Mr. RHODES: I am not so much concerned about the return of the $400, although that is not to be lightly overlooked, but I should not care to have a motion of this kind passed hastily, thereby establishing a precedent by widening the practice of returning fees which, under the rules, ought to be paid.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion stands.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): May I for a moment speak to a question of privilege. With regard to the presentation of the report of the committee on agriculture, I notice that it was not read in the house, and I wondered whether it might be printed in Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: It will appear fully in votes and proceedings.

Mr. COOTE: When a report of a committee is read does it not appear in Hansard?

Mr. STEVENS: Not always.

Mr. COOTE: I think there are many who would be interested in it.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I ask leave to lay on the table of the house a certain trade agreement between Canada and France which was signed this day, and to lay on the table also a certain convention between Canada and France concerning the rights of nationals, and commercial and shipping matters, which was signed this day.

TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and France.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I suggest to the Secretary of State that he give to the house as full a statement as he can of what is embraced in the agreement so that we may have it before us in its essential features?

Mr. CAHAN: I should be very glad to do that, but I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that I be allowed to introduce the bill now so that in its printed form it may be distributed to-night. When it comes up again on Monday morning all hon. members will have copies of it before them and that will very much facilitate my explanation.

Mr. STEVENS: With the schedules.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish in any way to prevent my hon. friend from introducing the measure at once. With his customary courtesy he has given me a copy in advance, and, judging from the size of it, I think it would help us if, at the outset, he gave us an explanation, indicating the essential features. It is a considerable document as it stands.

Mr. CAHAN: It would be more convenient for me to deal with the schedules as printed and distributed, because the explanation will be rather lengthy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CONVENTION CONCERNING RIGHTS OF NATIONALS AND COMMERCIAL AND SHIPPING MATTERS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 108 respecting a certain convention between Canada and France concerning the rights of nationals, and commercial and shipping matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that my hon. friend has considered the question whether this measure should have been preceded by a resolution.

Mr. CAHAN: Inasmuch as there is no increase in customs duty and there is no provision respecting which any expenditure of public money is involved, we were advised by the law officers that a previous resolution was not necessary.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SENATE BILLS—FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 104, respecting the Canadian and British Insurance Companies.—Mr. Rhodes.

Bill No. 105, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.—Mr. Bennett.

Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.—Mr. Duranleau.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bills be read the second time?

Mr. RHODES: Later this day.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Post Office—outside service—salaries and allowances, $15,381,845.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $14,161,500.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowance to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, and payment of $205 to S. R. Kirk, $1,076,030.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I shall keep the committee only a few moments while I direct attention to a case of the appointment of a postmaster, which has been placed in my hands by the national organization of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. This concerns the appointment of Mr. A. C. Belle Isle as postmaster at Campbellton, New Brunswick. I would like to give a few details in connection with this appointment. I am informed that the vacancy occurred in January, 1932, and that several returned soldiers applied for the position, among them being Messrs. Wetmore, Jardine, Duncan, Leblanc and Boucher. The appointment was actually made in January, 1932, when it was given to the present incumbent, Mr. Belle Isle. I understand that before the appointment was actually made the position was advertised as a bilingual position, and Mr. Belle Isle was appointed as temporary postmaster, I believe in August, 1932. About six weeks later in September, 1932, a second notice was posted. The second notice was in the usual form with the exception that it contained the following:

Applicants must have a sufficient knowledge of both French and English to satisfactorily discharge the duties of the office.

According to the evidence of one of the civil service examiners which appears on the file, this recommendation, which I am not criticizing, was made by the Post Office Department. This matter is referred to in a letter of January 30, 1933, addressed to the Postmaster General, reading in part as follows:

It appears that, at the examination conducted by the Civil Service Commission, the outstanding candidate for this office was Mr. J. S. Wetmore, a returned soldier. There were also other returned soldiers declared qualified. It appears, however, that the English speaking candidates were eliminated because it was declared that they had not a sufficient knowledge of the French language.

There are two grounds for complaint in connection with this competition. The first is the manner in which the bilingual qualification was advertised. We are informed that this qualification was eliminated but was later inserted in the advertisement in a very misleading form. Whatever the influences may be which caused the last advertisement to be posted in the manner it appeared, the impression was created in the minds of a large number of people and certainly in the minds of the English speaking returned soldier applicants that bilingualism would not be a deciding factor.

The second ground for complaint has reference to the standing of the appointee—Mr. Belle Isle. Whatever his personal qualifications are, our information indicates that his business qualifications and relationships are most unsatisfactory and should be investigated. Something in regard to his past history and standing was reported by the Civil Service Commission examiner but, for some reason, neither the Civil Service Commission nor your department conducted any further investigation, notwithstanding the examiner's recommendation that this should be done. That this candidate, whose business reputation is well known locally, should have been accepted without further investigation while qualified returned soldier applicants of unquestioned character and standing were eliminated is surprising and is the cause of great indignation.

The last paragraph reads:

In view of all the circumstances, the Canadian Legion requests that you permit this appointment to be made without reference to the bilingual qualification, as was apparently originally intended. This may entail the elimination of Mr. Belle Isle but our Campbellton branch believes this to be justified in view of his poor business standing in the community.

According to a return which was made in this house earlier in the session, the Civil Service Commission examiner recommended a further investigation into Belle Isle's character. Inquiries were made of several citizens in the community who were familiar with the appointee, including Mr. F. C. Mortimer of Saint John and Mr. H. A. Carr of Campbellton. Included in this return is a financial statement furnished by the appointee in June, 1930, for the purpose of securing credit from the Dominion Rubber Company, Limited. This purports to be an accurate and true statement of the appointee's financial position and shows a net surplus of $21,614. The appointee was examined under oath in October, 1931, under the provisions of the Debtors Act, and according to the evidence it is shown that the surplus which was alleged to have existed in 1930 never existed at all. The evidence which was taken under oath showed the appointee to be insolvent. There is also on the file an affidavit by Dr. L. Erle German to the effect that the applicant is not physically reliable for his present duty because of his addiction to certain habits which render him entirely incompetent. The Civil Service Commission examiner made a further investigation into Belle Isle's character on December 15, 1932. On January 30, 1933, the Canadian Legion wrote to the Postmaster General protesting against this appointment. This letter also appears on the file. On February 10, 1933, the Postmaster General was interviewed by a delegation which was introduced by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). This delegation consisted of Mr. J. C. Herwig and E. B. MacLatchy of the Canadian Legion. On February 10, 1933, a further letter was written by the legion pointing out its position in regard to this appointee. On February 21, 1933, the executive of the Campbellton branch of the legion wrote to the Postmaster General to ask that further inquiries be made with regard to the fitness of this applicant. Under date of March 6, 1933, a letter was addressed to the Postmaster General asking for an interview, which took place on March 7. A petition addressed to the Postmaster General and to the Prime Minister was circulated through the community. This petition reads:

To the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, P.C., K.C., M.P., Prime Minister of Canada, and
The Hon. Arthur Sauvé, M.P.,
Postmaster General.

We, the undersigned, hereby strongly protest against the appointment of Mr. A. C. Belle Isle as postmaster at Campbellton, New Brunswick, and do respectfully but emphatically request that a returned soldier be appointed to this position.

The petition was signed in the course of a few days by 1,286 adults including the present mayor, four former mayors, four town councillors, the police magistrate, four lawyers, eight doctors, twenty-six merchants, twenty superintendents and firm managers, sixty semi-professional men, accountants, and so forth, and one hundred and one of the community outside the actual city of Campbellton.

The Prime Minister was interviewed with regard to the whole situation on March 31, 1933, and I understand he wrote a letter on that date to the Postmaster General asking him to look into the entire situation surrounding this appointment. I wish to make it very clear in bringing this matter to the attention of the minister, that if in his opinion bilingual qualifications were necessary for that appointment, I am not criticizing that in the slightest degree, but the information that has been sent through the legion is to the contrary effect, namely, that bilingual qualifications were not required for the appointment in question. It would seem that the soldier preference was entirely ignored on this occasion. The present incumbent beyond question, if the sworn testimony on the file brought down in the house previously this session is worth while, has not the qualifications to render him a fit and competent person for this office. I am suggesting to the Postmaster General that he take into consideration the undoubted public opinion in that community with regard to this appointment and that he have this position vacated on account of the evidence existing against the present incumbent, have it readvertised and, if he is of the opinion that bilingual qualifications are absolutely necessary for it; then of course I cannot quarrel with that, but I have done my duty in bringing before my hon. friend and the committee a case submitted to me by the headquarters of the Canadian Legion.

Mr. SAUVE: My hon. friend will admit that this was a case involving the Civil Service Commission and Mr. Belle Isle was appointed by the commission after an examination—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt my hon. friend? There is in the file in regard to that a letter from the Civil Service Commission examiner stating that when the temporary appointment was vacated in September, 1932, and when the actual notice in connection with the bilingual qualification, which I read, was inserted, that was done by some of the officials of the Post Office Department.

Mr. SAUVE: The position was advertised as bilingual because it was assumed the population in Campbellton was about fifty-fifty French Canadians and English and it was requested that the appointee be bilingual, because the former postmaster was bilingual. Mr. Belle Isle, like other candidates, was examined; he was rated by both inspectors, one of my department and the other of the Civil Service Commission and he was rated first. I have on file many testimonials from high personages of Campbellton, for instance, Monseigneur Melançon and other French and English Canadians, stating that Mr. Belle Isle was very well qualified to be appointed as postmaster. Following that, the Civil Service Commission appointed him. After hearing the remarks of my hon. friend, I assure him that I am disposed to consider the case very fairly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to hear that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) wishes to be fair towards those who have cause to complain. That is why I shall inquire from him whether he is also equitably disposed towards the bilingual municipalities of the other provinces.

In the parish of Pré-Sainte-Marie, in Saskatchewan, it appears that a person named Snider was appointed postmaster on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir); the parish is almost entirely French Canadian. I request the hon. Postmaster General to be fair towards these people.

Will the hon. Postmaster General allow me to read a copy of a letter sent to him on February 22, 1933:

Dear Sir,—

Since November last, we have been in correspondence with the Postmaster General in connection with the transfer of our post office. Would you be kind enough to bring to bear your influence for justice's sake, on our behalf, and request the department to see that we get fair play.

This letter is in no way tainted by party prejudice; it is written solely in a spirit of fairness and without bias of any sort.

We, Canadian pioneers of Pré-Sainte-Marie, who settled this parish in 1912, a parish 100 per cent French, until 1920, having our own Church, where the Fathers of Sainte-Marie officiate, also a French Canadian school and, moreover, having had a French Canadian postmistress from 1912 to 1932, were given the mule's kick last autumn.

I trust it is not the Postmaster General's kick.

Our postmistress, having resigned, was replaced by a person speaking only one language and a complete stranger to our parish and what is still more grievous, one whose family resides in Pré-Sainte-Marie since only 4 years, and is of Dutch descent, the father being one of the leading socialists. Such are the premises where was located the post office, in charge of Mr. Garnet Snider, junior.

Now, we, French Canadians of Pré-Sainte-Marie, have no more post office, since the latter is located in the district of Forest V—and cannot request our mail or postal money orders in French, because Mr. Snider does not understand a word of French. As we have settled close to our Church, our post office is 3½ miles distant from our centre. Is it not shameful for a department or government which contends that it is anti-socialist, and when we French Canadians are the only ones to combat such false doctrine, that department forces us to call on these people each time we wish to post a letter.

This appointment was made on the recommendation of Doctor MacKay, of Tisdale—we have the written proof—and approved by a kind of committee whose members are mostly K.K.K., that is, anti-French and, especially, anti-Catholic. You can readily understand that a French Canadian had no chance of being appointed postmaster at Pré-Sainte-Marie.

These same gentlemen boasted in 1928 and 1929, that with the help of Mr. Anderson, Buckle and K.K.K. & company not a French Canadian would be left at Pré-Sainte-Marie. Allow me to state, sir, that they succeeded fairly well; in 1932, notwithstanding our protests they despoiled us of part of our school district. Now, they rob us of our post office —they rejoice over their triumph—for, as they state, it is from Ottawa that justice has come and from a French Canadian minister.

We can hardly realize that such a painful humiliation has been inflicted on our people, we French Canadians from Saskatchewan. If this humiliation had come from an English speaking minister or one of those night-caps of Long Lake, we would have felt wounded, but from a French Canadian minister it is doubly painful.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Brasset) allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am fully aware of the Pré-Ste-Marie case to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): May I request the hon. Postmaster General to allow me to complete the reading of this letter.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member will note that my intentions are of the very best. By my explanation, if he will only accept it, he will discover that I am not against those he wishes to defend. We are looking into this matter, and I think the occasion is not well chosen, under the circumstances—the hon. member knows my feelings —to read this correspondence to the house for insertion in Hansard; that is, if he wishes to help in settling this difficult case, in a spirit of fairness.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): At the request of the hon. Postmaster General, I shall dispense reading this letter.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Thank you.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Pass it over to me, if you please; I shall read it.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): However, under the circumstances, I would request the hon. Postmaster General to look into this case of flagrant injustice. Whether it is in Saskatchewan or any other part of Canada, the French Canadians, when in majority and especially in parishes almost entirely French Canadian, are entitled to have one of their own race as postmaster, especially, when a French Canadian has occupied that post for a long time. I would, therefore, request the hon. Postmaster General to exert his authority, as head of the Post Office Department, so that justice be done to the people of Pré-Ste-Marie.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is what I am endeavouring to do; we must avoid making matters worse.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat familiar with the Pré-Ste-Marie affair to which the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Brasset) referred, and I wish to add a few words previous to taking up some other matter. The hon. Postmaster General has known of this Pré-Ste-Marie case for a long time past, and yet it has not been settled. The post office was taken away from that locality and placed 3 or 4 miles further. The municipality of Pré-Ste-Marie is at least 80 per cent French Canadian.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, 49 per cent. The post office is situated at 2 miles from the Catholic church and school. That is far enough.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Their church, school and municipal institutions were all grouped in French Canadian style. The post office was located close to the church and school before it was transferred to the home of the gentleman mentioned by the hon. member for Gaspé. The post office was taken away from this municipality and located three or four miles away. These facts were known to the hon. Postmaster General months and months ago and yet the question was never settled.

We made representations to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who represents the constituency in which is situated the parish of Pré-Ste-Marie. I received an answer from the hon. Minister of Agriculture —unfortunately I have not got it with me— however, this is what he stated: I do not meddle in your affairs, please do not meddle in mine.

I do not doubt the good intentions of the hon. Postmaster General, however, I would request him to see that this case is settled, as soon as possible, in a fair-minded way— so as to prove satisfactory to the people of Pré-Ste-Marie.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the letter read by the hon. member for Gaspé, is dated February, 22, 1933 and continues as follows:

The last paragraph he read is the following:

We can hardly believe this shameful humiliation inflicted on our people. we French Canadians from Saskatchewan. If this humiliation had come from an English speaking minister or one of the night-caps of Long Lake, we would have felt wounded, but from a French Canadian minister, it is doubly painful. I do not know what intervened, however, they realize the injustice done, they are aware that we are protesting, they are now uneasy; they wish to bring into Pré-Sainte-Marie one of their conspirators, a returned soldier, and they state that "no Frenchman ever will have the post office" because, owing to the ignorance of these fanatics, they do not want any more French Canadians as postmasters.

We, French Canadians, cannot understand why our post office was transferred to Mr. Garnet Snider, our new postmaster. He is not a Conservative, having never voted, or is he a returned soldier, moreover, does not speak a word of French; yet, his appointment was approved—as they say—by a French Canadian minister. Furthermore, to crown matters, an anti-socialist government places our post office in the home of one of the leaders of this shameful movement.

However, sir, after taking cognizance of all the correspondence forwarded in connection with the Pré-Sainte-Marie post office and which must be on file in the Post Office Department, you will find that some French Canadians had sought the position of postmaster at Pré-Sainté-Marie. You will also note that the Post Office Department inspectors visited Pré-Sainté-Marie on November 7 and 8; but—a mystery —not a French Canadian knew what the inspector was doing there. The same automobile bearing the letters O.H.M.S. returned shortly after but—another mystery— . . . "How did you know I was here," said the inspector. Not a French Canadian came in touch with this important personage. Do not be shocked, sir, if, in the near future, the honoured name of Pré-Sainte-Marie disappears and is replaced by Forest V. . . . Then their triumph will be complete and they may then laugh because such a victory will only be possible through the help of a French Canadian.

Now, sir, we wish to know whether among our Quebec clan, there are still some with red blood in their veins, who are men of the type of our forebears or whether they are what the English call "mechanical robots" with a rubber stamp.

If you belong to the first category, we request your help. Could you make it a point to see that the Post Office Department acts fairly towards us without offending the gentlemen above mentioned. But if, on the contrary, you are mechanical robots, we shall pray God that he may enlighten your souls and we shall look to the press which is free and independent from political affiliation to inform our brothers in the east of Canada of the insult received, perhaps, indirectly but nevertheless with the full knowledge of the Post Office Department.

We are forwarding a copy of this letter to all worthy men who we believe equal to the task confided to them by their constituents.

Trusting to receive an answer so as to convey it to every French Canadian in Pré-Sainte-Marie.

Pré-Sainte-Marie,
Saskatchewan.

This letter, sir, is dated February 22, 1933. I am the more pleased to inform the committee, because you, yourself, sir, forwarded a copy to the hon. Postmaster General.

What is the use, sir, of discussing, here, in the house, the rights of our compatriots, when the Postmaster General is concocting a deal with some one, since February last, and that this case has been dragging since October? Is it a fact that the Minister of Agriculture is a S. M.—Sealed Member—of the Ku-Klux-Klan, and when some one calls out "Sanbag" he pricks his ears. That simply means, strangers are near, be on the watch. Moreover, we have members of the Ku-Klux-Klan, in the house; there is one who has not been seen for a few days, we also have the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull)—

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): The discussion must refer to the item under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, that is what I am discussing. In this letter a complaint is lodged against the Ku Klux Klan which influenced the Postmaster General to appoint Snider.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member is fully aware that no personal attack against a colleague is permitted, whatever may be his feelings towards him.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If it is not wrong to be a member of the Ku Klux Klan, it is neither wrong to tell them that they belong to that organization and explain the under-currents which influence certain appointments made here, in Ottawa. The time has come to throw light on the subject. The Postmaster General comes along with a smile and says: "I am settling this matter, do not read the letter, say nothing about it, you will harm their cause." It is more than time that the people in Canada he enlightened on what goes on at Ottawa and the disgraceful way French Canadians are treated by a French Canadian minister, who is so unfair to his race. It is more than time that the country should be made aware of the injustice committed.

When one stops to think that the post office in charge of a French Canadian was close to the church, that it was removed to a place 3 miles away, that it was given to a young man, son of a socialist, who never had voted, does not speak a word of French and, that these people are obliged to go to the next parish to mail their correspondence, one cannot help being shocked to note that the Postmaster General took the advice of fanatics rather than look after French Canadian interests. That is what took place. Then, we have outbursts of patriotism on the part of the Postmaster General who makes the round of clubs in Quebec proclaiming equal rights for French Canadians, and stating that we show ourselves tolerant and a lot of such phrases. Let him act like a man, a man with a big heart, a real patriot! The minister has created more than 300 or 400 post offices. If he wished to give Snider a post office, he was perfectly free to do so; however, why did he not leave a French Canadian to serve French Canadians at the post office, close to the church, in Pré-Ste-Marie? Why did he not do so? Quite the contrary, he deprives French Canadians of their post office near the church in Pré-Ste-Marie, he transfers it 3½ miles away, he appoints a young man who has never voted, a fanatic, son of a socialist. And that is called respect for the rights of French Canadians by the Postmaster General!

I have nothing further to add on the subject. All I can express is my deep indignation, and I feel certain that all who read the returns which were just tabled in the house, and from which a letter was read this afternoon, will share my indignation and will not expect any act of justice from the Postmaster General.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): The day before yesterday, the hon. Postmaster General gave to the house figures tending to prove that under his administration, there had been much less dismissals than under others. To that effect, he stated that, from 1896 to 1911, there had been 1,788 dismissals and from 1922 to 1930, 1,148, while during the two years under his administration, there had only been 770 dismissals. According to his method of reckoning, the figures seem to show that, under the present regime, we have had less dismissals than under previous governments. The only way of calculating these figures would be to keep track of the years also. From 1896 to 1911, 15 years elapsed, and in the course of these 15 years, 118 postmasters were dismissed per year; from 1922 to 1930, 140 postmasters were dismissed per year, while during the two years that the hon. Postmaster General has had charge of the department, there were 380 dismissals per year. The figures are the same only shown under a different light. This proves that, under the present regime, we have had many more dismissals than under previous administrations.

A little further on, the hon. Postmaster General stated:

The dismissals are carried out on complaints made, not by myself, but by fellow citizens of the postmaster or by members, as it was practiced in the past; and when these complaints were found to be facts by a commissioner, after an inquiry, they are dismissed.

I have before me, sir, a return in connection with the station of the parish of Cap-St-Ignace. There is no need to go further back and quote all the correspondence which took place. At the request of Messrs. Dechène and Choquette, advocates, Mrs. Métivier, the postmistress, was granted the right or privilege —if it is one—to have an inquiry. The report of the inquiry which I do not want to entirely read, ends as follows:

I consider that she—Mrs. Métivier—does not come under the provisions of article 55 of the Civil Service Act, chapter 22—revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and, therefore, I find no ground for the complaint of political partisanship lodged against said Mrs. Amarilda Métivier, of Cap-St-Ignace station.

(Signed) Fanning Gosselin, Commissioner.

This does not seem to agree with the statement of the hon. Postmaster General, because the report of the inquiry states that Mrs. Métivier is not guilty of political partizanship.

Not only have we the findings of the commissioner who held the inquiry, but we have moreover a letter from the deputy minister which partly reads as follows—addressing himself to Mr. Choquette:

It is unnecessary to continue the inquiry as nothing has been proved against the postmistress, your client. I feel convinced that the hon. Mr. Sauvé will drop the case, as I mentioned when you last called at the department.

(Signed) L. J. Gaboury,
Deputy Minister.

There seems to be no ambiguity, the case of Mrs. Métivier seems definitely settled. On January 12 of that year, the Postmaster General writes to the member for Montmagny:

In reply I must inform you that the commissioner who held the inquiry found no ground for the complaint lodged against that postmistress, and, under the circumstances, the matter has been left in abeyance.

You will recall, no doubt, that I first had recommended the dismissal of this postmistress, pursuant to your statement to the effect that you had personal knowledge of her active political partisanship. However, previous to arrangements being made for the transfer of the post office, there was a request for an inquiry by Mr. Fernand Choquette, a request which I could hardly refuse and to which, moreover, you had no objection.

This letter is signed by the Postmaster General. After all this correspondence, a memo was prepared and addressed to the hon. Postmaster General, in which the Deputy Postmaster General inquires whether he will follow the suggestion of the member for Montmagny or else do what is right. On February 3, 1933, the hon. Postmaster General wrote to the member for Montmagny as follows:

The council has decided that the rules must be followed in this case as in others and that the findings of the commissioner holding the inquiry could not be set aside.

The hon. Mr. Meighen believes that this decision is in accordance with the rules established in 1923 and accepted by both parties.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) Arthur Sauvé,
Postmaster General.

There is also a letter from the hon. member for Montmagny to the hon. Postmaster General which is rather harsh in its tone. On February 15, 1933, the hon. Postmaster General stated himself that nothing was found against Mrs. Métivier at the inquiry held, following the complaints lodged by the hon. member for Montmagny. The latter had stated that to his personal knowledge Mrs. Métivier had taken an active part in politics. The member for Montmagny did not appear at the inquiry; he was not even a witness of what took place. I was never in court but I have been present at trials in the course of which persons were warned: to avoid hearsay evidence and only testify to what they themselves had heard or seen.

Something incredible happened. On February 15, 1933, the hon. Postmaster General, although he had stated that the privy council would not sanction the dismissal of Mrs. Métivier, that Mr. Meighen had given his views on the subject, notwithstanding all this, decided to dismiss Mrs. Métivier. Mrs. Métivier is entitled to our sympathy, and must earn a livelihood. I know that the hon. Postmaster General is usually gallant to ladies. In saying so I have no afterthought.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Not in matters connected with administration.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Not in matters connected with administration, do you say? Nevertheless, it is a young lady that he appointed as postmistress at L'Islet.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not recommend her.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): That reminds me that a returned soldier had applied for the position of postmaster at Cap-St-Ignace station. I do not know why the hon. Postmaster General did not appoint him. Had he shown some backbone—he was asked just now to prove that he had some in connection with the Pré-Ste-Marie case—if he was firm in his own province, why did he not grant the request of the hon. member for Montmagny, with whom he is so friendly. I have here a copy of a telegram recommending the returned soldier Roméo Bernier:

Re post office Cap-St-Ignace station would draw your attention to the request of returned soldier Romeo Bernier qualified—pursuant to act should be appointed immediately.

The hon. Postmaster General has no excuse for not appointing him.

On September 7, 1932, the hon. member for Montmagny wrote to the hon. Postmaster General the following letter:

I enclose the form duly signed, recommending Mr. Romeo Bernier, returned soldier, for the position of postmaster at Cap-St-Ignace.
However, if there is to be a temporary appointment, I wish to recommend Mr. Jules Caron, from the same locality.

That is Mr. Jules Caron not being conversant with the act, he is to be appointed temporarily, then it will be stated that the position comes under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, and Mr. Roméo Bernier will get the appointment. I state that, in this case, the hon. Postmaster General was justified in appointing Mr. Roméo Bernier, he was a returned soldier. May I inquire why the hon. Postmaster General did not heed the inquiry?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Mr. Chairmain, before the hon. Postmaster General replies, as my name has been mentioned, I should like to give my version of the affair. Does the hon. member for L'Islet know the facts? He was probably informed by Messrs. Dechêne and Choquette who often correspond with him in connection with Montmagny affairs. First, let us see how matters stood: Mrs. Métivier had replaced a widow, Mrs. Bergeron, who had 10 children and was dismissed without an inquiry, in 1926, by the then Postmaster General. I am not aware that the hon. member for L'Islet rose in the house, at that time, to protest. When the election took place, the postmistress for the time being slandered public men in general and in particular the member for Montmagny. I requested her dismissal. If the thing happened again, I would act likewise. She denied having used the words which were attributed to her and came to call on me. I told her: Madam if you deny having used these words, we shall hold an inquiry. If you did not use them, evidently, nothing will be found against you. The inquiry was held and it was proved by two witnesses and her own evidence that she had slandered public men and, in particular, the member for Montmagny. The commissioner who held the inquiry declared that her case did not come under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

That was not the aim of the inquiry; the aim was to find out whether she had said the words complained of. The evidence having clearly shown that they had been uttered, I requested her dismissal, with a view to ensuring that public men, be entitled to some consideration on the part of the public, and not be subject to slanderous attacks, especially, coming from those who are in the public service.

Those are the facts. That is all what took place. The hon. member for L'Islet states that the commissioner, Mr. Fanning Gosselin, found that Mrs. Métivier was not guilty. That is not the case. He found, on the contrary, that she made use of the words reproached to her, but that, according to him, the provisions of the Civil Service Act were not applicable to her. However, the facts remain. Mrs. Métivier paid no attention to the evidence brought against her and carried on her gossip, in the post office. I again insisted that she be dismissed, because it was only just that she should be.

I recommended Mr. Bernier. Moreover, the act obliged me to do so. He had the first right to be appointed providing he fulfilled the requirements of the Civil Service Act. Not being able to fulfil them, he was not appointed. It was Mr. Caron who was appointed. He is an excellent postmaster, everybody is satisfied. Moreover, he generously made up for the unfair way Mrs. Bergeron was treated in the past, by renting her house, this helps Mrs. Bergeron and her ten children to earn a livelihood.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that on September 19, 1930, the hon. member for Montmagny had recommended Mrs. Bergeron.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): The charges made by the hon. member were denied under oath. There is no need of reading them, he knows them.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): They were proved to be true by two witnesses and corroborated by Mrs. Métivier, herself.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): The charges were not as serious as all that. There is one here, the third. Mrs. Métivier is supposed to have stated, referring to the member for Montmagny: "He is no better than the others, he has given his support to every political party." One cannot contend that what this person said on the threshold of the post office was very insulting. She stated that the hon. member belonged to all parties. He himself boasts of it.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is not what I complain of. That was not her only statement.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I can read them:

1. I am acquainted with Mrs. Métivier, widow and postmistress of Cap-St-Ignace station;
2. She is known for her Liberal views and her opposition to the Conservative party;
3. Last spring and on two or three different occasions since then, in the presence of five or six persons, strangers to her family, Mrs. Métivier disapproved of the Conservative party's policy and even made personal attacks against Mr. Armand LaVergne, the present member for the county of Montmagny, stating: He is no better than others; he belonged to all political parties; he got elected so as to fill his pockets, as all others do, or other words of such nature.

And I have signed,

Onésiphore Frégeau.

On the other hand, according to the charges of Mr. Frégeau against the postmistress of Cap St. Ignace station, she is supposed to have made that statement in the presence of five or six persons. He evidently shows bad faith because these charges are entirely denied by Mrs. Noël Ouellet, Mr. William Bernier and Miss Aline Guimont. I have the documents here. These documents were not invented by me, they were furnished by the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. LAVERGNE: (Translation): These people made no denial, they simply said that they did not hear the statement.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Did the hon. member for Montmagny hear the statement made by Mrs. Métivier.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): No, I did not hear it, however, I was given sufficient proof to request her dismissal. I requested it, and under the same circumstances, I would act likewise, because I consider that a post office is not a place in which to slander public men. If the hon. member for L'Islet thinks it is the right thing to state that a member gets elected to fill his pockets, well, it is up to him. That may not affect him but it does affect me.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I think the member for l'Islet is just as honourable as the member for Montmagny.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is what I thought.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): At the moment, his pockets are as full as mine.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to give the hon. member for l'Islet some explanation with reference to Mrs. Métivier. Mr. Gosselin, who held the inquiry, in fact, sent in a report, as the hon. member for Montmagny stated, that he did not think that the charges made against this postmistress did not come within the four corners of the Civil Service Act, and on the representations made by the hon. member for Montmagny, who is best able to judge in this case, we wrote to Mr. Gosselin, the commissioner, to find out what he meant when he stated that the charge made against Mrs. Métivier was not a matter coming under the purview of the Civil Service Act. The commissioner replied that he had the proofs that these words had been said before the warrants were issued, that it was not in the course of the election. It has been an established rule long before to-day, long before I was put in charge of the Post Office Department, that a postmaster or postmistress has no right to take an active part in politics not only during election time, but from the moment he or she is appointed to that position.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I regret that the hon. postmaster did not think proper to forward me this letter from Mr. Fanning Gosselin, the commissioner who held the inquiry, because I requested all correspondence and this letter never reached me.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall give the hon. member another explanation which he will understand as he did the last. I communicated by telephone with Mr. Gosselin, in Quebec, to find out what he meant, since the hon. member for Montmagny persisted in maintaining his point and that we wished to be fair towards him. The hon. member for l'Islet will recognize that I took the necessary time to think over the matter and that in no way was I ill-disposed towards Mrs. Métivier, however, when a minister is given new proofs or new representations are made of a nature to change his views, he is forced to do so, if he has a conscience.

Mr. MARCIL: In my constituency I have the honour to represent a large number of people who speak the English language; nearly one-third of my constituents are English speaking, and the case I wish to submit to the minister and the committee concerns a post office in an English speaking centre Therefore I shall speak in English; otherwise I should have spoken in French. The minister is something of a countryman of mine, having been born in the parish adjoining my own, and I am going to submit this case to the hon. gentleman and ask him, as a fair-minded man, whether the action taken is in the interests of the postal service and of the dominion.

The town of Port Daniel Centre in the county of Bonaventure is largely English speaking. The postmaster who has been dismissed, Mr. E. E. Sweetman, had been in office twenty-five or thirty years and to the best of my knowledge no report had ever been made against him either by the department or by the patrons of the office. In 1917 or 1918, if I remember rightly, an attempt was made to have him removed but he appealed to Sir Robert Borden himself and was maintained in office.

The patronage in my county is in the hands of the Hon. Dr. Paquet, a former member of this house and of the Meighen administration. I have no objection to the minister receiving advice from him, but it is strange that my last opponent has apparently given up Bonaventure entirely and has taken no part in making recommendations to the Post Office Department. It must have been decided by the Conservatives of the district to have a change of postmasters made in that office, for there was no complaint of any kind against Mr. Sweetman. The following is the document recommending the appointment of John George Assels:

We, the undersigned officers of the Port Daniel West Conservative Committee, strongly recommend John George Assels, of Port Daniel Centre, for the positon of postmaster, replacing Mr. Edward Sweetman, at Port Daniel Centre, Que.

Arthur Lawrence, President.
Thos. B. Bisson, Asst. Sec'y.
J. Langlois, Tresorier.
William Ahern, Secretary.
Edgar Lawrence, Poll Representative.

To support this application, Dr. Paquet got into communication with the department and strongly urged the change in office. As it was a civil service appointment an investigation had to be held, and Mr. Gerard Simard of Rimouski was appointed investigator. This gentleman, who has made considerable money out of the department, making these investigations, was sent down to take the evidence. I will not read his report because I do not think it is very important, but I will quote from the testimony of Mr. Sweetman, who was under oath. Having been sworn, he said:

After the federal election, a few days after, M. Lawrence came at home and I told him that Mr. Bennett was a very clever man and he would not be a Prime Minister if he was not clever. At the last federal election, I think that a petition to get voters in favour of Mr. Marcil was put at the post office, in order to be signed by citizens, but I asked nobody to sign it. The petition was in the part of the house where we live. I don't remember to ask anybody to sign it; and to my knowledge, Mrs. Sweetman has not asked anybody to sign it. This petition remained at our house a very short time. I did not see any whiskey or liquors on my premises. Mrs. Sweetman is assistant postmaster since thirty-six years. As to the car of my son, Edwin, this one is the only owner that I know. My wife may have help him to pay, but I don't know.

[Mr. Marcil.]

The Post Office Department had no complaints against this man. Joseph Jones, who had carried the mail for four years, said that he had never heard any complaint against this post office, and Mr. Robert Sullivan swore:

In my opinion, the post office has always been well kept, since they had it, and never had any complaint against them.

During the past thirty-six years there has never been any reason whatever for a change. The postmaster appealed from the decision that was given. He is an Anglican, and I will read one testimonial given this man, which I think should weigh with the minister. It is a testimonial that would certainly weigh in any other part of the empire, a letter from the Lord Bishop of Quebec:

Bishopthorpe, Quebec,
August 30, 1932.

Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

I take the liberty of writing to you about the post office at Port Daniel Centre, Bonaventure county, the Gaspe peninsula.

The postmaster, Mr. Edward Sweetman, has held the position for over thirty years. He is an invalid but his wife and daughter discharge the work of the office. They are people of irreproachable character and I understand from the office of the inspector at Quebec, as well as from two clergymen who have lived at Port Daniel, that the duties of the post office are carried on quite efficiently.

It is rumoured that the office is to be taken away from the Sweetmans and given to some other person.

Personally, I am and always have been a Conservative but I feel strongly that to take the office away from these worthy people would be a grave injustice. I express the hope that you will take the necessary steps in order that Mr. Edward Sweetman may be left in charge of the post office at Port Daniel Centre.

I remain,

Yours sincerely,
Lennox Quebec,
Lord Bishop of Quebec.

Now what do we find in this case? We find three applicants clamouring for the position, backed up by Dr. Paquet, and on the other hand we have the Lord Bishop of Quebec giving the evidence he does in this letter, backed up by the Anglican clergymen who had been in the district. Moreover, there was evidence in the possession of the department to prove that no charge had ever been made against the conduct of this post office. A returned soldier applied for the position but he was thrown aside on the ground that he had not the qualifications, being subject to fits. Mr. Ahern also applied but he too was rejected. Mr. Assels, however, was so insistent that he succeeded in getting Dr. Paquet into motion. Dr. Paquet first applied for the dismissal of Mr. Sweetman and was informed that an investigation would have to be held. The report of the investigator is of no significance, and it is contradicted by the postmaster himself.

I should like it to be clearly understood by the committee that the administration of the Post Office Department has become a matter of pure party patronage. In this district the postmaster had given long and efficient service, and he was highly recommended by the Bishop of Quebec. I would ask the minister also to read the evidence of Mr. Simard, and see whether the investigator was warranted in violating the act in the way he did. A petition was left at the residence of Mr. Sweetman but it was never presented to anyone; no one was ever asked to sign it either by the postmaster or by his wife. The son, who is a grown up man, owns an automobile, and as he had nothing to do with the post office he was free to come and go as he liked. No evidence was submitted against this postmaster except that Mrs. Sweetman, it is said, made the remark on one occasion that Mr. Houde of Montreal was a tramp. That, however, is contradicted. As regards Mr. Bennett, she eulogized him, saying that if he were not clever he would not be Prime Minister.

The Postmaster General is a man of high standing in his party and enjoys a high reputation in Quebec as an honest man. I should like him to read over the evidence and say whether, in the light of the testimonial that has been given this man Sweetman and in view of the standing of these people in the community, their respectability and their long and faithful service to the department for thirty-six years, the department was justified in dismissing him simply in order to appoint a party hack who was not a returned soldier and who I am sure could not have rallied in any sense the majority of the patrons of the office. The fact of the matter is that the change was made purely for party purposes. I must leave the matter in the hands of the minister; I can do nothing now. I do hope, however, that when he has a moment of leisure the minister will look over the file and convince himself that I have made out a fair case.

Mr. SAUVE: I thank the hon. member for Bonaventure for his remark. I have always honoured him as a gentleman and my opinion has not been changed to-day. With regard to the case he mentioned, it is quite true that Mr. Sweetman was dismissed upon the complaint of Mr. Paquet. The charge was denied by Mr. Sweetman but the commissioner, after holding an investigation on August 23, 1932, found the postmaster guilty on two counts. A witness Lawrence stated that Mr. Sweetman while discussing politics at his own home had declared that Mr. King was the best man and no one could be better. This same witness stated that Mr. Sweetman had stated to him that during the provincial elections of 1931, Liberal liquor had been left at his place for distribution. According to this same witness, Mr. Sweetman admitted that at the last federal elections a petition to be signed by the electors in favour of Mr. Marcil had been left at his home by his brother. The hon. member for Bonaventure knows that I have the highest respect for the bishop and the religious authorities, but this was not a matter of morals, it was one of fact. Certain regulations were enacted before my regime, and when the postmaster had been declared guilty of political partisanship, I could not do other than follow the regulations.

Mr. MARCIL: Did the minister take into consideration the thirty-six years of service which had been given without an adverse report being made by any officer of the department? Did the minister act merely on the opinion of a man from Rimouski who said that a petition had been left at the postmaster's house but that no one had been asked to sign? They could have left a similar petition at the home of the minister.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I wish to inquire from the hon. Postmaster General what decision he has reached with reference to the appointment of a postmaster for the town of Iberville?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am aware that the hon. member for St. John's-Iberville (Mr. Rhéaume) is well informed as regards this matter. A number of representations were made, as I wrote to Mr. Denicourt, one of the candidates chosen by the Civil Service Commission, and we are considering the matter. We shall have to conform to the regulations and make the appointment accordingly. It is true that it is a case which comes under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. The hon. member is well acquainted with the facts. We have to proceed with great caution, listen to representations, and when they have all been heard we shall act accordingly, conforming to the act or the public interest.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster General allow me to point out to him that if he wishes to conform himself to the Civil Service Act and amendments introduced by his party last year—if my memory serves me right—I cannot see why he hesitates to appoint Mr. Denicourt?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The matter is not entirely under my jurisdiction. The revenue of the post office at Iberville is more than $3,000. It is true that my approval must be sought finally.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I understand. That is why he should not have any hesitation; the Civil Service Commission has recommended the appointment of Denicourt and he has his appointment in his pocket since April 3. On April 19, 1933, I wrote the following letter to the hon. Postmaster General:

Hon. Arthur Sauvé,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

I have been informed that the Civil Service Commission had chosen Mr. Wilfrid Denicourt as postmaster of Iberville, over fifteen days ago, but his appointment had not yet been approved by the Post Office Department.

I have no doubt that the department will approve the appointment of Mr. Denicourt because he is a returned soldier and qualified for the position.

I am aware that influences were brought to bear to appoint another person, however, I trust that nothing will come of it, because it would be very unfair to Mr. Denicourt and, furthermore, your department cannot disregard the Civil Service Commission's choice. I am in no way interested in this appointment. All that I request is that the act should take its course.

The following is the answer received from the Postmaster General, on April 20, 1933:

Dear Mr. Rhéaume,—

I am in receipt of your letter dated April 19 with reference to Mr. Wilfrid Denicourt who, as you stated was chosen to be postmaster at Iberville.

In reply, I wish to state that my department is awaiting the inspector's report to settle the appointment permanently.

If, my memory serves me right, there are two returned soldiers who have applied for the position.

As you are also aware, the new Civil Service Commission is not complete.

According to the examination list Mr. Denicourt came first with 84 points and Mr. de Beaujour is fifth out of six candidates, with 71 points. I trust that the hon. Postmaster General will approve the choice of the Commission. The latter when advertising the vacant position stated:

The secretary of the commission will receive applications up to February 17, 1933.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

According to the report, before me, from the commission, five candidates out of six complied to that order of the commission; the only one who did not comply was Mr. de Beaujour, who forwarded his application on March 10. I cannot see why one should hesitate in appointing Mr. Denicourt who is a returned soldier, has five children and has had no work for over a year, while Mr. de Beaujour has been employed over 3 years at the locks in St. John; he earns $450 to $500 per year and draws a pension of $175 from the State. Moreover, he owns a lot where he has a garden. He therefore, is fairly well-to-do. Denicourt is a returned soldier, a brave lad who joined the 22nd Battallon, passed the Civil Service test and came out first. Mr. de Beaujour came out 5th; however, I am aware that he has been pulling strings and the hon. Postmaster is aware of that fact. When Mr. Goyette died, last autumn, Mr. Ernest Thuot, a good conservative, probably the most Conservative partizan in the county of St. John's-Iberville—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There are not many in St. John's-Iberville?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation) —who has been head clerk at the Liquor Commission, ever since the store was open in Iberville, gave up his position to become temporary postmaster, if I am well informed, Thuot wants de Beaujour to be appointed on condition that he is kept on and that the salary and pension be split in two. I consider that Thuot's appointment was not regular and did not comply with the act. I can assure you that if ever the Liberal party returns to power the first dismissal will be that of the postmaster at Iberville. I shall request it myself as an act of justice. Mr. Thuot had no business to give up his position at the Liquor Commission. He had been employed there for the last five or six years. He took an active part in politics, in 1931, he went to the county of Rouville—when employed at the Quebec Liquor Commission to carry on conservative propaganda from door to door. The Quebec government did not even hold an inquiry about it. After the death of Mr. Goyette he gave up his position and deprived Miss Goyette of the position she had held at the post office for over twenty years, and threw her on the street. To-day, if Denicourt is not appointed, it is because influence was brought to hear to have de Beaujour appointed in his place, so as to keep Thuot there and divide the salary. If Thuot lost his position he has but himself to blame and I do not think that he can get that position back at the Quebec Liquor Commission.

I trust that, notwithstanding all the recrimination I have heard, the Postmaster General will comply with the act as regards this appointment. I wish to inquire from him after these explanations—he knows the facts as well as I do—whether he will accept the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission in connection with this appointment.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think the hon. member will be satisfied when the case is definitely settled.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I hope so. Now, sir, I do not wish to hold up the estimates, but I would request the hon. Postmaster General to state why, in the parish of St. Georges-d'Henriville, county of Iberville, two tenders were called in connection with the rural mail contract, when a third contract was awarded without calling for tenders.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): May I request the hon. member to kindly postpone his inquiry as I have not the information with me. It is a question of contracts and there are many of them.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): There are but two.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I mean throughout Canada. St. John's-Iberville is but one county and there are many others. I shall be pleased to give him all the explanations and details he desires. I do not wish to conceal anything, he has a right to receive the information, and he shall have it.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Thanks. However, I would not like to have these details after the contract has been awarded.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, no.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): May I inquire from the hon. Postmaster General why a contract was awarded without tenders being called and why tenders are necessary in the other case?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): At present, I cannot answer. Had I this information I would willingly give it.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): When does the hon. minister expect to furnish this information.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall be able to give it on Monday morning.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): This will be quite satisfactory. Now, sir, a contract held by Mr. Barrière, in St. Gregoire, was transferred. Can the hon. postmaster inform me to whom this contract was transferred?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have not the name of the person here. The hon. member should have notified me that he desired this information; he could, in the course of the session, have secured that information either by putting a question on the order paper or otherwise. He would have been given a reply in the house, and, thereby, had it inserted in Hansard. I would have been pleased to have given the information as that is one of the aims of the session. We cannot furnish all information without knowing what hon. members require. I shall make a point to bring such information with me, on Monday morning.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I would like to know to whom the contract of Mr. Barrière of St-Gregoire-le-Grand has been transferred. I would also like to know why, in the same parish, two calls for tenders were posted, from March 27 to April 22, and why one of these posters was taken down. I think that one of these contracts was awarded to Mrs. Bessette of St-Gregoire-le-Grand.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There was correspondence exchanged recently in this connection.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster General furnish me with this information Monday morning?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, western Canada is not the only place where English speaking postmasters were appointed in parishes entirely French Canadian. In my own county, adjacent to Ottawa, the thing was done a little over a year ago. In January, 1931, the postmaster of Val-des-Bois was dismissed because of political partisanship.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What parish?

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): Val-des-Bois, Hull county. On January 22, four applications were made to the Civil Service Commission by Messrs. Archie Larocque, Théodore Thibeault, Hermas Morin and Isidore Larocque. Some time later, after the position had been advertised, three candidates were given a test and Mr. Peck was appointed. He was the least qualified candidate, according to the report of the inspector who had charge of the test.

Representations were made to the Postmaster General. In the file which I have here, there is a memo from the Deputy Postmaster General, Mr. Gaboury:

The Postmaster General has received further representations concerning the above postmaster-ship. Provided the assistant postmaster can take care of the bilingual requirements of the office, the appointment of Mr. Peck will be satisfactory.

However the examiner or inspector who had charge of the test refused to recommend the appointment of Mr. Peck because at Val-des-Bois, there is only one English speaking citizen and that is Mr. Peck; the entire population with this exception speak French. On April 23, Mr. Underwood wrote to the district superintendent:

Representations have been received by the Postmaster General concerning applicant Peck who, it is noted, is not considered by the investigating officer as having the necessary bilingual qualifications.

This matter has been examined and the department considers that, provided the assistant postmaster can fully take care of the bilingual requirements of the office, there would appear to be no objection to Mr. Peck's appointment if he is otherwise a recommendable applicant.

Mr. Peck does not speak a word of French. There is not an English family at Val-des-Bois. The commission requested on more than one occasion. . . . . .

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order! It is six o'clock.

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): I shall be through in a minute. On more than one occasion the commission requested a report from the district superintendent. It took four months to obtain that report, and, finally, Mr. Peck was appointed. I take this opportunity to point out this affair to the house. I think, sir, that in the county of Hull, where there are few English speaking citizens, and at Val-des-Bois, in particular, where there are none, the department should have appointed a French speaking postmaster.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal) moved:

That the following bills be placed upon the order paper for consideration in committee of the whole, this day:—

Bill No. 101 intituled: "An Act for the relief of Angelo Stavrow."

Bill No. 102, "An act respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company."

Mr. SPEAKER: This can only be moved by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

[M. Fournier.]

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 68, for the relief of Birdie Glickman Steinberg.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 69, for the relief of Harry Prupas.—Mr. Vallance.

Bill No. 75, for the relief of Olga Shidlowskaya Lowrey.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 76, respecting the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Casgrain.

Bill No. 85, for the relief of Emily Florence Lawrence Knight.—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 86, for the relief of Marjorie Bertha Willcox.—Mr. Bothwell.

Bill No. 87, for the relief of George Andrew Carruthers.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 88, for the relief of Lilias Torrance Newton.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 89, for the relief of Hilda Mary Falkenberg Gilmour.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 90, for the relief of Eva Amy Falle Jordan.—Mr. White (Mount Royal).

Bill No. 92, for the relief of Venita Angeline Scotten Kendall.—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 101, for the relief of Angelo Stavrow.—Mr. White (Mount Royal).

GENTER THICKENER COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 102, respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

On section 1—Extension of time for application to revive patent.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this bill should stand. It is a very serious matter, a patent of this character, and I have strong views as to what the duty of parliament is. The Secretary of State is not here. The bill has been placed on the order paper by consent of the house and if it stands there will be no inconvenience and there will be an opportunity of looking into it.

Progress reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

APPEAL TO PRIVY COUNCIL IN CRIMINAL CASES—LEGISLATIVE POWER UNDER STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved:

That the order of the house for the second reading of Bill No. 57, an act respecting the criminal code (appeals to privy council) be discharged.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object sought by this bill has been attained by the amendment of the criminal code which passed the house last week.

Motion agreed to and order discharged.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTING

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the motion standing in my name in the notices of motion be allowed to stand.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Is that the one with relation to the possibility of sitting to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: We will not sit to-morrow.

Motion stands.

Post Office—outside service—salaries and allowances, $15,381,845.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $14,161,500.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowance to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, and payment of $205 to S. R. Kirk, $1,076,030.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, there was a postal station on St. John street in Quebec which was closed recently, and I have received many letters and resolutions protesting against the closing. Would the hon. gentleman say what were the reasons which induced him to make that change?

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): The reason is that the closing of that postal station on May 1 will result in an immediate saving of about $1,800 per annum. The ultimate saving through the withdrawal of the staff and subsequent adjustments will amount to about $5,000 per annum. At the same time we are improving the service by two suboffices.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must tell my hon. friend that the people of that section of the city do not seem to agree with him as to the improvement resulting from this change, because I am receiving many protests about it. This post office is situated in one of the most important sections of the city of Quebec. The citizens of both Quebec South and Quebec East were taking advantage of the facilities there. However, I hope if the result is not what my hon. friend expects, it will be possible to persuade him to revert to the former situation.

Mr. SAUVE: We will see at the end of this year. I myself received several protests, but I sent letters to the Quebec papers explaining our purpose, and after the explanation given I think my hon. friend from Quebec East will accept our action. I did not receive any further protests since.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have much good will for the minister.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I have a complaint from Dease Lake and Telegraph Creek post offices in British Columbia. A notice has been posted in those post offices that from now on the parcel post rate will be 12 cents a pound. They are the only places in British Columbia where that change has been made. I have inquired as to the reason. I realize it is probably for the sake of economy, but I would like to ask the Postmaster General how much he anticipated will be saved by depriving those two post offices of that service. It is 5 cents a pound in other post offices in British Columbia, but it is raised to a flat rate of 12 cents for those two post offices. I have taken it up with the deputy minister but he could not give me any other answer than that it is done for the sake of economy. I can see no warrant for depriving those people of that convenience for the few dollars that may be saved; for I presume the mail has to go there anyway, whether there are few parcels or many, and I cannot see what saving can be accomplished.

Mr. SAUVE: We tried to do our best; if we have not satisfied the people there we will seek to do so. But my hon. friend will understand the situation that faces us on account of the depression of business. We are trying to do our best to serve the public and at the same time to serve the interests of the country. If your people are not satisfied we will seek to satisfy them.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): May I also ask the Postmaster General this: in the same district the towns of Anyox and Alice Arm up to last spring had three mail services a week. Last spring they were cut to two, which was naturally a hardship on those communities. The latest report that I have received informs me that it is anticipated that the service will be put to once a week.

I have several letters containing these complaints, but I do not think it is necessary to put them on record. I just want to register these complaints and I should like the minister to look into the matter very carefully before reducing the services from three to one a week. The population is the same as it was before, so I do not see why they should be deprived of that service.

Mr. SAUVE: We have asked for a better price for a weekly service. I suppose we will receive tenders, and we shall do our best.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Can the hon. Postmaster General recall the facts in connection with the postoffice of Missanabie, county of Algoma, Ontario, which were the subject of quite a considerable correspondence between the Rev. Father Maynard, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the hon. Postmaster General? The hon. Postmaster General, I presume, recalls this post office and can reply to the questions which I desire to put to him?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster inform the house who is, at present, in charge of this post office?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Missanabie? Mr. Stuart.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): It is the same Mr. Stuart who was the subject of the correspondence referred to?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think so.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Evidently, the Postmaster considers that Mr. Stuart has the qualifications necessary to fill this important post? .....Silence is consent.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I beg your pardon! I was waiting for the hon. member to resume his seat before replying. I am still working on that case. We have done our utmost to settle it, endeavouring at the same time to protect the interest of the department and meet the wishes of people of Missanabie, in Algoma West. There are naturally two sides to this question of a postmaster. Charges were lodged against him because of his personal views and behaviour towards certain citizens. The charges were absolutely denied by the postmaster. We notified the district superintendent to look into this matter and hold an inquiry. The superintendent sent in a report stating that the charges against this postmaster were not substantiated. Moreover, I requested one of the higher officials of the department Mr. Underwood, who is General Superintendent of Postal Services, to make a thorough examination of this case and continue the inquiry in this respect. Mr. Underwood's report is as follows—

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Would the hon. minister give the date?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): September 16, 1932.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Was there a report made after that date?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not think so. The report is as follows:

The undersigned discussed this question with the district superintendent, at North Bay. The Inspector Gagné who made the latest report on the case, was not at the office, I could not question him personally on the matter.

The district superintendent is of the opinion that there is no justification to take any definite action against that postmaster, considering the complaints lodged up to date. He added that there were no doubt people around Missanabie who are inimical to the postmaster and who are making every effort to have him dismissed.

On the other hand, the district superintendent considers that the efficient services rendered by the postmaster and the satisfactory way he manages the post office from the financial viewpoint, etc., justifies his maintenance in office. So far as we are specially concerned, namely, that an assistant postmistress unsealed a letter, it is clear that she did not do so with premeditation or malice. Had she acted thus, she could no doubt have destroyed this letter, while it has been clearly established that the moment she noticed that she had unsealed this letter, by mistake, thinking it was addressed to the postmaster, she immediately handed the letter to the son of the person to whom the letter was addressed, so that he might deliver it, explaining what had happened; moreover, the letter was never taken out of the envelope.

It was stated that the postmaster was hostile to French Canadians. This statement is denied by the postmaster who says that he gets along very well with the majority of the people but that there are some who spread trouble and discord and endeavour to bring charges against him. The present case is an instance of a case where it is difficult to get to the bottom of the affair; however, after discussing the subject with the district superintendent, who has personal knowledge of the facts, and considering how far the affair has gone, I think that we are not justified in taking immediate action by dismissing this postmaster.

(Signed) E. J. Underwood,
General Superintendent of Postal Services.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): The hon. Postmaster, I think, stated that this report was dated May 16, 1932?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): September.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): September 1932?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): If I understood the wording of this report, it is stated that action cannot be taken immediately? We are now in May, 1933; it is evident that no action was taken immediately. When does the hon. Postmaster General expect to take energetic action, in keeping with the actual situation as represented to the hon. Postmaster General?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Energetic action? I do not wish people to think that I lack energy; however, I should like to be given credit for sound judgment. It is not a matter of energy only but of sound judgment.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): It is an excellent thing to have both.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, one must have both. Since that date there has been some correspondence exchanged with Father Maynard, who seems quite unfriendly towards the postmaster. I inquired from the local member, who should be consulted in such matters, and he informed me that the postmaster enjoyed the confidence of the great majority of the citizens of that locality.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Who is the member for that constituency?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It is Mr. Simpson, member for Algoma West. The hon. member for Quebec East must be acquainted with him.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): There is nothing wrong in asking his name.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, on the contrary. If some one inquired who was the member for Quebec East, everybody would know that it is the Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): The hon. member for Quebec East robbed me of my powder!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to state to the hon. senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) that, ever since then, we have received no request from any group of persons belonging to the constituency, protesting against his conduct and asking for his resignation.

As to the administration of this post office by Mr. Stuart—the report speaks for itself—there are no complaints. Mention was made of a letter unsealed by an assistant. She gave an explanation, which is, moreover, that given by many postmasters. Furthermore, even under the preceding regime, I have knowledge of similar cases happening, and the then Postmaster General did not consider it sufficient, after listening to explanations given, to demand the resignation of the postmaster.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General is not quite consequent. Perhaps, he wishes, in his argument, to resort to the premises which he laid down just now, when he stated that not energy but sound judgment was needed.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, both energy and sound judgment.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): I always thought that, first, sound judgment was needed and, then, energy. At all events, the hon. Postmaster General states that no complaints have been received for a year past. It is unnecessary to have received complaints within a year; positive complaints were lodged and the correspondence is there to prove it. The Rev. Father Maynard openly complained of the administration of that post office in bitter terms, perhaps, not without cause. The Hudson Bay's representative also complained. An inquiry was held. The hon. Postmaster states that it is all over, that a report was made in September, 1932, and immediate action was to be taken. It is unnecessary to sift the whole affair again and to hear further complaints. It behooves the Postmaster General to act so as to arrive at some conclusion. This place, sir, is situated in the county of Algoma which is worthily represented in the house by the chief whip of the party on your right, sir, that is, perhaps, an explanation. However, faced with these specific charges which were lodged by the Rev. Father Maynard and others, I think that the Postmaster General shows much indolence and a great lack of energy. Perhaps, there is some sound judgment mingled with it, however, as the matter stands, it does not show very much.

On May 16, 1932, Mr. Ross—the latter cannot be charged with partizanship, as he does not know French and is the district administrator of North Bay—states:

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Is he a post office employee?

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Quite so, he is an inspector. It is the official report of the district superintendent of North Bay, to the general superintendent of Postal services. He states:

> There is no doubt that the postmaster has some prejudice against French Canadians; if he has not against every one; he has, at all events, against the French element of his locality and has shown very little tact in his dealings with these people.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Shame! shame!

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Is that the report of an official of the Post Office Department?

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Quite so. It is the report of Mr. John C. Ross, district superintendent to the general superintendent of postal services.

It is then unnecessary to search for a mare's nest and await charges to follow. Moreover, the hon. Postmaster General has the complete file before him and he can ascertain the wording of the complaints. On April 8, 1932, the Rev. Father Maynard wrote to the Postmaster General. I do not wish to insert in Hansard the whole letter, which is very long, however, the Rev. Father expresses himself in the following terms:

Often, complaints were lodged with the Post Office Department in connection with the post office of Missanabie. We have received promises that there would be improvement—

They are, perhaps, in the nature of the promises that the distinguished leader of the hon. minister made previous to the 1930 election. They are always promises of improvement but nothing coming out of them.

—but we have had, up to now, no satisfactory results.

The cause of the faulty service at the post office of Missanabie dates from when Mr. Stuart was appointed postmaster. Mr. Stuart has only been residing in Missanabie a few years. Up to last autumn he was the Hudson Bay's factor. From the day he arrived in Missanabie, Mr. Stuart, carried on an unrelenting war against Mr. Arthur Coté to rob him of his store customers.

Things were so unpleasant for Mr. Coté, that he left the place.

Since Mr. Stuart has become postmaster he has ostensibly renewed his antipathy for French Canadians. Last month he roughly handled a young man—

The hon. Postmaster General knows to what I am alluding to.

—a crippled young man, a French Canadian, who presented himself at the post office to claim his mail. . . .

The following is another complaint. Mr. Arthur Godon, of Missanabie, had requested from the chief of police a letter of recommendation on his good standing. . . .

It is exactly the letter to which the hon. Postmaster General alluded just now. One may doubt the report of the inspector, to the effect that the letter in question had been unsealed but that the one who had opened it, Mrs. Stuart, had not read it. The hon. Postmaster General does not expect that we are going to gulp down that story. It was a most important letter concerning Mr. Stuart himself as regards complaints made against him. Mrs. Stuart was well aware that the magistrate would forward this letter to the person it was addressed, and I am quite convinced that she did it knowingly, willingly and with the purpose of finding out what it contained. I shall continue the letter of the Rev. Father Maynard:

With this information you may realize, sir, that a change is necessary. French Canadians have a right to be treated with respect and justice.

With such a letter it is unnecessary to bring further complaints, so as to have an avalanche of them, to stir the sound judgment but, especially the energy of the hon. Postmaster General and to continue the inquiry. The inquiry had been started it should have continued.

Some time later—as the file shows—on May 26, 1932, the hon. Postmaster General wrote to the Rev. Father Maynard as follows:

I wish to refer to your letter of April 8, in connection with the administration of the Missanabie post office.

An inspector of the superintendent's office, at North Bay, recently visited your locality, and I understand he had an interview with you. The postmaster was warned about the complaints to which his attitude gave rise among his French Canadian post office clients. . . .

Naturally, the Postmaster General, notwithstanding all these complaints, will admonish him a little. He makes promises to the Rev. Father Maynard and imagines that the Canadians will rest content with admonitions and promises.

The postmaster was warned about the complaints to which his attitude gave rise among his French Canadian post office clients and I trust that this warning will have a beneficial and lasting effect.

It is rather a weak explanation.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to point out another fact to him.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I forgot to state, just now, that Mr. Stuart was granted leave to go to England to visit his sick mother. He returned a month ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): He seems to be ill himself.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Before the postmaster left for England much water had run under the bridge. The Postmaster General showed little backbone; however, I trust that when the report is complete, he will give proof of a little more backbone. On May 25, the Rev. Father Maynard wrote to the Postmaster General the following letter. However, the Postmaster General took great pains not to include it in the returns tabled in the house. This letter does not appear on the file which was asked and tabled in the house. Father Maynard thus expresses himself:

I have just received your answer to my letter of April 8, last, complaining of the postmaster at Missanabie and strongly requesting his dismissal—

The Rev. Father Maynard had requested his dismissal.

—on unimpeachable evidence. May I state that the settlement of this question—such as you state in your letter—does not satisfy those concerned, and with cause.

Yet, the hon. Postmaster General maintains that his judgment is sound and that he is particularly well provided with backbone. He has never done anything. Let us return to the letter. The Rev. Father mentions two grievances, and he has unimpeachable evidence.

And with this unimpeachable evidence you, the Postmaster General, are satisfied with a simple admonition against this enemy of the French Canadians, this strange brazen-faced person, while all wish that he be deprived of the management of the post office.

It is most unfortunate that one of our race, who could protect so easily the interest of our people, sacrifice them. We are moreover sufficiently scoffed at by the English element in all our dealings, not to do justice, at least, to our people in such a flagrant case.

The Rev. Father Maynard, who is a member of the eminent society of Jesuits, does not mince his words; he, perhaps, remembers that he is a soldier. Moreover, sir, he uses a very strong and appropriate term which, unfortunately is not parliamentary. I therefore do not wish to confide it to Hansard, in order that I may not be requested to withdraw it.

We shall remember—

Let us say here that there is a very energetic term which describes admirably the situation.

—this lack of energy on your part when the occasion offers.

I think, sir, if the hon. Postmaster General wished to prove that he had backbone and had been willing, he could have settled this case to the satisfaction of all who lodged complaints. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Stuart went over to Europe to visit his sick mother, the inquiry could have been continued, even before his departure, but, especially, it could be continued now. I trust that the Postmaster General, with the complete returns he has, containing such scathing reprimands, will first give proof of his sound judgment and energy or energy and judgment or both together and that he will remedy the intolerable situation existing at Missanabie, so that those of our people who guide public opinion and enjoy the confidence of the people may continue to do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Will my hon. friend allow me to put a question? Has he any statistics as regards the proportion of French speaking people in that locality?

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): I have not the figures with me. The French population of that district is quite large, it is quite a large proportion. I could not state exactly what it is, however, the French influence in that district is considerable.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the attention of the minister to a situation which exists no doubt throughout Canada, but which does exist in that part of Canada west of the great lakes. The transportation companies are practising economies by the cutting down of train services, especially on the branch lines throughout western Canada. Because of this reduction in railway service we are receiving a rather limited postal service. The branch line upon which I happen to live was built some twenty years ago. Originally we had a passenger train and a mixed train daily with a daily mail delivery both east and west. This service has since been reduced to tri-weekly. There are other instances where the service has been reduced to bi-weekly. Because of these reductions in service the business men of the communities find themselves without the necessary postal accommodation, and I was wondering if it would be possible for the Post Office Department to consider the possibility of putting on a truck or automobile service in order to provide the necessary postal accommodation. Will the minister and his officials give consideration to this question?

Mr. SAUVE: The Post Office Department is not responsible for the situation which has been created by the railways. In some cases where the railway service has been cut we have put on a special service and I hope that within a few months the situation of which my hon. friend complains will be remedied.

Mr. VALLANCE: I appreciate and admit the argument advanced by the minister that the Post Office Department is not responsible for the economies being practised by the railway companies but it seems to me that this department of government which always boasts of the manner in which its business is carried on will be jeopardizing its efficiency if it does not take cognizance of these conditions. I suggest in my humblest way that the minister and the officials of his department give consideration to this question because it is working a hardship upon the business men located on these branch lines who are receiving only three mails a week and sometimes only two, whereas the previous service was daily. They find it impossible to carry on business under these conditions. I leave the matter with the minister for his consideration.

Mr. SAUVE: We are considering it.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Now that Mr. Stuart has returned to this country, the hon. Postmaster General would be very gracious if he would inform the house when he has the intention to continue the inquiry and when he expects to receive a report.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): My hon. friend will recognize—he has had much public experience—that it is not always an easy matter to act quickly. Certain difficulties arise in a country composed of various elements like ours. The hon. member also knows that in the course of my few years in public life, I have never missed the opportunity to champion the cause of my compatriots, and this to the utmost. It is neither at my age nor at this phase of my public life that I will become a traitor to their interests; however, conscious of my responsibility in the administration of the country, I think I am justified in taking all possible means—I am not referring to violent means, my character is not such nor am I an extremist—to reach a settlement of this question, as I have done in the past without making a display of patriotism, and to work on behalf of my compatriots in Ontario, and, my own people know it. My character has not changed and the hon. member may rest assured of one thing, that, before long, he may, perhaps, have to reconsider the remarks he made this evening, when he again refers to the part I played in the final settlement of the question raised to-day.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): I have never doubted the sincerity of the hon. Postmaster General. I have a great respect for his long and fruitful career. Only deeds speak louder than words.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): If the hon. Postmaster will state that he has really the intention to settle as soon as possible this affair I shall be quite satisfied. If the hon. Postmaster will state that he has really the intention to settle this affair, I shall take his word for it. Only let him remember that deeds speak louder than words.

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): I expected that the hon. Postmaster General would give some explanation—

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): I would very much like that the minister be given an opportunity to reply to my question.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If members opposite would give me an opportunity and especially time. I cannot reply to everybody in the same breath.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Quite so.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I would not like the hon. member for Ottawa to think that I do not wish to reply because through courtesy I allowed the hon. member for Hull to address the house.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Quite so. But it was perhaps very much to the point.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member is clever, he has that reputation. He is also moderate in his views. That is how he has acquired some prestige in the house.

I know what I intended to convey; I can promise him one thing: I shall continue to look after this case with all the discernment possible, and I trust—I repeat it—that the hon. member will not have cause to reproach me next session.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): I wish to thank the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): When the house adjourned, I was explaining to the hon. Postmaster General the appointment of Mr. William Peck of Val-des-Bois, in Hull county. When the examination for this position was announced, the examiner came to Val-des-Bois. Three candidates presented themselves for the test. They were given marks on their test and classified by the examiner. The candidate who received the least marks, Mr. William Peck, was given the position. In a letter which the general superintendent of postal services wrote to the district superintendent, he pointed out to him that:

> Representations have been received by the Postmaster General concerning applicant Peck, who, it is noted, is not considered by the investigating officer as having the necessary bilingual qualifications.
> This matter has been examined and the department considers that, provided the assistant postmaster can fully take care of the bilingual requirements of the office, there would appear to be no objection to Mr. Peck's appointment if he is otherwise a recommendable applicant.

Under the circumstances—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member speak louder?

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation):

—the district superintendent is requested to look into the situation further and if in the light of the above remarks his report can be amended, he will please make the necessary alteration and return it to the department.

This report was made following a request of the Civil Service Commission to the Post Office Department in connection with the result of the examination. I do not know whether the examiner altered his report after the remarks of the superintendent, but I do know that a few days later, the commission announced the appointment of Mr. Peck, in the following terms:

This is to certify that the person named hereon has been selected to fill the position named above, after examination in conformity with the provision of the Civil Service Act and of the rules and regulations made thereunder; is qualified to be appointed on probation at the salary shown above.

If the hon. Postmaster General will refer to the file, he will note that the two other candidates had a higher rating and were better classified than Mr. Peck. I wish to inquire from the Postmaster General why the department appointed to this position the least qualified candidate? He is an English-speaking person who does not know a word of French, who resides in an exclusively French Canadian parish, 50 miles distant from Ottawa. There are a few German families but the majority are French Canadians. Mr. Morin and Mr. Larocque were better qualified. Mr. Larocque was even recommended by the parish priest. Mr. Peck who does not speak a word of French was appointed. I think the hon. Postmaster General might explain the reason of this appointment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Another question awaiting settlement.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): To my regret the remarks of the hon. member did not all reach my ear; however, I can furnish him with the following information: Mr. Peck replaced Mr. Morin as postmaster. The latter was dismissed at the request of Mr. Noél Beauchamp, who charged him with political partizanship. It was proved that Mr. Morin had meddled in politics. Mr. Peck therefore replaced him. The hon. member contends that Mr. Peck does not speak or understand a word of French. I must say that I am rather surprised at that statement and, immediately after the session, I shall make a personal inquiry in this connection. I may state that, if an injustice has been done, if it was a case of partizanship in the appointment of Mr. Peck, and if he cannot speak French in the midst of a French Canadian population, I shall see that the case is settled.

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General can look over the report of the examiner. I got my information from the returns furnished by the department and, this report states that Peck does not speak or understand French.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall quickly settle the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): It should never have happened. It has already lasted too long.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There are precedents.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Not so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I would like to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to another matter. A few days ago I received a letter from the hon. postmaster General in connection with mail transportation from l'Anse-à-Beaufils to Val-d'Espoir, in the county of Gaspé. The hon. Postmaster General informed me that the post office at Val-d'Espoir only brought in a revenue of $96 per year and that, consequently, he could not establish a daily mail service between l'Anse-à-Beaufils and Val-d'Espoir.

I received, to-day, a letter from the parish priest who requests me to insist with the Postmaster General to have a daily mail service. If the hon. Postmaster General will permit me, I shall read the letter received this morning:

Sir,—

In reply to your letter of the 2nd instant, I must express my thanks for your entreaties with the Postmaster General. The report which the Postmaster General gave you is that of March 31, 1930, to March 31, 1931; the revenue was $96.45. That year there were 60 families at Val-d'Espoir. Last year, namely, from March 31, 1931, to March 31, 1932, the revenue was $104. There were that year 68 families.

This year, there are 151 families. It seems to me that this should be sufficient to permit our having our mail every day.

He adds that there are postal money orders at l'Anse-à-Beaufils but not at Val-d'Espoir. He further requests a regular post office at Val-d'Espoir where there are at present 160 families. They are families that have settled here and they always look forward, as a pastime, to the mail. I would request the hon. Postmaster General, owing to the earnest entreaties of the local parish priest and other persons, to take the matter into serious consideration and see if he could not establish a daily mail service between l'Anse-à-Beaufils and Val-d'Espoir also a regular post office in the latter place.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Would the hon. member have any objection in sending me over a copy of the letter he has just read so as to have it on file?

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I shall hand over this letter to the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall consider the suggestions of the hon. member in the best disposition possible.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to say a few words that may not be strictly in order on this vote but I think I can say them in a shorter time than might be spent wrangling over a point of order. I wish to call the attention of the house to the indefensible waste of public money in having two fully equipped independent post offices in this building, within ten feet of each other. I wonder where anywhere in the whole world you could find a parallel condition. The most easterly one has a clientele at the most of ninety-six, and very often, as the records show, of not more than fifty, with perhaps a dozen officials as well. We have in our post office sufficient men who are competent to do the whole thing. The saving may not amount to more than $10,000, and $10,000 out of $345,000,000 is not a very big item, but it is the look of the thing. In these days of low incomes and high taxation people look at that sort of thing and they do not like it. It is the sort of thing that might suddenly sweep the country. Suppose some of the C.C.F. went about the country saying: "These two old parties have been perpetrating a thing like that for the last thirty years." A British government was defeated on a snap vote on a question of cordite. It was a trivial thing, there was no war on at the time, but there was a sudden flare-up and the government was defeated. It is the appearance of the thing I want to get at. If we allow these things to go on right under our nose, it will be argued, what will we do in bigger things. I am not saying anything against any official; I am simply saying that one post office would be ample for both houses.

Mr. BENNETT: Just one word in respect to that matter. For fifteen years that subject has been engaging the attention of successive governments. When the estimates were being prepared two years ago I had a report made on it. Not only has an effort been made with respect to that but also with respect to the accountant's office. It has been urged that there should not be two accountants' offices for the Senate and the House of Commons; with the retirement of one of the officials an effort will be made to merge them into one, and with the retirement of one postmaster an effort will be made to bring about the reform to which the hon. gentleman has referred. But there are great difficulties in the way. I think my predecessor made some effort in the same direction, but the Senate is a body that has a mind of its own when it comes to the question of dispensing with its post office. That I think is a short way of putting it.

Mr. NEILL: We hold the purse strings.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, but they also claim the right to a post office.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to a request just received. I could not better put my request than by reading a resolution of the parish council of Ste. Anne du Sault, county of Arthabaska. This resolution is as follows:

At a general and regular meeting of the municipal council of the parish of Ste-Anne-du-Sault, held in the ordinary place and at the regular hour of the council's meetings, Monday, May 1, 1933, at 7 p.m., those present being his worship, the mayor Alphonse Boissonnault and Messrs. the councillors Oscar Gentès, Pierre Sicard, Felix Nil Soucy, Joseph Morin, Alfred Loranger and Emile Beaudet, forming a quorum under the chairmanship of the mayor.

Whereas there is at present a refreshifying movement taking place in the province of Quebec and, that it would be well-timed to change the name of Bulstrode station for a French name, it is moved by councillor Oscar Gentés, seconded by councillor Pierre Sicard, that a request be made by the council to the management of the Canadian National Railways, also to the Postmaster General, at Ottawa, to change the name of the station and that of the post office, at present Bulstrode Station, to that of DeFoy.

Carried.

It is simply a question of changing the name of the post office to that of De Foy. I must inform the Postmaster General that it is an entirely French Canadian parish, and I trust that he will be gracious enough to make the change.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): For some time past we have been making changes and we shall continue.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to apologize to the committee for drawing the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to an old or stale question. However, I always wonder whether the power of dismissal of the Postmaster General, which is quite extensive, is not out-weighed by his power of reinstatement of those whe were dismissed. At present, I do not wish to dwell, at length, on the absolutely unfair dismissal of the postmaster of Kamouraska, Mr. Edouard Guy. Much of the evidence is contradicted by affidavits, however, I do not intend to refer again to that particular phase. When the hon. Postmaster General appointed Mr. Louis Langlois, as postmaster of Kamouraska—naturally, he is one of his good supporters—I wondered whether he took the trouble to go through the entire file and whether he discovered that Mr. Langlois had been dismissed after an inquiry, not for political partizanship, as shown here, but because he had despatched by mail, free of postage, defamatory literature to the address of my predecessor in the house, the hon. Justice Stein. Therefore, he disregarded the regulations of the Post Office department in mailing these circulars without affixing any postage stamps. The literature was of a political nature. Consequently it was a political offence. I am given to understand that in this connection the hon. Postmaster General is very lenient—especially when they affect the Conservative party—there was, however, a flagrant disregard of the postal regulations. If I make such an inquiry, it is not that I wish to criticize the hon. Postmaster General's actions, but I wonder whether he took the trouble to thoroughly examine the file.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): When was he reinstated? In what year?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): He was dismissed about 1924, after a thorough inquiry.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In what year was he reinstated?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): He was reinstated in 1931. If I ask this question, it is because I am aware that the hon. Postmaster General has a very generous disposition and that if any document in the file escaped his eye, he may have an opportunity to verify the facts and act accordingly.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Had the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) drawn my attention to this matter in 1931, I would have sifted the case thoroughly and given him an answer. I promise him to thoroughly examine this case and shall give him an answer next time.

Mr. TOTZKE: I wish to ask the Postmaster General a question or two in connection with the dismissal of a postmaster which I brought to the minister's attention last year. Before putting my question I wish to quote what the minister said in reply last year.

Mr. SAUVE: What case?

Mr. TOTZKE: The Jansen case. It took me about half an hour to present the case and I think I successfully proved that the dismissal had been very unjust. The minister replied to me in two sentences, but his remarks were very much to the point and I did expect as a result of his remarks to get some action. His remarks will be found at page 3163 of Hansard of May 20, 1932:

> Mr. Sauve: In answer to the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), all I can say is that my remarks in Montreal explained my feeling at that time and at the present time. I am sorry if a misunderstanding has arisen in the case mentioned by my hon. friend, and I shall be very glad to go further into the matter.

In view of all the circumstances I think it was justifiable that the minister should go further into that matter and see if anything could be done to rectify the injustice. I would like to ask the minister if he took any steps to find out whether anything could be done to restore that post office to that man.

Mr. SAUVE: I will review the case and give an explanation on Monday.

Mr. TOTZKE: I have another case that I would like to bring to the attention of the minister. This is in connection with the post office at Alvena, Saskatchewan. The postmaster at this office was charged with political partisanship by the defeated Conservative candidate on October 8, 1930. The postmaster denied the charge and furnished declarations to that effect, but he was later dismissed in spite of this and in spite of the report of the district superintendent in which he says:

> I circulated the patrons of the Alvena office on November 14, asking for an expression of opinion as to service rendered and whether or not the charges made were correct. To date sixty replies have been received, and of the patrons responding forty-six have expressed satisfaction with Mr. Slusar and his conduct of the office. The remaining fourteen claim that Mr. Slusar is not capable of handling the business since the post office has assumed new importance. He is said to be very slow in the sorting of mail and writing of money orders, owing to his lack of education, and to be, at times, disobliging and impolite. Complaint has also been made as to the present location of the office, which is across the railway tracks from the rest of the village.

The inspector was sent out, and the report further states:

> In several replies to my circular—

The superintendent had sent out circulars to the various patrons of the office.

—it was intimated that the complainants were making an effort to have Mr. Slusar removed from his position so that they, or some one of them, might obtain charge of the office, and that Mr. Peter Drabinasty, garage man, was the leader of this agitation. This seems borne out by the fact that several replies to my circular are in this man's handwriting although signed by different parties. The same implication was made to Mr. Cumming,—

That is the inspector.

—and it was suggested by Mr. Dmetro Andrunyk, general merchant, and Mr. J. Gray, agent of the Searle Elevator Company (both considered to be men of dependable judgment) that it would be doubtful if a change for the better could be made at the present time on account of the general character of the persons available for the position. Experience has shown that the postmaster in a community of this kind is particularly the target for criticism.

Further on in his report the superintendent says:

I am doubtful if the present postmaster will prove able to rise to the responsibilities of this office and provide satisfactory service for the business of the growing village, but I think that no action should be taken against him at the present time.

That is the report of the district superintendent. I may say from my own personal knowledge of this particular office and the community that the report is quite correct. I know that when they did appoint a successor to this postmaster he was not as well able to carry on the business of the office as the previous postmaster. But in spite of this report of the superintendent an investigation was ordered into the charges of political partisanship, and the commissioner who held the investigation was again in this case, as in the case of the Jansen post office, the brother of the defeated Conservative candidate. Evidence was taken by this commissioner, and two witnesses were called. One mentioned that when he heard the remarks of the postmaster which were the basis of the charge of partisanship there were two men present whose names he mentioned, and who had heard the remarks at the same time. After the evidence was taken the postmaster secured declarations from these two men who were supposed to have heard him make the remarks, and forwarded them to the Post Office Department, and both men in their declarations say that the evidence given was incorrect. They both say:

I was at no political meeting at any time in Alvena during 1930 and at no time did the said Slusar talk politics to me or in my presence.

This, as I have said, was sent to the Postmaster General, and he was asked by the commissioner for advice as to whether further investigation should be made. On May 12 a letter was sent to the commissioner, and there was no reply to that, but in spite of the production of new evidence and the desire of the postmaster to have it considered the order was issued that the postmaster should be dismissed and another man appointed in his place. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he did give consideration to those declarations, which practically nullify all the evidence that was taken before the commissioner, and if he did after consideration of those declarations decide that there should be no further investigation?

Mr. SAUVE: Mr. Slusar was dismissed on the charge of political partisanship. The charge was denied by the postmaster and was investigated by Commissioner Wilson on the 29th of April, 1931. He was found guilty on four counts: that the postmaster made partisan remarks among a number of persons at a meeting held in Alvena in the interests of the Conservative candidate for the purpose of inducing them to support the Liberal candidate; that the postmaster tried to induce persons to support the Liberal candidate; that the postmaster in the winter of 1930-31 at his store premises in the presence of at least three persons attacked the present administration with the intent of affecting the political views of persons present; and that during the provincial election campaign in 1929, on the store and post office premises the postmaster pointed out to an elector the advisability of voting for the Liberal party. He consequently was found guilty by the commissioner, and I followed the rule established by my predecessors. As to the new postmaster, I must say that the question raised by the hon. member is occupying the attention of the department, and we will continue to give attention to and review the case.

Mr. TOTZKE: The hon. minister has not got my point at all. Perhaps in trying to be brief I have not put it very clearly. The minister just gave a review of the charges and the evidence heard and the finding of the commissioner. I was asking if the minister did consider the declarations that were sent in by the two men who had been stated by one witness as having been present and heard these remarks alleged to have been made by the postmaster. They denied that they had been present at the meeting, which to my mind absolutely nullifies the evidence given by the one witness. Did the Postmaster General give any consideration to that fact?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes, I understand that is what happened, and I understand that the former postmaster has made a complaint against the acting postmaster. The case of the former postmaster is settled; he has been replaced. However, in view of what has been said with regard to the administration of the new postmaster, we are disposed to review the case to see if we cannot satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. TOTZKE: I know the former postmaster was dismissed; I did not need to be told that. I am trying to find out why he was dismissed. I say that after the report of the inspector had been received by the department fresh evidence was brought in by means of these declarations, and I want to know if the minister considered that fresh evidence or if he just went on the report of the commissioner, who said:

> You will note the witness George Zadvorny mentions two parties in his evidence named Michael Hrytzak and Bronko Zahretsky. These names do not correspond with the names mentioned in the declarations but the names are somewhat similar.
> It is my belief that the reopening of the investigation would not result in a different finding than that I have already made notwithstanding the contents of the declarations. I shall not do anything further unless you instruct me otherwise.

In other words, the commissioner says that there would be no use in reopening the case, in spite of the fact that the evidence of one witness has been entirely nullified by the evidence contained in these declarations; he is determined to dismiss the postmaster on the evidence of one witness, despite the fact that the postmaster denied all the charges. Did the Postmaster General give consideration to the new evidence that was brought in?

Mr. SAUVE: We will proceed to review both cases.

Mr. TOTZKE: I hope I will get some word in connection with this case before the year is up. In another case I waited for more than a year for a reply. My next case does not involve any question of political partisanship; the charge here is tampering with the mail, which I admit is a very serious charge. It appears that a number of samples of merchandise were sent to the post office at Lac Vert, in Saskatchewan. The postmaster there also conducts a general store, and has as a competitor another general merchant in the same village. The agent for the Kellogg food people had been through the village and had taken a list of names from the other merchant in connection with the distribution of samples of goods. When the samples arrived in the office the postmaster's wife inadvertently, according to her claim, wrote the name of their own store on the packages in addition to the name of the other store which had been stencilled there. This lady claims that she did not notice the other name and said they had been expecting similar samples for distribution in connection with their own store. In this connection I should like to read the report of the district superintendent. After reviewing the whole situation this is what the superintendent says:

> Mr. McRae has been postmaster at Lac Vert since June 6, 1921, and generally speaking, his services have been fairly satisfactory. My understanding is that he bears a good reputation in the district. He maintains that he had no knowledge whatever of what had been done by his wife in connection with the articles addressed to Mr. Rose, until advised by the addressee.
> I am of the opinion that it would be hardly fair to the postmaster to carry out the drastic action demanded by Mr. Rose.
> I would respectfully suggest that the postmaster be permitted to continue in charge of the office on the definite understanding that all duties pertaining to same must be performed in a fit and proper way and that should any further mistreatment of mail matter occur in the office, the question of declaring the postmastership vacant will be given immediate consideration.

Then the question arose as to whether the wife of the postmaster was correct in her contention that similar samples were expected for distribution from their store; that matter was investigated and it was found on inquiry of the Kellogg people that this was quite true. There is nothing on the file after that, no report, no suggestion, no request of any kind on the part of anyone that the postmaster be dismissed, until December 9, 1932. Then I find a memorandum from the Postmaster General to the deputy postmaster general which reads as follows:

> Referring to reports submitted by the district superintendent of postal service at Saskatoon, concerning complaints made in regard to the mistreatment of mail matter at the Lac Vert post office, will the deputy postmaster general please take steps to remove the present incumbent from office.

After the superintendent had written to the department advising that the postmaster be kept in charge of that office and given another chance the Postmaster General, without apparent reason, issued an order that the postmaster should be dismissed. I should like to ask the Postmaster General what his reasons were for overruling the recommendation of his district superintendent.

Mr. SAUVE: The inspector claims that the postmaster's wife was at fault. We will consider the report and see what it is possible to do.

Mr. TOTZKE: Does the Postmaster General say that the man has not been permanently removed?

Mr. SAUVE: I understand that the man was dismissed because the matter was considered sufficiently serious to justify that action.

Mr. TOTZKE: I understand that it was considered sufficiently serious to justify dismissal but I should like to know why the Postmaster General undertook to dismiss the man contrary to the recommendation of his inspector that this man should be retained in the office. What reasons had the department for dismissing this postmaster after the superintendent had recommended that he be retained?

Mr. SAUVE: The department is not always bound to follow the recommendations of the superintendent.

Mr. TOTZKE: I realize that. But as a rule does not the department take into consideration the report of the superintendent after he has sent out an inspector to the office to interview the patrons, and after he has given his best judgment to the various conditions that exist on the strength of which he makes his report? I know very well the superintendent in the Saskatoon district and he is one of the fairest men whom I have met in the service. He makes excellent reports with regard to everything that happens, and I am convinced that if the superintendent, fair and unbiased as he is, had considered this a very serious breach of the postal regulations, he would not have recommended the retention of the man. I want to know what prompted the minister in spite of all this to dismiss this postmaster.

Mr. SAUVE: He had committed a serious breach of the regulations and in any event we are not bound to accept the report of the superintendent. It is a matter of departmental judgment.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am free to admit that perhaps the reports of the superintendent are not always followed; but what request or report prompted the minister to dismiss this man after the superintendent had recommended that he be retained? I can scarcely conceive that for his more or less trivial offence he should have been dismissed. It was only one complaint. The only complaint that had been made was in connection with the writing of the name of the postmaster's store on these samples, and I am informed that only three or four of them got out that way, and as soon it was drawn to his attention the error was rectified. Moreover, the mistake was not made by the postmaster himself but by the assistant postmaster. I should like to know what the minister based the dismissal on.

Mr. SAUVE: The department does not consider the error trivial.

Mr. TOTZKE: In that event, there are certain regulations that must be followed. I take it that the superintendent at Saskatoon would follow those regulations, and if there was not any room for the exercise of discretion on the part of the Postmaster General there certainly would not have been a report like this from the district superintendent at Saskatoon. The action of the Postmaster General leads me to believe that there must have been something, some report from someone, which does not appear on the file.

Mr. SAUVE: I will review the facts and I hope to give my hon. friend an explanation that will satisfy him.

Mr. TOTZKE: I thank the minister, and again I trust it will not be until next year that I shall have to wait.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Postmaster General be so kind, as to inform me whether he has received the letter forwarded to him the other day, requesting certain information in connection with the transportation of mail between St-Fabien station and the post office and, if so, may I expect a reply in the near future.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I certainly received the letter of the hon. member and transmitted it to Mr. Anderson's branch who is making inquiries on the subject.

Mr. YOUNG: I have here the auditor general's report for the year ended March 31, 1932, and I notice that the revenue from stamps and post cards amounted to $27,000,000 odd. How much of that was derived from stamps for other than postal purposes?

Mr. SAUVE: We cannot segregate the amount. They were excise stamps.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister tell us, then, whether the department operated at a profit or at a loss last year?

Mr. SAUVE: We expect a surplus.

Mr. YOUNG: The previous year there was a deficit of over $2,000,000. Does the minister expect a surplus this year?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: For the year ended March 31 past?

Mr. SAUVE: About $600,000.

Mr. YOUNG: How much money is invested in post office buildings throughout the country?

Mr. SAUVE: It depends upon the policy of the Public Works department.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister tell me in dollars and cents?

Mr. SAUVE: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Has any other department spent money in connection with post office work and if so how much?

Mr. SAUVE: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. YOUNG: I have the estimates for this year and I notice on page 32 under the Department of Public Works, item 113, six sub-items. One is for public buildings outside Ottawa: heating, light, power, rents, salaries of caretakers, engineers, firemen and so forth, supplies for caretakers, engineers, firemen and so on, amounting to $5,000,000 odd. How much of that is for post office buildings?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that is relevant to the discussion; that would come up under public works.

Mr. YOUNG: I understood that there was one item reserved under each department in connection with which we might ask any question.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may ask the question if there is no objection from the committee.

Mr. SAUVE: Those accounts are not charged to the department.

Mr. YOUNG: I shall have to ask for a return next session.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the department of the Postmaster General ever figured out at what cost it has carried other departments of government in connection with postal services to those departments?

Mr. SAUVE: About $1,000,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would that $1,000,000 cover what is expended by the Public Works department in the interests of the Post Office department?

Mr. SAUVE: I cannot say.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Would the hon. Postmaster General inform the house as to how many employees over 65 years old are still retained in the department and what is the total amount of salary they draw?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member will readily recognize that it is preferable to put such questions, regularly, in the course of the session. Had he done so, we could have made inquiries and given him the information now asked for. He will admit that it is impossible to answer on the spur of the moment a question of that nature without having previously made some inquiries.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General is usually well informed. He has on the tip of his fingers all the details of the administration of his department. No doubt, without giving exact figures, he could possibly state approximately the number of employees in his department who are over 65 years old and also give approximately the amount they draw.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We are at present making a complete census and I am not so conceited enough as to think that I can inform the House on every detail of my department which comprises more than 40,000 employees.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I understand that, according to the Civil Service Act, when an employee has reached the age of 65, he can be superannuated.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): However, his superannuation is left to the discretion of the Minister in charge of the department.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): At 70, he is obliged to retire. But at the age of 65, it is a question for the department to decide according to the administration's interests involved.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): With your kind permission, sir, I wish to point out to the house the case of the retirement of an employee of the Post Office department. I think that in the present case, the hon. Postmaster General used his discretion as head of a department to get rid of an excellent employee, fulfilling his duty well, enjoying all his faculties both physically and mentally, because there was no cause to retire him. It is unnecessary to state that this employee was guilty of being a Liberal. He took no active part in politics as he was of a too scrupulous and conscientious temperament; he could not be got rid of on the usual pretence of political partisanship.

However, as soon as he reached the age of 65, the hon. Postmaster General invited him to retire. The employee referred to is Robert Carrier, a brother of an ex-member in this house for the county of Levis. Mr. Robert Carrier was postmaster at Levis. The retirement of Mr. Carrier was very unfair owing to the circumstances connected with it. He was postmaster at Levis during 26 or 27 years. Up to two years or three years ago, the Levis postmaster was not considered in the civil service and therefore not entitled to a pension. However, two or three years ago, the Levis post office was classified among the city post-offices, thereafter Mr. Carrier was called upon to contribute to the civil service pension fund, he was therefore obliged to contribute, yearly, 5 per cent of his salary.

This year, the hon. Postmaster notified him that, for economical reasons, he was retiring him. Mr. Carrier replied that he would retire providing a pension was given him. The hon. Postmaster wrote to him that it was impossible to grant him a pension, notwithstanding his contribution to the pension fund, because, to be entitled to a pension a civil servant must have contributed to the pension fund during 10 years and that he had only contributed to the fund for a few years.

Mr. Carrier requested to be left in charge of the post office until he had completed the ten years which the act stipulates in order to be entitled to a pension.

I think that, owing to the excellent services of Carrier, and the fact that no fault could be found against him both from the viewpoint of his work and political activity, the hon. Postmaster General should have allowed him to complete the ten years stipulated by the Act, in order to enable this good servant to draw a pension. The hon. Postmaster General may reply: we have granted him a gratuity. That is so, a gratuity of ten or eleven months of salary was granted to him. That is all he received, a lump or fixed sum, once for all. He was granted ten or eleven months' salary as a gratuity. One must bear in mind that, in truth, this gratuity is nothing else than the money Mr. Carrier contributed to the superannuation fund. It is his own money which was returned to him. It strikes me, that as there was nothing against the character or services of Mr. Carrier, who is still in excellent health and could have given ten or fifteen years more of service to this country, the hon. Postmaster should have allowed him to complete his ten years so as to entitle him to a pension.

The reason given for retiring him from the service was the saving this change would effect. I frankly admit that I cannot see what saving the minister can effect by retiring Mr. Carrier. First, a gratuity is granted to him, then the person who replaces him must be paid about the same salary. The same reasons were given when the deputy ministers of National Defence and Agriculture were superannuated. It is a very queer economy to practise. Dr. Grisdale, deputy minister of Agriculture is superannuated with a pension of $6,000 or $7,000, and a successor is appointed to whom a large salary is paid. The outcome of it all is that the government instead of making one disbursement makes two disbursements. That is called economy! The case of the national defence is still more flagrant, since, beside paying a pension to the retiring deputy minister, Col. Laflèche is paid a salary and a pension as a disabled veteran of the Great War. In the latter department the government makes three disbursements, while only one was made when Mr. Desbarats was deputy minister.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am not responsible for that.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): In these three cases, those of Mr. Carrier, Mr. Desbarats and Dr. Grisdale, civil servants with long experience were superannuated, they were eminently qualified to carry on their duties, enjoying all their faculties and were still able to render great services to the government. I wish to again protest against the unfair way Mr. Carrier was treated, and I trust that in the future the hon. postmaster will show more consideration for these old employees. It is not because a few among them are liberals—there are still in the Post Office Department a few liberals—that the hon. Postmaster General should take advantage of this discretional power to retire employees at the age of 65, and thus worry them, when he cannot find other reasons to do so.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am greatly surprised to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) in connection with the retirement of Mr. Carrier, postmaster at Levis. Why state in this house that Mr. Carrier was retired because of his political leanings?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Why was he retired?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Because such are the regulations. The opposition appeals to the government to economize, economize, economize! The Postmaster General, for three years, and especially this year, has been practising the strictest economy, with a will, but not pleasurably. Consequently, we have wiped out deficits, considerably decreased expenditure—close to $7,000,000—which corresponds to the policy advocated by the opposition, and resulting, this year, in a surplus of more than $500,000. Does this not please members of the opposition?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Instead of boasting of its deeds...

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Just a minute. The ex-Minister of Justice knows better. There are regulations at the Post Office Department and I assert—I am amazed that the hon. member for Bellechasse ignores it—that in no case of the superannuation of an employee is there displayed the least intention of condemning his political views. Mr. Carrier is one among others, Conservatives, Liberals and many others who, at the age of 65, are obliged to retire pursuant to the regulations adopted in the interest of the administration.

What is the hon. member for Bellechasse saying?

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I was speaking to the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Is the hon. member for Bellechasse prompting the hon. member for Quebec East?

At times, representations were made to the department, specially by postal employee's unions, to have the superannuation act amended—at the time Mr. Carrier was an employee of the Post office department—in order that employees who had not 10 years service, when leaving the service, for one reason or another, might be reimbursed of the amount of their contribution, pursuant to the act.

At present, the only means—the hon. member will note that the system followed in the administration of the department deserves his approval—by which we can reimburse these contributions is by having the amount included in the estimates, and all employees are aware of this. I am astonished that Mr. Carrier who placed his case in the hands of the hon. member for Bellechasse was not better informed. It is a usual practice between the Department of Finance and the councils or representatives of the various civil service associations. I repeat it, sir, with the thousands of employees in the service and the regulations adopted at the request of civil servants for better protection, we are obliged to-day, to observe these regulations, as we do the act. And in the best interests of the administration of the department, I wish to inform hon. members of the opposition that from the economic viewpoint we conform to the regulation, but we are not unfair to employees and such protests would not come from the Postal Employees Association neither from their council.

Again, I state, I am astonished that the hon. member for Bellechasse should think that the Postmaster General shows bad faith when he takes an interest in the welfare of his department.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Oh! oh!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There was just as much solicitude shown to the ex-postmaster Carrier as to others. Conservatives received the same notice. All were on the same footing. Why endeavour, to-day, to reproach me for doing my duty, when it is well known that the aim we are pursuing in acting thus—

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General will readily admit that he has an absolute discretional power as to retiring from the service an employee who is not over 70 years old. When a civil servant has reached the age of 65, the minister may superannuate him but it is optional. When a civil servant is over 70 years, the minister is obliged to superannuate him or request a special vote in the house. However, between 65 and 70 years the minister has an absolute discretional power, he may retire him but it is an optional matter. Such is the case of Mr. Carrier. That is why I contend that the retirement of Mr. Carrier is unfair because he was not allowed to complete the period of 10 years which would have entitled him to a pension. The hon. Postmaster General is well aware that there are in his department perhaps hundreds of employees who are over 65 years old and have not been superannuated. According to a report made recently to the house, there are in the government service, at present, 815 civil servants who are over 65 years old, and who draw, in salaries, almost $2,000,000. Out of this number there must be one third in the Post Office Department. Again, whatever may be said to the contrary, I am convinced that Mr. Carrier was retired because there was a desire to replace a Liberal by a Conservative and no fault could be found with him.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The appointment was made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General informed us that he wished to practise strict economy; he rejoices in the result he is obtaining. Will he state in what consists the saving he realized by retiring Mr. Carrier? He has not informed the house.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to be more serious in my reply than the ex-Minister of Justice has been in his question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): It behooves the Postmaster General to leave jokes aside, it does not suit him.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wonder who is the joker of the two?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): I am not, I have put a serious question.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, it is not a serious one.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Is that so?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): We can treat you as you deserve, if you so desire, I am asking a simple question and I would appreciate a polite reply.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Quebec East will readily admit that it is impossible to state that the dismissal of Mr. Carrier, at the age of 65, will result in a definite revenue. No. However the number of such cases will permit the department to replace them by other employees, at present in the postal service, and this will dispense us from taking on new employees. That is what happened at Levis. It is not an outsider that replaced Mr. Carrier, but a postal employee appointed by the Civil Service Commission. Moreover, the hon. member for Bellechasse will admit that when he states there are so many employees who are over 65 years old and still in the service of the department, he forgets one thing —I do not wish to impute that he shows bad faith—that we are making at present, a census in this respect. A number of them have been notified that their services will end six months hence, others in four months, and the result will be apparent at the end of the year.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Could the hon. Postmaster General state whether there are in his department employees who are more than 75 years old?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There is but one and, because of the special service he renders to the members of this house and the department he is kept on.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General has given a reply to suit his purpose, however, the gentleman referred to draws a salary of $5,220 per year. He has never rendered me a service, neither have I ever asked him for one nor do I intend to do so. There must be another reason for retaining the services of this gentleman after he has reached the age of 75. Not only are there some in the Post Office Department, but they are to be found in other departments. The employee referred to would be well advised to retire from the service. Can the postmaster deny that, in the course of this year, a number of postal employees who earned much less than $5,220, were superannuated? Some of them draw but very small pensions, others do not even draw any, as in the case of Mr. Carrier; while the gentleman referred to, who is far from being poor, could retire from the service with quite a nice pension and, thereby, permit others to be promoted by the Civil Service Commission. Instead of praising so highly his department and rather than dismissing employees with small salaries and granting them petty pensions or none, why does the hon. Postmaster General not exert himself to superannuate employees who have passed the age of 75 and should be retired, so as to permit other civil servants to be rewarded for their services? The hon. postmaster would be very gracious if he could explain this anomaly otherwise than by the reply he has just given now and which is not a reply.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member will readily recognize that the civil servant he refers to has had a long experience and is at the head of an extremely complicated service which we are almost entirely reorganizing, owing to the situation created by the suppression of a large number of trains or railway lines. The rural mail service is being reorganized. This extremely difficult organization needs much experience and even if the hon. member has not come in touch with this official, all members opposite, especially those who have been here any length of time, have had the opportunity of judging of his judicious qualities and his remarkable efficiency due, not only to his ability but especially to his experience.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Would the hon. Postmaster General find himself in a difficult situation, if Providence, unfortunately, decreed that he should be deprived of the services of this remarkable official! What difference would there be if he were superannuated?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We would find ourselves in the same situation as the people of Ottawa, if, to-morrow, they were deprived of their member.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): There is an enormous difference between the two cases.

Mr. BRADETTE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, I think that the hon. Postmaster General does his utmost to help the vast region that I have the honour of representing in the house. I have but one case to submit to the hon. Postmaster General; it is not a question of politics but one of the site of a post office. I refer to Val-Gagné. About 10 months ago, Mrs. Sigouin, the postmistress, died. The people of this beautiful rural village expected that the post office would not be removed, as it was the most central place of this locality. The position was given to a person who has all the qualifications required for a postmaster; however, the choice of the new locality for the post office is not rational, if the aim is an efficient service to the population. I have no criticism to make as regards the person appointed; however, the village of Val-Gagné is located to the south of the T. N. & O railway, while the church is located on this side, as well as all stores, public places, hotels, etc., and though nine-tenths of the population reside in this part of the village.

To-day, owing to the post office having been transferred across the railway, these good people must cross the double track. The hon. Postmaster General can realize the danger threatening these people and the poor service which will result. The son of Mrs. Sigouin, who resided at Ste-Agathe when his mother died, has taken up residence at Val-Gagné and manages the hotel that Mrs. Sigouin owned. This young man is a veteran of the great war. If I am not mistaken, he was even wounded at the front. He was a candidate for the position of postmaster. As I stated, at the outset of my remarks, I am aware that the department, in every possible way, has endeavoured to give the pioneer population of our region a most efficient service. However, to-day, in Val-Gagné, there is an anomaly which inflicts on the population a serious handicap and exposes them, in some measure of risk when they cross the tracks to get their mail, owing to the location of the post office. If the department could possibly, without clashing with the interests of anyone, restore the post office to its original site of two years ago or so, I think that such a step would please at least nine-tenths of the population of this fine new centre.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am pleased to state that I have noted the valuable suggestions made by the hon. member for Temiskaming North (Mr. Bradette) and shall make it a point to see that the population of that region are given satisfaction.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have a very pleasant duty to perform in offering my respects and warmest congratulations to all my colleagues, on this side of the house, who have laid before the hon. Postmaster General, their grievances, and, especially, to the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) who so ably set forth the Missanabie case. I also have another agreeable duty to fulfil, namely, to publicly thank my distinguished colleague and friend, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) for the help he extended to me in the matter of getting all the returns which the house had ordered, in connection with the Missanabie post office. The trouble we were put to in order to obtain these returns, is unbelievable! Repeatedly, I had recourse to every possible means, I wrote to the minister's secretary and also complained to the house. Once even, the hon. Minister of Finance will recall, on a motion for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, I broached this subject, by courtesy for the hon. Minister of Finance, I interrupted my remarks. Later I returned to the attack. I then was seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East; no doubt, the right hon. Prime Minister himself was stirred by the arguments we submitted to the house, to the effect that, when a vote is taken in the house ordering certain returns these must be brought down conscientiously and without reserve by the minister interested. I would not be surprised if the right hon. Prime Minister himself had intervened to remind his colleague that it was his duty to table all the documents belonging to the file referred to, without restriction or concealment, and in their entirety. Finally, that is what happened. I am thankful to the Postmaster General and have given him credit for it.

How does it happen that members are obliged to fight to obtain documents when their return is ordered by the House of Commons itself?

One thing struck me in reading over the Hansard, page 3960. When the Postmaster General stated, when I requested the tabling of these documents:

(Text):

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I cannot say more to-day.

(Translation):

He went no further. However, I note in Hansard:

(Text):

I know the rule.

(Translation):

These words were added, as an after thought, and the following day, when the question again came before the house, the member for Témiscouata spoke as follows:

(Text):

The Postmaster General is reported as having said, "I know the rule." He did not say it.

(Translation):

I said: "He is dumb"—and it is not reported in Hansard.

This is what happened. Hansard twice was tampered with. I gave the Postmaster General the benefit of the doubt, I thought that he was ignorant of the rule, that this was his justification; notwithstanding that ignorance is no excuse before the law, I thought it could be an excuse in politics; I imagined that the Postmaster General was not aware of the rule. Was he boasting when he said he knew the rule? I quoted the case of Sully; why did the Postmaster General have so much trouble with the Sully case? He has himself to blame, for not conforming to the act, as the act obliged him to submit this case to the Civil Service Commission and he failed to do so; he proceeded by delays, decrees of all kinds and in an entirely different way than the one he should have adopted had he wished to do his duty.

He failed in his duty, he endeavoured to free himself from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, he resorted to all kinds of delays to prevent the Civil Service Commission from deciding who should be postmaster of that locality. And it was because the hon. Postmaster General refused to conform himself to the Act, in this case, that he met with difficulties. They are not yet ended, because, as he stated yesterday, he is in no way certain that the Privy Council will approve his proposal to pay Jean $100 so as to indemnify him for all the trouble he had to undergo owing to the fault, negligence, ill-doing of the Postmaster General himself.

That is not all. I requested the tabling of certain documents, or, in other words, I put a question which was changed into an order of the house for returns, on April 19, 1933. What was this question?

1. How many postmasters have been dismissed since the month of August, 1930?
2. How many postmasters have been appointed (a) temporarily; (b) permanently since the month of August, 1930?

At the beginning of the sitting, to-day, I inquired from the Postmaster General when he would reply to these questions. He answered: "As soon as possible." What a clever answer. I waited all day, until 10.15 this evening, to receive this anwer to this motion ordered by the house on April 19—

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me? These answers were sent to Mr. Mulvey, to-day.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): So much the better. Thanks. Better late than never. I wish to thank the Postmaster General for having at last, answered this question just as his estimates are about to be adopted. I have the answer here.

How many postmasters have been dismissed since the month of August, 1930?

On the other hand note this:

How many postmasters have been appointed (a) temporarily
1,153.
3,035.

If the Postmaster General has dismissed 788 employees, if he has only created 300 or 400 new post offices, how has he been able to appoint 1,153 temporary employees and 3,035 permanent employees? He shoved three pegs in each hole. Will the hon. Postmaster General answer this question?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I beg your pardon?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am asking the hon. Postmaster General how it happens that if he only dismissed 788 employees, he was able to appoint 1,153 temporary employees and 3,035 permanent employees, making a total of 4,188 appointments?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We dismissed more than 700 postmasters, it is true, however, the hon. member must not confuse the temporary and permanent employees. The temporary employees are appointed for two or three months, they are then replaced. We are obliged to reply to questions exactly as they are put to us.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Let us discuss the permanent employees and leave out the 1,153 temporary ones. How can the hon. Postmaster General explain that he dismissed only 788 postmasters, that he created only 300 or 400 new post offices and that he was able to appoint 3,035 permanent postmasters? That is a puzzle!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member should know that these figures refer to the service all over Canada, the changes—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The dismissals refer also to all Canada.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): —deceases, changes not connected with dismissals for political reasons.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Well, sir, if there are so many postmasters that die, I shall be forced to conclude that all the Liberals are poisoned. I think, sir, that the hon. Postmaster General's reply is not satisfactory and is unworthy of a cabinet minister. I shall let those who heard the explanation given by the Postmaster General judge of their worth and shall not insist any further on the subject, because I do not wish to unduly delay the adoption of the estimates.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): Is the item carried?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No, no! I have still further questions to ask. I wish to inquire from the hon. Postmaster General whether he was acquainted with a person named Emile Bourré, an ex-employee of the post office, in Montreal, but superannuated in 1931, and to whom leave of absence, with full salary, was granted, before being superannuated.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am not personally acquainted with Mr. Bourré and I cannot answer this question the way it is put, I have not the details with me.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I regret very much that the hon. Postmaster General has not the details with him because I am informed that Mr. Bourré had a leave of absence for 720 days, with full salary, on the recommendation of the Deputy Postmaster General. I cannot vouch for the fact, I received the information through the mail. I cannot vouch for it as a fact. A letter received informs me that this chap was given 720 days leave of absence. He must be some kind of friend.

I have been requesting, sir, since April 19, from the hon. Postmaster General, the information which he gave me just now, be made a statement with reference to the dismissal of postmasters under various governments, he quietly passed over Louis Philippe Pelletier's mournful reign at the Post Office Department, when the guillotine was in constant motion.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member will have to restrict his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am discussing it. I am asking the hon. Postmaster General to furnish me with certain information; it was the minister who set the example by quoting the number of dismissals since 1896.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I would request the hon. member to set the example.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Certainly, I am endeavouring, however, to nail the hon. Postmaster General to the discussion of the estimates such as they should be carried on. And when I inquired as to the dismissals of postmasters since August, 1930—the house having ordered the tabling of this information—his duty was to give the full information and there was no need of going back to 1896, while at the same time leaving a wide gap between 1911 and 1921. I have remained faithful to the great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I recall how he reprimanded the then Postmaster General in 1911.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): We cannot discuss this evening, under item 272, the post office administration of Mr. Pelletier.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Certainly, and this is why: The Postmaster General made a statement—

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I wonder why the chairman did not call the Postmaster General to order when he referred to the dismissals of 1896 to 1911?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I am not responsible for my actions to the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): You are not responsible for your actions to me, sir; however, I think I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I would request the hon. member to adhere to the item under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall not further insist. I am not going to start a boxing match in the house.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): This in no way unnerves me.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No. I regret that there seems at times to be two weights and two measures.

I am not going to discuss what has already been debated in the house. I found quite an interesting document in the patent records. It is the description of the letter box, the famous box, a marvel of Amédée Lesieur, patented under another name. Amédée Lesieur, I stated the other day, was a wine merchant of Montreal, who had carried on a profitable business when the Scott Act was in force in Quebec; now he is a manufacturing agent, an agent of applicants for patents. The following is what is found in the Canadian

Patent Office Record of February 9, 1932, p. 338—

You are aware, sir, that pure water is called in pharmaceutics aqua pura and that under that term a druggist always asks a higher price for a bottle of aqua pura than for an ordinary glass of water. I also am aware that chemists designate it as H^2O; it is a chemical formula which means water—pure water as obtained from a tap just like the water the Prime Minister sent, at the expense of the state, to Washington for the use of the Kiwanis club. That is called, sir, diplomatic water, it is a special water. However, the following is the description of the famous box of which you have a photograph under your eyes, that stove pipe which is described as if it were the eighth marvel of the world.

When the description of this stove pipe is read to you, sir, you will imagine it is made of platinum, with gold supports, covered with rubies and similar to the ancient jewels found in Tut-Ank-Ahmon's tomb. Allow me to read to you the marvellous description of Amédée Lesieur's box:

No. 319,598. Mail Box. Boîte postale.
Alfred Edmund Guy Madley, Westmount, Quebec, Canada, 9th February, 1932. Filed 3rd December, 1931. Serial No. 384,322.

1. A rural mail box comprising a cylindrical casing closed at one end—

It is no longer a stovepipe closed at one end; it has become a cylindrical casing.

—and open at the other end—

As all stove pipes are.

—a hingedly mounted door for the open end, combined reinforcing and spring actuated supporting means for the box.

Is that not marvellous?

2. A rural mail box comprising a cylindrical casing with a pivotally mounted door—

One is a hingedly mounted door and is a pivotally mounted door.

—at one end and closed at the other end, a bendable metallic band adapted to envelop and reinforce the box—

Apparently the box is reinforced at both ends.

—and having one end suitably bent, a standard provided with a cap having an opening therein, a retaining bolt spring pressed for engagement with the band and with the standard and a tensioning nut for said bolt.

So there is a nut for the bolt. This is very important, very difficult and very highly technical.

3. In a rural mail box and in combination, a cylindrical casing closed at one end and provided with a gravity-operable door—

[Mr. Pouliot.]

So we have three doors, the hingedly mounted door, the pivotally mounted door and now the gravity operable door.

—at the other end, a standard, a combined reinforcing and supporting member for the casing and pivotal spring pressed means connecting said member with the standard.

Is that not marvellous? Is it not a grand thing for which to grant $28,000 to this fellow? Mark you, sir, that the report of the Postmaster General is dated November 5, 1931. He speaks of the scarcity of rural mail boxes in the maritime provinces and in Quebec, and he goes on to say:

This box is a greatly improved one, is patented and cannot be purchased elsewhere, and is particularly adapted to use in the postal service. The minister states that the price of $2.75 is fair and reasonable.

I am sure the minister has never seen the box; he has only seen the description. The descriptions of the three doors are worth a dollar each; this man was a marvel to make such a wonderful thing for 25 cents less than the $3.

An hon. MEMBER: How many did they buy?

Mr. POULIOT: The department bought ten thousands boxes, and on each box this wine merchant made a profit of $2. I wonder if he could not have used those boxes for wine containers. Evidently he thought it was just as well to sell them to the Postmaster General empty, so that they could be used as rural mail boxes. This shows how money is wasted while the salaries of the poor postmasters are cut ten per cent. Here is a fellow to whom the country owes nothing but who receives a grant of $20,000 from the Postmaster General. The hon. gentleman submitted his report to council on November 5 but the application for a patent was not filed until December 3, long afterwards. Yet the minister speaks highly of the economies he has made in his department.

I have tried to sum up what I have to say in the most concise way possible, but there is still another case I wish to submit to the committee. It is next to the last and I shall try to make it as short as possible. If I have gone into details in connection with these mail boxes it is only to show the house and the country how the Postmaster General is wasting his time in connection with such petty matters. He would do better to abide by the law instead of wasting time evading it.

Now, sir, let us discuss the Notre-Dame-du-Lac case. On July 15, 1931, we find a memo of the Postmaster General to the Governor in Council with reference to the dismissal of Antoine Landry, postmaster, for political partizanship.

On August 18, 1931, order in council P.C. 1994 dismissing Antoine Landry. August 31, 1931, application for the position by the returned soldier Dominique Côté to the Postmaster General.

September 5, 1931, Mr. Gaboury, deputy Postmaster General, writes to Dominique Côté:

I have noted your application, however, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that the appointment in this case is under the control of the Civil Service Commission which will give public notice of the vacancy in the locality. You may then put in your application in the regular way on the form which can be obtained at the post office itself or at the office of the Quebec District Superintendent of Postal Services.

On September, 1931, another letter from the returned soldier Dominique Côté, addressed to the Postmaster General.

On September 24, 1931, reply of Mr. Gaboury to Mr. Côté:

I have noted what you state, however, as I pointed out in my letter of September 5, the appointment in this case is a matter which comes under the purview of the Civil Service Commission.

On September 26, 1931, Mr. C. E. Dubé wrote to Mr. Gaboury that the returned soldier Côté was in no way qualified, having no education:

I recommend that Mr. J. Thomas Voisine be appointed temporarily and when the time comes to appoint a permanent postmaster, through the Civil Service Commission, Mr. Côté will have the full right of applying, and the commission will be able to judge whether he is qualified, which I doubt.

What Mr. Dubé wrote to the deputy Postmaster General is quite right. However, when he recommended such a person to fill the vacancy temporarily, that is not as right. The returned soldier should have been appointed, however, one must be broad-minded in this connection and not blame him.

On September 28, 1931, Mr. Underwood notifies Mr. Green, superintendent at Quebec, that the appointment of Mr. Voisine, as temporary postmaster is an accomplished fact. On October 28, 1931, the post office is transferred to Voisine.

On November 27, 1931, the returned soldier Côté forwards to the Postmaster General a petition bearing sixty-three signatures.

On December 4, 1931, the Deputy Postmaster General wrote to Mr. Côté that the appointment in this case is under the control of the Civil Service Commission.

On December 5, 1931, the Deputy Postmaster General writes to the Civil Service Commission and requests a temporary certificate for Voisine. On January 5, 1932, Mr. Underwood writes to Mr. Green instructing him to advertise the position. The notices are posted for the period between January 9 and 24, 1932. The qualifications required are: a sufficient education to keep ordinary accounts, carry on a limited correspondence and serve the public in a proper way.

On January 21, 1932, the Deputy Postmaster General notifies the Civil Service Commission that the Postmaster General is not in a position to send in the report with reference to the applications. On February 24, matters have not changed. A temporary certificate is requested rather than to conform with the Act and allow the Civil Service Commission to make the appointment.

On March 24, 1932, Mr. Underwood writes to Mr. Green, then follows a report from Mr. Green with reference to those who have applied for the position of postmaster at Notre-Dame-du-Lac.

Ottawa, March 24, 1932

S, Tanner Green, Esq.,
District Superintendent of Postal Service,
Quebec, P.Q.

Dear Sir,—

Re: Notre Dame du Lac

I am returning herewith your report on the applicants for this position.

In reference to the application of Mr. Dominique Cote, returned soldier, the Inspector rates the applicants 85 per cent but it is stated that the location and accommodation offered are poor.

The point is, is the location and accommodation poor to the extent of rendering it an undesirable situation for the Post Office? if so, then in reply to question 20 your answer should be "No" and the reason should be "Unsatisfactory accommodation and location."

As a matter of fact, the rating given to the candidate covers all factors. It covers the educational qualifications of the candidate, his ability to fill the position, his habits, standing in the community and also the accommodation and location which he offers.

If the accommodation is barely satisfactory but you are of the opinion that a satisfactory service could be given, then your rating should be slightly more than 60 to indicate that notwithstanding the fact that the accommodation is poor it is sufficiently good to justify the placing of the Post Office at that point.

Will you please be good enough to give this matter further consideration and return the report with any amendments which you feel are necessary, at the earliest possible moment.

Yours very truly,

E. J. UNDERWOOD,
Chief Superintendent of Post Office Service.

S.P. No. 218, (p. 59)
Ref. No. 80,
January 25, 1933.

(Translation):

The same question was put to each of the candidates, to Voisine and Côté: Will you change the site of the post office, if you are appointed? Reply of Mr. Côté: "No." Reply of Mr. Voisine: "No." That is, the site was to be the same, in both cases. Yet, it was contended that the site suggested by Mr. Côté was unsuitable while the one suggested by Mr. Voisine was a suitable one. And an official, so important as Mr. Underwood wrote to Mr. Green, of Quebec, to request him to change the rating of Côté because he had offered an unsuitable site, when this site was exactly the same as the one offered by Voisine. What what was the rating of Voisine? Ninety per cent. Dominique Côté, 85 per cent. However, note, sir, that it was said then that Voisine was offering a suitable site while Côté was offering a rather unsuitable one. For Voisine, it was said: "Private residence, very good accommodation." For Côté: "Private residence, poor accommodation."

This was evidently the reason for which the rating of Voisine was 90 per cent while that of Côté was 85 per cent.

Now, sir, what was the second report sent? I had all the trouble in the world to lay my hand on the first report of Mr. Green. I was obliged to have motion after motion adopted, and I had to write many a time to the Postmaster General and his officials, so as to obtain this report. Why is this information, which is requested by members who have a right to it, not given with good grace by the hon. Postmaster General? I have here the second report referring to Voisine and Côté:

Thomas Voisine: Class C, married, age 52; residence in "the" district 12; service overseas, no; education, primary; speaks, reads and writes French, but no English; has the candidate himself the required qualifications to perform efficiently the duties of this position, yes; character, very good; habits, very good; reputation, very good; what experience has the candidate had which may enable him to fill this position? None, except as temporary postmaster; other experience, secretary to the municipality of Ste-Rose.

Dominique Côté:

Class B, bachelor, age 35; residence in the district 35; service overseas, yes; education, primary; speaks, reads and writes French, but not English; has the candidate himself the required qualifications to perform efficiently the duties of that position? yes; character, very good; habits, very good; reputation, very good; what experience has the candidate had which may enable him to fill this position? none; other experience, always been a labourer.

The two candidates were questioned.

Rating: Thomas Voisine, 90 per cent; Dominique Côté, 75 per cent.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

That is, in the second report it was no more stated that Côté offered an unsuitable site, which was untrue, the first time. The qualifications of the two candidates were the same with this difference that one, Côté, was a returned soldier, and that the other, Voisine, was not, and the rating of Voisine is left at 90 per cent, while the rating of Côté is reduced from 85 per cent to 75 per cent. That is, according to Mr. Underwood, when the Postmaster General stated that Côté had offered an unsuitable site, he had 85 per cent; when he offers a suitable site, he is reduced to 75 per cent. The report continues:

The post office is no more in a public building, but in a separate one and a very good site. Even if there is no change.

Each candidate is willing to devote all his time to the duties which the post office necessitates. Voisine intends to obtain the help of his son and daughter and Côté the help of Miss Blanche Landry, who has had six years of postal experience.

Moreover, that is how post offices are kept in rural sections.

Do you consider this candidate sufficiently qualified as regards education, experience, personal qualifications, character, honesty, also do the premises and site answer the requirements of the post office in question?

Answer: yes, in both cases.

Signed by Jos. Lallier, Inspector of Postal Service, and countersigned by S. Tanner Green.

On March 23, 1932, Mr. Foran wrote to Mr. Gaboury:

(Text) Re Notre-Dame du Lac. I am to draw your attention to the fact that the time limit for receiving applications in this case was January 2, 1932, and to inquire whether the Department is yet in a position to submit the report on the qualifications of the candidates.

On April 1, 1932, Mr. Coolican writes to Mr. Foran:

(Text) I may say that the department is not yet in a position to furnish that report.

On April 15, 1932, temporary certificate from the Civil Service Commission, not to exceed two months from February 28, 1932.

On April 25, 1932, Mr. Foran to Mr. Gaboury:

(Text) As three months have now elapsed since the closing date for receiving public applications, will you kindly co-operate with the Commission in expediting the matter.

On May 11, 1932, temporary certificate from the Civil Service Commission, for a month, from April 28, 1932. Foran to Gaboury:

(Text) I am also directed to say that no further extension will be granted until the report has been received.

On May 17, 1932, another letter from the returned soldier Dominique Côté to the minister:

On May 18, reply of Gaboury to Côté:

I may state that the decision in this case entirely rests with the Civil Service Commission.

On May 19, 1932, Mr. C-E. Dubé writes to Mr. Sauvé:

I would suggest that Mr. Dominique Côté be examined as to—

In " au point de vue," the last word is wrongly spelt "vu."

In "son instruction" the first word is wrongly spelt "sont."

Instead of "qu'on commence," he writes "qu'en" commence, etc.

On May 23, 1932, reply of the Postmaster General to Mr. Dubé:

I noted your suggestions and I shall refer to them later.

On May 30, 1932, Mr. Grondin writes to the member for Témiscouata:

The report with reference to the candidates has not been forwarded to the Civil Service Commission and as the revenue of this post office last year was only $1,782, the permanent appointment will be made by the Post Office Department. This affair will receive the necessary attention, as soon as possible.

On May 30, 1932, three practically similar letters from Joseph Dubé, harness merchant; from Georges Voisine, councillor of Notre-Dame-du-Lac and brother of the other Voisine—a letter without date—and from Philippe Morin, June 3, 1932, on behalf of Thomas Voisine and against Dominique Coté, to the Postmaster General.

This is what happened. Instead of submitting the case to the Civil Service Commission, the Postmaster General listened to the recommendations or gossip which came from three unqualified individuals of Notre-Dame-du-Lac.

The hon. Postmaster General wrote to me as follows, on July 13, 1932:

The superintendent has forwarded together with his report a letter from Mr. Côté, a photographed copy of which I am sending you, it gives a good idea of the education of this candidate. You will no doubt, be of my opinion, that the Postmaster General cannot entrust the postal administration, especially when it is a matter of such importance as the post office of Notre-Dame-du-Lac, to a candidate who has no experience in office work and who, judging from his writing, is not capable of personally taking charge of the post office.

And the Postmaster General sends me a photostat of a letter from the returned soldier Côté, of Notre-Dame-du-Lac. I replied to the Postmaster General that his writing was better than his or mine.

Another case. According to a return tabled recently, may I inquire what was decided with reference to the person who was appointed postmaster at Coaticooke? It is a much more important post office than Notre-Dame-du-Lac. The Coaticooke post office has a revenue of $5,255 per year.

(Text):

This certificate is number 5255, dated February 21, 1933, and reads:

The education of this candidate is, however, rather limited, and the first inclination of the examiners was to report it as inadequate. He did not complete the primary school course and his showing on the written test was not good. It was felt, however, that some allowance should be made in so far as the written examination is concerned for his obvious nervousness at the time of the examination.

(Translation):

There were ten other candidates. However, this chap, who was not qualified was appointed. The Postmaster General will contend that he was appointed by the Civil Service Commission. That is true. But, on the other hand, the Postmaster General accepted from the Civil Service Commission the appointment of an uneducated person, as postmaster of an office which has a revenue of $5,255 per year; yet he finds that a candidate considered sufficiently educated by an inspector, is unfit to take charge of a post office with a revenue of $900 per year.

As to the rating, the following is what the Deputy Minister wrote himself to the Civil Service Commission. Return No. 65 S.P. 192:

The department does not assume that the commission is bound to accept as unquestionable the rating given by the district superintendent of postal service. The department has had sufficient experience to know that this is not the case.

There is a complaint in connection with the Coaticooke post office and I trust that, in future, the hon. Postmaster will conform to the act when it is a question of making appointments or dismissals and that he will guard himself against doing an injustice and, moreover, not come to the house boasting like the Pharisees of the good deeds done and the prayers said.

The hon. Postmaster seems to have every theological virtue and all those that man may have inherited since Adam. That is splendid, but sounds like the Pharisees. It is much better to be a publican and not boast so much. The hon. Postmaster General would have been better advised to allow the members to give credit for good deeds rather than have him behead certain postmasters of their country. It would have been better for them to defend him when he was attacked. I think that it would have been more proper and decent for the party's sake that the members who requested the Postmaster General to be unjust, to rise themselves and defend his attitude. Perhaps, many things were requested from the minister, which he now regrets and hon. members have not the courage to rise in the house and defend him.

I wish to state to the hon. Postmaster General: If he wishes to retain the esteem of our English speaking fellow-citizens in the Cabinet, the House of Commons and throughout the country, he should take as his motto these few words said by the most eminent of all French Canadians, Sir Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine: "Let us assert our rights." Let us prove our courage, let us never be intimidated by the cries of fish-hawks which fanatics set up all over the country. Fanaticism is of short duration. When an appeal is made to hatred of race, language and religion, sooner or later, it is certain to cause a revolution. Let one recall that in 1917 the election was made against Quebec, that the Union Cabinet denounced Quebec in every part of Canada and, four years later, it was Quebec who gave the majority to the party which triumphed.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay the house any longer, I stated part of what I had to say, I set aside much because we are nearing the end of the session; however, I would request the government to see that the injustice perpetrated by the Post Office department be atoned and that it be courageous enough to refuse the requests of its partizans who are not, themselves called upon to defend the government. I trust that, in the future, they will better defend it, that no more injustice will be perpetrated against the French or English speaking Canadians, and that the Postmaster General will act so as to be equally respected by both French and English speaking Canadians.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Before this item is carried, I wish to suggest to the Postmaster General some means to make amends for the wrong done to Mr. Carrier, ex-postmaster of Levis. It goes without saying that the Postmaster General was unfair to this man. He knew that his services had always been of the best, that his conduct was above reproach, that nothing could be said against him from a political viewpoint and, he was aware that in retiring from the service, Mr. Carrier, the latter could not enjoy a pension. I would request the hon. Postmaster General, so as to make amends for the wrong done, to reimburse him the contribution he made to the superannuation fund, beside the gratuity already paid to him. I trust that the hon. Postmaster General wishes to do a kind act before retiring for the night and that he will think over my suggestion and carry it out.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION FOR SATURDAY SITTING

Mr. BENNETT: The notice standing for Saturday's sitting will have to be dropped from the order paper because it refers only to this Saturday. If it is desirable to move another motion for next Saturday we can do so. In order that the clerk may have his record correct, I suppose the house will have to consent to this motion being dropped, although no doubt it would be dropped automatically because it refers to no other Saturday except this.

Motion dropped.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Monday, May 15, 1933

The house met at eleven o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1933-34

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1934, was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

CONSCRIPTION IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) arising out of a report that appears in this morning's Citizen of a statement made by Brigadier Anderson. He is reported as saying:

> It is my own idea that militia training in Canada should be on a basis of conscription, under which every man between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five might be compelled to train so many days each year.

I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence or the acting Prime Minister if that represents the present policy of the government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): If my hon. friend will allow me I will take that as notice of motion. It is not the policy of this government at all, but at the same time I think that question ought to be answered by the Minister of National Defence himself, who does not happen to be here this morning.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) a question in connection with a press dispatch that I noticed stating that the operating deficit of the car ferry steamer to Prince Edward Island will be charged to the consolidated revenue of Canada rather than to the Canadian National Railways. I would like to ask if that is a fact, and if it will affect the standing of the men?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): I think I will have to make a few remarks in reply to that question. The Prince Edward Island car ferry has been operated in the past by the Canadian National Railways as part of eastern lines, and whatever deficit there has been on it has been absorbed into the eastern lines' deficit. There has been a great deal of pressure, as my hon. friend probably knows, from Prince Edward Island chambers of commerce and various other bodies who seem to desire very strongly that so far as accounting is concerned it should be dealt with by the government itself, while operation is still handled by the Canadian National Railways. At their request, and after a great deal of pressure,—because frankly I did not see any advantage in it myself—it has been arranged that in the future, while the Canadian National Railways will still handle the ferry as they have in the past, the accounting will be separate and the estimate for the deficit on the operation of the ferry, if any, will be submitted to the house as a separate estimate.

I do not think it will make any difference in any shape or form to the men working on the ferry, I cannot see how it should.

PRIVATE BILL

GENTER THICKENER COMPANY

On the order for the house to go into committee on Bill No. 102, respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company—Mr. Chevrier.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the hon. gentleman who is responsible for this bill I would like it to stand until the Prime Minister is present, because he has something he wishes to say on it. It can come up tomorrow night when he will be here.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REPORTED ENGAGEMENTS OF PRIME MINISTER—PROSPECTS FOR PROROGATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) how much time this week he expects the Prime Minister to be here? From accounts in the press it would appear that the Prime Minister is not to be in parliament at all this week, except for one day.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The Prime Minister will be here tomorrow and answer for himself. As far as I am concerned I have been hoping that hon. gentlemen on the other side would allow the session to close early this week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the acting Prime Minister and members of the government will keep in mind that we are sitting here morning, afternoon and night, and we hope every effort will be made by the government to facilitate prorogation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I say to my right hon. friend that so far there has been business before the house at all times, and certainly none of the time has been wasted by the government.

SARNIA-PORT HURON VEHICULAR TUNNEL COMPANY

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. ROSS W. GRAY (West Lambton) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 41, to incorporate the Sarnia-Port Huron Vehicular Tunnel Company.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

TAX FREE BONDS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What is the amount of interest which the government pays annually on government tax-free bonds?
2. What is the amount of interest which the government pays annually on other government bonds?

Mr. RHODES:

1. On bonds presently outstanding, $39,347,950.25; after November 1, 1933, the annual interest on tax-free bonds will be $17,548,534.
2. $87,891,548.88.

BANQUE PROVINCIALE—DEPOSITS

Mr. FERLAND:

1. What is the amount of deposits in savings accounts of the Banque Provinciale du Canada in each province?
2. What are the guarantees of this bank to insure the reimbursement of such deposits?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Not reported under the Bank Act.
2. There is no statutory guarantee. Depositors in a bank rely upon the liquidity and solvency of the institution.

MOOSE BAY—WHARF

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. What was the cost of repairs made since August 7, 1930, to the wharf at Moose bay, Piopolis, on lake Megantic, province of Quebec?
2. Were the repairs carried out by contract?
3. Was the contract awarded after calling for public tenders and to the lowest tenderer?
4. To whom was the contract awarded?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. $1,642.17.
2. No.
3 and 4. Answered by No. 2.

CRANE ISLAND—WIRELESS STATION

Mr. FAFARD:

1. Did the government establish a wireless station at Crane island last year?
2. If so, who is in charge of such station and what salary or remuneration does he receive?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.
2. (a) Charles Narcisse Roy; (b) $100 per year.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

MAIL DELIVERY—QUEBEC

Mr. FERLAND:

1. What towns and cities in the province of Quebec have letter carriers for the purpose of mail delivery from house to house?
2. What towns and cities in such province have no letter carrier service?
3. What is the population of each town and city in the province of Quebec?

Mr. CAHAN: Tabled forthwith:

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF PATENT SOLICITORS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What is the purpose of the body known as the Canadian Institute of Patent Solicitors named in regulation 12, governing the Unfair Competition Act of 1932?
2. What firms or individuals are members of the said Canadian Institute of Patent Solicitors?
3. Is this institute an incorporated legal body?
4. Has the institute authority to say who may or who may not practise before the Canadian trade mark office; if so, for what reason?
5. Is the attorney who is fully qualified and who has been practising before the Canadian trade mark office for years, obliged to pay fees to this institute before being recognized by the trade mark office of the government; if so, why?
6. What provision has been made for existing Canadian patent attorneys to continue practising if they should not feel disposed to join the Canadian Institute of Patent Solicitors?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

MOTION FOR PAPERS

LEASE OF ARMOURY—SHAUNAVON, SASK.

Mr. BOTHWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, passing between the Canadian Legion, British Empire Service League of Shaunavon, Saskatchewan, or any representative thereof, and the Department of Public Works and the Department of National Defence, together with a copy of correspondence passing between the said two departments or between any person and either of the said departments, relative to the lease—or renewal thereof—of the armoury at Shaunavon, Saskatchewan, since August, 1930.

COMPANIES AND CREDITORS

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 77, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between companies and their creditors.

He said: The only amendment, Mr. Speaker, is the substitution of the word "and" for the word "on".

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 107, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and France.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is framed to approve of the trade arrangement between Canada and France which was signed at Ottawa on the 12th of May of this year. It is within the knowledge of the house that the former trade agreement, which was signed in 1922, was terminated in June of last year, and this is a new agreement to provide for reciprocal tariffs on the exchange of goods between the two countries in substitution for the agreement which was terminated.

The house is well aware that since 1892, when Mr. Maline made his celebrated report to the French government, France has been one of the most highly protected countries in Europe or, I think, in the world. When that report was made the basis of the French tariff law France became predominantly protective in its tariff policy, and in that year established its new schedules under which there was a maximum general tariff and also a minimum tariff applicable to all imports into France. Especially in respect to agricultural products has France been highly protected. It has been the policy of France ever since 1892 to protect its own agricultural products with a view to making that country independent of the rest of the world, especially with regard to wheat and other grains, in case a national emergency should arise, and the French people again be called to arms. It is a very significant fact that, going back for scores of years and in fact for centuries, no man has reached the age of fifty-five or sixty in France who has not seen that country over-run by foreign troops in an attempt to subjugate that nation. France has felt unable to protect its supplies of food coming from overseas, and therefore has insisted on maintaining a highly protective policy for the purpose of encouraging the production of food supplies within its own boundaries. Those hon. gentlemen who have gone through France, as I have on many occasions, will remember passing through miles and miles of wheat fields which compare not only well but very favourably indeed with the best wheat fields of our western country.

Prior to 1892, when France adopted these maximum and minimum tariffs, Canada had no trade arrangement with that country. Our trade and commercial arrangements were governed up to that time by treaties or conventions which had been negotiated by the government of the United Kingdom and which applied to us as they did to the other dominions, colonies and possessions of Great Britain. But after this new tariff was adopted Sir Charles Tupper, then High Commissioner for Canada at London, proceeded to Paris and on behalf of the government of Canada concluded negotiations for the first trade treaty with France, which was signed by the British ambassador and by Sir Charles Tupper, on behalf of Canada, on February 6, 1893. This trade treaty was subsequently approved by the Canadian parliament in 1894.

Under the provision of that trade arrangement Canada secured the French minimum tariff on some nineteen staple Canadian products in return for concessions made by Canada, by way of reduction of our Canadian import duties on wines, soaps and a number of other products of France. But after 1893 Canadian industrial and agricultural production increased very rapidly and became more diversified than before, and the agreement which was ratified by Canada in 1895 came to be regarded with more or less dissatisfaction in this country. Further negotiations then ensued between the two countries after the close of a colonial conference at London in 1902, at which it was practically decided that this dominion would grant special preferences to Great Britain which would not be granted to foreign countries. But after the return of Sir Wilfrid Laurier from the colonial conference of 1902 the French government insisted that no modification of the existing trade arrangement with France would be made unless Canada would concede to France the same low preferential rates, which had been conceded to Great Britain, and which were comprised in the so-called "British preferential tariff." The government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier however refused to make this concession, and so for a time the negotiations continued and finally failed. But in 1907 the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier resumed negotiations with France, and on September 19 of that year a new convention was signed at Paris by the British ambassador and by Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, and Mr. Brodeur, a minister of the crown, I have forgotten his office—

An hon. MEMBER: Minister of Marine.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on behalf of Canada. Owing to the opposition of the French Senate, which still continued, this convention was further modified and amended by a supplemental convention, signed January 23, 1909, and this amended convention of 1907-09 was then approved and came into force on February 1, 1910. The list of Canadian products entering France under the French minimum tariff was extended by this trade convention, and France, Algeria and the French colonies received the benefit of Canada's intermediate tariff which had then been established.

These arrangements continued until after the close of the great war, when, the French tariff having been increased from time to time, it was found that the high general tariff of France had practically precluded numerous industrial and agricultural products of Canada from access to the French market. The Canadian government then proposed to grant to all French products the advantages of Canada's intermediate tariff in return for the grant of the French minimum tariff to a more extended list of Canadian products. This the French government of the day refused to concede, and on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the convention of 1907-09 was denounced by Canada on March 19, 1920, and terminated on June 19, 1920. The following year, further negotiations between the governments of the two countries resulted in a modus vivendi or temporary arrangement being concluded at Paris on January 29, 1921. Broadly speaking, this temporary arrangement was based on the convention then recently terminated. Twenty-six new items were included in this arrangement on terms more favourable to Canada, but a number of Canadian products then received less favourable rates from France, being removed from the French minimum rate and granted new tariff rates which were intermediate between the French minimum tariff and the French maximum tariff.

In the following summer of 1922 the Hon. W. S. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, and the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the present distinguished member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) negotiated a new convention with France which was signed at Paris on December 15, 1922, by the British ambassador and by the two Canadian ministers mentioned. This new trade convention was approved by parliament and brought into force on September 5, 1923. Under its terms Canada afforded to France fixed tariff rates on a number of items substantially lower than Canada's intermediate tariff, so that thereafter there were fixed rates on thirty-one items or parts of items on the Canadian tariff, lower than the intermediate tariff rates then prevailing; and this new arrangement also conceded to France Canada's intermediate tariff rates, less a discount of ten per cent on ninety-one items or parts of items, and intermediate rates decreased by a discount of fifteen per cent on three items. In addition, Canada granted to France complete most favoured nation treatment in respect of all tariff matters. In return France granted its minimum tariff on one hundred and forty-one tariff items, a considerable number of which—I say this without special criticism—covered chemical and other products which have never since been produced in Canada, and on other items certain percentages of reduction in the maximum general tariff of France.

Canada was also then accorded better tariff treatment in the French colonies, and provision was made for Canadian products receiving, on importation into France, any tariff concessions then made or thereafter to be made by France to the United States of America. Under this convention of 1922 France retained the unfettered right to increase all or any of her tariff rates, minimum or maximum, at will, without consulting Canada. Widespread increases in French maximum and minimum rates have been the outstanding characteristic of the French tariff policy since that convention came into force.

In April and August of 1926, there was a general increase in French customs rates aggregating approximately sixty-nine per cent of the rates in force on nearly all commodities. These rates were effected for the purpose of readjusting French customs tariff protection to French national industry and production. Later, the French tariff revision of September 6, 1927, not only reclassified numerous sections of the French tariff but also established maximum and minimum rates considerably higher than those which had previously been in force. For example—I trust the house will allow this digression because it is of real significance under present conditions—since 1926 the French minimum customs duty on Canadian wheat and other wheat products has been raised on four different occasions. Expressing these increases in the equivalent of Canadian currency it will be ascertained that on September 3, 1927, the previously existing rate was increased to 17½ cents per bushel; by November 18, 1927, the rate had been increased to 27 cents per bushel; by May 24, 1929, it had been increased to 37 cents per bushel; by May 20, 1930, to 33 cents per bushel and since May 20, 1930, to 85 cents per bushel. These were all increases in the minimum tariff of France. The maximum rate or the general tariff was made twice the minimum rate and on the importations of wheat into France from Canada it stands to-day at approximately $1.70 per bushel. The increases I have mentioned, that is those up to 85 cents per bushel, were made in the minimum tariff to which Canada was entitled under the convention then in force. Since June of last year when that treaty was terminated, as I said before, Canadian wheat has been subjected to the maximum tariff rate which is the equivalent of $1.70 per bushel in Canadian currency.

