiscouata.

I would ask you to inform me when you will be ready to take charge of the post office, so that an inspector of the Postal service may be sent to effect the transfer.

The preceding letter is very important. On July 4, 1932—this letter also is very important—Mr. Jean replies to Mr. Green:

In reply to your letter of the 2nd inst., relating to the transfer of the post office at Sully, county of Témiscouata, I shall be ready to take charge of it on July 9 of this week.

Then, this recommendation of June 30, is confirmed, Mr. Jean is notified by the superintendent of Post Office of his appointment, the letter inquires when he will be able to take charge of the post office, and Mr. Jean replies: I shall be ready at the end of the week. What happened? On July 4, 1932, the Postmaster General writes to Mr. C. E. Dubé:

As you are aware, the recent amendment to the Civil Service Act, places that post office (Sully) under the jurisdiction of the department, however, at the same time, it strictly instructs the department to give preference to veterans of the Great War.

In connection with the Sully case, there is on fyle an application of Mr. Isidore Jean and as the latter seems sufficiently qualified...

The minister finds him qualified.

I cannot do otherwise than to authorize his appointment conforming to the stipulations in the Act. I have given instruction to that effect and the transfer will take place in the course of the present month.

All is well, up to then; but the hon. Postmaster General is like Louis XIV, who said: "I feel two men in me." "There is the good man and then there is the bad man. I have just referred to the good one, and the other, it is not precisely the bad one, it is the easy led one, one who has not the back bone to put his foot down and resist people who wish to lead him astray." He thinks that it is not the proper thing to do, and intends to resist. He sides with one and then another, finally he finds himself in a mess.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): He is a good fellow.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Nevertheless, here is an important statement made in the presence of the minister to the effect that Jean is sufficiently qualified. It is very important. Two days later, after the letter Mr. Sauvé had written on July 4, 1932, something very strange happened, and a memorandum from the Postmaster General to his Deputy Minister is discovered:

(Text) Re Sully. Please suspend all action towards transfer to Isidore Jean pending further instructions.

(Translation): He also is suspended; it is the post office of suspension: Mr. Plourde, the ex-postmaster is suspended; Mr. Jean is appointed, he also is suspended; everybody connected with that post office is suspended.

Why has Mr. Sauvé suddenly decided to suspend all action towards the transfer of the post office to Isidore Jean, contrary to the Civil Service Act and the recommendation of the Prime Minister?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to thank the hon. member for Temiscouata for his last kind words. He will admit that I acted in good faith, that I wish to give to the returned soldier Jean all his possible rights. I recognized that he should be given preference. However, as to his qualifications he did not fulfil the necessary requirements, since later on, the inspector of the department reported that he was not qualified. However, my desire was to appoint him and the hon. member has well brought out that point. If he was not appointed after all the means I took to do so, it is because, I repeat it, people with a serious turn of mind, of whom some are known to the hon. member, made representations to me, asserting that the returned soldier Jean was not sufficiently educated or qualified to hold that post. Furthermore I did not rely only on the reports of the district inspectors to obtain my information, but I sent the Chief Inspector, Mr. Fortier, who is well known on both sides of the house for his qualifications in such matters, in order to ascertain whether the returned soldier Jean was qualified to take charge of the post office at Sully. The report, I repeat, was not favourable to Jean, and I therefore acted accordingly.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The hon. Postmaster, sir, is again robbing me of my statement; he is in too great a hurry. All that I wish to find out from the minister is what happened between July 4, the date of the appointment of Jean, and July 6, the day he suspended Jean, and why he suspended him before receiving the report of Mr. Fortier, to whom he referred just now?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): After the representations made to me, I wished to find out, before putting him in charge of the post office, whether he had the necessary qualifications.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, why did the hon. Postmaster General write to Mr Dubé, on July 4, 1932, as follows:

As the latter seems sufficiently qualified, I cannot do otherwise than authorize his appointment, pursuant to the stipulations in the Act.

The hon. Postmaster General has a too serious turn of mind to state of a candidate that he is sufficiently qualified when he is not.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That was my opinion at the time.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): But that opinion must have been based on some fact?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The chief inspector convinced me to the contrary by his report. I was first of the opinion that he was qualified and I therefore wished to be fair to Jean—not only conform myself to the act but also be fair towards him. And the hon. member proved this point just now. It was only after representations were made to me by persons from Temiscouata, stating that they knew well the returned soldier Jean, the hon. member and the people of that beautiful county, that I thought it proper to send the Chief Inspector. That covers the whole case.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is, at the time the hon. minister suspended the transfer to Jean, he had no knowledge yet whether Jean was sufficiently qualified or not, and when he wrote that Jean seemed sufficiently qualified he was hesitating what action to take. Is that what the hon. Postmaster General wishes to convey?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No that is not what I mean—hesitating what action to take. My intentions were of the best, only, when I stated that I thought him qualified, I was in good faith, I really thought he was.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Why did the hon. Postmaster General cease to think so, two days after?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It was because the Chief Inspector had reported that he was not.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The report of the Chief Inspector is dated July 22, and this took place on July 6, 16 days before. The hon. Postmaster General could not guess what the report would contain before the Chief Inspector had interviewed Jean, at Sully.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Previous to July 22, I repeat it, representatives were made to me and the hon. member for Temiscouata is aware of the fact—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am not aware of it.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): —that representations were made by persons worthy of belief and respectable, it was then that doubt must have entered my mind as to his qualifications; it was also at that time that I decided to send the Chief Inspector.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Since they were persons worthy of belief and respectable, I hope the hon. Postmaster General will have no objection to giving their names.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Among others, Mr. Dubé, mayor of Rivière-du-Loup, a candidate at the last election, who is a highly thought of gentleman, enjoying the confidence of the citizens of the county of Temiscouata —and the hon. member has often borne witness to this fact.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It is not a question of discussing the personal qualities of an individual, the point is to find out how this affair happened. Now, we know. The cat was let out of the bag. The fact is that the minister, after writing to Mr. Dubé, on July 4, 1932, that he had decided to appoint Mr. Jean because he was a returned soldier and sufficiently qualified, after receiving a letter or telégram from Mr. Dubé, on July 6, to the effect that he should not be appointed, suspends him. I wish to thank the Postmaster General for his explanations. They are perfectly satisfactory. I was aware that those were the means resorted to, however, they were not on file. The moment the hon. Postmaster General completes the returns by his explanations, I am quite satisfied.

On July 6, 1932, telegram from Mr. Coolican to Mr. Green:

(Text) Re Sully: Suspend action on transfer to Isidore Jean. Wire reply.

That was most pressing, things had to be done by telegrams.

On July 6, telegram from Mr. Green to Mr. Coolican:

(Text) Re Sully: Transfer will be deferred as directed.

Things are moving fast. The Chief Inspector of the Post Office department is more exacting than the Postmaster General. The Chief Inspector in going to Sully had a duty to fulfil. He thought: I shall do my duty conscientiously. That is, I shall see that Jean fails, I shall follow my orders. He had received instructions before leaving Ottawa. That he had received instructions, is less astonishing to me, because the minister heretofore has explained what transpired.

Since August 1930, the Chief Inspector of the Post Office department has received instructions, in only two cases, to verify the qualifications of candidates applying for positions of postmaster, and in each of these cases, it had reference to returned soldiers residing in the province of Quebec. He reported on the case of Isidore Jean, of Sully, on July 22, 1932, and on that of L.-A. Champagne, of Action Vale, on July 28, 1932 (Hansard October 31, 1932, and November 8, 1932.)

I shall now point out to the hon. Postmaster General how very sad it is to note that the people who are ill treated by his department are French Canadians from Quebec and moreover, returned soldiers.

The only two candidates that were ill-treated, in the whole of Canada, are two French Canadian returned soldiers of Quebec, whom he had examined by the Chief Inspector of his department and, with special instructions to see that they failed in their examination for the position of postmaster.

I think that it is most regrettable. As a French Canadian it rouses me. I repeat it, I think it pitiless.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Do not laugh at it yourself!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That does not prevent me to state that I think it is, nevertheless, very sad.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Do not shed tears.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. M. H. Fortier, Chief Inspector, contends that Mr. Jean is not educated enough to take charge of the post office, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Sauvé had written to Mr. C. E. Dubé, on July 4, 1932, that Mr. Jean seemed to him sufficiently qualified. (Letter cited on page 39 of returns).

Report from Mr. Green to Mr. Sauvé, February 20, 1933.

Upon receipt of his appointment Mr. Jean... further hired the services of Miss Irene D'Auteuil, a clerk in a local store, who for that reason lost the former position and could not secure employment since and is living with the Jean family.

(Translation): No answer from the minister. On July 26 Mr. Green writes to Mr. Sauvé:

Re Sully, P.Q.: With reference to departmental letter of the 30th ultimo, appointing Mr. Isidore Jean to the postmastership of the above named post office, the District Superintendent quotes hereunder a telegram, received yesterday, from Mr. Isidore Jean:

(Translation)

Will you be kind enough to inform me whether there has been any change since you notified me to prepare the post office? It has been ready for the last three weeks.

(Text): This telegram was not acknowledged. That is, Mr. Jean had been appointed postmaster of the post office at Sully; Mr. Green notified him and asked to be informed when he would be ready. Mr. Jean answers: I shall be ready. No news. Mr. Jean again writes and Mr. Green notifies the Postmaster General that he did not answer him. Most likely Mr. Green expects an increase in salary for his action.

In his report, July 20, 1932, the chief inspector of the Post Office Department states that he examined Mr. Jean and the Post office in charge of Mr. Tardif.

First, is it true that Mr. Tardif attends to the post office himself? I am putting the question to the minister.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata was entirely satisfied of my answers just now. Does he wish to start over again?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General replies differently, while I proceed step by step. Mr. Fortier, the chief inspector of the Post Office Department states that he submitted Mr. Jean to a test and that he examined the post office in charge of Mr. Tardif. What I now wish to know is whether Mr. Tardif, himself, attends to the post office.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I believe that he attends the post office himself, because the chief inspector reports on his administration and states that he is quite qualified to carry on.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is not what the inspector states; he said that the post office was well taken care of. That does not mean that it is Tardif who attends to it. I wonder whether Tardif is really in charge.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I believe so.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Was it Tardif who did the work?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am certain, because Tardif is the postmaster.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General has been misinformed. The minister requires from Mr. Jean the "necessary qualifications to personally attend, efficiently, to the post office affairs." (Letter from the Deputy Minister to Mr. Jean, November 17, 1932, S.P. 172-B, P. 24).

Why did the Postmaster General not give instructions to the chief inspector to also make a complete report on the qualifications of Mr. Tardif, like in Mr. Jean's case? Did the chief inspector put Miss Irène d'Auteuil to a test? He makes no statement on her qualifications.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata is a brilliant lawyer, an author, and he knows perfectly well that it is Mr. Tardif who is responsible for the administration of the post office at Sully.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am pleased, sir, to hear that Mr. Tardif is responsible for the administration of that post office. However, he is not the one who attends to it; he hardly knows how to read or write.

Moreover, it is not a question as to whether they hold a university degree or are doctors, both are poor country folks who have had an elementary education, and the only difference between them is that one went to the war and the other did not; therefore, the Postmaster General acted contrary to the Act. That is all what the returns show. Now, the Postmaster General feels uneasy. On July 28, 1932, Mr. Underwood writes to Mr. Green:

Was the transfer stopped by telegram or by correspondence, and will the District Superintendent please send to the department a copy of the telegram or communication forwarded to Mr. Jean, as well as a copy of any correspondence you may have received from Mr. Jean in reply.

Their conscience began to prick them; things did not seem above board, everything was going wrong.

On July 29, 1932. Mr. Green replies to the minister:

When the Assistant-Deputy Postmaster General's telegram was received, on the 7th of July, Postal Inspector Beauchamp was on his way to make the transfer. He was reached by telephone at St. Pascal and told to defer proceeding to Sully; and, that is all. Nothing was written to Mr. Jean other than our memorandum of the 2nd July.

This happened when he had been informed that he was appointed postmaster and had prepared himself.

On July 30, 1932, Mr. Green writes to the Postmaster General:

With reference to our memorandum of yesterday's date, I have to advise that Mr. Isidore Jean has just been in this office and inquired, respecting the telegram, as to when he is to get the office and was told that the matter was under consideration at Ottawa.

Jean had already been appointed since July 4, he wanted information. No news! This letter was written one week after the Chief Postal Inspector had found that Mr. Jean's education was lacking, and twenty-six days after Mr. Sauvé had written to Mr. Dubé that he thought Mr. Jean sufficiently qualified. On October 4, 1932, the acting deputy minister wrote to the member for Témiscouata:

Re Sully: The Chief Postal Inspector was recently instructed to examine the qualifications of Mr. Isidore Jean, a veteran of the great war, who is a candidate for the position of postmaster at Sully.

According to the report of this official, Mr. Jean has not the necessary qualifications to properly take charge of the administration of this post office and would have to depend on his assistants.

Under the circumstances, in making the appointment, at Sully, the minister intends to leave in charge the present incumbent, against whom there are no complaints.

Would it not be fitting to have a chief inspector of ministers, who would judge their qualifications to these high offices and who could make a thorough investigation of the Post Office department itself, reporting to the Canadian Press.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is not included in the report.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No, it is a passing comment which I am making—it is a note at the foot of the page.

On October 17, 1932, the Rev Mr. David Roussel, parish priest of Sully, wrote to the hon. Postmaster General:

Mr. Isidore Jean, of Sully, has the necessary qualifications to take charge of the post office.

During all that time Jean remained under the impression that he was postmaster, he had been preparing himself.

On October 20, 1932, the deputy minister replied to the parish priest the Rev. Mr. Roussel:

At the request of the hon. Mr. Sauvé, I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated October 17, recommending Mr. Isidore Jean for the position of postmaster at Sully. In reply I wish to state that your representation on his behalf have been noted.

They were so well noted that the same day, October 20, 1932, a memorandum was sent to the general superintendent, as follows:

Go ahead with permanent nomination at Sully, Mr. Tardif as postmaster.

(Sgd.) L. J. Gaboury.

Instructions were forwarded on the same day by Mr. Underwood to Mr. Green. Eight days later, October 28, 1932, Mr. Jean writes to Mr. Sauvé:

It is very strange indeed, that after preparing the post office four months ago, I am still waiting for the transfer.

The other person had been appointed but Jean was unaware of the fact.

After being found qualified and relying on your promise, I firmly believe that you will keep your word. After the numerous outlays to which you have put me—being very poor. To answer my country's call, I have given the best of my strength and courage and, then, when the question of reward comes up, I am forsaken. After giving your word, I do not think that the absurd fancies of a few persons will change your mind. Anxiously waiting. Please have the transfer made.

My last letters remained unanswered, I would therefore request you to reply to this one.

Three weeks later, the deputy minister notifies Mr. Jean—at the request of Mr. Sauvé—that the Postmaster General found it necessary to make another appointment. From June 30, to October 20, 1932, the returned soldier Isidore Jean was postmaster, at Sully, without, however, performing his duties or drawing a cent of salary; on the other hand, he was only notified on November 17 last that the post office would not be transferred to his house.

That is, from June 30, to November 17, he was put to considerable expense in order to take over the post office.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Was he reimbursed for the expenses incurred?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not know. We shall soon learn.

Since section 10 chapter 40 of the Act, 1932, has been passed, to the effect that the provisions of the Civil Service Act—with the exception of the preference to be granted to returned soldiers—are not applicable to positions of postmaster whose post offices do not show a yearly revenue exceeding $3,000, the appointment to these positions are no more made by the Civil Service Commission, neither are the dismissals by order in council, pursuant to section 52 of the Civil Service Act. Does the department interpret the terms of the Act as meaning net or gross revenue of post offices?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): How?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Does the department interpret the Act which places post offices whose yearly revenue does not exceed $3,000 under the control of the Postmaster General, according to the net or gross revenue of these post offices? Must a post office bring in a net revenue of $3,000 to come under the jurisdiction of the minister in connection with appointments and dismissals or is it only a gross revenue of $3,000 that supplies the basis?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Net revenue.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That means more post offices.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): And a well dusted post office.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Can the hon. Postmaster General prove that Tardif is better educated than the returned soldier Jean and, if so, on what does he base himself?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I rely on the report of the Inspector General.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The Inspector makes no mention of it.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Nowhere does he refer to the personal qualification of Mr. Tardif. I shall send over the report to the minister and if he finds in that report something to that effect—

I shall read the whole report:

Ottawa, July 22, 1932.

Conforming with oral instructions received I proceeded to Sully, last week, in order to find out whether Mr. Isidore Jean, returned soldier, and a candidate, had the required qualifications to fill the position of postmaster of the post office herein under mentioned.

Mr. Jean informed me that he had no experience in office work, his occupation having always been that of a labourer. At present he is employed as sexton in the church here. I prepared a simple test consisting of addition and multiplication problems, and I ascertained that Mr. Jean, who left school at the age of 12, found it very difficult to solve these problems. After working almost five minutes to add seven amounts varying from $8.72 to $973.11, I found that his addition was wrong.

As to the multiplication test Mr. Jean found it difficult to multiply 13 by 10. He informs me that should he be appointed he would secure the help of his sister in law, Miss Irène Dauteuil, 17 years old, who, up to 10 months ago, was a domestic servant. Since then she has been employed in a general store, at Sully. Her occupation, however, consists in selling goods; she has never had any experience in bookkeeping or office work.

Owing to the little education of Mr. Jean, most of the important office work, such as making up cash accounts, statements in connection with post office orders and probably also issuing cheques, would have to be done by the assistant. He, therefore, cannot be considered as qualified for the position of postmaster and the result of the test shows that he would be unable to verify the work of his assistant and could not discover errors which might be made through negligence or otherwise on the part of his assistant.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I took advantage of my visit to Sully to examine how the post office is kept by Mr. Tardif, and I can state that I found everything in good order.

He, however, does not state that it was Tardif that kept it that way or that he was qualified. That is, it was Tardif's wife who was responsible for the good order of the post office. The report was concocted to prevent Jean from being appointed and have Tardif take his place. It is shameful that the Postmaster General should stoop to persecute such unfortunate people of the province of Quebec.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member stated that there was no report against Jean; that is one.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is not what I stated. I inquired on what the hon. minister based himself to state that Tardif was better educated than Jean.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation) All is included in the report: Jean is not qualified and cannot take charge of the post office; the other is in charge of the post office and no complaint is made that his post office is badly administered. I therefore, concluded that he was better fitted for the post than the other.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): He is a sexton recommended by the parish priest.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Jean?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Yes; he is a sexton recommended by the parish priest.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If Jean found it difficult to solve the problems which were set for him by Fortier, it is possible that Tardif would have been unable to find that 2 and 2 make 4.

On November 16, 1932, Mr. Jean writes to His Excellency the Governor general that the department refuses to reimburse him the large amount he spent and for which they were responsible since they had made him prepare premises for a post office. On December 27, Mr. Sauvé writes to Mr. Jean that His Excellency the Governor general forwarded to him his letter of December 16 in connection with the position of postmaster at Sully. He adds:

As to the question of reimbursing you for the outlay you made in preparing premises for the post office, I wish to state that if you will forward a detailed account of this outlay, I shall see what can be done.

Now, the postmaster general was disposed to look into the matter.

Mr. Jean writes to His Majesty the King George V:

I beg of your Majesty to see that justice is done to me, and you will have an opportunity of discovering how brutally the Canadian government treated me.

He now places his grievance at the foot of the Throne.

Hoping Honourable Majesty, that you will take an interest in my case as you did when you visited our regiment.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Did he write that?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Certainly, he wrote that. He is far better educated than Mr. Fortier, the chief inspector.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think that it is from the pen of another author.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I would then like to know who wrote it. That young man is capable of writing such a letter; yet, the inspector says that he is not qualified! On January 7, 1933, Mr. Jean forwards to Mr. Sauvé, the detailed account of his expenditure, and adds:

I purchased a house for which I paid $650; at present no one will offer me $400 for it. Moreover, I hired a girl to look after the office, whom I have been paying $10 per month, for five months. $50 is quite an amount.

Detailed account for the post office at Sully:

2,675 feet of wood at $20 per m. ft.	$53 50
2 windows at $7	14 00
1 glass door	10 00
Paint	2 50
Nails	5 00
5,000 shingles at $2.50	12 50
Roof paper and wainscoting	14 00
Labour, salary	42 00
Interior
Purchase of Office fixtures	30 00
Paint and varnish	7 25
1 table	2 75
A letter box in the door	1 00
Total	$194 50

(Signed) Isidore Jean,
Sully.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Was he reimbursed for this outlay?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not know. That is what I wish to find out from the minister. Will the estimates of the hon. Postmaster general be further considered tomorrow?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly, if they are not passed this evening.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Not on your life. I should like to receive answers to the questions I put to the minister. Even were I agreeable to it, I could not possibly allow them to carry, because the minister promised to answer my questions, to-morrow.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I could give these answers to the hon. member, just the same, to-morrow. This practice has often been followed. There are precedents.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No, no. The reason I have brought these facts before the house, is because I want French Canadians in Quebec to have fair play; in order that the rights of my compatriots in Témiscouata be recognized throughout Quebec and Canada; in order that all be placed on an equal footing; in order that the poor devil who has incurred expenses, for which the Port Office department is responsible, be fairly dealt with by the minister; moreover, in order to guard the minister against those who call themselves his friends.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): You will admit, sir, that expenses were incurred, a transfer agreed upon, which later was cancelled. This man was put to expenses. Was that amount reimbursed to him? It would only be fair, because after all, having received instructions that the transfer would be made, he had his premises fitted up.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As far as I can remember a certain amount was offered to Mr. Jean and he accepted it. I think the question is being settled.

Mr. ST. PERE (Translation): He compromised.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Quite agreeably.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): This is an era of compromise.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, May 10, 1933

The house met at eleven o'clock.

GOVERNMENT LOAN, $750,000,000

REDEMPTION OF OBLIGATIONS AND PURCHASE OF UNMATURED SECURITIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee tomorrow, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars, for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BANK INTEREST RATE REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance after quoting a few lines from a Canadian Press dispatch in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday. Referring to the reduction of interest rates by banks on loans, under the heading ' No conference held," the dispatch states:

> Another high banking authority who did not wish to be named said the matter of lowering interest rates was a question for each individual bank. There had been no conference between the banks, he said, and no uniform action planned.

Further on, it states:

> Question of applying the reduction is left with the individual banks, it was explained, each bank taking action on individual cases.

What guarantee is there that borrowers are going to be treated on the same basis and all get a reduction of one-half of one per cent interest?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I would prefer not to answer the question offhand. I shall note it in Hansard and give an answer to-morrow.

PROPOSED TARIFF TRUCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the Prime Minister whether Canada is a party to or interested in the proposal for a tariff truce which has been made by President Roosevelt and which is being negotiated at the present time between him and the Prime Minister of Great Britain? If so, what is involved in the proposal? Does it mean that there will be no tariff changes at all until after the world economic conference, or that trade treaties may still be negotiated downwards?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As I understand the matter, the tariff truce as suggested by the President of the United States involves an undertaking that there will be no increases in tariff until after the conclusion of the world economic conference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are we a party to the undertaking?

Mr. BENNETT: I have explained that as our budget for the year has been presented to the house and the imposition of taxation takes place by act of Parliament, necessarily we fall within that class.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Will it apply to increases in valuations?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the Minister of National Revenue please listen?

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): In view of the press reports that President Roosevelt and Prime Minister MacDonald have entered into a tariff truce I would ask the Prime Minister if he would give the house an opportunity to debate the resolution standing in my name as No. 39 on page 13 of the order paper, regarding a reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States? I should like to know if any arrangement has been made for continuing the debate on this resolution and having a vote on it before the house prorogues.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I hope that an opportunity may be offered the hon. gentleman to deal with the matter next session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I think the Prime Minister promised an opportunity would be afforded this session.

Mr. BENNETT: I think not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He said the debate would be resumed at a later stage but that the resolution could not be passed in the form in which it appeared.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister made no such statement. He said the debate could be resumed at a later date, and if it was not that is not his fault.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is his fault.

WHEAT CONFERENCE AT GENEVA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): The question I am about to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce may be taken as a notice for reply to-morrow. I see by this morning's press that two prominent gentlemen have been sent to Geneva in connection with the wheat conference there; they are the High Commissioner for Canada and Mr. Riddell. I was wondering whether any expert for Canada, for instance, Mr. McFarland, were going to assist the other capable men, because the matter requires very competent men who know all the intricacies of the situation, or, if Mr. McFarland cannot act, I was wondering whether Mr. Smith, who is, I think, a former pool representative in London or somewhere, were going.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The conference that is meeting at Geneva with respect to wheat is for the purposes of making a survey of the situation under the auspices of the League of Nations. I discussed the matter with at least one of the representatives of the United States and they are being represented at that conference.

Mr. Morganthau and two members I think of the American wheat board have gone over for that purpose. We are in communication by cable with our representative at Geneva and with the High Commissioner and it is believed that every purpose that can be served by this conference so far as this country is concerned will be served by the representative that is there especially in view of the conference that was held at London some months ago and later resumed at Rome.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

SALARIES OF JUDGES AFTER ATTAINING AGE OF SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 84, to amend the Judges Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The provisions of this bill appear to violate contracts between the crown and members of the judiciary. Perhaps my hon. friend would explain to us on the second reading whether that is the case or not, and if it is the case, on what grounds he justifies the measure at all.

Mr. DUPRE: This bill does not interfere directly or indirectly with the tenure of office or the salary of judges. It has to do entirely with the capacity of judges to earn their salary after they have been appointed. It has long been recognized by parliament that tenure of office during good behaviour can only be enjoyed by judges who have the capacity to perform their duty. Already we have in the Judges Act a provision whereby a judge who by reason of age or infirmity becomes incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office shall cease to be paid or to receive or be entitled to receive any further salary. That is in section 28 of the Judges Act, chapter 105 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

The present amendment does not deal with total incapacity, and it expressly provides that it shall not modify or affect the operation of the provision which I have just mentioned. What is dealt with in the bill before us is partial incapacity. I think the only real question of policy arising for discussion is the old one of what may reasonably be done in the public interest to prevent a judge whose capacity is undoubtedly diminished by advancing age from continuing to hold office and to draw the same emoluments as are being drawn by his younger brethren who are carrying the burden of the work. As hon. gentlemen know, parliament has already acted upon the principle that the judges whose tenure of office is within the jurisdiction of the dominion shall cease to hold office when they attain the age of seventy-five. This provision with regard to county judges will be found in section 26 of the Judges Act. With regard to the judges of the supreme court and of the exchequer court there was a long debate in this house in 1927 in which my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) participated, and this same provision I mentioned as applying to the judges of the supreme court and the exchequer court will be found in subsection 2 of section 24 of the Judges Act, and in sections 30 and 38 of the Judges Act, which is chapter 105 of the statutes of 1927.

In the year 1927 there were three measures proposed dealing with the judiciary by my hon. friend from Quebec East, as Minister of Justice, namely, a bill to amend the Supreme Court Act, a bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act, and a bill to amend the Judges Act, so as to provide for the retirement of judges at the age of seventy-five. At that time the opinion was expressed that the good administration of justice depends not only upon the integrity and right sense of justice of the high officials who sit on the bench, but also on their capacity to carry on their duties. It has been said that when a man has attained the age of seventy-five he may not have the mental and physical endurance that is demanded in the exercise of his duties. It is a debatable question whether seventy-five years, or eighty or seventy-eight is the right age, but the general consensus of opinion seems to be that seventy-five years might be the limit.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the minister permit me a question? According to this bill, is the age limit fixed at seventy-five or does it rest with the minister or the government?

Mr. DUPRE: No. Under the bill now before us, seventy-five years is the age limit.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): For all of them?

Mr. DUPRE: Yes. Every one of them.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): According to the last part of the bill, section 2, a judge, who has not reached fifteen years' service, may draw his full emoluments, if he is seventy-five years of age, or even more than eighty years old.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Unless the hon. gentleman who is addressing the house is willing to be interrupted, hon. members should not interrupt him.

Mr. DUPRE: I shall be very glad to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): According to section 2 of the bill a judge who has not fifteen years' service is allowed to sit after the age of seventy-five years to complete his fifteen years to allow him his pension.

Mr. DUPRE: I shall be glad to answer my hon. friend when we are in committee.

In 1927 my hon. friend from Quebec East, as Minister of Justice, presented the amendments to which I referred a moment ago, and in introducing his bill to amend the Judges Act said:

This resolution precedes the introduction of three bills; one to amend the Supreme Court Act, another to amend the Exchequer Court Act and the third to amend the Judges Act. The first clause of the resolution provides for the granting of a salary for one additional judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. The two other clauses of the resolution, which have been prepared by the officers of the house from copies of the bills which have been supplied to them, provide for the retirement of the judges of the Supreme court or of the Exchequer Court of Canada when they have reached the age of seventy-five years. These are the financial arrangements to supply them with a pension to which they would otherwise be entitled.

Mr. Boys: Is that voluntary retirement?

Mr. Lapointe: No, they would cease to hold office at the age of seventy-five years. These two changes are made for the same reasons. The Supreme Court of Canada is the highest tribunal of the land and it is of the utmost importance that it should have and retain the confidence of the people and be maintained in the highest state of efficiency.

These words are to be found in Hansard of March 10, 1927, at page 1079. Then, on the following page the ex-Minister of Justice added:

There is another consideration which applies to the provision making retirement compulsory at seventy-five years of age. Members of the bar come to argue cases before the Supreme court from distant parts of the country, and the court must be complete and well organized in order to hear these cases when counsel come to Ottawa for that purpose. Such cases cannot be adjourned except at considerable expense and to the disadvantage of the litigants and the members of the bar as well. These considerations apply as well to the other clauses of the bill making the retirement of the judges of the Supreme court and the Exchequer court compulsory at the age of seventy-five years.

We subscribe to that principle. The present bill does not affect the federal court but only those judges sitting in the superior courts of any province or of the Yukon territory. The argument I may present to the house was presented by the ex-Minister of Justice when at page 1081 of the same volume he said:

I was reading in the library that in the country to the south they have the same conditions with regard to their federal courts. The constitution of the United States enacts that the judges of these courts shall be appointed and remain in office during good behaviour, and the government has never been able, although it has tried, in many instances, to make their retirement compulsory. The United States has endeavoured to deal with the situation by giving a pension equal to their full salary to judges who, having been in office at least ten years and reaching the age of seventy, desire to be superannuated. That was an invitation to them to retire, because they would have a pension equal to their salary; but experience shows that most of them preferred to remain on the bench, even though they were given the right to a full pension when they reached the age of seventy. Fortunately we have not the same obstacle to meet as far as our federal courts are concerned, and I have come to the conclusion, having not only consulted with but received suggestions from the members of the bar and I might even say from members of the judiciary themselves, that this is a good provision to enact. That is why I am introducing these bills.

Then, answering the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) on March 25, 1927, the ex-Minister of Justice is reported at page 1562 of Hansard as follows:

I am sorry the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George does not agree with me on the age limit; I will admit that there is ground for a difference of opinion in that matter. I can assure my hon. friend that only after serious consideration and after having discussed this matter with many people who have a deep interest in strengthening the Supreme Court of Canada, did I take it upon my responsibility as Minister of Justice to introduce this Bill. I quite agree with my hon. friend that there are eminent judges who are wholly qualified to act as such after they have reached the age of seventy-five years, but as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has said, they are rather the exception. May I quote to the house the words of a man who has been Secretary of State in the United States, Mr. Chief Justice Taft, concerning this very question. In a book entitled Popular Government at page 158 he writes:

And this is our argument, too:

"Congress has passed a law providing that all federal judges may retire after a service of ten years, upon attaining the age of seventy. The law is in form not compulsory because I presume it was thought doubtful whether Congress had any power to retire judges, even though they continue the full salary as a life pension."

The constitution of the United States makes the tenure of office of a judge there during good behaviour, and congress has no right to make it compulsory.

Mr. Cahan: That applies to federal judges only.

Mr. Lapointe: To federal judges only. Chief Justice Taft goes on to say:

"I think the absence of power in Congress to do this is a defect. There is no doubt that there are judges at seventy who have ripe judgments, active minds, and much physical vigour, and that they are able to perform their judicial duties in a very satisfactory way. Yet in a majority of cases when men come to be seventy, they have lost vigour, their minds are not as active, their senses are not as acute, and their willingness to undertake great labour is not so great as in younger men, and as we ought to have in judges who are to perform the enormous task which falls to the lot of Supreme court justices. In the public interest, therefore, it is better that we lose the services of the exceptions who are good judges after they are seventy and avoid the presence on the bench of men who are not able to keep up with the work, or to perform it satisfactorily. The duty of a Supreme court judge is more than merely taking in the point at issue between the parties, and deciding it. It frequently involves a heavy task in reading records and writing opinions. It thus is a substantial drain upon one's energy. When most men reach seventy, they are loath thoroughly to investigate cases where such work involves real physical indurance.

That is not all. In 1922 a bill concerning the province of Saskatchewan was presented in the Senate. At that time Senator Bennett speaking on the bill quoted the words of the Hon. Mr. Perron. They are found at page 184 of the Debates of the Senate for that year and are as follows:

In this matter, he said he was in absolute harmony with Premier Taschereau in idea and ideal, and if it was that justice was delayed through the inability—owing to ill health—of certain judges, and if they did not realize their responsibilities and resign, then "it would be the painful duty of the bar to seek legislation that would meet the contingency".

Speaking on that bill the Hon. Mr. Dandurand, then leader of the Senate and a member of the government, added the following words:

The great problem is to find within the terms of the constitution a way to bring to the attention of the judges the necessity for their retiring without recourse being had to the very solemn process of an address by both branches of this parliament.

These words are to be found at page 189 of the Debates of the Senate for the year 1922. Later, on the 12th of May of the same year, Hon. Senator Barnard speaking on Bill No. 19, an act to amend the Judges Act, made the following proposition, which I would call to the attention of my hon. friend the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe):

The governor in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice that any judge has by reason of his age or infirmities become unable to properly perform his duty and upon three months' notice does not retire, may order that the salary of such judge shall be reduced to $1 a year from a date to be named, and thereafter such judge shall until he retires be paid no more than that amount, but on his so retiring he shall be entitled to the retiring allowance which would have been paid to him had he retired immediately before such order was made.

Then speaking of this amendment the leader of the Senate, a member of the then government, the Hon. Mr. Dandurand, added the following words which will be found on page 214:

I confess that my first impression was that this proposed legislation should rather be embodied in a separate bill to amend the Judges Act, because it would then be taken up with more solemnity and would attract the attention of all members of this chamber and would receive due consideration.

And he then said:

I am in sympathy with the ends sought to be attained, and will do nothing to prevent its adoption. If this chamber thinks we ought to proceed immediately with the adoption of this amendment, attaching it to the present bill, well and good. We may conclude, however, that it is better to make the amendment a separate bill.

Therefore in moving this bill we present to this house less drastic legislation than that which has already been proposed by the former government.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre) has quoted extensively from remarks I made in the house in 1927 on the bill relating to federal court judges. Modesty precludes me from adding that the best part of his speech is the quotations which he made.

Mr. BENNETT: And the best part of the hon. gentleman's speech in 1927 was his quotation from Chief Justice Taft.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not say it. But I would suggest to my hon. friend that he might have read another three or four lines from that address of mine when that resolution was introduced in 1927, on page 1080. He came very close to that sentence but he stopped there. Here is what I stated:

The sections of the British North America Act dealing with the judicature are Nos. 96 to 101. Section 99 states that the judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons. According to the enactment, the tenure of the judges of the high courts of Canada is really a life tenure—

Mr. BENNETT: We all agree with that.

Mr. LAPOINTE:

—and this parliament has no right to retire them compulsorily at any time during good behaviour.

The difference between that position and that of judges of the federal courts which were constituted by this parliament is quite apparent, because there was nothing in the constitution which prevented us fixing an age limit for their tenure of office. Not so with the judges who will be affected by the present bill. I have quoted in extenso section 99 of the British North America Act applying to judges who will come under the provisions of this bill.

My objection to this bill is that again, as on previous occasions, it is sought to do indirectly what cannot be done directly. The effect of this bill will be to say to the judges: We cannot retire you, under the constitution you are appointed for life, but we will starve you out of office when you are 75 years of age by reducing your salary. Mr. Speaker, I will also quote a few words from a prominent gentleman, which a thousand times more apply to the present bill than to the one which was discussed in 1927, because at that time we were doing something which we had the right to do under the constitution. Possibly my hon. friend will also say that this will be the best part of my speech. I think it will be an effective part of my objection to the present bill. When that bill to retire the judges of the supreme court and of the federal courts generally was before this house for the first time the right hon. Prime Minister, who was then the member for Calgary—I do not know whether he was leader of the opposition—made a speech in which he raised the question of the contract which came into existence between the judges and the state when they accepted their appointment to office on the judiciary. That was on March 25, 1927, at pages 1556-7. I will quote only one sentence. The right hon. the present leader of the government said at that time:

> What we are now doing involves a breach of the contract between the individual who holds office at the present time and the state, because his patent of office declares that he shall hold office during life or during good behaviour. He is still alive.

And then my right hon. friend suggested that if the bill becomes law we should at least provide that the judges who were then in office, who would come under the law, should be paid their full salary during their lifetime. My hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) the present Secretary of State, took also a very strong stand on the bill then before the house, very strong indeed. He reiterated these objections the following year. On May 29, 1929, as reported at page 2951 of Hansard, when I as Minister of Justice moved the second reading of a bill to amend the Supreme Court Act, my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) spoke as follows in the course of his remarks:

> In case a judge has been appointed for life it is a serious breach of contract when that judge is compelled to retire at an age and at a time when he is thoroughly equipped physically and intellectually for the performance of his judicial duties, and especially in view of the fact that his compulsory retirement necessitates his taking a pension which is very considerably less than the salary which would otherwise be paid to him under his contract with the state.

On the same occasion my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) also spoke and he said, as reported at page 2951:

> That judge undoubtedly has a contract with the state which entitles him to receive a salary for life or until such time as he resigns.

And at page 2952, the right hon. gentleman said:

> I think the government would be well advised to consider whether or not, in all cases of this kind where a contract has thus been amended, the judge should receive full salary.

On the same page my right hon. friend added:

> I think we must have regard to the terms and conditions under which the original contract was made. Although it may seem out of the ordinary that a judge should draw full salary when he is retired compulsorily, nevertheless, good faith and morals—

I call the attention of the house to those words:

> —good faith and morals, in my judgment, impose upon us that obligation, and it is an obligation which we should not lightly disregard.

Later on he said:

> I do not believe that the Canadian people would approve of our departing from the general principle that the government must, as in times past, have respect for the sanctity of a contract made between a servant of the crown when he entered the employment of the state.

We are hearing a good deal these days about the sanctity of contracts, but it seems to apply only to bondholders who do not pay taxes to the country. But in the very words of the present Prime Minister, there was a contract, and the words which are used to-day with regard to those who loaned their money to the state were used at that time—sanctity of contract.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but may I ask him how he reconciles his view with the one expressed by the Hon. Mr. Dandurand, a former leader of the Senate, when he said that a judge after seventy-five years might receive a salary of only $1 a year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman address his question to the Hon. Mr. Dandurand. Really, I do not see why he should interrupt my speech to ask that question. Now, sir, this principle, which was so strongly adhered to by members of the present government a few years ago they still adhered to last year. Take the debates of last session on the bill to reduce the salaries of civil servants, and there you will find the words of the Prime Minister giving as a justification for not having included the judges in that legislation the fact that there was a difference and that there was involved the question of contract as between them and the state. And in order to reach them the government had to take another course, whereby they increased the income tax of the judges so that they should be compelled to pay that ten per cent, because the constitution, and the principles which seemed to have been accepted by the Prime Minister and by everyone, precluded any other course than that being taken.

In the strong battle waged by my hon. friend the Secretary of State and by the Prime Minister, and after I had received communications, verbal and otherwise, from various members of the bar in Canada, I made up my mind that we should accede to the request that was made, and an amendment was adopted by this house covering the case of those judges who had been appointed before the new law was enacted, so that they should receive their full salary after retirement. This has applied to Mr. Justice Mignault. At the time this bill became law the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) asked whether it would apply to Mr. Justice Mignault and on my replying yes, he said he approved heartily but he regretted that it had taken so long to perform this elementary act of justice. Other judges who have been retired under this law are also receiving their full salary; I might cite the instance of Mr. Justice Audette, who is drawing his full salary.

This bill affects judges who, under the constitution, mind you, not under the law but under the British North America Act, are appointed for life, and we do not even provide for payment to them of their full salary as this parliament has done for the judges of federal courts who came under the law which my hon. friend has quoted as his authority for the present bill.

Now, as to the advisability of judges being retired when they have reached the age of seventy-five, I quite admit that personally I believe there are pros and cons on the proposition, and I would rather think that there are more advantages than disadvantages. If this could be done in a direct, honest, straightforward way, I would not be prepared to say that I would vote against the second reading of this bill; but I am opposed to this roundabout, indirect way of doing what parliament cannot do directly. My hon. friend said: Well, we want to pay judges who are over seventy-five years of age reduced salaries because of their reduced capacity for earning. Let me remind him, and he knows well that in our own city, our own district, it was possibly the oldest judge who, for many years after he had reached the age of seventy-five, was, until quite recently, when he was stricken by illness, most active and doing the greatest amount of business on the bench.

Mr. DUPRE: I quite agree with that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The same condition exists in many provinces. I could cite names in Ontario, Saskatchewan and elsewhere and, mentioning Saskatchewan let me say that this morning I received a letter from members of the bar of that province protesting against this bill as affecting a man who was not, before his appointment to the bench, a political friend of mine, but who is a great jurist there, and who unfortunately, like many other men of the legal fraternity, has not been favoured with much wealth on this earth.

If this bill applied only to future appointments, it would not be so objectionable. If judges to be appointed would know, when they accepted the office, that when they reached the age of seventy-five years if they continued in office they would receive a reduced salary, a principle would still be involved, but such a course would be less objectionable. But to apply this to judges who under the constitution have been appointed for life, is a vicious principle and should not be accepted by the house.

My hon. friend quoted my remarks about what happened in the United States. Under the constitution of the United States, supreme court judges are appointed for life; they cannot be forced to retire, and because of certain objections which were raised there as some objections are being raised in this country, the United States congress enacted legislation permitting the retirement voluntarily, because they could not make it compulsory of judges of the supreme court at seventy-five years of age on full salary. This was supposed to be an inducement to judges to accept retirement. But the late Chief Justice Taft, in his book on the matter, said that this had proved illusory and, I think, all credit should be given the bench, because they preferred to work for the money they were receiving and did not take advantage of that amendment which would have permitted them to receive their salary without working for it. At the time Mr. Taft wrote his book, not a single case could be mentioned of a judge who had taken advantage of that legislation.

Why this bill at the present time? Surely it is not for purposes of economy. It will increase expenses because every judge who will be retired will receive $6,000 and the man who will replace him will get $9,000, so that the state will pay $15,000 instead of $9,000. Therefore this is not for the purpose of economy. What is the purpose? Why should my hon. friends opposite do to-day what they described three years ago as a violation, breach of contract, an action against the sanctity of contracts, when the constitution did not prevent us from doing what was being done then? I am free to confess that I believe the purpose is to create vacancies for the appointment of new judges. I know the difficulties of my hon. friends opposite. A great, very close friend of the government told me a few months ago, before a vacancy was filled on the bench of the superior court of Quebec, that there were fifteen candidates for the appointment. I know the troubles and difficulties of the administration but I do not believe the government should have recourse to this expedient for the purpose of doing, I repeat, indirectly what the constitution prevents them from doing directly.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It has been my privilege in this house to listen to many addresses from the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), but I have never before found him labouring under such great difficulty as he has been under to-day to accommodate his present attitude to his past. When I have finished, I shall have pointed out to the house that the government is merely accepting the legislation which he himself was responsible for passing and adding to it the provision which is embodied in the bill now before us. In 1927 the hon. gentleman introduced into the house a bill which had the effect of depriving two gentlemen of their office on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada. I pointed out in the house at that time that the then government had the complete power to do this and as regards limiting the age to seventy-five years I expressed the view that I had grave doubt whether seventy-five or eighty years should be the governing and controlling age. But I accepted the view expressed by the hon. gentleman that after all seventy-five years should be the controlling age and that in this country there was no doubt litigants lost confidence in judges who were over that age. I pointed that out as agreeing with the position put forward by the then Minister of Justice.

The hon. member did not favourably consider the position taken by some members of the opposition at that time to provide that those who retire should receive full pay; that was not done until another year. He was asked to do it and declined. I find in the reports in Hansard that I referred to the fact that he mentioned the matter to me; I had given it some thought and I expressed the view that as this action constituted a breach of contract, some provision should be made by way of compensation, namely, to continue the salaries which the judges had been paid before the breach was made by parliament. It was the exercise of its power by parliament to deprive of his position without compensation a judge who had been appointed to office and in whose patent it was provided that he should hold office during life and good behaviour. He was removed from office by that statute and received his retiring allowance in accordance with the provisions of the act. But the hon. gentleman reconsidered his position and, as he says, Mr. Justice Mignault received the salary attaching to his office. Mr. Justice Idington, against whom the statute at that time undoubtedly was directed, only received his annuity when the legislation was passed at a later time, at the instance of the hon. gentleman, after he had departed this life. The fact is, therefore, that the former Minister of Justice introduced into parliament and had passed an act that deprived of their offices, at the age of seventy-five, the justices of the supreme court who had attained that age, and during the course of the discussion it was pointed out that there was thought to be no power to limit the age of superior court judges because of the provisions of the British North America Act. I am bound to say that I looked through the decisions after that and I observed that Lord Atkinson said that the provisions embodied in our statute, which are taken from the Act of Settlement, in reality do not refer to legislative but rather to executive power. However, that issue does not arise at the moment.

That was the position taken by the former Minister of Justice, who has just taken his seat. If it had ended there his defence would be fairly complete, for he could say with all propriety that the present Prime Minister had pointed out in the house that such provisions could not validly be enacted against superior court judges. Undoubtedly that is my conception of the law, but the hon. gentleman has overlooked the essential fact that his government placed upon these statute books section 28 of the Judges Act, being chapter 105 of the revised statutes. I am going to read that section to this house so that there may be no misapprehension as to what is the existing law with respect to these cases:

28. Any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court in Canada, or any local judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court of Canada or any judge of a county court, who is found by the governor in council, upon report of the Minister of Justice, to have become, by reason of age or infirmity, incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office, shall, notwithstanding anything in this act contained, cease to be paid or to receive or to be entitled to receive any further salary, if the facts respecting the incapacity or disability are first made the subject of inquiry and report in the manner hereinafter provided, and the judge is given reasonable notice of the time and place appointed for the inquiry and is afforded an opportunity by himself or his counsel of being heard thereat and of cross-examination of witnesses and of adducing evidence on his own behalf.

2. The governor in council may, for the purpose of making inquiry into the facts respecting the incapacity or disability of any such judge, issue a commission of inquiry to one or more judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or to one or more judges of any superior court in Canada, empowering him or them to make such inquiry and report, and may by such commission confer upon the person or persons appointed full power to summon before him or them any person or witness and to require him to give evidence on oath orally or in writing, or on solemn affirmation, if entitled to affirm in civil matters, and to produce such documents and things as the commissioner or commissioners deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which he or they are appointed to inquire; and the commissioner or commissioners shall have the same power to enforce the attendance of such person or witness and to compel him to give evidence as is vested in any superior court of the province in which the inquiry is being conducted.

3. Nevertheless His Majesty shall by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada grant unto any judge who has been so found by the governor in council to be incapacitated or disabled by reason of age or infirmity as aforesaid, and who resigns his office, the annuity which he might have received if he had resigned at the time when he ceased to be entitled to receive any further salary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Then paragraph 4:

4. Nothing in this act contained shall prevent the governor in council from granting to any judge so found to be incapacitated or disabled as aforesaid leave of absence for such period as the governor in council, in view of all the circumstances of the case, may consider just or appropriate, and if leave of absence be granted the salary of the judge shall continue to be paid during the period of leave of absence so granted.

That was passed in 1922 and, as I say, is the revision of section 2 of chapter 29 of the statutes of that year. Has the true significance of that statute become apparent to this house? It provided a method, now charged to be indirect, of dealing with a situation that had caused much criticism throughout the Dominion of Canada, which was referred to by Senator Dandurand in the Senate and which has been referred to in many parts of this country as constituting little short of what one eminent man described as a public scandal. Observe the language. No one charged the hon. gentleman then with endeavouring to do indirectly what he could not do directly; no one then charged that political reasons were responsible for this action, which gave the governor in council the power to terminate the contract, to say that he should receive no salary at all—not that he should receive two-thirds of his salary but that he should be deprived of all salary—unless he resigned. That is the law we find to-day upon the statute books. We did not make it, but confronted with a situation which in my judgment had to be dealt with, the only manner in which it could be dealt with was what? First, we could issue a commission to inquire as to the fitness, by reason of age, of men whom this high court of parliament had declared should not discharge their functions longer if they were seventy-five years of age, a limitation which we said made it impossible for a county court judge to continue in office, and which compelled a justice of the highest court in Canada to retire. Now because we endeavour, by the use of decent methods, to accomplish directly what this statute was endeavouring to accomplish indirectly, it is charged that we are being actuated by political motives.

Does the house understand and appreciate the difficulty with regard to complaints that are made with respect to men who continue to hold judicial office but who are only capable of giving concentrated attention to an argument for two hours a day or less? Does the house understand what is involved by continuing those men in office, while litigants complain vigorously because there is no method by which the situation can be met? If they decline to accede to polite requests what is left to this parliament to do? Are we to be charged with political considerations with respect to a matter of this kind when a statute such as this was placed upon the statute books of this country by the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member? That is most unfair. There is the statute; it provides for a commission of inquiry to determine the fitness of the judge. Listen to these words; the commission is to determine his fitness to discharge his duties, by reason of disability, age or infirmity. Those are the words incorporated in the statute by my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, by the government of the day, of which he was a member. What was the contract made by the state with the men who were appointed to the bench? It was that they should give their unremitting time and attention to the discharge of their duties, and they were to be paid for service, not for disability, incapacity or over-age. That was what the state promised to pay them for.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was dealt with in the amendment that was introduced two or three years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: This statute provides that if by reason of age or infirmity the judge is unable to carry on his functions he shall be retired, and since then we have said that the age limit shall be seventy-five. Who did it? The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat.

Mr. LAPOINTE: For the federal courts.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that seventy-five is good enough to govern in the one case and not in the other?

Mr. LAPOINTE: You have no right to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am pointing out that we have.

Mr. DUPUIS: He left on full salary.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not, but afterwards he did because he adopted the reasoning that was presented to him—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why does not my hon. friend adopt the same reasoning to-day?

Mr. BENNETT: That is just what I am doing. Let me proceed a step further. There is a statute, and age in 1922 was said to be a factor in determining fitness for judicial office, and what did this high court of parliament at the instance of the hon. gentleman subsequently enact? That seventy-five was the testing age. No longer a case for inquiry. Seventy-five was definitely and positively the age, and when that age was reached the office was vacant. That is not our act. We are not responsible for that. I said when that act was before the house that I had grave doubts about whether the age should be seventy-five or eighty, but after listening to what was said and reading the authorities, including Mr. Justice Taft's view, I concluded that seventy-five was a reasonable age to fix.

Now, confronted with that situation, and without going into detail, trying in every sense to avoid the discussion of personalities in this parliament with respect to the men or the age of the men who hold office, trying to eliminate all that, I put it to the house, in view of that legislation and the difficulties that the then Minister of Justice had, and the reasons that influenced him to declare by statute in 1927 that age, which is the word used in 1922, should mean seventy-five years, whether this government is not just and fair and equitable in every sense of the word when it says that when a judge attains the age of seventy-five he shall be paid in accordance with his reduced capacity, namely, two-thirds of his salary? There is no violation of contract there. The implied term of every contract is that as long as he is fit he is to be paid, and being unfit he is not to be paid, and that has been embodied in the terms of a statute that was passed not under this government, but under the government in 1922. Now we are applying the principle of that and are merely saying, arbitrarily if you will: When you have reached the age of seventy-five in a provincial court your salary shall be two-thirds of what it was when you were at your high point of efficiency. Hon. gentlemen will realize that there is a vast improvement in that over what the provisions of the statute provide. Section 28 of the existing Judges Act says that if the inquiry determines that by reason of age he is unfit to give that close attention to his duties which their importance demands he shall receive nothing at all. That is the law which my hon. friend's government saw fit to enact, and there are people who say they have no reason to quarrel with that, and I am not quarrelling with it at the moment.

Now is it desirable in view of the attitude taken by this parliament in fixing seventy-five as the age at which judges of the Supreme Court of Canada are declared incapable of discharging their duties effectively and efficiently—

Mr. FACTOR: They should go off the bench.

Mr. BENNETT: Precisely.

Mr. FACTOR: But not by reducing the salary.

Mr. BENNETT: But if they go off the bench they draw their full annuity under the bill now before us.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, their pension.

Mr. BENNETT: Their full pension; that is what I say. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) said that they should leave the bench, and I say certainly they should. They should be prompted by that high sense of public responsibility and duty to the state that placed them in a high position and gave them not only a good salary as things were when the salaries were fixed, but which in my judgment is inadequate under present conditions, and as well an annuity, against which there is much criticism in these days by many people. If under those circumstances, having attained that age, which is the age fixed for the Supreme Court of Canada, they are not willing to retire from office, we simply say to them: You will be treated from the salary standpoint as having reached that point where you are incapable of giving that one hundred per cent efficiency to the discharge of your duties, and you will be paid 66⅔ of your former salary.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Will the Prime Minister explain how section 2 accords with his argument?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 2 is to provide for the case—there is one case in this country at the moment—of a judge who will have attained the age of seventy-five by the first of July and will not have served fifteen years. He is protected and will get his annuity. That is what the section is for, to provide against any injustice being done by reducing to nothing the pay of a judge who has attained the age of seventy-five and has not put in the full fifteen years. But there is something more than that. The effect of this bill will be to prevent men over sixty being appointed to the bench of the superior courts, and every member of the profession knows that that is not only desirable but essential. It will ensure that men of vigour at least in the profession will be appointed to the bench. It means that unless they are under sixty when appointed they will not have served the fifteen years to entitle them to secure the pension at seventy-five.

In Great Britain, where they have imposed an age limit with respect to county courts much less than ours, they have no age limit with respect to their judges, and there have been eminent men who past the age of seventy-five have discharged judicial duties, notably in the courts of appeal. One of the most eminent who retired not long ago after he had passed the age of eighty said once very frankly, "If there is any question ever raised in the House of Commons with respect to my remaining and discharging judicial duties I shall of course feel that I have outlived my usefulness and shall retire." It was mentioned in the house, and he retired.

There was criticism made in the House of Commons with respect to the judicial committee and the age of its members, and if anyone will take the judicial committee as at present constituted he will find how young in years are the men who constitute that committee.

I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that I think it is most unfair to suggest a political motive behind this bill. I am perfectly willing to be charged with political considerations in some matters, but in a matter that affects the profession to which I myself belong I claim that I have been influenced by no consideration other than the public weal. What is more, I know what the judgment of litigants is who have to have their cases considered and adjudicated upon by men past the age of eighty years, and who in the very nature of things have not the physical stamina to concentrate their powers in such a way as to enable them to grapple with the problems that arise for consideration by courts of justice. If I had purely political reasons behind the judgment which I have formed in this matter, and which arises solely because of circumstances to which I could but will not refer, and which must be present in the mind of every one responsible for law and the maintenance of law and order in the country and the holding up to high place in the minds of the people of the judicial tribunals in Canada—I say that every man who gives any thought to it at all must realize that the same purpose is in the mind of the government that has endeavoured to do this which I believe was honestly in the mind of the government that passed section 28 in 1922. I never for a moment have thought that political considerations influenced the government in 1922 when they said that if because of age a man is unfit for his duties or is not discharging them properly he shall thereby forfeit any further pay. No one for a moment charges that; no one suggested it. It is because this parliament has decided that age means seventy-five years that further trial should be unnecessary. But if it is necessary it only drags into disrepute the very institutions which men charged with a sense of responsibility should themselves realize first of all. They should be the first to realize conditions with respect to a matter of this kind.

I think on consideration—nay, I feel certain that on consideration the hon. member for Quebec East who gave such attention to this matter in days gone by and who made such statements in the house in 1927 when the government of which he was a member enacted the legislation to which I have referred, will acquit this government of any sense of political responsibility in dealing with this matter. For I say to him this, that if he will study the appointments which have been made to the bench since this government has assumed office he will see, at least, that no consideration—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that,—that no consideration was too high. The interests of the public are sometimes influenced by geographical considerations which mean—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because there has grown up in this country a custom which cannot lightly be disregarded namely, that we must not select all members of the bench from the larger centres of population, but that smaller communities should have consideration given them when selections for the bench are under review. For, after all, some of the most eminent judges of this country have been country practitioners before they went to city communities to establish themselves in their profession.

I do commend this bill to the house for the reasons I have indicated, and desire to assure my hon. friend that but for the legislation which now exists I would not regard it as possible to introduce this measure. But, we have accepted the principle that fitness is determined by age, and that the age limit shall be seventy-five years with respect to the county court on the one hand and the Supreme Court of Canada on the other, and that when that age is reached there should be a diminution in the compensation paid in keeping with the terms of the statute to which I have referred.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I desire for a few moments to protest against this legislation. Before dealing with that section of the legislation which I believe is particularly objectionable, may I refer to some of the remarks which have been made both by the minister in charge of the bill (Mr. Dupré) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). First of all may I say that I deprecate the introduction by the minister, of reference to the necessity for this legislation arising on account of the incapacity of certain judges to perform their duties and earn their salaries after they were appointed—

Mr. BENNETT: After seventy-five years of age.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, the minister used the expression "after they had been appointed;" I made a note of his words. However whether it be after seventy-five years or after they are appointed, the reference should not have been made unless particulars were given. Coming from a province in which we have a number of judges affected by this act, who have been a great ornament to the bench, and who have been on the bench for many years, I feel it my duty to oppose the measure. Anyone who is familiar with the bench of the province of Ontario must admit that a number of the very best, the most capable and the most active judges we have are beyond the age of seventy-five years. Reference has been made to the chief justice of the province of Quebec, and to the chief justice of the province of Saskatchewan. I believe members of the profession as well as hon. members in the house will agree with me that perhaps the keenest, the most able and the most active judge on the Ontario bench, and the one who has lost the smallest amount of time in the last ten or fifteen years, is the oldest judge on the bench of that province.

If there are men on the bench who have not the capacity to perform their duties, they are dealt with by section 28 of the act. The difference between dealing with the matter under section 28 of the act, and dealing with it in a summary manner provided by the legislation now under consideration is that in one case the man has a chance to go before some tribunal and show whether or not he has by age, incapacity or infirmity become disabled to perform his duty.

Mr. BENNETT: Not in the supreme court.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not going to argue the question of the violation of contract, because apparently it is agreed on both sides of the house that this is a violation of a very solemn contract entered into at the time of appointments. Why has the bench of Canada attained its present eminence? It has attained that position because of the type of men they were able to obtain by the assurance given to prospective appointees that if they accepted the appointments they would remain secure in their position for the remainder of their lives.

Mr. BENNETT: Whether they were fit or not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Whether they were fit or not, my right hon. friend says. They were appointed for life. No one knows better than the Prime Minister that many men are now on the bench at a great financial sacrifice. Their remuneration on the bench, while it looks high to a great many members of the profession, is very small when compared with what several men on the bench of the various provinces were earning at the time of their appointments. Further than that, at the time of their appointments they were assured of the permanence of their positions. That is now sought to be taken away from them. The Prime Minister spoke about age or infirmity. I remind him that a man does not come under section 28 of the act because of age alone; it is on account of infirmity. I believe the Prime Minister knows perfectly well that a great many—

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to correct the hon. member. Age, specially, is the factor; it is age or infirmity. It is not "and"; it is age "or."

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let us pay attention to the argument of the Prime Minister. Does he say that under section 28 either age or infirmity is a ground?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly I do.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If he states that, I shall satisfy him in a moment that that is not what the statute says. These are the words of the statute:

> Any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior court in Canada . . . who is found by the governor in council, upon report of the Minister of Justice, to have become, by reason of age or infirmity,—

Not seventy-five years old.

> —incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office.

He is not put out for age but for incapacity.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, because his age renders him incapable of doing his job. That is what the statute states.

Mr. ELLIOTT: A moment ago the Prime Minister stated that either age or infirmity, under section 28, was a ground for retirement. That is not so. Age alone is not a ground.

Mr. HACKETT: The statute says it is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Age is not a ground for termination of salary.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute says it is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, if my hon. friend would look at the statute he would see it does not.

An hon. MEMBER: Not always.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the case of a man under 75 the factor to be considered is incapacity. Incapacity may be due to age or infirmity, but age of itself alone does not bring him within the ambit of section 28. May I point out also that in the province of Ontario, as I said before, a number of our most active, able and capable judges would be affected by this act. One member of a commission that was appointed not long ago to perform very difficult and onerous duties, involving a great deal of work and requiring great ability, was one of the judges who would be affected by this act. He was appointed not by a government of his own political complexion; he was selected on account of his ability, his physical strength and his capacity for work, as well as for the wide experience gained at the bar and on the bench.

The violation of contract feature has already been referred to; I do not intend to labour that. The fact that this is an attempt to do indirectly what cannot be done directly has also been referred to. The great objection to this proposal is that it is a breach of faith as well as a breach of contract. These men are entitled to the benefit of the act as it stood at the time of their appointment. They hold office unless they have become incapacitated, that is the present state of the law. I submit that this is the kind of legislation that should not be passed at any time, and it is particularly inappropriate at this time, as it would impose a further great burden upon the treasury of this country, by making each of those positions from which a judge is retired pay $15,000 a year, or practically so, whereas if he were not retired it would pay only $9,000. We cannot afford at the present time to increase the expenditure of the government in any way that can be avoided. So I submit that if ever it were excusable this is not the time it should be done. If it is the wish of the government to make this provision applicable to future appointees that is quite fair. It is no breach of faith. Those appointed take the appointment knowing the conditions. This, however, is a direct change of the law as it stood at the time of their appointment. In Ontario it operates against I think seven or eight of the most eminent judges we have ever had in the province, all of whom are now active on the bench. I cannot protest too strongly against legislation that deals so unfairly with men who have given to this country the kind of service that those men have given upon the bench.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, I am astonished to see such legislation presented to the house, having in view the legal ability and knowledge of the Prime Minister. He knows perfectly well that he is putting before this house a bill, which had he been leader of the opposition instead of Prime Minister, would have drawn thunderbolts from him. I take his own argument in the case of the bill relating to the Supreme Court of Canada; why do again in this house by special legislation what is provided against by the statute? Section 28 of chapter 105 of the revised statutes of Canada has been passed and must be applied. If a judge by his conduct or through incapacity comes under investigation under this act he is in the same position as any other person. Let the government then investigate, and if justified impeach him if he does not resign. Our judges when appointed were, under the constitution, appointed for life. They abandoned everything when they went on the bench. The bench of Canada is composed of able and honest men. If there were exceptions I would not care to mention them, but I do not think they exist. When they are appointed they have to cut themselves off completely from business life, leave their career behind them, give up their legal practice. If they were placed on the bench by the leader of their party it was because they were able men qualified to adorn the bench. They can no longer hold appointments as testamentary executors, they cannot be executors of companies. They go on the bench and to the best of their ability administer the law of the country. They have no friends, they are completely apart in the community if they are doing their duty. The statute says that after so many years they are entitled to retire on pension; they are not obliged to go, but they may go if they want to. We cannot suppose that a person qualified to be appointed a judge would remain on the bench if unable through sickness or other disability to discharge his duties; such an assumption would be contrary to common sense and to the opinion that all citizens have of a judge. I think the Prime Minister will agree that the judicature is one of the four powers of the state, these powers being the sovereign, the executive, the army and the judicature. Whether legislation enacted in the past relating to judges was wise or not, if we alter it now we destroy public confidence in the bench. Judges should not be interfered with because they compose the tribunals established to administer justice. If this House of Commons does not abide by its contracts, how do we expect any individual in Canada to respect his contract? What this bill proposes is an expropriation of right, and if it came before a court of justice any judge would dismiss such a case. The constitution is there; you cannot act against the constitution. Of course not exactly on political grounds, but on a very ingenious ground you take for your own purpose the argument used by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), the ex-Minister of Justice, in reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. In this House of Commons there may appear to be some inducement to accept such a bill, but in the country at large and in the light of the statute, you cannot do what you propose. The law protecting judges was so written in a fundamental way that even on the income tax you could not touch them. In the statute of 1906, reproduced in the revised statutes of 1927 is section No. 29 just following section 28, which says:

> (3) The salaries and retiring allowances or annuities shall be payable by monthly instalments, and the salaries and retiring allowances and annuities of the judges who are now by law entitled to receive the same free and clear of taxes and deductions imposed under any act of the parliament of Canada, shall continue to be paid free and clear of such taxes and deductions.

That meant that when they were appointed they had a salary fixed by statute, and no deductions could be made from that salary by any act of parliament. Are we to say now that a man seventy-five years of age is not fit to carry on as a judge? What if a son were to say to his father, "You are seventy-five years old now; you are too old to conduct your business. Get out of the store; I will take everything over." The father would say, "This belongs to me; I bought it and I am going to stay here." According to their contract with the state the judges can remain on the bench as long as they can discharge their duties properly, and it should be left to their own judgment to decide when they should retire. We name a man to the bench because he has a conscience; it cannot be otherwise. If he is unable to carry on beyond the age of seventy-five he will say, "I cannot discharge my duties according to the law and in fairness to the citizens who come before me." I should like to refer to section 2 of this bill, which says:

> This act shall come into force on the first day of July, 1933, but in the case of any judge who, on the day when he attained the age of seventy-five years or on the first day of July, 1933, whichever is later, has held office for less than fifteen years, the operation of this act shall in his case be postponed until he has continued in office for fifteen years, and shall thereupon have its full force and operation.

Thus a man appointed at the age of sixty-two or sixty-five—and there have been a few such appointments—will go beyond the age limit of seventy-five. What will happen in his case? This clause as it stands cannot pass; it will do an injustice to those who must retire when they reach the age of seventy-five. Those who have not completed fifteen years on the bench will serve beyond the age of seventy-five and you will be keeping on the bench a judge who, according to your own words, is not fit. After he reaches the age of seventy-five we will be paying him $9,000, though you will be retiring those with greater experience who have completed more than fifteen years service. So I say if this section is passed in its present form it will work a grave injustice on those who are obliged to retire on reaching the age limit. In the case of Mr. Justice Mignault the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) simply said, "Well, according to the sacredness of contract Mr. Justice Mignault is entitled to compensation; we will give him his full salary as a pension, since he is compelled to leave the bench at the age of seventy-five. So Mr. Justice Mignault is getting his full salary, and there are no deductions made from it by way of income tax or anything else, since a pension is not taxable.