Under the French law of December 1, 1929, importations of foreign wheat into France have been restricted by prescribing the percentages of domestic and foreign wheat which may lawfully be used in making flour to be used for bread making. The percentages of foreign wheat which have been prescribed from time to time for domestic use have varied according to the supplies of domestic wheat available. When I was in France, only three per cent of foreign wheat was permitted to be used, but, at the present time, by a decree recently passed, I understand that this percentage of foreign wheat has been reduced from three to one per cent. While I was in France carrying on these negotiations the fall in wheat prices on the French domestic market which then averaged, as the exchange fluctuated, from $1.25 to $1.30 per bushel in Canadian money, had caused such widespread resentment in the agricultural communities throughout France that at one time it was thought the life of the government would be seriously endangered. One afternoon I attended at the Chamber of Deputies when this matter was being discussed and I noticed that a large number of deputies representing agricultural communities were strong in their denunciation of the government for allowing the price of wheat to fall as low as the equivalent in our money of $1.25 per bushel.

In 1931, under the auspices of the League of Nations, France entered into an agreement known as the Stresa convention. This convention has been published in the reports of the League of Nations and I fancy that nearly every member of the house who is interested in agricultural production and especially wheat production is familiar with its terms. Under the terms of this convention France agreed to exceptional and temporary measures in order to assist Hungary and Jugoslavia. Later on, the terms of this convention were extended to Roumania. A rebate of thirty per cent of the minimum tariff on wheat imported into France was allowed to these three countries. This convention granted to each of these three countries the privilege of supplying ten per cent of the annual importations of wheat into France. Therefore, at the present time thirty per cent of the total annual importations of wheat into France is obtained from these three countries of central Europe.

During the discussions which ensued, especially with regard to wheat items, I learned that France was vigorously encouraging the production of wheat in her colonies in northern Africa. The importations of wheat from Algeria, Tunis and Morocco increased from 14,000,000 bushels in 1931 to 24,000,000 bushels last year. Although I have no personal knowledge of the facts, it was stated to me in these conversations that the department of agriculture of France was encouraging the sowing of hard wheat in Algeria. The result has been that France is receiving an independent supply of hard wheat of practically the same standard as that previously imported from Canada. In talking this over with a gentleman who had expert knowledge of wheat growing I was told that unless France imported new seed from Canada from time to time she would be unable to keep up the production of hard wheat in Algeria. Because of the climate and the soil of that country, if the wheat produced is sown again from year to year it becomes more in the nature of soft than hard wheat. There is a gradual deterioration in the hardness of the wheat. These are matters with regard to which I am not capable of giving the house an expert opinion, save this. That, as wheat forms by far the largest part in value of Canada's annual exports to France, I have stressed the difficulties which we have to meet in that market for this important product and I also state that the question of retaining the minimum tariff for Canadian wheat in the French market was one of the greatest difficulties that beset me during the negotiations.

But to return to the trade convention of 1922, France thereafter negotiated with Germany a new trade convention which came into force on December 15, 1928, and by which Germany received from France complete most-favoured nation treatment, and owing to the competition which then ensued Canadian products were by the Franco-German treaty subjected to more severe competition in many lines in the French market. Coincident with the negotiation of this Franco-German treaty, the French government further increased their minimum and maximum rates on many Canadian products which had been included in our Canadian convention of 1922 and thus increased the customs payable on those Canadian products entering the French market. Moreover, as I have already stated, while France under the 1922 convention with Canada was at complete liberty to raise her tariff rates at will, Canada had granted to France fixed tariff rates on thirty-one items or parts of items of our tariff which were substantially lower than our intermediate rates, and by reason of these fixed rates and of the fact that by successive trade agreements Canada had granted most-favoured foreign nation treatment to twenty-three other countries, the whole tariff structure of this country was, in respect of those favoured fixed items, anchored and immovable, so that as long as the convention of 1922 remained in force, Canada was unable to increase her tariff on those items in respect of her imports from twenty-two or twenty-three other countries.

It was therefore deemed essential by this government that Canada should recover freedom of action in tariff matters. Early in February, 1931, the Canadian government sought to obtain satisfactory modifications of the terms of the French trade agreement of 1922 and, failing in this endeavour, this government on December 15, 1931, gave to France six months' notice of the termination of the convention of 1922. At the same time Canada offered to France to enter immediately upon the negotiation of a new trade convention which might be deemed more satisfactory to both countries. The old trade convention therefore terminated on June 16, 1932. Although in the meantime the Canadian government had proposed an interim arrangement to December 31, 1932, on the basis of granting to France, during this interim, most-favoured national treatment for her products in Canada, the French government refused to consent to such an interim arrangement.

It was under these circumstances that, as I was leaving Canada to attend the general assembly of the League of Nations in September last, I was authorized by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who is also Secretary of State for External Affairs, to open, on behalf of the government, conversations with the government of France regarding a new commercial convention between the two countries. In September, therefore, on my way to Geneva, with the assistance and cooperation of the Hon. Philippe Roy, Canadian Minister at Paris, who certainly has a very intimate knowledge of French political affairs and a close acquaintance and friendship with nearly every prominent statesman in France, I met the French Premier, the Minister of Commerce and some of the important officials of the French Department of Foreign Affairs. It was agreed that these conversations would be renewed after my return to Paris at the close of the general assembly of the League of Nations.

The negotiations with the French government commenced effectively in October of last year and were continued with the government of Mr. Herriot until it was defeated in the French chamber in November last. The negotiations thereafter continued with the government of Mr. Paul Boncourt who succeeded Mr. Herriot as premier, and they were practically concluded, except with regard to three or four contentious items under discussion which remained to be settled, as we anticipated, on the morning of January 26 last. We terminated the session of the commission on the 26th to resume on the 27th. On the 27th a crisis arose and I was unable to see the Premier and the Minister of Commerce who had promised to receive me that afternoon. The Minister of Commerce promised to see me later, during the recess between seven and eight o'clock, and then I received word that owing to a crisis having arisen, a caucus of his party had been called for the recess and that our meeting had to be postponed. I was awakened early the following morning from my sleep by the private secretary of one of the ministers to tell me that the discussion had continued all night; that the government had been voted out of office at six o'clock that morning and that they had handed in their resignation at seven o'clock. We therefore initialled the various items agreed to and left, I think, three or four items for further discussion.

I then returned to Canada and after my return a new government was formed with Mr. Deladier as premier. Since that date the negotiations have been concluded, resulting in this trade arrangement and in the other convention. This has been greatly due to the kindly offices of that very estimable gentleman who occupies the position of French Minister at Ottawa and who certainly has devoted himself unsparingly to bringing about a satisfactory trade arrangement between the two countries. I have to pay him a high tribute for his kindness and courtesy to me during the remainder of the negotiations.

Under this new trade arrangement, products coming from France enumerated in schedule C, including seventy-seven tariff items, will enjoy the intermediate tariff of Canada with a discount of 10 per cent therefrom. On fifteen tariff items a higher discount than 10 per cent is granted. Under this arrangement there are no increases on importations into Canada. In respect of seven items, the British preferential tariff is granted, especially in respect to books printed in France in the French language, surgical instruments and scientific apparatus, cinematograph and moving picture films made in France and speaking the French language, while certain articles of special religious significance are admitted to this country free. In respect of certain imports admitted under the same rate as the British preferential tariff, it will be noted that these items will come into force when authorized by order in council. Several of these items, especially books and surgical instruments, seemingly conflict with the Ottawa conference trade agreement between Great Britain and Canada. But during the negotiation of this trade arrangement assurances were received from the government of the United Kingdom that there would be no objection to the inclusion of these special articles in the trade agreement with France. I therefore inserted a proviso in regard to these items coming into force by order in council, in order that official recognition of these concessions might be first obtained from the government of the United Kingdom. I think there is a clear understanding with regard to these matters.

Schedule D contains a supplementary list of tariff items in respect to which French products will enjoy Canada's intermediate tariff. This trade arrangement will be approved and confirmed, if this bill becomes law. As hon. members will notice, it is a provisional agreement which is made pending the conclusion of a commercial convention which will regulate in a more complete and permanent manner trade relations between Canada and France. There were insurmountable difficulties in the way of concluding a more permanent convention, these difficulties being due chiefly to the application of the French minimum tariff to Canadian wheat, and due also to the fact that international monetary policy has not been so stabilized as to enable the respective governments to determine on what basis duties will be levied when imported into either one country or the other. I do not wish to repeat statements about the proposed London economic conference, but it was felt by the Canadian representative that, owing to the wheat conference which was then likely to take place, and is now being held at Geneva, and owing to the subject matter of wheat being one which will come under discussion at London, it was better to arrive at a provisional agreement capable of giving temporary satisfaction than to attempt at this stage to procure a permanent trade convention with France. This trade arrangement is made for the fixed period of one year from May 12, 1933, the date on which it was signed. It may be terminated on May 12, 1934, by either party giving prior notice to the other to that effect on or before February 12, 1934. This trade arrangement may be extended beyond May 12, 1934, by the tacit consent of both parties. If it is continued after May 12, 1934, by tacit consent it may be terminted by either party giving the other three months' notice to that effect.

To this statement one exception is made in respect of No. 68 of the French tariff, which deals with wheat. That exception is to the effect that wheat and other wheat products included in tariff item No. 68 shall enjoy the French minimum tariff for the duration of the present agreement, which is fixed for one year from the date of its signature, with a proviso that not later than March 31, 1934, the two governments will examine together the conditions under which France may find it possible to extend beyond May 12, 1934, this concession of its minimum tariff to Canadian wheat. Moreover another exception is contained in the note attached to schedule A to the effect that a quota of 25,000 quintals of canned salmon will be effective until October 1, of the present year. France has entered into an arrangement with Japan with respect to a supply of canned salmon, and until October 1 next it was impossible, except by violating that convention, to grant to Canada a quota larger than 25,000 quintals.

Mr. NEILL: Is that the League of Nations quintal or the British quintal?

Mr. CAHAN: French quintals.

Mr. NEILL: One hundred pounds?

Mr. CAHAN: I shall have to look that up. As a matter of fact I did not know there was a League of Nations quintal. The one in question however is the European and continental measurement. They agreed that on October 1 of this year they will arrange a new quota. That quota will be arranged on the basis of the French quota law, and will be determined by exportations made from Canada to France in the years 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930. I find that under this tariff arrangement the quintal is equal to 220 pounds. Moreover, with regard to canned lobsters I find we are entitled to an annual quota of 3,000 quintals. Under this trade arrangement Canadian products mentioned in schedule A covering 185 items will enjoy the French minimum tariff. Canadian products mentioned in schedule B covering sixty-five other items will enjoy percentages of reduction in the French general tariff which are specified in schedule B. Provision is also made with respect to exportation of Canadian products to the French colonies and territories. The French colonies are divided into two main groups. The first group comprises the assimilated colonies to which the French customs tariff applies. This group includes Algeria, Indo-China, Madagascar and its dependencies, Mayotte and Camores, Guadaloupe and its dependencies, Martinique, French Guiana and Reunion.

The second group, whose tariffs are not assimilated to that of France, that is, which have a special tariff of their own, includes St. Pierre and Miquelon, Tunis, Morocco, Syria and Lebanon, French West Africa, including Senegal, French Guiana, Mauritania, Ivory Coast, Dahomey, French Sudan, High Volta and Niger. Other colonies not assimilated are French Equatorial Africa, Gabun, Togoland, Cameroons, French Somaliland, French settlements in India, French Oceania, New Hebrides and New Caledonia.

Under these trade arrangements the Canadian products mentioned in schedule A which enjoy the French minimum tariff in France when imported into the French colonies which are termed assimilated, that is colonies which have the same customs tariff as France, will enjoy the minimum tariff, whether this is the French customs minimum tariff or the minimum special colonial tariff then in force in that colony. Canadian products mentioned in schedule B on importation into the French colonies whose tariff is assimilated to that of France will enjoy the percentages of reduction on the general or maximum tariff mentioned in schedule B whether that tariff is the French tariff or a special colonial tariff. In the French colonies which are not assimilated, that is, which do not come under the French tariff, as well as in all French protectorates, the products of Canada enumerated in both schedules A and B will enjoy the lowest customs tariff applicable to such goods, no matter what may be their origin.

I suppose that in looking ahead one cannot altogether ignore the advantage of Canadian products having access to the territories of France. Spread as they are throughout the world, they represent a population of sixty millions of people. According to the last statistics available to me their annual imports were $707,000,000 or $708,000,000 of our money, and their exports $588,000,000 of our money, representing a total trade of nearly $1,300,000,000. We have participated in this trade to a certain extent, but I think not exceeding $1,000,000 to $1,500,000—I thought I had the statistics at hand, but I have not at the moment. The opinion prevalent in the discussions which I had with the commission, which was composed of official representatives of the French Foreign Office, the Finance department, the Commercial department and the departments of Agriculture and Colonies, was that in many of these colonies Canada had rare opportunities for advancing its trade.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it necessary to proceed further to discuss the items of these schedules. I would only remind the house that under the conditions which now prevail throughout the world it must be conceded that I met with exceptional difficulties in the prolonged discussions which took place at Paris. In those discussions I trust I was not unduly anxious to secure a new trade arrangement with France by reason of the fact that I am one of the ministers of the crown in this government representing the province of Quebec, which province by racial ties and speech and intimate social intercourse has special affinities for France and a desire to maintain the most cordial relations between Canada and France, though I was not unmindful of such considerations. Moreover I can say with all frankness that whether I succeeded to your satisfaction or not I gave to these negotiations all my heart and mind and strength. I did the best I could, and perhaps I am egotistical enough to think that I did as well as could possibly have been done under the conditions which confronted me.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it has been a pleasure to everyone in the house to note with what thoroughness the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) has dealt with the matter of this treaty. I think we all feel that we can extend a word of congratulation to the Secretary of State for the tireless efforts he has put forth in order to bring about the best possible convention that could be arranged at the present time. As he points out, the convention is not a permanent one, but only more or less of a stop-gap to keep the door open until after the economic conference, and therefore I am sure the difficulties encountered were even greater than had it been a permanent treaty.

Those of us sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, can naturally have no objection to a treaty being made with the republic of France. We accept the principle of a treaty with any country if by that treaty better trade can be developed between two parts of the world.

The provisions of the agreement are long and intricate. As to the actual terms of the agreement made by the Secretary of State and the actual terms of the agreement which it supersedes, there is practically no difference, as I propose to show in a few moments.

I do not object that the minister has given us such a careful and lengthy review of the treaty, but I do object to a treaty of such magnitude being presented at such a late hour in the session as to make it utterly impossible to give to it the careful study that it deserves. It is only because it is a provisional agreement that we probably should not expect to go into it as thoroughly as if it were a fixed agreement for a term of years. The minister points out that the old treaty could be terminated on six months' notice. That is quite true, it was an indeterminate treaty, but on three months' notice either party could terminate it. I cannot see a particle of difference between these terms of the old and the terms of the new treaty. The minister states that this treaty is for a year, but by tacit consent, whatever that means it will continue in force. I figure that this means that if nothing is said the treaty goes on. It can however be terminated by notice, in three months' time. As to any criticism that might be made in committee on the rates of duty applicable to any of the items, I doubt if criticism can be very well founded. I am sure the minister agrees with me that it will take at least a year to find out what the workings of the customs tariff will be on many of these items. At the present time importers find it absolutely impossible to get information as to what merchandise will cost when it arrives in the country. Fluctuating rates of exchange, dumping duties and other regulations have been a tremendous barrier to importation, and I doubt if the situation will be clarified much by the terms of this treaty.

The convention to which the minister referred, which was made by the late government on December 15, 1922, was not for any specified time, as has been pointed out. The present government saw fit to terminate that treaty, and their reason was very clear. They pointed out that under the terms of the treaty there were certain definite rates given France which also applied to other countries enjoying most favoured nation treatment, and that in this case the rates were so low as to be injurious to Canadian production. I have no quarrel with the government on that score; that is their policy, but I doubt very much if the terms of the treaty will bring the relief anticipated or will increase trade to any great extent.

Under the old treaty the French colonies were all included with France. The minister has pointed out that since the old convention was made there have been some changes in the tariff structure of France by which a separate tariff is maintained in what they term the non-assimilated colonies, and the same tariff is maintained in the assimilated colonies. Under the old treaty Canada gave concessions to France with regard to the intermediate tariff and most favoured nation treatment. As the minister pointed out, on ninety-two items it also gave a ten per cent reduction from the intermediate tariff, and on three items of textiles a fifteen per cent reduction, while on one hundred and thirty-one items there were fixed duties lower than the intermediate rates. In connection with the ninety-two items on which there was a ten per cent reduction from the intermediate tariff and in connection with the three textile items the proportionate differences between the general and intermediate tariffs were to be maintained as at the time the treaty was signed. Canada was not obligated to give France any preferences accorded to other parts of the empire, and at that time no foreign country was accorded tariff reductions more favourable than those specifically granted to France in the treaty. I notice that the minister has gone further; he has given France the British preferential rate on some items.

By the former convention France granted Canada minimum rates of duty, including the guarantee of most favoured nation treatment, on 141 items or part items, and on a much longer list of items reductions were granted from the general tariff representing various specified percentages of the difference between the general and minimum rates or, if lower, the rates of duty applied to the United States on products of a similar kind. That is to say, we were given the same rates that were accorded the United States. On all other goods we came under the general tariff as it existed before the notable increase made by the decree of March 28, 1921, so long as United States products were exempted from that increase. Then, in the event of the pre-1921 general tariff being withdrawn from the United States, we were given a reduction from the existing general tariff of 25 per cent of the difference between the general and mimimum tariffs. The French colonies, possessions and so on, not having the same tariff as France gave Canada most favoured foreign nation rates, and St. Pierre, Miquelon, the French West Indies and French Guiana accorded minimum tariff treatment on some or all food products. Not all the French colonies had in force duties lower than their general tariffs.

With regard to a great many items in the French tariff the effect of the Franco-Canadian convention was to give Canada the same rates that applied to the United States, which country, as I think the minister mentioned this morning, under an agreement made in 1910 was accorded the French minimum on about one hundred items. When the French tariff was increased by the 1921 decree, mentioned a moment ago, the United States was exempted from those increases. Until 1927 the goods of the United States entered France under either the minimum rates secured in 1910 or under an intermediate tariff which consisted of the pre-1921 general tariff. On September 6, 1927, the situation changed; a French decree increased duties, both minimum and general, and a new Franco-German treaty went into force. In consequence many intermediate rates—the pre-1921 general tariff—which applied to Canada and the United States, lapsed, and as a result the United States was placed under the new general tariff with regard to many products. On the items affected Canada was at once granted reductions from the general tariff in pursuance of the Franco-Canadian convention of commerce.

After some Franco-American negotiations a French decree of November 15, 1927, followed by decrees of March 15, May 12 and June 28, 1928, in the main restored to the United States the intermediate rates previously enjoyed, except that wherever the new minimum tariff exceeded the old intermediate rates, the new minimum rates went into force. Canada, through her convention of commerce with France, was given the benefit of these decrees wherever they established rates lower than those otherwise resulting from the convention.

Such were the terms of the old agreement. I do not know that there is any need to review the terms of the new treaty, which the minister has so ably explained, before giving the bill second reading. In committee, of course, we will have to study the schedules in order to arrive at what will be the actual effect, but might I point out briefly that article I of the convention now before us provides:

> The natural or manufactured products, originating in and coming from Canada, enumerated in schedule A to this agreement, shall enjoy, on their importation into French customs territory, the French minimum tariff, that is to say the most favoured foreign nation treatment.

The minister will agree that there are no fixed rates here, so there is no particular change between this article and the old convention; France can raise her duties at any time. The minister has explained what is meant by the expression "French customs territory." He has pointed out that these words mean that some territories are under the assimilated and others under the non-assimilated rates. Article 2 provides:

> The natural or manufactured products, originating in and coming from the French customs territory, enumerated in schedule C to this agreement, shall enjoy, on their importation into Canada, the rates of the Canadian intermediate tariff—

There is not much change there from the old convention; we would have to examine the customs tariff to see where any change occurs. Article 3 states:

> The natural or manufactured products, originating in and coming from Canada, enumerated in schedules A and B to this agreement, and the natural or manufactured products originating in and coming from French customs territory, enumerated in schedules C and D to this agreement shall, on their importation into the territory of the other party, enjoy the most favourable rates accorded to any foreign country that may arise from modifications made in the tariff classification—

[Mr. Malcolm.]

That means the best rates both ways, as was provided in article 12 of the original treaty, so again there is no change. Article 4 of the present treaty is very much the same as article 14 of the old treaty except that the verbiage has been changed somewhat, though I doubt very much if it has been clarified. Under article 14 of the old treaty we could not import through United States ports but we could export through United States ports. That is the provision contained in article 4, so again there is no change. I believe article 5 of the present treaty is almost the same as article 2 of the old treaty; certain rights are reserved. Perhaps if I read article 2 of the old treaty it would explain to the house the thought behind this item better than it is explained in the new treaty:

> The grant of the minimum tariff for the products enumerated in schedule A means the treatment of the most favoured nation as respects such products, but does not entitle Canada to claim the benefit of any preferential advantage which France may grant to her protectorates or the benefit of any tariff resulting from economic agreements which France may enter into with border states, or the benefits of any tariff which France may grant for products the importation of which is designed to facilitate settlements with those countries that were at war with France during the years 1914-18.

That is identically the same thought that is contained in this long article 5. The special terms which France may have with border states, such as the Luxembourg agreement, which my hon. friend knows about, still exist and will not be given Canada under this new agreement. In the last part of article 5 there is a new clause, section (e), which has to do with exchange, and which was not necessary at the time the former agreement was drawn. Article 6 is amazing:

> The high contracting parties undertake not to interfere with the course of trade by any prohibitions or restrictions of importation or exportation.

The minister agrees in that undertaking that he will not put an embargo upon French merchandise; but the exceptions are so broad that clause (f) declares:

> All necessary measures to face exceptional or abnormal circumstances and to assure the protection of the economic and financial interests of the country. The duration of these measures shall be limited to the duration of the causes of the circumstances which have brought them into effect.

Who is to be judge? I presume the governor in council, and I submit to the minister that he has drafted a treaty which, so far as the agreement not to put on embargoes or restrictions or prohibitions is concerned, gives him ample power under the clauses that follow to impose all the restrictions he likes. Article 7 is the same as article XVI of the old treaty.

The natural or manufactured products of the territory of either of the high contracting parties, exported to the territories of the other, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges than those paid on the exportation of similar articles of any other foreign country.

In other words, there shall not be an export tax on goods sold to France any higher than the export tax which is placed on goods sold to any other country. In my opinion, that is more carefully covered in article XVI of the old agreement:

The high contracting parties grant to each other as regards export duties and taxes the most favoured nation treatment. Drawbacks on the exportation of French or Canadian products shall not be higher than the amount of the import, excise, interior consumption or town duties collected upon the said products or the materials entering into their manufacture.

There have been I believe some breaches of the next article, 8, which provides:

The internal taxes which are levied in the territory of one of the high contracting parties for the benefit of any authority on the production, circulation, conditioning, offering for sale, sale or consumption of natural or manufactured products, shall not, under any pretext, affect the goods of the other party after importation to a higher degree or in more onerous conditions than similar national products.

That is pretty well covered by article XVIII of the old agreement. Under the old agreement, which is the same in spirit, we did break that clause by some of our sales tax regulations; we applied the sales tax and then made exemptions in respect of domestic goods. I am under the impression that when you apply the sales tax and make an exemption of domestic goods you contravene the spirit of that convention. Article 9 deals with the country of origin and is practically the same as article XIX of the old convention. Article 10 is practically the same as the other article XX, and article 11 is interesting; but it is the same as article XXI of the old agreement. In this instance, however, I think the minister has probably gone further than the former government went in signing the treaty in which the old article XXI appeared. That old article XXI provided:

France and Canada grant to each other reciprocally the treatment of nationals as respects the protection of trade marks, patents, commercial names, industrial designs and patterns, names of origin of products and the prevention of unfair competition.

Article 11 of the new agreement makes this provision:

Each of the high contracting parties agrees to protect within its territorial limits the natural or manufactured products of the other party against all forms of dishonest competition, particularly with regard to the use, for commercial purposes, of false indications, relative to the place of origin, nature, kind or substantial qualities of goods.

Each of the high contracting parties agrees to insure within its territorial limits, respect for the appellations of origin of wine. . . .

I submit to the minister that he has gone quite a distance in that clause.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman does not recall that the previous government of which he was a member signed at the Hague, on November 6, 1925, an international convention for the protection of international property rights and that that government ratified and adopted that convention on May 1, 1928, six years after that trade convention was signed. This introduced restrictions which are more severe than any that appeared in the former agreement.

Mr. MALCOLM: Does my hon. friend happen to have a copy of the Hague convention?

Mr. CAHAN: It has been distributed to members of the house; it is in the distribution office. I have my own copy here which I will let the hon. gentleman have.

Mr. MALCOLM: Does the minister know the article that has reference to this particular matter?

Mr. CAHAN: The first article gives a definition, and if the hon. gentleman will turn the pages he will see some articles marked in lead pencil.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes. It states that trade names shall be protected in all countries of the union, and so on. We are not discussing that.

Mr. CAHAN: We are discussing trade names.

Mr. MALCOLM: We are discussing more than trade names, I submit. It is a question of territorial names.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that the hon. member leave that discussion until we reach the particular clause.

Mr. MALCOLM: I was going to observe in passing that the minister has gone further in article 11 than Canada has ever gone before in restricting the use of such a word as, for example, champagne. Champagne originates in the Champagne district and therefore the word champagne is a trademark in the opinion of French wine-makers, and we could not then make Canadian champagne. In the same way, Portugal tried to reserve the right to the use of the word port in all descriptions of certain wine. I presume that Cognac Jarnac and other brandy producing areas would claim the right to a monopoly of such names, so that we could call a Canadian brandy Cognac. However, I will discuss this in more detail at a later stage.

Article 12 is the same as the old articles XXII and V as to general agreement. Article 13 deals with the question of delays and is a very good clause if it can be practised. But it has not been shown of late that the practice of facilitating import has been resorted to. Article 14 is more or less like the old article VI. Article 17 has to do with the terms of the treaty. As I said, at the moment I do not see any difference and I also do not see that the tacit consent means any more than its continuance if no notice is given. The schedules have certain omissions as compared with the old list and also have certain additions. The minimum tariff granted under schedule A is the same as was granted under the old treaty. I notice the minister has secured the minimum rate for canned fish which is slightly better than the rate granted under the old treaty. The minister will however probably recall that at the time the old treaty was negotiated the Canadian packers were not willing to submit and could not agree to any standard inspection. There had been some difficulty with their product and France was not prepared to grant the minimum rate. It is very hard to follow schedule B and I believe these items will have to be dealt with when we are in committee.

I do not intend to delay the house any longer, further than to say that it is unfortunate that a long term and definite treaty could not have been made with France. I realize the difficulties raised by the economic conference and probably the minister has done well to make stop-gap treaty. I believe he has tried consistently to arrive at some satisfactory conclusion in the face of enormous difficulties against the export of Canadian wheat to France. France has a great desire to be self-sufficient in the production of wheat but in times of peace she would like to have considerable Canadian hard wheat with which to step up the quality of her bread. France can and does export a considerable quantity of soft wheat for which the exporter receives a rebate which helps to pay the duty on hard wheat imported. Canadian wheat could not have entered France over the tariffs which existed and be sold at the price at which it was sold and I believe there have been some evasions of the regulations to have permitted France to import the large quantity of wheat which she imported last year.

I want to compliment the minister upon the clarity of his explanation and when we get to the items I hope he will be able to show that the difference between the rates granted under this treaty and those granted under the old will not be destructive to trade. I do not believe any advantages the minister may claim for this convention can be clearly understood until we actually know the amount of duty which will have to be paid and the regulations which will surround importations. We always find France a difficult country with which to establish an equitable trade balance. There are some commodities we can sell them and if the minister thinks that by the terms arranged some additional export business can be built up, I am very glad to know it. I trust that this agreement will reestablish the trade which existed with France before the old agreement was cancelled.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Trade agreement approved.

Mr. NEILL: Is it the intention of the minister to take up the schedules in detail or does this section cover them? There are a lot of details in the schedules which we would like to discuss, and I think they should be considered article by article.

Mr. CAHAN: So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to discuss them now. Perhaps we had better let the section stand until we go through the schedules.

Mr. NEILL: I think the schedules should be discussed article by article.

Mr. CAHAN: We could pass this section and reserve the right to discuss the articles.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On the schedule—Article 1.

Mr. NEILL: This article covers schedule A. I notice there is no provision made for the inclusion of pilchards, canned pilchards, pilchard oil and pilchard meal. I had hoped that the language used would be "fish or fish products." As this is supposed to be only a temporary measure, I suggest to the minister that he consider the advisability of providing for pilchards, canned pilchards, pilchard oil and pilchard meal in any succeeding negotiations.

Mr. MALCOLM: We are on article 1 and the hon. member is discussing an item in schedule A.

Mr. NEILL: The schedule comes under this article and I assume that we are following the practice adopted in discussing the Imperial conference treaties. That is why I am discussing schedule A which is referred to in article 1. Item 47 reads:

Fish of the salmonoid family, preserved "au naturel," marinated or otherwise prepared.

I hope there is no doubt that that item includes what is known as canned salmon. The term "au naturel" suggests the thing in its natural state.

Mr. CAHAN: The wording of schedule A is simply a translation of the schedule to the French customs tariff. This item covers the whole salmon family.

Mr. NEILL: I want to have an assurance that it covers canned salmon as we know it.

Mr. CAHAN: It does, yes.

Mr. NEILL: There is another point which I would like to have explained. I may be stupid, but those in the industry may find this point difficult of definition. There is a note to this item reading as follows:

N.B.—As long as the bill to modify the customs tariff of the above products has not been put into force, these products shall be submitted to a rate equal to the general tariff with a reduction of 72 per cent.

That seems to be a contradictory provision.

Mr. CAHAN: That is quite clear, if I may so state. The French government have a bill which was being passed when this trade agreement was being negotiated, changing the duty on salmon. It will apply to all imports of salmon and therefore they made it clear to us that until that bill passes—and I do not know whether it has yet become a decree—these products coming from Canada and other countries will be subject to the general tariff with a reduction of 72 per cent. As soon as the new minimum tariff with respect to these items comes into force in France, we shall have that minimum tariff.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. Then it seems to me this is contradicted by the note at the foot of page 14:

Notes annexed to schedule A.

It says:

From the putting into force of the commercial agreement, canned salmonoids . . . will be admitted . . .

At a reduction—

Representing a duty of 84 francs per 100 kilogs. gross.

But it says that after the agreement is put into effect the rates shall be the general tariff less 72 per cent. That does not agree with what the minister has just said and which is borne out by the footnote of item 47 on page 10, that we have to go back to the minimum tariff as soon as the bill passes. The note on page 14 implies that we shall not go back to the minimum tariff.

Mr. CAHAN: We shall not go back to the same specific minimum tariff, but we shall go back to the minimum tariff which the French have changed in the meantime and of which they have given notice in this agreement.

Mr. NEILL: The footnote reads that from the putting into force of the commercial agreement the rate will be so much. It does not say that it will terminate when the customs bill is passed. There may be some explanation, but I must say that it is rather complicated. I notice that the proposal, which is contained in the second paragraph of the footnote, is to put through a customs bill increasing the minimum tariff by 84 francs per 100 kilos, so that the tariff will be very substantially increased, and as far as I can figure it out with the foreign coinage and weights, it will come to something like $1.50 a case which, on a salmon selling at about $4.50 a case, is perhaps not a prohibitive, but rather a heavy duty.

While I am on my feet, I would also point out, although it really should come in on a later clause, that French sardines coming into Canada have been given a very favourable rate. That appears on page 19, item 120, sardines. The rate is the intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 per cent. This will interfere, will it not, with our sardine trade on both the Atlantic and the Pacific? I understand there is on the Atlantic coast quite a large sardine trade and it declares itself to be in a very distressed condition. This will also interfere with our production on the west coast of tinned pilchards, which are really a species of sardines or are classified as such. Will the minister explain why he has given this increased import preference to an article of home production?

Mr. CAHAN: I can simply reply that you cannot make omelettes without breaking eggs; we cannot expect to receive favourable admission of our products into France unless we give certain modifications with respect to the admission of their products to this country.

The item mentioned by the hon. member refers to a special fish, the sardine, which, under the French law, is a specific fish; it is not a sprat. In this case it is cooked in oil and preserved in oil, and accompanied by a certificate. This is a high class product of France in regard to which they wish to obtain special entry into Canada, and in consideration of the rates which they granted to us, we have granted them one in this case. This was a bargaining of rates; it was nothing else. I may have failed to drive a good bargain, but I had to drive a bargain with regard to every item of the French tariff and every item of ours. Day after day for six or seven hours a day we bargained and I have obtained the best bargain I could.

Mr. NEILL: I have no doubt the minister is quite correct in that. This is only a little rough on whoever happens to own the eggs that are used to make the omelette. The minister say that this refers to a special kind of sardine as defined in the French law. But this word is defined in our tariff:

Sardines, cooked in oil and preserved in oil.

That is exactly the way it is done in Canada. The certificate does not make any difference. They are cooked in oil in sealed tin containers. This is certainly going to be pretty hard on the sardine trade in both the east and the west.

Mr. HEAPS: The clause refers to certain minimum tariffs which the French are conceding to Canadian goods entering France. I should like, as a matter of information, if the minister could give to the committee some idea of the height or otherwise of the French tariff, because the bill does not give us any information in that particular respect. Can the minister inform the committee as to the height of the French tariff on the main commodities which Canada exports to France?

Mr. CAHAN: There is in France a minimum tariff and a maximum tariff. The maximum is two, three and in some cases four times as high as the minimum. The maximum tariff is evidently intended to be practically prohibitive. The minimum tariff is designed to give in any event a reasonable protection to French industry. As between the two, where we could not obtain the minimum tariff, we did the best we could to obtain a reduction, by certain percentages named, in the maximum tariff of France. In order to explain the matter, you have to take every relative item of the French tariff and ascertain what is the maximum and what is the minimum.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. HEAPS: That does not quite answer the question I asked.

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps I did not understand what the hon. gentleman was asking.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it possible to give in specific amounts what the tariff is on our main exports to France? Is it 10, 20, 40 or 50 per cent? Can the minister give that, so that we may have a more intelligent understanding of what the treaty really means?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman wishes to know what is the average duty that will be paid on Canadian exports to France under this arrangement?

Mr. HEAPS: That is the idea.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the average?

Mr. HEAPS: The average, of course, would not give us a proper understanding. I should prefer that he give us the actual amounts imposed by France on the main exports of Canadian goods to France.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman wishes, we shall take item by item; we shall take the next, wheat, and go through the list. Would the hon. gentleman indicate any particular item and give me the number of it?

Mr. NEILL: Item 47.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): It is not exactly in order now to refer to different items of the schedule. When we are discussing the schedules, it would be.

Mr. EULER: It was understood it would be.

Mr. NEILL: We are not going to go through the detailed schedules; we are dealing with the articles of the main schedule and it was understood the articles of the main schedule would have to cover schedules A, B and C.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): If it is the pleasure of the committee, we might consider schedule A.

Mr. NEILL: I am discussing article 1 which deals with schedule A, and that certainly is in order. If we proceeded in that way business would be expedited.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As I understand it in discussing article 1 we may refer to any item in schedule A.

Mr. NEILL: The minister was going to give us the maximum tariff rates on tariff item No. 47.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the item dealing with fish, preserved. The rate of duty on December 13 last was 42·50 francs per 100 kilogrammes and was levied on the gross weight.

Mr. NEILL: 42·50 what?

Mr. CAHAN: Duty, specific.

Mr. YOUNG: On the gross weight.

Mr. CAHAN: The special provisions are these, that on February 1, 1932, the French minimum duty on canned salmon was increased and ranged from 42·50 to 75 francs per 100 kilogrammes. So that at the present time that duty is 75 francs per 100 kilogrammes on certain kinds of preserved fish. They have also given us notice with regard to a possible further increase.

Mr. NEILL: There is something wrong, there, Mr. Chairman. The minister states that the duty was raised to 75 francs per 100 kilogrammes. If he would turn to page 14 of the bill he will find we are going to get a rate, meantime, of the general tariff "reduced by 72 per cent, the rate thus obtained representing a duty of 84 francs per 100 kilogrammes gross." If we take 72 per cent of the total, and we have left 84 francs, the original rate must have been much higher than 75 francs.

Mr. CAHAN: I said it was increased in 1932, and further increased while I was in France.

Mr. NEILL: From 75 francs you are now taking 72 per cent and are producing 84 francs.

Mr. CAHAN: No, that is the new duty proposed.

Mr. NEILL: Oh, this is hopeless.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like some further information with regard to item No. 68 dealing with wheat, spelt, meslin, grains and flours. This item deals with the export of wheat from Canada to France.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought I had dealt with that item when I introduced the bill. As the hon. member has said, item 68 deals with wheat, spelt and meslin. The general tariff rate is 160 francs per 100 kilogrammes, equal to $2.84 per 100 pounds. The minimum duty is 80 francs per 100 kilogrammes or $1.42 per 100 pounds, prior to the time I was conducting the negotiations there were various increases in the minimum tariff of France on wheat. At the time I was there the selling price of wheat in France was from $1.25 to $1.30 per bushel, and the duty at that time under the minimum tariff was 85 cents a bushel. The duty under the maximum tariff was $1.70 per bushel. At the present time every bushel of wheat going into France is subject to a maximum tariff rate equivalent to $1.70. When this treaty comes into force it will be reduced one-half, but we will still pay the tariff rate of 85 cents.

The former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) referred to the fact—and it is undoubtedly a fact—that in certain cases the French importer receives a rebate on the re-exportation to other countries of a certain part of his French wheat, and that in certain cases when such licences for export are allowed, with the corresponding rebate, it enables them in special circumstances, for the production of certain high-grade brands of flour, to import Canadian wheat at a duty less than $1.70 as at present, or less than 85 cents a bushel, as it will be when this agreement is confirmed by statute of this parliament.

Mr. HEAPS: I presume the figures the minister has given in dollars and cents refer to the present rate on Canadian currency.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, I am not considering the fluctuation. The rate on the franc was about four cents when the computation was made.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give the committee information as to the amount of Canadian wheat exported in the last two or three years from this country to France?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, I can.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. HEAPS: I have asked for some information.

Mr. CAHAN: I have a complete statement of it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Probably the minister will give it after recess.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned an hon. gentleman opposite was asking me as to the details of Canada's exports of wheat to France.

Year ended March 31st	Exports (bushels)	Value
1928..	2,438,709	$ 3,271,220
1929..	5,170,285	6,720,062
1930..	6,346,525	7,980,918
1931..	8,556,407	7,443,681
1932..	20,071,074	12,753,116

I have not the number of bushels for 1933.

It will be seen that there is a very considerable variation in the quantities of wheat sold to France. It is due to the fact that when there is a good crop in France wheat is not imported under the heavy import duties levied against foreign wheat, but when there is a partial failure of the wheat crop in France there is a large quantity imported notwithstanding the high duties.

In order that hon. gentlemen may see what a large proportion of our exports to France consist of wheat I have had prepared during recess the following schedule:

Year ended March 31st	Imports from France	Exports to France	Excess of imports	Excess of exports
1927..	$27,992,322	$15,220,232	$12,772,090
1928..	26,473,732	9,946,145	16,527,587
1929..	26,215,696	16,131,188	10,084,508
1930..	25,158,207	16,507,011	8,651,196
1931..	19,004,102	13,285,758	5,718,344
1932..	13,570,000	17,954,321		$4,384,321

Of our exports to France over 90 per cent are what may be called agricultural products in the state in which they are produced, and raw minerals and metals. We have a certain export of agricultural implements and other manufactured products, but these are comparatively small in quantity and value; whereas our imports from France are about 95 per cent—over 90 per cent at any rate,—wines, brandies, liqueurs and manufactured goods largely for luxury consumption. The textiles which we import from France are largely textiles of very high value, not sold in large quantities in this country, and owing to the financial depression of the last two or three years the consumption of that class of goods has been reduced, while undoubtedly, owing to the rescission of the treaty, from June last the imports have been restricted by reason of the fact that instead of our intermediate tariff with a reduction of 10 per cent applying to many of these goods our general tariff has since been applied.

Mr. HEAPS: I am very much obliged to the minister for the very interesting and detailed statement he has just submitted. There is one other question on which I would like a little further information, that is the question relating to the minimum tariff. I did not quite catch what the minister said this morning on this question. Do I understand that the present minimum tariff which Canada receives from France is fixed, or is it liable to be changed at any time by the French government?

Mr. CAHAN: The minimum tariff is different on each item. The minimum tariff is liable to change at the option of the French government at any time, there is no restriction. I show the hon. gentleman my brief on the French minimum tariff concerning Canadian imports. Under each item of that tariff I had prepared a brief for the purpose of negotiations, but it is so large and varied that I am afraid this discussion would be greatly prolonged if we had to go into the details. If this treaty passes this parliament and comes into force I have no doubt the Minister of National Revenue in his department and also particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce will circulate throughout the country a detailed statement of the duties which are imposed under each item of the French minimum tariff which is of interest to Canada, and also a detailed statement of the French maximum tariff from which certain percentages are reduced according to these schedules.

Mr. EULER: The minister stated this morning that the French maximum tariff was apparently designed to prevent entirely the importation of certain commodities into that country, and that under the minimum tariff fair protection in their market was still provided. He has stated now that there is nothing to prevent the French government from changing that minimum tariff. I take it then that if they desire to exclude from France any of the commodities which are now given the benefit of the minimum tariff they could immediately, without any notice to this country, change the minimum tariff so that it would have the same effect as their maximum tariff and exclude the goods. I suppose that is the fact?

Mr. CAHAN: That is true. They sometimes give a short notice, but they are at liberty to change it without notice, and on the other hand we are at liberty to change our tariff in like manner.

Mr. EULER: They could at any moment entirely abolish any advantage we have under this treaty, but we also have the privilege, without giving them any notice, of making similar changes in the benefits we are giving to them under the treaty?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the minister to say that Canadian wheat under this tariff will enjoy in the French market the minimum tariff of any country in the world. Is that correct?

Mr. CAHAN: That is correct, with the exception of the reservation made with regard to the three Danubian states.

Mr. DONNELLY: Then I should like to ask if there is any difference between this and the former agreement. Did not Canada enjoy the minimum tariff under the former agreement with France, with regard to wheat?

Mr. CAHAN: Exactly so.

Mr. DONNELLY: There was a great deal of criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to that agreement; they said we only enjoyed the minimum tariff and that France was at liberty to raise or lower that tariff at any time. Are there any restrictions in this treaty to prevent France raising or lowering her tariff against our wheat?

Mr. CAHAN: Not the slightest, so far as I know.

Mr. DONNELLY: So really there is no difference between this agreement and the previous agreement with regard to the importation of Canadian wheat into France?

Mr. CAHAN: Except that under the former tariff they were at complete liberty to increase the rate, and they did so four times during the life of the treaty. Under the present treaty they are at liberty to raise the tariff still higher, but if they raise it too high it is for us either to reduce the corresponding advantages they receive or to give notice of the rescission of the treaty. Each side is perfectly free with regard to raising or decreasing the tariff rate.

Mr. DONNELLY: Then I understand that we are in the same position as previously.

Mr. CAHAN: Except that in the old treaty there were many items which were fixed so far as Canada was concerned, and this parliament could not increase those duties except in violation of the agreement.

Mr. DONNELLY: The only difference I see is that under this agreement we do not enjoy the lowest tariff rates; there are Danubian states which enjoy that lower rate. Under the old agreement negotiated by the Liberal party, which was criticized so severely by hon. gentlemen opposite, the Danubian states did not have a lower tariff. Now we see other countries with a lower rate of duty on their wheat entering France than is given us, and that condition did not exist previously.

Mr. EULER: I should like to ask just one other question. We have not had time to examine the provisions of the treaty at all, of course, so I should like to ask the minister whether, as a result of the concessions we give to France, those concessions are given automatically to any other countries.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe they will be given automatically to twenty-three other countries which enjoy most favoured nation treatment in Canada, by reason of the outstanding agreements with those countries.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will the minister be good enough to tell us the difference between the old treaty and the present treaty with regard to maple sugar? Under the old treaty we had only the word "sugar," while in this treaty maple sugar and maple syrup are dealt with specifically. Would the minister tell the committee the tariff rate on maple sugar and maple syrup, which come under items 91 and 93, and would the minister inform the committee what were the old rates?

Mr. CAHAN: Under the old treaty the rate was the minimum tariff, which was 170 francs per 100 kilos. At the rate of exchange existing at the time this agreement was negotiated—I have not figured it at the rate to-day—that would mean a duty of $3.02 per hundred pounds on sugar.

Mr. BOUCHARD: On any kind of sugar, or just on maple sugar?

Mr. CAHAN: Maple sugar goes in exactly as other sugar goes, except that now there is no specific reduction with regard to maple sugar. In the fiscal year 1931 Canada exported to France only 192 pounds of maple sugar valued at $61. During the fiscal year 1927 Canada exported to France 262,682 hundredweight of sugars of all kinds, valued at $1,156,115. On inquiry in France I found that maple sugar and maple syrup were hardly known except by friends of those living in Quebec who occasionally, at Christmas and other times, send them samples of maple sugar and maple syrup, and a small quantity of maple syrup was introduced for the purpose of giving a certain taste to tobacco used in the manufacture of cigarettes. Under this agreement maple sugar and maple syrup remain under the minimum tariff.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will the same rates apply under this new tariff? The minister said the old rate was about 3 cents a pound. Will that be the rate under this new tariff, which specifically mentions maple sugar?

Mr. CAHAN: It will be exactly the same. Under the maximum tariff it would pay twice the duty, and instead of that tariff of $6.04 per hundred pounds the sole concession I could obtain was to have it placed under the minimum tariff, at one-half that rate.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not going to direct any questions to the minister but I should like to make one or two general observations with regard to the treaty. In common with other members of the house I realize that the bargain made by the minister is perhaps as good as could be made by any other hon. member under the circumstances. In spite of the remarks of the minister, however, and the valuable services he has given in this connection, I do not see very much difference between the treaty now before the house and the previous treaty with France, which was abrogated not long ago. As a matter of fact it appears to me that the introduction of this treaty at the present time is in itself a vindication of the former treaty, which was denounced by hon. gentlemen opposite mainly, I believe, because of the minimum tariff imposed by France on commodities we exported to that country. Now we find the government coming to parliament with exactly the same provision, and at any time the government of France can increase their tariffs against goods exported by Canada.

Further, Mr. Chairman, I think this treaty indicates that the idea of blasting our way into the markets of the world has proven an absolute failure. The indications are, as this treaty clearly proves, that we have to negotiate and sometimes we cannot negotiate with other people just as we please. Thirdly, in my opinion, the old idea of treaty making is now more or less obsolete. We have before us at the present moment a trade treaty containing many scores of tariff items, and it is not really a treaty in that sense of the word because a treaty that can be abrogated at a moment's notice ceases to be such. What the minister said this morning when he introduced the measure is absolutely true, and I subscribe to it, namely, that France was trying to make herself commercially independent of all other nations. That is perfectly obvious to anyone who has attempted to understand the course of France's actions in the past few years. But what France has been doing is precisely what every other nation has been doing or attempting to do in the same period.

An hon. MEMBER: Not for the same reason.

Mr. HEAPS: No; it may not be for exactly the same reasons, but the causes are similar. Within the last few years, with the advent of modern machinery, it has become much more easy for all nations to be self contained—much more easy than it has ever been in the past. We can now manufacture our own goods more easily than we did years ago; we can produce crops from our farms much more easily with modern machinery than at any time in the past. The practice of all nations to-day is therefore to export as much as they can. The nations of the world are becoming exporters, so that treaty making in the old sense is now more or less out of date and almost impossible. The things that France needed some years ago she may not need to-day and the things we need to-day we may not need to-morrow; and what applies to France and Canada applies to every other part of the world. At the same time I am in favour of endeavouring, by every means in our power, to foster closer trade relations between Canada and other countries, but I do not believe that we can bring about such relations by having tariff barriers such as now exist in France. Take wheat, for instance; that country has a tariff against that commodity equivalent to 85 cents a bushel, which works out approximately, on the basis of present value, at about 120 per cent. If wheat goes down the percentage will be greater, though of course if it goes up the percentage will be less. There is no telling however when France may increase her tariff on wheat and thus close what might be a potential market to Canada.

Further, I believe that while we are attempting to foster trade between Canada and France or any other part of the world there is no reason why we should not also foster trade between one province in this dominion and the others. Why should we attempt to export wheat to France when we have, or at any rate until recently had, 1,600,000 people drawing relief in Canada? It might be well for us to have Quebec supply our western provinces with the things she produces and have the western provinces supply the east with the products of the west. Naturally we should then be on a more or less self contained basis, and when we had exports in the form of surplus commodities then I would favour the interchange of commodities between nations, because the more of our surplus commodities we sell abroad and the more foreign commodities we bring in in exchange for ours the better it should be for the people of Canada.

In conclusion let me emphasize the fact that the idea of treaty making is of very little benefit in the long run to the people of Canada as it has been carried on in the last few years. We had an example last summer in connection with the imperial trade conferences, and we have before us to-day, though on a smaller scale, a replica of the agreements which we were called upon to consider last fall. Those agreements between Canada and other parts of the empire have not fulfilled expectations, and I do not believe that the agreement now before us will in any way foster trade between this country and France. On the contrary it might ultimately create a feeling which would not be in the best interests of either country.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Item 128 in schedule A deals with woods, in rough logs not squared, with or without bark, of any length, and the minimum tariff is applied to that item. I cannot find anything with regard to planed, squared or manufactured lumber.

Mr. CAHAN: What item is the hon. gentleman referring to?

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Items 128, 128bis, 129 and 130.

Mr. CAHAN: The minimum tariff is granted on wood in rough logs, not squared, with or without bark, and of a certain circumference, or squared or sawn common wood, and also on paving blocks, but it is confined to that. Those products are the only ones with respect to which they were prepared to give us the minimum tariff. These items were discussed one by one, sometimes for days, but that was the entire concession obtained.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Then we are not at liberty to ship manufactured lumber to France?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, under the general tariff.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): We used to ship railway sleepers and bridge timber, partly manufactured.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman means sawn common lumber, that goes under the minimum tariff.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Sawn lumber, but not manufactured into flooring and other articles. This is the same as we used to ship to Japan. We can ship to Japan squared timber for further manufacture in that country, as well as to the United States, but on planed or manufactured lumber there is a duty.

Mr. CAHAN: If it is sawn lumber, I understand it goes under the minimum tariff; if planed or otherwise dressed or manufactured, it would come under their maximum tariff.

Mr. MALCOLM: The expression used in some of the other customs tariff items is, not further manufactured.

Mr. CAHAN: I have taken the items of the French tariff, and in that tariff, under 128, the literal translation would be common woods in the rough—that means not planed or otherwise manufactured—and logs not squared, with a certain circumference. Of that we exported from Canada to France in 1932, 401 metric tons, while the exports, in metric tons, to other countries were: Austria, 38,000; Belgium, 12,000; Finland, 57,000; Germany, 37,000; Latvia, 13,000; Poland, 22,000; Roumania, 11,000; Sweden, 46,000. So on exactly the same basis Canada was not able to obtain in that market a very large sale for either logs or sawn lumber.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Do they come in under lumber products and take the minimum rates?

Mr. CAHAN: They come in exactly the same as ours, under the minimum tariff.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Will they be on the same basis as Canada?

Mr. CAHAN: On the same basis.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Does that apply to manufactured or unmanufactured lumber.

Mr. CAHAN: That manufactured is under their general maximum tariff.

Mr. MALCOLM: What is meant by the words "common woods"? Does that differentiate between soft and hard woods?

Mr. CAHAN: It excludes such special woods as mahogany and others which enter into the manufacture of high class furniture.

Mr. MALCOLM: Are birch and maple excluded?

Mr. CAHAN: No; I understand that birch, maple and spruce would come in as common woods.

Mr. MUNN: Are we obtaining any special preference under this treaty with regard to wood products?

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. MUNN: There is no change? There is no advantage?

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman refers to the old treaty which expired in June, we are getting exactly the same terms as before. If he refers to the maximum tariff which has been in effect since last June, we are getting a reduction, I think of one half or even more.

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to the regulations which might affect our exports of wheat to France. For some years past certain countries in Europe have enacted regulations whereby anybody exporting wheat would receive a token or certificate which would permit them to import the same quantity of wheat free of duty. Can the minister state whether France has such a regulation in effect at the present time?

Mr. CAHAN: The manufacturer of flour in France who exports flour made out of French wheat can obtain a special licence to import a corresponding quantity of foreign wheat. This is only done by the granting of special licences and it was under such special licences that a very considerable part of our exports of hard wheat in recent years have been imported into France.

Mr. DONNELLY: That was free of duty?

Mr. CAHAN: Upon the export of flour made from French wheat they can obtain, under certain restrictions, the right to import foreign wheat for mixing purposes. This is imported at a lower rate of duty than the minimum.

Mr. MUNN: Much lower?

Mr. CAHAN: My impression is that it is free of duty or a very low rate.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think it is ten cents.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does this treaty limit us to a quota? Just before one o'clock the minister was giving the details of the importations of wheat into France. I was not in the chamber at the time but these figures have been given to me. The minister also recited the rates of tariff which had applied to Canadian wheat and I think he went as far back as when the rate was only fifteen cents per bushel. From that rate it had mounted up until last June the rate was $1.75.

Mr. CAHAN: The maximum tariff rate.

Mr. VALLANCE: Because the treaty was nullified in June, Canadian wheat was subject to a tariff of $1.75 per bushel. As far as Canada was concerned, there was no minimum tariff because we had no treaty. I shall repeat the figures given by the minister and he can correct me if I am wrong. In 1929 we exported 5,000,000 bushels of wheat to France for which we received $6,000,000. In 1930 we exported 6,000,000 bushels for which we received $7,000,000. In 1931 we exported 8,000,000 bushels for which we received $7,000,000. In 1932 we exported 20,000,000 for which we received $12,000,000. In 1933 we shipped 15,000,000 bushels.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not the quantity for 1933 but the price received was $8,901,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister does not have the volume which made up that $8,000,000?

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister told the hon. member for Willow Bunch that under certain conditions when millers in France exported flour made from French wheat they were allowed to import foreign wheat. I do not know whether the minister can tell us but it would be very interesting to know just what percentage of the exports of 1932 and 1933 went in under the minimum tariff and what percentage went in under this other arrangement.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no statistics and I do not think they were available during the discussions.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister will notice that our exports have been increasing from year to year. I am interested to find out just why that increase has taken place.

Mr. CAHAN: There is some difference between the French and Canadian statistics. It was stated during the discussions that the Canadian statistics contained only the quantity of wheat exported direct to France. It was stated that vessels have left Canadian ports with wheat consigned to Liverpool or Southampton and have been diverted to France while on the way. Such wheat would appear in the French but not in the Canadian statistics. Leaving that aside, I might state to the committee that the very best opinion I could form after discussing this matter for five or six hours a day for many days is that the French have not the slightest intention of allowing wheat to come in from Canada or anywhere else which will interfere with the French domestic production. I think it will be found that in the years when the Canadian exports decreased, the production of French domestic wheat has been increased, and then, when there has been an increase in the Canadian exports, it will be found to be due to a partial failure in the French wheat crop of that year. I can offer no hope to the committee that France is likely to change this policy.

Mr. VALLANCE: In spite of the fact that under this treaty we are able to export wheat to France at eighty cents per bushel, the Canadian growers will have no larger market than they had before.

Mr. CAHAN: They will have just the market that is permitted by the French production. When I was there, only three per cent of foreign wheat was allowed to enter into manufacture of flour. Since I left France, I have seen a later decree that only one per cent of foreign wheat could enter into the manufacture of flour. Therefore our wheat market in France is unstable owing to the policy of that country to restrict by prohibitive measures, for an import of one per cent or three per cent is a restrictive measure, the importation and the use in France of foreign, including Canadian wheat.

Mr. DONNELLY: I want to thank the minister for his honest and frank statement concerning the exportation of our wheat to France. I trust this trade agreement which we now have before us has not been the cause of the French government lowering our quota from three to one per cent, as he has just stated to be the case.

Mr. CAHAN: Our quota has not been changed from three to one per cent. I said that while I was in France, the total foreign importation was limited to three per cent. I understand by a decree which I have seen since, the total foreign importation has been limited to one per cent. That percentage may be increased to 5, 10 or 11 per cent if there is a fair prospect that the French crop for the ensuing year is not coming up to the normal standard.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister this morning, if I understood him aright, said that there are some European countries which have treaty arrangements with France whereby they are allowed 30 per cent less than the minimum—

Mr. CAHAN: They get a rebate on the minimum rate. France, under the Stresa agreement, if I remember correctly, was to advance certain funds to assist in the rehabilitation of those three Danubian states. France grants to them first the right to export to her 30 per cent of her annual imports of wheat, each state of the three to have the advantage of 10 per cent of France's annual imports, and there is on that importation of wheat a rebate in duty which is paid back to those three countries for the purpose of assisting certain public works there.

Mr. DONNELLY: What percentage of the duty paid is returned?

Mr. CAHAN: I had the figures before me this morning, but my memory is 30 per cent.

Mr. DONNELLY: At the present time that would be about twenty-four cents a bushel.

Mr. CAHAN: A little more than that.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it the practice of the French government to lower the duty on wheat in years when their own crop is not sufficient for their needs?

Mr. CAHAN: In recent years there has been no lowering of the duty; each change has been an increase of duty. The French farmer is a very potent factor in French politics. When I was in Paris I saw a demonstration against the government of the day when, by the numbers I saw in the streets there must have been some thousands who had come in to the city to make certain protests against certain proposals of the French government.

Mr. YOUNG: Did they get a hearing?

Mr. CAHAN: I saw streets of Paris lined with police and soldiers for the purpose of maintaining order in that city.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch says that I am frank. I am very frank; I am not holding out to the wheat growers of Canada the hope of getting any very substantial market in France except in those years when the French production is not up to the demands of their domestic consumption.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not agree with the minister in the last statement he has made. I think he agrees with me that in some years when the French production of wheat has been high, we have had a fairly good export to that country. I also believe the regulations made from time to time as to rebating to the millers of flour an amount equal to the duty paid if the wheat were of foreign origin really constitute the factor which enables us to ship wheat to France. If France does a very substantial export business of flour milled from domestic wheat, under some internal arrangements, most of our wheat enters. I cannot understand how Canadian wheat could have entered under the general duty and sold in France at the price at which it was sold there during the past year. The minister knows wheat in France to-day is not as high as wheat in Canada plus the rate of duty which has been charged during the past year.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: If the prices are higher. I would like to know them.

Mr. CAHAN: I figured it up at the rate of exchange of the day—when domestic wheat was selling at $1.30 per bushel, the price having been reduced in a short time, as alleged by those arguing the case, from $1.75 per bushel, and there was a vigorous protest throughout the country against this reduction in price.

Mr. MALCOLM: What was the rate of duty that day?

Mr. CAHAN: About eighty-five cents a bushel minimum and I am told—and this is information that may not be accurate; it is not official—that they were able to buy Canadian wheat and land it at that time, at a French port at about forty to forty-five cents a bushel.

Mr. YOUNG: Was eighty-five cents the general rate at that time?

Mr. CAHAN: It was the minimum tariff rate.

Mr. YOUNG: Were we getting the minimum tariff rate at that time?

Mr. CAHAN: No; we had not since the previous June.

Mr. YOUNG: What rate of duty was Canadian wheat paying at that time?

Mr. CAHAN: It was $1.75.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is the point.

Mr. DONNELLY: It would be impossible to land Canadian wheat in France during the past year at forty-one cents a bushel.

Mr. CAHAN: It was said to be between forty cents and fifty cents.

Mr. MALCOLM: I may not have expressed myself well. At the very time of which the minister speaks, when Canadian wheat was paying a duty of $1.75, when sold in France. Even if the cost of the wheat was only fifty cents a bushel, with the duty it would cost $2.25 delivered in France.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman means that a rebate was being given at that time?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: A rebate was being given which brought the duty down to the present minimum tariff.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is the point I am making; the effect of the rebate permitted the sale of our wheat. Therefore I contend that if whatever wheat we have sold was by virtue of the rebate, the minister is not quite correct in saying that in future our sales of wheat to France will be governed entirely by the scarcity of production within her territory. I believe our sales to France will continue to be governed, as in the past, by the effect of the rebate on flour exported.

Mr. MORAND: Will flour exported displace our wheat in other markets?

Mr. MALCOLM: Flour exported makes an opportunity for us to ship in wheat.

Mr. MORAND: That is to France, but flour exported to other countries takes the place of our flour or wheat.

Mr. MALCOLM: It might do so or it might take the place of the softer varieties of United States wheat.

Mr. YOUNG: How much wheat does France consume in a year?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not the particulars of the production. She is one of the largest wheat producing countries of Europe.

Mr. YOUNG: I said consumption.

Mr. CAHAN: That can be found from the imports and what she produces; I have not the figures.

Mr. GIROUARD: What is the minimum tariff regarding item 37, butter, fresh, melted or salted?

Mr. CAHAN: Item 37 of the French tariff is "butter, fresh, melted or salted," the minimum tariff being 200 francs per 100 kilos which, at the time of negotiating—and I have the figures here—amounted in Canadian currency to $3.55 per hundred pounds or a little over 3½ cents a pound. At the same time the general tariff was $7.11 per 100 pounds, but there was put into force for one year—from September 28, 1932, while these discussions were going on—a higher duty for a period of one year for the protection of French production, and that higher duty amounted to 700 francs per 100 kilos, $12.44 per 100 pounds, or nearly 12½ cents a pound. That duty will be in effect until September 28, 1933, unless previously repealed by decree of the French government.

Mr. RALSTON: I ask the minister to turn to items 46 to 49 inclusive, appearing in Schedule A. Item 46 is for "fish, dried, salted or smoked." Will the minister tell me whether there is any regulation in force in France, and if so what, providing a bonus to salt water fishermen?

Mr. CAHAN: I presume the hon. member refers to the St. Pierre fishermen. I cannot answer the question accurately, but I know that the minimum tariff rate is high, and I understood that that was so for the protection of French fishermen fishing off the St. Pierre, Miquelon and Newfoundland coasts. When I was dealing with the French government the minimum tariff ran, on different kinds of dried, salted and smoked fish, from 100 francs to 300 francs per 100 kilos. That is, there was a tariff varying from $2.67 per 100 pounds to $5.33 per 100 pounds according to the class of fish. On dried and certain other kinds of fish, which they call stock fish, salted or smoked, the tariff was $1.78 for 100 pounds.

Mr. RALSTON: Is cod classified separately?

Mr. CAHAN: Dried, salted or smoked cod is under the first classification.

Mr. RALSTON: That is, from $2.67 to $5.33 per 100 pounds.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The minimum tariff is the same under the old treaty as under the new. It applies in both cases.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister referred to lobsters, under item 49. I am a little apprehensive about the note annexed to Schedule A which has to do with the importation of lobsters, and which seems to forecast the possibility of a quota regulation. Could the minister tell us anything on that point?

Mr. CAHAN: There is a quota. To which pages did you refer?

Mr. RALSTON: Pages 14 and 15 of the bill. On page 15 there is a reference to lobsters.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, there is a quota on lobsters going into France. Our quota for the minimum tariff is 3,000 quintals or 660,000 odd pounds. We are not prevented from sending an amount in excess of that quota, but we have to pay the maximum tariff duty on the excess.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not understand that the quota is actually in force.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, they have a regular quota system.

Mr. RALSTON: I notice that the second paragraph on page 16 reads:

> In case the importation into France of canned lobsters and spiny lobsters is submitted to quotas, the French government reserves the right to submit the importation of the above category originating in Canada to the regime of licences of importation which may be applied to similar goods from other sources.

I took that paragraph to mean that it was possibly envisaged that there would be a quota. The hon. minister states that there is one now.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly a quota was imposed upon us, in view of the fact that under arrangements outstanding 3,000 quintals was the full amount that could be allowed to us at the time. In the previous year we had exported to France 382 metric tons of lobsters preserved or prepared. The imports of France of preserved or prepared lobsters amounted to 6,192 metric tons. Of that amount 2,779 came from Great Britain, 1,170 from Germany, 811 from Japan, 547 from the Union of South Africa, 382 from Canada, 152 from a French colony, and 129 from Soviet Russia.

Mr. RALSTON: Over half came from Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: No; the United Kingdom sent more than we did. Canada sent only 382 metric tons, whereas Japan sent 811. Those figures deal with the year before the rescission of the French treaty.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the minister will find that those lobsters sent from Great Britain to France came originally from Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: That may be so.

Mr. RALSTON: I think it is. I do not mean that they were all Canadian lobsters, but I suggest that a very large proportion of them were.

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact it would not make any difference whether or not the shipment was direct because, with respect to lobsters, I understand Great Britain enjoys the French minimum tariff. So that whether they were shipped from Canada direct or shipped via Southampton or Liverpool they would receive exactly the same treatment, namely the minimum tariff, in France.

Mr. RALSTON: Has Great Britain enjoyed a minimum tariff under a treaty arrangement?

Mr. CAHAN: I believe Great Britain enjoys a minimum tariff in France on almost everything, in view of the fact that up until last year French productions were admitted into England at the lowest possible rates of duty. I cannot speak for the last two or three months.

Mr. RALSTON: I am wondering whether or not England and France even had the formality of a treaty.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, yes, there is a treaty outstanding.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the minister stated that 382 metric tons were shipped by Canada to France. Then I did not quite catch the figures that he gave as those which would be applicable to Canada. I thought it was more than that.

Mr. CAHAN: No, it is three thousand quintals at 220 pounds and a fraction.

Mr. RALSTON: That is 660,000 pounds. Now if a metric ton—here is where the minister has me completely at a disadvantage as he has been dealing with metric measures—if a metric ton is the same as our ton, that is 2,000 pounds, then 382 tons would be 764,000 pounds, whereas the quota, he is pointing out, is only 660,000, indicating that the quota could not have been in effect at that time, if I am right in my figures.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot tell as to the quota being in effect. As far as my memory goes, at the time of our discussion there was a temporary quota in effect with regard to importation of canned and preserved lobsters into that country.

Mr. MARCIL: Coming back to cod, which is a very important product of the lower St. Lawrence, has any real advantage been secured on the French market for salted cod?

Mr. CAHAN: No, it remains under the minimum tariff as it was before.

Mr. RALSTON: In reference to cod, would my hon. friend tell me the amount of dry salt cod which the figures show was imported into France from Canada, referring to items 45 and 46.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: I can simply give the total import into France of cod; dried, salted and smoked; which was 5,069 metric tons. That is for the year 1930, the last figures I have.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the total imports?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes. These are French figures. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has the figures at hand, tells me that our exports of dried cod to France were practically nothing in recent years.

Mr. RALSTON: They could not be, over that tariff wall. They are paying the fishermen 75 cents to $1 per hundredweight, and the minister is pointing out that the minimum tariff is $5 and $6. So I cannot see how there could be much. With regard to exports of fresh fish from Canada to France, can the minister tell me if the figures show any appreciable amount?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, $40,000 last year.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister tell me the minimum tariff on fresh fish, that is item 46?

Mr. CAHAN: It is about $1.33 of our money per hundredweight. I am computing at the rate of exchange as at the time of the negotiations. It has fluctuated somewhat.

Mr. RALSTON: One wonders whether there really is any advantage at all in putting items like this in the treaty. I quite understand this was in the previous treaty, but in view of the height of the minimum tariff can the minister tell me if there was any discussion about the possibility of dropping it altogether? What is the advantage of including it?

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps there may be during the present year no advantage. There are a number of items under the minimum tariff of France with respect to which as far as my knowledge goes, which is not extensive, the Canadian producer probably cannot profit for months. But this I will say, that there is no item included under the minimum tariff in this agreement and there is no item included in the other schedule which fixes reductions from the maximum tariff, that was not asked for by somebody in Canada. The number of requests that came in with regard to this treaty was very large. We simply dealt with items with respect to which some person in Canada thought that he might do business if they were placed on the minimum tariff.

Mr. RALSTON: With all due respect to the minister, no doubt concessions were asked for, but I can hardly conceive of anyone in the fish business simply asking for the French minimum tariff, for instance, on salted fish. He must have asked for further concessions.

Mr. CAHAN: If he did he asked for something which, except in one instance, France has never granted to anyone and has absolutely and imperatively refused to grant to Canada, that is a concession below the minimum tariff. The only way that has been done is in the arrangement made with the three Danubian states under conditions accepted by the conference held at Stresa under the auspices of the League of Nations. The fact is that whether for present or future trading there was some person in Canada who put in a memorandum asking for the minimum tariff on fish.

Mr. RALSTON: Coming back to lobsters, what I fear is this. It seems to me, according to the documents in front of me—I have the French convention and I have this treaty —that this is the first time a quota is expressly recognized by us.

Mr. CAHAN: If we recognize the facts that have been evident during the past ten years we have to recognize that France did reserve absolute liberty of action, and that France has imposed quotas on many of the imports from Canada which are mentioned as being under the minimum tariff in the preceding treaty.

Mr. RALSTON: I was speaking about lobsters particularly. We now recognize that France may impose a quota on lobsters, that these lobsters must be accompanied by special certificates of origin, and that certain control has to be exercised with regard to permits. It seems to me, just on the documents that I have here, that the export of lobsters is going to be more restricted and that there is less likelihood of doing business under the treaty now put before us than there was before.

Mr. CAHAN: All I can say is that up to September 25, 1932, there had been in force quotas on lobsters. I do not pretend to have searched further than that, but on that date I have a note that there were then quota restrictions in force in France on canned and preserved lobsters.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not see any advantage in this treaty at any rate for the fishermen, either on fresh or salt fish, or lobsters.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Reverting to item 37, is the hon. minister in a position to inform the house what quantity of butter, in pounds, Canada exported to France in 1931, 1932 and 1933?

Mr. CAHAN: The Minister of Trade and Commerce will look it up. If the hon. gentleman will simply procure one of the ordinary statistical returns made by the government he will see these products set forth in detail. I cannot carry them in my mind.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not shown in the return. I think the export is very small, and would be included in the general term, "all other items." The export of butter is very insignificant. I have not the detailed returns here; it would take a little time to look them up.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Is it the same for cheese—item 36?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, cheese is small too. In the fiscal year 1932, $9,000 worth, and $5,000 in 1931.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Could the minister tell us what kind of cheese is included? Is it cheddar cheese?

Mr. STEVENS: I presume it is Canadian cheese.

Mr. BOUCHARD: But that term covers many kinds of cheese.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not subdivided.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I might remind the committee that France is perhaps second to no other country in the production of cheese, not only in variety but also in quality. Canada produces a very good cheddar cheese, but without disparaging our own products I think the committee will agree that we have not the same variety of cheese that they have in France. I was told that small cheese, such as Chateau cheese, for instance, has found quite a substantial market in France. It just shows that as the French people may have developed a taste for Canadian cheese so we may have developed a taste for French cheese, which indicates that freer trade between the two nations is more satisfactory to both.

While I am on my feet may I remind the committee that in France the tariff really has worked for the farmers, but here in Canada though the farmers have been promised during election campaigns and at other times that the tariff would work for them, that has not been the case. As soon as the tariff is lowered on wheat and other articles there is an agitation in France, where I think there is more equity as between the benefits received by the different classes of the community from the tariff.

Mr. CAHAN: I can only say that when I was in France I was busy for seven or eight hours a day sitting with a commission composed of seven or eight gentlemen, experts from different departments, and I was not worrying over Canadian domestic politics at all. I was trying to make the best possible bargain for the sale of our goods in France.

In reply to the hon. gentleman who was dealing with butter, may I say that I recall that butter was not included in the schedule with the expectation of increasing our market in France for butter. We have had a considerable market in St. Pierre, Miquelon and the French West Indies, and butter was included so that we might retain the lowest rate of duty on butter entering those colonies, which are near us.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am particularly interested in item 168, which covers wood pulp chemically treated, under guarantee of clearance to be discharged by "les contributions indirectes." I do not know what those words mean, but I believe that under the previous treaty we did very little trade with France under this item, and I should like a little information from the minister in this regard. Apparently in the past we did not sell raw pulpwood to France, but I have been told by competent authorities that a potential market exists in that country. Will the minister be good enough to tell us the exports of wood pulp and similar material during the last year the previous treaty was in operation, and also whether it will be possible to create a new market in France for Canadian wood pulp.

Mr. CAHAN: I really believe that our exporters have not paid particular attention to the markets in France, which of course are highly competitive. I am sure many things could be sold there if special agencies were created for the purpose. With respect to wood pulp, our right to the minimum tariff is confined to chemical dry pulp which is used in the manufacture of artificial silk. We never have been able to compete with Norway and Finland with regard to wet pulp.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Under item 190 would the minister say how many tons of coal we exported to France in 1932, and what kind of coal it was?

Mr. CAHAN: We have not exported coal to France and we do not expect to do so. We have some advantage on coal in St. Pierre, Miquelon and the French West Indies, which are near our ports and to which at times we export coal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Have we had any trade of that kind with St. Pierre, Miquelon and the other colonies?

Mr. CAHAN: I was told that by exporting coal there we could do some business in bunker coal, with the vessels which come there for coaling purposes. If the hon. gentleman wishes me to do so I can look up these statistics, but they are available to him just as they are to me. I remember that I was asked to have coal included, not with the expectation of sending coal from Cape Breton or British Columbia to France but in order that coal might be sent to some of the French colonies, especially to supply bunker coal to ships calling at those colonies, which might create a market of some modest value.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not intend to go through all these items; many questions have been asked with regard to them. I do not want to belittle the efforts of the minister in negotiating a treaty of this kind, but up to the present time I have not found any great advantages in it. Most of these items constitute what might be called a fishing expedition, an exploration into the possibilities.

Mr. CAHAN: It must be a fishing expedition when only five per cent of our exports to France are manufactured goods. France will not reduce her minimum tariff under any circumstances; it has been done only once, by treaty, and to ask for reductions in the minimum tariff is to ask in vain. What would the hon. gentleman do when met with a decisive "No" of that kind? The only thing to do is to go through the items of the French tariff one by one, as we did, and to study the correspondence received in order to ascertain on which items there was any prospect of maintaining, expending or increasing our exports to that country.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to item 68, which covers wheat flour. I am quite well aware that for some time we have not exported much flour to France, but at one time that trade was fairly large. Is there any change in this treaty, as compared with the old agreement, in the duty on Canadian flour entering France? It is not necessary for me to remind the committee that the milling industry in Canada has been in a very depressed state for three or four years. Any outlet for Canadian flour would therefore be welcomed not only by the milling industry but by the farmers generally. Will the minister tell me whether, in his negotiations in France, he was successful or not, he made any effort to get some favourable consideration for Canadian flour going into that country.

Mr. CAHAN: We obtained the minimum tariff, which is the lowest tariff France gives or will give to foreign flour products. I could do no more.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am quite aware it is the minimum tariff, but is that any advantage to the Canadian miller over the arrangements that were in force up to last summer?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think so.

Mr. SANDERSON: It is just the same.

Mr. CAHAN: Just the same.

Mr. SANDERSON: As a matter of fact, there is no more advantage for the grower of wheat in Canada to sell his wheat to France than there was a year ago, and the same applies to flour.

Mr. CAHAN: Not the slightest difference.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I direct the minister's attention to item 31, dealing with oleomargine, edible fats, and similar products. Am I wrong if I am under the impression that the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada was prohibited? I remember having made my maiden speech against this product, and I should like to have more information in regard to it.

Mr. CAHAN: This includes all sorts of edible fats, and the caption is simply the one used in the French tariff. Without defining any particular edible fats, it gives us the minimum tariff with respect to all these edible fat products.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is there any more oleomargarine manufactured in Canada?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know whether any has been manufactured, and it would not have made any difference, because I was not an expert who knew all the edible fats that were manufactured in Canada. I may inform the hon. gentleman however that this includes every kind and description of edible fats and therefore we used the caption as it appears in the French tariff under item 31.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister has been refreshingly frank in admitting that with respect to a great many items in schedule A Canadian exporters can look with little hope for an increase in the existing volume of business, if any does exist. He has said with regard to wheat that there is little hope in that direction, and he has admitted with regard to flour that there is also but little hope. There has been some discussion in the press that due to this treaty pneumatic tires, and casings may go in larger quantities from Canada to France, and that we may have an increase of business in canned salmon and wood pulp for the manufacture of artificial silk. I would submit that under the terms of the old treaty we had on pneumatic tires a duty of 375 francs per hundred kilos; on lobsters, canned, 42½ francs per hundred kilos; on canned salmon 59½ francs per hundred kilos; on wood pulp ·75 to 13 francs per hundred kilos; on lead in pigs, of which we exported $571,000 worth, we had 4·25 francs per hundred kilos. Will the minister give to the committee the existing rates of duty under the French minimum tariff, with respect to the principal commodities which he thinks we may export to France, so that Canadian exporters who are looking forward to receiving considerable benefit from this treaty will be able to analyze his statement to the committee and ascertain just what duties they will have to face under the minimum tariff in trying to export their products.

Mr. CAHAN: With all deference, I suggest that the hon. gentleman is not serious in asking me to go over scores of items.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, the principal ones.

Mr. CAHAN: The Department of Trade and Commerce will undoubtedly send out to the public a complete and thorough analysis. All I have to say is that if the duties which the hon. gentleman has mentioned with respect to certain articles were the minimum duties under the old tariff treaty, they will continue under that minimum.

Mr. MALCOLM: Have they not been increased?

Mr. CAHAN: Not since last June.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am giving 1929 rates.

Mr. CAHAN: The 1929 rates remain practically the same. I should expect, from the discussions I heard, that there will be some increase in their minimum duties on lead, and it is just possible that there may be some increase in their minimum tariff on zinc. But whatever they are, we have to take them or take nothing. In dealing with France we are face to face with a choice between her minimum and her maximum tariffs. I may observe that those gentlemen regarded it as incomprehensible that we should have so slight a difference between our minimum, that is to say our intermediate for foreign purposes, and our general tariff. They have made their maximum tariff two, three and four times as high as their minimum, with a view to compelling foreign countries to make concessions in order to obtain their minimum tariff, and they thought that we had not adopted the most efficient tariff policy because our general tariff was on so many items the same as our intermediate.

Mr. MALCOLM: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: Granted. They said it was useless for a foreign country to deal with us because they obtained no advantages by coming in under the intermediate tariff. The reason for it I did not explain to them, but I have a clear reason in my own mind, and it is this. The one large country in the world which is under the general tariff of Canada is the United States, and we have not increased the general tariff above the intermediate tariff in respect of many items, because we did not wish to restrict our importations from the United States—in other words, because we did not wish to offend the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: That applies particularly to hon. gentlemen opposite, more particularly than to this government. But this I learned—I intended to reserve it until after the close of the economic conference at London, but I will say it now. In future, if we wish to deal advantageously with European countries in the matter of trade, and to secure concessions from them on the main exports which go from Canada, we shall find it very necessary to increase our general tariff in order to induce them to give us advantages for the purpose of procuring the admission of these products under our intermediate tariff, and if we do not do so we shall not obtain the advantages in their market which are necessary to increase our export trade with them.

This world has not reached that high plane of idealism where setting aside national interests the different nations are willing to sit together and deal fraternally with each other, giving the same favours to foreign industry in trade and commerce as they preserve for domestic industry and commerce. Any person who has that idea in his mind, that this is not a trading proposition, should have sat down day after day and week after week with me in the discussions I had with the French commission with respect to these matters. It is a trading proposition. Nationalism is not dead. The international spirit may be improving in certain respects but during my lifetime and during my generation I expect to find Canada treating foreign nations in a different manner to that in which she treats her own producers and I expect to find foreign nations treating their own domestic production more favourably than the foreign production of Canada or any other country.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am sorry the minister cannot give the committee the exact rates of duty.

Mr. CAHAN: Can the hon. member tell me the item he wishes?

Mr. MALCOLM: I mentioned rubber products and tires.

Mr. CAHAN: Rubber products are covered by item 620g and items lower down.

Mr. MALCOLM: What is the rate on rubber tires; I think the number is 620i.

Mr. CAHAN: That item deals with solid tires. The minimum rate is 200 francs per hundred kilos, which is equivalent to $3.50 per hundred pounds.

Mr. MALCOLM: What is the rate for 620h?

Mr. CAHAN: That item covers inner tubes, pneumatic tires and covers. The minimum rate is 250 francs per hundred kilos which at the rate of exchange in effect at the time I was conducting negotiations is equal to $4.25 per hundred pounds. The rate of exchange has fluctuated a little since that time.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is a concession.

Mr. CAHAN: That is on the minimum tariff; the former rate to Canada was $6.67 per hundred pounds.

Mr. MALCOLM: 375 francs under the intermediate.

Mr. CAHAN: On 620i the former rate to Canada was $4.45 per hundred pounds.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can the minister give us the same information with regard to canned salmon? What benefit accrues under the reduced rate?

Mr. CAHAN: We have the minimum rate but they are increasing their rates on canned salmon.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How much longer has the Japanese treaty with France to run?

Mr. CAHAN: What is the number of the canned salmon item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Forty-seven.

Mr. CAHAN: The Japanese previously enjoyed the minimum rate which is 42.5 francs per hundred kilograms, equal to 76 cents per hundred pounds. Under the old treaty the rate to Canada was $1.66 per hundred pounds. We now get the minimum tariff. I understand that this minimum tariff is to be increased from 76 cents to 84 cents. We will have the advantage of a reduction of one-half in the tariff on salmon and will be able to compete on equal terms with Japan.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This will bring us on an equality with Japan?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: For the first time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is an item in schedule A covering tobacco in leaves or stalks. Does the minister expect that we will be able to export any tobacco to France?

Mr. CAHAN: The minimum rate on this item is free but we wished to mention the minimum rate that we might be placed in a favourable position should an increase be made in the tariff. I devoted some time to this tobacco item, in connection with which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce supplied me with considerable data. From my discussions with the members of the French tobacco regie I can see no reason why our sales of tobacco to France should not increase in an equal proportion to our sales of tobacco to Great Britain. This will depend upon the producers in Canada taking the necessary measures to enter the French market. The High Commissioner at London gave me some data with regard to the increase of tobacco sales in London, not only for smoking tobacco but for tobacco to be used in the manufacture of cigarettes. I found the head of the French tobacco regie to be a very amiable gentleman. He told me that some twenty years ago he had visited Quebec city to see some people of the same speech and race as himself. He then investigated French Canadian supplies of tobacco but he found them not up to standard. He told me that he did not know that we had made any improvement since. I showed him the statistics with regard to our improved production and pointed out that certain grades were deemed by the British manufacturer to be equal to grades now produced in the United States. He told me that if this treaty went into force, he certainly would be prepared to receive overtures from Canadian producers of tobacco. He stated also that he would send experts to Canada to examine into the matter. I think there is reasonable ground for expecting an increase in the exports of tobacco from Canada to France. However, it will be necessary to convince the French experts that our tobacco is as suitable for smoking purposes and for the manufacture of cigarettes as the grades which they are now purchasing from the United States. Up to the time I was there they were purchasing tobacco in the United States at a disadvantage as compared with the discount on exchange that then existed in respect of Canadian funds. I am hopeful something may be done in the way of increasing that trade and I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce has the matter well in hand and has been giving a thorough and detailed study to the subject.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Can anybody import tobacco into France?

Mr. CAHAN: No, tobacco is imported by the government only. It is necessary to convince the experts of the government as to the quality of our tobaccos.

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry I cannot agree with the minister's interpretation of the duty on canned salmon. He told us just now that the duty was to be reduced to 84 francs per 100 kilograms. Item No. 47 states that the duty will be the minimum tariff and then there is a provision at the foot of page 14 that from the putting into force of the commercial agreement, the rates will be the general tariff reduced by 72 per cent, the rate thus obtained representing a duty of 84 francs per 100 kilograms gross. That is not my opinion; I am quoting from the paragraph. That would mean a rate of 84 francs, but then the paragraph goes on to state:

> On the other hand, it is the intention of the French govrenment, . . . to amend its customs legislation in such manner as to increase by—

Not "to" but "by".

> —by 84 francs per 100 kilos gross the minimum tariff on canned salmonoids.

If it read "to increase to 84 francs", I would understand it, but "to increase by" certainly means to add to. They are certainly going to add it to the minimum stated under item 47 which, by the footnote on page 14, is to be 84 francs per 100 kilograms. I suggest that we are going to pay exactly double that; first, the original minimum, and, if they pass that bill, there will be another 84 francs on top of that. If it does not mean that, then either I am or the English language is falling off. I ask the minister to read that paragraph.

Mr. CAHAN: There may be a mistranslation there. Has the hon. member for Quebec East the French version before him?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Will he look at the notes annexed to schedule A on page 14 where it says:

In such manner as to increase—

The experts in Canada have studied the matter and have compiled this memorandum which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has kindly given to me.

The general tariff in France is 300 francs for 100 kilograms. The minimum tariff is 75 francs. The rate to Canada under the old treaty was 165 francs up to June 16, 1932. It was 300 francs after that date and until the conclusion of this treaty. The rate to Japan was 75 francs up to September 25, 1932. From June 16, 1932, under the general tariff of France our export of canned salmon paid 300 francs per 100 kilograms, while Japan paid only 84 francs per 100 kilograms. Under the new treaty there is granted a reduction of 72 per cent discount from the general tariff. That brings it down to 84 francs per 100 kilograms and 84 francs at the rate of exchange on May 15 amounted to $1.49 per 100 pounds.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The French version of the treaty says that the rate will be raised "to".

Mr. NEILL: That is very important. We should make an amendment to that effect. It makes a great difference whether it is "to" or "by"; it means a difference of 84 francs.

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose the notes were prepared by one of the translators and a mistake may have been made. We shall take pains to have that changed.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister amend it?

Mr. CAHAN: With the consent of the committee I shall have one of the translators of the house look into the matter and amend it. It is all covered in the first paragraph to the notes in Schedule A; that is the operative part:

From the putting into force of the commercial agreement—

That is, this agreement.

—canned salmonoids coming under Ex No. 47 of the French customs tariff, exported from Canada will be admitted on French customs territory at a rate corresponding to the general tariff reduced by 72 per cent, the rate thus obtained representing a duty of 84 francs per 100 kilogs. gross.

[Mr. Neill.]

The operative part of the memorandum is correct. The note which has been annexed by one of the translators may be a misprint, or it may have been, by chance, a mistranslation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to inquire of the minister just in a general way regarding schedule C and items 549 to 564, all dealing with silks.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Schedule C is not included in this article. The article we are discussing covers schedules A and B. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will wait until we come to the next article.

Article 1 agreed to.

On article 2.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suppose we shall adopt the same system that we did in regard to article one; that is, on article 2, schedules C and D may be discussed. Then, when we pass article 2, it carries with it schedules C and D. The hon. member for West Edmonton might ask his question now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am interested chiefly in the silk items. I gather from what the minister has said with respect to schedule A, that, owing to the fact that the French government have been raising duties continuously since 1930, the duties on imports of Canadian goods into France are much higher than they were under the old treaty.

Mr. CAHAN: When initiated.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And even as late as 1930. I am speaking largely from memory, but as I remember the matter, as there was no definite arrangement for fixed tariffs, the French government were continuously raising their duties, thus affecting Canadian treaty articles. In view of the fact that the duties on those silk articles as well as on textiles of wool and cotton were raised rather extensively in the Empire trade treaties, they will be at a higher rate than they were under the old schedules. Inasmuch as the duties now in effect under this trade agreement are much higher than under the old on our exports to France, so are the duties higher on imports from France, particularly as they affect silks and other textiles.

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact, in a general way the textiles composed of silk and artificial silk were not largely dealt with in the agreement made at Ottawa a year ago. As a matter of fact with a few exceptions these items have not been increased by the trade agreement made with Great Britain. And with regard to most of these items, while the tariff remains the same France is obtaining the 10 per cent reduction which she enjoyed under the old convention. As a matter of fact France is left nearly in the same position as she was prior to the rescission of the old French trade agreement. So far as the financial condition of Canadian consumers will permit, and the purchases of luxuries affected thereby, she will preserve in Canada nearly the same position as that occupied by her prior to the rescission of the treaty. I believe that general observation is quite correct.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest that in the notes appearing on page 14 of the bill the word "therefore" should be substituted for the words "on the other hand" in the line third from the bottom of the page. I am told that the word "therefore" would give a better translation, and would make better sense. Then on the first line of page 15 I suggest the word "by" should be stricken out and the word "to" substituted therefor.

Mr. CAHAN: That is merely a matter of translation. If the committee will allow it to stand I should like to have the official translator go over it so as to have the language more precise.

Mr. NEILL: The minister will let the article stand?

Mr. CAHAN: After listening to the speeches in the French language of ten or fifteen hon. gentlemen my French is improving from day to day and from week to week. I read it very well, but I should like to have the official translator look over the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister let the article stand?

Mr. CAHAN: Is it necessary to have it stand, when only a note is at fault? That part of the bill to which the hon. member has referred is simply a note in explanation. The operative clause is entirely correct.

Mr. NEILL: Pardon me; the notes relate to Schedule A. There is a reference to addenda numbers 47 and 49 of the French customs tariff. These notes must be passed as something, and I suggest they are part of the schedule. When we have passed the article we have passed it all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the note is part of Schedule A, and Schedule A was passed under article 1.

Mr. NEILL: Schedule A is not passed.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; we are now on Schedules C and D.

Mr. NEILL: We are on article No. 1.

Mr. STEVENS: No, No. 2.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Article 1 is passed.

Mr. NEILL: When did it pass?

Mr. STEVENS: A quarter of an hour ago.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I said, "Shall the article pass?" And it was passed.

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish to harass the minister, but it is quite evident that we must not pass part of a bill in which there appears a gross error.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is merely a mistake in translation.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe the language now in the bill is quite clear, and could not be made clearer.

Mr. NEILL: It is clear, if you accept the explanation that there is a mistake in it. But are we going to pass legislation which obviously reads wrongly?

Mr. CAHAN: I believe the hon. member is not correct in that statement.

Mr. NEILL: The minister states that these are notes. Yes, but they are part of the schedule.

Mr. CAHAN: The note is part of the schedule.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: And the note to which reference has been made is official. I thought the hon. member was referring to notes concerning items 47 and 49.

Mr. NEILL: I referred to page 14 of the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought the hon. member was referring to a note concerning item 47 appearing at page 10.

Mr. NEILL: No, I am speaking about page 14.

Mr. CAHAN: Where is the mistake?

Mr. NEILL: We find these words, "notes annexed to Schedule A. Addenda Nos. 47 and 49 of French customs tariff." I propose that the word "therefore" should be substituted for the words "on the other hand" appearing three lines from the bottom of the page, and that at the top of page 15 the word "to" should be substituted for the word "by" so that it will read:

in such manner as to increase to 84 francs.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member may hold up the schedule if he wishes but—

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish to.

Mr. CAHAN: The French minister has signed for both the French and the English translations, and before changing that translation I should like to see the official translator and ascertain if it is correct. I believe the assurance given by me, that before this treaty is finally passed I should have that done, is quite sufficient.

Mr. NEILL: I did not understand it that way.

Mr. CAHAN: But I must have the consent of the French minister before I can change the translation.

Mr. NEILL: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the minister if there is any change in the rates on wine? I believe the Liberal government are responsible for the increased duties on wine. I believe, however, there is no change in the schedule.

Mr. CAHAN: No; I think French wines will come in and continue to come in at the same rate of duty as obtained before the treaty was abrogated. Of course for a few months past they have come in under the general tariff, but the treaty will restore the old rate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a great relief.

Mr. CAHAN: May I point out that the French government is anxious to have the rates still further reduced. They pointed out that in their opinion the sales being made by commissions were made at very high prices. I had to suggest that the high rates at which French wines, liqueurs, and brandies are sold in Canada were due not only to the alleged high rates of import duties imposed by the federal government, but due to the very large profits made by some of the provincial commissions in the sales of French wines.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Possibly.

Mr. CAHAN: As the liquor commissions are not under our control, and as they fix their own prices, the federal government should not be blamed too severely for the high prices charged in sales of French wines, liqueurs and brandies.

Article 2 agreed to.

Articles 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On article 6.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will there be no dumping duties against importations from France now?

Mr. CAHAN: There is a provision that we do not restrict ourselves in respect of dumping duties. But I cannot give any promise in that respect. The treatment given to France is exactly the same as we give to other countries, and France gives us the same treatment as she gives to other countries. But I did obtain an oral assurance from France that if by reason of any changes in the international monetary system stability of exchange is obtained they would consider the reduction of their surtaxes in consideration of our making similar reductions on importations from France. That is as far as I could go.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought probably the government had changed their policy as far as France was concerned, but apparently they are still sticking to it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the hon. member will look at the last clause of the article he will see we were careful not to part with anything.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I was afraid there was a catch in it.

Article 6 agreed to.

Articles 7 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the chairman reports the bill may I say that we allowed section 2, approving of the agreement, to pass before we discussed the agreement itself. I hope the members of the government will recognize that in raising no objection we simply took it as a foregone conclusion that the measure had been agreed to and being now in force was going through. I do not think, however, that this procedure should be regarded as a precedent. The schedule and agreement should be discussed and the house given a chance to consider its terms before we are asked to approve it.

Mr. CAHAN: The right hon. gentleman knows that we concluded this treaty under most extraordinary circumstances, and it was impossible to bring it before parliament at an earlier date. We recognize that the right hon. gentleman and those sitting by him on the opposite side have shown every consideration, in view of the approaching end of the session, to enable us to bring negotiation to a conclusion, for which we are very grateful.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point was directed chiefly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who, I am afraid, unless the point were raised might on some future occasion endeavour to use this as a precedent, for having agreements approved before we actually discussed them.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I would never do a thing like that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was done in the case of the Canada-United Kingdom agreement and we protested then.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will article 15 take in French colonies and mandates? I allude to Syria.

Mr. CAHAN: There are only two French mandates.

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, the mandates are included with the colonies?

Mr. CAHAN: They are included.

Mr. MARCIL: Before the bill is reported, is the minister in a position to say what the trade with France is at the present time, and what trade he anticipates will be brought about as a result of this new treaty?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman will find in the earlier part of the debate this afternoon a complete tabular statement of the trade with France, which I trust it is not necessary to repeat. I can only say with regard to the future that I think this will improve the conditions which prevailed when France was on our general tariff and we were on its maximum tariff. The extent to which trade will improve I think depends very largely on general economic conditions outside of and beyond the question of these tariffs. I can make no prognostications. With hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of present financial and monetary conditions of the world, I simply hope for the best.

Mr. DUPUIS: I understand schedule C is passed?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, everything is passed.

Mr. DUPUIS: Item Ex 169 as to books is marked "same rate as British preferential tariff."

Mr. STEVENS: Free.

Mr. DUPUIS: All French books will be free?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not quite understand what the hon. gentleman is asking.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am asking if French books under item Ex 169 will enter Canada free?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: The same as English books from England?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am glad that those on your right sometimes accept suggestions coming from this side, because on November 15, 1932, in the early part of this session we called the attention of the Minister of Finance to the subject and he promised us that he would ask the British government about it and ascertain if there would be any objection to allowing French books to be admitted for the use of those in Canada who wish to study French literature.

Mr. CAHAN: Let me say to my hon. friend that I do not wish to detract at all from any credit which he may deserve to receive for any suggestion he made, but he is not the only person either in the house or outside who made similar suggestions. The fact is it was practically agreed upon before the hon. gentleman made his suggestion, and we were then negotiating to that end.

Mr. DUPUIS: With all due respect to the minister I would direct his attention to the reference to this subject in the house on the 15th of November. He will note that these items, 171, 171a and 178 of the British preferential tariff were passed without comment.

Mr. STEVENS: You do not object to my hon. friend doing what you wanted?

Mr. DUPUIS: The items were passed without any notice whatsoever even against the wish of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. STEVENS: No, with my hearty approval.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am glad the minister accepted my suggestion. I know he is broad-minded.

Mr. DUPRE: Let us say all is well that ends well.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am glad to see that all the ministers are ready to admit that the suggestion I made on November 15 was good. The Minister of Finance promised me at that time that he would look into the matter, and he has acceded to my suggestion.

Mr. MALCOLM: The Solicitor General made the remark that all was well that ended well, but I do not think this is ended yet. I should like to ask the Secretary of State if it is the intention to allow these books to enter without the application of the dumping duty.

Mr. CAHAN: This tariff does not deal with dumping duties, and those duties are not imposed upon goods which have free entry.

Mr. MALCOLM: Oh, yes they are.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no dumping duty applicable in this case.

Mr. CAHAN: Then I cannot answer.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The dumping duty applies only if they are of a class or kind made in Canada, and it would not have application here.

Mr. MALCOLM: I should like to point out that the Minister of National Revenue has answered the question by saying if they are of a class or kind made in Canada they are subject to dumping duty. If the current rate of exchange is different from the rate set by the Department of National Revenue these books, which are supposed to be free, will be subject to a dumping duty.

Mr. CAHAN: That is why I said it would not apply. They are not of a class or kind made in Canada; these books are printed in French in France.

Mr. MALCOLM: If the same books were printed in French in Canada they would be subject to the dumping duty.

Mr. CAHAN: I doubt if you will find any of them printed in Canada.

Mr. GAGNON: Since my hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville has been so anxious to score a personal point may I ask him to remember that in the treaty put through by the late government in 1922 a duty of 15 per cent was imposed on these books. I am afraid the hon. member is not paying a compliment to those who negotiated the treaty at that time.

Mr. DUPUIS: My hon. friend is a little late; it has been mentioned already that since the English books were admitted free, it was only fair that the same provisions be made for French books.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State. Will the translation of this bill be ready to-morrow morning?

Mr. CAHAN: The French version is ready

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): No, I requested the French version but I have not received it.

Hon. Mr. DUPRE (Translation): We have it.

Mr. CAHAN: So far as the treaty is concerned, it is printed separately in French and in English, and I understood that copies were available.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): I asked for a copy but could not obtain one.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member for Quebec East has a copy.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I could not get one. I asked for a copy similar to that which the hon. member for Quebec East has, but I could not get it.

Bill reported.

CANADA-FRANCE CONVENTION

CONCERNING RIGHTS OF NATIONALS AND COMMERCIAL AND SHIPPING MATTERS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN: (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 108, respecting a certain convention between Canada and France concerning the rights of nationals and commercial and shipping matters.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is introduced to approve of the convention respecting the rights of nationals and commercial and shipping matters which was concluded between Canada and France on May 12th instant. The convention appears in full as a schedule to the bill.

In some respects this convention constitutes a departure from the general practice which has been followed until a comparatively recent date. In former years it was the practice of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom to negotiate general commercial treaties with foreign countries dealing not only with tariff questions but also generally with the rights of nationals and commercial and shipping matters. These treaties were sometimes extended in terms to their application to the whole British Empire, and their provisions governed the rights of Canadian nationals, Canadian corporate enterprises and Canadian shipping in those foreign countries with which the United Kingdom concluded these treaties. This practice is exemplified in the treaty of commerce and navigation between the United Kingdom and Japan which was signed on May 3, 1911, and which Canada confirmed by the Japanese Treaty Act of 1913. This treaty governs the relations of Canada and Japan not only in relation to commerce and navigation but also with regard to reciprocal trade and tariff rights.

At first Canadian commercial treaty policy was almost exclusively concerned with the exchange of goods and commodities, that is to say, with tariff questions. Some progress was made towards the adoption of a broader treaty policy in the convention of commerce of 1922, which was negotiated with France by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and Mr. Fielding, the then Minister of Finance. That convention dealt more or less casually with the protection of trade marks, patents, commercial names and industrial designs and patterns, as well as the treatment of nationals and corporations. Since that time Canada has adhered to a number of international conventions dealing with trade marks, patents, commercial names and industrial designs and patterns so that, both Canada and France having adhered to these conventions, which were inaugurated by the assembly of the league of nations and at The Hague, it was unnecessary to enter into particular agreements with respect to these matters in this present convention.

In the meantime, however, the general question of the negotiation of treaties was in a state of rapid development. It became the settled practice that Canada, in common with the other dominions, should be kept advised by the government of the United Kingdom from the inception of the negotiation of treaties affecting Canadians or Canadian interests. Later the resolutions of the Imperial conference of 1926 prescribed that no treaty could be concluded by the government of the United Kingdom which would impose obligations upon any of the dominions without the express consent of the government of the dominion concerned, and the provisions of the resolutions respecting communication and consultation precluded the negotiation by the United Kingdom of treaties conferring benefits or obligations upon the dominions or upon their nationals or national interests, without the authorization of the government of the dominion concerned. Like problems arose from the conclusion of various multilateral conventions, especially at Geneva under the auspices of the league of nations, in which the dominions were separate parties, and which conferred not only benefits and privileges, but also responsibilities and duties on the governments concerned, and also upon dominion nationals, dominion corporations and dominion shipping.

It has more recently appeared that foreign countries are rather reluctant to accord, in treaties with the United Kingdom, special rights or privileges to dominion nationals, corporations and shipping, particularly in treaties and conventions to which the dominions were not parties and in respect to which the dominions did not grant reciprocal benefits and privileges. Under the existing international and constitutional practice there are two possible courses available in the negotiation of commercial conventions. Following the first course, the convention may be negotiated by a representative of one part of the British Commonwealth, usually the United Kingdom, a separate full power being granted in respect of each of the other autonomous parts of the British Commonwealth that desires to avail itself of the benefits of such treaty and become subject to all or part of its obligations. The second course is for each member of the commonwealth to negotiate its own commercial conventions, confining the operation of such convention to its own territories and to its own nationals, corporate enterprises and shipping, and conversely confining the obligations assumed under the convention to the dominion concerned.

It is this course which has now become, I think, the normal procedure throughout the British Commonwealth and which has been followed in the negotiation and conclusion of this convention. Treaties governing commercial relations between two countries deal generally with two different classes of subjects. In the first place they deal with tariff questions as business bargains directly facilitating trade between the countries concerned, by according reciprocally preferred tariff rates to commodities exchanged between the two countries. In the second place they deal with the general regulations of commercial intercourse between the two countries by providing for the rights of nationals and shipping and commercial matters with a view thus to facilitating the general commercial dealings and intercourse between the two countries concerned.

It has been the usual practice to incorporate the provisions dealing with both classes of commercial relations in one convention, but in the present instance it was deemed desirable to conclude, as I have already stated to the house, a provisional trade arrangement or agreement for a period of one year, which might be extended by consent, and a convention dealing with other important national and commercial relations in a separate convention.

While this convention may be terminated by either party upon six months' notice, it is of such character that its provisions will likely be maintained for an indefinite period of time, affording a substantially permanent settlement of the problems with which it is directly concerned. Obviously it would have been unsatisfactory to incorporate the provisions dealing with the rights of Canadian nationals, Canadian corporate enterprises and Canadian shipping in a provisional trade arrangement which may be revised at the close of a period of one year.

The present convention concerning the rights of nationals and commercial and shipping matters deals solely with the second class of commercial relations. It defines and determines the legal rights and privileges of Canadian nationals in France and in the French colonies, protectorates and mandated territories and in corresponding manner the reciprocal rights and privileges of French nationals in Canada. It defines and determines the rights and privileges of Canadian corporate enterprises doing business in France and in territories under French rule, and in corresponding manner it deals with the rights and privileges of French corporate enterprises in Canada. Similarly, and on a reciprocal basis, it provides for Canadian shipping in the ports of French territories and French shipping in Canadian maritime ports.

The present convention follows closely the precedent generally adopted for dealing with similar problems and modern commercial treaty practice. It accords the Canadian nationals and Canadian business and shipping interests in French territories, as a matter of right, as favourable a position as has been established in modern treaty practice between countries which have reached the same advanced stage of civilization as these two countries. It should be observed that it also includes the undertaking by the two governments to deal with the special problems of corporate taxation which have given rise to difficulties in recent years.

In article 2 of this convention Canada and France agree to conclude another convention with regard to the subject of double taxation of persons and companies engaged in business in both countries. We discussed that third convention as it was a matter of special importance to Canadian banks and corporations which are doing business in France by branches or agencies. There has been a very considerable and insistent demand that Canada should negotiate with France with regard to an equitable adjustment of these matters. At Paris we drew up such a convention, which has since been approved by the officials of the Department of National Revenue here and which is now under the consideration of the financial and fiscal experts of the French government. As however their approval had not been obtained by May 12, it was inevitable that there should be a delay; but we hope at the next approaching session of parliament to submit to this parliament this third convention dealing with that particular subject of double taxation.

This convention, in terms, does not infringe on the immigration laws of either country. It gives to the nationals of either country the right to acquire property interests in the other country. The nationals of each country are exempted from compulsory military service in the other. The nationals of either country are granted free access to the courts of justice, either as plaintiffs or as defendants, in all processes within the jurisdictional authority of the courts of the respective countries, and merchants and manufacturers of either country are entitled not only to travel in the other country but to bring in samples for the purpose of trading and soliciting orders, and companies and societies are authorized to establish branches and carry on business in each of the countries concerned.

Provision is made in article 8, which is perhaps an innovation, whereby Canada reserves to itself the right to appoint consuls general, consuls, vice-consuls and consular agents, to reside in the ports and towns of French territories. With regard to the shipping of goods over the railways of either country, article 9 provides that goods shipped through the territory of one of the high contracting parties, with destination in the territory of the other party, on the railways of the latter, in relation to conditions and costs of transportation, and to rates and taxes of every description affecting transportation, shall receive as favourable treatment as that which is generally applicable to similar goods in the interior traffic of that country, under the same conditions, for the same directions and for the same distances, and shall enjoy most favoured nation treatment. With regard to the right of transshipment across either country, the goods shipped through a country are entitled to most favoured nation treatment and to the same treatment as that given to the transport of domestic goods and commodities. Article 13 contains a provision with regard to the rights of the shipping of one country which enter the ports of the other. There is also a provision covering vessels entering for shelter and those that may be stranded or wrecked. Article 20 reads:

If a dispute arises between the high contracting parties in regard to the proper interpretation or application of this convention which cannot be solved by diplomatic means, the matters in dispute shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice at the Hague.

In dealing with the provisions with regard to the rights of French shipping generally and of wrecked and stranded ships, I took particular pains to keep in mind the existing Canadion law dealing with these matters and I think I can assure hon. gentlemen that the provisions of this treaty are entirely consistent with the law at present in existence in Canada. In dealing with Canadian shipping, for the purposes of this convention we confined it to shipping registered in Canada. I might have proceeded further and perhaps a little more definitely but at the time of the negotiations we knew that the shipping laws of the British commonwealth were being revised and that at an early date Canada must recast and reenact her own shipping law in compliance with the resolutions of the imperial conference. I sought to avoid any distinct engagement in this convention which was not thoroughly consistent with our existing statutes and with the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite inaugurated at London and which this government has consistently carried into effect so far as we have dealt with shipping matters. I commend this bill to the consideration of the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do the matters dealt with in this convention differ in any particular from the provisions of the imperial act except to be brought more exactly into conformity with our own conditions?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think so. The former Minister of Justice will remember that when negotiations were commenced at Paris in 1921 or 1922 there was a treaty outstanding between Great Britain and France dealing with commercial matters. This treaty governed similar relations between Canada and France because Canada was then a colony or dominion of Great Britain. The hon. member will also recall that some innovations were made in the treaty of 1921 covering certain rights of Canadian nationals. The scope of the treaty of 1922 has been widened somewhat in view of the advance made since that time in the status of this country and in view of the fact that we are now exercising a larger autonomy than we did prior to that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand the Secretary of State, he proceeded in this matter in the manner agreed to at the imperial conference of 1923 with respect to the negotiation of treaties. He has, as the representative of Canada, proceeded on the basis of the equality of status of the self governing parts of the empire in negotiating these conventions. I should like to congratulate the hon. Secretary of State upon his indefatigable industry and upon his high sense of public service and duty. I offer him further congratulations upon the broadening of his own views with respect to the negotiation of agreements on the part of the self-governing parts of the British Empire. I am glad to see that he has come to accept so wholeheartedly the views put forward some years ago by hon. gentlemen on this side and which he was not at that time as ready and prepared to accept as he is to-day.

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose it may be regarded as a compliment that having reached and exceeded three score years and ten I can still modify my views to meet existing conditions. I think hon. members should remember and carefully consider the proposition that once a decisive step is taken—some may regard it as a forward step while others may regard it as a backward step—whenever the parliament of Canada takes a decisive step by the voice of a majority of its members—I am not dealing with petty affairs, I am dealing with large national and international interests—succeeding governments are bound in loyalty and good faith to carry out and develop those principles. You cannot go backward and retrace your steps to the same status from which you started. I think I can say for myself, for the other members of the government and for the Prime Minister that we have faithfully endeavoured to carry out that policy in national, in interdominion and international matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe this parliament will always value the opinions of my hon. friend. For this reason, I am pleased to gather from his remarks that his present view has become with him a matter of sincere conviction, and that he now believes that the method of proceeding he has followed, will tend, perhaps even more than any other, towards the preservation of the solidarity of the provinces with regard to it. I have never interest of all that each part should be conceded full recognition of its capacity to negotiate international affairs of immediate concern to itself.

Mr. CAHAN: In the same jocular manner may I say that where we have found that the right hon. gentlemen and his associates were swerving too much to the left or perhaps too much to the right, we have endeavoured as best we could to guide the progress of events in an intermediate direction so as to escape some possible evils and achieve all the good ends which they had in mind at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In this case my hon. friend has followed our course to the letter.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Convention approved.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This section covers the schedule. I would like some explanation of article 2 of the schedule which governs fiscal matters in relation to individuals. The two countries agree that their nationals——shall not be submitted, in respect of their persons, property, rights and interests, profession, occupation, business or industry and in general in all matters in the territory of the other to rates, taxes, imposts or contributions of whatever discription, and without regard to the authority on behalf of which they are levied, other or higher than those which are imposed on nationals in similar circumstances.

Has there been any communication or understanding with the provinces to this effect in regard to licence or other taxes which may be levied by them on the nationals of France who live within their boundaries and engage in some profession, trade or occupation? Will this prevent the provinces from levying a higher tax on the nationals of France than on their own nationals?

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact this is a treaty dealing on the one side with Canadian nationals and, on the other, with French nationals and my opinion would be that in Canada, after this treaty goes into force, we cannot impose a higher tax on a Frenchman because of his French race and nationality.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That will bind the provinces as well.

Mr. CAHAN: If this treaty is approved, it will bind the provinces as well. I do not think there is any objection whatever from the provinces with regard to it. I have never heard of any, but I am saying to the hon. gentleman and emphasizing the fact that this treaty is made with France.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Personally I am quite willing to accept it, but not very long ago representatives of the provinces in cases before the supreme court argued that this parliament could not bind the provinces, even through the negotiation of treaties with foreign countries, without the provinces agreeing to the provisions thereof. I have heard arguments along those lines. I do not say that I agree with that, and I trust the nationals of France will be treated by every province as well as by the Dominion government exactly as are the nationals of Canada. I wish merely to prevent any disagreement along that line in other quarters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like the minister to allow this section to stand until we approve the schedule. This will not delay matters at all, but it will regularize the procedure.

Mr. CAHAN: Very well.

Section 2 stands.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Articles 1 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On article 22.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By our unquestioned approval the minister will appreciate, I am sure, the complete confidence we have placed in his discretion and judgment in these important international matters; and also, may I say, our regard for the great care and industry which we know characterizes all his work.

Mr. CAHAN: I can only say that I appreciate the compliment, but in this matter I was not influenced by any partisan aims, ambitions or counsels; I tried to do the best I could for the country.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 104, to amend an act respecting Canadian and British Insurance Companies.

He said: This is a Senate bill embodying two amendments to chapter 46 of the statutes of 1932. The first widens the list of securities in which insurance companies may invest to include a certain group of companies which have more particular reference to the province of Quebec with which the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) may be familiar, and other securities of a similar character. The second amendment is to carry out what I have no doubt was the original intention when the act was drafted, namely, to enable, on the winding up of a company, the return of securities in the case of the whole list of companies. As the matter stands now, the authority of the minister to return securities in the case of a company which is wound up is limited to the extent that life, marine and fraternal insurance companies on being wound up could not have their securities returned.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I wonder whether I might bring something to the attention of the Minister of Finance with regard to insurance. I do not know whether he would care to answer a question with regard to a certain clause in the Insurance Act. Lately there has been considerable complaint regarding insurance companies refusing to take further premiums if the holders of the policies have let them go beyond a certain date, even where the cash surrender value has been greater than the amount of the premium. I understand that insurance companies have taken advantage of this in the last twelve months owing to a certain clause not being in the last Insurance Act. Has the minister heard about this and is he in a position to make a statement to the house?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I did not anticipate that a question of this character would be asked, and I fear I am not in a position to give an answer as comprehensive as my hon. friend would wish.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 105, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: I believe there will be no objection to my moving a further stage of this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not if the minister can explain the bill.

Mr. RHODES: I am afraid I cannot give any better explanation than has already been given the house. In simple language, the effect of the bill is to place members of the Senate, with respect to matters referred to in the bill, in precisely the same position as is now occupied by members of the House of Commons. Apparently the fact that there was a distinction is a matter of only recent discovery.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand that Sir Allen Aylesworth suggested the amendment, and I rely upon his judgment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RHODES: Before six o'clock is called I believe I should advise the house that after eight o'clock, if agreeable, we shall proceed with supply, taking up first the item in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What next?

Mr. RHODES: There are still further items in Pensions and National Health, together with a list of supplementary estimates.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And if everything is voted before nine o'clock, what then?

Mr. RHODES: There are other bills on the order paper with which we could proceed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The shipping bill?

Mr. RHODES: If we lack material with which to proceed we can take up the shipping bill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house I should like to ask to have the third reading of Bill No. 107, an act respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and France. A change of one word was spoken about this afternoon, and the Secretary of State has had it investigated and will make an explanation regarding it if the house is willing.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): On page 15 of this bill, in the first line, the word "by" should be "to." I took this up with the French legation, and I find that through some printer's or other error the mistake crept in. It is agreed that the change should be made. I therefore ask, with the unanimous consent of the house, before the third reading to change the word "by" to "to."

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not objecting to that, but may I take the opportunity of asking the hon. minister who translated the bill? Was it translated by the officers of the house in the ordinary way?

Mr. CAHAN: No, this is a schedule prepared with the treaty; the treaty is in both French and English. As a matter of fact the original translation of the draft was made by myself in Paris, assisted by Mr. Jean Désy and put before the translators of the French government and approved, though certain minor modifications were subsequently made. The translation in the French copy was printed from the treaty as signed, but there are typographical errors in it; the proofreading in the rush was not as careful as it should be. I understand that the officers of the house have a perfect right to correct merely typographical errors in the French proof that was put through hurriedly at a late hour.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This has nothing to do with the ordinary staff of translators of the house?

Mr. CAHAN: No, the treaty was submitted in French to the French translators. Who read the proof I do not know; I did not. There are some slight corrections from the proof, and this change of the word "by" to "to" is a proper change. It escaped notice and I took it up with the Department of External Affairs, and also with the French legation, and all are agreed that the change should be made. It should read:

—in such manner as to increase to 84 francs per one hundred kilos.

Owing to a mistake which was pointed out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) it appeared as if it were "to increase by 84 francs." It is clear from the other clauses that that is an error.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the Secretary of State has just pointed out, the error was drawn to the attention of the committee by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and if he is satisfied I think the rest of us will be. It does not need an amendment; it is a typographical error.

Mr. CAHAN moved that the bill be now read a third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Cahan.]

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Plunkett in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Live stock, $1,430,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: On a previous occasion when the Minister of Agriculture came before this committee with his estimates we discussed at some length the marketing problem of the live stock men, particularly of western Canada. At that time I made a statement that there was discrimination against the farmer who was delivering his live stock by truck. The minister challenged my statement, and, I did not at the time have the figures before me. Since then I have received quite a number of communications and would like now to correct any statement I made that was misleading. I hold in my hand a communication addressed to me from Luseland, Saskatchewan, dated April 4, written by Mr. George F. Twiss. Mr. Twiss happens to be in partnership with another man in the trucking of live stock from that community to the markets of Saskatoon. I would like to place it on record so that we will have this straightened out. He says:

Dear Sir,—

The issue of the Saskatoon Star Phoenix of April 1, on the third page states in a headline: Discrimination in Amounts Paid for Hogs Denied. This headline is misleading, and the article is a comment on your question in the House of Commons, inquiring if the "penalty" against trucked-in hogs was imposed in order to encourage business for the railroads.

Up until quite recently car lot hogs in Saskatoon brought 20 cents per 100 pounds more than trucked-in hogs. Edmonton, Calgary and Moose Jaw stock yards did likewise, and North Battleford is still paying 20 cents per 100 pounds less.

The charges in effect at Saskatoon stock yards for car lot and trucked-in hogs were respectively as follows:

	Car lot	Trucked-in
Yardage	.08	.12
Commission	.10	.25
Price	.20+	.20—

This discrimination works out per head on an average hog of 200 pounds trucked-in thus:

Yardage	.04
Commission	.15
Price difference	.40

The total discrimination is therefore .59 against trucked-in hogs. The commission is based on an average carlot of 100 hogs, eighty being the minimum carload.

Your assertion that there was a discrimination of $1 per hog seems therefore too high—

That is the reason, Mr. Chairman, I want this corrected.

—except in the case of a 400 pound hog, which would be about correct.

Mr. Blackwell, manager of the Saskatoon stock yards, explains that because there is a keen demand for hogs at present, the practice of paying 20 cents less for trucked-in hogs has been discontinued. Does he mean that when this demand is satisfied the practice will be revived? As a matter of fact the farmers can better afford to lose 20 cents per 100 pounds on hogs when there is a "keen demand" for them than when not. Who gets the 40 cents per hog?

Mr. Blackwell in this article starts out with saying: "As far as the stock yards is concerned there has never been any greater difference than 4 cents per hog," and yet a man trucking hogs into Saskatoon received 59 cents less per hog than if shipped by rail. Who got the balance? Does it cost this amount for service? If so why let the farmer have 40 cents of it now? Mr. R. Grant Thompson, secretary of the Saskatchewan Live Stock Pool, draws a herring across the trail and confuses the issue. He explains by comparing charges in Saskatoon with United States yards, which had nothing to do with your question. Even the Hon. Mr. Weir evades the question, according to the report in the Star Pheonix. He said that a careful study of the stock yards in the past year had been made throughout Canada, and that his information was that the extra fee of $1 was not per hog but per truck. Where did he get this information? It must have been the wildest of guesses.

Then he goes on to say something about the minister which I do not propose to read into the record, and he concludes with these words:

Your question has not been answered and the public are looking to you to get the correct one.

I have two or three other letters here, but I do not intend to weary the committee by reading them because they are along the same line. These men have proven that there is a discrimination to a greater extent than the minister admitted when we discussed this question last. I have here a letter from a farmer in O'Malley who claims that he is penalized one hog in twenty when they are shipped by truck. I have another letter here from Brancepeth, Saskatchewan, in which a similar complaint is made, and both these writers ask me to press for an answer from the minister. The hon. gentleman has had some time in which to investigate and review this question. I do not wish to read these letters into the record because I think the first one placed very plainly before the minister the position of the farmer who trucks his hogs to the stockyards in the west.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): As I recall it, the statement made by the hon. member the last time this matter was discussed was that there was a discrepancy of $1 per hog. I am sure the committee will realize that no person can give definite information with regard to this discrepancy unless he knows the number of hogs in a carload or in a truck. The answer I gave was that the difference would be roughly $1 a truck load, the extra cost being the fairest estimate the stockyards feel they can make as to the extra charge for the greater amount of work necessary in handling hogs delivered by truck, because sometimes they have to handle six or seven shipments instead of one. The hon. member for South Battleford notified me of his intention to make this correction and read the letters to which he has referred. I took the opportunity to secure a statement with reference to comparative prices for the handling of hogs in the Saskatoon stockyards, whether by rail or by truck. The following are the figures furnished me:

By rail, average car of 80 hogs:
Unloading per car	$ 1 00
Fire insurance per car	0 15
Cleaning and disinfecting car	0 75
Yardage 80 hogs at 8 cents	6 40
Feed, approximately 4 cwt. at $1.50	6 00
Commission per car	10 00
	$24 30

Per hog 30.4 cents.

By truck, say 15 hogs in truck load or driven in:
Unloading, no charge	—
Fire insurance	$ 0 10
Cleaning and disinfecting, no charge	—
Yardage 15 hogs at 8 cents	1 20
Feed (truck hogs not fed before sale)	—
Service charge 4 cents per hog	0 60
Commission 25 cents each	3 75
	$ 5 65

Per hog 37.6 cents.

That is a difference of 6·8 cents per hog. It is not necessary for me to make any comment on these figures. In these letters certain items have been selected, and I think the comparison is not altogether fair with regard to the cost of hogs delivered by truck and those delivered by rail.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask the minister the date of the memorandum to which he referred.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It bears no date, but these are the accepted charges.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then I should like to read a portion of another letter in order to prove that while the statement just made by the minister may be quite correct to-day it was not correct when this question was under consideration previously. This is a letter dated April 18, 1933, addressed to myself:

Dear Sir,—

We wish to voice our appreciation of your effort to find out why farmers who deliver hogs by truck, or any other conveyance other than the train service, to some of our stock yards are penalized.

Saskatoon stopped doing so during this past winter after the roads were blocked. They may start doing so again soon for roads are opening up.

Neither is Moose Jaw quoting "trucked-in" prices right now. But Prince Albert is and has been for the past year or so.

The penalty is 20 cents per hundredweight. Bacon hogs to-day are (in P.A. carlots $4.45 and local or "trucked-in," $4.20.

This represents a considerable loss to each farmer for each load even and then consider what it means to the average farmer over a period of time; say one year.

That is not from the constituency of South Battleford, either. I do not need to read further; I only want to show that probably the information just given the committee by the minister is correct to-day, but when this letter was written the stock yards had just ceased penalizing the farmer who trucked in his hogs, and they did so simply because no hogs were coming in trucks. What they are exercised about now, and the reason I am directing this matter to the attention of the minister, is that since the roads are open we should see to it that this practice is not permitted in the stock yards of western Canada. As I said previously, it always appears to me that whether a farmer drives his hogs ahead of him or whether he brings them by truck or in any other conveyance he should receive the same treatment that is accorded the farmer who ships in carload lots.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The figures I gave are the accepted charges throughout the year. There has been no change since the committee considered these items previously. If the farmer feels that there is anything unfair in the charges he should report it to the stock yard agent, who is an official of the government, and he will report it immediately to the department, when the necessary steps will be taken to remove as far as possible any discrimination that exists.

Mr. VALLANCE: If I hand to the minister the communications I have received will he consider this an announcement to the department that there is some discrepancy?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I would not make a speech at this time but the matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is of considerable importance. In the United Kingdom-Canada treaty, article 6 contains a provision with regard to the guaranteed market in Great Britain for 2,500,000 hundredweight of bacon and hams. I noticed in a paper published in Ontario that since the treaty went into effect the quality of Canadian bacon was going down relatively. We are all familiar with the argument that the exportable surplus determines the price in Canada. If that is so it is something which is very important from the point of view of the Canadian hog raiser. I have received from the department the live stock and meat trade review for November, December, January and February and also the weekly reports for April. I find that in November, when I believe the treaty went into effect, Canadian and Danish bacon were selling within 2 shillings per hundredweight of each other in Great Britain—62 shillings for the Canadian and 64 shillings for the Danish. That was the closing top for November, 1932. The average was 55 shillings for the Canadian and 56 shillings and sixpence for the Danish, or a spread of one shilling and sixpence per hundredweight. From that time the spread between Danish and Canadian bacon has increased, until in April, 1933, the average on the British market was 70 shillings for the Canadian bacon and 80 shillings for the Danish, or a spread of 10 shillings per hundredweight.

I thought that possibly because of the increased demand or at any rate the increased market, there was a tendency towards shortage of the good type to send to Great Britain. Looking up the records, however, showing the quantity of hogs coming forward to the markets in Canada, as well as the quality and grading, I find that the grading has certainly been keeping up, but it seems that the packing end of the industry has been falling down. The packers are continually circularizing the farmer through the bulletin of the industrial and development council of Canadian packers. They have always said that farming is one half of the live stock industry and packing the other. We have had a hog grading policy in this country for ten years, and there has appeared a marked improvement in the quality of Canadian hogs coming forward to the market, and it seems to me to have been demonstrated that the packers in Canada, if they wish to, can put on the British market a product that is up to the Danish, and at a price equal to theirs. The inference must be therefore that they are falling down where there is no justification for failure. I would ask the minister to inquire into this matter and if there is no definite improvement then I suggest that at the next session there should be an inquiry into the whole subject to ascertain the trouble.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The spread between cured Danish bacon of the best grade and cured Canadian bacon of the best grade is on the average, I think, around 8 to 10 shillings per hundredweight. I was surprised when the hon. member said that the spread at one time had shrunk to as little as one shilling, if that was for the best bacon in both grades. It is possible that owing to the restrictions imposed by the government of the United Kingdom on Danish bacon the quality of that product might have gone up. The supply of it of course was only four-fifths of what it had been previously, and those who had developed a taste for it and formed the habit of purchasing Danish bacon might, by their demands for it when the commodity was scarcer, have raised the price. It is also possible that at that time Canadian bacon was scarcer and that those who wanted to have it when it was not available similarly raised the price by their demands. Another point which is perhaps of small consideration on the whole is nevertheless worth mentioning. The spread might have been the result of the sum total of a number of causes, one of them being this. When the United Kingdom decided that it would restrict imports of bacon to such an extent as to raise the price of the primary product in that market, Denmark had to decrease her exports of bacon to the United Kingdom by 20 per cent. So that they could get into the United Kingdom market the greatest number of pounds of the highest quality bacon, the processors of bacon in Denmark adopted the method of cutting from five to six pounds from each side of the bacon, and what they cut off from either side was the poorest bacon. The result was that it raised the average quality of their bacon, and that might have had some effect.

So far as the department is concerned, there has been no difference in the instructions given to our graders, nor has there been any difference in the operations of the graders themselves. In Denmark they have one considerable advantage over us in the grading of hogs in that the entire kill is graded on the rail. We have given a good deal of effort to seeing whether we cannot in Canada also work out some system whereby hogs can be graded on the rail. One of the greatest difficulties has been overcome, that of identity. Different means of maintaining the identity of the hog, from the time it left the farmyard until it reached the slaughter house, had been tried—branding with indelible ink and so on—but such methods were not satisfactory. However, we have at last devised a method that should leave grading very little subject to error in maintaining the identity of the hog as shipped from farm to slaughter house. But the farmer who ships his hogs and sells them on the basis of grading on the rail will have to wait for final payment until the animal has been slaughtered. To illustrate with an extreme case, there are a great number of hogs that are shipped from western Canada, in particular from Edmonton, as far east as Moncton, New Brunswick. Coming through Moncton last fall I was surprised to learn that live hogs had been shipped to that point from Edmonton. I admit that that is an extreme case but I am sure that the farmers would hesitate quite a while before being in favour of waiting that long for their returns. There would be another difficulty which would confront us before we could adopt the policy of grading on rail. Some of the biggest losses in the packing of hogs are caused by bruises or injuries en route. When strange groups of hogs are put with other strange groups they are liable to fight with each other and the teeth and hoof marks make bruises which prevent the bacon being put in the top class. A farmer might have ten select hogs which because of bruises in shipment, either by truck or rail, would not grade as select. A peculiar thing is that hogs shipped by truck are more liable to bruises than those shipped in car lots. If the car lot shipment takes two or three days en route to market the hoof and tooth marks may almost entirely disappear, and they do sometimes disappear entirely as far as leaving any marks on the slaughtered animal is concerned. We realize that grading on rail is a much more accurate method of grading but we have some difficulties yet to overcome.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I discussed this matter with the minister two or three weeks ago and at that time he gave me much the same answer he has given the committee to-night. I conveyed the information I received to one or two farmers in Ontario who had drawn this matter to my attention and I would not like to tell the minister the words they used when they heard his explanation. I simply say this to indicate that the farmer is exceedingly sceptical concerning this whole business. One of these farmers is one of the foremost men in the province of Ontario. He lives at Burlington and the minister may know him, his name being Somerset. He tells me that the farmers in his district are convinced that the packers are taking advantage of the market and are not grading the farmers' hogs up to the bacon type. This provides more bacon than the graded hogs would justify. In other words, he alleges they are breaking our market in Great Britain by shipping to places where below grade bacon will be accepted. The figures given by the hon. member for Peace River would appear to indicate that there is some validity in the charges made by these men. Has the minister considered the absolute necessity of grading bacon for export? It is my firm opinion that sooner or later the minister will reach the stage where he will decide that both bacon and hams should be graded for export by government graders. Only in that way can we maintain the quality of our products, as we have maintained the quality of our grain by similar methods.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The information which I gave when I spoke before was obtained not from the packers but from the personal and impartial observations of our own officials. As I told the hon. member for Bow River when we discussed this matter, we have given consideration to the question of the grading of finished products before export. As yet no machinery has been worked out but we hope to get over the difficulties incident to grading on the rail and establish the two systems at as early a date as possible.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would not the establishment of a marketing board facilitate work of this character?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I would think not.

Mr. BROWN: There is a matter I would like to bring to the attention of the minister. I would have brought this to his attention earlier but my information came to hand only to-day. The minister may not be prepared to give me an answer at the moment but I would be quite willing to obtain an explanation later on. I will read a letter which I received from Snowflake, Manitoba, as follows:

> Could you find out from Mr. Weir why they buy bulls in Ontario and ship them out west when we have plenty of them out here. I think it is unfair to the breeders here to bring bulls from the east. There are a number of bulls brought into the Carman district and the breeders here would like to know what the bulls cost in the east. There are eight or ten bulls here in the Snowflake district and good ones too that the farmers would be pleased to sell. Would be pleased if you could find what those bulls cost in the east.
> [Mr. E. J. Garland.]

I am not always in favour of buying at home but it does seem that where animals of equal merit can be secured within a very short distance of where they are to be used, it would be a wise policy to purchase them. I do not know what the situation is in regard to prices. If the minister can tell me now what was paid for these animals, I should be glad to receive the information but if not, I can get it at a later date.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We had buyers at the spring shows in the west to purchase sires that were considered to be of a quality high enough to meet the demands of the policy. If anything, the prices did not vary very much although they were perhaps a little cheaper in Ontario. These men bought a large proportion of the bulls available that were of the quality required. It might be that the animals referred to by the hon. member's correspondent were not of the breed that is in demand.

Mr. BROWN: They would be Shorthorns.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We are very anxious to locate dual purpose Shorthorns in numbers much greater than we have been able to obtain up to date. As far as we are able we purchase everything that is up to standard in the west for the west and similarly as far as the east is concerned. If this man has a number of animals of a superior type, we shall be glad to make inquiries if the hon. member will give us his name. Of course he realizes than an animal sometimes looks very different to the man who owns it.

Mr. BROWN: Do I understand that animals are purchased only at the sales?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, we purchase them outside the sales when we can locate them.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister stated that the average marketing cost for hogs in carloads of eighty was 30·4 cents and delivered by truck, 37·6 cents. He then went on to say that the difference in the average marketing cost, one way as compared with the other, was 6 cents and a fraction. I am wondering if the minister is right, as the figures I gave would make a difference of 7·2 cents.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be correct.

Mr. McINTOSH: Should we not have the record straight?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I made the calculation as I was reading and may have made a mistake.

Mr. BROWN: Can the minister give me the prices paid for the animals purchased in the east?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends upon the quality and breed of the animals. If the hon. member will let me have the name of his correspondent we shall be glad to have one of our officials go and investigate the matter, provided it does not entail too large an expense. I shall be glad to give my hon. friend a detailed report of the prices we paid.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Is Canada at the present time shipping any appreciable number of bulls to the old country for breeding purposes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not for breeding, just for canning purposes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I had sent to me a few days ago a communication referring in a very uncomplimentary manner to stock that had been rejected for breeding purposes here being sent to the old country and classed as breeding stock. If the minister says that breeding cattle are not being sent to the old country in any numbers, I shall not bother with the matter. Much of the stock, it was claimed, was not of a character high enough to be licenced for breeding purposes in the old country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): After the removal of the restrictions for cattle trading, it was possible for us to ship to the old country to inland points, males and females. Many bulls that were purchased here at two, two and a quarter and two and a half cents per pound for canners and that were purchased here as such, were bought by some of the old country farmers at the stockyards. It was not intended when they were purchased and shipped from here that they would be taken out as breeding animals, and a good deal of dissatisfaction was caused in the old country by this being done. The Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries there got in touch with me and I had no hesitation in cabling him that any animals which were shipped as commercial animals were to be slaughtered unless the females passed the port inspector, and that other animals for breeding purposes would be shipped as such with their pedigrees, so that the difficulty has been completely cleared up.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The matter brought up by the hon. member for Peace River strikes me as being somewhat important and serious, especially as we have been looking forward to the gradual development and very great increase of our trade in hams and bacons in the old country. I can quite appreciate that there may be a good deal of weight in the minister's suggestion that the average value and quality of Danish bacon may be on the increase as the number exported may have diminished; it will be the poroest quality that will be kept at home and the best will be exported. But an average spread of ten shillings a hundredweight, not for the average, but for the very best quality, is serious and it seems to me that it brings up the question whether the packers on our side are taking advantage of the British market to ship bacon and ham that is not of the very best quality. That, of course, is doubly serious. On the one hand it is going to discredit Canadian bacon and ham on the British market and make it extremely difficult for us to take advantage of that market as we had hoped. On the other, as our domestic prices are largely determined by the export price, if we do not succeed in securing the highest possible export price, this will have a detrimental effect on the market as a whole.

In speaking of the possibility of controlling the situation, the minister was asked, I think by the hon. member for Bow River, whether he did not believe the establishment of a marketing board would not have some effect on the matter. I understood the minister to say that he did not think it could. In the former discussion which took place in the house on the subject of a marketing board, it was suggested that one of the definite functions of such a board should be to see that the animals, meats and other products under its control, that were exported, came up to a proper export standard for the very purpose of avoiding what apparently is now taking place; that is, by seeing to it that nothing save the very best left Canada for the old country, that the credit of this country and the standard of quality for the dominion in our cattle meats and dairy products as well as in grain, should be kept to the highest possible mark. In view of the great importance of the question, an inquiry should be instituted to ascertain whether the suggestion made is correct that at least some of the packers, not all of them, are in fact shipping to the old country as No. 1 Wiltshire bacon and ham, commodities which do not come up to that quality and which have not been purchased here as such, and by so doing are destroying our market. Should this be proven to be the case, I should like the minister to consider very seriously the question of controlling that situation, because it affects not merely this year's business but our hopes of developing a market worth while in the old country under the terms of the British trade agreements. May I ask the minister, if he has the records here: How much in the way of bacon and ham we have shipped over to the old country during the first months of this year, and how does the amount compare with what was shipped last year? The figures would bear upon the question whether we are increasing our trade and taking advantage of the market.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have kept in very close touch with the quality of bacon that has been shipped to the United Kingdom, so close a touch that we know a number of shipments were made that were decidedly below standard and they were checked up and traced to their source, though it is not advisable to mention it. But the machinery is being developed and we hope at no very distant date we shall be in a position to undertake the inspection of all agricultural products, manufactured or otherwise, that are exported to the United Kingdom. It must not be understood that we would think at the present time of allowing only No. 1 grade to be exported, because as regards bacon, for example, if we were to permit only the top grade to be exported, this might have a detrimental effect on the market at home by keeping our inferior product here. The hon. member for Red Deer has mentioned cattle. The poor quality of some of our cattle that were exported this spring was brought very emphatically to my attention at the time of the export. I looked into the matter carefully and the facts I obtained were these: that 87½ per cent of cattle that up to that time were exported to the United Kingdom were purchased by old country buyers themselves who had been operating on their home markets for years and who knew better than anyone else the quality they should have there for sale. Mr. Brown of Manchester who has purchased by far the largest percentage of our cattle, stated, that on any shipload he purchased he wanted some of each different quality with of course the highest percentage of good cattle; he also wanted some mediocre cattle and he could handle a few of the cheapest and poorest type of what we call our canner cow. He had a few clients for one quality, a few for another, and a number no doubt for the best quality of our goods. His feeling was this—and I was influenced a good deal in that connection because he is one of our biggest purchasers—that if he could not get in this country the kind of animal he wanted to meet his market in the old land, or, if he were purchasing in Calgary or Winnipeg and after he had purchased were to send a representative there who did not understand the old country market as well as he did and would eliminate some of the animals he had purchased, this would have a tendency to drive him off the market. That was why the action was taken. I appreciate as fully as hon. members opposite do—who I am sure realize this—the danger of creating in the old country a poor name for our cattle that are exported.

Bacon exports for the first three months of this year and last year are as follows:

Year	Exports pounds

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What the minister has said is perfectly true. I do not think any exception could be taken to permitting the old country buyer to come to this country and buy any cattle he wished. Nor would there be any great objection to the sale of inferior bacons, if they were purchased as such, so labelled and sold as such in the old country. That is not the point to which I had reference. The suggestion has been made, not merely in this House of Commons but throughout the country, that hogs have been bought as grades lower than select, butchered, made into Wiltshire bacons and sold in the old country as No. 1 Wiltshire sides. There could be no harm in selling the second grade quality if the product sold were represented and labelled as second grade. The difficulty comes in, however, when second grade quality is bought, but afterwards sold as first grade, thereby destroying the reputation for first grade quality. I should think we would not be so much interested in making certain that none but first grade goes to the old country, but rather that we should make certain that the customer buying first grade receives what he buys. If he buys second grade and receives second grade, it is his own lookout. That is the point to which I had reference, namely, that we should make certain that sharp practice which is suspected on the part of some farmers and some factories—I am using no names—whereby they buy lower grades which they sell as No. 1 and for which they receive the select price, should be discontinued.

Mr. VALLANCE: On previous occasions, probably two or three times during this session, there has been up for discussion a matter which in my opinion has been and still is of vital importance to the cattle breeders in Canada. I refer to the shipment of 100,000 head of Canadian cattle to Russia. The Prime Minister and probably the Minister of Trade and Commerce have taken some part in the discussion of this matter. Hon. members will recall that on one occasion the Prime Minister promised that one item in the Department of Agriculture would be held up so that the Minister of Agriculture would be afforded an opportunity of speaking to this matter. Naturally the country is looking forward to this discussion, and is anxious to receive an expression of opinion from the minister concerning the suggested shipment of 100,000 head of Canadian cattle.

I have before me a return for which I asked earlier in the session. It contains telegrams from various organizations urging the Minister of Agriculture to put forward his best efforts to consummate the deal. Going through the correspondence I find that the minister has been sympathetic towards the deal, and to-day the cattle breeders are wondering why it did not go through. I should like the minister to avail himself of this oportunity to state to the country why the deal did not go through, after encouragement had been given to the live stock industry in Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place the hon. member has stated that I was sympathetic to this much-discussed and much-advertised cattle deal with Russia. I have every sympathy with the trade and have done everything I could at all times not only in this but in other connections, to supply information to any person who wished to carry on trade in agricultural products. Especially am I in favour, so far as our legislation will permit, of trade between Canada and other countries in any kind of agricultural products. I believe the correspondence which has been laid on the table is the best record of the whole matter. So far as I know under the existing statutes or legislation there is nothing to prevent any person from trading with Russia or with any other country.

Mr. YOUNG: Except the embargo.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under the legislation of the country, as I said.

Mr. YOUNG: Except the embargo.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is that not part of the legislation?

Mr. YOUNG: Not a very desirable part.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is a matter of opinion. When Mr. Serkau came to me the chief purpose of his visits was to get information as to the quality and number of cattle we had for export. He wished to know also if there was anything to prevent selling our cattle to Russia. I referred him to the Department of National Revenue so that he might learn the conditions under which he would have to carry on trade. As the correspondence will show, Mr. Serkau considered those conditions eminently satisfactory. I gave him information upon all occasions he asked for it, and that was the limit of my activity in the matter.

Mr. VALLANCE: The return which was laid on the table at my request proves what the minister has said, namely, that he facilitated Mr. Serkau's effort, and encouraged him to go ahead with the deal. The minister went so far as to give Mr. Serkau the code which might be used while that gentleman was in Russia. The point which occurs to me, however, is this, that after all the encouragement the minister gave and all the expense to which Mr. Serkau was put, he must have had some assurance from some source that he had at least a chance of putting through the deal. I am not entirely satisfied with the explanation given by the minister because the record I have before me proves to me—and I do not wish to do the minister an injustice—that he encouraged Mr. Serkau in his effort. It must have cost a great amount of money to go even as far as he went. As the hon. member for Weyburn has said, probably the embargo is the cause, or it may have been the statement made by the Prime Minister to the effect that we would have no trade with Russia.

I believe the minister agrees, as he states, in some of the communications I have before me, that such a deal would have been beneficial. I notice here a series of telegrams sent to the minister. One from Myrtle, Manitoba, is as follows:

Hon. Robert Weir,
Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Impending deal with Russia as reported in press the best news cattle men have received for some time. If consummated will give great encouragement so badly needed at present time. Better cattle markets means more money for other commodities. Sincerely hope you may be successful in closing this deal.

James B. Davidson.

That telegram was dated December 28, 1932. The minister's reply is dated December 29, the following day, and is as follows:

I acknowledge receipt of your telegram of December 28 reading as follows:

"Impending deal with Russia as reported in press is the best news cattle men have received for some time. If consummated will give great encouragement so badly needed at present time. Better cattle markets mean more money for other commodities. Sincerely hope you may be successful in closing this deal."

This seems a repetition, although it is addressed and signed by the minister. The letter is dated on the following day and sent to Mr. James B. Davidson. This all indicates that the minister did give this organization some encouragement, and there is still in the back of the minds of the farmers the feeling that they did not get a square deal, that the matter was not given the consideration that it ought to have had.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Did the hon. member not make a mistake in giving the impression that my reply was a telegram to him? Was not my reply a letter quoting his telegram?

Mr. MULLINS: I am somewhat surprised at hon. gentlemen opposite bringing up that foolish deal. There is nothing to it; you are only playing politics. It was the most foolish deal I have ever heard of; I have been in the cattle export trade for fifty years. It is not possible to ship cattle to Russia; you would land only shadows. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken knows that you cannot have cattle twenty-two days at sea and land anything but a bunch of skeletons. I wonder that the Minister of Agriculture did not ask a few questions of someone who has been in the business—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Condemnation of the government.

Mr. MULLINS: Now let me tell you about Mr. G. G. Serkau, because I do not think you know anything about him. He put his hand in the public treasury of Manitoba years ago—I have the list right here. I will say it outside the house as well as inside if Mr. G. G. Serkau wishes; I am not hiding behind the privileges of the house. Here is a list of the foolish deals that the Manitoba government made down through the Liberal regime and into the present regime, giving the farmers cattle at $120 and $110 apiece that were worth $30 and never should have been bought at any higher price. A lot of cows were bought and placed with farmers, and I have the list here—I will read it for your information and then I think you should be done with this matter for all time to come. And Mr. G. G. Serkau is on the list as the greatest debtor of any of them. He put his hand in the public treasury of Manitoba before he ever came here, yet you will not give credit to the man who said no when he looked at it. Serkau wanted to put his hand in this treasury and get $4,000,000 to go and play with when he had already received money from the province of Manitoba to the extent of hundreds.

An hon. MEMBER: How did he do it?

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. MULLINS: He got it by way of loan from the Manitoba government, and has never paid the loan back. Why would you mention a man like that? He is not a cattle man, nor are any of those associated with him cattle men. The cattle business is on too high a plane, no one in it would do a thing like that; if they borrow money they repay it. It is an insult from the opposition side of the house to say that he was a cattle man. "G. G. Serkau"—many years ago I saw that name on the list, and I wondered if it was still there. It took me a long time to get it, but I had one of my friends ask for a return in the Manitoba house and they brought it down. He owes them interest and principal which he has never paid. Now I ask my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), would he trust a man like that with $4,000,000?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): He might make enough profit to reimburse the province.

Mr. MULLINS: He borrowed $1,500, to put cattle out; with interest it amounts now to $1,750, and he never repaid the government. If Mr. Serkau wishes I will make the statement outside the house, I am not writ proof.

An hon. MEMBER: Let's go out.

Mr. MULLINS: I am sorry the hon. gentleman fell in with him. I saw the Toronto Star full of it, but any man who has ever been in the business would know it was a fool deal. It would have been a nice thing for those gentlemen to have the government of Canada guarantee them against loss. I have never had anyone guarantee me against loss, and I have been exporting for over fifty years. This man is a German lawyer, and I don't believe he knows a cow from a heifer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Explain.

Mr. MULLINS: They are getting back into live stock in Saskatchewan, but I see they are going down on mules. I see they have less mules in Saskatchewan than they formerly had.

An hon. MEMBER: They are going up on jackasses.

Mr. MULLINS: For the information of the hon. gentlemen opposite I may say that you cannot ship cattle to any Russian port and land them in any kind of condition. Twenty-two days at sea! Mr. Chairman, twelve days at sea and your ship should be docking or your cattle will not be in very good shape. I remember having cattle on a ship that broke her shaft in mid-ocean and drifted down to the Azores; she was twenty-two days out, and the cattle were not worth anything —they could scarcely walk ashore. How would you take cattle from here and land them in a Russian port? I am astonished at intelligent men trying to bring that deal up again; I thought it was dead. You know that that is not a man you would place confidence in or give money to. What a godsend it is that there is a man at the helm of this old ship called Canada who can say no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it at sea?

Mr. MULLINS: That is one of our difficulties, making this kind of fool deals and getting us into the mess you have got us in.

While I am on my feet I am going to say a few plain words to the minister. I say to him: Go to the stock yards with some practical man; go out over the west and then go to the old country and see the conditions of the markets. Unless you have live stock on the farms in western Canada or any country, agriculture cannot succeed. This afternoon out at Renfrew, I walked through the best herd of Hereford cattle that I ever saw. That looks like a healthy business, but the minister should go to the stock yards with a practical man, not with a packer, and not with Mr. Todd. I say that because he is the smoothest lobbyist who has been around these quarters for some time. Take some man who has had some practical experience; I will find you plenty of them who will give the time, men who can tell you about bruising hogs. Go to the bacon market and look at the sides of bacon that come out of the cases all bruised, and selling as second grade. My friends ask how it gets to be second grade; go and watch your agricultural students grading these hogs and see them put them through the gates. It is not done by the trucks, it is not the cars, it is these students grading the farmer's hogs. Leave the farmer alone. If you want to put anyone in there get a practical man, one whose life has been forged on the anvil of practical experience, not one of these theorists out of a college. There are too many of them wearing a $10 hat on a $2 head. It is the practical end I want to see put into operation. I have sat here and listened to hon. gentlemen opposite speak on various subjects, but the most important question in this country to-day is the success of the live stock industry. I have given forty years of my life to the removal of the embargo and I am through; we are into the English market. But not a man opposite would stand up and admit that the channel had been cleared. It took forty years to get cattle back into the English market under the conditions that existed previously; this has been brought about by the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but they are not given any credit from the other side of the house. Now females get into the market just as male cattle do; the avenue is clear and the market is available.

I am not going to make very many more contributions to the live stock industry; I fully intended not to speak on the subject again. After having been told in the agriculture committee how the poor old cow has been exploited I have decided that I have been at the wrong end of the cow all these years. If I had been handling milk, probably I would have made as much as a friend from Montreal made. I sold him a few cows once and it was hard work to pay for them, but I heard him tell that committee that his plant is worth over $2,000,000. I know I did a great deal more work for the farmers than he ever did, but I did not get that much for it. I am anxious for the success of the live stock industry; I do not want it to fail, but if you do not go at it in a practical way it will be a failure all the way through. You can get a lesson from a practical Scotchman just west of here. I did not know he was a Scotchman until I asked him; no wonder it is a success. He has 250 of the best white face cattle I have ever looked at. My hon. friend from North Battleford was there, addressed the meeting and then went out in the field with this gentleman and looked over his herd of cattle. Go to the stock yards and get a few practical men and forget about cooperation. Cooperation is only exploitation; that is what it has been in every market. The farmer has been fooled; they have got him to ship his cattle through that one channel while some fellow draws a big salary and keeps a good fat position for himself.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I remember listening to one of the best broadcasts I ever heard with regard to these cooperative schemes we are talking about. This broadcast was by Bob Schuler, an evangelist in Los Angeles, who said, "Labour, you have a perfect right to be organized so long as some man at your head is not leading you for some specific purpose, to get a job in parliament or something else. Farmers, you are the biggest fools that ever went into organization." That is what he said over the radio, and he went on to say, "I am one of you; I have ten acres of walnuts just outside Los Angeles, and my wife and I shook hands every year when we sold the walnuts, for which we received $1,600. Then a nice, clever young man, with one of these baby moustaches, came to the door and said we should join up in order to help our brethren get better organization. I went into the organization, and I have never shaken hands with my wife since. I get $400 a year for my walnuts now; that young man gets $30,000 a year and he does not know walnuts from hickory nuts."

How about your grain pool in the west, which you asked me to help get through? I worked hard to put over that idea, thinking it was a good thing, but what a farce it has turned out to be. Some of the men have not been paid for their 1928 crop yet. The farmers are being drawn into some fool scheme all the time. Leave the markets the way we had them in the old days; throw them open. The Minister of Agriculture can do it by a stroke of the pen. You do not want these close restrictions, surrounded by all kinds of fool policies. Who owns the stock yards in Canada, with the exception of a few privately owned yards in the west, which should be under strict supervision. I would have all the live stock shipped to the stock yards; I would not let them go direct to the packers. At present a truck driver will pick up a farmer's hogs out in the country and take them right to the yard of the packer. What will happen the poor farmer? If you knew some of the packers as well as I know them you would say the farmer would not get any the best of it. Who owns one of the stock yards in Winnipeg? It is owned by the three railroads. We own the Canadian National and the Canadian Northern, and that leaves the Canadian Pacific with only a minority say. The government controls the majority of the stock in that yard, so why does not the minister throw it open and give us back the system we had in the old days? You could go to the hay market then and bring back a load of hay for your cattle, but now what do you get? You buy a bale of hay weighing eighty pounds but you pay for a hundred pounds. They ask you to bale it at eighty pounds so it will be easy to lift, but when the poor farmer comes to buy it he pays for a hundred pounds. Look at the bills; they are appalling in comparison with what it cost years ago. It is no wonder the live stock industry is dwindling into insignificance; a man has no chance.

Let me say here, Mr. Chairman, that unless the railroads put back the freight rates to the level of forty years ago, and reduce them by forty per cent, no man will be able to farm successfully in western Canada, particularly in regard to live stock. When the road was coupled up at Jackfish in 1885 they said to us, "Give us fourteen cars of cattle and we will give you a trainload rate." There was a crew of five on that train and we paid 60½ cents a hundred from Winnipeg to Montreal. To-day a train consists of seventy-five cars of cattle, but the crew still numbers only five, and the railway companies charge up the increased cost to labour, though it is not labour. They are paying the men a little more money, but they are not being paid too much. The late James Hill went out through Montana and the Dakotas to make a survey of what was wrong with the farmers in order to see why they were going bankrupt and leaving the land. He came home and cut freight rates in half.

Hon. gentlemen opposite harp about the tariff. They remind me of a Chinese concert I heard in Vancouver; it was played all on one string. Why not be big enough and broad enough to help save the country and the farmers? Why not help meet the situation that exists to-day? The old ship is floundering around in the trough of the sea; why not help guide it safely through? Why play politics all the time? I am surprised at my hon. friend from South Battleford; I never thought he would leave himself wide open by referring to that man Serkau, who has done nothing but exploit the farmers of the west. The Toronto Star fell for it; the headlines said Mr. Bennett should resign. I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite are big enough now to say that Mr. Bennett was right, if they are broadminded enough to say, "You were right about this man. He had his hands in the treasury of Manitoba and you stopped him from getting hold of the funds in Ottawa." I am proud that the Prime Minister did that, and I am sorry that my hon. friend from South Battleford should get up and introduce the subject of shipping cattle to Russia under the Serkau scheme. Unless we wake up and do something right now to bring about an improvement in our pure bred sires and to distribute them throughout the country we are going to be faced with very serious competition from Russia, because representatives of that country are in Scotland right now buying all the pure bred sires they can get hold of. They are going to take those sires back and we are going to face strong competition from them. Let us build up our herds; let us buy more pure breds and distribute them among the farmers so that we can build up the live stock industry of Canada.

Don't let Russia beat us to it. I assure you, it would be impossible to sell anything but top cattle to the Russians; they know what they are about. I saw some of them in Perth, Scotland, once buying pure breds and I would hate to see them come to this country, if that were possible, and take the tops of our cattle, leaving us with the culls. Heaven knows we have enough culls at the present time without getting more. I want us to breed a better grade of cattle in this country. Serkau came to me and made this remark, "You are not too old to go back into business?" I replied, "I don't think I am. What do you mean?" Then he asked me whether I would join him and I said, "No, do you think I would go to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with such a scheme as that? Do you think I would go to the Prime Minister with such a scheme? Why, he would throw me out of his office and he would be justified."

After reading about those cows that came here with Champlain, and having heard how they were exploited, I felt that I ought to say something, and I could not keep still after my hon. friend from South Battleford broke in. I thought I would let him know all about Mr. Serkau.

Mr. VALLANCE: Our good friend from Marquette has on previous occasions read me a similar lecture on the live stock industry. I was interested when he suggested that we could not ship cattle to Russia because of the twenty-two day voyage, because I can remember the time when we made a shipment, though a limited one, that took many more days than that in crossing. The hon. gentleman knows his Bible well enough to answer this question: How did Noah manage to keep his cattle all that time on the ark? I think he will agree that we can ship cattle much more easily than horses, and we have shipped horses to Russia on more than one occasion. So that the objection from the point of view of the voyage is not well founded. Let me tell my hon. friend that I am not through with the cattle industry yet, for it happens that I am not as old as he, and naturally I am looking to a somewhat longer future in the business. I can assure him that my interest in the farmer and in the cattle breeder is as great as his own, and it was because of that interest I have in them that I wanted us to ship 100,000 head of cattle. I wanted that done in the interests of the cattle producers. As late as 1921 we were able to ship to the United States five times that number in one year, whereas last year we shipped only 18,000. We have shipped a few cattle to the old country, but what the industry needs to-day, as proved by the record that was tabled in the house, is a wider market. We need more markets. My chief reason for getting up to-night was to give the minister, and the Prime Minister as well, an opportunity to tell the country why that attitude was taken with regard to the Serkau deal. So far as Serkau is concerned, I knew nothing about him. My hon. friend from Marquette told me privately what he has told the house to-night and through the house the country; he was the one that made me acquainted with the facts. There is nothing in this document tabled in the house that would indicate to me that what he has read to-night is true. In Mr. McDonald especially Mr. Serkau had a real business man who knew the cattle business probably as well as my hon. friend from Marquette.

Mr. MULLINS: I admit that we did ship a good many cattle to the United States, but I would ask all practical men in this house this question. What man among them, if it were not for some political reason, would ship a well-bred growing yearling out of the country to be processed in the United States? Certainly I would not do it. If I had a well-bred yearling on my farm I do not think the United States would get it. I have seen calves leaving Winnipeg on their way to the United States, trainloads of cattle starved for two days until they got on the scales under 1,000 pounds. Our cattle industry has been ruined by inexperienced men who have got into the business. We shipped to the United States in 1930, just when this government was coming into office, 35,000 yearlings, well-bred animals; also trainloads of calves leaving the ranches to find their way to Minneapolis. Would not that spell disaster to the cattle trade? Surely any practical man knows that this sort of thing was the ruination of the industry. Some poor chap found himself under the necessity of going to the barn and taking out a yearling which he had to sacrifice for binder twine. My sympathy goes out to that man. That is the type of man I want to help become successful so that he will not have to make such sacrifices. Let me point out that that is not the logical market for yearlings. They do not want your 1,000 pound cattle; they want small cattle. Personally I do not care where they go after they have passed that weight.

Now, what is the use of fitting up ships to take cattle overseas when with a change of government a high duty is imposed upon them? It simply means the disruption of the trade. We were sending constant shipments of cattle to the British market, and receiving in western Canada splendid returns, but a restriction was put on on the other side with the result that our trade was disrupted—the most important industry in the west. I do not regard it as second to wheat, because you cannot grow wheat unless you fertilize the land and you cannot fertilize it without cattle. But I emphasize the fact that the shipping of young cattle is absolutely wrong. I want to see a channel opened up to the British market; I want to see ships fitted up so that our cattle men can obtain a market, shipping their cattle at reasonable rates. More than that, I want to see the railways, which are giving cheap rates to passengers, extend cheap rates to the cattle industry. You can keep up the price of wheat; I am not as much interested in that as in cattle, because eventually you will grow more wheat and have better crops by keeping a good stock of cattle on the farm.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the minister still in mind the possibility of creating a marketing board at some time? In the part of Canada with which I am familiar, and throughout eastern Canada as well, the farmers' organizations and farmers generally are still very desirous of seeing such a body created. While they do not look to the board to perform miracles, they do look to it as offering the means of bringing some order out of the chaos which now exists in marketing conditions. I hope the minister has not given up the idea.

Mr. MULLINS: Let the farmer alone; he is as good a salesman as anybody.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand that this company in Winnipeg approached the government to ask for financial backing or a financial guarantee before they made these shipments to Russia or before the deal with Russia was completed. I understand also that when their suggestion was turned down, some little time afterwards they agreed to go on with the deal without any financial guarantee; all they wanted was an assurance of what the regulations would be in the future. I was told by one of the officials of a well known oil company that they had approached the government in connection with this matter. They were willing to finance the deal, buy the cattle and take Russian oil in exchange provided the government would assure them that the regulations would not be changed. They could not get this assurance and for that reason the deal was not put through. I was told this by two officials in the oil company and I should like to know the reason why this assurance was not given to Mr. Serkau and the oil company. The same thing happened in connection with the importation of gasoline from Roumania. We found that gasoline could be laid down at Montreal for six cents a gallon but we could not get any assurance from the government as to what the rate of duty would be or whether any dumping duty would be applied. Can the minister give us any reason why this assurance was not given to either one of these companies?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As far as I am aware, no such proposition was put up to the government by any oil company. However, granting that it had been put up in the manner the hon. member for Willow Bunch suggests it was, I think, had he been in the place of any member of the government he would have had no hesitation in stating that no government could give an assurance as to what the tariff on any commodity would be in the future. If the government did that for any company or for any individual they would be establishing a precedent and would have to act similarly in the case of all such requests. This would tie the hands of government absolutely.

Mr. YOUNG: A very excellent precedent.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): Early in December of last year the press of southern Alberta carried a dispatch stating that a shipment of seventeen carloads of poultry was then between Montreal and Moncton to be shipped to the London market from Saint John. Has the minister any information as to the extent of the poultry shipments last Christmas from Canada to the United Kingdom? Did these shipments have any beneficial effect upon the local market by eliminating surplus stock, and did the producer in Canada obtain a higher price because of these shipments? What are the prospects for increasing our poultry trade in Great Britain and what percentage of that market can Canada supply? Did we receive any benefits under the Ottawa agreements as far as poultry shipments to Great Britain are concerned?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In November of last year the Canadian poultry pool investigated the possibility of obtaining wider markets for poultry. Inquiries were made in the United Kingdom but replies were received to the effect that there was no market there, that the market was glutted. In spite of this information they decided to make a trial shipment. The first shipment was collected in Manitoba from four points just outside of Winnipeg. A number of carloads were got together. Great care was exercised in the method in which this poultry was prepared and shipped and careful records were kept of the temperatures of the shipment when en route both by ship and by rail. An effort was made to determine the best possible manner of making future shipments should this trial shipment prove satisfactory. The Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the Department of Trade and Commerce sent Mr. Brown, the chief of the poultry division along with this shipment. Elaborate and carefully prepared publicity was sent along with Mr. Brown and preparations were made to put our poultry before the public of the United Kingdom in the best possible way. I believe there were thirty-three carloads approximating one million pounds of poultry shipped. This shipment received a very fine reception, exceeding all expectations. The poultry sold in the United Kingdom for prices that return to the producer in Canada from three to four cents per pound more than the domestic price at Winnipeg. No one can say what would have happened to the domestic market had this shipment not been made. Inquiries have already been received for from two to three times as much poultry as we shipped last year. I want to take this opportunity to express before this committee my personal appreciation of the vision and foresight of the president of the Canadian Cooperative Poultry Pool in undertaking this trial shipment in spite of all discouragement. Other companies were appointed but declined to participate. When I say that the price received returned three cents per pound more than the domestic price it must not be forgotten that the depreciation in their currency at that time reduced the price of our product by from five to six cents per pound. In the case of shipments this year, the increased value of the pound together with the operations of the stabilization fund will mean a further advantage in price. No person can make an estimate of the amount of poultry that the United Kingdom market can absorb, but there is certainly a prospective demand for Canadian poultry. Under the Ottawa agreements we received a ten per cent preference.

Mr. YOUNG: Did those shippers of poultry know what the rate of duty would be before they shipped?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There was no duty into the old country.

Mr. YOUNG: They knew that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They did know it. There was a preference of ten per cent applying to shipments made after November 15.

Mr. YOUNG: The point I am making is that they knew what they would have to pay in the form of duty.

Mr. MORAND: They had no assurance that it would not be raised.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There was no duty.

Mr. YOUNG: They knew it?

Mr. MacMILLAN: I understand that some discussion took place in the agriculture committee of the Senate in regard to stock yard charges to farmers. I happen to be a shareholder in a stock yard which I think I can say I was more or less responsible for developing in my own city. It is controlled in Toronto by a bunch of financial racketeers and I know they took thousands of dollars out of the earnings of that yard and developed and extended it further. If my memory serves me aright, last year I received a dividend of 16 per cent, which is not bad. We shareholders can get no infomation. I wrote to the secretary on April 24 asking him for a financial statement and some other questions and he replied on May 12 saying that he had turned my letter over to the president. The president moved the office of the company from a downtown office to his own at the stock yards at Toronto and I presume to-day the stock yard at Saskatoon is probably paying a large portion of the rent of his office, stenographer's fees, and so forth, at the stock yard at Toronto. He soaks the Saskatoon stock yard a large sum as president although he has nothing whatever to do; then the other directors of the company who live at Toronto also soak the yard large sums of money. I should like to suggest to the minister that it might be good business in the interests of stock raisers to hold an investigation into these stock yard charges.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the minister, if I am in order in doing so on this item, whether he has any reasons to give me why a tubercular tested area has not been established in the county of Saguenay? I spoke to the minister about this matter last year. It was decided to open up such a zone in the counties of Charlevoix, Saguenay, Roberval and Chicoutimi, and I was told that zones were established in those districts with the exception of the county of Saguenay.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am not sure whether I caught the hon. member's question correctly, but there is part of Saguenay county that is not included in the restricted area.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why was it not included?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No application was made for it. The application is made by the municipalities or, I believe in Quebec, by the parishes through the provincial government, but for part of Saguenay county no application was made.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am sorry I have to disagree with the minister because I think this area was established in 1930. Requests and petitions were signed by the municipalities and the farmers' clubs and sponsored by the provincial government at the same time as similar requests were made on behalf of the people in Chicoutimi and Roberval. I think at the same time as the matter was taken up by the hon. member for Chicoutimi I joined with him in signing the petitions and presenting them to the Department of Agriculture. I think one of the reasons given to me last year or the year before was that there were not enough men on the staff of the Department of Agriculture to look after this matter in the late spring and the fall, but it would be attended to as soon as it would be possible to do so. The minister may have confused the matter, because that is one of the answers he gave to me before; he told me that as soon as men were available to attend to the tests he would see to it that the tests were made.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I stated, I did not hear the hon. member's question very clearly in the beginning; I thought he was asking why part of Saguenay county was not included. Part of that county was not included because no request came from it. The other parts of the county were included at that time, and no doubt it is this area to which the hon. member has reference. Every effort will be made to carry on the work in that particular district. We are taking every step possible, I may say—and I am sure this will be appreciated fully by the hon. member—to get as many French speaking veterinaries as are available to do the work not only there but in all parts of Quebec where there are French speaking people.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister at the present time French speaking veterinaries to attend to this work?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have a number, but not sufficient to do all the work that there is in Quebec.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: When does he expect that this test will be made?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not state definitely.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give the committee any information with respect to the Beatty live stock scheme? I do not know whether it has any connection with the Department of Agriculture, but it received a good deal of advertising when it came into operation a year or so ago.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is in no way connected with the Department of Agriculture and I am not in a position to give information concerning it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister give a report on the development of the pure bred sire plan which I think he inaugurated himself? It was a plan by which clubs were to be organized in districts throughout the country and when a number organized a club, they were to share a pure bred sire.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The pure bred sire area policy is a provincial one. The hon. member for Bow River, however, means, I believe, the pure bred sire policy inaugurated by me as head of this department. We have up to the end of March, 1933, some 1,280 pure bred sires, chiefly in districts where it is very difficult for the farmer to get high quality sires. I know of nothing that is more appreciated at the present time by the farmers than that policy. Because of their financial condition it is very difficult, if not impossible for many men who appreciate the value of live stock, especially a soldier settler who is starting in, to purchase such animals, and they value the assistance we have given them. One regrettable feature of the matter, however, is that we have not been able to fill the applications for one strain of sires that is in greatest demand; there are not sufficient animals of the right quality in the country.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was this policy inaugurated recently by the minister or his department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the fall of 1930.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many districts in Quebec, for instance, have taken advantage of this policy so far?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not the exact number, but a large number of bulls have gone into the province of Quebec. In addition, in that province we have another policy that is particularly suited to it. In conjunction with the provincial government we pay a grant of 50 per cent for young bulls of sufficiently good quality for dairy purposes that are sent out. A very large number of bulls have been sent out under that policy and quite a number under the other one. In 1931, under the policy that I first described, out of 839, 126 went into Quebec and while under the other policy we have not the number, it was very large.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister, before this part of the subject is disposed of, give us exactly the number of districts served in each of the provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not that exact information here. I believe they are very well distributed throughout the whole dominion. Under this policy there are more animals available proportionately in the west than in the east, because in the east we have supplementary policies such as the one I have described for the benefit of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister give me the figures for Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not that information.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister get it ?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, and I shall be glad to give it to the hon. member.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the minister give us some figures with regard to the grants to owners of sire horses that have been passed by either the dominion or provincial veterinaries? Can he give the amount the government has paid in grants during the past year and, if possible, by provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member asked for that information on the order paper, did he not?

Mr. SPENCER: No.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Someone did, and we gave the information. However, I shall be glad to let the hon. member have it.

Item agreed to.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

War veterans' allowances, $1,650,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When does the minister expect to have functioning the new pensions administration made possible by the legislation of a few days ago?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): That has not been considered yet. It will probably take some little time to get everything straightened out.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The other evening I discussed with the minister the condition of veterans on relief in the city of Montreal. The minister's reply was not as complete or as sympathetic as I had hoped. This government went into office on a definite pledge to end unemployment, or to perish in the attempt. Someone has suggested that it did not end unemployment, and that Canada is perishing in the attempt.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The government will perish, too.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is little doubt about that. I have in my hand a few statements submitted to me by the department in connection with questions I raised concerning relief for unemployed veterans in the city of Montreal. I refer to those who are on pensions. The committee will understand first of all that a man may receive a pension of a certain amount, and that that pension is supposed to be amplified by a grant from the department. This makes the magnificent sum of $30.60 for two adults, a veteran and his wife. If hon. members will take the trouble to figure it out they will find that the food allowance will be about $8.60 per month for the two persons, $4.30 for each person, or just five cents per meal,—I repeat; five cents per meal. I ask the minister and the committee this question: Do you think that is an adequate allowance for men who when called upon either under draft or voluntarily served their country?

Let us take the case of a married, unemployed veteran. I have before me information respecting a specific case, that of an unemployed married man with three children; I have his name and regimental number. He is receiving a total pension of 25 per cent amounting to $35, plus the amount which he had been paid as unemployment relief from the department, making a total of $41.50. According to the schedule for relief in the city of Montreal that sum is apportioned as follows: food, $19; fuel $5—I cannot imagine heating an apartment in Montreal for five dollars a month—rent $15; gas and light $2.50 —I gather that the lighting and gas service in Montreal must be much cheaper than any of those services with which I have had experience. The $19 allowed for food is utterly inadequate—it means that the five people, two adults and three children, must live on four cents a meal. As a member of this House of Commons I protest against a condition of that kind continuing in this country especially when we have a government that has promised to end unemployment or perish in the attempt. If they find, as they must have found by this time, that they cannot adequately cope with the problem, they should undertake to issue sufficient funds to the veterans so that those men may be maintained in something like decency, and may be provided with at least ten cents for each meal. That is little enough. It is interesting to note that when the family increases the amount of relief is reduced. When there is one child the allowance is 13⅓ cents per day. If there are two children it amounts to 12⅔ cents, and if there are three, only 12 cents. If there are four it comes back to 14⅓ cents, and if there are six the magnificent sum of 14½ cents is provided. A condition of that kind is in my opinion intolerable and inexcusable. Heaven knows there are sufficient funds which could be secured from those who have great wealth. If this government is afraid to tax wealth, let it issue currency for the purpose of taking care of unemployed veterans.

Mr. SANDERSON: I note in the item that the total expenditure for the fiscal year 1932-33 was $1,500,000. Could the minister give the committee some information as to how this money was paid out to the different provinces?

Mr. MacLAREN: While we are looking up those figures, I shall reply to the hon. member for Bow River. He has said that the amount allowed is too small.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the minister think it is adequate?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is to help people carry on, and does not necessarily amount to a substantial living, or anything of that kind. As a matter of fact unemployment relief administered through the department is working out reasonably well. I wish that understood. On the whole, under the circumstances of unemployment, poverty and distress, relief as administered is doing reasonably well. That is the report of our officials situated in various parts of Canada. I think we should bear in mind that the intention is to relieve a condition of distress. It is well to remember also that in addition there are earnings which may be made by the individual.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Rubbish; that does not apply to the city of Montreal.

Mr. MacLAREN: The relief may be small, but it is an aid. Receipts up to $10 a month are considered casual earnings, and are not included. There are certain areas in Canada in which relief has been discontinued to men causing agitations. I do not say for a moment that all men who complain are agitators and are causing discontent, but in certain areas there are such, and they are the ones we hear of. Particularly in Montreal and in an adjacent area called Verdun there are men who are agitating and causing a large amount of discontent beyond what is justified. The department is giving not less—and this is the important point—not less than the amount administered to the civilian unemployed. If it is sufficient for the great bulk of the unemployed, so is it sufficient for the veteran with a small pension. But I do say that we are doing rather better, and I believe that the feeling of the country and of the house is that we should do a little better, than is done in the municipalities. That is what we are carrying out. It is a most troublesome and unsatisfactory thing to administer relief to the distressed and those seeking employment. Personally I look forward to the time when the entire system shall be changed and it will be administered in a different way. In the meantime the department is devoting a very great deal of time to the matter—as it should—and doing the best it can, and it is achieving a very considerable amount of satisfaction and affording a great amount of relief.

My hon. friend has asked a question about the war veterans' allowances. May I make this observation about war veterans' allowances: that it is one of the branches coming under the department which is particularly satisfactory. I do not mean that there are no complaints, that there is no trouble,—

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not criticizing it.

Mr. MacLAREN: Well, I do not wish to claim too much for it.

Mr. POWER: Don't do so; you were not responsible for it.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is a very well administered part of the departmental work.

Mr. SANDERSON: I quite agree.

Mr. MacLAREN: It fills a distinct place in the country. Further, there is an increase there of $150,000, and the indications are that for a number of years there will be an increased expenditure, because as time goes on and men get older they qualify for the class.

Mr. POWER: When will the peak be reached?

Mr. MacLAREN: In seventeen years.

Mr. POWER: From the commencement?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is the estimate. I find that from time to time these estimates do not work out exactly as was expected, but that is the estimate to-day. As to the amounts, I can give them according to districts.

District—	Amount
Montreal	$118,621
Halifax	95,418
Ottawa	70,806
Toronto	277,499
London	82,620
Winnipeg	129,626
Regina	71,950
Calgary	102,910
Vancouver	267,279
Saint John	40,963

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wonder if the minister thinks a man is an agitator who protests against relief which provides him and his family with meals at the rate of five cents apiece. Would the minister not agitate under those conditions? I do not think I have ever been so disgusted in this house in twelve years as I have been to-night when I heard the minister rail at these unfortunate people because they are protesting against such a miserable pittance which does not provide them with enough to keep healthy. I ask the minister to go in person into the homes of these people, study the faces of the children, see the pallor of their countenances due to under-nourishment, and ask himself if he does not think that an officer with wealth who applies for a pension is not a more vicious type of agitator than the man who strives to secure a little better than five cents a meal for himself and his children.

The minister says that the basis upon which this relief is granted is that it is sufficient for civilians. I protest that civilian relief is not adequate, has not been adequate since the beginning of this depression; but to put a soldier on that same basis is gross injustice and inhumanity. The civilian at least has physical fitness, was not subject to the shocks of war. Here is a case I have under my hand, a man suffering from a gunshot wound in the spine and osteo-myelitis of the left ilium and chronic neurasthenia. Does the minister say that that man is not suffering more than a civilian and is entitled only to the same relief? This condition is intolerable. I do not blame these men for writing letters to this house protesting against such a condition; they would not be Canadians if they did not. It is a wonder to me that they have been so unutterably patient up to this time.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have listened to what the hon. member for Bow River has said, and I think he is speaking largely of item 198 rather than item 206.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am speaking to the point anyway.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I agree with you.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is quite in order.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I thank the minister. I want to say that under item 198, unemployment relief, we have for 1933-34 $2,600,000, and for last year we had $2,225,000. That is an increase of $375,000 this year. The families for whom I am speaking are families of returned men who cannot get one dollar of relief. I have had one particular letter from my own riding from a man with a family of eight who has had to haul cordwood into North Battleford, forty miles, in order to get enough for his family to live on, and the members of this family—as are many others—are not living as they should; they are simply on the verge of starvation. In this letter to me this man says that it is impossible to get any relief, and they have been practically starving all winter. Because this man has not got his pension established he cannot get a dollar to keep his family from starvation's door. Is there not something that the minister and his department can do in such a case? I think a case such as I have cited is a disgrace to Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is a disgrace to the government. It is not Canada that is responsible; it would do more.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will the hon. member inform me, is the man to whom he refers a pensioner?

Mr. McINTOSH: No; that is the point, the man is not a pensioner, but his family is starving and he cannot get any help.

Mr. MacLAREN: But that is the answer to the question.

Mr. McINTOSH: But is it fair, is it honourable on the part of the government or the country?

Mr. MacLAREN: This is a vote of parliament for pensioners; that is the point.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand—

Mr. MacLAREN: Pardon me; let me finish. This is for pensioners, and we are not allowed by parliament to pay it to other than pensioners. That disposes of that point.

Mr. McINTOSH: Not quite.

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, that is an absolute answer. The case is that of a returned soldier in the constituency of North Battleford who requires relief. I do not know what steps he has taken, but I do know that the proper authorities to approach would be the Department of Labour and the provincial government where he resides. It is not for me to say, but I understand that proper provision is made for these cases.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I say that this is a returned man who is not living in an unemployment area of Saskatchewan, and the Saskatchewan relief commission is loath to help men in such a situation. Being a returned man he feels that although his pension is not established he should be able to get some relief from this government, but he has found it impossible to do so. I am just asking if there is not some way to remedy a condition of that kind, or must it go on forever?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think my hon. friend must understand the procedure in connection with unemployment relief in his province; it is carried on by the municipality, with the assistance of the province and the dominion. It is not for me to say about these matters, because they are dealt with in a different way, and I am sure my hon. friend is more familiar with the procedure than I am.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am too familiar with the so-called relief procedure in Saskatchewan.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I should like to say a word or two with regard to the point raised by the hon. member for North Battleford.

An hon. MEMBER: Is this the new minister?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): No, just one who knows something of what he is talking about.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is that the distinction?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): If there is any such idea in the minister's mind I am sure it is unnecessary for me to relieve him of it. The point raised by the hon. member for North Battleford is the subject to which I should like to address myself. The hon. gentleman cites an instance of a returned man in his constituency who cannot get aid from the government out of the vote now under discussion which, as the minister has pointed out, is money voted by parliament not for all ex-service men but for those ex-service men suffering from disabilities which have been found pensionable. Clearly, according to the statement of the hon. member for North Battleford, the case in question does not come within the purview of the legislation at all.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister explained that; you have not said anything new yet.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Very often my hon. friend talks without saying anything new. I am stating the premise, but my hon. friend does not wish me to go further. To continue, the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the case he has cited does not come under this item at all.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister said that half an hour ago.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): My hon. friend did not seem to understand it.

Mr. McINTOSH: I did understand it, but I made an appeal following that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Then the hon. member went on and in a tragic appeal to this government asked if something could not be done. If the hon. gentleman knows anything about the system of relief in this country he must know perfectly well that the relief of civilians or soldiers not in receipt of pension is administered by the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. McINTOSH: I admitted that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): So instead of appealing to this government in the name of high heaven to do something, let the hon. gentleman get in touch with the authorities in his own constituency; let him bring the matter to their attention and to that of the provincial and federal government. Further I want to add that remarks such as those uttered by the hon. member for North Battleford do not serve to assist the ex-service men; if anything they merely serve to becloud the issue and stir up discontent throughout the country. They leave the impression with many of these ex-service men that they are entitled to an allowance under this item before us, while as a matter of fact that is not so. If instead of beclouding the issue the hon. member would explain this matter clearly many individuals would be put on the right track.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member rose to explain something, but in his closing remarks he beclouded the whole issue. He got up to help the minister, but by the time he sat down he was doing his best to destroy him. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that the political edge my hon. friend tried to put on my remarks does not rightly belong to them at all. I was not trying to make out a political case. If every time my hon. friend talks about returned men he must bring in politics he must not think every other person does so. I repudiate the construction my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre has tried to place on the remarks I made. I was merely speaking for a returned man in the constituency of North Battleford who wrote and said that while he was trying to get his pension established his family was practically starving and that he had appealed to the municipality and the province without result. My point was this: Cannot this government do anything in such a case? If the government cannot, let it say so. Surely a man can present a case of that kind to parliament and ask the minister in a courteous way if anything can be done without having an hon. gentleman get up and talk about politics when his own remarks are all politically biased, I am just asking the minister—and I think I know the hon. gentleman better than my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre knows him—if anything can be done. The minister said nothing could be done. If that is so, all right; I now know what to tell this returned man.

Mr. MacLAREN: First of all may I point out that this does not fall within my department; the Minister of Labour can inform my hon. friend in this matter, since he administers the Department of Labour. My hon. friend asks if anything can be done, and I say that a great deal can be done, and my hon. friend can so inform his correspondent when he answers his letter. He should inform the gentleman that he must apply to the municipal authorities; that is the first move, because relief is administered by the municipal authorities, the province and the federal government. I ask my hon. friend to do that, and if he does so I do not think there will be any great difficulty.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am quite willing to do that, but I think it has been done already with no result.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to make it very clear indeed that the comments we have heard to-night are almost entirely concerned with unemployment relief and have nothing to do with war veterans' allowances, which we are now discussing. I agree with what the minister has said in regard to the administration of these war veterans' allowances, and I think that is the feeling among all ex-service men in the Dominion of Canada.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The Canada Grain Act, including management, operation, maintenance and equipment of elevators, administration of, $2,295,172.20.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has promised to give me some material illustrative of the advertising he has been doing.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The right hon. gentleman asked a question with regard to the amounts spent in connection with the advertisement known as Canada Expects, and so on. I have the various amounts in connection with a list of dailies which I will give him if he wishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that my hon. friend put them on Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: I will give the list to Hansard:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about the weeklies?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Did anyone ask for this?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about the weeklies?

Mr. STEVENS: I have somewhere a statement with regard to them. I think the question has been pretty fully answered, unless my right hon. friend insists.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister will give to Hansard a statement with regard to the weeklies that will do.

Mr. STEVENS: I will try to do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I lent the minister the advertisement. Will he be good enough to give it back to me?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly. It is such a good one, I should like the right hon. gentleman to preserve it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I want to use it.

Mr. GARDINER: Last fall when the house was in session the minister brought in a bill to amend the Canada Grain Act, to permit the Board of Grain Commissioners to make a change in the rates. Under that legislation I understand that the board changed the rate for storage from one-thirtieth to one forty-fifth of a cent per bushel. I have received communications asking whether it is possible for the board to reduce the spread between the Winnipeg price and the price paid the producer. Generally speaking, the freight rate in the west from many points in Manitoba and in eastern Saskatchewan is something like fifteen cents per bushel. The elevator companies make a reduction from the Winnipeg price of twenty, twenty-one or twenty-two cents per bushel, giving the difference between the fifteen cents and that twenty, twenty-one or twenty-two cents. May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether in his judgment the Board of Grain Commissioners under the present legislation have any means of closing up that spread to some extent? There is a complaint in the west at the present time in that regard in view of the low price of grain.

Mr. STEVENS: The answer to the first part of the question is that the Board of Grain Commissioners, under their powers extended by the grain act, and as is their duty, from year to year fix storage elevator rates. Last year they fixed one forty-fifth of a cent instead of one-thirtieth as a fair rate, but organizations, both cooperative and private, have represented that that reduction was not warranted and is improvident. The whole question will be considered by the board in July before the rate is fixed for next year, and a full hearing will be given. As regards the other part of the question, including the question of freight rates, all I can say is that the board has jurisdiction only in so far as elevator handling charges are concerned, and to the extent that they have jurisdiction they intend, as I learned talking to the chairman a few days ago, to give the whole matter careful consideration. All who desire to be heard will be heard before the rates for the next crop year are fixed.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The matter which I am going to bring up now has been discussed in previous sessions, namely, the situation with respect to growers of durum wheat who delivered wheat to the Manitoba pool during the crop year 1930-31. I do not wish to delay the house to-night, although it is causing considerable concern in a certain section of Manitoba; and I would not have brought it up had it not been that there was forwarded to me a letter in which the delegation representing the durum wheat growers of Manitoba apparently waited on the Minister of Trade and Commerce last fall. I presume he fully understands the situation. In the closing words of this communication they say:

Mr. Stevens was very interested in knowing what Mr. Bennett had said to us in the two interviews we had with him. We explained that he had asked us to wait for a while and give them time to sell all the balance of the wheat they were holding. Mr. Stevens told us that he sympathized with us very much but that he was in no position at present to make any promises. He promised that he would read our original letter to Mr. Bennett and also your resolution and that he would go into the matter as fully as he could with Mr. Bennett.

I want to ask the minister what answer he gave this committee when the occasion arose, and if he has not yet given an answer, what answer he is in a position to give.

Mr. STEVENS: The answer must be that which has already been given. What I said to them, and what I think all who have given consideration to the matter have also said, is that one sympathizes very much with the view taken by these producers of durum wheat. But their claim is against the pool in which they participated; there is no question about that. The Prime Minister is alleged to have said, as indicated by my hon. friend, that when the selling agency completed its sale of all holdings then possible, there would be some thing out of which the pool would be able to further compensate these growers, and that position still stands.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): That is all very well, but I do not think it will satisfy these people, who in the first place contracted to deliver wheat to the Manitoba wheat pool, which was to turn it over to the central selling agency. Durum wheat at that time was selling slightly under common wheat, and the initial payment established for durum wheat was considerably below common wheat. Durum wheat that year, however, was all sold at a price considerably above common wheat—

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite right.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): —and from a rought estimate I gather that it brought in about $500,000 more than was actually paid over to the grower. If it was dealt with on the same basis there would be roughly about $200,000 coming to these people. I think the growers have a good claim to an adjustment, particularly with respect to the difference in the initial payments when the wheat was originally taken in. It is true that these farmers were contracted to deliver their wheat to the Manitoba pool, but a general change was made and Mr. McFarland was put in charge and the responsibility is now on the Dominion government. No accounting has been made of how this business has been handled and these people do not know exactly what is coming to them. Any figures presented are merely estimates and Mr. McFarland has given no real accounting. During the past two years I have taken up this matter on different occasions. I do not want to delay the proceedings at this late stage but I think this is of sufficient importance to be looked into and some action taken. This particular area in Manitoba where durum wheat is grown has been particularly hard hit during the past two years. The growers have suffered from causes other than not getting the full amount for their wheat, and I ask the minister to adjust this discrimination at the first opportunity.

Civil Government—Public Archives—salaries—to provide for the continuance in office of J. B. Noble, senior bookbinder, from April 1, 1933, to March 31, 1934, $1.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. RHODES: This item really comes under the Department of the Secretary of State but I think I can explain it. This gentleman is over the age of seventy-five years and is a highly skilled bookbinder now engaged upon the fine tool work necessary in the embossing of the Book of Remembrance. The one dollar is for the purpose of legislating this man on for another year, the money for his salary being provided in the main estimates.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that subject to the ten per cent deduction?

PUBLIC WORKS

Public buildings—Ontario—Windsor—government's share of cost of local improvements, $1,950.

Mr. MITCHELL: I received a letter a few days ago in connection with the employees engaged on the bridge at Burlington canal. I understand that arrangements were made to put these men on an eight hour day but for some reason or other this has not been done. This bridge is on one of the most travelled highways in the province and the operators are forced to work twelve hours a day for seven days a week. In view of the fact that there is considerable traffic over this bridge and also because of the amount of unemployment, I think this would be an opportune time to put these men on an eight hour basis. I think we are long past the stage where government employees should be asked to work such long hours. I know something of the conditions which obtain on this bridge because I have passed over it many times. I would like the minister to take this matter under advisement and consider the introducing of an eight hour day in the near future.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): I have also received representations in the same direction and the matter will be taken up with the treasury board or the council with a view to ascertaining whether under the circumstances we can meet the requests.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—Broad Cove Marsh—breakwater-wharf replacement, $13,400.
Cow Bay (Port Morien)—breakwater replacement, $19,000.
Dingwall—dredging, $39,000.
Grand Desert—harbour protection and repairs—further amount required, $2,700.
Hantsport—to complete siding to wharf, $9,500.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken—further amount required, $75,000.
Little Judique harbour—breakwater extension, $1,900.
Liverpool—dredging, $35,000.
Malagash—mooring pier, $1,600.
Port Hood island—extension of shore protection, $2,500.
South Bar (Sydney harbour)—extensions, improvements, $3,500—Total, $203,100.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a very large item. Is it due to repairs made necessary by high seas, or does the government expect a provincial election?

Mr. RHODES: I am not surprised at my right hon. friend asking that question, and at first blush that inference could be drawn. I may say to my right hon. friend, if my colleague will permit me—

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): You know more about it than I do.

Mr. RHODES: Last year we had the greatest storm in the memory of the oldest living inhabitant of the province of Nova Scotia. This storm washed away many wharfs and did much damage to entrances to harbours. This damage was the greatest ever known. Take the item of Liverpool, dredging. The total output of the Mersey Paper Company is shipped to New York, all from this harbour. This company has a specially constructed vessel but at the moment it is unable to load to its full depth because of the amount of sediment swept into the harbour by this storm. The item for dredging at Dingwall arises through an arrangement made with a company which is opening up a gypsum quarry to supply a market already in existence. The arrangement is that this company will file a bond and agree to expend a certain amount of money. This vote will not be expended unless the bond and proper securities are filed. The item of $75,000 arises solely because of the circumstances I have indicated—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought these harbours were all closed five years ago because of a storm at that time.

Mr. RHODES: They have had two very bad storms down there in the last few years.

Item agreed to.

New Brunswick—
Campbellton—cribwork block, $2,000.
Dipper Harbour—dredging, $8,000.
Harshman's Brook—harbour improvements, $3,000—Total, $13,000.

Mr. TOTZKE: What counties are these works in?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The Campbellton item is to construct a cribwork at the Campbellton ferry to facilitate the ferry service between Campbellton and Cross Point in Restigouche and Madawaska county.

Mr. TOTZKE: In what counties are the other two works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Dipper harbour is in Saint John-Albert. This is to provide for dredging an area inside the breakwater to a depth of five feet at low water.

Item agreed to.

Quebec

Montmagny—extension to protection wall, $16,800.
Notre Dame de Pierreville—protection work, $19,000.
Riviere St. Pierre—contribution towards dredging, the provincial government having contributed a like amount, $3,000.
St. Andrews—wharf, $3,300—Total, $42,100.

Mr. TOTZKE: What counties are these in?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This work at Montmagny is requested by the municipal council of that place. It is in the constituency of Montmagny.

Mr. BERTRAND: What about Notre Dame de Pierreville?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is in Yamaska.

Item agreed to.

Dredging — maritime provinces — further amount required, $12,000.
Dredging — Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—further amount required, $17,000—Total, $29,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice there is an item for dredging in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Where is the dredging in Saskatchewan? Is it in Mackenzie?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is in lake Winnipegosis.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is not in Saskatchewan.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Those provinces have been grouped together in this one vote. This particular dredging is in lake Winnipegosis.

Mr. VALLANCE: If it is in Manitoba, why charge it up to Saskatchewan? Is there no dredging in Saskatchewan?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That has been the heading of the vote for many years just as I found it when I came in.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—additional amount required to provide for ocean service subsidies, and to assist the shipment of live stock to the United Kingdom, $70,000.

Mr. NEILL: Might I ask the particulars of this vote?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This item, as I intimated the other night, provides for $25,000 additional to the Canadian-Australian-New Zealand mail subsidy to make up the present subsidy to what actually the mail would cost, which cost, on investigation, we found would be roughly $95,000. There is an item in the appropriation for continuance of the Canada-China service for the balance of the year. The amount in the main estimates would carry it only until the end of September. Then there is an item for assisting in the movement of live stock to the British market.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this to help carry out the United Kingdom-Canada agreement?

Mr. STEVENS: No, to help out the Canadian live stock exporter.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the minister give further particulars of that? How is the assistance given with regard to moving live stock?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a small contribution towards fitting up some of the ships.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

To assist in the conservation and development of the deep-sea fisheries and the demand for fish—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister please explain this item?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): The estimates of last year had been cut down by practically one-half in the main estimates which were voted a few days ago. We had taken into consideration the expenses made during the last fiscal year prior to the time the estimates were brought before the house. Since the estimates were voted by the house, we received further claims which increased our expenses of last year, so we think we shall be short this year by about $10,000 if this further amount is not voted.

Mr. RALSTON: Is this for advertising, or what is it for?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not remember exactly, but I am sure it is because the main estimate was cut by one-half.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, and that was too large.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to know whether this was for teaching the housewife how to cook fish, or whether it was for advertising or for freight or express subventions, or what in connection with the encouragement of the conservation of fisheries If the minister does not recollect, I am not going to press the question now.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not my main estimates before me this evening. I did not think this matter would come up to-night, but I can supply the information.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall bring just one point to the minister's attention. I shall not ask him for an answer to-night, but I would like him to consider the matter. I refer to the lobster industry. The matter has been mentioned to me more than once by those who are engaged in this industry and it is this: The possibility of establishing some fund—and it would not be a large one—for buying from the fishermen large female lobsters so that they may be returned to the water and thus the bed be not depleted. I shall mention a fund that will be available for that purpose.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If the expense is not too large, we may have something available for it.

Mr. RALSTON: There is two years' interest on the Halifax award that has never been paid. It is referred to in the report of the Maclean commission. There is a recommendation that the money should be expended for the benefit of the fishermen. A portion of it could be used with excellent results in connection with the conservation of the lobster fisheries. Will the minister take the matter into consideration?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Labour—Combines Investigation Act—further amount required, $18,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the minister give us the cost of the coal inquiry which has just been made?

Mr. RHODES: I have not the details before me, but my understanding is that there have been a large number of investigations and the expense involved has exhausted the appropriation in the main estimates.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give me the cost of the recent coal inquiry?

Mr. RHODES: I can secure that information from the Minister of Labour later, but I do not have it before me now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to ask the government, all of them that are now present: In the event of Quebec failing to take action on the report of the inquiry into the coal situation, will this government take action?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I may say to the hon. gentleman that the matter will be thoroughly considered.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would have preferred that the minister had said no; that under the law the action must be taken by the province of Quebec. I want to submit this to the government: If they have found out something that should be corrected, the best way to have it remedied is to disclose it. Until public opinion is created governments of all stripes are reluctant to act; they prefer to take the quiet attitude of hush, hush. They have done that continually in the past. When the great scandals in connection with brokerage firms of eastern Canada became known, you could not get the attorney general of Ontario to act, you could not get the attorney general of the province of Quebec to act. It was not until the province of Alberta took the bit in its teeth and ran away with the whole business of prosecuting Solloway and Mills, thereby showing the public the scandalous condition of affairs, that the other provinces were compelled to act by virtue of the development of public opinion. In this case, too, I venture to predict that until public opinion is aroused the province of Quebec will not act. I urge upon this government the publication of the report at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. YOUNG: I draw the attention of the government to the fact that the idea seems to prevail in some quarters that the thing to do after an investigation is to prosecute. Actually the people are not interested in prosecutions, but they are interested in cheaper coal. Will the government take any action along that line?

Mr. MITCHELL: It would seem that the only people who do not know anything about the coal inquiry are the members of the House of Commons. We saw striking headlines in the Toronto Globe and in the Mail and Empire. I believe the publicity in connection with the report should first have come to the House of Commons. The man who wrote the newspaper articles must have received information from somewhere. I am in entire agreement with the hon. member for Bow River. After all is said and done, sunlight is good for the health of the human being, and sunlight in connection with the coal investigation would be a good thing for the Canadian people.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The people are entitled to it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Members of this house and the people throughout the country are entitled to the information contained in the report, no matter who may be implicated, or the positions such people may occupy in the life of the country. There is no doubt that the evidence should be laid on the table forthwith.

Item agreed to.

To assist tourist traffic, salaries and retiring allowances of the former national development bureau, $30,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: How does the government propose to assist tourist traffic and take care of salaries and retiring allowances with only $30,000?

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, a branch of the Department of the Interior known as the national development bureau has for a number of years been carrying on a work, part of which was the development of tourist travel. That work is to be continued in the Department of the Interior, and this amount will provide the necessary funds.

Item agreed to.

Loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners for the construction of harbour improvements and facilities, additional to the amount authorized by the Chicoutimi Harbour Loan Act, 1931, and to be subject to the provisions of the said act, $332,100.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have always thought it a mistake on the part of this government to have opened the Chicoutimi harbour commission.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not this government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The previous government. I should say. I was at that time, and still am, convinced that almost the entire expenditure of the commission is for the benefit of the aluminum company located at Chicoutimi, which is part of the Andrew Mellon outfit of the United States, and part of the great aluminum combine. Advantage to the people generally in that district does not enter into the picture at all. The port is used principally by the aluminum company. I should like to know why this additional amount is being voted in the supplementary estimates, and what it is for.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When we came into power we were faced with a contract which had been awarded for the construction of a pier, and some improvements in the harbour of Chicoutimi. This amount is to take care of the expenses made necessary partly to complete the works which had been undertaken by the previous government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the total amount of money expended up to this time, and the total amount expected to be required for the completion of the work?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the exact figure here, but I believe the amount expended up to date is about $3,000,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How much is required?

Mr. DURANLEAU: To complete the works, including trackage and some small sheds, it will require a further amount of about three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. GARDINER: Over and above this amount?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the amount of the contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not that information before me, but altogether it was about $2,700,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this amount complete the work?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This amount is over and above the amount of the contract because, when I say "the contract" I must say that when we came into power we were faced even with verbal contracts for large amounts.

Mr. GARDINER: Verbal?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): With verbal contracts?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, for work which had been started at that time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is a verbal contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend knows.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I never heard of such a thing before; I never heard of public money being spent on verbal contracts.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I was faced with that situation, and works were under construction.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the minister tell us that someone went to him and said, "I have a contract for so much"?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And he paid the money out?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, and the Liberal government—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This is scandalous. If that is the way money is being expended it is time this government went out of office.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We were faced with such things when we came into power, and we had to complete the work.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the minister mean to say verbal contracts had been entered into and works were being proceeded with when he came into power, and that he had to pay the money because the contract had been proceeded with?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: We had better let this item stand until we have further information. This is too serious.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, but that is how the matter stood when we came into power; that is the situation.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister should give the information to the committee. That is scandalous.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would advise the minister to bring his documents with him.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Documents of a verbal contract?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, you will understand that we wish item 332 to stand.

Item stands.

Further amount to complete balance of payment for restoration of Saint John harbour, after the fire of 1931, including engineering and other services, not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Let us have an explanation of this item. This is another fairly substantial sum; what is it for?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the item is well detailed in the estimate.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this the one for the harbour commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes. As a matter of fact the work of reconstruction was done at very low cost, and this is the amount required for completion.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this a loan to the harbour commission, and will interest be charged on it the same as on other loans to harbour commissions?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, this will not be a loan to the commission.

Mr. GARDINER: Under whose jurisdiction was this money spent?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This amount was spent under our own jurisdiction.

Mr. GARDINER: Any particular reason for that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, we had some of our own employees supervise the work and we had the engineering under our control. I can say to this committee that we have saved a large amount of money on that construction.

Mr. SANDERSON: How much?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Many thousands of dollars.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was that under contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It was cost plus four per cent, and the purpose was to control the whole thing, the engineering and the finances.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who had the contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Two firms had the contract, the Northern Construction company for a certain part of the works, and the Foundation Company, Limited, for the other part, at cost plus four per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I do not quite understand the situation that has developed at Saint John, in view of the fact that they have a harbour commission there to look after all the harbour work. The explanation that the minister has given is not clear to me as to the reason why the department went over the head of the harbour commission to construct certain works, or to even to supervise works being constructed. Is it usual for the department to do that where you have a harbour commission looking after the harbour works?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It was unusual; it was due to the fact that as the committee knows a large fire had taken place there and we had to rebuild the whole thing within, I think, four months. As a matter of fact the whole construction was practically completed by the first of December, when the season of navigation opened. That is the reason the department came to the rescue of the harbour commission. I think anyone who would go there and see the work that has been done for the money expended will say that the job was done very cheaply.

Mr. MALCOLM: Item 332, which the minister allowed to stand, was, he said, an inheritance from the previous government. I want to point out that the loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commission, described in this item, was authorized by the Chicoutimi Harbour Loan Act of 1931.

Mr. RHODES: We are coming back to that item.

Mr. MALCOLM: When the Minister of Marine brings down his papers to-morrow I would like him to note that the very money he is asking for is under the Chicoutimi Harbour Loan Act which did not come into force until 1931.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That item stands.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, I draw your attention to the fact that it is after eleven o'clock.

Mr. MALCOLM: Let us go on by unanimous consent.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As the hon. gentleman has called attention to the time, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

At 11.07 o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 16, 1933

The house met at eleven o'clock.

DISCOUNT AND LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): On behalf of the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Sullivan), seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Tétreault), I beg to move:

That the petition of Joseph Alberic Beaudry and others, of Montreal, Quebec, presented on the 9th instant, praying for an act to incorporate The Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOBEIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): Before the orders of the day are called, Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter my protest against a report of the meeting of the redistribution committee held on Saturday forenoon, appearing in the newspaper Le Devoir, of Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The proceedings of the committee referred to are not before the House of Commons, and the hon. member is not in order in referring to them.

Mr. GOBEIL: The article I wish to refer to is a personal attack on myself. It appears under the title:

Mr. Gobeil, as a rural member, wants a larger number of urban seats.

I am not going to read the article, which is a tissue of lies. It is quite in line with the attitude taken by the representative of this particular newspaper, because it has continually, since the first meeting of the committee on redistribution, made false reports, or at any rate, reports that have not been quite correct. I cannot protest too strongly against the insinuation conveyed by the title of the article in question and the whole article itself. Let me say to the representative of Le Devoir of Montreal that he is not only a dirty individual, but a dirty, crooked public liar.

REPAYMENT OF LOAN TO BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). On Thursday last I asked the hon. gentleman a question with regard to an amount of $40,000,000 which the government owed the banks, and which I understand was repaid last December. I should like to ask in what funds that loan was paid, whether in Canadian or United States funds, and how much money it took in Canadian funds to discharge that obligation.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I would not attempt to answer that question at the moment. I shall make immediate inquiries and advise my hon. friend as speedily as possible.

STRAITS OF BELLE ISLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I should like to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if he has been made aware of an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette yesterday to the effect that the straits of Belle Isle were jammed with ice and, if so, whether it would not be advisable to have the government ice-breakers relieve that condition in order that navigation may be speeded up.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The report mentioned by my hon. friend has not reached me yet. It may be that some information has been received in the department and, if so, no doubt the matter will be attended to.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) whether any action will be taken by the government as a result of the report of the agriculture committee in connection with the milk situation.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The report will be reviewed, and of course if action is necessary it will be taken.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour concerning the agreement which has just been concluded between British Columbia and the Dominion government in connection with unemployment relief projects. Is it the intention of the Dominion government to take over the unemployment relief camps and road projects and itself conduct these operations?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The terms of the agreement between the Dominion government and the province of British Columbia set out the agreement at length and cover the point referred to by the hon. gentleman. It has been tabled, of course.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): Is it a fact that there is an understanding just now between the city of Montreal and the department, with respect to relief matters, that a proportionate amount will be granted to landlords in Montreal to compensate them for losses sustained?

Mr. GORDON: If I heard the hon. gentleman correctly, the question concerns any agreement between the Dominion government and the landlords of Montreal. No agreement has been entered into in that regard that I am aware of. A question of that kind would not come from the city of Montreal to the Dominion government. Any matter arising in Montreal or any other city or municipality with reference to relief would come through the provincial government to the Dominion government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRESENTATION OF LETTERS OF CREDENCE BY UNITED STATES MINISTER TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): It is no doubt within the knowledge of the house that the new minister from the United States to Canada, the Honourable Warren D. Robbins, is at present in Ottawa. Mr. Robbins is going to present his letters of credence to His Excellency the Governor General this morning at eleven-thirty and therefore the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is prevented from being in the house at the moment. I am going to suggest, if it is agreeable to the house, that we revert to orders of the day at three o'clock, when the Prime Minister will be here and will make a statement regarding the business of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Under the circumstances mentioned by my right hon. friend we can all appreciate the reason for the Prime Minister's absence at the moment. I thank him for what he proposes. I think that will be quite satisfactory.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

REPORT OF REGISTRAR THAT NO COMBINE EXISTS AMONGST BUYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I am at this moment in receipt of a telegram intimating that there has been an entire misinterpretation by the press and the country of the report with regard to the tobacco inquiry. May I ask the Minister of Labour whether the press is justified in saying that a tobacco combine does not exist and that the special inquiry exonerates the buyers? I wish to ask further whether the buyers are or are not in a combine, whether this report has been tabled and, if not, when we may expect it.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The position of the tobacco growers and their relationship to the purchasers was investigated by the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act, with a view to determining whether or not there existed a combine as interpreted by the act. The inquiry is through, and the registrar has reported to me that no combine exists as interpreted under the provisions of the statute. Under those circumstances the report of the registrar would not be tabled, nor has it been the practice in the past to table such a report. I do not think I can add anything further in connection with the matter. The registrar has reported that there is no combine within the meaning of the act.

Mr. GOTT: I asked also whether the report had been tabled or would be tabled.

Mr. GORDON: I said that the report had not been and would not be tabled.

SUPPLY

SINO-JAPANESE DISPUTE—SPEECH OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE AT SPECIAL SESSION OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

To provide for expenses of representation at the Disarmament conference (revote), $5,000.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): On this item I wish to make a statement, which has long been proposed, in reply to a number of criticisms which have been passed in certain quarters with regard to the address I made at the last special session of the League of Nations when the report of the Lytton commission came before the assembly.

A special session of the league of nations was convened at Geneva in December last to consider the report of the commission of enquiry into the dispute which had arisen between China and Japan from the events which took place at Mukden on the night of September 18th-19th, 1931, and the appeal of the national government of China, under article 11 of the covenant of the league "to take immediate steps to prevent the further development of a situation endangering the peace of nations." On December 10, 1931, the council of the league decided, at the request of Japan, to appoint "a commission of five members to study on the spot and to report on any circumstances which, affecting international relations, threaten to disturb peace between China and Japan, or the good understanding between them upon which peace depends."

Japan accepted the resolution of the council on the understanding that, in the meantime, it "was not intended to preclude the Japanese forces from taking such action as might be rendered necessary to provide directly for the protection of the lives and property of Japanese subjects against the activities of bandits and lawless elements rampant in various parts of Manchuria."

The Chinese representative, on the other hand, insisted that "the only sure way of restoring the normal, peaceful life is to hasten the withdrawal of the Japanese troops and allow the Chinese authorities to assume the responsibility for the maintenance of peace and order" in Manchuria.

The Lytton report, which was signed at Peiping on September 4, 1932, was first submitted to the council of the league and then, at the request of China, as provided in article 15 of the covenant, was referred by the council to the assembly, which was convened at Geneva on December 6, 1932. At that special meeting of the assembly I represented the government of Canada.

The first duty of the council and of the assembly was to consider the Lytton report upon the issues involved in the dispute, and to endeavour to effect a settlement by conciliation.

While the Lytton commission was pursuing its investigations in China, Japan and Manchuria, an intense propaganda was conducted in portions of the press which tended to condemn Japan exclusively and to create the impression that China was in no wise responsible for the disorders which had occurred.

The Times, of London, of December 8, 1932, on the morning of the meeting of the assembly at Geneva, which I addressed on that day, asserted in its editorial that:

"More harm than good is done by vague threats of coercive action, which are not warranted by the facts of the case as found in the Lytton report, and which indeed could only be made effective if public opinion in the other countries were profoundly impressed by the justice of the case of one of the disputants and the injustice of that of the other. The impartial and wise report drawn up by the league commission shows clearly that faults were committed by both sides, and that in the circumstances of the present dispute, unless they are aggravated by further violence by one party or the other, a settlement must be sought not by coercion but by conciliation."

At a later date, January 17, 1933, the Times again dealt with the controversy as follows:

"The business of the league being definitely, in this particular dispute, that of conciliation. it is worth while for it to seek, with all the patience and ingenuity which the occasion demands, a set of words acceptable to the diplomacy of both China and Japan. . . . .

The circumstances of the present dispute are peculiar to the far east, and it is wholly unnecessary to assume, because the league is unable to impose an ideal settlement there by force, that it must always be sterile in action, or that, because Japan is the country that took the initiative in military operations, therefore Japan is entirely in the wrong. Certainly her methods have given rise to justifiable criticism, and it is difficult to reconcile her policy with the spirit of the international instruments which she herself has signed. But she acted under great provocation; and the ultimate result of her action, modified, it may be hoped, by the friendly pressure of other powers through the medium of the league, may be for the benefit of the people of Manchuria, who already are being paid for the product of their labour in fairer measure than the rapacity of their previous rulers allowed to them. In any case neither condemnation nor condonation is necessary from the league. The future matters more than the past. The league's own commissioners pronounced that a mere restoration of the status quo would be no solution, even if it had been practicable. The soundest course must be—with the consent of the parties to the dispute, if possible, but if not, without them—to hold up a settlement to the world which will serve as the rallying point of public opinion and the objective of international diplomacy."

The recognized duty of the league, when we met at Geneva, was to weigh, without fear or favour, the evidence disclosed in the Lytton report, as it affected each of the two parties to the dispute, and to endeavour to arrive at a basis for an equitable solution of the difficult problem with which it was confronted. The Nationalist government of China, which is a member of the league of nations, had applied to the league to intervene in the Sino-Japanese controversy. The council of the league had no option but to proceed to an investigation, but, in the course of such investigation, the origin, real nature and causes of the controversy could not be entirely ignored. The league, in pursuing a policy of conciliation, could not remain indifferent to the relevant facts which the report had disclosed.

The erroneous opinion is seemingly current in this country that the Lytton report contains an unqualified condemnation of Japan and a complete exoneration of China. Certainly that opinion is without foundation.

It is significant that on May 18, 1929, the government of Japan declared its intention to protect the persons and property of Japanese subjects in Manchuria, where it is admitted it enjoys important commercial and territorial rights, and to that end announced its determination to prevent civil strife between Chinese war lords being waged within the confines of Manchuria, and that the military forces of Japan would prevent any Chinese armed forces, whether victorious or defeated, from entering Manchuria.

It is significant that on the following day, May 19, 1929, Sir Austen Chamberlain, then British Foreign Minister, on behalf of Great Britain, expressly stated to Mr. Kellogg, United States Secretary of State, that the terms of the Kellogg Peace Pact "excluded any action which a state may be forced to take in self-defence; and," he continued, "there are certain regions of the world, the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with those regions cannot be suffered."

It was not, therefore, surprising that the Japanese government contended that the events of the night of September 18, 1931, which precipitated the military strife between Japan and China, were justified as measures of self-defence, which they were entitled to take by reason of their treaty right to maintain armed forces for the protection of the South Manchurian Railway, on which an explosion took place between ten and ten-thirty p.m. on that night. The finding of the Lytton commission was that:

The military operations of the Japanese troops during this night, which have been described above, cannot be regarded as measures of legitimate self-defense. In saying this, the commission does not exclude the hypothesis that the officers on the spot may have thought they were acting in self-defense.

That finding of the Lytton commission was certainly to the effect that the measures taken by Japan were not justified on the ground of "legitimate self-defense," even though the military officials of Japan may have entertained an erroneous opinion to the contrary.

The second contention of Japan was that the state of Manchukuo had been the result of a genuine and spontaneous movement for independence, which was not precluded by Article 10 of the covenant; and the Lytton commission makes an express finding against this contention as follows:

The evidence received from all sources has satisfied the commission that, while there were a number of factors which contributed to the creation of "Manchukuo," the two which in combination, were most effective, and without which, in our judgment, the new state could not have been formed, were the presence of Japanese troops and the activities of Japanese officials, both civil and military.

To these two findings of the Lytton commission the representatives of Japan took strong exception.

But the Lytton report clearly and repeatedly points out that the chaotic conditions that prevail in China are, in a large measure, responsible for the existing difficulties between that country and Japan.

At page 13 the report says:

Political upheavals, civil wars, social and economic unrest, with the resulting weakness of the central government, have been the characteristics of China since the revolution of 1911. Those conditions have adversely affected all the nations with which China has been brought into contact and, until remedied, will continue a menace to world peace and a contributory cause of world economic depression.

The report also directs attention to the conditions existing in China at the date of the Nine Power treaty, which was signed at Washington on February 6, 1922, by Sir Robert Borden, on behalf of Canada, at a time when the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was Prime Minister. The contracting parties to that treaty, other than China, then agreed:

To respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China.

The report, nevertheless, finds that:

Yet, even at that time, China had two completely separate governments, one at Peking and one at Canton, and was disturbed by large bandit forces which frequently interfered with communications in the interior, while preparations were being made for a civil war involving all China. As a result of this war, which was preceded by an ultimatum sent to the Central government on January 13, 1922, when the Washington conference was still in session, the Central government was overthrown in May, and the independence of Manchuria from the government installed at Peking in its place was declared in July by Marshal Chang Tso-lin. Thus there existed no fewer than three governments professing to be independent, not to mention the virtually autonomous status of a number of provinces or parts of provinces.

I have quoted all this from the report.

It is admitted that, when the Washington conference was in session, civil war was being waged between the Southern government of Canton and the Northern government of Peiping, while in other districts five Tuchuns and seventeen minor leaders had armed forces in the field, striving to overthrow constituted authority and to maintain personal power.

At the close of the Washington conference, in submitting the Nine Power treaty for the approval of this parliament on June 19, 1922, (Commons Debates, p. 3161), the Prime Minister of that day, now the right hon. leader of the opposition, said:

Conditions in China have in recent years been abnormal and difficult. The inherent weakness of her internal political position has produced a condition and an atmosphere peculiarly conducive to discord and conflict of interest among the powers both in their relations directly with China and in their relations as between themselves in Chinese matters. One of the main objects of the Washington Conference was to endeavour to secure an improvement in this situation. Considerable progress in this direction was made, but it must be borne in mind that it was not within the power of the nations represented at Washington to provide the whole remedy. The problem is essentially one for the Chinese people themselves.

At the present time two provincial communist governments have been organized in Kiangsi and Fukien, but the number of minor soviets runs into hundreds. Communist zones of influence are even more extensive. They cover a large part of China south of the Yangtze, and parts of the provinces of Hupeh, Anhwei, and Kiangsu north of that river. Shanghai has been the centre of communist propaganda.

The boycotts which have, from time to time, been organized in China against the commerce of the United States, Great Britain and, more recently, against Japan, have also jeopardized peace in the Far East.

The Lytton report again and again accentuates the desirability of avoiding future friction between Japan and China and the restoration of mutual confidence and cooperation; but it is made clear that those desirable ends cannot possibly be attained so long as the national government of China insists upon pursuing a policy which involves the unilateral abrogation of existing treaty rights, and upon setting at naught the provisions of the Nine Power pact for the maintenance of the policy of "the open door" by resorting to the boycott of foreign merchandise and the intimidation of foreign traders. The Lytton report declares:

There is no doubt that the boycott has been among the causes which have profoundly embittered the relations between China and Japan in recent years.

In respect of these boycotts, the Lytton report insists that "the main controlling authority is the Kuomintang"; and it is evident from the appendix to the report that the Kuomintang is a powerful political association which, at its discretion, appoints and removes ministers and other Chinese officials, and determines and dictates the policy of the National government of China.

In respect of these successive boycotts the Lytton report finds that:

The Kuomintang, having from its creation supported the movement, increased its control with each successive boycott until to-day it is the real organizing, driving, co-ordinating and supervising factor in these demonstrations.

The Lytton report says that:

A powerful means of enforcing the boycott is the compulsory registration of Japanese goods held in stock by Chinese merchants. Inspectors of the anti-Japanese societies watch the movement of Japanese goods, examine those of doubtful origin in order to ascertain whether or not they are Japanese, undertake raids on stores and go-downs where they suspect the presence of non-registered Japanese goods, and bring to the attention of their principals any case of the violation of the rules they may discover. Merchants who are found to be guilty of such a breach of the rules are fined by the boycott associations themselves, and publicly exposed to popular disapproval, while the goods in their possession are confiscated and sold at public auction, the proceeds going into the funds of the anti-Japanese organization.

The boycott is not limited to trade alone. Chinese are warned not to travel on Japanese ships, to use Japanese banks or to serve Japanese in any capacity, either in business or in domestic service. Those who disregard these instructions are subjected to various forms of disapproval and intimidation...

On the other hand, it has been clearly shown to what extent the Kuomintang, using the mentality and the methods which the Chinese people have inherited from their old guilds and secret societies, has taken control of the recent boycotts, and particularly of the present one. The rules, the discipline, and the sanction used against the 'traitors', which form such an essential part of the present boycott, show that, however spontaneous, the movement is certainly strongly organised.

And again the Lytton report emphasizes the fact that "the main controlling authority is Kuomintang"; that "illegal acts have been constantly committed, and that they have not been sufficiently suppressed by the authorities and the courts"; that "they are clearly not only illegal under the laws of China but also incompatible with treaty obligations to protect life and property and to maintain liberty of trade, residence, movement and action"; that " the injury has been done to Japanese interests by the employment of methods which are illegal under Chinese law, and that failure to enforce the law in such circumstances implies the responsibility of the Chinese government for the injury done to Japan."

The report insists upon the recognition of Japan's interests in Manchuria. It declares that:

> The rights and interests of Japan in Manchuria are facts which cannot be ignored, and any solution which failed to recognize them and to take into account also the historical associations of Japan with that country would not be satisfactory.

And again the report says that:

> So far as Japan is China's nearest neighbour and largest customer, she has suffered more than any other power from the lawless conditions described in this chapter. Over two-thirds of the foreign residents in China are Japanese, and the number of Koreans in Manchuria is estimated at about 800,000. She has more nationals, therefore, than any other power, who would suffer if they were made amenable to Chinese law, justice and taxation under present conditions.

The Lytton Commission, therefore, finds that "the present political instability in China is an obstacle to friendship with Japan and an anxiety to the rest of the world as the maintenance of peace in the Far East is a matter of international concern", but the conditions for a satisfactory solution of existing difficulties "cannot be fulfilled without a strong central government in China."

And again the report says:

> The realisation of China's national aspirations in the field of foreign relations depends on her ability to discharge the functions of a modern government in the sphere of domestic affairs, and until the discrepancy between these two has been removed the danger of international friction and of incidents, boycotts, and armed interventions will continue.

It is not surprising, in view of these findings of fact, that the Lytton commission should earnestly advise and advocate a policy of conciliation and measures of cooperation between the parties as a basis of friendly settlement.

"Criticism alone", declares the commission, "will not accomplish a settlement of the dispute; there must be practical efforts at conciliation."

The report concisely summarizes the situation as follows:

> The issues involved in this conflict are not so simple as they are often represented to be. They are, on the contrary, exceedingly complicated, and only an intimate knowledge of all the facts, as well as of their historical background, should entitle anyone to express a definite opinion upon them. This is not a case in which one country has declared war on another country without previously exhausting the opportunities for conciliation provided in the Covenant of the League of Nations. Neither is it a simple case of the violation of the frontier of one country by the armed forces of a neighbouring country, because in Manchuria there are many features without an exact parallel in other parts of the world.
> The dispute has arisen between two states, both members of the league, concerning a territory the size of France and Germany combined, in which both claim to have rights and interests, only some of which are clearly defined by international law; a territory which, although legally an integral part of China, had a sufficiently autonomous character to carry on direct negotiations with Japan on the matters which lay at the root of this conflict.
> We recognize—
> —continues the report—
> —the great importance of Manchuria in the economic development of Japan. Nor do we consider unreasonable her demand for the establishment of a stable government which would be capable of maintaining the order necessary for the economic development of the country.
> There is no question—
>
> —declares the report—
> —of returning to the conditions before September, 1931. A satisfactory régime for the future might be evolved out of the present one without any violent change. . . .
> It is impossible not to realize that, at the heart of the problem for Japan, lies her anxiety concerning the political development of modern China, and the future to which it is tending.

And as to China, the report declares that all her " claims should be subordinated to this one dominating need for the effective internal reconstruction of the state."

Nevertheless, so long as the existing chaotic conditions prevail in China, it is indeed difficult to find a solution of China's difficulties with other nations by applying the terms of the League Covenant, the Washington Treaty and the Kellogg Peace Pact, which are applicable to thoroughly organized and responsible national governments rather than to a politically disorganized Asiatic state, some of whose leaders are evidently actuated by a belief that, under the protection of the international agreements, to which their country is a party, they may persist in hostile and provocative acts against foreigners without fear of retaliation.

Article 10 of the League of Nations has been the subject of considerable discussion in this country. That article reads as follows:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

It is well known that at the conference at Paris, which framed the treaty of Versailles, Sir Robert Borden, then Prime Minister of Canada and senior Canadian delegate to that conference, took strong exception to the terms of this article 10.

Subsequently at the fourth assembly of the league, which was held at Geneva in September, 1923, the Canadian delegation sought to repeal article 10, or to amend it so as to provide that "no member shall be under the obligation to engage in any act of war without the consent of its parliament, legislative or other representative body."

The committee which considered the Canadian amendment reported in favour of the following interpretative resolution:

> The assembly, desirous of defining the scope of the obligations contained in article 10 of the covenant so far as regards the points raised by the delegation of Canada, adopts the following resolution:—
> "It is in conformity with the spirit of article 10 that in the event of the council considering it to be its duty to recommend the application of military measures in consequence of an aggression or danger or threat of aggression, the council shall be bound to take account, more particularly, of the geographical situation and of the special conditions of each state.
> "It is for the constitutional authorities of each member to decide, in reference to the obligation of preserving the independence and the integrity of the territory of members, in what degree the member is bound to assure the execution of this obligation by employment of its military forces.
> "The recommendations made by the council shall be regarded as being of the highest importance and shall be taken into consideration by all the members of the league with the desire to execute their engagements in good faith."

This resolution failed to obtain the unanimous approval of the fourth assembly; twenty-nine states voting therefor, Persia voting "No" and thirteen states abstaining from voting. Therefore this resolution has no binding effect.

I deemed it expedient at the special assembly in December last to refer to Canada's now historic point of view, inasmuch as it was then evident that there were delegates from some of the recently organized states of Europe, who foresee that coming events may place their own state boundaries in jeopardy, and who were disposed to press for an arbitrary condemnation of Japan and the premature enforcement, in their interests, of the sanctions prescribed by the provisions of article 16.

I would like to suggest that one occupying the position I did, representing Canada and standing before that assembly of representatives from all parts of the world, must necessarily feel a great responsibility indeed, in view of the fact that to attain the ultimate end sought by many of the delegates might have involved placing upon Canada the responsibility of again sending her military forces into the far east for the preservation of peace in Manchuria. And knowing as I did, the historic development of opinion in Canada with regard to article 10, I conceived it my bounden duty to state to that assembly what I believed to be the prevailing public opinion in Canada which has been accepted and endorsed by each successive government in our country, in order that there might be no misapprehension as to the position which I as a delegate of Canada was then taking.

Article 16 would involve:

> The severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant breaking state, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the league or not.

I think that I truly interpreted the opinion of this government and of this parliament, in suggesting that the time had not then arrived for the adoption of such extreme measures. I believe that the views of the governments of the British commonwealth of nations were expressed in an editorial of The Times, of London, on January 24 last:

> And there must be very few among the responsible ministers who have been watching, waiting, and deliberating upon events in Manchuria who can have much doubt that a policy of active intervention would almost certainly have produced far more catastrophic results than the passing of three or four Manchurian provinces under the direction of Japan. League action could only be effective if, on the facts of the dispute, as found impartially by its own agents, one disputant or another were adjudged to be wholly in the wrong, and if the volume of condemnatory opinion were strong enough in a sufficient number of countries to make the governments of those countries ready to sacrifice human lives, material, trade, and money in taking action against the "aggressor." Threats of action by the league in any other circumstances would be no more than a bluff. The requisite conditions for action have certainly not existed in the case of the Sino-Japanese dispute.

The league therefore has very properly confined itself in this case to a policy of conciliation; and, in view of the temporary refusal of the two parties to the dispute to be reconciled, all that it can do now is to draw up the lines of a settlement which in its opinion would be at once feasible and just. . . .

It is at any rate certain that it is no part of the duty of the states in the league, whether collectively or individually, to pass moral judgment upon one or other of its members. Their business is to devise a solution which is likely to be practicable in the near or distant future, and which is in consonance with the principles of the league.

Informed and dispassionate public opinion in the neighbouring republic finds expression in an editorial of the New York Times, of February 22nd last, from which I quote:

No fair-minded person can deny that Japan has rights in Manchuria and a good case to argue. In the statement of it made on Tuesday by the Japanese delegation at Geneva, there is a great deal of force. One strong consideration in favour of the Japanese contention has all along been admitted. This is that there has been no well-organized and stable and continuing Chinese government with which a foreign nation can make agreements. When the covenant of the League of Nations speaks of a country made the victim of aggressive action, it manifestly intends a cohesive and recognized government able to maintain law and order within its own boundaries and to speak for the wishes of its subjects and citizens. This has not been the case with China since the overthrow of the monarchy at Peking. Other nations, including the United States, have been embarrassed and baffled by this lack of a central Chinese authority, but it is doubtless true that Japan, in her more intimate relations, has felt the awkwardness of the Chinese situation more keenly. In fairness, let it be admitted that Japan has had real complaints and grievances in Manchuria.

The New York Times continues as follows:

The league has been considerate. In this whole matter of the dispute between China and Japan it has been most cautious and considerate —many have thought too much so. Even now it will not be precipitate in pronouncing judgment. It is willing to give Japan still more time to find a way to accept some plan of conciliation and peaceful adjustment. What the Japanese people should understand, what the Japanese government should perceive, is that those who through the years have been most friendly to Japan are to-day the ones who most strongly desire that she make, if need be, some minor sacrifices of prestige in order to win back the cordial reception of her as one full worthy of being included in the sisterhood of modern and peace-loving nations.

The address which I made on the Sino-Japanese question on December 8, 1932, before the special assembly of the league, has been criticized on several occasions in Canada by those who had evidently not carefully studied the Lytton report. Notwithstanding their criticisms, I have reason to believe that that address was widely approved by eminent delegates from several of the leading states there assembled, that its delivery did not, in any measure, detract from the reputation which Canada had previously acquired at the league assemblies, but that, in part at least, it influenced the league's decision to increase the number of its committee of nineteen, and to give to Canada, as a state adjacent to the Pacific ocean, permanent representation on that committee. Now after having read over the verbatim report of that address, I have no desire to amend or modify the views which I then expressed, which I believe to be consistent with the report of the Lytton commission and in accord with predominate political opinion throughout the British commonwealth.

The assembly of the league, at which I attended, after discussion of the Lytton report, adopted, on December 9th, 1932, the following resolution, in favour of which I recorded the vote of Canada:

The assembly, having received the report of the commission of inquiry set up under the resolution adopted on December 10, 1931, by the council, together with the observations of the parties and the minutes of the council meetings held from November 21 to 28, 1932, in view of the discussions which took place at its meetings from December 6 to 9, 1932, requests the special committee appointed under its resolution of March 11, 1932:

(1) To study the report of the commission of inquiry, the observations of the parties and the opinions and suggestions expressed in the assembly in whatever form they were submitted;

(2) To draw up proposals with a view to the settlement of the dispute brought before it under the council resolution dated February 19, 1932;

On December 15, 1932, this special committee of nineteen drew up a resolution proposing that representatives of the governments of the United States of America and of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics should be invited to participate in the work of this committee, on the following terms:

In order to avoid misunderstanding and to make it plain that what is contemplated at the present stage with the cooperation of two countries not members of the league is solely the negotiation of a settlement by conciliation, the special committee suggests that it should be regarded for this purpose as a new committee, responsible for conducting negotiations, and should be authorized in this capacity to invite the governments of the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to take part in its meetings.

This resolution contained the following closing paragraph:

In this connection the committee of nineteen considers that in the special circumstances which characterize the dispute a mere return to the conditions previous to September, 1931, would not suffice to insure a durable settlement and that the maintenance and recognition of the present régime in Manchuria could not be regarded as a solution.

On January 18, 1933, the government of Japan made an objection, stipulating that the committee to be appointed for the settlement of the dispute should include only members of the league.

The committee of nineteen further reported as follows:

On February 8 (1933) the Japanese representative submitted to the committee further amendments to the text prepared on December 15. On February 9 the committee, after considering these amendments, deemed it desirable to ask for further information in regard thereto, in particular whether the Japanese government accepted as one of the bases for the contemplated conciliation principle 7 in chapter IX of the report of the commission of inquiry regarding the establishment in Manchuria of a large measure of autonomy consisting with the sovereignty and administrative integrity of China. This question was submitted to the Japanese delegation in a letter of the same date.

The Japanese government replied on February 14 that it was convinced that the maintenance and recognition of the independence of Manchukuo were the only guarantee of peace in the far east and that the whole question would eventually be solved between Japan and China on that basis.

The committee of nineteen replied that the Japanese proposal of February 8 did not, in its opinion, form an acceptable basis for conciliation, and thereupon proceeded to draw up its report to the assembly.

In paragraph 4 of this report the committee of nineteen briefly reviewed the political and economic development of Manchuria during the preceding quarter of a century. This report says:

4. . . . . On the other hand, Japan had acquired or claimed in Manchuria rights the effect of which was to restrict the exercise of sovereignty by China in a manner and to a degree quite exceptional. Japan governed the leased territory of Kwantung, exercising therein what amounted in practice to full sovereignty. Through the medium of the South Manchuria Railway, she administered the railway zones, including several towns and important parts of populous cities, such as Mukden and Changchun. In these areas, she had control of the police, taxes, education, and public utilities. She maintained armed forces in certain parts of the country: the army of Kwantung in the leased territory; railway guards in the railway zones; consular police in the various districts. Such a state of affairs might perhaps have continued without leading to complications and incessant disputes if it had been freely desired or accepted by both parties and if it had been the expression and manifestation of a well-understood policy of close economic and political cooperation. But, in the absence of such conditions, it was bound to lead to mutual misunderstandings and conflicts. The interconnection of respective rights, the uncertainty at times of the legal situation, the increasing opposition between the conception held by the Japanese of their special position in Manchuria, and the claims of Chinese nationalism were a further source of numerous incidents and disputes.

5. Before September 18, 1931, each of the two parties had legitimate grievances against the other in Manchuria, Japan taking advantage of rights open to question and the Chinese authorities putting obstacles in the way of the exercise of rights which could not be contested. During the period immediately preceding the events of September 18th, various efforts were made to settle the questions outstanding between the two parties by the normal method of diplomatic negotiations and pacific means, and these means had not been exhausted. Nevertheless, the tension between Chinese and Japanese in Manchuria increased, and a movement of opinion in Japan advocated the settlement of all outstanding questions—if necessary, by force.

6. The present period of transition and national reconstruction in China, despite the efforts of the central government and the considerable progress already achieved, necessarily involves political disturbances, social disorder, and disruptive tendencies inseparable from a state of transition. It calls for the employment of a policy of international cooperation. One of the methods of that policy would be that the League of Nations would continue to afford China the technical assistance in modernizing her institutions which her government might request with a view to enabling the Chinese people to reorganize and consolidate the Chinese state.

The full application of the policy of international cooperation initiated at the Washington conference, the principles of which are still valid, has been delayed, chiefly by the violence of the anti-foreign propaganda carried on in China from time to time. In two respects—the use of the economic boycott and anti-foreign teaching in schools—this propaganda has been pushed to such lengths that it has contributed to creating the atmosphere in which the present dispute broke out.

7. The use of the boycott by the Chinese previous to the events of September 18, 1931, to express their indignation at certain incidents or to support certain claims could not fail to make a situation which was already tense still more tense.

The use of the boycott by China, subsequent to the events of September 18, 1931, falls under the category of reprisals.

The resolution of the assembly on February 24, 1933, also contains findings that the sovereignty over Manchuria belongs to China, that the presence of Japanese troops outside the zone of the South Manchurian railway and their operations outside this zone are incompatible with the legal principles which should govern the settlement of the dispute, that these troops should be evacuated, and that the first object of further negotiations should be to organize this evacuation and to determine the methods, stages and time limits thereof.

The assembly also recommends the establishment in Manchuria, within a reasonable period, of an organization under the sovereignty of and compatible with the administrative integrity of China, which should provide a wide measure of autonomy, in harmony with local conditions, and which should take account of the multilateral treaties in force, the particular rights and interests of Japan, and the rights of third states; and that "the determination of the respective powers of and relations between the Chinese Central government and the local authorities should be made the subject of a declaration by the Chinese government having the force of an international undertaking." They also recommended that the Lytton report be followed by the organization of an international force which would preserve peace and good order in Manchuria as the Japanese troops should be retired. Briefly the position of Japan, taken not only before the assembly but at committee meetings and in private conversations, was that they had rights in Manchuria which were conceded by all the nations and even by the Chinese.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask what their rights were?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not going into that question, but if my hon. friend will study the Lytton report he will find those rights enumerated in page after page, and to some of them I have referred. At least there is this much to their claim, that they won back Manchuria from Russia after China had failed to protect it and ceded it; under existing treaties they had the right to maintain railways through Manchuria; they had the right to maintain military forces there for the protection of those railways and the rights incidental thereto. They were in control, as the report said, of cities and towns; they had their own police, their own schools and their own educational system; and they occupied in Manchuria, by right of treaty, a position such as no other sovereign country enjoys in any other country in the world. And with regard to the protection of these rights it was conceded by the Lytton report that they were entitled to give that protection, although the report found that they had exceeded their right in using their armed forces as they had done for that alleged end and purpose.

The issue that at once arose was this. Should the league assembly confine itself to making reasonable efforts towards effecting conciliation and the cooperation of these two countries, Japan and China, in Manchuria, under the nominal sovereignty of China? That was the supreme question we had in view at the time I delivered that address. There were representatives of other parties at the assembly who were insistent that the league should proceed to sanction more extreme measures. Such measures had to be considered, but they might have meant ultimately involving Canada in a war in the far east for the protection of certain ill-defined interests, and it was certainly my duty, as a representative of Canada, to avoid saying or doing anything which would seem to imply that the government and the parliament of Canada were prepared to take such extreme action under the then existing circumstances. Further than that, the Lytton report suggested the formation of an international army of police for the maintenance of peace and good order in Manchuria, and the question at once arose as to who were to supply and maintain the troops, necessary to attain that end. Japan, through its representatives, daily in the corridors stated that it was prepared to withdraw its troops, but not for the purpose of admitting the bandit chieftains of China to come in and pillage and lay in waste that country again. That was their contention. But they took the view that if an international force could be organized and they could be relieved of the responsibility of maintaining peace in Manchuria they were quite willing to withdraw. I ask hon. members to put the question to themselves as it was put to me. How many thousands of troops, ten, twenty or twenty-five thousand, would Canada be prepared to put into the far east as part of a joint international force? I had to tell them in private, not in public, that I did not believe that under the then existing conditions the parliament of Canada would appropriate a single dollar toward maintaining a single company of troops in the far east for that purpose. And that was exactly the same position taken in private by the governments of England and France and by other governments of the chief European states. They were unwilling to sacrifice thousands of lives and to expend again millions of money for the sake of preserving, through an international organization of their military forces, continued peace in Manchuria.

I am not defending Japan. I think she went to the very extreme and committed acts that are indefensible, and I said so in that discussion. But I do say that I do not believe that any representative of the government and parliament of Canada who has thoroughly studied the situation can find very much to criticize in the statement which I then made. The hour is getting late, Mr. Chairman, and I have taken a much longer time than I anticipated, though I could in more detail have presented the case with regard to the maintenance of peace by an international armed force. I thank the committee for its courtesy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is wholly appropriate that the hon. the Secretary of State, if he and the government deemed it necessary and desirable, should make a statement to this house of the position taken by himself at the League of Nations in Geneva last year. I question very much however the propriety of that statement being made at this particular time and without any notice having been given the house in advance of the government's intention to introduce this subject at this session.

We have now reached what looks as if it might be the last day of the session and we are discussing the last but one of the items which appears in the final supplementary estimates. The question which my hon. friend has raised is of all controversial questions the largest in the world at the moment, and I submit that the government are not justified in having permitted this subject to be brought on without at least having given the house some advance notice of its intention to introduce it at this session.

I think it would be most unfortunate were the remarks made by the hon. the Secretary of State now to become the subject of comment and debate in this house. The parliament at Westminster has carefully avoided a discussion of the Sino-Japanese situation; the parliaments of most of the countries of Europe as well as the congress of the United States have done the same. I do not see that we in Canada would be acting wisely were we to depart from what has been, I think, a very wise restraint on the part of other deliberative assemblies, and to begin now a discussion of the Sino-Japanese situation. I prefer not either to approve or to disapprove of anything which the hon. the Secretary of State has said this morning, but to let his statement speak for itself as the statement which he made at Geneva did. The time may come when the whole question can be discussed without danger of the remarks of anyone being interpreted by the nations that are at the moment in conflict as the taking of sides one way or the other with respect to the great questions which are at issue. It would be impossible, without going into the merits of the whole Sino-Japanese dispute, to comment on what my hon. friend has said and I do not think when these countries have been at war for the period they have, during all of which period we have kept out of the controversy, that we in Canada would be justified in choosing the dying moments of the session to raise a discussion on the questions at issue. I wish to be consistent with the view I have expressed by refraining from saying anything more at the moment. In my opinion this question might well have been made, if it was to be discussed at all, the subject of one of the most important debates of the session; but seeing that it has not been discussed up to the present time I think that we might well reserve until a subsequent session, at which time we trust the Sino-Japanese war will have concluded, such further discussion as we may wish to have on the statement of the Secretary of State at Geneva and on his statement to parliament this morning. I have profound respect for my hon. friend's integrity and ability, as he knows, as well as for his years and for himself, but I question very much the soundness of his judgment in bringing up this question at all and more particularly at this time of the session.

Mr. IRVINE: In connection with the remarks of the Secretary of State I wish to say pretty much what the leader of the opposition has said. I think the subject which the minister has brought before the house to-day is of very great importance not only to Canada but to the world, and if it was the intention of the government to have it discussed some notice should have been given the house in order that members who are interested in the international situation might have had an opportunity of preparing their material so as to discuss the subject as it ought to be discussed.

I could not always tell when the minister was quoting and when he was speaking for himself, but to me the whole trend of his discourse seemed to be towards the futility of the League of Nations, the futility of the signatories to all the peace pacts and the virtual declaration that the only hope of protection which any nation has, is in its own individual military powers. If, as the minister so emphatically declared, Canada is not prepared to put one dollar or one man behind the League of Nations, then I do not think we ought to spend one dollar to send delegates over there to make speeches which we cannot back up and which we have no intention of backing up.

During the historical summary of the eastern situation by the minister I could not help noticing that great emphasis was placed upon the internal weakness of China and upon certain rights which Japan had to the occupation of Manchuria. In this case I think the League of Nations by its inaction has declared to the world as clearly as any declaration could be made in words that the whole idea of the league is impossible and that the institution is impotent. If it had been otherwise, surely the weakness of China to which the minister has referred should have been the chief cause for the League of Nations taking action. But it is stated that China is too weak for us to assist, that her internal troubles are too great and therefore we will let Japan go in with a disciplined force and do what she wants to do.

I am not going to argue this matter because I agree with the minister when he suggests that there should be no pronouncement of opinion on this affair without an adequate knowledge of all the facts. Under the circumstances it would be impossible for any member to become possessed of all the facts necessary to enable him to make a pronouncement. However, I do make this pronouncement: either the League of Nations means something or it means nothing. If it means anything at all, it should endeavour to make effective the steps provided for in its own articles. I venture to suggest that when the minister made the speech to which he referred he did not represent the general opinion of the people of Canada. They had at that time some faith in the League of Nations, they believed that Japan was invading China and that it was the duty of the League of Nations to stop that sort of invasion. Instead of doing that the League of Nations did nothing and left the whole situation to time and time was the very thing that Japan required. The invasion is continuing at the present moment. I suggest that there are only two possible courses for Canada to take. The League of Nations should be considered as an instrument of serious use and it should be used as a means of maintaining world peace; we should urge the enforcement of the provisions of the covenant against Japan and we should withdraw our official representatives from Japan as a protest against the invasion of China. We should either do that or throw up our hands as far as the League of Nations is concerned and have nothing more to do with it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I agree entirely with the views of the leader of the opposition that it would be undesirable to discuss this far eastern question under present conditions. We would have certainly given notice if we had had an idea that there would be a debate upon the subject, but the government considered that the Secretary of State should make his statement so that it would be on record, not for discussion at the present time but for the information of hon. members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only exception I take is to the subject being brought up at all at this time. I would much rather have seen the statement of the Secretary of State appear in his autobiography which I hope he will give to the world some day and which I feel sure will be extremely valuable to those who have the privilege of reading it.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall never publish an autobiography as I do not expect ever to have leisure sufficient to write one. But in my case, as with Japan, there was a great deal of provocation. Statements have been made on the public platforms in various parts of this country and in the press to the effect that there was only one side to the Sino-Japanese controversy. It was alleged that the position which I had taken had discredited Canada before the world. I trust I will not be considered egotistical when I say that my address before the assembly was listened to most intently. It was made after consultation with the other dominion members from time to time as they gathered together. The British delegation told me that they approved of what I had said, and some of the most eminent men in the assembly came to me afterwards to congratulate me upon having expressed the views I did, and others considered that it was the duty of Canada to call attention to certain facts because of our situation on the Pacific and our friendly relations with both China and Japan. I did not intend to provoke a controversy but I think it was due to me that I should be permitted to point out to this parliament the grounds underlying the expression of views which I made there. To-day is the first opportunity I have had of doing this.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of continuing this discussion but I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. He stated that one of the reasons why Japan had certain rights in Manchuria was because China had ceded that province to Russia and that Japan had wrested it from Russia. I should like to know when the government of China ceded complete sovereignty over the province of Manchuria to any country. I should like to know whether she did that or just simply granted certain railway and trading rights.

Mr. CAHAN: Did I say "ceded"?

Mr. EULER: Yes, you used the word "ceded".

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps that was not the correct word for me to use. As a matter of fact, China did acquiesce in the acquisition of Manchuria by Russia.

Mr. EULER: Complete sovereignty?

Mr. CAHAN: Russia took charge just the same as she is taking charge at the present time of northern Mongolia.

Mr. EULER: Did China consent?

Mr. CAHAN: She began to treat with respect to it. I do not know that Germany has ever consented to Alsace Lorraine being taken over by France but she has acquiesced. I am not emphasizing the position taken by Japan. But what I do say is this: Japan took Manchuria back from Russia. Japan then restored Manchuria to China in consideration of certain rights in and to Manchuria being retained by Japan, so that, so far as China is concerned, she has, one might use the word, ceded or granted to Japan certain rights which Japan now claims.

Mr. EULER: My point is simply this: When the word "ceded" is used, I thought the cession of a country meant handing over complete sovereignty, and I understood China had never done that to any other nation with regard to Manchuria.

Mr. HEAPS: Was the statement made by the minister to the house this morning the official viewpoint of the government in regard to the dispute between China and Japan?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not pretending to make an official statement for the government with regard to the controversy between China and Japan; the time has not come for this government to make an official statement with regard to that, and the leader of the opposition has very properly taken that view. But the time had come for the Secretary of State, who had represented Canada at the League of Nations and whose statements have been misrepresented throughout the length and breadth of this country, to show, by quotations from official documents that those who misrepresented those statements and who from time to time exaggerated them, have never thoroughly appreciated the purport of the report of the Lytton commission on which my statements were based.

Item agreed to.

MARINE DEPARTMENT

Loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners for the construction of harbour improvements and facilities, additional to the amount authorized by the Chicoutimi Harbour Loan Act, 1931, and to be subject to the provisions of the said act, $332,100.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Last night the Minister of Marine made a statement which I do not think he should have made. He left the impression that this item was inserted because of some verbal agreement that had been made by the former Liberal administration. I just want to make it quite clear that this item is for a—

Loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners for the construction of harbour improvements and facilities, additional to the amount authorized by the Chicoutimi Harbour Loan Act, 1931, and to be subject to the provisions of the said act.

The present administration of which my hon. friend is a member, came into office in the summer of 1930. The Chicoutimi Harbour Loan Act was passed in 1931 and what is now being asked for is something in addition to the legislation which parliament enacted at that time. I do not think the minister should have even mentioned the former Liberal administration in connection with the item.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I was understood yesterday as saying that this item was to cover works performed under verbal contract. That was not what I meant. I mentioned those facts only to show the difficulties we had to meet when the new commission took office.

I desire to explain this morning exactly the situation. The verbal agreement about which the contractor spoke to me when I was in Chicoutimi was in regard to an approach that he was building for the new bridge that the provincial authorities were supposed to build later on across the Saguenay river a few hundred feet above the pier in course of construction. The contractor contended then that he had a verbal promise from the former harbour commissioners that this approach was to be paid by them to the extent of $70,000. This morning I asked for information concerning the matter and I was told that the claim of the contractor was denied by the former commissioners and also denied by the present ones and was never paid. I am informed that the contractor is now endeavouring to obtain compensation from the provincial authorities. That is the situation in regard to the verbal contract about which he spoke to me, but it is over two years ago now and I spoke last night only from memory, so there is in this item nothing in connection with work done under a verbal agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand the minister now to withdraw the statement he made last night which certainly would be understood as a reflection upon the previous administration and which he should not have made in the house?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have just given the exact information which, I think, is satisfactory to my right hon. friend; that is, that the claim of the contracts for $10,000 for work under supposed verbal agreement was denied by both commissions, past and present and never paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then the statement the minister made last night is withdrawn.

Mr. YOUNG: That does not explain the item. Last night the minister gave us an explanation of the item. Now he says that that is not the explanation. Perhaps there is another one.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This is to cover the amount due by the commission to the Bank of Montreal for money borrowed by the commissioners to liquidate outstanding liabilities. As a matter of fact, there were moneys overexpended before September, 1930, the date when the new commission came into office, to complete the works which had been undertaken by the former administration, and additional commitments after that were necessary to complete the work. When the present commission took office, there was an amount outstanding at the bank and it was carried by the new commission. Later on they paid the bank, borrowing from another bank, and this is an oustanding liability, but it was to complete works undertaken under the contract entered into in 1927 by the former commission for the construction of that pier.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. GARDINER: What was the amount outstanding owing to the bank under the old contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: At the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: No, at the time the new commission took office.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot give the exact amount, but it was between $225,000 and $300,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Was there any authority for the expenditure of that money by the old commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The contract was authorized, but the expenditure was over the estimate mentioned in the contract. There were certain works done by the former commission under the direction of the engineers to protect the works. A bulkhead was constructed and tie rods were fixed to solidify the works. That was done under the direction of the firm of A. D. Swan, the supervising engineers. Everything has been done under the direction of the engineers.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that harbour commissions must come to the government and then to parliament for the necessary funds to make their improvements. From the statement which the minister has made, it appears that the former commission overspent the amount of money which was authorized by parliament for the improvements at Chicoutimi harbour. Is that not the situation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can say that at the time the new commission came into office in September, 1930, there was a certain amount over-expended by the former commission.

Mr. GARDINER: I just take this opportunity of drawing to the attention of the committee the report made by Sir Alexander Gibb with regard to our different ports and harbours. Ever since I have been a member of the house, I have always supported any move which would make our ports more efficient in handling our imports and exports. When conditions were better than they are at the present time, Canada's trade was growing very rapidly. In order to facilitate the exchange of our goods for the goods of other countries it was absolutely essential that we should have the best facilities that we could provide for the time being. I have even gone so far as to say that our facilities should be a little ahead of our requirements in view of our expanding trade. No doubt at the present time the facilities are more than ample, in view of the decline in the volume of business, to take care of our exports and imports.

I have watched the development of our harbours very closely since I have been a member of the house, and I am quite satisfied of this fact, that we need some central authority which will take into consideration our port requirements from a truly national aspect rather than considering them merely as local requirements. I am afraid that there has been too much local pressure brought to bear upon governments—I do not refer to any particular government—to provide facilities in ports which were not of any real value to the country. I am not, as I have already said, one of those who would skimp our ports of the facilities they should have, but I do think that between now and next session the government should take seriously into consideration the elimination of the harbour commissions that we now have and the placing of this work under one central authority who will look at the question in a national instead of merely in a local way.

Mr. CARDIN: In this item this amount is described as a loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commission. I would ask the minister why he is following that procedure? In the past the practice has always been to supply the money which is necessary for the harbour commissions, for port development, by means of legislation instead of through an estimate. In the past when a harbour commission required a certain amount of money for the development of a harbour, parliament was asked to vote the money through a special bill which provided for the payment of interest on the loan which was being made. But there is no provision here as to the interest which the Chicoutimi harbour commission may be called upon to pay to the government. Do I understand that the government will expect the Chicoutimi harbour commission to pay interest on this advance of money when it is in a position to do so, as harbour commissioners have always been bound to pay interest on moneys advanced to them by special legislation. This has always been the practice in the past. Why this change in procedure?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The demand was made a little late in the session, and we thought it would be shorter to bring down an estimate. I do not think it will make any difference, so far as the paying of interest is concerned, whether the loan is made through an estimate or by legislation.

Mr. CARDIN: There is no indication here at all that they are bound to pay interest on the loan.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They are supposed to pay interest on all moneys loaned if they can afford to pay it.

Mr. CARDIN: But they are not supposed to pay interest that is not required of them, and there is no provision for the payment of interest in this item.

Mr. STEVENS: You cannot get blood out of a stone.

Mr. CARDIN: I know that many of these harbour developments were made at a time when business was better and prospects were brighter, and undoubtedly many of the developments in the different harbours could not be justified if you looked at them simply in regard to the volume of business to-day.

Mr. MANION: Such as the Montreal harbour bridge.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend is always referring to that. Yet he has in his own department the Welland canal, which has never paid a cent to Canada, and which was supposed to cost, when the first estimate was brought before the house, $50,000,000.

Mr. MANION: How about the National Transcontinental?

Mr. CARDIN: Yet the Welland canal which was first estimated to cost $50,000,000 has cost this country to-day $125,000,000, and nobody says a word, but my hon. friend is constantly referring to the Montreal harbour bridge. There are ten or fifteen undertakings under the government which have cost much more than the amount which was first estimated, yet my hon. friend objects every time to the bridge in the port of Montreal. Everybody was in favour of the building of that bridge. The Conservative party was as strong for it at that time as the Liberal party. Nobody on the opposition side had the courage at that time to stand up and say that they were opposed to the building of that bridge —nobody. During the last parliament when we brought forward the proposal for the building of the Caughnawaga bridge, the opposition of that day opposed the building of that bridge and any contribution from the federal government for that purpose, on the ground that it was going to be a toll bridge. The opposition of that time argued that the bridge should be a free bridge, and if we had proposed that it should be a free bridge the opposition of that day would have endorsed the building of the Caughnawaga bridge. In the county of Chateauguay-Huntingdon the Conservatives went around saying, "The Liberals want to give you a toll bridge, but we are going to give you a free bridge." And now the Conservatives are denying the justification for the building of the Montreal bridge. It is true that we are not getting all the revenue at the present time that we expected from the Montreal bridge, but the revenues are increasing from year to year, and we hope that when the business of the country is once more reestablished we shall have very reasonable returns from that bridge, returns which will take care of all the expenditures. It is true that the bridge has cost more than was originally estimated, but as I said, the Welland canal is in a much worse position in that respect than the Montreal bridge. There are many other undertakings of the government which have cost two or three times the amount estimated by the engineers, and that experience is not confined to government business alone. Any man who has had experience in construction knows that it is almost impossible to point to any work, even a construction costing only a few thousand dollars, that does not cost in the end more than was first estimated by the engineers or architects.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The parliament buildings, for example.

Mr. CARDIN: That is a common experience because there are always certain changes and new developments. The Montreal harbour bridge has cost a larger amount of money than was at first estimated because changes were made in the plans since the estimate was first presented to parliament. The steel, for instance, has been increased in strength and many changes were made in the concrete work. It can be very easily explained how the first estimate was seriously increased by these changes. The increase can be justified certainly just as well as my hon. friend can justify the increase in the cost of construction of the Welland canal over the first estimate.

Mr. MANION: I should like to point out that the opposition of that day did not oppose the Montreal harbour bridge because they thought it was going to be built at a reasonable price, instead of costing $19,000,000. The opposition of that day expected, and the government implied, that the bridge would cost eight or nine million dollars, but the government of that day that built the bridge spent $19,000,000 on a property that should have been built for eight or nine million dollars. That is what happened in that case.

In regard to the Welland canal, my hon. friend's government while it was in power spent probably more money on the Welland canal than this government has spent. His government were in power from 1921 to 1930, and they carried on the building of the Welland canal. My hon. friend implied that it was our fault that the Welland canal cost a great deal more than the first estimate. My hon. friend can go back to his own party. He will perhaps remember the estimate that Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave of $13,000,000 for the building of the Transcontinental, a road which cost $178,000,000. My hon. friend, and this will come closer to home, can probably go back to the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway purchase, which he forced upon the Canadian National Railways against the wishes of Sir Henry Thornton. Sir Henry Thornton said that it was not worth $5,000,000, and the hon. gentleman practically forced him to pay $6,000,000 for a road that has never yet paid its way in one day of its operation.

Mr. CARDIN: I am very glad indeed to discuss the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway. Since I have been in this house I have on many occasions noticed the expenditure of money for the building of railways which were not as important as the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway. This railway runs through one of the oldest sections of the province of Quebec, a section which has been established since the very first days of Canada, and that section of the province of Quebec has been the worst served of all Canada so far as railway facilities are concerned. That section of Canada has been retarded in its development for twenty or thirty years, during which time its people have had to stand conditions so far as the lack of railway transportation is concerned that no other section in the whole of this country could have sustained. I have voted, and hon. members opposite have voted, for the construction of branch lines where no people were established. We did that with a view to having people established there, or to having possession of a certain piece of territory in order to prevent one railway or another taking advantage of it. There were not many people established, but the purchase was for the purpose of future development. In the section in which the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway was built there is a large farming population and small industrial centres which for twenty-five or thirty years had been deprived of reasonable or fair railway communication. The small town of Sorel has been kept behind for a period of twenty-five or thirty years; it has not developed, along with other small towns, because of lack of necessary railway facilities. We had no regular train service. Freight rates were prohibitive, and it would cost more to transport merchandise from Montreal to Sorel than from Montreal to Quebec. That was the position in which we were placed at the time.

However no matter what was said by the Minister of Railways and Canals, the government need not be afraid or ashamed because the Quebec, Montreal and Southern has been acquired. It is the best acquisition the Canadian National Railways ever made.

Mr. MANION: It has never paid its way.

Mr. CARDIN: It is a paying proposition.

Mr. MANION: It is not a paying proposition.

Mr. CARDIN: The minister cannot indicate a single branch line which has been acquired by the Canadian National Railways and is capable of giving a better showing than is the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway. It was a good buy. It is not a load which has been placed upon the shoulders of the Canadian National. I am not afraid to put all the cards on the table, and when the cards are on the table I am ready to fight. I admit that certain officials of the Canadian National Railways were not strongly in favour of the acquisition of the line. They were not familiar with it. They did not know the circumstances under which that railroad had been operating, and they are always opposed to something new or something which had not originated in their minds. There is no man among all human beings who has a more one-track mind than has the railway man. He can see only one way. Everything coming from someone else he opposes or is ready to put aside.

Look at the returns of the Quebec, Montreal and Southern, and compare them with the returns obtained from other lines, and you will be forced to the conclusion, if you are reasonable and fair, that it was a good buy. It is the most promising line that the Canadian National Railways ever acquired. It was the intention of officials of the Canadian National to dispense with certain of their lines running from Montreal to Quebec and passing through St. Hyacinthe so that because of the absence of grade, the lines of the Quebec, Montreal and Southern could be used. The road is level, because it is at the level of the St. Lawrence river. When business was good the Canadian National was contemplating moving all their freight traffic and even their best passenger trains along the Quebec, Montreal and Southern roads. That was the decision and proposal of officials of the Canadian National Railways. I repeat the line in question is not a burden, and even if it had been I humbly submit that the province of Quebec has less mileage per head of population than any other province in the dominion. The province of Quebec, which has not been used as well as other provinces in Canada, was entitled to something. It is unfair for the Minister of Railways and Canals to start an agitation on that point. Our claim was justified. The operation has justified the buying of the Quebec, Montreal and Southern.

Going back to the other argument concerning the Montreal bridge, offered by the Minister of Railways and Canals, may I say that everything he has said is a justification for my argument. I refer the minister to an answer to a question asked in the house to the effect that the first estimate on the construction of the Montreal bridge was $12,000,000. That was the estimate of the engineers made at a time when the plans were not completed. Detailed plans had not been prepared, and to a large extent the minister could not do otherwise than resort to a certain amount of guessing when he was asked to give the price for the building of the Montreal bridge. If the estimate made by the engineers was $12,000,000, there is nothing so extraordinary in the fact that the bridge cost $19,000,000, especially in view of the changes which were made in the material used, and in view of other circumstances including interest which was charged to the Montreal harbour commissioners on the cost of the land acquired for the bridge and the construction itself. In the $19,000,000 is included $2,000,000 interest. So, if we take everything into consideration there is nothing so extraordinary in the cost of the Montreal bridge. The discrepancy is far below that which existed between the estimated and the real cost of the Welland canal.

Mr. MANION: I have two minutes to speak before one o'clock. The hon. member stated repeatedly that the Quebec, Montreal and Southern was an advantage to the Canadian National Railways. The information I get from officials of the Canadian National is that the Quebec, Montreal and Southern has never paid its operating expenses,—and I believe my information is probably a little more correct than is that of the hon. member.

Mr. POWER: They tell you what you ask them.

Mr. MANION: No, they do not. If they told me only what I asked them they would be very poor officials.

Mr. POWER: When they do not tell you what you ask them, you get angry about it. That happened in committee.

Mr. MANION: Because one of the officials told a falsehood, I objected.

Mr. POWER: If he told a falsehood, fire him; that is the answer to that.

Mr. MANION: He told a falsehood in reply to one of the hon. member's questions; that is why he remembers it so well. The hon. member (Mr. Cardin) who just took his seat implied that I was objecting to the Quebec, Montreal and Southern and to the Montreal bridge because they were in the province of Quebec. I deny that, absolutely. There is no man in this house who is or always has been more friendly towards expenditures, or towards the friendly treatment of the province of Quebec, than I am, and I have been that way all my life. I think this is not a very broad attitude to take when, upon a matter touching the province of Quebec, the suggestion is made that we are attacking the French-Canadian population. I do not think that attitude is worthy of any hon. member on either side of the house. Hon. members on this side of the house definitely—

Mr. BOUCHARD: You are the only one who mentioned it.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member pointed out that because it was in Quebec I would have nothing to do with it. I submit that the statements which I made were correct, and had nothing to do with the portion of Canada in which the money was spent. I do not think it is fair to bring in a question of race in connection with a matter which we are discussing.

Mr. POWER: It was not brought in.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

[Mr. Manion.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AS TO REMAINING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the house was good enough to grant permission to revert to the orders of the day when we resumed at three o'clock, since I was inadvertently—that is a good word—detained by reason of the arrival of the United States minister.

This afternoon we propose to proceed with order No. 24, with the house in committee on Bill No. 99, if the item of business under consideration is disposed of. We propose to proceed also with Bill No. 100, which stands in my name, and with Bill No. 106. It was thought that possibly the difficulties to which attention has been directed in connection with the latter bill would be modified if not overcome by adding as a new paragraph a provision that this act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by the governor in council. That is the proposal we shall make with respect to that measure.

There still remains the redistribution bill, and I have asked the committee to report the bill to the house at the earliest possible moment. I am told that it might not be possible to report it until the morning, but I suppose that when it is reported it will take some time for consideration, though just how long I am not in a position to say. I regret that with respect to some of the provinces an agreement has not been reached, but that very often happens. I was on a committee twenty years ago, and the matter was finally disposed of only in the last two or three days. The present chairman of the select committee was on the redistribution committee ten years ago, and it will be recalled that the measure was not proceeded with as intended on the first occasion but was taken up at the following session.

Having regard to the fact that this is 1933, however, I think there is great anxiety on the part of the house that the bill should be enacted, and if we are unable to do so by consent I suppose the only other way is to invoke the aid of what is sometimes called the brute majority, but which constitutes the means by which under democratic institutions we carry on government, the history of which is very interesting but to refer to which would serve no good purpose. I believe an agreement has been arrived at with regard to most of the provinces; I understand that the particular differences are very few but that unfortunately when an effort is made to overcome them new ones take their places. That being so it is quite obvious that the only proper thing is to report the bill to the house, and that will be done at the earliest possible moment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the remarks of the Prime Minister I might touch first on what he has proposed with respect to Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act. I understood the Prime Minister to say that he would propose that the measure should not come into force until so directed by the governor in council. I do not see that this alters in any particular the principle of the measure, which is one to which we at least on this side of the house cannot agree, and which we shall oppose on the second reading of the bill. I say that at once; the principle of the bill is not one which we can accept, and the proposed amendment would not help the situation at all.

With regard to the redistribution measure, I cannot agree with the Prime Minister when he says that previous redistributions have not been effected by consent, that is, if we confine the statement to the last three redistribution acts. In 1892, I think it was, there was a redistribution which resulted in a long drawn out battle in the House of Commons. At that time Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was leading the opposition, put forward the suggestion that there should be a joint committee of the house appointed to prepare the schedules to be attached to the bill to be presented to hon. members for their approval. In that year the government of the day itself prepared the bill without reference to the opposition, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier's view was that if a joint committee could be formed its members might be expected to rise above matters of party difference and do what would be generally recognized as fair and just to all concerned. After Sir Wilfrid came into office in 1896, and was confronted in 1902 with the first redistribution thereafter, he had redistribution carried out in that way. A joint committee was appointed from both sides of the house, and that committee arranged the constituencies as a result of agreement after some discussion and brought in a report which was unanimously accepted. To the bill was attached a schedule containing the redistribution map, and that bill was carried in the commons without disagreement of any appreciable extent.

A few days ago I was speaking with Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden with regard to redistribution in his day. Sir Robert made it rather a boast to me at the time—and I think he quite rightly spoke with a degree of pride —that when he was in office which would be in 1912, a committee of the house had been appointed which joint committee came to an agreement, so that there was no controversy. With respect to the last redistribution, which was carried out in 1923 when the late Liberal government was in office, I recall the circumstances quite vividly because I had the responsibility in the matter that to-day rests with my right hon. friend. It did take the joint committee some little time to come to a final agreement but an agreement generally approved was reached. I believe that at the end there was one constituency with respect to which there remained some controversy. As I recall the circumstance it was not a matter that affected the boundaries of the constituency; it was I believe some other feature which at the moment I cannot recall. I do remember, however, that the measure was brought into the house with the understanding on the part of the committee not that the particular difference whatever it was would be decided on the floor of the house but rather that the parties would declare their respective positions which I believe had reference to the returning officer to be appointed and that the bill should go through without any controversy, which it did. That was the last redistribution, and I have referred to the only other occasion on which we have had redistributions since we adopted the practice of having the redistribution map prepared by a joint committee of the house.

I do think it would be most unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, if at this time, after having been successful for the last thirty years with this method of effecting the necessary redistribution of constituencies, it should be found that the present ministry was not able to effect what three previous ministries effected in regard to a redistribution which would be regarded as fair and just by all parties concerned. I know there are some differences, but there may also be older and wiser heads in the house than those perhaps which have had thus far to do with the present redistribution, and I would submit that even yet, advantage might be taken of that added experience which in political life comes with years, to see if it is not possible to bring into this house before we prorogue a measure that will commend itself with unanimity to hon. members and to the country. Having regard to the conditions which exist not only in our own country but throughout the world as well I cannot think of anything that would be more unfortunate than to have the popular belief in parliamentary institutions further shaken or undermined in any way. I would urge that very strongly upon the ministry as a reason why above all others, we at this time, should seek by our action here, irrespective of the parties to which we may belong, to let the general public see that with regard to the basis on which our whole parliamentary institutions rests we are prepared to do the thing which will be regarded by the public at large, as fair, just and honourable. I believe the Prime Minister himself can bring his influence to bear in this matter. I cannot but think he wants to be fair, and he has a way of getting his own way when he wants it. I should say this was a time for him to exert that influence in the interests of fairness and justice.

Mr. BENNETT: With the character of the observations which the right hon. gentleman has been pleased to make to this house I am in accord but—and it is the "but" that is the difficulty—it is not quite fair to expect that every concession must be made by the majority and the right hon. gentleman will be the first to agree with that. What he said about our institutions is so true that I shall not do more than say that I wholly agree with him, but it must not be forgotten by this chamber, for instance, that when redistribution took place ten years ago the Conservative party now in power had no member from Saskatchewan.

Now, I put it to the fair judgment of public opinion whether or not when, for instance, there was an earnest effort by a member of the committee from Saskatchewan to rearrange one seat in particular about which there has been so much talk by a very highly respected but very old member of this house, who took the attitude, "No! My map or nothing"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is not right.

Mr. BENNETT: That is practically what it meant.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, there you have an initial difference. My advice to-day is, and I have inquired carefully, that certainly the map which our friends from Saskatchewan insist upon is practically their map or nothing. My right hon. friend opposite knows from long experience—and he has had a longer experience of the responsibilities of the head of a government than I have had—that there is a point always reached where you cannot expect men who belong to the majority to be told that they must subordinate entirely their views to the will of a sometimes arrogant and almost insolent minority. That is the fair way to put it. I am not putting it disrespectfully; I think I am putting it fairly when I say that.

The committee is called for half past three this afternoon, and if there is a real disposition to overcome these difficulties it will then become apparent. If the older members of the house can assist in arriving at an amicable disposition of a highly contentious question, I shall be very glad; indeed, I shall ask the leader of the opposition whether he has any suggestion to make as to a member or two on his side who will cooperate with the older members on this side to enable such a disposition to be arrived at.

Mr. MALCOLM: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: But I say at the threshold of the discussion that a frank recognition of the fact that there are Conservative members from Quebec and Saskatchewan is essential to the reaching of a conclusion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Mr. BENNETT: That must be done; if it is not done, then the fault will rest not with the government but with those who assert their right to rule regardless of the rights of majorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has referred to the provinces of Quebec and Saskatchewan as they were at the time of the last redistribution, and has said that the Conservative party was not represented on the committee that dealt with that redistribution. I submit that there could be no greater evidence of the fairness of the redistribution as effected in 1923 than the fact that to-day there are large numbers of representatives both from Saskatchewan and from Quebec sitting in the seats of hon. gentlemen opposite, whereas under the previous redistribution made when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, there was in one parliament at least, only one Conservative member, I think, from the province of Quebec and none from the province of Saskatchewan. The question is not whether there were representatives from these provinces on the committee at the time, but whether the representatives generally were able to effect a redistribution which was regarded by all as fair, and I submit that unless the members of the Conservative party on the redistribution committee representing other provinces had regarded the redistribution in that light, as regards both Saskatchewan and Quebec, the bill would not have received the unanimous consent it did.

I wish to take very strong exception to one phrase used by the Prime Minister. I believe that on reconsideration he will probably wish to withdraw it. He said if the matter were not settled by consent that no recourse would be left other than that of deciding the matter by brute majority.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said, what has been sometimes described as the brute majority.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Aptly described.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, we here are the minority and hon. gentlemen opposite are the majority. We do not ask for any privileges but for fair play and justice—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —but we do ask for the exercise of those qualities rather than brute force in the settlement of all questions which affect the rights of the people. After all, it is not merely our individual constituencies that are at stake but the representation of the people of Canada in their House of Commons. A more sacred duty does not exist than that which is imposed upon this house at the present time to see that that representation is made as fair and just as it can possibly be made, and if such is possible, that it be arrived at through agreement and fair play as the result of common consent.

I shall be very happy to join with the Prime Minister in naming two or three ex-ministers of the crown from this side to meet with some of his colleagues, if he is agreeable to having that course adopted, and to allowing these gentlemen to see whether they cannot help to work out a joint agreement. I think it ought to be possible to attain such a result for I still believe that a desire for fair play and justice is what is uppermost in the minds of the majority here, irrespective of the parties to which they belong.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): The right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) has directed my attention to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), based on a report in a paper of an address supposed to have been given by the district officer commanding No. 3 military district, upon which article the hon. member based the question whether this government is favourable to conscription in the militia. Let me say very definitely that conscription in the milita is not the policy of Canada nor is it the policy of this government. The department as at present administered is simply carrying out the well known policy of the country which is not conscription.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

To provide for payment to Miss Edith Tillie, of the balance of her subscription to the national service loan, $630.44.

Mr. NEILL: What are the details of this vote?

Mr. RHODES: This is to reimburse Miss Tillie of Edmonton, Alberta, who subscribed for a $1,000 Dominion of Canada four per cent bond, issue of 1932. The subscription was misappropriated by W. Ross Alger of the W. Ross Alger Corporation, Limited, with whom Miss Tillie was transacting this business. He was arrested and imprisoned. The amount of the cheque misappropriated was $936.70 with interest to May 1, 1933, at four per cent, of $21.35, making $958.05. They recovered from Mr. Alger before his arrest $280 and secured from the management committee his share of the commission of $17.61 and they have secured through Mr. Alger since the sum of $30. The Department of Justice has been consulted and has expressed the opinion that Miss Tillie has a legal claim against the government, and it is proposed to pay her this difference which she lost in this manner.

Item agreed to.

Federal District Commission—to provide for maintenance and improvement of properties under the control of the Federal District Commission, $55,000.

Mr. MARCIL: What new work is to be undertaken?

Mr. RHODES: This amount is in addition to the regular appropriation. It will be recalled that the commission has recently taken over the work of attending to the Rideau Hall grounds. The details are as follows:

Maintenance	$10,000
Filling	2,000
New fence	22,800
Improvements	12,000
Research building:
Maintenance of grounds	5,200
Planting	3,000

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they construct any more fences, please have them put up a fence different from that at Government House.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Reverend Doctor D. B. Marsh, $1,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the reason for this vote?

Mr. RHODES: Dr. Marsh is an elderly clergyman who has devoted himself to science, more particularly as it is applied to astronomy. He headed the Hamilton contingent which was able to secure a record of the recent eclipse, I understand the most perfect record of all those obtained. His work is recognized and I hold in my hand a copy of the Illustrated London News which indicates the value of the scientific work performed by that expedition. He did this work gratuitously and is now entirely without funds. It was felt that as this work had brought a certain amount of eminence to Canada it should be recognized in this manner which is comparable to other recognitions which have been made from time to time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to join with the Minister of Finance in saying that I think this recognition is eminently worthy in every way. If there is any fault to be found with the vote, it is that it is much too small.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment from the consolidated revenue fund to Indian trust funds of amount of defalcations of A. H. Lomas, former Indian agent, Cowichan, British Columbia, $15,770.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is this for?

Mr. MURPHY: I think it was in 1929 that this Indian agent was brought up in court for retaining moneys for his own use that belonged to the Indians. Certain timber lands had been surrendered to certain companies in British Columbia and this agent reported that timber was not being cut when as a matter of fact cutting was taking place. The dues paid by the companies to this agent were diverted to his own use instead of being sent to the department. He was apprehended, convicted and sentenced to a prison term. Certain moneys were recovered from the bond company and from amounts owing to him by the department but the amount in the estimates, $15,770, was not recoverable. This amount is being asked for to replenish the Indian trust funds.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payments in connection with additional movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $750,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the Minister of Mines advise if any orders in council have been passed since March 30, the date upon which this matter was dealt with under the main item? I should like to know if any additional orders in council have been passed to provide for subventions, particularly on coal from the maritime provinces?

Mr. GORDON: My recollection is that there have been no new orders in council passed. As the hon. member knows, the moneys required for the payment of subventions under the various orders in council have to be voted yearly and the orders in council that run out have to be renewed. There is possibly one with regard to the extension on railway coal which may have been passed subsequent to that date, but my recollection is that it was passed prior to that date. No others have been passed.

Mr. RALSTON: In view of the way in which this vote is worded, I should like to know whether it is intended to pass any further orders in council to provide for increased subventions? I am referring to increases in the rate per ton on coal moving from the maritime provinces, that is, either water borne, railed or water borne from Sydney to Montreal to be forwarded inland by rail or via the St. Lawrence.

Mr. GORDON: This matter of assistance has been the subject of conferences on a number of occasions between the producers, representatives of the miners and representatives of the government. The orders in council presently obtaining were the result of those conferences. It was stated that the assistance now given would permit coal from Nova Scotia to reach those points westerly which it was deemed by all those concerned would be the farthest point west that could be justified so far as help from the government is concerned. Therefore, it is not now in the contemplation of the government that further assistance by way of increased subventions will be given to the coal industry in Nova Scotia. I feel confident and I am sure the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, with his intimate knowledge of the situation, will agree that if there is any considerable increase in the consumption of coal, the assistance now given will, I believe, take care of the matter perhaps as well as can be done, at least from the standpoint of direct assistance from the government.

Mr. RALSTON: My point is that it seems that only by way of assistance of this kind or some other kind to which I am going to refer in a moment, increased sale or consumption of maritime coal can be effected. I think my hon. friend is putting the cart before the horse when he suggests that if there is increased consumption, the assistance now given will take care of it. On the other hand, it seems that the assistance is needed in order to produce increased consumption or sale.

In that connection may I ask the minister whether there is in contemplation—and perhaps I am entitled to ask the intention of the government in this regard in view of the fact that this is a definite appropriation in connection with coal—any provision respecting the imposition of import licences with regard to United States coal? That has frequently been talked about in the press; rumours have come to us that it has been discussed by the authorities—I presume by the minister—and I want to ask whether that policy is being seriously considered by the government or whether there is any likelihood of such a system being put into force with respect to coal?

Mr. GORDON: During the course of the discussions that took place between me and those interested in the coal industry of Nova Scotia, the question of invoking import licences was gone into at great length. It presents some most difficult problems. My view is that a measure of that kind is not capable of being worked out. I do not think the government would be justified and I do not think the industry would be well served if, having regard to its implications and also the difficulty of administration, such action were taken.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the minister give the committee the amount of money granted by the government to the different provinces last year in connection with this vote?

Mr. GORDON: No moneys were given to the provinces with respect to this vote.

Mr. SPENCER: To the producers of coal?

Mr. GORDON: That information was given at length when the main estimates were under review; it is on Hansard. I have not the figures before me at the moment.

Mr. NEILL: Am I correct in assuming that this appropriation will complete the provision of enough money to take care of all the subventions now in existence to the end of the present fiscal year, and further, that it will not be necessary to pass any orders in council extending any existing ones? The whole thing is complete now for the duration of this fiscal year; is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: Some of the orders in council providing for subventions expired about the end of the last fiscal year. They were renewed. My recollection is that some, probably one or two orders in council, do not expire until some time in the month of June, but they will be renewed in order that the money parliament has already voted and the present appropriation, if parliament votes it, will be available to take care of expenses under all the orders in council.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment, as an honorarium, to His Honour Judge Edmund R. Wylie, for services as royal commissioner in connection with the Estevan mining dispute, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Judges Act, $1,000.

Mr. YOUNG: In connection with the Estevan strike, there is an incident to which I should like to direct the attention of the government. It appears that a woman, a weaver by trade, living in England, was visiting relatives in the Estevan district that summer. On the day of the strike she went into Estevan to consult a doctor. While the rioting was in progress, she was sitting in the doctor's office. It appears that the policemen lost their heads and in firing, as they thought, over the heads of the strikers, they fired through the walls of the building in which the doctor's office was, one of the bullets striking this women in the arm. She was taken to the hospital where she remained for a considerable time. Her friends tried to get compensation for her from the provincial government, but they refused even so much as to pay her hospital bill, claiming that the mounted police were a federal body. Her friends wrote to me and I wrote to the Minister of Justice who replied that the federal authorities had no jurisdiction in the matter, because, although the mounted police were a federal body, they were at the time acting under the instructions of the provincial government. I do not think it is the intention of the people of Canada that their governments should resort to passing the buck in that manner. That is conduct befitting men like Messrs. Dodson and Fogg, but we expect something different from the federal government, and I would ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance whether he would not take the matter into consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: I am frank to say that the details of this matter have been presented to me for the first time in what has just been said by the hon. member for Weyburn. But I believe there is involved in all these matters a principle that has to be settled, and I think members of the house as well as the public generally consider governments should disregard principles because of the hardships of a particular case. The old saying "Hard cases make bad law" is never better exemplified than when pressure is exerted upon a government to pay claims which are not valid, legal claims against it.

The question of the responsibility of the mounted police in a case of the character indicated by the hon. gentleman is not so easily disposed of as by a mere statement of the facts. The province of Saskatchewan pays to the federal government an annual sum, for which this government supplies police force to that province. Saskatchewan has some executive responsibility with respect to the matter, and if the Minister of Justice has advised that at the moment in question the police force was acting under the direction of the provincial authorities, obviously the federal authority is not responsible. The question is one of fact. But I can only say this, that now that the matter has been brought to the attention of the government in the manner in which it has, I shall ask for the papers for the purpose of endeavouring to ascertain just whether any question of fact is at issue. But if one were to establish the precedent of responsibility, I can hardly see where the whole thing would end. I do not think I need remind the hon. gentleman that matters such as this are constantly arising and sometimes governments are charged with having hard hearts because they do not yield to pressure in any particular case. But if they did, then within a short time a hundred cases would arise of claims that would be asserted to be quite as substantial as the one that was acknowledged. This is one of the difficulties connected with the continuity of government and the maintenance of a proper relationship between responsibility and finance. If the financial responsibility is to be entirely disregarded, it follows that payments are made whenever a hard case is created. But if on the other hand a principle is to be adhered to, the payments are made very infrequently and usually in response to an appropriation submitted as an estimate to parliament or a judgment recovered in the exchequer court against the crown. Broadly, the rule has been, I think by most governments recently, especially having regard for the fact that in England it has been decided that the crown can be sued without its being necessary in certain instances to file a petition of right and receive the fiat of the sovereign, that permission to sue has been granted wherever there appears to be, shall I say, the semblance of a valid claim against the crown. I can only repeat that I will myself try to read the file and ascertain whether or not it is a case in which there is any responsibility, and if there is a doubtful case, without endeavouring to involve persons of little property in litigation, we may be able in some way to refer the matter to the decision of a judge for the purpose of having it disposed of. I cannot really state the case better perhaps than by directing attention to what has recently happened. The privy council this week gave judgment in connection with the old Yonge street corner in the city of Toronto. During a short interval when I was Minister of Justice I referred the matter to the exchequer court. Subsequently the judgment of the exchequer court and of the supreme court of Canada went to the privy council and the judgment of the supreme court of Canada was reversed by the privy council last week. There was involved a question of great principle which touched the relations of the crown with the subject. When the incurring of liability is at issue, the question of responsibility for negligence in connection with giving an order to fire is one that has engaged the attention of courts and of parliaments for a long time, the last concrete case heard in England being, as will be recalled, the case at Amritsar in India, where the order to fire was given, improperly it is claimed, resulting in a substantial number of people being killed. The hon. gentleman has anticipated what might be decided when he says that the police lost their heads, and that when the order to fire over the heads of the people was given they fired through the wall. If the wall shot through was higher than the people standing by, obviously the police fired over their heads but not high enough to escape going through the wall.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses of representation at the world economic conference, $15,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item is to provide for representation at the world economic conference. I imagine if the Prime Minister is in a position to make a statement at the moment that the public would be interested in knowing something of the extent of Canada's representation at the world economic conference, and also something of the personnel. I understand that there may be reasons why the Prime Minister cannot give full information but perhaps he will give us as much as he can.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that it is a very modest sum that is being appropriated for this purpose. It is a much lesser sum than was appropriated for the disarmament conference. My own personal views with respect to the world economic conference are that the position of ten millions of people on the northern half of this continent with respect to trade matters is of very considerable importance, and the voice of this country will have considerable influence by reason of the fact that our trading position is that of fifth or sixth among the nations of the world. It is therefore essential that we should have such representation as will enable it to be clearly understood at the conference what our position is. But when you deal with what you might call the purely monetary and financial side of it I need hardly say to any member of this committee that the position of this dominion is not nearly so important because our relative wealth is not very great. That is best illustrated by the position to which I directed attention some time ago, that the half-yearly payment of gold made by Great Britain in December last really amounted to several million dollars more than the entire gold reserves of this country. The fact is that the representation of this country in my judgment will have to be determined in the light of the order in which the problems will be discussed, and I am not in a position to make any statement as to either the personnel or the extent to which this country will be represented because we are in much the same position as are other countries in that regard. The settlement of the order of business will have much to do with the representation that may be necessary.

My own personal view, I say to this committee frankly, is that I should be placed in a position where I could advise Ottawa as to what representation would be required to enable particular business to be dealt with. Once more I am giving my own personal view when I say that no good purpose is served by asking busy ministers to sit around London weeks at a time without being able to have their minds directed to the consideration of the problem with which they wish to deal. I shall endeavour to ascertain the order of business and how it will be taken up, and then by communicating with those who I think are best able to deal with it I shall endeavour to see that adequate representation is afforded to this dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On this item I might as well ask the Prime Minister for information on one other point. The Prime Minister indicated that the government intended to appoint a royal commission to deal with monetary matters. I do not see any item in the estimates for the purposes of that commission and I was wondering whether the matter had been overlooked or whether the government had in mind other means of making the necessary provision.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the right hon. gentleman for directing attention to the matter. It was not thought that any sum that we might think reasonable to put in the estimates would be more than a guess at the moment. We propose to set up the commission, and there are means whereby we can provide for unforeseen contingencies of that character, as the right hon. gentleman knows, and as was done I think in connection with the radio commission. That is in our mind, but it is just possible that the necessity for the payment of any substantial sum of money may not arise until after parliament will again be in session. That is the reason it is not in the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Prime Minister say when the commission will be appointed?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact our present view is that the commission should consist of five members. That seems to be a rather large commission, but it is not so having regard to the necessity of obtaining the services of experienced men outside of this country, possibly to the number of two, together with three Canadians who might represent the practical operations of our banking act, the legislative position—shall I say? —of the country and—shall I say?—the great mass of the public who use credits and who are the customers of banks and are interested in the practical application of theories to the expansion of credits—that would be the third of the three Canadians. That is, practical banking experience; broad general knowledge of the operations of our credit system as relating to banking and currency and what is sometimes euphemistically referred to as the consumer; that is the user of credits and the applicant for credit. We feel that three Canadians should be appointed together with two whom we have not determined upon who should live outside of this country in order that, if possible, a detached view might be obtained in matters of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has not answered the question I directed to him as to the time at which the commission would be appointed. In that connection, may I ask a question which I had intended to ask later, namely whether or not the Prime Minister contemplates the possibility of a fall session. I ask that question now because it relates in part to the possibility of having this commission sit in the interval, and also because hon. members would be glad to know at as early a date as possible if anything in the nature of a fall session is contemplated?

Mr. BENNETT: I have considered the question with my colleagues. We do not feel that we are in a position to make any statement about it, in view of the conference to which attention has just been directed, and to the results which might be obtained therefrom. Legislation might be required, in a given contingency, at as early a date as the late fall of this year. On the other hand that might not be so. Therefore I cannot make any statement that would enlighten the committee, because I have not yet been enlightened myself. I diffuse no light, as I have not yet received it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does the right hon. gentleman say about the commission?

Mr. BENNETT: I had hoped that we would appoint the commission between now, and say, the middle of June. It might be that with respect to discussions as to the personnel of it, in one particular, it would be later than that when they could get to work. Some hon. members of the house know that the vacations in England do not begin until July 31, and it might be that we could secure the services of some eminent authority in that country who would not be unwilling to come to find a change in this country, and the work could be carried on during the months of August and September. That is as far as I can inform the right hon. gentleman at the present time, but the commission will be appointed, we hope, within—well, I was hoping by the middle of June.