We have a contract with these judges, and I think at first it would be well for the state to pay them their full salaries if they are to be retired. But during these times of distress and depression, when the finances of the state are so heavily burdened, why not postpone this bill for four or five years in order to have time to settle everything? Time is a great healer, and everything will work out eventually. In the meantime, why tax the people of the country in order to pay a new judge a salary of $9,000 while at the same time we must pay the retiring judge a gratuity of $6,000? If that retiring judge has been twenty-five years on the bench he will receive $7,000, so that we will have to pay $16,000 instead of $9,000 in order to replace a man who may be quite able to carry on.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the interests of litigants, whose counsel has been presenting an argument? The judge, an hour and a half behind the argument, says, "What did you say"?

Mr. MERCIER: (St. Henri): But very often the lawyers are to blame; sometimes they are all mixed up in their arguments, and they have not their cases prepared. In addition it seems to me that we are interfering in provincial affairs. This does not apply to Quebec, because there the judges are not fortunate enough to be able to increase their salaries, but often in Ontario judges receive extra remuneration for giving extra service for the benefit of the province. Why should we say to a judge that if he sees fit to remain on the bench after the age of seventy-five he shall receive in salary only the amount of the pension to which he is entitled, and if he receives $1,000 from the province he will only receive $5,000 from the Dominion? This is another way of pushing them off the bench or, to use the expression of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), to starve them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute of 1928 did that.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Hon. gentlemen should not laugh, because we are discussing a very important question. More than that, when people begin to laugh at the bench they are laughing at one of the corner stones of the nation.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, the broad principle of retiring judges at the age of seventy-five is a debatable question. There is a large body of opinion which holds that at seventy-five, with the maturity and wisdom that he has attained, a judge is perhaps more fit to discharge his duties on the bench than is the case with younger men. I believe the consensus of opinion throughout this country is that a judge should retire at the age of seventy-five, but if a judge of the federal court or of the county court should retire at that age there is no reason why a judge of the supreme court should not retire in the same way. I should say, however, that the government is not accomplishing its object by this legislation. The Prime Minister just asked my hon. friend from St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) with reference to the judge who, after listening to an argument for an hour and a half, asks the lawyer, "What did you say"? I say that in all probability this same judge will accept the two-thirds of his salary to which he is entitled and will remain on the bench, so you will not succeed in the object you have in view.

Mr. BENNETT: Then he will work for nothing.

Mr. FACTOR: I do not think this legislation will meet the situation; these men who are supposed to be incapable of discharging their duties will continue to sit on the bench but will receive a lower salary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And if I know them well they will remain on the bench.

Mr. BENNETT: Then that shows that they are not starving.

Mr. FACTOR: I hate to acknowledge that parliament, because it is unable by constitutional methods to retire judges after they have reached the age of seventy-five, has to resort to a financial scheme or arrangement such as is proposed in this bill. I believe that the time has come when the broad question of amending our own constitution should receive the attention of parliament. If under present conditions we are unable to amend the act so as to pass legislation which will facilitate the retirement of judges, a principle in which I believe, it is high time that parliament adopted legislation to enable us to do that. I would ask the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister this question: How do they expect by this legislation to get rid of those judges who are incapable or incapacitated and therefore cannot attend to their duties? The mere fact that a judge is over seventy-five years of age should not be a reason for his being removed from the bench, but if by reason of age or infirmity he is incapacitated and is unable to discharge his duties, the procedure is provided by section 28 of the Judges Act, and you do not have to—

Mr. BENNETT: But he does not go off the bench; his pay stops.

Mr. FACTOR: That is a good way of getting him off.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wanted you to say.

Mr. FACTOR: The Prime Minister says that, under the old section 28, if after due inquiry a judge is found to be incapable by reason of age or infirmity his pay is reduced or cut off. In that case he goes off the bench.

Mr. BENNETT: No; he stays on if he wants to.

Mr. FACTOR: Well, there will not be many judges who will stay on without salary, whereas under this legislation you are retaining the judge and paying him two-thirds of his salary.

Mr. BENNETT: The same option exactly.

Mr. FACTOR: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me, it is the same option exactly, only in one case he gets two-thirds and in the other nothing.

Mr. FACTOR: In other words, there will be an incentive for the incapacitated judge to remain on the bench because he will get two-thirds of his salary. That is the net result of the legislation. The Prime Minister may laugh, but I should like him to meet that argument. Is there not an incentive for a judge, knowing that he will get two-thirds of his salary, to remain on the bench?

Mr. BENNETT: If there is such an incentive it is itself an indication of the unfitness of the man to be on the bench.

Mr. FACTOR: But there is nothing in this legislation to remove him, and I submit that it is high time some method were evolved, whether by amending the British North America Act or by some other means, to go about this matter in a direct fashion under proper authority.

Mr. BENNETT: Why did you not do that in 1922?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Because we had no right to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: You had the same right that exists now.

Mr. FACTOR: The fact that it was not done in 1922 is no excuse for adopting a method of camouflage now to give a judge two-thirds of his salary. I think the government should take into serious consideration the principle involved in this matter. I am thoroughly in agreement with the governmen's intention of removing any judge who is incapable of discharging the duties of his office after the age of seventy-five. Further than that, I agree to the principle that every judge of the supreme court should retire at the age of seventy-five. I submit however that the proper method is not being followed.

The government are acknowledging that they are unable to do it by legislation, but they are attempting to do it by a cheap scheme. That is all it is—a cheap scheme which is tantamount to saying to a judge, "if you stay on the bench you will get two-thirds of your salary." The result will be however, as an hon. member suggests, that the scheme instead of being cheap may be expensive, because if the judge does not retire a new judge will have to be appointed and the additional salary will have to be paid.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): I believe the intention of the government is sound so far as unfit judges are concerned, but it seems to me that this bill as it is drafted is too drastic. No door is left open to those judges who are still capable, and if there is one class of our Canadian society to whom we should do no injustice it is our judiciary. I have in mind judges in Montreal who are in the neighbourhood of seventy-five years of age or over and who are most capable, some of them being perhaps the best judges we have in the whole country. Now, what will happen? Not only will the judges affected by this bill be deprived of their salaries, which is a matter of comparatively small importance, but lawyers who are accustomed to plead before such judges will suffer, and most of all the people who seek redress before our courts; they will be deprived of the wisdom of such eminent members of the judiciary. If it were possible for me to name such judges I would name them, and I know that the Prime Minister and the members of this house would bear me out in that regard.

I do not quite understand how this government could bring in legislation of this sort in such an indirect way to attain an end which will never be reached. They will not get rid of unfit judges. There is section 28 of the act which, if the government were willing to apply it, would accomplish the same purpose, with this distinction, that the government by section 28 have the discretion to apply it to those who are unfit, either by reason of ill health or by infirmity or otherwise, leaving on the bench those judges who are capable. May I here interject this parenthesis in answer to what the Prime Minister said, putting a question to the hon. member for St. Henri. He said, "What about those judges who, after listening to a lawyer for an hour and a half, ask him what he has said?" I may ask the Prime Minister whether in his experience as a lawyer he found that it was only those judges above seventy-five years of age to whom that remark could apply.

[Mr. Factor.]

Mr. BENNETT: I did not hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am asking the Prime Minister whether, in his experience as a lawyer, he has found that only judges above seventy-five years of age could suddenly ask him, after listening to him for an hour and a half, what he had said? I believe that even those who have not attained that age sometimes find themselves under that necessity.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt; I would refer to the hon. gentleman himself as one of them.

Mr. DUPUIS: It may happen in this house that when some hon. members on the other side are discussing certain subjects members on this side may appear to be asleep, but they are not.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Speaker, before recess we were discussing the advisability of passing Bill No. 84, to amend the Judges Act. I contend that the aim the government is seeking to attain will not be reached by this legislation. They say that they intend to oblige judges who are unfit to take their pensions. presumably they believe, from their experience, sometimes judges are bad judges of themselves, and although incapacitated by ill health or otherwise, they do not seem to realize the fact. That may be true. It is because of this that, I believe, in 1922 or thereabouts, this question was brought up in the house by the previous government and Senator Dandurand, presented an argument to that effect and piloted the discussion of the bill which is now on the statute book as section 28 of the Judges Act, chapter 105 of the revised statutes of Canada. The argument then advanced by Senator Dandurand was to that effect and cannot be applied as an argument in favour of the present bill, because the then administration was faced with the situation that some Canadian judges were repeatedly asking and obtaining leave of absence for six months. There was only one way to oblige them to take their pensions and that was to pass legislation to reduce their salaries to naught. But it applied only to those who were unfit, whereas the bill now before us applies to all judges who reach the age of seventy-five years.

Is it necessary that I should remind the house of many instances not only in the judiciary, but in many other walks of life, of people over seventy-five years of age whose services the country is still pleased to retain? What would have happened in England during the time of Gladstone if they had applied to public men legislation such as this? Where is the Englishman who is not proud of what Gladstone did for his country even in his later years? What would have happened in Canada if such legislation had been applied to public men in the case of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and many others who, on account of their experience and capabilities, were of immense value to this country? In the judiciary to-day, as I said before, we still have judges of advanced years who render eminent service to their country and their countrymen. Therefore I believe this legislation should either be amended or dropped; it is so drafted that it reaches the limit of despotism. The government will say to a judge: When you reach the age of seventy-five years, whether you are able, whether you have large experience, whether you are physically and mentally fit, you must get off the bench; we want to put a younger man in your place. That reminds me of a conference of United States medical men held in New York some years ago when one of them gave a lecture stating that every United States citizen who reached the age of seventy-five years should be put out of existence with strychnine or some other poison; that he was a nuisance to the people of that country. That gentleman was laughed at. One is not obliged to look with a searchlight to find in any land men who, after they reach that age, are still useful citizens.

The purpose of this bill is to retire on pension members of the judiciary after they have reached the age of seventy-five, by reducing their salary to the amount of their pension. The Prime Minister, with the gesture of an offended virgin, said: We have no political motive, and the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is not speaking by the book when he contends we have a political motive in the back of our heads. I am ready to admit, because the Prime Minister said so, that he has no political motive, but I would ask him and hon. members opposite: What is the motive? Although they know many members of the judiciary of seventy-five years of age or over are still rendering eminent service to their country, they are obliging them to retire against their willingness to continue to fulfil their important duties. What is the purpose of this legislation? It is to put younger men in their place, and I use the words of the Prime Minister. He does not want to name any judge over the age of sixty to any court. He wants to appoint younger judges. If it is not done from a political motive, the consequences at all events will be political in that when the judges reaching the age of seventy-five are retired, regardless of their capacity, the positions will be given to younger men, political friends who will stay on the bench for many, many years after this government has passed away.

I heard the hon. member for Quebec East use the argument that this is a breach of contract. I am of the same opinion. I believe that it is an absolute breach of contract with these judges who have abandoned their practice as lawyers, and generally speaking they were lawyers with a good practice, and some of them derived from their practice much more than the salary of a judge. Through a high spirit of service to the country they gave up their practice to accept nomination as a judge, with the absolute assurance of a solemn contract that they would receive a certain salary, and that no one, not even the government, would be able to deprive them of such salary. If to-day the government by this legislation puts them out of office, where is the hon. member of this house who will not call that a breach of contract? It is a breach of contract to put out of office very capable judges in order to appoint younger men. And what will be the consequence? Will that save money to this country? Quite the contrary. The result will be that the judge who is pensioned will receive two-thirds of his salary, let us say $7,000 a year, and in some cases $6,000, and the new judge who will be appointed will receive $9,000 a year, so that every retirement will cost the country $16,000 a year. I therefore see no reason in the world why the government should insist on this legislation. It seems to me that in justice to those judges who are capable and in justice also to those who were at the head of the government when section 28 was passed, this government should have the courage to apply section 28 and use their discretion in putting out of office those who are really unfit and allowing to remain those who can efficiently perform their functions.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the principle of this bill. Having practised for a period of something like thirty-nine years, perhaps my opinion is worth something. What I do not like about this measure is what I might call the retroactivity of it. Outside of that I think it is a very proper bill and it is carrying out the theory of the act which was passed in 1927, and for which we claim the credit I remember that immediately after the passing of that act in 1927 a judge of the Supreme court of Canada was retired, Mr. Justice Mignault, I believe. We omitted to provide for his pension, and that matter was not taken care of until the present government—

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was looked after by the old government.

Mr. HACKETT: Time flies.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, it always does.

I was always in favour of the scheme whereby pensions would be provided for judges retired in this particular way. Mr. Justice Mignault made the point that he was named under a contract mentioned in the statutes and that the government had failed to carry out the terms of the contract. In the present case, however, as I understand it, constitutional objections have been made and are recognized that the bill cannot go through as did the bill of 1927 because at that time we were dealing with federal courts, and the present bill, is a hang-over from the period prior to 1867 when we took over from the provinces the legislation affecting judges.

There is another objection that I see to a wholesale retirement of judges. Many of them have now reached the age mentioned in the bill. I should say that probably thirty or forty of them would be compulsorily retired under its provisions. That would amount to about a quarter of a million dollars for annuities for these judges. That is a tidy sum of money at the present time when we are casting about in every way to get money in order to carry on a hand-to-mouth existence. Just now I think it is a luxury which might well stand over until the years to come which we hope will be brighter than those we have gone through in the past three or four years.

Why should a judge be permitted to remain on the bench for more than the period allotted to men by the psalmist? Three score years and ten was considered to be the span of man's allotted life on this earth.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And then the Senate.

Mr. JACOBS: The Senate is a horse of another colour. We ought to give these judges time to prepare themselves for their Maker, and if they are on the bench every day rendering judgments, what chance have they when they go into the next world? I have a good deal of respect for the bench. I can speak a little more freely now than when I practised before them, but I also recognize that judges have their failings, and I think it will be generally admitted that a man under seventy-five years of age generally speaking is a better man than one over seventy-five. It is the most natural thing in the world that a man should have passed the zenith of his power previous to seventy-five years of age. Even in the days of Shakespeare it was recognized that a judge on the bench must be in the full vigour of physical and mental attainment. I think Shakespeare places the judge in the fifth stage of man's life: He talks of the justice.

. . . . . .
In fair round belly with good capon lined,
With eyes severe, and beard of formal cut.

I have that beard of formal cut. But when he gets into the sixth stage he talks about—

. . . the lean and slipper'd pantaloon,
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side,
His youthful hose well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank; and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in the sound.

That is the sixth stage. We wish to place all our judges in the fifth stage, so as not to have them in the condition which Shakespeare describes in stage six. After all, when a man is seventy-five years of age it does seem to me that $6,000 a year is a fair salary. Where could he get more than $6,000? It would be impossible. No doubt his family will have grown up. He has not the obligations that as a younger man he would have had. Altogether I think he ought to be satisfied with the smaller amount.

Another reason is that there are others trying to reach the bench. It is not fair or right that a position of such importance which is held out to eminent members of the bar who have worked and toiled upward in the night while others were enjoying life, should wait until the kindly hand of death removes the eminent judge. I do not consider it just to the other lawyers. What I do not like, however, is the wholesale appointment of thirty or forty men, all selected from one particular party at this particular time. The thing should be done with decency and decorum. It is not fair that such a thing should be perpetrated or practised upon the community just now.

Some suggestion was made during the debate about the eminence of learned judges, and that we would be deprived of their talents. Well, I think we have men at the bar to-day who are as eminent as men found on the bench. I believe every one will agree with that. The Prime Minister referred to a case—I do not know whether it was hypothetical or actual —where a judge asked an attorney after listening. "What did you say?" or "What were you saying? I well remember a case in which I was engaged where, shortly after we returned from lunch we found that the judge was asleep on the bench.

An hon. MEMBER: How old was he?

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know what his age was, but that did not interfere with his sleep.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is a good argument.

Mr. JACOBS: I put a question to the witness to which my opponent objected. There we were, with the judge snoring peacefully, waiting to see what would happen. Finally when we saw that the judge was not likely to awaken for some time I said, "Well, seeing that the question is not important I shall withdraw it." I lost my case. Whether it was because the judge merely had his eyes closed and was listening to me or whether he actually did not hear what I was saying, I do not know. However that is an experience which may happen to anyone.

We know the story of the Duke of Devonshire who, while addressing the House of Commons on one occasion, yawned. He provoked some amusement at the time, and when a friend met him outside the building and said, "Is it true, that you fell asleep or yawned when you were delivering your address?" the Duke replied, "Did you hear the speech?" The reply was "No." "Well, then," said the Duke, "if you had heard it you would have known why." Little things of that kind do not amount to very much, but they all go to show that as a person grows older his natural ability does not improve. It is a stage of decadence. We are simply doing by legislation what nature has done before. I see my good friend the Minister of Railways and Canals still shows a little interest in medicine, although he is now far removed from it—we have railroaded him out of it.

Mr. MANION: I was wondering which one of the lawyers put the judge to sleep.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope the Minister of Railways does not expect me to answer something which could be used in evidence against me. That is strictly against the law.

I would suggest to the Solicitor General that the measure be changed in such a way that it would apply only for the future. Then every person will be satisfied, and this would be one of the very few measures before the house in the present session which would go through without objection. It seems so easy thus to please this side of the house, to please the future judiciary and to please the taxpayers who, in the last analysis, will have to pay a quarter of a million dollars extra. Generally speaking, it would be giving satisfaction to everyone throughout the country. I am strongly in favour of the measure; I believe it is one which will have the effect of strengthening the bench, a process which is, of course, creditable. In these days, when conditions are not satisfactory, we will be able to get men to take their places on the bench, who will reflect credit upon themselves and upon the government that appointed them.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay this legislation, but I have one or two observations to add. I do not believe it necessary to reply to the accusation made by the hon. members for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) to the effect that political motives are behind this legislation. That accusation is unfounded. The only motive behind this legislation is that of securing high efficiency in the administration of justice. We have also to think of the taxpayers and litigants who are complaining because efficiency is not at its highest point. Everything enacted in the bill has already been enacted by section 28 of the act, which is chapter 105 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

If I may say so, the present legislation is nothing but a sort of alleviation or mitigation of the drastic legislation enacted by section 28. Deprived of its legal phraseology section 28 enacts that any judge who by reason of age or infirmity is incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office shall cease to be paid. We say that any judge who has attained the age of seventy-five will, if he wishes to do so, continue to hold office, but he will not receive more than the annuity to which he would be entitled. That is all we say.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is quite enough.

Mr. DUPRE: Section 28 is much more drastic; under it if he wishes to continue he will not receive any salary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is after investigation.

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend is quite right, under section 28 there will be an investigation, but we believe that it is not desirable that judges should be subjected to the odium of such an investigation. We should bring to their attention the necessity of retiring when they have attained a certain age. That is all there is to this legislation.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 1—Salaries of judges in office after attaining the age of seventy-five years.

Mr. JACOBS: I move that the words in line 11 "heretofore or" be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The amendment should be in writing.

Mr. BENNETT: The government cannot accept that amendment, because it negatives the bill. The existing difficulties about which the complaints have been made will continue.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It does not negative the bill, it merely takes away the retroactive feature which is the most objectionable part.

Mr. DUPRE: But we do not want to do that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know, that is very apparent from the speeches delivered this morning. It would not serve the purpose of the government.

Without entering into a new argument on this bill I wish again to voice my protest against it. I may say that the right hon. gentleman in his laboured argument, to use his own words, has not attempted to reply to the objections which have been made on this side of the house to this bill. I say that a most undersirable situation will exist when this bill becomes law. We will have two classes of high court judges in Canada, some with a salary of $9,000, others with a salary of $6,000. Because I prophesy to my hon. friends opposite that they will not succeed in persuading the judges who are still fit to work to get off the bench to suit my hon. friends.

Mr. DUPRE: At least we are trying to do something.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We shall have two sets of high court judges.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): On the first of July next how many judges will attain the age of seventy-five? Could we have the figures by provinces?

Mr. DUPRE: The number is fifteen. In Ontario six; Quebec, three; New Brunswick, two; Manitoba, two; Saskatchewan, one; British Columbia, one.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What will be the total amount of money involved?

Mr. DUPRE: To superannuate fourteen judges when the act becomes effective will require $99,666.66.

[Mr. Dupré.]

Mr. JACOBS: Has the Solicitor General the list of next year's crop, those who will reach seventy-five next year?

Mr. BENNETT: He has not the list with him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out to the hon. Solicitor General that when he was concluding the debate on second reading he intimated that this is, I think his words were, an amelioration of section 28 of chapter 105. If he will look at the marginal note—and frequently sections of statutes are construed by marginal notes—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —he will find it is:

Salaries of judges in office after attaining the age of seventy-five years.

They are not retired, they are remaining in office at two-thirds of the salary. That to my mind is a most vicious distinction. Judges are going to remain in office, yet it was the only argument for the bill that judges incapable of carrying on their duties should retire. But you are not necessarily retiring these judges under the terms of this bill. The only effective result of this legislation is to perpetuate them in office, if they so desire, at two-thirds of the salary they are drawing now. So if a judge at the age of seventy-five has the faults imputed by the hon. member he still remains, and all the imperfections of the present system absolutely continue in existence. Here we are in these times of depression when we are reducing the salaries of small people, going to impose upon this nation an additional burden of $100,000 during the first year, with probably a progressive increase as the years go on. I think the principle of this legislation is absolutely futile. If the house were in favour of retiring judges compulsorily at the age of seventy-five that is an entirely different thing, because then we would get rid of any incompetency such as is alleged by the Solicitor General in regard to certain judges. But this legislation does not cure that situation.

In the second place it establishes what I consider the very iniquitous principle of differentiation between judges; those with full salary up to the age of seventy-five, and others with two-thirds, if they decide to remain in office after this bill becomes law. To my mind, it is, if not intentional, at least in effect an attack on the judiciary of Canada. It is introducing a principle of differentiation in regard to service, and I think it is a very dangerous principle. The legislation is only a continuance of policies we have seen in operation the last three years, the slighting of parliament, taking these matters from its control and, as we saw in the case of the railway bill, taking away from the executive council powers which it properly has as an arm of the government. Now we are going to the judiciary and establishing this pernicious principle of differentiation between judges.

Mr. FACTOR: May I ask the Solicitor General in how many cases he has received complaints about the incapacity of these fifteen judges?

Mr. DUPRE: I am sorry I cannot answer, because these complaints have been made to the Minister of Justice who is away just now. All I know is that we have received a great number of complaints.

Mr. LAPOINTE: From whom?

Mr. DUPRE: From different parts of Canada. I can assure my hon. friend that I know personally that we have received a great many complaints from the province of Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Did my hon. friend receive any communications from the bench itself?

Mr. DUPRE: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: From the judges?

Mr. DUPRE: Oh, from the bench? Well, no, not from the bench. Either from litigants or from lawyers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Could not my hon. friend give that information to the committee?

Mr. DUPRE: No, I do not think I should.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If the Solicitor General has received any complaints I think we are entitled to know where they came from and what they were.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not think I should give that information. All I think I should say to my hon. friend is that in our own district in Quebec there have been complaints with regard to delays in the administration of justice, and those delays have been caused by the illness or incapacity of some judges. I think my hon. friend himself has complained in that regard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows that some of the old judges are doing a good deal more work than is being done by some of the new ones.

Mr. DUPRE: I quite agree, but I may add that this morning my hon. friend said that up to a certain period one chief justice of the province of Quebec was a remarkable judge, but that now he did not have the same capacity for work that he formerly had. I agreed with that statement; if I have to name the judge I will say that Chief Justice Lemieux certainly gave a wonderful example of high efficiency on the bench for thirty-five years, I think. Lately, however, because of his age, I presume, his capacity for work has not been the same, but that does not prevent us from having great admiration and affection for Chief Justice Sir François Lemieux, in view of his record.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am pleased indeed to hear those words. Chief Justice Lemieux has been a most active judge; he has been sick for some time, but it gives me pleasure to inform my hon. friend that according to the press this afternoon Chief Justice Lemieux held court yesterday, and he seems to be in good health once more. I know my hon. friend will be glad to get that information and I know he will hope that even with the reduced salary which the government proposes to pay, Chief Justice Lemieux will be able to sit again.

Mr. DUPRE: All I can say is that I am very glad to hear that Chief Justice Lemieux is better.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): If there have been complaints with regard to delays in Quebec it has been because, until the last six months or so, the court calendars in the city of Montreal have been overcrowded. If the rural districts of Quebec have suffered it has been because of the centralization of judges. They should have been decentralized and placed where they were about fifteen years ago; if that had been done there would have been no complaints in Quebec.

Mr. DUPRE: I have great respect for my hon. friend's opinion, but this is rather a controversial question, and I do not think it should be raised just now. My hon. friend may be right, but he could find many lawyers who would differ with him.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. DUPRE: In view of the short delay that has occurred in connection with this measure I think it is advisable to amend section 1 by deleting the word "July" wherever it appears, and inserting instead the word "September." This will give a little more time to the people concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that section 1 be amended by deleting the word "July" in lines 16 and 24 and substituting therefor the word "September."

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What is the purpose of this amendment?

Mr. BENNETT: The purpose is this: A number of hon. gentlemen have suggested that since on retirement judges usually have two or sometimes three months' leave. This amendment would postpone the operation of the bill until after the long vacation, making September 1 the operative day. Those affected therefore will have had the benefits to which reference has been made.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): And those who have never had any leave of absence may take a trip for once.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This amounts to a leave of two months.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it was said to be immediate execution previously.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, they were paid the full salary.

Mr. BENNETT: Not until the following year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In this case they never will get the full salary.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. DUFF: According to your ruling a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, the amendment must be in writing.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Where it is a question of only one word it is not necessary to apply that rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where is that rule found?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): It has been the practice.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): If a judge is to retire on September 1 will he be paid for the months of July and August on the basis of $9,000 if he has been receiving that salary?

Mr. DUPRE: I should think so.

Mr. BENNETT: The act does not become operative until September 1, so there will be no interference.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): I now have the amendment in writing. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Section 1 as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Coming into force.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the word "July" in lines 27 and 29 be deleted and the word "September" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Supposing a judge has been appointed—and I believe there are a few cases of this kind—who, in order to complete fifteen years of service, will have to serve until he is more than seventy-five years of age. Why should there be a different kind of treatment in his case? If other judges are obliged to retire and take their pension at the age of seventy-five, or to accept a reduced salary if they remain on the bench, why should this newly appointed judge remain on the bench at his full salary until he is seventy-seven or seventy-eight years of age?

Mr. BENNETT: There is one case, I believe, in which the appointee was at an advanced age when he was appointed. He has no retiring allowance until he has served fifteen years, and he will be over seventy-five when he has served for that length of time. It is desirable to take care of that case, otherwise he would be retired with no annuity at all.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): But according to the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite this morning he will be seventy-five years old, and he will be no good. Surely the rule must apply to all or none.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it would be subject to the fact that he must be able to carry on.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the section is general in its scope; it does not apply to only one man.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is only the one case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend says he has one case in mind. Is he sure there are not others? The law is general there, and my hon. friend from St. Henri is perfectly right. The right hon. gentleman argued this morning that when a judge reached the age of seventy-five he should withdraw, being no longer qualified. Why should he be considered qualified if he has not served fifteen years by the time he reaches the age of seventy-five? If he is not fit to be a judge under those circumstances this should apply to everyone. If there is necessity for a special vote in one particular case, as my right hon. friend suggests, it would be better to have the house vote the salary to that one man. But why should we embody in the law what is certainly a deviation from the principle expounded by my right hon. friend and by the Solicitor General?

Mr. BENNETT: I was careful to say that there might be doubts whether seventy-five should be made the governing age or not, but as a matter of fact, in looking through the cases, I believe the department discovered that at least one judge—there may be another case, but in the hurry of work one cannot say—who would be past the age of seventy-five before becoming entitled to his pension. The purpose is to ensure that he does not lose his rights by reason of the fact that he was over sixty when appointed. I think, when we are making operative an act of this kind, it is desirable to protect the interests of a judge in such a case, because he is otherwise subject to all the provisions of the act. If he is infirm or disabled he can be dealt with under the provisions of the statute that refer to cases of that kind, but this clause is intended to meet this particular case.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): My right hon. friend is trying to carry out the state contract with respect to this individual judge, making it possible for him to receive his pension. That is the position; you cannot get away from it. The endeavour is being made to respect his contract, affording that judge an opportunity to remain after the age of seventy-five years, so that he may obtain his pension. If this is done it will be a breach of contract, and if it is a breach of contract with respect to one judge or a few judges, the principle constitutes a breach of contract towards the other judges who have reached the age of seventy-five. The government might give to that judge, for the time he may have served over a period of thirteen years, a pension proportionate to the length of service he has rendered before reaching the age of seventy-five.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no provision in the law for it.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Then the law is against you.

Bill as amended reported.

Mr. DUPRE moved the third reading of the bill, and the house divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE BASED ON SPACE OCCUPIED BY ADVERTISEMENTS

The house in committee on Bill No. 98, to amend the Post Office Act—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill has been reprinted and the question propounded yesterday by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is now answered in the negative. This bill cannot apply to weekly newspapers because, first of all, it applies only when newspapers are transmitted for a greater distance than forty miles and then:

The newspapers and periodicals described in the immediately preceding subsection, upon any copies in excess of 2,500 copies, shall be subject to postage—

At such and such a rate, and in any event the advertising medium in any weekly newspapers the officials have any record of, does not exceed 50 per cent.

I have secured answers to the questions asked by the leader of the opposition. The first is that newspapers coming from the United States to Canada, come in free. The postage is paid there and by international arrangement the papers come into this country. On our newspapers we pay the postage here and they go into the United States. In that country the zone system prevails with respect to advertising and the rate is ten cents a pound on the advertising portion, so that Canadian papers, so far as that is concerned, do not meet with greater competition in that regard; that is, United States papers while coming in free, pay ten cents per pound on the advertising content as determined at Washington, plus the ordinary postage for the privilege of transmission.

The right hon. member asked whether this would affect the Saturday Evening Post. The answer to that is no. The Saturday Evening Post is dealt with by the legislation of 1931, under which it will be recalled that that paper falls within the category that pays the five cents a copy to this country. The revenue derived from that last year was very substantial. I cannot give the exact amount but it exceeded five thousand dollars a month. The other question which the right hon. gentleman asked was whether this effected any change with respect to rates payable other than those he mentioned, namely, to increase the rate of four cents on the advertising content in excess of the present figure. There is no change in that regard in the statute as it now reads.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

PURCHASE OF STATIONS—APPOINTMENTS TO STAFF

Mr. BENNETT: With the consent of the house I move that we revert to the order introduction of bills so that I may introduce the bill which has been printed in order that the house may have the opportunity of considering its position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What bill?

Mr. BENNETT: The radio bill.

Motion agreed to, and the house reverted to the order introduction of bills.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 99, to amend the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act.

He said: This bill is to amend the Radio Broadcasting Act of 1932 in two particulars, one to deal with the acquisition of stations by lease and or by purchase, and the other with respect to the appointment of a staff, that it should be selected by the commission. That may be highly controversial, but at any rate I only say to the house as I said the other evening, that Mr. Murray has gone over the country unaccompanied by the commission and has made a report in which having regard to his experience in engaging artists and others who provide programs as well as technical officers he makes that recommendation. I do not propose to proceed with the second reading to-day. After the house has had an opportunity to consider the bill we will discuss it at more length.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house will revert to government orders.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 93, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 1—Rate of exchange on depreciated currency in computing value for duty of goods imported.

Mr. YOUNG: Would you mind reading the first sentence of subsection (9), Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): It reads as follows:

"(9) (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the governor in council may, from time to time and as occasion requires, order and direct, subject to such exceptions as may be made, what shall be the rate of exchange fixed for any currency in computing the value for duty of goods imported into Canada from any place or country the currency of which is depreciated, and in case a sum in Canadian currency less than the invoice value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export, computed at the rate of exchange so ordered, be paid for in goods, the actual selling price of the goods to the importer shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption, and the provisions of this section shall apply and special or dumping duty shall apply equal to the difference between the value of the invoice computed at the current rate of exchange or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the governor in council, and the value of such invoice, computed at the rate of exchange for duty so ordered as aforesaid, or may be less than such difference as the governor in council may from time to time order and direct; and the governor in council may order and direct that in all cases of sales or consignments of goods imported into Canada, where the importer owns, controls or is interested in the business of the exporter, or the exporter owns, controls or is interested in the business of the importer, or the importer and exporter operate under a controlling or holding company, notwithstanding the expressed terms of the sale or consignment, the transaction shall be regarded as a sale and the actual selling price to the purchaser in Canada shall be taken to be the value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export converted into Canadian currency at the current rate of exchange, or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the governor in council, and shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption, and the provisions of this section shall apply and special or dumping duty shall be deemed to apply equal to the difference between the value of the invoice computed at the current rate of exchange or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the governor in council, and the value of such invoice computed at the rate of exchange for duty so ordered as aforesaid, or may be less than such difference as the governor in council may from time to time order and direct.

[Mr Speaker.]

Mr. YOUNG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I should like to point out that there is a typographical error in line 17, where the word "in" should be struck out and the word "the" substituted, so that it will read: "be paid for the goods." I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. EULER: May I ask the minister what the clause that has just been read means?

Mr. RYCKMAN: If my hon. friend will follow the section I think he will see that we have just put into words what the department has been doing since September when England went off the gold standard. We provided by orders in council for the exchange value of the pound for duty purposes. We provided also for the exchange value of the pound for special duty purposes. Then, as exchange was moving up and down, and as stability or an attempt at stability was desirable, we passed orders in council from time to time fixing the average value of the pound for special duty purposes. Having done that we found, and this appears in the section, that in order to avoid the payment of special duty, no matter what might be the exchange value of the pound, there were some who were selling at the fixed value of the pound for special duty purposes, thereby avoiding the payment of any special duty. There were certain articles of trade, such as wool, which had a gold value, and it was necessary for us to make orders in council in reference to the trade in wool. The trade in wines bottled in England, a trade which had been in existence for many years and was on a gold basis throughout the world, had to be provided for. These different movements and others, if hon. members will accept this long sentence which is Gladstonian in its proportions, will develop just exactly the course of the department in handling the business. I hope that this lengthy explanation will be at least in a measure satisfactory.

Mr. EULER: Since the minister has stated that the object of the legislation is merely to put into statutory form a practice which has been followed by the department for some time, why is it necessary, if the practice was legal before, to put it now in the form of a statute?

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is of course a very proper question. When this was done in the first instance I was not in the country. I was in London, England, when gold took the flight. It was found that in an emergency in which quick action had to be taken a decision was made which later had to be modified by order in council. Upon arriving home I canvassed the whole situation as carefully as I could. I was told, but not with emphasis, that the govenor general in council had done something which it had not authority to do. When I inquired what that was, I could not find out. However someone had set on foot the story that there was imperfection in the action taken by the governor in council, and in order to remove any possible doubt, I was anxious to effect a remedy. It is not proposed to go back and take the course of making merchants pay who have not paid but have been fair. The idea is to have the matter clear beyond peradventure. I may tell my hon. friend that the closest I could get to any definite statement as to what was done by the government which it had not power to do by order in council was that we had fixed an average for duty over fortnightly periods, and that it was necessary that the amounts so fixed should be the real exchange values of the pound on the particular dates. In order, as I say, to have some degree of uniformity we had fixed fortnightly values which obtained during the respective fortnights, action which it was suggested the government had not power to take. I think that it had. But if anyone wishes to challenge the action of the government I think this House of Commons, the final authority, ought to give the governor in council full power for what has been done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who was it told the minister? Was it his colleagues?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No it was not. So far as I know my colleagues are of the opinion that their action was correct. But there was the idea abroad to which I have referred. When I tried to localize it and find out what the trouble was the suggestion was made that we had not the power to fix the average value for duty covering fortnightly periods. So, in order to remove all possible doubt we are asking this House of Commons to pass this legislation, remembering, if you will, that it was necessary to act quickly. I think that while some people may object, in the main the action taken was beneficial to the country.

Mr. EULER: The minister admits that there was some doubt as to the legality of what was done in the past, since Great Britain went off the gold standard. Will he say now that this bill will regularize what was possibly done illegally in the past? Is it retroactive?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes. I say, as frankly as I can, that I believe the government had the authority. I believe that in the emergency the government should have had the power; I think all the chances are that it did. There is the view that improper or unwarranted action may be asserted. No one has done so thus far, but if such a contention should be advanced naturally the interests of the government and the revenue should be fortified. My answer to the hon. member would be that if this legislation is made retroactive from the month of September, when Great Britain went off the gold standard, we would be prepared for any threat on the part of any body in connection with the correctness of the action taken by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has any threat been made up to the present?

Mr. RYCKMAN: None that I know of.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, if I understand the minister correctly, under this section the government are to be given power to fix the value of the British pound, and the value so fixed will be the value for duty. That is to say, if goods to the value of £100 are brought into Canada, and the value of the pound is fixed at $4.25, then the value for duty of those goods will be $425. Is that correct?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, that is not correct. The hon. member may have got that idea from what I said. But in connection with duty upon the pound, may I say that the value of the pound was fixed at par when our tariff was made. The value for duty is still with the pound at $4.86⅔. But there is a special duty, and that special duty is levied or was a short time ago, because at the present time there is none. The value of the pound for special duty was first $4.40 and then it was changed to $4.25. The exchange value of the day, or of this fortnightly period, deducted from $4.40 at first, and later from $4.25, constituted the special duty or what is commonly known as the dumping duty.

Mr. YOUNG: Would the minister tell us where in subsection (a) he finds authority for saying that the value for duty would be $4.86⅔? It states here that the value for duty is the value they fix.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That was in the order in council, passed September 29, 1931, P.C. 2415.

Mr. YOUNG: What does it say?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It says:

By order in council (P.C. 2415) dated 29th September, 1931, it is ordered that in computing the value for duty of goods imported into Canada from Great Britain, the rate of exchange shall be fixed at $4.86⅔ to pound sterling being the par value thereof.

Mr. YOUNG: The section reads:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the governor in council may, from time to time and as occasion requires, order and direct, subject to such exceptions as may be made, what shall be the rate of exchange fixed for any currency in computing the value for duty of goods imported into Canada from any place or country the currency of which is depreciated, and in case a sum in Canadian currency less than the invoice value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export, computed at the rate of exchange so ordered, be paid for in goods, the actual selling price of the goods to the importer shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption, and the provisions of this section shall apply.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This legalizes that, if there ever was any doubt as to its legality.

Mr. YOUNG: When the minister fixes the pound at $4.25—that is the power given him in the first fifteen lines of this section, is it not?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would like to say that the minister does not fix the value, it is done by the governor in council.

Mr. YOUNG: Well when that is done, when the value of the pound is fixed at $4.25, and then when they fix the average current value, the difference between those two shall be the dumping duty. Is not that the understanding? "And the first value fixed shall be the basis on which the value for duty is computed."

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the minister was absent when the rate of $4.40 was fixed. Our tariff is based upon the assumption that the par value of the pound is $4.86⅔. That is a statutory provision. When England went off the gold standard on September 21, 1931, it was concluded that there would be an immediate increase in commodity prices, that prices of raw materials would increase and that wages would increase in terms of the new currency. And a deputation representing large interests in the country waited upon me—the minister was not in the country at that moment, if my memory serves me correctly. I speak subject to correction in regard to that. At any rate I told them that I should like their suggestions as to what they thought would be a reasonable percentage to deduct from the pound in view of the fact that a depreciated currency usually results in increased commodity prices. They came back at the end of the time fixed, and we agreed that $4.40 would be a fair basis of value for that purpose. Ten per cent from $4.86 as you will observe leaves $4.38, but as a matter of fact we fixed on $4.40, which was regarded by all as being reasonable, including the representative of the British interests. That was predicated upon the assumption that by reason of England going off the gold standard the appreciation in the case of raw materials would be substantially ten per cent. The board of trade figures show that in fact that figure was slightly higher than the result indicated, the cost of raw materials did not rise in Great Britain as was expected, it stood around eight per cent in excess of the prices before September 21. Then the British exporters suggested that the figure was too high in view of the changed value of the pound sterling. The pound in this country fluctuated. In August, 1931, the high was $4·8798 and the low $4·8642; in September it fell to a low figure of $3.70, the high figure being $4·9686. In October the high figure was $4.52 and the low figure $4.26; in November it fell below $4, $3.92 and a fraction, the high figure being $4.25; in December the high figure was $4.31 and a fraction and the low figure $3.83.

It was not however until this budget was introduced that the figure of $4.25 was agreed to. There was constant pressure that the value should be reduced below $4.40, and also there were representations made by Canadians that the figure should be increased. But we let it remain at $4.40 until the budget was introduced, when it was reduced to $4.25. The dumping duty is the difference between the average market value of the pound sterling for a period of fifteen days and $4.40 up to the time the budget was introduced, when the figure became $4.25. As I say, an arrangement as to the average for fifteen days was arrived at after a conference with the representatives of importers and representatives of some exporting houses with myself. Variations of course took place from time to time with the fluctuations of the market quotations for the pound sterling. Now of course, at $4.25, no dumping duty is payable, the figure at the moment being, I believe, the high for this month $4.43 and the low $4.10. That I think is the explanation.

Mr. YOUNG: I can understand the average fortnightly value of the pound as arranged. I can understand the $4.40 or $4.25. But I do not see where $4.86 comes into the picture. That was the value of the pound originally, that value disappeared, and it was agreed by this government that the value of the pound should be $4.40, and it says here "the value fixed by the minister shall be the value for duty." Where is the authority for $4.86?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps my hon. friend from Weyburn did not follow me carefully. In the latter part of my observations I was dealing with special duties. The value of the pound sterling upon which our tariff duties were based is $4.86.

Mr. YOUNG: But you have changed that.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that has not been changed, it is the special duties that have been changed. But for duty purposes we have remained at $4.86⅔, being the par value of the pound sterling. And the 20 per cent tariff, which was the tariff made by this parliament in days gone by, was on $4.86 and not any other figure. Then the special duty is the duty to compensate for the depreciated currency at which the goods have been bought.

I take this illustration; I did not intend to use it, but I put it to my hon. friend. The duty is 25 per cent by statute. A purchaser acquires £100 worth of goods, $486 would be what he would pay for them before Great Britain went off the gold standard—there might be a fluctuation of a few cents—the duty would be $121.50. If he bought the same goods with the pound at $3.80 the 25 per cent duty would amount to $95 which, plus the $380, would make $475, which would be less than the face value of the invoice before Great Britain went off the gold standard. Then the special duty would become payable. Since my hon. friend says he quite understands the $4.40 and the average fifteen day quotations I shall not repeat what has been said in that regard. The special duties were payable, as I have indicated, to equalize as far as possible the position of the Canadian producer with relation to the British exporter, in terms of depreciated money.

Mr. EULER: Like my hon. friend from Weyburn I will admit that I have always had some difficulty in understanding why, since Great Britain has practically discarded the par of $4.86⅔, our rate of duty should be based on that figure.

Mr. HACKETT: That is what the tariff is based on.

Mr. EULER: I understand, and I have no fault to find with, the fixing of the exchange for an average of fifteen days, but I do not quite understand why both methods should be adopted for extracting a higher duty. If it be true that because of the depreciation of the pound you should remain on the $4.86⅔ basis, is it not true also, at least in theory, and I think to some extent in practice, that as the British pound depreciated it was impossible to buy the same quantity of goods for the same amount of money. I do not know whether I have made myself clear, but when the pound depreciated after Great Britain went off the gold standard did not commodity prices in Great Britain increase so that for the same money you bought a smaller quantity of goods?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what was expected, and that was why $4.40 was agreed upon by us all as being a fair price for the pound. It was expected that commodity values would rise about ten per cent; therefore, deducting ten per cent from $4.86 would give you some idea of what the value of the pound might be. As a matter of fact that was not exactly what happened. Perhaps the hon. member for North Waterloo has been reading the British trade journals. Nothing has been more surprising than the fact that instead of commodity prices rising with the depreciated currency, commodity prices actually decreased with respect to many basic commodities. There has been some increase during the last two weeks, but prior to that there was a steady decrease.

Mr. EULER: I have not checked it up, but in one of the financial papers, I think the Financial Post of Toronto, the statement was made that commodity prices did increase to such an extent that the imposition of the dumping duty on the basis of $4.40 was entirely unnecessary, because the rise in commodity prices was sufficient to offset that depreciation. I have not checked it up, as I say, but certainly that statement is made by interested importers in this country.

Mr. YOUNG: The Prime Minister tells us that the pound at one time was worth $4.86. A certain thing happened in England; the government met and they said the pound was no longer worth $4.86 but was worth $4.40, and to-day they have fixed the value at $4.25. If you say the pound is not worth $4.86 why impose duty at that rate? There is nothing in this bill to justify that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am afraid my hon. friend is hardly correct. I would refer him to the order in council passed on September 29, 1931, which reads:

> By order in council (P.C. 2415), dated 29th September, 1931, it is ordered that in computing the value for duty of goods imported into Canada from Great Britain the rate of exchange shall be fixed at $4.86⅔ to pound sterling being the par value thereof.

Then:

By order in council (P.C. 2428), dated 29th September, 1931, it is ordered that in respect of goods imported into Canada from Great Britain, in case a sum less than $4.86⅔ in Canadian currency for each pound sterling of the invoice be paid for the said goods, the actual selling price of the goods to the importer shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption and the provisions of section 6 of the customs tariff shall apply.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister has just read an order in council authorizing him to do certain things which he has been doing for the last two years. Now he says some doubt has arisen as to the legality of those things, and he brings in a bill to legalize what he has been doing.

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, it is to remove any chance of doubt. In my own mind I think council had ample authority to do what was done.

Mr. YOUNG: Then the minister wants this bill to contain ample justification for everything that was done, but it does not contain anything that would justify the order in council he read.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. YOUNG: No, it is not carried. I may say that I have received complaints about this regulation, and I should like to read a portion of a letter I received from a broker. Referring to another letter he had written he said:

My letter does not start with parliamentary language but expresses the exasperation felt by the vague meaning put into many of these regulations. It is quite possible there is a hidden meaning and I would suggest you ask that this resolution be explained.

This gentleman says he cannot find any meaning in the resolution and suggests that there may be a hidden meaning. I have read the resolution carefully, sentence by sentence, and I cannot find any hidden meaning at all; if it is hidden it is well hidden. I even read it backwards, and it makes just as much sense that way. Will the minister explain just what he means by a country whose currency is depreciated? Does he mean depreciated in terms of gold, in terms of American dollars, or in terms of Canadian dollars?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Currency is depreciated when it is at less than its recognized par throughout the world.

Mr. YOUNG: In terms of gold?

Mr. RYCKMAN: There might be a country where they traded jack-knives.

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. YOUNG: That is a sharp answer. I have here the Commercial Intelligence Journal for May 6, showing the value of different currencies. I find that on that date the United States dollar was worth 88 cents in gold and the Canadian dollar was worth 74 cents in gold. Now I want to ask the minister whether United States currency would come under this clause. That currency is depreciated in terms of gold, but it is above par in Canadian money; the United States dollar is worth about $1.13 in Canadian money. Would United States currency be considered depreciated under this clause?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Let us see how this will work out. If this applies to a country whose currency is depreciated in terms of gold but is still above Canadian currency, any advantage or supposed advantage which that country might derive from the depreciation of its currency would be more than offset by the further depreciation of the Canadian currency. In a case like that I ask the minister how he would justify the application of this section.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the currency is at a premium of course the section would not apply.

Mr. YOUNG: I want to know whether that means at a premium in terms of Canadian money or in terms of gold. Here is a currency that is at a premium in terms of Canadian money and at a discount in terms of gold.

Mr. RYCKMAN: In the money market of Canada we have listed the currencies and their values; some are depreciated and some are appreciated, and we govern ourselves accordingly. The banks furnish the department, at eleven o'clock in the morning, the exchange rate in respect of any currency regarding which information may be asked.

Mr. YOUNG: I take it the minister means depreciated in terms of Canadian money. What will he do with respect to a country whose currency is above ours?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Frankly, I do not understand the question.

Mr. YOUNG: I want to know how the section will be made to apply.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The section does not apply.

Mr. YOUNG: Then I will ask this question. The United States is such a country: if we are buying goods from the United States does any currency dumping duty apply?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, not when their currency is at a premium.

Mr. YOUNG: Then will the minister explain this. I have here an appraiser's note for a small collection on an electric lamp. The appraised value—not the invoice value—is $1.90; United States exchange 26 cents; advance for duty, 72 cents, making a total value for duty of $2.88. How is that value for duty arrived at?

Mr. RYCKMAN: That has nothing to do with the section under consideration.

Mr. YOUNG: I think it has quite a bit to do with it. I will ask this question, then. If an American exporter is sending goods into Canada, with the Canadian dollar quoted at 88 cents American funds, and he offers to take the Canadian dollar at par, what action will the officers take?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not know either that that question relates to this section. We require the United States money to be converted into Canadian value.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister say he will or will not impose a dumping duty equal to the difference in the currency?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It depends upon the manner in which payment is made. It must be the fair market value in the country from which the goods are imported and must have relation to our own currency, and if an American exporter takes Canadian money when the United States money is at a premium we charge the duty in that case.

Mr. YOUNG: Then the minister is charging the currency dumping duty against the United States as well as against other countries whose currency is at a premium. I can recall a report that appeared in the newspapers some time ago of a speech of the Prime Minister in which he seemed to resent the fact that Americans did not give us 100 cents for the dollar. But if the American did offer full value the Minister of National Revenue would not let him do it.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. YOUNG: He said so.

Mr. RYCKMAN: We insist on the fair market value for duty purposes. If someone tries to charge less we step in in the interests of the business of the country and insist upon a fair market value, and the transaction is carried out on that footing.

Mr. YOUNG: It amounts to this. You simply say to the American, "You must not give Canada one hundred cents for her dollar." Let us see what the section says in line 30:

> . . . in all cases of sales or consignments of goods imported into Canada, where the importer owns, controls or is interested in the business of the exporter, or the exporter owns, controls or is interested in the business of the importer, or the importer and exporter operate under a controlling or holding company, notwithstanding the expressed terms of the sale or consignment, the transaction shall be regarded as a sale and the actual selling price to the purchaser in Canada shall be taken to be the value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export converted into Canadian currency at the current rate of exchange, or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the governor in council, and shall be regarded as less than the fair market value . . .

Leaving out the second clause we find this. If a certain relationship exists between an importer in Canada and an exporter in Britain, then the goods shall be regarded as being sold at less than fair market value and the dumping duty shall apply. Is that what the minister intends to say?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I intended to say what the hon. member has read.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister intends to say this, that if a partnership or relationship of principal and agent exists between an exporter in England and an importer in Canada, then the goods shall be regarded as being dumped and as being sold at less than fair market value. Is that what the minister intended?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes, with this added—if the price is the value for special duty, because some have been evading the special duty. How? By using in the transaction the value that has been fixed as the value of the pound for special duty, so that there is no special duty payable at all. In some cases they have been willing to pay the merchant in England a higher price than they needed to pay him, in order to evade paying the special duty in Canada. If I have an affiliated company in England and if I am prepared to pay at a higher rate than the currency exchange rate I am simply taking money out of one pocket and putting it into the other and not giving the government its fair share of duty.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is that contained in the bill? As I read it all that is necessary is that a certain relationship shall exist, that there be a partnership, and if they are partners, regardless of everything else, the dumping duty applies. That is the way I understand the bill.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the invoice shows that it would be a case of dumping if they were not partners.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is that in the bill?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The hon. member read it; I do not wish to read it over again.

Mr. YOUNG: I cannot find it. I do not know who drafted the section, but here are 466 words all in one sentence, and for the life of me I cannot find the subject or the predicate of it. I do not know who drew it up.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I didn't think it was quite as bad as all that.

Mr. YOUNG: It is, for I have actually counted the words, and they are all in one sentence. The man who did it must have been working by the mile.

Mr. BENNETT: He must have been a free trader.

Mr. YOUNG: A correspondent suggests to me that there may be a hidden meaning in it. It has been said that language was given man as a means of concealing his thoughts; evidently that was the idea in the mind of the person who drafted this section. I suggest to the minister that he break it up into a number of clear, terse, concise sentences. When you want to draft a thing like this there are two principles to be observed: first, keep clearly in mind what you want to say and, secondly, say it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Did my hon. friend ever think of applying that to himself?

Mr. YOUNG: I do the best I can. The minister wants to say several things here. If he will tell us what they are, we will try to say them for him. The first thing he wants to say is that the governor in council shall have power to fix the values of certain currencies. Why not say that in one sentence and stop there? Then make another sentence for the next thing the minister wants to do. He wants to say that the value for duty shall be based on the value of currency so fixed. Let him put that in another sentence. Then he can have another saying that the governor in council shall have power to determine every fortnight the average value of the currency in question. Let him have another sentence stating that in case the actual price paid for the goods at the average current rate of exchange is less than the value for duty so fixed, the goods shall be considered as dumped and shall be liable to dumping duty. Then he can have another sentence saying that when certain relationships exist between the importer and the exporter the transaction shall be considered as a sale and values shall be determined as in the former clauses of the bill. Let him put those different ideas in different short, terse sentences expressed in simple words. Then we shall understand the matter and be able to discuss it intelligently. At present the bill does not make sense.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The Department of Justice revised this section, and they did not have any difficulty with it. I must say I did not at first understand it as fully as I might have wished, but after reading it the second and third times, for I have read it a few times, I think it is plain. I do not believe my hon. friend would have to read it three times to understand it.

Mr. YOUNG: If the Justice department drafted it they may be quite capable of understanding it, and the minister may also be capable of understanding it, but it has to be understood by ordinary mortals in business and they do not seem to know what it means. Even the officials of the department do not seem to understand it. I suggest that it be put into simple language so that the man in the street, even the hon. member for Weyburn may understand it.

Mr. BENNETT: If they all understand it as well as he does, there will be none who do not understand it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Carried.

Mr. YOUNG: No. We want it redrafted. Does the minister not think it should be redrafted and simplified?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Frankly, I think not. The difficulties have been caused by the complications in the working out of business, the fluctuations we have had; by reason of changes in exchange values a dumping duty may be shown one day and none the next. It is these things that cause difficulty, but anyone in the trade who will follow it, will understand it. I can appreciate the fact that a layman might find some difficulty on reading this over for the first time, but I think a bright minded person, on reading it the second time, would understand it fully.

Mr. YOUNG: Unfortunately we are not all sufficiently bright minded to do so. In spite of what the minister says, in the last section I read where certain relationships are supposed to exist between the importer and the exporter and I cannot find in the bill anything other than that if such relationship exist, the goods are dumped no matter what the price is. Surely the minister ought to be willing to clear this up by clarifying his language.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think it is clear now.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 95, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lennox in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Stamp tax on cheques.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to offer to this section as follows:

That the bill be amended as follows:

That subsection (2) of section 44, as proposed to be enacted by section 2 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(2) The following cheques shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this section, under regulations to be prescribed by the minister, when drawn for an amount of money not exceeding $5:—

(i) cheques issued in payment for milk or cream to producers thereof;

(ii) cheques issued in payment for eggs or poultry by egg and poultry exchanges to producers thereof;

Mr. HOWARD: Has the minister any amendment for this section?

Mr. RHODES: That was amended in committee on the resolution, and the bill conforms to the resolution as amended.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 to 32 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I wish to amend the bill by adding a new section 1A, reading as follows:

1a. Paragraph (b) of section thirteen of The Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as enacted by section one of chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1932, is amended by striking out the words "against fire" in the last line thereof.

The effect of that amendment is this. The act of 1932 exempts from taxation farmers' mutual insurance companies which are engaged in the business of insurance against fire. When that exemption was made it was not in mind that there were also farmers' mutual insurance companies which insured against weather, hail and the like. By striking out the words, "against fire," farmers' mutuals will be exempted from taxation whether they insure against fire or against weather.

Mr. MARCIL: As regards the farmers' mutuals, the other day a farmer told me that he thought the cheques issued on the caisses populaires, the farmers' bank, so called, were exempted from the stamp tax. The bank is not incorporated in the real sense under provincial charter, but it is very useful to the farmers and the cheques issued are numerous. I would like to know for certain if cheques issued on this bank are exempt from taxation.

Mr. RHODES: Since my hon. friend mentioned the matter the other day I have had the opportunity of making inquiry and I find that under the act as hitherto administered those cheques have been regarded as cheques coming within the provisions of the bill with respect to the taxation of cheques.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 96, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Five per cent tax on residents of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move to amend subsection 5 of section 9B as enacted by section 9 of the bill, by adding the following words at the end of the said subsection:

except those exemptions provided by paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (k) of the said section 4.

Section 4 of chapter 97 of the statutes of 1927 refers (a) to the income of the governor general of Canada; (b) to the income of consuls and consuls-general and of officials or officers of a foreign country whose duties require them to reside in Canada; (c) the income of officials of Great Britain or any of its self-governing colonies whose duties require them to reside in Canada. Those are the ordinary diplomatic considerations which obtain in all countries, and I take it that there will be no exception taken on the part of the committee. Paragraph (k) has to do with the income of incorporated companies whose business and assets are carried on and situate entirely outside of Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I have another amendment of a minor character. I move to amend subsection 11 of 9B by substituting the word "income" for the word "revenue" in line 18, so that the proviso will read:

Provided that not more than one-quarter of the gross income of the Canadian company is derived from interest and dividends.

On section 12—Deductions of 12½ per centum on certain payments made to non-residents.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, you have been proceeding so rapidly that perhaps I have missed the clause concerning which I should have liked to make some observations. If you would permit me I should like to make them now. It was with regard to a debate of about a week ago in connection with the tax on corporations. Am I in order?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Yes.

Mr. EULER: I said at the time that the removal of the $2,000 exemption on corporation incomes has created a discriminatory position so far as small corporations are concerned. May I repeat, lest I be misunderstood, that I am not objecting in any sense to corporations paying income tax. My objection is based entirely on the disproportion between the tax paid by a business which happens to be incorporated as compared with the—

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. EULER: If hon. members say it is carried before I am through, it will take all the longer. There is a disproportion between the tax paid by the incorporated company and that paid by a similar business which happened to be owned by one or two persons. I object to the great difference in the taxation. I take as an example the tax which has to be paid by a corporation having a profit of $5,000 as compared with the tax on the $5,000 profit earned by a private individual. As I said at that time the amounts payable were in the one case something like $713 and in the case of the private individual only about $120. My contention was that the difference was entirely too great. The minister attempted to meet my statement by saying that I had not allowed for salaries. I want to say now that I did allow for salaries. When I spoke of the $5,000 income I presumed that salaries had been paid, and I omitted the actual computation as far as salary was concerned. Salary having been omitted in both cases in my computation the result was almost exactly identical in each case. If a profit—and I am speaking of a net profit in either case—is $5,000, and for the purpose of argument we want to say that in each case the manager of the concern receives a salary, the joint stock company at a salary of $3,000 and the manager of the private business on an allowance, if you wish to call it that, of $3,000, the difference, if it is computed by way of a tax on the company and by way of individual taxation, is, if we care to take it that way, $919 to be paid by the corporation or its owner by way of individual taxes, and only $346.50 to be paid by the private owner. I am trying to point out that the difference is entirely too great. I am not objecting to the principle of taxation of the corporation, but it seems unnecessary to state that it is utterly unfair that a business which shows a net profit of, we will say, $5,000 on capital should have to pay $919 while a privately owned business making a net profit of $5,000 pays only $346.50. I have checked these figures carefully, and they represent the difference between the two amounts in the case to which I referred the other day when it was taken for granted that I had not included salaries—$572 in one case and $593.75 in the other, or a difference of only $21.75.

I should like, not for the purpose of delaying the committee but to point out what I regard as an absolute injustice, for a few moments to review the situation. I think when the income tax was first introduced so far as corporations were concerned, in order to avoid double taxation, after the company had paid its taxes and the shareholders had received their dividends, they were allowed to deduct some eight per cent on individual receipts because of the fact that the company had already paid taxes on that income. It was regarded as unjust that taxation should be paid twice on the same sum. I believe that is a sound principle and if I cared to look back I could quote the present Prime Minister as having said what I am now saying, namely that the principle of double taxation is unsound. I could mention a good many members on the opposite side of the house who took that position. Following that I believe it was the late Hon. Mr. Robb who removed the provision for the eight per cent allowance, but included a provision for a family corporation. That has been removed by the minister. In fact, the minister has done these three things within a very short period: He has removed the exemption which joint stock companies enjoyed; he has removed the family corporation provision, and he has increased the rate of taxation.

Just to make the comparison still more glaring may I point out that the owners of a joint stock company have to pay from four to seven income taxes on the same sum of money. The exemption of eight per cent has been abolished. We now have, first, a tax of twelve and a half per cent on the corporation, which is paid by the company itself. The individual is then taxed on the balance which he draws in dividends. There is double taxation. He is then taxed on last year's tax, because that sum cannot legally be deducted. The municipality—and especially is this so in the province of Ontario—then charges him an income tax on the same income, and usually charges about twice as much as it ought to charge, because the tax is based on the mill rate or the assessment rate, and the assessments in most of our towns and villages are usually half or less than half the actual real estate value. The result is that the tax rate or the mill rate is perhaps forty mills where it ought to be only twenty, if assessments were properly made. So he has a municipal income tax on the same sum of money. Then, in my province along comes the provincial government, placing another tax on joint stock companies of one per cent of their capital. There are at least four income taxes paid by a man who happens to have his money invested in a joint stock company.

But the point I wish to make—and I have no hope that I will be successful in convincing the minister—is that in the case of the small company where there is a proprietor, or two or three proprietors in a family, on so small a profit as $5,000 a tax of over $900 is paid. That figure must compare with the $300 paid by the private individual. Let us take the figures which the minister mentioned the other day when he endeavoured to show I had not allowed for the $3,000 salary. Let me take the $3,000 salary in the case of a joint stock company which I had credited with a profit of $5,000. That reduces the profit to $2,000. Figure it out in that way. Even the small company which has a profit of only $2,000, a company which may be owned by one person or perhaps by one man and members of his family, pays a tax of more than $300, whereas his competitor next door pays only $120. My whole argument is to make this point, that the difference is entirely too great. I am not objecting to the corporation tax, but I do not see any reason why the small man because he happens for convenience to have his business in the form of a stock company—and he gets his charter from the provincial government, not this government, and the provincial government taxes him—should be penalized by having to pay three times the tax on his profits that the man who does business the other way has to pay. I think it is wrong and should be corrected.

Mr. RHODES: Dealing with the first part of the remarks of my hon. friend, in which he refers to an individual doing business as a company as against the individual doing a personal business, and the disparity in the income tax payable in the different situations, I hope he will not think me discourteous if I do not again cover the ground which I covered on Friday during his absence in reply to his colleague the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm). He will find the complete reply in Hansard, as far as I am able to give it.

Mr. EULER: I have it right here.

Mr. RHODES: Whether that be regarded by my hon. friend as a satisfactory reply or not, it is the only reply I can give, and it would not be fair to encumber the record by repeating the same argument.

With respect to his second objection, I am very largely in agreement with him. There is no doubt that the feature of double taxation is in itself objectionable. If conditions were fairly normal we might have eliminated it, but I must point out that now is not the time when we can consider such a proposal. When we do approach more prosperous conditions we ought, if possible, to get away from the feature of double taxation, not only in connection with the income tax but other taxes I might cite. Further we should try if at all possible, when conditions improve, to get away from the retroactive feature which has been present in the income tax since its inception, because it is very hard on an individual who has to pay a tax this year at an increased rate on an income which he received and spent last year, and possibly this year he may have no income. There are actual cases of that character. That is a hardship which we ought at the earliest possible moment to attempt to eliminate.

As far as triple taxation is concerned, first by the dominion, second by the province and third by the municipality, in connection with income tax, I am in accord with the views expressed by my hon. friend. I stated to the house, on Friday I think it was, that that subject came up for discussion at the last provincial conference, and as a result there is a committee of the higher officials of the provinces and the dominion at work at the present moment. I hope that as a result of their efforts we may arrive at a working basis which will be fair to the different taxation authorities and also to the individuals concerned.

Mr. MacLEAN: I wish to bring to the minister's attention again the question of reinstating the exemption of $2,000 for small companies. I wish to back up what the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has just said in connection with this matter. Even to-day I received a telegram from the Charlottetown board of trade saying:

> Incorporated companies here and council board trade urge reinstatement exemption of two thousand dollars to incorporated companies in budget.

They seem to think it is working a very great hardship on the small companies. I really think the minister should give serious consideration to this.

Mr. RHODES: It is not a complete answer I will admit, but I may say to my hon. friend that neither in the United States nor Great Britain do they give any exemption whatever. If the small company feels itself aggrieved, particularly the type of company referred to by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, it is a simple thing to dissolve the company and pay the straight income tax. Admittedly the exemption was dropped for the purpose of enlarging the return to the treasury. I cannot see that there is any injustice, as the exemption follows all along the line with every company.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, the exemption of $2,000 means a great deal to a little company that makes only $3,000 or $4,000 profit, whereas to a company making half a million it means nothing at all. What I am objecting to is the discrimination, and no matter how difficult it may be to raise revenue and how necessary it may be, I think the principle of justice and absence of discrimination should apply.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to move to section 12. It is purely for the purpose of facilitating administration, also to save expense by doing away with the necessity of making numerous small refunds. It will be a benefit from the administrative point of view, and also to the individual in saving him unnecessary annoyance. Taxes are deducted at the source from small payments to individuals who in the final analysis will be found not subject to tax. The amendment reads:

(3) Every person making any payment by any means whatsoever to a non-resident person on account of anything let, leased or used in Canada, or on account of royalties for anything used or sold in Canada, shall deduct from every such payment in excess of such an amount as the minister may prescribe, twelve and one-half per centum thereof.

That is there might be a remittance of $2 or $3, the minister might lay down a declaration saying that the deduction at the source would not be applicable in case of remittances of less than $25, $30 or $50, thus avoiding the necessity of numerous refunds in the case of small payments to individuals who in the final analysis would not be subject to the income tax, and to whom otherwise a refund would have to be made. That is the sole purpose of the amendment.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 9, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

That it is expedient to amend the Tariff Board Act, chapter 55 of the statutes of 1931, to provide that the salary of the chairman shall be $15,000 per annum; and that any member of the board who has served for a period of ten years, and is, on completion of such period, of the age of sixty years or over, may be granted an annuity equal to one-half of the annual salary of such member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Several members of the committee have already voiced their opinions in regard to this measure, and I wish to add my protest to the passing of the resolution. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that this resolution should be brought in at this time. It was only a few months ago that parliament decided what was to be paid the different members of the board. We have waited nearly three years to get the tariff board established, and these three years have been years in which a tariff board, if it was to be of service at all, should have been functioning. The real work of a tariff board has been done. Before the government undertook to revise the tariff in the drastic manner it has, it would have been well advised to have had a board of competent persons to give advice not only with regard to our own domestic tariff but also with respect to questions such as those which arose at the recent conference of the governments of the British Empire. The government would have been well advised if they had had a tariff board to which they might have referred, for consideration and information, many matters that came up at that conference, and with regard to which they should have been advised before acting so hastily.

So far as one can see at the moment, the one purpose the tariff board is now intended to serve is in all matters referred to the board to keep the protectionist element in the tariff. The legislation is on trial; the board itself is on trial; the chairman of the board so to speak, is on trial. As yet, none of us knows how successful he may prove to be as the chairman of the tariff board. We do know that he has been on the bench for less than three years, and that in the exercise of his functions as a judge he appears to have given entire satisfaction; but how successful he may be as the chairman of a board concerned with commercial and industrial problems remains to be seen. Had the board been in existence for a few years, had there been opportunity to test its worth and the capacity of the chairman, then it seems to me the government might have been justified if necessary in asking parliament to grant some additional amount to the chairman, having regard to the services he was rendering. Up to the present, however, no services have been rendered; yet we are asked, on the very day on which we have been reducing the salaries of the judiciary, to give one member of the judiciary, who was among the junior members, a position which is incomparably beyond that which any of his former fellow members of the judiciary enjoy.

This morning it was decided that no matter how competent certain members of the bench might be, how considerable their service, they were to have their salaries reduced after they had reached a certain age, whether they were to carry on or not. They were to receive an annuity amounting to a stated sum. Their salaries and annuities, however, were not to be at all comparable to what the chairman of this board will receive. I understand that his salary is to be equivalent to that of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, and that after ten years of service he is then to receive an annuity of $7,500 which is practically equal to the salary he was enjoying as a judge of the superior court.

Mr. BENNETT: He was getting $9,000, and $1,000 from Ontario, which made $10,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank the Prime Minister for the correction. However, it would appear that this gentleman certainly is receiving in salary and annuity, consideration away beyond that which is being given to members of the judiciary generally.

I want to give a further reason for declining to support this resolution, which indeed I strongly oppose. I told the Prime Minister at the time the legislation was being introduced that the Liberal party could not undertake, if it came into office, to continue the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the tariff, and in so far as the tariff board is to be an agency to perpetuate the protective feature of the tariffs which have been put into force by the present government, we on this side must decline to be a party, either directly or indirectly, to anything of the sort. I say that much by way of a further reason for my being opposed to granting this very large salary to the chairman of the board.

May I give another reason. We were assured that the tariff board when appointed would comprise gentlemen whose names would commend themselves to the house as those of non-partisans—gentlemen who would be in every way acceptable. Well, the appointees, so far as one can judge at all, are all gentlemen who have been pretty faithful supporters of the Conservative party, including even one member who sat with the Progressive group in this house.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes; he has; I can give his record if my hon. friends want it. I do not think he ever supported, except when a decision of His Honour the Speaker was being challenged, a single motion that originated from this side of the house in opposition to the present government. We are now asked calmly to vote a salary of $15,000 per annum for ten years to the chairman of the board, and large salaries to the other members of the board, and then a pension for the rest of their lives at a sum equal to that of a judge of the superior court, notwithstanding the gentlemen who are on the board have been placed there for ten years by hon. gentlemen opposite and that they are all, from their point of view as expressed heretofore, politically opposed to the policies which we on this side have been supporting. That is asking a little too much of an opposition, or even of human nature, and we on this side cannot think of supporting the proposed resolution or any act based upon it.

It does seem extraordinary that after a great part of the time of the session has been taken up in reducing the salaries of civil servants, reducing the allowances of war veterans, reducing the indemnities paid to members of parliament, giving reasons why staffs must be cut down here and staffs cut down there, we have had within the last few days one man after another, especially persona grata to the Prime Minister and the government, being given salaries far exceeding those of the highest offices in the public service. Just at this time, that kind of thing does more to create unrest than any other single action of the government. Those who have had their salaries cut down, war veterans who are expected to take less in the way of pensions, those who are obliged to make additional payments on income tax account, taxpayers generally, are all to-day comparing their position with that of those few favoured gentlemen who at this time are receiving special treatment at the hands of the government. We ought to oppose very strongly such exceptional cases, especially where there are not grounds sufficient to support them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to support the leader of the opposition in his protest against what I must regard as discriminatory treatment. I believe in paying good wages and salaries; I believe government employees or those who receive government appointments should be properly taken care of, but during this session and, in fact, for the last few years we have had what has been termed a policy of economy and under that policy there has been a cutting down of salaries affecting especially the lower paid people. There has been no gradation in this matter, but we have had a ten per cent cut all along the line. This has meant a great deal of hardship. In addition, staffs have been cut and many people have been thrown out of work altogether. I think it was only yesterday that some of us were pleading that the rights of railway employees should be protected at this time; that they should not be turned out on the street. The government would not listen to our pleas and put through legislation that we thought was designed in the interest of the bondholders, without paying any regard whatever to the employees of the railways. We have recently had to pass measures which lay a very heavy tax upon the people of this country. When I think of families that to-day are struggling to maintain the very minimum of a decent living, it seems to me absolutely wrong that such high salaries should be paid to certain individuals in the service.

I am not at all sure that it was necessary to get a judge to act as chairman of the board, nor that legal training is the best for the man who occupies that position. I can understand that legal training may be very necessary for certain positions, but it remains to be seen whether it is a good training for men who are placed in what might be termed executive positions or those involving considerable independent research. I am inclined to think a scientific training would be much more desirable than a legal. There are many men who have had practical experience as well as academic training who, I am sure, would be very glad to accept this position at a lower figure than that which is being offered.

Of course there is the larger question of the wide spread in our salaries. I think we should be tending towards a greater equality instead of a still wider spread. The suggestion has been made that the gentleman who has been appointed to this high position not only has special qualifications, but is also doing this as a matter of duty. I would like to think, if that is the case, he might be prepared to do his duty without receiving such very high emoluments for so doing. There are people who are doing perhaps less responsible work but are none the less doing their duty, who are being paid a wage or salary that is lower than would enable them to maintain anything like a decent standard of living. When I think of those high salaries, I remember that they are possible simply because of the taxation which is levied on the great mass of the people and which falls most heavily on some of the poorer people of this country. As one who for many years has come into contact with the poor people of Canada, I must protest against this further extension of this principle which we are asked to make to-night. I do not think it is at all necessary. I do not think any good explanation has been given why so soon after the original act was passed there should be an increase in salary.

I know it is possible for the Prime Minister to say that only by giving very high salaries can he secure the best men. I do not think that can be very well proven. I know it has been said that only by providing very fully for pensions can men be induced to give up more secure jobs. I do not think that contention has been or can be proven. I repeat: It seems to me at this time, when through our taxation and otherwise people are being called upon to make great sacrifices, the example should be set by some of those who are occupying high positions in the service.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I feel I would be recreant to my duty if I did not protest against this resolution at this time. When the Tariff Board Act was passed, we understood that a salary of $12,000 was to be paid to the chairman of the board, and at that time it seemed to me and to people throughout the country that this was a pretty fair salary. Now we find that the intention is to increase it to $15,000, which is more than judges are paid in any of the courts of this country and equal to what the Prime Minister of Canada receives. I can see no justification for increasing the salary to that extent. It may, however, have been impossible to secure the proper man for the position without paying him a salary in advance of what he was formerly receiving. I believe the chairman of this commission is a man that will fulfil the duties of his office to the satisfaction of everybody. I believe he is worth being paid a fair salary, but it seems to me that when you raise that to $15,000 a year, you are going beyond what is reasonable. We have been going through times of great stress; men as efficient in their respective callings as the chairman of this board has been in his are working for very small salaries or remuneration and can see no particular hope for the future. The poor people of this country are again being penalized by heavy taxation at a time when the number of persons on relief has increased by hundreds of thousands, until to-day, I am told, it stands at 1,300,000. The government in order to try to balance its budget is imposing a tax of two cents a pound on sugar and a sales tax on the necessaries of life, such as oatmeal, rolled oats, cornmeal, pot barley, rice, molasses, corn syrup, shovels, spades, sleighs, and doubling the sales tax on boots and shoes. Thousands of people in Canada are unable to pay the taxes on their homes. In view of these circumstances it does seem to me that at this time salaries should be held down.

My chief objection to this resolution, however, is to the proposal in the last part of it for the payment of annuities after ten years' service. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we have come to the time in the history of this country when we should cut out these annuities altogether unless they are granted on the basis of contributions made by the recipients while in office. The civil servants, I understand, have to contribute a certain percentage of their salary in order to be granted an annuity, and I do not see why the same principle cannot be carried out in the case of these higher officers. Conditions in this country are most serious and it is impossible for us to pay annuities on terms such as this resolution calls for when it must be done at the expense of the ordinary working man through imposing taxes on the things he consumes, such as sugar and boots and shoes, and so forth. I can see no justification for the last part of the resolution at all. The men who are appointed to this board from the chairman down are bettering their position through their appointment, and if they are not able to provide for their future through the greater salary they are receiving, I do not believe it is the duty of the poor people of Canada, the consumers, the farmers, and working classes, to provide for their future in addition to giving them this substantial remuneration during their first ten years of office. On behalf of the constituents I represent I protest as strongly as I can against the whole spirit of the resolution before the committee.

Mr. REID: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is high time that the people of this country took stock of what is being done here and took serious note of the high salaries and remuneration that are being handed out just like a free gift to many of our—yes—public employees. It may interest the house to know that since the present administration came into power under the present Prime Minister numerous increases have been given to certain high officials, increases which have only been obtained by other employees in the civil service after many years of faithful service. I have before me a list of some of the increases that have been put into effect, I am told, under the Prime Minister. Some of them are very striking, and I will say almost alarming.

I find that the salary of Major General A. D. McNaughton, chief of the general staff, has been increased from $8,000 to $10,000. He receives the salary of a deputy minister. The Deputy Minister of National Defence, Colonel LaFleche, appointed recently, gets another $10,000. The man who was superannuated to make room for Colonel LaFleche got $10,000 only after being in the service since 1879. Some of these new appointees are being given the same salary as those who are now being superannuated after years of faithful service to their country. Mr. Breadner, commissioner of customs, got one-third of the previous salary of the deputy minister, two other men being appointed, one as commissioner of excise and another as commissioner of income tax. The deputy got $10,000 after many years' service. Mr. Breadner was given $10,000 as commissioner of customs, and now he has received an increase of $2,000.

I go right down the list and I find the most striking example in the Department of the Interior, where a man sixty-five years of age was superannuated, I am told, at $5,000 or $6,000, and another man who was away down in the civil service list was raised to the post of deputy minister at a salary of $8,000, and this new appointee I am told is seventy-two years of age. That to me requires a lot of explaining. That position is now costing the people of this country $14,000 because the man who was superannuated gets $6,000 or $7,000, and the man who was appointed in his place gets $8,000.

Commissioner Starnes of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police after forty years' service gets $6,450. Major General MacBrien who took his place gets $12,000 right off, and this in a time of stress when every government is preaching economy, and when this government is giving notice to every provincial government to cut down on its expenditures and to economize and to keep within its budget.

I listened very attentively to the Prime Minister's explanation this afternoon of this increase, and candidly I was not at all impressed by his explanation. My own interpretation as to the reason of the increase of salary is this, and I give it for what it is worth: that Judge Sedgewick was pretty well satisfied with his $12,000 until he saw the other two appointees who were getting $10,000, and after seeing them he said to himself: "Well. if these two men are worth $10,000 each per year I certainly am worth at least $15,000." I may be wrong but that is my own plain interpretation of this resolution. I know that there are members on the other side of the house who have gone about this country saying that God has appointed the Prime Minister in this time of crisis, but I also know that in the Scriptures we read of great trials and tribulations that are going to be sent in the latter days, and perhaps the Prime Minister is one of these.

The most serious thing in this whole proposal is the superannuation or annuity that it is proposed to give. By what right should any man after holding a good job at a good salary for a few years burden the people of this country with providing him with a life pension? Take even the ordinary members of that board. After five years' service they may get one-fifth, and after ten years' service one-quarter, of their salary. I say that this thing ought to stop. These life pensions should be cut out. I think also the whole system of higher salaries for the higher officials in the government service should be carefully reviewed. Personally I am absolutely opposed to handing out a pension for a few years' service to anyone who has the gift of a good position. I feel sure if applications had been called for these positions so many would have been received that it would have been a great task even to read them. Applications would have come readily from men of ability who would have been willing to take the job, not only as chairman but as members of the board at the amount received as indemnity by members of parliament. But the fact that he is given a pension for life, after having been given the gift of a job, is atrocious. It is just about time this sort of thing was stopped. Personally I am absolutely opposed to it. There are instances where the country in recognition of long and faithful service has given a gratuity or life pension. But where a man has been given a good job with a pension provision, under which he will receive one-fifth of his annual salary if he retires after a period of five years, I must express my indignation, especially when the burden falls upon the people of Canada, the majority of whom are not able at the present time to obtain the necessities of life. Personally I am opposed to the increase.

Mr. BROWN: I shall state very briefly my objection to this resolution. The arguments against it have already been well stated by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) and New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I believe it my duty, however, to register a protest on behalf of my constituents. I believe I am not presumptuous when I say that in speaking for my constituents I voice the sentiments of all people of Manitoba, even if hon. members representing Manitoba constituencies do not feel called upon to speak upon this occasion.

So far as I am concerned there is no reason to doubt the ability of the man who has been chosen as chairman of the board. Some of us had the privilege, the honour or whatever you may call it, of meeting the board a few days ago. We came away with the impression that the chairman of the board was a man well qualified to fill the position. It was the first opportunity we had had to estimate his ability. That is not true of some other members of the board with whom we had been associated for a number of years and with whose ability and capacity we were familiar. I say we have no reason to doubt the ability of the man who will discharge the functions of the office of chairman. But he would have occupied a higher position in the opinion of the people of Canada had he not, before entering upon the duties of his office, demanded this additional salary. We take it—and if I am wrong I shall gladly accept correction, so that we may know where the responsibility lies—that he refused to accept the office unless the salary was increased.

Some years ago we used to talk about conscripting men for service. Sometimes we hear the term to-day, and we like to see men willing to serve their country. The chairman of this board would have stood much higher in the estimation of the Canadian people if he had been willing to serve without demanding the extra remuneration. There is no need of repeating the arguments which have been advanced—the difficulties of the times, the hardships which men are enduring, the tremendous loss suffered by the farmers, labouring classes, many of the smaller business men, and even larger business men. All these have suffered during the past few years. There is no necessity of recounting these facts; at such a time as this an increase of salary is simply without any justification whatever. I am amazed at the Prime Minister doing it, if he has any consideration even for the future welfare of his own party. In 1926 it was said that the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen had not given his followers in the prairies a feather to fly with. I assure the Prime Minister and all members of the cabinet that this is just one of the many millstones that he has hung around the necks of his followers in the west.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in protest against the resolution. I am amazed, as is the hon. member for Lisgar, at the Prime Minister in such days as these bringing in the resolution we have before us. I shall be further amazed if his followers support him. If they support him in this measure I cannot understand how they can justify their position in their constituencies when they return home, in view of the position they have taken in regard to other economies which have been made during this and the last sessions.

When we were discussing the ten per cent decrease in civil service salaries I drew to the attention of the Minister of Finance the circumstances of a case in my own city where a man with a wife and child was working two and a half hours a day at forty cents an hour. On that dollar a day, which made him ineligible for relief, he was suffering a ten per cent salary reduction. I asked if situations of that kind could not be obviated, but received no response. Such reductions still go on. I am not opposed to high salaries, but in these days if we are going to increase salaries or wages we should begin by increasing the wages of those who are at the bottom. We should not increase first the salaries of those at the top.

When in 1931 provision was made for a tariff board the salaries of the chairman and the other two members of the board were stated. I presume at that time the Prime Minister felt that $12,000 a year would be sufficient remuneration to obtain the best talent possible. During the last two years the trend of salaries has not been upwards; it has been the reverse. We have been told how the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway have slashed the salaries of their officials. To come at this time and ask for an increase in salary, presumably because the chairman of the tariff board has asked for it, is not fair. If anything would seem to indicate his unfitness for such a high position, it would be that he should come at this time when according to our government the country is in such distress, and ask for still further remuneration, especially when the salary for which provision had already been made gave him a very fat living, compared with that of the great majority of people in Canada.

A few days ago when the social workers of this dominion were in convention one of the delegates who is in close touch with conditions in the country stated that to-day in Canada 1,600,000 people are on relief. What does that mean? It means that 1,600,000 people, and many more, are on rations, just as if we were under a state of siege. Why should a few people live on the fat of the land while probably fifty per cent of the community are living on rations such as would be handed out in time of famine. Before we begin increasing the salaries of those who are already getting salaries sufficiently high, or too high, I ask that we begin raising the remuneration of those who do not now receive enough to keep body and soul together. Some little time ago I came across an article written by a Canadian woman, the mother of seven children. It appeared in the April issue of Chatelaine, and was so compelling an article that I took pains to find the author, although it had been published anonymously in the magazine. I found the lady in the province of Nova Scotia. I should like to give a few words from her article by way of indicating the conditions under which she and her family have to live at this time. She says:

> I am a Canadian mother.
> The most noble calling in the world is mine.
> I am a Canadian mother and my country honours me. At banquets I am reverently toasted by Canada's noble sons.
>
> When depression comes, my country rushes to the rescue. But when the S.O.S. goes out, do Canadians cry "Mothers and babies first"?
>
> I am provided with groceries. No milk.

A family of seven children, and provided with no milk!

> We are allowed no butter at all, no meat but fat pork for beans. I copy from our bill: 1½ bags flour, 3 pounds shortening, 1 pound tea, 10 pounds sugar, 1 gallon molasses, 10 pounds beans, 4 pounds pork, 6 pounds broken codfish, 10 pounds rolled oats, 2 boxes yeast cakes. This is the allowance for the family of seven for one month.

I would like to bring this woman and her family face to face with a man who is already getting $12,000 a year and ask him if he is justified in requesting another $3,000 a year while this woman with her family has to live under such conditions. I would ask hon. members opposite, how are they going to face their constituents who are on relief and justify to them this increase?

Then we come to the matter of superannuation and retiring allowance. I am in favour of retiring allowances and superannuation for every one, not only a few people who are already getting high wages and are able to take care of themselves. May I ask hon. members opposite, is not the tendency here to work in the opposite direction to need? This is a certain sort of paternalism, which manifests itself in the providing of pensions and retiring allowances for persons receiving high salaries. It would be different if we were asking it for other members of the civil service. Remember that during the last two years the annual increase in salaries and wages of the civil service staff, something that was justly coming to them, has been discontinued, so that they have not only received the ten per cent reduction but in addition have suffered the loss of their annual increase. I protest against the passing of this resolution at this time.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I will only say a word or two. I could not but notice the contrast between the proceedings yesterday in this house and those of the present sitting. To-day a great part of our time has been taken up with the question of pensions and superannuation for people who least require it. In the motion we are now discussing it is proposed in respect of persons receiving $10,000 and $15,000 a year that after they have been in the service of the government for ten years they shall be entitled to half their salary as a retiring allowance. In other words the $10,000 a year members of this commission will receive after ten years, if they are over sixty years of age, a retiring allowance of $5,000 a year, and the chairman of the board after he has served ten years and is over sixty will be entitled to a retiring allowance of $7,500 a year.

First of all I object to the increase at this time in the salaries of these highly paid officials. Again I must contrast to-day's proceedings with what took place yesterday when we were discussing the railway bill. During that discussion mention was made of the salaries paid to officials of the Canadian National Railways, and the Minister of Railways took a certain amount of credit for the large reductions made in the salaries of many of those officials, making reference to the fact that in some cases those reductions were as high as forty per cent.

Mr. MANION: Many of them are still getting higher salaries than this.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, I am speaking of the principle, not of particular cases. In this case the government, instead of proceeding consistently with the actions of which they were so proud yesterday, ask us to provide a salary for the chairman of the board twenty-five per cent in excess of what was proposed just a few months ago. When the government practises economy at the expense of even the lowest paid employees, it is a very poor time to ask parliament to grant a twenty-five per cent increase in the salary of a highly paid official of the government service. I remember very well just a few weeks ago when we were discussing civil service salaries it was said that even the charwomen ought to be proud to make some contribution to the state in its hour of difficulty. But here a highly paid officer, who in addition to his salary is promised a very large retiring allowance, instead of being proud to make a contribution in this hour of financial crisis asks a twenty-five per cent increase in the salary originally proposed. What a contrast! As the hon. member for Acadia just says, he does not happen to be a charwoman so he does not have to make the sacrifice.

In connection with pensions or retiring allowances to railway men who perhaps as a result of the legislation passed yesterday will in the very near future find themselves without employment, we were told yesterday by the Minister of Railways that he objected to providing retiring allowances for them because it would be a form of class legislation. Yet lo and behold! within twenty-four hours of that legislation being passed we are asked to provide retiring allowances for judges. I suppose this will be called not class legislation but an act of statesmanship. At this time when salaries are being slashed, when municipalities find it most difficult to provide even the bare necessities of life to the men and women who are unemployed, it will be impossible to justify before our constituents this action on the part of the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to make a few observations on this question. Every other hon. member has approached the problem in an attitude of amazement. To-day we have been discussing salaries of judges; we are now discussing the salary of a judge who is to be chairman of this new tariff board. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not amazed. We have seen many leading members of the legal profession doing a good turn for their own fraternity. I am not finding great fault with that. That reflects I suppose a human characteristic in them. But I think the government must agree with this side of the house that when the labour members fought so strenuously to have some provision made for the railway men, there was a great deal of merit in their contention. This government has practised economy with religious zeal. I have always held the opinion that the present state of agriculture and industry, its make-up, its driving force, is absolutely in opposition to the economy practised by the government of this day. Someone suggested that many applications would have been received if this position had been advertised. I believe there would have been a queue reaching from Ottawa to Vancouver on the one side and from Ottawa to Halifax on the other if that had been done. It is passing strange that when the governments of this country are taking $5 from the pensions of the old people who happen to be living together in the sunset of their lives, they would ask for legislation that has for its purpose an increase of 25 per cent in the salary received by the chairman of a board who already receives $12,000 a year. Let us not forget also that one of the members of this tariff board will be a comparatively young man when he will be entitled to retire on a pension of $5,000 a year.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the past and anticipated future policy of the government nothing can be said in favour of this measure. I am not so sure—and I am not casting any reflection upon the chairman of the board—that it would not have been better if some able economist had been appointed to head this tariff board, but that is beside the point. I just want to register my protest with regard to a policy that I consider absolutely wrong in principle, particularly in view of the practice of the government with regard to many other employees in the civil service, and indirectly with regard to the old age pensioners of this country. This granting of increases to people who could well do without them seems to be a studied policy of the government, but I believe we are passing through a time when these high salaries are neither necessary nor sound in the industrial, commercial and governmental life of this dominion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think there is any need to administer any more of these pin pricks to the Prime Minister; they just seem to put him to sleep. He seems to be saying to himself, "Well, I wish to glory these fellows would quit yapping or do it a little more quietly so I could really sleep." For myself I am really speechless. Ever since the Prime Minister made that outrageous appointment to Washington, which savoured so strongly of the family compact of a hundred years ago, this government has been going from bad to worse in these appointments, and from there to Milton Campbell.

I see the Prime Minister is awake now. If I tried my best to devise a method to turn out communists, bolshevists, reds and all those people whom we do not desire, I could not do better than the government has done. Look at that rearguard bunch of dummies, taking it all; not one of them has approved of it. I will bet that they wish they could rear into it just as I am trying to do. I imagine some of them would give a hundred dollars if they could have ten minutes at their leader. I would not give that much, because I can have it without paying the hundred dollars.

I have no language with which to express my disappointment in the course being pursued by the Prime Minister. We are asked to vote fifteen thousand plunks for a man who has not been on the job long enough to warm the saddle; already he wants an increase of $3,000. I think he should get a hoist from the toe of somebody's boot rather than this sort of hoist in salary. Milton Campbell! Well, I shall not say anything about him; his chief qualification was that he was a political dancing dervish, pretending to be a Progressive when everyone knew he was a hidebound Tory all the time. The people out in the country well know that Milton Campbell has sold himself, and that is the end of the "Progs" out there.

I have been wondering what to say. I obtained a big brown envelope, and into it I slipped a couple of these order papers, and I addressed the envelope to the central Liberal committee in the constituency of Kinistino. I think I will send a few more to the constituency of Mackenzie, just to see what the boys up there think of it. I may have to buy those order papers; to-morrow I may have to put up five cents each for them, but perhaps I will buy a dozen more just so the people in the west may know what has been going on in salary boosting on the hill.

I wonder if the Prime Minister has no shame. To what extent is he going in coughing up these great big salaries to men who are just starting on the job. Milton Campbell! Well, will some person support me? I will need some support soon; I can hardly stand up. That is not all; after these people have been ten years on the job they will get life pensions of $5,000 a year. If for the next ten years the members of this board pursue the policy that has been followed in the past by this government I do not believe they will stay in their positions very long, and there will be no question of pensions involved at all. We hope it will not be too long hence until we get another government, before everything goes to the bow-wows. We heard of some General McNaughton and General MacBrien or O'Brien or some such name, another of these big mugwumps with the big salaries who was given an increase recently. Out on the farm we have to work hard; my own wife has to work from five o'clock fast time until God knows what time at night. She does not get a look in at this sort of thing and thousands and tens of thousands of other farmers' wives have to work long hours to help to pay these mighty big salaries.

Mr. SPENCE: You should be there helping her.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do you think I am going to sit here in silence and see the taxes of this country—and like other people we have to put up our share of those taxes—being shovelled into the capacious maws of the friends of the Prime Minister? No, I am not going to keep silent. I was trying—and I thought I had succeeded in doing so—to cultivate a better relationship and a better feeling towards the Prime Minister. No one in this house admires his many abilities more than I do, but it is a pity those wonderful abilities cannot be devoted to better purposes. I would suggest that in future he should not be so almighty generous with other people's money, in regard to salaries. Why was it necessary to increase these salaries; were these gentlemen going on strike? I see even the chairman is hiding his face. No wonder; a cloud should come over the land and hide us all for shame. Now I forget what I was saying when the chairman covered his face, so I will have to start all over again. I had some notes here; I do not know what was on them, but I think this is far more serious than most of us realize at the moment. Fifteen thousand dollars for one year! Why, that looks like a fortune that would last the average farmer a lifetime. I do implore the Prime Minister in justice to himself to stop this kind of extravagance at this time. Wait for two or three years; wait for a few months; even wait until we have turned the corner a bit. We believe we are turning the corner but we shall never get it turned if the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance are going to be digging into the treasury in this manner. Does this mean that we are going to start all over again, after times have improved a little, and once more enter upon a rampage of borrowing and spending and spreeing? It looks like it and the Prime Minister of Canada is setting the example—he or his Minister of Finance or perhaps the whole lot of them.

I do not find any pleasure in making these observations, but I am so filled with indignation that for my own safety I have to say these things. I would ask the Prime Minister whether these gentlemen were really going on strike, whether they had refused to work for the salaries they were being paid. I understand that this matter was up yesterday; I did not know it. In fact, I have not yet recovered from the shock I received when I first saw it on the order paper two days ago. I think I have a right to get an answer to that question I have just asked the Prime Minister, because we all contribute to the taxes of the country more or less, some of us less and some of us more, and we have a right to know why this salary has been raised at this time so quickly after the appointment of these three gentlemen.

I met the three of them. There is nothing wrong with their looks, but we are not paying them for their appearance. I do not know whether they have held a meeting of the tariff board or not. Have they sent in their resignations, may I ask? Who has charge of them anyhow? The Minister of National Revenue perhaps can answer that. Is the board under my good friend? If I get no answer from that quarter I will address my remarks generally. Have they indicated that they cannot continue in the employ of the government unless they are given a considerable more than $12,000 for the chairman and $10,000 apiece for the other two? Someone is saying something. It may be a very profound observation but I do not catch it. At any rate I am entitled to know why this thing has been done in face of the conditions in the country, on the farm, in the factory and everywhere. How dare this government flout the people with these outrageous salaries at this time?

I have felt pretty hard sometimes towards the people who call themselves communists. What are they? People so inflamed with indignation that they will do anything. I am going to sit down before I begin to feel that way myself.

Mr. BENNETT: I have listened to the criticisms which have been made against this resolution, and it was not unexpected that they would be made; in fact, I should have been disappointed if they had not been made.

An hon. MEMBER: You aren't disappointed?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in the least. Whoever is responsible for government in these days has a twofold responsibility, and the discharge of those responsibilities is not pleasant, nor is it calculated to make one popular.

The right hon. the leader of the opposition a moment ago referred to this act as having been nearly three years on the statute books. That was a slip of the tongue; he meant two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said we had been waiting three years.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been on the statute books since August 3, 1931, and when it became apparent that there would be an imperial conference I ceased making any efforts towards filling the positions for the reason that I intended, as in fact I did suggest, that the board should be a tribunal to which the British manufacturer and others might go who sought reductions in our tariff structure. That provision was inserted in the trade agreements made with Great Britain, and this court—it is a court—will be discharging in reality international functions. It will be clothed with very great authority in the finding of facts upon which will be predicated the tariff policies of the country.

Those who have followed the trade agreements will recall that provision is made in these agreements for the basis of our tariff imposts. In my judgment it became therefore of the first importance that whoever were appointed as commissioners under that statute should be men of experience representing various schools of thought. The chairman stood in a different position. Those who represented the United Kingdom at the conference here last year all urged in the strongest possible terms that for the sake of this country and of the agreements themselves the chairman of the board should be as far as possible one possessed of judicial qualities. It has been said that it is doubtful whether a judge was necessary. In my opinion, having regard to the duties to be discharged, and the functions of the position, it was essential that one trained and skilled in weighing evidence and arriving at facts should be appointed. I think that opinion is pretty generally held by business men who have the interests of the country sincerely at heart. That being so, it then became important to ascertain where the chairman could be secured, and I will ask hon. gentlemen in this chamber to put it to themselves, from a study of the personnel of the bench and of the bar, as to where we could turn, if not to the bench itself, to secure such an appointee.

It has been said to-night, in no ill will, I take it, that Mr. Justice Sedgewick was a friend of mine. Unfortunately I was not privileged to know Mr. Justice Sedgewick beyond saying good day to him twice in my life. When he was appointed to the bench the Minister of Justice personally saw him twice before he could impress upon him the necessity, as a matter of public service, of taking a position on the judicial bench of the country. He yielded to that solicitation, although it meant a financial sacrifice and a very considerable one. I need hardly say that his appointment was received with great acclaim by the profession and by litigants alike, and that in the two years in which he discharged judicial duties he did so in a manner that satisfied all who came before him—members of the profession, his brethren on the bench, and litigants, whether in the bankruptcy court or elsewhere—that his was a first rate legal mind.

It is difficult in this country to induce professional men to realize that they should be prepared to make some contribution to the country's service. I suppose that in an old country tradition plays so large a part that the difficulty experienced in this country is there more or less unknown. I recall one leading member of the English bar who was in receipt of an income of £25,000 per annum, and when the Lord Chancellor sent for him and suggested that he should take his place upon the bench, he declined. On the second occasion that the Lord Chancellor sent for him he said: No refusal will be taken this time; we must all make our contribution to the state. This gentleman then took his position upon the bench with a lessening of his income by two-thirds and discharged his judicial duties with very great satisfaction alike to litigants and to the profession.

That tradition has not yet fastened itself upon the life of Canada. But there are, let me say, professional men who make enormous incomes in this young country. It was said that one of the leading members of the English bar at one time within the last fifteen years made an income of £70,000 per annum. It may strike some hon. members as strange when I say that there are in this country members of my profession who during the last ten years have made incomes in excess of $200,000. I need hardly remind the house that, as seen by the auditor general's report, the fees paid by the former administration, to a single individual for a service rendered with respect to a few cases, amounted to much more money by three times than the amount it is suggested should be paid to the chairman of this board I mention that merely because it is well known. I know one medical practitioner who made $80,000 in one year and some who have made larger incomes than that.

Under those circumstances Mr. Justice Sedgewick was asked by me to take this position I had not, as I say, seen him beyond saying good day to him and a casual shake of the hand at a bar association meeting but twice in my life. He asked for time to consider the matter and he took time to consider it. He then made it apparent that if he relinquished his position, which he had accepted reluctantly and as a matter of public service and which he was greatly enjoying, thus necessitating his leaving Toronto and the friends that he had made there during his professional lifetime, although his family, as is well known, are Nova Scotian by birth, this would mean a very great change in his whole habit and custom of living. After consultation with his friends—and I do not say that in a narrow sense, because he numbered among his friends many distinguished members of the Liberal as well as of the Conservative party—he felt that if he were to undertake this service, his salary should be the amount mentioned in this resolution, and I agreed. He has not struck nor asked for larger compensation by reason of his having been in the position for the time he has, but it will be observed that the resolution undertakes that his salary shall be that from the date of his appointment.

To express surprise and indignation may be the function of an opposition; I doubt not that it is, but I ask the house to consider just what is involved. Had we appointed a second or third rate man as chairman, we would never have heard the last of it; by so doing I could have escaped the necessity of coming to this house and asking that this resolution be adopted, and if anyone suggests that it is a pleasurable occupation for a man in my position in life to sit here and be attacked in the manner in which I have been to-night by hon. gentlemen opposite, notably by the hon. member who last spoke, he must have a strange idea of what constitutes enjoyment. But it is comprehensible that some person may be willing to render a little public service; that is possible, and when we asked Mr. Justice Sedgewick under those circumstances to accept this position, he said: If I am to accept this position with the insecurity that attaches to it in view of what has been said in the House of Commons, I think I am entitled to the compensation which is mentioned in that resolution, and I agreed; I believe he is if he discharges those duties in a manner worthy of the office which he holds. It is a great responsibility. He is in reality sitting as the arbiter between two governments, between the United Kingdom and Canada. He will hear evidence of expert witnesses from Great Britain and from this dominion. He will hear cases presented on behalf of those who seek to obtain access to our markets under more favourable conditions than now prevail, and the reasons given therefor. He must examine, analyze and sift testimony for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent the allegations made support the ends sought. All these things he must do, and if he is to discharge those duties with the judicial quality that characterizes one who is chairman of a board that commands the respect not only of Canadians but of those from other countries who come before this tribunal, then I say that he must be in a position where he is not going to be worried every day whether with to-morrow's sun he will be able to pay his grocer.

Someone has said that the chairman is on trial. Not only is that true, but there is on trial the whole ability of the Dominion of Canada to appoint at the head of a great board one who will command the respect and confidence not only of his own countrymen but of people from the United Kingdom who come here with their cases under the terms of the conference agreements. That must be considered. If we had appointed some partisan as chairman; if we had selected, as we might have done, someone from the ranks of those who support this party; if we had appointed one who might be described as a party hack, what then? What about the indignation of those who go before that tribunal? What would be thought in the United Kingdom and other countries of our ability to meet and discharge a great responsibility? When the railways and canals commission in England has to deal with a problem, you will find a great judge at the head of it. When they had the tariff commission, they had Sir Sydney Chapman, Sir George May and another gentleman whose name does not come to my mind at the moment. We have no such reservoir. When we have to go to the bench for the purpose of securing an appointment, we do not do so because they are judges as such, or because I happen to be a member of the legal profession, but because in the very nature of things we must endeavour to secure for the positions the best talent we can command, with the idea in mind that not only will Canadians be proud of the appointment, but that those from other lands who come before that tribunal will say: Here is a man who discharges his duty in a manner worthy of the great traditions that belong to those who sit in judgment upon matters affecting the interests of the country as a whole.

That was the idea in my mind, and actuated and governed entirely by that thought, I sought out Mr. Justice Sedgewick and asked him to accept this position. The terms upon which he was willing to accept it are those indicated in the resolution and for the reason that may be stated, namely, that he was already discharging a great public service. I may say that the resentment expressed by many members of the legal profession that he should be taken from his position, was widespread. If the committee were interested, I could give the names of members of the profession who said: You must not take this man from us; he is the most brilliant and the best qualified of the judges we have had for years on our bench in the trial division and in connection with bankruptcy. It is not a light or easy thing, may I say to my colleagues in the house, for one to tear up the roots of his home in a community, leave it and come to another city to establish his home. If it is thought the compensation is out of all proportion to the duties that will be performed, I can only say this: Having regard to the rewards that go to members of the legal profession Mr. Justice Sedgewick made a great sacrifice when he went upon the bench, and if my appreciation of the situation is correct, to leave that position and accept this meant sacrifice even although the compensation provided is larger than that which he previously received.

May I make just one or two other observations with respect to the matter? I knew that in time of stress and strain this house might not think this the most desirable thing to do; yet I say to my colleagues in this House of Commons that canvassing the situation in its entirety and looking over the field in every part of the dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific I know not where I could secure an appointee who would so fully measure up to my conception of the ability required to perform the tasks imposed upon him under the statute as the gentleman who has been selected. I do not believe that the Canadian people in the remote sections of the country will be led astray by the attacks that have been made, the specious appeals to sentiments so easily aroused in days of poverty and hardship, the attempt to raise class against class and man against man. Not since the first day of the record of civilization have all men been of equal capacity or equal ability to discharge obligations and duties and responsibilities, and down through all the ages the remuneration paid to men has sometimes been regarded as entirely out of keeping with the value of the services rendered. I know there are men in this house who think that the late president of the Canadian National Railways, who with all his emoluments of office received ten times this salary, was being paid too much, and yet the Pennsylvania railroad pays a much larger compensation than that to one man for the duties he discharges. And so with respect to other lines of railway in the United States, and so with respect to lines of railway in the United Kingdom. Great executive heads in this country also receive a sum to which $15,000 would in comparison seem a mere pittance.

This position is so much more important than any other that I do not believe you can appeal successfully to the prejudices of people even in the remotest part of this country by pointing out to them that the government should be condemned because it desires to put in this position the foremost man it can find to reflect credit on the Canadian people in the discharge of great obligations before an international tribunal.

Look at the fees you pay to a lawyer before an international commission, running up sometimes to amounts sufficient to pay the whole cost of this office for ten years. These are mere facts. Look at the auditor general's report and see the fees paid by governments, by this government, with respect to litigation which it did not initiate, fees it was bound to pay. I merely mention these things because I did not intend at any length to traverse the matter beyond saying that as the first minister charged with the responsibility of making this choice. I have no apology to make to my fellow countrymen or to any man for agreeing to the terms which Mr. Justice Sedgewick suggested if accepting the office meant tearing up the roots of his life in the community in which he lived. I believe that the sober, intelligent common sense of the Canadian people will commend any position taken by any prime minister who endeavours to see that the public service is worthily served by worthy public servants.

There has been dragged into this debate to-night a discussion with respect to General McNaughton, who is receiving $2,000 more than he was receiving. General McNaughton is receiving less than his predecessor received and less than his predecessors have received, and I should like to say this, that if we had not done that, we would have lost him. As to the capacity and the quality of General McNaughton, whom I did not know intimately at all until I came to this city as Prime Minister, a great English soldier said to me—not a Canadian soldier—"If this empire were involved in war to-morrow I know of no man I would sooner see at the head of affairs than your McNaughton." That is the conception that others have of a man who is now serving the state, and he is serving the state for a smaller sum than he could receive in at least two other quarters, but he loves the service in which he serves, and he is giving to this country in my judgment in the work that he is at present doing a service that is worthy of the amount that is being paid.

When you talk about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police I shall not to-night pay that tribute to General MacBrien which has been paid to him by those who know his work, from his sovereign down, those who know of his capacity, those who know of his training, those who recall the fact that he served in days long since past as a constable in the police near the city, part of which I have the honour to represent in this house; those who know his record as a field officer, his record as a general and as an administrator, his record and his capacity to earn a much larger sum than that which we are now paying him. I believe we have saved more money since he took over the duties of that office than he will ever receive in the entire sum that we shall pay to him during the term he serves. I know that his service does not commend itself to everyone. It is not expected it would. His job is to preserve law and order. His job is to put down anarchy. His job is to stamp out lawlessness, and there are many who do not like that.

A further attack was made upon the commissioner of customs. I wonder if it is known that the commissioner of customs in this country has really been working for a mere pittance. He has been entitled for years to a superannuation allowance. He serves the state for a few thousand dollars per annum; he was promised an addition to his salary of $2,000, which he had a right to receive, and which makes the sum total for the service he is performing $12,000. He retired from the service; he was brought back by Sir Thomas White again to serve the state; he was promised a larger sum, and that in part has been paid.

But I want to go a step further. When the right hon. gentleman appointed a commission, a very proper thing to do, to inquire into the salaries to be paid to what are called the technical officers of this country, it will be recalled that recommendations were made that the salaries should be increased because they were out of all proportion to what might be received if these same men were working for private enterprise and not serving the state. If my memory serves me aright it was pointed out by the right hon. gentleman then leading the government that it was desirable in every way for this dominion to endeavour to secure the services of men who would be sought by private undertakings, and that we should be able to secure just as faithful service to the state as would be rendered by these same men if they served private enterprise. In many instances that has been the case, and I trust that it will continue to be so. I know a great many men serving the state faithfully in these times who by reason of their very qualities could be receiving larger compensation if they served private enterprise where their great talents and abilities would find larger scope and greater opportunities for expression. I mention that because it seems to me I should fairly state what actuated the government in arriving at the conclusion which it reached to accept the suggestion that was made, and which I agreed to at once, as to Mr. Justice Sedgewick.

One thing more. The attack that has been made against Mr. Milton Campbell I am not going to traverse beyond saying this. In the Parliamentary Companion issued after the last general election, Mr. Milton Campbell describes himself as a Progressive, previously Liberal.

Mr. YOUNG: He has a good opinion of himself.

Mr. BENNETT: That is how he described himself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is camouflage.

Mr. BENNETT: I have in my hands the journals for 1931 and for 1930. Some hon. members surely will remember that he voted against the government when the motion was made on the first occasion this session for the speaker to leave the chair. And five days before he was appointed he had no idea in the world he was to be approached for that purpose. I think he knows perfectly well he was not the first choice. But because of being unable to secure the gentleman whom we sought to secure, Mr. Campbell, as a western man, was asked to accept the office, and he did. I still believe he is at least not a Conservative, whatever else may be said about him, and that he is not a supporter of this government. His criticisms of this government you will find upon the records of Hansard.

As far as the younger man, the gentleman from Quebec, is concerned, you have there an illustration of what I consider to be the duty of governments with respect to the public service. The government could do one of two things. It could select an old and tried supporter, one who, in the language of the right hon. gentleman, was thoroughly imbued with the doctrine of protection, or it could take a young man on the threshold of life, who has been educated in the universities of this country and of Great Britain, who speaks with equal fluency both the official languages of Canada, and who in his father's organization has had practical business experience. We selected a young man with this training, because it is my firm belief that under those circumstances you will get the best service for the state.

That is about all I have to say to the committee as to the factors that influenced us in the appointments that were made. But may I add that the right hon. gentleman made another mistake when he suggested that these commissioners are to receive pensions equal to those paid to judges. It will be remembered that in the statute the salary of the chairman is placed at $12,000 and those of the remaining commissioners at $10,000. After serving ten years they might receive one-quarter of their salary as pensions, and after serving at least five years twenty per cent; that is all. As the right hon. gentleman has said, the language of the resolution is general. With respect to the chairman I propose to add after the word "sixty" the word "four" so that it can apply only to the chairman, and to no one else. He is now fifty-five years of age; ten years from the sixth of February last he will be sixty-five. Instead of providing that he should be sixty or over, the resolution will provide that he should attain the age of sixty-four, and the provision will apply to him and to no one else.

I have spoken longer than I had intended. I repeat that I have neither apologies to make nor regrets to express in regard to this matter. The necessities of cases make it incumbent upon me frequently to make decisions which, quite properly, are subject to criticism. But the position taken in this case is I believe the only one which could properly be taken having regard to the interests of the state, having regard to the importance of the issues to be dealt with and the necessity of providing as chairman of this board one who would reflect credit upon Canada both at home and abroad amongst those peoples with whom we have made trade agreements. We must have confidence in his capacity, his integrity, his broad view and his ability to grapple with the problems presented to him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is satisfying at least to have been able to awaken the right hon. gentleman from his slumber of a few minutes ago. I do not pretend to be a stickler on ethics in parliament or anywhere else, but when various members had each spoken about a half an hour, while the Prime Minister lolled over as if he did not give a continental who we were or what we were or what we were saying, I thought it was just about time someone gave him a good poke in the eye so as at least to get him up. The right hon. gentleman is an expert at explaining; I admire him from the bottom of my heart. I take my hat off to him. If there is anybody on this earth who can make black appear white and white no colour at all, it is the right hon. gentleman. Now we know just about what his estimate of a proper public man for public service would be,—that is Milton Campbell, because he says himself he was a Progressive and formerly a Liberal. Saying things does not make them so. Recording them in that book, whatever it is, does not make them so. Milton Campbell was known to many of us in the west. I think he did vote for a provincial Liberal once, but that does not make a man a Liberal. I do not think the Prime Minister would have referred to Hansard if he had looked it up himself and had seen just what was Mr. Campbell's record since this government came into power. We also have been looking them up, and we find that he has not voted very often for this side of the house, especially when something could be gained by not doing so. The fact that he drew in what he threw his bait, hook and line after, shows where he stood. To say that he is a Liberal in the face of what has happened is pure nonsense. What are the farmers saying about him? That he sold them out. That is what they say. I detected in the Prime Minister's remarks that he resented our—what he called—attacks upon him.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does he think we are taking any pleasure out of this performance now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know where the laugh comes in. Part of the performance was put on by the Prime Minister himself. I do not take any pleasure out of it, but I am not going to sit here and see these outrageous salaries paid when there are people who are out at the elbows and down at the heels throughout Canada, especially in agriculture, lumbering and the other industries. Why could he not have saved us this humiliation? Could he not have waited a little while before doing this thing? The very fact that these three gentlemen are exacting this money at this time shows that they are not fit for their jobs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, it does. They have not the decency or sensitiveness of a hollow-backed ox or they would not have demanded more money at this time. I say it; I say it again, and I will say it as many times as I like, because it is true. What about the clergymen and school teachers throughout this country, many of them living on miserable, measly salaries paid by people so poverty stricken that they cannot afford to pay more?

An hon. MEMBER: No salaries at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We want someone on the tariff board who will not be worrying about his grocery bill the Prime Minister says. Fifteen thousand plunks, and worrying about the grocery bills! If some people had one-twentieth of that they would be well satisfied and thought well off. I am sorry that we will have to change our views with regard to the Prime Minister's conception of public duty. Just think of the grab there will be throughout the country if a man knows that all he has to do is to put in a claim that with a salary of $12,000 his grocery bill is worrying him, and that he wants another $3,000. They will be rushing in from all points of the compass. Why not? I am amazed at the reasoning of the Prime Minister. My right hon. friend is mistaken if he thinks that this country is not shocked at this shovelling out of money when the treasury is so depleted and it is so hard to get it replenished from the taxes. I might as well not try to express my feelings because I cannot express myself to-night as I would like. It is the way of the evil doer always; if anyone criticizes or objects, the answer is: "Oh, you are making a commotion; they will hear you; someone will be alarmed!" Who is the author of the commotion but the government which pays out these salaries? The government could easily have let a year go by before taking this action; in all conscience that is what should have been done, and then later on when things were getting better they could have done something for them, poor boys! I do not know Judge Sedgewick; he may be a world beater, but as for Milton Campbell—

An hon. MEMBER: You used to like him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The best evidence that this whole house is shocked beyond description is the fact that the hon. member for Marquette is not endeavouring to babble his support of the Prime Minister. Even he has not got up. It is the greatest tribute that the supporters of the government have paid to themselves that they sit there in silence. They cannot do otherwise if they are to be honest with themselves.

Mr. McPHEE: As a former political neighbour of Milton Campbell, former member for Mackenzie, I think I should correct an impression which may have been created in the minds of the members of the house this evening by the Prime Minister. He glories in the fact that Mr. Campbell was formerly a Liberal. If my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will look along his front line he will find his Minister of Railways and his deskmate the Minister of Justice who were formerly Liberals, which does not make them any worse or any better Tories. As far as Mr. Campbell is concerned I have lived in the district adjoining his for twenty years. On the 25th of May, 1915, I received the Liberal nomination for the Mackenzie seat which Mr. Campbell represented until recently. Mr. Campbell was then an anti-Liberal; and he never voted for or supported the Liberal party from that day to the present time.

If there is any doubt about it let Mr. Campbell answer for himself. I have here a letter written by Mr. Campbell on November 21, 1928 to a gentleman in Winnipeg—I will not mention the party's name. This is written on House of Commons stationery and is signed by Mr. Campbell:

> Regarding our conversation over the telephone last night, I have submitted the newspaper you gave me to one of my Alberta colleagues; he is looking into the matter and will advise me in due course. If these allegations are correct and we have financial and industrial sabotage in connection with the development of our natural resources, it is high time that the general public knew something about it.
> I am prepared to start something along this line just as soon as I am in possession of sufficient facts. There is an angle to the situation I would like to point out, however, I understand that Mr. Bennett is heavily interested in the oil business, presumably through the ..... company. The men associated with you are prominent Conservatives and although I am not a member of that party myself, I must confess that as between the two old political parties my sympathies are with the Conservatives. If our suspicions regarding the holding up of Alberta and Saskatchewan oil development by the ..... company are correct and if Mr. Bennett is a heavy shareholder in the latter company, any exposure of this nature would seriously affect the fortunes of the Conservative party.
>
> I would, therefore, suggest that the matter be discussed with Mr. Bennett before the question is given publicity. I expect to see you in the course of the next ten days.
>
> Yours respectfully,
> M. N. Campbell.

Mr. BENNETT: To whom is that directed?

Mr. McPHEE: A man by the name of Daugherty in Winnipeg.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Give him another thousand dollars for that.

Mr. McPHEE: This is the man that is held up as a Progressive-Liberal. Mr. Campbell was never a supporter of the Liberal party to my knowledge, and we disclaim any association or connection with him.

Mr. COTNAM: You used him!

Mr. McPHEE: As far as the resolution is concerned, on behalf of the constituency that I represent I must protest against it. In the first place the act by which the tariff board was created specified the salaries to be paid. These men knew when they accepted the positions what salaries they would receive. Now we have this government banking on an impossibility becoming a possibility—that they will be in power ten years from now—and granting to these men a bonus equal to fifty per cent of their salary. I protest against this on behalf of my constituents. I am satisfied that the people of western Canada at least, when they get the opportunity, will place upon it the indelible stamp of public disapproval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, if the Prime Minister had been seeking to defend giving to the chairman of the tariff board a salary comparable to that which is given to a judge of a superior court or to a minister of the crown I would have had a good deal of sympathy with what he might have said as to such an amount being appropriate, and also as to the difficulty there sometimes is in obtaining suitable persons for these positions. But all that the Prime Minister has said to-night would be equally applicable with regard to what might be necessary to secure members of the legal profession to take an appointment on the bench, and particularly an appointment on the supreme court bench. The Prime Minister has spoken of the privation involved in having to tear up one's roots as grounded in one community when one comes to live in another. Gentlemen who come to Ottawa to take positions in the Supreme Court of Canada have for the most part done that in the past and will have to do it in the future, and those gentlemen, with the exception of the chief justice, receive a salary $3,000 less than is now proposed to be given to the chairman of this board. I venture to say that the qualities and qualifications of members of the Supreme Court of Canada are equal in every particular to what is required of one who is to be chairman of the tariff board.

The Prime Minister said to whom should we look; in what direction should we look other than to the bench or the bar for one to fill a position of this kind? As a matter of fact, I think the Prime Minister himself looked in other directions, before he made from the bench or the bar the appointment he has made. I think his efforts were directed first to getting someone who had large experience in public life and who might commend himself particularly to those who come from the west as one familiar with the western point of view. Later on, I think he sought from among economists of at least one of the universities for someone to fill this position, and it was only after these gentlemen refused to accept the post—not because they did not care for the work, but I imagine because they were none too well pleased with the government policy on tariff matters and had not much confidence in the government itself—that the Prime Minister then began to look to the bench and bar. I do not believe, either, that he found the only individual on the bench or practising at the bar who was capable of filling that position, or who would not have filled it quite as well, and been glad to fill it, at a salary comparable to that which he would have received had he been appointed to the bench itself, or, if on the bench, received some slight additional honorarium. That is the exception we are taking at the present time. It is an exception not to paying even a large salary to one in a very responsible position, but to paying the chairman of the tariff board a salary $3,000 in excess of what is being paid to judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, $6,000 in excess of what is being paid to judges of the superior courts in the different provinces, and $5,000 in excess of what is being paid to ministers of the crown and those holding diplomatic posts as ministers. All these gentlemen are making sacrifices to some extent. I think the public service sacrifice argument is a little overstressed when it comes to receiving a salary of $10,000 and over and the emoluments that go with it. Perhaps the less that is said about sacrifices the better, under those circumstances, particularly when people in all walks of life are making very considerable sacrifices to the state to-day by way of the taxation that is being imposed upon them, among other reasons to help support positions such as these.

There is one point, however, in what the Prime Minister has said, to which I should like to take very strong exception. It indicates that so far as this position is concerned the Prime Minister himself takes a different view to-day from the view he took some time ago, when he was describing the functions of the tariff board. Certainly his present view as expressed to-night is one which will not be accepted for one moment by those of us who are on this side of the house. The Prime Minister says it is all important that this gentleman should be given this large salary because he has a high judicial office and because upon the exercise of that high judicial office and the manner in which it is discharged will be predicated the tariff policies of the country. Those were the words used "on which will be predicated the tariff policies of the country." I say, Mr. Chairman, that if it is to be the function and duty of the board to make reports on which will be predicated the tariff policies of this country, we should abolish the board altogether and not vote a dollar for any member of it. The tariff policies of this country will be predicated upon the will of the people as expressed at the polls and as given effect to by the party returned to power; they will not be predicated upon the report of any tariff board which may be appointed at this or any other time.

The Prime Minister said in addition this position was so important because the chairman of the board must decide on cases which may be brought before him by firms in the old country. I shall not go over the controversy we had with respect to the tariff board, but at present that is about what the functions of this board have become restricted to—to listen to those in the old country who have grievances rather than to listen to the grievances of consumers and those suffering from excessive tariffs in Canada. The board must make perfectly sure that those in the old country who have been promised something under the United Kingdom-Canada agreement will have some court to which they may appeal if they think the terms of that agreement are not being fully carried out. I do not think this parliament should be called upon to vote excessive salaries for purposes of that kind. I do say that what the Prime Minister has said to-night only tends to strengthen in my mind the conviction that we should make no change as between the present salary of the chairman of that board and what he is to receive hereafter.

There was another point to which I should refer. This United Kingdom-Canada agreement is to be in force for five years, assuming that it is carried through to the end of the period for which the agreement has been made. One year of the five has pretty well gone by, and already many changes have been made by the government. How much of the agreement will be left at the end of four years is problematical, I think. Why should we give a huge salary for ten years to a gentleman whose main function will be adjudicating on measures relating to an agreement that will last only four years? Then we are being asked to give him for the remainder of his life an annuity amounting to half his salary, or to $7,500 if this measure goes through. In the light of what has been said to-night I do not see why this should be done. Certainly at this time this house ought to show that it is determined to see that the salaries paid for these positions are kept somewhat in line with the salaries paid generally to the judiciary and to others in the public service, and when salaries are being reduced on all sides, that salaries already very high should not be increased.

Mr. MALCOLM: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I had a definite feeling with respect to appointments to the tariff board, but any feeling I had in favour of the board was absolutely dispelled by the remarks made this evening by the Prime Minister. The tariff board must exist for one of two purposes; it must be a fact finding body to give to the government the information which the government should have in order to decide on the tariff policies of the dominion, or it must be a body sufficiently well equipped to take that duty away from the government and decide on the tariff policies of the country itself. It must be for one of those two purposes. If, as the Prime Minister said, it is to decide great questions of policy I submit that a worse board could not possibly have been chosen.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister did not say that; I hope the hon. gentleman will take it back.

Mr. MALCOLM: If the Prime Minister did not make that statement I do not need to make any remarks relative thereto, but if the Prime Minister meant that this board was to decide on Canadian tariff policies I say again that a worse board could not have been chosen. To be of any value in deciding the policies of Canada the board should be composed of men having broad political experience, with some knowledge of the needs of the producer and of the consumer. I submit also that a worse board could not have been chosen as a fact finding body. If it is to be a fact finding body the man at the top, the chairman, need not be a judge; there is nothing to decide. Of course hearings must be held, but the man at the head of the board should be the most eminent economist in the Dominion, a man who can use our national statistics; compile figures from the evidence which will be heard, and submit to the government conclusive calculations showing exactly what will be the economic effect upon the general industrial fabric of this dominion of any specific tariff action. Judge Sedgewick is a gentleman for whom I have a very high regard. I do not object at all to the salaries of the members of the tariff board being substantial amounts; I am not now dealing with that point. However, certainly Judge Sedgewick's training has not been along the line of economics; his training has been in interpreting the statutes which are passed or amended by parliament from year to year. The duty of a judge is to determine whether or not a man is guilty of an offence under the laws of the country. The training of a judge is far different from that of a man who is required to compile statistics to submit conclusions to the government by whom the final judgment must be made.

Then, Mr. Chairman, if it is to be a fact finding body it does seem to me that industry in Canada has a perfect right to have someone on the board who knows the industrial condition of the country and who will be in a position intelligently to question British manufacturers when they come here to make their submissions as to why their products should be admitted to Canada at lower rates of duty. I think also that on the board there should be someone representing the purchasing public of Canada, whether it be from the standpoint of the importers or of the consumers.

So far as salaries are concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that at this time neither Campbell nor Hebert could get $5,000 a year from any private concern in Canada. I know nothing of young Hebert's qualifications; he may be the brightest young man in Canada. I know Milton Campbell only slightly; if he is a Conservative that does not hurt him, nor does it hurt him if he is a Liberal. It should be for their qualifications that this dominion is paying these men $10,000 a year each. I submit that from the standpoint of being economists, and ability in compiling information to assist the government to determine what its tariffs are to be, these are not the best men who could have been selected. I greatly resent at this time seeing $35,000 of the money of the taxpayers being paid annually to these men.

Motion agreed to on division and resolution read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 100, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Maloney in the chair.

Post Office—Outside Service—Salaries and allowances, $15,381,845.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $14,161,500.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowance to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, and payment of $205 to S. R. Kirk, $1,076,030.

Mr. POULIOT: I presume the Postmaster General has something to say.

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): Previous to discussing the estimates which I have the privilege of submitting to the house, I wish, as it was agreed at yesterday's sitting, to reply to certain questions and statements of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot).

The committee will agree that considering the hon. member's manner of presenting his case, it was preferable to wait, allow him to put his questions and establish the facts before furnishing the details requested.

I also intended, sir, to make a statement on the work accomplished by my department when the hon. member for Témiscouata rose to speak. This is not a reproach, it is simply a fact that I note. As I stated, last evening, the Postmaster General did not balance his budget by withdrawing revenues from the Excise branch, neither by reducing the salaries of employees. Seventy-five per cent of the Post Office revenue comes from city post offices and twenty-five per cent from rural post offices.

In cities, banks make use of excise stamps, while rural post offices sell excise stamps to accommodate the public.

Taking as a point of comparison, sir, the budget of 1932-33, I request the committee to authorize me to cut down the expenditure of my department, by $1,122,725, as follows: salaries and allowances, $438,155; post offices, a decrease of $1,000,420; superintendent offices, service of inspectors, $173,180; 10 per cent cut in salaries, $788,505; decrease in the transportation of mail, $528,500; divers, departmental expenditures, another decrease of $14,970. For the year ending March 31, 1933, compared with the year 1931-1932, we decreased the expenditure of the Post Office department by $4,281,100, as follows:

Reduction in salaries and allowances:
(a) General reduction of 10 per cent in the salaries of civil servants.		$1,799,507
(b) Decrease in the work performed owing to the postal traffic reduction..		658,250
		$2,457,757
Reduction in operation cost:
(a) Railways..	464,513
(b) Service by water..	8,693
(c) Service by air..	797,875
(d) Service by land..	272,502
		$1,543,583
Reductions of expenditure for material, bags, etc..		279,760
Total decrease..		$4,281,100

It is the third reduction we have made since I am at the head of this department.

The grand total of all reductions amounts to more than $7,000,000, and is as follows:

Reductions in the expenditure for a little over two years (since 1930)

Mail services—
By railway..	$1,784,118 63
By water..	240,952 37
By air..	1,220,652 04
By land..	927,365 56
Salaries:
Postmasters and staff..	2,049,743 45
Inspectors and staff..	79,520 45
Travelling clerks..	324,649 88
Travelling clerks (mileage). ..	141,294 51

Divers:
Postal stamps..	72,243 59
Travelling expenses..	20,737 14
Printing and stationery..	489,357 47
Scales, uniforms, telegrams, etc..	34,604 12

I think, sir, that this budget will be approved unanimously by the committee and particularly by my friends opposite who, again recently, advocated economy.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Do accounts balance?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In reply to the hon. member for Témiscouata, in connection with dismissals; I may state that I never dismissed 1,500, or 1,400 or 1,300 or even 1,200 postmasters as he contends and this can be verified at page 5124 of unrevised Hansard.

To summarize my statement, perhaps, it might be well that I place before the committee certain figures which will prove that I am not the axe-man proclaimed by a member of this house.

The facts are as follows: From 1896 to 1911, the Liberals dismissed 1,788 postmasters.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): For lack of education?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): These are facts. The hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) may put questions to me, if he wishes, but they must be to the point.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Was the reason a lack of education?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): A lack of education?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Why were these postmasters dismissed?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): For political partisanship. It was the reason given then. I wish to be fair: for bad administration and also, I think, to change the location of the post office, as at present.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That was in the course of 15 years.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): 17 years.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): 17 years.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There were 1,788 dismissals between 1896 and 1911. From 1922 to 1930...

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): To establish continuity, give us the number from 1911 to 1921.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am coming to it.

[Mr. Sauvé]

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Louis-Philippe Pelletier, who even dismissed the dead!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): From 1896 to 1911, there were 1,788 postmasters dismissed of whom 555 resided in Quebec and 383 in Ontario. From 1922 to 1930, the Liberals dismissed 1,147 postmasters, and the Conservatives, from 1930 up to this day, 770.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): There is a discrepancy in the number of years. The hon. Postmaster General would not successfully have passed a test in figures had the Chief Inspector Fortier been in charge of the test.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata intends to speak later on; let him allow me to make my statement. He will find that my replies are to the point.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is what we wish.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Under the Liberal regime, from 1922 to 1930, 396 postmasters were dismissed in Quebec; since 1930 to date there were 376 postmasters dismissed in Quebec.

My hon. friend from Témiscouata looked upon the Shelburne case as a crime. He may permit me to state to the committee that this incident took place over a year ago and that the Toronto Globe, of which he quoted an excerpt last night, congratulated the Postmaster General for having confirmed the appointment of Mr. James Hill Kennedy. Enough for this case.

The committee will admit that I am not the great evil-doer that the hon. member for Témiscouata seems to imagine or conceive.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I never made that statement. I said something else, but never that.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As to the French Canadian martyrs conceived in the mind of the hon. member, they will be found among those which he usually fabricates.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): This is too entangled to follow.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am not only alluding to the hon. member for Témiscouata, this applies also to other members.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Nobody was able to follow the hon. minister's argument.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Must I repeat it, these dismissals are made on complaints not from me but from fellow-citizens of the postmaster, or members—exactly as in the past—and when these complaints are verified by a commissioner, after an inquiry is held, or when reports are made against the administration or location of the post office.

They are carried out according to the regulations established long before my time under the régimes of both parties. The hon. member was wrong when he asserted, yesterday, that I had acted differently and had proved myself an enemy of the province of Quebec, because a larger number of postmasters in Quebec were dismissed. The hon. member for Témiscouata is well aware that it is, perhaps, an after election practice. I repeat it—I stated so last year—and, moreover that has been the practice in the past, under the régime which my hon. friend supported, and under the preceding régime.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What figures of mine are wrong?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon member may quote them, I shall reply to him.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri), (Translation): I put a question to the minister, a moment ago, namely, how many were dismissed from 1911 to 1921? I wish to have a general idea of the dismissals from 1896 to this date. You did not fill in that gap.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Also, the gap before the deluge.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have not the figures with me.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri), (Translation): Why did you quote the figures from 1896 to 1911, under the Laurier régime?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It was because I wished to establish a point of comparison. So as not to take up too much time, I did not wish to refer back to confederation.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri), (Translation): Are you aware that after 1911, the famous Bergeron inquiries were held which were responsible for the dismissal of postmasters from the Atlantic to the Pacific?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I closely followed the remarks of the hon. Postmaster General. I must congratulate him, his standard is certainly higher than that of the candidates examined by the Chief Inspector Fortier, because he figures in the millions. He is certainly better qualified to fill the position of postmaster than one who can only figure to one or two millions.

I regret that the hon. postmaster has not replied to the question I put to him yesterday, with reference to the Sully affair, We shall now travel to the beautiful Sully village, in Témiscouata. No doubt, sir, you will all be interested. I put an important question, yesterday, to the hon. Postmaster General and he did not think proper to reply to it. I requested him to dispel the dark clouds, illuminate our intelligence and furnish us with all indispensable information to help us understand the routine of his department. An inquiry was held against the ex-postmaster Mr. Plourde, on October 24, 1931, at Sully. A memo from the Postmaster General to the council, states that this postmaster was found guilty of political partisanship, and he therefore recommended his dismissal, on November 4, 1931. However, the order in council P.C. 1178, was only passed on May 18, 1932, many months later. Why was this postmaster suspended instead of being dismissed? We find the explanation in a letter written by the deputy minister, Mr. Gaboury to Mr. Foran, secretary of the Civil Service Commission, dated March 30, 1932.

> Referring to your communication of the 22nd of March regarding the postmastership at Sully, your file PO-34981, permit me to inform you that the dismissal of the postmaster at Sully has not yet been authorized by order in council and therefore, no action has yet been taken towards the permanent appointment.

(Translation): The reason, sir, the hon. Postmaster General suspended Mr. Plourde instead of dismissing him, was to avoid making a report to the Civil Service Commission, as the deputy minister's letter clearly shows. The Postmaster General cannot deny the fact, to-day. I am giving him proofs that I am better acquainted with his department than he is, because I put that question to him and he was unable to reply.

Let us refer to something else: the hon. Postmaster General wrote on July 4, 1932, to Mr. C. E. Dubé, who has charge of the conservative patronage in Rivière-du-Loup. This letter was quoted in Hansard, at page 4781. It contains the following:

> The act provides that the department is under the strict obligation to give preference to veterans of the great war.

This obligation existed previous to May 28, 1932, as it exists to-day. The Postmaster General disregarded the Act; he set it aside in the case of the Sully post office; he paid no more attention to this obligation than he did to the Act governing the Civil Service Commission.

I quoted yesterday, the letter from Mr Merriam, private secretary to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), to Mr. Jean, dated October 5, 1932. It may be found in Hansard, p. 5128. I have not the time to quote it again this evening.

Mr. Parker, secretary to the Minister of Pensions wrote to Mr. Jean on October 28, 1931:

This question comes under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department.

Telegram of Mr. Jean to the hon. Murray MacLaren, Minister of Pensions, on November 17, 1931—long before the appointment of Tardif as temporary postmaster:

The person in charge of patronage for the county of Témiscouata informs me that the post office at Sully will be transferred within three days. Will you be kind enough to see that my rights as a veteran are recognized and that I be appointed temporary postmaster while awaiting my permanent appointment.

The Minister of Pensions' reply to Mr. Jean, on the same day:

I desire to acknowledge receipt of your telegram of November 17, and shall bring your name to the attention of the Post Office Department.

Telegram of Mr. Jean to the Minister of Pensions, January 25, 1932:

Will you kindly see that my rights as a returned soldier are recognized in the appointment of a postmaster at Sully; Andrée Tardif was notified that there was a vacancy in the post office and to prepare himself for the position. I cannot understand why my rights are disregarded after all my entreaties with you and the Postmaster General.

Reply from the Minister of Pensions to Mr. Jean, on the same day:

I am passing your telegram on to the Post master General for his information.