Item agreed to.

British and foreign news service, $15,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like an explanation.

Mr. STEVENS: The contract with Reuters expires this year. For a long period of years the contract has been for $32,000. We have thought it desirable to continue the services for another year and we are asking for $15,000.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are Reuters agreeable?

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, before you leave the chair I should like to know if the Minister of Finance can tell us the total of the estimates for the year.

Mr. RHODES: At page 4 of the estimates the right hon. gentleman will find that the total amount was $358,656,488.11. The supplementaries totalled, $2,087,964.56.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did we not have one other supplementary? I refer to the vote for the railways and steamships.

Mr. RHODES: I have not that figure before me.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934, the sum of $174,127,778.15 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 109, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. RHODES moved the third reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before this bill is read the third time, Mr. Speaker, let me say that a moment ago I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if he could give me the total amount of appropriations made by the house this session. If it should be possible to have that information we should be glad to get it.

Mr. RHODES: I think perhaps it would be better for me to give those figures to the right hon. gentleman in the morning and I will tell him why I think so. A portion of this bill is for five-sixths while the supplementaries are in full, and I think I could give the figures more accurately to-morrow if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to delay matters, but I was going to point out to my hon. friend that in view of the size of this year's deficit and the probable deficit next year that I believe, the country must feel that the total estimates for this year show very little in the way of reduction over those for the previous year. Having regard to the amount of additional taxation the government has found it necessary to impose I think the public expected from the administration something more in the way of economy. I do not wish to make a formal motion but I do think the matter is sufficiently important to bring to the attention of the administration in the hope that when they are paying out sums under the estimates that have been appropriated they will see if it is not possible yet to effect some economies which it may be possible to make in the expenditure of these public moneys.

Mr. RHODES: Of course I am debarred from replying to my right hon. friend now, but at the earliest possible opportunity I shall take occasion to do so. Perhaps in just a word I might say that there have been very substantial reductions in controllable expenditures and that any increase or any lack of shrinkage in the total volume is due entirely to expenditures over which we have no control.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house disagrees with their amendment to Bill No. 71, an act to amend the criminal code, for the following reason: Because the deletion of subsection 3 of section 3 of the bill makes the said section ineffective.

And that the clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): What is the change made by the Senate?

Mr. DUPRE: The Senate did not concur in the amendment contained in section 3, which deals with offences against morality and especially the corruption of children. Subsection 3 deals with an irrebuttable presumption; it was carried in this house and deleted in the Senate. I have reason to believe that at present pourparlers are going on with some senators, especially the leader of the Senate and Hon. Mr. Dandurand, as well as with some representatives of societies for the welfare of children, and that very likely some compromise will be arrived at and a new clause enacted which I hope will meet with the approval of this house.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): I have had a certain amount of experience in criminal affairs, and I must say that in deleting this subsection I think the Senate showed more common sense than was shown by this house and conformed to the traditions of British justice as we understand it. Under the bill passed rather hurriedly in this house a man going into his own home while under the influence of liquor, even though it may be without the knowledge of his children, or permitting adultery even without the knowledge of his children, is liable to commitment on being found guilty of this offence. More than that, the onus is on the accused; he is not presumed to be innocent but must prove himself not guilty before the court.

I believe the bill should remain as it has been amended by the Senate; otherwise it will be an absolutely puritanical blue law. In my humble opinion, therefore, I think we should concur in the amendment made by the Senate and I would press the acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Dupré) to do so. I think we should remain faithful to the principle that an accused man is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty, and I do not think we should put on our statute book laws which are not capable of being applied or which, if they are applied, may lead to absolute tyranny.

Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker. Under this bill a man who is in his own house under the influence of liquor, if there are children, is presumed to be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to commitment whether or not they know of his condition, and he must prove himself innocent instead of the crown being compelled to prove him guilty. After my experience with criminal law, which unfortunately has extended over almost thirty years, I think this house should accept the amendment made by the Senate and thank that chamber for having made it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has misstated the case.

The Childrens Aid Societies of Canada have been endeavouring to prevent the corrupting of children's minds in their early days by reason of improper home surroundings. The new subsection 2 of subsection 215 read as follows:

> Every person who, in the home of a child, participates in adultery, or in sexual immorality, or indulges in habitual drunkenness or any other form of vice, thereby endangering the morals of such child or rendering the home of such child an unfit place for such child to be in shall be guilty of an offence and liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year, or to both fine and imprisonment.

I need not say that this subsection in its entirety is not new; it existed before. The words added are, "Participates in adultery or indulges in habitual drunkenness." Drunkenness itself was an offence so far as that section was concerned, but the words now proposed are as I have just quoted. These provisions are intended to render it less easy for the child to have improper conceptions of things early in life. Subsection 3, which the Senate deletes, read:

> It shall be an irrebuttable presumption, in any prosecution under subsection two of this section, that the child was in danger of being or becoming immoral, its morals injuriously affected and its home rendered an unfit place for it to be in, upon proof that the person accused did in fact, in the home of such child, participate in adultery, in sexual immorality, in habitual drunkenness, or in any other form of vice.

All that is new. Now, the irrebuttable presumption was not that of guilt at all. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to read the subsection he would have observed that that is not what the irrebuttable presumption relates to. The irrebuttable presumption in any prosecution would be that the child was in danger of being or becoming immoral by reason of such surroundings as are described. That is, as the law stood previously, to prove drunkenness was not sufficient; it was necessary to prove something else. Now we say that it is an irrebuttable presumption under this subsection that the child was in danger of being or becoming immoral or of having its morals injuriously affected if the home conditions were as I have indicated. The Senate struck out that subsection. There is a medium course that has been suggested and I believe the Senate will probably accept it. The minister is therefore moving that the statute be sent back to the Senate for that purpose.

[Mr. LaVergne.]

I may say that the Childrens Aid Societies of the country have been most active in connection with this matter, and this morning I received a telegram from a representative of the Childrens Aid Society, pointing out that if this subsection were deleted the legislation sought would be destroyed. While it may be puritanical to say that it is an irrebuttable presumption that the child is in danger of having its morals corrupted by reason of improper surroundings, that has nothing to do with the question of guilt or innocence. The guilt or innocence of the accused must be settled by proving in the first place, let us say, habitual drunkenness. That must be proven as a fact, but if you prove drunkenness there is an irrebuttable presumption that such a condition in the home is injurious to the morals of the child. I believe the Senate will now appreciate the fact that it was not an endeavour to determine the guilt and have innocence proven, but rather to determine the conditions that do exist; and having proven that there exist conditions which are detrimental to the interests of the child, that is a matter of irrebuttable presumption which is nothing more or less than what has been in the criminal code for centuries and will continue to be there. In other words, as a matter of law, certain inferences flow from the establishment of certain facts, and the proof of the facts rests with those who assert them, the onus probandi being on those who represent the prosecution; and when they prove the facts, then that is an irrebuttable presumption that the child is in surroundings which are inimical to its moral wellbeing.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

PURCHASE OF STATIONS—APPOINTMENTS TO STAFF

The house resumed from Thursday, May 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 99, to amend The Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932—Mr. Bennett—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): May I say to the committee at once that since we were last in session I have had the Civil Service Commission and Mr. Gladstone Murray endeavour to draft an amendment which would meet the situation in every detail, that is, to preserve the rights of the commission on the one hand and on the other to ensure efficiency. I am bound to say that I find to-day that they have not been able to arrive at any form of words which they consider adequate, so I propose, with the consent of the committee, to add the following words in order to remove all possible doubts as to there being an infringement of the rights of the commission, in view of what was said the other day:

Provided that the contracts of service of such persons shall expire on the 31st day of March, 1934.

This is a temporary provision to ascertain how the act works out and it will only last until 1934; on March 31, the end of this fiscal year, all persons employed under that section will have to be re-employed unless the law is amended under the civil service statute. They will have no position under this statute. What I said the other day has perhaps been extended a bit by some of our friends. When I said I proposed to set up the committee it was not to go over the whole radio question again—I regard that as settled—but rather for the purpose of ascertaining how the working of the statute which is now accepted as law could be improved upon in the light of the experience thus gained. This subsection, with the amendment I propose, would enable to be made only such appointments as will terminate on March 31, 1934, so that the creation of vested rights and interests, I humbly submit, could not arise.

In connection with appointments to the public service, my observation is that there should be a longer period of probation if possible, because I do not regard any system as infallible. It would be unfair to determine who were the best public servants, but I think a period of probation is very desirable, and all such persons, in the light of the experience that had been acquired, would be able to apply for positions and be dealt with in the manner thought best.

In section 14 I propose to add, in view of the criticism made the other evening, a few words which I think will be helpful. The new section 14 would read:

(1) The commission may expend for the purposes of this act the moneys appropriated by parliament for such purposes, together with such sums of money as may be received by the commission from any business carried on by it under this act.

(2) The moneys appropriated by parliament for such purposes shall not exceed the estimated revenue from receiving licences, private commercial broadcasting licences and amateur broadcasting licences:

Provided that if at the end of the fiscal year there is a balance of appropriated moneys unexpended, or if the revenue from the sources mentioned in this subsection exceeds the amount appropriated, parliament may appropriate any such balance and excess in addition to any appropriation provided hereunder.

(3) The commission shall present to the Minister of Finance an annual estimate of the expenditure proposed to be made by it during the fiscal year and the Minister of Finance shall from time to time pay into a chartered bank to the credit of the commission the moneys appropriated by parliament for the purposes of the commission.

From what I have been able to ascertain I think it is highly desirable that there should be a budget prepared by the commission to be submitted to the Minister of Finance in order that the payments made out of appropriations might bear a proper relation to the appropriations made by parliament and the moneys collected from licence fees. I regard this as being purely a temporary effort to bridge existing difficulties in the operation of the commission. I was somewhat astonished at the exent of the condemnation of the commission to which I listened the other evening and I only hope that the committee will accept this as an effort temporarily to meet a situation between now and the end of the fiscal year. My present intention is to ask the same committee, providing the members are all living, which sat before, to deal with this matter and investigate, not the principle because that was settled by the last report which was embodied in this legislation, but the operation of that legislation in the light of the facts as disclosed by the experience of the commission since it has been in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the first portion of my right hon. friend's remarks, that he purposes limiting this measure to March, 1934, I would point out that that does not meet our objection, an objection which I think is shared by the public at large, to having all officers, clerks and employees of the radio commission appointed by the commission itself and given such salaries as the commission itself may determine. So far as technical officers, professional employees, artists and the like are concerned, I think it is perfectly reasonable of the government to ask that the commission be given latitude and that they should not be restricted in the selections which they make or possibly in the salaries and payments to these persons.

The CHAIRMAN: I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that clause one has been allowed to stand and we are now on clause two.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought that all clauses were open to discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister discussed these matters and I thought I would have the same latitude in replying.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the purpose was to discuss all clauses.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to ordinary employees and clerks and the like, I cannot see any reason why those who come into the radio service should not be appointed in the same manner as those who come into the service of any other commission appointed by the government or even those who come into the public service generally. The Prime Minister has said that it is desirable to have a period of probation but he knows that there is a period of probation with civil service appointments.

Mr. BENNETT: Six months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Something like six months. During this period those who are not satisfactory may be rejected. I suggest that this section be amended by striking out the words "and other officers, clerks, and employees." The section would then read:

> The commission may employ such technical and professional officers as the commission may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the commission.

I think that would give the commission all the latitude it would need with respect to the classes that are at all likely to require special consideration. My right hon. friend knows that once a person is appointed to the public service he ought to have the right to assume that his appointment is going to remain permanent.

Mr. BENNETT: This is to remove that idea in this particular clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will not remove it. My right hon. friend has stressed, and I do not think it can be stressed too strongly, the necessity of public confidence in this radio commission. In this connection I intend to speak very plainly. Here is a commission which has been appointed by a Conservative government, every individual member of the commission is a Conservative appointee. It is proposed to give to these Conservative appointees the right to make all other appointments under the commission, even down to the clerks, stenographers and the like. They are to be given the right not only to appoint but to determine the salaries to be paid. That will simply serve to create a great Conservative political machine. It cannot be called by any other name. I cannot see how it can be expected that public confidence will be thereby established in the radio commission. If the government wished to take means to destroy confidence in this commission as an impartial body, they could not have gone about it in a more effective way. If the commissioners had been appointed as the result of a conference between the different parties of the house, or if there were on that commission representatives of the different parties, it might be a different matter, but hon. gentlemen opposite will not deny that all the commissioners are well known members of the Conservative party.

Mr. BENNETT: I deny that with respect to Colonel Steel.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One of them was a former organizer of the party and I submit it is most unfair to give a body of that character the right to make all appointments and to control the whole radio broadcasting situation in Canada. I have seen some of the regulations already put out by the commission and they go the length of stating that the commission can suppress opinions on legislation passed by this parliament. What opportunity under such conditions is any party other than the Conservative party to have where radio broadcasting is concerned? It would be impossible to conceive of a more deliberate partisan act than that of giving to this commission the power to make all appointments. I ask the Prime Minister to consider the eliminating of these minor appointments from the control of the radio commission. He knows as well as I or any other hon. member that in ordinary administrative work there is nothing to distinguish what is to be performed under the radio broadcasting commission from that which is performed under any other commission. There is another reason why the Prime Minister, in particular, might well be disposed to give favourable consideration to this proposal. The Civil Service Commission as it is now and will be constituted is a body made up entirely of appointees of my right hon. friend and not appointees chosen jointly by both sides of the house.

Under the different measures which have been introduced by the government we are having set up in this country a number of what might be described as irresponsible bodies. They are not responsible to anybody. They are called commissions, board of trustees or something of the kind, and they are given all the powers that might be given to governments with respect to the particular field over which they operate. The Conservative government is to appoint trustees for the Canadian National Railways. These trustees are to have to do with the expenditure of millions of dollars and the employment of hundreds of thousands of persons. They are to be given full control of the entire national railway service of the country. There is not a Liberal or a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation representative upon any of these bodies as they are constituted at the moment or as they are likely to be constituted. This radio broadcasting commission is being made into a sort of Conservative soviet and the same thing is happening with respect to the Civil Service Commission. What is government coming to in the country? Surely the minority is entitled to some consideration even at the hands of a majority such as that possessed by the government and its supporters. I think the government's action is most unfair and I believe it will be strongly resented by the people of this country.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say as I do not want to delay the committee. However, I think it is my duty to support the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition. I think, by the amendments that are proposed in this bill, we are giving too wide powers to this commission. The commission has already been working for some time and I think I am expressing the opinion of many, if not the majority of the people of this country when I say that the commission has not lived up to what the people expected of it. I have no confidence in the commission and to give it the new powers that are intended to be given by this bill would make it impossible to secure the results we expected from the creation of a radio commission such as was proposed by the committee that investigated and reported on radio broadcasting. For that reason I am opposed to the bill and shall vote against it.

Mr. SPENCE: I have lived in Toronto for forty-five years. The leader of the Liberal party has stated that this is a partisan commission. May I say to him and to the committee that I have been associated with the Conservative party during all the time I have lived in Toronto; for the last good many years I have been in the inner circle and Mr. Charlesworth was never known as a Conservative in my city. He was associated with an old Liberal family and married into one. He was never in the inner circle of the Conservative party and not regarded as a Conservative. Of course he might have voted Conservative at some time or another. What is the use of casting it up all the time that this is a commission composed of Conservatives, when it is not? As a matter of fact, I was not pleased with the appointment of Mr. Charlesworth because I thought a really good Tory should have been appointed.

Mr. GRAY: Before this bill passes I want to say just a word with respect to clause one which amends the Radio Broadcasting Act and takes away from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission the matter of appointments. During the debates of Wednesday and Thursday of last week, when the Minister of Marine and the Prime Minister were speaking, they certainly gave to the house and the country the impression that the reason for this change was the recommendation of Mr. Gladstone Murray, director of broadcasting, brought over from England. Certainly the impression given to the house and the country by those hon. gentlemen was that this reputable director brought into Canada at the request of the government had stated that it was necessary to make this change, and therefore the government were falling in line in introducing this legislation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I desire to correct my hon. friend in that respect. I stated very clearly to the house that since the commission had been in office, they noticed that they were handicapped in the performance of their duties by the existing law and this is why we are coming before the house with these amendments. They were approved by Major Gladstone Murray.

Mr. GRAY: I am speaking with respect to this one matter in particular. I have read my hon. friend's speech and I cannot find that he mentioned this particular item and it is specifically mentioned in the interim report of Mr. Gladstone Murray. As early as November, 1932, the chairman of the radio broadcasting commission wrote to the Civil Service Commission asking for the appointment of a director of publicity and a director of programs. I am not going to take the trouble to read the correspondence, but I shall quote a sentence or two. The chairman states:

> In connection with the organization of the work of the radio broadcasting commission, it is becoming urgently important that the services of a director of publicity be secured as well as a director of programs. I have discussed the matter with the Prime Minister, who assures me that the question is being taken up of an amendment to the act, whereby these and other important key positions on the staff of the commission may be exempted from the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

He then goes on to recommend that Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Weir be appointed at salaries of $6,500 per annum, and I shall have a word to say on that before I sit down. Nothing came of that and the next letter of interest is one of February 22, from the secretary of the Civil Service Commission to Mr. Charlesworth in reply to a letter of the latter again referring to the appointment of Mr. Buchanan. The secretary states in this letter that if they are going to make this a permanent position, they might just as well advertise now for a director of public relations rather than give him a temporary appointment of three months as they were able to do under section 40 of the Civil Service Act. He states quite frankly that the Civil Service Commission have no intention of certifying to such appointment, unless Mr. Charlesworth can give them assurance that the act is to be amended. This was all before Mr. Murray was ever in the country and certainly before he made any report to the government.

Then comes a very significant letter from Mr. Charlesworth to Mr. Foran, secretary of the Civil Service Commission, under date of February 23, 1933, as follows:

> I have yours of February 22 relative to our request for the appointment of Mr. E. C. Buchanan as director of public relations.
> I beg to advise you that last evening we received personal assurance from the Prime Minister that an amendment to the Radio Broadcasting Act would be submitted before the close of the session covering this as well as other matters. In accordance with the terms of your letter, I therefore ask that the certificate be issued for Mr. Buchanan as from February 15th.

That, I submit, proves conclusively that it was not Mr. Murray's recommendation that decided the course, but that the government had decided that they would amend the act long before Mr. Murray took any interest whatever in Canadian radio broadcasting.

May I say further that the danger of giving to this commission the power of making these appointments is pointed out fully in this correspondence in which they recommend that Mr. Buchanan—and I am not going into a discussion of his qualifications as a director of public relations—shall be appointed at a salary of $6,500. I am told that as regards directors of publicity in other departments, the salary of the highest paid official is around $4,000. Therefore this government, which under section 40 of the act is allowed, in making temporary appointments, to fix the salary, and which has been generous to its appointees in the way of salaries, did not feel that he was qualified to receive that salary and they fixed one of $5,800 less 10 per cent. That, along with other dangers, is one of the reasons I am opposed to giving to this commission the power of making appointments of this kind.

Before I sit down, may I refer to just one other matter and that is that we now have printed by this commission 108 rules and regulations covering the broadcasting system, and I wish to direct the attention of the committee in particular to rule No. 9, as follows:

> No broadcasting station may broadcast any speech, printed matter, program or advertising matter containing abusive or defamatory statements with regard to individuals or institutions or statements or suggestions contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation; as for example, the Patent Medicine Act or any regulations promulgated thereunder.

I would like hon. members to take the rules and regulations as printed by the commission and read them one by one. If they do I think they will all agree with me that we are on our way, but where no one knows.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the minister give me some information with regard to section 14 of the act? At the present time are the accounts covering the expenditure incurred by the commission paid through the regular machinery of the Department of Marine, that is through their accountant, after they are audited by the departmental auditor and approved by the deputy minister?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand the accounts of the radio broadcasting commission are paid through the Finance department.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then they are not paid through the Department of Marine?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is a rather peculiar situation. The Department of Marine receives all the money that is paid for licence fees. After that, by law it is compelled to credit that money to the receiver general, so that it forms part and parcel of the consolidated revenue fund. Then the minister is asked to vote a yearly sum of money not to exceed the revenue received from the collection of these fees. Then it becomes a departmental estimate, and I am rather surprised that the accounts submitted for expenses incurred through the radio commission are not paid through the Department of Marine. Is the minister sure that these accounts are paid on the direct approval of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under the law as it exists at the present time the radio commission has to deal with the minister, and not with the department. It is an independent commission—

Sir EUGENE FISET: I know that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —and the moneys collected by the Department of Marine from radio licences are deposited with the receiver general. Then when these moneys are released by a vote of the house the bills of the radio commission are paid, and that is controlled by the Finance department and the auditor general.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister is sure of that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to say a word in support of the hon. member for West Lambton. I wish he had read a few paragraphs further on. It shows that the radio commission have taken power and have issued instructions that: no broadcast shall . . . issue statements or suggestions contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation. Under that regulation it will be almost impossible for anyone to criticize over the radio at election time the actions of the government because that is legislation, but the government will be able to criticize the actions of the opposition because that is not legislation. Here is another regulation:

> The commission reserves the right to prohibit the broadcasting of any matter until the continuity or record or transcription or both have been submitted to the commission for examination and have been approved by them.

I presume that the commission sits in Montreal or Toronto, and if a man out in British Columbia suddenly has occasion or the urge during election time to express his sentiments over the radio he has to have them all written out—I do not suppose it could be done by wire because it would be too expensive—and he must submit them to the radio commission, and when they approve of his statement he will be allowed to go ahead and broadcast it. There are great possibilities there of discrimination. Then here is rule 93:

> The licensee shall file with the commission weekly in advance copy of the daily program schedule in such form as may be specified by the commission.

It is to be filed weekly in advance, by a man perhaps three thousand miles away. That rule could be used—I do not say that it will be, but the Scripture says, Avoid the appearance of evil—to discriminate against certain associations or bodies or individuals.

Mr. COOTE: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. NEILL: From the rules and regulations of the Canadian radio broadcasting commission issued on April 15, 1933, P.C. 535. I agree with the hon. member for West Lambton, who invited the members of the house to read these rules, because the more you read them the less you will think of them. I also endorse the remarks made by the leader of the opposition in connection with the proposal to engage the employees of the radio commission for the period of only about nine months until the thirty-first of March next. On the face of it that seems all right, but if the radio commission and the Civil Service Commission cannot in a few days formulate a paragraph that would differentiate between those officials properly coming under the radio commission, such as professional and technical employees, and the ordinary employees who should come under the Civil Service Commission, they will not be able to do it at the end of nine months, and this will be the situation. At the end of nine months what chance will there be of turning these employees out? They will have a wife and eight children by that time and will be a pathetic proposition. Then there will be this further consideration. Unless they are absolute dubs, after nine months' experience of the work, which has to be learned for the first time, when they come before the Civil Service Commission for examination they will have to compete with men who know nothing whatever about the work and the Civil Service Commission will almost invariably give the positions to the men who have had experience. It is almost their duty to do so. One has had experience, and the other not.

In conclusion, I regret very much that I am not in the position of the hon. member for Weyburn, to be able to boast, as he rightly does that he voted against the radio commission. I wish I had voted against it because the way it is developing it is going to be a curse to Canada, a curse to the people, and a curse to the government, a curse in the sense of being a source of perpetual annoyance and trouble. It will be another C.N.R. on a small scale. The minister told us some weeks ago that he was not sure whether he controlled the radio commission or the radio commission controlled him. There seems to be a doubt about it just as we hear the Minister of Railways say, "I cannot answer that question. I am not responsible. It is the railway commission." I regret very much that we adopted this system. Both sides of the house claim to be in favour of public ownership and then we shirk our responsibilities and turn them over to a commission which has apparently far more power than the government and is responsible neither to God nor man so far as I can see. You will find that its expenses will increase. It will be such a ready source of increasing its revenue that the radio commission will say to the people, "The licence fee is now only two dollars. You surely would not begrudge three dollars now you are getting such beautiful programs." We have not heard the beautiful programs yet, but I agree that the commission must be given time to get into harness. There is, however, going to be perpetual trouble, and the licence fee will be increased, with more and more dissatisfaction on the part of the public. When the public are dissatisfied now they can, or they used to be able to, switch to another program. But now that this radio commission is in force they will sit down and write to the government or to their member expressing their dissatisfaction, and every mother will want the hour of the bedtime story changed to suit little Jimmie's convenience. They will make complaints that they never would make to a private corporation. It is bound to lead to endless trouble, and to judge from the personnel of the commission we are more than asking for trouble.

Mr. POWER: I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend from West Lambton and my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni. I have before me the rules and regulations of the Canadian radio broadcasting commission, National Research Building, Ottawa, April 1, 1933, and at page 17 in part V, dealing with the control of programs, I find that paragraph 90 reads:

No broadcasting station may broadcast any speech, printed matter, program or advertising matter containing abusive or defamatory statements with regard to individuals or institutions—

With that I have no complaint:

—or statements or suggestions contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation; as for example, the Patent Medicine Act or any regulations promulgated thereunder.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is competent for any one of us to criticize the Patent Medicine act or the Pure Foods act or the Hoof and Mouth Disease act or the Hay and Straw act or any other act, but if we do that, forsooth, Mr. Charlesworth will prevent the station from allowing us to broadcast. I think the slightest consideration on the part of members of this committee will lead them to the conclusion that whoever drafted these regulations was not gifted with sufficient discretion to understand what he was doing. Take paragraph 91, for instance:

Could there be any more strict censorship applied anywhere in the world? No one of my hon. friends opposite could make a speech in favour of the child welfare league, the social service league, the sons of temperance, the daughters of sin, or anything of that kind, without going to the radio broadcasting commission and asking Mr. Charlesworth kindly to peruse the full transcription of the language he was about to broadcast in support of any laudable movement. And here I believe they are infringing upon the ordinary laws of the land. Paragraph 95 is as follows:

Licensees broadcasting sustaining programs originating outside Canada shall, when requested by the commission, give priority to programs originating within Canada.

To that I have no very great objection. But listen to paragraph 96:

The licensees shall, upon the request of the commission, give right-of-way to such programs as in the judgment of the commission are of national interest.

And then:

In such event—

That is, where they give the right of way at the request of the commission.

—neither the licensee nor the commission shall incur any liability for compensation or damages.

That is to say, the licensee may have a contract with certain parties. Along comes the commission and states: "We think that such and such a broadcast is in the national interest; you have to abandon your contract." I ask hon. members of the legal persuasion if we are to confer upon this commission the right to give judgment concerning contracts. It seems to me that had the commission had a little more ordinary common sense they would not have drawn up such rules with regard to broadcasting. In that connection perhaps I shall have to differ from many hon. members on this side of the house by stating that I do not believe Mr. Thomas Maher, against whose appointment I have not a word to say—because he was a good politician and deserved recognition by his party—had anything to do with these regulations. He would have had too much political sense to have spread this sort of thing throughout the country. I do suggest that perhaps it is the so-called non-partisan member of the commission, a military man with the air of a martinet, who is endeavouring to dragoon the Canadian people into obedience to a commission which should never have been set up.

Mr. GAGNON: I do not wish to quarrel with the hon. member for Quebec South concerning his criticism of the regulations which have just been put into force. As a matter of fact they have not been in operation for more than fifteen days, and so far I have not read a single serious criticism of them.

Mr. YOUNG: You are hearing it now.

Mr. GAGNON: Those regulations will be in operation. As the Prime Minister has said, a special committee will be formed to study the operation of radio broadcasting in Canada, and at that time we will be in a better position to judge whether or not the regulations are in the public interest. May I quote an article which was published in the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph on April 6, of this year? As the hon. member for Quebec South must know, that newspaper is no longer a Conservative paper, but is Liberal.

Mr. POWER: I am not discussing that matter.

Mr. GAGNON: This article has been written with respect to the radio regulations:

Stand By Radio Regulation

An attempt is being made by American broadcasting interests to persuade the Canadian Radio commission to relax its five per cent advertising rule in connection with programs, by permitting an indefinite additional percentage of indirect or veiled publicity.

The commission should stand firmly by its rule and we believe that it has the necessary backbone to do so. The public doesn't want all the ballyhoo and vapid puffery that has been imposed upon it over the air in the past and would applaud if not merely ninety-five, but the whole one hundred per cent of each program were cultural or recreational.

But apart from this, an inefficient intrusion upon the newspaper's special field of revenue has forced the latter to discontinue its co-operation in the popularizing of radio as a great social asset.

Inveterate listeners-in sometimes complain because the newspaper does not publish programs for their convenience. But this is rather too much to expect when it is recalled that that program is a direct competitor of the newspaper's advertising columns and also includes, in not a few instances, information "pirated" from its news columns.

If and when, radio abandons its economic trespassing upon the newspaper, to which it owed so much in the days of its commercial infancy and to which it has made such poor returns, publishers will doubtless be glad to supply their readers, who are also listeners-in, with day-by-day information as to programs, special features and so forth.

Meanwhile, Canada has rightly determined to keep commercialism under full control and we venture to predict that the day will yet come when the United States will be glad to follow the Canadian example, as it has done before now, in other instances.

I shall not quote from Conservative newspapers, but shall quote expressions of praise from Liberal newspapers such as the Winnipeg Free Press and the Halifax Chronicle. In its edition of April 27, the Winnipeg Free Press contains the following—

Mr. MARCIL: I rise to a point of order. Are we to have inflicted upon us opinions from every newspaper in Canada? Is that regular?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I believe a decision has been given concerning that point.

The CHAIRMAN: An article commenting on the debate before the committee is out of order; I think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There was a decision of this house to that effect.

Mr. GAGNON: The articles I should like to read do not reflect upon the present legislation. However, I shall not read the articles, if it is the wish of the committee that I should not. I shall be content with saying that I have here some articles appearing in the Halifax Chronicle and the Winnipeg Free Press. I urge the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to read the Free Press of April 27, and also the St. Thomas Times-Journal, an independent newspaper.

Mr. NEILL: Must I do so?

Mr. GAGNON: Then I have an article from the Winnipeg Tribune and another from the Edmonton Journal, both of which are independent, and express approval of the commission. I beg to differ with the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni concerning programs. He, and the whip of the Liberal party, have stated that since the commission has been functioning no good programs have been broadcast. I may have misunderstood the hon. members, but I believe they said something to that effect.

Mr. NEILL: I said I had not heard them yet.

Mr. GAGNON: It is unfortunate the hon. member has not heard them, because the majority of people in Canada state that for two months wonderful programs have been broadcast throughout the dominion. I have before me a great number of telegrams and letters which have been sent to the commission commending the programs. I do not know if upon attempting to read them I shall be called to order. At all events I might attempt to quote until objection is taken.

Mr. POWER: May I ask a question? How does it happen that the hon. member has all these telegrams addressed to the commission? Is the hon. member the representative of the commission in the House of Commons?

Mr. GAGNON: I take an interest in the work of the commission. I may be wrong but I thought that before criticizing the commission one member at least should try to acquaint himself with their work. Therefore I asked the commission kindly to give me some of the expressions of opinion they had received with respect to their programs, because I think it essential that hon. members should give the commission a fair deal before trying to discredit it in a most unfair way, as has been the case ever since this bill has been before the house.

Mr. POWER: Too bad the minister did not get that information.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GAGNON: Certainly.

Mr. MARCIL: If the hon. gentleman is so interested in the commission why does he not suggest to them that copies of their new regulations be sent to every member of the house so that we may be able to see what is being done.

Mr. GAGNON: I do not see any copies of those regulations in the hands of Conservative members of this house; apparently hon. gentlemen opposite have good friends on the commission. I have never read these regulations and my hon. friend from East Essex was obliged to borrow the copy of the hon. member for West Lambton. I do not think the Liberal members of this house are being treated unfairly by the commission, since they have been able to obtain copies. At all events, Mr. Chairman, I think when my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay said a moment ago that no good programs had been broadcast so far, he made an absolutely unfair, unjust and unfounded criticism of the work of the commission. I have here a letter which was written by the Wentworth Radio Broadcasting Company, Limited, of Hamilton, Ontario.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: To whom is that letter addressed?

Mr. GAGNON: It is addressed to the Canadian radio broadcasting commission, Ottawa, and if my hon. friend wishes he may have a copy.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask how the hon. member came into possession of this letter?

The CHAIRMAN: I should rule that since this is a letter addressed to the Canadian radio commission it should be laid on the table. I understand that the hon. member is about to read a letter addressed to the radio commission; therefore it is a public document, and after the hon. member has read it he must lay it on the table.

Mr. GAGNON: I am going to read it.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that it is a public document of which the house had no knowledge until the hon. member referred to it. Therefore after the hon. member reads it the letter must be deposited with the clerk of the house.

Mr. GAGNON: If that is your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I shall do so with pleasure.

Mr. MARCIL: If any public document is to be submitted in this house it should be laid on the table by the minister in charge of the department and not by a private member.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Surely the hon. gentleman is not in order in bringing the archives of the commission into the chamber.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman has a public document; I think he has a right to read it, but later it must be deposited with the clerk of the house.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that the original?

Mr. GAGNON: I have here a document; I am not sure whether it is a letter or a telegram, but it is from Moose Jaw under date of April 28, 1933. It is addressed to Mr. Hector Charlesworth and reads as follows:

> Please accept our sincerest congratulations on the French program, which we had the pleasure of handling for the commission at this point last evening.

Mr. CASGRAIN: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if this procedure is regular. Here we have a minister of the crown who says he is in charge of the operations of this new commission and who is supposed to represent that commission in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the point of order?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am coming to it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman cannot interrupt another hon. member to make a speech; he must state his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is coming to his point of order.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The hon. gentleman is reading some letters apparently addressed to the commission. I think the procedure is not in order; this hon. gentleman is not a member of the commission and he is not in charge of the affairs of the department. I would ask whether the hon. member has the right to have these documents in his possession and to read them in this house. Surely they should have been tabled or read to the house by the minister in charge.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not for me to decide whether the hon. gentleman is rightfully in possession of these documents. He has them in his possession, but I must decide that since these are public documents, prima facie at least, they must be tabled.

Mr. GAGNON: I shall not insist because I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee, but it seems to me the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has taken a most amazing position. When I was reading a letter with respect to the broadcasting of a French program the hon. gentleman hastened to stop me, as though I were dealing with something contrary to the public interest. It is well known that the radio might be used in Canada in order to improve the relations existing between the two great races in this country. I may tell my hon. friend that if he is as curious as I have been with regard to the operation of the commission he can go to the chairman or the vice-chairman, who is a well known friend of his, and they will be very pleased to give him all the information available and to show him all the telegrams and letters they have received with regard to the programs broadcast so far. I have only attempted to quote some telegrams and letters in order to show that those who have stated in this house that as yet the commission have not broadcast good programs have been saying something contrary to the truth and not in the public interest.

Mr. POWER: I have not been discussing the question of whether the programs have been good, bad or indifferent; I have not listened to them, so I do not know. I do object to the power placed in the hands of this commission, or to the power assumed by them. What right have these three appointees of hon. gentlemen opposite, however good they may be, to censor every word that may be said over the radio in Canada? What right have they to ask, under any circumstances, that if we wish to address the public we must supply them with a transcription of our remarks before we may speak?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the regulations say. Will the hon. gentleman read them?

Mr. POWER: I always bow to the opinion of the right hon. Prime Minister. Paragraph 91 states:

The commission reserves the right—

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. It is reserved but they have not exercised it.

Mr. POWER: Surely the right hon. leader of the government is not trying to make a point there. I object to giving them the right to exercise that power, and the Prime Minister knows that is what I mean. I do not care whether or not they exercise it. I would not give the right hon. gentleman the right to do that if I had power to do so. Unfortunately he has sometimes tried to do it in the house, but there is such a thing as free speech in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: You are the last man to talk.

Mr. POWER: I do not care whether I am the last or the first; I shall talk as long as I like.

Mr. BENNETT: I think you should be the last man to talk.

Mr. POWER: I do not know why I should not talk; If the Prime Minister knows any reason let him get up and say so.

Mr. BENNETT: I am referring to the personal observations made by the hon. gentleman, and I say he should be the last man to discuss them.

Mr. POWER: If, having said so much, the right hon. gentleman wishes to say any more I should be glad to listen to him. There is no reason in the world why I should not stand in my place here and make whatever speeches I wish, provided they are within the the rules of this house. When I make such speeches as I am making to-day, in keeping with the principles which I support and which he himself, I am sure, would support if he were on this side, I resent very much any implication on the part of the right hon. gentleman to the effect that I have not the right to speak as much as any other member of this house. If he has any reason for suggesting that I have not that right I challenge him now to state it.

Mr. BENNETT: I said, it depends on what the hon. member is talking about, his personal observations. That was what I said.

Mr. POWER: It depends on what I am talking about? I suppose if I am praising the government it is all right.

Mr. BENNETT: When the hon. gentleman drags into the debate personal observations and makes personal attacks, as he has often done, I say he is the last man that should do it—the very last man.

Mr. POWER: So that is the reason? My right hon. friend objects to my protesting against censorship because forsooth on some occasions I have spoken in a manner displeasing to him. Well, that is one of the reasons perhaps that I do object to censorship. If every time I say something that does not please the right hon. gentleman or his friends I am to be prohibited from speaking, I have the right as a citizen of this country to protest, and I do protest and will continue to protest so long as regulations such as these are included among those issued by the commission.

Mr. MacINNIS: When this bill was last before the house I pointed out my objection to the amendment with respect to the removal from the Civil Service Commission of appointments to the radio broadcasting commission. By the radio broadcasting act of 1932, provision was made for appointments to the radio commission through the Civil Service Commission, but now it seems that instead of obtaining their staff through the Civil Service Commission the radio commission simply go to that body and say, "We want this particular individual with such and such qualifications," giving his name and designation and asking the Civil Service Commission to O.K. that particular appointment. That being refused by the Civil Service Commission, they went to the Prime Minister and suggested that he take away from the Civil Service Commission the power of making appointments. This is what I particularly object to, and certainly the amendment will not pass by my vote until that is remedied. All those employees that can be appointed by the Civil Service Commission should be selected by that commission rather than by the radio commission. I do admit that there are certain persons, artists, who might properly be appointed by the radio commission, and such appointments should be left to them. Now the whole question of administration by the commission is under review, and the more we discuss it the more apparent it becomes that there is something radically wrong with the commission. In view of the rules and regulations that have been adopted I think the whole question should be very seriously considered at the present time, and we should determine just how far we will allow this tendency to go. It is just possible that the radio commission will be the first to put into effect the policy of the iron heel which we heard about last year, and we might as well have the fight now as at any other time.

Mr. MORAND: One thing that has been discussed, something that is very serious, should be settled and that is the question whether the commission shall have the right of censorship or not. I am rather surprised that members of this house should suggest that any one, at any time or place, may say just what he pleases over the air. I do not think that such a thing is permitted anywhere; it is not permitted in the United States nor in Great Britain, and surely the House of Commons will not constitute itself a board of censors. The commission must have the right of censorship, and if after a given period their judgment should prove to have been at fault, then certainly parliament would have the right to ask for their dismissal. But, I repeat, they must be given the right of censorship, for I do not see how broadcasting could continue under a system whereby everyone could say over the air whatever he pleased, no matter how offensive. I have only this minute seen the regulations, but section 90 provides:

No broadcasting station may broadcast any speech, printed matter, program or advertising matter containing abusive or defamatory statements with regard to individuals or institutions,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. MORAND: Well, how will you stop that without censorship?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the rest.

Mr. MORAND:

—or statements or suggestions contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation; . . .

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is wrong.

Mr. MORAND: I wonder whether my hon. friends have listened during the last two and a half or three years to the patent medicine quackery put over the radio in contravention of the Patent Medicine Act. People have taken advantage of the fact that they are able to say over the radio what they cannot print legally, and that is why this regulation has been put in. I would point out that similar regulations appear in every broadcasting act I have read, and they are necessary if radio broadcasting is to be properly carried on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend refers to people saying over the radio things they are prohibited by law from saying. I say, make any prohibitions you like, but make them by law and have them enforced. But that is not what that says; that is what it may mean but it is not what it says. Under that section the commission has power to control the political utterances of members of this house. It does not say so but that is the effect.

Mr. MORAND: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the effect of it.

Mr. MARCIL: Would anything in these regulations prevent a member of this house from addressing his constituents? Must a member submit his speech to the commission before he delivers it? I ask that question because we have not seen the regulations. That is the unfortunate part of it, and I would ask my hon. friend, who is well versed in the matter, to answer that question plainly. Is any member of this house allowed to say over the radio what his political views are without first submitting his speech to the members of the commission?

Mr. MORAND: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman read any regulation to that effect.

Mr. MORAND: My hon. friend can read the regulations as well as I can.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We haven't got a copy.

Mr. MORAND: There is nothing in the regulations to prevent any man from expressing his political views, but where a man abuses the privilege the commission has a right to demand a submission of his text before he delivers it. That has been done in Great Britain. Lloyd George, I know, was asked to do so, and so were others, able men and equally important. They have been asked for a copy of their speeches whenever it has been thought necessary. It is nothing new.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend suggest that a man of the standing of Lloyd George would be asked by a commission for a copy of his speech before he delivered it?

Mr. MORAND: He was asked.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If that is true we do not want it in Canada—absolutely not. I think we are handing over to this commission, if that is true, a power they should not have. The idea of asking a man of Lloyd George's standing to submit his speeches to censorship before he delivers them! Or asking the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) or the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) to submit their political manuscripts, before they make their speeches. Why, it is an outrage. Surely this is a country of free speech, and if we are to have radio broadcasting then every one of us has the right to express his opinions over the air no matter how disagreeable those opinions may be to the rest of us. That is my position, and when my hon. friend says that Lloyd George has to submit the manuscript of his speeches before he delivers them, I say that it is going entirely too far. The idea of submitting the speeches we are going to make to the commission appointed to supervise broadcasting is to me an outrage, that is all.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I have not had the opportunity of reading these rules and regulations and like many other hon. members I am at a disadvantage in discussing this matter. The hon. members for Quebec South and West Edmonton have referred to these rules and there seems to be some doubt in the minds of hon. members of the committee as to their meaning. They are wondering if they will not during the course of their political career make speeches to their constituents which will infringe the rules and regulations of this commission. Apparently they must first submit a manuscript of any speech to be delivered. It often happens in political meetings that an hon. member is asked to address an audience. He speaks on the spur of the moment and may have no notes at all and I should like to know how the commission would act in a case like that. During the discussion on the estimates for the radio commission I made some remarks and observations in connection with certain speeches which had been made over station CHLP in Montreal. The Minister of Marine took me to task by saying that I was objecting to free speech. The speeches to which I referred embodied criticisms of the administration of the city of Montreal and the provincial government. I should like to know if these regulations were in force when those speeches were delivered. I am told that the same organization is at the present time having similar speeches broadcast nearly every day. I am as much for free speech as is the Minister of Marine or any hon. member but if we are going to have free speech, let us have it for all. Can the minister tell me if the manuscripts of these particular speeches were submitted to the commission for examination along the lines suggested by these rules? If these rules existed then as they exist at the present time and no action was taken, I think the commission might be accused of being derelict in its duty. I, for one, will not submit to these rules and regulations as I do not consider them to be proper under the circumstances. As the Minister of Marine said the other day, I think every member of every political party has the right to express his own point of view. He should not be forced to submit to a triumvirate which insists upon scrutinizing speeches before delivery. As I said, I have a certain amount of respect for some of the members of the commission but I do not think the commission has delivered the goods. I do not think it has carried out the provisions of the report of the committee which considered this matter before the law was enacted. One of the members of the commission, who is there to-day, was my political opponent. I do not think he would have wanted to submit all the speeches he made against me during the last campaign. If these rules and regulations had been in effect I do not see how he would have been entitled to make the speeches he did make.

I think this commission has been given too much power. It is not in the interest of the country that such rules and regulations should be put into force. Before these rules and regulations were issued they should have been submitted to the members of this house and of the Senate so that the people of Canada could have been made aware of what they contained. This is the first occasion upon which we have had the opportunity of knowing what they contained. I should like to ask the minister if they are printed in the French language and if he can supply all hon. members with a copy both in French and English.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): In order that the atmosphere may be cleared and members may have a definite understanding as to the use that may be made of radio stations, I submit that the Minister of Marine or the Prime Minister should make a declaration to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, these regulations were submitted by the commission to the council and sent by the council to the Minister of Justice. The Department of Justice made certain amendments to them and sent them back as being in order. The power given to the commission is stated in the act. I was amazed at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay because there is nothing in these regulations that I know of to compel a member to submit his speech to the commission before it is made. What is stated is that the right is reserved to require submission if occasion necessitates. The reservation of that right is copied largely from the English rules. It is a supervision to be exercised in times of great stress and to deal with provocative discussions over the radio to which many people do not like to listen. All I have to say about this matter can be said in a few sentences.

Does this committee mean to indicate that it desires to destroy this commission? Is there any way in which this business of broadcasting can be carried on except through a department of government or through a commission? If it is to be carried on through a department of government, then the whole condition would change with a change in administration. It would be a political machine from the start. If it is not to be carried on through a department of government, what instrumentality shall be used for the purpose? The answer of this committee and of this statute is—a commission. Therefore, we have negatived the idea that this broadcasting business is to be carried on as a department of government and we have concluded affirmatively that it shall be carried on by a commission as an instrumentality of government. I think the committee must agree to these two propositions. Having concluded that we will set up a commission as an instrumentality of government, we must then proceed to the appointment of the commission. There has been much criticism of the appointments which were made. I confess that I know very little of the chairman's politics. I did not know him personally except for having met him two or three times at public functions. He was highly spoken of by independent persons to whom I went for assistance in this very difficult task of selecting a chairman. It was believed that his wide knowledge of Canada and his experience as a dramatic critic would entitle him to have some idea of the tastes of Canadian people in broadcast programs and that in the preparation of programs he would have better ability than the average man would have in connection with matters of that kind. At any rate, he was selected as chairman and his appointment was hailed with much acclaim by the press of all classes of political thought. The truth is that I was surprised the other evening to hear the statement made as to his unfitness for the position. I believed when he was appointed he had singular qualifications for that particular post and that he would be able to understand something of the Canadian viewpoint, of Canadian history. The books he has written indicate a strong, virile Canadian sentiment and I believed, as I have said, he would be able to appreciate what the Canadian people would wish to have.

The leader of the opposition speaks of three political appointees of this government. I know nothing of the qualifications of the technical officer and I have never inquired. I know he was highly spoken of in his profession; I believe he was awarded the Military Cross during the war, and though the information is always open to question, technical persons to whom I have applied for it have told me that Colonel Steel occupies a unique position with respect to matters of broadcasting and knowledge of the technique of electricity. I know from a source that has thus far been accurate, that on many occasions he has been offered outside this country positions in connection with the industrial field of the development of radio that would give him much greater compensation than he is now receiving, but he has a very earnest desire to continue along the line he has been pursuing in Canada in connection with the development of electrical appliances and especially in connection with radio broadcasting. I think it is rather unfair to say that in any sense he is a political appointee. He has, so far as I know, never indicated anything of his political beliefs and faith, and I certainly never have had any talks with him about his political views. He is perhaps given to expressing his opinions very tersely; perhaps, in the language of a distinguished man of another age, he does not suffer fools gladly, but that may be a misfortune. At any rate I am bound to say that very great harm is being done by suggesting that this is in any sense a political appointment.

So far as Mr. Maher is concerned I am not going over this afternoon what I stated the other day.

A commission having been appointed to which some hon. gentlemen take exception, the next thing to do is to assist it to discharge its functions. If anyone thinks you can appoint a commission to handle national broadcasting in Canada without tramping on the toes of private interests in this country, he is mistaken. Those who own private stations and those who think they should have control of the industry or business in Canada are all opposed to this commission and its pathway is made increasingly difficult by reason of that fact. Wave lengths have not in the past been treated with just that high regard to international obligations that will have to be observed in the days to come, because as we go forward in this matter, there is a more strict supervision and the international phase of the situation calls for much more careful consideration. I do not desire to repeat this, but the international side of the matter is the one that causes the acute difficulty. On the other side of the line we have 120,000,000 people with the most powerful stations except one in the world and unfortunately the impulse behind the human voice when it goes out into space to vibrate is one that may send it north or south or east or west.

Mr. YOUNG: Fortunately.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman prefers the voices from most other countries to those of his own, but I ask him in this instance to believe me when I say that I do not think it is at all times fortunate that the voices of other countries should drown the voices from this. I mention that merely because it is that difficulty with which those gentlemen have to deal. That is purely the technical side of the matter.

There is also another side to it, that is, the question of the preparation of programs. I think the programs that have been offered to the Canadian people, in view of the fact that this is a new commission, have not been unworthy of some of our traditions. I have not been able to listen in on the radio during the last few months except, I think, on a Sunday, and I remember hearing a very admirable lecture. I was pleased to learn at the end of it, as it touched the early history of the country, it was under the auspices of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission. We have in Canada a history that lends itself to broadcasting; we have the history of the early pioneers going back four hundred years to the early settlers, the history of the government of this country, of our commercial expansion and our growth and development constitutionally and otherwise. All these are subjects that might well be treated by the commission and I believe they will be, but it can function only if it is not destroyed, as I said the other evening, by its friends. It has to make regulations. The making of regulations, one would think, to listen to some of the observations made here this afternoon, is a terrible thing. But every hon. member knows he cannot send a telegram using profanity or obscenity.

Mr. YOUNG: There is no censorship there.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute states that if anyone writes such a telegram, the telegraph company will not transmit it. You cannot write any telegram you like and have it sent. So you cannot print any kind of advertisement you might like, because the newspaper will not publish anything the publication of which is not permitted by law. In addition to that you have the censorship that arises by reason of the fact that this is not the printed but the spoken word, and if the spoken word is to be sent on the air regardless of what it may be, you will have an intolerable condition in this country. Children, all kinds of people, would not desire to hear either profanity or sedition or obscenity over the radio. The right of censorship has been exercised by every radio commission I know anything about. The word "censorship" sounds offensive to the average mind because it means the paramount authority of the state is not willing there should be absolute licence on the part of each individual citizen. There can be no civilization without curtailment of individual rights and in this instanee the freedom of the individual is limited by the exercise of censorship, if you call it such, by a commission. The commission drew up these regulations which, as I have said, were sent to the Department of Justice and reported back, after some amendments had been made, as being in proper form; those are the regulations to which reference has been made. The fact that prohibitory power is expressed does not of course indicate it is at all times to be used. To reserve the right to do something means that you have not departed from that right. Upon that you cannot build an argument that a speech must be examined before it is made. It is really an indication that the right is still reserved and has not been parted with to exercise the censoring power.

But I go further. There is not one of us who has not every day to make some sacrifice of his individual freedom. The by-laws of the city of Ottawa, the provisions of the statutes of the provinces and of the dominion, control individual liberty with respect to various matters. A statute which we had before us to-day dealt with the question of habitual drunkenness in a home being an offence against good morals so far as children are concerned. In this case we have a censorship set up, not merely to exercise censorship, but to protect and ensure the success of this enterprise of ours. I use the word "ours". I do not think it is deliberate; I am sure it is not, but the attitude taken in this committee by hon. gentlemen opposite has given great succor and support to those who desire to destroy publicly-owned broadcasting in Canada, and who have taken to themselves the thought that this country regrets that it has nationalized radio. These interests have taken new force and new life because they say that this house which a year ago spoke with unanimity is now bitterly engaged in a discussion the like of which we have hardly had this session, in the character of the language used and the expressions applied to individuals who are outside the pale of the house but who are nevertheless subject to criticism. And criticism too of men who came here at the courteous request of the government to give us the benefit of their experience of the most extensive broadcasting system in the world, that of the British, because although the soviet have more powerful stations than England the British is the most important broadcasting system.

In the course of experience it was found that you could not go to the Civil Service Commission and get the kind of persons required for particular positions on an advertising basis, on a tender basis, so to speak, and the radio commission sought amendments to the statute. The amendments they first sought were far more comprehensive than the ones now before the house, and personally I said that they were too extensive and that I did not care to ask parliament to grant them. I was not so much impressed in the first instance with the necessity of the amendments with respect to the Civil Service Commission until after Mr. Murray had given us the benefit of his views. I do not pretend that Mr. Murray's views are binding upon me in any sense, but he was a Canadian who had much experience and had made for himself a position for his services in connection with which he is being paid, a salary that to some hon. members of this house would seem to be princely; he was of the opinion from his experience that at least in the initial stages of our work, if we are to get the radio commission functioning properly, because we have to appoint provincial representatives, and advisory committees must be set up in order to assist in carrying out in each of the nine provinces the work of the commission, it was desirable that the commission should be able to employ those servants and employees who could best do the work. I said to the radio commission, and I say to this committee frankly: It is contrary to the spirit of the Civil Service Act. But it was urged upon me that we could not deal with the matter in that way.

Once more reference has been made to the Civil Service Commission as being an organization that reflects the mind of the government. As I said to this committee the other day, we promoted to membership in that commission one of the members of the civil service, and I do not know to-day what his political faith is. I haven't any idea what Mr. Bland's politics are. In fact, I asked one of my secretaries the other day if he knew, and he said he did not, but he said he believed that if he had any views one way or the other they were probably Liberal. That was the answer given to me. But I personally know nothing of Mr. Bland's politics. I recommended that he should be promoted to the position he now holds because I believed that it was the view of the committee of this house that sat last year that he was an exceptionally well qualified man. Certainly in this house it was so stated. All that I know about him is this: Before he was appointed I sent for him and I asked him if he had any recommendations to make about the situation generally. He told me he thought money could be saved. I asked him if he was willing to accept the position on that commission and give it the benefit of his wide experience, and he said he was, and he was promoted accordingly. That is the political side of that appointment. Doctor Roche is still there.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the third member?

Mr. BENNETT: He has not yet been appointed.

Mr. MARCIL: Does not the Prime Minister think it is important that he should be appointed?

Mr. BENNETT: It is important that any vacancy should be filled if there is necessity for it, but there is no crying demand for it and the position is not yet filled because of an earnest endeavour to seek one who may not be charged with being a mere partisan. Doctor Roche and Mr. Bland are the first to realize that they cannot fill all these positions satisfactorily under the existing provisions of the Civil Service Act; but they believe that the provisions of the act are wide enough to exempt these positions from its operations. As the law now stands it reads:

> The commission may employ such technical, professional and other officers, and clerks and employees as may be necessary. Such officers, clerks and employees shall be appointed pursuant to the Civil Service Act.

That is the law as it is to-day. That is found to be unsatisfactory, unequal to the demands made upon it.

I have only one idea about this broadcasting commission, and that is to see it succeed. I know hon. gentlemen think that everyone is thinking in terms of political considerations. With respect to this matter I have not a thought in the world about politics, and I have not had. I explained the other evening the circumstances in connection with the appointment of one member of the radio commission, and I have also indicated this afternoon the position in respect to the other two members. We say that the proper method to pursue to meet the situation is to amend the statute so as to allow the radio commission to make these appointments. I am quite willing to admit that the criticism of that proposal is a criticism that I would make if I were sitting opposite, that the appointments were being put solely in the hands of the radio commission as well as the payment of salaries and matters of that kind, and yet when the advisory tariff board came into being under the late administration, a gentleman was selected for chairman who while he was on the commission was nominated as a candidate of the party in power, and there was no question about that at all, and who had previously been a candidate and been defeated. I am not going to say that human nature in any sense is at all different on one side of the house from the other. We are more or less the same. But the government thinks, in view of the representations made and the experience which the commission has had, it should be enabled to employ such persons as it finds necessary to carry on its business. It is because I and my colleagues in the government desire to protect the Civil Service Act and the principles of it that I suggested this afternoon, after thinking it over, and after these gentlemen had discussed it among themselves, no term of engagement should extend longer than the thirty-first of March next, that they would all expire on that date, so that there will be no question about an opportunity being afforded to make a discriminating effort to determine those persons who should be appointed under the Civil Service Act as distinguished from those to be employed by the radio commission itself.

The leader of the opposition has suggested that we strike out all the words after "officers," leaving in only the technical and professional officers. But it is with respect to the other officers, the director of programs, the director of public relations, if you will, and other such positions, that the commission in England at least, found that they had to have the freest hand in order to deal with the situation as it might arise. But in order that no one might be prejudiced I suggest this limitation of time.

My hon. friends opposite say, "This means that those people who will be employed in the meantime will have a better chance to get the position than someone else." But they would get it then under the provisions of the statute, being the best able, and if they are the best, those are the ones we want in order that the commission may succeed. I say frankly to this committee that it is my profound conviction, so far as a man can dissociate himself from political beliefs in a matter of this kind, that unless we endeavour to make a united effort to save this business as a national asset we are going to see it fail, and if it fails you may say that that will be a reflection on the government, and that is what you want to see happen. But it goes deeper than that. It is a reflection upon the people themselves, on their ability to maintain a public enterprise as a public property. That is what it really is, and that is the reason I make this suggestion. But if there is any other suggestion that this committee can make more adequately to meet this situation, and that will permit this commission to lay the foundations of the structure upon which it hopes to build success, by employing suitable instruments to that end; if there is any suggestion to make other than the one I have made concerning the limitation as to time of appointment, I shall be glad indeed to consider it and if possible to accept it. Because one thing is sure, namely, that the instrumentality we have set up to accomplish our end, namely, the commission—and after all it is the instrumentality of the government—can function only if we give it a chance to function.

I am sorry to say that in view of the protracted discussion over this matter it will be thought abroad, as it is already thought, that we rue our bargain with respect to the radio commission, that we are no longer desirous of maintaining it as a public asset, and that we are convinced that we should hand radio over to private interests. Well, just imagine what private interests have done in connection with other enterprises in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: And just imagine what they would be doing now if they had this in their hands. They would have no restrictions upon whom they would employ, no limitations imposed upon them. They would go forward with licence fees, if we gave them the licence fees, and do their task in that way. We do not get up in this House of Commons and ask, concerning the railway commission: "What induced them to close the crossing on Broad street, Regina?" or, "What was the operating cost concerning the grade separation on Yonge street?" or, "Why did they do thus and so?" We appoint them, and we leave them to do their work and perform their duties. Every time they have requisitioned us for additional assistance, whether it be for engineering—and they have increased those payments frequently—or whether it be for economies here or there, we have yielded to their views, because it is an instrumentality of government which the government itself could not operate as a department of government. The difference between departmental government and government by commission as an instrumentality of government is so clear that it need not again be defined.

We have taken other commissions—the grain commission, for instance. Look at what the grain commission is doing. It is operating through its laboratory in Winnipeg, through its agencies in Fort William, Calgary, Edmonton and Moose Jaw, and is discharging its multifarious duties. Is anybody in this house saying: "Look at the terrible regulations they have passed."

Mr. MALCOLM: They did.

Mr. BENNETT: And properly so, too.

Mr. MALCOLM: Every weighing master was under criticism.

Mr. BENNETT: And properly so, too.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, not properly so, because the committee did not find it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman realizes that the regulation was beyond the powers of those who enacted it. That is the point. That did happen, and it does happen frequently, and when power is exceeded you have the inevitable criticism and you have an adjustment of the difficulties. But the grain commission is operating all through western Canada—elevators, grading, standards, and everything pertaining to grain. And the value of the grain commission's work to-day lies in the value of its standards and grades abroad, and the confidence the public have in their integrity and the manner in which they discharge their duties. With perhaps some minor exceptions there have been few criticisms with respect to appointments made to the grain commission. It is true I could name one or two cases where there have been criticisms. One unfortunate gentleman was never able to sit at all—he was dying when he was appointed. But that is not a matter of importance. Let us take the railway commission: True, it has been the harbour of refuge once or twice, and still is. It is true that political considerations affected judgments now and then, but in the main we have set up an instrument which has succeeded.

I go farther: You have the harbour commissions. There you have had great failures and some successes. But so long as you have public opinion responsive to earnest effort you have an opportunity to achieve success. But if in a spirit of carping criticism, without referring to any other fact, you have concluded that what we have to do is to find fault with a body that has not yet launched upon its work—I claim a fair attitude is not being adopted. I carry my mind back to what took place in connection with the old grain commission, and how difficult it was to get it started. I wonder if this committee realizes how great the task was and how violent the criticism was, not in this house but—

Mr. MALCOLM: It made a good commission eventually, though, and made good regulations eventually.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that the commission as a commission, whose findings with respect to grades and matters of that kind have been received throughout the world with confidence, as I said a minute ago has in the main discharged its duties well. I could give striking illustrations, if I so desired, in respect of every one of them in which I believe political considerations governed appointments; I could give illustrations one after the other. But there is no necessity of doing that, because we all know that in the main with respect to these matters the Canadian people are satisfied.

This question of radio is more important than all of them.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is more important, because it touches the lives of all. The others touch the lives of some, but this is universal; it diffuses and dispenses news which comes into the homes of the poorest—because we find many poor homes in this country in which there are small radio sets, notwithstanding the fact that they find difficulty in obtaining other things which are almost necessities. They have a desire to hear what is going on in the outside world. While grain might be sold because of its superior quality even if the grades had never been fixed or determined upon—as they were not before, and as they are not in Russia, a country selling her grain in competition with ours—and while railways might be dealt with as they were before there was a railway commission, yet here we have something which shapes, forms and moulds the character of our Canadian people. And to the extent to which a commission realizes its responsibilities, and is able to discharge the functions which by this legislation devolve upon it, it will have discharged its duties as you and I would like to have them discharged. So to shape and mould the whole national outlook of the Canadian people as to make them take an interest and pride in the development of their own organization, in my judgment is at least a consideration. But I am not unmindful of the fact that keeping up with the Joneses has been one of the great difficulties of the present day. And to-day one of the difficulties that we Canadians have to face arises from the fact that we have limited resources and that we think we should have something just as good as if they were unlimited.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

GENTER THICKENER COMPANY

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 102, respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Extension of time for application to revive patent.

Mr. BENNETT: The other evening I asked that this bill stand because I hoped the minister would be able to look into it. I was unable to investigate it myself but I had that done, and the report I received was that because of a mistake made by a firm of solicitors in New York—an entry had been made in a diary to take the proper action to extend the patent, but that was not done—the solicitors were framing this measure in order to protect their client against their own negligence. I do not know whether that is a correct statement but that is the report I received. In view of the closing sentences of the section, in which the matter is left in the hands of the commissioner of patents after they have established the facts, I know of no reason why the matter should not be left in that position.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I say that the right hon. gentleman is quite right in his understanding of the facts. There was a motion for the return of the fees, and I wonder if there is any chance of that being done. I do not want that motion prejudiced by reason of my not mentioning it at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance is not in his place, but I see no reason why the fees should be returned. I distinctly recall that once in the practice of my profession a mistake was made in my office and I had to pay $1,000 to rectify it. I see no reason why this country should make the contribution instead of the solicitors.

Section agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

PURCHASE OF STATIONS—APPOINTMENTS TO STAFF

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 99, to amend the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932—Mr. Bennett—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 2—Powers of commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the recess the Prime Minister spoke at some length with regard to this measure, and to two or three statements which my right hon. friend has been making from time to time I should like to take very strong exception, in the hope that he will not repeat them.

The first statement is that anyone on this side of the house is in any way seeking to prejudice public ownership either in the minds of hon. members of this house or of the public generally. May I tell the Prime Minister that it was a Liberal administration that appointed the royal commission that brought in the report on radio broadcasting, recommending that this service be made a government owned and operated utility The Liberal party has taken its stand strongly behind that proposal, and we are just as anxious as the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite to see this government owned utility made a success and secure the confidence of the public. Indeed we are wholeheartedly in favour of government ownership and control of radio broadcasting. Any criticisms we may have to make from this side are directed not against public ownership as such but rather in an endeavour to remove those features which may tend to create prejudice against government ownership as it exists under the present radio broadcasting commission. When the right hon. gentleman speaks about private interests getting succor and support from those who are bringing forward criticisms with respect to any features of the present commission, let me say that he is simply drawing a herring across the trail. There can be no question as to the motives behind the criticisms which we have been making from this side.

The Prime Minister said the choice was between having radio broadcasting under a commission or under a government department, and he went on to say that if it were under a government department it would become a political machine. I think the Prime Minister is quite wrong. I do not think he would admit for a moment that the post office, which is a public utility, is a political machine. Though there may be reasons for so regarding it at the present time, I do not think he would admit that his own Department of External Affairs, which is a department of government, is a political machine.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the post office is a business and there is a great deal in connection with the departments of Marine, Fisheries, Public Works, Trade and Commerce and other departments of government that has to do with business. They have not become political machines because of the fact that appointments to the public service are made through the instrumentality of the Civil Service Commission. The absence of this protection is the feature to which we are taking exception in the bill my right hon. friend is now proposing. He is taking the appointments under the radio broadcasting commission out from under the control of the Civil Service Commission, which has been the one body that has saved our government departments so far as appointments to their staffs are concerned from becoming purely political machines. Some degree of censorship will undoubtedly be expected by the country and will be approved by hon. members, but great care will have to be exercised as to how that censorship is to be enforced, and as to the judgment and discretion with which it is to be exercised. So far as censorship goes, that is the extent of our criticism. As regards the appointment of staffs however the Prime Minister has told the house that there are certain appointments which Mr. Gladstone Murray says should be made by the radio commission itself. Well, no one is contending that the radio commission should have to go to the Civil Service Commission before its members can employ artists or highly technical or professional persons or others necessary to fill the parts essential to any broadcast. All we are asking at the moment is that with respect to the great body of officers, clerks and employees generally, these classes shall be appointed in the same way as others are appointed who are doing similar classes of work in the public service. There is a very strong reason for that with regard to the public service of Canada generally. If we are to leave to different commissions the right to determine what salaries are to be paid for certain classes of work, there will be endless friction between employees in the public service in and under the various departments of government. The Civil Service Commission was established amongst other reasons for the purpose of classifying certain kinds of work and attaching to the different classifications the salaries that seemed to be appropriate.

A few weeks ago we removed from the purview of the Civil Service Commission many appointees on the staffs of the penitentiaries, leaving to the chief of the penitentiaries staff the appointment of persons connected with the institution and the salaries to be attached to those positions. With respect to the railways we took away from parliament the authority to determine the salaries to be paid in different branches of that service, leaving that function to a group of trustees. And with respect to the tariff board, the government has removed from the Civil Service Commission the duty of appointing the staff of that board and of fixing their salaries. In respect of other bodies the same thing has been done, with the reservation in one or two cases that the governor in council must approve the salaries. Here however there is no approval of salaries demanded. We shall soon have throughout the public service as many rates of salaries as there are commissions and bodies of the kind. The Civil Service Commission exists to prevent that sort of thing and to see that throughout the public service those employees performing similar services should receive similar rates of pay.

That is what we ask at the moment with respect to these employees, and I do say that unless that control is preserved by the Civil Service Commission the government will be making a grave mistake and will certainly be converting the radio broadcasting commission into a political machine. I think the Prime Minister himself must feel that what I have suggested by way of amendment is fair. Let me read the amendment I propose to offer to section 1 if my right hon. friend will not see his way to accepting it:

To strike out the words "and other officers, clerks and employees or other" in lines 6 and 7, and to insert the word "and" after the word "technical" in line 6.

The section as amended would then read:

The commission may employ such technical and professional persons as the commission may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the commission.

That makes it clear that so far as all technical and professional persons are concerned —and both these words may be construed in a very broad sense to include artists and persons of special talent—

Mr. BENNETT: The statute in another clause is clear in that respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, so far as these classes are concerned, we are prepared, with the proviso which the Prime Minister says he is prepared to make, of having the provisions of the bill apply only until March of next year, to have such persons appointed by the radio commission. I do not think it would be right, however, especially if it is desired to establish public confidence in the commission, that stenographers, clerks and others of the radio commission staff doing administrative work generally, and work corresponding exactly to what many of them have been doing up to the moment, should be made exceptions of by being separated from that control which the Civil Service Commission exercises over similar classes of employees in the public service.

Mr. YOUNG: When the bill creating the radio commission came before the house last year I objected to it. I did not speak against it, contenting myself with expressing my opposition by vote. I did not speak against it because I was in such a hopeless minority that I realized that any objections I might raise would be laughed at as groundless fears. My objections to the nationalizing of radio were quite simple. I am opposed to any extension of the activities of government in the realm of business or over the lives or activities of our people. I am opposed to any further building up of bureaucracy which might seek to control all the activities of this country. We are gradually building up such a bureaucracy, and if we continue the time will come when all aspiring people in the country will look to the government or to some political party for advancement in life. That is not in the public interest. Any advantage we might reap—I say might—from public ownership or control of common utilities would be far more than offset by the disadvantage of having people all depending on governments.

I also object to having any commission arranging for me the programs which I shall listen to over the radio. I prefer to choose my own programs. If I cannot tune in on one station I want to be free to tune in on another, and I do not want any commission dictating what it shall be.

I also feared, at the time the bill was introduced, that the licence fee would be raised. It was raised. It was doubled, and I understand it would have been redoubled had the opportunity been favourable. I am told that the commission would like to have raised it still higher, but they thought the time was not opportune because people were hard up; but they are looking forward to the time when they can raise it still higher.

I will not repeat the arguments advanced this afternoon from this side in opposition to censorship. I am thoroughly opposed to it, as were the speakers this afternoon. But in regard to the argument that we must have a national broadcasting system in order to build up a Canadian spirit, because our people were apt to lose their patriotism owing to the influence of foreign programs—

Mr. BENNETT: That was not stated.

Mr. YOUNG: It was not stated in those words, but it has been said that in order to build up a Canadian spirit—we will put it that way—it is necessary to have true Canadian programs. Let us look at the rules and regulations of the broadcasting commission and see what they regard as truly Canadian programs:

> A program of foreign origin which advertises goods manufactured in Canada and names the address in this country where such goods are produced and distributed shall be deemed a Canadian program.

In other words, a program can be produced one hundred per cent in Chicago and so long as it advertises Canadian goods it shall be deemed a Canadian program. If the programs we were getting from abroad were going to make us all Yankees instead of Canadians, I do not see anything in this regulation that will change that. Such programs can still come in provided they advertise Canadian goods. It seems to me that the same hand that was at work devising these rules and regulations was also at work devising the customs rates, and the regulations are designed not to shut out the ballyhoo of the Yankee but rather to prevent us from listening to his advertising. The fear is not that we shall import American ideas but that we shall import some American goods. The greatest objection I have to the commission is in connection with the unethical practices to which they have resorted in order to beat out their competitors. Any merchant who tried to beat out his competitor not by giving better value or better service to his customer but by overturning his competitor's delivery van and spoiling his goods would be considered unethical and be despised and condemned by every right thinking person in the country. That is precisely what this commission has done. When the bill went through last year I thought that if we did not like their programs we would be able to tune in on the American stations as we had done in the past. However, we now find that we cannot tune in on any of those stations. The commission has so arranged the wave lengths as to make this impossible. In my opinion, this is unethical and should be condemned in the strongest terms.

Mr. BENNETT: The suggested amendment of the right hon. the leader of the opposition does not meet the difficulty to which attention has been directed. It is felt that the words "and other officers" should at least remain in to be dealt with by the commission. I am quite content to have the section amended to read as follows:

> The commission may employ such technical, professional and other officers as the commission may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the commission.

There will then be added these words:

> Clerks and all other employees of the commission shall be appointed pursuant to the Civil Service Act.

The only distinct difference between us is as to whether other officers shall be appointed by the commission or by the Civil Service Commission. It was that difficulty that influenced me in suggesting that it should be only for a limited time. There was an inability to settle definitely upon what would constitute other officers. This could not be done without a great deal of study being given to the matter, more than the Civil Service Commission was in position to give up to this time. May I remind the committee that in dealing with the National Research Council my right hon. friend appointed a head to that body for a period of five or seven years and inaugurated a line of salaries which were out of line with those paid in the civil service. This caused a great deal of heartburning and some differences and difficulties which we are endeavouring to adjust. I quite follow every argument which has been used as to the undesirability of having different salaries paid by different commissions for the same services but there is at once the answer suggested in connection with the National Research Council, namely, that the struggle to get a certain type of qualified persons is such in view of competition that you must pay the going salaries for the workers required. As I say, I desire to meet in every way in my power the suggestions which have been made, but I think the whole purpose would fail if the words "and other officers" were stricken out and these employees made subject to the Civil Service Commission. That commission is not able to deal with that phase of the matter and the radio commission must be in a position to do so if it is to function. I believe that because it is what they tell me positively.

Mr. Murray is very clear about it. I do not desire to quote him again but he has stated that if we are to make this succeed, we should take this course. I should like to endeavour to assist those who are trying to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A half loaf is better than none at all and the circumstances being what they are I am quite prepared as a compromise to accept what my right hon. friend has suggested. I wonder if he would accept a suggestion from me which I think would be in accord with the views he has just expressed. I would suggest adding to the section the words "and approved by the governor in council." These words would apply to the salaries to be paid. I suggest this simply because I think the Prime Minister himself sees the wisdom of not having different salaries paid in the public service for similar classes of work. If the salaries to be paid these professional, technical and other officers were required to have the approval of the governor in council, I think there would be a greater probability of uniformity in the salaries paid throughout the public service. I suggest to my right hon. friend the addition of those words to the amendment he himself is proposing.

Mr. BENNETT: Frankly, I was endeavouring to avoid that. I wanted to avoid the government taking responsibility with respect to matters of this kind if the commission was to function as I hoped it would. However, if the right hon. gentleman thinks that the addition of those words will improve it, I am not adverse. The section would then read:

> The commission may employ such technical, professional and other officers as the commission may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the commission subject to the approval of the governor in council.
> Clerks and all other employees of the commission shall be appointed pursuant to the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the Prime Minister knows that I am not given to increasing the powers of the governor in council but I believe there are some cases where the governor in Council might exercise a supervision which would be beneficial.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When this bill was up a few days ago I took a position in connection with this section which I do not see any reason to change. The Department of Marine, as I pointed out at that time, has had for a considerable number of years a very excellent technical staff which has operated the radiotelegraph section. To my knowledge no complaints have ever been levelled at the ability or capacity of those men. They were appointed under the Civil Service Act and I see no reason why these technical men should be placed outside the operations of that act. I have every respect for the opinion of Mr. Gladstone Murray with regard to the technical construction side of radio broadcasting, but I am afraid that he does not understand our problem in connection with civil service matters, and in fact he cannot be expected to understand it. It has taken us years to reach the stage we have in connection with the Civil Service Commission. If the Civil Service Commission is now to be sacrificed and a tremendous political weapon placed in the hands of the radio commission, this committee will be ill advised to pass even the amendment proposed by the Prime Minister. I submit that these men should not be placed outside the operations of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does section two remain just as it is here?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It takes away from parliament the approving of the purchase or lease of stations. It is understood that that will stand only until March, 1934.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not added that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will be understood?

Mr. BENNETT: I intended to add that clause at the end of the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Expenditure of moneys.

Mr. BENNETT: I have a new clause to offer to be substituted for this one. This provides that the estimates for expenditures shall be submitted to the Minister of Finance; otherwise the commission might contemplate a budget well over expenditures. I will ask my colleague to move this amendment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move that section 3 be amended as follows:

Section 14 of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

14. (1) The commission may expend for the purposes of this act the moneys appropriated by parliament for such purposes, together with such sums of money as may be received by the commission from any business carried on by it under this act.

(2) The moneys appropriated by parliament for such purposes shall not exceed the estimated revenue from receiving licences, private commercial broadcasting licences and amateur broadcasting licences:

Provided that if at the end of the fiscal year there is a balance of appropriated moneys unexpended, or if the revenue from the sources mentioned in this subsection exceeds the amount appropriated, parliament may appropriate any such balance and excess in addition to any appropriation provided hereunder.

(3) The commission shall present to the Minister of Finance annually an estimate of the expenditure proposed to be made by it during the fiscal year and the Minister of Finance shall from time to time pay into a chartered bank to the credit of the commission moneys appropriated by parliament for the purposes of the commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may be that I am not very quick at apprehending, but I have not yet been able to see justification for the interpretation that I understand the government is placing upon this clause. I understood the Prime Minister to say that the moneys which the commission were receiving were the equivalent of those which they themselves raised in the form of fees.

Mr. BENNETT: Only under this amendment they are not all paid over at once; they are paid over as the commission may require.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that all that the commission may expend?

Mr. BENNETT: No, such moneys as they earn.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The commission receives from parliament an appropriation which, this year, I understand was $1,000,000, and in addition gets all it raises in the way of receipts for the purpose of expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman has hardly put that fairly. First, the commission receives the moneys that have been collected for licence fees. Second, it has in hand such sums as it earns from the conduct of advertising and business and its expenditures are limited to the sums paid for licence fees and receipts by it from its business. The suggested amendment provides that they must budget and the budget must be sent to the Minister of Finance so that he knows the commission is not incurring liabilities beyond those which the receipts from the two sources will meet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I read this clause, it gives to the commission all that the Prime Minister has just said it is entitled to, but in addition there is an appropriation by parliament. I cannot read that language in any other way. Let me read this sentence:

The commission may expend for the purposes of this act the moneys appropriated by parliament for such purposes.

Parliament has appropriated $1,000,000, so that that means the commission may expend $1,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Provided licence fees are collected to that extent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The clause continues:

Together with such sums as may be received by the commission from any business carried on by it under this act.

That would be the business the commission carries on. Does that business include licence fees as well?

Mr. BENNETT: No, they do not carry on that business. It is just as the right hon. gentleman said and as the hon. member for Rimouski pointed out this afternoon, up to the moment the Marine department have collected the licence fees and they have been paid into the consolidated fund. Hence an appropriation was necessary to free any part of them for use by the commission. That is the real explanation of the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Parliament is supposed to appropriate for the purposes of the commission the amount raised by licence fees. The commission will get that amount and in addition such sums as may be received from any business that may be carried on, and nothing more.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Section 3 as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Limitation of appropriation.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman will see that this is covered by the new section 14. Therefore section 4 may be deleted.

Section 4 dropped.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is now on section 1.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 1 as amended will read as follows:

1. Section 4 of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

4. The commission may employ such technical, professional and other officers as the commission may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the commission, subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Clerks and all other employees of the commission shall be appointed pursuant to the Civil Service Act.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 1 as amended agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: The new section 4 will read as follows:

This act shall expire on the ..... day of ..... 1934.

This is only a temporary measure and will expire on a certain date in 1934. March 31 is a little early. As the appropriations are made from fiscal year to fiscal year, the only question is whether there is time to deal with the matter from the opening of parliament to March 31.

Sir EUGENE FISET: In view of the fact that each department is allowed from fifteen days to three weeks after the fiscal year is ended, to spend its estimates, perhaps three weeks after April 1 would be all right.

Mr. BENNETT: The law has been changed since my hon. friend's time. At present there has to be an appropriation accepted by the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Make it April 30, if my right hon. friend thinks that is better.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the new section 4 will read as follows:

This act shall expire on the 30th day of April, 1934.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move that new section 4 be inserted accordingly.

Section 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, and amendments read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BENNETT moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

TARIFF BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 100, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): There has been a good deal of discussion already on the second reading of this bill, and if there are no others who wish to speak I think we might as well have a division on it at once, as we are opposed to its provisions.

The house divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood the Prime Minister had an amendment he was going to move.

Mr. BENNETT: It is already in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it in this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; there is the provision for sixty-four years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was a provision to limit it to the chairman.

Mr. BENNETT: It is so limited.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the section carried?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This bill has been well discussed. Many hon. members have spoken, and the vote which has just been taken must convince the government that this is the most unpopular measure which has been introduced. Nothing further can be done, except to allow it to pass only on division.

Mr. BENNETT: Only to add this to what I have already stated: A judge who had enjoyed a judicial position for two years was asked on February 6, 1933, to vacate his office. Judging from the language used by the right hon. gentleman opposite he is faced with the possibility that in the event of a change in administration he would lose his position. Under those circumstances it is difficult to ask a man to undertake a task. That cannot be fully met; all that can be done is to see that after serving ten years and reaching the age of sixty-four he will be dealt with as indicated, and that he will receive a salary of $15,000. As I pointed out, if by reason of the action of a new administration he loses his position, as has been threatened, then of course his salary is still too small. Great Britain pays twice as much for such services. I am not going to labour the matter. These special provisions are applicable to only one person, and that is the chairman. He is to serve ten years, and must be sixty-four years of age before pension is payable as indicated.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GORDON

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has been directed to an article appearing in the Sherbrooke Daily Record of Monday, May 15, 1933. It is captioned, "Our Unfortunate and Much Governed Country," and among other things the editorial states:

> The Minister of Labour at Ottawa has a chauffeur to whom he pays $1,560 a year; supplies for his cars of $489.18; gasoline and oil of $120.48; repairs and renewals of $93.11; sundries, $67.43.

There is not an atom of truth in that statement, and if the order of precedence is to prevail I would suggest that Ananias move back from the fire and give place to the editor of this newspaper.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I remark that this is a well known Conservative newspaper in the province of Quebec.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this house will recall that at the beginning of the session an endeavour was made completely to revise and consolidate the Canada Shipping Act, and a bill was introduced in the Senate for that purpose. When that bill was under consideration by the Senate committee on banking and commerce, however, it developed that there might be some question as to Canada's power to enact all the legislation therein contemplated, and after a very full discussion the bill was withdrawn. During the hearing before the committee, however, it was made apparent that some remedial legislation should be enacted in order to protect our Canadian shipowners, and that some amendments should be made to our coasting laws.

The primary object of this bill is to amend our coasting laws in order to put them on a parity with the laws of the United States. Under section 935 of our present act United States bottoms cannot transport goods or passengers directly from one Canadian port to another Canadian port, but the law is evaded by taking goods from a Canadian to a United States port, let us say from Fort William to Buffalo, where a transshipment is made to another United States ship which takes the goods to Montreal. The United States ships do indirectly what is forbidden under section 935 of the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information as to the volume of that business?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will give that information when we get in committee, when I will have all the statistics with regard to this traffic. We are trying now to make our laws exactly the same as those of the United States; as a matter of fact the wording is about the same. At present section 935 reads as follows:

No goods or passengers shall be carried by water, from one port of Canada to another, except in British ships.

2. If any goods or passengers are so carried, contrary to this part, the master of the ship or vessel so carrying them shall incur a penalty of four hundred dollars; and any goods so carried shall be forfeited, as smuggled.

The amendment suggested in the present bill will read as follows:

No goods shall be transported by water or by land and water, from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation in any ship other than a British ship.

2. No ship other than a British ship shall transport passengers from one place in Canada to another place in Canada either directly or by way of a foreign port.

And so on. In order to illustrate my point I will read the existing law in the United States, under which foreign vessels are debarred from participation in the United States coasting trade directly or indirectly:

No merchandise shall be transported by water under penalty of forfeiture thereof from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States.

We have been asked by those interested to enact the same law for the protection of Canadian and British bottoms.

Mr. YOUNG: Who are those interested?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Every Canadian should be interested because this is for the protection of our own people.

Mr. YOUNG: Did every Canadian ask for it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The majority of Canadians are asking for it. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that when this matter was before the Senate committee many people were heard on that very point, and those opposed to this amendment have failed to make a case. They only had a fear that rates might be increased between Fort William or any other port in Canada and Montreal or other Canadian ports. I think it has been made abundantly clear that there is nothing to fear in that respect. We have plenty of Canadian bottoms to transport goods and passengers between Canadian ports either directly or indirectly, so there is no danger of rates being increased. As this house knows, the rates are under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners. They regulate the rates. Moreover, under section 938 of the act the governor in council has power—

Mr. VALLANCE: Is there not a maximum rate which the grain commission may fix? Is there not protection in it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is ample protection in it. In the event of any undue increase in rates owing to lack of competition or for other reasons, the governor in council has power to suspend any clauses of this statute. Section 938 provides that:

The governor in council may from time to time by order in council declare that the "foregoing provisions" of this part shall not, for the period specified in such order in council apply, either throughout Canada or in any specified waters of Canada, to the ships or vessels, or to any specified, ascertained, or ascertainable class or number of the ships or vessels, of any foreign country.

We are therefore protected. Those who had any fears in the matter were reassured; it was proved clearly to them that they were protected in three ways.

Mr. YOUNG: How long has the governor in council had that power?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Since 1923. Those interested in shipping grain or any other commodities are protected in three ways, by fair competition, by the regulations of the grain board, and by section 938 of the statute. I think it is only fair that our Canadian bottoms should enjoy the same protection as American bottoms in our waters.

There are other small amendments. They are not very important but we have taken the opportunity to include them in this bill. First, there is an amendment with respect to authority in the matter of pilotage. So far the authority has been vested in the Minister of Marine, but we have deemed it wise to substitute for the amendment proposed in the bill one providing that the authority vested in the minister in pilotage matters shall be conferred on the deputy minister in the absence of the minister. For the proper administration of the department I think it wise that this amendment should be accepted. Another amendment has reference to the inspection of ship's tackle for the protection of those engaged in the loading and unloading of vessels in Canadian ports. This amendment conforms with the legislation adopted by the League of Nations international labour bureau last year. This provision serves a very useful purpose for the protection of those employed in loading and unloading ships. Every country that signed the agreement will adopt the same legislation. The next amendment provides that everyone shipping goods weighing over 2,240 pounds shall indicate the weight on the package before it is loaded on the ship. As the result of experience this provision has also been adopted by the League of Nations international labour bureau last year for the protection of navigation and seamen. The next amendment requires that helm orders shall be given in the direct sense on all ships registered in Canada. This provision was adopted by the international convention for the safety of life at sea and was ratified by this house by chapter 49 of the session of 1931. Every country is accepting the regulation in order to have uniformity in the direction of ships. I do not think there is anything else I can add at the moment, but when the bill is in committee any information desired will be given.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): I have a few remarks to make with respect to section 935, to which the minister has referred. All members from western Canada are particularly interested in this section because it is possible that if the amendment is put into effect it will have some bearing, directly or indirectly, upon the rates which will be charged on grain passing over the lakes to eastern ports. I am satisfied that all western members have followed with the keenest interest and have read probably more than once the evidence which was submitted to the standing committee of the Senate on banking and commerce with respect to the original bill, letter J. respecting the Canada Shipping Act. The first witnesses who were heard by that committee were those who appeared on behalf of the grain producers of western Canada. The first witness to appear on behalf of such producers was Mr. P. F. Bredt, representing the Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba pool organizations. Mr. Bredt's view with respect to this particular section is set out at page 44 of the evidence, and possibly I might bring the crux of the amendment to the attention of the house by pointing out that if section 935 becomes law it will mean that only grain carried to Buffalo from Fort William or Port Arthur in Canadian vessels can be transferred to the port of Montreal. The contention of those who appeared on behalf of the various producers was that if this section became law the result would be to create more or less of a monopoly for Canadian shippers with respect to the transfer of grain from Buffalo to Montreal. Mr. Bredt sets forth the view of the three western grain pools in a written memorandum which appears on page 44 of the evidence. This reads:

Whereas the suggested amendment to the Canada Shipping Act would prevent transshipment of Canadian grain through Buffalo or other American lake ports except in Canadian vessels, and

Whereas it is essential in the best interests of Canada that no avenue of outlet for our grain should be closed, and

Whereas the passing of this amendment would result in restrictions of trade through inability to take advantage of possible lower ocean freights at Montreal or Quebec on all Canadian grain stored in lake Erie American ports, and

Whereas it would also have the effect of creating a virtual monopoly on freights to Montreal, which might react seriously against us in the world's markets.

Therefore be it resolved that we, as representatives of a large percentage of western Canadian producers, protest strongly against legislation which will in any way interfere with the normal movement of our grain.

Mr. Bredt stated that those were the views of the three pool associations which were said to have handled approximately forty-five per cent of the crop last year. I note that the minister, speaking in this regard, said something to the effect that those who were protesting against this amendment had not put up a very good case. Dealing with this matter, I note that Mr. Bredt states at page 46:

It is very difficult, of course, to state definitely that it would mean an increase in rates.

On page 51, he gives the following answer to a question asked by the Hon. Mr. Ballantyne:

Q. Mr. Bredt, if this act went through do you claim it would increase freight rates?

A. There is a danger as we see it, we may be wrong.

While Mr. Bredt expressed the view of the associations in the manner I have quoted, he still seemed to think that there was a certain amount of doubt. The United Grain Growers also filed a memorandum with the committee. Their president was not before the committee personally but he sent a telegram to the chairman, part of which reads as follows:

The principal interest of this to the Canadian grain trade and to the producers of grain in western Canada, including many thousands of shareholders and customers of United Grain Growers on whose behalf this company feels it necessary to speak lies in connection with the Buffalo route for lake transportation of grain and also in the competition in lake freights which the use of that route has made possible

While we recognize that certain conditions in lake transportation have at times driven lake freights on grain down to levels unremunerative to vessel owners and lower than could be maintained for any great length of time, we must point out that the competition from United States vessels has at times in the past been an important factor in holding down lake freights and we fear dangers to the interests of grain producers if such competition is permanently eliminated.

Mr. Sydney Smith, the president of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, also appeared before the committee and his views are set forth in the evidence. Mr. Smith stated that he represented the unanimous opinion of the export committee of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, and at page 76 he says:

On behalf of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, which I represent, I should like to say that my instructions are that they are not at all interested, nor are the export trade particularly interested in forcing grain on any route. The general idea—if I have not explained it clearly, it is my fault—is that they want the freedom of the export routes that now exist, and they believe that that is in the interest of the producer of western Canada. Although the grain exchange has sometimes been accused of being an institution that mixed everything up in connection with grain, they have at least identified themselves with the producer in this.

On page 65 Mr. Smith states that in his opinion this amendment might create a monopoly, but at page 74, in answer to a question by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, he makes a rather significant statement. Mr. Meighen's question was:

You are not in the shipping business?

Mr. Smith replied:

I am in the export business. I am not talking of any interests in Buffalo, I am talking of the viewpoint in the west, that we should like these two channels left open. We may be looking at a bogy, but that is what we think.

Mr. Smith is a man of vast experience in the exporting business. I suppose he is one of the greatest, if not the greatest exporter in western Canada. He states that they should like these two channels left open, that they may be looking at a bogy but that is what they think. I might point out that in supporting his contention that a monopoly might be created, Mr. Bredt stated that in July last the lake shippers formed an association known as the Associated Lake Freighters, Limited. Mr. Bredt stated that this association came into being on July 10 and that on July 11 the rates were raised, other increases taking place at periods of a few days until the rates were increased from four and a half cents, I think his statement was, to seven cents. My recollection is that another witness corrected that by stating that the rates had got down to three and a half cents and were increased to six and a half cents. Mr. Bredt supports his contention that a monopoly might result, if the business was handed over wholly to Canadian shippers, from what happened last July.

I should like to refer to certain statements and figures which appear on pages 28 and 29 of the evidence. I do not wish to weary the house by repeating these figures, but I want to draw attention to certain facts in order that when this bill is discussed in committee the minister may be able to give some explanation in respect of the matters to which I refer.

On page 28 of the evidence schedule 1 is set out showing shipments of grain from Fort William and Port Arthur to Canadian and United States ports by Canadian and United States vessels. It covers eleven crop years from 1920-21 to 1930-31. In the first two columns it shows that out of, in round figures, 1,452,000,000 bushels handled through Canadian ports, 1,411,000,000 were handled by Canadian vessels and only a little over 41,000,000 bushels were handled by United States vessels. In other words, the grain that went to Canadian seaports was handled almost entirely by Canadian boats. On the other hand, in the next two columns it is shown that out of 1,464,000,000 bushels of grain which were sent to United States ports, 1,282,000,000 bushels were handled by United States vessels while only about 181,000,000 bushels were handed by Canadian vessels. In other words, the grain which was shipped to United States ports was largely handled by United States ships.

There is a rather interesting schedule following that, schedule 2, which shows the lake shipments from Fort William and Port Arthur by nationality of vessels. In 1927-28, 788 cargoes in Canadian vessels comprised a total of roughly 148,000,000 bushels while 508 cargoes in United States vessels comprised 150,000,000 bushels. In other words, 508 United States vessels carried more than 788 Canadian vessels. This indicates that the Canadian vessels were either old and obsolete or were of less carrying capacity than the United States vessels. The same proportion holds good more or less throughout the remainder of the schedule.

Mr. MANION: Is that not because the Canadian vessels are largely canal boats going through to Montreal?

Mr. BOWMAN: Some of them go all the way from the head of the lakes to Montreal.

Mr. MANION: That is what I mean.

Mr. BOWMAN: That is probably one reason that would account for this. But reading the evidence one certainly was impressed by the fact that a considerable number of the boats belonging to the Canadian shipping interests were obsolete, although the shipping interests emphasized the fact that they had plenty of tonnage to handle the grain under all circumstances.

Schedule 3 shows how the grain was exported during a period of four years, as follows, in round figures:

Crop year—	Exported through Canadian ports bushels	Exported through United States ports bushels
1927-28..	140,000,000	168,000,000
1928-29..	180,000,000	190,000,000
1929-30..	86,000,000	78,000,000
1930-31..	119,000,000	102,000,000

This shows that in the first two years more wheat was shipped through United States than through Canadian ports, but in the latter two years more was shipped through Canadian than through United States ports, although the quantities are very close. I have taken some time to draw these facts to the attention of the committee to show that the routing of grain is of tremendous importance to western Canada. The eastern route is of great importance to Manitoba and the eastern part of Saskatchewan. I presume from about the middle of Saskatchewan west through the province of Alberta the grain is mostly routed through Vancouver.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, all Saskatchewan grain goes east.

Mr. STEVENS: Not all.

Mr. VALLANCE: Most of it.

Mr. BOWMAN: A considerable proportion of it goes east.

Mr. VALLANCE: The dividing line is about twenty miles from the eastern boundary of Alberta.

Mr. BOWMAN: A fraction of a cent of difference in shipping charges often determines the route by which grain will be shipped, and before I, for one, would be prepared to support this bill, I would certainly have to know, if the shipping interests are to be benefited, that it is not to be at the expense of the producers. The minister may be able to show us by the statistics which he has and as a result of the amendments which are contained in this bill, that the effect will be to give an increased volume of business to Canadian vessels, thus helping them, but certainly I would not for a moment be prepared to support this bill if I thought the effect would be, as I said a moment ago, to increase in the slightest degree, by a fraction of a cent, the cost to the grain producers of the west.

Another element which I think should be cleared up, I presume in committee, is the matter of safeguards or control. The minister, in the few introductory remarks which he made, referred to control, and read to the house the provisions of section 938 of the Shipping Act. I regret that I did not have an opportunity of reading carefully the provisions of that section, but I was surprised to hear the minister say that it had been in effect since 1923. I of course accept the minister's statement. But hon. members from the west will remember that, I think in 1924 or 1925, I am not sure of the year, there was some trouble with respect to shipping grain east. An hon. member informs me that it was 1922. If 1922 was the year, probably that would account for the amendment in 1923. At that time United States vessels had to be invited in to break our laws and we had to grant them immunity for so doing, which was a rather paradoxical situation. I should be glad if, when we are in committee, the minister would again read to us the provisions of section 938, so that if that is the case it may be made clear to us, that the governor in council may by order in council suspend the provisions of the bill now before us for consideration.

In the evidence to which I have referred the only questions that were asked of Mr. Bredt with respect to control appear on page 56:

> Right Hon. Arthur Meighen: But with evolution the units get bigger and there has to be control.
> Mr. Bredt: That answers the question, then, that we must have a rate control body?

I may say in fairness to Mr. Bredt that he did not express any opinion other than this with respect to the advisability of control.

The minister has referred to the power which at the present time is vested in the Board of Grain Commissioners with respect to control of rates. I have looked up the provisions of the act and I am not so clear in my own mind that the board have sufficient control. While the minister was speaking one member interjected that the act provides for maximum control, which is the case. Section 3 of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act of 1923 provides for the filing with the Board of Grain Commissioners of the tariff of rates to be charged, as well as subsequent changes in that regard. Section 4 of that act provides:

> It shall be the duty of the board to receive and tabulate all such tariffs and rates as may be filed with the board as aforesaid, and moreover, to ascertain by all available means, the rates of freight which prevail or are exacted or required for the carriage of grain from Fort William or Port Arthur to any of the ports or places aforesaid, and to consider and report to the Minister of Trade and Commerce from time to time any facts which may come to the knowledge of the board and which tend to show that there is a deficiency of cargo space, excessive freight charges or discrimination in the rates with respect to the carriage of grain as aforesaid, and all shipowners and other persons engaged in the grain carrying trade in Canada shall, upon reasonable request, immediately furnish to the board such information as they may possess relating to any of the matters aforesaid, and shall for any wilful refusal or neglect to furnish the same be guilty of an offence against this act and be liable to a penalty recoverable upon summary conviction not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars for each such offence.

Section 5, which is the operative part, provides:

When in the opinion of the board the toll, charge or rate which any company, owner or person charges or intends or proposes to charge for the carriage of grain as aforesaid is unreasonable or excessive or amounts to an unjust discrimination against any person, company or class of persons as compared with the tolls or rates for similar traffic between Canadian and United States ports, or between one port and another in either of said countries, the board may prescribe such maximum rates as it may consider reasonable.

The section goes on to provide that the rates so prescribed may be limited in their application to particular seasons of the year.

If there is a possibility of a monopoly being created, or if there is, by reason of the fact that our coastal laws are changed, a possibility of their having the effect which I have previously set out, then it is certainly most important that the government retain complete control so that it may at any time the need arises take action either through the Board of Grain Commissioners or by order in council to keep effective control over the situation. I may say in that connection that Mr. Sydney Smith stated that he did not think it was necessary to have a board but that if the act was left as it was competition would effectively settle the rates. But the fact is that under the old act there did arise in July of last year a situation which those appearing before the board treated as a monopoly, and upon that occasion they appealed to the Board of Grain Commissioners and had a maximum rate fixed. I do not know on how many occasions the Board of Grain Commissioners have acted in that way, but I am rather under the impression that there have been only two. Certainly up to the present the board has not been regarded as a rate fixing body.

I have made these remarks, Mr. Speaker, with a view to drawing to the attention of the house certain facts which in a measure cover the situation. Might I again state that in order for this bill to receive my support it will have to be shown to me quite clearly that there is ample provision for protecting the western producer so that he will not become the victim of any monopoly which may result from the bringing into effect of this amendment; also that there will be effective control, and that if there is to be benefit to those engaged in the carrying of this grain, it shall not be acquired at the expense of the grain grower.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I was under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that there was a time-honoured rule that speakers should be taken alternatively in an important debate, and I cannot recollect in a rather long experience a cabinet member introducing a bill being immediately followed by a speaker on his own side of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) was the first to rise to his feet and was first seen by the Speaker when the minister sat down. There was no discrimination in the matter.

Mr. NEILL: I see that Bourinot at page 334 says:

In all important debates it is customary for the Speaker to endeavour to give the preference, alternately, to the known supporters and opponents of a measure or question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The same rule is followed in this house invariably. But if an hon. member desiring to speak neglects to rise to his feet and another hon. member is on his feet the latter has a right to be heard.

Mr. NEILL: I was on my feet first. I was on my feet too soon, as a matter of fact. However, I am not surprised at all.

We have waited twenty-five years for a measure of this kind, and now a sorry substitute for the reform we desired has been brought down in the very last hours of the session.

I am not rising to deal with the subject matter which entirely engrossed the minister when he introduced the bill and his supporter behind him. I leave that to be dealt with by members on both sides of the house who are far more competent to deal with it than I am, nor shall I follow the hon. member for Dauphin in putting on Hansard a large portion of the records of another house. I would assume that hon. members interested in the subject would have already read that debate. For a few moments I should like to deal with another matter. I wish to enter a protest against this bill which seeks to amend the Canada Shipping Act having to be discussed in committee of the whole house instead of by the special committee appointed for such purposes, namely the committee which deals with marine and fisheries matters.

We have an illustration of the need for such reference to a committee in the fact that this bill, which I suppose contains a dozen sections, has been referred to as regards one section only. But there are a dozen more sections.

The general character of any bill amending the shipping act is largely technical and for that reason it is all the more necessary it should be referred to a committee, because there are very few, if any men, in this house thoroughly versed in shipping terms. I do not know that there are any men in the house thoroughly versed in the technical terms, and moreover there are very few hon. members —I doubt if there are any—directly representative of the shipping interests, more particularly the seamen, the masters, mates and so on. Therefore a very large body of hon. members will be more or less indifferent to a measure of this type, although it has tonight a special interest given to it because of reference which has been made to the grain trade. The presentation of the bill in this way will mean one of two things, either that it will be a long time going through committee of the whole, or it will go through without being properly understood and debated. A very fine illustration of the advisability of sending it to a committee was seen the other day when one of the most contentious bills —not contentious in a party sense; I refer to the pensions bill—was put through the house in two or three hours, because it had been thoroughly discussed and agreed to in committee. That is what should be done in this case. May I give an illustration of one or two of the technical points involved. I wonder how many hon. members understand some of the terms with which we will have to deal. I wonder if the minister himself understands them? Does he know what a cotter pin is? Does he know what mousings are? Does he know what a full line is, or a hatch combing, or a heel block, or a hog lashing? I have picked out only one or two at random. Yet we are supposed to discuss the technical use of these terms.

I refer more particularly of course to the big bill which was introduced earlier in the session in the Senate. It contained over eight hundred sections. I am told it was the biggest bill that had ever been introduced into this parliament, and yet it was solemnly proposed, in the face of protest, to bring it into committee of the whole in this house and have it passed in a way which would make it impossible to get anything like appropriate information or discussion on the matter.

[Mr. Neill.]

Let me quote a sentence or two from letters I have received concerning this bill. In a letter from the Canadian Merchant Service Guild I find the following:

> There is no language which we would care to employ that could adequately express the feelings of the masters and officers on this coast with regard to some of the proposals which are contained in the act. When we say that it is rank discrimination that, in our opinion, is only half expressing the situation.

And later:

> It is the most impracticable piece of legislation that we have heard of and those who are responsible for framing the act can have little or no practical knowledge of the steamship business, particularly as it affects this coast.

Then the Canadian Association of Seamen, Vancouver branch, writes as follows:

> For three weeks we have had a committee working steadily on each clause.

And then they go on to express their opinion about the legislation. The committee worked for three weeks on it, and then they obtained only a vague grasp of it. Then, I should like to make some comments concerning the number of amendments arising from their investigations. The first body I mentioned produced amendments numbering twenty-five. Another body, the All-Canadian Congress, produced twenty-five amendments. Then, the Association of Seamen, which had a committee sitting for three weeks, produced amendments which cover many pages. Their amendments are contained on thirty-five closely typewritten pages. After they had sent them in they had another thought, and sent another couple of pages of closely typewritten foolscap containing further amendments and comments they had made concerning the bill. That is the body which has studied the legislation for three weeks. Does that not give some indication of the necessity for this legislation going before a committee where men sitting around the table could take it into consideration, a place where they would have the advantage of the services of men capable of giving technical explanations? After such treatment they would be in a better position to deal with it.

If I remember correctly, this bill was brought to the house last Saturday. The people on the Pacific coast have not yet heard of it, with the exception of the casual wire which may have been sent out and which could explain only sketchily the nature of the bill which had been introduced. As their representatives in this house we are supposed to stand up and give competent opinion and advice on a matter with which we are almost entirely unfamiliar. We have not heard from those men whose interests will be affected. Is that the famous British justice that we hear so much about? Is it common sense?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Does the hon. member know that for over a month this bill has been before the Senate?

Mr. NEILL: It was before the Senate, but who in British Columbia knows or wants to know anything about the Senate?

Mr. DURANLEAU: They could read the proceedings of the Senate in the newspapers.

Mr. NEILL: It would be a hard day for us when we had to shape our legislation from newspaper reports, because they cannot be accurate. Besides, did the newspapers wire eight hundred sections? The associations to which I have referred got hold of the big bill, and over forty typewritten pages of proposed changes is the fruit of their research. Those who went through the legislation said it was absurd; they had never seen the like of it. They believed it was the greatest piece of discrimination they had ever seen. But so far as this bill is concerned, I must say that unless it has come to them in their dreams, they have not heard of it. As soon as I got it I mailed it, but I could not wire it. Should we stand here passing something vitally affecting their interests, when they do not know anything about it?

Why was this bill left until the last minute? Why was it not introduced earlier? It has been lying in the minister's office since 1908—I do not blame the minister—but I must say the deputy minister did not have the courage or the enterprise to bring it forward. Then other things developed,—the war, and so on. We have waited all that time. The act was so obsolete that the penalties were described in pounds, shillings and pence, instead of in dollars and cents. It is so obsolete that those who had framed the legislation had never heard of a motor gas boat. During the last two or three years I have begged the minister, time and time again—and I begged the last administration—to bring in a bill and let it stand over for a session thereby giving the people interested an opportunity for discussion.

I shall not take further time of the house. I do hope the government will take notice of what I have said concerning what these people think and want. They are an important body. When the big bill comes down next year it should be sent to a committee. There are some changes I should like to suggest in this bill, I shall refer to one change made by the Senate which in my view is most unfair. It deals with the tackle for the loading and unloading of ships. However I shall speak in committee, and shall give other hon. members who are vitally interested an opportunity to speak now on the motion for second reading.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I rise to oppose the second reading of the bill. As an illustration of legislation calculated to serve special interests, this is about the finest specimen that has come to my attention. I ask the government this question: What was the special hurry in connection with these sections? They constitute only a few out of the very large bill which has to be considered next year. What is the hurry in connection with this bill? The present coastal laws with respect to the great lakes and to the Pacific have remained on our statute books for some time. From time to time they have been altered or amended by order in council and regulation. Now, on the second to the last day of this session, as some of us hope, this bill is suddenly thrust upon us without any opportunity of considering it in a standing committee of the commons. Indeed, in its very make-up there is evidence of the haste with which it was drafted, in spite of the consideration given by the Senate committee. I wonder if hon. members of the committee have taken the trouble to read section 3, which appears on page 1 of the bill. Let me read the first three lines:

> Whenever the minister is so appointed as the pilotage authority his appointment shall, without more, extend to his successors in office—

In the name of goodness what does that mean? I have always understood that the language of seamen was a weird and awful thing, and this may have been drafted by a seaman. I understand that when they are ashore "more" is a popular word with them.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Would my hon. friend permit me to make an observation? In my opening remarks I stated that an amendment would be proposed in connection with this section.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should imagine so; I should be very much surprised if the minister did not move an amendment. I am not criticizing his proposal to amend the section; I am pointing to the evidence of haste and carelessness which appears in the bill before me.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Perhaps I might read the amendment to my hon. friend; I hope he will be satisfied with it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope so, but I am not quarreling with the minister on that point.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Why discuss the clause now when it is to be amended?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Because it is a typical illustration of the haste in this matter which, as the minister said, is to give protection to special shipping interests. The minister's own words come back to him; this is to give special privilege to some shipping interests.

Mr. DURANLEAU: To Canadian ship owners.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, but how does the minister know they are Canadian companies? When we are in committee of the whole will he be prepared to lay before the committee the names and nationality of the shareholders and the amount of their holdings in these companies? There are many so called Canadian companies that are by no means Canadian, and I should like further information before I accept the glib reference of the minister to Canadian companies. That is aside from the subject, however; the minister draws these remarks upon himself by his interjections. He has stated that this bill is for the purpose of protecting shipowners, and there is no doubt in my mind that this is the purpose. Equally there is no doubt that this protection will be secured to the disadvantage of the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, that is my conviction. I will tell the Minister of Marine, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), that it was recognition of the danger of agreements between the two railway companies against the interests of the western grain growers that induced this house to put on the statute books a statutory maximum rate for grain moving over the railways. I say that in this case also, if the government are sincere in their desire to protect the interests of the farmers, they will provide a statutory rate on the great lakes for grain and grain products as they have done on the railways.

There is no doubt whatever that section 935 of the bill before us strengthens the position of the lake shippers' association to which the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) very properly referred as having taken advantage of their organized position in days gone by, to the disadvantage of the grain growers of western Canada as well as the exporters of grain. Here there are two great interests involved, and it is not going to satisfy the farmers of western Canada to say that the shippers of eastern Canada are to receive a special privilege which enables them to create a monopoly under the guise of legislation, and so take advantage of their position as they did in the past. The hon. member for Dauphin said that representatives of some bodies appearing before the Senate committee feared the possibility of a combine. I say they would have been justified in declaring that it is virtually certain that a combine will be created as soon as this legislation is passed. Indeed, to all intents and purposes there is a monopoly and a combine on the great lakes at the present time. As an illustration of that statement let me remind the committee that last year in spite of steadily declining grain prices to a point which the government must admit to have been far below the cost of production, these lake shippers reorganized their association which apparently had not been operative since the scandal in connection with the previous combine, and at once advanced the rate to 7 cents.

Then this Inland Water Freight Rates Act of 1923 appeared on the scene, but I direct the attention of the government to the fact that here, as in previous cases, no rate fixing power is vested in the Board of Grain Commissioners under the act. Whatever rights they have are ambiguous in the act, and it is questionable whether or not the act is within the competence of this parliament. At any rate, according to all the information I have been able to secure, no decisions have been handed down as such by the Board of Grain Commissioners under the Inland Water Freight Rates Act of 1923, but they brought moral pressure, moral suasion, to bear on the lake shippers. The result has been that in spite of the collapse in grain prices we secured a reduction of only half a cent in the freight rates on the great lakes, a reduction from 7 to 6½ cents.

I can assure the members of the government that the farmers of the west do not look upon that sort of protection as at all adequate. As soon as this body is created the farmers will pay the price to the shareholders of these companies. I submit that instead of going into this thing in this way—I am reminded by a good friend of mine that the promise of some reciprocal trade treaty with the United States looms on the horizon—the government should delay action on this bill. The matter is not so very urgent, so why not delay action until the complete revision takes place next year, and in the meantime the government might exert all its influence in order to secure a cooperative agreement with the United States so as to free shipping on the great lakes and give the farmers healthy competition in regard to rates. Some hon. gentlemen may argue that the farmer does not get the benefit of reduced rates on the great lakes, and I think that is very true. I believe that in the majority of cases when there is a temporary reduction, especially in the shipping season, say a monthly or a weekly reduction, it is the exporter who gets the advantage. I do not think there is any doubt about it; the man who owns the grain at Fort William gets the benefit. I ask hon. gentlemen to notice that the creation of the pools, especially when they established their own agencies at Liverpool, brought into the picture an entirely new factor so that the farmers were enabled to secure the advantages of the reduced rates because of the fact that they were themselves shipping grain and selling it on the Liverpool market.

There is a further point in this connection which should not escape hon. gentlemen; it is that when the rates are pushed up at once the farmer is compelled to carry the load. The increase is deducted from the Fort William price, and this is a factor in determining the level of wheat prices in Winnipeg and throughout the west. So any bill of this kind, which is calculated to create a monopoly unless accompanied by a statutory maximum rate, does not do justice to the farmers of the west, and in my opinion should not be permitted to pass the house.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Garland, Bow River) asked the reason for the hurry with this bill, and suggested that it should be left over until next year. There is at least one very good reason, if not several. It will be recalled that for some time past—and personally I have had the matter in hand for several years—pressure has been brought to bear upon the government to enact some safety legislation with regard to ships' tackle and so forth. But those who were urging this were advised that the revision of the shipping act was coming forward in the near future, and it was suggested that they should wait until that time arrived. This year an attempt was made to introduce a complete revision of the shipping act, but certain very serious constitutional difficulties arising out of the necessity of synchronizing the new revised act with the statute of Westminster and similar shipping acts throughout other parts of the empire made it necessary to postpone the revision. It was thought desirable therefore to bring in this brief bill for the purpose at least of giving effect to this safety appliance provision with regard to ships' tackle. That is one reason, and to my mind a sufficient reason, and I wish to pay due meed of praise to my colleague for bringing this forward and doing a measure of justice to those who are engaged in the hazardous work of loading ships in our various ports. It has been recognized for a long time that such hazardous work called for some definite measures that would reasonably protect the workmen while at their task, and before turning my attention to the controversial clause of the bill I should like to refer briefly to that portion of it.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), in his usual sarcastic manner,—

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. STEVENS: —referred to this part of the bill in most scathing terms. I think his remarks were entirely unjustifiable. There is nothing mysterious about the nautical or shipping terms used in the bill; they are ordinary terms which are quite common and are fully understood both by the officials dealing with the matter and by any person who has had any acquaintance with shipping, and most certainly by everyone associated with the work of seamen. But there is no reason why my hon. friend should sneer at the supposed ignorance of members of the government so far as these nautical terms are concerned. The hon. gentleman is not the only man in the house or in the world who has a fairly wide knowledge of many of these things, and I would suggest to him that he would have been serving those whose interests he frequently pretends to have at heart—

Mr. VALLANCE: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing out of order in that. I say, he would have been serving much better those whose interests he has at heart had he said a word of commendation to the minister for at least the attempt to bring in these measures providing for safety appliances in the ports. In regard to that feature of the bill I would say this—details of course will be discussed in committee; I am making a very brief reference to the matter here. Provision will be made for an inspector in the ports, to be paid by the government or by the port authorities, to inspect ship's tackle. It is commonly known that frequently stevedoring companies in loading ships will put a more severe strain upon the tackle than it is properly constructed to bear, and so in the bill it is provided that when any heavy weights are to be loaded, weights such as heavy machinery, huge castings, and things of that kind, the weight if above a specified point must be clearly marked on the article itself, and due care must be taken in the handling of such heavy weights. Furthermore, the inspector is empowered to enter a ship at any time and demand access to its tackle, and any information, any records or matters of that description that may be required by him in the inspection of tackle to see that it is safe shall be provided. He is also empowered to see that any man working around ships at night shall do so by adequate lighting. He is empowered, again, where he learns of a practice which is becoming very common, of having men working in the hold of ships when huge weights are being lowered, in the larger ships from a comparatively great height, to see that the men are not forced to work under conditions such as they have worked under in the past. I know, as I am sure my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni also knows, that particularly on the Pacific coast where large fir logs, huge things weighing tons, are loaded to be shipped to Japan, frequently serious accidents occur and sometimes death because men have been compelled by shall I say rather avaricious bosses to work in dangerous situations. The minister and his staff have provided in this bill very fair and adequate measures for the protection of such men, and I submit that if for no other reason at all the bill should be welcomed by the house. It ought to be having the support to-night of members who are not in the house and who ought to be in their places to support it. There is another provision dealing with pilotage, with which I am not so familiar, but which I understand is desirable in the interests of the pilotage authorities of the country.

Now, for these purposes the bill was justified in its introduction into this house. In the closing clause of the bill will be noted a paragraph which I think is absolutely necessary because of the new conditions which arise out of the passage of the statute of Westminster. I am not presuming now to give any opinion from a legal standpoint, for I am not competent to do so; I merely state the matter as a layman. I understand however that by the passage of the statute of Westminster there are certain provisions of the Canadian act which if disturbed now might be regarded as not in harmony with the statute of Westminster and the old act, and so it was necessary to insert this clause, closing the bill:

> No provision of this act shall be deemed to operate as a repeal within the meaning or pursuant to the provisions of the statute of Westminster, 1931, or otherwise, of any provision of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, of the parliament of Great Britain, or any amendment thereof or addition thereto.

The need for that is that until the Canada Shipping Act is completely revised and brought into complete harmony with the act of Westminster it is imperative that we maintain all rights which shipping interests, sailors, masters and others have under both the Canada Shipping Act and the Merchant Shipping Act, both of which statutes are largely interwoven in their administration in Canada. This is an added reason why the bill should go through now.

May I turn now briefly to the controversial clause of the bill, the amendment to section 935 of the Canada Shipping Act? The hon. member for Bow River a moment ago, with that vigour for which he is so noted, and that eloquence that marks all his utterances, declared that this legislation was designed to create a monopoly in shipping. He said it was designed to serve special interests, the shipping interests, and he also said we had designed the legislation to serve such special interests because we wished to injure the producer. That is summing up very briefly the observations of the hon. gentleman, and I may say that in making these observations he has voiced an opinion which I have heard expressed in the last few days in casual conversation by some who apparently have not given due consideration to the proposals contained in this bill.

I submit in the first place that the bill is not designed for any such purpose; but there is a certain condition obtaining in Canada which has obtained for many years to which it is desirable the Canadian parliament should give consideration. I shall give certain figures in a moment to support my point, but briefly stated it is this: so far as the movement of American grain from American ports to the seaboard is concerned, Canadian ships cannot get any share of that business. Let us put that down clearly as a statement of fact. We are not complaining about it; that is the business of our American neighbours, but under their law Canadian ships cannot share in that or any other business. For the moment, we are dealing largely with grain. On the other hand, Canadian grain or other merchandise which moves in large quantities from the head of the lakes may be and has been moved quite freely by American vessels. It has moved just as freely and in almost as large quantities as by Canadian vessels. While hon. gentlemen may feel some apprehension should we attempt to divert a larger portion of this particular trade to Canadian bottoms, I submit that it is certainly no crime for the Canadian parliament, this government, myself or anyone else to propose to nurture Canadian shipping interests. It is no greater crime than proposing that we should nurture Canadian interests in any other branch of activity.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The minister says that at the present time Canadian grain can be moved and is being moved practically as freely by American bottoms from Canadian ports to seaboard as in Canadian boats. Could that be done from one Canadian port to another?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will bear with me while I make a general argument, I will come back and demonstrate that point in a moment. Let us lay this down as being fair at least: it is the business of parliament to nurture Canadian interests, whatever those interests may be. In this instance we have found that Canadian shipping interests on the great lakes are subject to a discrimination. As I have stated already, they are precluded from sharing in the business from American sources but they must share the Canadian business with American bottoms. Let us examine this briefly. With the permission of the house I shall place on Hansard a table which I shall analyse very briefly. I shall not merely ask to place this upon Hansard, I shall deal with it step by step. For the sake of clarity, I will ask Hansard to place one column of the table in tabulated form upon the record. This table is as follows:

This shows the clearances from the head of the lakes for the years 1919 to 1931, and I have 1932 on a separate sheet. I will refer hastily to the figures leaving out the odd numerals. I think it will be seen very readily to what degree American boats have shared in our business. In referring to tonnages, I will refer to those for total grains rather than just wheat as it will give a more complete picture.

Mr. YOUNG: Has the minister the rates for those years?

Mr. STEVENS: I will base another argument upon rates. In 1919 there was moved by Canadian boats to Canadian ports, 115,000,000 bushels; by Canadian boats to American ports, 2,000,000 bushels and by American boats to American ports, 9,000,000 bushels. In the next year there was moved by Canadian boats to Canadian ports, 76,000,000 bushels; by Canadian boats to American ports, 12,000,000 bushels and by American boats to American ports, 52,000,000 bushels. In the next year there was moved by Canadian boats to Canadian ports, 131,000,000 bushels; by Canadian boats to American ports, 7,000,000 bushels and by American boats to American ports, 91,000,000 bushels. The figures show the same relation right down the line, but later on they are even more startling. For instance in 1923 the movement by Canadian boats to Canadian ports was 163,000,000 bushels; by Canadian boats to American ports, 17,000,000 bushels; American boats to Canadian ports, 1,000,000 bushels and American boats to American ports, 126,000,000 bushels. Those figures show the competition by American boats in carrying grain from Canadian sources. A very substantial portion of the movement by American boats to American ports is moved back again into Canadian sources. The movement in 1929 by Canadian boats to Canadian ports was 104,000,000 bushels; by Canadian boats to American ports, 21,000,000 bushels and by American boats to American ports, 71,000,000 bushels. In that same year there were 51,000,000 bushels moved back again into Canadian channels, and largely by American boats from Buffalo to Montreal.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the minister the figures showing how much was carried by American and how much by Canadian boats?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I have not.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is a very important point.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: That is important, but we do know that a very large portion is moved by American bottoms. The firm of Boland and Cornelius of Buffalo handle the majority of this Canadian grain to Montreal. If my hon. friend will follow me he will see that all the way down in this list there is a movement by American boats from Canadian sources to American ports. The figures are 72,000,000 bushels, 96,000,000 bushels, 71,000,000 bushels, 179,000,000 bushels, 116,000,000 bushels, 151,000,000 bushels and so on. We are arguing that a larger proportion of that grain ought to be moved by Canadian boats from Canadian sources to the destination in eastern Canada. So much for that.

Then we come to the grain moved to Buffalo by American boats where it goes into storage. The voyage is ended as far as we are concerned. Buffalo is a sort of kicking-off place; the grain may go to New York, to Baltimore, to Portland, to Boston or to Montreal and, to a lesser degree, to Halifax or Saint John during the winter time. However, that is a movement by rail and does not concern us at this time. The fact is that the shipment ends at Buffalo and becomes a new shipment when it goes on to Montreal. American boats are allowed to go in to pick up this grain and move it to Montreal. This cannot be done under the American law with the conditions reversed.

Mr. YOUNG: Where would such a reverse condition prevail?

Mr. STEVENS: There might be a movement from Duluth to lake ports, although nothing like as large as far as grain is concerned. There might be a considerable movement in other commodities. Grain might be moved from Duluth or Chicago to Port Colborne, to Midland or other ports and from there moved on to Montreal.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): On grain moved from Buffalo to Montreal, could you get the preference?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, if that grain is shipped on a through bill of lading from the head of the lakes, it would get the preference just the same as if it went direct to Montreal.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not think the minister grasped my question. I wanted to know where a condition prevails where United States goods come from a United States port to a Canadian port and then back again into the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already stated from Duluth, for instance, to the bay ports and then back to Buffalo, then shipped down to New York direct by rail, or shipped to Port Colborne, for example, and then by rail or the Erie canal to New York or other United States ports.

Mr. YOUNG: Has the minister any figures in regard to that?

Mr. STEVENS: I have them somewhere, but I cannot lay my hands on them at the moment. The movement of course, is very much smaller on the Canadian side. I have figures somewhere showing the movement runs from about 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 bushels to, I think, 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 in a year. It is not a large movement, but the principle is there just the same that you cannot move United States grain by Canadian vessels to a Canadian port where it is again moved back into United States channels.

Mr. VALLANCE: In the evidence submitted before the Senate committee, was it not proven that very little, if any, of the grain going from Buffalo back to Montreal ever went out in United States bottoms?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: The evidence says so.

Mr. STEVENS: My information is—and it was very carefully prepared for me—that the major portion of it is moved by United States bottoms.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister has not the figures?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: From Buffalo to Montreal?

Mr. STEVENS: From Buffalo to Montreal, and I gave the name of one of the large shipping companies which handles most of it. I think we are clear, however, on that discrepancy between, shall I say the rights of Canadian shipping interests on the lakes as against United States shipping interests.

Mr. BROWN: In order that we may be clear on that point, is the minister prepared to assert that the United States laws would prevent Canadian ships from taking United States grain from Port Colborne back to a United States port?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. BROWN: That is a parallel case.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I say that a Canadian shipper cannot carry United States grain from a United States port to a Canadian port and then by the same or another vessel, either one or the other, carry it from that Canadian port back into a United States port. Furthermore, they cannot do that for either leg of the movement. That is why in this bill, as will be noted, the minister has provided:

> No goods shall be transported by water or by land and water, from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation in any ship other than a British ship.

That is why that provision is inserted. That brings us into conformity with the United States law in a reverse situation. I have under my hand the United States law which I might read at this point in juxtaposition with the clause I have read from the present bill:

> No merchandise shall be transported by water, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States.

That is the United States law and it will be seen that the legislation we are now enacting is practically the same.

Mr. VALLANCE: At the present time no United States bottom can take Canadian wheat from one Canadian port to another.

Mr. STEVENS: That is true, if the law is strictly applied. I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned that because I was overlooking a point. During past years it has been the practice to permit United States vessels to come into Canadian waters to move grain. This will be seen by the following figures. I will take, for instance, a series of years showing the number of bushels carried by United States boats from one Canadian port to another:

Year	Bushels
1924	1,000,000
1925	4,000,000
1926	4,900,000
1927	7,000,000
1928	19,000,000

Mr. LUCAS: Is that from a Canadian port to a Canadian port?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, by United States vessels with the permission of the government of Canada.

Let me make this point clear: It was admitted that some years ago there was possibly a shortage of Canadian tonnage to cope with the full movement of our Canadian wheat, but during the last six or seven years there has been a tremendous accretion to Canadian tonnage for the purpose of taking care of more and more of this business. To-day we have sufficient Canadian tonnage to handle all our business and also to take care of a substantial portion of that which has been moved by United States vessels to United States ports.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the minister the information as to the time of year that those volumes of wheat were moved by United States bottoms?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. BROWN: Is that not wheat that was in storage?

Mr. VALLANCE: That is the point.

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly some of it was, but not to the extent of 19,000,000 or 21,000,000 bushels.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think the minister will remember that every fall there was a row over this very matter and United States bottoms were allowed in.

Mr. STEVENS: That is true.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I know there was a row three or four years ago.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but the point I made a moment ago must not be lost sight of. It was recognized that there was a shortage of Canadian tonnage and Canadian firms remedied that from year to year by increasing their tonnage and putting more capital into the building of ships until, I think, in the last five years—and some hon. gentlemen who are better informed than I am may correct me—there was developed sufficient tonnage to take care of this business and to-day we have a great surplus of tonnage.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Might I ask one more question purely for the sake of accuracy? As I understand the matter, when this bill becomes law, under the laws of the two countries it will no longer be possible for Canadian grain to go to Buffalo or another United States port and then back to a Canadian port, by any line whatever?

Mr. STEVENS: By Canadian vessels.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: By either. The United States law would prevent its being done by a Canadian vessel. Wheat having once been shipped from a Canadian port to Buffalo could not be reshipped to a Canadian port.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is losing sight of the fact that the United States coastwise law is limited to grain moving from one United States destination to another United States destination. In this instance grain will be moved by Canadian vessels just the same as it has been moved on both legs of the route by Canadian vessels.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but I think he realizes that the privilege of moving grain in the fall by United States boats has not been on account of shortage of Canadian tonnage; it has been to provide extra storage at bay ports for winter unloading and shipment by rail.

Mr. STEVENS: In part, yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: Mostly.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not say mostly, because my hon. friend will note in some instances the figures are very large. May I suggest to my hon. friends that I have only forty minutes and we are not in committee. I wish to deal with one or two points which really come under my department and I am afraid I am not making very rapid progress.

Naturally there comes to the minds of hon. members the question of rates; that is, I think, the all-important point. We have before us evidence of the rates, for instance, over a period of years. I am taking the rates for the years 1923 to 1932 and for the months of July, August, September and October. Taking the average of those four months the rates from Fort William to Montreal since 1923 have been as follows:

Year	Rate per bushel cents
1923	10.45
1924	8.40
1925	8.30
1926	8.94
1927	7.80
1928	8.40
1929	8.35
1930	8.05

It will be noted that the average rate during that period, with the exception of the last two years, exceeded eight cents a bushel. What I want to place before my hon. friends is this. When we are chided as we were a moment ago by the hon. member for Bow River with not having done any better last year than fixing the maximum rate at 6½ cents, it is not quite fair criticism in the light of the rates that have prevailed during all those years. In other words, there is an element of fairness in all of this, and we thought that last year in preventing the lake shippers from raising their rates above 6½ cents we were giving them not only a fair deal but at the same time a chance to live, which they were not having under the very low rate which had obtained for a month or two. I am certain of this, that the producers of western Canada are not going to ask that they shall continue to be served by rail or boat at a constantly losing rate. It cannot be done economically; it cannot continue. The evidence I have placed before the committee shows that for a period of ten years the average rate has been upwards of eight cents, and therefore we ought not to be condemned for fixing the maximum rate at 6½ cents. That brings me to the point of control.

My hon. friend from Dauphin and others have asked, is there any effective control? Some slighting remarks were made about the Inland Water Freight Rates Act. I think that was not wisely done. The Inland Water Freight Rates Act, it is true, does not say that the Board of Grain Commissioners shall fix rates at which cargoes shall be moved, in the way that the railway board fixes rates for rail traffic, and there are obvious reasons why that would be undesirable. I think it would be equally inimical to the producers and shippers as well as to others because the board might even fix a rate which was above that which the boats would charge under open competition. There is open competition at the present time. There is not a monopoly on the great lakes; let us get that clear. Many boats are handling grain to-day below the maximum rate fixed. The maximum rate was fixed here about two weeks ago when the matter was referred to me by the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners. The board under the act brought the matter to my attention as a matter of routine and a maximum rate was fixed from the head of the lakes to Montreal, Sorel and Quebec of 6½ cents, which is looked upon as a fair and equitable rate. Somebody has said that it was unwise to fix maximum rates, suggesting there was something bad about it. Why, Mr. Speaker, the fixation of a maximum rate, leaving it open for competition to give a rate below the maximum, is obviously better than having a rate fixed by some board of commissioners as has been suggested.

Mr. VALLANCE: Only to the exporter.

Mr. STEVENS: To the producer too.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister be good enough to bring down to the committee tomorrow morning a copy of the order fixing the maximum rate?

Mr. STEVENS: I will have that order brought down. Let me now turn to the Inland Water Freight Rates Act. I may say that I criticized this act pretty severely at the time it was passed. My hon. friend (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) will remember when the late Mr. Low was minister, standing right where I am now standing, when he passed this act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will say you criticized it.

Mr. STEVENS: And it had a rather bad effect, I believe. Certainly we did criticize the act. The act has been in force. It has seldom been used, it is true, but it has been held there, as it were, over the shippers, and my hon. friends who are somewhat perturbed in the interests of the producers of the west could have invoked this act at any time, but they have not done so—not that I criticize them for that, but they did not invoke the act when the rates were ten and nine and eight cents. But we are putting it into force. We are exercising federal authority. The act says that every shipper shall immediately after entering into a charter party file with the board the terms of his charter party. That is the first clause. The next clause provides, and I think this clause has value and merit in it:

> It shall be the duty of the board to receive and tabulate all such tariffs.

That is the first duty. The next duty is this, that if the board on examination of the rates find that there is any deficiency of cargo space—I pause there for the purpose of emphasizing a very important point. If there is a deficiency of cargo space as there was in the years that I mentioned a moment ago, the particulars of which are under my hand, then what is done is to invoke the powers under the shipping act and suspend the coastwise laws. The clause was read by the Minister of Marine, but I shall read it again. It is section 938 of the Canada Shipping Act:

> The governor in council may, from time to time, by order in council declare that the foregoing provisions of this part—

That is the provisions that we are dealing with in this bill, namely sections 935 and other sections:

> —shall not, for the period specified in such order in council apply, either throughout Canada or in any specified waters of Canada, to the ships or vessels, or to any specified, ascertained or ascertainable class or number of the ships or vessels, of any foreign country.

That is, the governor in council may admit foreign tonnage into our waters if it is found under this act that there is a shortage of cargo space, and that has been done in almost every year, or in many years at least, during the last ten or twelve or thirteen years. Not only is it to be done in that case, but should there be any monopoly, should there be any challenge of the right of the government or of the Board of Grain Commissioners under this act to fix a maximum rate, this would then be applied. It has been the practice of governments to do it. It was done many times in the past, repeatedly done, and it is there for us to do it.

Should that not be considered sufficient, we have a regulation or a clause in the Customs Act, clause 298, which provides:

The governor in council may, from time to time, make regulations for declaring what shall be coasting trade or inland navigation respectively, and how the same shall be regulated in any case or class of cases, and may declare any trade or voyage on the seas, rivers, lakes or waters within or adjacent to Canada, whether to or from any place within or without Canada, or whether such seas, rivers, lakes or waters are or are not geographically, or for the purpose of other acts or laws, inland waters, to be a coasting trade or a coasting voyage within the meaning of this act and of such regulations, any may also, from time to time, by regulation, dispense, on any condition which he sees fit to impose, with such of the requirements of this act as he deems it inexpedient to enforce with regard to vessels engaged in any such trade or with respect to any case or class of cases.

In other words, under the Customs Act the governor in council has power to admit foreign vessels into the coastwise trade, both at sea, inland and elsewhere. So I submit to the committee that there is ample protection against a possible monopoly or against a violation of the principles of this bill.

I have taken more time than I expected, Mr. Speaker, largely because I have tried to answer questions at this stage instead of in committee. Let me conclude with just one or two observations.

Will the shipping interests, someone asks, benefit at the expense of the producer? I submit that that will not be the case. Certainly if I thought for a moment it would, I would never support this bill. I do say that we are entitled to take cognizance of the fact that our 100,000,000 bushels a year is carried in foreign vessels, and we have no opportunity of a like access to the American market. We are entitled to take cognizance of that fact, and to provide regulations which will safeguard Canadian shipping interests. It is not intended, however, that these shipping interests shall take advantage of such a privilege, to the detriment of the producer or shipper. As I have said, ample power is given to us, under the Inland Water Freight Rates Act, in the shipping act and in the Customs Act, to provide against any such encroachments on the rights of shippers, or any danger of a monopoly. Furthermore, such powers have been frequently exercised, and are recognized as common practice in this country.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): The minister was frank enough to say, as I understood him, that the purpose of the bill was to give protection to Canadian ship owners. Then he went on to say that he thought in this regard Canadian legislation—

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member would be content to call it eleven o'clock, if he intends to make a speech.

Mr. COOTE: I should be very happy if Mr. Speaker would call it eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 17, 1933

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

CONFERRING OF TITLES

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont):

Do the recent decorations granted in the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and in the Order of St. Gregory the Great, mean that Canadians holding titles in any order may now accept promotions in the same order as long as such promotions do not carry any rank or title?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. The promotion of the Right Honourable Sir George Halsey Perley, K.C.M.G., to be an ordinary member of the first class or Knights Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, was made in conformity with established constitutional practice, it being the considered view of His Majesty's government in Canada that the motion, with respect to honours, adopted on the 22nd day of May, 1919, by a majority vote of the members of the Commons House only of the thirteenth parliament (which was dissolved on the 4th day of October, 1921) is not binding upon His Majesty or His Majesty's government in Canada or the seventeenth parliament of Canada.

2. The government has no official knowledge of promotions in or appointments to the Order of St. Gregory the Great.

SENATE VACANCY

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Is there a Senate vacancy in the La Salle division?
2. If so, since what date?
3. Will the government fill the said vacancy in the near future?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Yes.
2. January 23, 1933.

3. An appointment will be made in due course.

CARLETON, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. MARCIL:

1. What was the revenue of the Carleton post office, county of Bonaventure, for last year?

2. Does the appointment of the new postmaster remain with the department or the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. $1,307.88.

2. With the department.

GOLD DEPOSITS

Mr. DORION:

1. What was the value of all gold deposited in the vaults of Canada's various chartered banks and in the vault of the Department of Finance, at March 31, 1923, and at March 31, 1933?

2. What was the value of gold deposits known to be held throughout Canada, at March 31, 1923, and at March 31, 1933?

3. What was the total amount of notes issued by chartered banks or by the federal government in circulation throughout Canada, at March 31, 1923, and at March 31, 1933?

4. What was the value of silver and copper currency in circulation throughout Canada, at March 31, 1923, and at March 31, 1933?

Mr. RHODES:

1.

	March 31, 1923	March 31, 1933
Gold held by Minister of Finance	$128,740,130	$ 71,815,753
*Current gold and subsidiary coin held—
Chartered banks in Canada	58,394,063	38,583,752
Gold deposited by banks in central gold reserves	9,502,533	9,181,732

2. No record in Department of Finance other than as to amounts referred to in answer to 1.

	March 31, 1923	March 31, 1933
3. Dominion notes in circulation	$242,657,765†	$180,926,882†
Bank notes in circulation	173,258,362	130,135,230
	$415,916,127	$311,062,112
4. Silver coin	$ 26,574,145	$ 28,051,477
Nickel coin	55,460	1,896,527
Bronze coin	1,962,863	2,553,883
	$ 28,592,468	$ 32,501,887

*Gold not reported separately in bank returns.

†Includes Dominion notes held by banks and in central gold reserves amounting to $215,797,880 (1923) and $151,911,399 (1933).

SAINTE-ANNE DE BEAUPRE POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the government aware that the postmaster at Sainte-Anne de Beaupre and his son are actively engaged in municipal politics?

2. Have they asked permission of the Post Office Department to do so?

3. Has the Post Office Department granted them permission to participate in municipal elections in the village of Sainte-Anne de Beaupre?

4. If so, when and by whom was such request made, and by whom was it granted?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. No.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

FEDERATION OF LABOUR CLUBS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Who authorized the Federation of Labour Clubs of Montreal to use the drill hall on Craig street, at Montreal, for their meeting on April 30, 1933?

2. Was an application made to the authorities of the Department of National Defence to secure the use of said drill hall on this occasion?

3. If so by whom was such application made?

4. Was the application made in writing or orally?

5. What sum did the Federation of Labour Clubs of Montreal pay for the use of said hall for the purposes of such meeting?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Department of National Defence.

2. Yes.

3. Mr. J. A. Chalifoux, General President, Federation of Labour Clubs of the province of Quebec.

4. In writing.

5. $10.

STORNAWAY, QUE., MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Does Mr. Ernest Bourque still hold the contract for rural mail delivery at Stornaway, province of Quebec?

2. If not, who has the contract now?

3. Was the present contract awarded after calling for public tenders and to the lowest tenderer?

4. Who were the tenderers and what was the amount of the respective tenders?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. No.

2. Adolphe Bolduc.

3. Yes.

4. Adolphe Bolduc, Stornaway, $800 per annum; Eugene Poisson, Stornaway, $800 per annum; Willie MacArthur, Stornaway, $840 per annum; Arthur Breton, Stornaway, $900 per annum; Hormisdas Pepin, Stornaway, $900 per annum; Milton Macleod, Springhill, $900 per annum; Odias Breton, Stornaway, $935 per annum; Archelas Breton, Stornaway, $945 per annum; Adolphe Bolduc, Stornaway, $973 per annum.

PENSION TRIBUNAL

Mr. DUFF:

1. Did the government pay or will they pay the personal expenses of the following members of the pension tribunal to Ottawa since April 15, 1933, namely: Colonel Cyrus Peck, Colonel N. H. McLeod, Colonel Gagnon, Colonel Thos. Morrison, Colonel C. C. Thompson, Mr. J. I. Grover?

2. (a) How long has each of these members of the pension tribunal been at Ottawa during the past month; (b) what governmental or tribunal duties have they performed daily since their arrival here?

3. How many tribunals are sitting in Ottawa at the present time and how many claims have each of these members heard since their arrival in Ottawa?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Colonel Morrison and Major Thompson, having their headquarters in Ottawa, do not draw travelling expenses. The expenses of the other members referred to are under review.

2. (a) Colonel Morrison, April 10 to date of inquiry, May 9; Colonel Peck, April 12 to date of inquiry, May 9; Colonel McLeod, May 6 to date of inquiry, May 9; Colonel Gagnon, March 30 to April 26; Major Thompson, March 30 to April 26; Mr. Grover, April 27 to May 5.

(b) The tribunal has been engaged on its regular work, namely the hearing of claims and giving of decisions; also the review of files and giving of decisions on claims previously heard on which decisions were outstanding, and has sat on the following days during the month preceding May 9: April 10, 12, inclusive; April 18, 21, inclusive; April 24, 28, inclusive; May 1, 5, inclusive; May 8, 9, inclusive.

The tribunal did not sit on Good Friday, Easter Monday, nor on Saturdays or Sundays.

3. One tribunal in session since March 30. Claims heard by: Colonel Morrison, Nil; Colonel Peck, 48; Colonel McLeod, 9; Colonel Gagnon, 47; Major Thompson, 24; Mr. Grover, 12.

Seventy cases, in all, were heard.

In addition, decisions were made on claims heard previously, as follows:

Colonel Peck, 5; Colonel McLeod, 6; Colonel Gagnon, 10; Major Thompson, 8; Mr. Grover, 4. Total 33.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

JOLIETTE TERMINAL

Mr. FERLAND:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters and other documents exchanged since August, 1930, between the Minister of Railways, any official of his department, or between any other federal department and any official of such department, and any other individuals, public bodies, companies or associations, including the railway administration, respecting the repair shops of the Canadian National Railways at Joliette, the Joliette terminal, the contract relating to these shops and this terminal, and all other matters connected therewith since August, 1930.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Might I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the defeat of the government measure in the Senate respecting judges, it is his intention to place the resignation of the government in the hands of His Excellency.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have no such intention, nor did I ever suggest it should be so except on joint resolution.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF POSITION OF DOMINION GOVERNMENT IN RELATION TO THE ENTERPRISE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I think it fitting that I should make some reference to the Beauharnois undertaking in view of statements made a few days ago which I have since had an opportunity to look through. I shall be as brief as possible, but I desire to correct some misapprehensions that are apparently in the minds of hon. gentlemen diagonally opposite and opposite and to my right. I think nothing better illustrates the soundness of the old maxim that it is very unwise to endeavour to lock the stable after the horse has been stolen, or the truth that is embodied in the couplet with which most of the house is familiar:

> Not heaven itself upon the past hath power:
> What has been has been.

Nothing better illustrates the truth of these statements than the position of Beauharnois, and when hon. gentlemen suggest, as they did in this house, that the federal government of the country should engage in the power business and should expropriate the power enterprise at Beauharnois, they overlooked two essential facts. The first is that the province of Quebec leased the power, not the Dominion government; and it leased the power believing that it had the legal right so to do. The ex-Minister of Justice referred to the fact that a similar attitude of mind was expressed by the government of Ontario in connection with the power development carried on at Niagara and other points on the St. Lawrence river. The second point to which I direct attention is that contracts were made between Beauharnois undertaking and two customers, namely, the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario and the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, which contracts are outstanding and are valid contracts according to the law of the country in which they were made.