(Translation) Then, even before Tardif was temporarily appointed, the Postmaster General had received the request of Jean, and furthermore, the Minister of Pensions as well as the deputy minister and himself had maintained that the question came under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. Moreover:

Ottawa, January 29, 1932.

Mr. Isidore Jean,
Sully, P.Q.
Dear Sir,—

Pursuant to my letter of January 25, in connection with the position of postmaster at Sully, the hon. Mr. Sauvé, Postmaster General, informs me that the vacancy will be advertised on the premises, shortly.

The hon. Postmaster General had promised the secretary of his colleague, the hon. Minister of Pensions, to advertise the position of postmaster at Sully, in the near future. Is that a fact or is it not?... I might just as well address myself to the calendar in front of me.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I would therefore advise you to submit your application to the Civil Service Commission, since the appointment of the postmaster will be made by the commission.

The calendar has an advantage over the hon. Postmaster General: the minister does not change, the calendar will change to-morrow.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Then the calendar is like the member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Yesterday, I was very patient with the hon. Postmaster General, I took pity on him, to-day, I note that he does not deserve my pity, and the crown of the calendar would seem very queer on his head.

. . . . since the appointment of postmaster at Sully will be made by the commission.

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) H. D. Parker,
Private Secretary.

Since September 28, 1931, Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General; Mr. E. J. Underwood, General Superintendent of Postal Services; Mr. Maurice Grondin, private secretary to the Postmaster General, have always replied, and this on more than one occasion, that the appointment would be made by the Civil Service Commission.

Yesterday, the hon. Postmaster General stated that the reason he had set aside the recommendation received from the right hon. Prime Minister to appoint Mr. Jean, postmaster at Sully, was that instructions had come from a person named Dubé, of Rivière-du-Loup. I shall quote in full two letters written by Mr. Dubé to the hon. Postmaster General, on November 10, 1931, and November 13, 1931; however, before quoting them I shall put a question to the hon. Postmaster General, and request him to follow me closely for a few moments. Are the returns tabled in the house true copies of the letters, including the mistakes in spelling?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not copy the returns.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I think the minister should know, for instance, how they are copied and if they are verified. Can he state whether they were verified.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): They have been closely compared.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is what I wanted to know. Letter from Mr. C. E. Dubé to the hon. Postmaster General, on November 10, 1931:

So far as Mr. Isidore Jean is concerned, when the position is advertised, he will have the right to apply. . . .

It is more or less acceptable French, however, it does not matter.

. . . and to lay stress on his services. I must, however, add that this gentleman has only been a resident of Sully for the last few months. . . .

There is but one mistake, he should have written "ne réside".

. . . and, moreover, I am informed that he has no education nevertheless when . . .

There is no accent on the "u", it does not matter.

. . . the appointment is made permanent, if Mr. Jean is chosen . . .

"Choisie" with an "e", "s-i-e".

. . . by the commission, I shall willingly conform myself.

"Volontier", "t-i-e-r".

Here is a gentleman who complains that Jean has no education and he himself writes a letter full of mistakes in spelling. (Returns 92, S.P. 142A, April 1, 1932.)

The following is another letter from Mr. Dubé to the hon. Postmaster general, on November 13, 1931:

Mr. Isidore Jean who has been residing in this parish about a year, and who wrote . . .

"Qui a écris", "r-i-s", he should have written "r-i-t".

. . . that I had recommended a well-to-do merchant, was wrong. . . .

"Erreure" is written with a mute "e".

. . . and as a proof to substantiate. . .

A "l'appuie", "p-u-i-e".

I am enclosing the certificate which is a recommendation for Mr. Tardif, and explains well . . .

He did not write "explique" but "e-s-p-l-i q-u-e".

. . . his standing.
(Returns 92, S.P. 142A, April 1, 1932.)

Here is a gentleman who does not write French correctly and complains that another has no education and, on his advice, the Postmaster general refuses—notwithstanding that he is bound to conform himself to the act—to give the position to a returned soldier.

At page 4785, of Hansard, there is a letter written by the parish priest of Sully, in which appears the following excerpt:

Mr. Isidore Jean has the necessary qualifications to take charge of the post office.

Had Jean not been qualified, would the right hon. Prime Minister have taken the trouble to recommend him to the hon. Postmaster general?

Furthermore, at page 307 of Hansard, October 18, 1932, the following answers to inquiries I made, are to be found:

Andrea Tardif, what education has he had? Answer: Primary school. Question: Did he receive a business or university course? Answer: No. Question: What education did Mr. Jean receive? Answer: Primary school.

We note, therefore, that they have received the same education.

Yesterday, in the house, I depicted a very pathetic scene which took place on the battlefields. We shall now describe the incident, at Sully, by another picture, a very interesting one: the scene of Buridan's ass. All know the story of Buridan's ass. It is an ass placed equidistant from a feed of oats and a bucket of water. It was thirsty and hungry; however, it was undecided whether it was more thirsty than hungry or more hungry than thirsty. It neither ate nor drank. It died! That is the story of the Postmaster general's hesitation to whom the following words apply: Piger vult et non vult. To-day he decides to act one way, the next day he changes his mind.

It is January 12, 1933. The deputy postmaster general acknowledges receipt of the letter and account of Mr. Jean and adds that his claim has been noted. Previous to the adjournment of the house, yesterday, I produced a letter from Mr. Jean to the hon. Postmaster general, enclosing a bill amounting to $194.50 for expenses incurred after being notified that he was appointed postmaster and had remained under that impression for over a month. Finally, three weeks or a month later, the department decided not to appoint him but to give the position to another person. A claim covering his expenses was forwarded and examined by the department. On January 12, 1933, the deputy psotmaster general acknowledges receipt and adds that his claim will be noted.

On January 12, 1933, Mr. Underwood writes to Mr. Green. Mr. Underwood is one of the head officials of the department and Mr. Green is the Quebec district postal superintendent:

(Text) I enclose herewith copy of an account submitted by Mr. Isidore Jean who was appointed to the postmastership at Sully on the thirtieth of June last, the transfer being suspended and later cancelled.

It is observed that Mr. Jean refers to the purchase of a house, but it is understood that he had made arrangements with the retiring postmaster with regard to post office quarters. As regards his reference to salary paid to a girl he intended to employ as assistant, there does not seem to be any justification for a claim as action towards the transfer to Mr. Jean's charge was suspended just a few days after his appointment, and he had no reason to continue paying the girl in question.

Regarding the detailed account concerning alterations made to the building in which Mr.

Jean proposed to house the office, no doubt most of the material is still of some use and the department wonders whether Mr. Jean would accept the total amount of $75 as total compensation.

There is, sir something very diplomatic about this transaction, $75 is offered when Jean requests $194. The hon. Postmaster stated he had been able to economize!

(Text) Would you kindly, in a diplomatic manner, endeavour to adjust this case along the above lines. I would be pleased to hear from you as soon as possible.

On January 16, Mr. Jean writes again to the Governor general to claim his expenses for the outlay he made. The Deputy minister writes to Mr. Jean as follows:

His Excellency the Governor General has transmitted to the hon. Mr. Sauvé your letter of January 16.

In connection with the position of postmaster at Sully, I wish to state that in my letter of November 17, I informed you why the Postmaster General could not appoint you to that position. I may add, however, that the department is at present considering the settlement of your claim.

On January 12, the minister was considering the claim of Mr. Jean. On January 25, he was still considering the matter. It was a question whether $75 or $194 would be paid. On January 27, 1933, Mr. Jean writes to the Deputy Postmaster General:

I believe I have given you sufficient time to think over the matter, and it would be only fair for you to apprise me of what has been decided as regards my claim in connection with preparing the Sully post office premises.

You have received my account and have had ample time to check it up. I therefore wish to know what has been decided in this matter.

On January 31, 1933, the Deputy Minister writes to Mr. Jean:

I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst. addressed to His Majesty the King, with reference to the position of postmaster at Sully, and which was referred to this department.

Now, we find that the Deputy Postmaster General has become private secretary to his Majesty George V. That is a promotion; he will be known as Lord Staffordham!

I wish to draw your attention to the letters that were recently addressed to you and to which the department has nothing further to add. I also wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 27, in connection with your claim, which the department at present has under consideration.

On January 31! The Postmaster General had passed the whole month of January thinking over Jean's bill, it had kept him busy. He draws a salary of $14,000, plus $2,000 in lieu of an automobile; he was busy the whole month, that is, he received about $1,250 to settle an important bill of $25. However, the matter is still pending. This matter has kept him busy for more than a month. On February 20, 1933, a report from Mr. Green was forwarded to Mr. Sauvé. It is amusing!

(Text) Office of District Superintendent of Postal Service

Quebec, February 20, 1933.

The Postmaster General,
For Post Office Service,
Ottawa, Ont.

Re: Sully, P.Q.

In reply to departmental letter of the twelfth ultimo, in reference to an account submitted by Isidore Jean, whose appointment as postmaster was subsequently withheld, the district superintendent has to say that Inspector Beauchamp visited Sully on the tenth instant to try and adjust the matter.

Mr. Jean when first interviewed was seemingly determined not to compromise or accept anything less than the full payment of his claim; inasmuch as he had already, through his lawyer, filed for a petition of right to sue the government. He was given to understand that his attitude would not likely bring relief but might occasion more outlay on his own part than he might obtain from a judgment in his favour even if such evolved—and he could not depend on such favourable outcome.

It is only later in the day that the inspector convinced him that, to his own advantage, he should accept compensation if the department decides to give any. He would not entertain any amount less than $100 which would seem rather fair for the following reasons:—

Upon receipt of his appointment, Mr. Jean bought a property for $650 payable in yearly instalments of $100. He had an annex twelve feet by fourteen feet built for the post office at a cost of $194.50 as per detailed account submitted. He further hired the services of Miss Irene d'Auteuil a clerk in a local store, who for that reason lost her former position and could not secure employment since and is living with the Jean family.

Mr. Jean is a labourer without employment and cannot pay for the house he bought which will likely have to be taken back by the former proprietor, but Jean cannot expect any compensation for the extension he built thereto. It means to him, a total loss,—hence his account for $194.50.

Even if he should undertake to dismantle it, he would have to pay for labour and would realize but a small portion of the amount paid for wood, door, windows, office fixtures and table, whereas all the other material would be a complete loss.

The inspector admits that the loss to Jean would be at least $194.50. The letter continues:

For all these reasons the amount of $100 would seem only reasonable and just and it is believed that the claimant would be satisfied with that amount. It is possible that $75 might alternatively be accepted, but only as a palliative with probable dissatisfaction and "come-backs."

You see, he was terrified of "come backs" for the difference of $25. "Come backs" would not be for the $25, but for the fact that the minister is unwilling to repair his wrong by paying a fair indemnity to the man whom he had appointed but to whom he did not give the position,—a man who was a returned soldier.

On February 27, 1933, Mr. Jean writes to Mr. Sauvé that he hopes that his claim has been taken under consideration and that a cheque covering the amount will reach him by the next mail.

On March 3, 1933, reply of Mr. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General:

The report of the inspector who interviewed you in this respect is at present being considered by the minister. . . .

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me. The case of Mr. Jean has been settled to his satisfaction. He accepted $100.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): When did this settlement take place?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Recently.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): On what exact date?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Last week. The order in council was signed and we have settled the claim.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): On what day of last week, please?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I cannot say the exact day. What does it matter to the hon. member, whether it was Thursday or Friday?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is of great interest to me. The hon. postmaster cannot give me the exact date?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall tell him: it is after receiving the letter in which I informed him that I would discuss the Sully case in the house. He felt ashamed, and settled the case. However, I wish to congratulate him.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member should cease drawing on his imagination in making such statements which are incorrect and untrue.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I had intended to congratulate the minister, but I shall not do so now, because of the language he made use of. I have been, for months, fighting on behalf of a poor fellow, to have the Post Office department settle his claim for $100, because of the loss he sustained. That is the kind of government—or rather, I shall not place the blame on the whole government, because the Prime Minister acted honourably in the whole of this affair, but the Postmaster General deceived Jean.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member has no right to make such a statement; I did not deceive Jean and the latter never made such a statement. The hon. member for Témiscouata is again drawing on his imagination.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If I told the minister that I was going to give him candy—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I would refuse it.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): and I withdrew the hand, I wonder whether I would be deceiving him. He told Jean: I am giving you a position; and he withdrew that position. He deceived Jean. My language is parliamentary, I am not drawing on my imagination. What I am reproaching the Postmaster General, his own conscience reproaches it to him—if he has any. I am delighted to hear that he has settled this claim and I regret that we had to fight over it so long to compel the minister to do an act of justice and equity by reimbursing this poor fellow for the loss he sustained and for which the minister was responsible. This goes to prove that we should have compassion for humble, poor and distressed people, and that, if one suffers injustice, he may appeal to any member of the opposition and rest assured that we shall champion his cause until he obtains justice.

Now, sir, as the hon. minister mentioned the saving he realized, we shall refer to his small expenditure. I regret very much that he did not produce, here, the postal box of Amédié Lesieur, however, I have here a good photograph.

Mr. STEVENS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No, no. I treat the hon. minister well enough; he should give me a little chance now. I expected to have a field day to-day but unfortunately I have had not even an hour to-night. However, I will try to make the best of it. After the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has heard the questions I will put to the hon. Postmaster General and his answers thereto I am sure he will share my views, so that it will be beneficial to him to listen to me.

I thank the hon. Postmaster General for having tabled yesterday these photographs of that rural mail box to which I referred yesterday. It is a stovepipe; it would be rather comical in other times than these times of stress. Many questions have appeared on the order paper about it, but first I should give Amédée Lesieur high praise for this marvellous invention—greater than radio, something wonderful! A great invention by a wine merchant who made some money while the Scott Act was in force in Quebec and developed into a manufacturers' agent as soon as his friend the Postmaster General took office! A very great man, a famous inventor, greater than Edison! Now what is that box? First of all I may say he is not a manufacturer's agent at all; he has acted as a go-between in securing and placing the mail box shown in this photograph. These boxes have been described, and the description is most interesting. The metal in the box does not cost more than 30 or 35 cents, and the total cost of labour in making a thousand is about 30 cents each. The box is 24 inches long and 10 inches in diameter, made of 26 guage galvanized iron, double seam, with one end closed by a cap seamed over a plain drop door on the front. In other words it is nothing but a piece of stovepipe closed at one end with a drop door at the other. Mark the glory and the greatness of the Postmaster General! The box is exceedingly flimsy and cheap. I rather suggest that the minister should bring a sample, or give one to each of us as compensation for the days we have been sitting here—a little souvenir. The total labour and material cost of that box is about 75 cents; but let us see what has been done. A great genius should not be left in the lurch. I could compare him with such men as Judge Sedgewick. The Prime Minister spoke very highly about Judge Sedgewick, but he is a child compared with Amédée Lesieur. Lesieur is a great man. In fact he got $5,000 more than Judge Sedgewick; Judge Sedgewick will earn $15,000 in one year, but Amédée Lesieur was clever enough to earn $20,000 with this mail box. A smart man! A great man!

As the hon. Postmaster General answers other questions than my own, questions that he sees in his imagination, I have here written answers to written questions. I will put them before the house and I will ask him some other questions, and I hope that if he is in his genial mood he will answer them. On January 1, 1931, there were 23,002 rural mail boxes in storage, according to information placed on Hansard on March 9. On July 1, 1931, there were 20,088; on January 1, 1932, 18,294; July 1, 1932, 25,760; on January 1, 1933, 25,638; and on March 1, 1933, 25,412. When the hon. Postmaster General took office there were 23,000 rural mail boxes in storage. How many of them did he place since he has been in charge of the department? 5,546. The smallest number on hand on any of the dates mentioned was 18,294. It was wise for the then Postmaster General, the predecessor of the hon. gentleman, to have a certain stock of rural mail boxes because it was the policy of the department then to establish rural mail routes and post offices, and at that time there was a surplus of $40,000,000, so it was right to have some boxes ahead for the poor years. But when the stock dropped to 18,000 boxes the minister says the stock of boxes on hand was so low that an additional purchase was necessary. He had placed 5,000 since he has been in office. He did not ask for any tenders, but he paid without tender $2.75 each for these boxes. How many did he order? Ten thousand! And the cost of manufacturing them was about 75 cents, so there was a clear profit of $2 a box for Amédée Lesieur.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): A Christmas box.

Mr. POULIOT: It should have been brought before the public accounts committee. In these times of stress why should Amédée Lesieur have a gift of $20,000 from the Postmaster General? It is a shame when the post office is cutting salaries and closing offices, and the Postmaster General is unable to justify a single figure that he gave yesterday, to pass over as a gift to Amédée Lesieur, money out of the public treasury to the amount of $20,000. Why were they bought? They were bought because "the patented box submitted was found satisfactory," and ordered according to the needs of the department. The department did not need at the time a single rural mail box; they had plenty of them, but in spite of that they bought 10,000.

I have one question to ask the hon. gentleman, and it is this; in what number of the patent record is this box described?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I listened with the same interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata with reference to the postal boxes, and I find it strange, knowing his parliamentary and political experience, that he displayed so much astonishment because these boxes were paid $2.75 when, under the regime he supported, they were paid as much as $2.80, $3.00 and $4.00; we pay them cheaper to-day. We purchased a certain number from Mr. Lesieur because the report of Mr. Murphy, our expert in these matters, stated that they were an improvement on some already used, that they better answered our requirements, especially for postal parcels, and that they are of a better quality. When the hon. member contends that our method of economizing was at fault, he is wrong. He forgets one thing—perhaps, he is unaware of it—that the stock, the quantity of boxes was limited and that these boxes were stored, for the requirements of the west, in Toronto and certain western centres and that those for the eastern section were practically exhausted. That is why we purchased that number of boxes, so that the Eastern part of Canada would not run short.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): As a matter of course, the Postmaster General can contend that under the liberal regime some boxes were purchased at fancy prices—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to complete my answer? It was also a question of economy. By transferring the boxes stored in the west to eastern points, the cost would have been increased and it was, therefore, to economize that we effected that transaction. The hon. member contends that no tenders were asked. First, pursuant to the act, the department is not obliged to call for tenders.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri) (Translation): Under $5,000.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): This does not apply to the Post Office department. Secondly, this box was patented; I could not call for tenders on a box recently patented. It was recommended by the department's experts, both as regards economy and meeting modern requirement, especially in connection with postal parcels. The hon. member will admit that, for a number of years, this system of distributing goods has been in vogue and seems to be considerably developing. The distribution of parcel post throughout the country has greatly increased—I am not alluding to these times of depression—and will further develop.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Since the hon. Postmaster General refers to economy, why did he not call for tenders? That is the first question I am putting to him. The second question to which he did not answer just now, is the following: I wish to inquire in what number of the "Patent Record" is to be found the description of this patent.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As explained, I did not call for tenders because it was a new box, recently patented, which answered the requirements of the department because it was of better quality; and, secondly, because it was cheaper than those we had purchased previously. Some of these postal boxes were paid $2.80, $3.00 and even $4.00; this one only cost us $2.75.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many postal boxes were paid $4.00 by the Liberals, were they made from stove pipes? Other boxes were purchased from Lesieur—50 boxes at $46.25. That was costly!

I wish to inquire from the Postmaster General in what number of the Patent Record is this invention described?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The number of the patent is 319,598, February 1932.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I thank the hon. Postmaster General for his information. Would the hon. minister take a copy of the order in council sanctioning the purchase of 10,000 rural mail boxes from Amédée Lesieur? Has the minister any objection?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, not at all. However, not this evening.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No, to-morrow. If the committee is not going to rise, I shall broach another subject. I do not wish to take up too much of the committee's time; however, there are certain cases on which I desire the hon. Postmaster General to throw some light. I wish to show him all the courtesy possible. However, I shall have to slip certain matters thoroughly, so as to obtain all the information to which we are entitled.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly .

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Thank you. Does the hon. Postmaster General wish me to submit to him another case or is the committee going to rise?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am ready to meet the wishes of the hon. member or the committee.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General is in charge.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, the committee and its chairman are.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall refer to the case of Notre-Dame-du-Lac.

I regret very much that the right hon. Prime Minister was not present in the house the other evening or at the beginning of this evening sitting, because I said many pleasant things about him. When I am so disposed, I do so heartily.

The Notre-Dame-du-Lac case is almost as interesting as that of Sully.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): In a press dispatch in the Hamilton newspapers the story is carried that an agreement has been arrived at between the federal authorities and the provincial authorities in British Columbia to reduce the federal contribution of 33⅓ per cent which is at present being paid to that province in connection with relief to 20 per cent in June, 10 per cent in July, and contributions to cease entirely in August. This report has naturally caused consternation in the larger centres of Ontario. I would ask the Minister of Labour if any similar policy is contemplated with reference to relief in the other provinces of the dominion, particularly in Ontario.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the question of dominion contributions in connection with relief to the provinces is essentially a matter for the provinces to determine. It is gratifying to me, although it may be disappointing to others, to know that conditions are improving throughout Canada. After long conferences with the British Columbia government it was made apparent that the need of that province for contributions towards relief was truly set out and reflected in the agreement between the dominion and the province which was tabled in this house some days ago. The province of Ontario has not indicated the extent to which the dominion may be called upon to contribute with respect to relief in that province. Unquestionably within a short time they will consult with this government regarding the position of affairs generally. I am hopeful that the contribution will be less than last year. If so it will be very well received by the taxpayers as something about which the province, the individual and all concerned should be extremely happy.

Mr. MITCHELL: The minister said he hoped the contribution would be less. Would that be on a percentage basis, such as a reduction of 33⅓ per cent or in bulk?

Mr. GORDON: That would be a matter to be determined after conference with the province.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): May I ask a question of the Minister of Labour concerning unemployment relief measures? Provision is made, as I understand it, for the Dominion government to pay one hundred per cent of the relief for single homeless men going into camps. This provision is for men who may congregate in the larger towns and cities. The question I have in mind concerns men of the same class who may be found in rural towns and villages. As they in the same position to have that assistance afforded them? I have in mind also the $5 a month paid to men going on farms. Is there any chance of those men partaking of the same provision as applies to men in cities and larger towns who are going into camps?

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Speaker, the provision that was made for that class of people falling within the definition "single homeless men" was provided on account of the situation which developed in the western provinces, and particularly the province of British Columbia. In that province by reason of a number of factors, the burden became very great. To put it shortly, the factors were these: Many thousands of single homeless men, a large percentage of whom arrived in Canada from continental Europe between the years 1927 and 1930 and for whose settlement no adequate provision had been made, drifted into the industrial centres, challenging the Canadian market for Canadian labour. When they found no work in industrial centres they gravitated to the province of British Columbia, and it was said by one person who knows that province very well that having regard to the situation British Columbia was rather cursed than blessed by its climate,—at least for the moment. After the matter had been investigated it was felt that there was a great deal in what had been urged by the province of British Columbia, and by reason of its action in the past some of the responsibility fell directly upon the Dominion government. It was therefore thought desirable and necessary that some added contribution—I say "added contribution" meaning something more —should be made with respect to that class of person who was concentrated in British Columbia and that more should be done than had been done in other parts of Canada. This by reason of the fact that the principle upon which relief has been extended is based upon the need, in any locality. Therefore with respect to single, homeless men in that province and in the other western provinces special provision was made. Representations along the same line have not been made from the other provinces. I doubt, in fact I am sure, they could not make out any such case based upon the same facts, because they do not apply. Therefore no provision in the same sense has been made generally throughout Canada. I cannot, of course, forecast the future but I do believe, from the information I personally receive from different sources, that many of these men will shortly be absorbed in various activities. There is no question that business to-day is better and is steadily improving. A glance at the reports even in the press will disclose that in various parts of Canada, as I am sure every member of the house will be pleased to note, workmen are being re-engaged and employed in useful avocations. The question of the disposition of single men in other parts of Canada will have to depend upon the future, and the representations the provinces may make with respect to the same.

[Mr. W. G. Weir.]

BANKING COMMISSION

INQUIRY IN REGARD TO APPOINTMENTS TO ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government if there is any truth in the rumour which appeared in the press this week to the effect that Lord Macmillan of the judicial committee of the privy council is about to be appointed to the chairmanship of the proposed royal commission on banking?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): No conclusions have been arrived at as to the appointments to that commission.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to proceed with amendments to the Shipping Act at this session, and if so when we may expect them?

Mr. BENNETT: It is. We expect the measure down to-day.

BANK INTEREST RATE REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question submitted yesterday by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) I desire to say that the Dominion government is not charged under the Bank Act with the duty of determining the rates of interest allowed by chartered banks on deposits nor with the rate of interest charged their customers for banking accommodation. However, believing that it was of the utmost importance to business and trade generally that interest rates should be lowered, the government has reduced the interest rate paid on post office savings bank deposits by one-half of one per cent effective May 1, thereby cooperating in the general program to lower interest rates paid on savings deposits by the chartered banks and other depositories in Canada. The government participated in this matter in order to lay the ground for an effective reduction in the cost of money to all classes of borrowers and to promote the stimulus to business recovery which should result therefrom.

My understanding is that while the Canadian Bankers' Association has made no official statement as to a general policy with respect to a reduction in interest rates to borrowers, substantial reductions have already been effected.

I may add further that I propose to bring to the attention of the Canadian Bankers' Association the question submitted by the hon. member for Battle River.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

INVESTIGATION INTO ALLEGED COMBINE AMONGST BUYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, some time ago proceedings were instituted to investigate an alleged combine in the tobacco growing industry. I should not say "alleged," I should just say "combine." I should like to ask the Minister of Labour, in view of the fact that conditions in my riding are nothing short of criminal, as to what progress has been made and what steps the government proposes to take to assist the tobacco growers.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the report of the registrar making inquiry has not yet been reviewed by me. The hon. member suggests there is a combine. If there is one, the steps which should be taken as contemplated by the statute will be taken, and those responsible for it will have to defend themselves as best they can.

Mr. GOTT: I should like to say another word so that I shall not have to make a speech under an item.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GOTT: Burley tobacco in the United States and American tobacco sold out at fifteen cents a pound and—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GOTT: I shall make a speech some time to-day, then.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not the time to make it.

WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there has been intimation in the press of the names of certain gentlemen likely to accompany the Prime Minister to the World Economic and Monetary conference. Might I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to state who will accompany him, and will he so inform the house, if not at the moment, before we adjourn?

I notice also that the Prime Minister of Great Britain has intimated to the British house the attitude he intends to take with respect to some questions coming up at the conference. Does the Prime Minister of Canada intend to make a similar, or any, intimation of his position?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, the matter of who shall attend the economic conference has not been considered.

As to the second question, it was not the intention of the Prime Minister to make any statement.

GOVERNMENT LOAN, $750,000,000

REDEMPTION OF OBLIGATIONS AND PURCHASE OF UNMATURED SECURITIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars, for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Finance any intimation to give to the house as to the reason for desiring the amount which is named in the resolution; also as to what he has in mind with respect to conversion?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, this sum is similar to the sum which was sought in 1931 prior to the refunding which followed. Perhaps in this connection I cannot do better than quote one paragraph from my remarks on the budget:

When the opportune moment arrives, we propose to offer a conversion loan to the public of this country. But it will be on a basis that will keep faith with investors and will not in any sense involve repudiation of existing contracts. Under such conditions, the issue can be made, it is believed, at a rate which will involve a substantial saving to the public treasury.

We will in any event this year have to refund 4½ per cent treasury bills maturing on August 1 in Canada, amounting to $50,000,000, and on October 1, we have a 4 per cent one year issue of $60,000,000 due in New York. There is also to be refunded on November 1 a residual of the 1933 issue amounting to $169,971,850.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are those tax-free?

Mr. RHODES: Those are tax-free. The total of those three which in any event will have to be refunded this year is $279,971,850.

There will also have to be money provided to meet the deficit on the Canadian National Railways and for the amount expended under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. So that in round figures we may say that in any event we will have to fund and refund a minimum of $375,000,000 for this year.

The balance we require for the purpose of being able to put through a refunding operation. No date has been set when that will be effected, but it will be our purpose to bring it about at such time as will enable us to secure as large a sum as we can at the lowest possible rate, with a view, through this refunding process, of saving a substantial sum in interest.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Might I ask the Minister of Finance if the odd $100,000,000 mentioned is all of the loan he will require to cover deficits on account of current debts?

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps if it is agreeable we might go into committee before I answer.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River). The finance minister has informed the house that the refund will be made at the lowest possible rate. I hope he means therefore that the rate will be a good deal less than 4 per cent. At no time in the history of Canada has it been more necessary that the rate of interest should be brought down to a point below that prevailing to-day. I would like to remind the minister that under the Finance Act the government of Canada have advanced large amounts to the banks of Canada at very low rates, some at 4 per cent, some at 3 per cent, some as low as 2½ per cent. I hope therefore that for the refunding of the large amount he mentioned a very low rate will be set, and if it is not all subscribed I trust he will have no hesitation in making up the difference by a direct issue of money from the treasury. We have an example set by our neighbours to the south where the president has been given power to put out no less than three billion dollars of direct issue for the purpose of meeting obligations. I therefore hope the finance minister, if the amount is not fully subscribed, will make up the balance by a direct issue from the national treasury of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hackett in the chair.

Mr. RHODES: Will my hon. friend from Edmonton submit his question?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was asking if with the $280,000,000 in round figures needed for outstanding treasury bills plus the other 1933 needs, he estimates that he will have in the neighbourhood of $375,000,000 of the $750,000,000 asked for, to use for refunding? My question was whether that odd $100,000,000 will cover your floating outstanding capital obligations for the year 1933.

Mr. RHODES: We will still have ample legislative provision, which is customarily contained in the appropriation bill, to enable us to take care of all obligations of that character. This sum to which I had reference, apart from the refunding and funding of which I have spoken, has to do entirely with a conversion loan.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What I was trying to get at was the direct obligations of the government for which they must borrow money this year, in addition to their floating treasury bills. My hon. friend has just stated that those obligations amount to approximately $375,000,000, and I am asking if that is all that will be required and if the remainder will be directly applicable to refunding.

Mr. RHODES: I think I have already told the committee the total amount we will have to meet by way of maturities and funding this year. If there should be an additional sum required it will be cared for by the borrowing power contained in the appropriation bill, but there is no other funding that we must do this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to direct two questions to the minister. First, what is the total internal debt of the dominion, as such; second, in addition to the $169,000,000 of tax free bonds maturing this year, what amount is still outstanding?

Mr. RHODES: We have payable in Canada outstanding bonds to the amount of $2,013,201,570.85. It is not possible, of course, to say whether that is all domiciled in Canada, but that is the best answer I can give my hon. friend. As I understand it, the second question is how much remains outstanding of the tax free issue?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, after the $169,000,000 mature this year.

Mr. RHODES: In round figures the total is $774,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Including the $169,000,000 coming due this year?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to say just a word in regard to the general resolution. I am not at all opposed to it, but I should like to state my views. I very much regret that the administration has not seen fit to take steps to inaugurate a refunding program for the general outstanding debt of the dominion. I believe the initiative should have come from the administration with regard to a general reduction of interest rates and a conversion or refunding program such as was successfully undertaken in Australia. Some hon. members might suggest that it would not be easy to obtain the money at a very low rate of interest, say 3 per cent or 3½ per cent, but I suggest that this is the time to appeal to national sentiment in Canada with regard to a general conversion scheme including all our outstanding obligations.

Mr. RHODES: I can assure my hon. friend and the committee that it is the desire of the government to refund as large a sum as may be possible, at as low a rate as can be possibly obtained. When my hon. friend refers to a refunding of all our issues, and when he compares the situation in Canada with that in Great Britain, for example, he must remember that their bonds were callable. Ours are not, and that feature must be borne in mind in connection with the volume we can attain in the matter of refunding. I can assure my hon. friend that so far as we can judge the trend of money and interest rates we are wise, I think, in deferring until the most favourable opportunity any general refunding scheme that may be undertaken. Exercising the best judgment we can, and guided by the best advice we may secure, it will be our endeavour to carry on the refunding at the most favourable moment.

I think I might very properly add at this stage that it will be our endeavour to secure our funds not upon the basis of the strict value of money in the terms of the market at the moment, but that we will appeal just as far as possible to the patriotism of the Canadian people.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the minister if the bonds when refunded will be payable in notes or in gold, and whether they will be payable in Canada or in other countries as well?

Mr. RHODES: It is anticipated that they will be payable in lawful money of Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: May I ask if this is to be a purely domestic loan or if it will be floated abroad, at least in part?

Mr. RHODES: It is anticipated that it will be a purely domestic loan.

Mr. YOUNG: I have here the public accounts for 1931, and at page XI I find the following:

> $45,000,000 three year 4 per cent treasury notes, issued on December 1, 1927, matured December 1, 1930, and were replaced by the issue of two year treasury notes for $40,000,000 at 4 per cent maturing December 1, 1932, the balance of $5,000,000 being paid from cash. These were sold at par to Canadian chartered banks.

How were those notes taken care of when they matured last September?

Mr. RHODES: They were met by the proceeds of the four per cent loan of last October.

Mr. YOUNG: They were paid?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, but I have been told that those notes were payable in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver or New York. Is that correct?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry to say I have not the facts before me, but my recollection is that they were payable entirely in Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it the intention that this new loan shall be payable at the option of the holder either in Canada or elsewhere?

Mr. RHODES: No, Mr. Chairman; it is anticipated that they will be payable in lawful money of Canada, in Canada.

Mr. SPENCER: I take it that lawful money of Canada is either gold or dominion notes?

Mr. RHODES: It is whatever the law says money is in Canada at the time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 103, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. RHODES: With the unanimous consent of the house, I move the second reading of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: May I point out to the Minister of Finance that I could have made a long speech at every stage of the debate; I did not do so in order not to delay the Post Office supply.

Mr. SPENCER: Unless the minister is particularly anxious to proceed with the bill just now, I suggest that it might be well to postpone it for the time being. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) could not be in the house this morning and I know he would like to speak to the bill. However, I will not press the request.

Mr. SPENCE: He has talked enough now.

Mr. RHODES: If it suits the purposes of the hon. member we can let the bill go through committee and I will hold the third reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. RHODES: At a later hour this day, if that suits hon. members.

Mr. SPEAKER: At this sitting.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

PURCHASE OF STATIONS—APPOINTMENTS TO STAFF

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 99, to amend the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I was under the impression that the Prime Minister would have something to say on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought we might have the discussion in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to me it is rather important to have some pronouncement on the second reading, because this bill will come as a great surprise to the house and to the country, especially as it is being introduced at this stage of the session. When the Radio Broadcasting Act was passed at the last session of parliament we were told that its provisions were based on the report of a royal commission endorsed by a committee of this house and, as such, should commend themselves to hon. members. My recollection is that, for that reason, the bill went through without much discussion. We assumed that we were passing legislation in accordance with what the committee, after listening to all the representations that had been made, deemed to be wise and prudent provisions in the circumstances.

In particular, it was stressed that appointments under the radio commission would be made just as are appointments to departments of the government generally, by the Civil Service Commission. We were also advised that, with regard to capital expenditures, whether in the acquisition by lease or purchase of new stations or of stations already in existence, parliament would have a voice in the matter and that the acquisition would not rest solely with the commission on approval of the governor in council. Above all, we were told that the expenses of the commission would be met out of its receipts, and that while parliament would have to make appropriations, thus bringing before the house a review of the whole situation, such appropriations would not exceed what was likely to be raised in the way of receipts from the commission's own operations.

Mr. BENNETT: That has continued.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After parliament had listened to these representations the bill was passed in the belief that the act would be carried out as set forth, and last year provision was made, in the nature of an appropriation, of $400,000. This year that appropriation has been raised by $600,000 and parliament has been asked to grant $1,000,000 for the commission, as compared with the sum I have already mentioned as having been voted last year, $400,000, which we were led to believe would be sufficient.

Yesterday we passed an appropriation of $1,000,000, assuming that that amount would be equal to what would be raised by the receipts of the commission itself. As I read the present measure, the commission is to have the right to expend not only the $1,000,000 appropriated by parliament but in addition all that it may raise by way of receipts. That seems to me to be going very much further than this house was led to believe was intended at the time it made the appropriation; for that appropriation of $1,000,000 would not have passed the commons, certainly not without considerable debate, unless it had been deemed that it would be the total expenditure which the commission would be in a position to make.

I wish to take strong exception to the provision in this bill that the officials, the clerks and employees generally of the commission, are not to be appointed by the Civil Service Commission as are the clerks and employees of departments of government, but that the commission is to be given a free hand in the making of such appointments. I do not believe there is an argument that can be brought forward in support of giving to the commission any such powers. The employees of the radio commission are no different from the employees of the department of government which has heretofore had charge of radio broadcasting, and those employees were all under the Civil Service Commission. I see no reason why they should now be taken out. Also as respects this commission which as yet is untried, why should we remove the matter of its expenditures, operations and so on, from such control as parliament may continue to exercise over capital expenditure? On the score of the measure taking away from the Civil Service Commission its authority in the matter of appointments, taking away from parliament its control over capital expenditures and of vastly increasing the total expenditure of the commission, giving to the commission all the funds that it will raise itself through receipts in addition to what may be appropriated by parliament, the bill is objectionable. Every one of these three grounds is subversive in its character of principles to which we should adhere, and contradicts absolutely the provisions of the original act which we were told was based on the report of a royal commission and of a committee of this house. On these grounds we on this side will certainly oppose this measure as strongly as it possibly can be opposed.

May I say to the Prime Minister that seeing that it has been brought in at this stage of the session I think he ought to withdraw the measure. It is not treating the House of Commons fairly to bring in at this stage of the session a measure subversive of all that we have understood to be governing in the matter of the radio broadcasting commission and particularly after this house has permitted the appropriation of $1,000,000, an increase of $600,000 over the appropriation of last year, to be passed with the distinct belief and understanding that it would cover the total expenditures of the commission and that that was supposed to be the amount which the commission itself would be able to raise from its own receipts. All through this session we have been led to believe that the commission's total expenditures would be limited in that way and that the original provisions of the act would be complied with. If it is necessary to change this or for any reason to alter original provisions then I submit the bill should be held over until another session when all these matters can be fully discussed.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any organization in this country that is as unpopular as this radio commission. Apparently there is no place that one can go in this country without hearing complaints. I have received considerable correspondence from radio users in the west and yesterday I forwarded to the minister a memorandum made up by a group of radio users in the city of Moose Jaw. A portion of the letter enclosing the memorandum reads as follows:

The change in wave lengths has resulted in spoiling the reception of practically every one of the good American stations which we were able to get here in Saskatchewan, and in place thereof we have to content ourselves with purely local programs, which, as you know, are not to be classed with either the Columbia or National programs.

We have had to stand for a lot from the new radio commission here in the west, but when Mr. Charlesworth took it upon himself to boast of what he had done for the west, it was about the last straw. So far as radio programs in the west are concerned, we were much better off before they had any commission, than we are to-day.

I do not know that I can put the complaints that we hear in better words than those contained in this memorandum and for the information of the house I propose to quote what this group of radio users have said. The memorandum reads:

1. Judging the commission by what it has produced so far, it would appear that the members of the commission have no personal grasp of the actual history or requirements of radio broadcasting entertainment in Canada.

2. During the past season in the main the programs provided over Canadian stations have been very much inferior to the programs provided in previous years.

3. This is most particularly true of programs sponsored by the Canadian radio commission.

4. The finest programs we get in Saskatchewan are furnished by western agencies without any assistance or even recognition by the Canadian radio commission.

5. The chain programs furnished by the Canadian radio commission consist practically entirely of broadcasts by some orchestra or band with the exception perhaps of the corn husker program on Saturday night which consists of old time dance music with appropriate calling off.

6. The commission through its chairman has publicly announced that it intends to borrow programs from the NBC and put them over the Canadian chain.

7. It also announced through its chairman on one occasion that there were no good comedians in Canada (which may or may not be true, but there is no evidence of any effort on the part of the radio commission to find out).

8. The demand for Canadian broadcasting commission was due to the desire on the part of Canadians to have programs of a Canadian flavour and to induce Canadian listeners to listen to Canadian stations with programs of a Canadian flavour rather than programs of an American flavour.

This is particularly necessary in western Canada where so large a proportion of our people are of foreign origin.

The demand for such programs featuring Canadian ideals, disseminating in a palatable way information as to Canada's history, Canada's status in the world, and Canada's future.

9. A program of symphony music is just that, namely, a program of symphony music. It is much more palatable well played by a foreign orchestra than it is not so well played by a Canadian orchestra, and the mere fact that a program of symphony music is coming over a Canadian station has no particular significance, particularly to the foreign born, and those of foreign extraction in our country.

10. The Canadian Pacific Railway broadcasts and the Canadian National Railways broadcasts of previous years were splendid broadcasts. The radio commission has apparently made no attempt to continue these programs. The Canadian National Railways programs particularly were fine from a national and educational viewpoint because they gave Canadian historical skits and playlets, such as we hear from an American viewpoint over the American stations.

11. The announcement by the radio commission that they were going to procure and broadcast over the Canadian chain American programs was most unpalatable because the commission was appointed to wean our listeners away from the American programs, and it was entirely unnecessary because the American programs were already accessible from the American stations.

12. Following some criticism on the floor of the house, the radio commission through its chairman made a statement in Toronto that Montreal and Toronto should realize that they were not the whole of Canada and that the commission had done some wonderful things for the west. The fact of the matter is the commission has done absolutely nothing for the west.

13. The First Battalion, King's Own Rifles of Canada at Moose Jaw, have one of the finest military bands in the country. The bandmaster wrote the commission offering the services of the band for broadcasts and received from an employee of the commission a curt if not insulting reply. Many people claim to have written the commission with helpful suggestions and to have received not even the courtesy of an acknowledgment of their letters.

14. If any further evidence were wanting of the absolute total ignorance of the commission of the condition of broadcasting in western Canada the commission itself furnished this evidence by the change in wave lengths of the Saskatchewan stations. Prior to this change in wave lengths it was possible to get the following American stations regularly with splendid tone and plenty of volume:

KFYR, Bismark.
WCCO, Minneapolis.
WHO and WOC, Des Moines.
KSL, Salt Lake City.
WENR, Chicago.

This will do for an illustration.

The commission announced that the reason for the new k.c. ratings of the Saskatchewan stations is to conform to the international agreement. Whoever made this international agreement knew nothing of the situation in western Canada.

The stations above referred to can none of them with the exception of KFYR be heard in Saskatchewan when the Saskatchewan stations are broadcasting. In addition the Saskatchewan stations cannot be heard outside of their own centre when these stations are broadcasting.

To illustrate: One of the finest programs put over on a regular schedule by the Western Telephone Systems was the fireside hour from Regina Sunday night 9:00 to 10:00. Listeners in Moose Jaw trying to listen to this program through CKCK, Regina last Sunday night found it impossible to do so due to the fact that WOC, WHO came through at the same time and it was impossible to detune them and hear Regina, so that throughout this very fine program there was the other program coming through, speaking voices and singing voices and orchestra mixing in with the fireside hour.

All over Saskatchewan radio listeners find themselves in this wretched position, that their favourite Canadian station is ruined by their favourite American station, and they cannot listen to either when the other is on. In fact the situation is such that in the city of Moose Jaw for illustration, and in the city of Regina for another illustration the only stations which can now be heard satisfactorily are the purely local stations. Even in the immediate rural vicinity of the cities in which Saskatchewan stations are located the local station cannot be heard with any quality of tone because of the heterodyne caused by the carrier signal of some other station.

Had the commission deliberately planned to make it impossible for Saskatchewan listeners to hear any but their local station it could not have been achieved more satisfactorily than it has been done.

One is forced to one of three conclusions, either:

1. That the commission does not know what it is doing, or
2. That it does not care, or
3. That it has deliberately made these wave length adjustments to produce this state of affairs in Saskatchewan to compel Saskatchewan listeners to listen to such programs and only such programs as are available over their local station whether of chain or local origin.

Mr. BENNETT: Who signed that?

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is not signed. The letter is from Schull & Marquis, a firm of reputable solicitors in the city of Moose Jaw.

Mr. BENNETT: Then there is no evidence whose opinion that is.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Except what it says in the letter—from a number of radio listeners of the city of Moose Jaw.

Mr. BENNETT: But who are they?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am only judging from the letter written by the firm of Schull & Marquis. It is in the nature of a personal letter making a protest on their own behalf as well as on behalf of the others who joined in making up the memorandum. I wanted to put that on record because of this fact. Since coming to Ottawa to attend this session one hears complaints on every hand of this radio commission and the way they have manipulated things so that radio users are not able to get the benefit of the radio they bought and paid for, and when I see that the chairman of the radio commission states, "There is difficulty here but we have done wonderful things for the west," I want to show what the situation in the west is.

I believe that before any further money is voted for this commission before we give them any greater power than they now have and before they are allowed to employ their own officers, clerks and employees without the intervention of the Civil Service Commission we should have some evidence that the radio commission know what they are doing.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): When the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) was reading the memorandum complaining of the radio commission the Prime Minister asked who had signed it, and the hon. member for Swift Current replied that he had received it with a general letter written by a reputable firm of lawyers in Moose Jaw. For the edification of the Prime Minister may I just read a few extracts of opinions which have been expressed by individual radio listeners in the province of Saskatchewan complaining of the action of the radio commission. I do not know whether I should read them all, but I have quite a few of them condensed and I will give the names and places.

Here is one from W. S. Pierce, Archiwill, Saskatchewan, He has this to say:

> We would like to express our dissatisfaction with the change in your wave length. Your station CJRM was about the only station we could get clearly on a good night. Now you are placed so close to WENR and WLS that we cannot get you or them in the evening.

Then Miss G. E. Grant of Sceptre, Saskatchewan, writes:

> As we take the wheat prices for the elevators here at Sceptre, we are very disappointed with the change in your wave length. It is not half as good as it was before.

Mrs. G. Hill, Blaine Lake, Saskatchewan, writes:

> Since they changed the wave length we cannot get Fleming at all and have to put on all the volume we have to get CJRM—

That is the Moose Jaw station:

> —and if Saskatoon is on, we cannot get it at all. Saskatoon interferes with all the stations terrible.

Then there is a complaint of the same nature from Mrs. A. Brown of Birch Hills, another from M. McMillan—I do not suppose that is the member, but the name is McMillan. He writes:

> Since you have changed the wave length we cannot get Moose Jaw with Saskatoon on as they both come in about the same place on our radio.

Then there are other complaints from Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Abbey, Ridpath, Herbert, Melfort, Glenellen, Swift Current, Masefield, Saskatoon again, Richlea, Grandin, Leroy, Wadena, Milden and Regina, all making the same objections which are set out in the memorandum which was read by the hon. member for Swift Current. I feel just as he does, that instead of the chairman of the radio commission telling us what wonderful things they have done for the west, in view of the protests that are now being made against the radio commission I think we should get from the minister through his radio commission some illustration of the wonderful things that they have done for the west before we vote any more money for the commission.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I wish to add my protest to those which have already been expressed by my hon. friends on this side of the house against this bill. I do not see what justification there is for giving the radio commission power to employ all its officers, clerks and employees in any different way from that prevailing with the other departments and public agencies of this government. The reason which is given in the explanatory note is that the Civil Service Commission has not in the past been accustomed to employing personnel of the type required by the radio commission, and it is not considered that the Civil Service Act is a suitable vehicle through which the commission should obtain its employees either technical or clerical. Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot for the life of me see any good reason in that explanatory note. What they say there applies to every other department of the government when it is first placed under the Civil Service Commission. For example, the Civil Service Commission had not in the past been accustomed to appoint, and did not possess the qualifications for appointing, legal officers in the Department of Justice or financial experts in the Department of Finance. The practice that they follow is to appoint a board of men who are competent to select the men required from among the applicants for these positions, and the Civil Service Commission acts upon the report it receives from these various boards. Surely this radio commission, and especially at this time, should not be a state within the state, should not be exempt from all the restrictions and control which are exercised over the other departments of the government. I agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken that there is no public body in Canada, no government body, so unpopular as the present radio commission. As far as I am concerned I must say, although I do not suppose it matters much, that the radio commission lost my entire confidence immediately after they took office, when, as it was shown in the house last session, the commission had been appointed on October 3, and sworn in on October 30 or 31, and that two days before they were sworn in a licence was given to a political newspaper in Montreal. The commission did not act after its appointment. The licence was granted by the Minister of Marine just two days before the commission was sworn in. They say they have no responsibility, because they were not sworn in when the licence was granted. But the law gave them power to prevent the opening of that station. In that instance we had an example of the worst kind of political patronage. When the radio legislation was passed I was the first on this side of the house, on the second reading of the bill, to voice my approval and give my support. Had I known that the commission now in office was to be appointed I would not have given to that bill the support I then gave. I have not confidence enough in the commission to relieve it from the control and necessary restrictions other departments of government are under. I am also opposed to section 3 which gives them the right to expend the moneys they receive from any business carried on under the act, apart from those moneys appropriated by parliament. This body is under the control of parliament. We cannot free parliament from responsibility for these moneys. As I said a few moments ago I am opposed to building a state within the state, especially in view of the personnel of this commission.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, on account of the very illuminating speeches which have been delivered since this bill was introduced I am very happy that it has not been carried. Since I mentioned in the house that I would pull Mr. Charlesworth's whiskers I have received two anonymous letters, one in capitals and the other in semi-commercial characters. I do not pay any particular attention to them, but I do say that the Prime Minister will never say about the chairman of the radio commission the nice things he has said about the chairman of the tariff commission. Here we have a gentleman who has been writing articles in a Toronto publication—writing about music. What does he know about music? He gave lectures about this, that and the other thing; now he is non compos mentis all the time, and is supposed to rule the air. He is full of hot air, that is all he is.

Mr. DAVIES: You are.

Mr. POULIOT: Who says that?

Mr. DAVIES: I do.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member has exploded.

Mr. DAVIES: I suggest you have.

Mr. POULIOT: First of all, the hon. member is a newcomer in this house. He has to learn the law before teaching others, and he will learn the law by listening to others.

Mr. DAVIES: Make it interesting and I will listen.

Mr. POULIOT: He will gain great advantage by listening to others before making such an exhibition of himself.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member said if it were made interesting he would listen.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not accepting the judgment of the hon. member, the baby of the house. I am not surprised when he shouts, because we always hear babies scream.

Mr. DAVIES: What about yourself?

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, I am speaking in a most delicate way. I say this, that the Prime Minister is master of the land; the chairman of the radio commission is master of the air. I wonder why the aeroplanes of the Department of National Defence are not put under his control. I wonder why the flags are not put under his control, and everything in the air. The birds—why are they not put under his control? Everything that has wings and is lighter than air, or up in the air, should be under his control—as should my hon. friend the baby of the house. He should be under his control, also, so that we would have peace in this House of Commons.

Mr. GOTT: Hot air is not under control.

Mr. POULIOT: Then you are full of hot air.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You cannot make another speech before the orders of the day are called.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member spoke, but he did not say anything.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking seriously I am asking the government to keep control of the radio commission. I was very sorry when I heard my good friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) say he would not interfere with the work of the radio commission. When he said that I was scandalized. I say to him now, while he sits next the Prime Minister, that he should run the radio commission as well as his own department, with an iron hand and a velvet glove. He should be the master of the radio commission. Then when we come to this House of Commons we would find one man who would be responsible for what has been done by the commission. This is true parliamentary doctrine which no hon. member on the treasury benches will deny.

We have a Civil Service Commission. It is either good or bad. If it is good, leave to it the powers it should have; if it is bad, abolish it. There was a hole made in the law favouring the Postmaster General by which he was allowed to dismiss postmasters of post offices having revenues of $3,000. Under the change the Postmaster General was allowed to dismiss postmasters who previously could be dismissed only by order in council. That power was granted to him. He was granted the power to appoint postmasters to post offices earning a net revenue of $3,000. That change was an encroachment upon the Civil Service Act. Now, in connection with the radio commission, we have another encroachment of the same kind.

I have nothing to say particularly against any member of the board. The Quebec member seems to be a very pleasant gentleman, although I have not had many dealings with him. I am very discreet in these matters. I do not know the expert, and I know Mr. Charlesworth only from reading what he has written in Saturday Night. In addition to that there has been some personal correspondence. Are these men superior to the members of the Civil Service Commission? Why should exception be made in favour of the radio commission when there is no exception made in favour of the Minister of Marine? Are these men of the radio commission such superior men? I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) in his seat, also the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré)—they cannot make permanent appointments in their own departments, except by a vote of the House of Commons or through the Civil Service Commission. Why should there be any exception in favour of Mr. Charlesworth and his two companions? I ask the government to decide now whether or not it will stand behind the Civil Service Commission? I ask them whether or not the Civil Service Commission is a body worth having. That is the main point. We have to know how things are being done. If they are done properly one way they should always be done that way. That is the statement that I make with full responsibility as a member for a constituency in which there are many radio listeners, and in which there will be a permanent broadcasting station if the minister grants the licence that has been asked for for months and months. In the name of my own people as well as of all Canadians I protest strongly against such discrimination. Can a thing be good and bad at the same time? It is impossible. Sir, I entertain great fears that the Canadian people will not be treated fairly by the chairman of the radio commission. That is my personal feeling; I express it here in the House of Commons. I do not trust that man. I wonder why I should be bound to accept the decision of a radio czar in this country. It is absurd. Is there a milk bottle in the House of Commons?

Mr. GOTT: If there is the hon. gentleman should sip at it.

Mr. POULIOT: Is there a nursemaid in the House of Commons?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Onions.

Mr. GOTT: I did send the hon. gentleman a bag prepaid.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, Mr. Speaker, with due respect I stand here for the liberties of the Canadian people, for the freedom of the electors, the men and women and children of this country and of the constituencies of hon. gentlemen opposite as well as my own. We will not stand for discrimination, we want fair play for all, and as members of the parliament of this country we want to retain control of the men who are paid with the taxes that come from the Canadian people. We wish to be able to say our word about what is done; to praise if it is right, and if it is not right, to condemn. We want to keep the right to present to the government the grievances of the people, of the electors of my hon. friends opposite, both of them, Essex and the newborn child.

Mr. O. HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on this bill on behalf of the people of central and northern British Columbia. I have had a lot of communications asking me as to what the radio commission are doing. Up in our country the people are paying licence fees to listen to American radio programs. They have requested the commission and the Minister of Marine that a radio station be established in northern or central British Columbia to serve that territory, but up to the present nothing has been done. The other day I received five letters in one mail asking what they were paying licences for to the Canadian government, when they only have American broadcasting programs to listen to. I therefore urge the government and the minister, if this money is voted, that consideration be given to those people. They are isolated, many of them use the radio as their only means of keeping in touch with what is going on outside; they have not the facilities of those living in the populous centres. I urge the minister to see that something is done for those people to warrant them paying the licence. They are complaining, and rightly so, about paying it, and I submit they should be given some consideration. I trust the minister and the radio commissioners will see what can be done on their behalf.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to what the previous speakers have said. At this late stage of the discussion I do not desire to take up time. My views as to appointments to the government service are well known to hon. members of this house. May I add that I fully concur in the remarks made by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the criticisms this morning I wish to express the opinion of this group, which is absolutely in favour of the principle of public ownership. After all, this child is only just born, and the 245 members of this house were the midwives.

Mr. YOUNG: No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL: It was carried unanimously.

Mr. YOUNG: No, it was not.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well I understand it was; at any rate we will not argue about that. I am not unmindful of the fact that in bringing order out of chaos there is bound to be some disagreement.

Mr. YOUNG: How about bringing chaos out of order?

Mr. MITCHELL: Someone says "How about bringing chaos out of order." That hon. member must have a very short memory. Chaos has been the general condition in the broadcasting field on the North American continent, largely through the lack of control by this government and the government to the south.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not complaining about the right of any hon. member to criticize the commission. I believe that in view of the length of public experience of the chairman of the commission someone might whisper in his ear just to keep quiet for a time, which should be quite easy in view of his experience in the newspaper business. In my judgment the radio commision should act in the national life of this country more or less as a judicial body. I do not believe that the chairman should go about the country making such speeches as he has made. I believe that is absolutely inconsistent with the dignity of the position. It is only natural that when he utters what in my judgment were direct insults to members of this house they should be answered on the floor of this house.

But what I chiefly rose to object to is the provision in this bill further reducing the power of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: The last two sessions of this parliament have seen a fall in the prestige and influence of that commission. Last session we saw 4,000 members of the postal service given back to the old system of party patronage with all its evils. This year we have a measure passed by this house which takes from the jurisdiction of the commission certain employees of the penitentiaries. Now we have, before the ink on that bill is quite dry, this commission being given power to engage its own personnel. In my judgment, taking the long view of it, we are thereby opening the way for the entrance of all the evils of party patronage into the operations of this commission. I am not unmindful of the difficulties confronting the commission in the absorption of broadcasting stations, and dealing with the question whether it is a practical thing to absorb the staff that exists at the time the commission takes over a particular station. But I do not think it is beyond the power of the government and the commission to fit such matters into the frame work of the civil service legislation. It is only human nature that the party which created this commission will bring pressure to bear to see that its own friends are appointed to the positions coming under this commission, if this amendment is adopted. I believe this is a retrograde step; I believe it is absolutely against the building up of what I believe to be necessary in this country, an efficient civil service. I am not unmindful of the fact that party patronage will die slowly; I have not forgotten to take into account the mental background of those members of this house who carried on during that period when party patronage was at its height. I believe I have expressed the opinion before that it will take at least a generation to build up an efficient civil service, on the principle of trial and error. I believe the government is absolutely wrong in taking this step; I think it is absolutely unnecessary and against the general opinion held throughout this country in connection with the building up of an efficient civil service in this dominion.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very long to reply to the objections which have been raised in this house since this bill was introduced. It seems to me that each time my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) speaks about radio matters he has an obsession with regard to the licence granted to La Patrie for the erection of station CHLP. I have answered my hon. friend once or twice in this regard and for the last time, I hope, I will answer again.

Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot understand why a newspaper which is supposed to be Conservative should have a station. They have been accustomed to having their following in Quebec in control of all the newspapers and radio stations in that province, and they cannot get over the fact that a Conservative paper should have a small, one hundred watt station in order to give a chance to every party and every man who wants to broadcast his opinions with regard to public and even political matters. They cannot understand why we should have even one small station. I have already said to the house that the acting Minister of Marine did well when he granted that licence. The commission was not functioning at the time; the acting minister had the power and he took that action. I believe the people of the province of Quebec are satisfied to have that station; I think we should have more in Quebec, and I hope the radio commission will give justice to every party in that province and see that the electors are given proper treatment and that they have a chance to hear and read both sides of all questions. Since the radio estimates were brought down we have heard a great deal of criticism. We expected it, because we know there are enemies in this country who are heard through the members of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. YOUNG: What kind of enemies?

Mr. DURANLEAU: When I say enemies I mean those opposed to state control or state ownership of radio in this country. We expected opposition, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think this criticism is fair when it is remembered that the commission has been in charge of radio in Canada for only three or four months. Why not give these men a fair chance? I know they have been on the job from nine o'clock in the morning very often until twelve o'clock at night in order to give the best possible service to Canada. Of course they had to comply with the international agreements that are in existence, and on April 1 they had to make some changes in wave lengths. That has resulted in some criticism, but conditions will be remedied; give them time. Next June there is to be a conference in Mexico of all the countries of America, at which we will discuss the whole question of wave lengths. All these matters will be readjusted, and I think the commission should have at least a few months in which to satisfy the public. I do know that their aim is to give Canada the best service possible. We hear many local complaints, but if hon. members could go to the offices of the radio commission they could find volumes of letters of congratulation which are being received every day with regard to the programs the commission have put on during the last two months. Hon. members would be amazed to read the congratulations they have received.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We certainly would be.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I say to the minister—

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am sure hon gentlemen have not had the opportunity of hearing all the programs that the commission have put on during the last two months, because they have been attending the sessions of this house every evening.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We cannot get them in Ottawa.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I know there has been some trouble in Ottawa, but in a short time it will be remedied. We will have an agreement with the United States in a short time which will enable us to adjust matters satisfactorily. I do not want to take up very much of the time of the house at this late stage of the session—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain the bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I should like to mention a few of the things that have been done by the commission since its appointment. They started with the Christmas broadcast, with which I am sure everyone was pleased. We tried previously to have an imperial broadcast on Christmas day, but we could not get it. This year, however, due to the organization of the commission, that broadcast was successful and everyone was pleased. The commission has transmitted many programs by means of transcontinental chains to all radio stations in Canada that were in a position to take them. On the average this has amounted to about forty stations for each broadcast. We had thirteen one-hour concerts by symphony orchestras; surely that is something. We had eleven forty-five minute concerts by army, navy and municipal bands, and we had ten popular dance programs. In addition we had twelve one-hour French programs from Montreal and Quebec. I am proud to say that with respect to these programs the largest number of letters of congratulations have been received from various parts of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The memorandum continues, giving the following details of broadcast:

Choral societies and choirs—two one-hour programs.

Special events, such as finals and semi-finals in the Canadian hockey series, speeches by the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —and Sir Arthur Salter—seven programs varying from fifteen minutes to an hour and a half. I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite applauding, because I am sure that every Canadian who listened to the remarks of the Prime Minister of Canada when he was in Washington on a recent occasion will admit that it was a great achievement for the radio commission to have brought over so clearly and distinctly the speeches made on that occasion.

In the western provinces radio listeners have been hearing for the first time in the history of the radio regular symphonic programs. A survey made by the university of Alberta some weeks ago showed that they were the most popular programs of any kind with radio listeners. Dr. Stapleford, head of the United Church's college at Regina, recently said that the commission's work for the west had been magnificent. A similar tribute with reference to the commission's work for the maritime provinces was recently expressed by Hon. F. D. Richards, Prime Minister of New Brunswick.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

One of the most remarkable of the commission's trans-continental broadcasts occurred on April 21st when the Western Canada High Schools' Orchestra, composed of 265 juvenile musicians from the prairie provinces, was assembled at Winnipeg and heard in a beautiful program. Commenting on this program, Mr. P. G. Padwick, the organizer of the concert, wrote: "The Radio Commission was able to do more for the extension of the orchestral movement in forty-five minutes than has been accomplished in ten years of hard missionary work."

The Empire Christmas broadcast brought upwards of 3,000 congratulatory messages from various parts of Canada. It could not have been carried out had the commission not been appointed. An attempt in the previous year failed because the necessary co-ordinating forces did not exist in Canada. The magnificent Anglican broadcast on Sunday, April 23rd, was arranged through the cooperation of the commission; otherwise it could not have been organized. One of the other recent acts of the commission was the broadcasting to every part of Canada of Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald's address at Washington on April 22nd. Without the commission's assistance this broadcast would have been heard only in the Toronto and Montreal areas.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt the minister in the reading of the memorandum he has been quoting from, but I would ask him this question. If the commission is doing so splendidly under the statute as it stands, why is it necessary to amend that statute in the way proposed?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall come to that in a minute. Since the commission has been functioning we have observed that its activities are handicapped by the provisions of the act as it is now in force.

Mr. LAPOINTE: With such a glorious record?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We are to-day acting on the advice of a man of very considerable experience. As I say, I shall come to that point in a moment or two, but at present I am merely stating to the house what the commission has done, is doing and intends to do. Surely my hon. friends cannot expect the commission to have done everything conceivable during the short time that they have been in office. They did not own these stations in Canada; they have to hire wireless stations, and their operations cannot be expected to have been so far perfect. But they are doing their best and I hope that in a few months my hon. friends will admit with others that no other organization could do better than the commission has been doing.

It is the intention of the commission to organize a complete wire chain across Canada, tying in all the principal stations in each area throughout the country. This chain will be operated by the commission for a certain number of hours each day, and Canadian programs of the very higest calibre will be transmitted throughout Canada over these lines. It is the intention of the commission to secure the very best talent in all the cities throughout the country, and to have these artists broadcast from as many Canadian stations as possible. These programs will comprise all types of entertainment, including dramatic productions, talks and music, in such a way as to interest all classes of listeners in Canada.

Due to the wide variation in time between Halifax and Vancouver, it will be necessary for the country to be organized into a number of regional chains in addition to the main trans-Canada hook-up. This work is already well under way. It is the intention of the commission to have available at least four hours of Canadian programs each day. These programs will be clear of all advertising matter and will be transmitted at suitable periods for the various parts of the country.

Upon taking office in January, 1933, the commission found that an agreement had been signed between Canada and the United States, laying down very definitely the distribution of channels and power throughout Canada. This treaty had been arranged by the Canadian Legation with the State Department at Washington in May, 1932. This agreement made it possible for Canada to use an increased number of clear channels and permitted a very large increase in the power of Canadian stations. To effect this agreement it was necessary for a few small stations to be reduced in power and for a number of changes in channels to be made throughout the country. Since the commission could only make these changes at the time of the renewal of the station licences, it was impossible for effect to be given to the agreement until April 1, 1933.

These changes have had the effect of clearing a great deal of interference from Canadian channels and, while it is possible that in some parts of the country certain American stations are not now well received, it will be found that other American stations carrying exactly the same chain programs can now be heard in those particular areas, whereas before these latter stations were blanketed by the Canadian stations. This is the situation which exists in Ottawa at the present time. American stations carrying all of the high class chain programs are now heard here that could not previously be picked up on any set in the Ottawa district.

With respect to western Canada, it is the intention of the commission to build two powerful stations which will give entire satisfaction to the west.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Is it true that the complaint just now is that the radio commission is working only one way—that it works in the west but not in the east? Is that true?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Why should that be?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I do not know; I am merely putting the question to the minister, because I am not an expert.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am told that it is working both ways. The commission is trying to give satisfaction to the whole country.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): As they are linked up just now, I am told that the west cannot hear the east.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend has followed the programs of the last two months, he will realize that some were heard from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I heard one last Sunday evening and I will admit that it was wonderful.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am making a statement in connection with the west because of the complaints which have been voiced in this house. After a careful survey of radio conditions in Canada, the broadcasting commission consider that it is essential that two new stations should be erected in western Canada in order to serve this large area. It is proposed to begin construction of two high powered stations in British Columbia and in Saskatchewan. The coverage in British Columbia is at present very poor on account of the fact that only low power stations are available, and these are all in the vicinity of Vancouver. One large station, suitably located, would give excellent Canadian service to the entire province. The province of Saskatchewan is now served by a number of low power stations scattered over the southern half of the province. It is proposed to erect one large station near the centre of the area where satisfactory power supply can be obtained.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Can the minister tell us where the station in British Columbia will be located?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot give definite information at the present time. The commission is trying to find a location for a station which will cover the whole province.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): To reach the outlying districts?

Mr. DURANLEAU: To reach even the outlying districts, yes. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) quoted me as having said that I would not interfere with the operations of the commission. What I stated to this house and what I repeat is that I intend to follow the provisions of the statute which last year was adopted unanimously, with the exception of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). Apparently these amendments will not be accepted unanimously. I intend to follow the provision of the statute. I shall intervene where it is my duty to do so, within the provisions of the statute. I shall conform strictly to the law; that is the position I intend to take.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the minister be responsible to the House of Commons for everything done by this commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The minister will be responsible for his own acts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He has got enough of that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The radio commission is under the Minister of Marine but his responsibility will not go the length of covering all the acts of the commission.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the commission is an irresponsible body.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The commission has the authority and the powers which have been granted to it by this house; that is all I can say.

Now, with regard to the proposed amendments submitted to the house. Since this commission has been in operation it has been noticed that there was something lacking in the law. As the house knows, the Prime Minister of England was kind enough to lend us a gentleman of great ability and of much experience in these matters. This gentleman, for the last ten years has been one of the leading officials of the British Broadcasting Corporation and we were fortunate in having the services of Major W. E. Gladstone Murray. This gentleman has covered the whole situation, he has travelled all over Canada and has heard representations from many different bodies. He has come to the conclusion that the act should be amended in the way in which it is proposed it shall be amended by this legislation. I think it is my duty to read to the house the interim report of Mr. Murray. When he has completed his survey, Mr. Murray will make a complete report but he thought it wise in the meantime to make an interim report which suggests and urges the amendments now before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would it not have been better to have waited until the final report was made?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason he made the interim report.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That would mean that we would have to wait until next session. The commission has been so handicapped with the law as it is at present, that it was thought desirable to proceed at this session. The following is a letter dated May 5, 1933, from Mr. Murray to myself:

In accordance with the arrangement of this morning, I have the honour to make certain submissions. Having had the opportunity of considering, not only the present state of organization of the commission, but also the public attitude across the dominion, I am convinced that it is of the greatest importance in the public interest that reforms should be effected during the present session of parliament. If, unfortunately, immediate action is not taken and the problem is left over until a later date, there is real danger that either the work of the commission will be paralyzed or will evolve in the wrong direction.

The situation is that public opinion is ready to have implemented the wish of parliament as expressed with almost unprecedented unanimity last summer, when the radio broadcasting bill became law. There is, however, a growing suspicion that the law is in certain respects defective, and that, unless it is amended, the unanimous wish of parliament will be thwarted. Guided by experience in connection with the parliamentary side of the B.B.C. during the past ten years, I would seriously commend to your attention the following reforms:—

(1) That the appointments under the broadcasting commission should not be made to conform to the Civil Service Act.

Conditions of broadcasting are essentially different from those which apply to the civil service, and this fortunately was recognized in the early days of the B.B.C. Broadcasting, while too important to be left to private enterprise, is nevertheless too sensitive to be brought fully into the machinery of state. If broadcasting is to flourish in Canada, the authority created by parliament should be empowered to choose, on its own responsibility, those who are to carry out the work.

(2) That detailed expenditure on the work of broadcasting, whether it be in the creation of programs, in the leasing or purchase of stations, or in the erection of new stations, should not be allowed to become the subject of debate on the floor of the House of Commons. The essence of public service broadcasting is to keep it clear of party political warfare. It seems to me that procedure by order in council would surmount the objection of inadequate public control.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Send that gentleman home.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The letter continues:

Moreover, as in the case of the British House of Commons, it is highly important to confine discussion on broadcasting to broad matters of policy, avoiding detail in all directions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is very kind of this gentleman.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It continues:

(3) That the revenue accruing from the licence fee paid by listeners should not be regarded as part of the consolidated fund, as apparently is the case at present.

As long as the moneys accruing from licence fees are included in the consolidated fund vote, so long will it be possible to suggest that licence revenue is part of general taxation. In point of fact, as the Prime Minister made clear in the House of Commons on April 21, 1933, the federal government is in the position of a trustee. When the owner of a radio receiver pays his licence fee, he is actually subscribing to a contract for service. If and when the licence revenue, as in Great Britain, becomes greater than is necessary for the purpose for which it was provided, then the state is obviously entitled to take the surplus. But, for the moment, with a national system in embryo, it is obvious that the contract between the listener and the state should be fully honoured. It is submitted that the only way to achieve this result and to prevent misrepresentation is to have the licence revenue paid over direct to the commission, there being, as in the case of the B.B.C., an annual independent audit and a report to parliament.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are we doing anything to this gentleman for lecturing parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: Because he does not agree with you there is no reason to talk that way.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is terrible to have the parliament of Canada spoken of in that way by that gentleman.

Mr. DURANLEAU: To continue:

(4) That there should be no impediment to a moderate scheme of development.

The commission is anxious, and, in my opinion, rightly so, to create new stations as opportunity permits, in order to extend effective coverage beyond the limits of what is possible under existing private ownership. Moreover, there is confident expectation on the part of the public that the commission will go forward in this way. It would appear, therefore, to be inadvisable to impose any reduction either in the main or supplementary votes which would imperil a moderate plan of development in the form of new stations.

In conclusion, sir, I would reemphasize my feeling of the urgency of these reforms, upon the early enactment of which may well depend the success or failure of a potentially great asset for the Canadian people.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) W. E. Gladstone Murray.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is one o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, may I ask that the house by unanimous consent revert to the order for motions so that I may have the privilege of introducing a motion which is more or less of a routine nature?

The house having reverted to the order for motions.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I beg to move:

That pursuant to a special order made on the 27th of March last, Bill No. 102, respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company be now read a first time and a second time and referred to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: May we refer back to the orders for motions in order to enable the report of the select standing committee on pensions to be submitted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house will revert back to the order for motions.

PENSIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I beg to present the second and final report of the special committee to which was referred Bill No. 78, to amend the Pensions Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the hon. member moving concurrence?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the bill be placed upon the order paper this day.

He said: I understand that the conclusions were unanimously arrived at with no divisions, and it is for that reason I make this motion.

Mr. ARTHURS: The reprinted bill has not yet come to my hand, but I expect it will be ready for distribution among the members within a very short time. It is expected this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): At this point would I be in order to ask the Prime Minister if the statement regarding importations of New Zealand butter has been made out?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is being prepared in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it will be submitted.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall have it in hand very shortly.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be done in a minute.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

PURCHASE OF STATIONS—APPOINTMENTS TO STAFF

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bennett for the second reading of Bill No. 99, to amend the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to add much to what I stated to the house this forenoon. I cannot add much to the interim report of Major Gladstone Murray, except to say that I hope hon. members opposite who are criticizing the radio commission at the present time will not deny that the commission is attempting to give the best service possible to the country. Their experience of three or four months has shown them that they need these amendments, and that is also the opinion of that great expert, Major Gladstone Murray.

It seems to me the opposition is not consistent when it criticizes the commission and at the same time denies the commission the tools which they think they need in order to make a success of their administration.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, without unduly detaining the house I desire to make one or two observations arising particularly from the observations of the Minister of Marine this morning. In the first place I desire to recall to the minds of hon. members the very wonderful spirit of unanimity manifested a year ago in this house when the principle of the control of radio broadcasting was before the house for decision. At that time, Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that hon. members to your left, with the exception of one, were all in favour of the principle embodied in the legislation. Therefore I do not at all give way to the hon. member for East Hamilton

[Mr. Arthurs.]

(Mr. Mitchell) when he suggested that hon. members to your immediate left were not altogether in favour of the principle of public ownership. I wish to assure the hon. member—

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to correct that statement; I never said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rather gathered that inference from the hon. member's remarks. I wish to assure the house that members of His Majesty's opposition sitting to the left of the Speaker have the finest record possible in regard to our public activities, and are as strongly behind the principle of public ownership as are any hon. members in this House of Commons.

I was greatly amazed to hear the Minister of Marine, when referring to criticisms from this side of the house, suggest that the attacks made upon this measure were inspired by a dislike for state control. May I remind the hon. member that we have been the unfailing champions of public ownership. The other day he and the administration of which he forms a part, in connection with another measure which I cannot mention at this time because it is contrary to the rules to refer to a previous debate of this session, most signally departed from the principle of state control, in connection with our railway systems of the Dominion of Canada.

In the first place the minister's defence consisted of reading a long and elaborate memorandum which was obviously and transparently prepared by one of the officials of the radio commission, or by the director of public relations. After hearing the complaints from Saskatchewan, the far west and Quebec in regard to the operation of the commission the minister submitted a memorandum obviously prepared by one of the officials I have named, and giving us a wonderful description of their various activities. He told us about the wonderful Christmas broadcast, about the symphony concerts, about military band concerts and, as a climax to the wonderful description, he told us that only the other day the people of Canada had the high privilege of listening over the radio to the broadcast of the inspired words of our Prime Minister, while in a foreign country.

Despite the obvious attempt of the minister to defend the operation of the radio commission since its inception, it is a fact they are to-day a very distinctly unpopular body throughout Canada. It is a fact that complaints received have been more than justified. The minister did not give us one reason which would justify the presentation of the bill we now have before us. What were the reasons he gave. He read us an interim report of Mr. Gladstone Murray. The report of Mr. Murray referred, in the first place, to section 1 of the bill, namely taking away from the Civil Service Commission the power of employing staffs, and vesting that power in the radio commission itself. Speaking for myself, may I say that I have not sufficient confidence in the present personnel of the radio commission to entrust them with control over their employees, and my distrust is shared by a great majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Here is an obvious and to my mind unwarrantable intrusion upon the fundamental activities of the Civil Service Commission. There has been a continual effort to lessen the powers of the Civil Service Commission. If this government is allowed to function for a longer time in the Dominion of Canada, the Civil Service Commission will be nothing but a pale anaemic ghost, without any power of its own. Those who believe in the Civil Service Commission, as such, cannot possibly support the principle of this bill.

Let us turn to clause 2. We are taking away from parliament the power to purchase, and placing it under the supervision of the governor in council. The only possible justification I can see, after reading the section, would be that occasions might arise where expedition would be proper. But when I heard read the memorandum which the minister submitted to parliament, I found it was inferred, if my recollection is correct, that it was considered improper for this Canadian parliament to discuss details of radio administration. That appears to have been the opinion of Mr. Gladstone Murray. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the sooner specialists brought from other lands cease to criticize the affairs of Canada or the parliamentarians of Canada, our duties and our functions and our responsibilities, the better it will be for the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are too many of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It seems that we cannot any longer settle our own problems with Canadian brains. We have to import specialists from other countries to settle our affairs,—and this from the party of "Canada first." Although Mr. Murray was Canadian born and undoubtedly an eminent gentleman I resent the repeated suggestion he made that members of this parliament should not be given the opportunity of discussing the details of radio administration. Here again we are setting up another independent body in Canada and giving them power over their own employees. According to the interim report read this morning by the Minister of Marine we are going to be deprived of the opportunity of discussing session after session the details of radio broadcasting and radio administration in our various communities. The complaints which are raised in Ontario, Quebec or the maritimes we cannot properly ventilate unless we discuss the details of that administration. Unless that gentleman is prepared to submit a more constructive final report than his interim report he should be immediately dismissed from further investigations of our Canadian radio system. We have never in this house passed legislation that more directly touched the lives of Canadian people than this Radio Broadcasting Act. That act, according to the minister himself—I am not agreeing with him—has been functioning well during the last year. The minister read an elaborately prepared memorandum to defend the actions of the commission. If it functioned so well why the necessity for this new legislation, brought into this house in the dying hours of the session without any knowledge by any member of this house as to the contents? As far as I am concerned I think it unfair on the part of the government to introduce this legislation at this late hour. I think the four paragraphs of the bill are absolutely indefensible, they infringe upon the Civil Service Act, take away the powers of parliament and recast the financial structure which was so ably defended by the Prime Minister himself a year ago.

In view therefore of these considerations, although I am in favour of the principle of public ownership of radio, I am obliged to oppose this bill.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house very long, but having been a member of the special committee on radio broadcasting which studied this problem very diligently last year I think it will not be out of order if I attempt to demonstrate that the powers which are now asked are not at all inconsistent with the unanimous report which was made by that committee last year. I have the report here and would like to quote a few propositions which were unanimously adopted by all members of the committee before being submitted to the house. In passing may I say that no committee worked more harmoniously and more earnestly at problems concerning Canadian life than that which last year studied the radio problem in Canada. Here are some of the main principles which were unanimously adopted:

Your committee further recommends that the commission be vested with the necessary powers to carry on the business of broadcasting in the Dominion of Canada, such powers to extend to the following matters:—

I will pass over a few items which are unnecessary for the purpose of my argument.

(j) subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada, to take over all broadcasting in Canada.
(k) to be vested with all other powers necessary or incidental for the fulfilment of the objects of the commission.

Last year when we were studying these problems we considered whether we would recommend the appointment of all officers and employees or artists by the radio commission, and we were unanimous in deleting from our report anything relating to the Civil Service Commission. In no part of our report do you find any reference to that commission, nor anything which could be taken as recommending parliament to take steps to see that radio artists or employees of the commission be appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I may go further and say that the first draft of the bill submitted to the house did not make any mention of the Civil Service Commission. It was only on the morning on which the bill was presented to the house, during the last days of the session, that we found a new draft which obliged the radio commission to have recourse to the Civil Service Commission for the appointment of its employees. Therefore I say that those who contend that the bill now before the house is in conflict with the report of the radio broadcasting commission last year are certainly mistaken.

Before going further may I interject a few remarks with respect to the criticism directed against the commission by the distinguished member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) with respect to the erection of a radio station in Montreal. First I must say in all sincerity that this criticism is wholly unfounded, because it has not been proven yet that these small stations of 100 watt power will come in conflict with the national hookup. If hon. members of this house would read the report of the committee they will find that section (c) provides:

That all stations, 100 watt and under, not required for the national system, remain under private ownership, but be regulated as to programs and advertising by the rules of the commission.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Therefore it was absolutely in order for the minister acting for the Minister of Marine during last fall to grant a 100 watt power radio station licence to La Patrie of Montreal. I think I can offer a very serious argument in support of that contention. Montreal is the biggest city in Canada. Its population exceeds one million people. While hon. members from the other party have found no fault with the fact that there are four or five high-power stations in Toronto, the population of which is certainly less than that of Montreal, in Montreal there was only one station providing French radio broadcasting, that is the station of La Presse. Why is there not room in Montreal for another radio station, especially when it is contemplated that probably the high-power station of La Presse may be acquired in the future by the national radio system? Now this criticism is absolutely unfounded and only made in an attempt to mislead the people of Canada. Some say that La Patrie is a Conservative organ. It is true that in recent months it has approved the policy of the federal government, but my hon. friend from Quebec East will recognize that some of the large shareholders and directors of that concern are Liberals who are supporting the Taschereau government in Quebec. Therefore if La Patrie supports this government in federal affairs and on the other hand the Taschereau government in Quebec, the least we can say is that La Patrie is rather an independent newspaper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Strike one!

Mr. GAGNON: Of course, this is only a matter of detail on which we must not dwell at great length. Last year, Mr. Graham Spry, who is not a Conservative but I understand is one of the directors of the Farmers' Sun of Ontario, a newspaper which is far from approving all the policies of the present government, came before the committee on radio broadcasting, as chairman and president of the Canadian Radio League, and presented a very carefully prepared report to which the members of the committee gave great attention. Mr. Spry himself explained before the committee how the Canadian Radio League met with the approval of many associations in Canada. He said:

National associations, labour and farm organizations with a membership of 279,308 have passed resolutions and have supported the Canadian Radio League. Sixteen university presidents, eight provincial superintendents of education, and other educational leaders are members of our council and have supported us.

The heads and other leaders of Roman Catholic, Anglican, United, Baptist and Presbyterian churches. Some of those religious organizations as bodies, have contributed in a small measure to the financing of the league. Leaders of women's organizations and women's organizations with a total membership of 683,800 are supporting us, and we have the suport of 70 publications with a combined circulation of over 2,000,000.

I could analyse the support in any way you wish. Geographically take for example the west. The legislature of the province of Alberta passed unanimously a resolution endorsing the public ownership of broadcasting in Canada.

Now, sir, what did this distinguished gentleman propose to the commission? He proposed the organization of a national system of radio broadcasting which would be put in operation in the course of three or five years. If hon. gentlemen opposite are interested to read the memorandum which was submitted to the committee by Mr. Spry they will find that for the first year, for instance, he recommended that the sum of $1,400,000 be devoted to the establishment of a system of radio broadcasting. What has been done? Last year the government asked this house to vote $400,000, and this year the house is being asked to vote another $1,000,000, so these demands by the government have been wholly consistent with the recommendation made to the committee last year.

When we hear hon. gentlemen opposite criticize the present broadcasting commission we are amazed to think that they would expect the commission to establish a broadcasting network in two months, when the president of the Canadian Radio League told us last year that it would be better to proceed very slowly, that the best way to deal with the problem would be to take three to five years to carry out that project. In providing, under the present bill, that the commission shall be entrusted with all the money paid by radio set owners the government is entirely consistent with the unanimous report of the committee of last year, which recommended to this house that all revenues obtained from licence fees and the sale of advertising, and other revenues accessory to the business of broadcasting, should be used by the commission in the interests of radio.

Major Gladstone Murray, a man of great experience, who also appeared before the committee last year recommends that all moneys paid by the owners of radio sets should be left in the hands of the commission. Why should hon. members opposite now try to throw discredit on such a distinguished gentleman as Major Gladstone Murray? It has been incorrectly stated that he is a stranger. Major Murray is a distinguished Canadian; he was born in British Columbia, educated in Montreal at McGill university, and went to England at the age of twenty. When Major Murray was sufficiently competent to leave Canada at that age and become general chairman and director of publications of such a wonderful organization as the British Broadcasting Commission by the time he was thirty years of age it does seem to me that hon. members of this house ought to applaud his success and congratulate him instead of trying to discredit his ability. When he appeared before the committee last year he was not acting on his own impulse; he came because his presence was desired by all political parties. I remember that the nicest compliment paid to Major Gladstone Murray last year came from the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who sits in the extreme left corner of this chamber. That committee was not composed only of Conservatives; I am happy to say that among its members were two very distinguished Liberals, namely the hon. members for Richelieu, the former Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) and the hon. member for North Waterloo, the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler). I am sure these two hon. gentlemen will agree that Major Murray is a very efficient and experienced gentleman with regard to radio broadcasting. When he came again this year to help the commission it was not at his own suggestion, or in order to impose his views on the Canadian government; he came here because the government and the radio commission asked for the benefit of his experience and wisdom. I think we should be glad to have had his valuable suggestions and the benefit of his ability in this matter.

I should like to conclude my humble remarks, Mr. Speaker, by saying that it is absolutely incorrect and unjust to attempt to mislead the people by stating both in and out of this house that the Canadian government is imposing an additional burden on the taxpayers of Canada by voting $1,000,000 for radio broadcasting. This money is paid by the owners of radio sets. I think when the government raised the licence fee from $1 to $2 it entered into a contract with the owners of radio sets by which it bound itself to make available the best possible programs and to improve the whole system of radio broadcasting.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I rise in order to express my dissatisfaction with the suggestion made this morning by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) in his reference to the new station operated by La Patrie in Montreal. In answer to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) the Minister of Marine said, "Well, you were satisfied when you controlled everything in Montreal, newspapers, radio stations and so on," leaving the impression that the Conservative party was not properly treated when radio broadcasting came under the Department of Marine, which I had the honour to administer for some years. Let me declare here—and I do not fear any successful contradiction—that when I administered that department radio broadcasting was administered fairly, and all parties received their fair share of the time allotted to all stations. There was no discrimination with regard to the Conservative party in Montreal; if any complaints are to be made I think we are entitled to make them. During the election of 1926 in particular we were not given the same advantages that were afforded the other party, in our judgment. We may have been wrong, but some of our people were under the impression that we were not properly treated by the stations then existing. When I was Minister of Marine and had charge of radio broadcasting I did all I could to satisfy the requests which came to the department, and I do not think the Conservative party can complain with regard to the broadcasting of speeches in the city of Montreal.

My good friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) justifies the issuance of the licence to La Patrie by saying that small stations of one hundred watts and less do not come under the control of the radio commission. That may be true, but in making his argument I thought he sought to justify a stronger station in Montreal because in Ontario there are several powerful broadcasting stations. I do not object so much to the issuing of a licence to the newspaper La Patrie, but I do object to the procedure that was followed. I am not sure whether in the report of the radio committee of last year it was recommended that new licences should not be issued pending the formation of the commission, or for a certain period after it was formed, in order not to complicate the work of the commission; at all events it was the understanding between all members of the committee that nothing should be done by the department, in the way of issuing new licences, which would have that effect. Certainly the issuing of further licences is an obstacle to the work of the commission, and later on it will encounter difficulties when it comes to acquire stations already established. I think it is only from that point of view that it is more or less undesirable that new stations should be established now, since we have the commission in charge of radio broadcasting in Canada. It is only from the point of view of the embarrassment which these stations will cause the commission that I advance my objection. By the terms of this bill, I fear that the radio commission will be permitted to organize a new technical and clerical body, and I do not see any need for the setting up of an expensive technical staff to surround the commission or to be engaged in its service. We have at the present time in the Department of Marine experts whose reputation cannot be disputed by anyone. In the radio branch of that department there are experts who are regarded everywhere as men of the greatest ability and the widest knowledge. Indeed, if you go outside Canada and talk to people who are interested in radio broadcasting, and who know something about the administration of that important appliance of science, you will hear that there is no man better qualified in Canada, indeed in the world, than Commander Edwards of the Marine department. We have Commander Edwards and other employees of the department and I say that they are competent and quite capable of giving to the radio commission whatever technical advice may be required. I repeat, we do not need to create a new body of technical men because it will mean purely and simply a duplication of systems, and we know that at the present time we have too much duplication of services in the administration of public affairs. Let us use the services of those competent men whom we already have in the radio branch of the Department of Marine. If we do so we shall need very few extra men to take care of the operations of the radio commission in Canada.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): I did not intend to take part in this debate but this morning I heard again some criticism from the other side especially on two points—first, the issuing of a licence for a one hundred watt station to La Patrie in Montreal, and secondly criticism with respect to the appointees on the radio commission, one such criticism coming especially from the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

So far as the licence to La Patrie is concerned, I am the one responsible for it and I have no apologies to offer the house. I did it when I was Acting Minister of Marine because I thought it was the proper thing to do. At that time there were five stations in Toronto and only two in Montreal. There were in Toronto three stations of five hundred watts each, plus one station of nine thousand watts, and another of five thousand watts, as against one station of five thousand watts in Montreal, La Presse, and another station of four hundred watts, Marconi. All I did was to add one station in Montreal, a station of one hundred watts, and this resulted in these comparative figures: fifteen thousand watts in Toronto and five thousand five hundred in Montreal. I took it upon myself to do that because it came in the ordinary routine of business and because I considered it in the public interest. The criticism that has been offered in this matter is not that it was a wrong thing to do, not that these people were not entitled to any station, not that they would manage it badly. The sole criticism is founded on the fact that La Patrie is a Conservative paper. I do not think that criticism can be defended, but rightly or wrongly I did as I have indicated, and if I had to do it again I would do the same thing.

The second point is this. My hon. friend from Quebec East again attacked the personnel of the commission. The three principals of the commission are the president, Mr. Charlesworth, the vice-president, Mr. Thomas Maher and Colonel Steel, and respecting these gentlemen all I can say is that we entirely disagree with my hon. friend from Quebec East. We are proud of these appointees, who have done very good work up to now. They are only beginning and it will take a certain time before they can finish their work. They have to please everybody all over Canada and everyone knows it is extremely difficult to please everybody, especially when you are dealing with a population of ten millions scattered over nine provinces with different tastes, different ideals, different traditions and so on. But there is one point particularly I wish to bring forward and it is this. I resent very much the criticism made by my hon. friend from Quebec East against the appointment of the vice-president of the radio commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not say a word about him to-day.

Mr. DUPRE: For the last three or four months my hon. friend has delighted—

Mr. LAPOINTE: All right.

Mr. DUPRE: —in criticizing Mr. Maher, trying to minimize his work and his efforts. I am to a certain extent responsible for that appointment and all I can say is that up to now that gentleman has proved highly efficient, broadminded and very active. We placed great hopes in him and I may say that they have been more than fulfilled. The only people Mr. Maher has not been able to please are in Liberal quarters.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL: That is, half the population of Canada.

Mr. MANION: Not after the last election.

Mr. DUFF: Wait until the next election.

Mr. DUPRE: From every part of Canada, with the exception perhaps of Quebec East or Liberal constituencies around Quebec, we have received nothing but praise for the work done by Mr. Maher and we are very proud of his appointment as vice-president of the commission. He has done well up to now and will in the future justify what I have just said regarding him.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): When the appointment of a radio commission first came before parliament for discussion, the consensus of opinion was that the commission would be kept out of politics, and my hon. friends opposite were unanimous in their expression of that view. I remember hearing the Prime Minister say that these commissioners would not be politicians and that the commission would be a non-political body. Now it has been made a political body, for if you can find a more thorough politician than the organizer for the province of Quebec, Mr. Maher, then I am at a loss to know where he is. The commission has been made a political commission, and now an effort is being made to turn its staff into a political staff. We have a bill here to create a new Civil Service Commission; it will be a brand new commission appointed by this government. Should we entrust the commission with the appointment of friends of the government, leaving that power wholly in their hands?

I wish my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) had been in this house in 1917 and had heard Sir Robert Borden and the stalwarts of the Conservative party at that time defending the soundness of appointments by merit and the creation of a Civil Service Commission. The Conservative party of to-day is simply trying to undo what was done by the Conservative party of the past. First it was penitentiaries, now it is radio and the year before it was post office. The government is simply making a political organization of this service and I am sure the people of Canada will look upon it in that light. It is all right for the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) to say that he has no apologies to make, that he is proud of his appointees, but why did he grant a licence to La Patrie twenty-four hours before the appointment of the commission? Why such precipitation? Did he not trust the new commission to give La Patrie what it was entitled to?

Mr. DUPRE: That application was before the department for many weeks and it came up in the course of the daily routine. There is no doubt it could have been signed before and I do not know why it was not. I have nothing to say except that it came before me and I signed it in the ordinary routine. My hon. friend can be assured that this matter had been in the department at least two or three weeks.

Mr. POULIOT: Why did not the minister give it the six months' hoist?

Mr. MARCIL: I think the Solicitor General has made the case still worse. The minister went to Spain and enjoyed a very nice vacation in that country. We cannot afford these things with the budget of Canada in its present position. We cannot afford to create a new commission when we already have a competent body in the Department of Marine. This department is made up of Canadians and it seems to me to be a mistake to employ a stranger to come to tell us what to do. The government is trying to get away from governmental and parliamentary responsibility. This commission is to receive the money of Canadians and is to spend it as it likes subject to the approval of the governor in council. Parliament will have nothing to say. We are running away from our responsibility. When we go back to our constituencies and hear complaints of the radio commission we must tell our people that even though we have their mandate to represent them in this house, we have nothing to do with the matter, it rests in the hands of three appointees. That will not work at all. Canadians are accustomed to responsible government but I am sorry to say that we are drifting away from it. There will finally be a revulsion in public opinion throughout the whole of Canada and a desire to go back to parliamentary representation and parliamentary government. We have received the mandate of the people to act for them and we will have to account for all these commissions. Thirty-three years ago when I was a young member of parliament the people could say to me: you are young and active and you can do things; we trust you. But to-day they say: you are powerless, everything is in the hands of a radio commission, a soldiers' commission, a pension commission and a civil service commission. We are departing from that most sacred of principles, parliamentary control and parliamentary responsibility.

The Solicitor General is a man of learning and a man of letters and he remembers the fight which took place in Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces to obtain parliamentary government and parliamentary responsibility. We are drifting back to the old days when the government with a self-appointed council could dispose of the moneys of the people and the representatives of the people had nothing to say. We can remember when the representatives in the legislature at Quebec were debarred from voting a dollar of public money. Is it the ambition of hon. friends opposite to return to such a form of government? I hope not. They are Canadians like ourselves, they are proud of the position which Canada occupies as the foremost sister nation of the empire and we should not override, overrule and overthrow the sacred principles of responsible government in order to make a few political appointments which will mostly be wiped out by the incoming administration. Hon. friends opposite are reasonable men. Do they think that Canada will stand for long for the position in which this government is at the present time? The salaries of the members of the tariff board are being increased while the members of the old tariff board were dismissed twenty-four hours after this party came into power. This new board is to be merely a fact finding body, it will have no responsibility or power except to report to the government. The government can do what it likes with its recommendations. The salaries of these men are being increased when the men and women of Canada, the charwomen, the members of parliament and the civil servants have had their salaries decreased. All statutory increases have been withheld for the last two years.

I am sorry that the Prime Minister of Canada, talented as he is, patriotic as I think he is, has come forward and set such an example to the people of Canada. He has stated that there are two measures which shall apply; if a man occupies an exalted position, he is entitled to an increase in salary but if he does not occupy such a position, he will have to take a cut. This session we are voting $70,000,000 in new taxes. I wish hon. members would come down to the part of the country I represent to see the conditions which prevail. There has not been a sawmill in operation for the last two years; taxes have not been paid and the people are forced to live from hand to mouth on herrings, potatoes and whatever else they can get. Yet we come here and increase the salary of this, that and the other gentleman. We create new commissions and we abdicate our powers.

We have even reached the bench, the most sacred institution we have in this country. Outstanding men are to be forced to retire from their judicial offices in order that new judges may be appointed by this government. The Prime Minister is a distinguished lawyer and I can remember his saying when in opposition that no appointee of his would be raised to the bench except for his judicial qualifications. Let him look over the list of appointments which have been made since he became Prime Minister and then repeat that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be glad to.

Mr. MARCIL: That is not the impression of the country. Some of these appointments have been considered as purely political. There is a wrangle now going on in the province of Quebec over the new appointments to be made to the superior court. I admit that the plums of office belong to the friends of the party in power, but there should be a limit.

We should consider the financial position of the country at the present time. If we go on abdicating all our powers, we might as well close up this house and the Senate. There will be no need of placing this additional burden upon the overburdened taxpayers. It is unfortunate for the Prime Minister that he should be presiding over the destinies of Canada at the most unfavourable time in its whole history, and apparently he is trying to undo much of what he did in 1930. During the short session of 1930 he came here and raised the tariff probably thinking it would bring about what he had in view. But what has been the result? Since that time he has been trying to undo what was done in 1930, first with the mother country, to-morrow probably with the United States and the day after perhaps with France. He is trying to get back to the policy of the Liberal party which is the policy of all the men who have led Canada. Canada cannot be self-contained. Canada cannot live by itself. What do we need at the present time? Markets, and nothing but markets.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it was radio.

Mr. MARCIL: That is an illustration. There are thousands and thousands of people in this country who have no radio and have no means of getting one. What we are trying to get now is markets for our products. Yesterday we passed legislation for the creation of a new board in connection with the joint operation of the railways in Canada. If Canada had continued as it was in 1911, when that great Canadian presided over the destinies of this country, or if we had continued the policy we followed in this country when I occupied your chair, Mr. Speaker, and when I heard every man from western Canada ask, not for one but for half a dozen transcontinental railways the country would not now be in the difficult position in which it finds itself. I was old enough to hear from the lips of Sir Charles Tupper when he came to Queen's Hall in Montreal to explain the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, and when the country was afraid that it had sold out a second time to the Canadian Pacific, that western Canada would become the granary of the world and that Halifax, from where he came, would be the new Liverpool of America. But in those days we had a moderate tariff compared with our tariff to-day. Sir John A. Macdonald had a moderate tariff. The Conservative party had always had a moderate tariff. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had a moderate tariff, and it is suicide for Canada to-day to raise its tariffs against the other nations of the world.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I would remind him that the discussion is not on the tariff but on the second reading of the radio bill.

Mr. MARCIL: I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for being carried away by my faith in these old-time notions of parliamentary government. The only thing I have to say about radio is this. It is unfortunate that the radio commission has been made a purely political combination, that its personnel should be political appointees, and that now the radio commission should be trying to evade the Civil Service Act by making all its appointments independent of the Civil Service Commission. It is unfortunate because such a policy will be condemned by at least half the population of Canada, and by its present policy this government is condemning the traditional policy of the Conservative party as it was laid down in 1918 by Sir Robert Borden, then leader of that party, when he brought the outside service under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Cimmission.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my criticism of this bill is in the main confined to the first section. Had it not been for that I think I could have seen my way clear to have supported the other two clauses. Like the majority of the members of this house I gave hearty support to the principle of national control of our broadcasting system. There is no occasion at this time to go into the reasons why we thought that that was the best system for the Canadian people. I still believe, in spite of some of the difficulties that have arisen, that our hopes lie in that direction. It is true that difficulties have arisen. Perhaps that is inevitable in view of the fact that we have to trust the carrying out of our ideals to weak and imperfect human instruments, and it may always be that way.

Criticism has been made of conditions prevailing in broadcasting in the west, and particularly in Saskatchewan. I do not know what the conditions may be in Manitoba since I have not had any representations from any of the people there. For my part I am prepared to concede this, that it is only natural that in a transition period there should be some inconvenience and some disarrangement of the former conditions. We cannot overhaul and rebuild a house and live in it at the same time without being subjected to some inconvenience.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN: For my part I am prepared to recognize that fact so far as the technical end of the work is concerned. My thought is that if we fail to give the commission the finances for which they are asking at the present time, possibly we may only prolong this period of inconvenience and dissatisfaction. So on that point I am not going to offer any criticism.

I think we have some reason, however, to suppose that from another standpoint the commission is deserving of criticism. Certain public statements which the chairman of the commission has made would indicate that in some respects he is not temperamentally fitted to be at the head of the commission, for he seems inclined to resent, and to rush into print to repudiate, any statements that are made in criticism of his actions. Being a public servant he will have to learn to take criticism without being too ready to rush into print. The very fact that he was reported the other day to have said that anybody who criticized the radio commission on the ground that it was not functioning properly was either a liar or a fool indicates that the chairman needs a little advice as to that courtesy which is due to the public from a man occupying the position he does. However, as I said, I have an objection to raise to the first section of the bill, and it is to the proposal that the employees of the commission shall be chosen purely at the will of the radio commission, that appointments shall be taken out entirely from under the control of the Civil Service Commission. This radio commission is to be given the power to set up an entirely new organization of its own in spite of the fact that we already have in the employ of the government men who are well qualified from their experience to deal with these matters. What does that mean? It means the possibility of the setting up of a very expensive organization, and if that organization is set up without any control by parliament we have reason to suppose that at least it might become so expensive that the people of Canada would not be able to bear the expenditure, and we might be faced later on with the proposal to raise the licence fee, which has already been raised from one to two dollars. Who knows, if we put into the hands of the radio commission the power to create such an organization as I have suggested, that it might not become so expensive that the people of Canada would rise in revolt against the whole system and would recede from the position we have taken, which I think is endorsed by the great majority of the people of this country, that radio should be under the control of a national system. So there lies in this the danger of completely destroying our national system of broadcasting. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, and for that only, I feel I cannot give my support to this bill. For the reasons I have indicated other sections of the bill may commend themselves to me, especially in view of the fact that as soon as possible the disabilities arising from unsatisfactory methods of broadcasting must be removed.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has taken cognizance of section 3 subparagraph 14 of the bill. I believe in this paragraph he is creating a precedent that is bound to have an ill effect on every department of government. He will recall that during the present session of parliament the Minister of Justice introduced a bill to modify the mounted police legislation and to authorize the department to spend, over and above the estimates voted by parliament, whatever revenues would accrue. I objected to that part of the bill, and it was withdrawn.

To-day we are doing exactly the same thing. We are authorizing the radio commission to expend money voted by parliament, and they are being given the right by statute to expend sums of money over and above estimates voted by parliament, and without the control of parliament. I believe the Prime Minister will readily realize that such a precedent would be detrimental to other departments. No other department has been granted the right to expend moneys which have accrued through revenues. As a rule all these receipts are credited to the receiver general.

Such a provision obtained last year with regard to the radio commission. The Prime Minister himself told us that the appropriations voted for the radio commission represented the income received from the sale of licences, and that in no way shape or form would the moneys received from radio licences be exceeded. Here however we are authorizing the commission to spend money voted by parliament, and beyond that we are creating two sets of estimates for the department, one voted by parliament yearly, and the other consisting of money which will accrue from rendering services mentioned in the bill. It is quite true that in the next section further provisions are made concerning appropriations. We must remember however that these moneys divide themselves into two classes, one being the estimates voted yearly by parliament representing the income received from the sale of radio licences, and the remainder money the commission will have the right to spend without the authority of parliament. I am calling the attention of the Prime Minister to this fact because in the house we have always fought shy of authorizing any department of the crown to spend money, from whatever source, except that voted by parliament.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee on radio which sat last year I should like to offer one or two observations on the bill. Those of us who were members of the committee and did not belong to the party in power were, I believe, entirely fair in our attitude when we supported the idea of the nationalization of radio as a great public benefit and public utility. There was no difference of opinion, and we supported the report unanimously. Again in the house we supported the bill unanimously, when it was introduced by the Prime Minister. I am still one hundred per cent in favour of the nationalization of radio. I say without any intention of giving offence that I am not quite satisfied with matters as they have been conducted by the commission. I am willing to make due allowance, and to admit that possibly the commission has not had sufficient time to make good on the work which they have undertaken. As I say, I am quite willing to make some allowance in that regard. I should like to say, further, without intending to give offence to the Prime Minister that I believe he made an error in making appointments, and that the public, and perhaps parties opposed to him, lost just a bit of confidence in the genuineness of the statements made by the government to the effect that politics would not enter into the work of the radio broadcasting commission.

As I said before, we accepted in good faith all assurances, and embodied in the report a clause to the effect that there should be no political influence of any kind either in appointments to the board or in the conduct of the work of the commission, after it had been established. I criticized, as did some other members, the appointment of one of the members of the commission—not on any score of policy, but because it did not seem to me to be in accord with the report of the committee, or with the promises made by the Prime Minister, when the bill was in the house, to the effect that there would be no political influence in connection with appointments.

I cannot agree with the Prime Minister in his definition of what constitutes a political appointment. I will say that I have had a short meeting with one of the commissioners, to whom reference has often been made, the gentleman from the province of Quebec, and I had the pleasure of receiving his assurance in the presence of other hon. members in the committee to the effect that so far as he was concerned no political influence would be wielded in carrying on the work of the commission. In the meantime, at least, I am willing to take him at his word. I think at the outset one mistake was made.

Mr. JACOBS: What does the hon. member propose to do with politicians who are out of a job?

Mr. EULER: I would elect them to parliament. The chief point of contention in regard to this bill seems to be that there has been a political bias exercised in appointments and in the work of the commission. Very naturally, denials have been made by the government. I do not believe—and I do not blame the commission for this, but mention it at this time so that it may serve as a warning in the future—that the granting of the licence to or what took place subsequently in connection with the Windsor radio station was entirely free of party politics. I make that statement, trusting that in future, whatever the commission may do, it will see to it that there will be no further interference, so far as political influence is concerned. I am willing to say that as only three or four months have elapsed since the commission was appointed, it is not reasonable to expect that within such a short time they can properly rearrange the whole system of radio distribution so that everybody will be satisfied, or so that we will have a perfect system of radio broadcasting. That is not to be expected and for my part I am inclined to be liberal and to make allowance for the difficulties of the work which has to be done.

I find that the bill deals with three things. First it proposes to take from the purview of the Civil Service Commission the appointment of all employees connected with the work of the radio commission. Secondly, it proposes to vest in the governor in council the approval of all capital expenditures in connection with broadcasting stations. And lastly, although I am not quite clear as to the meaning of the third clause, it proposes to give to the commission the right to expend all moneys they receive—I presume by way of licence fees, or revenues received from advertising, and so on. I have not a great deal of fault to find with the last clause, because when the committee drew up its report I favoured the principle that the commission should collect the licence fees. I feel that if it were a responsible commission, a good commission, a commission that wanted to do its duty, it should be entrusted with the work of collecting the licence fees and expending the money for the purpose for which the commission was created. I do not entirely agree with some of my hon. friends on this side that all those moneys must necessarily be voted by parliament. The commission would be limited absolutely to the amount of licence fees which it collects and can spend no more. I can see no very good reason why we should depart from the principle that is observed in the conduct of the Canadian National Railways. Ever since we took over the national railways the revenues collected by those railways in the ordinary conduct of business, charges for freight, passengers and so on, were expended by the board of the railway without reference to the House of Commons. I have not a great deal of fault to find with that, because I believe that if you have a commission worth its salt, one that should have encouragement to go on and do a good job, you have to give it a certain freedom of action. If it is not deserving of such freedom then, of course, it should be replaced.

With regard to the sections of the bill—I am taking them in reverse order—I know they are the result of the recommendations of Major Gladstone Murray, an expert adviser who comes from the British Broadcasting Corporation and has made an investigation into the Canadian situation. I receive these recommendations with a great deal of respect, but I am constrained to say that merely because Major Murray made them it does not necessarily follow that we must approve of them in every particular. In conversation with him the other day and with some of my colleagues on that committee this matter came up; I cannot see why all the employees of the radio broadcasting commission should be removed from the control of the Civil Service Commission. I quite grant this, that as far as the technical advisers and technical officers and artists are concerned there is good reason why the commission itself should make those appointments. I should say the commission should make them. But when you come to the clerical staff, stenographers and so on—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Secretaries.

Mr. EULER: Secretaries if you like, and clerks engaged in the office of the commission, I see no reason why they should not be subject to appointment by the Civil Service Commission just the same as similar employees in any other department of the government. While it may not mean a very great deal at this time, while the number of employees is not very great, this matter of radio broadcasting is a very big thing and may expand in such a way that in time there will be a great many employees. I think there is real cause for criticism by those on this side who believe that, whether or not it will be exercised, there is at least room under this provision for the exercise of political patronage. For my part, as I have said from the beginning, I would like to see as many opportunities as possible for the exercise of such patronage removed. The radio broadcasting commission cannot be as successful as it ought to be if any government exercises political patronage in the conduct of such a national undertaking.

As far as the substitution of the governor in council for the parliament of Canada is concerned in the matter of expenditures on capital account, I have not a very great deal to say except again I do not see why we should depart from the principle that we observe in connection with the Canadian National Railways. When the Canadian National Railways require appropriations for capital expenditures they go not to the governor in council, but to the parliament of Canada, and properly so. I see no reason for varying that practice. The only apparent reason that was given I think was that since parliament meets only once a year and there is an interval of perhaps seven or eight months when parliament is not in session, and the commission might find it necessary to acquire a station here or there or perhaps build a station, it would be prejudicial to the work of the commission if they had to wait until parliament met to get an appropriation for capital expenditure. There may be a little weight in that argument, but I do not think there is enough to justify us in violating the principle.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while in some respects I am in favour of the provisions of the bill, I feel that the government might very well make a distinction as far as appointments are concerned, they could segregate the technical officers and have those appointed by the radio commission itself but as far as other clerical employees are concerned they could leave them for appointment by the Civil Service Commission. And they should make no change as far as capital expenditures are concerned but should have those authorized by parliament in the same manner as capital expenditures are authorized for the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. RAYMOND D. MORAND (East Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take a very few minutes to discuss one or two phases of this situation. The main criticisms that are offered at the present time to this bill are only two or three; one the appointment to the commission of a man with some political background. Now I have been in the house long enough and I know my own people long enough to realize that as it was necessary to appoint one French-Canadian upon that commission I doubt very much if you could find one who had not been in politics somewhere. I am quite sure that hon. members on the other side would not expect us to take one of their friends particularly, consequently, we have taken one from this side. However, that is not a new principle, that applies to the appointment of our judges, and I am sure we cannot and will not say that our judges are guided by political consideration in their judgments or the work that they do.

Another thing I find a little difficult to get quite straight in my mind is the objection that the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has to the station at Windsor. He complains that there was some political bias in respect to this station. There were two stations in that part of the country, that were thought to be somewhat political, but they were amalgamated and now there is only one. Is there no way to please hon. gentlemen opposite? Even for removing them they still find fault.

A fact that appears to be overlooked in respect to this question is that radio broadcasting is a business. It is not a department of government, it is purely a business. The hon. member for North Waterloo in connection with two of the clauses of this bill made reference to the Canadian National Railways. Why not carry the principle a little further? To my mind it is just as sensible to say that the Civil Service Commission should appoint the men working for the Canadian National as those employed by this commission. Can one conceive of the Civil Service Commission holding an examination for a prima donna for instance or someone who is going to appear before the microphone at a broadcasting station? The thing on the face of it is ridiculous. It might be that for a few appointments here in Ottawa such as stenographers, and so on, the Civil Service Commission might act, but from time to time this business of broadcasting will be taking over stations throughout Canada, will be employing technical men and artists, consequently it is surely ridiculous to think that the Civil Service Commission must pass upon whether these people can or cannot be hired and appear, or shall have their salaries set by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. EULER: I made an exception in the case of the technical officers.

Mr. MORAND: Well, others did not. To me that is so evident that I cannot imagine why such an argument is made. The Civil Service Commission are not losing anything they ever had, because they have never had anything to do with this new business. Again I say one might just as well expect them to appoint the engineers, firemen, switchmen and so on all over the Canadian National system.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Bring us something stronger.

Mr. MORAND: Maybe you would not understand it.

Mr. GOTT: Too deep for him.

Mr. MORAND: As far as the financial feature is concerned, it is simply a question of making definite the ideas which were both understood and written in the report which was unanimously brought into this house. The intention was, and I believe still is—and I think the feeling is quite unanimous—that money received from the broadcasting business should be used in order to give Canada proper programs and proper radio stations. That is all that is done here.

With regard to paragraph 2, I do not think it makes a great deal of difference in the practical working out of the matter whether parliament or the governor in council has this power; what goes to the governor in council usually comes to parliament later, so practically there is not a great deal of difference.

We have been hearing a great deal with regard to changes in wave lengths and interference. Certainly there will be trouble. I do not think anything could better justify the action taken by the committee last year than this tremendous effort that is being made to halt the nationalization of broadcasting. It is my firm belief that if this action had not been taken last year it never would have been taken in Canada, because the opposition has been very great. It took a government with a great deal of courage to put through the nationalization scheme last year. Personally I am just as strong now in my belief that this is the proper way to handle the radio situation, and I think in all fairness we can ask the members of this house and the people of Canada to give the commission a chance to work out its own salvation and deal with a most difficult problem, even though there may be a good deal of trouble during the period of transition.

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has been very critical of the operation of station CKOK in Windsor. I venture to assert that he has been prompted by the suggestions of United States citizens operating stations in the city of Detroit, and that the ammunition he has been using has been furnished by those operators. Let me quote from page 3696 of Hansard for April 14:

> Mr. Euler: My hon. friend will pardon me if I remind him that my statement was made in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), I think it was, in which he attacked Ontario and Quebec with regard to tariffs. I had no intention of making a vicious attack; I do not think I ever made a vicious attack on anyone or anything in my life. Would the hon. gentleman say that this was a fair attack to be made by a western member?

I want to say that the hon. member for North Waterloo has made a decidedly vicious attack on the operation of station CKOK. The Border Cities Star of Saturday, April 22, quotes the hon. member as follows:

> I am not an expert in radio matters—

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I should like to get home before the grass gets much greener. The hon. gentleman is entirely out of order. What has this to do with the bill before the house?

Mr. GOTT: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this is the first time I have addressed the house this session while the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has been on his feet continually with regard to minor, petty questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand the hon. member to be quoting a report of what was said in this house.

Mr. NEILL: I understand that he is doing so, and surely that is not in order. My point of order, however, is that the discussion being carried on by the hon. member has nothing to do with the second reading of this bill, and I ask for your ruling on that point.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, since this house opened at three o'clock we have listened to amplifications of principles that had nothing to do with radio. Is it to be expected that men should sit here and listen to that sort of thing, with your permission, sir, without replying? The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) referred to the whole question of the operation of this station CKOK in Windsor, and the hon. gentleman who represents a nearby constituency is replying; that is all.

Mr. EULER: If I might make a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, it would be to let the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) go as far as he likes.

Mr. GOTT: The Border Cities Star of Saturday, April 22, contains this front page heading:

> United States Influence Seen in CKOK-CJGC Merger

There is also a picture of the hon. member for North Waterloo on the front page. The Border Cities Star quotes the hon. member as follows:

> I am not an expert in radio matters, but I am wondering why they should establish a station or continue a station at the extreme edge of the country rather than in central Ontario, thus reaching what is usually known as the western peninsula of the province. I wish the minister would say something in that regard.

In view of the fact that the minister did not say anything in that regard I will tell the hon. member that this is one of the most important sections of the whole Dominion of Canada, and I think it is entitled to a first class radio station. Station CKOK is one of the best equipped radio stations in Canada, and if the hon. member had his ear to the ground he would cease his criticism of it. The hon. gentleman seeks to imply that station CKOK has been really a United States station, while the fact is that thirty-five of the forty-two employees of that station are Canadian citizens and residents of this country. I have here many newspaper clippings, but I am going to read only one to prove that the hon. member, to use a slang expression, is all wet with regard to station CKOK. I quote again:

Politics and "Influence"

CKOK, the border's broadcasting station, is under fire from the stronghold of local opponents. The management of the station has been panned and accused because it broadcasts the programs of the Columbia network, a United States organization.

Operators of the station have been accused of using "political influence" to get the licence to operate. Rather amused are some of the onlookers, who recall the election of 1930. The Conservatives were far from satisfied at the treatment of a local organization which it is believed was promised the radio licence by Mr. King, the leader of the defeated party.

In the face of this, however, the present owners of the station are still accused of operating only through "political" influence.

I rise merely to put this clipping on record and to ask the hon. member for North Waterloo if he will not give us a little cooperation and support, instead of continuing to criticize one of the best radio stations in Canada, so that CKOK may have a fair trial and the people of western Ontario may have a station by means of which they can hear Canadian programs instead of being compelled to listen to United States programs all the time. Station CKOK has reached out and obtained business in the city of Detroit, and I believe the jealousy which has arisen because of that fact has been responsible for much of the opposition to this station.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has quoted something in which reference was made to myself as having promised to some one a radio licence or something of the kind. Seeing that I am in the house, and that it might in consequence be assumed that having listened to that quotation I agreed with it, I want to say now that never at any time, directly or indirectly, did I promise anyone anything of the sort or in that connection.

Mr. GOTT: I gladly accept the statement of the right hon. gentleman, but let me say that rumors to this effect were circulated throughout the county of Essex prior to the election of 1930.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose Bill No. 99, an act to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1932. May I say that when the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific railway bill was before the house I opposed that measure. I opposed that legislation for more than one reason. In the first place I took exception to it because it came to the House of Commons in an indirect way. It came into this house through the Senate and my contention was that a bill of that nature ought to be brought before the Commons directly and not indirectly. I argued that it should first have come before the representatives of the people, men elected by the people, and not before the Senate, which is the result of indirect election. Because of the mistake by the government in that respect I opposed that irresponsible legislation. I opposed it for another reason, namely, that it was based on a report which had been prepared by a non-Canadian commission. The report was submitted by the Duff commission, which was not a full-fledged Canadian commission inasmuch as it included representatives from Great Britain and the United States. I pointed out that such representation was unnecessary, because in my opinion the time had come in the history of Canada when there was sufficient ability to be found right in this dominion to deal with matters affecting transportation and kindred subjects. I said that we should appoint our own board or commission, a purely Canadian body, to investigate the transportation problem and report accordingly.

I oppose the legislation now before us on somewhat the same grounds. I understand that there has been dragged into this discussion—and quite rightly—the report of Mr. Gladstone Murray, an expert of the British Broadcasting Corporation, a native Canadian but a man who thinks that there are some phases of the radio problem that ought not to be discussed in parliament. What an impossible thought! What will we hear next in this chamber. I differ entirely from that point of view; it is not the Canadian point of view. Every question touching the welfare of the Canadian people ought to be discussed in this house and settled by the representatives of the Canadian electorate, and we are in no need of experts, whether born within or outside of this country, to come to Canada and tell us what we should do—to tell us that the time has arrived when certain aspects of important parliamentary legislation ought not to be reviewed fully by the members in this chamber elected to represent the dominion as a whole.

I oppose this legislation for the further reason that there is an endeavour to take out of the hands of the Civil Service Commission appointments to the radio broadcasting commission. I do not believe that there is any support in the way of public opinion in Canada for action of that kind. I do not believe there is support for it in the far west; certainly there is none in the middle west. Nor is there any support for it, in my opinion, in Ontario, Quebec or the maritime provinces. Consequently action of that kind is purely govermental, purely executive and partisan, and has no justification in public opinion.

Because these appointments are not to be left to the Civil Service Commission, because we are by this means doing our best to destroy the Civil Service Commission as a national organization that should function properly, because this bill proposes something that will militate against the successful operation of the Civil Service Commission, undermining its efficiency and permanency—because apparently my hon. friends are out to destroy it as far as possible by taking away from it the powers which it ought to exercise—I am opposed to the legislation which is now before the house. More than that, it seems to me that in the new section 14, subsection 1, wherein the expenditure of moneys is to be taken out of the hands of parliament, we are giving up one of the historic functions of parliamentary government. I cannot sanction anything that looks like a move in that direction. History tells us that parliament must have control of every dollar, every cent of revenue which is raised by taxes, and the moment we depart from that principle in the slightest degree we are in danger of destroying parliamentary government in this country, and I am opposed to any move along that line. Further than that, if we are to have parliamentary government in Canada, parliamentary government worthy of the name, we must see to it that parliament exercises proper control over such matters. There should be no control through commissions, executives and experts. The best expert opinion in Canada can be found in this house; we do not need to import experts.

Mr. ERNST: Speaking.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the hon. gentleman referring to himself?

Mr. ERNST: No, I am referring to you.

Mr. McINTOSH: You are doing well if that is what you mean.

Mr. ERNST: I was judging by your own estimate of yourself.

Mr. McINTOSH: I suggest that the hon. gentleman should try to estimate himself properly. He will have quite a job on his hands. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we have not full control in this house over the revenues of the country then we have not complete parliamentary government in Canada, and any action on the part of any government that will tend to weaken parliament in this respect will meet with my opposition.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

With regard to this bill, from the point of view of its effect on the Civil Service Commission, I have some information which I wish to put on Hansard. It brings out the political relationship that exists at the present time between the Civil Service Commission, the Prime Minister of Canada, the government of this country and those who are seeking positions on the radio commission. The information I want to put on the record is this:

Sessional Paper No. 382
Canada
Department of the Secretary of State
Tuesday, April 25, 1933.

Return to an address of the House of Commons, dated 3rd April, 1933, showing:

A copy of all correspondence, documents. orders in council and certificates of the Civil Service Commission, respecting the appointment of Mr. E. C. Buchanan to the position of director of public relations to the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission.

C. H. Cahan,
Secretary of State.

Reference No. 268.
Mover: Mr. Gray.
Dated: April 25, 1933.

I will not read the whole return, but there are a few parts of it that bear on the main problem before the house, namely, the attempt to make this radio commission a purely political body. If that effort continues then we might as well as a parliament scrap the Civil Service Commission at once and be through with it. I have here a return dated Ottawa, November 24, 1932, in which reference is made by Hector Charlesworth, chairman of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, to organization work—organizing the commission, or in other words, dealing with the filling of key positions. The Prime Minister's name is mentioned in this return, and I shall read the document as it has been submitted to the house:

Ottawa, November 24, 1932.

Dear Sir,—

In connection with the organization of the work of the radio broadcasting commission, it is becoming urgently important that the services of a director of publicity be secured as well as a director of programs. I have discussed the matter with the prime Minister, who assures me that the question is being taken up of an amendment to the act, whereby these and other important key positions on the staff of the commission may be exempted from the provisions of the Civil Service Act. In the meantime I should be glad if your commissioners would give consideration to the temporary employment, for a period of three months, of Mr. E. C. Buchanan as director of publicity at $6,500 per annum, and Mr. E. A. Weir, at present employed with the radio division of the Canadian National Railways, at $6,500 per annum, as director of programs and station relations.

As I indicated above, the question of the permanent appointment of the incumbents of these positions will, it is hoped, be dealt with under an amendment to the act, but in the meantime I should appreciate it if the commission could see its way clear to sanction the above temporary appointments. It is important, in view of certain commitments about to be entered into, that these appointees should enter our service by December 1st.

Yours faithfully,
Hector Charlesworth,
Chairman,
Canadian Broadcasting Commission.

The Secretary,
The Civil Service Commission,
Ottawa, Ontario.

That letter was dated November 24, 1932. The next letter on the return is dated November 25, 1932, the day after the letter I have just read was written, from the secretary of the Civil Service Commission to Mr. Charlesworth:

Dear Mr. Charlesworth,—

By direction of the commissioners, I am enclosing herewith a report to council asking for authority, under section 40 of the Civil Service Act, for the temporary employment of Messrs. E. C. Buchanan and E. A. Weir in accordance with the request contained in your letter of November 24. I might explain that, in order to bring reports before council, it is necessary to have the signature of the minister in charge and I presume that the Minister of Marine is the minister through whom the radio commission will be expected to report to council. That being the case, the report should be signed by the Minister of Marine in the space provided for that purpose before being forwarded to the clerk of the privy council for the consideration of that board.

Yours very truly,
W. Foran,
Secretary.

The next is the report to council referred to in the previous letter. This is addressed to His Excellency the Governor General in Council under date of November 25, 1932: It reads:

Under section 40 of the Civil Service Act, the Civil Service Commission, on the recommendation of the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Commission, submits the following report for approval:

It is recommended that authority be granted for the temporary employment of Mr. E. C. Buchanan as director of publicity and Mr. E. A. Weir as director of programs and station relations for the radio broadcasting commission for a period of three months at such salaries as His Excellency the Governor General in Council may approve.

The chairman of the Canadian broadcasting commission reports that appointments to these positions are urgently required.

That report is signed by W. J. Roche as chairman and J. E. Tremblay as commissioner, and a space is provided for the signature of the Minister of Marine. The next letter is from the chairman of the radio commission to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission. It is dated February 16, 1933, and reads:

Dear Sir,—

I would call your attention to my letter of November 24 in which I asked you to give consideration to the temporary employment for a period of three months of Mr. E. C. Buchanan in connection with the public relations activities of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission.

In view of the urgent necessity of the commission obtaining more publicity for the programs which we are now putting out, we would ask you to give this matter your attention in order to obtain the necessary certificate for Mr. Buchanan under section 40 of the Civil Service Act, Mr. Buchanan to be employed by our commission as director of public relations at a salary of $6,500 per annum.

It is considered that Mr. Buchanan's services should begin as and from February 15, 1933.

Very sincerely yours,
Hector Charlesworth,
Chairman.

There you are! There we have the chairman of Canada's Radio Broadcasting Commission, himself a well known Conservative propagandist, urging with all his power the appointment of Buchanan, a government extremist, as director of public relations at twice the salary he is worth or could draw in the open market.

The next letter is from the secretary of the Civil Service Commission to the chairman of the radio commission. It is dated February 16, 1933, and reads:

Dear Sir,—

Replying to your letter of the 16th instant, I beg to call your attention to the fact that your letter of the 24th November last referred to the employment of Mr. E. A. Weir as director of programs and station relations as well as of Mr. E. C. Buchanan as director of publicity. On November 25, the Civil Service Commission forwarded to you the necessary report to council, as required under section 40 of the Civil Service Act, covering the employment of both these gentlemen and has not been advised as to what action was subsequently taken either by the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission or by the Governor General in Council in regard to this matter. Is it your intention now that the question of Mr. Weir's employment should be dropped and a separate report made out in the case of Mr. Buchanan? You will understand that, until the salary has been authorized by the Governor General in Council, the commission is unable to issue any certificate of temporary employment under section 40 of the Civil Service Act.

Yours very truly,
W. Foran,
Secretary.

The next is a letter from the chairman of the radio commission to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission. It is dated February 17, 1933, and reads:

Dear Mr. Foran,—

In reply to yours of February 16 I may say that the present situation with regard to Mr. E. A. Weir and Mr. E. C. Buchanan is as follows: The appointments of these gentlemen were held up owing to the decision of the Department of Justice that until the return of Colonel Steel in January our commission was powerless to make any appointments. Since then a new situation has arisen with regard to our relations with the Canadian National Railways whereby the appointment of Mr. Weir may be dealt with in a different manner from that originally decided.

With regard to Mr. Buchanan, now that our board is fully constituted we desire to engage his services as soon as possible. There is a clamour throughout Canada as to lack of advance information about our broadcasts. The Commission has also decided to drop the title "director of publicity" and use that of "public relations." The matter of Mr. Weir may have to stand in abeyance for the present, but we should like a new order on the lines I have mentioned in the case of Mr. Buchanan. The former certificate in each case may have to be cancelled. I believe that these orders are in the hands of the Hon. Alfred Duranleau if they were not returned to your commission.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

Hector Charlesworth.

Following that letter we have a letter from Mr. Foran to Mr. Charlesworth. It is dated February 22, 1933, and reads:

Dear Mr. Charlesworth,—

The commissioners have had under consideration your letter of the 17th instant with reference to the case of Mr. E. C. Buchanan.

I am now directed to call your attention to the fact that when the temporary employment of Messrs. Weir and Buchanan was originally discussed with you the commissioners agreed to issue temporary certificates for three months in these cases on the understanding that new legislation was contemplated which would exempt these positions from the operations of the Civil Service Act.

The idea was to gradually destroy the act.

So far as the Civil Service Commission is aware, no steps have yet been taken towards the amendment to the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act but, if your commission is able to give the civil service commissioners an assurance that the act is to be amended without delay, the commissioners are prepared to issue a certificate as requested for the employment of Mr. Buchanan for three months from February 15.

The letter closes with the following very important sentence:

If it is intended, however, that the position of director of public relations should later be advertised for competition under the Civil Service Act, the commissioners decline to certify Mr. Buchanan's employment at the present time and are of the opinion that the position should be advertised immediately.

Yours very truly,

W. Foran.

That is the viewpoint of the Civil Service Commission, that is the viewpoint of its secretary and it is the viewpoint of anyone who wants to build up an efficient Civil Service Commission in Canada. As I say, that letter was signed by the secretary of the Civil Service Commission. The next letter is from Mr. Hector Charlesworth to Mr. W. Foran, the secretary of the Civil Service Commission. It is dated February 23, 1933, and reads:

Dear Mr. Foran,—

I have yours of February 22nd relative to our request for the appointment of Mr. E. C. Buchanan as director of public relations.

I beg to advise you that last evening we received personal assurance from the Prime Minister that an amendment to the Radio Broadcasting Act would be submitted before the close of the session covering this as well as other matters. In accordance with the terms of your letter I therefore ask that the certificate be issued for Mr. Buchanan as from February 15th.

Hector Charlesworth.

I shall not read further from this return. The point I wish to emphasize is that the Civil Service Commission tried to stand its ground, took the stand that it ought to take in order that it might function properly and successfully in the interests of the people of Canada, but it was prevented from carrying out its functions. It was prevented by political interference from doing what it thought it ought to have done, and that political interference came from the present government, came from the cabinet of Canada, came from the Prime Minister of this country, and because of that political interference the Civil Service Commission had to sidetrack its real functions and make appointments which should only have been made after advertisement and after competition. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, that is a very important and serious departure. If we are going to have the Prime Minister and the cabinet of this country go out and take the stand which I have shown the house was taken, I see no future for the Civil Service Commission in this country. It will be impossible for it to function as it should function, and it will become nothing more or less than a political commission. It is no wonder that we have heard argument after argument from member after member here this afternoon that the Civil Service Commission was gradually being undermined and destroyed, and it is being gradually destroyed by the government taking unto itself the making of appointments which are purely political, perhaps appointments which should not be made because of a lack of efficiency and a lack of those qualities that are necessary to give that efficient service for which the people of Canada are paying.

I think I have made clear, Mr. Speaker, my stand and that of the party to which I belong in regard to the bill before the house, and its effect upon the efficiency of the Civil Service Commission. I hope that the government will take new ground and act differently towards the Civil Service Commission, instead of continuing to do what it has been doing for the last year or two, deliberately making it a commission that is becoming weaker and weaker every day.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If no one else is going to speak I may say that since early this morning this house has been engaged in discussing the measure, the second reading of which I moved, and I venture to say that if anyone will take the trouble to look at Hansard he will find that all that is referable to this measure can be contained in a very few pages. The discussion has wandered on in that way.

First of all I would like to say that the observations made by the right hon. leader of the opposition as to the undesirability of this measure being brought in at this date give expression to a sound objection. It is an objection to which I attach a great deal of importance. It arises by reason of circumstances over which the government had no control. The last member who spoke (Mr. McIntosh) referred to the fact that there was an earnest endeavour on the part of the commission to get a particular individual to act with them, and that they spoke to me, and I suggested that that could not be done unless there were amendments to the act, which is true; but I did not desire to commit myself to amendments to this act with respect to matters of that kind unless I knew something more about it than I then did. As a result of the very kind thought of the government of Great Britain we were able to ask Major Gladstone Murray to come here. After he had agreed to come, he was detained and he did not arrive here until much later than was expected. He completed a trip over Canada, not accompanied by the commission, and made an interim report on the fifth of May, which was read to the house this morning. It became apparent that in his opinion it was desirable to make certain amendments to the act, and I intimated the other day that I would introduce those amendments, but I do so reluctantly at this stage of the session. But inasmuch as it has been represented to me that it is absolutely imperative, if we are to save this commission, that action of this kind should be taken, I brought the measure to the attention of the house yesterday and moved its second reading to-day.

Does this house desire to preserve the radio broadcasting business of Canada for the Canadian people? That is the first question. If that question is answered in the affirmative, then we must select the instrumentality of government by which we shall effect that purpose. It is not a department of government; it is a business, an industry. And in the same way that provinces select liquor commissions to transact their business, so in this instance the Dominion government believes, as shown by the statute that has been passed, that the instrumentality by which we can accomplish our purpose is a commission of three persons.

It will be observed that there is a great distinction between a department of government and a commission. A department of government, as the very words indicate, is responsible to this parliament in a narrow sense. A commission is an instrumentality set up by parliament itself to accomplish certain purposes and achieve certain ends. The liquor commission of Quebec makes no report to anyone except a report as to its operations. It buys, it sells, it receives money, it pays out money. The liquor commission of Alberta buys and sells without reference to the government and turns its profits over to the province. The liquor commission of Ontario, I understand, although I am not so familiar with its operations, conducts its business in exactly the same way. Why is that so? Because being instrumentalities of government, government has clothed them with powers and holds them responsible for the discharge of the powers conferred upon them, and the government must accept the responsibility as between the people and the legislature. That is this case. Whether we like it or not, that is what we have tried to do. It is folly not to recognize the fact that a very persistent and determined effort is being made to destroy this commission. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite are desirous of assisting in its destruction. We know how this commission is looked upon by private interests outside of this country. We know exactly the powers in this country that were so disappointed because the radio committee did not report in favour of private interests controlling broadcasting in this dominion. The report that was read this afternoon by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) indicates clearly what was in the mind of that committee when it dealt with this matter.

We have determined that we will not part with our broadcasting rights in Canada. We have determined that at this stage of scientific development we are going to cling to those rights, but we are going to endeavour to give to the Canadian people some reasonable service in the way of broadcasting facilities. We have charged a license fee of two dollars. The taxpayer of this country is not responsible for the moneys expended by the radio commission.

The only persons who have an interest in that matter are those who take out their licences, and every user of a radio is supposed to have taken out a licence. That money we said last year, and we repeat this year, is money for the expenditure of which this commission should be responsible. It is money which partners in the enterprise have entrusted the commission to expend for them, and parliament has taken the necessary action to preserve this business for the Canadian people. If, Mr. Speaker, it is thought for a moment that this commission can successfully function if it has to come and report to this house in answer to a question as to whether Jane Smith was a contralto or a soprano, or whether she sang on a certain night, and what she was paid—it must be a failure inevitably and positively. There can be no doubt about it. Every thoughtful man knows it, every observer knows it; but that is the criticism made by the opposition and private interests. We may be asked, "What is the name of the announcer at station so and so; where was he born; what size boots does he wear?" We may be asked, "Did Jane Smith, or somebody else, come from New York to sing?" If that sort of thing is to continue I say to this House of Commons this afternoon: Gentlemen, you have destroyed the thing you desired to protect. That is as certain as anything in the world, and there is no thoughtful member of the house who does not realize it.