If this house will bear in mind these two facts it will at once realize and recognize the extent to which this government was unable to deal with the problems to which attention has been directed. Reference has been made to the fact that on more than one occasion I have directed attention to the circumstances connected with the alienation of natural resources by the governments of this country. What the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) overlooked, in quoting again the statement I made originally, was that the crown is not the crown in right of the dominion only but is also the crown in right of each of the provinces. Only last year the privy council, in a very important case, decided that while the crown was one and indivisible, nevertheless there was a crown in right of the provinces and a crown in right of the dominion.

If it will be borne in mind that the power rights with respect to the St. Lawrence are claimed by the crown in right of the province of Quebec and not by the crown in right of the dominion, so far as this particular case is concerned, my observations with respect to the regret that the government must experience because the crown has parted with its rights will have full force and effect. Bear in mind, therefore, that as a result of the investigation in this house, the government took the only appropriate action which it could take under its constitutional limitations. It declared certain works to be for the benefit of Canada, it rescinded and repealed an order in council under which certain claims were made and it passed a statute by which no further alienations, so far as the government was concerned, of its rights in the St. Lawrence river to give additional water to the enterprise, would be valid without the consent, not of the executive but of this parliament.

I shall not traverse the ground which has been covered with respect to these contracts and to the legislation enacted by this parliament after the report was made by the investigating committee. I shall content myself with referring to the statements which were made in the house in 1932 as to what we conceived our duty to be with respect to the enterprise itself. Before I do that perhaps I should direct attention to the fact that the contract with the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, to which I referred, contained a provision by which the Beauharnois company undertook not to compete with the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated in the distribution of power on the island of Montreal or within the radius of so many miles from the Place d'Armes square. So far as distribution of power was concerned, the company had contracted itself out of the right to sell power in that particular area which is the most populous and the largest power consuming area in a particular community in the country.

I said that the purpose of the government as declared in this house was fourfold, and I shall quote from a statement which I made in this house in 1932, as follows:

The government by every means in its power will endeavour to do the following: (a) secure continuance of the enterprise; (b) secure the rights of those who bona fide have put their money in that enterprise; (c) secure proper control and management; (d) take such other steps as may be necessary when terms and conditions are fixed as will ensure the greatest possible benefit to this dominion as a whole by reason of the undertaking now being declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Those were the four ends the government had in view. First, as to the continuance of the enterprise, it was found that the $30,000,000 which had been given to the company by investors throughout Canada was not sufficient to enable the company to continue its operations and, further, that the company could not secure additional money by making sale of its first mortgage bonds. Therefore, the government undertook to be responsible for any ultimate loss that might be made by the bankers in the advances which were given to the enterprise, on the condition that the enterprise should convey the canal itself to the crown in the right of the dominion so that if the St. Lawrence seaway undertaking was carried out this would be part of and available for the purposes of the seaway. The cost was represented by something in the neighbourhood of the sum which the government ultimately became responsible for in the event of the banks not realizing on their security, namely, between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000. In pursuance of that undertaking the enterprise was carried forward so that on the first day of October last power was delivered to the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario and the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, thereby making possible the continuance of the corporation as such. Had the work not been placed in operation by the first day of October, the contracts would have fallen and in these days I am not sure but that both the hydro and the Montreal Light, Heat and Power would have been glad if the power had not been made available. The power was made available on the first day of October through the efforts taken by the administration.

Attention was directed to the fact that shortly after the house rose when we first had to deal with this matter the Premier of Quebec suggested that we should turn over the undertaking to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated and relieve ourselves from any further responsibility in the premises. I said then that although the undertaking had been launched for the purpose of being a competitor of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power, I could quite understand the attitude of the Premier of Quebec who did not believe that government should be involved in matters of this kind. Nevertheless I represented that we could not agree to do this for the simple reason that that great corporation was not interested in seeing this corporation succeed, having regard to the then existing conditions. In view of what had transpired in this parliament, we felt that it was our duty to see that no action which took place here should prevent the enterprise from being in position to deliver power on the first day of October last, and we took the steps which I have indicated.

Having done that and having seen that the enterprise was in a position to deliver power, the further question arose as to what should be the attitude of the government. I endeavoured to make it perfectly clear that I could not recommend to this house the creation of a federal power commission to operate in a province a policy which was the exact negation of that of the government of that province. The policy of the government of Quebec is to regulate by appropriate authority the development of power by private enterprise. That is its considered policy and from that policy it has indicated that it has no intention of departing. To create a federal power commission which would take possession, by expropriation or other appropriate proceedings, of the property of a private enterprise, whether it be Beauharnois or any other company, was something that we did not care to contemplate and we therefore declined to consider that proposal.

The company having defaulted in its bonds, the appropriate remedies provided by the trust deed under which $30,000,000 had been advanced became operative and a meeting of the holders of these securities was held. The government divested itself of any responsibility in connection with those investors as to how they should enforce the securities upon which they had made their advances. They appointed a committee and that committee made a report, which was to the effect that a certain scheme of reorganization should be adopted. I was asked whether the position of the government would be the same if other plans were made with other enterprises or other individuals for the purpose of giving effect to the reorganization and I answered in the affirmative; the government had no interest as to individuals nor any communication directly or indirectly with the Montreal Light, Heat and Power. The committee of the bondholders carried forward their negotiations and as a result of such negotiations the reorganization was arranged as proposed to the bondholders. Stone and Webster did see me and they asked that we should guarantee securities, which I declined to do; and I declined to guarantee securities for the reorganizing committee. As a result of all the efforts that were made, a committee of the security holders put forward a plan at a meeting of all the $30,000,000 bondholders for the purpose of enabling them to say aye or nay to the proposals thus made, and the government left itself in a position where the same provisions that existed with respect to that plan would exist with respect to any plan that was put forward for the reorganization of the enterprise. The plan carried and the matter is ended so far as the government is concerned.

There is just one other observation which I desire to make. This house has listened to attacks against power monopoly in the province of Quebec. This house has no concern about what that province does within its constitutional limitations. It is, within the ambit of its jurisdiction, as complete and authoritative a legislative body as is this parliament within its own, and I decline to be drawn into any controversy as to the wisdom or unwisdom of what Quebec may do within its legislative jurisdiction with respect to power or otherwise. I have endeavoured at all times, at least in my public life, to make clear that I regard the rights of provinces and provincial legislatures as being quite as important to maintain as are the rights and privileges of this parliament within their respective fields of legislative action. In this instance the province of Quebec, for reasons that may seem good to it but with respect to which I as a member of the Dominion parliament have no business to concern myself, has made the determination that it will proceed by private capital to develop its power resources and that it will create, as it has, a tribunal for the purpose of regulating and determining rates. All I can say is that any contest that may take place between the users of power and the corporation supplying it, for the purpose of securing a reduction in rates is a matter beyond the control of this parliament; it rests solely and entirely within the control and jurisdiction of the legislature of Quebec and the people who elect that legislature. As to the wisdom of their plans, I have nothing whatever to say.

That being so, there is only one further question that I think should be dealt with, and that is the export of power. With respect to the export of power from Canada to the United States, those who are interested will find that in 1925 the legislature of Quebec passed a statute, the preamble of which is as concise and powerful an indictment of any policy that will permit the export of power as it is possible to conceive can be put into words. No stronger indictment as to the evil consequences that will flow from permitting the export of power to the United States can be found than will be found in that statute. But the province of Quebec has not the jurisdiction over the export of any commodity from this dominion. That rests within the jurisdiction of the dominion, and this parliament passed a statute which provides for licences being given before power or gas is exported from our country. There are outstanding certain export licences with respect to what is called surplus peak power, off peak power, if you will, at Niagara. I am not at the moment concerned about those, because they were granted many years ago and they have been continued even unto this day. But with respect to the granting of licences to export power, it is the considered judgment of this government as at present advised that we shall not grant any such licences. I say that for two reasons: first, that it has been the settled policy of this country to maintain that view; it has been the view of successive governments, although there was put forward here some years ago a proposal which was negatived largely through the efforts of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). But the second view, which after all is the powerful and prevailing one in my judgment, is the one indicated a few days ago by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and expressed in terms, to which I need not again refer, by my colleague the leader of the Senate. Those words are as appropriate to-day as they were when they were uttered. We cannot afford to export power and create community life in another country with industrial activities and then, when the requirements of our own country call for cutting off the licence for export, contemplate that situation without having regard to a statement made by a president of the United States that such action on our part would practically be considered an unfriendly act. Under those circumstances I make the statement I have made this morning for the purpose of relieving any doubt there may be in the minds of any hon. member that the government has in contemplation the granting of licences for the export of power. I shall not trouble the house further and I offer an apology for dealing at such length with this matter this morning, but I desire to summarize the position in a few short sentences.

We came into this matter, the Beauharnois power development, in consequence of statements that were made in the house that brought about an investigation by a committee selected by the House of Commons. That investigation resulted in certain recommendations being made to which this government gave effect. There was mentioned the other day one matter that I do not think was investigated by the committee and with respect to which it may be necessary for the government to make further inquiry; that is, the Jacques Cartier Investment Corporation or something of that sort, I am not just sure of the name, as regards which certain allegations were made in consequence of which we have made and will continue to make certain inquiries.

At the time there were outstanding contracts for about 400,000 horsepower with the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario and the Montreal Light, Heat and Power. There were restrictions upon the activities of the corporation in the selling and distribution of power. The corporation was a provincial one. The government gave it such assistance as was necessary to enable it to secure from the banks the funds required to start the enterprise, and within the time limit of the contracts, the enterprise began to function and supply power. Next, the government furnished every facility possible to enable those who had paid their $30,000,000 into the enterprise to meet together and determine what action they should take, whether by foreclosure that would vest all the shares of the company in them, or by reorganization. They determined upon a plan of reorganization which involved certain assistance being given in the way of extending the time within which to carry out their undertakings and sell their securities, which we made available to any company or persons who desired to participate in the enterprise.

Lastly, the government has incurred no further responsibility nor does it financially or otherwise in connection with this purely provincial matter, and we shall do everything in our power to see that the arrangements that have been made with the government are carried into effect, for in consequence of the contracts outstanding the government had no control over rates in any way, shape or form.

The observations which I made after the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) had spoken are very pertinent now, and they were then but for one fact, that I was not then aware that the enterprise had made its agreements which precluded any possibility of action being taken by this administration with respect to the price at which power was being sold or could be sold, or for that matter, I suppose, taken by the late administration after the order in council had been passed.

I have nothing further to add except to say that every possible oportunity was afforded to those who owned the enterprise to do with it as they pleased, but that the government in pursuance of the policy adopted by this house practically unanimously afforded an equal opportunity to all who might be concerned to assert their rights and to deal with the situation amongst themselves as shareholders as they thought desirable.

As to my own view, I regretted and I still regret that it was possible for the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated to place itself in the position it did with respect to this enterprise, but that is a matter over which I had no control and over which this government has no control, but which arises by reason of the fact that the contract which was made with this Beauharnois enterprise by the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated is a contract that limited and limits I think for a period of seventy years—a lifetime contract—the right of the Beauharnois Corporation to distribute power practically within the whole island of Montreal. That we could not deal with because we had no power to destroy a contract validly made according to the laws of the province of Quebec between the two companies. Under those circumstances, with the full facts before us, we took the only steps that could be taken to afford to those who had put their money in an opportunity for a breathing space in which to reorganize their enterprise and to take such steps as they thought desirable for the protection of their investment and the undertaking which has been built by reason of their investment being made.

Mr. EULER: May I direct just one question to the Prime Minister? Has the government freed itself of its liability with regard to its guarantees to the bank of some fifteen or sixteen million dollars' worth of expenditures?

Mr. BENNETT: I said that we had not freed ourselves of the ultimate responsibility if there was a loss on the sale of the securities, but that is not a contingency that we look upon as being one of any seriousness.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister permit another question? He has stated that it is the definite policy of the government that there shall be no licences granted for export. I should like to ask whether it is also the policy of the government that there should be no further permits for the diversion of water from the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BENNETT: Possibly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was not in his place when I said that we had already provided by statute that although the province of Quebec had granted a licence for further quantities of water we would not authorize a diversion from the St. Lawrence except by the authority of this parliament.

REPAYMENT OF LOANS TO BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) made inquiry with respect to the payment of an issue of $40,000,000 of two year treasury notes which matured in New York on December 1 of last year. He wished to know, first, in what funds they were payable, and secondly, how much it had cost in Canadian funds to meet the obligation. The answer to the first part of his inquiry is that they were paid in United States funds, and the answer to the second part is that they were paid out of the proceeds of an issue of one-year treasury notes which were placed in New York. The complete answer to his question will, of course, depend upon the rate of exchange at the time when the obligation is ultimately liquidated. It follows that if Canadian funds were at a parity at that time the amount of Canadian funds then required would be $40,000,000.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): That does not quite explain it, but I suppose we can figure it out. It is all right.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Duranleau for the second reading of Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in any remarks I have to make on the bill which is now before the house I intend to deal only with section 11, which relates to the coastal shipping of Canada. I think the minister frankly admitted last night that the bill was principally for the protection of ship owners, so we are justified in dealing with the bill from that standpoint. From a perusal of the evidence it is clear who is asking for this bill. It is the shipbuilders and the shipping companies, and I think they are chiefly under one concern, Canada Steamships Limited. They are both shippers and shipbuilders. They own the Midland Shipbuilding Company of Midland and the Davie Shipbuilding Company of Levis. Prominent amongst the witnesses before the Senate committee I noticed the names of Mr. Enderby and Mr. Wolvin, who figured so prominently in the association or combine that was responsible for raising grain rates on the great lakes in 1922, and which finally resulted in the appointment of a royal commission to investigate grain rates on the great lakes. As a result of that investigation two bills were introduced in the session of 1923, one placing these grain rates under the jurisdiction of the board of grain commissioners, and the other giving the governor in council power to suspend the coastal shipping laws at any time.

I noticed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) last night, in the very able speech which he made on the second reading of this bill, said that it was the duty of parliament to promote the interests of the various industries in Canada, and he apparently was speaking of the ship-owning industry. I think the ship-owning industry are very well able to take care of themselves, judging by their action of last year.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt my hon. friend? It is certainly not correct for him to state that I represent the ship owners. I do not represent anyone of that character or any business interest in this house.

Mr. COOTE: Let me assure the minister I did not say he represented them at all.

Mr. STEVENS: You said that exactly.

Mr. COOTE: No; Hansard will show I did not say that. I did not intend to say it, and if accidentally I did say it I shall quite gladly withdraw it. I said that his remarks last night were directed in defence of or in support of the interests of the ship owners.

Mr. STEVENS: No. Mr. Speaker, I must ask my hon. friend not to state it in that way, because it is not right. One can make an argument pro or con, but it does not necessarily follow that he represents the interests of any particular industries or particular class.

Mr. COOTE: I shall gladly accept the statement of the minister and withdraw anything to which he may object. But I wish to make it plain that I think the ship owners are much better able to take care of their own interests than are the producers. I am very much concerned about the interests of the producers. I believe they are the ones who need protection. Mr. Enderby, when before the committee, was quite frank. He admitted the principal reason for the section of the bill to which we are objecting is to give protection to Canadian shippers. The principal function of the Canadian fleet is the movement of the Canadian crop across the great lakes.

I should like to make it plain that I do not believe there is any protection for the growers of grain. They have to meet the competition of the world, and I do not see why the ship owners of Canada cannot meet the competition of the United States fleet. They did it successfully in 1932. They have a shippers' association or combine. To all intents and purposes, I believe it is a combine. This bill I think will give to that shipping combine a monopoly of the business of transporting grain. Apparently they want this business for themselves so that they can levy a toll. It might be of interest to the house to see how successful they were last year without the legislation which is now being introduced. I shall quote briefly from the evidence given by Mr. Bredt before the Senate committee. He said:

On July 10, last year the rate from the head of the lakes to Montreal was four and a half cents. The Associated Lake Freights Limited was organized on July 11, and on that date the rates were raised a quarter of a cent to four and three-quarter cents. I wish to enlarge upon that. We consider that there is no competition on the lakes so far as Canadian vessels are concerned, but that they are in a combine. For your information I want to give the following figures which support this contention. On July 28 the rate was raised to five cents; on August 16 to five and one-quarter cents; on August 21 to five and a half cents; on August 26, to five and three-quarter cents; on September 1 to six cents; on September 11 to six and a quarter cents, and so on, to October 1, when it was seven cents.

I believe that is all the quotation I need to read. I think there is complete proof there that the grain shippers' association was successful in raising rates, and that is really the purpose for which it was formed,—to raise rates on the great lakes. This bill can provide no possible advantage to the grain grower. His greatest safeguard is the competition offered by the American shippers. At page 15 Mr. Enderby was asked this question:

Do you agree with Mr. Smith that the cost of the ship has no relation to the rate that it is able to obtain?

Mr. Enderby's answer was:

None whatever. The cost is set by the competitive route or the competitive steamer on the same route.

Now that the business is to be left to the Canadian shippers I do not think there is going to be any competition. At page 18 he states:

It is the through rate that governs.

And, Mr. Speaker, these through rates will now be in their own hands. This bill will cancel competitive rates. The grain may go to Buffalo in an American boat, but only a combine boat can move grain from Buffalo to Montreal. I have shown already how they can raise the rates. I should like to point out here that one disadvantage we will suffer arises from the fact that it will be impossible to store grain at Buffalo, as formerly, and we will not be able to ship that grain to any point desired. Buffalo has been one of the cheapest points at which to store grain for the winter. I think this is about the very worst time which could have been chosen to place any more barriers or handicaps in the way of our producers or grain exporters. Buffalo is strategically placed. It has large storage facilities, and from there grain can be shipped either through an American or Canadian port. But once this legislation becomes law Buffalo will cease to be of much use to us as a grain storage point. Any grain that goes to Buffalo from now on must go out through American ports.

The financial position of the shipping companies has been stressed. I should like to stress the financial position of the producers. They are selling at from thirty to forty cents a bushel wheat which costs all the way from seventy cents to one dollar a bushel to produce. It has been sold as low as twenty-five cents. I suggest that this is a poor time to increase the toll for the benefit of the shipping combine. It seems to me there is no doubt of the fact that this bill will have the effect of increasing the toll or the freight rate on farmers' grain. There is only one place from which that increase can be paid, and that is from the share which the producer will receive. The competition in the wheat market is keen at the present time. It was pointed out by Mr. Smith, who gave evidence on behalf of the grain exporters, that the exporters have to send their grain forward to eastern Canada and have it ready to ship out whenever they can get an order. We are not going to be able to take advantage of the storage facilities offered at Buffalo, and we will not have the choice of two routes through which we could get the grain out to the various importing countries.

Instead of restricting, the government should do everything it can to make available to us all the different routes possible. The minister said that the rate would be set by the board of grain commissioners. He said last night that the rate was fixed last September by order of the board. That may be so, but certainly I cannot draw that inference from the report of the board of grain commissioners for 1932. They say that under the Inland Water Freight Rates Act the board is charged with the duty of prescribing maximum lake rates on grain when, in its opinion, these rates become excessive or discriminative as compared with rates charged for similar traffic between Canadian and United States ports. The paragraph in the report continues:

In the early part of the shipping season of 1932, lake rates fell to what were considered to be unremunerative levels and in July, the Associated Lake Freighters Limited was formed. In July an advance in rates on grain carried between Port Arthur-Fort William and other Canadian ports occurred.

That was immediately after the formation of the association.

Further advances occurred at intervals until on October 1, the rate of seven cents per bushel on wheat was put into effect between Fort William and Montreal. At this point, the board intervened and on representations being made to the Associated Lake Freighters Limited, the maximum rate was reduced to six and a half cents per bushel on wheat and continued at this rate for the balance of the season.

I think the inference from that paragraph is not that the board issued any order, but that they reasoned or remonstrated with the shippers' combine. Current gossip in Winnipeg was to the effect that the board had threatened the combine that if they did not lower their rate, an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act might become necessary. I suppose the shippers' association, rather than have that investigation, decided to lower the rate one half cent. We know from experience how long it takes to get an investigation started under the Combines Investigation Act, and I am very much afraid that once this legislation is passed, some fall when there is a lot of grain to be moved the shippers' combine will put up the rate and will perhaps submit to an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act rather than reduce rates, and in the meantime make a nice killing for themselves out of the increased rates on grain.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt the hon. member? Yesterday he asked me if there had been an order, I had not time to send it over then, I will do so now. There was an order actually passed by the board of grain commissioners on the 5th of May of this year. There is no necessity to wait for an investigation.

Mr. COOTE: I understood the minister last night—I may have been mistaken—to say that the order had been passed last year as a result of investigation by the board. Certainly the reduction last year in the rate from 7 cents to 6½ cents was not caused by any order issued by the board. I do not think section 5 of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act of 1923 gives sufficient power to the board. It says:

When in the opinion of the board the toll, charge or rate which any company, owner or person charges or intends or proposes to charge for the carriage of grain as aforesaid is unreasonable or excessive,—

How are you going to decide whether that rate is unreasonable or excessive? There is a fine point for the lawyers to argue about and carry from one court to another and perhaps to the privy council.

—or amounts to an unjust discrimination against any person, company or class of persons as compared with the tolls or rates for similar traffic between Canadian and United States ports, or between one port and another in either of the said countries, . . .

I think in the past most grain shippers are of the opinion that the American rates followed the Canadian rates and were just a little lower, they appear to take whatever rates the Canadians set or perhaps give a little lower rate. The last year or two there has been very little comparable traffic, not enough for the board to base a decision on. How much grain have the Americans moved to Buffalo for export overseas? Their export trade had practically ceased. If we are going to depend on that legislation we are leaning on a very weak reed. Some lawyers state that it is open to question whether the board really have this power, whether this act is really intra vires of this parliament. I of course would not wish to express any opinion on that. But Buffalo has consistently enjoyed a cheaper rate than Port Colborne, and that certainly is proof to me that once this act is passed we are going to have to pay a little higher rates on our grain.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Will my hon. friend permit a question? What is his answer to clause 938 of the Canada Shipping Act? Does he not think there is sufficient protection for our grain shippers in case of monopoly? It gives power to the governor in council at any time to suspend the operation of any provision of this part of the statute.

Mr. COOTE: I am glad that is in, but we know from past experience that sometimes it takes about three months after rates are raised to get the governor in council to act. I think it naturally will take a little time.

Mr. MANION: It could be done overnight.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to make it clear about rates to Buffalo being cheaper than to Port Colborne. This is from the evidence of Mr. Smith:

I mean this, senator, that the Canadian boats usually get a higher rate to the bay ports and to Port Colborne than the American boats get to Buffalo, and therefore the Canadian boats are not willing to run to Buffalo at a lower rate if they can get a higher rate to Port Colborne and the bay ports. My experience has been that Canadian boats have not wished to take grain to Buffalo to any great extent.

Once this legislation is passed I think practically all the grain will go to Canadian ports and they will get the better rate. Someone will have to pay it.

Might I point out that this legislation which the minister mentions was introduced in 1923. Mr. Robb, the Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time I think was not very much impressed with it himself, that is he was not very sure that the board had all the powers it should have, or rather that their power to control rates would be very effective as far as the producer was concerned. He said:

> The importance of this measure does not consist in the fixing of a maximum rate; we find the importance of it, the teeth of it, in the gathering of the information, the tabulating of it, the publication of that information, and the publication from day to day, during the season, of the space that has been booked and the space that is available for shippers. That is where we find the very teeth of this measure;—

I do not think they are very effective teeth myself.

> —and it is in that respect that it is opposed. It is opposed not because there happens to be in it a clause that gives the board the right, if they deem it wise, to fix a maximum rate, but because the measure provides machinery upon which the government can act intelligently and arrive at a decision that will justify the suspension of the coastal laws.

So really the only effective protection we have is the power of the governor in council to suspend the coastal shipping law. For my part I would not have this coastal shipping law apply. That is, I would not want to prevent American ships coming in and carrying grain to Buffalo, and again carrying it to Montreal if necessary.

Mr. BOWMAN: They can now as a matter of fact carry grain to Buffalo.

Mr. COOTE: Quite so. But I say again carrying it to Montreal. Any Canadian shipper who ships grain to Buffalo now has to take a chance on getting his price by shipping it through American channels.

Mr. BOWMAN: Not at all, because an American ship can carry it from Buffalo to Montreal.

Mr. COOTE: Well, that is a point that has to be made clear to me. It has got to go by boat owned by this combine, because all the Canadian ships are in the combine.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. MANION: What combine?

Mr. COOTE: The Lake Shippers' Association, I think it is called.

Mr. MANION: Not much of a combine, because they compete with each other. I can give the hon. member some figures on coal which will show they are far from a combine.

Mr. COOTE: I hope the minister will give some figures on wheat also. I think we are going too far in this idea of nationalism when we cannot move goods from one Canadian port to another in anything but a Canadian boat. I suppose soon we will not be allowed to travel from one part of Canada to another unless we stay in Canada.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Is it any more unreasonable that we should provide that protection for Canadian ships than the United States government provides for American ships? A Canadian vessel cannot engage in trade from one American port to another.

Mr. COOTE: There is a distinction to be drawn on that point, but I will ask this of the minister and also of the hon. member for East Algoma: Will they agree to place on the Canadian statute books some other laws in conformity with laws dealing with similar matters that are now in force in the United States? I will give an instance. There is a law in the United States which allows an American citizen who is abroad to buy $100 worth of merchandise and take it back free of duty. Will he support the placing on our statute books of a similar law to allow Canadian tourists to bring back from the United States $100 worth of merchandise free of duty? If his argument applies in the one case it should apply in the other. If I go to the United States and one of my automobile tires happens to play out and I buy one there, when I get to the line I have to pay duty on that tire before I can get back home. The United States law allows an American to buy a motor car, if he likes, in Canada, either new or secondhand, and take it back with him at 25 per cent duty; our government will not allow a man to bring in a secondhand automobile at any rate of duty. Does the hon. member think we should change our law in that respect to correspond with the law in the United States?

With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for East Algoma, may I ask this question. Because the United States has a coastal shipping law which prevents a Canadian boat from hauling grain from one American port to another American port, why should we have exactly the same law here? The conditions are not the same, because Buffalo happens to be an American port. Any exporter from the western states can send grain from Duluth to Buffalo and later send it on from Buffalo to Montreal if he wishes, or he can send it from Buffalo to New York. He can send it by the Erie canal. But the Canadians will not have that privilege. I understand the hon. member for Dauphin to say that we can send it on if we send it in a Canadian ship.

Mr. BOWMAN: Send it in an American ship.

Mr. COOTE: Not from Buffalo to Montreal, if it has been brought down in an American ship.

Mr. BOWMAN: That is a different proposition. We have no transfer points in Canada to compare with Buffalo. It is true we have a transfer elevator at Port Colborne with a capacity of 4,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MANION: And there are the bay ports.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, but they do not compare with Buffalo at all; Buffalo is strategically located, and there is no point in Canada that compares with it fairly.

I regret very much that this bill, if it must be passed, did not come down earlier in the session and go before a select committee of the house. Before it is passed Canada Steamship Lines, which is the biggest company in the association, should be investigated. We should investigate the capitalization of that concern; we should investigate its earnings in past years. The minister said last night that the rates they charged this year, although they did raise them to 7 cents, were not as high as in former years. Well, they should not be as high. Why did we spend $150,000,000 on the new Welland canal? Was it not in order that there might be lower rates on grain as well as other freight? In my opinion the rate of 7 cents, considering the price of grain and having regard to the fact that everything in Canada was supposed to have been reduced, was excessive.

Mr. STEVENS: 6½ cents, not 7.

Mr. COOTE: They raised it to 7 cents and it was brought back to 6½ only under pressure from the board. It seems to me that the shipowners have a good deal of nerve to come forward at this time and ask for this legislation. I do not wish to delay the house, but I do insist that this is the very worst time the government could have chosen to bring down legislation of this kind. The Prime Minister was in Washington lately and discussed with the president of the United States the possibility of securing better trade relations, and in this connection I may quote from an article that appeared in the Montreal Star of Saturday, May 13. This article appears under the heading:

> United States considers protest against change in shipping laws. . . . Measure would reduce shipment of grain in American vessels.

It is dated Washington, May 13, and reads in part:

> Acting in response to the vehement pleas of Buffalo and United States lake shipping interests, the State department is considering making a protest to the Canadian government against the pending amendment to the dominion shipping laws aimed to reduce the shipment of Canadian grain down the lake in United States ships to Buffalo for transfer there to dominion vessels for export overseas through Canadian ports. Following representations made at the State department on Thursday afternoon by Congressman Andrews of New York, informal discussion of the problem was carried on between department officials and Hume Wrong, charge d'affaires of the Canadian legation.

I repeat therefore that this is the very worst time to introduce such legislation as this. It is very apt to be regarded by the public in the United States as a sort of retaliatory measure, and while I am not concerned about United States shipping, we do have to depend upon it sometimes to get some relief in rates. We suspend the coastal shipping laws and invite these ships to come in and carry our grain at lower rates.

This whole bill suggests pressure from the shippers' combine, or if that word is objectionable I will say association. I do not think the house should deliver our producers into the hands of the association. In my opinion the legislation we have to control rates is not effective enough, and I must protest as vigorously as I can against legislation of this kind. I would ask the government to put it off another year and let us have a thorough investigation of the whole matter by a committee of the House of Commons. So far as I am concerned I will not consent to being governed in this case by the work of a committee of the Senate. So far as I can see from a perusal of the evidence given before the Senate committee, there did not appear to be any members of the Senate acting as representatives of the producers. The representatives of the shipping interests were not questioned by anyone representing the producers. I want to see these men brought before a House of Commons committee and we should be given an opportunity to obtain a good deal more information in regard to this whole question before we pass this legislation, even though it may be held in abeyance in the meantime and may come into force only by proclamation of the governor in council. I do not think we should adopt this legislation, and for my part I cannot allow it to pass without recording my vote against it.

Mr. BOWMAN: The hon. member made the statement that grain loaded in Buffalo must go through American ports. Surely he did not intend to convey that impression to the house.

Mr. COOTE: That, I said, was the impression which I got from reading the bill, and if it is not correct I hope the point will be made clear. Section 935 reads:

> No goods shall be transported by water or by land and water, from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation in any ship other than a British ship.

It says, for any part of the transportation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no objection to that.

Mr. COOTE: I understand my hon. friend from Dauphin to say that if grain goes from Fort William to Buffalo in an American ship it can then go on from Buffalo to Montreal in a Canadian ship.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. COOTE: Well, that is the point I want to have made clear.

Mr. MANION: If it goes to Buffalo in a Canadian ship it can go on to Montreal in a Canadian ship—a British ship.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): But you cannot retain the identity of the grain and tell which came out of the Canadian vessel.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): In the course of his remarks on this subject my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Coote) said that the bill was asked for by the shipping combine or the Lake Shippers' Association. Personally, I have no brief for the Lake Shippers' Association or the shipping combine either, but I have a brief to some extent at least for the many thousands of Canadian working men who are engaged in the shipping business at the head of the lakes or at ports in Canada or the United States for that matter. For fifty years we have been spending enormous sums of money on harbours, lake ports, wharves, and various facilities for shipping. We are spending annually large sums for lighthouse services, pilotage service and all this sort of thing for the purpose of making inland shipping safe and providing ample facilities by which traffic from the west can be moved to the east in the easiest and cheapest manner possible. Now, the question here arises: Whom are we doing this for? Judging from the statements of my hon. friend and others in relation to this matter, notwithstanding that we have spent all this money on the services I have mentioned, we are to turn over the whole business to United States shipping and United States working men, while in every port, from Fort William to Montreal, there are hundreds of Canadians who have been trained in the lake service—captains, engineers, firemen, dockhands and so on idle while American ships are carrying the traffic.

Mr. COOTE: Would my hon. friend permit an interruption for the sake of accuracy? He said that we had suggested that all this business would be turned over to American shipping interests. I ask him to withdraw that statement as no one has suggested any such thing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I hesitate to withdraw that statement. If my hon. friend did not mean that and I am doing him an injustice, I will withdraw it, but that is really what has been advocated. Anyone who knows anything about the conditions on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence knows that if present conditions continue, Canadian shipping will be driven off the lakes. The circumstances are such that it is impossible for them to compete. In the first place, American ships are provided with return cargoes not available to Canadian ships.

Mr. YOUNG: Why? Because the government will not let them take back coal.

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, they cannot take back coal or anything else that goes to an American port. That is why. The proof of this statement can be found in the records. If my hon. friend will go back to 1920 he will find out what took place when American shipping was in control, not only with regard to rates on coal but with regard to rates on grain. The rates in 1932 were the lowest that have prevailed since 1920. I am virtually certain that lower rates have never prevailed.

In speaking of the competition provided by American ships my hon. friend stated that the rates are controlled by this competition. Let us see how it works out. When Canadian shipping on the great lakes had a capacity of 165,000,000 bushels, the average rate was 10·78 cents. When the capacity of Canadian shipping had been increased to 287,000,000 bushels, the rate was reduced to 5·07 cents. I should like to give my hon. friend one illustration of the position in which Canadian shipping will be placed should the monopoly and control be given to United States shipping, as will be the case unless the provisions of this bill are made applicable. During one of the years when the United States ships were in complete control and the rate on grain was 11·64 cents instead of 5·07 cents, I came into direct connection with some United States shippers.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask what year that was?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The year 1920. One of the firms which had been busily engaged in the transport of grain from the head of the lakes through Buffalo and on to Montreal entered into a contract with a Canadian shipper to carry some 3,000 tons of freight from one lake port to another. This contract was entered into during the fall of the year, the goods to be carried in the following summer. In the meantime the rates rose, and what happened? The American company put themselves into liquidation. They sold their ships to the clerks in their own office and raised rates just 150 per cent on the Canadian commodity that was to be carried. That is the position in which hon. friends want to put Canadian shippers; they want to drive Canadian ships off the lakes. My hon. friend as well as the hon. member for Weyburn has inquired why Canadian ships could not compete. I should like to show them the tonnage that Canadian ships cannot handle. During a period of ten years there was an average tonnage of 45,000,000 tons in the form of coal, ore and stone handled on the great lakes by American ships. Not one single ounce of this tonnage could be carried by Canadian ships. Let us see what has happened with regard to grain. The hon. member who has just left the chamber stated that the American ships carried a very small percentage of Canadian grain. For the ten year period ending 1932, American ships carried on an average 126,000,000 bushels of grain from Canadian ports to United States ports, while Canadian ships carried on an average 11,000,000 bushels. The position has become so accentuated that Canadian seamen and Canadian workingmen are idle while American ships are carrying Canadian trade and Canadian ships are not able to participate in American trade.

I am not anxious that there should be any difficulties or controversies between the two countries. If hon. gentlemen can make an arrangement by which Canadian shipping will be permitted to participate in the coastwise trade of the United States on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river, I would be in favour of withdrawing this bill. Is it fair that this country to the south of us with its large volume of trade should have its shipping tied up in a castiron box and reserved for its own people while Canadian shipping companies are forced to meet competition which is absolutely impossible. I do not think there is an hon. member in the house who will suggest that the rates in effect last June and July were such as made it possible for a shipping company to continue to operate and pay the Canadian workingman a wage upon which he could live.

There is another point to be considered. Facilities have been provided at the head of the lakes, at Collingwood, Midland, and other points for the repairing of ships. Large sums of money have been invested and large numbers of Canadian workingmen are dependent upon this industry. You never hear of a United States ship coming across to one of these shipyards and giving employment to Canadian workingmen. But it is suggested that the Canadian ships which do make use of these facilities should be driven off the lakes. Such a procedure would force the closing up of these shipyards and throw Canadian workmen out of employment and Canadian investments into the discard.

The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) gave some evidence to show that there is no combine existing. I personally know that there is no such thing as a combine. It may be true that the Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, own the largest tonnage on the lakes but—

Mr. MANION: They compete with other boats.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Certainly, they compete. There are other companies which operate ships. I know two captains who live in Sault Ste. Marie. They have sailed the lakes all their lives and they formed a small company and purchased three ships. They are operating them from the head of the lakes to Port Colborne and Montreal and they compete with everybody in order to get traffic for their vessels. Is it a crime that Canadians should do that sort of thing? Is it a crime that Canadian workingmen should desire to work in their own country when they are not allowed to compete in the country alongside of us? Have we reached the stage where the only person who is to be considered as being entitled to the rights of Canadian citizenship is the man who grows wheat on the western prairies? That has been indicated by the discussion which has taken place.

The question of the protection of the producer has been raised, but an attempt is being made to penalize the producer. After all, who is the producer of wheat? Wheat is grown on the western prairies but it would not be worth anything if a market could not be found. Where is this market to be found? It will be found at the place where there is someone who wants to buy the wheat and in the main that is in Europe. How are you going to get it there? The railroad man who operates the wheat train from the fields of the west to the head of the lakes is just as much a producer of wheat as is the man who drives the plough over the prairies. The sea captain, the engineer, the deck hand and the other men who go out in all kinds of weather and risk their lives to carry that grain across the lakes and down the river are just as much producers and just as much entitled to be protected by this parliament as is the man who actually works on the farm, the so-called producer of the grain itself. Instead of this bill being introduced too early, I say that the men interested, the men who have been lying idle in the ports of this country waiting for the possibility of getting an odd job here and there on a Canadian ship, have waited too long and this bill should be put through and made effective during the present shipping season.

I do not wish to delay the house by giving further figures as to what has taken place. But during the period when the United States had control of the situation, that is during the war and the early period after it, Canadian wheat producers had to pay the highest rates they have ever paid, and the reduction has been from 11·64 cents in 1920 to 5·09 cents solely because of the competition that is provided by Canadians who put their ships on the great lakes.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, the aim of this bill is to give to Canadian ships a monopoly of the carrying of Canadian grain on the great lakes. The minister himself put the situation last night in the statement that "Canadian boats should carry Canadian grain." The effect of this bill, if it becomes law, will be to deprive Canadian grain of the use of Buffalo as a transfer or a storage point. To understand the full effect of that on the transportation of grain, one must have in mind the picture of the whole grain transportation business. When the first trainload of wheat leaves the west for the head of the lakes, those who ship it have no idea where it will ultimately land. When that wheat arrives at the terminals, those who own it do not know where it is going to go; it may be sold in any one of a dozen different countries. But one thing they do know is that that wheat must be kept moving; they know there are millions and hundreds of millions of bushels to follow. They know if it is delayed in the terminals they will fill up, and if they do, the railway yards will be congested, the blockade will go right out to the farms and the wheat will not move. The whole strategy in moving wheat consists in constantly moving it eastward, but always moving it to a point from which it may be shipped out in the greatest number of directions. That point is Buffalo. It is the most strategically located point in Canada or the United States for the transfer and storage of grain. From that city you can ship down the St. Lawrence and out through Canadian ports or you can ship down the barge canal or by rail to New York, Boston, Portland or several other United States ports. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, for a moment to picture yourself as an exporter of grain. You discover on a certain morning that you can sell some wheat in Liverpool, some in Bordeaux, Antwerp, Rotterdam or Hamburg. What do you do? The first thing is to see what ocean space you can get. You discover that coming into the port of Montreal is a ship that will load for Liverpool; coming into the port of Portland is a ship that will load, we will say, for Hamburg; coming into the port of Boston there is one that will load for Antwerp and coming into the port of New York is one that will load for Rotterdam and another that will load for Bordeaux. On every one of those ships you can get space. What do you do? If you have your grain at Buffalo you secure the space and you sell the grain. If your grain is at any other point than Buffalo you will not be able to deliver at all those ports and you will lose the sale. If you could not get your grain on to any ship loading for Antwerp or Amsterdam or Rotterdam or Hamburg or any other port, you would not be able to make the sale and the result would be that you would sell less grain. If this legislation takes effect, Canadian grain will not be able to go to Buffalo and use that as a transfer or a storage point.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the case at all.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend says that that is not the case. By that he means that Canadian boats can carry grain to Buffalo and Canadian boats can take it from Buffalo down the St. Lawrence.

Mr. MANION: Yes, or United States boats can carry it to Buffalo.

Mr. YOUNG: And carry it out through United States ports?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, to Rotterdam or any other place.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) points out that Canadian boats will not take grain to Buffalo because they can get higher rates for taking it to Canadian ports. That precludes the grain from going down the St. Lawrence. In addition to that, the conference agreements passed last fall make it impossible for Canadian grain going through Buffalo to receive the preference.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is again absolutely wrong, not within a thousand miles of what is right.

Mr. YOUNG: Canadian grain going out through United States ports does not receive the preference.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly it does.

Mr. MANION: If it is consigned clear through to Britain.

Mr. YOUNG: But I say that it is not consigned clear through. The shipper has to keep his grain moving; he does not know when he loads it on to the boat at the head of the lakes, where it is going. When it is consigned to Buffalo, it is not consigned clear through.

Mr. MANION: Often it is.

Mr. YOUNG: He wants to be able, when he ships it to Buffalo, to consign it wherever he can make a sale.

Mr. STEVENS: Most of it is consigned through.

Mr. YOUNG: No, it is not. This legislation will deprive us of the use of Buffalo as a transfer and to a large degree as a storage point.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member knows better.

Mr. YOUNG: I know what I say. The minister says that Canadian boats will carry it to Buffalo. The hon. member for Macleod says that they will not because they can get higher rates to Canadian ports. The member for Macleod is right. The average rate from the head of the lakes to bay ports, or to Sarnia or Goderich, last year was 2·08 cents per bushel, while the average rate to Buffalo, a much longer haul, was 1·577 cents per bushel, or nearly half a cent a bushel lower than the rate to bay ports. Close the port of Buffalo to our wheat; shut United States boats out from the handling of it and that spread will widen; the rates on the lakes to Canadian ports will increase. Who will pay the difference? Everybody knows the price the farmer receives for his wheat is the Liverpool price less the cost of shipping it there. Every cent, every fraction of a cent you add to the cost of putting the wheat on to the Liverpool market is just that much subtracted from the price the farmer receives. What right has anyone to say to the farmer: You must give one cent a bushel more to a shipping man, any more than anyone has the right to say to the shipping man: You must put your hand into your pocket and give a cent a bushel to the farmer. No government has the right to do that. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) said that Canadian boats could not compete with United States boats; they would be driven off the lakes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: They can compete on fair terms.

Mr. YOUNG: He said that United States boats carried some 45,000,000 tons of coal, ore and stone which the Canadian boats could not carry and I thought he said that was carried as return cargoes. It is not; it goes in the same direction as the wheat does.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The coal is a return cargo.

Mr. YOUNG: Why do our Canadian boats not bring coal back? The government does not allow them.

Mr. STEVENS: Because we favour the purchasing of coal from your own riding and a dozen others in the west. That is why.

Mr. YOUNG: Because you have adopted a certain coal policy.

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly. Purchasing coal from your own backyard.

Mr. YOUNG: And you have said to the boats on the great lakes: "When you take a cargo down, we will not allow you to bring a cargo back. The money you make on the one trip will have to pay for your trip both ways." That is the net result of your policy.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he favour the abandonment of the subventions and support to Alberta and Saskatchewan coal moving eastward in favour of encouraging the purchase of American coal from Port Arthur?

Mr. YOUNG: If my hon. friend had been in the house when the question of subventions was up he would know that I am strongly opposed to these coal subventions from start to finish.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the hon. member would prefer to use American coal in Winnipeg to his own coal.

Mr. YOUNG: I would buy the coal where I can buy to best advantage, and you can trust me to do it. I do not want the government to tell me where to buy it.

The American boats have more business at home and they only enter Canadian trade when the rates are high. When the rates are low the Canadian boats have the trade to themselves. The American boats when they come into the trade are the controlling factor in the rates. Their competition keeps the rates from going out of sight. It has been said that the rates will be regulated. We know that last year the board of grain commissioners fixed the maximum rate at 6½ cents a bushel, and we are told that there is a further provision that gives the governor-in-council power to intervene and set the rates at any time they think the rates are too high. But what has been our experience in the past? Whenever the rates have gone up it takes so long to get action through either channel that the mischief has already been done before action is taken. I give every credit to the board of grain commissioners for the action they took last fall in fixing a maximum rate, but this fact remains that before they fixed it a great deal of the mischief had been done, and as for intervening by order in council that is slower still.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is wrong again. The board of grain commissioners intervened before the proclaimed rate went into effect.

Mr. YOUNG: When did the seven cent rate go into effect?

Mr. STEVENS: That did not go into effect. It was announced, but the board of grain commissioners stepped in and the rate was fixed at 6½ cents.

Mr. YOUNG: I will accept that.

Mr. BOWMAN: And it was fixed without any complaint.

Mr. YOUNG: From whom?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BOWAN: Without any complaint being lodged with the board of grain commissioners.

Mr. YOUNG: There was considerable complaint in the west, but perhaps no formal complaint, and that may be the weakness of the system. If you wait for someone to make a formal complaint a good deal of the mischief can be done. There was complaint in the west when the rates were increased and when the price of grain was at the lowest point almost in history.

In the United States in 1880 the freight rate on wheat from Chicago to New York was 20 cents a bushel. Under free competition, open market conditions, that rate gradually worked down till at the turn of the century it was only 10 cents a bushel. Then it worked back and forth within a range of two cents a bushel until rate control became effective in the United States. Prior to 1906 their attempt to control rates had been spasmodic and ineffective. With the passing of the Hepburn Act in 1906, rate control became a reality, and then the decline in freight rates ceased. The rates moved back and forth within a range of two cents until 1916 when the rate shot up to 20 cents a bushel. That was the result of control, and now the rates are controlled by the interstate commerce commission, and the rate is 18 cents a bushel, as compared with 10 cents before effective control came into force, and 20 cents away back in 1880. They are almost back to where they were forty years ago in the matter of freight rate. That is the result of attempting to control rates in the United States.

I ask this question: On what basis are you going to control rates? Will you regulate them on a cost plus basis? Will you say that the carrier of the grain on the lakes must have all his operating expenses, his depreciation, insurance and everything else, plus a reasonable profit.

Mr. MANION: He has not been getting that for many years.

Mr. YOUNG: You are talking of controlling rates. Will you regulate them at a figure that will give the ship owner a profit? I ask, then, what right have you to guarantee him a profit more than anybody else? Besides, when you attempt to control rates the controlling body is not in a position and never can be in a position to know when the boats are efficiently managed, or whether the capital structure of the company represents a lot of obsolete and scrap vessels that went out of service long ago. I understand that today one of the reasons why Canadian boats cannot compete is that they have a lot of old-fashioned, out of date boats.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) spoke last night of a statutory rate. I do not agree with that. I do not think we should have a statutory rate. It is too rigid. The proper control of rates is free, open competition. I have here a book on the American Transport System by Harold Moulton and associates in which this matter of freight rates is discussed, and he has this to say:

> Wherever there is free economic competition it will decide the rate question, and it should be permitted to do so freely.

Free, open competition, yes, not trying to close the market and letting a combine get all the traffic. The American boat now comes into the picture whenever rates are high enough. This is attempting to remove that competition. It is done at the instance of the Associated Lake Freighters mentioned by the minister the other night. Who are these Associated Lake Freighters? I may tell the minister that when we go into committee we will want to know something of that company and its charter. The statement has been made that there is no combine. I say that there is, and we know there is, and we know who is at the head of it. We know the methods to which he resorted to get shipping companies into it, and the fees per bushel he charged for his services. We know that when the combine was organized, rates began to increase and then the board of grain commissioners stepped in and set a maximum rate. When this legislation becomes effective that combine is going to ask that control of rates be taken from the board of grain commissioners and given to the board of railway commissioners, because they did not like the action taken last fall by the board of grain commissioners.

The legislation was drafted in fear of retaliation by the United States. I believe that it would have been brought in before but there was always the fear that the United States might hit back. At last some clever person, the government leader in the Senate I believe, hit upon the device of taking the very words out of the American act and putting them into the Canadian act, arguing that surely the Americans cannot now retaliate against what we are doing, that they cannot resent these very words in our act which are taken from their own act. But the cases are not quite parallel. There is small temptation for Canadian boats to go into United States ports to carry grain to Canadian ports, and then go back to American ports, because the ports are not favourably located. The cases are not parallel at all. It may have seemed very clever for the government leader in the Senate to devise this way of drafting the section so that the Americans would not retaliate. I say it may have been a clever trick of a clever man, but I have no faith in clever tricks of clever men as a basis of national prosperity. In trying to build the prosperity of a country you must take the broader and the longer view. Those tactics might be all right for a man running a pawn shop, but they will not do in international relations. The Americans will find a way to retaliate. What will they do to our boats on the Pacific coast running from Seattle to Vancouver and Skagway? Will they not find a way to retaliate? I think they will. To assume that simply by taking these words out of their act and putting them in ours we have outwitted them is not to give them credit for being as clever as we are, and I think we might be disappointed.

What about the tariff truce of which we have heard so much lately? A tariff truce has been arranged among the different countries. We are going to get together with the idea of promoting world trade. Is this proper preparation for it? I am not sure of the terms of the truce, and I do not know whether this legislation is a breach of it or not—certainly I do know it is a breach of the spirit of it. It is protection, pure and simple. What about the talk of reciprocity? We are going to have a reciprocity treaty with the United States—perhaps. Is this good preparation for it? In what frame of mind will the Americans be when they see this legislation on our books? What will they say when we seek more favourable trade relations? What about the seaway treaty? Will the United States enter into a seaway contract if we say we will not allow any American ships through our ports? They do not know what we may do next. Two years ago—nearly three years ago—our Prime Minister went abroad to do wonderful things for trade within the empire. He went to the Imperial conference at London. At that time he failed. A year ago he had another opportunity when the Imperial economic conference met here in Ottawa. We know the results of that.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Very tangible results.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at the trade returns.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Look at the pockets of the people.

Mr. YOUNG: Now he has another opportunity. He is going to another conference to try to promote world trade. But before he goes he is making a similar preparation,—a preparation similar to that which he made before he went to the Imperial conference in London. Before he went to London he passed legislation which made the conference abortive. Before the conference at Ottawa last year legislation was placed upon our statute books which made it impossible to effect profitable trade arrangements with Great Britain. Now he is going to another conference, but before going he is introducing another measure which will have the effect of giving a monopoly of shipping on Canadian lakes to Canadians.

Mr. ROBINSON: You want to create a monopoly for American ships.

Mr. YOUNG: No, I am asking only for free competition. That is all we ask. Let the grain be carried by whomsoever can carry it cheapest and most efficiently. There seems to be no limit to the ingenuity displayed by this government in devising ways and means of stifling Canadian trade.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: And the strange part of it is that they do it all with the very best of intentions. They think that by this measure they are going to help us. They think they can build up Canadian shipping in this way. No country in the world has been able to build up its shipping industry by means of navigation acts or protective tariffs.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the hon. member been reading what the British Shipping Federation has been saying lately about competition?

Mr. YOUNG: No.

Mr. BENNETT: If he had he would not now be making such observations about what he calls free competition.

Mr. YOUNG: I am making them, anyway.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Everybody out of step but my boy.

Mr. YOUNG: No country ever succeeded in building up its shipping by navigation acts such as these. Norway tried it once. Centuries before Columbus discovered America the Scandinavians established colonies on this continent, with which they carried on a profitable shipping business. But what happened? They passed certain navigation acts which had in view the very purpose behind this bill, namely, to confine shipping to their own nationals. What were the results? They destroyed their colonies—destroyed them completely. England tried to build up her trade in the same way.

Mr. STEVENS: She did.

Mr. YOUNG: Let us see what she did. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries she passed her navigation laws. Here is the result:

> Sir Joseph Child in 1690 enumerated fifteen lines of foreign trade which we had lost either wholly or partly through the working of the navigation acts, while the Dutch broadly gained what we had lost.

Then on the next page:

> But when we note at the same time that the tonnage of the mercantile marine, estimated on the annual clearances, had risen only from 444,000 in 1714, to 471,000 in 1760, we realize the utter failure of the navigation acts to fulfil their avowed purpose. In the same period the foreign tonnage entering English ports had increased more than fourfold, to say nothing of the smuggling mostly done in foreign bottoms.

In other words, the navigation acts, which England had passed for the sole purpose of protecting her shipping and giving to British ships a monopoly of the shipping trade, in forty-six years increased British shipping by three-quarters of one per cent, while foreign shipping into British ports increased by four hundred per cent. How much success did they have? How much success did their navigation laws reveal? I have much more that I could read, but I shall not take the time.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: You might as well read it.

Mr. YOUNG: All right, I will.

Mr. STEVENS: Read some more, it is really most pleasant reading.

Mr. YOUNG: I know it is pleasant for my hon. friend.

Mr. ROBINSON: And it happened only about four or five hundred years ago.

Mr. YOUNG: The article is too long to read, but the substance of it is this: France tried to build up her shipping in the same way, and failed; Venice tried it, and failed; Genoa tried it and failed; the United States tried it and failed. We are trying it and we are going to fail, because you cannot build up a shipping industry in that way. Shipping is the last industry in the world which will stand a protective tariff. It is the one industry above all others which must have free, open competition. Something was said a few moments ago by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland)—

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. member permit a question? He has just stated that this measure provides a protective tariff for shipping. There is no protection for shipping, in so far as the great British shipping world is concerned. They all have access to our waters, it is not limited to Canadian ships. The whole British shipping world, the largest entity in the whole shipping industry of the world, has access.

Mr. YOUNG: This, then, is levelled at the ships of one particular country? Is that right? Do I understand that?

Mr. STEVENS: No. All foreign shipping is included.

Mr. YOUNG: All foreign shipping is included,—but it is aimed at the ships of one particular country.

Mr. STEVENS: No it is not.

Mr. YOUNG: It is. Last night the minister said that it is the business of parliament to nurture Canadian interests. To nurture them means to feed them. Where will he get the wherewithal to feed them? Is it the business of parliament to take from one man that which he produces and feed it to another? I say it is not. It is the business of parliament to see that every Canadian gets fair play. He is entitled to the thing and he should get the thing that he produces himself.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. YOUNG: I cannot support this bill in any shape or form. If it is passed it will result in a monopoly of the trade on the great lakes. That trade will be delivered over into the hands of only Canadians. It will result in higher freight rates. It will result in difficulties in selling our wheat at a time when one of the greatest problems with which we are confronted is that of selling wheat. Because, as I said before, when the grain cannot be shipped from the most satisfactory point, it very often happens that we miss the sale of a consignment. In every way we look at it this bill is unsatisfactory. I do not see how any hon. members from the west can support it. I see that the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) is in his seat. Will he stand up and vote for this bill; will he vote for a bill which will increase the freight rates on grain carried on the lakes?

Mr. LOUCKS: I will answer my hon. friend. Yes, I will vote for this bill. I think if the hon. member had heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce last night he must be satisfied that the grain growers in the west have every protection.

Mr. YOUNG: I heard what he said. It will be a very sorry day for the hon. member when his people hear about his statement.

Mr. LOUCKS: I have no worry at all.

Mr. YOUNG: What about the other members from the west? I do not see how they can vote for this bill. It is class legislation, and is designed to protect a certain class of people doing a certain business on the lakes, people who will be able to put their hands into the pockets of the western farmers, take money out of them and put it into their own pockets. Who is there who will guarantee him a price for his wheat? Nobody does and nobody can. Why then should he be compelled to guarantee profits to anyone else?

Mr. STEVENS: No one suggests it.

On motion of Mr. Kennedy (Peace River) the debate was adjourned.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house we may perhaps intervene in this debate for the purpose of reverting to the order of presenting reports of standing and select committees. It is quite unusual, and can only be done with the consent of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): What is the purpose?

Mr. BENNETT: For the purpose of receiving the report of the select committee dealing wth redistribution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before giving any consent on that point may I ask the Prime Minister what is the intention of the government with respect to the report, once it is brought in? Is it intended to go right on with the bill immediately?

Mr. BENNETT: We could not go on until this order of business is disposed of. The purpose of dealing with it at the present moment is that the bill may be distributed. It was suggested after a conference yesterday, that we name two of the older members —and I am suggesting that Sir George Perley and Mr. Duranleau should be the two from this side,—to confer with members who might be named by the leader of the opposition to see if such difficulties as exist in connection with the schedule to the bill can be disposed of. There are not a large number.

This house might then adjourn until three o'clock to-morrow, for the Minister of Marine is in charge of the bill now before the house, and if he continued with that he would not have the opportunity to confer. The Postmaster General, as is known, is attending a conference that, under an agreement, I think, was arranged to meet here, I fancy before we came into office. That has to be dealt with. Under these circumstances if the report is presented the consideration of it would go upon the order paper for the next sitting, the bill would be distributed and if it be acceptable to the house, we could adjourn until three o'clock to-morrow to enable this conference to take place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the rules of the house it would not be possible to proceed with the bill in any event until it had been placed upon the order paper.

Mr. BENNETT: Not without consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That would have to be given first. I would not feel that we were justified in giving consent until we have had an opportunity of at least looking over the schedules. In the circumstances it would appear to be desirable for the house to adjourn at one o'clock until to-morrow afternoon and in the interval have the conference to which the Prime Minister has referred.

The Prime Minister has mentioned the names of the gentlemen whom he would select. I would name Mr. Lapointe and Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) who are to my immediate right and left, to represent the official opposition. If that is agreeable, I would agree to the suggestion to revert to the order so as to permit the report to be introduced.

Mr. BENNETT: Then by consent, I move, —I would associate with me the right hon. gentleman as seconder—that we revert to the order of presenting reports of standing and select committees.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, my right hon. friend has placed his faith in majorities, I think he had better hold thereto.

Mr. BENNETT: I would still be in a majority. Seconded, then, by Mr. Stevens.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) presented the second and final report of the special committee as follows:

Your special committee to whom was referred Bill No. 2, an act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, with instructions to prepare schedules to contain and describe the several electoral divisions entitled to return members to this house and to report the same, now present their second and final report:—

Your committee have prepared the descriptions and the return of members for the several electoral divisions which are set forth in the schedules hereto appended in respect of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island and the Yukon territory.

The report of your committee is unanimous in so far as the same relates to Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba and the Yukon territory, and, although not unanimous as to the other provinces, represents a very substantial measure of agreement with respect thereto.

Accordingly the committee beg leave to report the said bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I make a suggestion; I have not seen the bill—

Mr. BENNETT: It will be distributed immediately.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —but I would like to know the population of the new constituencies as determined and fixed by the bill. Would it be possible to have a list of those new constituencies with the population of each new riding described in the schedule so that we may be able to discuss the matter intelligently?

Mr. BENNETT: The bill is printed and will be distributed now. The information the committee had before it will certainly be available to this select four who will try to deal with the problem. I should ask the chairman to make available all the information and maps that the committee had before it, which I believe indicate in approximate figures the population of the new ridings.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what I want.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may be permitted a word on this matter I also might instance that this is a rather unusual procedure. The proposal is that this house adjourn at one o'clock until three o'clock to-morrow in order that some of the older heads of this house, named by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, may confer together to iron out some of the difficulties that have arisen in the committee dealing with redistribution. It is rather unfortunate that this has to be done, but inasmuch as it has to be done, I think the suggestion is a very good one. But I think it is unfortunate that the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition should have agreed on the older heads of this house, because the longer a person remains in this house the more partisan he becomes, consequently the possibility of them accomplishing anything is not very great. The Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition have unfortunately forgotten that there is another section in this house that is as much interested in redistribution as the Conservative party and the Liberal party. If I may be bold enough to make a suggestion it would be that it would be advisable to have a younger head working with the older heads, and he would probably be the balance of power that would accomplish something. Therefore I suggest that we add to that committee Mr. Speakman of Red Deer to represent this corner of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, this informal discussion which by consent is being carried on may be all to the advantage of parliament. What we desire to do is to arrive at some fair redistribution of the seats in this dominion that will do violence to the rights of no man. That is the effort. Whether or not it can be accomplished depends largely upon the good will, as the right hon. gentleman opposite said yesterday, of those who comprise this house, having respect always to the fact that the anomalies of the past sometimes have to be undone. That does always create difficulty. Shifting population is always a factor. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) suggests that one member from that corner of the house might be of assistance on this committee. This small committee has no authority to bind anything. It will endeavour to speak for a party organization to ensure that the arrangements it makes may become effective; that is the position as I understand it. If the hon. member from Acadia, who has a fair mind, believes he can assist in the manner indicated, speaking for myself I shall be glad if he will sit in with the other members of the committee for the purpose of making any suggestions that might lead to that end. Would that be acceptable to my right hon. friend?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As far as the official opposition is concerned I would be most heartily in accord with having the leader of the Progressive party sit in with the other gentlemen for that purpose. The whole aim, as I understand it, is to arrive at what would be recognized as fair and just as the result of persuasion and argument rather than of any other power or influence.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. Then it is understood that between now and to-morrow the small committee representing the parties, Sir George Perley; the Minister of Marine, Mr. Duranleau; the former Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Lapointe; the former Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton); and Mr. Gardiner, the hon. member for Acadia, shall meet together to see whether some suggestions can be made to obviate the necessity for prolonged and acrimonious discussion with respect to these matters.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does the hon. member for Acadia feel equal to the task of representing the younger heads?

Mr. GARDINER: As my hon. friend will remember, I did not suggest that in the first place; I suggested the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman).

Mr. BENNETT: We will take the leader of the party.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the house do now adjourn until to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock, but perhaps someone will move the adjournment of the debate first.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

Mr. BENNETT: I now move that the house adjourn.

Mr. BOULANGER: I object to the motion for the adjournment of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BOULANGER: Well, I object. There are many items on the order paper which might be taken up—items in which private members are interested.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable. Does the hon. member desire to have a vote?

Mr. BOULANGER: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: All those in favour of the motion will say aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: All those opposed to the motion will say nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the ayes have it. The motion is carried, and the house stands adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 1.05 p.m.

Thursday, May 18, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary) (for Mr. Matthews) presented the sixth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce, as follows:

The select standing committee on banking and commerce begs leave to present the following as a sixth report:

On Monday, February 6, 1933, the following order of reference issued from the house, viz.:

Ordered,—That the following proposed resolution be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce:—

Whereas the question of public and private indebtedness has become one of our greatest and most perplexing problems, enhanced during the past years by the extremely low price level of all primary commodities, through which this indebtedness must be in large part met, and the effect of which has been to double and treble the actual burden of these liabilities; and,

Whereas this fact has been recognized in respect of certain international obligations, and has become a practical issue in respect of the public obligations of many countries; and,

Whereas no such recognition has as yet been given to the heavy private indebtedness within this country, although these, together with the high interest rates which prevail, constitute just as heavy and impossible a burden to the individual, as do national and international obligations to the countries concerned; and,

Whereas this situation is one of the greatest factors in the present economic depression, and is one of the greatest barriers to the financial recovery of agriculture and industry, and as such, deserves and commands the immediate attention of this parliament;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give serious and immediate attention to the question of debts and interest rates within this country, and the possibility of their reduction, either by way of direct action, or by the submission of the entire problem to the select standing committee on banking and commerce, in order that the subject may be fully inquired into, and if possible, some solution found.

Attest.

Arthur Beauchesne,
Clerk of the House.

In view of the general terms in which the resolution is expressed, the sponsor was asked to prepare a memorandum indicating more specifically the ground he would suggest the committee endeavour to cover. This was done, and the memorandum may be found on page 3A of the printed evidence.

The committee accepted the task set before it, but to obtain the information outlined to the committee by the proposer of the resolution, was an undertaking that in part was incapable of fulfilment. For example, a comprehensive answer to the question asking for a general classification of the wealth level of all lenders of money would require a complete census of the wealth of private individuals as well as of corporations. Such a census, in the view of the committee, could not accurately be taken.

While the dominion statistician was able to supply from existing records a large amount of relevant statistics, additional data are needed which can only be obtained by special inquiries for which a period of time covering some weeks or even months will be necessary. In view of these facts, this report must necessarily be limited in scope and is not intended to be a complete review of the subjects contained in the reference.

Nevertheless, studies of the material gathered to date reveal tendencies upon which certain conclusions may be based. These are developed in the paragraphs which follow:

1. Public Debt—Dominion of Canada

(a) Debt outstanding—

The total of unmatured funded debt of the dominion on March 31, 1933, was $2,715,910,607. From this amount should be deducted sinking funds of $66,001,724, leaving the net funded debt at $2,649,908,883.

(b) Interest rates—

Interest payable on this total was $127,239,499, or an average rate of 4·68 per cent. On specific bond issues the rate varies from 2½ per cent on the loan of $4,888,186 made in London in 1897, due in 1947, to 5½ per cent payable on victory loans maturing in 1933, 1934 and 1937.

Evidence presented to the committee indicates a downward tendency in interest rates in recent years. The yield on typical Dominion government bonds used by the Bureau of Statistics in their index of long term interest rates, which was as high as 5½ per cent in 1922, was down to a rate of 4½ per cent in 1933. This cheapening of the cost of money is reflected in the current interest rates, which have been paid on various classes of debts. The average rate of interest paid on Dominion government funded debt was 5·20 per cent in 1922, and in 1932 was 4·97 per cent. The current rate, due to the effect of conversion loans, is 4·68 per cent.

Since the committee began its sittings, the rate of interest on savings deposits in banks has been reduced from 3 per cent to 2½ per cent, in loan and trust companies from 4 per cent to 3½ per cent, in the post office from 3 per cent to 2½ per cent, and in the province of Ontario savings office from 3 per cent to 2½ per cent.

(c) Sinking funds—

Sinking funds are applicable only to sterling bonds issued in London, of a par value of $254,000,000. The amount presently held in the sinking fund represents about one-quarter of the outstanding principal of the issues to which the sinking fund applies. With respect to other issues, retirements have been made from yearly surpluses from time to time, but no definite program of debt retirement has been laid down in the past.

Recommendations re Public Debt

1. The committee highly recomends the conversion of outstanding obligations from a higher to a lower rate of interest when the state of the money market warrants it. The conversion loan of 1931 is an example of the benefits of this practice, as shown by the following table:

Conversion Loan, 1931

Description of Loan Converted	Amount Converted	Interest Old	Rate New	Maturity of Conversion Issue	Annual Saving in Interest
	$	per cent	per cent		$
Second War Loan, 1916-31	38,625,700	5	4½	1956	193,128
Renewal Loan, 1922-32	37,523,200	5½	4½	1957	375,232
Victory Loan, 1918-33	276,688,100	5½	4½	1958	2,766,881
Vicory Loan, 1919-34	285,772,300	5½	4½	1959	2,857,723
Total	638,609,300				6,192,964

The annual saving of interest is shown to be $6,192,964.

In pointing out that bonds maturing within a short time should be converted to lower rates of interest as soon as it can be done, the committee calls attention to the possibilities as shown in the following figures:

There are outstanding victory loans maturing in 1933 and bearing 5½ per cent interest.. .. .. $169,971,850
Victory loans maturing in 1934 and bearing 5½ per cent interest.. .. 226,138,350

The conversion of these 5½ per cent securities presently falling due affords an opportunity of further reducing the burden of fixed charges. If they were converted to a 4½ per cent coupon the saving per annum in interest would be $3,961,102. If the rate of interest were 4 per cent, the saving would be $5,941,653.

The committee expresses the hope that a coupon rate not exceeding 4 per cent may be used. Any discount on the sale of the bonds could be absorbed by amortization.

2. A general amortization or debt retirement plan should be put into effect as soon as finances permit, and the annual payment to effect this end should be budgeted for each year. The adoption of this plan would ensure an orderly retirement of the existing debt within a definite period.

The committee particularly draws attention to the fact that after the heavy refundings that will be necessary up to and including 1937, there follows a period of twenty years in which the maturities in any one year are not so large as to involve major borrowing operations.

3. Future long term bond issues should either (a) have sinking fund provisions; or (b) have their maturity dates arranged, in so far as practicable, to conform with the suggested plan of annual debt retirement.

In good times, when revenues are buoyant and no bonds maturing, the pressure for increased capital expenditure throughout the country is almost irresistible. When maturities are coming due, the Minister of Finance must provide for them. Hence the desirability of regularity of maturities.

4. Long term issues should, when possible, have callable provisions so that in times of low interest rates advantage may be taken to re-finance.

If and when these recommendations are adopted, the whole debt structure of the Dominion of Canada will be on a retirement basis that will tend to safeguard and indeed improve the credit of the country.

The committee is of opinion that an emphasis on the integrity of our national obligations will re-affirm to our own people and to the world that in trustworthiness and quality we stand for the honour of our bargains, whether convenient or not.

The following table summarizes the situation as regards public debt in the dominion, its provinces and municipalities, and the funded debt of corporations:

Public Debt of Canada, its Provinces and Municipalities, Funded Debt of Corporations, together with Interest Payments (Latest Available Figures)

—	Amount	Interest	Average Rate
	$	$	per cent
Net debt of Canada March 31st, 1933 (preliminary) (1)	2,599,089,000	121,637,365	4·68
Bonds guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada as to principal and interest, and interest only March 31st, 1933 (2)	996,148,354	45,356,904	4·55
Gross direct liabilities of provinces, fiscal years ending in 1932 (3)	1,363,382,464	62,715,593	4·6
Indirect liabilities of provinces, fiscal years ending in 1932 (4)	215,977,011	9,071,034	4·2
Grand total direct liabilities of all Canadian municipalities Dec. 31st, 1931 (5)	1,584,000,000	77,616,000	4·9
Corporations—
Railways (6)	919,000,000	40,897,000	4·45
Other corporations (7)	1,178,000,000	64,672,000	5·49
	8,855,596,829	421,965,896	4·77

(1) Funded debt was $2,715,910,607 with interest charges of $127,239,499.

The net debt figure is used in preference to that for gross debt ($2,990,315,000) because certain items in the gross debt are offset by active assets ($391,226,000), which are in large part cash assets and interest bearing assets. Among the active assets are loans to provinces which should appear among provincial debts. If they were included in Dominion government debt also there would be duplication. Net debt figures are used in preference to funded debt because the latter would include money raised and put into active assets, such as loans to provinces.

(2) Bonds guaranteed by the dominion. Of these, interest only is guaranteed on principal amounting to $216,000,000. Principal and interest are guaranteed for the remaining $780,148,354.

(3) The largest item in provincial public debt is the bonded debt which totals $1,148,451,597. In addition there were treasury bills amounting to $103,707,602, bank loans, savings deposits, etc.

(4) Indirect liabilities of the provinces include guarantees of railway, hydro-electric, municipal obligations, etc.

(5) This figure includes the total liabilities of all municipalities in six provinces and the bonded debt of the others (the total liabilities not being available). The amount given is, therefore, the lowest at which the aggregate direct liabilities of Canadian municipalities can be placed.

(6) Only the unguaranteed portion of Canadian National bonded indebtedness is included here, the guaranteed debt being included in the second item of the table.

(7) Other corporations include industrial, financial, merchandising, etc., in fact, all except public and railways.

II. Municipal Debt

The gross debenture debt of municipalities numbering over 4,200, by provinces, as at December 31, 1931, was as follows:

Province	Bonded Debt
Alberta	$ 78,679,570
British Columbia	129,913,890
Manitoba	116,864,937
Ontario	499,002,074
Nova Scotia	31,386,025
New Brunswick	21,477,521
Prince Edward Island (a)	1,863,211
Quebec	362,132,334
Saskatchewan	47,488,595
Total	$1,288,808,157

Other liabilities, consisting of temporary loans and overdrafts on banks, accounts payable and miscellaneous floating liabilities, amount to $295,223,318.

Interest payments on municipal bonded debt average 4·9 per cent, or on the total shown in the table above, $63,151,599.

III. Private Debt

While the figures for public debt can be obtained with approximately completeness, those for private indebtedness can only partially cover the field. Figures for bank loans are a matter of monthly record, and were submitted to the committee.

Concerning mortgages, definite information is obtainable for only a portion of the field. In the census of 1931, a question regarding mortgages was included in the farm schedule. As a result of this investigation it was ascertained that out of a total of 654,297 owned and partly owned farms in the dominion, 244,201 were mortgaged to the extent of $677,564,100. It should be pointed out that these figures refer only to the debt secured by a mortgage or by an equivalent legal instrument on lands and buildings. Details may be found in the evidence. These figures apply also only to "owned" farms. It is estimated that urban mortgages held by corporate lenders amount to about $765,000,000.

No attempt has been made to compile information on debts of private individuals which may have been contracted in various ways, because of lack of available data.

IV. Bank Interest

Rates of bank interest and discount are not available by provinces but average rates for the dominion as a whole are known. Average interest rates on loans, including call loans, show declines from 1930 to 1932.

Maximum and minimum average interest and discount rates charged by all banks on loans or advances in Canada during the years 1930, 1931 and 1932.

	Average Interest		Average Discount
	Maximum*	Minimum*	Maximum*	Minimum*
	per cent	per cent	per cent	per cent
1930	6·43	6·29	6·99	6·86
1931	6·39	6·05	6·80	6·66
1932	6·18	6·03	6·81	6·67

N.B.—These average rates include call loan transactions on which for some years past the prevalent interest rate had been 6 per cent.

*Each bank reports quarterly its maximum and minimum rates. The averages shown above are the averages of four quarterly periods and of all banks.

V. Mortgage Rates of Interest

Considerable data were secured by the Dominion bureau of statistics from the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association, and from some individual mortgage companies relating to interest charged on mortgages. Average rates were obtained from 57 companies, which show current rates ranging from 6 per cent to 8 per cent in all provinces except Quebec, where slightly lower rates were reported. One large company furnished records showing that the average rate on new rural and urban mortgages for the Dominion declined from 8·35 per cent in 1921 to 6·84 per cent in 1931. On renewals the rate fell from 8·17 per cent in 1921 to 6·90 per cent in 1931.

In general, it may be concluded in the cases of the figures supplied that mortgage rates have declined throughout the dominion in recent years on both new mortgages and renewals.

Nevertheless, these conclusions should only be taken as tentative, because they are based on returns from corporate lenders only. No data are available yet from private lenders or from mortgagors themselves. Statistical enquiries should be instituted to secure information from these sources to round out the case presented by the mortgage companies.

VI. Supplementary Information Required

On several other subjects which came to the attention of the committee, partial information was furnished by the Dominion bureau of statistics, but it is felt that the data thus far brought together are insufficient upon which to base definite conclusions, and that an all-round enlargement in the bureau's organization of financial statistics should be instituted. In particular, in addition to the supplementary information required on mortgage rates (which has already been mentioned) the committee recommends that the Dominion bureau of statistics be authorized to obtain the following:

Data on fees and charges to which mortgagors are subjected when taking out new mortgages or renewing old ones. Very meagre information is available on this subject, but enquiries are already under way in the bureau of statistics.

Data on the cost of money to loaning bodies are required so as to get some idea of the spread between actual costs and loaning rates. Only partial information is now available.

Data on arrears of interest payments and on the amount of principal and interest written off by mortgage companies.

VII. Jurisdiction of Parliament

The following questions respecting the jurisdiction of parliament to legislate on the subject of interest and loans were submitted to the Deputy Minister of Justice, the Deputy Minister of Finance, and the attorneys-general of the various provinces (pp. ix and x):

"1. Has the Dominion parliament the power to fix a maximum rate of interest which may be charged on loans, et cetera, granted by corporations created by Dominion statute or letters patent where such corporations were

(a) previously incorporated;

(b) to be incorporated?

2. Has the Dominion parliament any power to prescribe the maximum rate of interest chargeable on loans generally made by

(a) persons,

(b) corporates created by statute or letters patent other than Dominion?

3. Has the Dominion parliament the power

(a) to fix;

(b) to alter

rates of interest in respect of bills of exchange and promissory notes?

4. (a) Has the Dominion parliament power to enforce reduction of principal of debt in respect of loans made

i. by corporations incorporated under jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament;

ii. by corporations incorporated under other jurisdictions;

iii. by individuals?

(b) If necessary for the determination of the above questions, is any differentiation to be made between loans

i. secured upon real property;

ii. secured upon personal property;

iii. without security?"

Answers to these questions were made by the Department of Justice and the attorneys-general of Nova Scotia, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Quebec. These answers appear in the minutes of proceedings and evidence as follows:

Department of Justice, pp. 43 to 48;
A.-G. of Nova Scotia, p. 49;
A.-G. of British Columbia, pp. 65-66;
A.-G. of New Brunswick, p. 187;
A.-G. of Manitoba, pp. 188 to 190;
A.-G. of Quebec, pp. 198-206.

The answers may be summarized as follows:

Questions 1 (a) and (b)—all answers were in the affirmative.

Questions 2 (a) and (b)—all answers were in the affirmative. The A.-G. of British Columbia, however, said that:

"so far as corporations other than federal are concerned, the dominion perhaps could not interfere with a contract made with a foreign company outside Canada though the party liable for the interest might reside within Canada."

Questions 3 (a) and (b)—all answers were in the affirmative.

Questions 4 (a), i, ii, iii—all answers, with the exception of that of Manitoba, were in the negative, the Department of Justice excepting, however, bank loans. The A.-G. of Manitoba said that it was difficult to give a satisfactory answer but stated that in the case of legislation arising out of what might be termed a national emergency, or legislation which could be classed as relating to banking, incorporation of banks, the issue of paper money, bills of exchange and promissory notes, bankruptcy and insolvency, the answer would be in the affirmative. He further stated that in the case of a debtor who resides in one province and the creditor outside the said province, the legislature of the province of the debtor could not validly legislate in derogation of a civil right existing and enforceable outside the province.

Questions 4 (b), i, ii, iii—all answers, except in the case of Manitoba, were in the negative. The A.-G. of Manitoba did not answer this question expressly, but it would appear by implication that his answer would have been in the negative.

General

It is hardly necessary to point out that obligations, both public and private, undertaken when the general price level was much higher, present a serious problem under economic conditions presently prevailing. This is particularly true of Canada, in which within a comparatively short period, heavy obligations have been assumed for capital investments in plant, equipment and transportation facilities connected with the development of our natural resources and the expansion of the productive capacity of the country.

In so far as public debts are concerned, we believe that the most desirable course to be pursued lies in the direction of means that may be taken to cheapen money, and other measures, including international cooperation, designed to lay the foundation for a rise in the general price level and a restoration of world confidence and trade.

Within the country, the balancing of governmental budgets and the conversion of maturing debts at lower interest rates will be a constructive influence. Measures which will tend to relieve the burden of fixed public debts will of course also operate with similar effect in the field of private debts.

The committee believes that the reduction in interest rates on bank deposits recently achieved with the cooperation of the government is a constructive step, and, it is to be hoped, a forerunner of more important action which Canada may be enabled to take in the international sphere as a participant in the World Economic and Monetary Conference.

A printed copy of the evidence taken is tabled with this report.

[Mr. Stanley.]

Mr. STANLEY moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Would it not be as well if we first had an opportunity of reading this report?

Mr. DONNELLY: This report has been submitted to the house and we do not know what it is. It should stand for twenty-four hours until we know what it contains.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion to adopt the report is perfectly in order but the house can take what action it wishes.

Mr. IRVINE: We do not know what we are being asked to adopt by this motion. The subject submitted to this committee for its study and examination was a very important one and before we finally endorse the report we should know what it contains.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: A motion of this kind requires the unanimous consent of the house. As exception has been taken, the motion can stand until members have had a chance of reading this report in votes and proceedings.

Mr. SPEAKER: The report will be published in votes and proceedings of to-morrow. If hon. members desire the motion to stand, it will stand.

Motion stands.

DISCOUNT AND LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria) moved:

That standing order 104 be suspended in relation to Bill No. 110, an act to incorporate The Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada and that the said bill be placed upon the order paper for consideration this day in committee of the whole house.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The rules of the house do not provide for the discussion of private bills on Thursdays. I submit that this matter should be considered at the next sitting.

Mr. SPEAKER: Objection having been taken, the motion cannot be proceeded with.

Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I beg to lay on the table a number of orders in council passed pursuant to the relief legislation.

QUESTIONS

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—GASPE, QUE.

Mr. BRASSET:

1. Is the government aware that Rodrick Eden, of Gaspe village, recently appointed collector of customs at Gaspe, is unable to either speak or write French?
2. Is the government aware that the same Rodrick Eden has a contract to carry the mail from Gaspe to the Wakeham post office?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. The district inspector of customs and excise reports that Mr. Eden possesses a sufficient knowledge of French to satisfactorily perform the duties of collector.
2. Yes.

WINDSOR, ONT.—FEDERAL BUILDING

Mr. CHEVRIER:

When will the Minister of Public Works place on and in the federal building recently erected on Ouellette street, in the city of Windsor, Ontario, sign-plates bearing French inscriptions, corresponding to the sign-plates bearing English inscriptions affixed on and in the said building?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Representations with regard to sign-plates bearing French inscriptions being placed on and in the new public building at Windsor, Ontario, will be given due consideration at the proper time.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

ARTHUR G. SLAGHT, K.C.

Mr. STANLEY:

What amount was paid by the government of Canada to Arthur G. Slaght, K.C., from and including the year 1926 to and including the year 1930?

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT STEAMSHIP CITADELLE

Mr. GARDINER:

1. For what purpose was the Canadian government steamship Citadelle built?
2. Upon whose representations or requests was this boat constructed?
3. What type of boat was requested?
4. Who prepared the plans and under whose instructions were they prepared?
5. Were the parties responsible for the representations or requests consulted and their approval of the plans secured before this construction was commenced?
6. How were tenders called?
7. Who tendered and for what price?
8. Who was the successful tenderer?
9. What was the price?
10. What moneys have been paid to them to date?
11. Were there any extras? If so, what were they and what did they cost?
12. Was any work done for private interests in the port of Quebec last fall?
13. If so, for whom and what amount was paid by these private interests for the services rendered by this boat?
14. Upon whose request was this boat transferred to the port of Saint John last fall and for what purpose?
15. While at Saint John was any work done for private interests?
16. If so, for whom, what payments were made by these private interests and to whom were the moneys paid?
17. Upon whose request was the boat brought back to the port of Quebec this spring, 1933?
18. For what purpose was it brought back?
19. Has the Department of Marine or the government made any arrangements, tacit or otherwise, to do work for private interests in the port of Quebec?
20. If so, what are they—viz—for whom and what consideration?
21. Has the government gone into the towing business?
22. If so, for what reason?

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

On the orders of the day.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. the acting leader of the house (Sir George Perley) whether Canada has received the disarmament message of President Roosevelt. The newspapers give a list of fifty-four nations to which this message has been sent and the name of Canada does not appear in this list. I should like to know whether Canada has received that message.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The President's communication, as my hon. friend will have seen by the press, was sent to the heads of all the different governments of the world. In our case, as one of the constituent parts of the British commonwealth of nations, this communication was sent to His Majesty the King, and a copy of the same has been transmitted to the Governor General for the consideration of the government of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was not sent to the Imperial government?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was sent to His Majesty?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It was sent to His Majesty on behalf of all parts of the British commonwealth; a copy of it has been sent by the King to His Excellency, the Governor General, and it has been transmitted to the government of Canada for its consideration.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHEVRIER—MR. GOBEIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I rise to a question of privilege, not so much one that affects the honour of any hon. member of this house, but one that may be referred to under standing order 41 in reference to decorum in debate. I want to quote the words of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) as reported in Hansard on page 5057. It is quite true that these words are not addressed to any other hon. member, but in speaking of a certain article that appeared in a newspaper, the hon. member for Compton on a question of privilege used the words that the representative of the newspaper——is not only a dirty individual, but a dirty, crooked liar.

Under the rules of the house this is one of the most unparliamentary expressions that could be used. Your Honour has been pleased on other occasions, indeed, only within the last few months, to rule in matters of this kind. Let me refer to Hansard at page 3630, where an hon. member made certain remarks about another newspaper correspondent. Your Honour was pleased to rule, as reported on page 3728, that the hon. member had attacked the reporter, of course not a member of this house, and Your Honour was pleased to say further:

I therefore direct the Editor of the Debates to expunge from the record—

So and so—the paragraphs in question. At a later date there was another ruling which Your Honour was pleased to make and which will appear in Hansard at page 4908 where the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), anxious to maintain the high reputation and character of this house, was pleased to say:

If a member can talk that way about a man who cannot defend himself on the floor of this house, about his whiskers, then all I can say is that this parliament has reached a low level.

Another decision which Your Honour was pleased to give as to striking out from the record a similar expression. It is quite true that May states:

If a member should say nothing disrespectful to the house or the chair, or personally opprobrious to other members, or in violation of other rules of the house he may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals.

Let me submit that in the use of those words—

Or injurious to the character of individuals.

[Sir George Perley.]

—one cannot dissociate the feelings or character of a member of the house, and I for one, who have the highest regard for the traditions of parliament, for its rules and precedents which you have with so much dignity so far upheld, resent extremely that words of that kind should be used with reference to a man who cannot defend himself upon the floor of the house. It would be very difficult, if such words may be used, to find a line of demarcation as to how far one can go in describing people outside. An hon member is well within his rights to say in a few words what he thinks of anyone, but I ask that some decency be maintained in the use of expressions. I therefore request you, sir, in view of the precedents you have established in the decisions you have given to rule that the words complained of be stricken from the record.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): May I answer?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is in order for the hon. member to speak on the matter.

Mr. GOBEIL: I was in any case going to rise on a question of privilege. I am going to speak on a question of privilege and at the same time answer the hon. member. Will that be in order? I must say first that the last part of my remarks in Hansard accusing this man of being "not only a dirty individual, but a dirty, crooked liar," is not exactly what I said. What I did say and what I have since corrected in Hansard is "a dirty public liar."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GOBEIL: I quite agree that if I had said "a dirty, crooked liar," his degree of crookedness might have been debatable, but I said "a dirty public liar." On the question of privilege, in view of an article that appeared yesterday signed by Mr. Emile Benoist, which, in my opinion and I am sure in the opinion of the house, is very injurious to myself and also absolutely false, may I be permitted to give a little more detail in regard to what I said the day before yesterday? On that occasion I complained of the title of the article and also of the article as a whole which I said was a tissue of lies. What the corespondent of Le Devoir said was that as a rural member I was insisting that more seats should be given to the island of Montreal. The intention of the writer is quite obvious. Knowing that I represented a rural riding, his intention was obviously to give my constituents and, indeed, all the rural citizens of Quebec the impression that I, as a rural member, had insisted that more seats be given to the island of Montreal, to the detriment of the rural parts of my province.

In this article of yesterday, Mr. Benoist makes the accusation that I have spoken to that effect and almost suggests that I should prove that that was not what I said.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is rising to a point of order. I will hear him.

Mr. POULIOT: No hon. member can discuss or complain of an article in a newspaper unless he lays that newspaper on the table of the house. That has not been done yet, and therefore, until it is done, the hon. member is not in order in speaking to his question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Temiscouata is premature in his objection.

Mr. GOBEIL: The writer being present at that meeting of the redistribution committee knew perfectly well when he wrote the article that the proceedings of the committee were not taken down in writing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Would the hon. member proceed to tell the house what he complains of in the article? There is no necessity for a long debate.

Mr. GOBEIL: I complain first of the heading of the article which says that Mr. Gobeil as a rural member wants a larger number of urban seats, a statement which is amplified in the article. What I was going to say was that the writer knew when he wrote the article that the proceedings of that committee were not taken down in writing, and surely my word as a sworn member of that committee and as a sworn member of this house should be as good as that of the writer. I denied in this house the day before yesterday that what was said in that article was correct. I said that it was not only incorrect but altogether false. I will go further. I have taken the trouble to look at practically all of the newspapers that I could find in the reading room of this house—

Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise to a point of order. A question of privilege has been raised by the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) regarding certain words that have been used. I submit that the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) is not in order in quoting another article which has no reference at all to the first one, or in making a speech on redistribution a subject which has been especially entrusted to a special committee of this house.

Mr. POULIOT: And the redistribution bill itself is before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Compton is dealing with the question of privilege raised by the senior member for Ottawa as well as with another matter at the same time in order to shorten the proceedings.

Mr. GOBEIL: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I had looked at practically all the Liberal papers published in the province of Quebec and also the Conservative papers that I could find in the reading room and not one of them has words such as are used by this writer, and of which I complain. What I said before the committee was that projects had been submitted conceding two more seats to the island of Montreal, three more seats and four more seats, and I said that Mr. Dorion and myself were quite agreeable to working on a plan that would give three more seats, and it was agreed upon.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Compton complains that he has been misrepresented as to his actions before a certain committee of this house. He has made his complaint.

In regard to the question raised by the senior member for Ottawa, the precedents he quoted are in themselves an effective answer to his application that I take some action, as according to said precedents, when words are spoken, no matter what they may be, concerning people outside the house, there is no recourse. In the instance referred to in which I as Speaker ordered certain statements expunged from Hansard and as to which there was objection from the right hon. leader of the opposition, in all of these cases reference had been made to members of this house. The references were not solely to people outside the house. I say that under the rules and precedents of parliamentary procedure the Speaker has no right to order the words complained of by the hon. member for Ottawa expunged. If reference had been made to hon. members of this house the Speaker could deal with them, but there is nothing to prevent this house taking whatever action it may choose, or see fit or be well advised to take, concerning the statements made by the hon. member for Compton in this house or by any other hon. member. It is entirely a matter for the house to deal with, and can be done by motion.

Mr. GOBEIL: May I say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has sufficiently addressed the house on the subject. His position has been made quite clear.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, if I am in order, with the greatest possible respect I would point out to you that when an hon. member had made use of a certain expression at page 2535 of Hansard and you had considered the matter you were pleased to direct, "I am of the opinion that the remark is not directed to the hon. member for Regina." If it was not directed to the hon. member for Regina it was directed to no other hon. member, but Your Honour ruled at a subsequent date that the words should be expunged from the record. Another remark practically of the same nature was made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) with reference to parliamentary correspondents, and Your Honour then ruled that the words were unparliamentary and that they should be stricken out of the record, and that was done. I have the greatest respect for Your Honour and I have no quarrel with your decision, and the citations I made were simply for the purpose of showing that the decorum of the house is a matter in your hands which I think should be regarded as a sacred trust.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): In my opinion these are not questions of privilege but questions of personal explanation. An hon. member of this house before the orders of the day were called complained about a newspaper article on what he said was a question of privilege, but it is not a question of privilege; it is a question of personal explanation. When an hon. member of this house is attacked by a newspaper the rule is very clear. He has no other recourse but to have the writer of the article or the editor of that newspaper brought before the bar of the house. That recourse is open to the hon. member, but I think that these are not questions of privilege and should not be raised as questions of privilege.

Mr. GOBEIL: Leaving my personality altogether aside I wish to submit, Mr. Speaker, that as a member of the redistribution committee I did my duty to the best of my ability. That may not amount to very much, but that is all I can offer, and I submit that I should not be subjected to all the slanders and falsehoods of that dirty individual.

[Mr Speaker.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I can only say this: I wish it were in the power of the Speaker to protect hon. members from any annoyance, but as I pointed out in reply to the hon. member for Ottawa, if he wishes to deal with the matter, then as the Deputy Speaker has already pointed out, the editor or the reporter can be ordered to appear before the bar of the house. That is entirely a matter within the power of the house itself, and is not subject to be ordered by the Speaker. The whole matter has to be dealt with by the house, and I say to the hon. member for Compton that if he wishes to go further, it should be done by motion.

Before this incident is closed, I do not want hon. members to take it that I approve of the language that has been complained of. It is quite within the power and the best judgment of every member of the house to refrain from using such language as will give offence. It is quite proper to engage in debate and severely criticize the policies and even the personal actions of members, without indulging in language of which the house should be ashamed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You had better repent.

JUDGE RUTHERFORD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago a petition was presented to the government asking that Judge Rutherford be restored to the air. I should like to know if the minister intends to take any action.

An hon. MEMBER: He has just spoken.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister does not answer. I should like to know if he intends to take any action.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I believe the statement I made some time ago about Judge Rutherford was quite clear, namely that the air had not been denied to him, but that the commission wanted the discs upon which the speeches of that gentleman were reported submitted to them before they were put on the air. That is all.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 17, consideration of the motion of hon. Mr. Duranleau for the second reading of Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have read this bill, and I believe the intent behind it is contained in section 935.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will hon. members please be quiet. It is impossible for the hon. member to make himself heard.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): That section reads as follows:

> No goods shall be transported by water or by land and water, from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation in any ship other than a British ship.

I suggest that that section is rather badly drawn. One phase of it is amusing, because I do not see how one could transport goods in a ship by land. As I see, it, Mr. Speaker, the issue is between the Canadian lake shippers and the western farmers. There has been injected into the debate the suggestion that the issue was between Canadian and American lake shippers. That does constitute an issue, but it is second only to the main one. There is also the suggestion that a question arises between western farmers and labour engaged on Canadian boats on the great lakes. That also is an issue, but does not interfere with the main point.

Personally, under ordinary circumstances, I have no objection to the government trying to bring about conditions which will bring a reasonable return to men engaged in shipping or in any other occupation. But I submit that until the time arrives when the farmers of western Canada are receiving at least a living wage from the sale of their grain it is absolutely unfair to put through any regulation or law which will mean that the producers who are selling at less than cost of production—and in this statement I am taking government statistics—shall be asked to sacrifice something more to help some other people engaged in a legitimate business, simply because those other people are suffering a loss. It is that phase of the matter to which I object. If through the financial or economic policy of Canada we were able to raise the level of wheat prices to the place where they would make a reasonable return to the farmers, and provided we had reasonable control of rates on the great lakes, I would not take any objections. That this is an issue between the grower of wheat who must pay the rates and the shipping interests, is made very plain in the evidence submitted to the Senate committee.

I do not wish to read much of it, but I think I am in order to read some because the bill has not gone before a committee of the house where evidence could be taken. The question has been raised as to whether or not there is a combine. I do not know whether it is possible to term as a combine the arrangement existing among Canadian ships on the great lakes. That was not admitted in 1923, despite the fact that the committee investigating found that there was virtually a combine. But that this legislation is asked for in order to make it easier for Canadian steamship lines operating on the great lakes generally to increase prices is admitted in the evidence, and I shall read just enough to establish that point. The evidence of Mr. Enderby of the Canada Steamship Lines as found at page 54, is as follows:

> The Chairman: You say there is nothing that savours of a combine in that circumstance?
> Hon. Mr. Dandurand: Was there any agreement?
>
> Mr. Enderby: There was an agreement between the Canadian vessel owners to endeavour to get the rate up to where they could get their living expenses out of it.
>
> Hon. Mr. McRae: That accounts for the advances.
> Mr. Enderby: Yes. Even at six and a half cents there is no money in the rate for any Canadian steamship company, or any American steamship company. When steamers have to lay around at the discharge port for four, five, ten or fifteen days, there is no money in a six and a half cent rate.

So I think that establishes quite clearly the intent of the owners of the Canadian steamship lines. Immediately you eliminate one competitive factor you make it easier for the combine, or for the agreement to increase rates, to operate. It does not matter whether that factor is some interference with the western rate on grain or whether it is the elimination of American vessels in connection with the hauling of any portion of it. May I say that some of the gentlemen who took part in the committee investigation were men who had at least some part in the combine formed in 1923. Therefore I do not think there is any question about the fact that there has been an attempt on the part of the owners of the Canadian steamship lines to eliminate competition in connection with the movement of some portion of the grain which has to be moved from the head of the lakes to Buffalo, in order that they may secure a higher rate. Until the time comes when we have a knowledge of the cost and conditions of the steamship business, and a commission set up that could gain that knowledge, I do not think it will be fair simply to give this additional right to Canadian steamship lines when it is perfectly clear that the money must come from the farmers of western Canada who to-day are selling grain at very little over sixty per cent of the cost of production.

We might as well recognize that a little while ago wheat was at its lowest price for 250 years, and to-day it is a long way from being up to a reasonable price. There has been a tendency in past debates in connection with matters affecting the shipment of grain on the great lakes to suggest that we were playing into the hands of the Americans, and also that the port of Buffalo was not of any real value to the producers of western grain. I think the best thing that has been written in connection with the transportation of grain from western Canada to the markets of the world was written by one of the board of grain commissioners, Doctor MacGibbon. Members who have known Doctor MacGibbon and his record know that he is a very careful and thorough student. He pointed out, in his book published in 1932, the significance of the port of Buffalo in the Canadian grain trade. That port has been necessary for Canadian grain shipments because of peculiar natural conditions. One factor that tended to raise grain rates in 1923, and which the people who were accused of forming a combine and charging exorbitant rates gave as a reason why they were compelled to charge those rates, was congestion in the ports, which prevented them from delivering the grain and getting back for return cargoes. There never are any more than enough elevators, ships, canal space and loading and unloading facilities to take care of the rush in the fall due to a big crop in western Canada. If you eliminate Buffalo or handicap it in any way you bring about in some seasons at least a condition of congestion that will hurt the western farmers. The sale of wheat in the worlds market is highly competitive. It has been pointed out time and time again that Canada is in a rather difficult position; the wheat fields are far from the seaboard, and in the late fall the great lakes freeze up. Therefore in the fall the great effort is to get the grain off the prairies and down as far as possible along the great lakes so that it is in a strategic position for delivery to Europe and elsewhere during the winter. Hauling wheat by rail from western Canada to the east is not economical, the natural route from western Canada to the east for grain is the great lakes. Doctor MacGibbon in his book says that in the fall it is absolutely necessary, in some seasons at least, to have all the ships that can be massed to handle the crop in order to prevent congestion at the head of the lakes. At page 246 of his book we have the following:

> When a new Canadian crop is ready for shipment, especially if it be a large one, the Canadian lake freighters as well as the American lake freighters not engaged in the ore trade, are fully employed in moving the crop from the head of the lake. Indeed it becomes necessary to use to the limit all the ports available, in order that the elevators at the head of navigation may be kept clear, and as much as possible of the crop be shipped east from Port Arthur and Fort William before the close of navigation. Traffic conditions in the great lakes, in the fall season, therefore, tend to cause grain to flow through the port of Buffalo.

Mr. BOWMAN: Would the hon. member mind telling us at what time that book was published?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): In January, 1932.

It has been said that we ought to use Canadian ports. I am all in favour of using Canadian ports, but Canadian traffic routes and Canadian ports have not the facilities to handle grain economically and efficiently. That is a fact. As a matter of fact if you go back in the records you will find that Canadian ports have been handling in some years, at least when the United States was a large exporter, almost as much United States grain as the United States ports were handling of Canadian grain, not quite balanced. In 1930 I think Saint John handled 30,000,000 bushels, and 17,000,000 bushels of that was American grain.

Mr. BOWMAN: How are the figures at Montreal? Have you any figures for Montreal?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): No, I have not gone into that. A statement from the Canadian National Railways, which I think was given to the shipping committee, gives an indication of what is happening. The number of bushels of Canadian grain moving through Canadian ports, crop year 1928-29, was 83,512,520. In 1930, Canadian grain shipped by way of Buffalo, amounted to 92,479,728 bushels; 72,277,730 bushels were shipped by United States ports, and 20,201,998 through Montreal.

It has been said that we have regulation as a result of the act of 1923, and with regulation we ought to be able to take care of the producers' interest. The act of 1923 provided that the board of grain commissioners could fix maximum rates. It provided for the publication of tariffs, and that brokers who were handling contracts for space could not handle insurance. Doctor MacGibbon in commenting on that act, dealing with freight and handling charges, says at page 257:

A fundamental difference between lake rates and rail rates is that the latter are approved of by regulative bodies in both the United States and Canada. They are relatively stable, and they are non-discriminative, in that between two points under similar conditions the same rates prevail for all shippers. But with lake rates, the rates charged are reached by a process of bargaining between the individual shipper and the carrier. In each case there is a separate contract, so that the rate varies according to the amount of space demanded, the terminal point designated, the season of the year when carriage is desired, and, in general, the amount of grain offering for carriage in relationship to the bottoms available; all these play a part in influencing the terms of the contract. It follows that it is open to the lake freighter to carry in the same vessel on the same date, and between the same points of origin and destination, shipments of wheat of the same quality at different rates per bushel. One lot of wheat may be paying three cents and another lot four cents per bushel. The individual bargain accounts for the rate.

In dealing with the Inland Waters Freight Rates Act of 1923 we have the following, at page 261.

This measure provided that shipping companies should file with the board of grain commissioners a tariff of rates to be charged for the carriage of grain. When the rates proposed appeared excessive or unjustly discriminative in the opinion of the board, it could prescribe such rates as it deemed reasonable.

This act, which was intended to regulate shipping rates for grain, proved altogether unworkable in its main features, and it was drastically amended in 1924. The main features of the act of 1923 were the setting of a maximum rate and publishing the tariff, and of course the separating of the insurance and the allotting of space. The only real difference between the act of 1923 and the amending act of 1924, is that it was provided that instead of simply publishing the tariffs:

Every shipper shall immediately after entering into any charter party, bill of lading or contract for the carriage of grain from Fort William or Port Arthur to any other port or place in Canada or the United States by lake or river navigation, and before the grain shall have been laden in pursuance thereof, file with the Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada a true copy of the said charter party, bill of lading or contract for carriage.

The point is that the board shall prescribe a maximum rate. In railway matters the board of railway commissioners practically set the rate; they conduct an exhaustive inquiry with regard to the proper costs of equipment and so on and then fix the rate. In lake shipping, however, in connection with the freight rates we have a situation something the same as obtains with regard to tramp steamers all over the world. The matter is left to the individual bargain and the contract. As Doctor MacGibbon points out, the conditions are such that you may have different rates applying to different quantities of the same quality of goods on the same vessel. So the fixing of a maximum rate, if you enable the Canadian Steamship companies to eliminate a certain amount of competition, will not prevent a generally higher rate being charged.

Mr. STEVENS: Except that a maximum can be fixed.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Yes. The other point is that the board of grain commissioners can examine the rate and then report the matter to the governor in council. I do not think the governor in council can be reasonably expected to have time to look after the details of these rates, in view of all the circumstances. That is one reason, in addition to the generally difficult situation confronting the farmers to-day, why I do not want to see any of the competition existing on the great lakes to-day eliminated so far as the steamship companies are concerned.

There is just one other point to which I should like to refer; that is the question of the 6 cent preference. I take it that under this act if grain is shipped from Fort William to Buffalo in a United States vessel it cannot be taken on down to Montreal, because no goods can be moved except in British or Canadian ships. I take it that grain stored in United States lake vessels during the winter could not move to Montreal. I take it therefore that this act would interfere to some extent with the movement of grain from the head of the lakes to Buffalo for storage over the winter, and possibly this would bring about a congestion at the head of the lakes. I believe the first trial shipment that was sent to the old country through Buffalo, and reconsigned from there, did not obtain the preference. I believe a second shipment was sent through with the original documents, but that the preference was not given in that case either. I should like to be corrected if I am wrong in that statement, because I think it has some bearing.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Has any grain been consigned through Buffalo that did get the preference?

Mr. STEVENS: If I might interrupt my hon. friend, because I know he desires to get the point right, the documentation of the second shipment to which he referred was not correct according to the regulations of the British customs authorities under regulation 12 of the import act.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Then no shipment has gone through Buffalo and obtained the six cent preference?

Mr. STEVENS: I should not say that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): So far as we know.

Mr. STEVENS: Any shipment may go forward on a through bill of lading.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Right from a Canadian port?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): But as a matter of fact Buffalo is useful, so far as the Canadian grain trade is concerned, for storage and for redirecting the grain.

Mr. STEVENS: And for reconsignment.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Yes, and because it is necessary particularly in the event of a big crop it seems to me there will be a great deal of confusion so far as the preference is concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: This will not affect the situation at all.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): This is my argument, and my hon. friend may answer it if he wishes. It seems to me there will be that confusion until the question of proper documentation is dealt with and the officials at both ends are thoroughly familiar with all the necessary requirements. It appears to me that grain shipped to Buffalo in a Canadian boat and there unloaded or transshipped will be unable to proceed to Montreal because, if I read the act correctly, it would be impossible to distinguish between the grain hauled from the head of the lakes in a Canadian ship and grain hauled to Buffalo in a United States vessel. You may say that ten million bushels of a certain kind of grain came by a Canadian boat and that ten million bushels will be allowed to go to Montreal by a Canadian boat, but I do not think it would be possible to separate the grain in that way, and a good deal of confusion might arise as to grain going to Montreal and thence to England to claim the preference.

Mr. STEVENS: No more difficulty than there has been in the past.

[Mr. D. M. Kennedy.]

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I cannot quite see it in that way, but possibly I am wrong. At present grain moves to Buffalo where it is kept in bond for shipment to the old country. It is in the interests of the officials of the United States government to see that this grain does not get on the United States market without paying the duty. The organizations handling that grain, the elevator companies, railway companies and steamship companies, have no interest in mixing that grain or anything else, yet with all these organizations interested in keeping that grain apart from United States grain, and with no real temptation to do anything but get it through, the preference will not be given unless it is sent on a through bill of lading. Evidently if it is stopped on its way through it stands a very good chance of losing the preference, and I am afraid that some time a question will arise as to some of the grain that goes through Buffalo and from there to Montreal, because I do not see how anyone can tell whether it has been sent to Buffalo and reconsigned to Montreal and so through to England or whether it was brought to Buffalo in a United States vessel and had no right to go to Montreal at all.

Briefly I am opposed to this measure because it eliminates competition and will enable our friends of the shipping combine, or those Canadian ship owners who have an agreement among themselves, to take more out of the western farmers in connection with their grain. I am opposed to this legislation because I think we need all the facilities that exist at present on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence in order to properly handle a big crop when it comes along. If the organization is cut down in any way there may be a tremendous amount of trouble and congestion in handling a big crop, perhaps when the weather does not continue favourable for harvesting until the whole crop is in. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I want to register my protest against this legislation.

Mr. D. J. COWAN (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, one has only to listen to the observations which have been made by members on all sides of the house to realize the difficulty which arises in framing legislation dealing with the grain trade which will appeal to all interests. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) has spoken on behalf of the western Canadian farmer and he has stated the position in which he finds himself when he comes to contemplate the legislation now before us known as the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act. We are on common ground in stating that the grain trade and the shipping of grain to market is one of the most important functions in our economic life. The growing of grain is important and the means by which that grain reaches the market is also important. The hon. member has pointed out only one side of the picture. There is another side in which I am particularly interested, representing as I do one of the ports at the head of the lakes which relies almost exclusively upon the shipment of grain for the maintenance of its industrial life.

We have built up in Canada a merchant marine which must be protected and must be given the opportunity to function. Otherwise, the fear which the hon. member has expressed as to the possibility of an absolute monopoly in the transportation of our grain will be realized. The desire of the men who are employed in this merchant marine is that it be given an opportunity of functioning and that they be given the right to labour in preference to seamen employed by the American merchant marine. I think I am on common ground when I say that everyone desires that Canadian grain should be transported to the British market in Canadian owned ships manned by Canadian seamen, that is, provided that no other interests are jeopardized or prejudiced. It seems to me that that is the sensible conclusion at which we should arrive and I propose to address my remarks in an effort to allay the fears which seem to be in the minds of certain western members that their interests would be jeopardized by the passing of this amendment.

If hon. members would read the evidence given before the Senate committee I think they would discover that there is in existence to-day a sufficient tonnage of Canadian ships to handle all the Canadian crops. This may not have been true ten or fifteen years ago but I think the evidence was conclusive that there are in existence to-day sufficient bottoms to handle the entire Canadian crop. If that be the case and the rates charged are not exorbitant, what good argument can be advanced that Canadian wheat should not be shipped in Canadian bottoms from Canadian ports? We have the facilities and the Canadian seamen have a right to work in preference to the seamen of other countries. At Port Arthur and Fort William I have seen American ships, fitted out and supplied at other ports, leaving with a cargo of Canadian grain while our own seamen stood idle on the docks. Such a situation should be remedied and it is intended to remedy it by this amendment to the shipping act. As I said a moment ago, I do not think that anyone would disagree with this proposal provided there was no increment in the rates. In my opinion there are at least four ways in which this can be prevented.

In the first place, there is the competition between Canadian companies. I do not think anyone needs to be told at this time that the shipping companies are working in the red. I believe that every company operating a fleet of boats on the great lakes to-day is losing money and has lost money for some time. I mention this only to show that there is competition amongst such companies as the Patterson Company, the Canada Steamship company, the Matthews line and so on. When companies are insolvent or facing bankruptcy there is always a desire to get business even at cut rates. This has been the case in Canada during the past year. In order to get business and meet competition these companies have been willing to cut rates.

There is a second reason why these rates will be kept within bounds. There is an alternative route available to grain shippers by way of Buffalo, the Erie canal and New York. A Canadian shipper or exporter in Winnipeg is bound to take advantage of the cheapest route and if he finds that the route via Buffalo and New York is cheaper than via Port Colborne and Montreal, he will ship his grain over that route. There will always be that competition which will prevent the Canadian companies making the rates unduly high. If they do that they will find that their route will be forsaken in favour of the Buffalo route.

If that argument is not strong enough to convince my hon. friend, there is the further argument of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act which provides that the board of grain commissioners may fix a maximum rate. It is true that they do not fix actual rates, that being left to competition and other factors, but they do fix a rate which cannot be exceeded. This act forces the shipping companies to keep their rates within bounds.

Then there is the further fact that the governor in council may exercise their powers to suspend this law. That provision is an advantage to the shipper because if the rates become unduly high, the governor in council have the right to suspend this act. In all frankness I say that in my opinion that would be done only when the rates became exorbitant. I do not think there is cause for fear on the part of hon. members of this house that a monopoly or combine would be brought into being. I think it would be impossible for such a thing to happen. Consequently, I approve of the principle of this bill.

There are a number of other sections with which I do not propose to deal other than to say that I give them my support. These have to do with safety devices, the providing of better working conditions for the men and so on. Such provisions will always meet with hearty approval at my hands. The Seamen's union is at one in saying that they are to their advantage. I do not propose to speak at any greater length on those sections of the bill. With regard to the section dealing with the coastal laws, I think it will be to the advantage of Canada to see that this section is put through and at this session so that the resultant changes can be made during the current year.

Correlated with the business of shipping is that of dry dock construction plants. It appears to me that it would be to their advantage to have this legislation go through so that a greater amount of repairs, when damages occur, might be completed at Canadian dry docks. A United States boat will not go into a Canadian dry dock for repairs, because of the regulation that there must be paid to the United States government a tariff of 40 per cent of the cost of such repairs when the boat returns to its United States registry. This bill is designed to put us on a parity with United States shippers; it is their law practically word for word. I do not see that anything could be said by interests adverse to us as to our giving them a sample of their own medicine, because if this measure goes through, Canadian boats will have exactly the same privileges as United States boats and the latter will have no advantage over Canadian boats in Canadian waters. I therefore commend the government for bringing this bill down at this time and I intend to give it my hearty support.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the only clause of this bill that I shall discuss in any detail is the one which deals with the proposed amendment to the coastal laws. As regards those clauses dealing with the interests of labour engaged in hazardous employment, we can only say that we would give them our hearty support. I say therefore, it is regrettable that this highly contentious clause of the bill should be introduced along with those clauses that we would like to support, and we shall therefore be compelled, because of this contentious clause, to oppose the whole bill, notwithstanding the fact that there are some clauses which we would like to approve, sympathetic as we are towards all legislation that would protect men who are engaged in hazardous employment.

The proposed amendment to the coastal laws is one that we as producers of wheat cannot view without alarm. Anything that has within it the possibility of increased freight rates must, to say the least, merit the keenest scrutiny on our part and we are not going to be very easily convinced that this bill does not contain that possibility. The avowed purpose of the bill is to protect Canadian shipping and when any measure is introduced that has for its object the protection of a particular class of the community, it almost inevitably results that that protection is given at the expense of somebody else. That that protection can be given only by taking something more from the Canadian producers of wheat is the opinon that we on this side of the house hold, and we intend to protest against any such course. I am not going to say that it is the deliberate purpose of the government to overburden the producer of wheat. I do not know whether the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) made that statement as he was quoted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). Certainly we would not say that it was the deliberate purpose of the government to place additional burdens on the producers of wheat, but I say that the almost inevitable result of this bill will be to impose such burdens on him and that is something that at the present time he cannot stand.

There is nothing of greater concern to the wheat producer than freight rates on wheat. Situated as we are in the middle of the continent, competing as we have to do with other wheat producing countries more favourably situated, the question of freight rates is to us of prime importance, infinitely more important than to our Australian, or Argentine, or even our Russian competitors. The question of raising the freight rate on wheat by even the fraction of a cent, with wheat at its present low price, is to us a matter of prime importance. The wheat trade and the production of wheat constitute our principal industry. I do not underestimate the importance of the live stock industry; our cattle, beef, hog products, poultry and dairy products are all important, and in spite of the opinion which is sometimes given expression to in the east, we are engaging in those industries to the utmost extent that we find profitable. Nevertheless it is true that for many years to come, the agriculture of western Canada will be based on wheat, and therefore freight rates that are paid on that commodity are to us of first importance.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce will pardon us if we are not so readily convinced as some hon. members opposite seem to be that this will not result to our disadvantage. We are not going to be very easily convinced that there will be no increase in the freight rates on wheat. We have had similar assurances in regard to the tariff and there has been no indication as yet that the assurances of the government in regard to increases in tariff have not been prejudicial to those of us who have to buy the products of Canadian manufacturers. The hon. member for Port Arthur-Thunder Bay (Mr. Cowan), who has just spoken, says that the interests of the producer will not be jeopardized. We have reason to fear that they will be because we have had some experiences in the past when there has not been sufficient competition in the carrying of grain. They tell us that there will be no increase in local rates. Will hon. members opposite explain to us why it is that wheat is carried to Buffalo cheaper than it is carried to Georgian bay ports? Does anyone imagine that on the basis of actual cost, it costs more to carry wheat to Georgian bay ports than it does to Buffalo or that it costs more to carry wheat to Port Colborne than it does to Buffalo? The figures that have been furnished by the board of grain commissioners absolutely disprove any such statement. I have before me the figures for the years 1930, 1931 and 1932, covering the months from April to December and so far as the figures I have are concerned, there is only one month in which the freight rate to Buffalo was higher than either to Port Colborne or Georgian bay ports. Yet, with these figures before us, they ask us to expect that rates will not be increased if Canadian steamships are given the monopoly of the carrying of wheat. We on this side of the house are not going to be so easily convinced as some hon. members opposite seem to be.

Like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) I was interested when, after the minister had presented his case, he was followed by a speaker on the other side of the house who proceeded to show from the evidence given before the Senate committee that there was strong reason at least to believe that the bill would be prejudicial to our interests. I wondered in my own mind where the hon. member was going to land, but it was quite evident before he got through that he was preparing a soft place on which to fall.

The situation at Buffalo is unique. It is unique in that it has always been to the advantage of the producer of wheat in western Canada and to those who export wheat. As has been said, Buffalo is the strategic point at which wheat can be stored. Wheat stored there can be carried to any of the American ports or to the port of Montreal, and as I have said, that is a unique situation which has been to our advantage. We do not propose to lose that advantage through any failure on our part to make our fight against changing it. We have no prejudice against Canadian ports; we have no prejudice against our wheat going by Montreal or Halifax or Saint John; but the position to which we are going to adhere is that we must have these alternative routes open. It is only by keeping them open that under the present conditions under which grain is handled we can expect to get the utmost possible return to the producer, and that is the important thing to-day.

I have said that the situation at Buffalo is unique. The government tell us that they introduced into this bill the exact wording of the United States bill dealing with similar matters. That may be, but the situation in the United States is not parallel at all. What would be a parallel situation? It would be the shipment of grain from, say, Duluth to Port Colborne in Canadian vessels, and then an American law stepping in forbidding the carrying of that grain from Port Colborne to another American port. It may possibly be that the American law as at present existing would forbid such a transaction. I suppose it would, but that is a situation which simply does not arise to any extent, because to what other American port could the grain be carried from Port Colborne? Perhaps across that little bit of water to Buffalo or down through the canal to some points on the south shore of lake Ontario—

Mr. STEVENS: Or through the Erie canal to New York and Albany.

Mr. BROWN: But does that happen to any great extent? If it does, we want the minister to give us the facts and figures with regard to that situation when we are in committee.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not happen at all so far as Canadian vessels are concerned. The law prohibits it.

Mr. BROWN: That is what I say. Then that thing in itself is not a matter of importance to the Americans so far as protecting the situation from their viewpoint is concerned, but it is of importance to us that the strategic point at Buffalo should be preserved.

After all, Mr. Speaker, this bill is the product of an attitude of mind that sees the necessity for ensuring a profit to everyone in the secondary industries in this country at the expense of the primary industries. It is one of the problems that concern us. I do not know how we are going to get away from what seems to be an inevitable situation, that the farmer is compelled to take simply what is left after everybody else has been paid. Since we have nothing to say at all, or only under very rare circumstances, in regard to the price we shall receive for our products, it is almost inevitable that the farmer has to take what is left after everybody else has been paid. In view of that situation we have to resist to the utmost extent of our ability any move that increases the costs that are taken off our product between the time it leaves us and the time it reaches the world's market. We have to make demands, as we have upon every occasion when we were dealing with the tariff, that our production costs shall be kept as low as possible. That is the only way we have to protect ourselves. It is the only kind of protection that the government can give to us, to ensure that our cost of production shall be at the lowest possible point, and it has always been upon that ground that we have resisted the impositions that have been made upon us for the benefit of other industries.

I wonder if the government have considered some of the possible results of this legislation. It is generally found that when established trade routes and established trade methods are interfered with there are some unforeseen and unintended results. We cannot foretell all the results in this case, but I am prepared to believe that the first result will be an increase in freight rates by Canadian ships. Do we imagine that the Americans are going to lie down entirely on the question of carrying Canadian grain? I wonder if the hon. member for Port Arthur-Thunder Bay (Mr. Cowan) fully realizes the significance of the admission he made when discussing this question, when he said that the exporter of grain would have the alternative route via American ports, and that if the grain went cheaper that way the exporter could ship that way. Here is what may happen. American steamers will not lie down on this job. They will carry Canadian wheat to Buffalo, where it will be stored, and let us rest assured that they will carry it in competition with Canadian vessels carrying grain to Port Colborne or to Georgian bay ports. Now has not that situation the possibility in it of sending a larger quantity of Canadian grain via American ports and less via Montreal?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has my hon. friend lost sight of the fact that Canadian ships can compete in that trade? They can carry grain from Fort William to Buffalo.

Mr. BROWN: I realize that they can, but rest assured that if there are lower rates or if the spread between the rates to Buffalo and Port Colborne or Georgian bay ports is wider than it is at present, it matters not whether that grain is carried by American ships or Canadian ships. The situation still has in it the possibility of sending a larger amount of grain by American ports. Not that we as grain growers could object to that; I am not advancing it for that reason. But I am asking the government if they have considered the possibility of the adverse influence it may have upon the port of Montreal. So that, as I pointed out, these changes are very far reaching. One cannot be sure that the results intended to be achieved will be achieved, and that no ill effects will be the result.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to ask a question. If as the hon. member has argued the result of this legislation will be to divert the grain trade from Canadian into American channels, how can he complain that in using that route his interests will be prejudiced?

Mr. BROWN: I am not complaining that this legislation, particularly, is prejudicial to that route. When I spoke of that I was simply dealing with a general proposition, namely that we want the alternative routes preserved. That portion of my argument was not addressed to this bill. We want the alternative routes preserved. I simply pointed out to those who are strongly advocating the use of Canadian ports that this very step they are taking to help Canadian ports may have the opposite result.

Mr. STEVENS: You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. BROWN: I am not trying to have it both ways. All I intend to do is to point out that the thing you are going to do may not have the result you expect. Much of the legislation of this government has had unexpected results. All restrictions upon trade have had unintended effects. I am simply pointing out that this legislation may be prejudicial to the interests of those who are advocating it, and who think that they are speaking in their own interests.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Does the hon. member not think that the six cent preference will be protection for the port of Montreal?

Mr. BROWN: If you ask me my opinion in regard to preferences, I would say that we have yet to see that they have been of any value to us.

Mr. STEVENS: They certainly have.

Mr. BROWN: When we go into committee we are going to ask the minister to prove conclusively that grain has been shipped through the port of Buffalo, and that it has received a preference. That is a matter I had not intended to discuss at the moment. My attitude towards the preferences in general is that up to the moment they have meant nothing.

We have heard something about maximum rates, and that competition has kept the rates below the maximum. That may be true, so long as there is free competition. But when competition is removed the inevitable tendency will be for the maximum rate to become the minimum rate. That is almost certain to be the result. Further, I do not wish to be unduly offensive concerning any hon. member of this government, but I must state frankly that we have not confidence in the governor in council, under this government—

Mr. STEVENS: We understand that fully, because we have heard it so often. We know it, and we do not expect anything else—individually or collectively.

Mr. BROWN: We have not confidence in the governor in council because their attitude has been to give secondary industries first consideration. How can we be expected to have confidence in the governor in council, after some of the things to which we have had to submit? Let us consider, for instance, repairs to farm implements, to which we have had occasion to refer.

Mr. STEVENS: Are you dissatisfied with what we have done in that connection?

Mr. BROWN: No, we are not dissatisfied with what you have done. The minister tries to get away with that kind of stuff, but it won't go.

Mr. STEVENS: No, my hon. friend is the one who tries to get away with it.

Mr. BROWN: The minister is trying to do now what he tried to do when he spoke on the budget. He tried to prove that we were absolutely opposed to everything in the budget. Of course we are satisfied with the present situation in regard to repairs to farm implements. But we are satisfied only because we brought conditions to the attention of the country and the government. For that reason the government simply had to withdraw from the position they had taken. That is the only way we can get anything from this government to help the farmers.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It is like pulling teeth.

Mr. STEVENS: Some you do not have to pull.

Mr. BROWN: Even if we had confidence in the governor in council, the probability is that their action would be so slow that it would be of little benefit. The hon. member for Port Arthur-Thunder Bay said that the governor in council could take action only when rates became exorbitant. I suppose an exorbitant rate would be a maximum rate, above which they could not go. I think there were some inconsistencies in the argument of the hon. member for Port Arthur-Thunder Bay.

I do not know whether it is necessary for me further to discuss this matter. I believe I have made it clear that representing a western constituency I must view with alarm even the possibility of an increase in lake rates on our wheat. While I regret having to oppose the whole bill, because of other provisions in it, to be true to the interests I represent I must do so.

Mr. A. B. THOMPSON (East Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, coming from a constituency which has within its borders the Georgian bay ports of Midland and Port McNicoll, I should like to say a few words concerning this proposed legislation. I shall direct my remarks more particularly to the amendments to the coastal law. One hon. member opposite has asked these questions: "What is the need for the bill now before us? Why is this legislation necessary." If I were to answer I would say that the reason is to remedy an injustice which for a long time Canadian elevators, Canadian ships and Canadian mariners have suffered by reason of Canadian grain being routed on American vessels to Buffalo, thence re-routed via American vessels to the elevators at Montreal and other Canadian ports. To my mind this is a condition which should have been remedied years ago, and it is gratifying to know that at last we have a Minister of Marine backed by a government prepared to do something for our Canadian steamers.

Let me read what the Canadian Unionist, Canada's national labour magazine, has to say in connection with this matter. I find the following:

> One direction in which the Canadian government can relieve unemployment is by enacting the many amendments to the Canada Shipping Act which have been proved necessary by long experience and which have been under consideration for the last twenty-odd years. The most important of these proposed amendments is one to ensure that Canadian ships shall be manned by Canadian seamen. At present Canadian ports are full of idle seafarers, while Canadian ships are manned by citizens of every country but Canada.

The article goes on to say:

> The Department of Marine has come under new management in the last couple of years, and there is a possibility that the long-overdue revision of the law will be undertaken at the present session of parliament.

Then, further on:

> The new Minister of Marine, Hon. Alfred Duranleau, is a much brighter lad than Hon. Pierre Cardin. Between them Messrs. Duranleau and Hawken have at last managed to put a tackle inspector on the Vancouver docks, which Messrs. Cardin and Johnston never would do, despite the appalling list of fatalities that accumulated under their cold-blooded "do nothing" administration.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that in common with other countries we have been passing through a period of depression—

Mr. SPEAKMAN: May I ask the hon. member a question? From what official document was he quoting?

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): I said at the outset that I was reading from the Canadian Unionist, "Canada's national labour magazine."

An hon. MEMBER: That is a good magazine.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When it supports the government.

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): We are passing through a period of depression. The greatest cause of the depression is unemployment. If this bill becomes law it will to a very considerable extent relieve the unemployment situation, because a great part of our Canadian grain which is now carried by American vessels and passes through American elevators will be carried by Canadian vessels and pass through Canadian elevators. When this bill becomes law Canadian grain shipped from one Canadian port and destined to another Canadian port, directly or indirectly, must be carried in Canadian vessels. We know that a great deal of money is spent in the handling and carriage of this grain, and when it is moved by American vessels through American ports Canadians derive very little benefit from it. Certain hon. gentlemen on the opposite side appear to think it is a serious offence for anybody to speak for the Canadian shipping interests. No vessel owner has ever spoken to me about this legislation, but ever since I have been a member of parliament I have had Canadian seamen and masters and mates and engineers come to me and want to know when our government was going to put our coastal laws on the same footing as those of the United States, giving to Canadian seamen the same measure of protection that the Americans give to theirs. Surely, sir, if we can do something for the Canadian mariner it is up to us to do it. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) speaking yesterday seemed very anxious to know what the American government would think if we passed this legislation.

Mr. YOUNG: What they would do I was more concerned about.

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): He was very much concerned about what they would think and perhaps what they would do. I will tell him what in my opinion the American government will think; they will think more highly of us and have more respect for us, that we had the courage and backbone to pass legislation which they have had on their statute books for many years.

Mr. YOUNG: They will be quite flattered that we have copied them!

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): It has been one of these cases of jug-handled protection that the Americans have enjoyed at our expense. Let me give an illustration of what took place in my riding two years ago. A large quantity of American grain was brought down to Port McNicoll just at the close of navigation to be stored in elevators there. When navigation opened the following spring that grain had to be carried to Buffalo, and although there were a number of Canadian boats lying idle at Port McNicoll and Midland not one of them was allowed to take part in that traffic because the American coastal laws would not permit it. Now we are going to put our boats in the same position as the American.

Mr. YOUNG: Did they pay storage on that grain?

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): I assume they did, it is customary.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Canadians pay storage on grain in Buffalo.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the hon. gentleman right in that statement that Canadian boats could not take it out of Port McNicoll?

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): Certainly, it came from an American port and was destined to an American port, although indirectly; and according to American coastal laws that grain must be carried exclusively in American bottoms.

An hon. MEMBER: It would come over in bond.

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a maritime nation. We have thousands of miles of coastline on our seaboard and our rivers and inland lakes, and to my mind it is of the utmost importance that we protect this shipping industry and give it a chance to survive. The people who would suffer most if our shipping industry were driven out of existence are the grain growers of the west, because then they would be at the mercy of the American vessels; we have no control over their rates. The hon. member for Port Arthur-Thunder Bay (Mr. Cowan) has shown to the house what protection the grain growers will have in the regulation of rates, it is not necessary for me to go over that ground again. We have the competition of our own boats, the competition of the Buffalo route to a certain extent, and the powers of regulation of the government and the grain commissioners.

Some hon. members who have spoken say that the grain grower gets no protection. Why was the Hudson Bay railway built? Was it not built to give to the grain grower of the west an outlet for his grain to the markets of the world at a lower transportation cost? Why did Canada spend millions of dollars in the enlargement of the Welland canal if it were not to help the grain grower of the west?

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): Absolutely yes. Millions of dollars.

Mr. BROWN: It was never asked for by the west.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It was, years ago.

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): We on this side of the house are not concerned in setting one class against another. We want to do what is for the general good of the country.

Mr. YOUNG: You are setting one class on the backs of another.

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): For that reason, in order to help the farmers of the west, we have spent all that money on the enlargement of the Welland canal and the building of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. YOUNG: Who is "we"?

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): I think it is to be regretted that some representatives of the western farmers do not realize what Canada has done for them.

Mr. YOUNG: We are beginning to realize it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Simcoe): I would like, if it were at all possible—I am afraid it is not, because the hon. gentleman who preceded me has shown that he could not be convinced against his will—that the hon. gentlemen who are opposing this bill should withdraw their objection and join hands with us and let us all work together for the common good.

Mr. YOUNG: Withdraw the bill.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words with regard to this bill, before it goes to committee. Before doing so I must express my appreciation of the sentiments that have been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the need of looking after the welfare of those engaged on ships, and I hope they will extend those sentiments to the ships operating on the Pacific coast. I pointed out a few evenings ago that only about ten per cent of the employees on Canadian Pacific ships were white men, and that this company had their ships repaired in China rather than in Canada because it could be done more cheaply there.

I am not particularly concerned with who own the ships. We may call them Canadian owned ships, railways, docks or whatever they are, but the bondholders are in all parts of the world, and recently we were told that until such time as the bonds are paid up we do not own these utilities. I am interested, however, in the first part of this bill which refers to the protection of workers against accidents occurring while unloading or loading ships. I commend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) for bringing in these amendments at the present time. Unfortunately, as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has said, they are linked up with other amendments which we may not like, but those to which I have referred are long overdue. While commending the minister, however, there is some uneasiness in my mind with regard to section 681f. Subsection 2 of section 1 repeals sections 674 and 681 of the Canada Shipping Act, but section 681, subsections (a) to (f) inclusive, does not come into operation until a date fixed by the governor in council and proclaimed in the Canada Gazette. Until that proclamation is issued sections 681 and 674 remain as they are at present.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this implies that the rest of the act will come into effect as soon as the bill passes this house but that these sections will not come into operation until a proclamation is issued by the governor in council. My reason for being uneasy is the fact that opposition has always manifested itself when anything has been attempted in the way of protecting those engaged in loading or unloading ships, or having to do with safety on board ships. I understand that last year the Minister of Marine took steps to appoint an inspector of tackle and that when this became known it was opposed by the shipping federation of British Columbia. If up to the present they have been able to prevent the Minister of Marine from doing what I believe he considers the right and proper thing to do, and something which it is very necessary to have done, I am afraid they will be able to exert enough pressure to prevent this section from coming into operation for some considerable time. Of course if the minister can give an assurance in that regard in committee he will have my full support so far as these sections are concerned.

With regard to the rest of the bill, which has to do with the ships which may or may not engage in the coastal trade of Canada, I believe it is inevitable that there should be some regulation in this regard. We may talk as we please about free competition, but really that is a thing of the past. As a matter of fact competition always tends towards monopoly; it only remains competition until such time as the bigger ones have absorbed the small ones, when it becomes a monopoly. If these amendments with regard to our coastal trade are to be put into operation I believe we should insist on sufficient safeguards so that those furnishing the freight for the shipping companies may not be unduly penalized.

In conclusion I may say again that so far as the first part of the bill is concerned, dealing with the protection of those engaged on the ships, I will extend my unqualified support.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make just a few observations with regard to the bill now before the house. I think the best recommendation for the bill was that quoted by my good friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Thompson) from the labour magazine, which expressed the attitude of the working men of Canada towards this measure.

I have always been an advocate of the Canada first policy. I have always advocated Canada for Canadians, Canadian seamen on Canadian ships and Canadian workmen in Canadian shipyards, and I have always held that when ships were required by the government or by Canadian shipping interests, if at all possible those ships should be built in Canadian shipyards by Canadian workmen and that so far as practicable Canadian materials should be used in their construction. I am surprised at the attitude that has been taken by some hon. gentlemen opposite. They fear that there may be a monopoly.

Mr. YOUNG: There is one now.

Mr. QUINN: Well, as the hon. member for Port Arthur-Thunder Bay (Mr. Cowan) has pointed out, and as hon. members should know, we have the necessary safeguards in the Canada Shipping Act, section 938. There is the further safeguard that the competition with Buffalo will still exist; a great deal of Canadian grain will be shipped through that port for European ports. Only the preference on Canadian grain going to the United Kingdom will prevent much of our grain going through Buffalo. In addition we have the Hudson Bay route. I believe a considerable quantity of Canadian grain will be shipped via Churchill. The competition to be offered by Vancouver is an important factor. Above all, I believe that this bill should be given a fair trial. It will mean much for Canadian unemployed. We should look with favour upon any legislation which will relieve the present condition of unemployment and give preference to Canadian seamen on Canadian ships.

I might extend this a little further. We have ships running out of Canadian ports on the Atlantic seaboard which are not manned by Canadian seamen. There are always available highly qualified masters, mates, engineers, firemen, cooks, stewards, deckhands—all that is necessary to make up the personnel of a ship's crew. Even in the personnel of the crews of the Canadian National steamers are many old country men. While I have nothing against our brothers from across the sea, as I said in the beginning, I am for Canada and Canadians first. Wherever there is a master, an officer, an engineer or a member of the crew available in this country, he should be given preference over all others. My attention was called to a large concern in this country which operates a fleet of ships under Canadian charters. They took these ships out of Canada and had them registered in Great Britain to be manned with British crews. They pay a lower rate of wages to their masters and crews than is paid by Canadian shipping interests and I presume it was for that reason they took the action they did. Our own men should be given protection. If permits are to be granted to Canadian interests for the operation of steamers through Canadian ports, there should be some provision to compel them to employ Canadian officers and crews.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) expressed some doubt with regard to the clause in the bill covering the appointment of inspectors of ship's tackle. He doubts the efficiency of this clause because it can come into effect only by order in council. I do not suppose it can be brought into effect until there are available the proper men to be appointed as inspectors. I say to the minister and to the government that care should be taken in the selection of these officials. They should be familiar with the type of work carried on on the waterfront. They should be men from the ranks who have worked up and become efficient as stevedores or master freight handlers. This should not be a white collar job; it should be a job for a man who thoroughly understands the work and has had years of experience. For some years I have urged the necessity of having such inspectors; a year ago I brought this matter to the attention of the minister. I have before me a letter received under date of October 26, 1932, from the Halifax Longshoremen's Association. It reads:

F. P. Quinn, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons.
Dear Sir,—

The Halifax Longshoremen's Association, local 269, I.L.A. have for some time been pressing the Dominion government to appoint a full time inspector of gears, tackles and working ways for the port of Halifax, and up to the present has not met with any success in having the appointment made.

At the last regular monthly meeting of the association I was instructed to write you and ask you to again enlist your good offices to the end that such an inspector be appointed as soon as possible.

The changing character of the methods of carrying on the work render it more necessary than ever that the appointment be made and we respectfully request you to direct the government's attention to this matter as soon as you can conveniently do so.

Yours truly,
A. M. Sullivan,
President,
Halifax Longshoremen's Association,
Local 269 I.L.A.

I commend and congratulate the government for having taken up this matter and providing this amendment to our shipping act.

There is another matter which I am sorry has not been dealt with by this bill. It is a small matter and it may have escaped the attention of the minister and the committee when the bill was being drafted. Perhaps it is not too late to have it included in the present amendment to the act. I refer to the unfairness of the charge for pilotage in the St. Lawrence made against ships plying from Nova Scotia to Ontario. I have before me a resolution which was passed unanimously by the Halifax board of trade on March 14 of this year. It reads:

Whereas under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act, R.S.C. 1927, chapter 186, St. Lawrence river pilotage dues are payable by ships navigating between ports in the maritime provinces and ports in the province of Ontario;

And whereas by section 457, subsection c (ii) of said act, ships employed in trading between any one or more of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and any other or others of them are exempt from payment of said dues;

And whereas payment of said dues is illogical and without merit, and a great injustice and hardship to ships navigating between the maritime provinces and the province of Ontario in that if said ships sailing from the maritime provinces were bound only for the port of Montreal, or were proceeding from the port of Montreal to the maritime provinces, said dues would not be payable, but because said ships proceed to and from ports in the great lakes they are subject to said dues;

And whereas the imposition of said dues is a great impediment to interprovincial trade;

Now be it resolved that the Halifax Board of Trade and the undersigned interested parties place themselves on record as strongly urging and petitioning the government of the Dominion of Canada and the Minister of Marine that section 457, subsection c (ii) of said act be amended by inserting the word "Ontario" before the word "Quebec" in the second line thereof.

I submit this to the minister and ask him to give it his most careful consideration. There is another matter which I intend to bring up but I shall deal with it when the bill is in committee.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) referred to page 54 of the evidence given before the Senate committee with reference to the rates charged by the Canada Steamship company. As I said before, there seems to be in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite who represent the wheat growers a great fear with regard to rates. It was pointed out, I think by Mr. Enderby in the proceedings of the committee, that the carriage of grain was not enough to pay the company for the cost of operation. I submit to hon. gentlemen opposite that it is as unfair for them to expect the owners of Canadian steamships to carry grain at a rate too low to give them a reasonable profit, as it is to expect the grain growers to raise wheat and sell it for forty cents a bushel.

Mr. DONNELLY: They are doing it.

Mr. QUINN: Yes, but we have the evidence in the last few weeks that the price of wheat is gradually rising; it is not going up fast enough to suit me, but it is gradually rising and I hope in the very near future to see it at a price that will pay the Canadian wheat grower a sufficient profit to allow him to operate at an advantage and also to pay a fair and decent rate to those who are transporting his grain to the seaboard and across the ocean.

Mr. AHEARN: The hon. member should thank President Roosevelt.

Mr. QUINN: Hon. gentlemen on that side of the house will thank anybody other than the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Conservative party. I have no quarrel with them; they are elected and they sit there to oppose this government, and they are doing so with all their might.

Mr. REID: Not with all our might.

Mr. QUINN: Well, they have given a pretty good exhibition of it in the last few weeks.

Mr. REID: If we were to do so, there would be a revolution.

Mr. QUINN: I do not want to go any further with regard to that. Hon. gentlemen opposite are entitled to their opinion and we are entitled to ours. President Roosevelt, as we all know, is a man of energy and he has proven that he is a wonderful leader of a government. I congratulate the country to the south of us on having such a brilliant man at the head of it; I also congratulate Canada on having at the head of its government a man who will walk hand in hand with President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald and the leaders of other countries in bringing this world out of the chaos of the last two or three years.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this late hour of the session to detain the house by making any lengthy speech on this bill. I rise chiefly to enter my protest and to voice the protest of my electors in the west against this measure as at present framed. Anything that savors of freight rates is of vital importance to the farmers of western Canada. Situated as they are in the middle of a continent, on anything they produce, whether it be wheat, cattle, eggs or any other commodity, they have to pay a long freight haul to carry it to the market. Their butter, eggs, beef, poultry, pork, all have to come to eastern Canada in order to be marketed; their wheat has to go to the markets of the world in order to be sold and they have to pay the freight. Similarly on anything the farmers of the west have to buy there is a long freight which they must pay in the price thereof. So it is that matters affecting freight rates are of immense importance to the western farmers, and on that account alone they view this bill with a certain amount of fear. They look upon it as another load placed on their shoulders, because they cannot help feeling it will mean they will have to pay more freight. This is another blunder by a blundering government, a government which has done nothing but blunder ever since it came into power. The first thing it did when it took office was to limit the farmers to a more restricted market than they had before; it imposed a duty on everything they had to buy and restricted the farmers more and more until they could hardly exist. Not content with that, the government next started to restrict the market in which the farmers had to sell. This was done by what is called the government's sound money policy, a policy which puts the Canadian producer at a disadvantage with, practically speaking, all the other producers in the world. Not many months ago when we sent a steer to England and got £10 for it, instead of getting $48 and some cents when that money came back here, we got only $38. If we had lived in Australia or New Zealand we would have got $63. Our markets were restricted until the farmer was bled white, because the markets in which he had to buy and those in which he had to sell were all restricted.

Now the government comes along with a bill that will make the farmer pay more freight on the wheat he has to ship out and that will take the last drop of blood out of him. Is it any wonder the farmers of the west are rebelling against this bill? Some say that the shipping interests cannot operate at a profit on the lakes and the rates will have to be raised to enable them to do so. Why is this bill put through in the last minute of the last hour of the last day of the session? Why is it brought in now when it has been in cold storage for twenty years? It is being brought to the light of day only now and an attempt is being made to put it through the house because the government think we are tired out and will make no objection. Why is this bill being introduced? For no other reason than to try to help the shipping interests, not to help out the farmers.

Let us look at conditions as they exist on the lakes. Anybody who knows anything about transportation on the lakes knows there are two kinds of boats, the large boats that operate only on the lakes and the smaller boats that carry the grain on the lakes and down the river. The larger boats carry the grain from Fort William or Port Arthur down to the lake ports, Port Colborne and Buffalo, and the smaller boats carry it from Port Arthur or Fort William right down to Montreal. Most of the grain carried through to Montreal is taken by Canadian boats, because they are the smaller vessels, but most of the grain taken to lake ports or to Buffalo is carried in United States bottoms, for the simple reason that they are large boats which cannot go down the river to Montreal. But the minister has not told us who carries the wheat from Buffalo to Montreal. Some say that the United States boats do this. That is wrong. Most of the wheat carried from Buffalo to Montreal is taken by Canadian boats, because they are the small boats and the only ones that can go down the river. When we get into committee of the whole on this bill I expect the minister to tell us the quantity of wheat carried from Buffalo to Montreal by United States and Canadian boats—and I do not mean boats belonging to companies which are partly of United States ownership; because there are boats of Canadian registry in which the United States people may own some stock.