In the face of that fact we have one great illustration, the British Broadcasting Corporation. Sir John Reith became responsible as chairman of it, and the gentleman chosen largely to direct its activities was an Ontario born Canadian, and in him I think most of us feel a great sense of pride. May I say incidentally that if hon. members are disposed to discuss the question of salaries I advise them to consider the salary paid by the British Broadcasting Corporation to that gentleman, as compared with the salaries we pay in this country. I mention that in passing only. The British Broadcasting Corporation have had a wide experience; they have had a successful experience. They have dealt with technical problems of the first magnitude. They have dealt with the tastes, the desires and the wishes of their clientele, those people who own licences and radios throughout the kingdom, and they have established a great reputation.

But think of our position in this country. I am bound to say the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) put it fairly, as did the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Look at our position. We live in the northern half of the American continent. Anyone who knows anything about the theory of radio broadcasting knows that the strength and the power of a station to transmit and send through the air the human voice so that it may be collected again and be made to sound like the human voice, is a matter purely technical in its nature. So greatly has science advanced that it has become simply a question of being able to determine with great exactness the strength and power necessary to project the human voice along certain channels to a given point where it is picked up and repeated, just as we hear it over the receiving instruments in our homes.

Let us put the position fairly. There are in the United States a large number of very powerful stations. If there is no arrangement made internationally between this country and the United States it follows, inevitably, that any stations we put up of lesser power will be choked by the confusion which will result from projections by high powered stations of the vibrations of the voice through the ether, as they say,—and now they say there is no ether—we will say through space, for the purpose of having the voice collected at another point. This confusion is inevitable, unless arrangements are made between countries. We have an international agreement.

I was rather hurt when I heard one hon. member state that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) had had a good holiday at Madrid. Shall Canada be represented in international radio conferences? The Minister of Marine did not desire to make that long trip to Madrid at that time of year, strange as it may sound to the gentleman who made that observation in the house to-day. When he reached there, due to his mastery of both English and French, he, with his technical advisers, was able to take a very leading part in the transactions of the conference, a matter of gratification to most Canadians. He had with him a highly trained technician. I have not had the pleasure of knowing Colonel Steel for many years. I met him a couple of years ago, or more. But I do know this, that in other countries he is spoken of as one of the foremost technicians known. I thought we were exceedingly fortunate in getting him for the technical position. I would not say that his training fitted him to deal with public relations, but for technical purposes he is qualified. At Madrid he was able to render great service.

In the meantime we desired to set up this commission. I desired to secure his services. He could not get away from Madrid. I cabled the minister, and although the minister found it difficult to get away, finally he came. Colonel Steel stopped in England, saw the English authorities who gave him full facilities with respect to the stations they had, and the great station they were building. The officials gave him every possible facility. I saw him myself, in December, in England. He was anxious to get back here and to obtain information as to the working of our own system. He came back to Canada.

The commission was organized under the chairmanship of Mr. Charlesworth. I have heard much criticism of Mr. Charlesworth to-day. I am not in a position to speak with any degree of authority with respect to Mr. Charlesworth, due to the fact that I did not know him intimately. I never have known him intimately. I was advised by friends who had wide knowledge of the matter—not of one political party—but to whom I had made application for information, that Mr. Charlesworth was, first, a man of letters and of wide culture, a sound critic and would understand something of the tastes of the Canadian people, that he had travelled throughout Canada and would be able admirably to direct the operations of such a commission.

An objection has been made so often in this chamber that it does not need repeating, concerning the appointment of Mr. Maher from Quebec. But those who know anything about what he has done since he has been appointed all agree he has acquitted himself admirably, and is a first rate official in every respect. I will say this, frankly,—I said it before, and I say it now—it is one of those unfortunate circumstances that he had been actively interested in political matters before he was appointed. That may make some of my friends opposite, as the hon. member for North Waterloo said, look upon him with suspicion. But I will challenge any hon. member of this house to say or to show that in the conduct of the duties and obligations of his position he has in any sense been political in any way, shape or form. I say that very frankly, because I think if ever a man desired earnestly to make for himself a reputation, and a reputation of which he might be proud, it is Mr. Maher.

There is your commission,—your technician, your chairman and your vice-chairman. There you have the problem, with this great country to the south with 120,000,000 people, and with all its powerful stations. You know the network of them,—the one outside of New York city, the very powerful one at Schenectady, the one at Cincinnati, then down the western coast, and as far as Texas. We have the one across the Texas boundary with strength sufficient to produce interference even in this country. There is your situation.

I say, sir, to my friends in this house that before this commission was organized, and there was no control of the national business of broadcasting, we were rapidly heading for chaos. Why? Because with the confusion of wave lengths, channels, and conditions incident to the very powerful stations just across an imaginary line, you have a situation which, unless it is taken up and dealt with firmly will mean what the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) described,—not only chaos, but a condition in which you are trying to repair your house and live in it at the same time. No one knows better than I, because I have endeavoured to follow this matter with care, being most anxious to preserve this broadcasting business for the Canadian people, the unpopularity for the moment of this commission. But I do ask the members of this house to be fair. I ask men who have had experience in business to be fair. We have been told this afternoon that there is no need of this house having experts about anything, therefore I know I am speaking to men who are experts in business as well as other matters —knowing that as I do, I ask any hon. member of this house whether he thinks it is quite fair, remembering that Colonel Steel did not get back from Madrid until the first part of this year, to launch such a campaign of attack against this commission as we have had here to-day? Would you think it fair in regard to any business that you were asked to reorganize? Which one of us asked to reorganize a business would make attacks at the end of a few months on the position in which the business then stood? I have watched this thing with care, and I propose to do so because I am tremendously interested in its success; for if it fails the whole principle of the people owning this great facility will have been destroyed. Colonel Steel assured me that undoubtedly in connection with our international agreements, in connection with working them out, in connection with the fact that we are trying to follow an orderly course prescribed by international agreement to bring a measure of order out of chaos—and I use that word in no way offensively or critically—the discharge of that duty would take time. In the report of the committee three to five years was mentioned, but in less than that number of months we have this attack launched in the terms in which it has been made to-day against this commission. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if the members of this house will not be a little fairer in dealing with this problem—because it is a problem. We have selected an instrumentality, and having selected that instrumentality let us give it a chance.

Now I come to the first point, the question of staff and personnel. Is it the desire of this house that the broadcasting commission should be required in the first instance to go to the Civil Service Commission to ask whether or not they may employ this or that band, this or that orchestra, this or that artist? That is the very negation of the principles and purpose for which this commission came into being.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one would suggest that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what we are trying to remove by this section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You are going much further than that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it does go further, and I am coming to that. Then we come to the question of technical officials. I think it is abundantly demonstrated that when you ask the Civil Service Commission with respect to technical officials they will tell you that they have no further information than the commission has itself. We are endeavouring in the bill to provide for broadcasting throughout the nine provinces. We desire to have powerful stations—for while this country has only 10,000,000 people and our neighbours have 120,000,000 odd, we have just as much air as they have—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I was referring not to vacuum but to space. Leaving that for the moment I desire only to make it clear that what we are earnestly endeavouring to do is to provide that if it is thought desirable to lease a station, this organization of ours should not be destroyed in the very beginning of its life by having to wait until parliament comes together to authorize it.

When this measure was introduced in the terms it was last year, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has properly observed, we believed that parliament should exercise control in respect of capital expenditure. But in practice it is found to be desirable that within the limits of their income the commission should be able to lease or purchase with the consent of the governor in council. What are the safeguards? First, lack of funds. All the money they have is that which they get from the sale of licences plus what they receive from advertising and the sale of programs. What is the difference between the radio commission conducting its business in this way, with revenue derived from licence fees and the sale of programs and advertising, and the liquor commission buying and selling liquor in any province of Canada? What is the difference, as the hon. member for North Waterloo says, between it and the Canadian National? That is an instrumentality of government at the present moment, because we own it; it is a corporation which we have created by statute of this parliament to discharge a great public service.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? Why then the dual system of having part of the money voted by parliament and the other part not voted? I have no objection if you leave the entire revenue of the radio commission in the hands of the commission to be administered, but do it either one way or the other.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will let me finish what I am saying now I will try to meet his difficulty at the end of my observations, because I made a note of it as he went on.

Under those circumstances we have the safeguard of the limitation of revenue. And you have the provision for the approval of the governor in council in order to be certain that the expenditures made for purchases or leases shall not exceed the revenue received.

The other point dealt with referred to the mere matter of the change of the word "and" to "or." But I want to make a further observation. It has been reiterated, and I cannot help but think that those who are reiterating it have not the interests of national broadcasting so much at heart, that parliament has been voting a million dollars of the taxpayers' money to the broadcasting commission. If this house earnestly desires to save this business for the Canadian people, I cannot too strongly emphasize the fact that the million dollars voted is a million dollars paid by those who take out licences. There is not a dollar of taxes in that amount; every dollar of it represents money received from a select class, namely the licensees under the statute.

There is a criticism which one hon. gentleman started to make and did not complete, namely, that prior to this commission coming into being certain work was done with respect to collecting the licences on commission, and matters of that kind. In course of time I am satisfied that these difficulties will be ironed out and the obstacles removed to which reference was to be made. It will be the earnest desire of the government that they be removed and that there be single control with respect to these matters. But it takes time; it cannot be done in a single day.

I have this point to make to the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugène Fiset). I realize that last year a committee made a report to this house, which with the exception of a single member was accepted by all. It is my most earnest desire that the radio business should come back to that position where as one voice we speak our determination to maintain it as a national undertaking. I am certain we can do it only by bringing about a common understanding and an earnest desire to have success follow the efforts of those to whom we have entrusted this work. I therefore suggest that the house pass this bill; that it limit its operation to the first of July, 1934, that we then call into being at the next session a committee to which this whole matter may be referred, in order that the house once more may speak for the whole nation and not for any party with respect to a matter of this kind. I confess that I felt somewhat distressed this afternoon to find all the opposition coming from my hon. friends across the gangway. I cannot think that that is in the interests of this great national undertaking.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: No words that I can use would exaggerate what I conceive to be the importance of this matter in relation to the body politic. I look upon it as one of the foremost means of education that the world has ever known, and I believe we must not permit it to be destroyed either by political differences or by the insidious efforts of private interests to destroy public ownership of this utility.

I might have said this before had I made any remarks when the motion was made for the second reading of the bill; the delay is excused only by the reasons I have given. I believe it would have been preferable to send this bill to a committee so that it might have had an opportunity of again hearing Major Gladstone Murray's explanations as to why he came to the conclusions he did with respect to this matter. But this I say in no too critical sense: When any government, after much solicitation, inconveniences itself as well as its instrumentality, the British Broadcasting Corporation, to secure the loan of one of our own distinguished sons, I think it is a little lacking in the courtesy that should be extended to him to have the criticisms and statements made that we heard in this house with respect to that gentleman. I say that to my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), whose remarks were wholly unworthy of him, I think, on an occasion such as this.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the bill should be given second reading, and in reply to the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it should be dropped I suggest that a clause be added providing that it shall expire on the first day of July, 1934. A committee will be appointed in due course to consider the matters here dealt with, and I cannot conceive that under those circumstances any great injury will be done to the Civil Service Commission or any other cause to which reference has been made to-day. During the interim we will provide an opportunity for those charged with the responsibility to discharge those obligations which the statute places upon them in the manner they desire, which will reflect credit upon themselves, I am sure, and give satisfaction to the Canadian people. Long before this commission came into being there were complaints with regard to radio reception in this city; it is well known that there are difficulties in the way of radio reception at particular points. All these problems are being studied, and I trust that they will be overcome. I hope we will sufficiently realize the importance of this matter not to confine our criticisms to purely political lines, but that an earnest effort will be made to promote the well being of radio broadcasting as a public utility in this dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has made a certain proposal to which there is no opportunity of making any reply.

Mr. BENNETT: That can be done in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then in the meantime we shall vote against the measure.

Mr. BENNETT: Very well; that was what we expected.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Bennett) which was agreed to on the following division:

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment and salaries of officers and employees.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say a word, first, as to the understanding there was yesterday, when we agreed to allow the appropriation for the radio commission to pass, namely, that when the house was in committee on the bill hon. members would have an opportunity to discuss any phase of the radio commission's affairs. I think the Prime Minister agrees.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I asked to have the Minister of Marine here to-day with his assistant so that any questions that might be asked could be answered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take it therefore that it is open to hon. members to discuss any phase of the commission's affairs. At the moment we are on section 1. The Prime Minister suggested, on the second reading, and there was no opportunity to make reply before the vote was taken, that there should be added to the bill a clause to the effect that its provisions would be applicable only until the first of July, 1934. Of course, the addition of such a clause would be a mere subterfuge, it would simply enable the commission to go ahead and make all appointments under this section we are now discussing, without reference to the Civil Service Commission.

The Prime Minister devoted most of his speech to pointing out the absurdity—I think that is the word that might be used—of consulting the Civil Service Commission as to who should be appointed as a singer, as to her voice, the size of her shoes and in general the equipment of artists before anyone should be engaged. No one in the world would think of asking the radio commission to go before the Civil Service Commission for any such purpose. So far as artists are concerned, unquestionably the radio commission should have in its own hand the determination of selections, irrespective of the Civil Service Commission. What we are now asked to do however is not merely to give the radio commission the right to select artists independently of the Civil Service Commission but to appoint the administrative staff, officials, clerks, stenographers and employees generally who may be required, and to make such appointments regardless altogether of the Civil Service Commission. Now, the commissioners who have all been appointed by the present administration are Conservatives.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Mr. Bland was never known to be a Conservative.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking of the radio commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the right hon. gentleman said the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I did I meant the radio commission. All the appointees are Conservatives and this house is now asked to agree to these Conservative appointees making such appointments as are necessary under the radio commission, and for all time.

Mr. BENNETT: No, until the first of July.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, until the first of July, 1934, and that means that within that time all possible and necessary appointments will have been made. May I suggest to the Prime Minister an arrangement which I think would be fair? Let him designate the classes of persons whom one could not reasonable expect to be appointed by the Civil Service Commission and with respect to whom the radio commission should have the determining voice, and ask that these positions be exempted from the Civil Service Act. I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter with the members of my own party, but if the right hon. gentleman is reasonable in that regard I venture to say we shall be prepared to accede to reasonable exemptions from the Civil Service Act. We cannot, however, agree to remove from the Civil Service Act the appointment of stenographers and clerks generally as well as others who may hold positions corresponding to those in the public service at large. Unless such an arrangement as I suggest is adopted, it will be making of the radio commission a purely political machine. The Prime Minister says that he does not wish to do that. This is an opportunity to test the sincerity of his word in that regard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just immediately before the vote the Prime Minister suggested that this would apply for only one year. It does not seem to me that that was a very good way in which to try to influence the vote of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not think there would be a vote at the time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I for one could not be induced to vote in favour of the bill under the circumstances. As the Prime Minister made his speech immediately preceding the vote, we had no chance to discuss the proposition he advanced. It does not seem to me that the proposal suggested of waiting one year is a good one. Once these men are appointed they will have a certain claim upon the government. We could not very well dismiss the whole staff at the end of a year and disorganize the commission, so it seems to me that now is the time to settle the principle involved. I voted against this bill because I believe the clause before us is an infringement of the rights and privileges of the Civil Service Commission. Again and again we have seen groups of employees taken out from under this commission. The Prime Minister has suggested that it would be absurd to ask the civil service commissioners to indicate who would be the singers and other professional performers, but I do not think anyone suggests that that be done. I recall that I asked a question a few weeks ago as to how many appointments had been made under the Civil Service Commission to the radio commission. I am not quite sure of the answer, but I think it was that one stenographer had been appointed. It seems to me that the Prime Minister's difficulty is more of an excuse than anything else.

Personally, I do not like the idea of proceeding to build up a patronage system. I voted for the bill last year because I believed in the public ownership of radio. I think we all did. We believed in the building up of a nationally owned and nationally operated radio system but I am afraid that it is developing into simply a Conservative owned and a Conservative operated affair.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is just what it is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am afraid of it. Instructions have recently been issued according to the press that manuscripts of speeches must be submitted before permission to broadcast will be given. Apparently the papers have received their information from the radio commission. These instructions state that nothing must be said derogatory to the powers that be. I cited a case the other day where a man had been actually convicted in the city of Montreal for protesting against the action of the radio commissioners. It will be a very serious thing if we are to build up an organization which will have the powers of censorship. We all agree with the Prime Minister that radio is an institution of very great importance. We believe its educational value is very great and we understand that there must be some regulations with regard to who shall use the radio and what shall go out over the air, but I should like to feel that this censorship will be in the hands not of a group appointed by the party in power but of one consisting of disinterested men appointed by a disinterested body. I cannot see that we will be carrying out the original idea of public ownership if we allow this amendment to go through.

The Prime Minister bemoans the fact that there is not to-day the unanimity which prevailed a year ago. If there is not it is because of the actions of the present government. If the government had made this organization non-partisan, I think it would have made a wide appeal to the people of this country. I know as far as I am concerned, I would be ready to do everything in my power to give added strength to the commission. But one hesitates to do that under these circumstances. I am in favour of public ownership and I am also in favour of appointments being made through the civil service; I am in favour of the public having all the advantages of a publicly controlled and operated institution such as radio but I fear the development of an institution which will have the powers of censorship and which will be under the control of one political party. We are talking redistribution and an election is in the air. What will happen at the next election if there is to be a censorship as to what shall be sent over the radio? The government has not yet given a clear-cut statement with regard to matters of that kind. If the papers are correct in stating that manuscripts of speeches must be first placed in the hands of the commission, I can see where we will encounter many difficulties.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everybody will.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Everybody will be getting into great difficulty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think Mr. Maher would accept mine.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we can all foresee that. Under these circumstances I do not think we should safeguard these matters a year hence, they should be safeguarded now when appointments to the commission are being arranged for. The Prime Minister has made an appeal to us on this side heartily to support radio. I would like to make an appeal to him that he put this matter in such shape as will enable us to support it heartily. I think the suggestion made by the right hon. the leader of the opposition that a clear distinction should be made between those who are to be appointed to manage radio affairs and the artists and the technical experts is a reasonable one.

Mr. BENNETT: The section could be allowed to stand and I will consult the Civil Service Commission to see if a clause cannot be drawn up to meet the situation.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask one question before this section is withdrawn, and it is not in connection with this particular policy. I should like to know from the minister what his policy would be in a situation such as this; the Vancouver musicians' mutual protective union recently passed a resolution which I will summarize briefly. They have heard that it is the intention of certain people to endeavour to influence the radio commission to appoint a national broadcasting symphony orchestra to have its headquarters in the city of Toronto. Naturally they object to that because they think that in these days of unemployment the work should be distributed throughout the country. As an evidence that the Vancouver musicians are capable of rendering work of that kind I have a cutting here from I think the Toronto Saturday Night of October 9 last, saying that "the broadcast by the Vancouver symphony orchestra proved a revelation of the musical talent available in British Columbia." So that shows that they are competent to do work of that kind. I just want to know that it is not the intention to monopolize the whole thing by one hook-up from Toronto, but that on the other hand our local musicians in the various centres throughout the country will have an opportunity to produce themselves and display their artistic abilities.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think I covered that point this morning. It is the intention of the radio commission to employ artists in almost every city in Canada in order to give our young musicians and artists an opportunity to show what they can do, and to give a chance to everybody.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Section stands.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BENNETT: I have agreed to let the section stand, and I will consult with the Civil Service Commission and see if a clause can be drawn which will meet the suggestions that have been made.

The CHAIRMAN: Section stands.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. Mr. Chairman. I want to talk on it. It is bad enough to have my hearing denied without being imposed upon. I think I have a right to be heard. I haven't had a word to-day at all. I did not intend to speak to-day but I do want to say a few words on section 1.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 2—Powers of commission.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to speak as one who knows very much about radio. We had one in our house on the farm until we became too poor to keep it in batteries. It is there now just to look at. It may not be much of an ornament, but it is a reminder of better days. Maybe we will be able to get batteries for it when conditions improve. But it does not require much knowledge of radio to be able to make some observations on section 2 of this bill.

At this point I should like to be permitted to indicate the tendency of the government's activities. So far as I can discern them, they are all in the direction of getting all the national services in their own hands—for what purpose, we can only conjecture. In order to amplify my remarks in regard to this particular section, may I say that it would seem that they are providing for all appointments to be made outside the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, thereby making the radio commission a political institution, if they so desire.

I managed to hear some of the remarks of the Prime Minister and they were deeply interesting to me. Not knowing much about radio, it was news to me to learn of the ease with which powerful stations can be established in the United States and drive less powerful stations in Canada off the map. If they can be established there, powerful stations could be established in this country that would drown out everybody else.

Mr. BENNETT: And cost a lot of money.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, it would take a lot of power, and it would cost a lot of money, but when politics is at stake, a little power here or there does not amount to much to a millionaire government when it comes to getting a monopoly of the air. But if this can be done in the United States, if their powerful stations drown us out and jam our instruments, what is to hinder the government of Canada, with all the power it will have with this radio system, with the government appointed commission all of whom are friends of the government—what is to hinder this government establishing a powerful radio station and putting all their opponents off the map?

Mr. PORTEOUS: We never thought of that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Perhaps I am displaying ignorance about radio, but I do not know that I am. I am not displaying any ignorance as to the capacity of governments to do this kind of thing.

Mr. BENNETT: You should know.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is exactly what was done by the government previous to 1896 in their election act provisions; I went through it, and I know. I do not need to be told; it is not something I have forgotten or that I have got from somebody else; it is something I know from practical experience as having been directed against myself.

May I illustrate right now some evidence of this? May I show what is going on now? I do not wish to make any assertions concerning the redistribution bill, but may I point out by way of illustration, to give emphasis to my remarks about radio, that the government is bringing down a redistribution bill which is the most ingenious and diabolical ever conceived by either man or devil.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is true. If a government will hobble me and behead me, —I am just talking about myself as an illustration—mutilate me and crucify me under one bill, for absolutely political reasons, why can they not do it—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): I ask the hon. member to keep in order, and to speak to the section before the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member's language is wholly unparliamentary—"diabolical" and "devil" and that sort of thing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: "Diabolical" is quite proper and parliamentary.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): It is absolutely out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I remember that once in the house I used the word "hell" and it was not ruled out of order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I could use stronger language. I think you had better leave my language alone, for fear it gets worse.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The redistribution committee has not made a final report, and no comments should be made concerning it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It does not have to be reported. The last map has been drawn, and I know what it contains.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Order, please.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then, we come to another illustration—by the way, if you are going to cut out illustrations to back up my statements, I am hamstrung; that is what is happening all along the line, and my good friend the chairman is going to join that parade.

Mr. POULIOT: Have you not got figures of speech?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What was done the other day by one of the most modest and mildest men in the government when the Indian bill was under discussion? Nobody needs to smile me off the map with regard to the object of this government in amending that bill. Under the authority given the government, that bill could be the means of enfranchising Indians by the wholesale just before an election even.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Respect for age is something, but this nonsense should stop.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Prime Minister does not need to look cross.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He says it is nonsense.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a shame, that is all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: First there is redistribution, with our heads already in the noose; all you have to do is pull the rope. Is that not so? The axe is suspended right over our heads. I am showing the tendencies of this government to prepare all along the line for an election, so that they may hobble, hamstring and cripple their opponents as much as possible, thereby making them relatively impotent for that great battle. They are winning as many outposts as possible in advance, that is what they are doing. Nobody can fool me on the signs of the political times. If the government does not like my exposing them, it is not my fault. It is my business to expose them, and to warn the people of what is happening. They tried out, in a small way, the political stunt on the penitentiary bill to grab off all appointments from the Civil Service Commission. The government is getting a fine stand-in with the big fellows in the militia. I know what can be done through the police—I know, mighty well. We have not had mounted police in the west for over fifty years without our knowing that if you have a political appointee at the head, considerable political work can be done through him.

Mr. ROBINSON: You are talking from experience, are you?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Theory, do you say? I say when you have your own or your party's hide ripped asunder by it, it is not a theory. Now we will get back to the bill. I have given some illustrations to show what is going on. After the franchise being won by our forefathers a hundred or more years ago, partly through bloodshed, I object to hon. gentlemen opposite swiping it from me in broad daylight by any device, without a word of protest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You do not need to laugh. The man who laughs at that only displays his own ignorance, and he does not know anything about the political history of Canada, modern or remote.

Now, about this bill—but by the way, I have another illustration, the Canadian National Railways. What about them? We know about the legislation that has just passed—and all these things have happened in the last ten days. We know about the board of trustees, all appointees of the government. Did anybody ever hear of words being passed from the upper fellow, the man at the top, down all along the line, as to what the men at the bottom should do at election time? Anybody who has not heard of that should not be sitting in this chamber. He is too innocent to be living this side of the Jordan. There are three or four illustrations bearing directly on the political possibilities of this bill. Now my good friend the Prime Minister says it is nonsense for me to suggest—he himself put the thought in my mind—what could be done by these powerful radio stations. Did anyone in this house ever hear a more powerful, a more effective orator over the radio than my right hon. friend? I heard him in 1930 and I never heard his equal on the radio in my life. A clear, ringing voice—yes, I see he appreciates that—a clear, resonant voice, a wide vocabulary; he never needs to hesitate a moment for a word, as I have to, unfortunately. And he carried conviction because there was an element of sincerity in his voice that would deceive even the very elect. Put two or three speakers like that on a government radio system, with a powerful station that will jam off everyone else, and goodbye opponents—particularly if it is assisted by this gerrymandering bill already referred to if it is carried out; I do not know whether it will be or not. But there is only one thing lacking for a complete hamstringing and emasculating of the electors of Canada at the next general election and disfranchising them not by thousands but by hundreds of thousands, that is an election act such as we had in 1895 or that under the War Time Elections Act when every disputed ballot was put in an envelope and you had to prove at great expense that it was any particular candidate's vote. There is not one candidate in fifty who is wealthy enough to stand the resultant expense. That is all that is lacking to make the government's election plans complete.

You will observe from my remarks that I do not know much about radio but I know a whole lot about Tories. I should know a lot about Tory tactics prior to elections; forewarned by past experience is forearmed, and I want to warn not only this house but the country at large what our good friends over there are preparing for us. What a commentary it is on the lack of confidence they have in themselves or the electors when they have to resort to these devices to fool the people and try to ward off the verdict against them that is bound to come if things are permitted to run their natural course.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I had the misfortune of being called out of the chamber this afternoon and could not follow the speech of my right hon. friend. But fortunately I came back in time to receive his reprimand, I might even say his castigation, for having dared to say that Mr. Murray had been lecturing parliament in that interim report which was read this morning.

Mr. DURANLEAU: And that he should be sent home.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not remember having said that, but if I did not say it then I say it to-night. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie); my right hon. friend seems to be pleased or grateful for having had the loan of this gentleman, but I say we have too many loans of this kind. The Finance minister was saying the other day that we are still a borrowing nation; I knew that as regards finance, but I do not think we should borrow gentlemen from England or elsewhere to come and tell Canadians what they should do with their own national problems.

Mr. HACKETT: He is a Canadian.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is not living in Canada now.

Mr. HACKETT: He has been absent a short time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it lacking in courtesy to resent its being said to members of this parliament that parliament should not have control in this matter, that, according to this gentleman, parliament is not qualified for that sort of work? Is it lacking in courtesy to resent that? I think my right hon. friend is wrong; his criticism should be directed the other way. Moreover he should defend parliament and the members of the house against the language of the chairman of his radio board, who has said somewhere that any man who thinks that the radio commission is not doing what should be done is either a liar or a fool.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the hon. gentleman authority for that statement?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I saw it in the newspapers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I have received no evidence of it, but in view of what was said here I am writing to ask what was actually said.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am pleased that my right hon. friend will try to remedy grievances of members of the house, and not resent too much the defence we have to put up against the reflections of this gentleman and others who are borrowed from elsewhere to come and tell us how to solve the problems of Canada.

There is one matter, however, as to which I agree with my right hon. friend; it is deplorable that there is no longer unanimity in this house—and I might say elsewhere—with regard to radio affairs in Canada. But whose fault is that? I have said that I have no confidence in the present commission, and I believe that the majority of the Canadian people have no confidence in it. Who is responsible for that? I am not responsible. I think the appointments to the commission were unfortunate. I think that what has happened since the commission has been appointed also is unfortunate, and that is the real cause of the unpopularity of that board with the Canadian people at the present time. My hon. friends the Minister of Marine and the Solicitor General have replied to me on the basis of statements I did not make, but I wish to refer to one argument of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine. I criticized, and I still criticize, the issuing of a licence to a newspaper in Montreal for radio broadcasting a month after the appointment of the commission, and two days before they were sworn in, without the matter being submitted to the commission. The very fact that this has been done is an indication that the government did not keep faith with the house and wanted to evade the provisions of the Radio Broadcasting Act. Under that act, section 8, it is the duty of the commission to determine the number, location and power of stations required in Canada. And by subsection (c):

The commission may make recommendations to the minister with regard to the issue, suspension or cancellation of private broadcasting licences, and notwithstanding anything contained in the Radiotelegraph Act or regulations, the minister may issue, suspend, or cancel such licences.

What I more particularly object to is not the issuing of the licence to that newspaper, had it been done in the regular way by the commission or upon the recommendation of the commission. What I object to is that the licence was issued between the appointment of the commission and the swearing in of its members. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine said: well, it is a Conservative newspaper and it is a good thing that both parties have their stations. Surely this house would not subscribe to such a policy, that there should be an allotment of broadcasting stations in Canada on political lines, so many for the Conservatives, so many for the Liberals. The house never contemplated that when we adopted the Radio Broadcasting Act.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In your time it was only the Liberals.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Never. What Liberal station ever did that?

Mr. GAGNON: La Presse, the Toronto Star and others.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I never understood La Presse to be a Liberal newspaper. Let me say that at election times, and at other times as well, I have heard speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite over the La Presse station. That never has been considered a Liberal station. From La Patrie I think almost every day we have talks by gentlemen who call themselves Labour-Conservatives or others who represent an organization called the Federation of Labour, which is merely a Tory association, as all hon. gentlemen opposite know. I still say, Mr. Chairman, that to divide the licences in Canada on political lines, so many to one party and so many to another, is a wrong principle that cannot be accepted or subscribed to by this house.

There was another thing said by hon. gentlemen opposite in defence of this act; they say that Toronto had four broadcasting stations and it was not right that Montreal should have only two. What advantage is there in having so many broadcasting stations? It merely brings about confusion. I do not think it is of any benefit to the community that there should be several small stations; I do not think there should be a competition as between Toronto and Montreal or Vancouver and Winnipeg as to the number of stations in each city. Rather I think good service and quality should be looked for in the organization of radio broadcasting.

My hon. friend from Dorchester, who was one of the members of the committee last year, said that committee had reported that stations of less than one hundred watts should not come under the commission. Whatever may have been contained in the report of that committee it is the law which governs in the matter, and there is nothing in the broadcasting act accepting the report of the committee in this regard; all stations come under the radio commission.

There is another point to which I should like to direct attention. Some hon. member who discussed this question to-day praised himself and the house for having had the support of the radio league in this matter, and the name of Mr. Graham Spry was mentioned in this connection. I knew the radio league had suggested that instead of a board appointed by the government and paid for its services there should be a sort of honorary board on which all sections of the country and of the community would be represented by men who would be willing to serve without expense to the country, and the real executive work should be entrusted to a general manager. That was the program suggested by the radio league. In the April 27th issue of the Weekly Sun, which is edited by Mr. Graham Spry, who was the president of the league, I see an article headed "The Radio Commission". I am not going to read it all, but here is part of what Mr. Spry says:

The Canadian Radio League proposal, first advanced in detail in the Queen's Quarterly, January, 1931, provided for a voluntary commission to which a competent and experienced general manager would be responsible for the practical details of administering broadcasting. In this way, the formulation of policy would have been separated from its administration, as in the case of a company with its board of directors and its general manager and staff. There would have been the additional advantage that the voluntary board, selected by consultation between the three parties, would have represented different parts of Canada, would have been independent of partisan interest, and in a position to resist partisan pressure. This is the British scheme, and the British board, rather than the government, are held responsible for administration, thereby saving the government from criticism for the acts of its semi-autonomous commission.

The government of Canada, however, saw fit to establish a commission that combined the formulation of policy with its administration; then it appointed a commission, one of whose members was a former Conservative organizer. Subsequent acts and appointments of the commission, rightly or wrongly, were taken by the public and the opposition parties to be partisan. The radio commission, therefore, became subject to political pressure and party criticism.

And so on. I think there was much to commend itself in the proposal of the radio league; certainly we would have avoided the situation in which we find ourselves to-day. My right hon. friend does not like it; no one likes it. We all supported the idea of nationalizing the radio, of public ownership; there was never such unanimity in the house as when the bill was made law during the last session of parliament. We were told by the right hon. gentleman that politics would not enter into appointments to the board which was to be created to administer radio affairs, but unfortunately we think faith has not been kept so far as that promise and that pledge are concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: We say that politics has not entered into it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot understand my right hon. friend when he says that politics did not enter, when he has put there to represent a large section of the community a man who not only was his candidate in the last election but who has been the organizer of his party for three or four elections. So far as I am concerned I do not believe that man can administer radio affairs in my district impartially. I do not trust the radio commission, as it is now constituted, for the next general election or for any other matter in my district. It is a sad condition in which to find myself; I should prefer to have confidence in that board. I agree with my right hon. friend that confidence is necessary for the success of radio broadcasting in Canada, but if confidence is lacking we are not responsible; the government is responsible, and I am sorry to say that until that condition is corrected it will be impossible for the people of Canada to get along well with the board which is in control of radio broadcasting, and until that condition is created we shall not have success or harmony.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has no objection to an exclusively conservative or liberal station, and he is quite right; however, there are people who are in a more unfortunate position than that; some have no station. I wish to apprise the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) of what happened to me. As Coppée would say: My story, gentlemen on the bench will be brief. Once, for my good or ill fortune, I delivered a speech, at Montmagny, on the Imperial economic agreements, and some enthusiastic person—there are always some—requested me to repeat it in Quebec. During two months, I received from station CHRC dilatory replies, followed by an absolute refusal; they gave no excuse or reason. I wish to inquire from the hon Minister of Marine, whether persons holding government licences to operate broadcasting stations have a right to refuse a private individual the use of their station, providing he does not offend public decency or order—I felt that I had offended neither the one nor the other—and providing that, in requesting the use of the station for half an hour, he gives them sufficient notice, such as a week, two weeks or even two months. My notice covered two months. I am totally at a loss to know why the gentleman refused me. I put a question on the order paper, two weeks ago, to ascertain the names of the owners of that station.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Was it station CHRC that refused?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): It was station CHRC. The hon. member for Quebec East was more fortunate than I was because I listened to a splendid speech of his, broadcasted from station CHRC. I was unable to even put in a word. I wish to inquire whether these stations are under the government's control and whether they have a right, proprio moter, to prevent a citizen or even a representative of the people, as, for instance, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), from addressing a larger audience than the usual one. Friends of the Conservative cause had requested me to repeat that speech in Quebec. You will always come across people that are more Catholic than the Pope. Evidently, in the eyes of these gentlemen of the CHRC station, I was guilty of heresy, if not in fact at least potentially. That is, I presume, the only reason which can be advanced for this refusal. So far as the merit of the ideas expounded, my speech was delivered in Montmagny before a highly intellectual and select audience, comprising representatives of the State and Clergy. Nobody was shocked. What I wish to know is whether these stations have a right to refuse, proprio moter, the use of their broadcasting stations, according to their whiffs and whims.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): May I put a question to the hon. member? According to rumour, was not the vice-president of the Radio Commission, in the past—previous to his appointment—one of the directors of the CHRC broadcasting station?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I am aware that he was. That, perhaps, may throw some light on the CHRC station's refusal to grant my request, because it is no secret, I have no reason to conceal it, I did not recommend the appointment of the present vice-president. I considered that there were persons, such as Notary Montreuil, of Quebec, and many others eminently qualified to fill that post. The appointment having been made, I do not intend to discuss it, I have no reason to approve or champion it. I simply expressed my views, at the time.

Mr. DORION (Translation): There is another broadcasting station at Quebec; the CKCV station.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I had applied to the CHRC.

Mr. DORION (Translation): That is, to the "Soleil"!

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That was bad enough; I had, first, applied to friends of the hon. member for Quebec Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), I was certainly not going to apply to a broadcasting station belonging to gentlemen who are really no friends of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency. There must be at this station persons very broad-minded as regards the distribution of patronage, but very narrow-minded as regards individuals who are conceited enough to honour the broadcasting station with their presence.

I have put a question to the hon. Minister of Marine....

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Did you apply to the Canadian Broadcasting Commission to obtain redress?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Did they refuse you?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): They replied that it was none of their business.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I understand that the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), wants an answer. This is the first time that I hear about the refusal of this station to broadcast my hon. friend's speech.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I am not criticizing the minister.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I am amazed at this refusal, because usually stations are delighted to broadcast the always interesting speeches of the hon. member. However, it must be noted that the station referred to, the CHRC, is owned by a private company, it is a private broadcasting station—

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Quite so.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —which was granted its licence for the period of twelve months, last year; and, 6, months this year, that is, since the new regulations are in force. Broadcasting stations must be operated according to the regulations of the Radio Commission. With this exception, the stations are independent of the Minister of Marine and the Radio Commission.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is what I wished to find out.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I hope that my hon. friend will be more fairly dealt with in the future, not only by that station but by all stations, because Canadians, as a rule, are always delighted to listen to the always very interesting remarks of the hon. member for Montmagny.

My hon. friend inquired as to the directors of the company which owned that broadcasting station. I have not yet this information. The hon. member recently put that question on the order paper and I immediately requested that this station furnish me with the facts of the case. As soon as I get a reply, I shall be pleased to get in touch with my hon. friend.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is what I wished to know. I have no reproach to make to the hon. Minister. I am aware that the Radio Commission is practically independent. I want to find out whether the broadcasting stations are independent of the Commission or whether they come under its jurisdiction. It seems to me extraordinary that the Radio Commission would grant a licence to a public station, which has a public franchise, and that this station would simply be the organization of one group or one party, or two parties—not of three or four. I would think that having obtained a franchise from the people, they are there to cater to the public, therefore, the Radio Commission should have over these stations a more efficient and complete control. If not, the commission would not serve the purpose for which it was created.

A broadcasting station—the hon. Minister stated—is owned by an independent corporation, and I understand, according to his remarks, that a station has absolute control of its program and the broadcasting hours placed at the disposal of the public.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Absolutely, providing it observes the regulations of the commission. For instance, an advertisement must not occupy more than 5 per cent of the time allotted to the program.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): In this case, it might, perhaps, be necessary to amend the Radio Broadcasting Act, in this respect.

I am very much of the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Quebec East, because in fact, that might lead to tyranny or partiality and this would totally fall short of the aim which we had in view when creating the commission. The radio broadcasting stations are established to cater to the public, the moment they observe our constitution, our laws—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Peace and good order.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): —public peace, good order and decency; they are there to serve the public and to be at its disposal.

I wish to state that we have, at Montmagny, a small station owned by Mr. Marquis, a Liberal, who takes an active part against me during electoral campaigns, however, he is a loyal opponent who is always pleased to put his station at the disposal of any one, of any party, among others, of the member for Montmagny. The latter does not always help him, however, he understands the reason, the purpose for which he has this station and that it is the government which grants him his licence.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear! Hear!

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I wish to draw the attention of the minister and the commission to this fact in order that it may help him to obtain a more powerful broadcasting station, because he often broadcasts to the whole of lower Quebec, while the Quebec station is unable to reach that section of the country.

I suggest to the minister that there is ground to amend the act. The owners of broadcasting stations are public servants, because radio is almost a public utility—they hold a franchise—therefore, they are there to serve the public, and not to satisfy their petty spites, their personal views—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear! Hear!

Mr. LAVERGNE. (Translation): —their preferences. I, for one, strongly criticize the CHRC station of Quebec, not because it affects me but because it affects others. I often had the occasion of broadcasting my speeches, speaking both in front and behind the broadcasting mouthpiece. What does one speech more or less—I would gladly dispense making them. I think it most unfair of this station and a renewal of its licence should be refused to them. That is why I wish to find out who are the owners, because, when I have their names, I shall have quite a lot to say as regards having this intolerable state of things redressed.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): I wish, sir, to support the attitude taken by the hon. member for Montmagny. If the government has full control of radio in Canada, then the commission, the authorities in charge must see that everybody has fair play, so far as radio service is concerned. The moment that a public man does not express subversive views against public order or peace, I think he is entitled to obtain from radio stations, holding a government licence and under the control of the commission, that his speech or utterances be broadcasted by Canadian public stations. The reason we established government control over radio, was so that everybody would be dealt fairly and justly, and I entirely agree with the hon. member for Montmagny in his remarks to the house.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. member for Quebec East has told the house that the radio commission does not possess his confidence. I think it rather unfortunate that a body occupying as important a post as that confided to this commission should, before it has really entered upon its duties, be accused by a man of the high position of the former Minister of Justice of being entirely unworthy of the confidence of the country, and I think also it is extremely unfortunate that no allegation is made in support of the charge. It is true that the hon. gentleman singled out for his own personal charge the vice-president, and forsooth he said, "I cannot have any confidence in this man nor can anyone else have confidence in him because—heinous offence—he was on some occasion a Conservative candidate."

An hon. MEMBER: The only reason.

Mr. HACKETT: He goes further and says that this man has added to the crime by having been a Conservative organizer. I believe that the hon. gentleman is accurate in stating as a fact that the vice-president of the commission did at some time have something to do with politics. I should hate to think however that every member of this chamber is unfitted for any honourable post because at some time he had sought and been found worthy of the confidence of the electorate of some constituency. I consider it most unfortunate that a distinguished member of this chamber should wish to point to every man in this house and say that because he has at some time been a partisan he is unworthy of high office. If he is going to apply that rule to this and other countries, what esteem can he have for the bench, what esteem can he have for the incumbent of any office that is worth holding?—because in democratic countries positions of high trust are invariably given to those who seek, and show themselves worthy of, the confidence of the people. I reiterate therefore that to say, without substantiating the statement, without bringing forth anything to justify such a charge, that this body which has recently come into office is unworthy of public confidence, designates, I fear, a type of mind and a partisanship which detract from the value of the judgment uttered in those words of condemnation. The hon. member says that Bill Murray should go home—and I speak of Bill Murray because he was at McGill with me, a boy from British Columbia, an active, energetic lad who has made his way in the world and is welcomed not only to Canada but to other countries where expert radio advice is sought; he is called in because he is supposed to know more about the technique of radio development than anyone else. When the hon. member refers to that gentleman as a stranger, and harks back to that cry that is sometimes heard in the back ranges, that he is a foreigner—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I never said that. Be fair; I never said that.

Mr. HACKETT: I am perfectly willing to retract.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are carried away by your own eloquence.

An hon. MEMBER: Take your medicine.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. gentleman said that we did not require any assistance or guidance from outside.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not saying he is a foreigner.

Mr. HACKETT: If this government has fallen into that evil habit it has only fallen a victim to the bad example set by its predecessor. I will ask hon. gentlemen opposite where they went to get that lamented man who recently passed from us and who for some years headed our national railway system. Where did he come from? Then, if I remember well, there was a gentleman who came, not from Vancouver, not from Montreal or Toronto, a gentleman who had something to do with the investigation of conditions in the maritimes and whose name I believe was Sir Andrew Rae Duncan. Where did he come from? Who summoned him here from Scotland? If I remember well, there was also a report made with regard to the Hudson Bay terminal, a vast and costly report which was made by a most skilled and able man. He did not come from Toronto or Montreal, he came from England; his name was Sir Frederick Palmer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think that was a mistake.

Mr. HACKETT: It may have been a mistake but I am willing to do the hon. gentleman and his friends justice by saying that they went where they thought they were able to get the best man they could. Now that is all that this government has done. Let us therefore be fair to the radio commission and realize that it is trying to become something of which we shall all be proud. Let us give it a fair chance.

Mr. GAGNON: I will not detain the committee very long, but I want to say a few words with respect to this small station in Quebec which seems to have incurred the displeasure of my hon. friend from Montmagny A few minutes ago my hon. friend from Quebec East, when speaking about the radio broadcasting commission, reproached me for having quoted the report which was made last year by the committee that sat on radio broadcasting matters. I shall quote not only the report of the radio committee but also the law. I refer my hon. friend to chapter 51 of the statutes of 1932. Subsection (g) of section 8 of the act reads:

> The commission may, subject to the approval of the minister, assist and encourage the construction of small private stations.

But it is known that these small private stations of 100 watts and under remain the property of the owners. They may not be taken into the national scheme of radio broadcasting and will not be subject to the control of the Minister of Marine or the broadcasting commission except so far as programs and licences are concerned. It is a well known fact that the two small stations in Quebec city have not been taken over by the commission. In fact, no station in Canada has been taken over to form part of the national scheme of radio broadcasting. The commission contends that they cannot do this unless the law is changed.

I come now to the speech of the hon. member for Montmagny. He does not seem to like station CHRC, but I do not think this station can be accused of narrow partisanship. I think that is demonstrated by the fact that the hon. member for Quebec East broadcast a speech over that station about a month ago. This was the speech which the hon. member for Montmagny referred to as being wonderful. I will call it a seditious speech. I think one is entitled to his own views in this regard. The hon. member for Montmagny may have his own views, the hon. member for Quebec East may have his and I may have mine. I think it was absolutely unfair to insinuate that that station has been unfair or unjust to any particular party. One of the small stations in Quebec is the property of Mr. Vandry, a well known Liberal, while the other is owned by a company. There happened to be some Conservatives acting as directors of this company, but I do not think that that would be sufficient to prove that the company was unfair. My hon. friend saw fit to overlook Mr. Vandry's station and broadcast over CHRC. That is his business.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not refer to any of these stations. My hon. friend is addressing me but I did not say a word about these stations.

Mr. GAGNON: I hope my hon. friend will not be offended if I refer to his conduct. L'heure Provinciale is not a Conservative matter. It was organized by the provincial government, which has decided to use CHRC. That is further evidence that CHRC does not play politics; although the directors are Conservatives they have the patronage of the provincial government. The hon. member for Montmagny put a question on the order paper in connection with the directors of this company. He is a very distinguished lawyer and he knows that he could obtain this information from the provincial secretary, whose duty it is to disclose the names of directors of any provincial company. CHRC is carrying on under a provincial charter. The hon. member for Montmagny may have cause to complain about CHRC but he should not complain in this house or insinuate that the Minister of Marine has been unfair. That is not the case. CHRC is a provincially owned station and if for one reason or another—perhaps for unjust reasons—the hon. member was not treated courteously, why did he not use the station of Mr. Vandry? The latter would have been much pleased to broadcast my hon. friend's speech. I think it is absolutely unfair to insinuate that station CHRC in Quebec city has been playing politics. If the hon. member for Montmagny has not been treated courteously by CHRC, this government cannot be blamed. It is only the directors of that station that could be blamed. When the hon. member for Montmagny insinuates that the vice-chairman of the radio commission was connected with that station, I think he was unfair. He knows very well that when taking his oath of office the vice-chairman swore he had no interest in any station, and he has no interest in any to-day.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of treading on the corns of the hon. member for Dorchester; I am exceedingly sorry if he thinks I have done so, because I did not want to arouse his ire. However, I thank him personally although I do not know whether he has done such a good service for the Minister of Marine. I do not know whether the hon. member for Dorchester was speaking for the government, but he forces me to again get up to say a few words. My quarrel with station CHRC was settled absolutely and I was satisfied with the explanations given by the Minister of Marine. I understand he was not to blame and I have no quarrel with him. However, I thought that I should put this matter before the committee as in my opinion the situation created was absolutely unfair. In saying that I do not refer to my own personal feeling. When the hon. member for Dorchester has been in parliament as long as I have he will know that it is more of a pleasure than a sorrow to put speeches on the shelf. Apparently the hon. member is acting as an advocate for station CHRC and I must tell him that he seems to be better informed about that station than the minister. He accuses me of having attacked the vice-president of the commission, but I did not do anything of the kind. The hon. member for Quebec East asked me if he was an owner of that station before his appointment and I simply answered "yes". Whether or not he is now an owner, I do not know, but I suppose he is not.

I may say to the hon. member for Dorchester that in this affair station CHRC acted without courtesy, without honesty and without courage. For two months they gave me dilatory answers. They were going to be paid and paid with the money of good friends of the hon. member for Dorchester. These people were anxious to have the speech which had been given in Montmagny broadcast in Quebec, and they were willing to pay the station. The action of this station constituted a slur either on the Conservative party or on myself. If it was only on myself, I am none the worse off; I can stand these things, but I think they have acted most unfairly. This is a public utility, to serve the public, and if no one had been concerned but myself I would not have mentioned the matter. They have been granted a franchise and I claim that they are there to serve the public. If they have a right to refuse to serve the public then it is time the law was changed. They are not there to gratify their affections or their hatreds. They are there to put that station to the service of the public of Canada, that and nothing else, and if the law does not give the commission those powers, the law should be amended. If the law does give the commission those powers, that station should be reprimanded immediately because certainly we should be missing the aim in nationalizing radio if we allowed it to become a tool in the hands of those with influence or money enough to buy or rent a station. I do not care how many stations there are, and I do not care whether it is Liberals or Conservatives or Tories or Grits or anybody else that runs them; that is a matter of indifference to me, but I say that the people of this country have a right to the radio when they wish to hear it, and nobody can make me believe that station CHRC did not have half an hour to give to the hon. member for Montmagny, especially when people have told me that they received permission to broadcast for a whole hour the next day on only one day's notice. I have no hatred or love for that particular station; I am quite indifferent; I do not know who owns it, but I want to know who owns it if it is going to continue to be operated in that way. I want to know who got the licence and through what influence, and I want to see that they do not get a licence next year if they do not act differently.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If I may presume, Mr. Chairman, to talk a second time before the ninth hour is up on a subject I do not know a great deal about, I should like to take just five or ten minutes more—and do not be too harsh, Mr. Chairman, on my homely illustrations because that is the way I talk.

While I do not know much about radio I should know a lot, without presumption, about Tory-o, and that is what I am talking about, if I may; and I think the chairman is going to let me. I should like to give another illustration of what can be done by a government that wants to do it, and apparently this is that kind of government. I want to point out how easy it is for the government to do it, and I am going to tell the Minister that I had it worked on me once not by means of the radio but by monopolizing the press for advertising purposes. I will tell that story first.

When I ran a federal election campaign against a Progressive candidate for the first time in 1919 in Assiniboia in southern Saskatchewan, I found when I got into the constituency that every square inch of advertising space had been taken up in advance right through the election by my enterprising friends then called the Progressives. Imagine the helplessness of one going into a contest like that! Now if our innocent friends the Progressives will do that towards a brother farmer opponent, what won't the less innocent gentlemen now occupying the treasury benches do towards an opponent by means of the radio? The hon. member for Dorchester has talked about engaging a period of time on the air over a certain radio line or wave or whatever is the technical term, but we might find that the Liberals could not get on the air for six months to come. This government will know when an election is coming on six or four or two months before the writs are issued, and they can have every wave and everything else that goes with it engaged right through the election.

Mr. SPOTTON: They will have a wave of public opinion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, over the left. I know what my friends the Progressives worked on me in Assiniboia. I am not unduly suspicious when I suggest that the government might engage the radio in advance right through the election. A man would be worse than a fool who, having been burnt once, did not fight shy of fire a second time. So I say that I am not unduly suspicious. I am taking things as I find them and as I have found them for a half century, and they have not changed very much for the better during the last two or three years.

Here is something I cannot get over. I do not want to be too much at loggerheads with the Prime Minister, but he interjected a little time ago that what I was saying was nonsense. Well, let us see if what he was saying was not nonsense and actual bunk, and it is my business to debunk the right hon. gentleman. This radio commission had its foundations laid on party appointments. This commission is admittedly Conservative, and I am not finding fault with that as such. But good as it may be, and I know nothing about the gentlemen composing it, although I hear the chairman well spoken of—I understand that for a long number of years he was editor of Toronto Saturday Night, which I read occasionally because I rather like to read it and find out what my opponents are saying. The foundations of the commission, then are admittedly Conservative and political; and how can you conceive that anything with a strictly Conservative foundation will be anything but Conservative? In other words, how can the superstructure be anything but political when the foundation is absolutely political? Is there a cackle over there? Did my hon. friends never hear about the principle of like begetting like? If the root be bad, what will the branches be? Unless something better is grafted on to the old root, the branches will be the same as the root; so I say that what the Prime Minister said about our criticisms was not only nonsense but it was absolutely asinine, the biggest bunk that I ever heard—to say that the foundation could be one thing and the superstructure something else absolutely opposite—neutral, non-political, with a Tory foundation. In saying that I do not want to be supercritical about the gentleman who occupies the position of chairman. The government has chosen that course, and it must not now pretend to be astonished because we expect the superstructure to be no better than the foundation. I think my conclusions are sound. I have not heard anybody get up since I spoke before and try to show that my other illustrations were not also sound. I invite anybody now to say how any government that wants to do it can be prevented from tying up the radio service in the way I have described, and just mark if it is not done.

It is only quite recently, Mr. Chairman, that the Conservative party in Canada has been noted to be friendly towards the nationalization of any utility. Everybody knows that the Canadian National was taken on by the government of that day because they did not know what else to do with it. Everybody knows that the present national radio system was taken over by this government because it was left in their lap by the preceding government. A commission had been appointed by the Liberal government to inquire into radio, headed by Sir John Aird, and the commission made a unanimous report prior to the retirement of the former government. Public sentiment was so strongly behind that report that when this government came into office it could not do otherwise than carry out the recommendations of the commission. The government made the most of it and accepted that report, and put its recommendations into operation with a magnificent speech on the general subject of nationalized air service by the right hon.

the Prime Minister. They did not like it particularly, because they are really only the foster parents. That is all they can claim to be of any of these great national utilities. Then why not turn the radio service to some further useful account, so that it could be used during an election? That is what they are going to do, do not make any mistake about it. They have not been slow in making use of other things, as I have already described. The leopard, as a rule, does not change his spots, or the Ethiopian his skin, just over night. I promised to take only five minutes—six minutes, possibly—and that time has now expired. I do not believe I shall speak longer, Mr. Chairman.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Expenditure of moneys.

Mr. COOTE: Before the section carries I should like to say that I had not the privilege of being in the house during the whole discussion of this bill. I did hear part of the Prime Minister's speech and it was because of what he said that I voted for the second reading of the bill. After what the Prime Minister said I thought the bill should have second reading and be allowed to go before committee of the whole so we could find out what need there might be for section 1 of the bill. It seemed to me that the Prime Minister made a very good case, and that while we could not question him on the second reading of the bill we could do so in committee. If the broadcasting commission in Canada is to carry on properly it seems to me that at least some of the sections in the bill are necessary.

In my opinion the present unsatisfactory conditions in connection with our national radio are due largely to the personnel of the commission, and I make that statement with a great deal of regret. I do not object to the government appointing men on commissions who may have been Conservatives in the past. Of course, when picking men, they should not pick those who have been preeminently Conservative, or have taken an active part in political life. It is important that the men chosen for these positions should be chosen because of their qualifications for the job. Our Civil Service Commission does not bear the reputation it should because we have never been careful enough in choosing the commissioners. It may be that the government was careful in choosing the radio commissioners, but I do not think the personnel of the commission is what it should be.

If half the reports I hear are true, I believe they are going too far in their censorship. Since the house adjourned at six o'clock, I have been told that certain people cannot have the use of the radio in Canada unless they first submit their manuscripts to the chairman of the commission, or some official of the commission, so that the commissioners may know exactly what is going to be said before the program is broadcast. That is going much too far. I do not believe the nationalization of radio will ever become popular if that practice is followed.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Would the hon. member allow a question? In what instance was that done?

Mr. COOTE: All I said was that since the house adjourned at six o'clock I was told that that happened in one case. I cannot give the particulars.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Is that the Rutherford case?

Mr. COOTE: I understand that there was another case. I do not believe any diplomacy has been shown in connection with the Rutherford case. Any man who is to be chairman of the radio commission in Canada should be particularly broadminded and have a bit of diplomacy in his make up. I am afraid that the experience of the present chairman of the radio commission in the position which he formerly occupied did not fit him particularly for the job which he now holds. He was writing editorials for a certain publication in Toronto. I do not believe any man in this house would suggest that restraint was exercised in the criticisms contained in the columns of that paper. He was a particularly critical editor. I have heard that remark passed very often about the gentleman in question—not that I have anything against him, but I do not think he was the ideal person to appoint to this very important position.

I hope the appointment will turn out all right, because I wish to see national radio a success. I believe that it should be nationalized. But if it is to be autocratically controlled in what I believe to be a rather narrow minded manner—and I am willing to be corrected, if the chairman has not been as autocratic as we understand—it is not going to encourage the belief of the people of Canada in public ownership. Nationalization can be a success only if it is carried on in the proper manner. The essential thing in making a success of nationalization is to choose the right type of men to control. I can only hope that because of the criticism which has been made in this house lately, much of which I believe is justified, the commission will be a little more careful in the way they conduct the business of radio in Canada.

Mr. EULER: I do not intend to make an address, but I should like to ask a question. During the rather interesting family squabble which took place on the other side of the house a few moments ago, I believe the hon. member for Dorchester made the statement that small radio stations of 100 watts or under are not subject to the control of the commission. I am quite sure that that is a mistake, and I should like the minister to confirm my opinion. I believe those stations are entirely under the control of the commission; if not, they should be.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Dorchester read only subsection (g) of section 8 of the act, which reads as follows:

> The commission may, subject to the approval of the minister, assist and encourage the construction of small private stations.

There is no doubt that those small private stations are under the control of the commission.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Quebec East. All the stations in Canada are under the control of the radio commission. They obtain their licences, and they have to comply with the regulations of the commission.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to refer the minister to a question I asked him on April 28, on the orders of the day, in regard to the report of a speech that Mr. Hector Charlesworth, chairman of the radio commission, had made in Toronto on April 25. While I did not read the text of the speech, I gave in substance some of the statements the chairman was reported to have said. On that occasion the minister replied that he had no knowledge of the speech to which I had referred, but would look into the matter. I took the trouble to send across the floor of the house a copy of the Toronto Globe of that date, and the minister intimated to me by a nod of the head, at least, that he would look into the matter. I ask him now if he has read the speech, if he has taken it up with the chairman, and if he has endeavoured to discipline the chairman in regard to his utterances.

If the chairman of the committee will permit me I should like to state more fully the report to which I referred. The speech was delivered in Toronto on April 25 in the Royal York hotel, before the advertising club. The chairman is reported to have said the following:

Vigorously defending the actions and policies of the Canadian radio commission before a meeting of the advertising and sales club in the Royal York hotel, chairman Hector Charlesworth yesterday challenged his opponents with the words of William Ernest Henley, "My head is bloody but unbowed." He declared that the commission would not deviate from the policies which it has formulated. "Anybody is a liar or a fool who says that radio in Canada is not in a better condition now than last year," he said.

"I have absolutely no apologies to make. We have a program which must be carried out. It is being carried out most economically. There is no doubt that the policies which the commission has adopted will soon be enforced in the United States," said the speaker.

I will not read any more, Mr. Chairman, but I should like to ask the minister, who I understand is in control of the commission and is the chief over the chairman of the commission; for no matter how eminent that chairman may be he reports or should report to the responsible minister of the department under which that commission functions—I ask the minister if he thinks that a public servant has a right to make a speech such as the chairman of the radio commission delivered in Toronto that night? Has the minister taken up the question of that speech with the chairman of the commission, as he promised he would? Has he advised the chairman that in future he had better control what he says when he speaks in public in regard to the position he occupies?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Does my hon. friend suggest that the chairman of the radio commission should submit his manuscript to the minister before he makes a speech?

Mr. SANDERSON: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not, but I think the minister, as a responsible minister of the crown, when a public servant under him makes such a speech as Mr. Charlesworth is reported to have made in the Royal York hotel at Toronto, should discipline him and tell him that in future he had better keep a bridle on his tongue.

Mr. POULIOT: He should turn his tongue seven times around his whiskers before speaking.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I think that ought to be withdrawn. There are certain amenities that should be respected. Has this parliament degenerated to that sort of thing? I just leave it to you, sir. If a member can talk that way about a man who cannot defend himself on the floor of this house, about his whiskers, then all I can say is that this parliament has reached a low level.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, Moslems consider the beard as sacred.

Mr. QUINN: Sit down, you jackass!

Mr. POULIOT: That sounds like Balaam's ass!

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is all right?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then you should protest.

Mr. POULIOT: Did you hear that, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. SANDERSON: I was directing a question to the minister—

Mr. BENNETT: I am raising a question of order which I desire to have dealt with. The observation made by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) is equally objectionable. It is my duty to try to remember something of the traditions of this house, and the observation made by the member for Temiscouata I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to have withdrawn, likewise the observation made by the junior member for Halifax.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has already spoken on the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: This is a different point of order, a new point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. According to the rules and regulations the language used by the hon. member for Temiscouata if addressing himself to a colleague would be out of order. Speaking of an outsider I do not know that I can call him to order, but I would ask the hon. member for Temiscouata and the hon. member whose constituency I did not catch—

Mr. QUINN: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I made the remark and I gladly withdraw it. It was made in the excitement of the moment.

The CHAIRMAN: —at the same time I do not think I have authority on this point to call him to order. I would ask the hon. member for Temiscouata to remember one thing; in England the House of Commons is considered a gentleman's club, and that should apply to Canada also.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: Let him shave and I will withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SANDERSON: Now that the storm has subsided I will come back to my question to the Minister of Marine. Has he drawn to the attention of the chairman of the radio commission the report of his speech delivered in Toronto on April 25, as it appeared in the Toronto Globe which I sent across to the minister? Has he taken it up with the chairman?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, in my estimation the president of the broadcasting commission has the right to defend himself against the attacks that have been made upon him by people outside of this house. He has been attacked; the commission has been unfairly attacked by papers in this country, especially papers owned by those who are opposed to state control of radio and the chairman has the right to defend himself. That is my view. I spoke to the chairman about this speech to which my hon. friend has referred, not because I wanted to give a lesson to the chairman, but only to have the information. He told me verbally that he had been misquoted by that paper. As my hon. friend knows, it is only part of his speech which is reported. But I hold, Mr. Chairman, that the radio commissioners have the right to defend themselves.

I am surprised to hear so much criticism without any single, serious fact or matter of reproach against the commission. I challenge my hon. friends on the other side of the house to give a single fact to show that these gentlemen have not performed their duties since they have been in office. We had an illustration of the quality of those criticisms from one member of this house a minute or two ago. He had been told a few minutes ago that the radio commission ruled that the manuscript of speeches was to be submitted to the commissioners before they were broadcast.

Mr. COOTE: By some people.

Mr. DURANLEAU: And when my hon. friend is asked who are those people, he does not know. Hearsay evidence is worthless. Is that fair to the commissioners? Are they not at least entitled to have specific charges? Why not give these gentlemen a fair chance? It is evident that there is no real ground for these criticisms. I am sorry that so much of the time of this house has been taken up with petty criticisms, none of them serious; and I say that the speeches of my hon. friends today in this house are the best proof that these gentlemen have done their full duty since they have been in charge of that commission. If my hon. friends opposite have no other charge to lay against the commission, I say the commission must have done wonderfully well because nothing serious has been uttered against it. This afternoon I gave the house a full explanation of what the commissioners have done since they have been in office, of their policy for the future, and nobody objected to what I said; no one criticized their program for the future. Everyone seems to be satisfied. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that these criticisms will stop, and I am sure that within but a few months the commission will demonstrate that they deserve the office with which they have been entrusted. My hon. friends say, "Well, some of them were politicians." I challenge my hon. friends to show one instance since the commissioners have been in office—and I refer particularly to the vice-president of the commission—in which that gentleman has shown any political preference to anyone. I think he has been absolutely fair to everyone. I repeat, they are trying to do their best to serve the people of this country; why not give them a fair chance for at least a year? This is a new business, a new undertaking. They may make mistakes; they are human, but they must be granted a reasonable time to show their competence to administer this new enterprise with success. I hope, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend will be satisfied with the answer I have given.

Mr. SANDERSON: If I understood the remarks of the minister correctly he said that he had brought to the attention of the chairman of the radio commission the report appearing in the Toronto Globe of April 28 of a speech delivered by that gentleman in the Royal York hotel, and that the chairman of the radio commission said he had been misquoted. Is that correct? Did the minister say he had been told by the chairman of the commission that he had been misquoted in that report?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is what I said.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is that what the chairman told the minister?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not entirely mastered the beautiful language of my hon. friend but I hope I made myself clear.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am sorry if I have misunderstood the minister. I should like to know whether the chairman of the radio commission told the minister, his chief—because the minister is or should be over the chairman of the commission—that he was misquoted in this report. If so I am quite willing to take that explanation. Did Mr. Charlesworth say he had been misquoted?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have given my answer; it was very plain.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I frankly deplore the suggestion of the hon. member for South Perth that this commission should be under the direction or control of any minister of this or any other government. Technically, of course, I know he is not subject to that control, nor does the act give the minister any power of direction or discipline other than the authority vested in the governor in council to dismiss the commissioners for cause.

As a result of the castigation the commission has been getting to-night—a castigation which very frankly I think was coming to it—I trust it will develop some tact and some character of administration in connection with broadcasting that will endear it to the people of this country, and make them have some respect for and confidence in it. I should like to see radio broadcasting so controlled by such a commission that, as in Great Britain, a debate of this kind could not and would not take place. I hope that day comes, but remember that after all the commission has succeeded in creating widespread distrust and dissatisfaction, and certainly it must mend its ways if the nationalization of radio is to be a success. I think all our comments should be confined, so far as possible, to facts; I agree with the minister in that regard. Personally I have heard all sorts of rumours. Some I have discovered to be quite untrue while others have had sufficient foundation to justify the attacks that have been made on the commission, as I said a little earlier in the evening. I do feel that hon. members of this house would be well advised to give this converted journalist, this excellent technician and this third person, whose character and qualifications have been eloquently discussed in this house by others who know him better than I do, time to get their breath, to sense public feeling in the matter and to develop a publicly owned broadcasting system along the lines sincerely desired by the committee last year.

I do think a mistake was made—I am free to admit it at this stage—in combining the administrative and policy-creating powers in one commission. It seemed almost impossible to avoid doing that, though I agree that it would have been better if we had been able to accept the suggestion advanced by the president of the Canadian Radio League, which was quoted earlier this evening by the hon. member for Quebec East. In my opinion the commission failed seriously in one respect; that was in not making it perfectly clear to the public from the beginning, and not after the trouble had arisen, that the million dollars in the estimates were not and never had been taxes and were not coming out of the pockets of the taxpayers as taxes. From the commencement radio licences have been a charge on users of radio receiving sets in order that they may secure certain services in the way of a check-up on interference, closing down interruptions caused by high frequency currents, telegraph stations, leaky transformers and so on. I could testify personally to the efficiency of the Department of Marine in that aspect of their work, but during the years when the Department of Marine was carrying on that work a large surplus of money was accumulating that should have been credited directly to radio broadcasting and radio users. I understand that it went into the consolidated revenue fund and was used for general purposes. I am of the opinion that sooner or later this or some subsequent government will have to see that this money does not go into the consolidated revenue fund but is kept separate for the use of the commission and is used freely by the commission, as it is in Great Britain. Again I direct attention to that illustration. The commission should be allowed to build up its capital plant and to develop along the lines that I am sure every Canadian wants to see. Unfortunately the commission let the newspapers get away with gross misrepresentation in this connection, and I should like to direct attention particularly to the Toronto Globe. Even after that newspaper had been informed of the actual facts in connection with this sum of $1,000,000 it persisted in carrying on, in its editorial columns, a bitter and vicious attack on the ground that this was an expenditure of public money dragged out of the public by taxes. This principle should have been recognized in the very beginning.

Now for a moment or two I come to the bill itself. Section 1 is distasteful; I do not think the elimination of the operation of the Civil Service Act in the matter of appointments is wise or proper. I am willing to concede that a difficulty exists in this case, however. For example, Mr. Chairman, when the commission decides to take over an existing radio station they will find there the general manager, the radio experts and technical men and others, probably forming a most efficient unit. I grant at once, it is unthinkable that these men should have to go back to the commission to receive what one might call eligibility as the result of an examination, and I submit that if a compromise could be reached in the matter it would be the wisest step from the point of view of all interests concerned.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that in the consideration of this aspect of the matter, the radio commission be permitted to retain those persons who are sufficiently desirable and are now employed on the staffs of any broadcasting agency that may be taken over by the commission, but that all new appointments of any kind, from technical men down to stenographers, shall be made through the medium of the Civil Service Act. It is not fair to say that the Civil Service Commission is incapable of undertaking the necessary tests in connection with appointees to the radio commission. It has done it most successfully in connection with the experts of the Marine department who have been administering the Radiotelegraph Act and who were in that service before this commission was ever thought of. I have never heard any complaint against these technical men, and it is just a slight step from radio-telegraphy to radio broadcasting; the general principles underlying both are the same. So that I do not think it can be contended successfully that there are technical reasons why the Civil Service Commission should not function in this case. I am satisfied that with the co-operation of the Marine department and the commission it can be made to discharge its responsibilities.

With that one criticism I have nothing further to say against the bill, but I do suggest that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine would be well advised to consider seriously making the whole commission more like the British broadcasting system.

I disagree with the criticism launched at Mr. Gladstone Murray. It was my pleasure to hear him last year and I had the pleasure also of examining him on the committee. I met him this year again, and I think that as Canadians we can be very proud of a fellow Canadian who has raised himself to such a high peak of efficiency in the mother country. Personally I sincerely congratulate the government on having secured the services of Mr. Murray if only for a short time. I do not think they could have secured a better man for the work he had to do, and if his letter may have a tinge of the lecture about it, it is perhaps as well. There are many of us who need lectures on many matters.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Labour members present in the house when the vote was taken on the second reading voted against that motion, and they did so not because they were opposed to the bill in its entirety but solely because they were opposed to the amendment in section 1. The hon. member for Bow River has put our case so well that it is not necessary for me to say anything further in that connection. I agree with everything he has said, and with this part of the question disposed of we should certainly have no objection to the rest of the bill.

May I say that neither in the house nor outside have I ever uttered a word of criticism of the commission. I think we should give the commission an opportunity to organize radio broadcasting in this country. In the short time they have been operating they have done some very good work, though possibly they have also made some mistakes. Personally I am quite willing at the moment to give them credit for the good work they have done and to overlook the mistakes they have made so far. It may be that the discussion that has taken place in this house to-day will not be lost on the commission, but in saying this I must add another word. There is another commission in this country, the Civil Service Commission, and we should also give that body an opportunity to carry on its work, which is to provide staffs for these various organizations. As a matter of fact, we are every day robbing the Civil Service Commission of any dignity it may have had, and it is not to be wondered at if it does not function as efficiently as it is supposed to do.

We are not opposed to this bill in its entirety but only to the amendment proposed in section 1, the amendment to section 4 of the act. If some modifications were made in that regard, which would leave the bulk of the staff under the Civil Service Commission, we should have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CARDIN: During his speech this morning the Minister of Marine mentioned the fact that an agreement had been reached with the United States in regard to the division of wave lengths. The agreement was made in 1932, and he said it was very profitable to Canada. Would he favour the committee with a copy of it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: A statement was made last session to the house by the Prime Minister, giving the agreement in detail. It appears in Hansard. However, I will look into the matter and if what appears in Hansard is not altogether satisfactory to my hon. friend I will try to supply the necessary information.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it will be generally agreed that the entire discussion on this bill has been political. On one side we hear it said that if the Liberals were entitled to stations so were the Conservatives. In my judgment that is absolutely opposed to the best interests of broadcasting in this dominion in its widest sense. If the allotment of stations is to be put on the basis of political parties, then why not go to the logical conclusion and throw the thing wide open and have complete chaos? I believe that anyone has the right to broadcast provided that in his material he keeps within the confines of the statutes of the country, because it must be remembered that radio is essentially different from any other medium of disseminating information or political agitation. It is comparatively easy to keep up a newspaper, or to rent a hall or, like the Labour party, to speak under the canopy of heaven; but broadcasting channels are naturally limited, and in my judgment the quickest way to destroy this great educational facility is to have it made a football of party politics. Frankly, I believe that the discussion in this house to-day has been a good thing for the nationalization of our broadcasting facilities in Canada if it has done nothing else than to clear the air and to teach members of the house and the people of the country that this institution must not be turned into a political football.

I would like to say a word or two in connection with the civil service aspect of the employees of the commission. This afternoon the Prime Minister made reference to the liquor control boards in the various provinces. I do not intend to discuss the boards in the provinces outside of my own. After all is said and done, the manner in which they approach any problem is influenced by the practical experience which we have had in relation thereto. Never since the inception of the liquor control board in Ontario have I heard of anyone but a Conservative being employed by that body.

Mr. MORAND: Why pick on Ontario?

Mr. MITCHELL: I live in Ontario and I do not know anything about the boards in the rest of the provinces. I am afraid that if power is given to this radio commission to have complete jurisdiction over the technical and clerical staffs, in the very nature of things the same condition will exist. Man being what he is, this will be the natural course. If the same policies which have been pursued in other provinces with respect to commissions absolutely divorced from government are followed by this government, there will be only one result. This question should stand far above the conflict of political parties. I believe that radio will exert an enormous force in the control of the destinies of this country. Its powers of education should be treated as almost sacred. There are many practical problems which will confront this commission and in my opinion the broadcasting of political information is one. Absolute fairness should govern in this regard and the rights and privileges of every political party, irrespective of colour or complexion, should be respected, provided its doctrine fits in with the framework, the constitution and the laws of this country. I would not like to see happen in the next elections that which has happened in the past in my province when those who had the most money got the best facilities and naturally had the best audiences. Now that radio is being nationalized, each political party irrespective of its financial standing should have ample opportunity to make its views known to the people of this dominion.

An hon. MEMBER: We will not get it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Someone says, "we will not get it," but in my judgment the people are entitled to that and they should demand it.

Mr. MORAND: Will the hon. gentleman tell me what constitutes a party?

Mr. MITCHELL: You should know as you belong to one. You had better ask that question of yourself.

Mr. MORAND: You do not belong to one.

Mr. MITCHELL: You do not know, you are just guessing. I shall support the third reading of this bill provided adequate consideration is given to the civil service aspect of the matter. I think it is within the intelligence of the government to so amend this section as to prevent the intrusion of politics into the permanent staffs of the broadcasting stations and the commission itself. There has been nothing but chaos in this country and the one to the south ever since the inception of radio, and I believe that this commission should be given ample opportunity to work out channels and wave lengths so that radio may be enjoyed by the people in every part of this dominion, not only by those in the larger centres.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a provision in the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act which had much to do with the unanimity which prevailed last year when the bill became law. Apart from providing for the appointment of a commission, the act provides that the governor in council after consultation with the provincial authorities shall appoint nine assistant commissioners, I believe one for each province. It would be the duty of these assistant commissioners to organize advisory committees in the various provinces and to act in conjunction with the private stations. There would then be a general council convened from time to time which would be composed of the members of the central commission, the assistant commissioners and representatives of the advisory committees. This council would formulate the policies of the commission and deal with such other matters as concerned radio broadcasting. I should like to know whether any steps have been taken towards the appointment of these assistant commissioners and the organization of these advisory committees. I believe it would be in the interests of good administration of the law if this provision was put into operation.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I explained to the committee that the technical member of the commission, because of his being detained in Madrid, was not able to carry on here until January. I explained that the commission had been endeavouring effectively to organize and to discharge its functions; that Major Murray came to this country at the request of the commission made through the government. I stated that he had made a trip through Canada unaccompanied by any member of the commission in order that it might not be said that he had formed any view which was in any sense influenced by the commission. The commission has been desirous of inspecting all radio facilities in Canada by visiting every province of the dominion but because of parliament being in session and the very unjust and unfair observations which have been made throughout Canada with respect to the million dollar appropriation, it has not been able to carry into effect its original plans. As soon as it is possible to do so, it is proposed to put the provisions of the statute into effect. I introduced this legislation believing as I did that the best interests of national radio would be served by the appointment of assistant commissioners. These men would not be paid officers of the commission, and they would surround themselves with those who would give a proper bent and direction to what I might call a high national policy with respect to radio—education, improvement in art, and all that goes with a more liberal appreciation of the outside world. I believe that that can best be effected through the methods that we have provided in the legislation itself, and that is why the provisions are there.

So far as the debate this afternoon is concerned it has to every possible extent that you can measure endeavoured to discredit the commission. The bill was taken up this morning; it is now ten o'clock, and I say that whoever looks at the record of to-day's proceedings with respect to this bill and reads what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to this commission and its efforts to discharge its duties, will certainly not believe that those proceedings have been such as to promote the interests of national broadcasting in Canada. To criticize a commission is one thing, but to give it an opportunity to work is another. Some hon. members may be under the impression that the members of this commission are office boys sent out by a minister. The minister has no control over the commission, neither the Minister of Marine nor the Prime Minister. In that sense they are not errand boys or office boys nor yet servants or agents. They are a commission appointed for a purpose, and I indicated what that purpose was. The commission present their report to the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Marine presents it to parliament, but to suggest that the commission must be called in and be told, "You naughty boys, you must not do so and so," is to do violence to the whole underlying principle of the legislation. There has been nothing in this debate to-day to suggest what I conceived a year ago to be an earnest effort on behalf of the Canadian people to launch a great enterprise, free—shall I say?—from the carping criticism arising out of acute political differences that apparently would destroy the commission. It is too bad. The whole debate this afternoon and all day has been sharp and acute, indicating divisions upon political party lines. Certainly every effort that a government could make was made last year for the purpose of avoiding that very thing.

As to the observation that was made by the former Minister of Justice and by another member this afternoon, that the chairman of the commission said that any man who thought so and so was either a fool or a liar, I have not yet received any evidence of his having said it, but if he said it I am prepared by a minute in council to indicate in the firmest terms that that sort of talk is not worthy of members of the commission. I am ready to do that in the strongest possible terms because I realize that the public have no right to have said to them by anyone who occupies a position in connection with a public commission words of that character.

The way in which this discussion has been carried on to-day will certainly militate against the usefulness of the commission. Its task is difficult. Why? Because, I repeat, there is opposed to it at every point the powerful private interests of the American continent who do not wish to see it succeed, and who see here the greatest experiment that ever has been made because, in emulation of the British broadcasting system, we are endeavouring to free ourselves from all the difficulties and dangers that have followed upon private ownership. When I hear the hon. member for Melville make the attack that he did, and he was the only one, I want to say that the genesis of the whole idea of public ownership of these utilities came from Sir Adam Beck who was a member of the Conservative administration in the province of Ontario, and to-day the great hydro-electric system that has grown up in that province is the target for abuse and attack by every private interest on this continent that is connected with electrical energy and power. And, this radio is being made the butt for the same kind of attack, inspired and influenced by the same private interests on this continent.

If we are going to succeed we can succeed in only one way. Appreciating our responsibilities, we must realize what the stake is. Failure would be one more mark against public enterprise, one more failure on the part of the people to do collectively what the individual can do in private life, one more vindication of the claims of private ownership against public ownership. I am convinced beyond peradventure that if the Canadian people are to derive any benefit from radio they must continue their ownership of it as they now have it, and they can only do that not by sharply dividing the House of Commons on questions of pure partyism, by thinking in terms of Liberal or Conservative or Progressive, as I pointed out this afternoon, but by supporting the commission in its task.

I cannot conceive it possible that the former Minister of Justice was sincere in what he said this evening. I do not usually question his sincerity as he so often does mine, but I put this to him: When a member of the House of Commons is appointed to the bench and takes his oath of office, do I say I have no confidence in him because he opposed me in the House of Commons? I could give illustration after illustration of appointments to the bench from the ranks of that party during the nine years they were in office. There was one case of a leading organizer of a great party in one province appointed to the bench, fresh from his seat in the legislature, and another case of a member of the House of Commons appointed to the bench. But would I stand in my place and say I have no confidence in the ability of that man to write honest judgments? He took the oath of office. And Mr. Maher took the oath of office that is the only oath of office you will find in the statutes because it made express provision for negativing those very faults that in practice we found had arisen. I have not lost confidence, for instance, in gentlemen that I have seen promoted to the bench in the country in which I practised law simply because they happened to belong to the Liberal party. During the years in which I was most active in the practice of my profession, from 1897 onwards, all the appointments to the bench in that country up until 1911 were made by a Liberal government, and made mostly from either defeated candidates or Liberal members of the legislature or of parliament, and I cannot conceive it possible that I could ever stand in the legislature or parliament and say publicly that I had no confidence in the bench because of them.

Yet here is a gentleman who was a professional man, and not only a professional man but trained in that profession which usually gives men a wide vision and a large outlook. Those who live in the great outdoors and carry on surveys and have to do with the natural resources of a country, the forest and the stream—no small insular views influence their judgment in the main. They are men accustomed to seeing the wide horizons, the deep forests, the great lakes and rivers, and they usually have wide and large views of the country and of their responsibilities as citizens. That gentleman was appointed to this position. It is true he had been the candidate of the Conservative party and an organizer in a small way in the district in which he lived. He was appointed and took the oath of office, and there stands the challenge that was made by the Minister of Marine and which has not been answered. There is yet to arise any living man who has said that since he took that oath of office he has acted in any way as a partisan. Think of the effect, not of an ordinary member of this house, but of a gentleman who for years was a minister of the crown, with all the authority that attaches to an ex-Minister of Justice, standing in his place and making the condemnation he did of this gentleman. I say that that strikes at the very foundation of confidence. Then we have the magnificent spectacle to-night of a member of the opposition standing in his place and saying that his confidence in the commission was shaken because the chairman was not shaved, and deriding his whiskers. That is what parliament has fallen to. Now, one can ask oneself the question, in all seriousness, whether under those circumstances it might not be fair to look at the merits of this bill, just as it was presented to this house, with no ulterior object or motive. The letter dated May 5 which was read by the minister this morning suggested—I say suggested, because there was no endeavour to lecture this parliament—with a frankness which I thought did credit to the gentleman, means by which he believed certain purposes could be achieved.

I said this afternoon what I desire to repeat to-night, that in as far as section 1 is concerned I proposed to ask the Civil Service Commission if they have any suggestion to make as to how that situation could be met. For I say, in all frankness, that those who are charged with the responsibility should be able to select the instruments to effect their purposes, and if they cannot do it as to technical men, if they cannot get a broadcasting program without the assistance of the Civil Service Commission, what is going to happen? Do they have to have the approval of the Civil Service Commission before they may employ a singer, or a pianist, or a flute player?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The same old story.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what this means. It is all very well for the hon. member for East Hamilton to shake his head. But I say to him, as I said this afternoon, that what we are endeavouring to do is to remove that incongruity and make it clear that this commission may employ the persons it desires without having, for instance, what has happened in this house—

Mr. MITCHELL: Why not do that with the Post Office Department?

Mr. BENNETT: Does anybody suggest that in this house it would be the proper thing to ask who are the directors of a company which has a licence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why not?

Mr. BENNETT: Why so? It is not the business of the minister to write letters and to discover that fact. That is not his job.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is our job to find out everything that concerns the public welfare.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member's conception of public welfare is so well known that I shall not discuss it. He knows exactly what I mean,—just $100 per annum. Now, let us go one step farther: I just wish to say one thing more, and it is this, that just as sure as you are going to ask in this House of Commons, "Who was the announcer? Where was he born, and why—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: If you are going to ask all these questions you are going to have a complete failure. Can anybody imagine in the British House of Commons questions of that kind being asked with respect to their broadcasting corporation? There is a pattern to follow. We are endeavouring at least to make our institution worthy of it. I say in all seriousness, that I cannot conceive it possible that there could be in the British House of Commons a discussion such as has taken place this afternoon and evening with respect to our broadcasting legislation. It will be recalled that recently, in December, they did appoint new commissioners. Lady Snowden was appointed, and she was replaced by a Mrs. Hamilton. I forget who the other appointee happened to be, but I remember seeing it in the press. A letter was written to the press saying that this was not the fair thing to do, that the government had acted improperly. A dignified protest was made on behalf of Lady Snowden, and that was the end of it. That is the position. Anyone who follows the press of that country knows it.

I suggest that if we are going to give the radio commission a start, let us at least give it a chance. That is all I have asked this afternoon; that is all I have said. The protests which have been made by hon. members opposite would indicate that their love for it was so great they were willing to destroy it. They indulged in such violent criticisms of the commission as to arouse lack of confidence in and public suspicion as to the motives behind the operations of the commission in regard to this property. Not a tittle of evidence has been adduced in this committee by any person—I repeat, by any person—that in doing their work they were actuated by political motives.

So far as this section is concerned, I asked before dinner that it should stand in order that an opportunity might be afforded to consult with the Civil Service Commission to prepare a clause that would protect the commission on the one hand, and ensure that this body which we have set up might be able successfully to function and discharge the duties of a national broadcasting organization.

Mr. LAPOINTE: After those very nice, mild words of my right hon. friend perhaps he will answer a very simple question I asked him as to whether or not the government has taken any steps to appoint assistant commissioners in the various provinces to help the work of the commissioners, men who would organize advisory committees and would see that the object of the bill or of the law which was enacted last year is achieved.

Mr. BENNETT: I said they had not been appointed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Instead of replying to this very simple question my right hon. friend has complained about the violence of our criticism. We are used to the mild words of my right hon. friend and the suavity of the objections he usually makes against arguments or suggestions from this side of the house. Let me repeat that we believe in the nationalization of radio broadcasting. The work of the committee last year came as the result of an investigation made by a commission appointed by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin), the then Minister of Marine. It was the work of that investigating commission which brought about the report of the committee last year, and the legislation for which my right hon. friend is modestly taking the credit.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me; a committee of this house sat and made a report, and upon that the government produced legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend said, "I did it."

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have the judgment of Hansard for it.

Mr. BENNETT: You can see what it says.

Mr. LAPOINTE: However, we supported that legislation, and if the situation exists which the right hon. gentleman deplores, we are not responsible for it. I repeat, it is because of the work, first, of the government in the appointments which have been made and, second, because of what has taken place since.

My right hon. friend has said that as a former Minister of Justice I must know that judges have been appointed to the bench who were active in their respective political parties before their appointments, and that they are good judges. Of course, Mr. Chairman, but you will remember that last year we discussed the bill, and were all intent on having an impartial body. We wanted to have something in which the whole country would have confidence. It was suggested to the right hon. gentleman that the appointment of the members of the board might be made after consultation among the leaders of the different groups in the house. My right hon. friend said he would consider that suggestion, but if it were not accepted at least we could rely upon his statement that the appointments would be absolutely non-political. The members of that commission have to deal with something which is very important to every Canadian citizen. The broadcasting business has become part of the very life of all citizens of Canada. We all want to have a fair, square and impartial deal about it. It was the duty of the government to have on the commission men in whom everyone would have confidence. I still say that the appointment to the commission, as representing an important part of the citizenship of Canada, of a gentleman against whom I say nothing, but who was an active politician, who had not only been a candidate but had been organizer for his party in my own district for many years, for many successive elections, whose words I have myself heard on the radio abusing the party of which I am a member—I say that appointment was not keeping faith with what was said in the house last year when the house voted unanimously to enact the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act. I have nothing to withdraw of what I have said in that respect. I only hope that circumstances will be such that the confidence of the country in the radio board can be restored.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What do you want? My hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) seldom speaks, but he shouts interruptions. I hope he will not do so when I speak.

Mr. COTNAM: Mr. Chairman, I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement, as the member for North Renfrew did not happen to be saying anything at the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sure the hon. member for Quebec East will accept the word of the hon. member.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will certainly withdraw the remark; I am sorry my eyes and ears deceived me.

I hope my right hon. friend will be able to amend section 1 in the manner suggested; it would improve the bill to some extent. But as my last word I repeat that I have nothing to withdraw of what I have said to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a remark or two.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Prime Minister got off something a while ago and I want to correct it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is a motion before the committee which is not debatable.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, that is the way they get out of it—take to the tall timber!

Progress reported.

Mr. BENNETT: If it will please the hon. gentleman, I may tell him that I have to leave for the hospital, if that is what he wishes to know. I have put it off as long as I could, but I was asked to go and that is why I am leaving the chamber now.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Post Office—Outside Service—Salaries and allowances, $15,381,845.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $14,161,500.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowance to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, and payment of $205 to S. R. Kirk, $1,076,030.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, in 1928 prorogation was delayed several hours on account of a remark of the then leader of the opposition on the Lord Nelson and Nova Scotia hotels in Halifax. The Conservative party held up Mr. Veniot's estimates for over two weeks one year. I do not intend to do that, but what I intend to do, sir, is to have some satisfactory explanation from the Postmaster General. Yesterday evening he gave a statement about his accomplishments during the past year. I have only a few words to say. He said he did not accept my figures—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I ask the members of the committee not to listen quite so loudly.

Mr. POULIOT: It is their enthusiasm.

(Translation): As this quotation is in French, I shall continue my remarks in that language:

First, the member for Témiscouata stated that 662 postmasters had been notified that complaints of political partisanship had been lodged against them. Nineteen had sent in their resignation.

Were they cases of political partisanship? I put the question to the Postmaster General.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member repeat his question?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): With pleasure. So long as I am not obliged to repeat all my questions. Does the hon. minister recall that 662 postmasters were notified that complaints of political partisanship had been lodged against them?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, so far as I can recall.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): And that 19 had resigned? Did they lose their positions because of political partizanship?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes. The 19 that resigned were postmasters that confessed to political partisanship. They admitted their guilt.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Very well! Thank you! Now, 606 post offices were closed and 321 new post offices were opened. Does the hon. Postmaster General admit that the 606 post offices that were closed were kept by postmasters appointed by Liberals or a different government than the present one.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata will agree that it is impossible to answer on the spur of the moment his question.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I can understand that the hon. Postmaster General is unable to state whether these officials were appointed by the Liberal or Conservative party; however, on the other hand, were the 321 new post offices handed over to friends of this government. Were they recommended by members who sit on the government benches or by persons who are in charge of patronage in each county?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): By various persons. I suppose that they are friends of this government. There is nothing wrong in that—as they are numerous.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, sir, will the Postmaster General deny that he closed post offices kept by postmasters appointed by other governments than his? I am not only referring to Liberal governments because postmasters appointed by Sir John A. Macdonald were dismissed. Does the minister admit that the post offices which were closed were kept by persons appointed by other governments than the present one?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have not all the information in this connection. I could not give a complete answer. As to the new postmasters appointed under my administration, there are some who are not considered as friends of our party. For instance, there are returned soldiers, as in the Shelburne case —Mr. Kennedy—and others. I might also mention the Rimouski case, that of the returned soldier Couillard.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): Quite so.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Would the hon. Postmaster General inform the house, whether the change of site of a post office is equivalent to the dismissal of the postmaster?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That all depends.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The answer has the same meaning as "certainly and probably." I should like to receive an answer from the minister in this respect. When a postmaster is in charge of a post office and the latter is transferred across the street, without the postmaster previously being notified, I wonder if that is equivalent to a dismissal?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That means that the site has not been considered as convenient and, therefore, a change is requested.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to quote to the hon. Postmaster General a letter which he, himself, wrote to Mr. Foran, the secretary to the Civil Service Commission, with reference to the post office of St. Arsène. It is in connection with changing the site of the post office.

As regards the absence of an order in council, I need only mention that, under section 7 of the Post Office Act, the Postmaster General has power to remove or suspend any postmaster and that this prerogative is not affected by section 52 of the Civil Service Act. This is a point on which the Department of Justice gave a ruling to the Civil Service Commission on the 24th of August, 1921, at their own request. Mr. Rioux's dismissal was, therefore, quite regular.

May I draw your attention, sir, to the fact that the hon. Postmaster General refers to dismissals of postmasters. I shall not insist further on the subject.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

There is, however, another matter which has amazed me, it is the statement which the hon. postmaster made yesterday. He said that 770 postmasters had been dismissed under Conservative governments—in the plural. He made that statement yesterday, May 10. Yet, on November 16, he stated that 814 employees had been dismissed in his department. He contends that they were dismissed because of political partisanship, bad administration, unsuitable site or other reasons, but this did not refer to post offices closed. It is a question, at present, that affects all the employees of the department, I recognize the fact.

I shall repeat the figures I gave the other day—it will be very brief: "Dismissals following threatening letters, 19; post offices closed, 606; change of site, 96; dismissals for political partisanship, 522; total of persons beheaded since August, 1930, 1,243.

The hon. Postmaster General stated yesterday, with reference to Sully, page 4849 of Hansard:

Mr. Sauvé: The case of Mr. Jean has been settled to his satisfaction. He accepted $100.
Mr. Pouliot: When was the case settled?
Mr. Sauvé: Recently.
Mr. Pouliot: What exact date?
Mr. Sauvé: Last week. The order in council was signed and the case is settled.

I wish to inquire from the minister on what date was the order in council signed.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The order in council has been signed and it is before the council. The memo to pay the sum is before the council.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Does the hon. Postmaster General consider that there is a difference between a memo of a minister and an order in council?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Sometimes, yes, there is a difference. I meant recommendation.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is it not a fact that a memo is signed by the minister and an order in council by the clerk of the privy council?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Always. The recommendation is made by the minister.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is the minister certain that it will be sanctioned by the council? I understand the minister sent in his memo?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member knows the routine and is perfectly aware of what I meant. What I state is the truth.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is not an answer, sir. The hon. Postmaster General may be sincere, however, I wish to show that he does not know his business and that the answer he gave me yesterday was entirely inaccurate. The following is what he stated: "The case of Jean is settled." That is an assertion; it is not "certainly," "probably," "assuredly."

Mr. Sauvé: The case of Mr. Jean has been settled to his satisfaction. He accepted $100.
Mr. Pouliot: When did this settlement take place?
Mr. Sauvé: Recently.
Mr. Pouliot: On what exact date?
Mr. Sauvé: Last week. The order in council was signed and we have settled the claim.

There was no order in council signed. I understand the hon. Postmaster General prepared a memo to submit to the council. I wrote to him on April 25 that the question of Sully would be discussed in the house; I requested him to bring the file to the house, and if he had brought this file, he would have been in a position to give a more reliable answer, when the question was discussed. Does the Postmaster General contend that Jean has been paid? He has not been paid.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not contend that he had been paid.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): He cannot be paid before the order in council is passed.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I contend that the department recommended the payment of $100 to Jean and that the latter accepted this sum.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): But he has not yet been paid, because I received a telegram to-day, sent from Sully, at 4.20 p.m.

Jean-François Pouliot,
Ottawa.
I have not yet received anything.
Isidore Jean.

Then if Jean has not received anything, the case is not yet settled.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The case can be settled without Jean receiving payment. It is an understood thing that he will be paid.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Has the hon. Postmaster General any guarantee that the amount will be passed by the council? Was the matter discussed in council; did the council state: we shall pay Jean $100?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I cannot answer that question and the hon. member has sufficient knowledge of the duties incumbent to a minister, and the discretion he must show, not to persist in his question, whatever may be the advices he receives.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am not persisting in any way.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have a similar case to submit. In the parish of Ste. Rose, a returned soldier was appointed postmaster, two years ago. He was put to considerable expense but never got the post office. He was never reimbursed. I am wondering if his case were submitted to the council, whether he would receive the same treatment as was meted out in the case quoted by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If Mr. Jean is not paid before the next session, I authorize the hon. member for Temiscouata to then reproach me of it.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have no need to be authorized by the hon. Postmaster General, I can do this on my own responsibility. The minister is not my tutor. I shall ask him but one question with reference to Sully: Why did he not submit this case to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member takes me so much by surprise that I cannot answer the question on the spur of the moment. At all events, if he will be patient, I shall give him the reason later on.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Was the box of Amédée Lesieur patented when the order in council to purchase 10,000 rural mail boxes was passed.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, I think so.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then I shall prove to the Postmaster General that he is wrong and, moreover, that he deceived the House on two occasions, on March 22, 1933, and on May 10, 1933. He stated on March 22, in answer to a question.

(Text):

Patented equipment submitted found satisfactory and suited to the needs of the department.

On May 10, 1933, that is, yesterday, at page 5203 of Hansard, he states that he did not call for tenders because they were new boxes, recently patented. The order in council was passed on December 12, 1931; however, the hon. Postmaster General's memo was prior to that date, namely, November 5, 1931. He then stated that the quantity of available rural mail boxes in the maritime provinces and Quebec were exhausted.

This box is a greatly improved one, is patented and cannot be purchased elsewhere, and is particularly adapted to use in the postal service.

The minister states that the price of $2.75 per box is considered fair and reasonable.

The memo presented by the minister is dated November 5, 1931. Will the hon. Postmaster General state whether this is exact? The order in council No. 2799 was passed on December 12, 1931, and the patent 319,598 was granted in February, 1932. Now, sir, under whose name was the patent registered? Was it under the name of Amédée Lesieur or that of the Government of Canada?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I beg your pardon?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Was the patent for the beautiful casket, we have here, registered under the name of Amédée Lesieur or that of the Government of Canada which purchased 10,000 samples?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It was registered under the name of another gentleman whose name I cannot recall; the sale was made to Mr. Lesieur regularly and legally.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If it were registered under the name of another person whose name the hon. Postmaster General cannot recall, then, I must insist that I be furnished with all the facts.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall furnish them.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I think that the officials who are at his side should know these facts.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order! The hon. member should remember that we are not in committee of public accounts.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No. Mr. Chairman, we are not in committee of public accounts; however, we are in committee to discuss the estimates of the Post Office Department. The case is similar to that of this morning, when it was asserted in the House —when the Radio bill was discussed—that the representatives of the people must control the moneys expended by the various departments. I know that the Chairman of the Committee holds those views.

I do not wish to be disagreeable to the minister. I am doing this to save him from trouble, annoyance and embarrassment. It is with this aim in view that I ask these questions.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): Questions should be more to the point.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall give the hon. member the name of the person, to-morrow; I had it this afternoon, and, I think, I sent it over to him.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall send over to the hon. Postmaster General the first page (4206) of the Hansard of April 12, 1933, where Gilbert Viau is mentioned. There is a return, No. 292, S.P. 367. I would request the hon. Postmaster General to inform the house whether Gilbert Viau, final sorter into lock boxes, city delivery branch, Montreal postoffice, referred to in a question and in this return is the same person.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Has the hon. member not got his photograph?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): This is not a joke; I request the hon. Postmaster General to answer me properly.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I cannot answer such a question.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The minister cannot answer?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I wonder why the hon. Postmaster General cannot answer. In fact, I know he is the same man. I put the same question in both cases with reference to Gilbert Viau, final sorter into lock boxes, city delivery branch, Montreal postoffice. There is something very extraordinary, in both returns, I should like some explanation as I cannot understand them. In one, we find that Viau was born at St. Martin on December 21, 1884; age: 34. That is in return S.P. 367.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): He remains young!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): He was born on December 21, 1884. I wondered whether the minister would notice that fact, and I find that the hon. member for St. John's Iberville (Mr. Rhéaume) is sharper than the Postmaster General. On October 24, 1918, Gilbert Viau was 34 years old. On April 12, 1933, according to the statement of the hon. Postmaster General, Gilbert Viau was 50 on December 21, 1932. On October 24, 1918, he was 34 years old, being born on December 21, 1884. On April 12, 1933, he was 50, he was supposed to have been born on December 21, 1882. This gentleman makes use of "Jouvence" water. This reminds me of a very brilliant child known as Pic de la Mirandole. He was two years old; some one asked him his name and age: What is your name? Zan! What is your age? Two Zan! When Gilbert Viau was born, he was two years old! Now, sir, is Mr. Moffat still the owner of the Montreal post-office cafeteria?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Who is the owner of the cafeteria now?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Loiselle.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is he the hon. Postmaster General's chauffeur?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is he employed in the Post Office Department?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No. He is stoker (chauffeur), he stokes his stove!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is he employed by a person named Laurent, who has a contract for the delivery of parcel posts?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, not to my knowledge.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What is his christian name?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Guillaume or William.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What is his family name?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Loiselle.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Why did Mr. Moffat lose his contract?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We decided, at the time, to make a change.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Postmaster General could rise in his seat to answer my questions.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If the hon. member will resume his seat—It was because we had decided to make a change.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata is aware that a member cannot rise when another member has the floor, it is contrary to the rules.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I wanted to see whether the minister would rise, I would have resumed my seat immediately; I wish to observe the rules.

An hon. MEMBER (Text): Why not put the whole thing on Hansard, at once.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) could speak French he might take part in the discussion. Meanwhile, it is better for him to keep quiet and when he does speak let it be with reference to the discussion.

Who delivers the postal parcels in Montreal?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): A person by the name of Ernest Laurent.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Since when has he been delivering them?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): For over a year.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How much more than a year?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): A few months.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): One year and a few months?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Over a year, yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): who recommended Mr. Laurent to the hon. minister?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): He is a well known man.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If the member knows him well, I think he should give the house his name.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Ernest Laurent. He is the more so known, that he had this position, this contract, years ago. He lost it when your friends came into power.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He will lose it again next time.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many vehicles has he to deliver the parcels?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I know that he has enough to do the service well.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many has he?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I cannot give the number. That is not my business.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How much has been paid to Laurent by the Post Office Department since he has been on the payroll?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have not the vouchers with me. The hon. member will admit that I cannot possibly have the public accounts with me. I was not notified that this question would come up.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is it a permanent contract—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Temporary.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): —a contract for a specified period between the Postmaster

General and Laurent, or is Laurent temporarily employed?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It is a temporary contract, by tender.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is it not a temporary contract, since October 28, 1930?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is possible, yes, in that month.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): At the minister's good pleasure?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is it not a fact that Laurent receives 70 cents per hour, according to his contract?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): He now receives 80 cents per hour.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): 80 cents?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Has the hon. Postmaster General increased Laurent's salary by 10 cents per hour, since March 17?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member is not observing the rules of the house. We are not in committee of public accounts. We cannot spend the time of the house in questions and cross-questions of that kind. The hon. member fully knows the rules of the house. He may put questions and he certainly has a right to criticize all the expenditure of the department and its administration; however, it is not the spirit of the committee of the whole, of the finance committee to put cross-questions of that kind; the place for that is the public accounts committee. Let the hon. member criticize, let him request certain information, but I cannot allow such a cross-examination.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have but one observation to make to the chairman: The minister who has his estimates voted with the least difficulty is the Minister of Public Works. We follow the same routine when he brings down his estimates; we put questions to him and he always answers.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I am not the Minister of Public Works, I am the chairman of the committee.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Would you kindly inform me, sir, under what rule I am debarred from questioning the minister when he submits his estimates? Am I obliged to make a 40-minute speech or am I free to question him on matters relating to his department?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member has been long enough in the house to know that a cross-examination like he has just made cannot be directed against ministers. He may criticize; however, the examination of accounts is discussed in the public accounts committee.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am not criticizing the minister.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Whether the hon. member has any ground of quarrel or not with the minister has no bearing on the matter; but the observance of the rules of the house has.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What rule, sir, prevents me from putting questions to the minister?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I have no objection to the hon. member putting questions to the minister.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): You have no objection that I ask questions to the minister?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): This questioning might be quite proper in the public accounts' committee. In my opinion, it is discourteous and not in order in this committee.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, will you quote the rule of the house on which you base your decision?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): It is the rule which governs general discussion. I quoted it the other day in the house. I have given my decision. The hon. member has had the whole session to look up the rule.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If you wish me to deliver a speech on the subject, the Postmaster General will get nowhere.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): That does not concern me.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member may proceed and show that he is better disposed.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Yes, he could show a better observance of the rules.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I would request, sir, that you make allowance for his future good intentions.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I base my decision on rule 41, "decorum during debate."

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What, decorum! In court, it is the practice followed by every lawyer.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): We are not in court.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): We are in the highest court of the country.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member is mistaken. The inquiry he is making should take place in the public accounts' committee.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The public accounts' committee is but a subcommittee of the house.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I am not seeking a lesson in parliamentary procedure from the hon. member, I state that he is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am not trying to teach the hon. chairman a lesson any more than he himself does to the judges when he pleads before them. At present, I am expressing my viewpoint and I contend that, as representative of a constituency in Canada, I am entitled to put any question to the hon. minister.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member is not entitled to put any question to the hon. minister nor is the minister obliged to answer it.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): In court, we cannot ask suggestive questions.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): We are not in court.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am, at present, discussing a point of law. The minister does not figure in this, it is just as if he did not exist, moreover, it is the usual practice, the minister does not figure at present—I am simply discussing a point of law, a question of principle.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I must call the hon. member to order. I gave my decision, he has but one thing to do if he is not satisfied: appeal from my decision.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): May I put two questions to the hon. Postmaster General, in this respect?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I am unable to judge. The hon. member is too old a parliamentarian, he knows that he cannot proceed in that manner.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Quite the contrary, it is because I know that I can proceed in that manner that I am doing so. However, if you insist—

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): That is not my opinion.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I respect your opinion, sir, however, I think you are wrong.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): If the hon. member is not satisfied, he may appeal from my decision.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Very well, sir, I appeal from your decision.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Very well.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not wish to be disagreeable to the chairman. As it is almost 11 o'clock—I have too much esteem for the chairman—he is aware of it also—to say things which would be unpleasant to him.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): It is not a question of esteem; it is a question of duty.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If he performs his duty, I carry out mine, in my own way. We are both sincere; however, we do not agree on this subject.

I shall ask the hon. Postmaster General why Laurent was awarded a temporary contract since October, 1930, and why tenders were not asked for such an important contract?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member knows that this is often the practice. The Laurent contract is renewable at the minister's good pleasure; I think it is a fair one and that Mr. Laurent has greatly improved that service; and, thereby proved a saving to the department. For instance, in the changes connected with our garage, at Montreal, we saved more than $6,000.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): May I inquire from the minister whether it was not to keep Laurent in suspense that no tender was called for and that the contract is temporary, instead of being for a specified period?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have just stated it is because he gives a good service, I have no further knowledge of the matter.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, sir, I am not joking, I shall request the right hon. Prime Minister to continue this inquiry in the Court House, in Montreal, with the files that are there.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member explain his insinuation?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It is not an insinuation, but an advice which I am giving to the Prime Minister. If he wishes to look into the matter, he can verify the facts in the files of the Montreal Court House. And should he not wish to go there, he had best send a judge or lawyer and he will be given all the details. As I am not allowed to question the hon. Postmaster General, I shall drop the matter.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I request the hon. member for Témiscouata to further explain and not leave the house under the impression of his insinuation. Does the hon. member contend that Mr. Laurent is involved in certain court cases which renders him unworthy of occupying a position in the department, and, thereby, unworthy of having a contract? I wish to know.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I stated what I had to say. It is my turn to leave matters take their course.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member has already been before the court.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Yes, and I won my cases. Thank heaven! Come with me and you will see!

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 12, 1933.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table a number of orders in council passed pursuant to the relief legislation.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the authentic texts of the draft conventions and recommendations which were adopted at the sixteenth session of the international labour conference of 1932, in accordance with the provisions of article 406 of the treaty of Versailles and the corresponding provisions of the other treaties of peace; also the text of an order in council which has been adopted dealing with the competence of parliament and of the provincial legislatures respectively with regard to the subject matter of these draft conventions and recommendations. The texts of the draft conventions and recommendations, together with the order in council above mentioned, have been transmitted to the lieutenant-governors of the several provinces.

NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, under the order of motions I might be permitted to table a reply to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) who asked at page 4746 of Hansard a question regarding the quantity of butter imported into Canada from New Zealand since 1930 when this treaty came into effect. The question is not quite accurate, and so in my answer I have divided the information into two periods, one period dating from the cancellation of the first treaty and the other period approximating with the coming into force of the new treaty. I would suggest that this be printed in Hansard as an answer to the question, as I promised the hon. member yesterday I would do so today.

BUTTER IMPORTATIONS

Mr. MARCIL:

Could we be advised of the quantity of butter which has been imported into Canada from New Zealand since 1930, when this treaty came into effect?

Mr. STEVENS:

The terms of the Australian treaty were extended to New Zealand by order in council and later withdrawn on October 12, 1930.

Canada's imports of butter from New Zealand entered for consumption from October 1, 1930, to March 31, 1932, with amount of duty collected were:

Period	Amount		Duty Collected
	Pounds	$	$ cts.
October 1, 1930 to March 31, 1931	2,532,696	652,799	47,996 35
April 1, 1931 to March 31, 1932	72,984	17,404	5,254 85

A treaty was negotiated with New Zealand and went into effect May 24, 1932.

Canada's imports of butter from New Zealand entered for consumption from April 1, 1932, to March 31, 1933, with amount of duty collected were:

Period	Amount		Duty Collected
	Pounds	$	$ cts.
April 1, 1932 to March 31, 1933	806,947	125,020	40,641 47

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTING

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I beg to move the following motion standing in his name:

That on Saturday the 13th May, instant, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning. That in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission from one to three o'clock p.m., and that both the order of business and and procedure shall be the same as on Friday.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I understood this was a motion which would not be pressed without the unanimous consent of the house. If there was any prospect in the world of our getting through with the business to-morrow in time for prorogation on Monday I think it might be advisable to have this motion passed, but unless there is that probability it would be infinitely better I think to allow us to reserve our energies for next week. We have had a very busy week sitting morning, afternoon and night, and unless there was the certainty of our getting through to-morrow I do not think this motion should be pressed. I know that is the feeling of all hon. members on this side.

Mr. RHODES: Would there be any objection to having the motion pass on the understanding that we rise at six o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we do not get far enough to-day to make probable a completion of the business by to-morrow night, I think hon. members will wish to have the week-end off, particularly those who had intended leaving the city to-night. I do not see why if we are to sit again next week we should come back here for part of the day to-morrow.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I am sorry the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) is not here but I think I am expressing his opinion when I say that if there is no prospect of our finishing the business of the house this week, and I do not think we have any reason to believe that that can be done, I think it would be a mistake to ask the house to sit on Saturday. The members of the house have been working hard all week, and I do not see why we should sit on Saturday unless we can finish up the business. I hope the minister will not press the motion.

Mr. RHODES: In view of what has been said by the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition and the hon. member for Macleod I shall not press the motion, but I should like to reserve the right to move it at a later stage in the day if it is thought desirable that that should be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just going to suggest that the motion be allowed to stand, and if there is any certainty or real probability of our getting through this week, I think everyone would be willing to sit until midnight to-night and to-morrow night.

Motion stands.

LEGISLATION BEFORE THE HOUSE AND TO BE INTRODUCED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in order to get a correct view of what business remains for the house; there are still three or four orders which appear on the order paper, also two or three items of supply remain to be passed, then there are the French agreements and the shipping bill to which reference has just been made and redistribution. Are there any other measures apart from those that are likely to be introduced this session?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): As at present advised I think there are no others, certainly none of a major character.

SEED GRAIN DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): If my information is correct the federal government distributes seed grain in the western provinces. Would it not be possible in view of the large number of settlers who are unable to buy their seed grain this spring, that a distribution of seed grain should be made in northern Ontario?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The federal department does not distribute seed grain excepting under the subsidies of the province. The subsidies for Quebec and Ontario are used in one particular way on the recommendation of the people who are in the best position to advise. There is a small part of the subsidy in the west that is used to distribute newer strains of grasses which are returnable.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) if the report in the press is correct that a treaty has been signed with France; if so, will it be tabled forthwith?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): An arrangement has been made to sign the treaty at 12 o'clock to-day, and I hope that if the printers are up to date copies of two treaties, or rather of a trade agreement and a convention between Canada and France concerning the rights of nationals and commercial and shipping matters, will be laid upon the table within a short time thereafter. The bills to approve the same will by leave of the house, be introduced forthwith. I think one bill with its schedule will be printed early to-day, the other schedule is very long and there may be a delay of some hours in respect to the second bill.

GOVERNMENT LOAN, $750,000,000

REDEMPTION OF OBLIGATIONS AND PURCHASE OF UNMATURED SECURITIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 103, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I happened to be out of the house yesterday morning when this bill received second reading and was passed in committee of the whole. There are two or three observations that I would like to make and I would like, if I may, to direct a question to the minister. I have not yet had the privilege of reading Hansard so that I have to depend on what I have heard with regard to the statement of the minister yesterday.

I want to suggest to the minister that from this time on no bonds of the dominion should be issued payable in gold. I made this suggestion to the Minister of Finance of Canada eight or nine years ago. I am afraid he did not see fit to act on it at that time.

Mr. RHODES: I did not catch the suggestion.

Mr. COOTE: I say I made the suggestion to the Minister of Finance eight or nine years ago that no bonds should be issued payable in gold or in anything but lawful money of Canada. I want to suggest to the minister, if he has not already so decided, that the bonds to be issued under this act should be payable only in lawful money of Canada, not in gold or in foreign funds.

Then I suggest to the minister that these bonds contain a provision under which the government may call them in at any time. I think the minister will realize the wisdom of such a provision.

Incidentally, I also urge that our money policy be such as to maintain as nearly as possible stable purchasing power for money which is paid in interest to the bondholder. I think that would be one of the first steps to lower interest rates in Canada. I do not think it necessary to remind the minister of the necessity of lowering these rates. One step has already been taken by lowering interest rates on savings bank deposits. The chief factor governing interest rates in Canada, particularly on long term obligations, is the rate paid on Dominion of Canada bonds. I would just like to remind the minister that our public debt, that is provincial, municipal and dominion, now amounts to over six and a half billion dollars, which at an average rate of five per cent—I think we are paying more than that—means an annual interest charge of $325,000,000. I just mention these figures to impress upon the minister and the house the necessity of lowering interest rates.

Lastly, I want to suggest to the minister that the new loan should be floated at a very much lower rate of interest. I think he should fix three per cent as the rate to be paid on these bonds. I believe that rate is justified by the price level obtaining in Canada now. Whatever the government may decide as to the rate, the principle enunciated by the Prime Minister three or four years ago should be followed now, and banks and insurance companies, particularly insurance companies, should be compelled to invest a percentage of their reserves in such bond issues. I understand that the minister must meet this year treasury bills amounting to $110,000,000 bonds maturing, $169,000,000, and budget deficit $100,000,000, roughly $380,000,000 in all. My last suggestion to the minister is that if he does not get sufficient subscriptions from the public to cover this amount at the rate of interest I have suggested, he should issue enough Dominion notes to make up the balance. He has now ample precedent for that in the action which has been taken in the United States, where the president is authorized to issue three billion dollars of United States notes to retire maturing obligations. I think that as the government has been following a so-called "sound money" policy for the last two or three years, that of keeping our money good in the United States, the minister might now very well follow the United States precedent and meet part of these maturing bonds with an issue of Dominion notes. If public subscriptions are not sufficient, he should at any rate meet the remainder with an issue of Dominion notes. I think the rate of interest should not exceed three per cent.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

War veterans' allowances, $1,650,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was understood that under this item the members of committee would be free to discuss any matter they may wish to take up with respect to the minister's department.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, the right hon. gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. COOTE: Under this item I should like to direct the attention of the minister to complaints that have come to me, and I suppose to other members of parliament also, from different soldier organizations. I think the chief complaint is that the scale of relief afforded by the department to pensioners has not been equal to the scale afforded by many municipalities to those receiving unemployment relief. I had a communication from the Canadian War Disability Pensioners' Association of Winnipeg in which they say:

> No clothing allowance is made to the needy pensioner whereas the civilians receive the necessary clothing in greater Winnipeg, either through the Greater Winnipeg Welfare Association or through the city council.
>
> Many of our needy pensioners have been out of employment for an extended period. They are not only needy and destitute but many of them and their families are without clothing absolutely to protect them against this climate. If they appeal to the welfare association of the city or municipal councils, they are told they must look to the Department of Pensions and National Health. When they go to the department they are told that there is no provision for clothing. The result is obvious. Many of our needy pensioners are without clothing, and it is impossible to provide their children with the necessary clothing to permit them to attend school.
> The matter of clothing is not a matter of minor consideration but a very substantial one.
> During the past week the temperature has registered in Greater Winnipeg continuously below zero ranging from 20 to 35 degrees.

Then they have another complaint with regard to dependent children:

> The scale of relief allowance to the dependents of needy pensioners applies only to boys sixteen years of age and under and girls seventeen years of age and under. If they exceed that age no allowance is made in respect thereof, even if they are unemployed and dependent, whereas relief to civilians is based upon the number of dependents in the family irrespective of age.

I think those matters should be cleared up by the minister before this item passes. While I am on my feet perhaps I might direct attention to the next complaint as well, which has to do with the purchase of fuel:

> Civilian needy in greater Winnipeg are enabled through a special arrangement by the city of Winnipeg to purchase their fuel at what might be termed "wholesale prices," in any event at prices substantially less than the retail price, whereas needy pensioners must pay the retail price which it can be conservatively stated is at least 25 per cent in excess of the price paid by the civilian needy on direct relief.

The first question I should like to direct to the minister is with regard to the clothing for pensioners in Winnipeg. Is the department continuing to pursue that policy of refusing to give a clothing allowance to pensioners and their families?

Mr. MacLAREN: The subject to which my hon. friend refers has reference to unemployment relief and not to war veterans' allowances. The committee will observe that in the vote for unemployment relief this year there is an increase of $375,000, and last year there was also a large increase. In past years it has not been the practice to distribute this unemployment relief during the summer months but because of unemployment conditions of late this relief has been distributed the year round, though to a lesser degree in the summer when the same expense is not incurred with regard to the provision of fuel.

The policy pursued in the distribution of unemployment relief at present is that the amount distributed to pensioners—and of course these are small pensioners, because men who draw large pensions are able to get along without this relief—shall be not less than the amount allowed in the district or municipality in which the pensioner lives. Conditions vary in different portions of the country, and there has been no attempt to fix an exact amount for all parts, for the reason that as local conditions vary the amounts granted by local authorities varies also. Substantially, however, there is not a very great discrepancy. When I say that the department has been granting not less than what is allowed locally, in point of fact in some cases it is rather in excess of the local amounts. In no case has there been a reduction. If a municipality has lessened its allowances the department has not followed suit.

I am afraid a general conversation was going on in the committee which prevented my hearing much of what my hon. friend read, but I gathered that he was presenting complaints with regard to the distribution of clothing.

Mr. COOTE: The distribution of clothing in Winnipeg, where no clothing allowance was given the families of veterans though such an allowance was given by the city to their own unemployed.

Mr. MacLAREN: The policy followed in Winnipeg is practically the same as that followed in several other communities. The department does not issue clothing; it has not been thought advisable to do so. It would mean that the department would have to go into the purchase of clothing and carry on the organization necessary in connection with its distribution. This would mean that such operations would take place in a number of the large communities of Canada, and this has not been done. Unemployment relief never has been distributed in the form of clothing either directly or indirectly but recently, following our policy of doing not less than is done by the municipalities, clothing has been distributed to pensioners and their dependents in certain centres, including Winnipeg. Provision is made for dependents up to the age of sixteen in the case of boys and seventeen in the case of girls, and that is in keeping with the Pension Act. Over these ages they are subject to the care of the municipalities. That is the view taken by the department. I can understand complaints arising with regard to boys over sixteen or girls over seventeen, because they do not quite realize the principles on which we are working; but we do not hold ourselves responsible for any dependents or children of pensioners over the ages I have stated. The department has been most careful, indeed anxious, to give as much relief as it can, and it has made an arrangement with local organizations, Winnipeg among them, whereby they purchase the clothing and distribute it, the amounts being paid out of this vote. On the whole, I think the plan has succeeded reasonably well, although we have received complaints which we have found to be quite inaccurate. On the other hand, we have had very considerable evidence of greater contentment and satisfaction within the last few months.

Mr. COOTE: When was the practice adopted of distributing clothing relief in Winnipeg? Has it been recent?

Mr. MacLAREN: In March of this year. It has involved travelling and interviewing on the part of the officials, and the making of many arrangements. The arrangement was made in March of this year, when the amount expended was $5,741. Since then, in the two succeeding months, the amount has naturally been less because the needs have been met.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Mr. COOTE: The letter which I have was written before March and I have been waiting for an opportunity to bring this matter up on the minister's estimates. I regret that this clothing allowance arrangement was not put into effect in Winnipeg earlier than March because the climate there is severe and the pensioners have been under great disability. In regard to dependent children over sixteen and seventeen respectively, will the municipality give an allowance to the parents?

Mr. MacLAREN: I will not venture to speak for all the municipalities, and I do not think I am expected to answer yes or no to that question generally. I do know however that in many areas they accept that position. In any event, the department is not empowered to go further than the provisions laid down in the Pension Act. The position is accepted in many places, I daresay not in others; but it is partly because it is not understood and partly because they are not willing to accept that interpretation.

Mr. COOTE: I should appreciate it if the minister would have some of his officials ascertain whether that is being done in Winnipeg. If not, I suggest that the situation should be thoroughly canvassed between the department and the city officials there in regard to this point.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am informed that that is the case in Winnipeg. I know that when I visited that city some months ago the situation was discussed at a meeting attended by the mayor and representatives of various organizations. I am informed that Winnipeg accepts the situation.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand that those returned soldiers who are receiving pensions and are living in the dried out district in Saskatchewan cannot obtain any assistance from the relief commission in that province because of the fact that they are soldiers receiving pensions. What steps has the government taken to look after these people?

Mr. MacLAREN: Unemployment relief has been one of the most difficult subjects which the department has had to deal with, and in fact the officials in charge of some of our large hospitals have told me that there is more time taken up and there are more difficult problems to settle in that connection than in all the rest of their administration. An endeavour was made to get this distribution to our pensioners and their dependents carried out through the provinces, inasmuch as they have organizations, and they have the unemployed who have to be clothed. The provincial government of Saskatchewan has taken on the distribution of clothing to our pensioners and their dependents and has been operating since January or February—I cannot give the exact date.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am not thinking so much of groceries or clothing. What I am referring to is the fact that a good many of these returned soldiers are farmers and this is the time for them to buy their seed, as well as to make necessary repairs to machinery preparatory to putting in their crop. The relief commission will not give them any assistance because they are pensioners. What has the government done in such cases, in order to provide for seed and so on for these soldiers and to help them to make the necessary repairs to their machinery in preparation for the summer?

Mr. MacLAREN: The distribution of funds for the purchasing of seeds does not come under this department at all; it comes under the soldier settlement establishment or some other suitable organization. No attempt whatever is made by this department to meet that situation, but we do try to take care of light, heat and rent and, in a few instances where the municipalities do not supply clothing, we give some assistance. Our care is to relieve absolute distress and to help the men to carry on in the meantime.

Mr. DONNELLY: My object in raising this question is to bring to the attention of the minister and of the Minister of Labour the condition that exists in southern Saskatchewan. If a man happens to be a returned soldier receiving a pension he is worse off than if he were not in receipt of a pension, because without a pension he could get relief; he could obtain seed and be assisted in making repairs. If he is a returned soldier, however, the relief commission in the province will not come to his assistance for the reason that he is in receipt of a pension; they take the view that the soldiers' organizations should look after him. It is impossible for men in that position to get this measure of relief which is so much required at this time of the year in this area, where conditions have been severe in the last three or four years.

Mr. MacLAREN: I quite recognize the difficulties. Personally I do not care for the arrangement. I should have hoped, speaking for myself and not for the government, that ultimately the whole matter of unemployment relief would be administered in an entirely different way and perhaps through a different department.

Mr. DONNELLY: All I am asking the minister to do is to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour in order that some arrangement may be arrived at to give these people a certain measure of relief and a certain measure of fair play.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the time has come when some further consideration should be given to the manner of dealing with unemployment relief for returned veterans and pensioners in particular. I have received a number of letters from the Non-Affiliated Veterans of Canada in Montreal. They write to me stating that they find that representations made to the department in connection with their complaints have been quite unavailing. Their letter of March 13 reads as follows:

> Following up our recent resolution to obtain justice for our disabled front line veterans who, because of their disabilities and unemployment conditions generally are forced to apply for relief to the Department of Pensions and National Health. We have held an open meeting for front line veterans, March 12, at 1877 Wellington street, Montreal. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:
>
> "Whereas, the total amount of relief granted by the Department of Pensions and National Health in Montreal and district to the disabled veterans is $30.60, this sum is with pension included, that is to say, that, if a man draws a war pension of $25 per month, he would be granted $5.60 plus $2 for each child.
> "Whereas, the average low shelter rental in this district is $18 per month.
>
> "Whereas, if a rent is paid the disabled veteran has only $12.60 per month to provide food, fuel, light, clothing and medical attention for his family.
>
> "Whereas, if a rent is not paid the landlord may seize and sell under authority of the Quebec lease law, leaving the disabled veteran destitute.
> "Be it resolved that the existing conditions are intolerable and that the federal authorities duly consider all phases of the situation and render a decision favourable to the disabled veterans, who have fought and suffered that our Canada may be the land of their ideal."

Following the receipt of that letter and resolution I took up the matter with the minister and asked a question in the house with respect to this situation. The minister assured me that an investigation had been started and would be pursued on the following Monday, my question being asked on a Friday. On March 21 I received a further letter from this same organization, which reads:

> At an open meeting for the front line veterans, held under the auspices of the Non-Affiliated Veterans of Canada, at 1877 Wellington street, Montreal, March 19, the following resolution was unanimously adopted and a request was made that it be sent forward to the ministers of the government and members of parliament:

"Whereas, in view of the fact that the lower rate pensioners and their dependents in this district are facing starvation until they receive their pension cheques at the end of the current month.

"Whereas, we have already forwarded two resolutions to Ottawa outlining the situation in this district and have received no satisfactory reply from the Department of Pensions and National Health.

"Therefore be it resolved: that the Department of Pensions and National Health be asked to take immediate action to alleviate the distress that exists amongst the disabled veterans.

"Be it further resolved: this organization of service by veterans in France can produce concrete evidence that disabled veterans in this district are being evicted from their homes and have appealed for assistance both to the federal and municipal authorities and have received no help."

We would feel very grateful for any assistance you may be able to render us.

I found out that there was some sort of an investigation being held in Montreal by the department. I solicited further information from my correspondent, the president of this association, and his letter of March 29 contains the following paragraph:

An inquiry at the local relief office to-day brought no information as to an inquiry here into conditions. If there is any way in which we can be of service to you to show our appreciation, kindly let us know and we will try to oblige you.

The letter contains also the following paragraph:

The veteran in this district, according to a schedule issued by the department for a married man without children is allowed $30.60 per month which is divided as follows: rent $15; light $2; fuel $5; food, $8.60. This food amount must cover a month of thirty-one days. The result of this is that the veteran must use some of his rent money for food and other essentials, and so the landlord goes short and misery begins by way of bailiff sales.

I again communicated with the president of this association and under date of April 11, he wrote as follows:

I will try and give you some idea of the investigation or rather camouflage that has taken place. On March 22nd, I was requested to go to the D.S.C.R. and meet the district administrator for Montreal, Mr. Boyd. Upon arrival there with the secretary of our branch, we found the deputy minister of pensions, Mr. McKee and his second in command awaiting us. Mr. McKee informed us that being in the Montreal district and having received copies of our resolutions, he thought he would like to see us and immediately opened up a conversation regarding the relief question, the result of which we were informed that no more relief could be granted other than that he would ask Mr. Boyd, district administrator to canvass the civic relief authorities and other charitable organizations with the object of trying to get some clothing for pensioners and their families, but so far there have been no apparent results.

On Friday, March 31st, we were called back to the D.S.C.R. in reference to eviction of pensioners from their homes; which we had called to the attention of the ministers and members of the House of Commons in our resolution of March 19th. Mr. Boyd informed us he had been instructed from Ottawa, that upon sufficient data provided by myself or secretary representing the N.A.V.O.C. branch number one, Montreal, to the effect that a pensioner on relief was being evicted, he would take the matter up at once with the view of either having the eviction order cancelled or make arrangements for the man to get another house and failing in that, he was to report the matter back to Ottawa.

In dealing with the rent situation, the tactics are plain enough. In the past the average pensioner has been in the habit of buying his eats and other necessities first and leaving the landlord whatever might be left which we have, no doubt, would be little or nothing. Therefore, it is an easy matter for Mr. Boyd to go to the landlord and make arangements guaranteeing the rent of fifteen dollars ($15) as the administration intends making the pensioner produce the receipt for the rent before they grant him any further relief which means, in most cases, women and children will have to go hungry in order to pay the rent and draw the small amount that is left after that.

Coming back to the matter of investigation, I might state that we were not informed that anything of that nature was taking place so were not prepared with any evidence also the system of calling up members of different organizations and button-holing them at different times is no way of trying to solve the problem, but merely a means to find a loop-hole for the department of pensions to crawl out of.

I must admit that my only authority is my correspondent who represents himself to be the president of this association.

Mr. MacLAREN: Could I have his name?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): William G. Brookes, president, Non-Affiliated Veterans of Canada. I was not satisfied that this case was not like many others which have come to my attention where there has been exaggeration and at times misrepresentation upon the part of correspondents. I replied under date of April 12 and asked him to send me particulars of specific cases in order that I might have something concrete to justify further protests. I was forwarded a letter signed by R. Laycock and Mrs. Mary Laycock of Verdun, Quebec. This letter reads:

With regards to my relief, there seems to be a decidedly strong rumour about that we are to be subjected to another cut in our relief through the D.S.C.R. This hardly seems possible, and I wish to protest it strongly, when one stops to consider the cost of "bare" living commodities, that is with what we are receiving: $32.75 per month which, no matter how carefully one tries to manage leaves nothing for clothes, not to mention light, gas or rent.

I can readily understand that would be the case in Montreal.

Most decidedly it is my wish to protest this talked of cut in our relief.

That was something entirely new to me. On April 17 I received the following letter from Mr. A. H. Johnson:

Dear Sir,—I receive a pension cheque for $25 and a relief cheque for $5.60, making a total of $30.60 as the sole income for a family of two adults, my rent amounts to $15 per month and leaves me a balance of $15.60 to take care of all my other expenses such as food, clothing, medical attention and household necessities.

I have repeatedly complained that this amount was inadequate, both to the Department of Pensions and National Health at Ottawa and to the local district office but have received no satisfaction whatever, the department only answers that the pensioner on relief is in somewhat of a preferred position to that of the civilian in this district, but when one realizes that our municipal aldermen have stated that the amount of relief granted by the city is only sufficient to keep a person from starving, one may readily realize why there are so many children and adults waiting for admission to hospitals suffering from malnutrition and tuberculosis.

A pensioner is in constant fear of accidents or sickness or death overtaking one of his family. Where can he turn for assistance? Charity only applies to civilians in this district.

Everyone that I have interviewed in this matter, leaders of public opinion, have all been impressed with the situation and have all agreed that the matter is one for the federal authorities to deal with and the local Department of Pensions and National Health say it is a matter for Ottawa to deal with.

Faithfully submitted,
A. H. Johnson,
Pension No. 32910
Regimental No. 105344.

I have a further letter from Mr. H. Lafond, who states:

An average rent in Verdun—

This is simply corroboratory evidence.

—that is sanitary and decent surroundings for a flat of four rooms is $20 monthly, five rooms, $23 to $25, and six rooms, $28. Anything under that is old houses and not modern.

That was submitted by my correspondent or by the organization merely as evidence that $15 to $18 was certainly not a high rental to pay and it would hardly provide suitable accommodation for even these people who are in such serious circumstances.

A further letter from Mr. Frank Wrigley states:

On or about June the 15th last I applied to the local Department of Pensions and received relief for June and July to the extent of $21 for each month—

That is June and July, 1932.

—over and above my pension of $35 for a family of five. August the following month I was closed off all relief. I appealed to the local administrators and received a $10 loan on my pension. I was instructed to let my rent go as the landlords had been very lucky up to that time.

Rather amusing that he should have been instructed to let his rent go.

September of the following month I appealed to Captain Boyd, the administrator, who told me he could not advance me a further loan owing to lack of funds, he promised to send an investigator up, but the investigator has not arrived yet.

November, my wife in an advanced stage of illness, was suddenly taken seriously ill, I came home one night and found that she had been lying helpless for over half an hour owing to premature childbirth. I could not afford proper medical attention so was obliged to render first aid and dispose of the remains myself. I had neither food or fuel in the house, I kept the children home from school on that account. I sent a note to the principal of the school explaining the reason for their absence. I understand my letter was referred to the Verdun Protestant School Board. All I could obtain from the Pension department was a fuel order and was now obliged to beg and borrow from friends and run into debt with merchants, the same which I cannot see any hopes of paying and am being continually hounded for payment of same.

December I received and have been receiving since, a relief chit of $6.50 over and above my pension each month. After paying monthly rent of $20 which is obligatory under the ancient and obsolete law of Quebec yearly lease law, I have the magnificent sum of $21.50 left to provide light, heat, food and clothing, medical attention and other necessities for a family of five.

Then this trenchant sentence is added:

Will Mr. Bennett tell me how to do it?

He continues:

I have been without underwear all winter, also holes in my footwear, owing to being a chest case I appealed to Captain Brennan, chief medical adviser, for local department of pensions. Doctor Brennan informed me that was an economic question and a matter for further legislation, as there was no provision made for cases like mine, but from a medical point of view I should not be going about in such a condition. In answer to my questions he also informed me that in my case if I caught cold and took seriously ill I would be granted hospitalization with full pay and allowance, and in the event of my death my dependents would receive a pension. The present government are evidently firm believers in the old song "Old soldiers never die."

I have been notified by my landlady to vacate my present home owing to my inability to meet the terms stipulated in my lease. I am without funds to rent another home and am completely at a loss as to where I am going to stay, according to Captain Boyd no further loans can be advanced to any pensioner who is on relief and distinctly told me I was up against a stone wall.

Hoping the same will be of some assistance to you.

I have a whole file of letters, some not so bad and some even worse than that. I hesitate to place them all on the record of the house, and with what I have already read I rest the case for these men. I want to ask the minister two questions, first, why he did not see fit to do me the courtesy of letting me have as soon as it was available, a copy of the report of the investigation that he promised me would be held—if he had done that, a great deal of trouble might have been saved—and, second, what is the report of the investigators?