I want particularly to deal with the effect this legislation will have upon rates. We believe it will create a combine and that this combine will force rates up on the lakes. If we look at the rates at present what do we find? I will give a couple of instances. We had the experience in the past when Canadian boats had a monopoly of all the lake traffic, and what did we find? In the spring of 1931 a dispute arose between the insurance companies and the American boats, and the result was that American boats, by reason of the wording of the insurance policy for a time did not enter the trade on the lakes at all. When the Canadian boats had a monopoly on the lakes the price of handling wheat down the lakes from Fort William to Montreal immediately shot up to nine cents a bushel and was kept there for six weeks, until the dispute between the insurance companies and the American boats was settled, and when the American boats again came into competition the price immediately dropped three to six cents a bushel. That is a matter of record, and the minister knows it.

But we had another experience. In 1932 due to competition the rate on wheat from Fort William to Montreal kept going down and down month by month until in June it was 4·1 cents a bushel. Then a shipping combine was formed on the lakes. Some say there is not a combine, but we know there is, we know who is the head of it, and we know what he gets out of it; do not make any mistake about that. This shipping combine was formed and the plan was that the rate should be shot up half a cent a bushel month by month. In June the average rate was 4·1; in July, 4·54; in August, 5·27; in September, 6·40; in October, 6·79, or almost 6·8. Then our Minister of Trade and Commerce, through the board of grain commissioners, stepped in and said that the rate could not go above 6½ cents, although it had been above that figure. The rate then came down to 6½ cents. But let us see what were the rates to Buffalo, where there was competition, during those same months. As compared with the rate of 4·1 to Montreal in June the rate to Buffalo was 1·56. The rate to Montreal went up half a cent in July, and the rate to Buffalo in the same month was 1·57; to Buffalo in August, 1·54; September, 1·52; October, 1·52; November, 1·55. In fact, during all those months the rate to Buffalo hardly ever varied. Contrast that with a rate of 4·1 from Fort William to Montreal in the month of June and almost 6·8 from Fort William to Montreal in October; and these high rates to Montreal were due to there being a combine of shipping interests on the lakes. But going to Buffalo there was competition, and the rates remained the same. Naturally, then, if we do away with this competition, this alternative route to Buffalo, we are afraid that freight rates on the lakes will be shot up, and I think we are justified in that belief.

Why is it that we have these rates that now exist? Buffalo is the only port where we have competition. The rate going to Port Colborne in 1930 was 2·41 on the average, and the rate to Buffalo, a longer distance, 1·9, or half a cent higher going to Port Colborne than to Buffalo. Again in 1931 the rate to Georgian ports was 1·84, the rate to Port Colborne 1·89, and the rate to Buffalo 1·65, or nearly one-quarter of a cent less to Buffalo than to Georgian bay ports. Canadian boats are charging more for going a shorter distance than the rate to Buffalo, and hon. gentlemen opposite want the farmers to pay this extra rate and take their punishment. We are ready, as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr.

Quinn) said, to see our own Canadian people get all the traffic they can, but we are unwilling to pay them more than anybody else; in fact, we are not able to. The western farmer is bled white, and right at a time like this to ask him to pay more in freight rates is ridiculous. I wonder how the western members opposite will vote on this—my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull), for instance.

Mr. TURNBULL: Don't worry.

Mr. DONNELLY: Your constituents will worry, don't make any mistake about that. A rise in freight rates will affect all the people in western Canada, the people in the cities just as much as anybody else. Wheat is the lifeblood of our people in western Canada, and we are being asked by this bill to pay more in rates for the benefit of the shipping interests on the great lakes. This increase will be taken out of the farmers and nobody else.

In 1932 the rates were even worse—on the average 2·08 cents to lake ports; to Port Colborne, 2·22, and to Buffalo, 1·55, or nearly three-quarters of a cent more to ship to Port Colborne than to Buffalo, and half a cent more to ship to Georgian bay ports than to Buffalo although to Buffalo is a longer distance. Yet we are asked to vote for this bill to give Canadian shipping interests a monopoly of all the trade on the lakes.

With regard to the movement of grain at Buffalo, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), speaking on this bill said that Buffalo occupied a unique position. There is no doubt about that. The grain of western Canada comes to Fort William and is shipped from there to Buffalo, and from Buffalo it goes down the lakes to Montreal, or out via New York, Philadelphia and other United States ports. Both Canadian and American boats have been carrying this grain, but if this bill is put into effect any grain which is going down the lakes and is intended for Montreal must go in Canadian bottoms; if it goes to Buffalo it must go in Canadian bottoms. If the grain goes in American bottoms it will be in violation of this bill. There is no doubt that the rate to Buffalo to-day is the lowest, and there is no doubt that if this bill goes into effect it will affect Montreal injuriously. To my mind it is certain that the port of Montreal will suffer. All the wheat that is going to the markets of Europe outside of Great Britain will go to Buffalo and out through New York and Philadelphia, and on to Europe. Some wheat will go to Buffalo in either American or Canadian bottoms, but very little in Canadian bottoms. Only the bigger boats will take it, and the majority of the Canadian boats are smaller boats. Only the bigger Canadian boats will bring wheat from the head of the lakes down to Buffalo. It would not pay the smaller boat; the rates would be too low. They would rather go to Port Colborne, Goderich, or any other port where the rate will be higher, or take it through to Montreal. If this bill goes into effect it will be to the disadvantage of Montreal. We will find a lot more grain going through American ports to the markets of Europe via American bottoms, than we find at the present time.

I do not intend to delay the house any longer. I have risen merely to voice my protest against this bill. I resent some of the references made by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Thompson). He referred to what eastern Canada had done for western Canada, and how eastern Canada had built the Hudson Bay railway. I always understood the Hudson Bay railway had been built by money which the people of western Canada had paid for their preemptions. The greater part of the money put up by western Canada for their preemption payments of $3 an acre had been put into a private fund. That money was used for the building of the Hudson Bay railway and, of course, further amounts came from the general revenue. I am sorry to hear any hon. member say that eastern Canada has been handing out anything to western Canada. The hon. member said, "Oh well, we built the Welland canal for you." Western Canada never asked for the Welland canal; it is of no advantage to us. It gave labour to people in eastern Canada, particularly in Ontario, and the same applies to the St. Lawrence waterway development. If the people of eastern Canada want to build it, well and good; but so far as we in western Canada are concerned, we are not at all interested in it. We do not want to be told that the St. Lawrence waterway development is for us, or that the Welland canal was built for us. Only now, when western Canada, on account of its poverty, has ceased to be a market, does eastern Canada realize what we mean to it. Western Canada has always been your market, and still is. We are proud and willing to buy from you—understand that. But we hate to be branded as something to which gifts have to be handed; we are not looking for charity from eastern Canada. We are looking only for our just due, for a square and fair deal. We do not like to be told continuously that we are objects of charity on the part of eastern Canada, that we want gifts handed to us, or that this or that has to be done for us. It is regrettable that that stand has been taken, and I resent it.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I regret to delay the house even for a few moments, but under the circumstances, when we consider the condition of the order paper, it is possible that the delay is not as serious as it otherwise might be.

The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) made reference to the various beneficial features of the bill. I should like it to be understood at once that in anything I may have to say in criticism of a part of the bill I am making no reference, nor have others made reference, to the features of the bill which are wholly commendable. The provisions which deal with the administration of Canadian shipping, with the protection of those working in Canadian vessels, with proper inspection, with the protection of men working in hazardous trades —in fact, all these provisions for the proper regulation and safeguarding of shipping meet with my approval; they are wholly commendable, and we should be pleased were we in a position to support them by our vote. With the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and other hon. members who have spoken may I voice my regret that one section in an otherwise commendable bill should be such as to make it impossible for us to register our support. That section has been discussed so widely, and its potential or possible effects have been described so frequently and so clearly, that it is unnecessary for me to go into the matter at great length.

There is, however, one phase of the situation to which I wish to make reference. I believe it will be generally agreed that the cost of freight rates, as the cost of anything else, is determined essentially by the laws of supply and demand and by competition. If in Canada at the present time we were working under a wholly planned economy, were we to have every phase of our production, transportation and distribution planned, regulated and controlled, it is possible that competition would be unnecessary. But under existing conditions the main and indeed the only effective regulatory influence we have in respect of transportation costs is that commonly known as competition.

When we deal with competition in lake shipping, the subject specifically under discussion, there are several factors which must be considered. Unquestionably each of the various routes competing with one another —that is, the routes out from Vancouver, the routes through Hudson bay and others I need not mention—is a regulatory factor in respect of other routes. No one can stand by itself.

In the grain business the margin of profit is so small that a fractional increase in cost on one route may divert the trade in another direction. I believe that is the only effective safeguard we have left. But when we consider that feature, we have to remember that it works both ways, and that just as the shipment through Vancouver or through Hudson bay must have its effect upon shipping costs on the great lakes, so any possible increase in shipping costs on the great lakes —which, again, is a regulatory factor over Vancouver and Hudson bay—will have its effect generally on the other routes. So the principle of competition is a matter of importance, and applies to every route and to every cargo of grain shipped, no matter through which route it may travel.

May I say at once that the section of the bill which protects Canadian shipping and gives to it a virtual monopoly on Canadian coastal trade, whether carried on directly or indirectly, is wholly consistent with the policy of this government as it has been developed and demonstrated since the election of 1930. There has been constant evidence of a national policy of restriction. Under this policy, so far as possible, every branch of Canadian industry shall be given its proportionate share of protection. Each shall be given, so far as the law will permit, at least a suggestion of a monopoly in its own field. May I venture to suggest that it is only when each of the industries concerned is upon an equal footing that such a policy may be applied with any degree of equity. There is nothing unfair as between any one of these interests, so long as each receives the same degree of protection, and so long as each one of them is wholly national and domestic in its scope, although a continuation of such a policy may be detrimental to the country as a whole. Unfortunately in this particular case and in respect of the commodity which will be affected to the greatest degree, namely grain, we are attempting to do the impossible. By this proposed legislation we are attempting to inject a policy of national restriction into the one business in Canada which is essentially and inherently international in character, the wheat business.

Mr. POULIOT: Give Judge Sedgewick a chance.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Judge Sedgewick has nothing to do with it. There is no business in Canada which from that point of view is at all comparable with that of wheat growing. It is essentially an international business. Four fifths of the entire production must, in one way or another, and by one route or another, find its market overseas; the domestic sales are an insignificant factor as far as prices are concerned. So by this bill we are trying to do something which in my opinion cannot be justified and cannot be made to work successfully; we are attempting to apply the policy of national restriction to a business which essentially is international in character. What will be the result? Of course, as has been said, we are guessing, we are estimating, we are forecasting. We are saying what the result may be, not what is it. But I think we are fully justified in suggesting that the only possible result must be to raise, if it be only infinitesimally, the charges for transporting wheat by the lake route. If that happens it is perfectly logical to expect that it will find its reaction in a slight increase in rates on other routes in respect to which this route is a competitive factor. I say it is only reasonable and logical to expect that this will be the result; for why is the bill brought in? It can have only one of two purposes, either to give to Canadian shipping a greater share of the present available tonnage at the same rates, or to give to Canadian shipping a chance to charge a little higher rate than they are now able to charge because of American competition. It has been stated, and I see no reason to dispute the statement, that at the present time there is not one Canadian shipping line on the great lakes whose business is not written in red ink; they are all carrying on at a loss. It has been pointed out as a deplorable situation. It has been suggested that no business can be expected to carry on indefinitely under such conditions, and that to persist in such a course must inevitably result in bankruptcy for the companies and the final disappearance of that shipping. If that is the situation, and if it is brought about by rates that are too low, and if it is to be corrected by this legislation, how can it be corrected other than by giving the shipping companies an opportunity to charge rates higher than those charged at the present time? It has been suggested by one hon. member, and again I am not disputing his suggestion, that when we speak of the farmer as being the only producer concerned in raising wheat our application of the term is too limited; that all the essential industries lying between the soil and the seed at the one end and the consumer at the other must be looked upon as factors and copartners in production. That may not be technically correct, and in order to avoid all possibility of misapprehension I shall refer to the farmer as the primary producer. But suppose that definition to be correct; then what do we do? As far as we can by law, through the railway commission we provide that the railways shall charge rates which pay the cost of operation and provide a reasonable return to the shareholders. To those who supply the machinery and other essentials of the farmer for raising wheat, as far as we can we give by law through monopolized market the opportunity of carrying on their part of the business at a reasonable profit. By this bill we are endeavouring to make certain that the shipping partner in this undertaking shall be given the opportunity to make a reasonable profit on the carriage of the grain. But must it not be obvious to everyone who considers the matter, whether he be from the east or from the west, that eventually, if only so much money is available to be divided among the various factors, that amount being the price received for the grain on the markets of Great Britain and Europe, and if you ensure a profitable business to all the other factors concerned, to that extent you place the whole weight upon the primary producer, the man who raises the grain?

My purpose, Mr. Speaker, in rising was not to ask the government to depart from a policy upon which they were elected, that of protection, of giving as far as possible a domestic monopoly to the various branches of domestic industry and production, but to show that in this particular case they are trying to do that which is not only illogical and impossible but absolutely unfair; they are trying to apply that policy to the one business in Canada which cannot fit into a domestic plan, which is essentially international in its character and scope. That being the case, that one business at least should be saved from the effects of an intensive policy of national restriction. If prices cannot be controlled, if we must take a dump price on the markets of the world, we should be allowed at least the right to ship by any agency and in any way that will carry our wheat to the markets of the world at the lowest possible rate. Every additional quarter cent added to the cost of carrying wheat at a time when farmers are wondering whether or not they can continue in the business will be a deterrent to that business, an unfair increase in the burden of the farmer, and one which we, representing western Canada, trying our best to be fair, trying to see things from the national point of view, under the present circumstances cannot but oppose.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I am vitally interested in this bill, as much so as any man who sits on either side of the house. The people of my constituency are engaged in grain growing as well as in raising live stock, and anything that has the effect of raising freight rates on grain would not be satisfactory to me. If I thought for one moment that this bill would work a hardship on the grain producer of western Canada I would not support it. But, Mr. Speaker, we have control of the rates. If rates are raised unfairly we can take way the concession that is given to the shipping companies. The rates are protected under the grain commission. Also we can suspend the coastal shipping laws and let the American boats in at any time we wish, according to the provisions of this bill. Then I wonder what my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) would do with the Hudson Bay railway. He has been fighting for it nearly as long as I have. Mr. Speaker, if there have been reductions in freight rates they were brought about by the Conservative party.

Mr. YOUNG: Trying to make amends now.

Mr. MULLINS: All you have to do is to look at the old Manitoba rate which I had the privilege of helping to make. You enjoyed a ten cent rate on wheat to the head of the lakes from 1901 to 1918. I wonder if the hon. member for Lisgar will deny that. I was there when that protection was given the shippers of western Canada, not only on grain but on all products. We had control of rates then. We have control now on the lakes, and we can alter those rates just as we did previously. I do not doubt that if the angel Gabriel came down here the hon. member for Lisgar would find fault with his wings if he were on this side of the house, but if by chance he happened to be over there he would be all right. Hon. gentlemen opposite have opposed everything designed to help the grain industry, yet they are parading themselves as "holier than thou" and trying to condemn us and find fault with everything we have done.

I should like to direct attention to the former Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin). What did he do to help the grain growers of the west? Our present minister is trying to help both the shipping industry and the grain growers. Speaking in Montreal about a year ago the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) absolutely opposed the Hudson Bay railway, on which we in the west have pinned our hopes for many years. I have quoted these words in the house previously, but I think they should be mentioned again. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been trying to kill the Hudson Bay railway, and it would not be in operation to-day if they had been in power. Here is what the hon. member said:

> —we can afford things de luxe like the Hudson Bay railway, and Port Churchill. It is like giving your best girl or your wife a present when your pockets are full of money, but these are the days when we have no money, when we cannot even meet expenditures strictly needed. The Conservatives adopt a different attitude. The finances are upside down, yet they spend millions on projects which can wait a year or two years, or even five years—

We would not have had the railway finished for five years if the former minister had been in office. Then he went on to say:

> What is happening to-day as regards Port Churchill? We have Hon. Dr. Manion acting like a beggar in the street, begging people to ship some grain over the Hudson Bay railway to Port Churchill. So eager is he to get some grain there that he is offering free elevators, a cut in railway rates—

He seems to find fault with that reduction in railway rates.

> —and also a bonus to compensate for the higher insurance rates out of Port Churchill. That is what the Bennett government is ready to do. Sane merchants doing a regular reasonable business in grain do not want to send their grain through Port Churchill at the present time—

It is too bad that our only hope, for which we have fought for nearly half a century, should be blighted by a speech made by the former Minister of Marine and Fisheries. These are his verbatim words, which I am sure he cannot deny. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite find fault because we bring in this shipping bill.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would the hon. member care to quote the speech made by his own leader at Portage la Prairie in 1926 with regard to the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. MULLINS: I go by a man's actions. We have finished the Hudson Bay railway; we are giving the grain growers of the west every opportunity to get their grain out by way of Hudson bay.

Mr. BROWN: Who let the contract for the construction of the elevator?

Mr. MULLINS: Who finished the elevator? Hon. gentlemen opposite were too busy letting contracts all the time they were in office. If many other contracts had not been let all over the country Canada would not be in her present condition, and the hon. member must know that to be a fact. The Conservative party has given the farmers everything possible in the way of freight rates from western Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite harp on the Crowsnest pass agreement, but that does not amount to anything. Manitoba should get back the rates she had prior to 1917, which hon. gentlemen opposite took away. What were they doing from 1922 to 1930; were they asleep at the switch? Those rates, which were forty per cent less than the present rates, belong to Manitoba. Manitoba enjoyed those low freight rates from 1901 to 1917; the Conservative party then in power in Manitoba, which brought in those rates, saved millions of dollars to that province but hon. gentlemen opposite do not give us a bit of credit. They are not fair enough to do so. I am big enough to give them credit for anything they may have done to help the west. I am more interested in moving live stock and grain from western Canada than I am in holding this seat.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Why not resign?

Mr. MULLINS: I would resign to-morrow if by doing so I could bring about a cheaper freight rate in the west. I want those farmers to get their commodities to the markets of the world as cheaply as possible; that is my primary object in this house, and I know that at present they cannot get their products to the markets of the world at anything like a decent figure. I do not want to waste eight years in this house, as hon. gentlemen opposite did, without getting lower rates.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I was discussing the shipping bill as it would affect freight structures. During the recess I have studied every part of the bill and I cannot see that the western farmers are other than safeguarded in every detail. If I thought for one moment that anything would be done to make freight rates higher, I would not support the bill.

Before I proceed, may I be permitted to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Charters). I notice a splendid bouquet on his desk and I know what it means.

Mr. DUPUIS: With permission of my hon. friend, I would like to second him in his congratulations.

Mr. MULLINS: I listened with a great deal of attention and interest to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I have known the hon. member for many years but I wonder if he is sincere when he refuses to support this bill. Has he a sincere regard for the farmers who have to struggle and pay tribute in the way of high freight rates. What did the hon. gentleman do down through the years to have those freight rates reduced? I cannot see that he has done anything to help the farmers of western Canada obtain a reduction in freight rates. When I look over the Liberal platform with its fourteen points I cannot find anything which will help the farmers to obtain any redress. It is the same old song and the same old chorus. The farmer can go on working and slaving on the land, he can continue to be a hewer of wood and drawer of water, and he will never find one bit of assistance in this platform.

Mr. BROWN: I guarantee that I can hew more wood and draw more water than the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins).

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. member is a faithful follower of the Liberal party. I do not find any fault in that because if he is faithful, he will stand true to his party. There is not one word in this Liberal platform about a reduction in freight rates. The hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) throws up his hands and speaks against the provisions of this bill. I wonder if he has noticed that there is not one word about a reduction of freight rates in the Liberal platform. You cannot succeed in the west with the present freight structure. It costs 70 per cent to ship lumber to the prairies. The mill gets 30 per cent but the railway company takes 70 per cent. Under the old agreement which I had the honour and pleasure of helping to put into force, things were different. It was the Conservative party that brought about this agreement, and I think I told the house something about it when I was speaking previously. I looked up the terms of this agreement and I would like to put certain particulars on Hansard so that the hon. member for Lisgar can look them over at his leisure.

The Manitoba agreement with the Canadian Northern was dated February 11, 1901. The appeal should have been taken to the Court of King's Bench before it was taken away. Compared with the Crowsnest rates, the Manitoba agreement lowered the rates on grain four cents per hundred pounds from all points in Manitoba to Fort William or Port Arthur. I hope the hon. member gets the significance of that reduction of four cents per hundred pounds. There was a reduction of fifteen per cent in the rates on general merchandise from Fort William and Port Arthur to all points in Manitoba and from all points in Manitoba to Fort William and Port Arthur. The Crowsnest pass contract applied only to a limited number of commodities and in a limited territory. It applied to commodities moving in one direction only, while the Manitoba contract covered movements from all points in Manitoba to the east, west, north and south. The Manitoba contract controlled both express and passenger rates. On October 6, 1903, an agreement was reached with the Canadian Pacific Railway covering uniform rates from all points in Manitoba to Fort William and from Fort William to all points in Manitoba. This company filed their tariff for reduced rates with the railway commission on October 7, 1903. The manitoba contract remained in force until March, 1918, when it was overridden by the War Measures Act. In 1919 subsection 5 of section 325 of the Railway Act was passed in an endeavour to override the Manitoba contract. This subsection was to remain in force for three years. In June, 1922, an amendment was passed by which the subsection was to remain in effect until July 6, 1923, and it was continued in force for a period of one year by order of the governor in council. The Crowsnest pass rates were never taken into account after the Manitoba contract came into force in 1901. The Manitoba contract was taken as a guide for everything. This contract saved western Canada $100,000,000, and it was brought into being by the Conservative party with which hon. gentlemen opposite find so much fault.

Hon. gentlemen opposite should not object to keeping out American boats, especially when we have sufficient Canadian bottoms. A few years ago they sold a number of boats to a lot of grain men at a ridiculously low figure. I am surprised that they should find fault with this bill and want these American bottoms to come in when they put practically a whole fleet of boats on the lakes for which they had paid millions of dollars. The Liberal government built these boats and sold fifteen of them to their friends, those boats are in operation—boats that cost nearly $1,000,000 apiece were sold for the paltry sum of $50,000 each. I know one good, staunch Liberal friend who bought four and he still has them in operation on the lakes. Surely when so many of my hon. friends' friends have these boats, they will not be so strong in opposition to them.

Ten days after that contract between the government and the Canadian Northern Railway had been signed, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made the government of Manitoba the following offer:

> That if the Manitoba government would assign to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the contract as made with the Northern Pacific Railway Company ten days previously, the Canadian Pacific would assume all the rental charges and put into force as well a reduction of grain and flour rates of four cents per 100 pounds below the Crowsnest pass rate, together with reduction on other commodities, from points in Manitoba to Fort William for the term of the lease as made with the Northern Pacific Railway Company for 999 years.

That was a business government that made a business deal and got for western Canada cheap rates that the people there enjoyed over the years they did, thus saving to the province nearly $100,000,000. This government is bringing in just such another bill involving just such another transaction with the lake shippers, and I believe it will save millions to western Canada and give our shipping interests a chance. We have control; we can cancel at any time, and I do not see why hon. gentlemen opposite are so frightened when those conditions are inserted in the bill.

It was not my intention to speak on the matter, but I felt it my duty to do so when I listened to hon. gentlemen and know and realize how unfair they are to this side of the house, giving us no credit for anything we endeavour to do to save the agricultural industry and the situation in general. As a member I am and have been very much concerned about conditions of agriculture on the western prairies. As regards unemployment and agriculture, far be it from me to do anything that would be detrimental to the man who is struggling on the land. Is there a man on the opposite side who has given the government credit for introducing the stabilization fund? I have heard nothing but fault-finding speeches from that side of the house. When my faith is shaken, hon. members will hear from me strongly from this side, but I have every faith that this shipping legislation will be carried out satisfactorily, and as for all the little, narrow points hon. members opposite are bringing up in connection with it, they are only drawing a red herring across the trail.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I rise, for more reasons than one, to oppose the bill which is now before the house. Representing as I do an agricultural riding in western Canada, one that is predominantly agricultural in complexion, I cannot see legislation of this kind go through the house without opposing it.

In doing so I am, as I understand the situation, taking the viewpoint of the majority of the people in the three western provinces. I feel that I am taking the stand that every farmer or tiller of the soil in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta would wish me to take. I might except some of the Conservative members from western Canada who have said already in this chamber that they are not going to oppose the bill but that they are prepared to support legislation of this nature. That would be about the only exception that I could make in what I am saying in regard to the bill now before the house. I therefore leave those hon. members on the government side of the house who represent constituencies in the three western provinces to speak for themselves.

The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Thompson) this afternoon spoke about certain shipping injustices. If this legislation did not go through, he was pitying the Canadian shippers, ship owners, masters, mates and all those who go down to the sea in ships. Beyond mentioning the injustices to the interests I have named, I did not hear the hon. member say anything about injustices suffered by western farmers in connection with legislation of this kind. The hon. member also said that this bill ought to have been before the house years ago; that it was a belated piece of legislation. I inferred from his remarks that during the past decade or so the gathering storm on behalf of this bill had been growing greater and greater until it had to burst forth. It is a peculiar thing that the storm that has been gathering in order to put this bill through has gathered the velocity and momentum it has during the period a Conservative government has been in power. If the storm were gathering a few years ago, it did not break forth, or if it did do so in any measure, it did not have any effect; it did not get very far; nothing was done; but, as I understand the matter, the Liberal government of the day, if representations were made to it on behalf of legislation of this nature, took the position that it could not be carried out seeing the expense had to be paid largely by agriculture.

The hon. member—and I am still speaking of the hon. member for East Simcoe and I want to quote him fairly—said that he was supporting this bill because it was going to help employment, to relieve unemployment. If we are going to support the bill to relieve unemployment or to help employment and the legislation is going to boost prices, I cannot see, in the last analysis, that it will help employment very much; on the contrary, it will create more farm unemployment. But if we are going to help employment in Canada, there is a very good way of doing it. If we want unemployment to disappear; if we want the activities of the Canadian people in the way of industry and commerce to grow apace, there are many things that ought to be done entirely apart from a measure of this kind. This legislation will not meet the situation at all. We ought to lower our tariff walls. That would help to relieve unemployment. We ought to organize and effect commercial treaties with every nation in the world. We ought to have as our objective international trade, not any narrow insular ideas in regard to building up Canadian trade and commerce. Clearly we ought to remove all restrictions on trade, thereby giving international business an opportunity to function. If these things were done, commerce would flourish, business would increase and unemployment would disappear, and there is no way by which it can disappear except by taking action along these lines. To talk of relieving unemployment by putting through a measure of this kind is to talk the veriest nonsense.

The same hon. member this afternoon said that the Americans had adopted legislation something like this and that we ought to follow their example. The idea of tit for tat in international relations and in formulating a national policy is not sound procedure. Surely we have reached the stage in the history of this government when its supporters will not stand up and say: Our policy must be dictated from Washington. They told us a few years ago that the Liberal policy was dictated from Washington. That was not true, and I hope it will not be true of any government in Canada that its policy will be directed from Washington. So I see little merit in an argument of that kind. They say that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. Even if it is, I would hesitate to imitate the Americans in any policy that was going to be of doubtful benefit to Canada.

I do not think this measure will get us very far on the road to relieving unemployment or building up a sound national spirit. I would suggest to the hon. member that if we want to develop the shipping business in this country, we might take off the 25 per cent duty which ships must pay to get into this country after they are built. Instead of loading the dice against them, let them come in free and give them a chance to function profitably. Then there would be no necessity for legislation of this kind.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) mentioned, and I want to quote him as fairly as possible, the Hudson Bay railway, the Vancouver route, the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence waterway, and he said: There in those routes you have the means for competition to keep down rates. I would not say that of any of those routes. I would not like to use the Hudson Bay railway as an argument for establishing a shipping monopoly in Canada and then after it is established say: Well, we have the Hudson Bay route to make the monopoly of none effect. I think it would be far better for us in adopting a policy of this kind to put no confidence in any regulating body whatsoever. My policy would be this. I would say that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and rather than regulate a monopoly after you have created it, rather than control a merger after you have brought it into existence I would say have nothing to do with either from the start. Prevent the thing right from the beginning, and then you will not have to correct it, will you? You will not have to regulate it, will you? You will not have to control it, will you? The answer is self-evident. Briefly, see that no merger or monopoly takes place, and then your argument for regulation and control disappears, as it ought to disappear, because such a monopoly would endanger the very foundation of the agricultural industry of Canada.

Another member this afternoon—I do not remember who it was—brought the question of the Hudson Bay route into this debate. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to give the party opposite some credit for helping with the Hudson Bay route. I am not going to be small enough to get up and say that the Liberals ought to take one hundred per cent credit for it. I think we ought all to be first-class Canadians and give each other credit where credit is due in a proposition of this kind. But I should like to draw attention to the fact that the contract for the Hudson Bay railway was let by a Liberal government, and by a Liberal Minister of Railways in 1911. What took place between 1911 and 1914? Was anything done in connection with the Hudson Bay railway? Nothing. And a Tory government was in power during those years. Then why mention the Hudson Bay railway? What was done from 1914 to 1921? Nothing whatever.

Mr. ARTHURS: There was a war on.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is no argument. The road was left in disrepair and public opinion in certain parts of Canada was being built up against the route. The steel was left to rot to a certain extent, and no advance step was taken in the matter from 1914 to 1921.

What resulted after 1921, when the Liberals came into power? We know what took place. The Liberals, as I said, in the first place let the contract for the railway. It was they who began the railway. You have to begin a thing before you finish it, haven't you? There is no use taking credit for finishing a railway and claiming credit for everything about it just because you finished it, because if it had never been started you would never have had it to finish. So from 1921 to 1930 the Liberals went forward with the Hudson Bay railway, and I am here to say that every member from the province of Quebec sitting on the government side of the house from 1921 to 1930 gave fair support to that undertaking. They were with the Liberal party in the prosecution of the great enterprise, and they did not oppose any money vote in this house for the purposes of that railway. Consequently no man can say that Quebec as a province opposed the Hudson Bay railway. It is a sound national policy, and any argument to the effect that any minister or any member from the province of Quebec went out of his way to oppose that road is not borne out by the facts of the case.

More than that, when the Conservatives did push the road onward, where did they push it? To Port Nelson, to the wrong port, and we had to correct that blunder and to put the terminus at Churchill, where the road ought to go, and where it did go. With these few remarks I shall leave the Hudson Bay railway.

The essence of the bill which is before the house will be found in section 935 which reads:

1. No goods shall be transported by water or by land and water, from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation in any ship other than a British ship.

2. No ship other than a British ship shall transport passengers from one place in Canada to another place in Canada either directly or by way of a foreign port.

That is the essence of the bill, as I understand it. As I see it the objective of the bill is to hand Canadian shipping to Canadian bottoms or to Canadian ships. That principle is all right; I am not going to quarrel with it. I think it is sound, if it can be done without too great a cost to any industry in Canada. If it can be done without great cost to western agriculture, it is sound; otherwise it is not. That is the angle of the question I wish to approach. But if this cannot be done, what are you doing? You are applying to the shipping interests of Canada the principle of Canada first, the principle of economic nationalism, the principle of a narrow, self-sufficient Canadianism which is directly the opposite of an internationalism which to a very great degree must dominate the minds of Canadian statesmen, if we are going to get anywhere in national and international affairs.

It is because the bill is wholly in favour of what might be termed a narrow nationalism and wholly contrary to what you might term a sound internationalism that I think it ought to be opposed. What are we doing to-day? We are trying to build up a new ideal of internationalism by way of disarmaments, settlement of international debts, and adjustments of tariffs and trade. Therefore anything which will prejudice a sound internationalism on the part of any government in Canada ought to be opposed, because it will help only to bring failure agriculturally and otherwise when we attend international gatherings and when we put forward the viewpoint which we as Canadians ought to express.

Further, some of the speakers were in doubt about the bill having the effect of increasing or boosting the rates. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not much doubt about it. I am not doubting. I do not think a man ought to be a doubting Thomas in a case of this kind. I am afraid the increase in prices will be such a grim reality that there will be no room for doubt. I am afraid that this price boosting under a new shipping combination will be a reality. Therefore as a western member I must oppose it.

May I say I did not like the way this bill was introduced to the house. It came in a roundabout manner. It came in an indirect manner—in an irresponsible manner. It came from the Senate. A bill of this kind should not come from the Senate, but in the first instance should come before this House of Commons. Any representations to be made on behalf of Canadian shipping interests, on behalf of industry or on behalf of agriculture should be made before a committee of the House of Commons, not before a committee of the Senate. This bill was introduced in the wrong way, just as the railway bill was introduced in the wrong way. For that reason I opposed the railway bill—at least that was one reason. I oppose this legislation for the same reason.

Further than that, dealing with a matter of this kind the Senate will do a certain amount of work, will hear certain representations, and will begin to frame a piece of legislation. Then when the Commons get it we find it is altogether wrong, ill-constructed, and the time of the house is taken up in undoing what the Senate has done. Therefore I say that to make progress, to get on sound ground, to give every one a chance to make representations and to have the bill properly drawn up in the first instance it should have been brought before the House of Commons, and should not have been presented to the Senate until the House of Commons was through with it. Sound democracy demands procedure of this kind.

Let me congratulate the minister upon his plausible defence of this measure. I always appreciate hearing him speak, and if I am opposing this measure I should like it understood that I am not opposing the minister. I believe him to be one of the most competent and most courteous men in the House of Commons. Therefore I do not wish him to think there is anything personal in my opposition to this measure. The Minister referred to legislation dealing with other subjects, such as the appointment of inspectors of ships' tackle, regulations for protecting workers against accidents while loading or unloading ships, powers of inspectors in connection with an order for cessation of loading or unloading, marking of heavy packages or objects, regulations respecting grain cargoes and deck cargoes, and, lastly, pilotage and lighting facilities for loading ships. All these are worthy parts of the measure. I say they ought not to have been mixed with the other parts of the bill. A different bill ought to have been brought down. However, since a bill containing these worth while measures has not been brought down, there is nothing for us to do but to oppose the whole measure. If we oppose the measure we are not necessarily opposing those goodly things which form a part of it, but are opposing it because we have to object to the main portion of it—the transportation of goods and passengers.

The minister stated the legislation was to nurture Canadian shipping interests. From that I would understand it is to improve Canadian shipping, to build it up, to make it strong and to give it more power. We are going to give it more power by framing legislation which will make comparatively easy the building up of a shipping trust, and as a result of this nurturing there will come into being a real shipping combination. This nurturing policy will of course take care of the capital structure of any shipping trust. The costs of every ship owner will be included in the rate structure, and every care will be taken to see that so far as ship owners are concerned the capital structure is sound, that it will bring forth a profit and that it will pay. If it pays it will do so at the expense of the farmers. In such legislation as this I should like to ask where the farmers' interests come in. Who is looking after the farmers' costs and his capital structure? Under a high tariff government his capital costs have gone up; the production of a bushel of wheat costs more than ever. If you add to his costs by building a shipping merger he will be worse off than ever. I fail to see how any western member can stand in this House of Commons and vote for this measure.

Just to show what is going on, and to show the cost of carrying a bushel of wheat from the head of the lakes to Georgian bay ports, to Port Colborne and to Buffalo, let me quote the figures for the year 1930. For 1930 the average cost of carrying a bushel of wheat to Georgian bay ports was 2·5 cents; to Port Colborne 2·41; to Buffalo 1·92. You will notice the rate to Buffalo is away below that to the other two ports. In 1931 the average rate to Georgian bay ports was 1·84, to Port Colborne 1·89 and to Buffalo 1·65. Again the rate to Buffalo is below the average to Port Colborne or the Georgian bay ports. For 1932 the average to Georgian bay ports was 2·8, to Port Colborne 2·2 and to Buffalo 1·55. So for these years the Buffalo rate was lower than that to Port Colborne or the Georgian bay ports. There you have the situation as plain as it can be put. With Buffalo an open shipping point, a storage point and a transfer point, we have lower rates to that port than to Port Colborne or Georgian bay. If by legislation we practically close Buffalo, if we say to our Canadian ships: You must carry all the grain from one Canadian port to another, then we practically eliminate Buffalo as a competing factor, and only one result will follow; the cost of carrying wheat will go up, and the western farmers will have to pay, pay!

I must say that this is the most inopportune time in the history of Canada to bring in legislation of this kind. We are in the midst of a world depression, the farmers are carrying on under the greatest difficulty, they need every cent they can get to enable them to live, they are unable to pay their taxes because the cost of production is away above the price they are getting. Being in such a predicament, I would say that such legislation would far better have been left to another time and not brought before this parliament without the most thoughtful consideration. Farming to-day in this country, is in a worse position than it has been in for fifty years, and this is no time to bring in legislation as to the result of which there is even a doubt as to its helping the farmer. I think this legislation will do every farmer great injury and perhaps be the means of bringing to bankruptcy numbers of western farmers. For these reasons and many others I stand up to oppose this measure, and I hope the government will act wisely and withdraw it. If however the government presses it to a vote I hope all the members from western ridings will have the courage to oppose it, even if it means voting against their own party.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief in my remarks. I may state that I was greatly tempted to cast my vote in favour of the bill, and I would have done so, had the principle on which the bill is founded been frankly and entirely applied. I think it is of national import to limit the transportation of Canadian goods to Canadian ships and railways, and this, through Canadian ports. All should agree on this policy. This provision, morever, seems to be embodied in the merchant marine laws of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and in those of most of the countries of the world. There should be therefore, no objection to that principle being embodied in the Merchant Marine Act of Canada. Unfortunately, sir, it is not that policy which is applied in the bill under discussion. The reserve made is not to the advantage of Canadian ships. And, I repeat it, if the bill restricted the transportation of Canadian goods, between Canadian ports, to Canadian ships only, I would support the bill. According to the bill, this reserve is made not in favour of Canadian ships but in favour of British ships, namely English, New Zealand, Australian and South African ships, etc., etc.

Well, sir, as between the two sources of competition, I consider that the one which Canadian ships will have to meet from British ships will be just as injurious to our trade as that of the United States ships. The principle is the same.

I am aware that it will be contended that in practice there is very little danger that British ships will cross over to compete with Canadian ships on the Great Lakes. I readily admit that the danger is remote, however, this does not alter the principle. Moreover, if the danger of this competition does not exist for the Great Lakes, it does for the Pacific coast, because, at present, Canadian shipowners and seamen complain of the competition waged there in coastal trade by British ships and seamen. If the policy of "Canada First" is to be applied, let it be applied frankly and completely and, let it be stated in the Canadian Merchant Marine Act that the transportation of Canadian goods is entirely restricted to Canadian ships. It is not sufficient to suppress the competition from which Canada suffers on the part of United States ships; let us do the thing thoroughly and suppress all competition from whatever country it may arise.

I stated a moment ago that Canadian ship owners on the Pacific coast complain of the competition waged in the coastal trade by British ships. I have before me a telegram which I want to read to the house before closing my remarks. This telegram was sent to me on May 16 by Mr. C. M. Woodworth, one of my friends in Vancouver, also a prominent lawyer in that city. It is as follows:

J. O. L. Boulanger, K.C., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Canadian shipowners, seamen, engineers and officers have waited on me and strenuously object passage sections nine thirty two, nine thirty five Bill C one Canada's coastal trade must be reserved to Canadians described above.

(sgd) C. M. Woodworth.

I therefore repeat, sir, that I would support the bill if the principle on which it is founded applied to every country. However, as the bill affects United States ships and affords no protection to Canadian ships against the competition by other nations, I shall vote against it.

Mr. J. T. SIMPSON (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the shipping act now under discussion provides for Canadian shipping the same protection as the United States gives to United States shipping. All the arguments that I have heard against this bill, and I have paid particular attention to the debate, were very effectively answered at a previous session of the house by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). The hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) this afternoon made some criticism about this bill being introduced at this time; he said it was too late in the session. I would like to point out that this bill, or one somewhat similar to it, was introduced on May 6, 1932, but was not proceeded with at that time. It is now some two or three weeks since the bill was introduced in the Senate, and ample time was given hon. members as well as the public generally to become acquainted with its contents and to make any objections they thought should be made.

The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), who spoke a few moments ago, said that two sections of the bill should have been left out but that he was in perfect accord with the other sections. I suppose it would be difficult to frame a bill that would please everyone, and it is the privilege of the hon. gentleman to oppose the bill or any section of it if he thinks that should be done.

The first Canadian coasting law was enacted in 1870. Prior to that time the Imperial Shipping Act and Customs Act regulated Canadian shipping, but in that year the Canada Shipping Act was passed, providing in one section that no goods or passengers should be carried from one port in Canada to another except in British ships. That section has been in every shipping act up to the present time, though it has been changed and modified by certain orders in council. Section 958 of the act of 1870 provided:

—the foregoing provisions of this act shall not apply to the ships or vessels of any foreign country in which British ships are admitted to the coasting trade of such country, and to carry goods and passengers from one port or place to another in such country.

That power of suspension was vested in the governor in council, and this provision remained in our shipping act until 1923, when section 958 was inserted, reading as follows:

The governor in council may, from time to time, by order in council declare that the foregoing provisions of this part shall not, for the period specified in such order in council, apply, either throughout Canada or in any specified waters of Canada, to the ships or vessels, or to any specified, ascertained or ascertainable class or number of the ships or vessels, of any foreign country.

This amendment extended the powers of suspension to cover ships or vessels of any foreign country, thereby giving the United States fleet on the great lakes an opportunity to compete with the Canadian fleet.

The first elevator at the head of the lakes was built and put into operation in 1884. Since that time the elevator capacity has been increased to meet the demand brought by the development of grain growing in the west. In 1911 the elevator capacity at the head of the lakes amounted to 26,000,000 bushels, while in 1931 it amounted to 91,000,000 bushels. The elevators on the lower lake and bay ports as well as on the St. Lawrence have been increased accordingly. In 1928 we had the largest movement of wheat from the head of the lakes that has ever taken place; in that year 404,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat came down the lakes, together with 185,000,000 bushels of United States wheat. That was the peak year; that figure has not been reached before or since. Owing to greater wheat production and in order to get away from the long haul eastward from Alberta the port of Vancouver was developed. In 1923 we shipped 25,000,000 bushels of wheat through that port, while in 1932 that figure increased to 104,000,000 bushels; thus in nine years the amount of wheat shipped through Vancouver was quadrupled. Now the Hudson Bay route will become a factor in the handling of Canada's wheat. I do not think it necessary at this time to go into the history of the establishment of these routes by the different governments that have been in office during the last twenty-five years.

Some mention has been made of the increase in freight rates in 1922, when the rates went higher than they ever had been previously. In 1922 there was a coal strike in the United States, which was settled in the fall of that year. Then there arose a great demand for the transportation of coal from United States to Canadian ports as well as to other United States ports at the head of the lakes, and there was more money for the shipping companies in the transportation of coal than in the transportation of wheat. The grain trade had contracted for a large amount of ocean space; they were unable to get the wheat east to occupy that space, so they offered increased rates in order to induce the shipping companies to carry wheat instead of coal. In 1922 the tonnage carried on the great lakes was nothing like the tonnage carried to-day, but at present there is sufficient tonnage to carry the grain from the head of the lakes, and there is no danger of the rates being increased or of a monopoly or combine being created among the shipping companies.

The other evening the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) referred to the evidence submitted to the Senate committee which dealt with this act; he quoted from the evidence of Mr. Bredt, who appeared before that committee, and who stated that there was no possibility of an increase in grain rates from the head of the lakes. Mr. Sydney Smith also stated that the fear of an increase in freight rates was only a bogy, and that it had no foundation in fact. Besides, there are the provisions of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act. It has also been pointed out during the debate that the board of grain commissioners has power to fix a maximum rate for the carrying of grain from the head of the lakes.

I think it was in the month of May of last year that two cargoes of wheat were carried from the head of the lakes at the rate of three and a half cents per bushel. That was a distress rate; no shipping company engaged in the business of carrying wheat can do it at that price. It happened that one or two boats had taken cargoes to the head of the lakes; they had to return and there were no cargoes offering on their return, which meant their having to lay up for the rest of the season. In order to make expenses on the way back they contracted to carry grain at this rate. I do not think my statement will be contradicted when I say that not a fraction of this saving in freight rates went back into the pockets of the grain growers. The total difference between the normal and this special rate went into the pockets of the grain dealers.

The price quoted to the western farmer is for wheat delivered at the head of the lakes, and from the head of the lakes to the place where the wheat is consumed there is an average freight charge. The price paid to the producer is based on the Fort William price plus the freight charge to the place of consumption. Any reductions in rates, such as those I have mentioned, do not benefit the producer in any way.

The statement has been made during this debate that a number of the Canadian grain boats are obsolete. I know for a fact that during the last two or three years some of the most recently built grain boats have not been put into commission because of a scarcity of cargoes. This has happened while cargoes have been carried by United States boats. It seems to me that Canadian shipping interests should be protected by the passing of this bill. If this bill is put into effect it will mean that employment will be given to many men who have learned the art of sailing and who are qualified to fill the positions on these boats. If Canadian shipping is protected it will add very materially to employment. A number of the steamship companies have boats lying idle which could handle all the Canadian grain from the head of the lakes. Among these companies are the Paterson Steamships Limited, Canada Steamship Lines Limited, Mathews Steamship Company, and others. There are besides many individual ship owners. To my mind this trade should be preserved for Canadian ships. I should like to quote from a letter of the Paterson

Steamships Limited dated March 22, 1932, as follows:

During 1930 our steamers Fort Willdoc and Windoc did not operate at all, thus, employment was lost to 46 men, being 23 men per vessel.

We are listing the following vessels with the time lost by men, who would otherwise have ben employed on these vessels. We figure that their total employment, if working throughout the season, is nine months.

1930

Steamer	Operating time	Time lost
Vandoc	20 days	8 months
Soodoc	1 month	8 months
Canadoc	20 days	8 months
Saskadoc	60 days	7 months
Bricoldoc	60 days	7 months
Ontadoc	90 days	6 months

1931

Fort Willdoc	No operation
Windoc	No operation
Vandoc	No operation
Soodoc	No operation
Canadoc	1 month	8 months
Saskadoc	2 months	7 months
Bricoldoc	1 month	8 months
Ontadoc	10 days	Practically 9 months

Our other three upper lakers were operated throughout the seasons but on two or three occasions they were laid up for as long as fifteen days at a time, and, needless to say, no crew were kept on them during these lay-up periods but we cannot give you the time lost by the men.

It will be seen that in the case of this one steamship company a very large number of men might have been employed if the business of carrying wheat from the head of the lakes had been kept for Canadian steamship companies. To my mind the competition between these different companies will prevent any increase in freight rates; and besides there are the provisions of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act.

There is another governing factor in the power of the board of grain commissioners to fix a maximum rate for the carriage of wheat. I feel quite sure that if this bill is passed there will be no increase in freight rates from the head of the lakes. I know something of the cost of producing grain and other farm commodities and I know that the producer, as has been stated in this debate, is entitled to every cent which can be got out of his product. However, I feel that in the interests of Canada as a whole no sacrifice would be made by any class through the passing of this bill. I intend to give it my very hearty support.

[Mr. Simpson.]

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken part in this debate if the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) had not challenged me last evening. I want to make clear to the house that if I thought the passing of this bill would mean an increase in the freight rates to the farmer, I certainly would oppose it. I should like to say to the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) that there would be no hesitancy or lack of courage in my action; I would oppose the bill. But I think I speak for Saskatchewan members on this side of the house when I say that because I feel assured now that we shall not be exploited in rates and for other reasons that I shall mention, I am prepared to support the bill.

When I spoke on the budget I read a resolution from the town in which I live and I mentioned that some two hundred farmers who were at the meeting at which the resolution was passed asked me to bring it before this chamber, requesting the federal government to introduce legislation whereby we might preserve the identity of our wheat. To my mind there is nothing that will accomplish this better than the legislation which is now before us. There is a strong feeling throughout my part of the country, and in fact throughout the west, especially in Saskatchewan, that our wheat loses its identity when it goes through United States ports. In other words, our wheat is blended with an inferior grain and when it reaches the British or a foreign market, it is inferior to Canadian wheat. I am more convinced than ever of this, and perhaps I have the right to speak, because hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon mentioned the impossibility of keeping our wheat from being blended with United States wheat when it reached Buffalo. If that be the case, I think we are more than justified in seeing that the major portion of our wheat should go through Canadian ports.

I have other reasons for supporting this bill. When I read in Hansard to-night some of the statistics given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) indicating that for some years an average of over fifty per cent of our wheat had been going through United States ports in United States bottoms, there is enough of good Canadian in me yet that I would like to see a little more of our wheat going through our own ports, especially when I am assured that no additional burden will thereby be imposed upon the farmers of western Canada. When I compare the rates for the last number of years and see that we had a rate as high as ten cents and an average of eight cents for a few years, in fact having to go to 1932 before it came down to five cents and a fraction, and when I am assured that there will be a maximum rate of six and a half cents, this appears to me to be a better policy than to take a chance on the rate going up to ten cents, which would be possible, as it has done in the past. Therefore as a farmer and representing a rural constituency I rise to justify my action in supporting this bill.

I do not like and am not going to criticize hon. members opposite. This is a chamber for free speech. They may be sincere in what they are saying, but when the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) was speaking, a few ideas passed through my mind. He has for a number of years been an agitator in favour of a Canadian flag; he wants a Canadian flag, but now he apparently does not wish to see Canadian vessels get the support they should from their own country; he is more concerned to see that our wheat coming down the great lakes goes through United States ports. I confess I cannot understand the psychology of the hon. gentleman. When the question is one of supporting our own shipping facilities and our own ports, I feel quite justified in my action and as I said to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), I am not concerned when I declare my stand on this question because I know the sentiments of the farmers in my constituency. I do not know that they are so very different from those in the constituency he represents, but I know there is a strong agitation that something should be done to preserve the identity of our wheat, because there is a feeling that we have lost, as I have already stated, millions of dollars through our wheat leaving Canada through United States ports and being blended with inferior wheat. I am still more firmly convinced that I am right from the fact that the British government, when they granted the preference of six cents, took exception to our wheat being rebilled through United States ports. That shows there is some ground for my contention that our wheat should not be blended.

I do not know why hon. gentlemen opposite should be so doubtful of this bill when we are assured by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that should anything happen, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in reply, I think, to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), it would not take weeks and months to change the measure; that it could be done overnight. If that be so, why should we worry this evening? Why not give our own ports and our own shipping interests a chance? If the privileges granted are abused, I assure the house that I shall be the first to rise and voice my opposition.

I have always been led to believe that volume counts, and it seems to me that if we could turn 100,000,000 bushels of wheat through our own shipping facilities, we might get a lower rate. Volume does count. Again I say I am justified in asking that this measure be given trial.

The criticism has been made that this measure should have been introduced long before this, but we have now had ample time to discuss it. I did not intend to speak upon it, but I want to assure the house, and particularly hon. gentlemen opposite, that all farmers are not thinking in exactly the same terms as they are, according to some of the former speakers. The farmers of a goodly portion of Saskatchewan believe they have been losing a great deal of money because our wheat has not been going through our own ports but has been shipped through United States ports and blended with inferior grain. I only wish to declare that I have no hesitancy whatever in supporting the bill.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I had intended remaining quiet because I did not think it necessary to advance any arguments why we from the west should oppose this bill by both vote and voice, but when my good friend the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) capped the whole climax this evening by saying that he was prepared to support this legislation, I had to rise and congratulate him on his loyalty to his party rather than to his electors. What are the good farmers of his riding whom he has been willing to sacrifice on account of his loyalty to his party, going to think when the rates go up?—because when you restrict the shipping the rates will go up. The hon. member is apparently prepared to take that chance; I do not know whether he has many chances to take or can afford to take many of them, but that will be discovered later. There is only one thing lacking to make this scene complete and that is for the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) to rise and speak likewise. These two hon. gentlemen are, I think, the most loyal supporters that the government have in the house; in season and out, on every question conceivable, they have always stood up faithfully for their side. A measure of pride may be taken in such an attitude. When they go as far as that, putting their heads in a noose and sacrificing the interests of their constituents, they are overdoing a good thing, as I believe they are in this instance. I think I see the hon. member for Rosetown going up and down the highways and byways of his constituency trying to explain what a delightful thing it is to have a monopoly of shipping on the great lakes.

Mr. LOUCKS: It will be an easy matter for me to explain.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If he chooses to take that attitude, I have been in the house for some years and in the west for longer and my hon. friend is the first farmer to get up and brazenly and openly advocate what the government is going to do to-night. This is a government of agricultural folly. I do not think, since they came into office, there is anything under heaven they have missed making a fool of, especially as affecting agriculture. If there is a chance to give agriculture a knock behind the ears or in any other fatal spot, they get after it with a club. One more coddling of the big fellow, and one more swatting of the little fellow—that is what it is. This is not a new question, Mr. Speaker. It was before the house many times when the Liberals were in power. The Minister of Marine in this government had it up last year in a somewhat halting, hesitating fashion. I do not think he knew what it was all about himself. It might have been some story of Adam and Eve for all he knew. He did not seem to possess any knowledge of it, and at last he rather reluctantly retired from the scene of action with his bill and left it till to-day to bring it up again.

I wonder if this is one more source for replenishing the war chest. I am wondering, in my innocence, what all these trusts mean, and how much there is in it for the boys. Does the hon. member for Rosetown figure he can take a chance on losing a few votes, by reason of what he will acquire by having access to a plenteous war chest?

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I submit that it is not within the right of any hon. member to suggest that another hon. member is expecting to overcome a possible loss of votes by his access to a war chest. I submit that it is not competent for any hon. member to suggest any such thing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think it is out of order at all, Mr. Speaker, but I will be quite accommodating and—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Sullivan): I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will apply the same remarks to the sugar trust, which is in exactly the same category, and then, to save time, withdraw for both.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. SPOTTON: Getting old enough to know better.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Although, Mr. Speaker, if I cared to enter into an argument I do not think I was out of order. I suppose I cannot say anything about cream separators or barbed wire or anything of that nature.

I should like to say a word about the attitude of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). There is another loyal old scout. There is one thing I do like about him. No matter how hopeless the debate may be for the government, the hon. member for Marquette always nicks in, and when you would naturally expect all the government supporters to hide their faces behind the curtains the hon. member for Marquette always shoots up in the government's defence. But there was one night last week when he did not. I thought he was about to expire. He did not even clap his hands or endorse the government's policy on that occasion by any vocal noise he was capable of making. He simply sat silent. I forget just what the occasion was but I think it was the salary grab for the chairman of the tariff board. There were so many events last week that I could scarcely distinguish them, but at any rate one was almost too much for the hon. member for Marquette to swallow. I suppose other hon. gentlemen sitting opposite have swallowed so many, so much, that their larynxes have become so distended that they are capable of taking down almost anything without a wink; and so with this bill. I think we shall have to be forgiving towards them. I did not think that you would ever find a full-fledged protectionist from western Canada on either side of the house who would support this shipping bill, but here are members from the west sitting opposite supporting protection in its most vicious form. I wonder what the hon. member for Rosetown's predecessor would have said. Just think of what those votes at some elections mean! The gentleman who preceded the hon. member for Rosetown, Mr. John Evans, was one of the extreme low tariff or indeed absolute free trade men in this house.

Mr. STEVENS: And he was left at home.

Mr. LOUCKS: He pretty nearly lost his deposit over what he said in the last campaign.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Here is his successor taking absolutely the opposite side. It will be interesting to look forward to the next representative for Rosetown.

Mr. LOUCKS: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not see why there should be occasion for calling me to order so frequently.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Sullivan): What is the point of order?

Mr. LOUCKS: I was taking a little exception to some of the things the hon. member for Melville said, and I want to inform him—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Sullivan): That is not a point of order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I conclude with one more remark, and I expect that that will be out of order also: "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise."

Mr. V. C. PORTEOUS (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, this bill opens up the whole subject of transportation. Many hon. members have referred to steamships as if they were the only means of transportation, but surely they must realize that in times past different governments in this country have frequently given bonuses for the development of transportation facilities so that freight carrying charges might be reduced. We have in times past built docks, done very considerable dredging, and spent a tremendous amount of money on aids to navigation for the sole purpose of eliminating some of the costs of transportation for the benefit of the producer of the commodities transported. The benefit goes back to the farmer and the producer of the products of the forest and of the mine. I have sometimes thought that the assistance given to navigation facilities was not warranted because it meant competition for our railways. In the past large sums of money have been granted to the railways with a view to bringing about cheaper transportation rates, but much more public money has been expended on water transportation than rail transportation. I have sometimes wondered if the large expenditures that have been made on the Welland canal, for instance, did not warrant tolls being charged on the ships passing through, but I realize that that would add to the transportation costs. Many hon. members have presented that phase of the situation in the debate on this bill. They must realize, however, that these vast amounts of public money have been spent in order to lower transportation costs and thereby allow a profit to the producer of the commodities which are shipped.

It is also true that an enormous amount of private money has been invested in shipping facilities such as boats, elevators, and so forth. I wonder if the farmer from western Canada realizes that if it were not for that large amount of private money invested he would be in a much worse position than he is in today. If Canadian capital had not been invested in this country. American shipping would have taken the business and would have tended to create a monopoly; and so I say that the investment of Canadian capital in transportation facilities has increased competition and in that way kept down freight rates. It is also true that numbers of men in eastern Canada are employed on our ships and on harbour work, aids to navigation, and so forth. I do not think that the western farmer will stand in his place and begrudge the sailor or navigator his honest means of livelihood. When we accuse Canadian shipping interests of entering into a monopoly we must remember that we might be faced with a similar monopoly in a foreign country. I do not think any hon. member in the chamber would say that he would trust American interests more than Canadian interests. Therefore I think it wise that these amendments to the shipping act should be passed. If there is a combine we have our Combines Investigation Act with which to effect a remedy, but I do not see how there could possibly be a combine in connection with transportation facilities of this country. Not only have we our own Canadian steamships, operated by many different companies seeking to get business through a competitive system, but we have competition from the railway companies. We have shipping carried through the Panama canal; we have the Hudson Bay route, to which reference has been made. Apart from that, as hon. members have said, the man who has a commodity to sell will find the cheapest channel through which it may pass to reach its port of destination.

If this bill becomes law there will be competition with American ports for a great part of our wheat which is not shipped to the United Kingdom. I do not wish to comment at length, but in my view it is high time that a bill of this kind was put through in order to give our Canadian shippers and those employed in lake shipping an opportunity equal to that enjoyed in the United States. Hon. members will realize that at no time has the United States allowed coastal trade from one American port to another American port by Canadian ships. Why should we not take the same step. I am perfectly convinced that there is sufficient competition to keep down transportation costs. Were I not so convinced I should be inclined to oppose the measure. But, as I have said, transportation is not limited to Canadian steamships. The railways are in competition. It is not limited only to great lakes ports; there is competition from the ports in the far west and those of the Hudson bay. Further than that, Canadian shipping is in competition with American ports for that portion of the wheat which may be shipped to points outside the United Kingdom.

On the grounds I have stated I have no hesitation in supporting the bill. I am convinced that it will be in the best interests of all concerned, and that it should be passed without delay.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate I shall not speak at length, as I have only a few observations to make. First, I should like to answer the objection raised by the hon. members for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly), Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) to the effect that this bill should not have been introduced at the last minute of the session. That was the expression used by the hon. member for Willow Bunch. Is it necessary to repeat what I said earlier in the debate. These amendments have been before the Senate for over two months; they were embodied in the complete revision of the shipping act. These particular amendments now before us were discussed before the banking and commerce committee of the Senate. Surely the hon. members in this house are familiar with these amendments and their purport.

The second objection of my hon. friends is that the measure should not have originated in the upper house. Why? My answer to that is that hon. members who have read the proceedings of the Senate in regard to this bill, and more particularly the inquiry before the Senate committee, will have to admit that wonderful work was done. Every phase of the matter was thoroughly studied and this work done by the Senate is of considerable assistance to this house. When the hon. member for Willow Bunch suggests that the measure was brought in at this late hour of the session, because we were afraid of the opposition and that we anticipated no objection, on account of the fact that the opposition is tired, I say he is greatly mistaken. This government is not afraid to bring any measure before the house at any time in the session, because this government would submit to this house only measures of public interest and on all such occasions hon. members opposite will have full opportunity for discussion. If this measure was brought down late in the session it is due to the well known fact that the complete revision of the shipping act was abandoned only a few days ago in the Senate. This remedial measure was introduced at this session because its urgency had been clearly demonstrated to the Senate. I think hon. members opposite will admit that they have had ample time for the discussion of this proposed legislation. Many of them have addressed the house. Some have thrown some light on the subject; others have not. As a whole however we had a fair discussion of the bill and I do not think it is fair to criticize on this point.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly all that was said on this measure, nobody denies that Canadian ship owners, Canadian shipbuilders, Canadian elevator owners and Canadian mariners are entitled to fair protection from the administration. They are important groups of citizens, and it is the feeling of this government that they are entitled to fair protection. That being so, and since the American law prohibits the shipping of goods from an American port to another American port either directly or indirectly in a Canadian bottom, it is only fair that our Canadians should receive the same protection. Unless very serious grounds can be urged against it, I submit it is the duty of this government to accord such protection.

The main objection to the bill on the part of my hon. friends opposite is that it will increase freight rates on the great lakes. But my hon. friends did not bring any reasonable proof of their contention in that regard. I do not know on what they rely. In the testimony of those called before the Senate committee to oppose the bill there is nothing that would justify the contention that rates would be increased as a result of this legislation. Some of my hon. friends say: You are asking the farmers to pay more. My hon. friend from Willow Bunch made that statement. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) said: You have no right to take one cent more per bushel from the farmers to help the Canadian ship owners. Where do you find any proof of anything of the kind before the Senate committee? Mr. Bredt is practically the only one, apart from Mr. Smith, who was heard in opposition to the proposed legislation, and he could not affirm, as was done in this house by our friends opposite, that the effect of this bill would be to increase the rates. Mr. Bredt was very frank; he was representing the Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba pool organizations. At page 46 he said:

> It is very difficult, of course, to state definitely that it would mean an increase in rates.

You have there the statement of a man who had some responsibility and wanted to be on the safe side. He said he could not affirm positively that it would mean an increase in rate. He repeated the same thing two or three times. At page 51 Mr. Ballantyne put this question to Mr. Bredt:

Mr. Bredt, if this act went through do you claim it would increase freight rates?
A. There is the danger as we see it. We may be wrong.

Did any member opposite in this house say to-day: "We may be wrong"?

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Bredt is opposed to the bill, nevertheless.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That makes it all the stronger.

Mr. DURANLEAU: At page 55 Mr. Meighen asked Mr. Bredt:

Before you get to that point, Mr. Enderby says that that very same competition which resulted in reducing the rates would exist just the same after the passing of this legislation as before. I cannot see why it would not. What do you say to that?
Mr. Bredt: Frankly, we are afraid that that would not be so.

There was a fair statement by a man sent by the western growers to oppose the bill. In view of the proof given before the committee by many people from the west who know the business, who proved positively that there would be no increase in the rates, I say that in the position they take my hon. friends have not a leg to stand on.

I think it was the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) who asked this government if we had considered the injurious effect of this legislation upon the port of Montreal. He did not, I believe, definitely so state, but that was the effect of his question. The hon. member for Willow Bunch said he was sure this bill would be detrimental to the port of Montreal. Well, Mr. Speaker, those were only assertions, without proof. I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friends to the memorandum which was filed with the committee of the Senate by Mr. Campbell, representing the Toronto Elevators, Limited, Sarnia Elevator Company, Limited, Midland Simcoe Elevator Company, Limited, The Great Lakes Elevator Company, Limited, Collingwood Terminals, Limited, and Goderich Elevator and Transit Company, Limited. What was the memorandum of those organizations on this question? The main proposition put forward by these companies is as follows:

1. The proposed provisions will have the effect of diverting a larger volume of grain through an all-Canadian grain route which has been established by the expenditure of large sums of money by the government of Canada and private interests.

This is the opinion of a large number of citizens interested in these elevators, that instead of injuring the port of Montreal or our Canadian ports it will direct a larger volume of business through them. The same memorandum—I am giving only the headings—says:

2. The proposed amendment will eliminate the existing unfair competition from American vessels.

Is it true or is it not that our Canadian shipping is suffering unfair competition from American bottoms? If it is true, is it not our duty to give some protection to our own people? Then the memorandum goes on:

3. The transportation and handling of Canadian grain is principally dependent on Canadian vessels and elevators both rendering public service entitled to the support and assistance usually afforded public services.

Then:

4. These provisions will have the effect which was intended by previous legislation, the language of which was insufficient to effect its intent.

To-day our law protects Canadian ship owners from direct shipping from one Canadian port to another by United States vessels, and we are asking now that they be protected against indirect shipping in the same way.

This afternoon I heard some hon. gentleman refer to labour. I remember that two years ago I received a delegation composed of sailors and others citizens who came here to urge the adoption of this very legislation. They represented to me that very often during the navigation season they had many empty and idle Canadian ships in their ports while the sailors were walking about watching United States ships passing in front of the ports, manned by United States sailors but loaded with Canadian grain which had been taken on at a Canadian port and was to be delivered in another Canadian port. I think it was proved very clearly, as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Simpson) stated this afternoon, that a great many Canadian sailors are actually idle and unemployed and a great many Canadian ships are anchored in our ports while many Canadian elevators are capable of handling much larger quantities of wheat than they are getting to-day. If this is all true, I do not see why we should not give our Canadian sailors and ship owners an opportunity to get larger business.

I am greatly indebted to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) for the generous support he has given me in this instance, because I frankly admit that I am not an expert in these matters. My colleague stated very clearly that if we had thought for a moment that this legislation would injure the grain growers of the west in any shape or form it would not have been brought before the house. It is because we are convinced that the farmers of the west are fully protected that we believe this protection should be given the other classes in our community.

My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) said he approved of the principle of this bill in so far as it affords protection to Canadian ships, but that he could not vote for it because it would protect British ships as well as Canadian ships. I want to tell my hon. friend that the competition with which Canadian ships are faced at the present time, and which they have faced for several years, does not come from British ships or from vessels belonging to nations to which we accord most favoured treatment. British ships, as a rule, do not cross the ocean to compete with our Canadian bottoms. That competition comes from other sources. and I think we are protecting Canadian ship owners and the people of Canada as a whole against those who would injure our best interests. I hope that my hon. friends will permit the second reading of this bill so that we may get into committee as soon as possible.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I did not hear all my hon. friend's remarks, and before he takes his seat I should like to ask if he made any explanation with regard to the powers that are to be delegated by the minister to some of his officials.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend will wait until we are in committee I shall give all the information required.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Duranleau) which was agreed to on the following division:

[Mr. Stevens.]

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): I was paired with the hon. minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee, Mr. Gott in the chair.

On section 1—May delegate duties by way of confirmed by-law.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Before this clause is disposed of I think we should have some explanation from the minister. If I asked some questions before the second reading it was due to the fact that I was not sure that the way this clause stands at the present time will meet the requirements of the pilotage authorities of the district of Montreal. I think representations have been made to the minister and the officials of the department with reference to the powers to be given to the officers of the department, the deputy minister and other officials when the minister happens to be absent. These representations have endeavoured to point out what may happen should this section stand as at present. The explanatory note reads:

> The object of these provisions, which are new, is to avoid the necessity of the actual attendance of the minister as pilotage authority, possibly at Halifax or Vancouver, in certain cases and to attach the powers of the authority to the department rather than to the persona of the minister.

According to the explanatory note, this section is to cover only the ports of Halifax and Vancouver. I think it would be better, rather than conferring the present extensive authority upon the officials of the minister's department, to insert in the bill a provision that this would obtain only in cases concerning these two ports, so that there would be no ambiguity about the matter. I was told also there were conferences with some of the officials of the department regarding certain improvements that might be made to this clause along the lines suggested to the minister. The clause the way it stands was one of the principal reasons I voted against the bill, but on the other hand, other clauses may contain paragraphs which might have induced me to support this legislation. This clause as it is now is not acceptable to certain interests and I think there are members on the other side who hold the same views as I do. I would ask the minister to give whatever explanations may be necessary in connection with this measure, and to indicate in what respect, if any, I am wrong.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am sorry my hon. friend was not in the house when I moved the second reading of the bill, because then I said very clearly that this clause would be deleted and replaced by another one which reads as follows:

3. Whenever the minister is appointed as pilotage authority for any district, his successors in office or any acting minister or, in the absence of the minister, his lawful deputy, shall be the pilotage authority, and any such pilotage authority may by by-law confirmed by the governor in council, authorize the superintendent of pilots in the district to exercise any of his functions. Moreover, such pilotage authority may, for such time or such purpose as he may decide, authorize any person to exercise any particular function or power vested in the pilotage authority by this act or any by-law made hereunder.

This amendment was asked by the pilots and I think, under the circumstances, it is a fair amendment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I wanted to be sure.

Mr. STEVENS: I move that amendment.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I read over carefully the amendment that the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) has just submitted to the house. As the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) stated a few moments ago, I think that it should be stipulated in the proposed amendment that this clause does not apply to the pilotage authority in the Montreal and Quebec districts. The reason for this is that there are two sections in the Merchant Marine Act, of which one, No. 395, is as follows:

The minister shall be the pilotage authority of the pilotage district of Quebec, and all the powers vested in the harbour commissioners of Quebec, previously to the twentieth day of July in the year one thousand nine hundred and five, as such pilotage shall continue to be vested in the minister.

Previously, the pilotage authority in the Quebec district was entrusted to the harbour commissions. Later it was entrusted to the Minister of Marine on condition that the pilotage authority remained in the hands of the minister. The same conditions prevail in the Montreal district; section 397 of the Merchant Marine Act is as follows:

The minister shall be the pilotage authority of the pilotage district of Montreal, and all powers vested in the Montreal harbour commissioners, previously to the twenty-fourth day of October of the year one thousand nine hundred and three, shall continue to be vested in the minister.

If the authority which was previously entrusted to the minister by these two sections is delegated to the Deputy Minister of Marine or else to the superintendent of pilotage, the same thing which happened last year will occur once more. One of the Marine department officials, thinking that the pilotage authority had been vested in him, suspended six or seven pilots of Quebec. Pursuant to the amendment moved, the provisions of sections 395 and 397, which heretofore protected the Quebec and Montreal pilots would disappear. As the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay pointed out, if this amendment has only affected the Halifax and Vancouver pilots, why not state so.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Quite so. Those are my views.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I submit, sir, that these amendments are introduced with a special and indirect purpose, that of embodying all pilots; under the pretext of amending section 414, it is proposed to amend the two sections 395 and 397. However, it goes further. If one reads section 391, we find the following definition:

(i) pilotage authority means any persons authorized to appoint or license pilots or to fix or alter rates of pilotage, or to exercise any jurisdiction in respect of pilotage.

Therefore, the superintendent of pilots or any official of the marine department, may, in the absence of the minister, license or suspend pilots, alter the pilotage rates or exercise any particular function or power over the pilots and pilotage.

I submit, sir, that the Minister of Marine is deprived of the powers vested in him by the act or his authority is diminished. Extraordinary powers are vested in persons in no way responsible to the house or people. At any time, we may be faced with orders in council appointing authorities who will take decisions over a whole district, when, by virtue of the act and the history of pilotage, pilots had acquired rights. When the Quebec pilots accepted the Minister of Marine as pilotage authority, they gave up certain rights which they, previously, possessed. Why? Simply because they were guaranteed that the pilotage authority would be the Minister of Marine and not a superintendent whatsoever.

If the Minister of Marine simply wishes to affect, by his amendment, the pilotage at Halifax and Vancouver, let him state so in this clause. However, if the intention is to change the pilotage authority in the Quebec and Montreal districts, let him state so, as I wish to be apprised of it.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): The hon. member is quite right, I agree with him.

Mr. DORION (Translation): It is most important. I submit that this amendment has an indirect purpose and is introduced with the set idea of wiping out the advantages which sections 395 and 397 conferred. I am therefore opposed to the amendment introduced by the hon. Minister of Marine.

I also wonder why only a paragraph of part VI of the act is amended. No other clause of the same part is changed. One particular clause, a small and hardly noticeable one, is altered in part V of the act, however, tomorrow one will discover that Mr. so and so, an official of the marine department has been handed over the pilotage authority in the Quebec and Montreal districts. I would be inclined to move an amendment or subamendment. I would request the hon. Minister of Marine to state, at least, that sections 395 and 397 will have their full effect as in the past.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to put a question? The minister himself cannot see to everything. In his absence, is it not possible for the deputy minister to exercise the duties delegated to him? I think that the deputy ministers in the various departments have greater powers conferred on them than these.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Let me refer to what I stated just now. The pilot unions of Quebec and Montreal were, in the past, under the authority of the Quebec and Montreal harbours, respectively. They had quite extensive rights, and one of the main reasons which made them sacrifice their rights, was because they were guaranteed, at the time, that the Minister of Marine alone would have pilotage authority. The act states: "Pilotage authority" signifies all persons authorized to appoint or license pilots. There is nothing else mentioned, to license pilots, appoint pilots and fix or alter pilotage rates or exercise any particular function or power over pilotage. These are the powers which it is intended to vest in the deputy minister or head of a department. I submit that such powers should remain in the hands of the minister.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): As the bill reads, the person who has authority can delegate it, under certain circumstances.

Mr. DORION (Translation): That is exactly to what we are opposed, namely, that the Minister of Marine should delegate his authority to fix rates and license new pilots.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Is the deputy minister not as conversant as the minister in regard to pilots?

Mr. DORION (Translation): I do not think so. It is a right granted to pilots. They accepted the Minister of Marine as pilotage authority, on condition that it be the minister himself and not another official of his department. In sections 395 and 397, it was specially stated:

> The minister shall be the pilotage authority of the pilotage district of Quebec.

Further it is stated:

> The minister shall be the pilotage authority of the pilotage district of Montreal.

Those who prepared this act intended to vest the pilotage authority in the minister only.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Is it not a fact that in all departments the deputy minister carries out the duties which are delegated by the minister.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): At present, there is no deputy minister in the Marine department.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Why is not one appointed?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The deputy minister receives his instructions from the minister and is responsible to him. In an urgent case when action is required, the deputy minister is in charge of the administration and he must act.

Mr. BURY: May I ask what is the effect of the amendment that has been moved? I cannot see any practical difference between the amendment as proposed and the amendment as it appears in the bill. Is there any real difference?

Mr. STEVENS: In the absence of the minister the deputy acts.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to very strongly oppose the proposed amendment; in fact, I admit that in the absence of the minister, it is important at times, under urgent circumstances to have in the department an official authorized to take immediate action. I simply wish to inquire from the hon. minister whether he intends to adopt a similar amendment in connection with section 397 which refers to Montreal. I frankly confess that I am not an expert in the matter, however, I wonder why special provisions are made in so far as the Quebec district is concerned, when no change is contemplated for the Montreal district. Why should the hon. minister be replaced by an official for the Quebec district, while he keeps for himself all the authority and prerogatives in connection with the Montreal district?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): There is nothing in the amendment to that effect.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): If a special amendment is sought for the Quebec district and if the Merchant Marine Act, in so far as the Montreal district is concerned, remains unchanged, I submit that this constitutes a contradiction devoid of sense.

Mr. RALSTON: I would point out what seems to be a real difference. The first change is to insert the words, "in the absence of the minister." The other is that by the last clause of this proposed amendment the power of delegation of the pilotage authority can be given effect to without the approval of the governor in council. Under the bill as originally introduced into this house it required the approval of the governor in council both for the authorization of the superintendent of pilots to exercise any of the pilotage authority functions, and for the special authorization in connection with any particular power. Under the proposed amendment the pilotage authority, which may be the minister, the deputy minister, or the acting minister, or the superintendent of pilots, may authorize any one of his functions to be performed for such time or such purpose as he may decide without the deterrent of having that authorization given the approval of the governor in council. Is that not a distinct difference?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think, Mr. Chairman, that it must be done by by-law approved by the governor in council.

Mr. RALSTON: Not according to the amendment now before us.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Better to leave things as they are.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendment reads:

> Whenever the minister is appointed as pilotage authority for any district, his successors in office or any acting minister or, in the absence of the minister, his lawful deputy, shall be the pilotage authority, and any such pilotage authority may by by-law confirmed by the governor in council, authorize the superintendent of pilots in the district to exercise any of his functions.

Mr. RALSTON: Then follows the clause to which I referred.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It continues:

> Moreover, such pilotage authority may, for such time or such purpose as he may decide, authorize any person to exercise any particular function or power vested in the pilotage authority by this act or any by-law made hereunder.

I think everything should be done by by-law ratified by order in council.

Mr. RALSTON: But not as it reads. My point is that the pilotage authority may authorize the exercise by any person of any of his powers under this act without the sanction of any by-law and without the approval of the governor in council, as the last clause now reads. In the original amendment the approval of the governor in council is made a condition precedent both to the appointment of a superintendent of pilots to exercise the powers of the pilotage authority, and to authorizing the delegation by the pilotage authority to anyone else of his functions in any particular case. But in the amendment now before us the approval of the governor in council is not necessary. The pilotage authority may delegate his power without reference to the governor in council or without any by-law, for such time or such purpose as he may decide.

Mr. CARDIN: The last clause referred to a particular function.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This amendment was suggested by the pilots themselves after consultation with the Department of Justice, but if my hon. friends think there is a doubt as to the meaning of the amendment I have no objection to adding a word or two to make it clear. We might delete the words between the word "functions" in the eighth line of the typewritten amendment and the word "for" in the next line, and insert after the word "functions" the word "and".

Mr. BURY: Is there any other difference in the amendment except that the absence of the minister is a condition required before his deputy can exercise his powers? If, not why not simplify it by adding after the words "his stead and" on the twelfth line the words "in his absence." The section appears to me to be admirably drafted.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Objection was taken as to the wording of certain parts of the draft. The words "without more," for instance, were objected to by someone yesterday.

Mr. BURY: That is all right; the words "without more" are necessary; the authority goes without anything further than the act itself.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I put a question, just now, to the hon. minister. I wish to know whether sections 395 and 397 will have the same effect as they had previously, when this amendment is adopted?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the section which we intend to amend does not only affect the pilotage of Quebec, Montreal, Halifax and Vancouver, it affects all pilots who come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine, so that there will be no discrimination between pilots of Quebec and Montreal or other parts of Canada. May I add that the amendment such as proposed, after the changes suggested by my hon. friend are made, meet all the needs of the situation; it is perfectly clear and I submit it should be accepted.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister spoke about pilots having been consulted concerning this amendment. Does he mean pilots of Quebec and Montreal? Have the pilots of Halifax and Vancouver been consulted?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The pilots generally.

Mr. RALSTON: Representatives of pilots generally.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I believe I have not understood my hon. friend correctly. I do not believe the pilots of Halifax and Vancouver were consulted. This amendment was asked for by officials of the department. Pilots of Montreal I understand objected to the wording of the amendment, and suggested the substitution of the amendment which was just proposed.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it the amendment is suggested because of the fact that in some cases it is found necessary for the pilotage authority actually to be in attendance at the port. Would the minister tell me what those cases would be?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Let us consider subsection (j) of the general powers of pilotage authorities contained in section 415 of the act:

(j) provide for the compulsory retirement of licensed pilots who have not attained the age of sixty-five years, proved on oath before the pilotage authority to be incapacitated by mental or bodily infirmity or by habits of drunkenness.

If proof has to be taken in Halifax and Vancouver, under the law as it stands to-day the minister would have to go there to take such evidence.

Mr. RALSTON: Or they would have to come here?

[Mr. Bury.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, or they would have to come here. Therefore we want to delegate the power to someone else so that such person could take the oath.

Mr. RALSTON: Why not let Mahomet come to the mountain?

Mr. STEVENS: It may cost a lot of money.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think the amendment means much, because it is effective only in the absence of the minister. And as stated a moment ago by the hon. member for St. Henri surely the deputy minister must have some authority in the department. There are other duties performed by the deputy minister in the absence of the minister.

Mr. CARDIN: And more important duties.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The minister is always head of the department, and on his return he could make a change in the decision made by the deputy minister.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): It is only a delegation of power in some special instances.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have received a telegram from the Pilot Association of Quebec strongly protesting against this amendment being enacted. As I stated at the outset of my remarks, when the explanatory note states that the amendment only affects the pilots of Halifax and Vancouver, it is clear that this was intended to deceive us. It is as follows:

These provisions which are new, is to avoid the necessity of actual attendance of the minister as pilotage authority, possibly at Halifax or Vancouver . . .

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It is because they are the most remote points.

Mr. DORION (Translation): In truth, it looks as if the amendment was aimed at the Quebec and Montreal pilots. However, sections 395 and 397 remain in the Act, thereby liable to stir trouble. In the future, if the Quebec pilots refuse to conform themselves to an order received from the pilotage authority, they may base their contentions on section 395 which stipulates that they are still under the authority of the Minister of Marine Who will decide whether section 395 or section 414, as amended, should apply? I submit that there is ambiguity and had the intention been to only include the pilots of Halifax and Vancouver, it should be so stipulated in the amendment.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The cities of Halifax and Vancouver were mentioned because they were extreme points which the minister could not reach. In such instances he would delegate his power.

Mr. DORION (Translation): It is stated "possibly."

Mr. CARDIN (Translation): The amendment applies to the sections you have just quoted, because it is stipulated that when the minister is appointed as pilotage authority, his powers may be delegated. That applies to your case.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) may think, from the legal aspect, section 395 still will provide that the minister constitutes the pilotage authority.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The minister or his deputy.

Mr. RALSTON: My concern is this: While apparently the amendment is for the benefit of the harbours of Quebec and Montreal, they really do not need the amendment because the minister could attend at those points. It seems to me that in effect the amendment will apply only to the points far away. If there is any benefit in having the act as it was before, with the minister acting as pilotage authority, it does not seem to me that those points should be deprived of a benefit simply because other points happened to be nearer. I am in accord with the idea of delegating authority to a certain extent in special cases. But this amendment goes much further by way of delegation than is usually the case. As a rule the term "minister" includes an acting minister. The present amendment, however, goes further and provides for the "deputy minister," and then there is further provision "in the absence of the minister." As a matter of fact there is usually an acting minister, if the minister is absent any length of time. It seems to me that that should cover the case, rather than have a further delegation not only to the deputy but to someone else altogether, namely the superintendent of pilots. Then from the superintendent of pilots it goes to someone else. I submit this is delegation with a vengeance.

Mr. STEVENS: Everything is done by by-law.

Mr. RALSTON: I am showing that the delegation is not done by by-law. The delegation is done simply by someone writing a letter. In any other function of the minister you do not have the minister delegating his power; the acting minister always has power. Sometimes the deputy minister has power, but you do not have a further delegation to the superintendent of pilots, then to some other official, and then from him to somebody else. It seems to me we are making the section more involved than is necessary. As pilots from outside points have not been consulted, there may be some objections. I do not know whether or not there could be, but if there was any benefit in having the act as it stood before and as it has been for many years, why change it just at this time, and have all these powers of delegation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. member has stated that the proposed amendment may be useful in outside districts such as Halifax and Vancouver, but that perhaps it may not be necessary at other points because the minister could go to Quebec and perform his pilotage duties. However if there were an inquiry held even at Quebec I should hesitate to go myself. In some circumstances I believe it would be proper to delegate powers to hold an inquiry even in Quebec, instead of forcing the minister to leave his office for that purpose.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister tell me how many pilotage districts there are in Nova Scotia? Sheet Harbour used to be a pilotage district, but I do not know whether it is now or not.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are two, Halifax and Sydney.

Mr. RALSTON: Under the minister.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I still maintain my contentions in connection with the amendment proposed. Last year, an official of the department, Captain Robertson, on his own responsibility, suspended seven pilots. A number of pilots having refused to undertake some special service, those who had made the request immediately communicated with Ottawa. At the time, the hon. Minister of Marine was absent What happened? Captain Robertson, on his own authority, suspended six or seven pilots, by telegram. These Quebec pilots were suspended because they had refused to undertake some special service, notwithstanding the fact that such pilotage authority was not vested in the superintendent. Not only he had not that authority but he was unaware of the provisions of a contract between the shipping federation and the Quebec Pilots' Union. If that authority is vested in the superintendent, the same thing will happen as last year, he will suspend without any cause these pilots. I again contend that the authority to appoint pilots and fix pilotage rates should not be vested in officials of the department, but that this authority should be left with the minister or, perhaps, the deputy minister and no other official.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Could the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) inform the house as to what happened to these seven pilots? I understand they were suspended in virtue of the authority delegated by the minister?

Mr. DORION (Translation): No, they were not suspended under authority delegated by the minister. Fortunately, the minister after examining the facts of the case, gave instructions that these pilots be reinstated. Nevertheless, the superintendent of pilots was under the impression, when the suspensions took place, that he was the pilotage authority. That is exactly why this amendment to the act is moved this evening, it is to avoid a similar occurrence in the future. After a pilot is dismissed or suspended by an official of the Department of Marine, what recourse will we have, if this amendment is adopted? The minister will then reply that the pilotage authority had made such and such a decision, I am helpless.

I contend that such powers should be vested in the minister or deputy minister only.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The minister may delegate such powers and appoint a competent official. Pilots who do not wish to carry out special duties, will be suspended, and this will only be fair and just.

Mr. NEILL: I have heard the amendment read once, but I have not heard the amendment as amended. Would you mind reading it now as amended, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gott): It now reads as follows:

> Whenever the minister is appointed as pilotage authority for any district, his successors in office or any acting minister or, in the absence of the minister, his lawful deputy, shall be the pilotage authority, and any such pilotage authority may by by-law confirmed by the governor in council, authorize the superintendent of pilots in the district to exercise any of his functions, and for such time or such purpose as he may decide, authorize any person to exercise any particular function or power vested in the pilotage authority by this act or any by-law made hereunder.

Mr. NEILL: Is the authority to be granted to the original minister's deputy or the second minister's deputy?

Mr. DURANLEAU: His lawful deputy.

Mr. NEILL: Both ministers have lawful deputies. I want to know which deputy is referred to.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is the lawful deputy of the Minister of Marine.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no deputy minister of marine.

Mr. NEILL: The deputy of the present minister. A good many of these references will apply to the port of Vancouver. May I ask the minister if any request has been made for this legislation from any of the pilotage boards of British Columbia?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, we have had no such requests. It is purely an administrative amendment.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister any reason to believe that this legislation will be acceptable?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Oh, surely.

Mr. NEILL: We have not heard anything to that effect.

Mr. DURANLEAU: To the amendment as drafted I do not think there would be any objection.

Mr. NEILL: But the minister has no knowledge on the subject. The pilotage boards have not asked for it. How does the minister know that this legislation will be acceptable or workable to the pilotage boards of British Columbia?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This does not affect any pilotage board; it affects only the pilots. If there is any place where we need delegation of power it is a place three thousand miles from Ottawa. It is that I may delegate my authority to hold an inquiry in Vancouver, for instance, otherwise I would have to go there myself.

Mr. NEILL: The whole purpose of this amendment, then, is to authorize the minister to delegate his power?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Exactly.

Amendment agreed to.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, some of us who have been discussing the difficulties in regard to redistribution have made some progress to-day, and we would like to have to-morrow morning to meet and go further into these matters in an effort to arrive at a conclusion. If it is satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite I suggest that the house adjourn until three o'clock to-morrow, and I hope we shall be able to make some progress in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the Minister of Marine is a member of the committee that is conferring on the redistribution measure and he could not very well be in both places at the same time. If progress is being made in respect to redistribution I am sure it will be welcome news to all hon. members, and if the matter can be furthered by the house not sitting in the morning, I am sure we will all be agreeable to adjournment until three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move that the house adjourn until three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11 p.m.

Friday, May 19, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the fourth report of the select standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DISCOUNT AND LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. J. A. SULLIVAN (St. Ann) moved:

That pursuant to a special order made March 27 last, Bill No. 110 (Letter F1 of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to Incorporate the Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada," be now read a first and second time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved:

That Bill No. 110 (Letter F1 of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to Incorporate the Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada," be placed on the order paper under private bills for consideration in committee of the whole this day.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTING

On the notice of motion:

That on Saturday the 20th May, instant, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning. That in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission from one to three o'clock p.m., and that both the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Friday.—The Prime Minister.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): With the consent of the house I should like this notice of motion to stand until after eight o'clock.

Notice of motion stands.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): In the absence of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren), I have been asked to explain to the house the amendment made by the Senate. Hon. members will remember that this bill was very hurriedly reprinted and that in some cases reference to other boards had been omitted. Those omissions were corrected in the Senate. They are four in number, three of which refer to the original bill as presented to the committee over which I presided and the other is on account of an agreement between the Minister of Finance and the members of the British Empire Legion. The first amendment is on page 4 of the bill. While provision is here made that a quorum travelling in the country shall be comprised of two members of the board, there was no provision made for a quorum transacting ordinary routine business in Ottawa, and the result therefore would have been that under ordinary circumstances the quorum would have consisted of one-half of the whole body which, if it consisted of twelve members, would compel six of them to remain continuously in Ottawa to hear routine business. The Senate therefore moved to insert the following as subsection 4 of the new section 7:

(4) Except as herein otherwise expressly provided, for the purpose of exercising and performing the powers, authorities and functions vested in the commission, as distinct from a quorum thereof, under this act, the commission shall consist of two or more commissioners; and whenever under this act a quorum of the commission is referred to it shall mean a quorum as constituted under the provisions of section fifty-five of this act.

I think hon. members will understand that. It is simply to provide that for the transaction of ordinary routine business in Ottawa it will not be necessary to have more members present than are at present required under the board of pension commissioners; that is to say, two or more may decide any ordinary routine matter. This does not interfere at all with section fifty-five which provides for a quorum in the field. That is distinctly and positively provided for.

The next amendment is on page 6 of the bill, amending the clause providing for the payment of a pension to those members who have previously to this time served on the commission or the court. It is proposed to insert in 10B (1) after the word "bodies" in line twenty-two the words "or as a member of the board of pension commissioners for Canada or of the pension tribunal." That is to say, the act will provide for service on either of these bodies being counted in the total service.

The next amendment is on page 13, and is a very simple one. It is with regard to the presentation of cases to the chief pensions advocate. The amendment is to insert after the word "before" in line ten on page 13 the words "the commission or." I think my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) will understand that. It simply means that the applicant has the power to appear before either the commission itself or a quorum thereof.

The next amendment is on page 18, amending clause 63 by adding after the words "reference" in line five the words "or submission." Our committee found that it was necessary to allow the applicant to submit a stated case to the court, not necessarily the file, and consequently the words "or submission" have been inserted.

The next amendment is on page 21, and this is the one which applies to the agreement entered into between the Minister of Finance and the representatives of the soldier organizations. It was never intended that the prospective pension of a dependent mother or father, or brother or sister, under section 33 of the act should be limited, and consequently the Senate have struck out in line eighteen on page 21 the words "or section thirty-three." Those words were evidently placed in there under a misapprehension, and I am sure the house will agree that this amendment is perfectly proper.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) (for the Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 78, to amend the Pension Act.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): The house will appreciate that it is a little difficult to follow the sections as my hon. friend has indicated the amendments rather quickly. The section I am most concerned with is the one that does not seem to fit in with the reprinted bill I have before me. I have the reprinted bill as amended and reported by the special committee. I realize that we are not in committee here, and that all I can do is to ask a question and have the explanation made again. Section 19 of the reprinted bill which I have here simply provides for the coming into force of the act.

Mr. ARTHURS: What page is that?

Mr. RALSTON: On page 21. I have just been handed another copy of the bill which I have no doubt is the same as my hon. friend has been using in indicating the amendments. My hon. friend referred to prospective pensions to dependent parents. Did he also say to widows?

Mr. ARTHURS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Clause thirty-three does not apply to widows.

Mr. ARTHURS: No. To mothers, fathers, brothers or sisters.

Mr. RALSTON: It is prospective pensions to dependent parents and brothers and sisters. They are now being left out of the clause which restricts their pension, and the amendment now is so that they will not be affected by this act or by the budget proposals which were originally made by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ARTHURS: Exactly. The wording of clause 33 was placed there under a misapprehension. It certainly was not the intention to interfere with them at all.

Mr. RALSTON: If I might ask another question with the permission of the house, have these amendments been seen and concurred in by the representatives of the veterans?

Mr. ARTHURS: Yes, in every case.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Minister of Justice) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house disagrees with their amendment to Bill No. 71, an act to amend the criminal code for the following reason:

Because the wording of the said amendment may be deemed to involve a principle which it may not be advisable to sanction in an act of parliament, and that the clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DUPRE: After this house had accepted section 3 of Bill No. 71, to amend the criminal code, the Senate deleted subsection

3 of section 3 which concerns an irrebuttable presumption. That was sent back to the Senate and the whole bill came back again to this house with subsection 3 reinserted and subsection 2 amended. Subsection 2 in the bill as it left this house reads:

Every person who, in the home of a child, participates in adultery, or in sexual immorality, or indulges in habitual drunkenness or any other form of vice, thereby endangering the morals of such child or rendering the home of such child an unfit place for such child to be in shall be guilty of an offence and liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year, or to both fine and imprisonment.

In order to cover the second case, namely that of a man and a woman living in adultery, where the children might be affected, the Senate added a proviso to subsection 2 which reads as follows:

Provided that this subsection shall not apply in the case of two persons who though in fact living in adultery are living apparently respectably as man and wife, and where the children affected are the children of such union.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is free love.

Mr. DUPRE: As this amendment or proviso might be considered as a sort of indirect consecration of adultery, we believe it would be advisable to have another drafting or another sort of amendment to subsection 2.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, May 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 1, subsection 681, appointment of inspectors of ships' tackle. Is the subsection agreed to?

Subsection 681 agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Are we now on section 2?

The CHAIRMAN: No, we are on subsection 681.

Mr. NEILL: We passed section 1 last night before we adjourned.

The CHAIRMAN: We passed the amendment to the first section.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The whole section.

The CHAIRMAN: We are taking it subsection by subsection. Subsection 681 of section 1 is carried. We are now on subsection 681a, "Regulations for the protection of workers against accidents while loading or unloading ships."

Subsection 681a agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Subsection 681b, "Powers of inspectors." Shall the subsection carry?

Subsection 681b agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Subsection 681c, "May order cessation of loading or unloading." Shall the subsection carry?

Subsection 681c agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Subsection 681d, "Meaning of tackle."

Mr. NEILL: I cannot hear. Are we on section 2? I want to speak to section 2. Probably if we had some order in the chamber we could hear.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall call it out when we come to it.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I understand we are discussing section (2). I admit the bill has been badly drawn, as I pointed out to the minister last night. These small, faintly printed letters in brackets are the real sections, and I say that section (2) begins at line twenty-four of the first page.

The CHAIRMAN: No. Section 2 is at page 5 line forty-three.

Mr. NEILL: I beg to differ. I agreed with the minister last night that section 1 had been passed. I now suggest that section (2) appears at line twenty-four. It is improperly marked in brackets, and should appear in black numbers.

The CHAIRMAN: I have the bill before me.

Mr. NEILL: So have I.

The CHAIRMAN: I repeat that section 2 is at page 5 line forty-three.

Mr. NEILL: No. Then, section 2 is in twice.

The CHAIRMAN: That is section 2 of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, section (2) is at page one, line twenty-four.

The CHAIRMAN: No, that is subsection 681 of section 1.

Mr. NEILL: I am not talking about subsection 681. I am talking about a paragraph beginning with the figure two in brackets, and it reads like this:

By repealing sections 674 and 681—

And so on.

The CHAIRMAN: That is a subsection of section 1 which has been passed.

Mr. NEILL: No, it is not a subsection of section 1; pardon me. The one to which I refer is a new section. The minister agreed with me last night. I wish to speak to the words beginning at line twenty-four of the first page.

Mr. STEVENS: I can understand what the hon. member wants and I believe he is entitled to speak. I will admit the bill is rather involved. Section 1 is divided into a large number of subsections, part of the numbering of which is incident to the main bill—that is, the old bill. Subsection (2) at line twenty-four of the first page is really the second paragraph of section 1. The chairman is right enough, but my hon. friend is also right in claiming the right to discuss this particular part of section 1. I believe the noise in the house made it impossible for the hon. member to hear.

Mr. NEILL: I ask the liberty of returning to subsection (2).

Mr. MANION: Go ahead and discuss it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, go ahead.

Mr. NEILL: I do not want to be thrown out. Wait until the chairman gives me permission.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot understand what the hon member means.

Mr. NEILL: If you will let me speak I will go on.

Mr. MANION: Go ahead.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to speak to what is now called subsection (2)—I shall call it anything, for the sake of peace. I am referring to that part of the bill beginning at line twenty-four.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no objection. I understood it was passed, but I have no objection.

Mr. STEVENS: The members could not hear the reading of the sections. I could not hear distinctly, and I am sure my hon. friend could not.

The CHAIRMAN: Last night I called section 1 (1)—3, (a), (b) and (2). Now I have called subsections 681, 681A, 681B, 681C and 681D. We are not proceeding regularly. We should proceed section by section, but we are taking the subsections as they are drafted in the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Then, Mr. Chairman I ask the opportunity to go back to subsection (2) beginning at line twenty-four.

[The Chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN: The sections I am now calling are under subsection (2) of clause 1.

Mr. MANION: Go ahead until you are stopped.

Mr. NEILL: So far as I could hear from this point in the chamber we might have been dealing with the redistribution bill. I have no intention of delaying the house when we should be home. This subsection deals with five sections in the original bill. They cover safety regulations. It was because these details were in the bill that I voted for it, although I was well aware that the primary object of the bill as the minister said was to institute a monopoly on the great lakes, objection to which has been voiced by hon. members to my left and right.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MANION: He did not say that.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) truly pointed out that while the provisions of this bill in relation to the great lakes come into effect the moment it is passed, the operation of the provisions relating to the safety regulations is postponed indefinitely. I also note with some apprehension that while there is provision for appointing inspectors there is no provision for paying them. That makes one wonder how remote the appointment of these men will be. On the second reading of the bill I did not, of course, criticize these regulations, but I criticized, and I think justly, the method in which this bill was introduced so late in the session, not being sent to a committee where it could be adequately discussed, and no chance allowed to get the views of the men concerned. The men in British Columbia do not even know that this bill has been introduced. For this the Minister of Trade and Commerce took me somewhat severely to task, in language that I think went somewhat beyond the range of parliamentary usage or the dignity that one expects from a cabinet minister—or that we used to expect from a cabinet minister. The minister, when he sat on this side of the house, built up a reputation for fair and logical debate. I must say that I think he rather lessens that reputation when he takes a position of political infallibility, that if anything he sets his signature upon is criticized from the opposite side, the wretched member must be doubly and trebly damned.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, I never said that.

Mr. NEILL: I do not think that is a desirable attitude. I suggest to the minister that he follow the attitude of his own leader who the other day said quite frankly when the opposition was putting forward some criticism,—I noted it particularly,—that the criticism put forward by the opposition had a good deal of point to it and was such as he himself would have made had he sat on the opposite side. The Minister of Finance, and also I think the Minister of Public Works, have not once, but several times stated in this house that they were quite ready to welcome criticism. The tolerant point of view, that it is just possible someone else may be sincere in holding a different view, makes for the amenities of public life and certainly facilitates the passage of legislation. Personally I absolutely decline to submit to such dictation; this house is still democratic, whatever the government may be, and I propose to maintain as well as I can the rights of the private members of parliament.

Turning to the minister in charge of this bill, the hon. Minister of Marine, I am glad to second the remark of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) last night that he always treats criticism with fairness and courtesy. These safety regulations are going to be put into effect, as we find by subsection 681A, by regulations made by the governor in council. I am sorry to see that. It is all to be done by regulation. Why is it not definitely included in the act? This is another instance of what we have seen done so often, our jurisdiction taken away and handed over to the minister, which often means not the minister but his deputy or officials, a bureaucracy which we cannot control. There are two functions of government, the legislative and the executive. We are continually handing over a little more and a little more of our legislative powers either to the cabinet or to some member or official thereof. We have had three glaring instances of that evil this present session. I will not take time to mention any but the last, that is in connection with radio. We gave the government or the radio commission power to make regulations, and I am perfectly certain, and I think every hon. gentleman must be of the same opinion, that if we had been passing those regulations in this house a lot of them would never have been passed in the language which we criticized and commented on a couple of days ago. Now we are doing the same thing here, putting power into the hands of a department to legislate. Not to carry out our decision, but we give them the power, by order in council and regulation, to legislate differently to what perhaps we would do! Why not put it in the act? Perhaps have a general clause giving a little leeway, but the main features should be in the act.

Then I notice that the regulations are to have regard to the following things, and there are one, two, three, four, five—really only four, because the last does not apply to safety—four matters on which they are going to make regulations. They are somewhat vague. As far as they go they are all right, but they do not go far enough. I want to put on record one or two other details that should engage the attention of the department in drawing up these regulations, in the hope that when they come to draw them up they will include them also, although I am a little doubtful as to their power to do so. I am quoting from a memorandum prepared by the Vancouver harbour commissioners some time in 1931. I am only going to quote a few paragraphs:

No block nor shackle shall be rigged directly over the head of a workman if it can possibly be avoided.

No man shall be required to work in holds with the hatches off whilst other work or loading or unloading is proceeding above them unless conditions are such as to preclude anything falling from an upper deck injuring those who are working below.

That is not referred to in the act, and I know a man who was killed a year ago by lack of that precaution.

All vessels loading or unloading shall have each hatch that is working tended by a competent hatch tender.

That is not in the bill.

When the vessel is either loading or unloading lumber—

And this is where I am interested.

—or any long loose material such as round pipes, steel rods, rails, etc., and only one sling is being used on each load, the sling shall be of sufficient length to permit a round turn on the load.

That is a very necessary thing.

In vessels loading a deckload of lumber, logs, piling or poles, the deck load shall be secured by hog lashings at a height of not more than six feet from the level of the deck and every four feet thereafter.

The next one has a similar bearing.

No man shall be permitted to work below walled timber, lumber—

That is piled up timber.

—logs, poles or piling unless such wall has been so secured as to preclude the wall or any part of it falling into the space in which the man is working.

Any vessel loading or unloading from or to booms, rafts or cribs shall supply a rowboat equipped with a lifebuoy and pike pole and have it attended by a competent person.

In many cases that is done voluntarily but it ought to be compulsory.

Men shall not be permitted to go into the holds of vessels after such holds have been fumigated until the holds have been certified in writing, by the officer responsible, to be clear of gas.

Those are all things that, as far as I can see, could not be covered by even the broad provisions of the bill. But they certainly should be there.

Another fault I have to find is that there has been omitted a clause often found in such bills which would go a long way to compensate for the absence of the things I have suggested. I have not got the legal language, but the lawyer members will understand what I mean. I am speaking of a clause something like this: Without restricting the generality of the above section attention is directed to the following items. That is not the technical wording, but all lawyers know that if you do not have a clause like that, the working of the act is confined entirely to the items that are mentioned, whereas if a general clause is put in it is not so restricted and it would be possible to go further with the regulations than the details mentioned in the act. That clause certainly ought to be in, and I submit to the minister that he might as well have it put in now. It is not a question of expense, it is a question of making the act more workable.

I have just one more objection. In subsection 2 of 681a penalties not exceeding $100 and not less than $50 are provided for anyone contravening any regulation made under this section. That penalty is simply ridiculous. I took the trouble to look it up and I find that we have this year on two occasions—I have it under my hand if anyone wants to see it—imposed for a much less serious thing than where men's lives are at stake a possible penalty of $2,000 and not less than $200 and a possible gaol term as well of not less than three months. If the $2,000 is not paid the offender is liable to a further gaol term of not less than three months. What was the crime involved there? In the one case it was being in possession of liquor that had been made illegally, that is, without having a licence. If a man or some poor ignorant woman made a little home brew and did not know that a licence was required, he or she would be liable to a fine of $2,000 and to a gaol term of not less than three months. Here the lives of men are at stake, but if a life is lost through neglect to provide these safeguards, on the first offence the fine is only $50.

[Mr. Neill.]

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, many of these accidents are fatal. If a stick of timber is dropped down two holds and falls on a man he has not much chance to survive, or if a man falls backward into a hold through the lack of a proper guard, his life may be lost. Let me give another instance. Many of these ships are loaded and unloaded in a hurry; perhaps they must pay demurrage if they are not at another port in so many days. There is a rush, and sometimes these safety provisions do take a little while to rig up, and possibly they may cause a little delay in the handling of the cargo. Under such conditions it would pay the ship owner to take a chance and drive his men on in order to get through, ignoring the provisions of the act. If the ship is loaded without accident the owner is that much ahead; he has got away with it and saved expense. But if something should go wrong and a man should lose his life, for the first offence the ship owner would get off with a fine of only $50. Most ships load a couple of hatches at the same time, and in such a case the wage bill would be more than $100 an hour. It would pay a ship owner to take a chance in order to save half an hour's wages. I think we are making a burlesque of the matter when we impose the extreme fine of $100 for an offence which may cost a man his life. Surely there should be some greater severity and some heavier penalty than a fine of $50 in the first instance. I think that is a most regrettable feature.

I intend to propose an amendment when we reach section 681d. Perhaps I should wait until we reach that section; if you say I should do so, Mr. Chairman, I will wait. Section 681d reads:

The expression "tackle," as used in the four sections immediately preceding means the tackle, machinery, gear, apparatus and appliances used on board a ship for the loading or unloading thereof.

That is not the way the section was introduced originally; the Senate changed the wording, and I should prefer to go back to the section as it was drafted by the officials of the department. I think the latter part should read:

—gear, apparatus and appliances used for the loading or unloading of ships, and includes all tackle whether on ship or on shore.

The difference, of course, is that in the one case it is confined to the tackle on the ship, and in the other case it applies to tackle on shore or on the wharf as well. This is very necessary, because vessels are often loaded by an engine with a derrick, placed on the wharf or on the bank of a river. If the object is to protect the lives of the men this provision is equally necessary whether the defective crane, we will say, is on the boat itself or whether it is on the wharf or the bank of the river. It is suggested that this is beyond our jurisdiction and that, being on land, this tackle would come under provincial authority. The minister was kind enough to discuss this question with me last night, and he said there were provincial officials who were charged with such inspection. All I can say with regard to British Columbia—and I consulted with my colleague from South Vancouver—is that we never heard of any official who performed duties of that kind. There are officials appointed under the workmen's compensation board who go into the woods and supervise the machinery used there, but I do not think their jurisdiction extends to cases such as these. Further than that, the objection is surely overcome by the fact that under the old act the inspection extended to the shore. Section 674 reads:

—may inspect and examine the tackle, machinery or apparatus used for the loading or unloading thereof.

It seems to me we are going back if we limit it to the tackle on board ship when the old act, which we are trying to improve, said the inspection extended to all tackle used for loading or unloading, which would cover tackle on shore.

While I am on my feet there is just one other point I should like to impress upon the minister, also in regard to these regulations. I should like the hon. gentleman to give us some assurance—and I do not see why he should not do so—that when these regulations are formulated, and I hope he will indicate that this will be done in the near future, they will be published in the Canada Gazette so that everyone may know exactly what the regulations are. If the minister would be kind enough to assure me on those two points I will wait until we come to section 691d to move the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before the minister replies may I say that I agree almost entirely with everything that has been said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in connection with these amendments. Of course that does not include his reference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his opening remarks. The need for these amendments has been so apparent to those engaged in this work that I think we should take every care to see that they are made as precise as possible. Section 681 seems a little indefinite. It says:

The governor in council may from time to time appoint at such places in Canada as he deems advisable—

I believe this could be strengthened by making it read:

The governor in council may and shall from time to time appoint at such places in Canada as he deems advisable—

The same change might be made in section 681a, which reads:

The governor in council may make regulations for the protection against accident of workers employed in loading or unloading ships—

I suggest that this should read:

The governor in council may and shall make regulations for the protection against accident of workers employed in loading or unloading ships—

I believe this change should be made because, as I said yesterday, there has been a great deal of objection on the part of stevedoring companies and shipping federations against the taking of any but the very least precautions for safety in loading and unloading ships. I have before me a letter from the shipping federation of British Columbia to the Deputy Minister of Marine, dated August 23, 1932, in which they regretted that the minister was taking steps to engage an inspector of tackle who would see that safety regulations were carried out. I am sure these objections will continue, and I think for the protection of the minister himself the act cannot be made too strong or too definite. Let me repeat that I agree entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni with regard to these amendments.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to make just a few observations with regard to this portion of the bill. While I take no great exception to the observations of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I should like to direct the attention of the committee to the words which he complains are out of order or impose a strain on the decorum of the house, so that I might at least be in the judgment of the committee whether or not I conduct my discussions with due regard to the amenities of parliament. The words to which the hon. member referred were these —I am quoting from Hansard, page 5119, reporting the debate on the same bill:

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) in his usual sarcastic manner—

Mr. Neill: Thank you.

Mr. Stevens: —referred to this part of the bill in most scathing terms. I think his remarks were entirely unjustifiable. There is nothing mysterious about the nautical or shipping terms used in the bill—

Mr. NEILL: Read further.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, further down there is this:

The hon. gentleman is not the only man in the house or in the world who has a fairly wide knowledge of many of these things, and I would suggest to him that he would have been serving those whose interests he frequently pretends to have at heart—

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I was interrupted and I went on:

I say, he would have been serving much better those whose interests he has at heart had he said a word of commendation to the minister for at least the attempt to bring in these measures providing for safety appliances in the ports.

If there is anything offensive in parliamentary debate in the words I have quoted—

Mr. NEILL: "Pretends"?

Mr. STEVENS: —I fancy that hon. members who take exception to discussion of that sort will have great difficulty in carrying on debate at all. I simply say this. As the hon. member who has taken his seat knows, this measure is of great interest to the men working in the hazardous calling of loading and unloading ships in various parts of Canada, and particularly I think in the great port of Vancouver. He has raised the matter here and so have I over a period of years, and as I said the other day, it was hoped that we might have done something in this regard last year. But for reasons which it is useless now to discuss the bill was not then proceeded with. Then we included the present proposals in the general revision of the act this year; but when it was found, for purely constitutional reasons, that we could not proceed with the main act, the minister excerpted from that act these separate provisions relating to pilotage and to lake shipping, and it was considered that, these three matters being of sufficient urgency, we should bring in a separate bill this year instead of putting the whole matter off until next year.

Under these circumstances I submit that the minister ought to have been commended rather than criticized for his action. Now with regard to the observations that have just been made with reference to those measures in the bill dealing with inspection, the minister himself will discuss them from a technical point of view, but I am speaking now as one who for twenty years represented one of the largest ports in Canada and who therefore is deeply interested in the success of this legislation. The observations of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni indicated more clearly than I could in half an hour's argument the imperative necessity of empowering the governor in council to direct these matters by making regulations, because the hon. gentleman cited a number of more or less minor details which illustrate that there must be thousands of such. If we were to put them all in the bill, if we embodied them in the bill in detail, we should probably find ourselves limited to the terms of the bill, with the result that such contingencies as were not actually indicated in the bill would not come within the purview of the inspectors. Under the bill however, and following universal practice in this respect —the practice in other countries and the practice dictated by many of the major statutes of Canada—we have empowered the governor in council to make regulations. Let me read the section as it is here:

681a. The governor in council may make regulations for the protection against accident of workers employed in loading or unloading ships,—

Let us stop right there. That is very broad, and it is a general injunction imposed upon the minister and the governor in council to make regulations of a general character for the protection of those employed in the loading and unloading of ships, and I submit to the committee that this includes everything in the way of risks which might crop up unexpectedly—risks unforeseen in the loading or unloading of ships. It goes on:

—having regard in particular to the following:—

And "the following" are matters that are again fairly broad.

(a) the strength of machinery, tackle and gear and their fitness for the purpose for which they are intended;

That embraces all apparatus used—ropes, cables, blocks and tackle, winches, booms and so forth, everything used in the loading or unloading of ships. All these are subject to the regulations to be made by the governor in council.

(b) the provision of proper safe gangways, stagings and matters of a like character.

This provision anticipates a peculiar class of accident which I regret to say is frequent on the Pacific coast. Late at night in the dark men have on many occasions fallen off the edge of the dock or off an unprotected deck space on the ship, falling between the ship and the dock; and usually, lying between the ship and the dock, are a couple of large booms, probably three or four feet thick, thirty feet below the level of the dock or of the deck of the ship. Men have not uncommonly fallen down between the ship and the dock and been killed or seriously injured; frequently they are drowned. This provision is intended to take care of such accidents.

The next subsection provides:

(c) protection in the way of rails or other sufficient protection at openings through decks and around wharves and docks.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggested that this did not refer to the protection of hatchways. I submit that it covers that very matter. Where there is a hatchway open it usually has a combing and roping around which may be and usually is set up, and this provides that it shall be done. It is provided here that suitable protection shall be given to safeguard against risks of that kind. The next subsection reads:

(d) illumination of holds and decks of ships, and docks or wharves at which ships may be loading or unloading.

I pause for a moment to refer to an observation of the hon. member for Vancouver South. He suggested that the word "may" should be followed by an obligatory "shall." May I suggest, subject to correction by any of the legal gentlemen in the house who are probably better qualified than I am to discuss this particular point, that generally speaking, in statutes the word "may" carries with it the import of the word "shall." And the very fact that we are passing this legislation will impose upon the governor in council the duty of carrying out its terms. I do not think that the hon. member need have any doubts as to the effectiveness of the clause as it stands. When he refers to the inadequacy of the powers which the governor in council will have, may I refer to section 681C. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni will find a subsection giving still further power to the inspectors:

If any inspector of ships' tackle—

(a) is of opinion that any person employed in the loading or unloading of any ship is exposed to undue risk on account of the condition of any machinery, tackle, stagings or the like, or on account of the way in which the operation is being carried on, or—

Then it goes on with another observation, and then it states:

—he may and shall order, orally or otherwise, addressing such order to the owner, master and other person in charge of the loading or unloading of such ship or to any of them, that the operation of loading or unloading such ship shall cease.

That places a mandatory power in the hands of the inspector to deal with the matter if he considers that any machinery, tackle or staging is not proper and safe.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni also referred to the inadequacy of the penalty, but he will notice that the item he quoted in clause 681A is of course applicable to that particular clause and a similar penalty is in the next clause, but under clause 681C where the inspector's mandatory power is provided for, we find this penalty:

If any person so ordered—

That is, so ordered to discontinue the operation.

—continues the operation of loading or unloading or allows it to be continued he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than one hundred dollars.

Mr. NEILL: Under that clause only.

Mr. STEVENS: No; I call my hon. friend's attention particularly to this: this is applicable to the mandatory power which the inspector has, if he sees any machinery, tackle or the like not being properly operated, to order those in charge to cease. If he is disobeyed, then the master or the owner is liable to this fine of $500.

Mr. NEILL: Under this one section only.

Mr. QUINN: As well as the others.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will permit me I will invite him to consider this point, and I will do so in very courteous terms if I might inspire in him a little confidence in me. This applies to all of the clauses because the mandatory power of this clause is provided in the two or three preceding clauses. Therefore any order given under this clause must carry the very clauses of which he was complaining and the power of fining in this clause is added to the power of fining in the other two clauses; there is no question of that. I say again, borrowing a little from his own sarcasm, if he will permit himself to be fair for a moment, he will certainly admit that.

Mr. NEILL: I certainly shall not.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I confess my hon. friend is hopeless.

I was quite sympathetic toward the anxiety of the hon. member for Vancouver South when he referred the other evening to a possible delay in bringing these provisions into operation. In that regard he referred to clause 681F which provides:

Sections 681 to 681e, inclusive, of this act shall not come into operation until a date to be fixed by the governor in council and proclaimed in the Canada Gazette, and pending such proclamation sections 674 and 681 of this act, as they now exist, shall remain in force.

I want to say very frankly to the hon. member that if I thought for a moment there would be any unreasonable delay in bringing this into operation, I certainly would not support the measure as I am doing. But may I point out to him a very sound reason and, indeed, an absolute necessity for having it in that way. If we passed the bill as it is and repealed section 784 and 681, during the hiatus or the period of time between the actual passing of this bill, let us say, to-morrow or next Monday or Tuesday as the case may be, and the date when we are able to promulgate very complete regulations which undoubtedly will take a month or two to draft, we would be without any protection whatever, because we would have repealed section 674. The importance and significance of that will be apparent at once when I read the present section 674 in the main act. This section reads:

> Every inspector may, at any time visit any ship, whether registered in Canada or elsewhere, and whether propelled wholly or in part by steam, except ships belonging to His Majesty; and although any such ship is classed in Lloyds register of British and foreign shipping, or in any other corporation or association for the survey and register of ships approved by the governor in council, may inspect and examine the tackle, machinery or apparatus used for the loading or unloading thereof, and, if he considers such tackle, machinery or apparatus defective, so as to be dangerous to life, he shall report thereon to the minister who may order that such tackle, machinery and apparatus shall not be used until permitted by the minister.

I am not for a moment arguing that this section is satisfactory, but what I am saying is that it is the existing protection we have. If we delete or repeal it and do not have in its place the regulation provided for in this new bill, then we shall be denied even that measure of protection.

Then I invite attention to section 681 of the main act which is also repealed by this bill unless the clause that is complained of is substituted therefor. Section 681 reads:

> Any tackle, machinery or apparatus used in violation of any order made by the minister under the authority of this part, prohibiting the use of such tackle, machinery or apparatus until permitted by the minister, shall be liable to forfeiture and seizure by the chief officer of customs at any port, and may thereupon be sold in the same way and under like provision as goods liable to forfeiture for non-payment of customs duties; and the owner of the ship, for the loading or unloading of which such tackle, machinery or apparatus is used in violation of such order, shall incur a penalty of $100, and such ship shall be liable for such penalty.

Again I draw attention to the fact that just during the next few weeks, during the period of time while the minister, in consultation with the harbour commissioners of the various large ports, is able to draft the necessary order in council with the detailed regulations, it is desirable that these provisions should be preserved to us. I trust the hon. member will at least accept from me the assurance so far as I am concerned, as one equally interested with himself in the bill, that I certainly never had in mind any suggestion by the minister or anyone else that it was intended to postpone indefinitely the bringing in of these regulations. Furthermore, it is, I think, obvious to all who have given study to this matter, that these regulations will be very voluminous; that is, they must necessarily cover a very wide range of activities, not only the very few mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but a very large and wide range of matters provided for, and those regulations necessarily will have to be very carefully considered by the Justice department and others in order that we may be certain that they are of a character that cannot be challenged in connection with the powers of the federal parliament. It will therefore probably take some little time to draft these regulations. I shall leave it to the minister to declare his own views, but I am speaking now as one who has been interested in this matter for a number of years and I say to the hon. member for Vancouver South that I share with him the anxiety to have these regulations promulgated at the earliest possible date, and that I do not think the interests of those who are most seriously affected are in any sense jeopardized by this clause.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I, although coming from the same city, are not as well acquainted as we should be, but I can assure him that whatever our differences may be in regard to other questions, when it comes to such practical matters as this, he will find me at least quite reasonable and able to see points that he may make. I would ask the minister if there is an inspector at the present time at the port of Vancouver under section 674.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not actually in office but in course of appointment.

Mr. MacINNIS: That just takes away the ground from under the feet of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If there is no inspector at the present time there is no protection, and consequently if this section should come into effect immediately on the passing of the act we would be in no worse position than we are now in. So on that score there is no valid reason why the section should not come into operation immediately on the passing of the act.

Referring to the penalties provided in section 681C, subsection 2, I would point out that penalties are also provided in section 696 which deals with the manner in which cargoes and deck cargoes may be carried on British ships registered in Canada, and the fine in this instance shall not exceed for any one offence one thousand dollars, but a term of imprisonment is also provided not exceeding three months for non-payment of the fine.

Mr. STEVENS: In what section?

Mr. MacINNIS: In section 696 on page 4 of the new bill. I believe that the proper carrying out of the sections that we have been dealing with up to section 681C is just as important as the carrying out of section 696. Defective tackle at any moment may mean and has often meant the loss of life, and consequently we should make the penalties as severe as possible.

Mr. NEILL: I understand that the Minister of Marine is a lawyer high up in his profession. I would ask him whether in his opinion section 681A would not be greatly strengthened by the clause I suggested, not limiting the generality of the reference by the particular details mentioned. That would give the minister power to cover by regulation many of the amendments I have suggested, which after all were recommended by the Vancouver harbour commissioners.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no doubt that when the terms are general, without any particulars, the powers of the minister may be greater, but I think that the different subsections give the minister all possible power to enact regulations. I do not see why it would be necessary to add general powers when everything is covered by the subsections.

Mr. NEILL: My point is that 681A-B-C-D do not cover many of the possible accidents which should be guarded against.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The section reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations for the protection against accident of workers employed in loading or unloading ships, having regard in particular to the following:

Then follow certain particulars, but the first sentence of the clause is absolutely general. We might frame the clause in the manner suggested by my hon. friend, but it would not strengthen the power of the minister at all. The governor in council may make regulations for the protection against accident of workers employed in loading or unloading ships. That is an absolutely general power. Then there are added the words "having regard in particular to the following," but that does not limit the powers at all.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest that it does.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think so, and it has been so held by our courts time and again.

Mr. NEILL: Then why do we so often find in our acts a clause that the generality shall not be limited?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It has been held time and again that where there are general powers, if there are also special powers such as are given here by the words "having regard in particular to the following," that is simply a direction given, but the general power still holds good. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister undertake, when he draws up his regulations, to consider these other details that I have mentioned?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course. I am told by my officials that all the suggestions that have been read by my hon. friend are now in the office of the ministry. We shall not be limited by these subsections at all. If we find that something else should be included we have general powers to cover it.

Mr. NEILL: Can the minister indicate when he expects to have these regulations out, and will he publish them in the Gazette?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think all these regulations must be published in the Gazette. At all events these certainly will be.

Mr. NEILL: When?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As soon as they have been adopted.

Mr. NEILL: There is an amendment to section 681D. Mr. Chairman, which you have not yet put.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I was just going to say a word on the amendment. The ground has been very well covered by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I shall add only a word or two. The very question raised by my hon. friend's amendment was discussed at length in the Senate. The original bill included practically the same enactment, but they came to the conclusion that it was better to empower the inspection of tackle only on board ship. There may be tackle on the wharf, of course, but the moment the tackle goes on ship it can be inspected by our officials, and anything that is used from the ship to the shore, such as chains, wires and that sort of thing, can be inspected by our officials. The point was raised in the Senate whether the enactment of an amendment such as my hon. friend suggests would not be encroaching on the jurisdiction of the provinces. It was also felt that every province had a Workmen's Compensation Act in force, which provides for the inspection of machinery used by workmen. My hon. friend stated that in his province the inspectors go into the woods and inspect machinery used there. I am not familiar with the British Columbia act, but under the laws of the province of Quebec, and I presume it is the same in the other provinces, the inspectors have the power to inspect tackle or machinery in any part of the province, including wharves. The workmen employed on the wharves are fully protected by the Workmen's Compensation Act of the province. It was felt in the Senate, in view of the fact that there was a doubt as to whether or not we were encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the provinces, and owing to the fact that provincial laws protect their workmen, that it was advisable to limit the powers of inspectors to the tackle on ships only. The words employed are "tackle..... used on board a ship."

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the minister hold that he is correct in stating the case that way? How can we then, as provided in subsection (c) of section 681a make regulations for the "protection in the way of rails or other sufficient protection at openings through decks and around wharves and docks." Is that not on shore, just as much as the tackle which would be on the wharf for the loading of a ship?

Mr. STEVENS: The wording is "openings through decks."

Mr. DURANLEAU: And "around wharves and docks."

Mr. MacINNIS: Then subsection (d) of 681a is as follows:

> Illumination of holds and decks of ships, and docks or wharves at which ships may be loading or unloading.

If we can make regulations for wharves, surely such regulations could apply to the tackle with which ships were being loaded. Surely it would apply to that tackle as much as to the tackle on the ship. We cannot exclude it in one instance and include it in the other.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There may be some doubt as to what is mentioned by my hon. friend. I do not admit this parliament cannot grant a power of inspection of tackles used on the dock for loading or unloading ships. When I say the Senate thought it better not to give power to the inspector to inspect tackles on the wharf, I must add that the leader of the Senate stated that there was no admission that we did not have that power. He did not believe it was necessary, however, on account of the fact that the workmen on the wharf were protected by provincial laws. There may be something in the point just made by the hon. member; but I do not think it matters very much.

Mr. NEILL: I am glad to hear the minister state that at least there is a substantial doubt. There are two phases before us, namely the bill itself which limits it to the tackle actually on the boat, and the amendment which seeks to put it back to where it was before action was taken by the Senate, namely to have it apply both on ship or ashore. Suppose we go back to the language used in the original act, in the Revised Statutes of Canada, and leave the doubt—which the minister admits is a doubt—open. We may then have some advantage from the enforcement of the law. I suggest we go back to the language of the original section, number 674, which contains the words "used for the loading or unloading thereof." Just use the words "used for the loading or unloading" of ships. Do not say where the tackle is. The minister admits there is a doubt. We will not raise it, and other people will not raise it. Further, this language has the advantage of being in the law to-day.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When the hon. member reads section 674 he will find in the first line the words "every inspector may, at any time visit any ship." Therefore it seems to me that the inspection is limited to the ship.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but he inspects the tackle used for "the loading or unloading thereof." The tackle may be in the next county, so far as this section is concerned.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The section itself may not be clear. But it provides first for his visit to the ship, and it is on such ship he must carry on his inspection. The language of the section would imply that his inspection would be limited to tackle or other apparatus on the ship.

Mr. NEILL: Not necessarily. That is only implied.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to appeal to the hon. members who are opposing this amendment to keep in mind the history of this whole negotiation. During the year 1931 and up until last year we pressed the department for a measure of this kind. It will be recalled that the board of harbour commissioners of Vancouver drafted regulations, part of which were quoted to-day. Upon arriving in Ottawa, their constitutionality was investigated by the Department of Justice. They sought to find out whether it was within the jurisdiction of parliament —the harbour commissioners being a creature of parliament—to approve of or pass such regulations. The Department of Justice found that they did not have jurisdiction. That finding covers all the provisions included in the harbour commissioners' by-laws. I have before me the opinion of the Department of Justice in that respect, and also communications from the department saying that this matter was very carefully considered. I suggest to the hon. members that if they insist upon injecting into this bill the words contained in their amendment chances are that when we come to apply the provisions of the bill we may be attacked by a stevedoring company or a ship which might be libelled. And on a narrow technicality of that kind the whole value of our efforts would be destroyed. We do know of a certainty that this parliament has jurisdiction to deal with the ship. We also know fairly well that we have not jurisdiction to deal with matters ashore. At least such jurisdiction is in question. I appeal to hon. members not to press their amendment unless we are perfectly certain that it is constitutionally intra vires of this parliament, but rather that they should let that section pass as it is. I submit that this is very broad and very general, and while the inspector will have to be a little careful, and enforce his orders only where his jurisdiction extends, to my mind it will be a tremendous mistake to inject the suggested language into the bill, only to find out later that we have destroyed the whole effort we are now making.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has said that the Department of Justice decided along the lines set out in the bill. I point out that the original bill as presented to the Senate—not the big bill, but this one under our hand—did contain a provision about tackle on shore, and the Senate changed it. If the Department of Justice looked into the matter and decided that it was all right to have that provision in the bill—as presumably they did, as the minister said they did—why did the Senate take it out?

Mr. STEVENS: I was referring to the by-law of the harbour commissioners. I cited that as an illustration of the narrowness of the powers or the ground on which these powers are exercised. I would certainly deplore the introduction into the bill of anything that would jeopardize its passage as it stands.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to draw the attention of the committee to a slight amendment to the section which, if put into effect, would not be as noticeable as the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Instead of adopting his amendment I suggest that we delete the words "on board a ship" appearing after the word "used" in the twelfth line. That would not restrict the meaning or interpretation of the term "tackle," and would not be so likely to be questioned as it might be if the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni were used, which would draw attention immediately to the term "on shore." I believe that would be the best way to pass this section. I submit that to the minister and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for their serious consideration.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will notice that the word "thereof" at the end would not fit.

Mr. NEILL: It would need to be changed to "of a ship." I would withdraw my amendment cheerfully. As I suggested a moment ago, that would leave the thing undecided, the doubt unsolved.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to deleting those words "on board a ship," and the word "thereof" at the end, and substituting for the latter word the words "of a ship." It would then read as follows:

> The expression "tackle," as used in the four sections immediately preceding means the tackle, machinery, gear, apparatus and appliances used for the loading or unloading of a ship.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, as the minister cannot move an amendment to his own bill I take the liberty of moving:

> That on page 3 of the bill, line 12, the words "on board a ship" be deleted, and that the word "thereof" at the end of the next line be deleted and in lieu thereof there be added at the end of the section, following the word "unloading," the words "of a ship."

Mr. NEILL: I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Subsection 681D as amended agreed to.

On subsection E—Marking of heavy packages or objects.

Mr. QUINN: If the minister will look at 681B, subclause (a) gives power to the inspector of ship's tackle in the exercise of his duties to:

> . . . go at all reasonable times on board any ship or on any port or dock at which any ship is, for the purpose of loading or unloading, . . .

Now, large ocean liners or cargo steamers have their gangways or stagings rigged from the ship direct into the sheds. Their freight in the majority of cases does not touch the wharf or dock at all, and the operations of stevedoring, loading and unloading, are superintended largely from the sheds. I submit that the inspector should be empowered to go into the shed or warehouse where these operations are being carried on. I submit that that subclause would read better as follows:

> . . . go at all reasonable times on board any ship or on any wharf or dock or in any warehouse or shed alongside which any ship is lying for the purpose of loading or unloading.

I move that amendment.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course we are all anxious to have this legislation as complete as possible, but I am asking myself if the word dock does not include warehouses and sheds. The sheds and warehouses are on the dock.

Mr. QUINN: If the minister will interpret wharf or dock as covering warehouses or sheds the amendment is not necessary. The amendment makes it more explicit and definite.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have no objection to this amendment except that I believe it is open to the same objection as the amendment offered by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to subsection 681D. It draws attention particularly to the warehouse or shed, which I think is rather undesirable.

Mr. STEVENS: Personally I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) would be well advised not to press this. I think he is running the risk of injecting into this bill terms which may on a narrow interpretation of jurisdiction destroy the bill. It will be noted that the draftsmen have been rather careful in drafting this bill to provide that the inspector may go at all reasonable times on any wharf or dock at which any ship is for the purpose of loading or unloading. That gives him access over the dock to the ship, which of course is absolutely essential and is well within the power of parliament. But when you enlarge that by stating that the inspectors shall go into warehouses and so on I think you give possible ground for dispute. I know this has been very narrowly interpreted, I would deplore injecting into it anything which might jeopardize the validity of the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Do I understand that the hon. member withdraws his amendment?

Mr. QUINN: If the minister gives me that assurance, that warehouse and shed is covered by the term wharf or dock I am satisfied and will withdraw the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. NEILL: I call the minister's attention to subsection 681:

> The governor in council may from time to time appoint at such places in Canada as he deems advisable—

I would direct the minister's attention to the need for appointing an inspector at Port Alberni, which is now the third biggest lumber shipping point in British Columbia and employs sometimes as many as three hundred stevedores.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to refer the word "third" to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid).

Mr. NEILL: Third is right. We are ahead of Victoria, and we come a very good second to New Westminster and will very speedily pass it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): May I remind the committee that we are now discussing subsection 681E.

Subsection agreed to.

On paragraph 681F—Proclamation of date.

Mr. MacINNIS: I listened very attentively to the explanation given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with this section, but after pointing out that there were no inspectors at the present time under section 674 I do not see that we would be any the worse off if we did not have this section at all.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsection 696 agreed to.

Subsection 897a agreed to.

On subsection 932—British ships.

Mr. REID: Before dealing with this section I should like to say that I differ with many hon. members on this side of the house; I am absolutely in support of this bill, particularly with regard to the section relating to safety appliances. In regard to the section, now before the committee however, I should like to direct a question to the minister. I know that under the British commonwealth merchant shipping agreement the registry of British ships is defined, and I should like to ask him why we have not followed the example set by Australia and New Zealand in this connection and defined the registry of British ships in Canada as it is defined in that agreement, which I might say was signed by Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland. Under that agreement it is almost imperative that the persons owning or registering such ships shall be British subjects.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I suppose my hon. friend has read section 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, which says:

A ship shall not be deemed to be a British ship unless owned wholly by persons of the following description (in this act referred to as persons qualified to be owners of British ships); namely,—

(a) Natural born British subjects;

(b) Persons naturalized by or in pursuance of an act of parliament of the United Kingdom, or by or in pursuance of an act or ordinance of the proper legislative authority in a British possession;

(c) Persons made denizens by letters of denization; and

(d) Bodies corporate established under and subject to the laws of some part of Her Majesty's dominions, and having their principal place of business in those dominions:

Provided that any person who either—

(i) being a natural born British subject has taken the oath of allegiance to a foreign sovereign or state or has otherwise become a citizen or subject of a foreign state; or

(ii) has been naturalized or made a denizen as aforesaid; shall not be qualified to be owner of a British ship unless, after taking the said oath, or becoming a citizen or subject of a foreign state, or on or after being naturalized or made denizen as aforesaid, he has taken the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen, and is during the time he is owner of the ship either resident in Her Majesty's dominions, or partner in a firm actually carrying on business in Her Majesty's dominions.

As we see, Great Britain has deliberately abstained from defining British ships by statute, and in the past Canada has done so by section 932 of the Canada Shipping Act. The present draft eliminates the word "means" from the definition and adds at the end the words "and are by the law of England" and so forth. So we follow the same practice that is followed in England at the present time. By the marine laws of England it is the place of control in fact of a ship owned by a corporation, and not the place of residence or the nationality of the owners of the shares of the corporation, or even the place of registration of such a ship, that settles the nationality of the vessel.

Mr. REID: There is another point to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister, and perhaps it might be discussed at this time because it is of great importance to many seamen on the Pacific coast. Under the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement provision is made with regard to the certificates of officers. Article 17 reads as follows:

Subject to any special provisions that may be made by any part of the commonwealth as to the qualifications to be required of officers on ships engaged in its coasting trade,—

The next words are those to which I wish to refer.

—a valid certificate of competency or service granted by one part of the commonwealth will be recognized throughout the British commonwealth as indicating that the holder is duly qualified accordingly when serving on board any ship registered in that part.

I take that to mean that in the case of a ship of British registry coming to Vancouver or New Westminster and having a crew engaged in the old country, who had English certificates, that crew would be considered competent to be on board. Take it the other way around, however, with a British ship leaving Vancouver or New Westminster and going to the old country. We find that officers or seamen applying for berths are not considered if they have certificates of discharge issued in Canada, and I understand that this is being done on instructions from Great Britain. I have had several affidavits sent me in that connection. I am not going to take time to read them all, but I have one in particular which explains the whole situation. This affidavit was sworn to by a ship's carpenter named Harrison, who says:

3. That during the summer of 1932, I applied to the assistant shipping master of the city of Vancouver, namely Mr. Menzies, for a berth as ship's carpenter or able seaman or by any other capacity upon any British ship that might be returning to the old country and I was then and there informed by the said deputy shipping master that it would be impossible for me to obtain such employment as all captains of English vessels had been circularized to the fact that they were not to engage any Canadian citizens or English or British subjects who had been domiciled outside of England for a period of over two years and that as I had been in Canada three years at that time, it would be impossible to obtain such employment.

4. That I have returned to the shipping master's office to obtain employment on numerous occasions and have always met with the same answer.

5. That on Monday the 13th day of March, A.D. 1933, I attended the shipping master in the city of Vancouver, with one, Paul Bailey, who was applying for berth as fireman on board the steamship Juanita, and I heard the assistant shipping master, Mr. Menzies, advise the said Paul Bailey that he could not obtain a berth as fireman unless he had an English board of trade certificate of discharge and that his Canadian certificate of discharge was useless.

6. That I verily believe that amendments should be made to the Canada Shipping Act for the protection of holders of Canadian certificates of discharge and for the protection of holders of English board of trade certificates of discharge who were domiciled in Canada.

I have three affidavits, one from the carpenter, a man named Harrison, another from Paul Bailey, the fireman, and a third from Cornelius Jan Lieuwen, mate, and they all swear that they have been turned down when they have applied for berths on British ships going to the old country. Under the Canada Shipping Act we recognize in this country discharge certificates from any part of the British commonwealth, and I submit that the matter should be very carefully considered. I think we should have an explanation as to why our Canadian citizens who apply for positions on British ships, and who have their discharge certificates from Canada, should be treated in the way these men have been treated in Vancouver recently.

Mr. STEVENS: It happens that I received the same affidavits to which the hon. gentleman has referred. They were prepared by the Seamen's Union. The complaint is of course a very natural one. Here are quite a large number of seamen, some of them ablebodied seamen, others officers, mates and so on. They find themselves out of work and are naturally anxious to be employed, and the complaint is that frequently they apply to the captain of a British ship, or rather, to put it properly, they apply to the shipping master's office for berths on British ships in the harbour of Vancouver, and the master of the British ship declines to take them.

We have not all the facts before us. A statement is made by these men who feel they have a grievance. Now, in this instance, immediately I received these affidavits, I turned them over to the officers of the Department of Marine, through my colleague the Minister of Marine, and I can assure the committee that they are now being carefully looked into. We feel that these men are entitled to have the whole matter fully surveyed, and at the moment we can make no statement. The minister and his officers have been in touch with the situation but there is no answer definitely because the facts have not all been ascertained.

May I hazard one or two observations, not for the purpose of justifying the attitude of the ship's captain but rather that we may have before us at least part of the argument to be advanced on the other side. A British ship comes to the harbour of Vancouver with a British crew, or at any rate a crew taken on at a British port, and as the result of desertion, or possibly discharge or sickness, they may be short a few men. Usually the crew is signed on for the round trip, wherever they may be going—sometimes around the world, sometimes from Liverpool to Vancouver and return, whatever the cruise may be. Frequently on arriving at Vancouver the ship will be short three or four men. The master of a British ship in such a situation will go to the shipping master and ask for a sufficient number of men to complete his crew. The affidavit asserts that these captains have been instructed not to employ Canadian sailors. I submit that that statement in that form looks prejudicial to Canadian interests, but I apprehend that this is the more correct way to put it. Inasmuch as there are a very large number of British born seamen who are themselves unemployed in these days, the owners of the vessels in Great Britain desire that their captains in signing on men in any port away from home—a port in one of the dominions, for instance—should give the preference to British sailors entitled to return to Great Britain, thus finishing a cruise which had been broken in some way. I presume therefore, speaking again without absolute knowledge, that the instructions are not to bring back any man who will not be completing a voyage and who, on his arrival in Liverpool, may be subject to discharge, simply adding to the ranks of the unemployed there. They prefer therefore to bring back if possible British seamen who are competent, shall I say, to finish the voyage in Liverpool in the ordinary course of events.

I am quite certain that neither the British government nor the British board of trade, under which these regulations very largely come, has ever at any time given instructions that Canadian or Australian seamen, or seamen from any of the other dominions shall be treated prejudicially or in any unfair way.

There is no doubt in my mind on that score. I sympathize of course with men who wish to get work and are unable to, but I think it is desirable that we should keep before us some at least of the elements which enter into and complicate the situation for the captain and others concerned. However, the department has the matter in hand and is making inquiries, because I transmitted to the department the affidavits which I received. We expect to have all the facts before us in the course of a few days. Whether they will come to hand in time to deal with the matter here I do not know, but hon. gentlemen can rest assured that the Minister of Marine and I myself will follow it up until we secure a fully satisfactory explanation of all the circumstances.

Mr. NEILL: It is quite natural that the British government should look after British sailors, but there is one point which I think should not be lost sight of. Reference was made a few weeks ago to the case of a man named Bailey, the circumstances being similar to those now under discussion, although there was this additional factor: he was trying to get a job on a boat subsidized by Canada. Now, if Britain can look after her sailors it is the duty of this country to see to it that if we subsidize vessels they shall engage Canadian sailors.

Mr. STEVENS: In that instance the vessel was chartered for a special trip because there was an excess of lumber offering over and above what the two ships owned by the company could carry. As Minister of Trade and Commerce I was faced with this situation. I could have refused to permit the company to charter that ship, but that would have meant that four million feet of lumber would have remained unshipped for a month and the British Columbia workers in the mills and in the woods would have been deprived of a month's work. I felt therefore that it was desirable to permit the company to charter the ship and earn the subsidy in that way—because it was a voyage subsidy. They did so, and I may say to the committee that in a period of about six or seven months there has been moved by this company under the subsidy system something like fifty million feet of lumber of the secondary grades, lifting it off our markets in British Columbia. There is not a lumber exporter, not a lumber mill nor the lumber association itself that will not speak in the highest terms of the efforts made to move that lumber.

As regards this particular man to whom reference is made, the vessel was British and the captain found himself short a man in the port. He had brought out a cargo to Vancouver and was on his way across the Pacific. His ship had been chartered for the outward trip and he would therefore proceed to Liverpool or some other port for which he was headed. It would have been unfortunate for that Canadian seaman to find himself out of a job in Shanghai or in some other part of the world, because we could not have followed him.

Mr. NEILL: Was it not a round trip?

Mr. STEVENS: No. These subsidies are for the outward trip only, and in the case of a chartered ship, they take a cargo at Vancouver and go on to Shanghai, which is always a good kicking-off place. They take on a cargo of soya beans there and go through the Indian ocean and the Mediterranean around to Great Britain, the other way altogether; or they might take a cargo to some other place, but it is an outward bound subsidy.

Subsection 932 agreed to.

On subsection 935—British ships only may engage in coasting trade.

Mr. YOUNG: When this bill was under discussion the other day the minister made a statement to which I would like to refer. I was speaking in regard to grain being consigned from the head of the lakes to Buffalo and the Minister of Railways said that much of it was consigned right through to Great Britain, while the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that most of it was consigned through. Will the minister say how much of the grain is consigned right through?

Mr. MANION: I did not say that much was consigned through; I said it could be consigned through.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend's words were "Often it is."

Mr. MANION: I do not know I said those words, but it does not make any difference.

Mr. YOUNG: The Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

Most of it is consigned through.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. member say from what page of Hansard he is quoting?

Mr. YOUNG: Page 5141 of Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will just examine that language a little—I notice it is always better to check these things up—he will find that we were discussing the hypothetical question of the consignment of grain through United States ports to Great Britain and its competence to earn the preference on entry into the British market. The hon. gentleman himself goes on to say:

> Mr. Young: But I say that it is not consigned clear through. The shipper has to keep his grain moving; he does not know when he loads it on to the boat at the head of the lakes, where it is going. When it is consigned to Buffalo, it is not consigned clear through.
>
> Mr. Manion: Often it is.
> Mr. Young: He wants to be able, when he ships it to Buffalo, to consign it wherever he can make a sale.

Then I said:

> Most of it is consigned through.

My point is this: I really think it is almost senseless for us to have to repeat these discussions on these clauses, but I shall do so in spite of the fact that we are in the dying days of the session and everybody wants to get away. This movement of grain to Buffalo is of two general distinct characters. One is during the open season of navigation when grain moves freely from the head of the lakes to the seaboard by Canadian and United States ports. It will move to Buffalo and naturally be moved as rapidly as possible through to New York, Boston, Providence, Portland, Baltimore, Philadelphia and other ports where it can find the cheapest and best shipping to carry it to the markets of the world. The consequence is that during that period the tendency is to push the grain through. But when we come down toward the end of navigation, the holders of wheat will very frequently, in fact every year, store up as much as they can in Buffalo and hold it there because, as I said the other day, it is a good kicking-off place. The tendency is to do that, but that is for what we call winter storage. In addition to putting the grain into elevators, it is a common practice to rent storage in as many vessels as they can and tie those vessels up to docks contiguous to an elevator spout to be loaded in the winter or spring as the case may be. Those vessels are frozen in and remain there as winter storage. Precisely the same thing applies to Port Colborne, Port McNicoll, Midland, Goderich and other bay ports.

What we were discussing the other day was this principle: Is it possible or competent for a shipper of Canadian grain through Buffalo to Great Britain to earn the preference? I have stated over and over again: Yes, it is, provided he observes the terms of regulation No. 12 of the British Imports Act. Regulation No. 12 in brief is this, that not merely wheat, but goods of any kind, of course including wheat, shipped from a British territory or a British dominion through a foreign country must, in order to earn the preference in Great Britain, be consigned through on a through bill of lading. Then it says further, that in the absence of a through bill of lading, it must have such invoices and other documents as may be certified by the customs authority in the foreign country to show that the goods were shipped through in a direct route from the point of shipment in a British territory to Great Britain. Any wheat or any other commodity that is handled in that fashion will earn the preference.

Let us pause for a moment and study, shall I say, the soundness or sanity of that. Obviously, neither Great Britain nor Canada nor any other country desires to place upon its statute books a preference and then make that preference open for goods that may lie in a foreign country for weeks, months or even years. There must be some control over the goods and so this provision that I have mentioned has been made.

When the wheat shipments were made last winter, this is what happened: Wheat had been moved from Port Arthur to Buffalo and put into storage. But when it was shipped, as is the case with nearly all wheat that is shipped to Buffalo or Montreal, it was entered on the bill of lading as being for export to the United Kingdom. Why do they do that? It is done constantly and daily because that is the most favourable market in the world. But very much of that grain after it leaves Montreal or Halifax or Saint John or United States seaboard ports is redirected while at sea and may go to Rotterdam, Antwerp, Hamburg or any other European or other foreign port; it may go down to the Mediterranean. This is a matter of daily occurrence, and one of the great problems confronting the Bureau of Statistics here and the statistical authorities in Great Britain has been for years to reconcile precisely the imports entered under customs authority in Great Britain and the recorded exports from Canada to the United Kingdom. There is always a variation. We have now got it down to a point where we can estimate that degree of variation; we can make an estimate, but it is only an estimate, because what we call the export entry will be for Great Britain, but the ship may be diverted at sea. In the case I have already cited, the wheat was put into storage at Buffalo and I think it remained there for nearly three months. Then what in the British order is forbidden, was done; the wheat was reconsigned to Great Britain. The documentation of it was broken at Buffalo and because the continuity of the movement so far as documentation is concerned was broken at Buffalo, the wheat was refused the right of the preference in Great Britain. To emphasize this, may I point out that only yesterday hon. members opposite, in discussing this matter, spent a good deal of time in stressing that you could not ensure the identity of the grain. They pointed out in connection with this very clause that we have under consideration—I think the hon. member for Willow Bunch did so—that when wheat goes into the elevator at Buffalo, let us say from a Canadian ship and, in order to earn that right of coastwise preference under this clause, has to be moved out in a Canadian ship, it is impossible when loading that wheat out of Buffalo for Montreal to determine that it is Canadian wheat. That was the point that was made and emphasized. I am prepared to meet that argument and discuss it, but not at the moment.

What I wish to point out is that it naturally impresses the import authorities in Great Britain as decidedly unfair to ask them to accept as Canadian wheat, wheat which has actually been consigned to Buffalo and has remained there, and is then reconsigned to Great Britain. In other words, there is no continuity of documentation that proves it was Canadian wheat. On the other hand, as my colleague the Minister of Railways and I stated the other day, where the grain is moved on a through bill of lading, as is frequently and almost constantly done, to New York, Baltimore or some other American port, it is entitled to earn the preference when it is so moved. I think I have spent more time than I should have in emphasizing that point.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister regrets that he had to make a speech of some length in reply to my question. I simply asked for some figures. I do not know why he made that speech unless to make me forget what I wanted to ask him.

Mr. MANION: He has done well if he has done that.

Mr. YOUNG: The point I want to make is this: When the minister said yesterday that most of the grain going from the head of the lakes to Great Britain is consigned right through from the head of the lakes, he must either have known or not known the facts. If he knew the facts will he give the figures? That is important for this reason. If that grain leaving the head of the lakes is consigned right through to its ultimate destination and the shipper knows where he can get a ship to carry it, he can route it over whatever route he likes from the head of the lakes to the seaboard. But if he does not know where it is ultimately going to be sold, he has to be very careful what boat he ships it in to Buffalo, for if he ships it in an American bottom he loses the choice of routes when the grain gets to Buffalo. When the grain arrives at Buffalo he might have the chance to sell the grain where it would be to his advantage to ship the grain out through the St. Lawrence route, and he would have to refuse that sale because he could not ship through the St. Lawrence route once the grain had been carried in an American bottom to Buffalo. That being the case, the shipper of grain moving from the head of the lakes to the seaboard, the object of the shipper always being to get it as close to the seaboard as he can and always reserving the choice of routes, will not ship the grain in an American boat to Buffalo because then if he has the chance to sell the grain where it would be to his advantage to ship it through the St. Lawrence, he is precluded from doing so; he cannot make that sale. He will therefore confine his shipments to Canadian boats. Already Canadian ships have a monopoly of the Canadian grain trade between Canadian ports, and this will give them a monopoly of the Canadian grain trade from Canadian ports to American ports.

Mr. MANION: What is there to prevent him from sending the grain out from Buffalo to Great Britain and then changing its destination en route? He has a cargo of grain, and if he ships it to Great Britain he can get the benefit of the preference. The preliminary statements made by my hon. friend are correct. The shipper sends the grain in an American ship to Buffalo, if he chooses that way, and consigns it on through. He can hold it in Buffalo indefinitely until he wishes to consign it through. Then it goes out of Portland or Boston to Great Britain, and there is nothing to stop the shipper, once the grain is on the ocean, from changing its destination to Antwerp or Rotterdam or Marseilles.

Mr. YOUNG: There is this: When he gets the grain to Buffalo he might find it to his advantage to ship it to Montreal.

Mr. MANION: He cannot ship it back to Montreal if it came to Buffalo in an American ship, and my hon. friend was not arguing that. He was arguing that the shipper could not get the preference, and I am asking why.

Mr. YOUNG: He is denied the choice of routes.

Mr. MANION: If he ships it to Buffalo in an American ship; no one questions that.

Mr. YOUNG: That being the case, he will not ship it to Buffalo in an American ship, but in a Canadian ship.

Mr. MANION: What is there to prevent him from shipping it on an American ship and then doing as I suggested?

Mr. YOUNG: If he ships it on an American boat to Buffalo, he might find it to his advantage to ship the grain from Buffalo to Montreal and he would be denied that privilege.

Mr. STEVENS: May I point out that the narrow, technical point my hon. friend makes is correct, but in the main his argument is not very sound because if the grain is shipped from Port Arthur in an American ship it is then competent for the shipper to ship it to any market in the world, by the Erie canal, by Boston, Portland, New York, Baltimore or Philadelphia and I believe other ports. In other words, he has all these American ports that he can ship by. On the other hand, if a shipper wants to take his wheat to Buffalo and then move it on to Montreal, as is frequently the case, all he has to do is to ship it in a Canadian vessel to Buffalo. My hon. friend's point, if it has any point, is that this is creating a monopoly for Canadian shipping, and the second point is that there is a combine of Canadian shipping. Those are the two points emphasized, and we might as well combat them now.

As a matter of fact, this does not create a monopoly. It may give a partial preference to Canadian vessels for the movement of grain from the head of the lakes to the seaboard provided the shipper wants to pass his grain through Buffalo and then through Canadian routes. But what are the routes open? You can move the grain from the head of the lakes in large lake vessels to Port McNicoll, Port Colborne, Midland, Goderich and one or two other ports, and from one of these points you can ship it in a smaller boat by canal down the St. Lawrence to Montreal, or you can ship it from any of those ports by rail to Montreal, and the rail rate usually synchronizes with the lake rate on the fall trip. He has the choice of all these routes. He can also ship the grain by a Canadian ship to Buffalo and by another Canadian ship to Montreal, or from Buffalo in an American ship to an American port, or in a Canadian ship to Buffalo and then out through an American port. Surely he has enough choice of routes. We are narrowing that only very slightly, in this respect: We say that we do not wish to extend the coastwise privilege to foreign ships in our waters, and that if the shipper wants to choose one of these dozen routes by Buffalo to Montreal he must use a Canadian ship. That is all we say.

Many hon. gentlemen opposite have said that we are giving this trade into the hands of a monopoly. What are the facts? There are forty steamship lines plying on the great lakes, on the lower lakes and on the upper lakes. On the upper lakes you have vessels of a large capacity, carrying from 250,000 to 550,000 bushels of grain. Most of the boats plying below Niagara are smaller boats of 80,000 to 90,000 and 100,000 bushels capacity. Forty steamship companies operate in those waters. How many of them belong to what is known as the association? Out of forty companies eighteen belong to the association. I will admit that the large company, the Canada Steamships, is one of that group. But there is competition even among the steamships in the association. Then outside the association there are twenty-two steamship companies operating on the great lakes. So I submit to the hon. gentleman in all fairness that there is no sound reason to assert that there is a combine of shipping on the great lakes.

I pointed out the other day what the rates are at the present time. The rate to Montreal, to Three Rivers and Quebec is six cents a bushel. The maximum rate fixed was six and a half cents, but for the last eleven years, from 1921 until 1932, the rate has averaged yearly from eight cents to ten cents per bushel. No one has complained bitterly about it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the minister noticed the press dispatch of this morning stating that it was cut to four cents yesterday?

Mr. STEVENS: In Montreal?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I had not noticed it, but I am glad the hon. member has spoken because as a matter of fact I had intended referring to that matter a moment ago when I was discussing the question of the number of steamship companies operating. I should have concluded my remarks in that connection, and shall do so now. I have gone into this matter with great care. To me it has not been a trivial matter; I have spent hours and hours upon it, and my officers and the board of grain commissioners are constantly in touch with it. I have been assured over and over again that not only is there no monopoly, but there is the most bitter kind of competition. I wished to observe when I stated the fact that the rate was only six cents, instead of six and a half cents, that that was evidence of competition. I have already stated that there is competition within the association itself. But as to the twenty-two steamship companies outside of the association I had intended to say that there was every possibility—I am informed that there was—of keen competition and cutting of rates. The hon. member has just told me that the rate to-day is announced as four cents a bushel. It is news to me, and I thank the hon. member for it. I wish to assure hon. members opposite that in this legislation they will find all the elements of sound competition.

Another point we must keep in mind is this, that during the years to which I referred the other night, when we opened the Canadian coastal trade to American vessels—that was, mark you, for the movement of grain from Port Arthur to our own bay ports, as they are called—during those years that power was exercised because of a paucity of vessels capable of carrying cargo in Canadian waters. But that very paucity of vessels incited the forty companies to which I have referred to purchase ships; as a result they purchased some in the United States and some in Great Britain. Some of them, particularly the larger vessels, were built on the great lakes. Some of them are old Canadian National ships turned into lake carriers. Although I have not the exact number, the figures are set forth in detail in the Senate report. There are literally scores of vessels. I find that there are fifty-two on the upper lakes and many more than that on the lower lakes.

Mr. MANION: With a capacity of nearly fourteen million bushels.

Mr. STEVENS: They had a carrying capacity at one time of fourteen million bushels. That shows the extent to which our lake shipping has developed. Certainly at the present time there is no need to open Canadian coastal trade to foreign vessels. But I do point out to the house that it has been the practice in the past to do that. It has been our practice to do it and, as I said, to do it over night—it requires no length of time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How often is that done?—the opening up to which the minister has referred.

Mr. STEVENS: By order in council.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is done for storage purposes in the fall?

Mr. STEVENS: No, not necessarily. I know what the hon. member is referring to. He is quite right in saying it has been common practice to open up at the end of the season for storage purposes. If I am called upon to do so I shall again cite the figures I gave the other night.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not at all interested in that. I know perfectly well that almost every year we are forced to open up in the fall for storage purposes.

Mr. STEVENS: And for carrying.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister is stretching a point there.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I am not. I can cite the figures, if I can lay my hands upon them.

Mr. MANION: When my hon. friend's government was in power they asked them to do it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite right.

Mr. STEVENS: In 1924 hon. members opposite went to Chicago and invited vessels to come up.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On several occasions I went through the process of ascertaining whether or not storage space was available in the fall. Large quantities of grain were stored in American bottoms and carried to Canadian ports. No one denies that. The minister is stating it was open for traffic.

Mr. MANION: So it was.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not anticipate that this point would be challenged again, and I find that I have not the figures before me. The other day I gave them for a period of years. I believe I can place my hands upon them. They showed distinctly that what I am stating is true. Hon. members opposite will notice that in some years only a few American boats came to Canadian ports. The figures I gave in my remarks the other evening will indicate the years when the boats were used for storage purposes only.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall give the hon. member an answer, and I am certain he will agree with it. In 1922 only 383,148 bushels were sent in American boats to Canadian ports. No doubt that was some vessel tied up at Goderich, or at some other point. In 1923 there were 1,220,900—storage again. In 1924 there were 4,241,535 and in 1925, 113,810. In 1926 there were about 5,000,000 bushels, and in 1927 over 7,000,000 bushels. I am certain they were not American ships in storage because that would mean at least twenty of their larger ships. But in 1928 we have nearly 20,000,000 bushels. That was not storage, but represented a very substantial traffic.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I ask a question? How many boats stored wheat in the port of Montreal during the winter of 1928? I say there were seventy-five. I visited the port to see that very thing.

Mr. STEVENS: Seventy-five boats would carry about 7,000,000 bushels, but the figures for that year show 19,000,000 bushels. I submit it is well known that they were admitted occasionally for carrying purposes when required.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think so.

Mr. STEVENS: Since those years there has been an accretion to the Canadian fleet, and there is no need for it. But if need arises we have power under section 938 of the law.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The same power which existed previously.

Mr. STEVENS: And we have powers under the coastal laws, so that there is ample protection in the law as it stands for all interests which may be affected. The point I am endeavouring to emphasize to the committee is that the facts do not bear out certain allegations made by hon. members opposite. The facts do not show that there is a monopoly of shipping on the lakes which will be used to the detriment of the producers at the head of the lakes. No evidence has yet been produced to support that contention; in fact there is abundant evidence to the contrary.

In the second place, the question of rates has been challenged. The rate to-day is four cents, whereas for a period of ten or eleven years it ranged from eight cents to ten cents. I am not making any suggestions in this connection, but I am merely stating what has occurred. I say therefore that there is no reason to be alarmed in regard to rates. Then, we have the Inland Water Freight Rates Act by which the board of grain commissioners have control. And I submit that that control, which has never been exercised to any great degree, can be exercised more than it has in the past. If operated in conjunction with the power under the shipping act to suspend, the west is ensured against danger of monopoly, unfair rates or anything which will interfere with the free movement of the grain. As I said to the hon. member for Weyburn, out of a dozen different rates for movement of grain to the sea we are interfering only in part with one. That is all. We are interfering to ensure in larger measure to our own ships the carriage of our own goods, in the interest of the men working on the ships as well as of those who own them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This matter is one with which we had a great deal to do in former days. Application was made almost every fall to permit American bottoms to come in and store grain through the winter, thus providing additional storage space, and they would be permitted to take the grain to a Canadian port to unload in the spring. Apparently no change has been made in that respect; it is permissible under the proposed amendments. Am I right in assuming that the only intention of these amendments is that the government will not permit American bottoms to carry grain to Buffalo, unload it there and reship it to Montreal in American bottoms?

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So really the only thing you are doing is taking away the permission to carry grain from Buffalo or an American port to Montreal?

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. MANION: Or on either leg of the journey.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then if the grain is destined to a Canadian port an American ship cannot carry it to Buffalo?

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is much more serious than the other aspect. Because as I have examined these rates I see no reason why the rate to Montreal should not be four cents; when the rate for a journey three times the length, namely to Port Colborne and Buffalo from Fort William, is around two cents or one and a half. I see no reason why they cannot carry it the rest of the distance at that rate. One may assume that the mere fact that American bottoms are carrying grain to Buffalo, even if you stop them there, will have a regulating influence on the movement of grain to lake ports. Every one knows that the bulk of the grain is moved from Fort William to Georgian bay ports and thence largely by rail to Montreal. So there is nothing strange about a four cent rate to Montreal when the average rate in the past three years, without going beyond that, has been less than two cents to Port Colborne and Buffalo.

Mr. MANION: Except that the rate to Montreal includes the transshipment at Port Colborne. Of course that costs something.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, competition there did not have the same effect as competition to Port Colborne and Buffalo. Competition to Port Colborne and Buffalo undoubtedly kept that rate down; no one can deny that, or the rate to the lake ports would have been higher when rates were eight and ten cents to Montreal.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt there?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not going to say much about this except that having had the matter up so frequently during the eight or nine years we were in office, and having permitted by order in council the storage of grain in American bottoms and the unloading at Canadian ports in the spring, I always felt that the little bit of competition which the permission to American bottoms to carry Canadian grain from the head of the lakes to their own port of Buffalo acted as a regulating influence upon rates from Fort Fort William to the bay ports. After all that is the important end, because I always look upon the direct shipment via bay ports to Montreal by train as the most economical route for handling the grain. I thought all you were doing by this provision was merely taking away the right to move that grain from Buffalo to Montreal in American bottoms. But if you say that every bushel of grain that goes to Buffalo in bond, before they decide whether it shall go out through American or Canadian ports, is going to be denied carriage in American bottoms, then you are handing a pretty strong lever to our Canadian shipping. If that is not true then why for the last ten or fifteen years as far as I know have the Canadian shippers always been complaining about this very thing?

Mr. MANION: Because they are not treated on the same basis as the Americans treat their ships.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If there is nothing in it, why the demand practically every year for permission for American bottoms to handle Canadian grain, always refused as far as I remember except on two occasions, when it became evident that there was not sufficient storage space to take care of the grain?

Mr. MANION: The reason the Canadian shipping objected to American competition was that Canadian ships were not permitted to do the same thing on the American side.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh yes, they are.

Mr. MANION: Oh no, the American shipping laws will not permit Canadian ships to take part in any American coastal trade. Let me give an instance. Last year or the year before there was a good deal of sulphur shipped from Texas up the Atlantic coast to Montreal and then transshipped and taken to some inland American port. The Canadian boats wished to share in that traffic but no Canadian boats could get in on it at all; the American shipping laws do not permit them to take part on one leg or the other in intercoastal shipping in the United States. That is the reason Canadian shipping wants to be put on the same basis. This bill merely does that and nothing more—not another thing beyond what the Americans have been doing to the Canadians for years. This is the first time that Canadian shipping is being put on the same basis as American, and it is only fair that it should be. In regard to the remark of my hon. friend from Weyburn—

Mr. VALLANCE: Before the hon. minister leaves that sulphur shipment, is it proposed now to refuse to let an American bottom come to the port of Montreal and do what they did with the sulphur?

Mr. MANION: No, certainly not. We do not interfere with that in the least. I was just giving that as an illustration of the intercoastal trade of the United States, in which they will not permit a Canadian ship to take part on either leg of the journey. We are only putting the wheat trade on the same basis. Previous to this bill an American ship could carry wheat to Buffalo and another American ship could take it thence to Montreal, so that they did both legs of the journey, but Canadians were not allowed to carry on either leg of a corresponding journey between American ports. Now we are putting them on the same basis.

I might give another illustration that came to my notice as Minister of Railways in regard to a large number of cargoes of coal shipped up the lakes. It is said that the Canadian ships are in a combine. The prices quoted for the carriage of that coal ran from 17 cents to 25 cents per ton. Seventeen cents is a ridiculously low rate, a losing rate, and some ships would not look at it, but the tenders ran from 17 to 25 cents; I think some were 20 and 22. That does not look much like a combine. The coal traffic is usually divided amongst them at the lowest rate. If there was anything in the shape of a combine all they had to do was to get together and instead of tendering from 17 to 25 cents, all put in the 25 cent rate. That came to my notice within the last two weeks. It shows that there certainly is not a combine on the up journey. And by all the methods that the Minister of Marine has mentioned in this discussion the government can certainly prevent a combine on the down journey.

Mr. YOUNG: Has the minister seen the by-laws of the Associated Lake Freighters?

Mr. MANION: I have not seen them recently, but I am arguing the point without the by-laws; we have power through the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Marine and the board of grain commissioners and the shipping laws to break any such combine. And finally, if the Canadian shipowners take unfair advantage, this parliament can repeal the law. I do not think there would be a man on this side of the house who would not at once support the repeal if he thought the Canadian shipowners with their fifty-two ships were taking unfair advantage of this law in any shape or form. Surely every member of this committee is anxious for Canadian advantage; surely it is not the desire of the committee to give to American bottoms the right to drive Canadian bottoms out of the great lakes trade and put into the hands of American bottoms complete control of the carriage of Canadian grain, giving them power to charge any price they choose later on. Surely we do not wish entirely to destroy our Canadian shipping, but that is what is happening to-day. Anyone who has watched the price of the stock of the Canada Steamship Lines, which is the biggest line on the lakes, knows what is happening. This line has the largest fresh water ship in the world, the Lemorne, with a capacity of something like 600,000 bushels of grain. A few years ago the preference stock of the Canada Steamship Lines was selling at 84. Yesterday, out of curiosity, I checked it up, and I found that it was selling at 7. The reason is that the company is on the verge of going out of business; it cannot carry on with the present business that is being done. It is not getting the business, and I think it is only fair that we should want some Canadian shipping left.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister had better say they need volume.

Mr. MANION: That is what I said; they are not getting the business. If the United States vessels are allowed to come in and take it away from them they cannot carry on. After all—though my hon. friend will not agree with this—the basis of protection is to give volume, not necessarily higher prices. If our Canadian ships, after they get the traffic, do not treat the farmers of the west fairly I for one, and I am sure I should be joined by all hon. members on this side of the house, would want to undo a law that harmed the farmers. I am not a farmer myself, but the head of the lakes is just as much interested in the success of the farmers as are the farmers themselves.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will United States vessels still be permitted to carry grain consigned through United States ports?

Mr. MANION: Certainly.

Mr. VALLANCE: Some time ago the minister gave the total capacity of the lake carriers as 14,000,000 bushels. Perhaps the minister, coming from the head of the lakes, will be able to answer this question: On the average how long does it take to make the trip from the head of the lakes and back?

Mr. MANION: To Montreal?

Mr. VALLANCE: Average them all up.

Mr. MANION: It depends to a large extent on where the vessel is going. It is very much shorter to the Georgian bay ports than it is to Port Colborne; it is a great deal shorter to Port Colborne than to Prescott, and it is still farther to Montreal. Since the Welland canal has been deepened it is possible for the large boats to go as far as Prescott. I do not know what the average would be, and I would hardly care to make a guess.

Mr. VALLANCE: Six days?

Mr. MANION: Yes, that would be my guess if I cared to make one.

Mr. VALLANCE: For the sake of argument we will say it takes six days, and we will assume that the lakes are open for twelve weeks in the fall.

Mr. MANION: I see what my hon. friend is coming to, and I do not wish to make a statement that I cannot support. I do not know that six days would be the average. It would be roughly a three day journey from the head of the lakes to Port Colborne, and of course it would take three days to go back. But they have to unload and they might be tied up waiting for other ships or for other reasons. They could not make it to Montreal and back in six days, so I should say that average is rather low.

Mr. VALLANCE: All I want to point out is that if we had twelve weeks in the fall, in the rush season, with that capacity we could only move 168,000,000 bushels. Would there not be some danger of congestion at the head of the lakes in that event?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, 168,000,000 bushels is a lot of grain to move in three months.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then let me ask the minister this question: On the average how much is offered by the farmers of the west to the trade, and what is the total storage capacity at the head of the lakes?

Mr. STEVENS: There my hon. friend comes up against the question of futures, as he knows. The only way the grain of the western farmers is taken care of, as far as offerings are concerned, is by the existence of the futures' market, and the grain is held by those who desire to go into that business. My hon. friend knows that last winter we held at the head of the lakes something like 68,000,000 bushels. I could look up the figures, if I had time, to show precisely the amount of grain that has been moved during the fall rush, but I do not think it applies to this argument.

May I reply to an observation made by the hon. member for West Edmonton, which I think should not go unchallenged. The hon. gentleman said the rate to Buffalo was two cents, and he went on to say that surely another two cents ought to cover the transportation to Montreal. I know the committee desires to be just and fair. The movement from the head of the lakes to Buffalo or any bay port is made in these large vessels. I will give the capacity of just a few; 420,000 bushels, 460,000 bushels, 350,000 bushels, 550,000 bushels, 220,000 bushels, 320,000 bushels and so on. The capacity of the ships below Niagara, however, is much less; some of them carry 95,000 bushels, 85,000 bushels, 82,000 bushels, 75,000 bushels, 100,000 bushels and so on, most of them less than 85,000 bushels. So the movement of grain over a short distance in a ship carrying 400,000 bushels is a much less expensive proposition than the handling of grain in a ship carrying only 70,000 or 80,000 bushels.

That is the first point. Then we must remember that with the exception of the Soo it is clear sailing from the head of the lakes to Buffalo or Port Colborne or the bay ports, but from Niagara down to Montreal the ships must pass through a long series of canals and locks. The difficulties in navigating these narrower and more difficult waters certainly are much more serious than is the case on the lakes. As a consequence the rates from Buffalo or Port Colborne to Montreal could not be expected to be anything like as low as the rates from the head of the lakes to Buffalo. I think it is only fair to the shipping interests to point out these facts. I am definitely of the opinion that there is no ground for complaint when the rate from the head of the lakes is around six or seven cents a bushel, The present rate of four cents a bushel, while no doubt a good rate for those shipping the grain, certainly is most unprofitable for the carriers.

Mr. DONNELLY: I want to take the minister back to where this discussion started. We are talking about shipping Canadian wheat to Great Britain, and the possibility of shipping that wheat through a foreign country and obtaining the preference. The Minister of Railways and the Minister of Trade and Commerce both told us how easy it was to do this, but they did not tell us how much grain has been shipped in that way. I want to know if any wheat has been shipped to Great Britain through a foreign country that obtained the preference and, if so, how much.

Mr. STEVENS: I have not the figures, but I have made inquiries.

Mr. DONNELLY: That just goes to show that it is rather hard to do. We were led to believe that most of the grain was going that way, but now we are told that no one knows how much is being shipped through a foreign country.

Mr. STEVENS: I said yesterday that I would try to get the figures, and I am still trying to do so. As I pointed out, the movement of grain whether through Buffalo, Montreal or any other export point, is very difficult to keep track of so far as Canadian statistics are concerned. The prevailing practice is to bill the grain out as for the United Kingdom, and then the destination is changed later.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is not the point.

Mr. STEVENS: I am trying to show my hon. friend the difficulty of securing these figures.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister is not telling us anything we do not know. We are trying to get some actual facts as to how much grain has been shipped in that way, but we are told that no one knows. There is another point I brought up the other day as well. A good deal of our wheat during the past year went to Buffalo and was transshipped to Montreal. We were led to believe that practically all Canadian wheat going to Buffalo was shipped in American bottoms. What I should like to know is how much of our wheat was shipped in Canadian bottoms and how much in American, going from Buffalo to Montreal. I think you will find that most of it went in Canadian bottoms.

Mr. MANION: Well, that will not be interfered with.

Mr. DONNELLY: It will, I submit, because wheat cannot be shipped in an American bottom to Buffalo and come from Buffalo to Montreal in an American ship.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman said that most of the grain went in Canadian bottoms. That will not be interfered with.

Mr. DONNELLY: We were given to understand that last year most of the grain went from Buffalo to Montreal in American bottoms, but I contend that most of it went in Canadian ships. This competition is the only competition we have had—the competition furnished by American ships from Buffalo. That is the only competition we have depended on in order to secure low rates. We have been getting low rates because of the fact that grain has come from Buffalo to Montreal in American bottoms. Will the minister tell us how much Canadian wheat going either from Duluth or Chicago to Montreal was carried in Canadian bottoms? We have not had any statement in that regard. Some of the wheat going down the lakes, from Duluth and Chicago, goes down in Canadian bottoms. What I want to know is how much wheat during the past year was carried in Canadian ships.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend said that this bill would wipe out the competition so far as Buffalo is concerned. It will not wipe out that competition. It is true it will eliminate part of it but there is still the competition furnished by Canadian ships carrying grain to Buffalo. That competition will continue, and it applies to all grain going on to Montreal or going out the other way. There is still also the competition from the shipping of grain in American bottoms to Buffalo. A man shipping from the head of the lakes may ship in a Canadian bottom to Buffalo, or by an American bottom through an American port, and there is still competition to that extent. The hon. gentleman is correct to this extent, that competition is eliminated with respect to that proportion of the grain that may have been carried to Buffalo in American ships and then carried on to some Canadian port. The fact remains, however, that all competition is not wiped out, because there still remains a good deal of it.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. DONNELLY: The only competition we have had for years has been in connection with wheat going to Buffalo. Is not that a fact?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: Well, what other competition has there been?

Mr. MANION: As regards wheat going to Buffalo—

Mr. DONNELLY: Let the Minister of Trade and Commerce answer the question. What competition have our Canadian ships had to face?

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman asks a question and wishes to answer it himself.

Mr. DONNELLY: The Minister of Trade and Commerce answered my question. He said no, and I want to know why he gives that answer.

Mr. MANION: I say that there is still competition to Buffalo inasmuch as the American ship can take the grain to that port and it can be shipped right through anyway. So that there is still that competition in the shipping of grain from the head of the lakes. The only point is that once it has gone to Buffalo in an American ship it cannot come back to Canada at Montreal, but it can go through Portland, Boston, Philadelphia or New York.

Mr. DONNELLY: The statement I made was this, that for the last few years the only competition Canadian boats have had to contend with was in connection with grain going to Buffalo, and I said, "Isn't that so?" And the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, "no". Then the Minister of Railways got up to reply to that question I asked. Did he reply to it?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: I don't think you did. I repeat, the only competition that Canadian boats have had to put up with in the carrying of wheat has been in connection with wheat going to Buffalo. That is all.

Mr. MANION: And it can still go to Buffalo.

Mr. DONNELLY: I asked whether or not it was so and the Minister of Trade and Commerce said it was not; I was not right. Well, what other competition has there been? None whatever. That is the only competition, and that competition to-day is curtailed to a certain extent because you cannot ship wheat to-day by an American bottom to Buffalo and then on to Montreal; under this bill it cannot be done, so that the competition is curtailed to that extent.

Mr. MANION: There would have been no argument if the hon. gentleman had said curtailed in the first instance. I understood him to say that the competition had been wiped out. It is true that it will be curtailed to some extent by this bill, but there is still the Buffalo competition by Canadian boats and on by Canadian boats to Montreal.

Mr. YOUNG: The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that there were a dozen routes by which we could ship from the head of the lakes to Montreal and that only one of them was being interfered with, and that one not completely. That is true, but the one that is being interfered with is the one in which there is competition, and it is the one in which we have lower freight rates. The freight rates to Buffalo are lower than the rates on the shorter haul to bay ports. It is the one in which we have American competition, the one in which we get lower rates; and the result of this interference will be to eliminate the competitive factor which reduces these rates. The minister suggests, further, that there is competition inside the combine—competition among themselves. I say there is not. James Stewart, who is head of the combine, sits in his office and allots the tonnage to the various vessels. He says to one, "You go there and get so many tons", or he may order the ship to tie up and stay where it is. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce will read the by-laws of the company he will appreciate what I am saying. The minister says that there are some lines that are not in the association. Yes; I know one steamship company that refused to be coerced into it because they said it was a direct violation of the criminal code and they would not make themselves liable in that regard. If that is not a combine I do not know what is.

Mr. STEVENS: When the hon. gentleman talks about a combine, it reminds me of the time, fifteen years ago, when almost every speech in this house contained references to combines, mergers and so forth. If the hon. gentleman means that certain business groups are working under an arrangement among themselves for the orderly handling of business, and if he suggests that this constitutes a combine, he may interpret the act in that way. But I would point out that there is a definite legal interpretation of the word combine.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, in the criminal code.

Mr. STEVENS: In the combines act. A combine exists where there is a combination of business interests in restraint of trade to the detriment of the community as a whole, or affecting other persons' affairs; and under the statute it is competent for any six persons—those who have spoken right in this house—to lay information if they so desire and have an investigation. Such investigations have been held; we have had two or three since the house met. But if my hon. friend talks about a combine in that sense, I say there is none so far as I know. But even in the narrow sense in which he interprets it, I submit that out of forty steamship companies in the business there are twenty-two that are not in the association and eighteen that are, and if we wanted any evidence, if there were any desire to obtain evidence of the ineffectiveness of any combination of interests we have had that evidence in the last two years so far as the welfare of the shipping companies is concerned. We have seen ships tied up, companies going bankrupt, ships not able to get cargoes, and strenuous efforts being put forth to obtain business—keen and bitter competition. There never was a time on the great lakes when there was more competition than there has been in the last year or two. My hon. friend, therefore, should not speak of combines unless he is prepared to make a statement under the act and charge that there is.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

DISCOUNT AND LOAN CORPORATION OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 110, to incorporate the Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada—Mr. Sullivan—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Loans.

Mr. POULIOT: I have no particular objection to this bill provided that the promoters of the company do not sell any shares in my constituency.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. SPENCER: Before you report the bill, we did not hear who was in charge of it and we have had no explanation from the sponsor. I would like to ask what percentage of interest it is proposed to charge.

Mr. SULLIVAN: Seven per cent. Originally the charge was 12 per cent. We have reduced it to 7, or 5 per cent less.

Mr. SPENCER: Does that include all the various charges that are made?

Mr. SULLIVAN: It carries everything.

Bill reported.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPENCER: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On subsection 935—British ships only may engage in coasting trade.

Mr. DONNELLY: Just before six o'clock I was asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce to tell me how much Canadian wheat had been carried by Canadian bottoms to Montreal and how much Canadian wheat that was in Buffalo had been carried by Canadian bottoms and how much by United States bottoms to Montreal. Has he the information for me now?

Mr. STEVENS: I have no additional information.

Mr. DONNELLY: Just before six o'clock the hon. member for Weyburn brought up the matter of the alleged combine. The minister tried to assure us that there was none. Yet he says some eighteen companies were in some sort of association and there were twenty-two companies that were out of it. That does not give us much information. Would he tell us the amount of tonnage in the association, the amount out of it and also the amount of tonnage interested only in the transportation of wheat. Many boats on the lakes will not engage in the transportation of wheat and therefore might not be in this estimate that he gave. As was said by the hon. member for Weyburn, it is well known that James Stewart, who organized this association and is the head of it, receives as his share one-fortieth of a cent a bushel for every bushel that is shipped. If he had received his full amount for what Canadian wheat was shipped last year, he would have got in the neighbourhood of $100,000. The wheat growers of western Canada are paying this. To-night's paper shows that the lake freight rate on wheat has fallen to four cents a bushel, this being probably due to what took place in the house yesterday. There is some alarm over this legislation. We know very well certain companies thought seriously of going into this association or combine and when they consulted their legal adviser in connection with the matter, he advised them to stay out of it because he said that they would be subject to section 498 of the criminal code which states:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $4,000 and not less than $200, or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000, and not less than $1,000, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company,
> (a) to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce.

On account of that section, the company to which I have referred was advised not to go into this combine. It is an assured fact that a number of these people are working together for no other purpose than to raise freight rates, that is the only reason they would get together. The only thing which enables us to keep down the prices is the competitive price to Buffalo and under this bill the competition of United States boats going into Buffalo with Canadian grain would be done away with to a great extent. Can the minister give me the information regarding the amount of grain going to Montreal?

Mr. STEVENS: As regards the question of tonnage of companies in or out of the association, I have not figured that out at all, but I suppose it could be done without any great difficulty. When I used that argument, I did make the statement that the Canada Steamship Lines, one of the largest companies, was, I understood, in the association. But I said that there were those twenty-two companies outside, operating independently. I could not give my hon. friend the precise tonnage, but I can say this, that this was in connection with companies engaged in the grain carrying trade.

In regard to the other question asked, namely, the quantity moved from Buffalo to Montreal in Canadian vessels and the quantity moved in United States vessels, I made inquiries, but I have not any definite, final figures on the matter, I have not, however, the slightest objection to my hon. friend, for the sake of his argument, assuming what he has or others have asserted, namely, that the bulk of it is carried in Canadian bottoms. I am not objecting to that at all. I am placing no argument against it. I am not able to give my hon. friend precise figures. When he and other hon. gentlemen ask regarding the amount of grain exported to Great Britain via American ports and that earned the preference, I have told him and others that there is great difficulty in getting those figures. I tried yesterday and the day before to get them, but I have not been able to do so. One of the difficulties, as I pointed out this afternoon, is that frequently, and indeed very commonly, grain is exported both via Montreal and American ports consigned to the United Kingdom, because that is the best and the largest market, and then frequently after it has left the seaboard it is reconsigned to some other destination. I stated this afternoon that one of the difficulties we have experienced in the compilation of Canadian export statistics is the redirecting of wheat or grain on the high seas after it has left Canadian ports. I am sorry that in the short time available since this question was raised during the last few days I have not been able to secure the information, although I have asked for it. I am sorry it is not available. It is not a simple but a comparatively difficult matter to work out.

Mr. DONNELLY: We know that there have been two shipments of Canadian wheat through foreign ports to Great Britain, and that neither received the preference. We have not heard of any such shipment that did, and therefore we assume, and I believe correctly, that no Canadian wheat so shipped to Great Britain has received the preference in that market. So why beat about the bush? Why not come out openly and say plainly: "We do not know of any such shipment that has received the preference." We have heard of none. We know that two shipments tried to get the preference and did not get it. That is all we have heard about it. On the other hand, it is of vital importance that we should know how much American wheat is taken to Montreal in Canadian bottoms. We hear so much about Canadian wheat going to Buffalo in American bottoms that I think it is only fair we should be told how much American wheat is taken to Montreal in Canadian bottoms. A very large amount of wheat goes out of Montreal every week. How much is Canadian and how much is American?

One more word with regard to this combine. The minister knows very well that this association was started last June, and he also knows very well that at that time the rate from the head of the lakes to Montreal was 4·1 cents. It was the understanding of this association that they would endeavour to put up the rates from Fort William to Montreal half a cent a bushel a month. And how did they succeed? In the month of June the rate from Fort William to Montreal was 4·1; July, 4·5; August, 5·2; September, 6·4; October 6·7 or almost 6·8, and at the very time those rates were being raised by half a cent a bushel a month the rate from Fort William to Buffalo remained steady; it practically never changed at all. Here are the rates from Fort William to Buffalo for the same months: June, 1·56; July, 1·57; August, 1·54; September, 1·52; October, 1·52. So the rates from Fort William to Buffalo practically never changed; and yet the rate from Fort William to Montreal rose from 4·1 in June to almost 6·8 in October. How does the minister explain that, except by the fact that there was some kind of association or combine among the boat owners to raise the rate from the head of the lakes to Montreal? If the minister does not give us any answer we must assume that there was a combine, and I think it is up to the minister and the government to look into that matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not gather that my hon. friend wanted me to deal with that question again because I have dealt with it already half a dozen times. I have done my utmost to demonstrate to the committee, and I think I have done so to the reasonable satisfaction of hon. members who desire to be fair in the matter, that leaving aside this one rate of four cents which was brought to my attention while I was on my feet, the prevailing rates to-day from Fort William to Montreal are exceedingly reasonable. They are substantially lower than the rates that have prevailed for the last ten years. I gave the rates in detail over a period of ten or twelve years, showing that the prevailing rate of six cents was low. I also pointed out in my previous remarks, but I will repeat it for my hon. friends, that the rate of four cents a bushel is an exceedingly low rate due to distress competition; there is no question about that at all.

I have also pointed out, so far as the alleged combine is concerned, that personally I do not think there is a combine in the sense in which that word is used, namely, a combine in restraint of trade. I have also pointed out that the law respecting combines is simple and clear, that any six persons who feel there is a combine in restraint of trade can put the act in motion. The act has been invoked in a number of instances in the last few years, and in a very simple manner. It is not my business to invoke it. It is open to any six citizens who feel in any way aggrieved in that respect to do so.

Mr. DONNELLY: Suppose six citizens put the act in operation to see if there is a combine. We saw something last year of the effect of that when we had an alleged combine in the coal trade investigated, and we heard nothing more about it.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not correct.

Mr. DONNELLY: Practically speaking. We cannot get the information, anyway.

Mr. STEVENS: It is now in the hands of the authorities of Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. DONNELLY: We would get no better results from an investigation in this case. What I want the minister to explain is how those rates went up. What was the cause of the Canadian boats—and the grain can only be carried in Canadian bottoms—raising the rates from Fort William to Montreal from 4·1 in June to 6·8 in October while the rate from Fort William to Buffalo remained exactly the same during all those months? There is no other reason whatever except the existence of a combine or working arrangement among our Canadian boats to put up the price.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is not stating the case correctly. Wheat can be carried right up to this moment in American bottoms on the first leg of the journey. My hon. friend said that the rise in the rates was due to the fact that the wheat could only be carried in Canadian bottoms. But I say it can be carried in American bottoms. This competition is in existence now and has been in existence. So my hon. friend is not correct in that statement, for there is the full force of American competition at play.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is just what I wanted the minister to explain—what caused the rise in the rates.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to a phase that has not so far been discussed. It must be a relief to him to hear something that has not been discussed several times. Subsection 4 of clause 935 reads:

> Any goods so transported shall be forfeited as being smuggled goods.

The law is going to forbid a foreign vessel from taking goods or passengers from one port in Canada to another, and it provides a severe penalty for violation of the law, $500 in the case of freight, and $500 for each passenger in the case of passengers. That may be all right for the big shipping companies and the big shippers who know what the law is, but I submit that to forfeit the goods so transported as being smuggled goods would be very unjust to what is known in some cases as the innocent purchaser. If a man has a horse stolen he can recover it from anybody who has obtained it in an illegal way, but if it is found in the hands of an innocent purchaser who has bought it not knowing it was stolen, and has paid a fair price for it, he cannot recover. Here is a case I should like to place before the minister. Being a business man he may think only in terms of big shipping interests, but I am thinking of the smaller people. I engage his attention, because his local knowledge will enable him to follow me.

We will suppose there is a man at Alert Bay, which is a point one hundred and eighty-three miles north of Vancouver. This man is out of a job, but has a chance to gain employment at Campbell River, a point say, one hundred miles south. He, his wife, his family and household goods are on the wharf at Alert Bay. A steamer comes to that point. He does not ask to see the ship's papers to ascertain where it comes from. Why would he, being a man ignorant of such matters? He goes on board, and when the ship is three or four miles away from the wharf the purser comes along. Of course the purser should not carry the man under those conditions, but chances are he will take him then. A heavy fine may be imposed for this infringement of the law. But I am thinking of the man out of employment. We find that when he gets to Campbell River he is liable to have his household goods forfeited, due to the fact that they are regarded as being smuggled. That is not fair. He has been a perfectly innocent man.

Let me give another instance. A hand logger has been working in a little cove for a period of six months employed getting out logs. He, too, is ignorant of our coastal law. His work is about completed, and he is looking for a tug to tow it to Vancouver, or elsewhere. The cove may be located in a sheltered bay to which tugs would come. Finally he will get a fair price from some tug, and that tug is given the work. It is afterwards discovered that he has employed an American tug, and he is liable to forfeit his whole winter's work. It may be argued that this instance would not come under the law, because a tug is not a ship. In answer to that argument I turn to page 10 of the large bill amending the shipping act which, although not yet passed, will no doubt come before us. I find under the definition of a ship that a ship includes "every description of vessel used in navigation, not propelled by oars." Either a tug boat or a gas boat, under that definition, would be a ship. If the man who, in the course of ordinary business, could not be expected to ascertain the exact registry of this tug, does not do so, then he is liable to lose his whole winter's work. That would be the result because of ignorance for which he could not be held responsible. Would it not be sufficient punishment if the ship were fined $500 and a further fine of $500 for each passenger, without confiscating the goods? It seems to me excessive punishment.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This legislation has been on our statute books for years, and no exception was ever taken to it. There is no change whatever in this clause so far as the points raised by the hon. member are concerned. Clause 935 of the statute reads:

1. No goods or passengers shall be carried by water, from one port of Canada to another, except in British ships.

2. If any goods or passengers are so carried, contrary to this part, the master of the ship or vessel so carrying them shall incur a penalty of $400; and any goods so carried shall be forfeited as smuggled.

We have not brought in any new legislation on this point. If the hon. member wishes to read clause 936 he will find that it, also, is fair legislation. The cases suggested by the hon. member are most extreme, and I do not think that such circumstances would ever arise. If they did, I am sure a good lawyer would surely save the goods subject to confiscation, and the owner of the ship would be protected.

Mr. NEILL: I am afraid for the innocent passenger or shipper, not for the owner of the ship. The minister states that this legislation has been in the statutes for years, but never has been enforced.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It has always been enforced, but no complaint was ever received against it.

Mr. NEILL: That is equivalent to saying that in a case such as I have indicated it has never been enforced. If it has never been enforced this would be a good time to eliminate it. I believe it is good policy to eliminate faulty legislation when we are making a general revision. If it cannot be defended more successfully than the minister has defended it, I suggest my contention holds. The minister has stated that I have referred to extreme cases. I say that they are not extreme, but are common cases in the area in which I am interested, and are likely to occur at any time. I cannot definitely point out any cases in which the law has been enforced, but it is not wise to have useless legislation on the statute books. However, if the minister will not listen to me I shall not waste the time of the committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Merchant Shipping Act 1894, not affected.

Mr. NEILL: I have only one last word to say to the minister. On this bill which contains only two sections there has been a discussion lasting about three hours and a half. This lengthy discussion has been brought about because the bill was not sent to a committee where it could have been discussed around a table. I have in my hand the original bill which no doubt will be introduced again next year. This bill containing amendments to the shipping act consists of eight hundred and twenty-one sections, and by a simple process of arithmetic I have ascertained that if we are as long proportionately in the discussion of that bill as we have been on this one, about ten months' continuous sitting will be required. I submit to the minister, and to the Prime Minister, who, I suppose, is in some measure responsible for the present bill being brought before a committee of the whole instead of before the special committee, that they would do well to allow the bigger bill to go to the committee on marine and fisheries. I believe it is within the knowledge of every hon. member who has followed the progress of bills, such as the pension bill, that legislation is passed much more quickly if in the first instance it is discussed before the smaller committee.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can say to my hon. friend that the matter will be considered then. I do not think so much time will be required for the study of the full revision, because a great many of the sections are merely a repetition of sections in force at the present time. Some parts of the bill may be contested, but many of them will be accepted as being the law in force at the present time.

Section agreed to.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have an amendment which I shall ask my colleague to move.

Mr. STEVENS: The government has decided and the minister is now asking me to move an amendment which the Prime Minister suggests should be added as a third section at the end of the bill, as follows:

That subsection 12 of section 1 of this act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: What it is intended to do is to add a section providing that subsection 12 of section 1, which reenacts section 935 regarding British ships only engaging in coasting trade, shall come into force only on proclamation. It will be a new section 3.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time on division and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED SATURDAY SITTING—REDISTRIBUTION BILL—ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, shortly after three o'clock this afternoon I indicated that the notice standing in my name on the order paper might stand until eight o'clock. That notice is of a motion that the house sit to-morrow from eleven to one o'clock and from three until six, and probably not in the evening. I have just been conferring with the right hon. leader of the opposition, who takes the view that it is perhaps undesirable that we should sit to-morrow. I am prepared to sit to-morrow and start consideration of the redistribution bill. The first seven sections of it I fancy could be passed without difficulty, and I then propose to commence at page 34 of the schedule and take the ridings in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, in Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, leaving Ontario and Quebec only for further consideration. I am entirely in the hands of the house in the matter, and will be guided largely by the views that are expressed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if we had been fortunate enough to reach an agreement that was at all general with respect to the redistribution measure I would see some advantage in going on immediately with the bill. But if, as I understand is the case, no agreement has been reached between the different parties in the house with respect to the constituencies generally, I think possibly it would be just as well to conclude everything except the redistribution measure and start afresh with it on Monday morning.

The Prime Minister speaks as though it is going to be an easy matter to pass the bill, but I may say to him at once that if what has been accomplished in the last three redistributions, namely effecting a redistribution by agreement, is not to be accomplished at the present time, I am afraid we will have to take as strong a position as we can in this matter, and while we may be in the minority we will do the best we can to protect the rights of the minority and if need be fight to the finish. If the choice is to lie between a redistribution to be effected by joint agreement of the different parties in the house and one which is to be put through, as the Prime Minister said the other day, by "what is sometimes called the brute majority," we will just have to see how long we can resist the brute majority. We certainly are not going to see the constituencies of this country unjustly redistributed at the will of the administration just because they know they have the majority behind them to put any redistribution through. I had hoped that it might be possible to effect a redistribution in the different provinces of the dominion that would be recognized as fair, but apparently that is not the case, and in the circumstances I would say—having in mind that we have done our best this week to make progress, we have for some time past been sitting morning, afternoon and night—that we might very well adjourn until Monday next and begin on the redistribution measure then. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to begin at once with their brute majority, let them go ahead.

Mr. BENNETT: All of which, Mr. Speaker, sounds well, but we are dealing with actualities. A very earnest effort has been made for weeks to find an accommodation with respect to these ridings. If there has been disagreement with respect to at least one of the provinces it is because we know that they never intended to agree; they have been good enough to so express themselves privately, at least, if not publicly—privately in the sense that it was not said on the floor of this house, but nevertheless publicly so far as the purport of it was concerned. I have no desire that there should be placed upon the statute book an unfair redistribution, but I will not become a party to an unfair redistribution being put on the statute book by the will of the minority.

An hon. MEMBER: We never asked that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what is asked, and nothing else. It has been said, for instance, that the difficulty is with regard to agreement. There is no disagreement about New Brunswick; it loses one member. No county boundaries have been disturbed; nothing has been done except to drop one member from Saint John. In the province of Nova Scotia, because of the desire to maintain county boundaries as they exist at present, one of our own members finds himself living in a constituency that has fifty thousand people. He has made sacrifices in that direction which he says will legislate him out of the House of Commons. That does not look like jerrymandering. In the province of Prince Edward Island there has been no change at all. At least fifty of the seats in Ontario have been agreed upon beyond all question, and at least seventy-five seats have been agreed upon in a reasonable way.

It has been pointed out that many changes have been made in Quebec. Why? Because for the first time in the history of this dominion we have the urban population constituting a majority of the people. The burden cast upon those responsible for redistribution has been correspondingly great. Need I point out that the island of Montreal contains practically ten per cent of the population of this country; if it received ten per cent of the seats it would have twenty-four members. That brings about a great difficulty, and the city of Toronto stands in somewhat the same position. With respect to Manitoba an agreement has been arrived at; no one is complaining, so why should not the schedule be adopted? In Saskatchewan there were two proposals submitted, one by those who had given much thought and attention to the figures and the other by hon. gentlemen opposite. Finally the matter resolved itself into smaller differences. A great agitation was carried on because the seat of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was being taken away. As a matter of fact the majority of the members of the committee said, "We will yield that point and be done with it, rather than waste time." But as soon as that was done something else cropped up. We will never be able to do business in that way; that is certain. There were some differences in Alberta, one of them because an hon. member has moved his place of residence, and he wants the place where he now lives to be included in the constituency which he represents. He might move again to-morrow. Should the constituency be changed again in that event?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is absurd.

Mr. BENNETT: It was absurd, I quite agree; it was absurd for many reasons, some of which I shall be glad to discuss in this house when the time comes. Then there was the province of British Columbia, where there were two or three minor differences, one being the question of whether a portion of the territory on the mainland should be included in the constituency of Comox-Alberni or in another constituency. There were also some differences in regard to the city of Vancouver, and that territory was divided according to the boundaries established for provincial constituencies. Since the lists are made under circumstances with which the house is familiar it does seem to me that this was not an unreasonable way of dealing with the situation.

Personally I am bound to say that I have not followed the details of this redistribution question, though this afternoon I made myself perhaps more familiar with them than I have been heretofore. I was of the opinion that if we adopted the schedules with respect to the other provinces we might be able, in connection with Ontario and Quebec, to arrive at an accommodation that would more nearly represent what everyone, including our opponents opposite, would feel was reasonable. But it is difficult; no one who has not been through this matter understands just how difficult it is. Twenty years ago I was a member of the committee that dealt with redistribution when Sir Robert Borden was in power. I recall the difficulties and the differences that manifested themselves at that time, with members finding themselves out of their constituencies, and I am bound to say that it was not until the last two or three days that we finally managed to have matters disposed of. At that time, however, the rural population was more numerous than the urban population and the difficulties were not so great as they are now. Perhaps the very conditions under which we live, world conditions of depression, tend to create a certain state of mind on the part of members of the House of Commons who sit opposite a government as well as on the part of those who sit on the government side; that may be responsible for part of it. If it is thought that it will conduce to a fair and reasonable discussion of these matters I shall not press that the house sit to-morrow. Personally I think it should, but in this instance as in many others I am willing to yield to what the opposition may think desirable in the national interest.

I do not wish to speak at length with regard to this matter; I have only one further word to say. In the very nature of things, when you have had one party completely dominating the position in a province or provinces for many years you are bound to have difficulties when you come to the question of redistribution, when the voice of what is still the minority in those provinces but which constitutes a part of the majority in parliament is heard. The very fact that it is a minority voice in those particular provinces but is a part of the majority voice in parliament makes the position doubly difficult, and in my judgment a frank recognition of that fact is desirable. If a peaceful solution of our problems can be found, well and good, but I think that peaceful solution will be found more readily by proceeding with the bill and meeting the difficulties when we come to them, endeavouring to dispose of them as men should at such a time.

I desire to add only this, that it is always the privilege of a minority, or the opposition in parliament, to keep the house in session just as long as it reasonably can. During the short time I have been here I have made it a rule to be neither deterred by threats nor influenced by promises in the conduct of the business of this house, and I say to hon. gentlemen that I shall not be deterred from doing what I conceive to be my duty with respect to redistribution either by the threat of being kept here or the promise that if I do not do my duty we will not be kept here. We shall continue along the course we have mapped out, and carry forward a fair and equitable redistribution of the seats in parliament.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, being a man of peace, as my right hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) knows, I do not wish to add fuel to the flame by discussing the fairness or unfairness of the proposals contained in the bill as it has come back from the committee. I do not think it is desirable that we should do so this evening.

May I say that I think it is always very desirable, if it is at all possible, to have an agreement between the parties in this house as to the redistribution scheme which will be finally carried out, but I desire to say to my right hon. friend that it will be impossible to proceed with this bill as he suggests. The right hon. gentleman suggested that we might adopt the first seven sections of the bill and then consider some of the schedules as to which there does not seem to be much disagreement. We cannot accept section 3; that is the whole point of contention. Section 3 reads:

> The said provinces and territory respectively shall, for the purposes of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts, and be represented as provided in the schedule to this act.

Those who object to part of the schedules cannot vote for this section; certainly the whole discussion will be made on section 3 of the bill. As to the other sections, I agree that they are not contentious, but we cannot discuss section 3 unless every possibility of agreement has disappeared. So far as I am concerned, I shall not be able to leave my place in the house while this bill is being considered. I have been summoned to attend this evening a meeting of what have been called the elderly statesmen. I am proud of the last word, though not of the first, because it is not right as applied to myself. But I could not attend that meeting if this bill were being considered by the committee. I urge upon the Prime Minister the advisability of accepting the suggestion of the right hon. the leader of the opposition, so that we might try to find out definitely whether we can agree, as every one hopes we shall, and then if we cannot we can discuss the bill on Monday. May I point out that some of us are rather tired at the close of this week. Speaking for myself, and I know that the same is true of others, we have all done pretty strenuous work this week and I do not think it is fair to ask that we should begin the consideration of the bill to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: In that event I would move that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I understand that the Prime Minister was just about to move the adjournment of the house. Unfortunately, when this question was brought up, I was waiting upstairs for the special committee of this house to meet, but I believe that the leader of the opposition suggested that the house should not meet to-morrow, his reason being that we might have the week-end to explore the situation further in the hope of arriving at some reasonable conclusion. I must confess that my experience of this committee has been a unique one. I have seen party strife at play to the greatest extent one could imagine, but, notwithstanding that, I consider that the committee had made splendid progress. Unfortunately to-day the committee was able to meet only for a short time; because of other duties intervening we were unable to meet this afternoon. I am quite confident however that if the major parties of the house agree to restrain themselves and be calm on the subject we can arrive at a fairly satisfactory solution of the problem which will be beneficial to all concerned. I merely rose to say to the Prime Minister that I think he would be well advised to move the adjournment of the house over the week-end for the purpose of having further parleys with a view to arriving at a reasonable conclusion.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the house do now adjourn until Monday at eleven a.m.; the motion is seconded by Sir George Perley. Possibly there is very much in what has been said, namely, that the expression to-night of strong views and the rousing perhaps of latent passions in connection with a matter of this kind could serve no useful purpose, and we might be further ahead on Monday morning than if we proceeded to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think so.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 8.55 p.m.

Monday, May 22, 1933

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate acquainting this house that the Senate do not insist upon its amendment in lieu of its first amendment made to Bill 71, an act to amend the criminal code, but do insist upon its first, second and third amendments originally made to the bill, for the following reasons:

1. Because the provisions of subsection (3) of clause 3 involve a principle which may not be advisable to sanction in an act of parliament.

2. This amendment is consequential.

3. Because the words struck out should never have been included.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

WAR DISABILITY PENSIONS

Mr. SPEAKMAN:

1. What was the total number of new war disability pensions awarded during each of the fiscal years (a) 1931-32; and (b) 1932-33?

2. What is the total annual expenditure involved by reason of these new pension awards during each of the periods stated?

3. In how many cases were decreases made in existing war disability pensions during each of the above fiscal years?

4. By how much was our annual expenditure decreased by reason of the above mentioned decreases in pension?

5. In how many cases were increases made in existing war disability pensions during each of the above fiscal years?

6. By how much was our annual expenditure increased by reason of the above mentioned increases in pension?

7. In how many cases was the payment of a war disability pension stopped entirely during each of the above fiscal years by reason of (a) cancellation; (b) death?

8. By how much was our annual expenditure decreased by reason of pension payments having ceased in each of the above classes?

Mr. MacLAREN:

1. 1931-32, 3,091; 1932-33, 1,912.

2. 1931-32, $552,256; 1932-33, $347,727.

3. 1931-32, 791; 1932-33, 2,129.

4. 1931-32, $162,343; 1932-33, $470,923.

5. 1931-32, 4,023; 1932-33, 2,865.

6. 1931-32, $780,692; 1932-33, $558,023.

7. 1931-32, (a) 305; (b) 845; 1932-33, (a) 529; (b) 874.

8. 1931-32, (a) $49,721; (b) $563,558; 1932-33, (a) $104,718; (b) $545,183.

REVERSAL OF PENSION TRIBUNAL DECISIONS

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland):

1. What are the respective percentages of reversal decisions by the pension appeal court of each member of the pension tribunal?

2. In considering the appointment of any members of the pension tribunal to the suggested pension reorganization, is it the intention of the government to take into account the percentage of unsound decisions rendered in the past by these commissions?

Mr. MacLAREN:

1. No statistical percentages of reversals of decisions have been kept.

2. In making all appointments due consideration is given to the possession of the proper qualifications.

BEARBROOK DRAIN, CUMBERLAND TOWNSHIP

Mr. CASSELMAN:

1. Was an application made in 1930 to the Minister of Public Works for a special grant in connection with the construction of the Bearbrook municipal drain in the township of Cumberland?

2. If so, by whom?

3. Have similar applications been made between January 1, 1921, and December 31, 1930?

4. If so, by whom?

5. What answer was given to each application?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2. A. Goulet, M.P.

3 and 4. Yes, one from Mr. W. E. Faubert of Leonard, Ont., which was forwarded by the Honourable Chas. Murphy, in 1923.

5. The answer given to the Honourable Mr. Murphy was that the improvements requested pertained either to the provincial government or the municipality. The estimates for 1930-31 did not include any provision for this work.

RADIO STATION CHRC

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. When was a licence granted to radio station CHRC at Quebec?

2. Were any complaints lodged against this station and will such licence be renewed when it expires?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Annual licences to CHRC have been granted since April 1, 1926. The last licence is dated April 1, 1933, and expires October 31, 1933.

2. No complaints have been lodged with the Marine department. I am unable to state at this time what licences will be granted when the present ones expire.

HAY FOR EXPORT CATTLE

Mr. BARRETTE:

1. Has any person been appointed to inspect the hay shipped as fodder for the cattle shipped at the port of Montreal to United Kingdom?

2. If so, what is his name?

3. Who signed his appointment and what is his salary?

4. When was he appointed, and what are his instructions and prerogatives?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. The inspectors of live stock shipments at Montreal are required by the regulations respecting the shipping of live stock from Canada, approved by order in council dated the 3rd day of May, 1909, to satisfy themselves as to the quality and quantity of hay supplied as feed for cattle shipped for export.

2. James O'Grady, Hector Delorme.

3 and 4. Mr. O'Grady was appointed by order in council dated October 26, 1905; his salary is $1,620 per annum, less 10 per cent. Mr. Delorme was appointed by order in council dated January 9, 1903; his salary is $1,620 per annum, less 10 per cent.

Their duties and powers are as defined in the regulations respecting the shipping of live stock from Canada.

[Mr. Casselman.]

PREVENTIVE SERVICE—NEW BOAT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Did the Minister of National Revenue recently authorize the purchase or construction of another boat for use of the preventive service?

2. On what date were tenders asked for in this connection?

3. How many tenders were received?

4. What was the price in each case?

5. To whom was the tender awarded?

Mr. DUPRE:

1. No. The construction of the boat referred to was authorized by order in council of April 15, 1933, P.C. 649 on the recommendation of the Honourable the Minister of Justice.

2. Tenders were called for on February 23, 1933, the closing date for receipt of tenders being April 1, 1933.

3. Thirteen. Four other firms declined to tender.

4. The Gidley Boat Co., Penetanguishene, Ont., $57,390; The Davie Shipbuilding Co., Lauzon, P.Q., $57,840; The Collingwood Shipyards, Collingwood, Ont., $67,250; Birmal Boats, Southampton, England, $47,355; Canadian Vickers, Ltd., Montreal, P.Q., $53,000; The Manseau Shipyards, Sorel, P.Q., $47,265; Yarrow & Co., Ltd., Glasgow, Scotland (delivery at Glasgow), $32,214; The Burrard Dry Dock Co., Ltd., North Vancouver, B.C., $62,500; Halifax Shipyards, Halifax, N.S., $59,500; J. Samuel White & Co., East Cowes, England, $51,240; J. I. Thorneycroft & Co., Southampton, England, $50,820; Boeing Aircraft, Vancouver, B.C., $59,700; For Yarrows Ltd., Canada (See Yarrow & Co., Glasgow).

5. Manseau Shipyards, Sorel, P.Q., at $47,265, delivery at Halifax.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

SOREL SHIPYARD

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What was the total amount of estimates for the government shipyard in Sorel during 1932-1933?

2. How many men were employed in the Sorel shipyard (a) on March 15, 1933; (b) on April 24, 1933; (c) on May 1, 1933?

3. What is the average cost per cubic yard of excavation in the St. Lawrence ship channel by government dredges in 1932?

4. What is the average price, per cubic yard of material excavated, paid to the general dredges under contract in the said channel?

5. Has the Department of Marine recently purchased a winch from the Sorel mechanical shop?

6. If so, what was the price?

7. Were tenders invited?

8. What does the department intend to do with the said winch?

9. Is the Sorel mechanical shop owned or subsidized by the government?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

COURT OF ADMIRALTY, QUEBEC CITY, REGISTRAR

Mr. GOBEIL:

For a copy of all complaints lodged against M. A. Lachance, registrar of the Court of Admiralty, Quebec City; also a copy of all correspondence concerning the said Mr. Lachance, received and sent by the Department of Justice, since June 1, 1928.

CONFERRING OF TITLES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question which grows out of the reply made to a question by the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) with respect to titles conferred on Canadians. The reply indicates that the promotion in the case of the Right Hon. Sir George Perley to the order of Knights of the Grand Cross was made—and this is the part to which I wish to direct attention:

> In conformity with established constitutional practice, it being the considered view of His Majesty's government in Canada that the motion, with respect to honours, adopted on the 22nd day of May, 1919, by a majority vote of the members of the Commons House only of the thirteenth parliament (which was dissolved on the 4th day of October, 1921) is not binding upon His Majesty or His Majesty's government in Canada or the seventeenth parliament of Canada.

The question I would ask the Prime Minister is whether the statement that is made there with respect to constitutional practice is intended by the government to apply to resolutions of the House of Commons generally or only to the resolution that relates to titles. As I read the statement the substance of it is that a motion in the nature of a resolution adopted by a majority vote of the House of Commons in one parliament does not bind His Majesty or His Majesty's government in Canada or another parliament. Does the Prime Minister present it as the view of the government that a resolution of the House of Commons is not binding upon His Majesty, or His Majesty's government and is binding on parliament only during the parliament in which it is passed?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I will read what the right hon. gentleman has said, and give an answer at the next sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is another question that I would like to ask the Prime Minister. Is it intended by this reply to imply that an opportunity will not be granted the House of Commons to discuss the whole question of titles before any further titles are conferred? As the resolution now stands it would appear that in the government's view the resolution of the House of Commons which we had thought was still binding is not so binding. If such is the case I wish to express to the Prime Minister the view that this house ought to have an opportunity of discussing the whole question of titles before any further titles are accepted by Canadians.

Mr. BENNETT: I will deal with the matter, Mr. Speaker, at the next sitting.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before you leave the questions, Mr. Speaker, may I ask if it would not be possible before prorogation to have an answer to question No. 2, standing in the name of Mr. Butcher, relating to an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall speak to the Minister of Labour about it.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

The house in committee on Bill No. 2, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not wish to cast a reflection upon the hon. member who has just taken the chair, but as he has been a member sitting on the committee which has dealt with the whole matter of redistribution, I am wondering if all hon. members would consider him competent now to act impartially as leader of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): I am at the disposition of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The Speaker should name a member.

Mr. McINTOSH: You want to hold it yourself, do you?

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the objection, I ask the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) to take the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is better.

On section 1—Short title.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I think it desirable to point out immediately the unfairness of the government having left consideration of this most important measure until the very end of the session. That fact of itself, it seems to me, is prima facie evidence of a desire on the part of the administration to exercise its power as a majority to press through this bill under circumstances which are most unfair to the minority in the house. I would point out that the government has known from the time it came into office that at this session a redistribution bill would have to be introduced. In the speech from the throne delivered on October 6 of last year an announcement was made by the administration that a redistribution measure would be brought in during the session. The bill was introduced on October 13, and was given first reading on that day. Second reading took place on November 25, at which time the bill was referred to a joint committee of the house for purposes of consideration, and if possible, arriving at an agreement with respect to what may be described as the redistribution map. These essential preliminaries were simply for the purpose of quickly getting the measure to the stage where hon. members on both sides of the house and of all parties in the house might confer together with respect to the defining of the boundaries of the constituencies embraced in the redistribution map. At the time the bill was given second reading, as leader of the opposition I suggested it might be advisable for members of the redistribution committee to convene before we adjourned at that stage of the session. Hon. members will recall that the adjournment took place last fall in the month of November. I suggested that advantage be taken of the recess to discuss the map so that at an early stage after resuming the house might have an opportunity of considering the measure in a regular and orderly fashion and not in a hurried fashion. When we resumed on January 30 of this year, apparently the committee had had no meetings at all. As time went along and the committee had had no meetings and no progress whatever had been made, I asked the Prime Minister if it was the intention of the government not to proceed at this session with the redistribution bill, and the Prime Minister said that it was the government's intention to proceed. A little later on my hon. friend and colleague from Quebec East again asked the same question of the ministry, pointing out that the general committee had not been called together, that the Quebec members on the committee had not been called into conference, and that no opportunity had been given for the discussion of the measure. That was as late as March 23. On the following day the committee was called together for the first time.

From that time forward until just a week or two ago it was only on rare occasions that members of the committee were brought together. In fact, the impression became general throughout the house that hon. members opposite had determined not to proceed with the bill at this session. It now appears that evidently what has been in the mind of the administration all along has been to have its followers leave the matter until the very last moment, and then bring in a bill fashioned pretty much by the administration itself to be driven through the house in the dying hours of the session.

In that regard may I say there is an ominous parallel with what occurred on the last occasion gerrymandering of constituencies took place in this parliament. As hon. members well know the practice fifty years ago, namely in 1882, was for the government itself to frame and to bring in a map. Then, with the aid of its majority it pressed that map through the House of Commons. That practice was followed again under a Conservative administration in 1892. On both occasions there were what have come to be known as odious gerrymanders. In 1892 Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then leader of the opposition in this House of Commons, drew attention to what was in the mind of the government with respect to the gerrymandering of that time. His words were these:

> The very fact that this measure has been postponed and put off until, I may say, the dying hours of the session, is in itself sufficient to deserve the most severe censure of this house.

These words are to be found in Hansard of May 31, 1892. He stated further:

> I protest against this system too long indulged in by this government, of delaying their most important legislation until the last days of the session when members are naturally anxious to get away to their own business.

I say there is an ominous parallel between what was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that occasion and what we on this side of the house are compelled to say to-day. This government also has adopted the practice of waiting until the end of the session to bring in its most contentious measures. It has deferred until the very end the measure with respect to the salary of the chairman of the tariff board, the measure with respect to radio broadcasting, and the contentious measure concerning shipping, the debate in connection with which was concluded only a day or two ago. Now, after the order paper is cleared of everything else, and it is over seven and a half months since parliament assembled for the present session, it brings in for discussion the redistribution measure. I say it brings the measure in; as a matter of fact, speaking technically the report of the committee was made to the house on Wednesday last. At that time the bill which is now before us was presented. Realizing how little was the opportunity for full and complete discussion at this stage of the session I suggested at the time that an effort still be made to have the committee continue its negotiations with a view to finding out whether or not an impartial measure, one which would appeal to the sense of fair play in all quarters of the house might not be reached. That overture was accepted. A committee composed of some of the senior members of the house was appointed to review the situation as it had developed up to that time. The committee met on Thursday and again on Friday. But on Friday night the Prime Minister asked the house to proceed immediately with the bill, notwithstanding the fact that a call had gone out to the members of the committee to meet again that very evening. What I fail to understand is why that committee did not meet again. What was the purpose of indicating to members of the committee that they should come together on Friday night and possibly continue their discussion on Saturday, if all the while the intention was that the committee should not meet at all?

May I point out that the Right Hon. Sir George Perley, a member of the committee, stated in this house on Thursday that he believed the committee was making headway with respect to the matter which had been referred to it. I quote his words as they appear at page 5198 of Hansard:

> Sir George Perley: Mr. Speaker, some of us who have been discussing the difficulties in regard to redistribution have made some progress to-day, and we would like to have to-morrow morning to meet and go further into these matters in an effort to arrive at a conclusion.

"In an effort to arrive at a conclusion," showing that in the mind of the right hon. member for Argenteuil not only had considerable progress been made but that there was a prospect of the committee reaching a conclusion. The hon. member for Acadia, who was also on the committee, gave his impression to the house on Friday evening, and his impression was very similar to that of Sir George Perley, namely that the committee was getting together and that there was a prospect of reaching a conclusion which would be satisfactory to all parties concerned. I quote from Hansard, page 5232:

> Mr. Robert Gardiner (Acadia): I understand that the Prime Minister was just about to move the adjournment of the house. Unfortunately, when this question was brought up I was waiting upstairs for the special committee of this house to meet, . . .

And later on the hon. member said:

> . . . I consider that the committee had made splendid progress.

That was said after the hon. member had mentioned that there had been considerable discussion.

> Unfortunately to-day the committee was able to meet only for a short time; because of other duties intervening we were unable to meet this afternoon. I am quite confident however that if the major parties of the house agree to restrain themselves and be calm on the subject we can arrive at a fairly satisfactory solution of the problem which will be beneficial to all concerned. I merely rose to say to the Prime Minister that I think he would be well advised to move the adjournment of the house over the week end for the purpose of having further parleys with a view to arriving at a reasonable conclusion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that indicates very clearly that those who were nearest to the discussions, who had the clearest view of the redistribution map, were gradually coming together on a basis of fair play and equity, and that in their minds there was every possibility of a satisfactory conclusion being reached. Why then did they not continue this meeting on Friday evening, and why did they have no further meeting on Saturday? I am told that no sooner had the house adjourned than members of the committee were advised by hon. gentlemen opposite, or by one who was a member of the committee, that there was no use in the committee meeting, that it would come to the same thing in the end, that they would make no headway, and that the committee might just as well break off. I say, Mr. Chairman, that that feature, combined with the way in which the committee itself has been dragged along from month to month and from week to week, is an indication that the government has sought by a process of attrition to tire out and exhaust the patience and energies of the members of the house so that at this stage of the session it would be possible for them to press this measure through with the power which they have as a majority.

In this regard I wish to say another word, with respect to what the Prime Minister himself has said as to the function of a majority in parliament, in connection with this measure in particular. What the Prime Minister said a day or two ago in discussing this question is highly significant at this time. At page 5074 of Hansard will be found the words of my right hon. friend:

> Having regard to the fact that this is 1933, however, I think there is great anxiety on the part of the house that the bill should be enacted, and if we are unable to do so by consent I suppose the only other way is to invoke the aid of what is sometimes called the brute majority,—

Now listen to the words which follow. The Prime Minister says, "sometimes called the brute majority." But he goes on to give his own views as to the way in which government is to be carried on. It is as follows:

—but which constitutes the means by which under democratic institutions we carry on government,—

Brute majority constitutes the means by which under democratic institutions we carry on government!

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what is said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what is said. I will read the passage again and allow the house itself to judge as to exactly what is said.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

—if we are unable to do so by consent I suppose the only other way is to invoke the aid of what is sometimes called the brute majority.

Mr. BENNETT: By the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister now interjects "by the opposition." He did not say that when he was speaking. What he did then was to continue to give his own view.

An hon. MEMBER: You understood that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

—the aid of what is sometimes called the brute majority, but which constitutes the means by which under democratic institutions we carry on government, the history of which is very interesting but to refer to which would serve no good purpose.

In that statement the Prime Minister is I think, entirely wrong. Government may be carried on by majority rule, but it is majority arrived at as a result of discussion and argument, not by brute force in any shape or form. That expresses exactly the difference between us at the present time. The Prime Minister is putting his faith in what he says is sometimes called brute majority, and he is doing it because according to his own view as stated by himself, that is the way in which government is carried on under democratic institutions. May I point out that there are some institutions of government older even than parliament in which in deciding matters which pertain essentially to justice, the rule of the majority does not prevail. The institution of the jury is a much older institution than parliament itself, and even our present day juries decide not by a majority but by common consensus of view.

Mr. BENNETT: Not in all cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the most important cases. And may I say with respect to a question like the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons, on which the whole basis of government itself rests, that this parliament is not merely exercising its function of legislating, it is exercising the function of the high court of parliament wherein it is expected to see that justice is done to all electors in the country, those who may not be in a position to represent their own views except by the members who happen to be representing them in particular constituencies at this time, as well as those who speak through their members. I submit that there is no higher trust imposed upon a House of Commons under our constitution than that of justly redistributing the constituencies. That trust is one which must be exercised not alone in the light of what is in the interest of the sitting member or the constituency he represents, but in a wholly or impartial and broadminded way in the light of what is most just and fair to the great body of the electorate.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about 1924?

Mr. POULIOT: Ask York-Sunbury about 1924?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if at the very beginning of this discussion we are to have interruptions and continual disorder from hon. gentlemen opposite as part of their brute majority method of procedure; or whether we are going to have this discussion carried on as proceedings in parliament are supposed to be conducted? We have heard a good deal this session about the iron heel of ruthlessness and brute majority. If that is the way in which matters in parliament are to be decided I think the sooner hon. gentlemen opposite allow the public to have some say on procedure with respect to its affairs the better it will be.

I mentioned not long ago, when we were discussing the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, that I thought it would be desirable to let the public who were being adversely affected by its provisions have some say with respect to that measure. And what was the reply of my right hon. friend? It receives added significance in the light of what is taking place to-day. I said:

My right hon. friend says he will stand or fall by these agreements.
Mr. Bennett: Hear, hear.
Mr. Mackenzie King: I challenge him to go to the country upon this issue—
Mr. Bennett: Wait till we pass the representation bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There you have the secret. And the Prime Minister says "hear, hear."

I just have this further to say, Mr. Chairman, that I think we might well reserve the decision as to the designation to be given to this measure until we see what it is to include. As it reads to-day it is:

This act may be cited as the Representation Act, 1932.

That, as it stands, will require amendment to 1933. I think if we are to proceed as hon. gentlemen opposite have indicated we may in the end have to change it to read, "The Brute Majority Representation Act, 1933." However, I shall reserve until later what I may have to say further on that.

I wish at the moment in conclusion to say this to the Prime Minister: The other evening he spoke of there having been threats of delay and the like. I wish to say to him at once that we are just as anxious to get away as hon. gentlemen opposite. We are making no threats of any kind beyond indicating the position which it will be necessary for us to take in opposing injustice and unfairness. If as this measure proceeds hon. gentlemen opposite show a disposition to do what is fair and just by way of amending the measure which they have presented to us they will find us quite prepared and ready to join with them in an effort to get this bill through with as little as possible in the way of discussion. But if hon. gentlemen opposite are going to say, "We have the majority; we are here and we are going to have this bill or nothing else," they must expect that those who stand for justice and fair play towards the people of this country will have something to say before the measure is put through.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, as chairman of the special committee having charge of the preparation of the schedules for this bill I think it is appropriate that I should reply to the right hon. gentleman. Under the provisions of the British North America Act it is the duty of a government, following the taking of a census, to proceed with the redistribution of the constituencies based on the population as disclosed by that census. It is not a duty that a government seeks or goes after voluntarily; it is a duty imposed upon a government by the constitution. In approaching the discharge of that duty let me assure the right hon. gentleman that this government has as high a conception of its responsibility and as keen an appreciation of the principles upon which a redistribution should be based as has been possessed by any other government in this Dominion.

The result of the census disclosed that a readjustment was necessary in the province of Nova Scotia, which must lose two seats, as well as in the province of New Brunswick, which must lose one seat. The province of British Columbia is entitled to two additional seats and the province of Alberta to one more seat. These are the only provinces in which the numbers must be varied as a result of this census. There are, however, changes to be made in the other provinces because of increases in population in certain areas, particularly in the cities, rendering a rearrangement necessary in those provinces also.

The course adopted was the course that was followed during the last two redistributions, the appointment of a special committee representative of all parties in this house. That committee was appointed in due course; it met and fully recognized the principles which had been laid down in this house by the leaders of all parties, namely that the unit of representation in the cities should be larger than the unit in the rural municipalities, and that there should be no greater disturbance of conditions than was absolutely necessary. That committee met, recognized and confirmed those principles, and it was unanimously agreed that it would be well to subdivide the committee into committees for each province and that these sub-committees should meet, discuss the situation, endeavour to arrive at an agreement and report to the general committee.

That course was followed; from time to time I saw that these sub-committees met, They had many meetings, but there were not many meetings of the general committee; no reason existed for many meetings of that committee, because until the sub-committees had exhausted their efforts or had arrived at a conclusion there was very little for the general committee to do. However, the general committee was called together in order to find out what progress had been made, and we were all delighted with the very substantial measure of agreement that had been reached. Let me say to my right hon. friend that the work of this special committee represents an agreement in regard to, I should say, between ninety and ninety-five per cent of the constituencies in the whole of this Dominion. There is no serious difficulty in the province of British Columbia, though a readjustment was necessary there. There is no serious difficulty in the province of Alberta. I will admit that with regard to Saskatchewan the differences seemed rather acute. There is an agreement in Manitoba. In Ontario a very substantial measure of agreement was reached, and the same applies to Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I said a substantial measure, and I know whereof I speak. There is no difficulty with regard to New Brunswick. As for Nova Scotia, we have come to at least a fifty per cent agreement, so when it is all added up there are very few seats as to which there is any difference between us. The special committee met and received the report of the sub-committees; we were assured that there had been a very substantial measure of agreement and that probably full agreement would be arrived at. But suddenly there developed in that committee a disposition on the part of some of our friends of the opposition to delay this measure. There became perfectly clear the desire that the measure should not pass this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all; quite the opposite.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): At every meeting of the committee towards the last that desire became more apparent. I assured the committee from the beginning that it was the desire and the intention of the government that this bill should pass during this session.

Mr. POULIOT: At the last minute.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not at the last minute but at every meeting of the committee. I said it was in the public interest, and I believe it is in the public interest that this bill should be passed at this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend for just a moment? I was asked by the Minister of Finance as to what was the wish of the opposition in this matter, and I told him distinctly that we hoped that this bill would go through during this session, that we expected it to do so, and that has been our attitude throughout.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is quite all right on the part of my right hon. friend, but he is not speaking for others.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking for the party.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I say, the committee met and endeavours were made to straighten out the small items as to which there were differences. We had some rather dramatic demonstrations in the committee. We had maps torn up; we had threats and invitations to mortal combat, and all that sort of thing—everything that was calculated to delay and to prevent the bringing about of an agreement.

Now, the committee met and the schedules were laid on the table. I made a last appeal to those who were in difference to get together to see if they could not harmonize, and I left the matter open until the latest possible hour in the hope that some agreement would be arrived at. But, as I say, the opposition seemed to be frozen; it seemed to have become concentrated, and the desire to prevent an agreement being reached became more manifest as time went on.

Mr. POULIOT: Not concentrated but united.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All we could do therefore was to report the bill, and we did report it about a week ago. It has been said that this bill should have been brought down earlier in the session. Well, we are following about the same course which my right hon. friend opposite followed ten years ago with respect to a similar bill. It came in on the 11th, I believe, and prorogation took place on the 19th. It has been usual I believe to introduce this bill as practically the last item for consideration in the session.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There was unanimous consent then.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, there was not.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have the report somewhere here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was nothing brutal about it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If the hon. gentleman will read the report he will find that it was not unanimous. There were differences in regard to certain constituencies in Ontario and those differences were ultimately adjusted, as some of these differences may be adjusted before the present bill passes. The fact remains, however, that that report was not unanimous, as the hon. gentleman will find in the votes and proceedings. Let me say, as chairman of this committee, that I have endeavoured to be fair, conciliatory, indulgent and patient—

Mr. DUPUIS: We don't need indulgence.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —but at the same time firm; and I have indicated, as I have said all along, that it was our intention to get this bill through this session. I hope that as the discussion proceeds the subcommittees from the different provinces will be able to explain exactly what is in dispute, because I do not thoroughly understand all the details.

My right hon. friend speaks of brute force. May I remind him that there is also brute force in an opposition, and I would point out that under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman the opposition knows perfectly how to use brute force.

Mr. POULIOT: It is the force of argument, the force of reason.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And that brute force has been used time after time in this house.

Mr. GRAY: The leader of the opposition spoke of the majority, not brute force.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am saying that there is brute force in a minority—

Mr. GRAY: The leader of the opposition did not say brute force.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —and the minority in this parliament have used it from time to time. I do not think they can deny it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We do deny it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And there is also a brute force in a minority of a minority, and that minority of a minority are using it on this occasion and endeavouring to hold up the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Specify.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When did we use that force?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Let me say in conclusion that the work of the committee represents a fair, an honest, a sincere and in large measure a very successful attempt to bring in a bill which is fair and which proposes a proper readjustment of the constituencies as provided by the constitution.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Will he be kind enough to give us the population of each constituency as framed by this bill, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, in order to facilitate the discussion—because he said that representation is based on population.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not those figures; I fancy my hon. friend could get them as easily as we can. As the discussion proceeds however I am sure the information with respect to any particular constituency will be available through the chairman of that subcommittee.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I do not wish to speak at great length but I can assure my hon. friend that it is impossible for us to discuss what concerns each constituency without having the population of each constituency as framed by this bill. My hon. friend from Laurier-Outremont was kind enough to pass me his notes, which indicate the population for some of the constituencies, but there are a number of constituencies for which I have not the figures: Beauharnois-Laprairie; Chateauguay-Huntingdon; Laprairie-Napierville; L'Assomption-Terrebonne; Levis; Nicolet-Yamaska; St. John-Iberville. I have not the figures for these constituencies and I would ask the minister to be kind enough to supply them at the second sitting to-day.

I do not intend to delay the committee much longer, but on Friday last the Prime Minister said that he might be impressed by the arguments advanced in the House of Commons and that this would perhaps serve a better purpose than a meeting of the special committee of elder statesmen, so called. For that reason I wish to submit certain figures for his information. I have prepared a memorandum, and as the right hon. gentleman is familiar with French he will have no difficulty in following me.

(Translation)

I—Federal Elections

British North America Act, 1867.

40. Until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick shall, for the purposes of election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided in electoral districts, as follows:

Quebec shall be divided into sixty-five electoral districts, composed of the sixty-five electoral divisions into which Lower Canada is at the passing of this act divided under chapter two of the consolidated statutes of Canada, chapter seventy-five of the consolidated statutes for Lower Canada, and the act of the province of Canada of the twenty-third year of the Queen, chapter one, or any other act amending the same in force at the union, so that each such electoral division shall be for the purposes of this act an electoral district entitled to return one member.

The consolidated statutes of Canada date from 1859 and only refer to the act of 1853 and that of 1855, which are embodied in the consolidated statutes of Lower Canada. The statute 23 V, chapter 1, divides the cities of Montreal and Quebec, each in three counties, respectively. No further change.

The federal elections of 1867 and 1872 were based on the Representation Act of 1860, C.S.L.C., chapter 75, with the exception of one parish transferred from Portneuf to the county of Quebec and the three divisions of Montreal which were altered.

The same may be said of the federal elections of 1874 and 1878.

The Tory gerrymander of 1882 affected only six counties.

Chapter 75 of the consolidated statutes of Lower Canada of 1860 still served as basis, with no other change to the federal elections of 1887 and 1891, until the Tory gerrymander of 1892.

II—Provincial Elections

British North America Act, 1867—30-31 V, chapter 3.

80. The Legislative Assembly of Quebec shall be composed of sixty-five members, to be elected to represent the sixty-five electoral divisions or districts of Lower Canada in this act referred to, subject to alteration thereof by the Legislature of Quebec. . . .

From 1867 to 1886 the provincial elections of Quebec, similar to the federal elections, were based on chapter 75 of the consolidated statutes of Lower Canada of 1860.

In 1886, by the act 49-50 V, chapter 96, the province of Quebec was divided in 68 counties, "which form, for the purpose of the people's representation in the Legislative Assembly, the 65 constituencies constituted by the British North America Act, 1867."

Note.—Reference of this statute, C.S.L.C., chapter 75—Reference repeated following section 60 of the consolidated statutes of Quebec, 1888.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

III—Federal and Provincial Representations

Provided also, that all augmentations or gores of seigniories, parishes, townships or settlements, and all towns, villages or reserves for the same, not specially mentioned in this act, shall be considered as forming part of the county in which the principal portion of such locality, or in the immediate vicinity of which such town, village or reserve, shall be situate, unless otherwise specified by some existing statute for whatsoever purposes.

(16 V, c. 152-9; S.R.L.C., 1860, c. 75, s. 2.)

One must bear in mind that the federal representation of the province of Quebec is always 65 members. From 1903 to 1922, the provincial representation of this province was increased from 75 to 86, this explains the following fact:

In the dominion redistribution of 1924, in order to observe the eighty-year old divisions of the counties, dating from 1853, it was necessary to rearrange the new provincial and municipal subdivisions of the counties.

The word "county" used in the dominion statutes always signifies provincial county and the only time that this word was used in a federal statute, is in the act of 1914, when it was a question of creating the "Quebec county."

The Dominion Act of 1924 always mentions the provincial counties, for instance, Frontenac, Papineau, Lake St. John East, Lake St. John West, Matapedia, etc., to quote only the counties, the provincial name of which does not exist in the federal counties in which there has been no federal change previous to 1853 up to the present legislation:

Beauharnois, changed in 1933.
Bonaventure, changed in 1933.
Chambly-Verchères, changed in 1933.
Compton, no change.
Joliette, changed in 1933.
Kamouraska, changed in 1933.
Levis, changed in 1933.
L'Islet, changed in 1933.
Lotbinière, changed in 1933.
Montmagny, changed in 1933.
Pontiac, changed in 1933.
Richmond-Wolfe, changed in 1933.
Shefford, no change.
Sherbrooke, no change.
Témiscouata, changed in 1933.
Vaudreuil-Soulanges, no change.

Old counties, to-day joined with another county, in which there has been no change previous to the present legislation:

Maskinongé, from Berthier-Maskinongé.
Brome, from Brome-Missisquoi.

Huntingdon, from Chateauguay-Huntingdon.
Napierville, from Laprairie-Napierville.
Montcalm, from L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Contour changes, previously adhering to the boundaries of the old counties:

Beauce, in 1924.
Dorchester, in 1924.
Megantic, in 1903.
Nicolet, in 1903.
Stanstead, in 1924.
Three Rivers-St. Maurice, in 1903.

Territory Added

Chicoutimi-Saguenay, in 1882, Anticosti island; in 1914, the new Quebec. Gaspé, in 1882, the Magdeline islands; and no other change since 1853.

Counties Annexed

Chicoutimi-Saguenay, 1867.

The county of Chicoutimi-Saguenay has been changed since.

Drummond-Arthabaska, 1867.
Richmond-Wolfe, 1867.
Chambly-Verchères, 1892-1893.
Laprairie-Napierville, 1892.
St. Johns-Iberville, 1892.
Three Rivers-St. Maurice, 1892.
Chateauguay-Huntingdon, 1914.
Laval-Two Mountains, 1914.
Quebec-Montmorency, 1914 and 1924.
St. Hyacinthe-Rouville, 1914.
Vaudreuil-Soulanges, 1914.
Berthier-Maskinongé, 1924.
Brome-Missisquoi, 1924.
New descriptions of counties since 1853:
Bellechasse, 1882.
Laval, from Laval-Two Mountains, 1892.
St. Hyacinthe, from St. Hyacinthe-Rouville, 1893.

New Counties

Hull, 1914: new descriptions in 1915 and 1924.

Labelle, 1892: new descriptions, 1893, 1903, 1914, 1915 and 1924.

Lake St. John, 1924: subdivision of Chicoutimi-Saguenay, comprising the provincial counties of Lake St. John East and Lake St. John West in their entirety.

Matane, 1914: subdivision of Rimouski, comprising the provincial counties of Matane and Matapedia in their entirety. No other change since.

Rimouski, 1914: divided in two, Rimouski and Matane. The federal county of Rimouski comprises the provincial county of Rimouski in its entirety. No other change since 1853.

Wright, 1892: new descriptions, 1903, 1914, 1915 and 1924.

Changes in Old Borders

Argenteuil, Bagot, Berthier-Maskinongé, Brome-Missisquoi, Champlain, Chateauguay-Huntingdon, Chicoutimi-Saguenay, Drummond-Arthabaska, Laprairie-Napierville, L'Assomption-Montcalm, Laval-Two Mountains, Portneuf, Québec-Montmorency, Richelieu, St. Hyacinthe-Rouville, St. Johns-Iberville, Yamaska.

In most of these counties there was a gerrymander in 1892 which was redressed in 1903.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay the committee any longer. I have placed before it certain facts relating to past legislation of which it can take cognizance as a preliminary to the discussion to take place on this important matter. With regard to brute force, I may say that this House of Commons is not a zoo, but one of the houses of the Canadian parliament. If there is any force on this side of the chamber, it is the force of reason and the force of argument. I shall have other facts to lay before the committee as each constituency in the province of Quebec is called. The facts I have given do not refer to the subdivisions of the city of Quebec or the city of Montreal, they relate mostly to the rural constituencies. I say to the government that we are here to defend the rights of the people. I am entitled to say that because I have presented petitions to this house signed by the heads of families. What I am doing now is simply expressing the wishes and beliefs of the people whom I have the honour to represent. I shall object to any elector being taken out of the actual limits or boundaries of the constituency of Temiscouata. I shall object whether he is a Conservative or a Liberal. Ever since I have had the honour of representing these people in the House of Commons I have been devoted to them and have tried to do my duty and I shall not let the government take one of them from me.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say a few words in reply to certain statements which have been made by the chairman of the redistribution committee. I am sure he will agree with me when I say that so far from attempting to postpone this matter until another session, on every possible occasion, both before the general committee and before the subcommittee dealing with the province of Ontario, I urged the advisability of bringing this matter, difficult although it is, to a conclusion at this session. There are many reasons why I think that redistribution at the present time is of more than ordinary importance. We are living in a very remarkable period in the history of this country. Throughout the different ridings, the people are being subjected to burdens and difficulties which they have not had to face at any other time, I hope that my attitude both before the general committee and the subcommittee was such as to indicate a very sincere desire to see brought into being a fair and just redistribution which would cause as little grief as possible to the people in the various ridings and upset conditions as they exist to-day to the least possible extent.

There is one point which I think should be stressed particularly at this time. We find that there has been an increase in urban population over what it was ten years ago. Before this committee enters further upon its deliberations, I should like to call the attention of each member to a matter which I think should be considered very carefully. To-day we are living in a very remarkable period with a great deal of unemployment. That unemployment centres very largely in the cities and towns, and I do not believe that this is not an opportune time to increase the representation in the urban portions of this country at the expense of the rural portions. There is no question that to-day the rural ridings in many cases are much smaller than the urban ridings. But when you look at the vote that was polled you will see that very frequently a smaller vote was polled in the large urban ridings than in some of the small sized rural ridings. If I remember rightly the smallest vote polled in any riding at the last election was polled in the Toronto South riding with a large population.

For the consideration of the committee in the deliberations which are to take place, I want again to renew the appeal which I have made repeatedly, that where there is a possibility of adjusting differences they be adjusted by not increasing at the present time urban representation at the expense of rural representation.

As to the manner in which the committee conducted its deliberations and as to whether the representatives of the opposition on that committee did everything in their power to have the redistribution pressed to a conclusion, I really think that the chairman of that special committee upon reconsideration will be disposed to retract the statement he made that there was a disposition on the part of members of the opposition to delay or defer the business of that committee.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I want to be perfectly fair to my hon. friend and to say that he did not urge the postponing of the consideration of the bill. In fact, he was as keen as I was to have it passed this session. I do not charge him with anything of that kind, but I say that from other sources there did come objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I knew from the discussions we had had that the chairman would realize that he was not representing exactly what did take place in his remarks in regard to certain of the opposition members at any rate. As a matter of fact, the impression I gained from attending that committee, and there was not a meeting of the general committee that I did not attend, was that the members of the opposition were all keen to have the matter forced to a conclusion this session. In a matter that involves as intimately as redistribution does the interests of the representatives of this house and of the people whom they represent, it is quite impossible for men chosen as the representatives in this house are chosen and as the members of the committee, representing cities and towns and rural communities were chosen, to agree or even to reach a substantial measure of agreement upon matters which so vitally affect the interests of the people they represent. With the Prime Minister in his seat and with many other members of the government in their seats I do renew the argument which I have made repeatedly that at a time like this, with as many in the cities and towns on relief as there are at the present time, and with that burden being borne to a substantial extent by the people in the rural communities, the adjustments so far as possible should be made without an increase of urban representation.

What does representation in the House of Commons mean after all? What is the effect of it? The effect is to give the people who are given increased representation a greater voice in the affairs of the country, and the effect of that is to advance the things that make more attractive life in the particular communities in which these people live. Surely, Mr. Chairman, we have had demonstrated to the people of this country in no uncertain way—I do not want to get into an appeal that looks like an appeal of one section of the country against another, because I think that is bad—that life in the city and in these large centres is more attractive at the present time than it is in the rural centres. We are spending money to bring people back to the land. That is one of the great troubles that the country is facing to-day. Do you think you are going to bring about that result by increasing the representation of the cities and towns at a time like this when that increased representation means the elimination of certain ridings that have existed practically ever since confederation? That is a point which I think should be taken into very serious consideration by the committee in endeavouring to adjust differences where they exist, and where adjustments have to be made I want to urge again upon the committee that they be made if possible at the expense of the urban representation rather than at the expense of the rural representation.

At this stage I do not propose to enter into any long discussion over the effect of the redistribution on the particular province which I represent. I do want, however, to call the attention of the chairman of the special committee to the fact that even if only ten per cent of the ridings throughout this dominion are in actual dispute, just consider what that would mean in a fairly close election, for after all no one can forget the fact that at some time in the future an election will be held in these new ridings. There are 245 ridings in the Dominion of Canada. Assume that there are changes made in the redistribution which adversely affect the opposition in this house in only ten per cent of these ridings. That means 24 ridings, and very frequently that settles the question as to which party shall have its views enforced in this house.

I do not think at this stage I shall enter into the difficulties which have confronted the members of the committee in the province of Ontario. There are 82 seats in the province of Ontario, and it is not an easy matter to delimit boundaries by which certain constituencies which have existed ever since confederation shall be wiped out. I think there were 31 of those constituencies that were not touched. Some of them are small in population, but if you affect one riding by taking townships from adjoining ridings, then all these other ridings are more or less affected so that the number of ridings actually affected becomes very considerable. The committee put a great deal of time and work on the discussions concerning the province of Ontario. I regret very much that the differences have not been solved, but I am still hoping that they may be capable of some measure of solution before the deliberations of this committee have concluded. I do not know that at the present time I could to any great advantage take up the time of the committee by further discussing these problems.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly concerning matters raised by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) who has just taken his seat. I must say that the relations in the Ontario committee consisting of the hon. members for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam), West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), Leeds (Mr. Stewart) and Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) have been very harmonious. I think the very fact that we agreed on at least seventy-five out of the eighty-two seats is an indication that we have considered the matter with great care. Thirty-two seats in the province of Ontario we did not disturb, but left them as they were laid out in the redistribution of 1924. In regard to twenty-two other seats the changes were insignificant. With the exception of one of the eleven Toronto seats there was no criticism. The difficulties in connection with that one seat were rectified. making those eleven seats unanimous.

At the commencement of our deliberations the hon. member for West Middlesex stated he believed we should disturb as few seats as possible. I doubt whether or not in any previous redistribution in the province of Ontario as few seats have been disturbed as in the present instance, and I doubt if in any previous redistribution there was as much harmony as was in evidence in the committee of this year. In the first instance we set out to take five seats from the rural communities. It was our intention to give three of those five seats to the urban communities and two to two rural seats which had largely increased in population. According to the recent census the population of West York in the province of Ontario is over 124,000. The population of Northeast Toronto was 106,000; Toronto-Scarborough, 87,000; the county of Welland, 83,000; the county of Nipissing, 70,000. The majority of the Toronto seats are all over 60,000, running from that figure to over 106,000. We felt some consideration should be given to the densely congested areas. In that connection we decided to give two more seats to Toronto, one more to York, one to Welland and one to Nipissing. In the latest draft of suggestions in the committee we found that if we were to have unanimity in all seats it would be necessary to drop two of those seats. A great number of seats have very small populations, and as there was no rule before the committee stating a rural seat should have a minimum population of so many thousands, an urban-rural seat so many thousands minimum, and a city seat so many thousands minimum, we had no rule to go by, with the exception of what was done in past redistributions, namely to respect as much as possible the county boundaries. That has been the plan we followed in connection with the Ontario constituencies. May I add that that has been the plan followed since confederation.

I have looked up some of the figures in connection with the first parliament of Canada and the constituents the various members of that parliament represented. It would appear from those figures that to-day we are following the same procedure. The following figures will serve to show in one instance the votes, and the others the populations of the constituencies in the session of 1867-72:

Vancouver island.. .. .. .. (votes)	239
	Population
Niagara-Ontario..	3,693
Montreal Centre..	5,264
Kingston..	12,407
North Bruce..	17,183
South Oxford..	19,923
South Perth..	21,145
South Bruce..	31,372
North Huron..	39,016
Montreal East..	55,670

It will be noted that Montreal East had the largest population. The method used at confederation has been followed since. I do not say that it is the correct one. It is not followed in many democratic countries and states. I made a careful study of the whole subject as it applied to all democratic countries of the world, and I found in most countries the rural, semi-rural and city ridings were allocated a minimum. However, that is not so in Canada.

In the state of Ohio, if my memory is correct, the population per assembly representative in the state legislature is approximately 66,000. For their congress the figure is about 281,000, and they endeavour as nearly as possible to divide their states in those proportions. In West Australia they commence with a widely extended district corresponding to our Patricia or Algoma districts. To use an arbitrary figure we will say that they start off with a population of 10,000. On that basis the urban-rural constituency would have a population of 20,000, and a city constituency 40,000. But in Canada we have no such basis upon which to work. We have followed the methods adopted in Canada in the past.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

I am sorry to say that even in connection with the present redistribution a number of ridings will be small, but not as small as they were left in the redistribution of 1924. The following are some of the figures for constituencies as provided in the redistribution of 1924:

South Perth..	18,382
North Wellington..	19,833
Glengarry..	20,518
Haldimand..	21,287
Brant..	21,970
Oxford South..	22,581
York West..	61,655
Toronto East..	63,735
Welland..	66,668
Toronto East Centre..	69,717

The latter is the largest according to my figures.

Now in the present redistribution, the smallest as far as I can see will be Brant with 21,202, Haldimand with 21,428, West Middlesex with 23,632, and the largest, Wentworth with 66,943; West Essex with 69,605, East York with 69,740, Nipissing with 74,000, and Welland with 82,731.

Unless there is some change—and there may be errors in my figures because there were many numbers to add and subtract—if you compare the figures of past redistributions in this country with those now proposed, they are not different as far as I can see. In the last redistribution, that of 1924, many county boundaries were materially disturbed. The counties of Simcoe and Dufferin were joined together, they had four seats and were reduced to three; the two Elgins were reduced to one; the two Hastings and one Peterborough reduced from three to two, the three in Frontenac, Prince Edward and Lennox-Addington reduced to two, and three seats in Muskoka and Ontario reduced to two. Five seats altogether were taken off the rural ridings in Ontario in 1924 and given, one to Essex, one to Rainy River, one to North Temiskaming and two to York. I am very happy as I said at the commencement, that on practically seventy-five seats there was entire unanimity. As far as I know now there are only two ridings to settle that is in the changes in the counties, on which we have just had some discussion. I think reasonable discussion will enable us to lay the whole 82 seats in Ontario before this house in a unanimous report. That is my hope.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just one word in answer to my hon. friend. I know he does not intend to be inaccurate, but when he states that there was agreement in regard to 70 or 75 seats, the position was that there were 82 ridings being discussed and I think he will agree that the accurate statement is that the main objections were aimed at a limited number of seats, but more than he has stated.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I suppose that redistribution carried out by a committee of the House of Commons will always be a very difficult task. I had the honour of being on the committee in 1924 and we found the task exceedingly difficult then, largely on account of the fact that the movement of population in Canada is from the rural parts to the urban centres, and that movement apparently is going to continue. We found the same difficulty on this occasion. I am not going to cover the ground that has been covered by previous speakers, namely, that the committee was subdivided into subcommittees for the various provinces. Each provincial subcommittee of course proceeded to make the adjustments or work upon them, assuming of course that if they could agree the main committee would have little or no discussion about it. In the committees it was the endeavour to hear all shades of political opinion and the fact that we nearly came to a settlement on the two western provinces is I think an indication that our work was fairly well done. It is a very difficult thing to satisfy everyone. Then in the somewhat small number of meetings of the general committee, naturally we became interested in the difficulties that were encountered as announced by the members of the smaller subcommittees dealing with those provinces in which they were not so fortunate in approaching agreement. I do not know, and I am not going to say that more meetings of the general committee would have been helpful, because I think after all disputes can be settled better by individuals chosen from the provinces working in the smaller committees. There is more hope of their getting together among themselves than if outside influences are brought to bear upon their deliberations. However, despite what our good friend the Minister of Public Works has said there was a persistent rumour going about the corridors of the house that the government were not extremely anxious about putting this bill through which I may say caused me some uneasiness at times. Indeed, I felt sometimes as though our work—a great deal of hard work—was going to result in having the whole thing put over. I for one, am extremely glad that it is to be settled. I believe that the quicker matters of this kind are settled the better for all concerned, and I want to assure you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee, that I was not one of those who advocated delay. On the contrary, I felt that we should get this matter settled. I never heard any expression from any one in our group advocating delay, certainly no member of it suggested it to me.

After it became evident that the committee in at least three of the provinces could not entirely agree, it was suggested that a smaller committee selected from both sides of the house might see if it were possible to bring about an understanding between the members of the committees dealing with the various provinces. Under the chairmanship of the Right Hon. Sir George Perley we did make considerable progress. I was one of those who hoped that we should get every one of those difficulties adjusted. It looked as though in Ontario the matter could be straightened out. In Quebec we seemed to be making fair headway, but I do want to say that redistribution in Quebec is the most difficult thing I ever undertook to sit in upon and understand. I confess here and now that I do not understand it; the way in which constituencies in that province are laid out. It is to me more like a jig-saw puzzle than anything else. But I still think that if our committee had been allowed to work a little longer—

Mr. BENNETT: You know that Mr. Lapointe went away on Saturday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was told to go.

Mr. BENNETT: Who told him?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A member of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is the member?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Lapointe will speak for himself. I think he will tell you.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly I didn't.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was here on Saturday; I went to the meeting called on Friday afternoon at 2.30. At 8.30 I went again to the room designated but no meeting took place. The hon. member for Acadia was present on both occasions, as was the hon. member for Quebec East, but the chairman of the committee did not turn up, so of course we came to the conclusion that our services were no longer required. However, I did stay here on Friday, largely at the suggestion of the chairman of the redistribution committee, but I received no indication of any desire for a consultation on this matter. I think if that consultation had been held under the chairmanship of the right hon. member for Argenteuil, perhaps many of these difficulties could have been straightened out.

With regard to Saskatchewan there is only one thing I desire to state. The chairman of the committee referred to some incidents that occurred during the meetings of the general committee. If that is how one should have performed, perhaps we should have all become somewhat wrathy in our expressions of disapproval; perhaps then we would have obtained more than we have been able to secure, that is, if the schedules remain as they are to-day. Evidently those demonstrations brought some results. Let me say, however, that from the very start we recognized that the government had to take the responsibility of making this redistribution, and we knew perfectly well that it would be useless for us to press for the full measure of what we believed would be an equitable redistribution. Personally I was prepared to view the matter from that standpoint and to give in to a greater extent than otherwise I should have felt constrained to do. Other hon. members may feel that they have been dealt with unfairly, and no doubt they can put up a good case. I am not here to express their point of view; so far as I am concerned the sub-committee to which I belonged came to an agreement, and I am prepared to stand by that agreement. I should have preferred some changes, and would like to see them made even yet if that can be done, but if those changes are not made I do not intend to raise any terrific row about the matter and detain the house at any great length. The government must take the responsibility for this measure, and if the schedules are within reason at all I am prepared to abide by them.

In 1924 we had to take the responsibility, and apparently that redistribution has been used as a yardstick on this occasion. Naturally when you see a constituency with 18,000 or 20,000 individuals constituting the electorate while a neighbouring constituency has three times that many it does not look like an equitable redistribution, but that has been the system pursued in the past and I doubt if we can change it very much on this occasion. I just wish to add that so far as we were concerned, as members of the opposition, we were at the disposal of the committee on all occasions, ready and willing to try our best to bring about a reasonable settlement of the problems confronting us.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): At this stage of the discussion I should like to make just a few remarks. I had not intended to speak at this point, but in view of the remarks of the Liberal member of the Ontario sub-committee with regard to urban and rural populations I feel that I should say a word. I believe my fellow members on the Quebec sub-committee will agree with me when I say that we really never discussed that point. We had several suggestions with regard to Montreal; it was suggested that two, three and four additional seats should be given there. Almost immediately we dropped the suggestion of four additional seats. One evening I was in the room of my hon. friend from Laurier-Outremont together with several members from the province of Quebec when that matter was brought up, and I said that so far as we were concerned we would be quite satisfied if Montreal were given only two additional seats, but that if this was not felt to be fair we would also consider three additional seats. During the conversations I suggested that neither party should have to take the responsibility of deciding whether two or three additional seats should be given Montreal, and I proposed that we make a joint declaration to the newspapers as to any decision that might be arrived at. At all events, Mr. Chairman, with practically no controversy we agreed to recommend that three seats be added to Montreal, and we worked on that basis. Personally, as a rural member, I would have been agreeable to only two additional seats being given Montreal, but it was thought that this would not be fair. That is about all I wish to say at this stage, except to make a reference to my hon. friend from Temiscouata, who said he was not furnished with all the information he required. I believe that was only an oversight, and the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont has informed me that the hon. gentleman has been furnished with the information required.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): At the outset I should like to say that the relations between the members of the Quebec sub-committee were most agreeable, but I should like to say just a word in order to show exactly how we proceeded. I do not want to betray any secrets; I do not think I am doing so, because it became a matter of public knowledge that room 272 was being used by the government members of the committee for their meetings. I want to say that I was extended every courtesy in that room, and that other hon. gentlemen on this side were likewise admitted, though perhaps not so often as I was, which is only natural. After we began meeting in this room we were shown a map which had been drawn by some man who seemed to know his business. When this map was submitted to me, representing the minority on the Quebec sub-committee, I neither approved nor disapproved of it. I was told that this map represented the government proposals with regard to Quebec, and we discussed the matter on that basis, but later on changes were made. At one time the east end of the island of Montreal was to be joined to the county of L'Assomption, but we raised strenuous objections to that proposal, arguing that more than one-half of the population of Montreal would be included in a rural district. That proposal was abandoned, and other changes were made following discussion. The counties of Beauharnois and Vaudreuil-Soulanges were to be joined according to the original map. This would have meant that the riding would be divided not only by the St. Lawrence river but also by a lake several miles wide, with no communication between the different parts. I understand there is a ferry that runs in the daytime, but at night, to get from Beauharnois to Vaudreuil-Soulanges, one would have had to go to Montreal, a distance of fifty-five miles and return.

So far as representation in the city of Montreal is concerned, there are now three seats in that city and I have no excuses to offer in giving Montreal three seats. The increase in population in that city in the last ten years was twice as large as the population throughout Quebec, and on the map as first submitted the idea was to have two seats in the island of Montreal. Discussions took place and it was finally decided that there should be three new seats in the city of Montreal, one in the west end, one in the east end, which would be respectively Liberal and Conservative, and another seat in the west end comprising Rosemount, which was supposed to be fair fighting ground for both parties, and that was agreed to. The gentlemen representing the government benches were up in my room, as suggested by the hon. member for Compton, and they thought that the plan we submitted was fair and equitable. And that, as far as I understand, is the plan which is to go through now.

I wish to go on record however, as a representative of the city of Montreal, as saying that we were entitled as a matter of fact to more than three seats; but seeing that three are given us we are going to take them, and I do not want to accept any blame for that. I am representing the city of Montreal in this house and I took it upon myself to get as much as I could for that city.

Our committee discussed this matter very thoroughly. I do not think there are other committees that worked harder than we did. We worked far into the night on many occasions, and when it was thought that it might be advisable to get some of the wiser heads, or presumably wiser heads, to form a new committee, we, as representing the province of Quebec, were called in as technical experts or advisers, and through the courtesy of the members of this new committee we assisted at all their discussions. We were called upon to give our opinion, which we did, and I might say that the difficulties that existed when our committee was disbanded, or when it was superseded by this other committee, exist at the present moment.

Now this map of the province of Quebec, as has been said by the hon. member for West Edmonton, certainly resembles a jigsaw puzzle, and there is much concern in that province as to the result of this redistribution. On the part of the public and in the press there seems to be a pardonable curiosity as to the necessity of such wholesale readjustment. Nothing of the kind was done in previous redistributions for the reason that Quebec, with its fixed population, served as the unit of representation; and if acute criticism has not arisen at the present time, so far as redistribution in the province of Quebec is concerned, at least the curiosity of the public is excited and the question is being asked—What are the reasons for all these changes in Quebec?

The opinion of the members from this side of the house, so far as Quebec is concerned, was expressed in a letter to Mr. Dorion, the chairman of that committee, on April 27, when we suggested that the province of Quebec should be left as much as possible as it is. But there were certain changes that had to be made. It must be borne in mind that the counties of Yamaska, Beauharnois, Laprairie, Napierville and L'Islet were to disappear owing to their not having the required population, and in Bonaventure, Stanstead, Lake St. John, Sherbrooke, Shefford and Brome-Missisquoi there were no changes whatever to be made.

I suggested therefore, in a letter to the chairman of our committee, that so far as the wiping out of certain counties was concerned, when that did occur the adjacent, contiguous counties should be put together as an integral whole and should not be divided up. I also suggested in that letter that owing to the increased population in Montreal the representation should take place on the principle, which we started off by laying down, that there should be increased representation in Montreal in the west and east, as I have indicated.

We discussed these matters as long as we could. We could not agree, and it is not my intention now to go into details. I understand that when the items in the schedules come up each of the members representing the counties affected will have his say in the matter. I certainly cannot understand however why only nine seats out of sixty-five in the province of Quebec have been left undisturbed.

Mr. A. F. TOTZKE (Humboldt): At this stage of the proceedings I do not intend to discuss the individual troubles we have had with regard to the constituencies in Saskatchewan, but I wish to make a few general remarks more in reply to the remarks of the chairman of the committee.

At the outset, let me say that I hope that the remarks which I shall make at this time and later on in the discussion of this bill will be such that the Prime Minister may not again be called upon to refer to me as one of those who are arrogant and almost insolent.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say any such thing. If the hon. gentleman applies the remark to himself I certainly did not.

Mr. TOTZKE: He referred to the members of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: Just look at the record.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why were those words used at all?

Mr. BENNETT: Because it represented the attitude of mind which hon. gentlemen were taking.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But they must apply to somebody.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely—to those who accept it. Let the hon. gentleman read what I said; I stand by it.

Mr. TOTZKE: I have it here. At page 5076 of Hansard, on May 16, the Prime Minister, in reply to certain remarks made by the leader of the opposition, had this to say:

> My right hon. friend opposite knows from long experience—and he has had a longer experience of the responsibilities of the head of a government than I have had—that there is a point always reached where you cannot expect men who belong to the majority to be told that they must subordinate entirely their views to the will of a sometimes arrogant and almost insolent minority.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

[Mr. J. A. Mercier.]

Mr. TOTZKE: But prior to that, the right hon. gentleman had said:

> My advice to-day is, and I have inquired carefully, that certainly the map which our friends from Saskatchewan insist upon is practically their map or nothing.

And immediately after that he made the remarks which I have quoted with respect to the insolent minority.

Mr. BENNETT: I was discussing another point; I was dealing with another phase of the matter. I said that there was always a point reached where majorities could not subordinate their views to a minority—a sometimes arrogant and insolent minority.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am sorry if I misinterpreted the remarks of the right hon. gentleman. I have only this to say, that at no time during the discussion, in the committee or elsewhere, have I—certainly not knowingly—been insolent or arrogant. Now, apparently in the difficulties which the special committee of the house and the special committee of elder statesmen have met, all criticism is directed at the province of Saskatchewan. I have been told at various times that if we could come to an agreement the whole matter could be ironed out, that Saskatchewan seemed to be the stumbling block in the whole procedure. If that is true, the only thing I can say is that perhaps it is because Saskatchewan has been treated worse than any other province in the dominion in the matter of redistribution.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. TOTZKE: Somebody says "no." As an example, I cite the case of the hon. member for Melville. He is one of the oldest and the most respected members of this house. For over a quarter of a century he has been one of the leading figures in political life and agriculture in western Canada. It was decided deliberately to do away with the constituency of Melville and put the hon. member who now represents this constituency in with another hon. member of this house.

Mr. TURNBULL: Will the hon. member permit me to interrupt? I may say that since the hon. member for Melville's seat has been restored I have been asked from the other side of the house to move the boundary line back and eliminate it again.

Mr. TOTZKE: The hon. member says that he has been asked to restore the original plan; that is not correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TURNBULL: The hon. gentleman must take my word for it; I made a statement and my hon. friend has no right to say that it is not correct.

Mr. TOTZKE: The hon. member has no right to say that I asked him to put it back.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. TURNBULL: I did not say the hon. member had asked.

Mr. TOTZKE: You said you had been asked.

Mr. BENNETT: From the other side.

Mr. TURNBULL: I said I had been asked from the other side, and I ask the hon. member to accept my statement.

Mr. TOTZKE: I accept the hon. member's statement. At this stage I may say that I am speaking for the members from the province of Saskatchewan as their representative on the special committee dealing with redistribution. What was asked of the hon. member in connection with the restoration of his original plan was that instead of restoring the original lines, the town of Melville and certain other townships in that vicinity would be amalgamated with the proposed constituency of Touchwood, the new constituency to be called Melville. That is what was asked for from this side of the house. I am sure the Prime Minister will not disagree with what was suggested as the rearrangement of another constituency in Saskatchewan. I refer to the constituency of Prince Albert, represented by the leader of the opposition. This constituency was so arranged that with a normal vote the leader of the opposition would be in the minority by seven or eight hundred or perhaps a few more votes. But that was not the worst feature. The lines of the constituencies of Prince Albert and Melfort were so arranged that the boundary line would run through the farm of the present Minister of Agriculture. To my mind that shows a deliberate intention on the part of hon. members supporting the government from the province of Saskatchewan to force the leader of the opposition out of the constituency of Prince Albert and allow the Minister of Agriculture to run in that constituency.

It is difficult for anyone coming from the province of Saskatchewan to preserve the utmost decorum in the remarks he makes with regard to the redistribution of that province. I must say that all my dealings with the hon. member for Regina have been very decorous. We have been very agreeable and there has been nothing between us personally which would lead to acrimonious feelings or difficulties of any kind. With regard to the chairmain of the committee, the Minister of Public Works, I must say that he always has been courteous to me. He has been most agreeable and ordinarily I would say he has been very fair. But the fact remains that whenever I went to discuss the question of the redistribution in Saskatchewan with the chairman of the committee or later on with members of the committee of elder statesmen, I was always told that if I did not agree to the proposals made by the hon. member for Regina the bill would be forced through in spite of everything. It seems to me that that did not offer much chance for negotiation in connection with the redistribution of that province.

Mr. POULIOT: That is a strange kind of conciliation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Tory conciliation.

Mr. TOTZKE: I should like to quote a few of the remarks made by the Prime Minister when dealing with this matter on Friday last. At page 5230 of Hansard he said:

> I have no desire that there should be placed upon the statute book an unfair redistribution, but I will not become a party to an unfair redistribution being put on the statute book by the will of the minority.

I have no objection to that statement and I heartily agree with it. I believe the Prime Minister was sincere in making those remarks. Later on he said:

> There is no disagreement about New Brunswick; it loses one member. No county boundaries have been disturbed; nothing has been done except to drop one member from Saint John. In the province of Nova Scotia, because of the desire to maintain county boundaries as they exist at present, one of our own members finds himself living in a constituency that has fifty thousand people. He has made sacrifices in that direction which he says will legislate him out of the House of Commons. That does not look like gerrymandering. In the province of Prince Edward Island there has been no change at all.

If that procedure had been followed out in the province of Saskatchewan there would have been no difficulty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And in Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: It could not be followed out in Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, it could.

Mr. TOTZKE: There has been no change in the representation of Saskatchewan, and I have maintained from the start that all that was necessary to be done in that province was to make minor adjustments to the various constituencies in order more nearly to equalize the population. But we find that not only has the matter of the equalization of population not been given particular regard but that various members now sitting in the house and representing certain constituencies have been forced out of their own into other constituencies.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is it not correct that during the past ten years there has been a substantial move northward of the population?

Mr. TOTZKE: I agree with that and I will take it up later.

Mr. McINTOSH: And a good deal of it will go back south in the next few years.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. TOTZKE: When the committee rose at one o'clock I had been referring to the remarks made by the Prime Minister with regard to redistribution in the maritime provinces and had said that if that idea had been followed in Saskatchewan we could very easily have come to an agreement. I had referred to the constituencies of Melville and Prince Albert and had said that other members were being put out of their constituencies. The Prime Minister then interjected a question whether it was not a fact that the population was moving northward in the province of Saskatchewan and I agreed that it was. I am sure that the Prime Minister will not think me discourteous to him if later on in my remarks I refer to that matter.

I had referred to the members who had been put out of their constituencies or had been put into the same constituency with another member. I had referred to the constituency of Melville where the sitting member had been deprived of his seat in Melville and had been put in the same constituency with the member for Touchwood. The hon. member for Regina then interjected the remark that we had agreed later on to the restoration of his original plan. I stated at that time that we had agreed tentatively to the restoration of his original plan for the Touchwood seat provided that the town of Melville and certain other territory was included therein and that the constituency should be called Melville. But I want to say on that point, that while we agreed to that, it was on the understanding that it would lead the way to further adjustments in various other seats of the province.

Under the redistribution as it appears in the schedule to the bill now before the house the hon. member for Yorkton is put in the same seat with the member for Touchwood. I submit that if the seat of Melville is restored to its original position as suggested by the committee at the present time, there is no necessity for the amalgamation of the two seats of Yorkton and Last Mountain. If the original Melville seat is restored it breaks down the argument that there is any necessity for the amalgamation of two seats in that part of the province.

Then there is the constituency of South Battleford which under the present plan is eliminated. A portion of it is put into the constituency of Kindersley, throwing the sitting member for South Battleford into the constituency with the present member for Kindersley. The constituency of North Battleford is in part thrown into the old constituency of South Battleford, and to my mind this is one of the most glaring instances of gerrymandering in the whole province. They take the seat of North Battleford and the old town of Battleford, and put them into the same constituency across the north branch of the Saskatchewan river. Certain portions of the old constituency of North Battleford are put into the new constituency which is to be called Battleford. Up to the present time the boundary line between the constituencies of North Battleford and South Battleford has been the Saskatchewan river. The citizens of Saskatchewan in that part of the province lying north of the Saskatchewan river have very little in common with the people on the south side of the river. The people of North Battleford and the people of the old town of Battleford have been at loggerheads ever since the new city of North Battleford was created, and I charge that this is a deliberate gerrymandering to throw the new seat of North Battleford in with the old town of Battleford.

Besides that, the seat of Redberry, as it is called in this bill, is a ridiculous sort of constituency no matter how you may look at it. It runs from the Saskatchewan river to the limit of population as at present, one hundred and fifty miles to the north. Besides that it runs to the west, north of the constituency of Battleford as it is now called, for some one hundred miles from the city of Battleford.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that we are on clause 1, the title of the bill.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but this discussion has been going on all morning.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friend—

Mr. TOTZKE: Previous speakers have introduced all the material that I am now using, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: They should not have done so.

Mr. TOTZKE: I shall appeal to the house.

The CHAIRMAN: If my hon. friend will allow me just a moment, we are now on clause 1, which reads:

This act may be cited as The Representation Act.

Mr. BENNETT: On that section, Mr. Chairman, discussion has taken place of the whole question of redistribution, commencing with the leader of the opposition and carried on continuously. I think there is no reason why the discussion should not now be allowed to continue.

The CHAIRMAN: If there is no objection, certainly. I apologize to the hon. member. I was simply trying to follow the rule.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am sorry you interrupted me, Mr. Chairman, because now I am off the track.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry.

Mr. TOTZKE: I was talking about the ridiculousness of the present proposal regarding the constituency of Redberry. It makes it necessary for the returning officer, if he happens to live in the city of North Battleford, which I imagine he would, having to go around the north side of the constituency of Battleford for one hundred miles to the west. Then as far as the present population is concerned he goes one hundred and fifty miles north of the city. But that is not the end of the constituency. The constituency goes right to the northern part of the province. In the northern part of that constituency there lies a good quantity of arable land which at the present time is unsettled but which likely will be settled in the future.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it would have to be put in some seat.

Mr. TOTZKE: Yes, and I have made a suggestion which I am sure the Prime Minister will agree is very much more reasonable than the one now proposed. I agree that the constituency of North Battleford has a very large population and should be divided, but when they throw in the constituency of South Battleford with it I say that the division is ridiculous and is clearly a case of gerrymanding. I say that the population of those two seats should be divided in an entirely different way. I say that the constituency of Battleford as now proposed should go north to the boundary of the province, just as does the constituency of Redberry. I say that North Battleford and South Battleford should not be put together in the same constituency. They should be divided.

Aside from those constituencies from which sitting members have been thrown out or thrown together into the same constituency, there is the case of my own constituency. I am a little diffident about speaking of it because at the very outset of the negotiations I had made the remark, and I still say, that they can do as they wish with my seat. But they have thrown me into an entirely new seat, and the thing I object to in connection with my seat is that they have thrown me into a seat at the expense of my leader. In a deliberate attempt, and I say it advisedly, to gerrymander the leader of the opposition out of his seat, they have put the best portion of his seat into the constituency in which I now live.

This morning mention was made of the fact that the constituency of Melville had been restored as a result of the agitation that had been carried on by the members from the province of Saskatchewan. It is true that that seat has been restored. It is also true, as I said a few moments ago, that we agreed to a certain restoration of the original plan of the hon. member for Regina, who was a member of the special committee on redistribution. I have also said that if, as proposed in the bill, the seat of Melville was restored practically to its orginal size and boundaries, the argument for the amalgamation of any seats in that part of the province fell to the ground. I submitted to the hon. member for Regina and to the special committee of elder statesmen of the house, who were supposed to act as mediators between the members of the special committee and try to reach an agreement, a map showing that it was not necessary to amalgamate the two seats of Yorkton and Last Mountain as at present proposed.

In the restoration of the constituency of Melville we had a long, narrow seat lying to the north side of the Qu'Appelle river. Prior to the proposals made by the hon. member for Regina the constituency of Qu'Appelle was located south of the Qu'Appelle river. I had no objection to the location of that constituency except that I did say it constituted a very flagrant example of gerrymandering, because the southern boundary was not lying straight as it had been formerly, but was made to jog, running up and down for a distance of six miles, crossing and recrossing the railway, with no apparent reason whatever except to throw out Liberal votes and place Conservative votes in the Qu'Appelle constituency. I said there was justification for the restoration of the Melville seat to the north side, because the same principle applies there. The Qu'Appelle river is a natural boundary, and it is only just that the constituency of Melville should extend along the natural boundary formed by the Qu'Appelle river and with the lines of railway in both Qu'Appelle and Melville constituencies, and running their entire length. I say however that there is no justification for putting in another long narrow seat, and I suggest my map was entirely justifiable. I am sure hon. members who have studied the matter impartially must agree with my contention.

Suggestion has been made that my attitude and the attitude of other hon. members before the special committee was unreasonable, and that we had taken the position that we would accept our map or nothing. Every time I went to speak to the hon. member for Regina in connection with redistribution in the province of Saskatchewan he asked me if I would agree to the amalgamation of the two seats and the building in of a new one. I always said, "I cannot accept that." I did not see any necessity for it. Immediately the remark was made, "Well, what is the sense of us discussing any further? If we cannot agree to that we cannot get anywhere." I am not blaming the hon. member for Regina for the attitude he has taken. I realize he was in a position where he had come down from Saskatchewan with a map he was told to put through, and he had no alternative.

Mr. TURNBULL: I deny wholly that statement.

Mr. TOTZKE: I accept the hon. member's denial and I will say that if he was not tied perhaps I should say that I was more or less tied not to accept that proposition.

Mr. MANION: That is a different thing.

Mr. TOTZKE: But I still think I was right in what I said. I tried to argue before the select committee of elder statesmen, the question as to the amalgamation of the two seats and the building in of a new one, but I did not have the opportunity. After the restoration of the Melville seat was proposed I went before that committee and tried to make the explanation I am now giving to the committee. Of course I was heard, but after speaking I was told that if I did not agree to the proposition suggested by the hon. member for Regina, with the possibility of very slight variations in boundaries here and there, the matter would be put through by force and in spite of me. That was the attitude I met all the way through negotiations from the chairman of the committee, from government members, and from the select committee of elder statesmen. Always I was more or less threatened with the suggestion that if I did not agree to the proposals made by the hon. member for Regina they would be put through anyway, and possibly would be worse than before. Finally, in an attempt to have some agreement before the matter was brought into the house or into this committee I prepared another map. I went to present it to the committee of elder statesmen, but found that only the two Liberal members on the committee and the leader of the group in the corner of the house were present. I laid the matter before Mr. Turnbull, and he said to me, "Is that the least you will take?" I said, "Substantially, yes." I did not have the opportunity of arguing the matter before the committee of elder statesmen, and I suggest I was placed in the position where anything I proposed was given no consideration until I accepted almost in entirety the proposals of the hon. member for Regina.

I wish to say only a few more words in outlining the position I took throughout the negotiations. On March 16 I received the first map from the hon. member for Regina. In the covering letter he made the following observations:

> I gave considerable thought to your suggestion that the boundary lines should be moved to the north and found that in actual practice it was rather difficult to make a general application of that principle. In some cases the boundary line has been moved north on my proposed plan. In others, it has been extended south and in one instance, sufficiently to take in part of the territory south of the Saskatchewan river. I know this is contrary to the idea that natural boundaries should be recognized, but I can only point out that communication at the point in question is not difficult, and that there are either five or six ferries across the south Saskatchewan river in the area in question.

As I have spoken some time, I shall try to curtail my remarks. After receiving that letter I submitted to the hon. member for Regina a contra proposal in the form of a map. The covering letter, of which I wish to read a part, is dated March 27, and is as follows:

> I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the twenty-fifth instant, and wish to submit the following in reply.

You will recall that my first statement to you in connection with the redistribution of the constituencies in Saskatchewan was, that as there was no change in number of the representation from that province, the only excuse for making any alterations in the present boundaries of the various constituencies was that there should be a more equitable distribution of population among them. I also said that it was an accepted principle, and in this I am supported by the statement of the chairman of the committee, the Hon. H. A. Stewart, that the unit of population should be considerably larger for urban districts than for rural.

In preparing the map which I submitted to you, this is the principle I have followed, although I admit that in one of the northern constituencies, namely Melfort the population was left a little above the unit. The other two seats, namely Prince Albert and North Battleford, while above the unit of population, each contain a city and thus may be classed as urban constituencies. However, I submit that adjustments to the boundaries shown on my map could very readily be made to take care of any discrepancies in distribution of population without too radically disturbing the present boundaries.

I admit at once the comparatively large percentages of increase in population of the northern constituencies, but I submit that considerable of this increase has come from districts in the dried out areas in the southern part of the province, and the majority of these people, to my mind, will return to their former homes when conditions return to normal, as I am sure they will.

Perhaps I was not quite correct in that particular, because the census was taken in 1931, and quite a large number of the people who moved to the northern part of the province went up after it had been taken. However I still maintain a considerable number went up before, and a good many of them will return to their former homes. My letter continues:

There is also no doubt in my mind that certain areas in the northern constituencies, now occupied, cannot maintain their population and will of necessity have to be abandoned.

Then I included a list of the constituencies showing the percentage of increase in population in the last ten years. I do not think it necessary to burden the record with this information. Then my letter continues:

Now the increase in population for the province is 21·6 per cent, and this must be borne in mind when considering percentages of increase in the various constituencies. I shall draw to your attention only those districts in which there are marked discrepancies, and which do not bear out your claim in the matter of adjusting populations.

This letter refers to the first map submitted by the hon. member for Regina:

Touchwood had an increase in population of only 7·2 per cent, and so perhaps should be a little larger than the unit for the province, but as the unit works out at 43,861, and will be considerably smaller when allowance is made for larger urban units, it seems to me that the population in this district is far too large.

Maple Creek had an increase in population of 13·7 per cent, considerably below the average, and yet the population has been decreased under your plan.

Moose Jaw had an increase of only 0·02 per cent in population. This is an urban riding, but under your plan, the population has been decreased.

Qu'Appelle had an increase in population of 8·8 per cent—very much below the average, and yet has a decrease in population under your plan.

Saskatoon had an increase in population of 48·9 per cent it is true, but this is an urban district and should have a considerably larger population than you give it. The new district, Hague, which you propose around Saskatoon, has only 1,077 less of a population.

Yorkton is an urban district, but the city of Yorkton has only about one-eighth the population of Saskatoon, and yet you make the district considerably larger in population than Saskatoon.

Now, if you will study my map, I think you will find that in the majority of the seats the population has been fairly placed, having regard for the unit of population which making allowance for the larger population allowed urban districts I would place at about 42,000.

Willow Bunch is a little high, and some of it could be put into Moose Jaw, which is considerably too low.

Long Lake is a little low in population, and some could be added from Humboldt, which in turn could take more territory from Melfort, and possibly Prince Albert, which would more nearly equalize the population all around.

Rosetown also is below the unit, and here population could be taken from North Battleford to make adjustments in both seats.

The difficulty I found with the hon. member for Regina and the Saskatchewan members on that side of the house was that they claimed that if my proposals were followed the population which was taken from the other seats and put into these seats which they were trying to preserve would mean the defeat of their candidate. In reply I said I admitted that was substantially correct, that they could not go out of these districts into the area around them without getting a population which was more or less predominantly Liberal; but I said at the time that I was not concerned particularly with the evenness of the population in the constituencies. I pointed out that in other provinces they had in certain constituencies a very small population and in others a very large population. I also said at that time that I was quite willing to go back to the present map of Saskatchewan and make alterations here and there which would more nearly equalize the discrepancies in the population, and that there was no necessity for an entire new gerrymander of the province. To continue:

Now may I make some remarks regarding your plan in general. To my mind your map does not recognize the fact that the only changes required in our province are adjustments to more nearly equalize population. You are not, for example, consistent in the recognition of natural boundaries. For example, in Qu'Appelle you retain the Qu'Appelle valley as the northern boundary, yet in Kindersley, South Battleford, Long Lake and Hague, apparently no attention to natural boundaries has been given, yet the Qu'Appelle valley is more easily crossed than the Saskatchewan river. Then again, no apparent attention has been given to railway transportation in some districts, and, as everyone knows, in the wintertime and during wet spells this is the only way one can get around his constituency.

I must say that I cannot help but come to the conclusion that your proposal is a deliberate gerrymander, which is confirmed by the fact that a number of the sitting members are forced out of their present ridings into new ones.

With regard to your remarks as to the probable trend of population in the future, I am sure you will admit that there is little likelihood of any very large increase in our population during the next ten years, and hence our adjustments may fairly be made on present population.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at this stage of the proceedings, I do not know that I have any more remarks to make. When we get into the schedules I intend to go over the districts one by one, and shows just the attitude I take in connection with each. But before I take my seat I wish to bring to the attention of the committee the one constituency which I think is the worst of all in Saskatchewan, that is the constituency of Long Lake. This constituency has been a little low in population, it is the only constituency in the whole province where a decrease of population has been shown during the last ten years. But it is bounded on all sides by natural boundaries, on the one side the Saskatchewan river and the Qu'Appelle river. On the east side is Last Mountain lake. As I said before, the Saskatchewan river can be crossed at various points by ferry, but on the west side of this particular constituency is this Last Mountain lake which is sixty or seventy miles long and there is no way of crossing except by rowboat or motorboat, there are no ferries on the lake. So if the member for the constituency lived on one side or the other of this lake he would have to go around the end of the lake to visit his constituents on the other side. And at the same time any constituents who wished to visit their representative would have to do the same. At present it is all right, the representative lives in Regina and he can start out and go up the east side and down the west side, but in the case of a member residing in the constituency this could not be done without a great deal of inconvenience and loss of time.

[Mr. Totzke.]

Then I also want to draw attention to the city of Regina whereby this proposal the hon. member for Regina suggests that only the city of Regina be in the constituency. It is true the population of Regina is large enough for a constituency, but I submit that the annexes and suburbs should not be thrown in with the rural area. There is what is known as North Regina, having about 800 population, I do not know the population of the other part. But I submit that in this case the suburbs of Regina should go with the city. The same applies to the city of Saskatoon, I say more of the surrounding parts should be taken into that constituency. The people of the city of Saskatoon are thrown into the new constituency of Hague under this proposal, it is very inconvenient. Having nothing in common with the people to the north of Saskatoon, they should be taken in with the city.

My time is up, and I will reserve my further remarks until the schedules reach the committee.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): I do not propose at the present moment to discuss the details of all the constituencies in the province of Saskatchewan, but merely to present to the house as well as I can the general problem with which the committee was confronted, the general plan which was adopted to deal with the problem, and the guiding of principles by which I was governed in coming to the conclusions to which I came. My hon. friend from Humboldt made one or two remarks which seemed to me to explain clearly the whole situation. At one stage of our negotiations he said he was not concerned very much with the populations, but, to use his own words, he was willing to go back to the old map of Saskatchewan and leave it as it was; there was no necessity for a new gerrymander.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A new one is good!

Mr. TOTZKE: That was not my statement.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friend will consult Hansard he will find that what I say is correct.

Mr. TOTZKE: I wonder if the hon. gentleman will accept my word as I accepted his.

Mr. TURNBULL: Not as to what you said in the house. I will leave it to Hansard.

In 1924 when the last redistribution took place in Saskatchewan, there was not a Conservative member from that province in the house. There was only one Conservative member from the northern part of the province here when the redistribution before that took place. But whatever took place in 1914 did not much affect the matter because the map of Saskatchewan was terribly altered in 1924. On that occasion the subcommittee for Saskatchewan consisted of the hon. member for Melville, who was then representing the city of Regina, and Mr. J. Fred Johnston, who then represented the constituency of Last Mountain. At that time this terrible natural boundary of Last Mountain Lake, which should be observed very strictly to-day, was in the centre of the constituency of Last Mountain.

Mr. TOTZKE: Not in 1924.

Mr. TURNBULL: Until 1924. In that year it was necessary to provide for new seats in the province, and the error was made in building those seats. With regard to the area immediately south of the South Saskatchewan and Qu'Appelle rivers, which includes eight of the present seats, there has been no great difference between myself and the hon. member for Humboldt; in fact our agreement has been so close that the press reporters attending the committee meetings have said there is no difference between us on that point. With regard to this boundary line of Qu'Appelle, to which my hon. friend referred a few moments ago, and which is in this southern portion, all I can say is that I understand that the boundary line is satisfactory to the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who represent the adjoining constituencies, and I see no very great reason why we should waste the time of the house in trying to disturb it.