Mr. MacLAREN: Certainly I shall supply all the information possible to the hon. member for Bow River. I do not wish him to have any feeling that anything is being concealed from him or any other hon. member. This matter was brought to my attention some time ago by the hon. member for Bow River and as a result an investigation was held; I think he already knows that. The assistant deputy minister made at least two visits there in order to look over the situation carefully. We also had a very distinguished social welfare official who, in addition to the local representative, studied the matter. The result is that the information gained does not sustain the substance of the letters which my hon. friend has read. On the contrary there is much to show that they are not correct. In the meantime I would ask the hon. member for Bow River if he would kindly send that correspondence to the department to be investigated as it is obviously impossible to answer it in the house. If he will do so, the matter will be carefully considered. I have under my hand from the assistant deputy a memorandum under date of April 5, which I might read to the committee. It states:

With reference to complaints received, alleging that unemployed soldier pensioners in Montreal were on the verge of starvation and that many were threatened with eviction from their homes owing to the inadequacy of relief allowed by the department:

I would advise that a careful investigation has been made and, as a result, I am satisfied that the departmental schedule of relief is sufficient to provide adequate food and shelter.

Regarding the threatened evictions, investigation has brought to light only one authentic case where it was subsequently shown that the pensioner had failed to pay rental although in a position to do so.

The departmental scale of relief in Montreal, to which pension may be augmented, when the need exists, is higher than that provided to non-pensioned veterans and civilians.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

As there will no doubt be further discussion on this subject, in order not to delay the house I have been asked to proceed with bill No. 78, and I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 78, to amend the Pension Act—Mr. MacLaren—Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Chairman, this bill No. 78 as it appears before the house to-day is largely amended from the bill as originally introduced. Bill No. 78, in effect, is a bill to reorganize the administration of the pension department. It has nothing to do with pensions in the ordinary sense. It was found that after the amendments to the Pension Act of 1930 the courts as then organized became greatly congested, and in consequence an investigating committee was appointed in 1932 to inquire into the whole procedure. The members of the committee included five officers of the department, five representatives of the returned soldier bodies, and one judge. Unfortunately, perhaps, they disagreed on many points, but in some essential points they were in entire agreement, and based on their report the original Bill No. 78 was introduced and was afterwards sent to a committee of this house of which I had the honour to be chairman.

The unanimous opinion of the committee of 1932 was that there should be only one court of first instance, thus shortening the procedure. This court, according to the bill as it was first presented to this house, was to be completed by an enlargement of the board of pension commissioners. Hon. gentlemen will see by the amended bill that our committee have recommended that a new body be formed to be called the Canadian pensions commission, this body to consist of not less than eight or more than twelve persons, in order that there may be sufficient personnel to carry out the idea of the present quorums and be able to meet the soldier at home. That principle has been consistently followed throughout the bill. Therefore the board of pension commissioners as at present existing and also the tribunal will be done away with by this act.

There are other essential changes, not necessarily amendments, but in the bill itself. I might refer to the reviewing officer, which was another very important feature and was very thoroughly considered by your committee. The reviewing officer under this bill is a man appointed for the purpose of protecting the public to a certain degree, and also of seeing that justice is done the returned soldier. In the past objection to the judgments of the various quorums has been taken by various persons, largely employees of the board of pension commissioners. This was objected to, and in the original bill it was suggested that the reviewing officer should be placed under the control of the pension appeal board. This would apparently be more satisfactory, but it has been considered better to have an entirely independent officer, and so it will be found that in the amended bill as presented to the house to-day this official is to be appointed directly by the governor in council and to be responsible to no particular body.

So far as the pension appeal court is concerned the recommendation of the committee of last year was followed. It was found that in that court there are at the present time between 1,300 and 1,400 cases awaiting appeal, far too much work for one quorum. This bill therefore provides that ad hoc members may be added, some judge who shall be paid only for the time engaged, thus allowing two quorums to be formed and two courts to be working at the same time, and in this way it is quite possible that they will be able to catch up with the congestion.

The most important part of the whole bill and of this legislation is that we have probably not yet reached the peak of our pension troubles. There are at the present time 1,490 cases already prepared to come before the tribunals, and these cases are coming in at the rate of approximately 3,000 per year. So the committee will understand how necessary it is that these quorums should be able to carry on and help to relieve the congestion at the earliest possible moment. I may also say in passing that if our recommendations are carried out and this measure meets with the approval of this committee a good deal of the red tape in connection with the trial of these cases will be done away with. There will be a great deal less formality and that will be much better for the returned men.

In conclusion, I think I voice the opinion of every member of the committee in saying that the work was done by your committee most earnestly and with no desire except to serve the interests of the public and at the same time the interests of the returned men. Not only that, but I think that in every change, certainly in every material change, we were absolutely unanimous, and had the entire concurrence of the representatives of each of the veteran bodies, all of whom were present at the hearings.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two of concurrence with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), the chairman of the committee on pensions. The committee may recall that I was personally responsible, when the original Bill No. 78 was first brought to the house for the suggestion that this bill should be referred to a special committee. And I think if ever a course was justified it was that course, because there is a tremendous difference between Bill No. 78 now before the committee and the bill in its original form. The main changes, as stated by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, have been endorsed by the unanimous vote of the committee, with certain reservations which can be expressed during the discussion, and also endorsed by the bodies of ex-servicemen representing all the organized associations in Canada. So while we have all received numerous letters and telegrams from the various provinces protesting against Bill No. 78 as introduced, I think generally speaking the bill now before the committee should give satisfaction. Speaking only for myself I may say quite frankly that I would have preferred to see the present legislation functioning for at least another year, but seeing that the majority of the investigating committee last year, the Audette commission, including General Ross and Colonel Sherwood, recommended legislation along this line, possibly there was substantial reason for change. I wish to make one observation, that we have adopted in the first place the principle of merger between the board of pension commissioners and the tribunals. Most of the telegrams received have objected to abolition of the tribunals and retaining the board. I ask the committee to observe that these objections have been met by your subcommittee. The new body, the Canadian pension commission, is to consist of not less than eight and not more than twelve, in the discretion of the governor in council. I think I am voicing the opinion of the committee in saying that although the number of members is left to the discretion of the governor in council, the number of cases now awaiting decision or coming up for hearing in Canada absolutely justifies the number being twelve instead of eight. But that is left to the discretion of the governor in council who will be acquainted with the number of cases calling for attention. The hope of the committee is that this legislation will largely remove the congestion referred to in the report of last year and also will remove the unsatisfactory condition that prevailed in regard to the number of appeals taken. A very important feature of this bill is that there is no appeal from a favourable decision of the commission as such, that is a decision favourable to the applicant. There is an appeal from the travelling quorum which hears cases throughout the country. And the reviewing officer, who in the old bill was subject to the appeal court, is now an independent officer subject only to the governor in council. He will advise which of the cases in which judgment has been given in favour of the applicant by the quorum in the field should be appealed by the crown. So I think the legislation in general should work in the interests of the veterans. We have endeavoured to ensure that the personnel of the tribunals and of the board of pension commissioners shall have equal chances in the discretion of the governor in council, and also that the clerks and under-staff shall be in the same category. So that the objections which we have all been receiving from our various ridings have been as far as possible met by the committee.

May I say in conclusion that I agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound that the spirit manifested by every single member of that committee was a desire to serve the best interests of the ex-servicemen, consistent of course with the interest of the state.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, perhaps it would not be out of place if I follow somewhat on the line taken by the two hon. members who have preceded me, that is make a somewhat general statement, on this first clause of the bill, as to the nature of the changes which were made and our reasons for making them.

As the house is well aware, the legislation of 1930 was the result of the recommendations of a committee of this house which worked I think very diligently and very carefully. As a result of the labours of that committee the entire administration of the act was changed in 1930 and a new body was appointed called the pensions tribunal, having in mind this important feature, the desire of the applicants and all those interested in them that cases should be heard in the different parts of the country and that those claiming pension should have the opportunity to appear in person and have their cases dealt with in that way. This was brought into effect. The number of cases was so great that the original tribunal of nine, which provided for four quorums of two and a chairman, were found insufficient, and later three temporary members were added, whose terms I think expire this year, making a body of five quorums, with the possibility at times of six in case of congestion. We had hoped that this would have settled the matter and brought permanent satisfaction, but it did not. Complaints became widespread on two main grounds; first as to congestion and delay, and second as to the great number of appeals taken from the decisions of those travelling courts. So we met again, the intersessional commission having meantime gone into the matter. I think I can agree fully with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in expressing my appreciation of the government's action in acceding to our request and referring Bill No. 78 to this committee, and secondly in expressing my opinion, which I think will be generally shared, that that request and that action were amply justified by the changes which have been made in the bill. I assume that every member of the house, like myself, has been in receipt of various letters and telegrams and resolutions during the last few weeks, based upon the bill as at first presented, and protesting against what they looked upon as the abolition or partial abolition of the tribunal. One feature was demonstrated very markedly throughout last year, that whatever other dissatisfaction there was, the men were very well pleased with that feature which provided an open court and gave them the opportunity of appearing in person. That was the one feature of the 1930 legislation against which no complaints were brought, and which the men desired to have perpetuated. Bill No. 78 as brought down provided for the merging of those two bodies, or rather the disappearance of the tribunal by its merging into the pension commission. It provided that instead of the present bodies, the board of pension commissioners with three members and chief medical officer, who I think by order in council is now a member, making four members of the board of pension commissioners, and twelve members of the tribunal, nine being permanent and three temporary, there should be one body consisting of eight members, and that it should be composed of the present board of pension commissioners in full, appointed for a term of years to complete the term for which they are now appointed, I think seven years, and four members of the tribunal to be appointed for three years only as stated in the statute. May I say quite frankly that many of us felt that this was not entirely satisfactory, because it did provide, first for diminution in numbers and second for the total disappearance of the tribunal in three years. To this we could hardly agree. However, as has been the case in the past, and as I am glad to say has always been the case in every pensions committee brought together in this house, in spite of divergent opinions when the committee met, in spite of various ideas held, we presented a unanimous report, one in which we all concurred, in which we all agreed. It must be pointed out, however, that in the report of this committee with regard to the organization of the new board a great deal is left to the discretion of the governor in council. As has been said, the bill as brought down provides that this new body, under this new name, shall consist of not less than eight or more than twelve members. May I say that it was my opinion, and I think the opinion of many others, that in view of the work which had been done and the work which apparently must be done, a minimum of twelve would be absolutely necessary.

May I present the situation, Mr. Chairman. Up to the present time we have had the board of four pension commissioners performing their duties faithfully and conscientiously. They have been working hard, and I think they have done as much work as four men could do. Then we have had twelve members of the tribunal in the field, also working hard, hearing every case they could, but still the congestion was not overtaken. Under this new legislation, before the present amendments, provision was made for a total of eight members. Assuming that four members would be required to carry on the work of the commission as it has been carried on heretofore that would leave only four members, or two travelling quorums, available for work in the field. I think it is obvious that at the present time at least two quorums could not do the work which five quorums failed to do.

My main purpose in speaking at this point, Mr. Chairman, apart from my desire to concur in the statement that we were in accord in our final report, is to urge upon the governor in council the necessity of using the discretion here conferred by appointing the full number of twelve in the first place. Without going into statistics, and without wasting the time of the committee by quoting figures, may I state the facts briefly. Last year some 3,200 new cases were brought forward and sent to the tribunals for their attention. During the same period the five, and at times six, travelling quorums finally disposed of some 3,600 cases. It has been suggested, not only by members of the committee but in remarks made by members of the pension appeal court, that the travelling quorums of the pension tribunal, in their anxiety to overtake their work, perhaps had been acting too hastily and had not devoted sufficient time to each case. I think they averaged about five cases per day, and it was suggested and urged from many sides that four cases a day was as much as any one quorum could properly handle. So it is a very simple problem in mathematics to work out how many cases per year can be dealt with by so many quorums, and I think it will be agreed by most hon. members that four quorums is the least that can really handle this work. It is true that we agreed to leave this matter to the discretion of the governor in council in order that the bill might be satisfactory, but I should like to urge the governor in council to use their undoubted discretion and the knowledge which they possess to make certain of two things: First, that this congestion will not reappear, that the numbers will be adequate and the personnel satisfactory, and second, that the complaints which have been made so frequently as to the number of appeals taken from the decisions of those quorums—now that those appeals will be within their own discretion and on their own responsibility—will be brought forward no longer.

I am glad to have been able to take part in this discussion; I hope that this bill, properly interpreted and administered, will end many of the complaints that have been made and give satisfaction both to the returned men and the taxpayers. As the different sections come forward, of course, they can be discussed in detail and I may have something more to say then.

Mr ROSS: With the principle of the bill so ably presented I am in accord. I could not be otherwise, since it is practically the method I proposed to the committee in 1930. That proposal was turned down; it was decided to enter upon the experiment which we are now discarding, and that experiment has cost this government and this country $1,371,000 in cash. The tribunal was not a name of which I was very fond, because returned men always liked the name "pension board." Owing to the difficulties which have arisen ever since the close of the war many returned men felt that the pension board was not sufficiently sympathetic to their applications, but now that this bill proposes to change the name it may be, and I trust will be, that a better feeling will exist among the returned men.

I have always felt, Mr. Chairman, that our legislation was good. No other country has pension legislation equal to that of the Dominion of Canada, but the trouble has been that somewhere the administration fell down. I am sure that any person who served on any of the committees appointed since 1922 has felt that there was some sort of antagonism or lack of cooperation on the part of the different organizations. That became very acute when we introduced the tribunals and the appeal court. Now these two bodies have been merged, and I hope we can look for a more sympathetic administration of the act.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I think difficulties have existed with regard to the administration. I directed the attention of the committee to a lack of consideration which, if rectified, perhaps would clear up some of those difficulties. It was stated during one of our meetings that in notifying an applicant that his application had not been accepted, the name and address of the person concerned with appeal appeared on that notice. I disputed that statement. I have before me one of the forms sent out in such cases, which is as follows:

> I am directed to inform you that the act of 1931 amending the Pension Act provides:
> "Should the application be not granted the commission shall refer the case to the chief pensions advocate and the chief commission counsel for presentation to the pension tribunal if the applicant or any person on his behalf duly authorized so requests in writing."

When that notice is received very often the person interested does not know what it means, and many of these notices are not answered. As a result, many applications are lying there inactive. I would direct the attention of those in charge of the administration of this legislation to the fact that some effort should be made to get rid of these ten or twelve thousand cases now in the inactive list. It might be that if these cases were divided up as between different areas the persons concerned could be advised by advertisement that no action had been taken with regard to their applications and that, if they would get in touch with some official of the commission, they would be informed more definitely as to what might be done. I am perhaps more interested in this phase of the question than in anything else. We have still kept the principle of examination and inspection, and with a little more trouble, and more details given in the paper sent to the applicant who has failed, I think we could clear up a good many of these ten thousand cases.

Mr. MacLAREN: I wish to express my complete appreciation of the work of the committee. They have come together on this bill and have been very thorough and assiduous in their duties. The work they have done has shown a fine spirit of unity on a subject in regard to which there are so many diverse opinions. I was visited yesterday by representatives of the Associated Veterans. They came to inform me, as representing their organizations, that the bill met with their complete approval. Both of these factors, both the finding of the committee and the representations from the Associated Veterans, are undoubtedly gratifying and will encourage the department to do its best in carrying out its part. In any case, it is reassuring. Finally, if I were making any general observations, I would ask for the fuller confidence of parliament, of the returned men and of the public generally in the administration of this act. I believe it is warranted; I do not think it would be misplaced but on the contrary would have a very beneficial effect not only on the department but on the feeling of the people throughout the country.

Mr. GEARY: What the minister has just said is something which I think should be borne in mind by this committee, namely, that the soldiers' organizations as represented before the committee undoubtedly displayed a spirit of conciliation and of compromise, and evidenced an endeavour to arrange the matter having in mind not only their own interests but the interests of the taxpayers as well.

There have been two main troubles with the administration up to date; one was congestion in the hearings by the tribunals and the other was the appeal. The appeal was probably the sorest point of all and it arose because the commission was really appealing on its own behalf. Perhaps what has been said had some basis in truth; the soldiers felt that the sympathy of the commission was not always with them. The commission appealed without knowing what it was appealing on in many cases. There was pressure at times, the record was not always available, and appeals were put in without regard to whether they were justified or whether there was proper cause of appeal or not.

The merit of this bill, to my mind, is this. The number of appointees may be eight or twelve, and hereafter such matters as delay or congestion in the first court, and the question of appeal from that court, will be up to the governor in council. That is the essential feature of the bill as we now have it. There is no delay anywhere at all except in the officials appointed by the governor in council.

They may appoint enough or they may appoint too few members to go about the country hearing cases. Further, either the reviewing officer is proper and right in advising appeal or he is derelict in his duty in advising too many appeals, in which case the governor in council will have to stand the brunt of the criticism that may be brought to bear.

These are the achievements of the committee; these are the things that the house will have achieved in passing this bill. The soldiers have had good cause for complaint in a great many instances, but I believe that the opinion of the country is still in favour of all the promises made to these men being carried out. There is no disposition on the part either of the country or of this government to cut them down. We hear occasionally of pensions having been wrongly granted to persons—men who did not deserve them. May I point out, however, that this is not to be laid at the door of the soldiers. Pensions may have been badly awarded, there may have been injustice in that direction; but that to my mind has been the fault of administration in the granting of pensions and not a fault which must be laid at the door of the soldiers' organizations. They simply desire to see that the soldier shall get a fair deal in the matter of pensions.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am happy to associate myself entirely with the remarks of the other members of the committee, and I am particularly happy to concur fully in the very able remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Canadian Pension Commission.

Mr. DUFF: This is the section referring to the change in the act to provide that instead of there being a pension commission and also a pension tribunal these two bodies shall be amalgamated and a commission to be known as the Canadian pension commission appointed. I notice in subsection 2 of section 3 that the number of commissioners to be appointed by the governor in council must be not fewer than eight though it may be increased to twelve. While every right-thinking man in this country is willing to see that every consideration is given to the claims of the returned soldiers and that the amounts due them for pensions are paid, nevertheless it seems to me, in view of the magnitude of the amount which this country is voting every year for pensions to returned soldiers, that the government in the present condition of the country's finances should carefully consider what action ought to be taken in connection with this section of the bill.

In the past we have had a board of pension commissioners, and I do not think that anyone who has taken any interest in the work of this commission will deny them credit for the splendid work they did during the number of years they functioned. It is rather strange to me to hear some hon. members say, in spite of the fact that, in addition to the board of pension commissioners which for so many years carried out its work so well in the interests of the returned soldiers, and the fact that an additional body of twelve men was appointed after the act was amended in 1930, that now there are more complaints and more claims than there were when the work was done entirely by the pension commission. It seems to me that while everyone is anxious to do everything that is reasonable and possible for the returned soldiers, the government should be very careful to take every step it possibly can to economize in this matter. Let me say to the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, that in my opinion it is necessary to try first how well the work will be done by eight men, before the additional four are appointed. Before those additional four are appointed, making twelve in all, the governor in council should make an experiment with eight men. It seems to me it would be in the interests of economy to appoint the three pension commissioners. These men know the work and could be appointed with advantage. It seems to me it would also be in the interests of the taxpayers of this country to provide only for a board of eight, which would be sufficient to carry on the trials.

This pension commission has been acting for a great many years and in the main has given satisfaction not only to the people of this country but to the returned soldier. It is quite true that there has been criticism of certain amounts paid to returned soldiers, but that is to be expected in the administration of such vast sums of money. There have been criticisms made that they have not always given the amounts which the returned soldiers or the men at the head of the organizations demanded, but it seems to me that that should be in their favour. In any business it is impossible to satisfy everyone and the Minister of Finance and every member of this committee knows that where government money is concerned, either for this or any other purpose, there is sometimes a temptation to ask for more than should be given. It seems to me that the members of parliament are as much to blame as anyone else for the fact that since this act came into force a number of years ago we have spent vast sums of money and are to-day spending something like $55,000,000. I am not averse to spending every dollar that is necessary, whether it be $55,000,000 or $100,000,000, but the Minister of Finance has to find ways and means of raising the revenue and in view of the conditions prevailing at the moment I think every effort should be made to see that no money is paid to returned soldiers which is not deserved. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that a complete investigation be made into the payments to returned soldiers. This could be made either through this pension commission or in some other way. I am convinced that many men are receiving pensions who should not receive them while there are other poor devils receiving amounts entirely inadequate. If the whole matter was gone into I am quite convinced that the Minister of Finance would be able to save tens of millions of dollars.

The pension commission and the tribunal boards will go out of office immediately this bill receives royal assent. In view of the good work done in the past by the pension commission, I think in the appointment of these eight officials first choice should be given to the three members of the present pension commission. After a man has been engaged in a certain line of work for a number of years it is pretty hard for him to go back to something else upon being thrown out on the street. I should like the Minister of Finance to give serious consideration to this matter. Why do I say this? First, for the reason I gave a moment ago, that these pension commissioners have given the best years of their lives to this work. Of course, there is bound to be criticism in the expenditure of such a vast sum of money but the fact remains that these pension commissioners are in a position entirely different from that of the members of the tribunal boards. These boards were a new experiment and they have been in operation for only a few years. If the minister cannot make a definite statement to-day I ask him to take into consideration the appointment of the present commissioners to the new pension commission.

Mr. RHODES: In administering subsection two of section 3 I am sure it will be the purpose of the governor in council to keep in mind the considerations which have been presented to the committee by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). It is the desire of the governor in council, as it is of the members of this committee and the people of this country, that full justice should be done to the returned soldier. On the other hand, we must keep in mind the heavy burden which is imposed upon the taxpayers of this country. As my hon. friend will understand, I cannot give him any definite undertaking but we all appreciate the representations he has made, not only with respect to the personnel of the old pensions board but with respect to other matters. I can assure my hon. friend that the attention of my colleagues will be directed to his observations and that they will receive my careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the Minister of Finance give the same assurance with respect to the members of the pension tribunals?

Mr. RHODES: I am sure it will be the desire of the governor in council to see that all interests are properly considered.

Mr. DUFF: According to their merits.

Mr. MacLAREN: As this bill will become operative by proclamation, the difficulties referred to by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough will not arise. The hon. member referred also to the necessity of a review being made of all pensions. My understanding is that the board of pension commissioners have been working for the past few months upon a review of all cases.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to repeat what I have said already but I wish again to urge the importance of the right of hearing being held in open court and the necessity of having a body sufficient to provide the necessary quorums. As far as the personnel of this body is concerned, I am sure the governor in council will keep in mind those men who have obtained experience in this work and who only a few years ago were appointed under a ten year contract. The bill in its original form provided for the reappointment of the board of pension commissioners and I hope in the appointment of this new body the governor in council will consider the number which I have suggested and which is provided for in the bill. I hope they will also keep in mind, as they undoubtedly will, the personnel of the pension tribunals. Apparently these men have achieved a unique success, something rarely accomplished. They reviewed many cases some of which they accepted and some of which they refused but I have heard only of a few cases of dissatisfaction in connection with unsuccessful applicants whose cases were heard by these tribunals. Men have told me that while they were disappointed in not having their cases accepted they felt that they had had a fair, honest and impartial hearing. If their cases were rejected, they felt that they were not strong enough to stand. I hope these men will be kept in mind in the appointment of this new commission. The government is under some responsibility to the members of these boards as they have served only three years of the ten year statutory contract under which they were employed. I repeat that to my mind the important part of this legislation is the retaining of the feature of the open court and the providing of travelling quorums before which the applicants can make a personal appearance. This can be done only by adequate appointments to the board.

Mr. COOTE: Not being a member of the special committee, I had not intended to say anything upon this subject, but the remarks of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough prompt me to say a few words. Many veterans and their friends throughout the country greatly regret to see the pension tribunal done away with. It was because of the dissatisfaction existing in Canada that the pension tribunals were established and there is a great deal of dissatisfaction now because so many cases in which favourable decisions were given by the tribunals have been appealed and the appeals are held up for such long periods. I think in one case which I brought to the minister's attention, an appeal has been pending, if I remember rightly, for nearly two years. While of course I agree with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough that the government at this time should do everything to practise true economy, I want to remind the hon. member and the committee that this government has gone to the limit in living up to our obligations to those who purchased government bonds to finance the war, but in many cases, in my humble opinion, we have not gone nearly to the same limit in living up to our obligations to the men who went overseas and fought in the war. I say that because of individual cases which have come to my attention. I have under my hand the correspondence in regard to one case where a man served three years and ten months in France with practically no leave, and with every day of that leave spent in hospital in England. He is incapacitated and he cannot get a pension. Although he was physically fit when he was taken on, he was discharged as medically unfit, of course the board claiming that this was due to defective eyesight which they stated was congenital.

I have another case of a man who spent four years in France; he was buried in an explosion caused by a shell. He has suffered ever since with a weak back and pains in his legs. It would seem to anyone that this man's disability was due to the injuries he sustained when buried by the shell. He was refused a pension by the pension commissioners. His application was heard by the tribunal and allowed. His case was then taken to the appeal board where, after a delay of a year, it was heard and he was refused a pension. In many of these cases when they come to the appeal court, the clause under which the applicant is supposed to get the benefit of the doubt is absolutely ignored. The men feel and I feel that the board of pension commissioners should be enlarged to take in the present members of the pension tribunal so that we may clear up the thousands of cases that are waiting for hearing. I should like to urge upon the minister that the full board of twelve be appointed so that they may deal with these cases as promptly as possible and clear up some of this dissatisfaction which I think rightfully exists among many veterans who have applied for pensions.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have just a word to say about subsection 14. This was amended in the committee to read:

> All officers, clerks and employees on the staff of the board of pension commissioners for Canada—

Then there was added:

> And of the pension tribunal . . . shall be and become during pleasure, officers, clerks and employees on the staff of the commission.

The amendment was one about which I felt strongly. It was my desire that the officers, clerks and employees of the pension tribunal should receive the same consideration as those of the pension board. By that I mean that there should be no discrimination. Some misunderstanding has arisen in certain quarters as to just what that means. My sole desire is that the staffs of both the pension board and the tribunal should be placed on an equality when it comes to the question of administration and that the same consideration should be extended to the employees of both boards, without any discrimination whatever.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Pension appeal court continued.

Mr. DUFF: With regard to 10B on page 6, subclause (1) reads:

> The governor in council upon the retirement of any member of the commission, or the court, who has served upon one or other of such bodies during at least twenty years, or who has so served during at least ten years and has reached the age of seventy years, or is physically or mentally incapacitated, and is not entitled to superannuation under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, may grant to him a pension for his life not exceeding one-third of the salary to which he was entitled as such member.

It will be noticed that if he is over seventy years of age, after serving ten years, he receives 33 per cent of his salary, but if he is not seventy years, but might have served ten or more years, he gets nothing. In view of the principle laid down by parliament on several occasions and especially in the last few days in regard to the appointment of the tariff commission, where a salary of $15,000 was asked for the chairman for the next ten years and where, after that ten years had expired, he was to receive a retiring allowance or pension amounting to $7,500, and in view of the fact that certain members of this new pension commission, or, in fact, of the old commission, will soon retire, they should be entitled to the same treatment, I am going to move the following amendment to 10B:

That all the words after the word "least" in the third line of subsection (1) of clause 10B be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"ten years, may grant him a pension for his life not exceeding one-third of the salary to which he is entitled as such member, or two-thirds of such salary to any member of the commission who has, as aforesaid, served fifteen years and upwards, provided any such member is not entitled to superannuation under the Civil Service Superannuation Act."

I am not asking for the same consideration as has been given to the chairman of the tariff commission; all I say is that a member of this board, after serving ten years, may be granted for his life a pension not exceeding one-third of the salary to which he was entitled.

Mr. RHODES: It is one o'clock. May I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the money phase of this motion?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): Yes, it is out of order.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at one o'clock.

Mr. MacLAREN: I just wish to make one observation on the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. I think there is merit in what the hon. member says. I propose to bring the matter to the attention of the government, and I hope it will be dealt with at some more favourable time. I think it is of sufficient merit to be fully considered, but it should wait until some more favourable time. That is my own personal view.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur-Thunder Bay): The amendment is to strike out all the words after the word "least" in the third line of subsection 1 of clause 10B and to substitute the following therefor:

"ten years, may grant him a pension for his life not exceeding one-third of the salary to which he is entitled as such member, or two-thirds of such salary to any member of the commission who has, as aforesaid, served fifteen years and upwards, provided any such member is not entitled to superannuation under the Civil Service Superannuation Act."

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps in view of the fact that a monetary question is involved, the amendment may be out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur-Thunder Bay): It is.

Mr. DUFF: By changing only a few words I submit, Mr. Chairman, the amendment would be in order. The Minister of Pensions and National Health was good enough to discuss my amendment with me and he has just said that the government will take it into consideration, but if this section passes as it is I submit that it will be impossible to deal with the proposal in my amendment until the next session of parliament. May I suggest to the minister that instead of dealing summarily with the amendment now and passing the clause, he let the clause stand until to-morrow so that he will have an opportunity to consider the matter further and perhaps agree to my suggestion. He admits that there is merit in the amendment.

Mr. MacLAREN: I did not have the idea that it would apply this session.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand that the minister is willing to allow this subsection to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have not been able to hear what the minister was saying on this side.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think the section should stand. I have said I am impressed by the reasons expressed by my hon. friend, but it is a matter that requires a good deal of consideration by the government, and I said I should have much pleasure in bringing it to the attention of the government with my favourable comments. I think that is as far as the hon. gentleman can expect me to go.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot agree with the minister. I can understand, of course, that it may be necessary for him to give further consideration to my amendment, but certainly my amendment is very much more modest than the proposals contained in certain legislation which we have passed in this house in the last two or three years or in the legislation which was proposed to this house within the last day or two. I remember when I was very much younger and one of a big family, when some of us tried to get from the other the biggest slice of bread and molasses my mother used to say, "There should be no step-bairns in our family," and as far as government officials are concerned there should be no step-bairns, but everybody should be treated alike. Within the last day or two the government introduced legislation whereby parliament was asked to vote for the chairman of the tariff board—I am not talking personally at all—not only a salary of $15,000, an increase from the $12,000 which the former chairman of the board received, but in addition that he should receive an annuity after drawing $15,000 for ten years. As far as I am concerned there are entirely too many pensions being paid, whether it is to the chairman of the tariff board or anybody else, because the ordinary person in this country who has to pay taxes receives no pension at all. He is engaged in farming or mining or fishing or in mercantile life, and, if any of us does not make enough for our old age we have to go to the poor house or grub along as best we can without any pension. Yet the government proposed to give the chairman of the tariff board a salary of $15,000 for ten years and an annuity, and if the chairman of that board cannot save sufficient for the future out of a salary of $15,000 a year for ten years, I say that he is not fit to be chairman of the board. In addition, besides providing that the taxpayers of this country should pay the chairman of the tariff board a pension of $7,500 per year or fifty per cent of his salary at the end of ten years' service, that legislation originally proposed pensions also for the other two members of the board and now my good friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health says that he cannot agree to my very modest amendment to provide a pension for these men who have given good service to this country as members of the pension board, although my amendment proposes that they shall receive a pension of only one-third of their salary.

Clause 2 of this bill makes provision for the salaries which the members of the new Canadian pension commission shall receive. The chairman is to receive a salary of $7,000 and each of the other members of the board $6,000 per annum. I am willing to admit that in these times under present conditions $7,000 or $6,000 is rather fair remuneration in the public service. But how can the minister or the government justify not accepting my amendment when the chairman of the pension commission is responsible for the expenditure of $55,000,000 per year, and when he receives a salary of $7,000 and the other members of the commission $6,000, as compared with $15,000 for the chairman of the tariff board and $10,000 each for the other two members of that board? The minister is part of the ministry and an adviser to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, and I ask him how can he justify waiting for another year. Surely, Mr. Chairman, the members of this new board, whether these gentlemen who have been members of the pension commission for the last ten years or the new members who are going to be put on from the tribunals, with the serious responsibilities they have to assume, are entitled to as much money from the taxpayers of this country as the members of the tariff commission. Yet my hon. friend says when I move a modest amendment to give these men not so high a pension when they retire after ten or fifteen years, that it cannot be dealt with this year, and asks us to pass this bill and the matter will be considered later. I say that is not fair either to the members of the pension board, the members of the tribunal or the members of this house. I say to the minister that in fairness to everyone concerned he should allow this clause 10B to stand for further consideration.

Mr. HEAPS: In the course of the proceedings this morning, I listened very attentively to the plea of the hon. member who has just sat down for the utmost economy in pensions. He pleaded that as much as twenty-five per cent could be cut off the pensions list of the Dominion of Canada. Yet the amendment he now moves is one which if accepted would have the effect of increasing the amount spent by the government on pensions. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am quite in favour of giving employees in the service of the government a reasonable retiring allowance, but I think that instead of starting at the top we should start at the bottom. I am getting sick and tired of listening to pleas on behalf of men in the employ of the government who are receiving very high salaries, and to whom in addition to the high salary we are asked to give other large sums in the way of pensions. During the past two days we have listened to a plea for high pensions to men receiving $15,000 a year, and to judges receiving salaries of $8,000, $10,000 and $12,000 a year. We have been told that thrift is one of the great virtues. I am under the impression that if we are to have thrift it should start among those people who enjoy these very high salaries; men in receipt of $8,000, $10,000 and $15,000 a year should be able to save a little for the rainy day. We are always hearing that people receiving $700, $800 and $1,000 a year should be taught the virtue of thrift. I think these people receiving high salaries are still better able to put something aside to tide them over. As I said, I am not opposed to the principle of retiring allowances, I am heartily in favour of it.

May I point out further that the engine driver or the crew of a train that brings the hon. member here from Nova Scotia is performing just as useful service to society as the man who takes office on the pension board. After all their work deals with the spending of money, but the train crew have entrusted to them the very lives of a number of human beings. It is true, I do not for a moment deny it, that the man sitting on the pensions tribunal is performing a very important task, but not one bit more important than that of the men driving the trains. These men at present are entitled not only to certain emoluments, but as they come under the Civil Service Commission they have also a claim on the superannuation fund; at any rate if not they are receiving fairly good salaries. I think this particular time is not one in which it is essential to provide them with retiring allowances. We have been told for the past two or three years in this house that these are times for the practice of the utmost economy. I do not know of any more extravagant expenditure at this time than providing these very extravagant retiring allowances for men in receipt of high salaries, so I think if we allow this question to stand for the time being there will be no harm done.

Mr. MacLAREN: I would like to point out that the government has consented to pass this bill as it stands. I do not think it would be desirable to make any changes if possible to avoid doing so. Therefore I would favour the passage of this section as it stands, and as I say I will bring it before the government for future consideration.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Owing to the confusion in the house I was unable to hear what section was called. Do I understand that section 6 was declared carried?

The CHAIRMAN: We are taking the bill subsection by subsection. Subsection 10B is carried.

On subsection 10C—Appointment of civil servants.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, with the animation that is prevailing in the house you have got a little ahead of me. I wish to amend the wording of this section. There are several words omitted in the last line on the page. It reads:

—his tenure of office as a member of the commission or of the . . .

I wish to amend it to read as follows:

—his tenure of office as a member of the board of pension commissioners for Canada, of the pension tribunal, or of the . . .

Those words were omitted in error.

On subsection 10E—Medical and clerical assistance.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister would answer an important question that I would like to put now. Perhaps it does not come under the bill, nor do I wish at this time to raise any question regarding the matter of pensions, but among many organizations of returned men a feeling prevails that the private soldier who receives a pension is called up each year for examination, but that such examination is not required in the case of those who were officers. My question is, do those who were officers and who are in receipt of pension come up for examination periodically the same as the private soldier?

Mr. MacLAREN: As far as I know there is no difference made between members of the forces as to examinations and reexaminations on the ground of rank. There is a difference regarding the nature of the disability. For instance if a man has an amputation of the thigh, that remains, requiring no verification. But there are conditions which may vary, and they call for more repeated examination.

Mr. DUFF: Under subsection 3 it is provided that the pension advocates shall be appointed under and pursuant to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, at such salaries as the governor in council may prescribe. I should like to know from the minister how in the name of all that is good and holy pensions advocates can be appointed by the Civil Service Commission. Surely the ministry, this parliament and the country will have sufficient confidence in this board to permit them to appoint their own pensions advocates without referring to the Civil Service Commission. If appointments are carried on in this way it may take three or four months to get an appointment through, and in any case the Civil Service Commission would really take the recommendation of the minister or of this new board. So far as I am concerned I think this is a mistake; in fact I think the whole Civil Service Commission is only camouflage, and in this more than in any other law it is more of a camouflage than ever. If the appointment of officials to penitentiaries is not to come within the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission; if the appointment of officials and soloists, to whom the Prime Minister referred last night, is to be carried on by the radio commission surely the same practice can be followed here. There should be no delay in making these appointments; if a soldier is suffering because he is unable to be represented before the board he should not have to wait two or three months for the Civil Service Commission to advertise the position and appoint an advocate.

I say this is a great mistake, in spite of the fact that it is carrying out the unanimous report brought in by the eminent gentlemen who formed this committee. Personally I do not like the idea of unanimous reports of this kind; I think it would be much better to have divided opinions, but since these eminent gentlemen did bring in this recommendation that the pensions advocates should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission I respectfully submit that they must have been asleep at the switch when this went through. I hope the minister and the members of the committee will agree with me.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think the hon. gentleman is labouring under a very great misapprehension. As a matter of fact the present pensions advocates are reappointed to office, under subsection (4). We may have brought in a unanimous report, but we were not unanimous in the beginning; personally I shared the view which has been expressed by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, that the pension commission should have power to appoint its own men. My reason for so thinking was that in every case these pension advocates are returned soldiers and they are and have been men acceptable to the leaders of the returned men. We desired to continue that state of affairs, but the representatives of the legion said they were quite willing to have this clause inserted if that was thought advisable because in every case the preference will be given to returned soldiers. Not only that, but in the past they have been asked to sit in with regard to the appointment of these men. These vacancies will only occur from time to time, from death or other causes or when it may be necessary to add an additional member to the staff. I think there can be no question that even in the view of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have expressed very pronounced opinions in the last few days with regard to certain matters, it was the part of wisdom to make all future appointments subject to the approval of the Civil Service Commission of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: The chairman of the special committee which was appointed to investigate this matter has not answered my question at all. The fact that these advocates are returned soldiers has nothing to do with the matter. The pension commission or this newly appointed board certainly can select advocates for the returned soldiers, and in that way we will get rid of a lot of red tape in these appointments. Surely the gentlemen who will form this body will have sufficient interest in the returned men to appoint returned men as pensions advocates, without reference to the Civil Service Commission. I say that this clause is not necessary at all. I believe it will clog the machinery of this act and will keep the returned soldier waiting anywhere from three to nine months until the Civil Service Commission, which is not composed of returned soldiers and which may appoint other than a returned man, gets around to making an appointment. So far as I am concerned, in the interests of the returned soldiers and in spite of the fact that this matter was investigated by such a wonderful committee, composed of gentlemen who have all the necessary knowledge to decide on these questions, I am opposed to having these advocates so appointed. I say it should be left in the hands of the minister, the governor in council or the pensions commission. I would prefer to have the appointments made by the governor in council, because after all in this country, where we have responsible government, appointments should be made in that way rather than by a body which has no responsibility at all.

Mr. ARTHURS: If the hon. gentleman will turn to clause 10H he will find a similar provision with regard to commission counsel, in exactly the same terms. I do not think for a moment that the soldier organizations in Canada would be in favour of having the men who appear against them appointed by the court that is going to try them. By this measure we are taking over the men now engaged in this work and future appointments will be made by the Civil Service Commission. I do not think there should be any question about that at all.

Mr. DUFF: I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee, but surely my hon. friend is not serious when he insinuates that the Civil Service Commission should appoint these advocates instead of the minister or the governor in council because, in the latter case, the returned soldier might not get a square deal. Let me tell my hon. friend that in my experience during the last seventeen years, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred appointments have been made by the Civil Service Commission on the recommendation of either the minister, his deputy or someone else in the department. It is all nonsense for my hon. friend to say that if these appointments are not made by the Civil Service Commission the returned men will not get a square deal from the minister or the governor in council. I say this clause should be struck out; it is absolutely unnecessary and is not in the best interests of the returned men.

Subsection 10H agreed to.

On subsection 10I—Reviewing officer.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Though this is one of the two or three really important clauses in the bill I shall delay the committee for only a moment. This section is intended to meet the unfortunate situation in regard to which many complaints have arisen respecting the abuse of the appeal system. There is one important change of principle embodied in the new act. Speaking the other day on another subject, I suggested that, in the meticulous care which the department had taken to divorce all pension matters from political considerations, we had perhaps in some instances gone too far and removed from parliament and the governor in council that authority and responsibility which should be theirs, and our objection was perhaps commendable. In this act, in the appointment of a reviewing officer and in the appointment of a board, we have deliberately restored to the governor in council itself and, through the government, to the department, responsibility in respect of two causes of complaint—congestion, where we now place the responsibility on the government itself to see that adequate means are taken for the hearing of cases by the quorum, and secondly, in the case of the reviewing officer, the provision that the governor in council shall become responsible for the appeals that shall be made. It is perhaps an experiment, but I think it is a wise one; and having brought these two important matters more completely under the control of parliament, we shall probably, I think, be able to obviate many of the troubles which we have experienced.

Mr. DUFF: I would direct the attention of the minister and of the chairman of the special committee to this particular section. The chairman of the committee gave satisfaction but he rather opposed my view which I expressed in connection with the appointment of the advocates, because he was of the opinion that the pension advocates should not be appointed by the commission. The present clause reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, or any other statute, the governor in council may appoint an officer, called a "reviewing officer," and may fix the salary that shall be paid to him.

In other words, in one case this very able committee compels the pensioners, before they can get their cases heard, to submit to the delay of having the advocate appear before the Civil Service Commission, while in the case of the reviewing officer the appointment can be made by the governor in council. I wish the chairman of the special committee would explain why he was Dr. Jekyll in one case and Mr. Hyde in the other.

Mr. ARTHURS: There is this difference between the two cases. Under this bill, which if carried will change the operation of the Pension Act, the most important, the most essential officer so far as the men are concerned is the reviewing officer. He is the channel through which all cases must pass. It was contended by some that this officer should be under the control of the present board of pension commissioners or its successor, while others took the view that he should be under the control of the Department of Justice. Others, again, including General Ross, who submitted a very elaborate report last year, suggested that the reviewing officer should be under the control of the pensions appeal board. Personally I was inclined to favour the latter course, but after we considered the matter, this being a very important office, we decided to leave this man directly responsible to parliament through the minister, having the appointment made by the governor in council, thereby being under our direct control, so that we could demand an accounting at each session. This is a most important office, and I trust that the government will select a man of great ability, a man with a sense of fair play, because he stands between the pensioner and the public purse. If he makes no decision to appeal within thirty-five days of judgment, the applicant receives his pension irrevocably; if, on the other hand, he decides that an appeal is necessary, the applicant has ninety days in which to prepare. I would point out to my hon. friend that this official is in an entirely different class from the advocates.

Mr. DUFF: I admit with the hon. member that the reviewing officer under this bill is in an entirely different class from the advocates who are to be appointed to represent the returned soldier. And that is the great trouble in this country; there is too much class. In my opinion the pensioner is the man who should be looked after. He should be given the easiest way to get his pension reviewed.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is what we are doing.

Mr. DUFF: Instead of that the chairman of the committee now says that the reviewing officer, who is going to get a big salary and occupy an important position, should be appointed by the governor in council. The advocate, who really represents the poor returned soldier in the country districts, must go before the Civil Service Commission for approval. The soldier must wait until the advocate has been appointed by that body. I do not know whether the Civil Service Commission is any good or whether its members are earning their salaries; that is a debatable question so far as I am concerned. But this government as well as previous governments have retained the Civil Service Commission, and I say that if that commission is necessary in the case of the advocates, it is equally necessary with respect to the reviewing officer. I submit that the reviewing officer as well as the advocate should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission; indeed, the necessity is more apparent in the former case. I can see what my hon. friend means; I can see what the minister means in the contention that the reviewing officer should be appointed by the government. It is a good fat job for someone. The advocate may appear before the board only once in a year or in five years and he will be paid a certain fee, five dollars or ten dollars. The returned soldier has to wait three or six months until this august body in the Hunter building appoints the advocate. But with regard to the reviewing officer, receiving a salary of five, six or seven thousand a year, the chairman of the special committee stands up and says that this official is in an entirely different class. I know it; surely he is in a different class—likely in the Tory class. He will be appointed by the Tory party.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am anxious to know whether by setting up a new commission we are short-circuiting in any way the hearings of applicants. Will cases still pass through the commissioners to the appeal court and then to the reviewing officer? In other words, what is the mode of procedure? I ask that question because of the difficulty men have experienced in having their cases settled.

Mr. MacLAREN: The provisions of this legislation are in very large measure a simplification of what was a complicated organization. Simplification and expedition are I think two of the prominent features of the bill. There will be two adjudicating bodies instead of three as at present, one, the pension commission and, two, the appeal court. I do not agree exactly with what my hon. friend the chairman of the committee says as to the duties of this reviewing officer. His duties will be important but they will not be preeminently important. He will have nothing to do with the awarding of pensions, he will simply review cases which have been heard by the travelling boards.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That would be the commissioners?

Mr. MacLAREN: Two members of the pension board who will go out to hear evidence. These men will have the power of making a definite decision. During the last few months there has been an erroneous impression throughout the country that this legislation was going to do away with the personal contact with the men. That is not the case because such contact has been provided for. There will be two adjudicating bodies instead of three which will simplify the procedure and save time. Where a man has been granted a pension by the travelling board the question will then arise as to whether that finding should be accepted or an appeal taken, and this point must be decided by some individual or organization. This will be the duty of the reviewing officer. He will review the evidence and if he is satisfied that the pension has been granted on proper grounds, that will be the end of it. If he thinks the evidence is insufficient and that there should be an appeal taken, he will so report. He will have no authority over the awarding of pensions, he simply decides the proper cases for appeal. I believe this provision will go a long way to meeting the complaints which have been made that too many references have been made to the appeal court.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Assume that two commissioners hear an applicant and decide to make an award. That award will be reviewed by this reviewing officer and if he thinks it is too generous, he will refer it—

Mr. MacLAREN: I did not say he reviews it, he looks over the evidence and decides whether or not an appeal should be taken.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am simply trying to get clarity. This reviewing will be done in the interests of the government because he will be their officer. If he decides that the case should go to appeal, it will go to the appeal court which is now set up.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is the only court to go to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Their decision will be final.

Mr. MacLAREN: Absolutely.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the event of an applicant being dissatisfied has he the right to take his case to the appeal court?

Mr. MacLAREN: In all instances. That is the point I was trying to make clear, that the reviewing officer will have nothing to do with such cases. A man who has been unsuccessful has a right to take his case before the appeal court.

Mr. DUFF: With all due deference to the minister, I cannot agree with him when he says there will be only two bodies under this bill. First, there will be the body known as the Canadian pension commission; second, there will be the reviewing officer and, third, there will be the appeal court. Under this legislation there will be three bodies to which the soldier can appeal. He will appeal first to the pension commissioners and if he is not satisfied with their decision, he can appeal to this reviewing officer.

Mr. MacLAREN: No.

Mr. DUFF: What is the reviewing officer for if he is not there to be appealed to? He certainly must review the evidence.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I explain? There will not be three bodies. There will be only two adjudicating bodies, one the pension commission and the other the appeal court. At the present time where a pension has been granted, the case is considered as to whether or not an appeal should be taken. It is the same in principle to-day as I trust it will be under this bill. But that body is the pension board and objections were taken to the procedure under which this board would first express their views as to the granting of a pension and then decide whether or not there should be an appeal. That procedure was not considered to be logical. This reviewing officer will perform the same function now being performed by the pension board but he will be independent of the board. He will not have expressed an opinion and will be under the governor in council so far as jurisdiction is concerned. He simply determines whether or not it is reasonable to appeal and will be responsible for the cutting down of unnecessary appeals.

Mr. DUFF: The reviewing officer will be entirely separate from the commission or the appeal court?

Mr. MacLAREN: Quite so.

Mr. DUFF: After reviewing the evidence he will either decide in favour of or rule against the soldier. For the sake of argument I will assume that the minister is right when he says there are only two bodies, the new pension commission and the appeal court. If the minister is going to appoint eight commissioners instead of the present three, then in my opinion there will be no necessity for an appeal court. The reviewing officer can review the evidence and pass his finding back to the pension commissioners. I have no hesitation in saying that since it has been operating, the appeal court has been responsible for an unnecessary expenditure of at least $10,000,000.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The reviewing officer.

Mr. DUFF: I am talking about the appeal court to which the soldier appealed against the decision of the pension commissioners.

I cannot remember whether this court was set up by the late government or the present government, but from information I have received I know it has been responsible for a waste of at least $10,000,000. I could give a dozen instances, but I will give only one at the present time. A jeweller in a certain city was asked by the government of the day to raise a regiment in which he was given the rank of colonel. He had in his employ a clerk who did certain clerical work in connection with the raising of the regiment. This clerk never put on a uniform or went overseas, he simply carried out the orders of the colonel who was boss of the jewellery store. But a few years after the war, the appeal court having been formed, the pension board received an application from this man, it was turned down and it was appealed to the appeal board. The appeal board awarded this man, who was never in khaki, who was never overseas, $7,000 back pension and gave him a pension during his lifetime. He had tuberculosis and later on died and at the present time his family are receiving about $100 a month from the pension board although he was never entitled to anything. Nevertheless the appeal board, against the decision of the pension commissioners who investigated the case and who knew that this man had no claim, gave him about $7,000 back pension and put him on the pension list, with the result that until he died he received a large pension and now his family are receiving a very large amount of money from this country. The minister cannot deny that the incident to which I have referred did happen and that this country has been mulcted to the extent of a large sum of money and is still paying out large sums to the family of this man who was a jeweller's assistant in a jewellery store, who never saw the war, never put on khaki, never served as a soldier. I can give a dozen similar instances.

Mr. LAVERGNE: As a matter of fact this is an extraordinary case, because at the present time the tribunals are giving about 40 per cent of their decisions in favour of the returned men, while about 80 per cent of the cases have been appealed by the reviewing officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no reviewing officer. The chief commission counsel.

Mr. LAVERGNE: What is in a name?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The procedure is entirely different.

Mr. LAVERGNE: In many cases which are appealed, instead of the men having the doubt in their favour, their claims are thrown out.

Under this new machinery we have really four bodies instead of three. The returned man puts in his claim to the board of pension commissioners. If it is approved, well and good; if not, the pension commission refers the matter to two of its members to hear the evidence and give a decision. If the decision is in favour of the returned man, it goes before a reviewing officer and he will then send it to appeal just the same as was done before by the commission counsel; it will be the same procedure. So far the delay has been caused by too many appeals being brought by the pension counsel before the appeal board. After the tribunal, which had heard the witnesses, heard and seen the men and knew the cases, had given its decision, at least 75 per cent of those decisions were appealed and only about 40 per cent of the appeals were decided in favour of the men. I never was a very strong partisan of the war, but I think we are not playing the game with the returned man. Instead of his being given the benefit of the doubt, every time the decision has been against him, that of the first court being reversed by the appeal court, and the man who went to the front and lost his health or came back wounded, has seen his claim rejected by the appeal court. In my opinion we should take the position that men who have been at the front should at least get the benefit of the doubt. I am afraid we are putting this reviewing officer into the same position as that of the pension commission counsel; we shall have the same result and the law will not work any better than did the previous act.

Mr. MARCIL: I think the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) should explain what this pension law means. The references that have been made to this body, that body and the other body reminds me of the old song:

> Gin a body meet a body
> Coming through the rye;
> Gin a body kiss a body,
> Need a body cry?

I have the case of a poor widow in St. Godfroy in the county of Bonaventure which I have brought to the attention of the board of pension commissioners about eight or ten years. Although her son was killed in action at the front, I have never been able to get a dollar for her, a poor woman who has been living on charity from the parish of St. Godfroy and from the parish priest. Every six months or year I get an encouraging letter that her case will be looked into. Then Mr. Chasse writes me stating that her case does not come within the purview of the conditions under which a pension can be granted. This case has been kicked around amongst Tom, Dick and Harry for the past ten years. She cannot get anything and I cannot get anything for her. There was a travelling board appointed in Matapedia last fall. This woman lives forty or fifty miles away; she did not meet the body; she was not given a hearing; she was not called at all. I cannot give her name at the moment. Her son, a young man of eighteen years, was, as I say, killed in action. If he had been living to-day, he would be looking after his mother.

I want to bring forward another case. There is in my county a man whom I will not mention who receives a total disability pension and who has a large number of children. I think he receives so much for his wife, so much for himself and so much for each child. The story was that, while he was not totally disabled he received about $180 a month, because he was the organizer of my opponent in the election of 1925 and took a very active part in the county at that time. Questions are put to me by my electors: On what basis or principle of justice are such pensions awarded? I am unable to answer them. We are paying $55,000,000 out of the treasury in pensions, but if there is anyone in the house who can explain why a pension is given or refused, it is more than I have been able to do. Of course we know what happened in the United States. After the recent revulsion of public feeling there, they made a clean sweep of many of those pensions, I think $500,000,000 at one sweep.

A soldier who has gone to the front and who has been disabled or who, by reason of his service to his country, has lost health, should be compensated, but there should be some basis of justice in the way in which his claim is treated. The system is so complicated it is impossible for a poor man to understand the difference between a pension board, an appeal board, a reviewing officer and this, that and the other thing; we are entirely at sea in the matter. I wish to call the attention of the minister to this particular case of the poor woman at St. Godfroy whose son was killed in action, and I ask him in all decency to do something for her.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the matter can be made simple if it is dealt with by the means at our command. Any man who wishes to be advised and assisted goes to the nearest pensions advocate of his area. The government pays that official his salary and it is his duty to do all he can to assist the men, as I believe he does. All that is necessary in any of the cases to which my hon. friend has referred, is to tell them to see the pensions advocate in their district.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the case of the mother of this soldier who was killed in action?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am referring to all those who think they are entitled to pension.

Mr. MARCIL: The official is in Quebec, about 400 or 500 miles away.

Mr. MacLAREN: If necessary, I shall send him to the woman's house.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the minister tell me who acts in Bonaventure county?

Mr. MacLAREN: Just let me finish; I think I can save the hon. member a number of questions.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish the minister would.

Mr. MacLAREN: First of all as to the procedure. A man does not understand these matters until they are explained to him and the course is to appeal to the nearest pensions advocate.

Mr. MARCIL: Supposing he is in Quebec, 400 or 500 miles away?

Mr. MacLAREN: He will be instructed. The case to which my hon. friend from Bonaventure has referred and similar cases are pitiable and distressing but one cannot do anything until one knows the whole of the facts. It must be connected with war service. Is that the case? These cases require full investigation by those trained in the work. I know nothing about the particular case in question and I could not offer any opinion until all the facts are placed before me. If my hon. friend will be good enough to have the name and address I promise to let him know the grounds on which it was refused and the reasons connected with it. Simply to relate the case here does not effect much beyond drawing my attention to it, but if my hon. friend will give me the name and address I promise to give a prompt reply.

Mr. MARCIL: From what I understood from the correspondence with this woman the boy enlisted at the age of eighteen and he was not then contributing to the assistance of his mother, perhaps because he was not old enough to work. He was killed at the front and now a pension is denied the poor mother because he did not support her when she did not need his support. If she has not a case in equity, I do not know who has. I know the minister's kind heart and that is the reason I am bringing the case to his attention.

Mr. MacLAREN: Please give me the facts.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There seems to be a lot of misapprehension about this reviewing officer. At the start I was not in favour of it because nowhere in the judicial system of Canada was there such an officer of the crown as a reviewing officer under this act. When the quorum goes about the country and hears applications for pension, if the decision of the quorum is unfavourable to the applicant, the board there and then decides against the applicant, and the applicant at once knows that he may appeal. If the decision is to be in favour of the applicant no decision is given in the field, but those who heard the application, either a quorum of two or, what sounds rather peculiar, a quorum of one, or whoever hears the application reports the case to Ottawa and the decision is placed before the reviewing officer without the applicant knowing what the result will be, although of course he infers from the decision not having been given in the field that it will be in his favour. The reviewing officer then takes the case as it comes before him and looks over the evidence and if he feels that the decision in favour of the applicant ought to be appealed by the crown he simply turns the case over to the appeal board and says in his opinion that there ought to be an appeal. An appeal may or may not be taken. The reviewing officer simply reviews the evidence, places the facts before the proper officers and says in his opinion that an appeal ought to be had. It might be construed, and this is where I disagree with the majority, that the reviewing officer was already deciding the appeal, but I can well see the difference. He does not decide the appeal; he is rather in the position of counsel. In an ordinary civil or criminal action when judgment is rendered, the dissatisfied party secures the advice of counsel on the chances of success in appeal. Counsel may say: In my opinion you would be well advised to appeal. That does not mean that the client should or should not appeal. It simply means that in the opinion of counsel, or as in this case in the opinion of the reviewing officer, an appeal ought to be taken. It does not by any means follow that if an appeal is taken it will be successful.

Mr. LAVERGNE: But this is an appeal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Just as a counsel learned in the law who is called in to give advice advises an appeal. But that does not mean that the appeal is well taken or that it will be successful.

Mr. LAVERGNE: In this case the reviewing officer decides that there will be an appeal, and then the man has to go and have his case appealed before the court. In the ordinary courts the lawyer advises an appeal, but here the reviewing officer decides that there should be an appeal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reviewing officer says in his opinion the evidence is such as would warrant the taking of an appeal. I can well see now that I have gone through the reports how this operates. Under the old system the crown, being limited as to the time in which they could take an appeal, appealed cases holus-bolus, if I may use the word, appealed en masse, without knowing whether the case was good or bad. They simply appealed every decision in favour of the applicant, and as a result of these appeals being taken promiscuously, purely to save time, without looking into the merits of the case at all, the court became congested. In the meantime the applicant who had received a favourable decision in the field kept on hoping for months and months that he would get his pension after a decision had been given in his favour.

I said at the outset that I did not favour this reviewing officer because nowhere in the judicial system of Canada is there such an officer. I thought we could devise a system that would simplify matters, but again I say, in order to prevent the clogging up of the higher tribunals with appeals taken by the crown without due consideration of the evidence, it was necessary that some kind of a check should be imposed. It would have been much better if the crown counsel who had heard the case in the first instance there and then decided there would or would not be an appeal. But I am not responsible for that situation. As it is now, no appeal is to be taken by the crown unless the reviewing officer expresses the opinion that an appeal should be taken. The returned man has always the right to appeal the moment that an adverse decision is given. When the reviewing officer gives his decision that the crown ought to appeal, the applicant is advised, and then he has time to have his case prepared by the veterans' bureau and all the other machinery placed at his disposal under the act. I do not like this fifth wheel to a cart. But under the conditions I think it is the only system that could have been devised in order to prevent the clogging up of the courts and at the same time do justice to the applicant and deal with the case with the shortest delay possible.

Mr. LAVERGNE: But we come to the very same result as before. This reviewing officer will appeal all the decisions in favour of the men.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not prepared to accept that. If he does, he is not worthy of his position.

Mr. LAVERGNE: That was the experience of the past. The chief commission counsel appealed in almost every case that was decided in favour of the men. I do not think the exceptions numbered five per cent. After a decision had been given in favour of the man, then on the ipse dixit of the commission counsel the case was appealed, and it would be months before it would be decided. I think that under the system proposed here we shall have the very same result. I suppose it is an improvement, but to my mind it is not an ideal system, and while we are at it we may as well do the whole thing.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will my hon. friend suggest a way out?

Mr. LAVERGNE: I do not know if my suggestion will be any better than that of the committee. But a man makes a claim; the commission delegates its work to two members to hear the case. They give a decision in his favour—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It may be turned down.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Yes, if so that is the end. But suppose they grant a pension, then that record, without the man knowing, goes back to the pension board and the reviewing officer takes it; he looks at the record, he has not heard the case, he has not seen the claimant, but he decides by looking over the file that this case should be appealed, and it is sent to the appeal court. It is practically the same procedure as that which takes place with the chief commission counsel. We will be falling into the same rut. I understand the pension board cannot say: we will appeal this case or we will not appeal. They should be entitled to a counsel who would advise them—give them an opinion about the case. Either the registrar of the court or the advocate who has fought the case for the crown before the quorum of the commission should report to the commission: This case in my opinion is not proven, the quorum has erred in its decision. Then the commission should take the advice of counsel, or of the lawyer who represented the commission in the quorum. But why should there be a man there with sort of juristic powers who will be allowed to say: I advise the commission to appeal, in spite of the case having been won by the man, without the opinion of the lawyer who represented the commission before the court? To my mind we shall be back in the same rut from which we are trying to escape. Why not take the opinion of the man who conducted the case before the quorum? Then the commission might have a sort of advisory counsel to check the opinion of that lawyer. This is going to defeat the purpose of the committee, and the men will be in the same position. After all the promises made by both parties in this house since the war broke out, in my opinion, we are not playing the game with the returned men. I have this satisfaction that I was not one of those who made these promises, but they certainly got many promises that are not being fulfilled to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One word only. There was a very well-organized committee and they investigated last year the entire question of pension administration. That committee did represent the organized veterans of Canada, and the various tribunals functioning in regard to the administration of pensions. The unanimous effect of the three subreports was all in favour of establishing two courts, a court of first instance and a court of final instance. The bill as submitted had some very objectionable features, especially in regard to the reviewing officer who was to be under the jurisdiction of the president of the appeal court. The committee changed that and he is now an independent officer. The pension counsel who are to make the appeal in case they think it necessary are also appointed by the Civil Service Commission under the Civil Service Act. So the control that the old board of pension commissioners had over the commission counsel is gone. These amendments, arrived at by the committee after careful consideration, were endorsed by those who represented, after years of experience, the considered viewpoint of the organized ex-servicemen of the Dominion of Canada. So although I agree largely with the fears and proper apprehensions of my hon. friend, I suggest that this is the very best thing that we can do. We all agreed on it, we took the advice of the ex-servicemen, of the department officials and this is the best we could arrive at. I suggest that we give it a trial.

Mr. LAVERGNE: So much the better.

Mr. ROSS: Although it does not properly belong to the discussion of this bill, I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the case reported by the hon. member for Bonaventure. There the difficulty is again demonstrated which I pleaded against this morning, that these notices are sent out just with the titles, chief pension advocate, chief commission counsel, and the poor unfortunate applicant living hundreds of miles away has no idea where to write or to apply. I appeal to the minister and the incoming board to simplify this, give more details and get rid of this difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The case mentioned by my hon. friend from Bonaventure was a case of dependents, and entirely different from the ordinary case. Such a case must not be confused with the ordinary application for pension.

Mr. ROSS: But the fact remains that this poor woman does not know the next step. I am not talking about whether it is a dependent or a first application.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I may say again what I have said from 1930, that while I agree with this appointment of the reviewing officer as being the best method by which appeals by the crown can be dealt with, personally I have always felt and always stated that I think finality in such cases should lie with the court best qualified to hear the case, that court being the body which meets the man in the field, goes into the circumstances thoroughly, and knows the applicant. If I had my own way I would have no crown appeal, I would have the case settled by the court that sees the man, but as long as we have an appeal I think the best way is as we have it now.

Mr. COOTE: I insist on taking this only opportunity I have of protesting against there being any reviewing officer at all to appeal against a decision given by the judges who have actually seen the applicant and heard his story. I have met with many instances of what seemed to me injustice, where a case which seemed to me just and humane and in keeping with the act, particularly that clause under which the man is to be given the benefit of the doubt, has been appealed from the decision of the tribunal. In cases that have come to my own notice where appeal is taken from the decision of the tribunal, I have not seen one in which the man was given the benefit of the doubt by the appeal board. If I had my own way I would do away with the reviewing officer altogether.

On section 18—Repeal.

Mr. MacLAREN: The committee will remember that some days ago the Minister of Finance referred to an agreement which had been reached with the associated veterans to the effect that no further additions should be made to the list of pensioners by way of marriages and births after May 1. As a result I am asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce to move that the bill be amended, and I may say to hon. gentlemen that this amendment has been submitted by the Minister of Finance to representatives of the associated veterans, and they have expressed their satisfaction with it. The amendment is as follows:

That the bill be amended by inserting the following section therein immediately after section 18:

"18A. Notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other act, no pension, or additional pension, awardable or payable under the provisions of this act, shall be awarded or paid:

(1) under schedule A or schedule B or section 33 of this act, to or in respect of,

(a) any child of a member of the forces or pensioner, if such child shall have been born on or after the first day of May, 1933;

(b) the daughter, or other person, who, on the death of the wife of a pensioner or on the death of a widow of a member of the forces who has been in receipt of a pension, shall have assumed the household duties, and care of the minor child or children of the pensioner or the widow, as the case may be, on or after the date aforementioned.

(2) Under schedule A of this act, to or in respect of the wife of a member of the forces or pensioner, if she shall have been married to him on or after the date aforementioned."

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps I might confirm the statement made by the minister to the effect that this is the amendment which was submitted to and accepted by the representatives of the associated veterans whom I saw, headed by the president of the legion, Major Roper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no particular objection to this amendment, because of what the minister stated, but I do think this very important amendment might have been submitted to the committee which devoted several laborious days to the consideration of the other clauses. I am scarcely in a position to comprehend at once the significance of the amendment.

Mr. RHODES: It was purely a question of procedure; this had not been referred to the committee and it would have required a fresh reference from this house. Otherwise that would have been done.

On the title.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I inform the committee that in addition to the formal report made by the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Parry Sound, several other recommendations were made which it was not thought advisable to embody in the formal report to the house. I think three or four recommendations were agreed upon in connection with specific cases brought to the attention of the committee. I believe they have been directed to the department, and I hope the minister will pay particular attention to them.

Mr. MacLAREN: They are being sent to the Prime Minister, and I know they will reach me ultimately.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to know what was done with one particular recommendation, which does not appear in the bill because it did not have application, but which was brought before the committee by the heads of one of the veterans' organizations. It was to the effect that section 73, which is commonly termed the benefit of the doubt clause, should be amended by the addition of certain words.

Mr. ARTHURS: At the request of the various parties presenting these claims—which, of course, I said we could not bring to the house—these recommendations were carefully copied out and forwarded as informal recommendations of the committee to the Prime Minister. They included the particular recommendation to which the hon. gentleman has just referred.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): With the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that we revert to the order of presenting reports of standing and select committees.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent of the house we will revert to the order of presenting reports of standing and select committees.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Fifth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization—Mr. Senn.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale) presented the sixth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

He moved:

That the private bills reported upon to-day in the sixth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, viz:

Bill No. 101 (Letter DI of the Senate), an act for the relief of Angelo Stavrow;

Bill No. 102, an act respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company; be placed upon the order paper of the house for consideration this day in committee of the whole house and for third reading.

Motion agreed to.

GENTER THICKENER COMPANY

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale) moved:

That the recommendation contained in the sixth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, respecting refund of charges on Bill No. 102, an act respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company, be concurred in.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I must take exception to this motion which, I understand, calls for concurrence in the report of the committee in connection with Bill No. 102. This will have the effect of refunding to the parties interested in the bill the fee of $400 which they are called upon to pay under the rules. I may be mistaken, but the practice, I understand, has been to make the refund in the case of private bills where the applicant is an individual, but not in the case of an incorporated company to whom we give the powers they seek in the bill before the house. I would ask that the motion stand at least until such time as we have ascertained whether or not it is in conformity with the practice that has heretofore obtained.

Mr. SPENCE: This was the recommendation of the private bills committee, and as the session is drawing to a close the company would like to have the matter dealt with to-night. I cannot see any difference, so far as this motion is concerned, between a private individual and a corporation. Sometimes the corporation is worse off. I am not making any particular fight, but I think the request should be granted.