Mr. TOTZKE: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. TURNBULL: Taking the six seats immediately north of the Qu'Appelle and South Saskatchewan rivers, which include Yorkton, Melville, Last Mountain, Long Lake, Rosetown and Kindersley, these seats presented an entirely new and difficult problem. In the first place, prior to the 1924 redistribution that territory was largely included in the three constituencies of Saltcoats, Last Mountain and Kindersley; it is true that the larger portion of the constituency of Yorkton was not in that area. By this arrangement made between the Liberal member for Regina and the Progressive member for Long Lake, of the new seats to be built into Saskatchewan three were built into that area, and the result of the 1925 election there should be observed after this—well, I should not call it an old gerrymander because I have not used that term, but in contrast with the new gerrymander we will call it a redistribution. As a result of what took place there the constituencies of Yorkton and Melville returned Liberal members, and remember that Melville was the constituency built in there by the then hon. member for Regina, who immediately forsook Regina and went to the new constituency, where he was returned in 1925 with a majority of over three thousand and in 1926 with a majority of over four thousand. The hon. member for Last Mountain was also elected by majorities greater than 1,500, while the new constituencies of Long Lake, Rosetown and Kindersley returned Progressive members to the house, this being practically the only area from which Progressive members were returned. Qu'Appelle and Mackenzie were the other two seats. With further reference to the redistribution of 1924, it will be recalled that in the parliament of 1921 there was only one Liberal member from the province of Saskatchewan. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition says that the results of the following elections proved their fairness or unfairness in that redistribution. In the first election after 1921 there were fifteen Liberals returned to the house instead of one.

Mr. VALLANCE: You lacked $750,000 in that election.

Mr. TURNBULL: When we come to discuss that we will discuss how much you got out of the Jacques Cartier cheque and how much you got out of the cheque from the Department of Public Works in Saskatchewan, to which the hon. member referred in this house the other day, and which he tried to make out was a cheque of the Saskatchewan relief commission.

Mr. VALLANCE: I rise to a question of privilege. As the records of the province of Saskatchewan show—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I object to the statement made by the hon. member for Regina. He lives close to the seat of the provincial government in Saskatchewan, and the statement I made on the floor of this house can be verified by the papers which have been tabled.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must state his question of privilege.

Mr. VALLANCE: The question of privilege is that the hon. member has accused me of receiving a bribe from some source, which is absolutely untrue. Must I submit to that sort of thing? The hon. member for Regina knows that all the papers which have been tabled in the legislature prove the truth of what I stated the other day.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member rises to a question of privilege, and I should like him to state it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a most vicious attack.

The CHAIRMAN: I want to understand the privilege the hon. member claims, and I should like him to say which words he wants withdrawn. I cannot listen to a speech on these matters.

Mr. VALLANCE: Will you allow me to tell you? I thought you were listening. When the Minister of Labour was putting through his estimates having to do with unemployment I stated in this house that a certain member of parliament who now sits in the House of Commons received a cheque, diagonally across which was marked "Relief No. 1." I was that member of parliament, and I stated to the house the conditions under which I received that cheque. Then I directed a question to the minister as to how much of the money spent for unemployment relief in the province of Saskatchewan had been used for like purposes. This money was paid to me through the relief commission in lieu of land which they expropriated for road purposes, but now I am accused by the hon. member for Regina of receiving moneys to which I was not entitled.

Mr. TURNBULL: I never said that.

Mr. VALLANCE: Now I demand that the hon. member, who knows as well as anyone does the facts in the case, retract the statement he has made, because he knows it is untrue.

The CHAIRMAN: In all fairness I must hear the hon. member for Regina.

Mr. TURNBULL: If I had said that the hon. member for South Battleford had received—

Mr. VALLANCE: You did say it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. VALLANCE: I will not sit down.

Mr. TURNBULL: If I had said that the hon. member for South Battleford had received a cheque to which he was not entitled I would withdraw that statement unhesitatingly, and if the hon. member is under the impression that I did make that remark I here and now relieve him of that misunderstanding. I do not think I ever made that statement, and I believe Hansard will bear me out. In any event I do not know of any cheque the hon. member ever received to which he was not entitled. What I did say was that he had received a cheque from the department of highways in Saskatchewan, which was marked "Relief No. 1" and which he then led the house to believe had been issued by the Saskatchewan relief commission for the purchase of land instead of for relief. The hon. member now says—

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, I will not. I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Regina has the floor, and I think in all fairness he must be allowed to state his position. Then the hon. member for South Battleford may reply.

Mr. TURNBULL: A few moments ago the hon. member said he got the cheque through the Saskatchewan relief commission. That cheque was for the purchase of soil, which was taken off his land to make a fill in a relief highway passing his farm. He was absolutely entitled to that cheque.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then why bring it up?

Mr. TURNBULL: Why bring up the $750,000, which has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was entitled to this money.

Mr. TURNBULL: It was taken to cover another excavation.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member tell me what words he wants the hon. member to withdraw or retract?

Mr. VALLANCE: I want the hon. member to withdraw something he has just said also. The records of this house will show that when the Minister of Labour was putting through his estimates I stated the position very clearly; I told him of the cheque I had received from the department, diagonally across which was written the words "Relief No. 1." I directed a question to the minister in that regard, but he had no information. Now I want the hon. member for Regina to withdraw the allegation or the insinuation that I received that money from some source other than the source from which I said I received it. That is the point.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member knows he must accept the word of a colleague.

Mr. TURNBULL: I have no recollection of having said at any time that the hon. gentleman got it from some source other than that from which he himself said he had got it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the hon. gentleman accept my word as to where I got it?

Mr. TURNBULL: If the hon. member says he got it from the department of highways that will be correct; but no matter where he says he got it, I will accept his word if he will get up and say it. As I was saying before this irrelevant interruption came, the fairness of redistribution according to the leader of the opposition, must be tested by the results it brings; that is what he says. The right hon. gentleman argues that because we elected eight members in Saskatchewan in 1930 the redistribution in 1924 must have been fair. Well, if that is the case, may I ask what happened in 1925 and 1926 when we did not elect any? Where was the fairness of the redistribution then? However, I am not going to discuss that question at the moment except to make this observation; whether in error or otherwise, more seats were built into the country immediately north of the South Saskatchewan river than there should have been in 1924. If it was an error, well and good, and if it was intentional that does not make the position any better.

That was the first problem. I may remark incidentally that when these seats were made in 1924 as I have described, the population was then 18,000 below the unit of population, and that in a part of the country that was not growing. One of these seats has actually decreased in population since then, while all others have increased slightly, particularly at the eastern end; so that in 1931 those six seats were between 51,000 and 52,000 below the 1931 unit of population, which unit of population had increased, between 1921 and 1931, from 36,283 to 44,186. It was obvious therefore that in this area there were too many seats—quite obvious.

In the northern part of the province another problem presented itself. There were three seats there, Melfort, Prince Albert and North Battleford, which were away above the unit of population—seats which had grown enormously in the ten years between one census and the next. The population of North Battleford, according to the 1931 census, was 53,708, or an increase of 55.8 per cent; the population of Prince Albert was 50,896, or an increase of 30 per cent in the ten years; and the population of Melfort was 52,688, or an increase of over 71 per cent in the ten year period. There was the second problem, that across the northern part of the province were three seats much too large, and in an area which was rapidly growing. There were six seats in the centre, much too small, in an area which was not growing rapidly, if at all, and there were three seats in the northern part of the province which, as I say, were much too large and in an area rapidly growing. This is the area which the hon. member for Humboldt says will fill up with settlers in the next ten years, and from which the hon. member for North Battleford tells us settlers will be leaving in a year or two.

Mr. McINTOSH: I will attend to you when I am speaking.

Mr. TOTZKE: I think the hon. member for Regina misunderstood me. What I said was that the North Battleford area contained a good deal of arable land which would lend itself to settlement. I did not say however that there would be settlers there.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friend is correct, the hon. gentleman from North Battleford is running true to form.

Mr. McINTOSH: Like my hon. friend.

Mr. TURNBULL: The hon. member for Humboldt says that there is considerable arable land in that area. Now, having faced that situation, I conceived the idea that the proper way to remedy the error was to remedy it at the place it occurred, and accordingly I was of the opinion that, too many seats having been allotted in this area in the first place, and that the area having been represented by one member too many in the last ten years in comparison with the rest of the province, the right thing to do was to restore it to its proper representation, which could be done only by combining two or more seats so as to reduce the number.

The northern end of the province presented the exact converse of that situation. It was going to be too large for three seats, and I thought it would be better to make an extra seat where an increase in population had taken place. Another idea I had in mind in laying out the boundaries was that, the northern seats being placed where, in my opinion at any rate, growth of population would be most likely, and having some regard to the trend of population except in that area I have indicated, it was fair that the northern seat should start below the unit of population. That is not a new principle. My hon. friends, in making the 1924 redistribution, recognized the principle themselves and started the seats of North Battleford, Prince Albert and Melfort, 4,556 in population below the unit at that time. With their growth of population they increased 24,714 above the unit, or an average of over 8,000 each higher than the unit of population. I therefore adopted the same principle followed by my hon. friends in 1924 with respect to the northern seats, believing that they should be started off fairly well below the unit of the province.

Having decided this, I had reached the conclusion in my own mind that a seat had to be removed from the central portion of the province and a new seat built in the northern part, and my map was prepared on that basis. The fact that the southern part of the province is satisfactory is, I think, some evidence at least of the fairness of the map I drew in the southern part.

Mr. TOTZKE: Will my hon. friend pardon me? The southern part is not satisfactory, but I said I was willing to come to some understanding if other matters could be adjusted.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members may not interrupt without permission.

Mr. TURNBULL: Well, if it was not entirely satisfactory down to the last section or township or range, at least there was no great dispute about it; there was nothing that could be regarded as being in the nature of a deliberate gerrymander or frameup. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the expression deliberate gerrymander, apart from the fact that members are not allowed to impute motives, has been a stock phrase with my hon. friend from Humboldt. The first communication I had from him with reference to the first map I submitted as the basis of the negotiations that had so far been carried on was that it was a deliberate gerrymander, and the hon. gentleman has used that phrase in all discussions since. As I told him then, and as I repeat now, such expressions do not add to "the comity of nations"; rather, they tend to prevent agreement. My hon. friend from Humboldt had his own ideas as to how these matters should be fixed up. As I understood him, he came here with somebody else's ideas which he intended to carry out. In any event, his idea was that the proper thing to do was to perpetuate the error, and in order to retain these seats, which should never have been there in the first place, it would have been necessary to move all the boundaries northward, discommoding all the seats north of them. We should have had to do that if we were going to perpetuate the error committed in 1924, and because I could not agree that this was the right thing to do there was, as he has said, a deadlock from the start. He would come into my office and ask, "Have you given up the idea of amalgamating these seats and moving them northward?" I would reply, "Certainly not", and we would then agree that there was no use discussing details until that general principle had been settled. If at any time in the course of the negotiations I had abandoned my plan and accepted the plan put forward by the opposition, we should probably have got together later on with respect to the details. But I could not see that I was bound to do this in order to be fair. I did not accuse my hon. friend of being unfair or of trying to bring about a deliberate gerrymander merely because he did not adopt my plan, and I had hoped that he would not suggest any such thing because I did not adopt his. Apart from the fact that we have differed on this general principle, however, I may join with him in saying that our negotiations personally have been kindly and cordial, and if we do not part in agreement at least we part friends so far as redistribution is concerned.

That covers the general problem and practically the whole dispute which has been in existence between my hon. friend and myself with regard to the province of Saskatchewan. I said that these should be amalgamated, my hon. friend said that they should not; I said that a new seat should be built into the northern part of the province, my hon. friend said it should not. From the first day we met until the day the bill was brought into the house there was no recession by my hon. friend from that position. At no time during the whole proceeding did he offer one single concession. This matter came up very early in the course of the proceedings and in order to make my position clear, the question of the seat of the hon. member for Melville having arisen and I having amalgamated it in such a manner that the seat of the hon. member for Melville was divided into two parts, as was Yorkton; this question having arisen and the proposal having been objected to by the hon. member for Humboldt and I being accused of trying to gerrymander the hon. member for Melville out of his seat, I put myself on record in a letter dated April 27, 1933, reading as follows:

Mr. A. F. Totzke, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

Re: Redistribution

Dear Mr. Totzke,—

I understand that the principal objection to the redistribution map prepared by me is that it involves the disappearance of Melville as a separate seat, and thereby seriously affects Mr. Motherwell. I have no desire to do anything that would look like being unkind to Mr. Motherwell, or any other member on either side of the house.

If, therefore, you can find some way of preparing a map that will not be unfair, and will provide for the retention of Melville seat, I will be quite prepared to reconsider the situation.

That has always been my attitude, expressed both verbally and in writing to the hon. member for Humboldt. I may say that a map in compliance with that letter has never been submitted to me. My hon. friend says that when you come to draw a map there should be no regard for politics or anything but the rights of population, and with that theory I agree absolutely. That was one of the reasons that led me to refuse the map prepared by the hon. member for Humboldt. Member after member from both sides of the house came into my office. I discussed this map with them and member after member told me they had never looked at the vote to see whether the map they were proposing was good or bad. If that is so, my hon. friends who presented me with the map were singularly fortunate from a political point of view in where they placed their lines. The result of that map was apparent to anyone.

Some statements have been made with regard to attacks made by me on two former ministers, but there has been nothing of the kind. I have been adopting the principle laid down this morning in the house by the leader of the opposition. He said that a map should not be drawn in the interests of the sitting member or in the interests of constituents, it should be drawn in the interests of the electors of the whole dominion. If it was a crime to disturb the seat of one of these right hon. gentlemen so as to make his chances of election less sure than it was before, then what about the proposed map of the hon. member for Humboldt? According to that map, the present Minister of Agriculture would have been out of his seat entirely so far as the vote at the last election was concerned. If my hon. friends say that they never looked at the vote, I say again that they were singularly fortunate in having placed the lines where they did.

Mr. TOTZKE: I do not think it is right to say that any map I put forward would have put the Minister of Agriculture out of his seat.

Mr. TURNBULL: Another criticism which was made of the map was that the boundary line between Prince Albert and Melfort passed through the farm of the Minister of Agriculture and left it open to him to run in either constituency. I do not know where the danger to the leader of the opposition lies, but perhaps there is some. In the map made in 1924 an area at the forks of the South Saskatchewan and North Saskatchewan rivers, running twelve miles on the north bank of the North Saskatchewan river and twenty-four miles on the south bank of the South Saskatchewan river was interjected into the constituency of Melfort. The area in question was some six miles wide and included between the forks of the river. In order to get to the southern portion of his territory from the northern portion, the candidate for Melfort had to pass through the territory which had been interjected into his constituency. I eliminated that by drawing my line straight north and south past the forks of the river. That line happened to run through the farm of the hon. member for Melfort but that was not the factor in the placing of the line. It may have been a coincidence, but that was all. Perhaps the hon. member who drew the map in 1924 did not look at the votes, but again I say he was singularly fortunate in where he placed his lines. These things are coincidences when my hon. friends do them but when we do them, they are deliberate gerrymandering.

The hon. member for Humboldt says that if we had pursued the same course in Saskatchewan as was followed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick he would have been quite satisfied and there would have been no trouble at all. We dropped a Conservative member in Nova Scotia and we dropped one in New Brunswick and I suppose if we had dropped Conservative members all along the line we would have got agreement. My hon. friend criticizes because members are being put out of their constituencies, but I wonder if he knows how many members in the province of Ontario were put out of their constituencies in 1924? I wonder if he knows how many members are being dropped to-day through constituencies being joined? In deciding boundaries should we not do what the right hon. the leader of the opposition says should be done, not decide them with regard to the sitting members or with regard to the constituencies but with regard to the larger interests of the electors of the Dominion of Canada.

My hon. friend complains that South Battleford and North Battleford have been put together. I do not see any great crime in that. They were put together provincially by my hon. friend's friends in the province of Saskatchewan and they remained together provincially under my own friends in that province. After an experience of ten years they are evidently satisfied to stay together. Why should there be any crime in keeping together people who have lived in such friendly relations provincially during that period? My hon. friend proposes that South Battleford should be continued northwards to the northern limits of the province. He has told us at great length of the hardships the returning officers are put to in reaching the northern parts of the province, and he referred to the great hardships to be faced by the candidates. Why duplicate that? If one returning officer has to go up to look after North Battleford, why send up another to look after South Battleford? If two or three candidates have to go up to the northern territory to cover one constituency, why send up two or three more to cover another? It seems to me that the smaller number of candidates that will have to traverse the northern section of the province by canoe or dogteam, the better it will be for everyone concerned. I cannot see any justification for extending the boundaries to the northern part of the province. I may be charged with being inconsistent because of the extensions made in the constituency of Mackenzie, but the northern portions of that constituency can be handled from The Pas. If the candidate for Melfort has to handle that territory he will have to go to The Pas as best he can to reach the same territory as the candidate for Mackenzie.

Proceeding to amalgamate some of the seats in the central area and having observed that the growth of population was greater in Rosetown and Kindersley than in the seats east of there, I decided that the amalgamation should take place in the eastern rather than in the western end of that area, and I did take the four seats of Long Lake, Last Mountain, Yorkton and Melville and draw a map so as to convert these four seats into three. To do that I extended Long Lake east of the Last Mountain lake where it had been in days gone by, and I divided what was left of the other three seats by a boundary line running north and south. That boundary line was satisfactory to at least one member involved. With regard to another member I never heard any complaint. With regard to the third member there was long and loud complaint till at last there was that dramatic scene, absolute stage play, in the committee room when my hon. friend from Melville with the assistance of the hon. member for South Battleford mutilated the map of the hon. member for Humboldt in that scene which was intended to be dramatic and was intended for the press. That is one of the troubles of democracy in a country like this. You cannot always do what you think is absolutely the right thing if the feelings of the public are to be worked up by a stage play of that kind. I am still of the opinion that the boundary line as drawn north and south and having no regard to whoever lives there, is the right line, the proper boundary line to have made for that constituency. But my hon. friends opposite were vociferous through inspired messages to the press and through their speeches in the committee which were made for the press, that a great injustice was being done, and we had the same old cry, that this was the seat of an old, long established member of the house, and that sympathy cry was played to the utmost limit. So following that, on Monday the fifteenth, I addressed another letter to the hon. member for Humboldt which reads as follows:

Mr. A. F. Totzke, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Totzke,—

I am sorry that I cannot arrive at any conclusion other than that the six seats lying immediately north of the South Saskatchewan and Qu'Appelle rivers, in view of the fact that they are deficient in population by 55,000—

That should be 51,000 or 52,000:

—and in view of the further fact that they have grown very little in the last ten years, should be reduced in number by at least one.

In the last map I submitted to you, a certain area has been included in the two seats of Touchwood and Yorkton-Melville with the boundary line placed north and south. Although nearly all of the old provincial constituency of north Qu'Appelle, formerly represented in the provincial house by the Hon. Dr. Motherwell, was included in the seat in which his farm is situated, objection is taken that the change deprives Dr. Motherwell of a constituency. While I cannot see the force of that objection, as he is still living in a constituency which is familiar territory to him, I am, nevertheless, prepared to go a considerable distance and to sacrifice some of my own views in order to promote an agreeable compromise.

I am, therefore, suggesting that this territory be divided by an east and west line, instead of north and south. In order to get a fair balance of population, the east and west line might be described as follows:

"Beginning at the eastern boundary of the province and following the old boundary between Yorkton and Melville to a point six miles east of the old boundary between Yorkton and Last Mountain, then north six miles, then west along the township line to the boundary between Touchwood and Long Lake (as shown in my present map)."

That would give Dr. Motherwell a territory well served by railways, convenient to get at, well known to himself, and would appear to me to be an ideal seat.

With regard to Prince Albert, I will be prepared to make the southern boundary of that seat approximately on the line suggested by you.

I hope that this suggestion will settle the whole matter, in so far as Mr. Vallance and others in the committee on Saturday declared that if a change were made that would leave Mr. Motherwell approximately his old seat, they would withdraw all opposition. In any event, I understand that your objections now are as follows:

1. With regard to North Battleford, South Battleford and Kindersley.

2. With regard to the fact that Last Mountain Lake is a natural barrier that has not been recognized.

3. The combining of a large portion of Melville with a large portion of Yorkton; which objection will be removed if the proposition now submitted to you is agreeable.

In order to promote prorogation, I would be glad if you would agree with me in a definition of the matters still in dispute between us.

Prior to the writing of that letter the hon. member for Humboldt had been in my room, and we had discussed the situation in Prince Albert. We had discussed the southern boundary for that seat, and either I in his presence or he in my presence drew a line, or we drew it between us, which still remains on my map, as the line he thought would be fair to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. TOTZKE: The hon. member does not want to be unfair. He will recollect that I also asked for the eastern boundary of Prince Albert to be restored the way it was, taking off the portion that was put in from Melville.

Mr. TURNBULL: I will not contradict my hon. friend, but I do not recollect it, and the line is not on the map. In any event I made the offer that is contained in this letter, agreeing to place the southern boundary of Prince Albert on exactly the line that my hon. friend from Humboldt indicated. I had thought then that all the matters in dispute between us had been settled. Lest they might not be I asked my hon. friend. I outlined in the letter those things which might still be in dispute between us and asked him if he would agree with me in defining the points in dispute so that we would know where our settlement came. Later he called me or I called him, or at any rate we got into conversation on the phone, and I asked him if the proposition contained in my letter was agreeable to him, and he said, "No, it is all off." I think those were his exact words. He said that the hon. member for Prince Albert would not buy any concession for himself at the expense of anybody else in the house. A perusal of my letter will show that there were no concessions asked on behalf of anybody else. An offer was made, and it was hoped that it would be accepted—that it would narrow, if not entirely remove, the issues between us. In any event the written offer was refused, and having been refused I did not feel that I could very well change the map that I had with the lines that had been agreed upon. That is the situation as it stands to-day with respect to the constituency of Prince Albert. If my hon. friend wishes to see an example of a constituency at all like what my hon. friend has referred to he should look at the constituency of Maple Creek on an old map of Saskatchewan. It is true that there the unit of population is smaller, but on the other hand Maple Creek is a constituency that covers a very great area and it is a very hard constituency to handle. It is a country with a comparatively sparse population, and in view of that I did not see that there was any particular harm in making the unit a little smaller than for other seats.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): As one of those whose constituency has been eliminated in the new electoral map as presented in the schedules to this bill, I should like to say a few words. I am also one of those unfortunate individuals of whom the hon. member for Regina speaks who lives only two or three miles from the boundary of his constituency. May I point out to the hon. member for Regina that in the twenty-six years that I have lived on that same piece of land I have been moved around with every redistribution bill, so possibly I should not have any kick because I am being moved once more. The hon. member, if he goes back twenty-six years, will remember that the old constituency of Battleford took in all that portion of western Saskatchewan as far south as the Saskatchewan river. That was in 1907. Then after the next redistribution bill I was placed in the Rosetown constituency. With the next redistribution I was placed in Kindersley, and then again in South Battleford.

As regards the 1924 redistribution bill the hon. member for Regina has pointed out that the hon. member for Melville and the hon. member for Last Mountain were two of the members from Saskatchewan on that committee. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Humboldt, in spite of all the gerrymandering that was supposed to have taken place in 1924, and in spite of us, in 1930 it was possible to elect eight Conservative members and two Tory Progressives. True, as he has said, in 1925 we were able, under the redistribution of 1924, to elect seventeen members, and we were able to support the late government on that redistribution. I believe he will also agree however that it was not because of the redistribution that those results were made possible. At that time in the west there was an agitation against a certain political group which had been in existence since 1921, and on that ground and that ground alone the members who were elected in Saskatchewan in 1925 came to parliament in the session of 1926.

After the hon. member for Humboldt and the hon. member for Regina had been deliberating for a very considerable period they found themselves at a deadlock, and it was suggested from some source or by some individual that a new committee not officially appointed might be set up to arrive at a conclusion. The hon. member for Melville and myself were chosen by the Saskatchewan group to sit in on the newly elected committee along with the hon. member for Saskatoon and the hon. member for Moose Jaw. The hon. member for Melville and myself along with the hon. member for Humboldt in the office of the last named hon. member drew up a new map, and in it laid down certain principles which we thought we should follow in arriving at a conclusion. I shall be quite frank with the committee by stating that the first principle we admitted was that we would not disturb any sitting member from the province of Saskatchewan, irrespective of his place in the house. We thought if we could redistribute the population with as little disturbance as possible of the boundaries new set out, we would be doing well. The second principle we laid down was that we would take rural constituencies, namely those constituencies one hundred per cent rural but containing small villages and hamlets, and set the population at from 40,000 to 44,000, a figure which we considered fair. For those semi-urban constituencies, namely those containing small cities or large towns, such as Moose Jaw, Swift Current, Yorkton, Battleford, and the larger centres of population other than large cities, we set anything from 44,000 to 46,000. And for the two larger cities of Regina and Saskatoon we set the figure of from 50,000 to 56,000. With those points in mind we set to work and presented a map in the office of the hon. member for Melville upon which occasion two hon. members opposite were present. At that time we were told very distinctly that it was impossible for them to accept the map. There was no further argument, and the committee never met again.

In the meantime I met the hon. member for Regina, upon which occasion he pointed out to me that the map which we had submitted would eliminate four Conservative members now sitting behind the government. I hastened to assure him then as I do now that it was not our intention to do any such thing. As has been pointed out by the two previous speakers, the constituencies throughout the centre of the province were lacking in population, while three of the northern constituencies had too large populations. We attempted to redistribute by moving gradually south that excess population in the northern part of the province without creating any undue disturbance, or creating any new seats in the northern part of the province.

If hon. members would look at the constituency of South Battleford they would find that that portion which is and was predominately Liberal has been moved from the constituency of South Battleford and placed in the constituency of Kindersley. May I tell you, Mr. Chairman, and this committee through you, that immediately after the last election the Conservative candidate made the statement that if the southern end of South Battleford, namely that portion in which I live, was eliminated from the riding the Tories could win. Therefore I was not at all surprised when, upon the presentation of the redistribution map, I found that South Battleford had been eliminated, and that the portion which had been predominately Liberal had been put into Kindersley constituency. In the original map there was another rather peculiar feature, namely, that the newly proposed seat of Kindersley went down across the South Saskatchewan river, thereby taking in a portion of the present Swift Current constituency. Upon going through the vote for the last election to find out just where that portion of Swift Current stood in that election I found to my amazement that there was about 800 of a majority of Liberal votes. But the next time I looked at the map I found that that portion of Swift Current had been eliminated. The hon. member for Kindersley agreed with me this morning that it was eliminated on his suggestion.

Mr. TURNBULL: It was opposed also by your member on the committee.

Mr. VALLANCE: I believe the hon. member is correct, in the first instance. The reason he opposed it was that our first attitude was that natural boundaries should be maintained. The hon. member is quite correct there. But it was not at his instance it was removed. It was removed because of representations made by the sitting member for Kindersley.

The hon. member for Regina has given the date of a certain meeting of the redistribution committee which the hon. member for Melville and myself attended, and at which we probably played a rather important part. He has accused the hon. member for Melville and myself of putting on some stage play, and suggests that it had all been rehearsed. I can state truthfully that no such arrangement was entered into between the hon. member for Melville and myself. Undoubtedly the hon. member for Melville had well prepared that which he was going to say, and I think the very results would indicate that he had well in hand the matter which he had under discussion that day. I hasten to assure the hon. member for Regina, however, that it was not on any agreement between the hon. member for Melville and myself that the events he has described took place.

Quite naturally I discussed the 1924 distribution with the hon. member for Melville who at that time was the only Liberal member west of the great lakes. He represented the Liberal party in Saskatchewan during the 1924 redistribution. Despite what the hon. member for Regina has said, the hon. member for Melville took his map to the late Senator Willoughby who was then residing in the city of Moose Jaw and with only a few very minor changes the senator agreed that the map was very fair. Having in view the fact that the province of Saskatchewan is not entitled in 1933 to greater representation than it had in 1924, it seems to me that the situation is rather tragic. Our whole representations were on the ground that we had no increase in our number of representatives and that with very little trouble we could have redistributed the excess population throughout the existing twenty-one constituencies, without to any appreciable extent disturbing either the boundaries of or the members now representing those constituencies. That is all I wish to say at this point, but I shall reserve my rights to speak again at a later stage.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Chairman, I do not desire with the other members for Saskatchewan to monopolize the whole time, but it does occur to me that Hansard would read more intelligibly if we made out initial statements consecutively. Let me at the outset assure my good friend the Minister of Public Works that I have left my cane and any desire to use it just now in my room, possibly to remain there until the next redistribution period comes around.

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Unless it is required, you know. But I have no desire today to engage in a controversy with anybody with regard to this matter. I think the fact that I am well out of my teens possibly accounts for the fire going out of my blood a little and the heat out of my tongue, especially after the long six months we have been engaged here during this session. Whatever else comes, I am going to try to be moderate to-day.

At the outset may I say that as far as the constituency of Melville is concerned I am quite satisfied with its present boundaries as outlined in the bill before the house. Of course there is a very conspicuous protuberance from it just opposite the village of Lebret that might possibly be whittled off, but that can be attended to when we come around to it. I am willing to take it the way the government gives it nothwithstanding that protuberance if they object to the change.

After all I do not think this is a very satisfactory way to settle this knotty question. We have had it discussed over and over again already, and now we are going over it so many times more, and then again we are to go over it by provinces. Is there not some more excellent way of settling this difficult question? We are now well on into May, outdoors is delightful, the fields are a glorious sight, the resurrection of spring brings new life to vegetation, the trees are bursting into leaf and bloom, the birds are mating, and here we are indoors disputing over a matter that in my estimation should be delegated to some impartial body that has no interest in the elections: Especially does that apply in those provinces in which there is disagreement. As a matter of fact in all previous redistributions during this century the various subcommittees were able to come together and agree, and putting it through the house was only a matter of form. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if it is due to the cantankerousness of the opposition that we cannot agree this time, or is it because we have a government that has brought down an arbitrary and most unfair arrangement of constituencies? I remember quite well the redistribution of Sir Robert Borden's government in 1912, I think it was; we never knew there was a redistribution going through, it was never mentioned during the following election. The same is true with regard to the preceding one of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and as far as I know, there never was any word regarding the matter during the election that followed the redistribution of 1924. We never heard of it in our province, everyone was satisfied. Surely the desire for a scrap has been well worked out of us this year, without prolonging this session just for pure cussedness on the part of any of us.

No, Mr. Chairman, with all respect to others that is not the reason. We believe that a very serious injustice is being done, not only in Saskatchewan but elsewhere, by the provisions of this bill. Some might think that as my own seat has been conceded—at least as far as the legislation is concerned; it can be changed of course if the government so desire; I do not desire it—that I should be satisfied. Well, that would be a very small, narrow attitude for me to take. Shall I be satisfied when my brother, my fellow members who are less fortunate, are still dissatisfied and believe they have a right to be, and I also believe they have a right to be? Can I be a piker and withhold my help while my fellow members continue to suffer? Surely that would not be a proper attitude. Yet in justice to the government I must express my appreciation of what they have done for my constituency. I certainly will convey to my constituents my appreciation of the simple act of justice that the government has done to the constituency of Melville. I do that quite freely. I do not know to whom particularly to convey my appreciation, three or four are claiming it now, I am willing to accord it to them all. I catch the eye of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), I understand he had quite a bit to do with restoring this constituency. If so I want to thank him. The hon. member for Regina thinks he as a member of the subcommittee had something to do with it. If he had I want to thank him. But down deeper than all that, in the bottom of my heart I have a feeling that the Prime Minister had something to do with it. I appealed to Caesar for simple justice, and not in vain.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not interfere with the committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, there are a good many ways of getting a thing done by the Prime Minister without doing much interfering.

Mr. TURNBULL: Mr. Chairman, I had no communication at all directly or indirectly from the Prime Minister.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, anyway, I feel so appreciative that I am willing to spread it all over the whole government and its followers. It is immaterial to me as long as I do justice to the situation by expressing myself thus.

I am not going into the controversial side of the redistribution situation; I am under orders not to be too boisterous or belligerent, nor too long. Something has been said in regard to the redistribution of 1924. I think if the hon. member for Regina knew the facts he would not have made such statements as that arrangements were made whereby this one and that and the other got such and such a majority, including myself. Why, Mr. Chairman, even this government could not have arranged things to get a seat in Saskatchewan at that time. The policy of the then leader of the Conservative party was such that if all the angels in heaven had come down into Saskatchewan they could not have elected a Conservative. Think of the policy of the Conservative party with regard to the Crowsnest pass and the tariff and the Hudson Bay railway at that time. That is why, regardless of redistribution, regardless of boundary lines, there was not a Conservative elected in that province. In fact for nineteen long years there was not a single federal Conservative elected in Saskatchewan. It has been stated who the members of the subcommittee of 1924 were. There were at that time six provinces of the dominion which had not a Conservative member. So we had some difficulty in trying to get proper representation on some of the committees. In the province of Saskatchewan there were, I think, fifteen Progressives and one Liberal, your humble servant being the lone Liberal pelican upon the housetop at that time. Well I could not go to work and make a Tory member just to go on the redistribution committee. So we did the next best thing; when the Progressives and the Liberals arrived at an agreement as to the map—I think we had five new seats to place, making twenty-one, and that added to the difficulty—when we had arranged the map as we thought reasonably and as it would commend itself to the major committee, I then, as intimated by the hon. member for South Battleford, was instructed by the major committee to take our map to the late Senator Willoughby. He was then, I think, the leader of the Conservative party in the upper house. He had also been for many years leader of the Conservative opposition in the Regina house. I knew the late Senator Willoughby very well and quite favourably. I went to him with the map and said it did not seem quite right that they should not have a voice in its formation. The fates seemed to be unkind to the Tory party for a number of years, but I did not anticipate that it would always be so, and my anticipation has been proven correct. Therefore I said we would feel more comfortable if he would take our map and look it over. He asked if he could keep it and I said yes, that he might keep it three or four days in order to consult with whatever colleagues he chose. If I remember correctly I mentioned Senator Calder, but I am not sure; at all events I left it to the late Senator Willoughby to consult with whatever Conservative colleagues he had in Saskatchewan, and I am sure he had at least two or three. At the expiration of the three or four days I went back to his office and asked if there were any particular changes he would like. He mentioned two, the first of which we the subcommittee had already considered and met his wishes. It was a trifling matter, and is not worth mentioning now. I asked what the other change was, and he said he would like six townships taken out of the riding of Qu'Appelle and attached to the riding of Weyburn, immediately south. I suppose these six ridings merely happened to have strong Liberal majorities. I said to the Senator, "Well, if we concede this change it will be decidedly in your interest, because Weyburn does not really need it while Qu'Appelle will be very glad to get rid of those troublesome townships." In this redistribution bill the Conservatives still show that desire to get rid of that Liberal area, in Qu'Appelle and many other similar areas as well. The senator replied, "Well, you do not expect me to make a recommendation against my own side, do you?" I admitted that I did not, and then I asked if those were the only recommendations he desired to make with regard to the twenty-one ridings in Sakatchewan, if all he asked was that those six townships should be transferred from the south of one riding to the north of the other, and he said that was all. I told him that so far as I was concerned he could have that change made, and I stated that I would so report to the main committee. I conferred with Fred Johnston before reporting; when we presented that suggestion to the main committee they smiled a little at our simplicity. I said, "Will it not be worth that concession to be able to say that the map was referred to the only Conservative representatives we could find?" In those days they were as hard to discover as a needle in a haystack, and we took the only course we could. I suggested that it would be worth while to be able to say that after the map had been referred to some representative Conservatives the only changes they requested were fully complied with. From a political standpoint as well as from the point of view of being right it was worth many times the loss of the six townships, so we were not quite so simple minded as we appeared. It was fair and right, and after all is not the right and fair thing the proper thing to do even in politics? You may look simple at the time for doing it, but it will be like bread cast upon the waters; it will come back some time, perhaps in a few days rather than many.

I do not know whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite believe that story; I cannot say I do not care, because I do care. If we had some sort of tribunal, however, to which we could refer these matters, when any responsible person made a statement such as I have just made we could easily call witnesses before that body. In my case I could wire for Fred Johnston and John Millar or any others who know the facts.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And Senator Willoughby?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will not wait to ask my hon. friend to repeat what he said. We could get also the hon. member for Weyburn as he has some knowledge of the matter. These are some of the reasons why I dislike the thought of spending these beautiful spring days inside in unprofitable discussion of this controversial matter, but it is not our fault. An unjust and unfair redistribution of constituencies has been offered this house by the government; we do not like it, and we are going to show our opposition in all legitimate ways. I hope the discussion will continue to be legitimate and orderly, but if it is not the responsibility must be borne by the government.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I have covered what I had in mind when I made these few notes this afternoon. I feel like making an appeal to the Prime Minister; perhaps because my last appeal was successful I feel like making another. Why the haste? We started the last distribution in 1923, but it took two years. Rather than press it on some unwilling members in 1923 we deferred the decision until 1924. Was that not a better way than to scrap it out or threaten to put it through by closure? I said some pretty caustic things about the Prime Minister's experience in London at his first conference, and again with regard to the Ottawa conference. Now I want to say some nice things about his experience in Washington, where he conducted himself in a manner which made us all proud of him. Would it not be better for him to leave the shores of Canada with everything nice and peaceful on parliament hill than to have just finished a great big scrap over redistribution?

An hon. MEMBER: A bribe?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a justifiable bribe if it is a bribe at all. I am putting it as I think my hon. friend from Parkdale would put it in his own heart. Anyone who has been at one of these great conferences knows that the person who represents Canada or any other country must have a period of quiet, rest and study to prepare therefor, and if the Prime Minister would follow that course I am sure no man at the conference would acquit himself better from his viewpoint than the same right hon. gentleman. But if he goes there with his nerves all ruffled and his temper out of joint, after mauling us all around here and making us accept this redistribution bill, unjust as it is to so many members, in what condition will he be when he arrives in London? Even the six days of salt water will not soothe the fire that will surge in his blood and gurgle in his veins. I think the right hon. gentleman comes of Scotch and United Empire Loyalist parentage; he must have some Irish too, and perhaps a little Yorkshire. In that case how could anyone expect anything but a desire to scrap when such a splendid opportunity and such a natural cause as we have within the provisions of this bill presents itself.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How about blarney?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If hon. gentlemen opposite want to know my composition I will give it to them; it may account for some of my belligerency and indignation when I find myself put upon. I am Scotch, Irish and Yorkshire; that is enough to hang anybody, when drawn into a real fight. I should think I had really accomplished something if the Prime Minister were to say, "What is the use of pushing this through?" Let it stand till another day. There are many other unjust things in this bill in addition to the Melville constituency omission. That has been adjusted all right, but how about the ninety and nine? They must be dealt with yet, and this is neither the time nor place to do it. We cannot make any progress in the next ten days so far as I can see unless amendments are permitted. Then a race for the train; a race for the boat; a race for London, fire and brimstone breathing all across the way; and then you expect to soothe down the ruffled feelings of the nations of the world on the many knotty problems that will come up on that occasion before a thus harassed and hurried Canadian Prime Minister. I do not believe it is fair and I appeal to the Prime Minister as our Prime Minister, as my Prime Minister—the best one I can get for the present, and so long as it is by the will of the people whoever is Prime Minister, is my Prime Minister, no matter what side he is on. I would acknowledge the same if the C.C. F.'ers were in power, though I rather hope that will not occur in my lifetime. But joking aside, I think that most of us feel that while we have been looking forward for nearly three years hoping for accomplishments, nothing worth while has really been done yet. First there was the London conference, then the Ottawa conference, then the Washington conference; and now we have been told, "Hurrah, boys, the real thing is coming at the London conference on June 12th." Well, if that is to be the climax, if it is to be a case of to be or not to be, then I say, let us not spoil the setting, the home leaving for the Prime Minister by dealing with this matter at this time. That would be my invocation, that would be my last word at this stage of the debate, and I have a sort of half belief that whatever the Prime Minister may do or say in response to my appeal he would like to do as I suggest himself. But the exigencies of the situation, the possibility of an election this fall, and the desire to reap any benefit that might accrue to the governing party by reason of this redistribution all urge him to have it over first and get it off his hands, so that the government will be free to go to the people at any time. I can quite understand that. But will not that advantage be largely lost, will it not be dissipated if he drives this unjust measure through the house? The Minister of Public Works said a bib-full during his short remarks when he intimated that there was such a thing as a brute minority. Yes, there is, if we choose to exercise it. Five men backed by other speakers desirous of going the limit, and without any violence, could compel this government to abandon this bill before the conference if they wanted to.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, they could, and there would be no violence either;—

Mr. CHAPLIN: You have a great imagination.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —but we don't want to do that. I do not want to give you the secret particularly, but I know how it could be done. There is nothing this government dislikes more than publicity; indeed, there is nothing any government dislikes more than publicity if it has a poor case to put up, and I am afraid that is the situation this government is in. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not need to have me tell them how desperately unpopular they are throughout the country, from one end of Canada to the other, and I would urge upon the government, while the debate is still in a state of quietude, and still showing a decided desire not to boil up, that something be done to avert the impending storm; because as sure as fate, if ever we lock horns properly there will be fur flying and wigs on the green. I do desire to avoid that if I can, and if anything I have said will bring about a better state of affairs I shall be happy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I wish that whoever is muttering would try to talk loudly for me to hear, because I cannot hear while Hansard can. I cannot express myself any more earnestly than I am doing on this subject at this time, addressing myself through you, Mr. Speaker, particularly to the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): As one of the members from western Canada affected by this notorious redistribution bill, I think I should say a few words in this house. The measure before us is described as "Bill 2, an Act to readjust the Representation in the House of Commons." The understanding implied by that title is that the readjustment of representation is to be brought about by a government having a fair majority in parliament and not by a government which will use in an unfair way the majority given to it by the people; not by a government anxious to make use of a brute majority in the national assembly. At the present moment we are not sure what the government is going to do; in other words, the government has not yet put its cards on the table to show how it will get the measure through the house. We shall see that by and by, but I hesitate to believe that the best thinking members on the other side of the chamber, the Prime Minister himself or any one of his cabinet members, will attempt to drive a measure of this kind through the House of Commons by means of the gag, by brute majority. I hesitate to believe that until I see it. However, if that attempt is made, the members from western Canada will explain in no uncertain terms their attitude towards any such endeavour.

May I now briefly review two or three points leading up to this measure. May I say first of all that the work of redistribution in Canada is nothing new; it has taken place periodically from 1867, over sixty years ago. Under the British North America Act redistribution is necessary every ten years, and I think it is worth while going back over past history to see how the work of redistribution has been effected from decade to decade. In 1872 there was a redistribution following confederation; there was another in 1882, and one again in 1892. During the period covered by those three redistributions the Conservatives were in power. We have been told—and I am not mistaken—at least it has been re-echoed by quite a number of Conservatives from the west, that this is their first chance, their glorious opportunity for a gerrymander. They have stated that they have not had an opportunity to carry out a redistribution to their taste for quite a long time and they therefore must take advantage of the present occasion to do their best in order to improve their chances at the polls. There we have their viewpoint as explained by themselves, calculatingly, coldly, callously.

Well, in 1872 and 1882 right up to 1892 the party opposite was in power and had charge of three redistributions, and I would point out first of all that the redistribution of 1872 was put through the house, not upon the report of any joint committee but by a brute majority; it was driven through the house. The redistribution was effected in a similar way in 1882 and in 1892. When we come to 1903 we find the Liberals in power, and the redistribution in 1903 and that carried out in 1924 were the only two occasions when the Liberals effected a readjustment of representation in the House of Commons. Both these redistributions were as fair as possible. Since confederation, of seven redistributions, five have been made by Conservatives and only two by the Liberals; in other words, the Conservatives have had more than twice as many redistributions under their charge as the Liberals have put through the house.

All redistributions up until 1903 were carried out in about the same way, not by a report of a joint committee, not in a conciliatory manner, not by cooperation, but by using the majority in the House of Commons to drive partisan redistribution measures through the house. In 1903 a change took place. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a great Canadian, was at the helm of state. What did he do? He turned his back on work of that kind, he would not accept it. He arranged for a joint committee to take up the work and try to obtain a decent solution of the problem. Things were worked out in a fair and just way. In 1911, after the success of 1903, Sir Robert Borden, another eminent Canadian, was at the head of affairs and he followed the practice launched by Laurier in 1903. If I am not mistaken the present Prime Minister was a member of that redistribution committee, and if any hon. member of this committee ought to know what was done and what ought to be done now, it is the Prime Minister. I am just fair enough to believe that before this debate continues much longer the Prime Minister will rise to the occasion and take such action as will enable the committee which was dealing with this measure, or the last elderly committee which was dealing with it, to take up the matter anew and so iron out all difficulties that the work of redistribution will be done fairly and honourably.

The hon. member for Regina said that in 1924 there was not one Conservative from Saskatchewan at Ottawa and therefore the interests of the Conservative party were not looked after as they should have been. I am afraid the hon. member must be mistaken. Does he believe that because he was not then a member himself the interests of the Conservative party were not well looked after? Does he mean to cast disrespect upon an honoured gentleman who has passed away and who was then the leader of the Conservative party in the upper chamber? Surely if the hon. member will but give one moment's reflection to what was done in 1924 he must admit that what was done was done honourably and fairly and that the Conservative party was consulted on every move. He must admit that the hon. gentleman who was then the leader of the Conservative party in the Senate accepted in full what was done and was entirely satisfied. He was not ignored. He had representations to make; they were listened to and they were met in a satisfactory way. What more could have been done?

Let me go on. In 1887 the Northwest Territories had only a very small representation at Ottawa. The Northwest Territories were given representation for the first time in 1887 and had only four representatives, one from Assiniboia East, one from Assiniboia West, one from Alberta and one from Saskatchewan. In 1903 this representation was increased and the province of Saskatchewan was represented by six members, one for Assiniboia East, one for Assiniboia West, one for Humboldt, one for Mackenzie, one for Qu'Appelle and one for Saskatchewan. It will be noticed that the representation was growing. The population of the west was growing and the great lone land was taking on new life. In 1906 and 1907 another representation change was made and Saskatchewan was given ten members, about half the number of the present representation. There was a member for Assiniboia, one for Battleford, for Humboldt, for Mackenzie, for Moose Jaw, for Prince Albert, for Qu'Appelle, for Regina, for Saltcoats and for Saskatoon. We come now to the 1911 redistribution, and it will be found that Battleford existed as a seat from 1911 to 1917. That is six years, or the lifetime of one parliament. In 1917 another change took place, and that change has existed up to the present year. In 1917 North Battleford was given a member and South Battleford was given a member. The two names North Battleford and South Battleford were placed on the electoral map of Canada.

This brings me to the diabolical attempt being made at the present time to do away with these two historical electoral names. In the bill now before us we will not find the name "North Battleford" and we will not find the name "South Battleford"; we will not even find the name "The Battlefords," all we find is the name "Battleford." Some explanation has been given that the new riding is going to be called "The Battlefords," but if so, it does not appear in the bill. North Battleford has been destroyed and taken off the map entirely; South Battleford has been likewise destroyed and taken off the map and there is no name—and it would appear deliberate—in the measure now before the committee to symbolize that there ever were two Battlefords or that there are two Battlefords to-day. That is a nice kettle of fish, is it not?

Let me go on. When the hon. member for Humboldt was speaking he touched upon this question and referred to it as illustrative of an out and out gerrymander. The hon. member for Regina tries to tell us that it is not a deliberate gerrymander, that it is not a gerrymander at all. I am here to say and say positively that it is. I am here to say that he cannot go into northern Saskatchewan and make his argument stick with five per cent of the people—not even with the majority of Conservative electors. He knows that he cannot. He knows just as well as he knows that he is sitting in his seat that he has deliberately engineered a gerrymander move—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McINTOSH: —to destroy the name of North Battleford, to destroy the name of South Battleford and not put in their places names which will tell the world or tell the country that there are two outstanding districts in northern Saskatchewan named North Battleford and South Battleford.

The aim of any redistribution measure ought to be the equalization of population. The hon. member for Regina attempted to make out that he was following that plan, that there were too many seats made in central Saskatchewan in 1924 and that one would have to be eliminated. He claimed that the population had gone northward and some adjusting would have to be done. He gave these as the reasons why he made the changes in the two Battlefords and further south. Surely he does not expect those who know the facts to believe any such concoction of excuses.

Let me tell the committee what he and the Conservative party have done in this bill as far as the federal riding of North Battleford is concerned. They have taken two-thirds or more of that riding which they figure consists of Liberal votes and made a new riding with the addition of a few polls from across the North Saskatchewan river at the northern end of the Rosetown riding. The hon. member for Rosetown did not want to accept those polls, and we know why. He figured that they were Liberal and he did not want them. That is the reason why he would not take them. They had no conscientious difficulty in tying up those few polls from across the North Saskatchewan river with two-thirds of the North Battleford riding, which was Liberal, and calling the new riding "Redberry." They made a new riding and called it 'Redberry." They purposely killed the name "North Battleford" by taking mostly all the Grits in the portions of the two ridings mentioned and putting them into one new voting area.

They have taken the remaining part of North Battleford, something like one-third of it, which they estimate quite Conservative, and put it with the top part or two-thirds of South Battleford, which they figure is also Conservative, and in this way they have made the new riding of "Battleford," and in this new riding they place the city of North Battleford. Just fancy such a base partisan move! May I say that I live in the city of North Battleford, and the boundary of the new riding in which they have hived the Grits, the constituency of Redberry, is only about three and a half or four miles from the city of North Battleford. I live in that city, and I am not in my old riding because I figure my old riding is over two-thirds of the North Battleford riding which has been intentionally wiped out and given a new name, having had an addition made to it—as I have explained—from the south. Fancy any representative, or fair parliamentary committee submitting to an insulting proposition of that kind! I would imagine that the very look of the thing would be extremely obnoxious and antagonistic to any man with a fair mind. But up to the present time, although representations have been made, the hon. member has made no attempt to remedy that monstrosity. The riding of North Battleford as it now exists is simply a curved geographical monstrosity. It has been cut to pieces and a third of it joined to two-thirds of the Battleford riding to make what the hon. member for Regina considers a Conservative riding. That is deliberate gerrymandering. What could one call it if not that? It is interfering with the franchise rights of the people affected. There is nothing fair or just about it. There is not an elector that I know of who will say that that is a fair redistribution either as to the top or northern part of the Battleford riding or the gerrymandered parts of the North Battleford constituency. Outside of a few Tories in North Battleford from whom the hon. member for Regina had to hear—as the hon. member told me himself—before he could make any changes, no citizen will regard this redistribution as equitable and fair. He cannot deny that.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not think that is very fairly put.

Mr. McINTOSH: I do not want to misquote the hon. member. I have a great respect for him except in some regards.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friend will quote the rest of the conversation he will see that it is not what he said.

Mr. McINTOSH: With certain reservations I have a wholesome respect for the hon. member, but I am afraid he is slipping, dangerously slipping. I fear he is going astray. I am afraid he is destroying his own reputation in the province. I am satisfied he is destroying his own reputation in the city of Regina. I am convinced he has done something here that will be tagged to him for the rest of his life. I only spoke to the hon. member once or twice about this measure. I deliberately kept away from him. I wanted him to have has own free will about it. But I had an idea what was going on all the time, and when I did speak to him about it he said, "I will consider the matter," but I do not think he has given the consideration promised. But he did say—yes he did—that he had to hear from North Battleford before he could do anything. He was expecting to hear from a small Tory clique who were bent on manipulating votes. These men were back of my hon. friend from Regina, these and other Conservatives from the province. These men were tied to the committee in Regina that, in the main, worked out this redistribution bill. There is no doubt about it that the map which my hon. friend submitted in the first place was wilfully concocted in Regina, and is the product of a Tory clique representative of every riding in Saskatchewan.

In the month of January, during the parliamentary recess, there was a meeting held in Saskatoon, and my hon. friend from Regina was at that meeting. I ask him now to deny it if he was not. Get up and deny it if you can.

Mr. TURNBULL: That is no crime.

Mr. McINTOSH: You cannot deny it.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not intend to.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members must address the chair.

Mr. McINTOSH: My hon. friend was at that meeting, and so was the secretary of the Minister of Agriculture, and the hon. member for Saskatoon and the hon. member for Rosetown.

Mr. LOUCKS: No, I think you are wrong.

Mr. McINTOSH: What? They didn't ask you? They had two or three representatives from North Battleford at that meeting. I shall not mention their names.

Mr. TURNBULL: They did not tie my hands as the hon. member for Humboldt had his hands tied, according to his own statement.

Mr. McINTOSH: They did not tie your hands. They certainly tied you holus-bolus. At that meeting was decided what was to be done—in regard to a Tory redistribution—in the province of Saskatchewan. I understand the Regina government was represented at that meeting.

Mr. TURNBULL: The Regina government was not represented at that meeting, and it was not decided at that meeting what should be done.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members must not interrupt.

Mr. McINTOSH: Oh yes, it was. Let me go on. At that meeting in Saskatoon, the ground work was laid for the present gerrymandering in the province of Saskatchewan. There it was concocted and organized, and the hon. member for Regina was present and let it go on, and now he is trying to carry it out. Let me say, though, that if a few Tories in the city of North Battleford figure they can do what the hon. member for Regina and his government are trying to get away with in this bill, they have another think coming, and my hon. friend and the government will find out when it is too late what the electors of South Battleford and North Battleford think of what you are attempting to do in this bill.

May I say that North Battleford and South Battleford, as my hon. friend from Regina stated, are linked up electorally in a provincial way. We have had provincially a Liberal member representing the Battlefords and we have had a Conservative member representing the Battlefords, and I think I can truthfully say that the conclusion of both these members is that the tying up of the Battlefords is a mistake and should not be done, that they ought to be separated electorally each with its own member, when the servicing of each riding could be better looked after. Not that I have any fault to find with the estimable people south of the river. I know a great number of them. I know every person in South Battleford just as well as I do the citizens in North Battleford, and my policy on the platform and in the press has always been—over a period of twenty years—to unite the two Battlefords—to bind them together commercially. But historically they were divided years ago and they remain divided by the north Saskatchewan river to a great extent to-day. My argument is that they ought to be left separate electorally. If the government is willing to make the fair adjustments that ought to be made, these two ridings do not need to be thrown together. A fair redistribution can be made by having the dividing line north and south.

The hon. member for Humboldt said that by pushing north the boundary line of the map which was delivered by my hon. friend to the Saskatchewan Liberals the problem could be solved. So it can, and it should be solved in this way if the government wants to do the right thing. Then North Battleford would be left in its right geographical setting. It is the largest centre north of the north Saskatchewan river between Saskatoon and Edmonton. That means something and if an outstanding fact it ought to be respected

That north country belongs to North Battleford. We have done our best to give it railroad and highway service, and I for one object to taking North Battleford out of its proper electoral setting and putting it into a riding linked up with points southward and eastward, many of which are tributary to Saskatoon and other centres. The very fact that that was done indicates the motive. There could be no other motive than that of hiving the Grits in one riding and hiving the Tories in another, with the idea of gaining an extra seat in this house. If that is the intention of the hon. member and of the government I am afraid when they count the votes at the next election they will receive a surprise. I am convinced clean fair-minded people will oppose a policy of that kind; they will oppose any manipulation of ridings for the purpose of gaining votes, no matter what party does it. And they are right.

The placing of North Battleford city in a riding comprised of say one-third of the old riding of North Battleford and two-thirds of the old riding of South Battleford is admittedly a major grievance against this bill in the northwestern section of Saskatchewan. I believe these changes have been made deliberately—not to put "The Battlefords" together but wholly because wholesale gerrymandering had been decided upon. May I say to the hon. member for Regina—and I see him pallidly looking at me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: In that respect he is running true to form; he fearfully looks and looks but never acts. I say to him that what has taken place in regard to North Battleford and Battleford was in the air three years ago, namely after the election of 1930. His Tory friends in North Battleford said that when redistribution came they would disorganize the riding, that they would split it into two or three pieces, and that they would hitch it up in such a manner that the Liberal party would have greater difficulty in electing a member to the federal house. We see their pernicious policy carried out in this bill. These disorganization threats colored unfairly the representations locally made to the hon. member. That is why he is tied, so far as making any change is concerned. But I say to him for his own good that if he is basing his future upon the decision of a few politically biased men in North Battleford who vote Tory once in a while, he is on very thin ice, on shifting ground. He should give the utmost reconsideration to what is fair and just not only for the people of North Battleford but from North Battleford northward and westward, a territory that properly belongs to that northerly constituency.

The hon. member for Regina said that there had to be a new seat north of Saskatoon. We all know why that was done. We know it was done to help destroy the riding of Prince Albert; certainly that is one reason. And I will tell the hon. member another reason why it was done; it was done to effect a way of escape for the hon. member for Saskatoon. Those are the two reasons. The hon. member states that six seats were too small, that they were not growing and something had to be done. There was his problem. How did he arrive at his solution? He did it in a partisan way, in a gerrymandering way, not in a fair and judicial manner. Then he states that in the north the three seats were large and were growing. That is true. There is the problem again. How did he meet it? He met it deliberately by effecting a gerrymander. He could have done the dividing north and south, but he did not want to do it that way. He rejected every effort on our part—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am in order. I don't know how you are.

Mr. TURNBULL: I call that disrespectful.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order. You should address the chair.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member should know well the meaning of the word disrespectful. May I say—and I mean it—I think enough of the hon. gentleman to address the chair. It was only an oversight.

The CHAIRMAN: Well, carry on with your good intentions.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am only too willing to do that. As I have said, in the northern part of the province the correct method would have been to run the dividing line north and south. Thereby, there would be brought about a fair redistribution of votes. Up to the present time we have not been able to have that solution. We know that the northern part of the province has been growing, and the population has been expanding. But may I say to my hon. friend that a great many of the people who have come from the south to the north will return to the south—they are going now—once crop conditions and weather conditions prevail which will make it worth their while. They will return when they have a better opportunity to make a living in the southern part of the province than there has been in the last few years. The population in the northern part has grown considerably during the last ten years, but many of those who came from the south will go back. The population will be balanced better than it is to-day. Many in the north are on farms upon which they cannot make a living, and they will have to leave for other parts. Many of them are on relief at the present time, and that condition of affairs cannot continue. They are not to blame. I suggest that to base a redistribution on such changing conditions is not sound.

I am not going to say anything further at the present time. All I wanted to do was to give the house an idea of what has been done to the two ridings of North Battleford and South Battleford. Both names have been wiped out. A new riding named Battleford has been brought into existence, and the hon. member believes it will be Conservative. Two-thirds of the old riding of North Battleford has been called Redberry. In that riding the Grits are hived. In the riding of Battleford the Tories are hived, and in that way hon. members opposite think they will gain a seat. There is a picture of what has taken place. The city of North Battleford is only a few miles from the boundary of Redberry riding, a riding which is made up as I have described. If hon. members opposite think a measure of that kind is fair and decent, if they think it is in accordance with Conservative traditions, all I say to them is to go ahead with it, and watch the results at the next election.

Mr. TURNBULL: There are so many inaccuracies in the speech of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that I cannot let them go without challenge. In the first place the hon. member for Rosetown was not averse to his boundary going northward. In fact, I discussed the matter with him on more than one occasion. We discussed the matter of his boundary line not only being north as far as the north Saskatchewan river, but extending north across the north Saskatchewan river, and the hon. member for Rosetown would have been quite willing to take that territory, had I decided that it should be allotted to him. In the second place this map was not concocted in Regina. There was no committee in Regina I know of that had anything whatever to do with the map. It is true there was a meeting in Saskatoon and also one in Regina. I called in those who I believed knew the territory better than I did, and got their opinions. I received no instructions from them, but merely obtained their opinions as to the situation at each point. I did the same thing in connection with south Saskatchewan. I did not believe I would be doing my duty as a member of the committee if I did not get the information which was necessary, and upon which conclusions might be based. No member of the provincial legislature was at any of the meetings nor was the matter discussed with any member of the provincial legislature. I have had no communication directly or indirectly from any member of the legislative assembly in Saskatchewan with regard to the redistribution with the exception of two, and those members wrote me regarding the redistribution as it affected territory in which they themselves lived and no other territory. In neither case were their representations accepted by me. That is the extent to which any member of the provincial legislature had control over me concerning this committee. My hands were not tied by anybody; I came to it as a free agent to make this map in the way I thought fair, and have done my duty as I saw it. Hon. members who have listened to this debate so far and heard statements such as those made by the hon. member for North Battleford and the hon. member for Humboldt as to why they could not come to any arrangement with me, must now realize why it was absolutely impossible for even the most reasonable men on this side of the house to get any reasonable settlement with gentlemen who have thus spoken, because they conducted themselves all through in the manner in which they are conducting themselves in this house now. It is true I did tell the hon. member for North Battleford that I would have to communicate with his territory in order to arrange any substantially different line of demarcation with regard to his constituency. I do not pretend to know the territory of North Battleford, I live hundreds of miles away, and would have no information on which to base a decision except by communicating with those in that part who know the territory. In order to change the boundary as requested by the hon. member for Humboldt or anyone else I would have to communicate with those who could give me the necessary information. The hon. member for North Battleford came to me in the last days of the committee's sessions, and I told him that I was sorry he had not consulted with me earlier.

With regard to the city of Saskatoon, it has grown by at least forty-eight per cent in the last ten years. It is one of the most rapidly growing cities in Canada, and it would be unfair to saddle it with a large population at the beginning of the ten year period and take a chance on what the population would be by the end of the period. The hon. member for Saskatoon has more confidence in his constituency than the hon. member for North Battleford has in his; he is not saying that people are going to leave because of inability to make a living in the constituency. I wonder if the hon. member for North Battleford will repeat that statement when he returns to his constituency.

Mr. McINTOSH: I will do all the repeating that is necessary.

Mr. TURNBULL: Then a statement is made in regard to consultation with Senator Willoughby. Before I can have much faith in the efficacy of that consultation I would prefer to know what information was given to the late senator, what material they showed upon which to base a decision, how many days they gave him to consider the matter or get in touch with anyone knowing the circumstances. The whole thing is so apparent, and now an attempt is being made to whitewash themselves into an appearance of political purity by pretending to have conferred with the Conservative party through the late Senator Willoughby.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is my hon. friend referring to the late Senator Willoughby and his communication with myself?

Mr. TURNBULL: I have reference to what were said to be the negotiations between the hon. member and Senator Willoughby.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, it is manifestly unfair, because we did honestly try to get a representation of Conservatives in regard to that redistribution.

Mr. TURNBULL: On the words of the hon. members themselves, they brought their draft map to the late Senator Willoughby four days before the committee reported. He had no information in his hands and no material on which to suggest changes, yet they bring that forward as a fair conference with the Conservatives as to the province of Saskatchewan regarding the redistribution of 1924. The fact that that little change was the only change asked is an indication that there never was a proper opportunity given for an expression of view by the Conservative party.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was no obligation to get any.

Mr. TURNBULL: Certainly not, but do not pretend that you did when you did not.

With regard to the boundaries of the city of North Battleford being within three miles of the boundary of the constituency for many years it has been within much less than that distance from the southern boundary of the constituency, and that did not hurt one way or the other. The northern country is still attached to North Battleford commercially and in every other way as it was before. The two Battlefords are placed together. It is true it might have been done some other way at some other time by some other person, but there is nothing unfair in the way in which they are placed. It was done according to my best judgment and I say it is fair. The attempt, and it was successful, was to do justice to the people in that part of the country.

Mr. TOTZKE: I wish to refer only to one remark which the hon. member for Regina has repeated frequently, and seems to make a striking point of it, as to my statement that my hands were tied in connection with the acceptance of his plan. I made that remark in a more or less facetious manner after the hon. member had denied that his hands had been tied in connection with the map he proposed. I want to say at this stage that my hands were not tied in any manner; I had no instructions of any kind from anyone in the province of Saskatchewan. The only instructions and the only consultation that I had were from and with members from Saskatchewan sitting in this house at the present time But as far as his proposal and map are concerned amalgamating the two constituencies and putting in a new one, certainly I could not accept that.

Mr. McPHEE: As one of those whose constituency is affected, being one of the ninety-and-nine mentioned by the hon. member for Melville, I just wish to say a few words in the hope that two injustices to the constituency I represent may be rectified before the schedules are dealt with.

In the first place the constituency of Yorkton as laid out in 1924 was a complete parallelogram extending 30 mlies north and south and 84 miles east and west, with the Manitoba boundary on the east side. Under this proposed redistribution the northern row of townships, six miles in depth, is removed from the Yorkton seat, and the constituency extended 54 miles farther west; so that now it is a district 138 miles long by 24 miles wide. The district of Yorkton as at present constituted contains approximately 39,000 people, so that in order to increase it up to the present quota of representation it is only necessary to add 5,000 people to that territory. But they take off the northern row of townships and extend the territory 54 miles farther west, almost half way across the province of Saskatchewan. But that is not what I rose to object to. I am satisfied with the constituency, but my complaint about the generosity of the hon. member for Regina is that in restoring the Melville seat to the hon. member for Melville he encroached upon the Yorkton territory.

Mr. TURNBULL: Will the hon. member permit a question? Did not my hon. friends request that change? Why not attribute it to the generosity of some of my hon. friend's friends?

Mr. McPHEE: In the last map my friend proposed and in the letter he sent to the hon. member for Humboldt he said that Melville would be restored and a portion of the Last Mountain seat would be added to the Yorkton seat, and we took it for granted that the south boundary of the Yorkton seat as at present constituted would be the south boundary right through, But the Yorkton constituency was encroached on in township 25 in ranges 7, 8, 9 and 10, and it so happens that by accident or design, my hon. friend in making his computation gave to the hon.

member for Melville a Liberal majority. I am going to ask that that injustice be rectified before we come to the schedules, and I am sure my hon. friend the member for Melville will have no objection.

The further protest I want to make is in connection with the name of the new seat. Notwithstanding the fact that this constituency contains the enterprising city of Yorkton, which is the judicial centre of the district, the land titles office and the fair association; notwithstanding the fact that this is an old district that was settled by hardy pioneers and that during this summer the city of Yorkton and district will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of that settlement, the government and my hon. friend from Regina have called the new constituency Touchwood. I resent the indignity and the injustice that has been done, and I will put the matter fairly to the right hon. leader of the government. What is in the mind of the government; what have they against that district that makes them change the name from Yorkton to Touchwood?

Mr. TURNBULL: I am afraid I shall have to take the full responsibility.

Mr. McPHEE: These are the two principal injustices to which I wanted to refer, and I am sure the right hon. gentleman will rectify them before we come to consider the schedules to the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, a number of hon. members from Saskatchewan have spoken already with regard to the province as a whole. I shall not go over ground that has been covered already, but, as the representative of one of the constituencies which is being materially altered in the schedules attached to the bill, I feel that on behalf of my constituents I should bring to the attention of the house and of the country just what is being attempted by the government under the proposed distribution. I believe this will serve as a good illustration of the sort of thing to which we on this side of the house are taking exception in the name of all that is fair and just.

It is a little difficult for one to distinguish between oneself as member for an individual constituency and as leader of a political party, but I am prepared to discuss the matter on both grounds, as to whether or not what is suggested with regard to Prince Albert is of a nature likely to commend itself to the sense of justice and fair play of the people of this country. The hon. member for Regina, who has spoken on behalf of the Conservative committee that arranged the bill so far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned, said that the problem was to readjust the constituencies along lines which would serve to bring them more into accord with the movement of the population to the north, and that it was necessary to take a constituency out from the southern part and add a constituency in the north. Perhaps for that general statement there is much to be said; just whether or not any question would arise from its operation would depend entirely upon from what place and in what manner the one constituency was removed and where the other constituency was added. The constituency which is being added in the north is to adjoin the constituency of Prince Albert, which I have the honour to represent in this house at the present time. The mind of the committee, which now must be the mind of the government since its recommendations form a part of the schedules as they appear in the bill, will I think be apparent from the figures which the committee had before it at the time the propopsed adjustment was made. The unit which, as I understand it, the committee sought to maintain as the basis for constituencies in Saskatchewan was a representation of 44,186. This meant that constituencies having a larger representation should be reduced in size. Prince Albert came within that category; according to the figures before me, which I believe were before the committee, the present constituency of Prince Albert has a representation of 50,896. The problem then, in strict equity and justice, would be to reduce Prince Albert from 50,896 to 44,186, but what is the reduction that has been made? Prince Albert has been reduced to 38,469, and may I point out that it is only one of four constituencies of the twenty-two in Saskatchewan which now have units of less than 40,000.

When one comes to examine the other constituencies having representations of less than 40,000 one sees how this particular constituency of Prince Albert has been cut up in order to legislate out of his seat in this parliament the one who represents it at the present time and to help make absolutely secure at least one hon. gentleman who sits on the other side of the house. May I point out how the change that has been made, and in so doing I would say that this constituency, as redefined, is a fine exemplification of what is meant by the word "gerrymander." The word gerrymander in political parlance simply means that in redistributing a constituency the boundary lines are so altered as to do an obvious injury to one political party and give an obvious unfair political advantage to another party. According to the figures for the last general election in 1930 the constituency of Prince Albert gave me, as Liberal candidate, a majority of 1,192. Prince Albert is an old constituency which at one time elected Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at a general election many years ago. Later Sir Wilfrid decided to represent another constituency, to which he had also been elected, but Prince Albert has a certain tradition connected with the Liberal party, and for many years it has been a Liberal constituency. When I was without a seat following a general election of 1925, some hon. members from the province of Saskatchewan, together with others from other provinces, offered to place at my disposal their seats in the House of Commons in order that I might resume my duties here. The constituency of Prince Albert was mentioned as one which in all probability would give little concern to the leader of the Liberal party, as it was one of the recognized Liberal seats. In the same way I might say that the present Prime Minister, representing a constituency such as Calgary, may feel free to go from one end of Canada to the other during a political campaign without embassassment, because he represents a safe Conservative constituency. There was considerable chivalry on the part of hon. members on this side of the house when they came to offer their constituencies to their leader.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to interrupt, but I think the right hon. gentleman will recall that in 1911 the only constituency in Saskatchewan which returned a Conservative member was Prince Albert. It has not that Liberal tradition to which the right hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That may have happened on one occasion, but I would point out that the representation of Prince Albert by two Liberal leaders, each of whom has held the office of Prime Minister of Canada entitles it to some place of special honour in the Liberal category, at any rate. Now let me point out what the change proposed today will mean, according to the figures of the last general election. If the last election had been fought within the boundaries proposed at present, instead of having a Liberal majority of 1,192 I would have been defeated by a Conservative majority of 618.

An hon. MEMBER: Hurrah!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some hon. gentleman says "hurrah"; that may be very chivalrous, but let me tell my hon. friends opposite that it is not in accord with the sense of chivalry of the people of Canada as a whole. It may be Tory chivalry but it is neither British chivalry nor British fair play.

An hon. MEMBER: Cut it out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not cut it out; I will say what I am called upon to say in reply to interruptions from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a lot more to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a good deal more to say. Now, may I ask how this has been brought about. It is very simple Those who had charge of the map have looked over the constituency to see what portion of it gave the largest Liberal returns. They found that the southern portion did; they found that the southern portion had given a very considerable majority, and they have so altered the constituency as to take out of that southern portion a Liberal majority of 1,719, which they have placed in a constituency they have newly framed to the south. The constituency which they have newly framed to the south is now being given a unit of 46,285, while they are reducing the unit of Prince Albert to 38,469. By taking this Liberal majority out, they have made the riding even smaller than the unit is according to the redistribution at the moment. What have they done in order to make the constituency what it now is? They have gone over into another constituency, the constituency of Melfort, the constituency of the Minister of Agriculture, and taken a Tory section of his present constituency, which is to the east of Prince Albert, and added that to Prince Albert. They have not at any single place or in any single direction drawn a line which would be fair as between Liberals and Conservatives, but have taken out of and away from the south a part of the constituency strongly Liberal and to what remains they have added to the east a part of an adjoining constituency strongly Conservative. If there could be a clearer gerrymander of a constituency than that I should like to know what it is. I shall have a little more to say about this later on, but I cite what I do, as I wish to make it clear at the moment why it is that some of us on this side have found it impossible to agree to what has been proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The hon. Minister of Public Works, speaking this morning of what there had been in the way of agreement among the different provinces, said that some ninety per cent of the seats were already agreed upon. I am not admitting the truth of that, but supposing one were to admit that there is substantial agreement with respect to ninety per cent of the seats what follows: If there is injustice with respect to ten per cent, if the kind of thing that has been done in Prince Albert is repeated in ten per cent of the constituencies, it means that at least twenty-four of the constituencies are being altered unfairly through a gerrymander, in a way which will give to the government in power to-day an unfair advantage in the way of gain and the opposition the disadvantage to the extent of almost certain defeat in these constituencies. With ten per cent something like twenty-four constituencies, that represents a difference of forty-eight on a division. One can readily see wherein the will of the people is certain of defeat if the constituencies are gerrymandered in that way.

I submit that action of this sort is wholly indefensible, and I may perhaps be pardoned if I say I think it is doubly unchivalrous when it comes from a government towards the leader of the party opposing them. After all, there are some things one has a right to expect and to look forward to in public life; there are some amenities to be preserved between public men, and particularly men who have been in public life for a considerable time and in connection therewith have heavy responsibilities. I have taken the position from the start, with the members of the Saskatchewan committee, that I did not think the seat which I am representing at the present time in parliament should be brought into the discussion at all, but rather that I would look to the Prime Minister and the present government of Canada to do what they thought was fair and just by the leader of the opposition in this House of Commons, and one who, if I may be pardoned for saying so, has during the course of his leadership of his party held the office of Prime Minister for a period of nearly nine years. If they wish to legislate me out of my seat in parliament they can do it in this way. If I am to be thus prevented from coming back to continue to serve my country within the House of Commons, I have no doubt I shall outside the halls of parliament find plenty to do, to which I shall be able to turn with energy and zeal. But I believe that the people of Canada, whether Conservative or Farmer or Labour or Liberal, will resent a deliberate effort on the part of the government of the day, in virtue of its majority, to legislate out of his seat a political opponent who for many years has been the leader of his party. As I have said, I will leave to the Prime Minister and his colleagues the situation so far as this seat is concerned, and I may add that the Prime Minister cannot get away from his responsibility by saying that he knows nothing about this political map, having left it all to the hon. member for Regina to do with as he thinks best.

Mr. BENNETT: No, to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Or to the committee either. The right hon. gentleman is Prime Minister and he has the final say in the matter. More than that, we all know that the members of the committee have been in constant conference with the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I accept the right hon. gentleman's word.

Mr. BENNETT: They have not been in constant communication until after the difficulties arose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope that now difficulties have arisen the Prime Minister will accept some of his responsibility in this regard.

Mr. BENNETT: He is always ready and willing to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out what happened in 1923 at the time of our last redistribution. Those who were on the committee will recall the accuracy of what I say. I was then Prime Minister, charged with the responsibility which my right hon. friend has to-day. I was then representing another historic constituency, the constituency of North York. I was told that the committee had reached practical agreement with respect to most of the Ontario seats, but that there was one objection which was being raised by the Conservative party, namely, that the constituency of North York as it then stood had too small a unit of representation; it was felt that the unit of representation of that constituency ought to be enlarged. Had I wished to do so, I could as Prime Minister have intimated to the members of the committee that I hoped they would keep the unit of representation of North York just where it was. I knew what it meant, adding to the representation of North York, but I asked what would satisfy the committee as to the justice of the situation. They said they would like to have two townships added to North York—townships adjoining the city of Toronto. Hon. members know what that would mean in the way of adding an increased Conservative following to the riding. I took the position that as Prime Minister I was not going to ask any favours for myself, or expect for the constituency I represented, anything which I would not ask equally for any other constituency. I said that if it was true that the representation of North York was small as compared with the others, then by all means these townships should be added. They were added, and when the general election came I carried the old constituency of North York but was defeated by the additional majority in the added constituency.

I take no pride in having adopted that attitude, but I have the satisfaction of knowing that I acted honourably in the matter, and I have nothing to regret with respect to my attitude toward any hon. gentleman opposite. If my hon. friends opposite do not wish to recognize any obligation of fairness, to say nothing of chivalry or justice, towards the leader of the party by which they are opposed, that is of course for themselves to decide. I am not at the moment pleading for myself, but I am speaking for the people of Prince Albert constituency, which has honoured me with its representation in this house, when I say that that constituency has the right to expect a unit of population equivalent to what is recognized as the unit of other constituencies in that province, and has the right to expect that if in a redistribution a change of its boundaries has to be made it will be made fairly as between Liberals and Conservatives in the riding as it stands at the present time.

Mr. TURNBULL: If the declarations that are made now had been made when the committee started to sit some time ago they could have been taken as at least an indication of the intention to negotiate a redistribution map to a favourable conclusion. Judging from the negotiations which have taken place from the time we started until the time we concluded, in my opinion there was no intention on the part of Liberal Saskatchewan members to arrive at any concluded settlement unless it was absolutely upon their own terms.

Mr. McPHEE: That is not true.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. TURNBULL: The right hon. member for Prince Albert is very much perturbed about the lack of chivalry due to the position of leader—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Due to any leader.

Mr. TURNBULL: —whereby he might be legislated out of his seat in the province of Saskatchewan. In the first place at one stage in the proceedings I expressed to the hon. member for Humboldt some doubt as to whether the right hon. the leader of the opposition would be a candidate in Prince Albert at the next elections.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is not for you to decide.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that if I am not mistaken that observation was made some time ago by the Minister of Agriculture. The constituency of Prince Albert has now been so arranged as to bring his farm into it, evidently with a view to accommodating him.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I ask the right hon. the leader of the opposition to give the statement he attributes to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not so very long ago I received a communication from the Liberal committee of Prince Albert to the effect that my hon. friend had said that I would not run again in Prince Albert. They wanted to know whether that would be my decision. I replied that my decision would be to abide by the wish and will of my friends in Prince Albert, that if they wished me to run I would run, and that anything that might be said by others had no bearing on the situation so far as I was concerned.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Where do I come into the picture?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was what my hon. friend said during the by-election in South Huron. A report was sent down to the constituency of South Huron that the leader of the opposition was not going to get a seat in Saskatchewan, that the next time he would not run in Prince Albert. We now begin to see what was evidently in the minds of those who were circulating the story.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): While in Prince Albert I made no statement that the right hon. leader would not likely run in the federal constituency of Prince Albert during the next elections. As far as the by-election in South Huron is concerned, when discussing the matter on one of the platforms I stated that there were three questions for the electors to decide. One was the issues before the electorate, one had reference to the leaders of each party and the other concerned the candidates. I may have given the impression, which was no doubt in my mind at that time, that there would be little likelihood of the right hon. leader of the opposition running as a candidate in the constituency of Prince Albert. I gave my reasons for that, which the right hon. gentleman did not ask me. The right hon. leader of the opposition had done considerable travelling from one part of the country to the other as the result of which he had been elected in various constituencies throughout Canada from the east to the west.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have given the reason why I was kept from North York.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To continue, when the right hon. the leader of the opposition first ran in Prince Albert constituency he had a majority of over five thousand. He spent a day and a half in the constituency between then and the next elections, and I believe his majority dropped by a little over fifteen hundred, or in the neighbourhood of five hundred for each half day or a thousand a day for each day he was in the constituency. I am just repeating now the substance of my remarks to one of the audiences to which I spoke. Between that and the next elections his majority dropped something in the neighbourhood of three thousand, which was a little over a thousand a day for each day the right hon. member had stayed in his constituency. With these facts in my mind I concluded that there was little likelihood of the right hon. member contesting the constituency in the next elections if he were forced to spend any time in the constituency.

The right hon. leader of the opposition made one statement referring to the will of the people to which I take exception, and if the committee will bear with me for a few minutes I think I can show that he is not correct in his statement. The last redistribution made it impossible for the people in the federal constituency of Prince Albert to express their will. I have before me the results of the last federal elections and they show that poll after poll in the northern part, and especially in the city of Prince Albert and the districts in the neighbourhood of Prince Albert, returned majority after majority against the right hon. gentleman. This is what happened in the Anglo-Saxon and French speaking part of the constituency and the only thing that enabled him to carry the election were the votes of a large block of people of German descent who had been left in the southern part of the seat in the last redistribution. I am not making any inference that these people should not be given every opportunity to exercise their franchise. They are of German descent. I had the privilege and pleasure of working throughout that whole district for years as a school inspector. Under the redistribution which was in force during the last elections a large block of these people in the southern end of the Prince Albert constituency and another similar block to the north of Saskatoon, totalling in all about forty-five thousand progressive Mennonite farmers by being thus divided were practically denied the opportunity of nominating one of their own people so that this very worthy part of the Canadian population would be unable to express its opinion in this house. I know many of these people personally and they take second place to none, but this is what happened because of the work of scientific and highly specialized political racketeers. I do not think it was the work of the leaders of the Liberal party as we like to think of Liberalism. I believe it would have been a distinct gain it we could have as a member one of these people of German extraction who had made such a success. But that was made impossible because of the block left in Prince Albert constituency, evidently just to affect a vote of the people in the northern part of the constituency. By doing that, both these peoples have been practically disfranchised. The right hon. the leader of the opposition and his followers have therefore made it impossible for these people to express their will.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TURNBULL: When I was speaking before six o'clock I was referring to the situation in Prince Albert. Until after the committee had reported, owing to the fact that there was a deadlock between the hon. member for Humboldt and myself regarding the method of redistribution rather than as to details with respect to seats, I received no information regarding what was wanted in Prince Albert other than the offer which I referred to in the letter which I read this afternoon, which offer was made in accordance with a conversation between the hon. member for Humboldt and myself. The hon. member for Humboldt says this afternoon that as well as delineating the southern boundary for Prince Albert he had stipulated that an angle south of the south branch of the Saskatchewan river should also have been removed from the Prince Albert constituency. As I said, I had no recollection of that, and my letter was written when the matter was very fresh in my memory and it contains no statement of that kind. In the reply made by the hon. member for Humboldt it was not mentioned as an essential feature of the offer, but he simply said that the offer itself was wholly unacceptable. So there was no further discussion as to whether that feature had been eliminated or not.

That offer was refused, and I heard of no further offer until after the redistribution committee had reported, when I was presented with a map which retained the old boundaries of Prince Albert intact, and accompanying it was a request to divide the three constituencies of Yorkton, Last Mountain and Melville by a line running north and south instead of a line running east and west, thereby setting up the old seat of Melville again very close to the original plan; also a map subdividing the constituencies of North Battleford and South Battleford and sending South Battleford to the northern portion of the province. On that map the boundaries of ten constituencies were altered from the map that I had submitted. It is quite true that some of those alterations were minor alterations and were consequent upon the three major alterations to which I have referred in the Melville area, the Prince Albert area and the Battleford area. In that stage of the negotiations it was a rather big demand. I asked the hon. member for Humboldt to consult with his friends and come back to me and say what the minimum of his demand was in order to get a complete compromise on the Saskatchewan map. He came back and said that the reply was practically all that he had asked for in respect to these seats, and I replied that at that stage that was an impossible request from my point of view.

The right hon. leader of the opposition complains that in applying the principle of reducing the population of Prince Albert, which he now says was properly applied—and in the map presented by the other side of the house the population was also reduced but not down to the minimum between 45,000 and 46,000—I reduced his population too far, making it between 38,000 and 39,000, and he protests that it should have been left at at least 44,186. I submit that the leader of the opposition is not showing the acquaintance with his district that he ought to have. Quite a considerable number of people have gone into that constituency since the census of 1931 and that the addition of these people will bring the figure much more closely to the 44,000 unit than might be expected. It is further suggested that in arguing that the unit should not be below the average, no allowance is being made for the trends of population. Now the population in Saskatchewan as a whole, as is generally known, did not move north. That was not the cause of the maladjustment that I was attempting to remedy. The population in the southern part of the province grew just about as fast as it grew in the rest of Canada, but the population in the northern part grew very much faster. There was no great removal of population from the south to the north of the province prior to 1931. It was the excessive growth in the northern part of the province itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me to make a correction, if it should be a correction. The figures that I gave as to the population of Prince Albert at present and the figures the committee had before them were based on the last census, not the figures that obtained at the time of the last election.

Mr. BENNETT: The census figures?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The census figures, yes.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not think there is any dispute between us as regards that. The census gives 50,896 as the population in 1931. The population as proposed by the map submitted to me by the hon. member for Humboldt on the new basis would be 45,986, or within 14 of 46,000. The population I submitted was 38,469, and if the offer I had made in writing before referred to had been accepted, it would have added something like 6,400 or 6,500 to that population. But to ask now that the population of Prince Albert, or its boundaries shall remain intact, is not only to leave a population of nearly 51,000 in Prince Albert constituency but seriously to affect the adjustment in Melfort constituency as well. It would mean the transfer of 4,800 from Prince Albert to the Melfort district.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition says that I have apparently added insult to injury by carrying into his constituency from Melfort an area which gave a Tory majority at the last election. I am sorry if I have done that injustice to the Minister of Agriculture, because naturally he would feel very badly if he had lost any Conservative votes to the constituency of Prince Albert. My right hon. friend is very anxious lest we should legislate him out of his constituency. He talks a great deal about chivalry, with probably more heat than light. Out in our part of the country we merely call that "fanning the air." It does not weigh very heavily with the voters in Saskatchewan. I submit that there is not very much necessity to legislate the right hon. gentleman out of his seat. If he loses as many supporters between 1930 and the next election as he lost between 1926 and the last one it will take no legislation to remove him from Prince Albert.

In connection with these questions of chivalry, and chivalry especially to leaders of great parties in this country, it is well to remember what happened in the constituency of Portage la Prairie in 1924. Some additions were made at that time to the seat held by the then leader of the Conservative party. It is true that by superhuman effort in 1925 the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen carried the seat. But it was one of the hardest seats in the province of Manitoba to get at, one of the hardest seats to work, and one which was calculated to defeat the right hon. leader of the Conservative party at that time—although in 1925 that purpose was not achieved. In 1926 it operated very much better, because not only did the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen lose his seat, but he abandoned his membership in the House of Commons. The people who did that are the people who in 1933 are talking about chivalry.

Apart from all the talk about fixing up a seat in Prince Albert for the right hon. leader of the opposition, let me say that the situation there is not entirely in line with anything which has happened heretofore. In the first place, that seat is not ordinarily the one held by the right hon. leader of the opposition. He came there more or less by political accident arising out of the previous election. He came there to find a safe refuge in the Prince Albert seat. Let me remind the committee that it would not have been a safe refuge, had it not been for the redistribution of 1924. The fixing of the boundaries of that constituency in 1924 made what was normally a seat with a fighting chance for both parties into an absolutely safe Liberal seat. The seat the right hon. gentleman represents was made safe by the redistribution of 1924. If we had been responsible for that redistribution we would have been accused of deliberate gerrymander. But for my right hon. friend it was merely a rearrangement of boundaries to suit the general welfare of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend will make it clear that the seat was one which had been carried by a Liberal member who resigned in my favour. It was not as the result of arrangement of any boundaries with a view to making a seat for myself.

Mr. TURNBULL: Quite true, the right hon. gentleman was not a candidate in that constituency at the general election. I thought I had made that clear. The seat was won by Mr. McDonald by a very large majority, and after the redistribution of 1924. What I was trying to say was that by reason of the delineation of boundaries which took place in 1924 Prince Albert became a safe Liberal seat, and because it was a safe Liberal seat it offered a refuge for the right hon. gentleman when he lost his election in an Ontario constituency. Since the right hon. gentleman went to Prince Albert as a result of a political misfortune in another province, there is no guarantee that at any time it will be a permanent seat for him. He is not in the same position as is my right hon. leader in the city of Calgary. Calgary has been his home for many years. Again, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen had been for many years a resident of Portage la Prairie. It might be, if Prince Albert has been fixed up as now suggested, that at the time of an election the right hon. leader of the opposition might find a seat in Ontario or Prince Edward Island, and we would be faced with the proposition of placing another Liberal candidate in Prince Albert, a seat made safe by reason of operations which took place in 1924.

If time permitted and if I considered it worth while I could point out seat after seat in the province of Saskatchewan which was fixed up in 1924, even though the late Senator Willoughby was consulted. The map speaks for itself. There is no question about it, that whether it was intended or not the result of the redistribution of 1924 was to make that province much safer for Liberals than it had been before the redistribution. I do not quarrel with my hon. friends for that. I merely ask them, knowing what was done in 1924, not only in the province of Saskatchewan but in other Canadian provinces, not to trouble us with their mock heroics regarding misfortunes which they say they are suffering in 1933. There are plenty other seats in Saskatchewan which are perfectly safe Liberal seats. I think there is cause to apply the same principle to the constituency of Prince Albert as was applied to other seats in the northern part of the province, that is to say, reduce the population below the unit, taking into consideration the fact that the trend of increased population is to the northern part of the province and that in the last ten years that constituency has grown up by thirty per cent. After due allowance is made for that, it is found that the population is between 38,000 and 39,000 which is ample population for that particular seat at the moment. Not only that, but the justice of what I say is shown by the maps submitted to me by the hon. member for Humboldt. I am not charging him with the responsibility for drawing the map, but I say that the map submitted to me by him removed some fifteen townships from the southern part of the seat of Prince Albert. That is I think approximately what would have been removed had the boundary I offered been accepted. If it was a great injustice for me to move those townships from Prince Albert, what must it have been for a member of the committee on the other side of the house. Lest someone may make a mistake about a township, may I explain that townships in the eastern part are different from those in the west. Out west a township is six miles square or thirty-six square miles. Ffteen of those townships, according to the map presented by the hon. member for Humboldt, were to be removed from the southern part of the constituency. So there was not very much difference there. The Liberal map, if we may call it such, provided for a reduction of population, as well. Not only that, the redistribution of 1924 placed those three northern seats below the unit for the western provinces, and I was merely following that precedent upon this occasion.

With regard to the so-called serious trouble in Battleford, and the complaint that Battleford was not made Battlefords, the fact of the matter is that in the draft of the boundaries which went to the printer the word Battlefords appeared, but in the printing the "s" was dropped out. If it would relieve the mind of the hon. member for North Battleford I may tell him that I shall move at the proper time that the letter "s" be restored, and that both Battlefords be recognized in the future history of Saskatchewan, as reflected in this redistribution.

May I say in conclusion that I regret very much the hon. member for Humboldt and myself were from the start so vastly separated on a question of principle that I was not able to get the cooperation from him on details that I otherwise would have had. The question of a boundary line being a little too far one way or another was one which might have been ironed out, had there been cooperation between us on other points. But in view of the fact that the hon. member for Humboldt would not relent unless I abandoned the plan of cutting out a seat and putting in another which I had in view, there was no possibility of our getting together on details. We could have got together on details had I accepted his map. That was clear from the start. But I look upon that as being dictated to by the brute force of a minority, if one wished to use that term in connection with the righteous actions of the house. When it comes to a question of small changes here and there in boundaries I quite readily admit that a boundary might have been placed a mile east or west of where I would put it and one point might be as satisfactory as the other. I am sorry the admission of the right hon. member for Prince Albert did not come earlier in the negotiations to the effect that it did not matter very much whether a seat was cut out in the centre and a new one formed in the north, but it mattered where it was cut out and where the new one was added. Had that position been taken by hon. members opposite at an earlier stage in the negotiations Saskatchewan might have been much more nearly united at the close of those negotiations than it is now. May I say, however, that out of the twenty-one seats in Saskatchewan there is a pretty substantial amount of agreement in respect to seventeen. We are not so very far apart, in the end. If we were able to achieve that amount of agreement it seems to me that all the hysterics about deliberate gerrymanders and unfairness and all that sort of thing which we have had thrown at us, has not much solid basis in fact.

Mr. A. F. TOTZKE (Humboldt): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to follow my hon. friend from Regina through all his statements. The personal and racial atmosphere was not introduced into this debate until the hon. Minister of Agriculture took a hand this afternoon. But I want to dissociate myself from the position that the hon. member for Regina has tried to put me in. He has tried his utmost to fix on me the onus of having placed the constituency of my leader in the state in which it is now found. He said I had never at any time objected very strongly to the constituency of Price Albert as proposed. He must admit, however, that every map I proposed to him showed the boundary of Prince Albert extending to the town of Rosthern. It is true that some townships were taken off the southeastern corner of the constituency, but it was done because we wanted to live up to the principle we were working on of more nearly equalizing the population. The hon. member for Regina was most emphatic until near the end of the negotiations that the southern boundary as placed on his map must stay there. He also insisted that that portion taken from the Melfort seat and put into Prince Albert should remain. He now explains that he must apologize to the hon. member for Melfort for taking these good Tory votes and putting them into Prince Albert. I know very well why it was done. To-day we have seen what was in the mind of the hon. gentlemen; they thought they were going to force the leader of the opposition out of the constituency of Prince Albert and make him run elsewhere.

My hon. friend said he had reason to believe that the leader of the opposition was not going to run in Prince Albert. He mentioned that to me once; I think it was about the time of the election in South Huron. He will remember I told him, when the rumour came from Prince Albert that the right hon. leader of the opposition was not going to run there, that my leader himself immediately made the statement that as long as the people of Prince Albert wanted him to represent them he was going to do so.

Mr. TURNBULL: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Did the line that he and I agreed upon, which was marked upon the map, include within the constituency of Prince Albert the town of Rosthern?

Mr. TOTZKE: There my hon. friend, I will not say intentionally, is again misrepresenting my attitude. We did not agree on that line. It was after the hon. member had told me that he certainly could not admit an alteration of the southern boundary that I tried to get from him an indication as to how far he would go. He said he would consider this. Every time I asked him for an alteration in the boundaries of a constituency the only thing that I could get was that he would consider it.

Mr. TURNBULL: Did you not get an offer in writing?

Mr. TOTZKE: To consider it?

Mr. TURNBULL: No, an offer of the boundary in writing.

Mr. TOTZKE: Nothing very definite. But I will say this, that every time I submitted a map to him, even when we were trying the hardest to equalize the population in the northern constituencies as he wished them, the town of Rosthern was always included in any map submitted. It is not fair on the part of the hon. member to try to hang on me the accusation that I was endeavouring in any way to limit the chances of my leader in the constituency of Prince Albert. Besides, I was not specially concerned at the moment about the constituency of Prince Albert, because I felt sure that the Prime Minister would not see an injustice done to the leader of the opposition. I had an assurance later on from a member of the government that nothing would be done to legislate the leader of the opposition out of his seat in Prince Albert. It is true that the last map that I submitted, which I could not get the committee of elder statesmen to allow me to argue before them, had alterations in some of the constituencies—the hon. member for Regina says in ten; I did not count them—but these were necessary on account of the alterations in Melville and north of Melville.

I mentioned a moment ago the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. He is running true to form. The first session he came down here he told us and told the people of Saskatchewan that he was not a politician, that he did not know anything about the game. That first session thoroughly proved that he was not a politician, and to-day proves it again. This is the first time in the proceedings, either here or in the committee, that the political or racial question has been brought into the debate in any shape or form. The hon. Minister of Agriculture said this afternoon that the right hon. leader of the opposition was elected in Prince Albert not by those of Anglo-Saxon origin but by those in the southern portions of the constituency which are populated predominantly by men of German origin. He said the Anglo-Saxon people of Prince Albert constituency were disfranchised—and this from a member of a government sworn to His Majesty to serve loyally and truly the people of this dominion! If any people of Prince Albert, Mr. Chairman, were disfranchised by the votes cast by the people of the southern part of the district, I would protest in the strongest language of which I am capable. He said that is the reason that the southern portion of Prince Albert constituency was taken from that constituency and put in a new one, so that they could be with their own class and would have an opportunity to elect one of themselves.

Before I make any further comment in that regard, may I say that the people of Rosthern district to my knowledge are very anxious that the leader of the opposition shall again represent them in the next parliament. The hon. Minister of Agriculture knows that constituency—he admitted that this afternoon—knows it very well. He inspected the schools through there; he inspected the schools in my own community, and when he says that the new constituency is composed of people almost entirely of the same class as those around Rosthern and that the southern portion of Prince Albert which is being removed was predominantly populated by these people, I want to call to his attention the names of many places in that district; he knows them well, and he will know the class of people who live there. For example listen to these names: Domremy, Duck Lake—you will remember Duck Lake from the 1885 rebellion days.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Those are not in the southern part of the constituency of Prince Albert.

Mr. TOTZKE: They certainly are.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My whole point this afternoon was the solid block of Mennonites amounting to 40,000.

Mr. TOTZKE: My hon. friend knows very well that these places I have mentioned—

Mr. BENNETT: The old stuff.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Ku Klux.

Mr. TOTZKE: You remember Batoche and Fish Creek. My hon. friend says they are a bunch of foreigners. Are you going to call people who are Canadianized or were born in Canada foreigners? Are you going to call the French people who settled there many years ago foreigners? Domremy?

Mr. BENNETT: This is running true to form.

Mr. TOTZKE: St. Louis, St. Isidore de Bellevue—are those likely to be German settlements?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Those are not in the southern part.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are, every one of them.

Mr. TOTZKE: Mr. Chairman, I object to being interrupted in this way. The Minister of Agriculture is not adding anything to the debate. He simply says they are not in the southern part; I say they are.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Thompson, Simcoe): It is a matter of geography.

Mr. TOTZKE: These are French communities. Then I have another list of names which are neither Anglo Saxon nor German. Let me read this list: Blaine Lake; Petrofka, and St. Julien. That sounds French, but it is settled largely by Ukrainians. Then there is Wakaw, settled by Ukrainians and Hungarians, and we have the German settlements, Waldheim, Laird and Rosthern, and there are one or two other little places also. These are in the southern portion of the constituency of Prince Albert as it now exists. They are south of Duck lake, so that town must be in the constituency of Prince Albert also.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I very much regret that this matter has been brought into the house. I want to say, however, that I know the people in those constituencies; I have the honour of representing a number of similar people, and I am very proud to do so. There are no more loyal Canadians than these people, and I resent any imputations against their loyalty to their adopted country. They do not want to be hived by themselves; they want to take their position as Canadian citizens, and they want to assume their rights and privileges with all the responsibilities that go with them. This shows what hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to do. They are attempting to keep the Anglo-Saxons together and to put those of foreign extraction off by themselves, because they know that most of these people who have taken up residence in this country are not bound by the traditions of eastern Canada or the mother country, but have been able to figure out for themselves just what party they wish to support. I was going to remark here that if the speech made this afternoon by my hon. friend is similar to the speeches he made during the by-election in South Huron I am not at all surprised that my hon. friend from South Huron was returned with such a substantial majority.

Then there is the question of the population in the new seat, in which the hon. gentleman says these people will find some of their own kind so they will be able to get their own representation in this house. Again I say that my hon. friend knows the constituency which it is proposed to create in this part of Saskatchewan. He knows the people there; he has inspected schools all through that district, and he will recognize the names I am going to mention. How about Alvena? That is not a German community; it is settled almost entirely by Ukrainians and their descendants, and a very good class of people they are too. How about Aberdeen? That is not a Scotch settlement although many Canadians are located there, as well as a few Mennonites of German extraction. At one time there was quite a settlement of Mennonites around the village of Aberdeen, but many of those people have moved away. Now there are many of the Anglo-Saxons there about whom my hon. friend is so concerned. How about Vonda, my home town? There are very few Germans in that town; I am almost alone, but just the same I have a lot of friends there. How about Prud'homme? The hon. gentleman knows where that is, and he knows that a French settlement almost surrounds that town, while to the north is a Hungarian settlement; there are no Germans there at all. How about Blucher? How about Elstow? How about Colonsay? How about Clavet? How about Bradwell? How about Zelma? How about Young, Dundurn and Hanley?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Most of the towns he is mentioning now never were in the constituency of Prince Albert.

Mr. TOTZKE: I said this was the new constituency in which my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture said the people of German extraction in the southern portion of the constituency of Prince Albert would find people of their own kind and class. There is no question but that the reasons advanced this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture are not the reasons that were behind the gerrymander of the Prince Albert constituency. The reason is that the people whom they are trying to get out of the constituency of Prince Albert are strong supporters of the right hon. leader of the opposition, and hon. gentlemen opposite believe they will support him more strongly than ever during the next election. The same thing applies to that portion of the Saskatoon seat which has been removed from the northern part of that constituency. Here again we have the Mennonites of German extraction who have voted consistently against the Conservative candidate; evidently they are to be taken out now. Anyone who consistently votes against the Conservative candidate must be hived up in some other constituency so that the Conservative candidate may have a better chance in the constituency from which those people are ousted. I do not think there is any question about that, and hon. gentlemen opposite may talk as they wish about trying to get these people together with people of their own kind. They do not want that at all. The people who have come to the west from other countries and have become citizens of this country want to bear their share of responsibility; they want to be called Canadians. That is all they are looking for, and I think the Minister of Agriculture, after his experience as an inspector of schools in that very community, bemeaned himself in the remarks he made this afternoon.

Mr. T. H. LENNOX (North York): I had no intention of taking part in this debate at the present stage, Mr. Chairman, but in view of the remarks of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition I am compelled to say a word or two at the present time. I might say that I was more than amazed at the references the right hon. gentleman made to North York; I could hardly believe that he would say what he did. In order that there might be no misunderstanding I secured a copy of Hansard containing his speech, and I propose to read that now and then refer to the actual conditions with respect to that constituency. The right hon. gentleman said:

May I point out what happened in 1923 at the time of our last redistribution? Those who were on the committee will recall the accuracy of what I say. I was then Prime Minister, charged with the responsibility which my right hon. friend has to-day. I was then representing another historic constituency, the constituency of North York.

In that he was quite right.

I was told that the committee had reached a practical agreement with respect to most of the Ontario seats but that there was one objection which was being raised by the Conservative party, namely that the constituency of North York as it then stood had a small unit of representation, and it was felt that the unit of representation of that constituency ought to be enlarged. Had I wished to do so, I could as Prime Minister have intimated to the members of the committee that I hoped they would keep the unit of representation of North York just where it was. I knew what it meant, adding to the representation of North York, but I asked what would satisfy the committee as to the justice of the situation. They said they would like to have two additional townships added to North York—townships adjoining the city of Toronto. Hon. members know what that would mean in the way of adding an increased Conservative following to the riding. I took the position that as Prime Minister I was not going to ask any favours for myself or expect for the constituency I represented anything which I would not ask equally for any other constituency. I said that if it was true that the representation of North York was small as compared with the others, then by all means these townships should be added. They were added, and when the general election came I carried the old constituency of North York but was defeated by the additional majority in the added constituency.

I take no pride in having adopted that attitude, but I have the satisfaction of knowing that I acted honourably in the matter, and I have nothing to regret with respect to my attitude to any hon. gentleman opposite.

Let me ask the house to bear with me while I discuss the political complexion of these two townships which the right hon. gentleman says the Conservative desired to have added to the old North York and to which he, in a moment of weakness apparently, consented. I cannot go back prior to 1925, because prior to that, in the two preceding elections in North York, there were three candidates. I would however refer to the township of Markham, which was one township that was taken in. There was a provincial election in 1926 and the present premier of the province of Ontario, who was then Minister of Highways, was the Conservative candidate while Mr. Annis, a farmer, was the Liberal candidate. Now let us see what a great sacrifice the right hon. the leader of the opposition made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the hon. member referring to federal or provincial elections?

Mr. LENNOX: I will deal with both. As I say, the Hon. Mr. Henry was running as the Conservative candidate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is provincial.

Mr. LENNOX: I will come to the federal; don't worry. This is the township which the right hon. gentleman was good enough to add to the old constituency of North York, and I find that in 1926 the township of Markham, nine months after the election of 1925, when I opposed the right hon. gentleman— the township of Markham and the village, which is a part of it, and Richmond Hill as well, including Vaughan, gave no less than 1,542 of a Liberal majority. That was the wonderful sacrifice made by my right hon. friend. Vaughan gave a Liberal majority of 236 and Woodbridge, which was in Vaughan, gave a Liberal majority of 38—that was in 1926—making a majority of 274. Richmond Hill, which was added, gave a Liberal majority of 84 and, as I said a moment ago, the total majority in these municipalities that were added was 1,542. That was the Liberal majority.

Let us now take the election of 1929, and then I shall come back and deal with the subject from the federal point of view. In 1929 there was a provincial election, and the present premier of the province, Mr. Henry, was also then a candidate, opposed by Mr. Saunders. The township of Markham, including the village, gave a Liberal majority against the present premier of Ontario of 792, and the township of Vaughan, which my right hon. friend opposite consented to have added to the old constituency of North York, gave a Liberal majority against Mr. Macaulay, the present Minister of Highways, of 150, or a total of 942. That was the position in the period from 1926 up to 1929.

Now let me refer to the election of 1925, when I had the honour of opposing the right hon. gentleman. Instead of my right hon. friend receiving 1,184 majority in the township of Markham and the village, he received 71 in the township of Markham, and he was given the magnificent majority of 16 in the village, making a total of 87, whereas nine months later a Liberal candidate received a majority of 1,542. I come now to the election of 1926. In that election—

Mr. DONNELLY: Take 1921.

Mr. LENNOX: I would go back to 1921 but for the fact that there were three candidates then. However, for the information of the hon. gentleman I may say that Mr. Maclean received only 423 votes in Markham in 1921. He was the Conservative candidate. In 1926 I was opposed by Mr. Harry Sifton, and Markham township apparently thought a great deal more of him than it did of the leader of the opposition because, instead of giving 71 of a majority, which was more than 1,400 less than the Liberal candidate received in 1926, they gave Mr. Sifton in Markham township 223 and in the village 43, making a total for that gentleman of 266. Vaughan, which was added, instead of being 150 Liberal as it was in the provincial election, in 1926 gave me a majority of 267; so that, taking Markham and Vaughan, I received a majority of 1. Then we had my friend Mr. Mulock, who came to North York in 1930 and who got a majority of 249 in Markham and, in the village, 25. In the township of Markham the majority was 274 for Mr. Sifton and Vaughan, much to the surprise of the Liberals, gave me a majority of 206.

Let me for a moment direct attention to one or two things mentioned by my right hon. friend. In the first place, he asked a question as to what had happened in 1923 at the last redistribution. He said there was one objection which was being raised by the Conservative party and that was that the constituency was too small, the desire being that these two townships should be added. I was not in the house in 1923, but it seems to me a most remarkable thing that the Conservatives of North York were anxious to add to the old riding of North York two townships that gave an adverse majority of nearly 1,600. The right hon. gentleman went on to say:

> Had I wished to do so, I could as Prime Minister have intimated to the members of the committee that I hoped they would keep the unit of representation of North York just where it was. I knew what it meant, adding to the representation of North York, but I asked what would satisfy the committee as to the justice of the situation.

And he goes on:

> They were added, and when the general election came I carried the old constituency of North York but was defeated by the additional majority in the added constituency.

Let me say for the benefit of this committee that I have had ten elections and the largest majority I ever had was against the right hon. the leader of the opposition. I have never had a very large majority but I had a majority of 494 against him. When the right hon. gentleman says that he carried the old constituency I want to tell him that his memory is very poor. If it had not been for the assistance he received from the new municipalities which were added, instead of having a majority of 494, I would have had a majority in the old constituency of 681. The right hon. gentleman says that these new townships adjoin the city of Toronto. I am rather surprised that he is not better acquainted with the geography of a riding which he represented. As a matter of fact, Markham and Vaughan, which were added to North York are not within ten miles of Toronto. There are three townships between Toronto and the new riding, the township of Scarborough, the township of York and the township of North York. As I say, the shortest distance between the new riding as provided for by the redistribution of 1924 and the city of Toronto is ten miles. I only say this in view of the statements made by the right hon. gentleman, for whom I have the very greatest respect, although he does not speak to me. If the statements he made with respect to Prince Albert, his own constituency, are as incorrect as those he made with respect to North York, I do not think they should impress any hon. gentlemen in this committee. I am not at all acquainted with conditions in the west but I suppose it would not be doing anyone a very great injustice were I to say that the right hon. gentleman would have no more reason to be accurate in his references to Prince Albert than to North York.

I had no intention of speaking at this stage but I might just say that so far as changing the constituency is concerned, I do not think that anyone will accuse me of being politically selfish in this matter, having won the last three elections under present conditions and against three of the most formidable opponents, the leader of the opposition, who was then the Prime Minister and the representative of North York, Mr. Harry Sifton and Mr. Mulock. I will just say that my whole aim with respect to North York is to have the boundaries the same as they are for provincial purposes. It is no doubt within the memory of hon. gentlemen that within the last two months there has taken place a redistribution for provincial purposes. A committee was appointed, the same as here. That committee brought in a report, and strange as it may appear, that report provided the same boundaries for North York as are provided by the report of this committee.

[Mr. Lennox.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very strange.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a coincidence.

Mr. LENNOX: It may have been a coincidence but there are four Liberal papers in my riding; they are the watchdogs for the Liberals of North York, they do not like me any too well but I have yet to see a single word of criticism by any of them with respect to the redistribution which took place in the provincial house and which provided the same boundaries for North York as are provided for by this bill. One would have thought that if the boundaries were unfair and any injustice was being done to the Liberals in the riding of North York, there would have been some uprising, on the part of the press at least. I have not noticed a single word. So far as the provincial house was concerned, the report was adopted unanimously by Liberals, Tories and Progressives alike. In view of this, it does seem to me that so far as the boundaries of North York are concerned—I am speaking for those who will follow me and not for myself—that what was considered a just and equitable redistribution two months ago can hardly be called a gerrymander to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee will be able to judge just how hard pressed the hon. member who has just spoken was to make his point when it considers that he found it necessary to introduce into a debate dealing with federal redistribution what took place under a provincial measure in a provincial campaign and, more than that, was prepared to leave the impression, had I not interrupted and corrected him, with the committee that he was speaking in regard to a federal—

Mr. BENNETT: He distinctly said "provincial".

Mr. LENNOX: I mentioned Mr. Henry as being the leader of the government in the province.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I imagine that a good many people reading the remarks of the hon. member, if they do so, would not gather to what particular Mr. Henry he was referring. I ask hon. members who are representing constituencies here at the present time if they would allow themselves to be driven to the point where they would find it necessary to support their arguments as to the complexion of a riding federally by referring to what had taken place in a provincial election under a provincial redistribution measure.

The hon. member takes exception to my statement that these townships were lying nearer to Toronto than other parts of the riding of North York. As everyone knows, the city of Toronto is growing to the north very rapidly. For a greater part of the distance on either side of Yonge street as you leave Toronto the influence is wholly that of Toronto and any part of the township of York that is brought into a constituency further south will be brought completely under the influence of the Conservative forces of the city of Toronto. When the committee indicated to me in 1923 that what was desired was to add those townships, the ones requested were added. As I said this afternoon, this was done for the purpose of meeting the wishes of the committee upon which Conservatives as well as Liberals were numbered. I agreed in the way in which I indicated today. The best evidence that what was done was fair and just under the circumstances and was considered so by hon. gentlemen opposite is the fact that when the redistribution bill came into the house it came in without any exception being taken to any constituency in the province of Ontario. I am not going to follow the hon. member into the reasons that may have resulted in the majorities he has received in North York. He knows them better than anyone else.

Mr. LENNOX: Is this statement of the right hon. gentleman true?

They were added, and when the general election came I carried the old constituency of North York but was defeated by the additional majority in the added constituency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the impression I have been under, that had the old riding been left as it was I would have carried it. Possibly I should have made an exception of those voters who were brought up from Toronto by my hon. friend and who voted in other parts of the constituency.

Mr. LENNOX: There were none brought up at that election.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise merely to correct a misstatement made this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman, because, to use his own words, it is always desirable that the record should be historically correct. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was never a candidate in Prince Albert. That is No. 1.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In 1896.

Mr. BENNETT: He was never a candidate in Prince Albert.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In what is now the constituency of Prince Albert.

Mr. BENNETT: No, never. Secondly, it is not traditionally Liberal. Here is the record. I thought I remembered very distinctly what the position was when I went west but I have taken the trouble during the recess to get the Parliamentary Guide and at page 278 the record of Prince Albert is given. It came into being in 1908. At the first general election Mr. Rutan, a Liberal, was elected, and he was the member for three years until in 1911 the seat was carried by Mr. James McKay, a Conservative. He remained until at a by-election the next year Mr. Donaldson, a Conservative, was elected in his place. The seat then remained Conservative until 1917, when the government candidate, Mr. Knox, was elected by a majority of 3,590. Mr. Knox was an opponent of the Liberals at that time. He was reelected as a Progressive in 1921, and the seat remained Progressive until 1925 when Mr. McDonald was elected, and he was succeeded on his retirement by the right hon. leader of the opposition, who is still the member for that constituency. A note is appended, "See Assiniboia, and particularly the reference under that head to the old electoral division of Saskatchewan."

At page 217 of the Parliamentary Guide is the record of Saskatchewan. The record with respect to Saskatchewan is as follows, Saskatchewan being an electoral division that returned one member only for the whole of the territorial division of Saskatchewan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of which Prince Albert was an important part.

Mr. BENNETT: No, there were several places, including Saskatoon, then an embryo city.

Mr. TOTZKE: In 1906? Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: I am making my observations from this record, and at page 218 is the record of this traditionally Liberal seat! In 1887, at the first election, Mr. Macdowall, a Conservative, was elected by 166. He was reelected in 1891 by 283, and in 1896 Sir Wilfrid Laurier was elected by 44. But I find that he was also elected in the same election for Quebec East, and that he resigned his seat at Prince Albert and was succeeded by Mr. T. O. Davis, Liberal, who was reelected in 1900, and when he went to the Senate he was succeeded in 1904 by Mr., now Mr. Justice, Lamont, a Liberal. So it is not a traditionally Liberal seat, and secondly, Sir Wilfrid Laurier never sat for Prince Albert, and never was elected for Prince Albert.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was elected.

Mr. BENNETT: Never was elected. He was elected for what is known as the electoral division of Saskatchewan. When I went west there were four ridings in the northwest territories: Alberta, represented by Mr. Oliver, West Assiniboia, represented by Mr. Davin, East Assiniboia, represented by Mr. Douglas and later by Mr. Turriff, and the other was Saskatchewan, which in 1896 was represented by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was succeeded by Mr. Davis when Sir Wilfrid elected to sit for Quebec East.

That is the record. I do not think for a single moment that the right hon. gentleman deliberately misstated it, but it just shows how one may for a moment have in one's mind an idea that is hardly consonant with the exact facts, just as the right hon. gentleman had with respect to his position in North York. It turns out as a matter of fact that had it not been for the two townships that were added by the redistribution of 1924 he would have been beaten by a much larger majority than he was. I am not for a moment asserting that he made the misstatement deliberately. It is just one of those accidents that sometimes happens to one's memory, and I merely correct the misstatement in order that the record may be historically correct.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is why it is done—statesmanlike.

Mr. BENNETT: To keep the record historically correct.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should like to take a very few minutes to correct some of the misrepresentations that were made by the hon. member for Humboldt, whether wilfully or not—

Mr. TOTZKE: I would ask, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman be made to withdraw that statement.

The CHAIRMAN: He said that he did not know whether the misrepresentations were wilful or not. He qualified his statement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My statement was to the effect that in the southern portion of the constituency of Prince Albert at the present time there were people of German descent. I maintain that that is correct. Here are the names of some of the places: Laird, Waldheim, and Rosthern, which are practically solidly German, and then north of Saskatoon are Hepburn, Hague, Mennon, Langham, Osler and Dalmeny, practically all solid German. The statement that I endeavoured to make was that by virtue of these people being placed as they were in a block in Prince Albert, and similarly to the north of Saskatoon city, it was practically impossible for them to nominate one of their own people. As to referring to them in any way as foreigners or people who are not loyal to Canadian institutions, I went out of my way, and there is no distance to which I would not go, to uphold these people as Canadian citizens. But I do not know of any instance in my memory in which any hon. member in this house or out of it went further than the hon. member for Humboldt when he tried by the greatest stretch of imagination to suggest that I considered that the French were foreigners.

Mr. TOTZKE: I did not say that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If my memory is correct, those are the very words of the hon. member. There is no hon. member in this house or out of it with a higher estimation of the fine qualities of our French-Canadians and of the French in the old land than I have. Not only have I every reason to know them in the constituency of Prince Albert but I also had the good luck to meet many of them in very close association in the motherland, and I assure the hon. member for Humboldt that I could not imagine a greater difference between the broadmindedness, the love of country, the generosity and heroism of those people in their motherland, and the spirit that prompted him to insinuate what he has tried to into the remarks that I made this afternoon. I made no distinction between the Anglo-Saxon in the northern part—

Mr. TOTZKE: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member has accused me of saying that the French-Canadians in that constituency were foreigners. I did not say that. I said he had said these people of German extraction in the southern portion of Prince Albert were being put into the new seat so they would be with people of their own kind. I made no statement as to them being classed as foreigners.

The CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of order.

Mr. TOTZKE: It is a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member cannot correct speeches.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I made it clear I was referring to that block of people of German descent as against people in the northern part of the constituency who were French, Ukrainian, Scandinavian, and other people who lived in harmony, and are doing everything they can to make that one of the best sections in Canada.

Mr. TOTZKE: If I am not allowed to say anything on a question of privilege, I must say we are in committee and I have the right to reply.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may answer.

Mr. TOTZKE: I wish to repeat that I did not say the hon. member had referred to French-Canadians as foreigners. I distinctly said, with regard to his remarks in connection with moving the people of German extraction from the southern portion of Prince Albert into this new seat which was being created, that it was for the purpose of putting them with people of their own kind, in order that they might be able to nominate one of their own people to represent them in this House of Commons. I was simply showing that they were not the same kind of people as those to which he had referred in the southern portion of Prince Albert. In that portion of Saskatchewan the people do not want to be put into situations of that kind. They want to live together in peace and harmony. They do live together in peace and harmony out there. They are among the best citizens of Canada, and the younger generation are growing up to love this country as their own. If at any time anything disparaging is said in this house concerning those people I for one will be on my feet to defend them to the best of my ability.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): It has been amusing to sit in this committee from eleven o'clock this morning and to listen to the words of hon. members opposite concerning that which they have been pleased to term the gerrymandering of 1932-33. While perhaps it may be very elevating to hear the expressions of high idealism from broadminded men who wish to redistribute the constituencies of Canada so that they will be perfectly fair to all members, one is led to wonder how fragile the memories of hon. members opposite must be. The hon. member for Regina referred to what took place in the constituency of Portage la Prairie in an effort to defeat the election to the House of Commons of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. It was my privilege to go through that elongated constituency and to see for myself some of the things that were done. If the right hon. gentleman who has bewailed so bitterly what has taken place in Prince Albert would obtain a map of the province of Manitoba as it was prepared in the redistribution of 1923-24, he would see how far his idealism and chivalry to opponents carried him at that time.

To my personal knowledge the same agent who went out from the city of Ottawa to the constituency of Portage la Prairie to arrange that redistribution passed through all the constituencies in northern Ontario. I had the privilege of meeting the gentleman in my home town, although he did not know to whom he was talking at the time. He was accompanied by other political leaders of the north, members from the Timiskamings, East and West Algoma and Port Arthur. If the right hon. gentleman wishes to know where the word "gerrymander" really got its pernicious meaning he should come to northern Ontario and I will show him. I will show him what took place in 1924. If hon. members opposite want to know where the hon. member who invented the jig saw puzzle obtained his ideas, let them come to northern Ontario, and they will find out.

Mr. BRADETTE: Where?

Mr. NICHOLSON: In Timiskaming.

Mr. BRADETTE: Not in Timiskaming; I object to that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let the hon. member possess his soul in peace for a few moments, and I shall show him what took place in South Timiskaming in 1924. Why did a change take place? Because this gentleman who went out from the city of Ottawa had specific instructions to make the Timiskamings safe, regardless of what he did. "Make it impossible to elect a member in East Algoma. Hive the Tories in West Algoma, and make it impossible to elect a Conservative member in Port Arthur." If the committee will bear with me I will read some of the descriptions from the statute passed as a result of that redistribution. Let us first take West Algoma:

> Algoma West consisting of those parts of the territorial districts of Algoma and Sudbury . . .

Note the expression "the territorial districts of Algoma and Sudbury." We have heard some discussions this afternoon with regard to members having to go fifty, sixty or seventy miles out of their way to reach parts of their constituencies. Let me indicate what is involved in the designation I have read. We find the term "parts of the territorial districts of Algoma and Sudbury." In order for the hon. member for West Algoma to get into the district of Sudbury he has to cross the district of East Algoma. There is no point in West Algoma which was contiguous, within one hundred miles, to the district of Sudbury. And to reach the points within the district of Sudbury which were taken out of East Algoma and added to West Algoma and, in order to carry out the instruction to make it impossible for a Conservative member to be elected in East Algoma, what did the hon. member for West Algoma have to do? He had to travel one hundred and seventy-two miles, one hundred and sixty of which were in East Algoma or in Nipissing, going southwesterly all the time. Then he had to travel one hundred and seventy-two miles northwesterly to reach that point which it was desired should be taken out of East Algoma. But there were other points in East Algoma which were to be put in with West Algoma, and in order for the hon. member for West Algoma to reach them he had to go back one hundred and seventy-two miles, travel up the Canadian Northern railway one hundred and eighty miles through parts of the district of Nipissing—South Timiskaming, as it was gerrymandered into in 1924—and East Algoma.

Let me follow that up. This is the further designation with regard to West Algoma—I shall not read the whole of it because it takes nearly a whole page in the statutes:

> . . . the township of Dowsley, thence east along the north boundary of the township of Dowsley to the northeastern boundary of the township of Ebbs, thence south along the east boundary of the township of Ebbs to the northwestern boundary of the township of Doherty, thence east along the northern boundary of the township of Doherty to the northeastern boundary of the township of Shanley but not including the village of Hornepayne.

Perhaps this is the illustration that will best indicate the chivalry and fairness that was exercised in the 1924 redistribution. The village of Hornepayne lies completely inside the township and within the district of West Algoma. But it comprised a population that it was thought could be influenced to vote Liberal, while in the rest of the township was a population that might vote Conservative. They could not get a sieve fine enough to run these two groups of people through and get the Liberals into Port Arthur and the Conservatives into West Algoma, so they picked up the village of Hornepayne and transferred it to Port Arthur. But they did not stop there. There was a part of West Algoma known as Michipicoten harbour and Michipicoten island, all within the district and constituency of West Algoma, about eighty miles by boat from the Soo, and containing such places as the Helen mine and Goudreau, by rail about 150 miles within the border of West Algoma. But there were some voters there who it was thought might be transferred to Port Arthur and influenced to vote there, so they too were transferred to Port Arthur. I will not stop to read them all. To get to that part of his constituency the hon. member for Port Arthur had either to charter a vessel and travel 350 miles down lake Superior or to travel 380 miles by rail.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? As he is discussing Timiskaming I assume he is familiar with the map as drawn at present. Is it not a fact that North Timiskaming is left exactly as it was in the 1924 redistribution, and South Timiskaming is left as it was with a very slight exception?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Either the hon. gentleman was not listening or I succeeded very badly in making myself clear. I was referring to South Timiskaming, East Algoma, West Algoma and Port Arthur. These were the four constituencies about which specific instructions were issued and to which special agents were sent right from Ottawa in 1924. Let me come back to that point about Michipicoten harbour and island, with about 180 voters that were transferred from West Algoma to Port Arthur—why? In the hope that a Conservative member could not be elected in Port Arthur; and they were taken out of West Algoma in order to increase the majority of my hon. friend the present member for West Algoma. As I stated, the member for Port Arthur had to travel 380 miles by rail to reach these points, of which the last 130 miles were through the territory of West Algoma.

Now I will just come to South Timiskaming. First of all the description starts:

> —consisting of that part of the territorial district of Timiskaming . . .

And then further down:

> —and that part of the territorial district of Sudbury—

Now, what is it necessary for a member representing South Timiskaming to do in order to get into that part of the territorial district of Sudbury, and why was that change made? Nipissing in 1921 had a majority of almost 6,000 for the Liberal candidate. Timiskaming was a closed constituency.

Mr. BRADETTE: It was a new riding.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was desired to make it impossible for a Conservative to be elected in South Timiskaming, but they missed their guess; they forgot that W. A. Gordon lived in South Timiskaming. But that is not the point. In order that a candidate or member could get into that part of the district of Sudbury designated here it was necessary to travel from Haileybury to North Bay, at least 100 miles, and then travel through the district of Nipissing again for another hundred miles to get into that corner of those townships that were bordering right on the city where the Liberal member lived, the city of Sudbury. That was the case with regard to South Timiskaming; it has been corrected, I understand, although I have not checked it up.

Let me come back for a moment to East Algoma. Without reading the designation, which takes up almost a page, I will just pass along:

—the projection southerly of the east boundary of the township of Plummer Additional and running north to and along the east boundary of the said township and of the line of townships lying north thereof to the south boundary of the 21st range of townships . . .

When Algoma was divided after the 1901 census the line between West and East Algoma ran straight north from Georgian bay. But it happened that the member for East Algoma from 1917 to 1921 lived in that part of the riding where he has lived for the whole of his adult life. He happened to be interested in three fairly large saw mills employing from 1,000 to 1,500 men all the year round, and living thereabouts. Something had to be done to correct a situation of that kind. The Conservative member lived there; the Conservative candidate lived there. That would never do. So they ran this line to the south boundary of the 21st range of townships and thence east along the said south boundary to a point directly south of the southeast corner of the township of Lackner. What did they do by that? They simply took out four little towns in three townships, the town of Chapleau, in which I live, and Devon, Nicholson and Dalton, where my saw mills, or those in which I am interested, are, and where the people I employ happen to live. That is what my right hon. friend will designate as chivalry towards political opponents, the high idealism that demands that constituencies be distributed fairly and equally amongst representatives in the House of Commons. I commend the ideal, Mr. Chairman; that certainly is the attitude that should prevail, but I just ask my right hon. friend to search his memory and ask his friends who were on that committee to search their memories and recall the instructions that were given to the solicitor in the city of Ottawa who traversed these constituencies east and west and stopped off at all points of interest to see what could be done to gerrymander members out of their seats, and then make another speech and tell the house what a real gerrymander is. We used to hear of Sir John Macdonald stating in answer to Sir Richard Cartwright regarding gerrymanders that if he lived another ten years he would gerrymander him again. And I have no doubt that if my right hon. friend were to have the opportunity ten years from now he would gerrymander again. Taking the picture I know to have existed in northern Ontario and realizing what was done, Sir John Macdonald would consider himself as a gerrymanderer to be a perfect piker, to use the common phrase; he would say, "I know nothing about the task, refer me to those who committed that gerrymander of 1924."

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): I am rather glad my hon. friend has turned the discussion to the province of Ontario. This afternoon and evening we have listened with a great deal of patience to a discussion of the redistribution of seats in the province of Saskatchewan. I feel that something should be said with regard to what I consider to be the greatest unfairness in representation in any province of the Dominion of Canada, that is, the disproportion of representation in the province of Ontario. The bill we are considering is the result of the meditations of a committee of hon. members of this house, who I think have worked laboriously for some time. That there is decided disagreement on the part of members of the committee none will deny, and to me the cause of that disagreement is quite apparent. From the discussion during the time the committee was sitting, as well as the discussion to which we have listened here, it seems to me that personal considerations for members of this house, as well as political considerations, have taken up altogether too much time, while the consideration of fair representation for the municipalities has not been given enough time. After all it is our duty, whether we be in this house or on a committee, to follow the British North America Act and every ten years, after the decennial census, to try to rearrange the ridings of the dominion so that the voters will have a fair say, and not so that those now in parliament will have safe seats. After this parliament is over not a single one of us will have a seat or any claim on one; the most we will have will be the right to represent some party at the polls and to ask the people for their suffrage. I am not a particle interested in whether the last distribution was as bad as this distribution; the fact remains that the committee did come to an agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Not wholly.

Mr. MALCOLM: My right hon. friend says there was some difference, but certainly this redistribution, as I am prepared to show, is just about as bad as it could be if you are thinking of the rights of the electors in the province of Ontario. I have compiled two or three sets of figures to which I should like to refer. The average of population in the ridings in Ontario should be about 40,000. But while it is fair that one man should have as much say in the administration of the country as another man there is another factor in addition to population which must not be ignored, and that is the number of votes polled. I believe the men who think enough of their franchise to go to the polls have a greater right to consideration than those who do not vote. There is also the question of the geographic problems in some of the very large ridings. Therefore every redistribution committee has to agree to some extent that the urban population, which does not vote in the same percentage as the rural population, should have a larger unit of population than the rural seats.

Mr. TURNBULL: Is the hon. gentleman referring only to the province of Ontario now?

Mr. MALCOLM: I am dealing with the province which I represent.

Mr. TURNBULL: That is not correct so far as our province is concerned.

Mr. MALCOLM: It has been generally agreed in the province of Ontario that a smaller unit of population in the rural districts was fair for the reason that it was easier for the candidates to work a city seat, and also because in a city riding not such a large percentage of the voters come out on polling day. Even allowing for these factors, may I point to a few cases and ask where any fairness exists in regard to the unit of population? I see my hon. friend from Lincoln sitting opposite. Lincoln takes in the town of St. Catharines and a very prosperous farming area surrounding it. The riding of Kent takes in the city of Chatham and the very prosperous country surrounding it. These ridings, along with North Waterloo—which takes in the city of Kitchener and a very rich agricultural district—each have about 53,000 electors, and they each poll in the neighbourhood of 25,000 votes. On the other hand, in the centre of this province we have two members from the county of Brant and the city of Brantford. The county of Brant polled only 9,000 votes, while the city of Brantford polled 15,000 votes. So it takes two citizens of Lincoln or Kent or North Waterloo to equal one citizen in the county of Brant. I see my hon. friend from Kingston opposite; his is a purely city riding with 26,000 electors, just half the number in some of the other seats in the province.

I must say that bearing these facts in mind this seems an unfair redistribution. I am not blaming the members of the committee at all; I am blaming every man in this house. The chairman of the committee may reply that this is what we did at the last redistribution, but that is no excuse for doing it a second time. Here we have ridings like Kingston, with 26,000 voters, polling 11,000 votes; Brantford with 32,000 voters polling 15,000 votes; Toronto East with 69,000 voters polling 19,000 votes, and Toronto South, with 46,000 voters, only polling 7,000 votes. Then we have the township of Brant with 21,000 voters polling 9,000; North and South Bruce, with 21,000 or 22,000 voters polling 10,000 or 11,000 votes. In contrast we have the district of Nipissing, in a part of Canada which is growing rapidly due to the expansion of the mining industry. Under this bill there will be 70,000 people in that constituency, and at the last election they polled 23,000 votes. I agree with my hon. friend from East Algoma that the difficulties in such ridings as the Algomas and the Nipissings are very great; the people are scattered along the railway line and candidates must travel many miles in order to get to their constituents. At the same time the Algomas have 37,000 or 38,000 people, which is a bit too much having regard to the physical and geographic problems which exist.

I have no complaint to make with regard to the taking away of a seat from the counties of Grey and Bruce, making three seats instead of four. As a result of that division the representation of these seats will be from 32,000 to 35,000. I do submit, however, this one thought: While it is perfectly fair to put the unit of representation in my county at 35,000 I am far from satisfied when I see another county smaller than mine, which a candidate can cover in two hours in an automobile left unchanged while I must travel 120 miles to cover the length of my riding, and must use horse-drawn vehicles during some seasons of the year.

I believe that this redistribution in Ontario —and I have said this to my hon. friend from West Middlesex who represented the party to your left, Mr. Chairman—should have brought about a greater change in order to give a more equitable distribution of the voting power of this province. After all I think we are doing too much counting what the results of the 1926 and 1930 elections happened to be; we are wasting too much time counting up what various townships gave in Conservative, Liberal or Progressive votes. As I see it our task is to try to get some equality in regard to representation, and as representatives of the people I hardly think it is good enough for us to be satisfied providing the redistribution suits certain members of the house and makes certain seats safe. I think if the Ontario committee had really wanted to do so it could have made ten or twenty changes which would have brought the average unit close to 40,000 instead of having the list start at the top with 18,000 in some ridings and wind up at the bottom of the list with ridings like Welland, with 82,000, and Nipissing with 70,000. It does seem to me that the public have a right to a more equitable representation than they are getting. I would say also, that the representation of a riding with five votes on the list for every vote polled would not justify putting two seats in this riding. It just happens that the ridings which in my opinion are worst sinned against are the ridings in which the people poll a very large percentage of the votes on the list.

Someone, I believe the hon. member for East Algoma, was speaking a little while ago as to what had taken place in the last redistribution. I hardly think there has been a sufficiently marked change to indicate that the last redistribution could have been quite as bad as the hon. gentleman almost suggests it was. A great many of these seats in Ontario are fairly well represented; with respect to probably two thirds of them one can take no particular exception because they are as close to the unit of population as they can be while still preserving county boundaries. But I do submit to the chairman of the committee and to the house that as between, on the one hand, fully 8 or 10 seats in Ontario which are polling only 8,000 or 9,000 votes, and on the other hand 8 or 10 seats which are polling from 22,000 to 25,000 votes, there is a gulf which does not indicate very good work on the part of this or of past redistribution committees. I suggest that now this matter is before the house for consideration we should be well advised to observe county boundaries more fully than we have done, to increase representation in a good many of the districts which are overpopulated and to make some changes in those which are under-populated.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Just a very few words in reply to my hon. friend from North Bruce, who seems very much disturbed about the fact that a large proportion of the electorate do not go to the polls. I submit that the way to deal with such people is not by a redistribution of constituencies based upon the number of people who vote at the polls; it seems to me that any action along that line is bound to result in confusion and is entirely contrary to the principles of the British North America Act. If my hon. friend is consistent —and I am not suggesting that he is not—he ought to be in favour of compulsory voting—

Mr. MALCOLM: I am, very much so.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —and should bring in a bill. But until something of that kind is done I submit that we cannot deal with the matter in this indirect, haphazard, uncertain way as suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. member knows that that is always taken into consideration to some extent.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The number of votes polled?

Mr. MALCOLM: That is the reason for the larger representation.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Under the law it cannot on any principle be taken into consideration. That comes under the election act.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend knows that we have a larger unit for the urban seats.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): But that is under a different principle; there are such questions to be considered as the ease with which the member can represent his constituency, the greater extent to which a city constituency is in touch with public opinion and can reflect its opinion and wishes in the house. My hon. friend spoke about the city of Kingston, which has a comparatively small population. Let me point out that in the last redistribution, when hon. gentlemen opposite got through, the city of Kingston had a population of only 24,104, but the adjoining constituency, which is rural, made up of Frontenac and Addington, had 30,696.

Mr. MALCOLM: I said that two blacks did not make a white.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): But this black is not as black as my hon. friend would have it painted. Let me tell him that when the adjustment was made in the last redistribution, so far as Kingston was concerned, we urged that part of the county of Frontenac or the whole of it be put with the city of Kingston; but my hon. friends over there would not listen to it. Instead, they combined the two counties of Frontenac and Addington, which had nothing in common, and left the city of Kingston as it was with this small population.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not think that anyone should make a statement in this house regarding what was represented at the last redistribution in committee. There is not a word of evidence to prove what took place in the committee, and therefore no statement can be either substantiated or denied. The statement which the minister is making is not the statement that was made to me, and inasmuch as the committee did come to an agreement I think the minister will almost admit that there was a good deal of unanimity if that unanimity was not complete.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They did not come to an agreement until afterwards.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes; I know my hon. friend was called in at the last to try to bring things together.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In answer to my hon. friend—

Mr. MALCOLM: I say there is no evidence.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —I may tell him that his leader has to-day been making statements as to what took place and what was urged upon the committee.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am not excusing anyone.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And the hon. member for Melville has even been quoting the statements of a dead man. Now, let us get back to Kingston.

Mr. MALCOLM: And Brant.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, I will come to Brant. With regard to Kingston, I was observing that the two counties of Frontenac and Addington, which had nothing in common municipally, were put together, with the result that there was a large discrepancy between this urban and this rural seat. But I submit that it is not well every ten years to disturb an area in which there has been a redistribution in the previous decade, and to do anything in the city of Kingston now you would have to rearrange the whole map that was rearranged ten years ago—

Mr. MALCOLM: That is what we do it for.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —and that would be very disturbing. Let us come now to Brant and Brantford. At the last redistribution it was urged that these might be put together, but my hon. friends would not consider it.

Mr. MALCOLM: We don't know that.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do, and I can tell my hon. friend that I will not make any statement which I do not know to be perfectly true.

Mr. MALCOLM: But it is a matter of memory purely.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, and my memory is good.

Mr. MALCOLM: But the other man thinks his memory is good too.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My memory is good and I can substantiate what I say. Now, there never has been a redistribution that has followed exactly the underlying principles which we all say should be adopted. There never has been a redistribution satisfactory to all concerned. Take each and every one of them and you will find just as glaring discrepancies as my hon. friend has pointed out to-night.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no province in Canada with as bad a spread in representation as Ontario, from 20,000 to 70,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It has a larger number of seats than any other province.

Mr. MALCOLM: Quite so, and the biggest spread.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend knows that the urban population has created a problem which is difficult to deal with. On the one hand we have the contention that you must not decrease rural representation, and on the other hand we have the contention that you must increase the urban representation. We have endeavoured to keep both these in mind and to give to cities an increase, though not such as they desire, while not disturbing too greatly county boundaries or conditions as we find them. Particularly have we endeavoured to avoid tearing up the map, as it were, where it had been all torn up only ten years ago and the electors in those areas which had been then disturbed had just got quietly settled down and had adapted themselves to the changed conditions. This has been described as a gerrymander, but let me say to my hon. friends that I have no confidence in gerrymanders. I do not believe either of the parties think that you can count on any definite advantage being gained in an election from a redistribution. I think the results of the last redistribution proved that quite clearly. In 1925, following the last redistribution, the advantages were certainly not in our favour. We went to the country with fifty members and came back with 117. I think it is perfectly clear that in these days and in these peculiar times you cannot count with any accuracy upon the results of a readjustment. After all, public opinion prevails. If my hon. friends think that as far as I am concerned or as far as this committee is concerned in this redistribution we have been primarily and principally concerned in endeavouring to secure some small, petty party advantage, which I think we will all agree is extremely doubtful, then they are absolutely mistaken. I ask my hon. friends to appreciate the difficulties which confronted us. There was the difference in the size of the counties, the desire to retain county boundaries and the desire to create as little disturbance as possible. I ask them to believe that we have accomplished as good, as fair, as reasonable and as equitable a redistribution as has ever been accomplished in the history of Canada.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Chairman, I just wish to make a correction in the remarks of the hon. member for North Bruce. If I heard him correctly, he intimated that his new riding would have approximately 35,000 people.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think I gave figures for three ridings, 32,900, 35,400 and 34,600.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the riding of the member for North Bruce is carried out according to the bill it will contain a population of 29,842 while if it is carried out according to a proposal which was made, it will have a population of 27,789. I understood the hon. member to say 35,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: I gave the figures for three ridings, and the 35,000 is for North Grey in which the city of Owen Sound is situated.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member with reference to South Toronto and I shall refer to city representations generally. While the committee was in session it was mentioned on many occasions that the two Brants should be put together. One of the reasons for this was that that county containing 53,000 odd contained the city of Brantford with a population of approximately 32,000. As a city member I know that the hon. member for Brantford City works very hard. A great deal of his time is taken up with correspondence in connection with the great industries located in that city. If my memory is correct, Brantford is the fourth largest manufacturing city in Canada. Having some fifty to sixty industries in my own riding I know full well what he must have to do to look after the requirements of the industries in his. A lot of people seem to think that a city member has nothing to do but my own experience is that I have to be here at nine o'clock in the morning and usually do not get away until twelve o'clock at night. If other city members work as I assume they do, they have lots to do.

The reason might be advanced that city voters do not vote. If my memory is correct, during the last elections approximately fifty per cent of the voters on the list in my riding voted. I represent a riding containing over 70,000 people. Many of these people say, "What is the use of going to the polls? The Conservative candidate will be elected anyway, and he does not need my vote." That is one of the reasons why the vote is frequently small in the cities. However, on the whole Canada stands up well with any nation in the world in the percentage of voters who vote. Something was said a moment ago about compulsory voting. I am opposed to compulsory voting and if it is ever brought up in the house I shall be prepared to advance many facts as arguments against such a method being adopted in this country. In the last general elections eighty-six per cent of the voters in North York voted. The percentage in the riding of Stormont was eighty-seven; in Kings eighty-nine. I see the hon. member for West Middlesex is checking these figures very carefully and I shall have to be careful because he agreed that if any constituency in Canada voted ninety per cent he would buy me a dinner. The percentage in the riding of Stanstead was ninety.

Mr. ELLIOTT: At this stage I think my hon. friend will admit that he is too high in his percentages.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not think I referred to these ridings before. I ask the hon. member to check them up as I may be a fraction too high. The percentage for Laval-Two Mountains was ninety and for Laprairie-Napierville, ninty-one. The percentage for the whole of Canada for the elections of 1930 was 76.1; for the elections of 1926, 70.1; for 1925, 68.7, and for 1921, 70.3. They have compulsory voting in Australia, the voters being fined when they do not vote. In the last general elections in that conutry, the vote ranged from ninety-one to ninety-four per cent. I think the people of Canada deserve a great deal of credit for the interest they take in elections and for the way they turn out to register their votes.

The hon. member referred to the last redistribution and seemed to think that nothing should be said about it. Under this redistribution, there will be no riding in Ontario as small as some of the ridings under the redistribution of 1924. The 1924 redistribution left South Perth with a population of 18,382; North Bruce, the hon. member's own riding, with a population of 20,872; South Bruce, with 23,413; North Wellington with 19,833; Argenteuil with 17,165; Bagot with 18,035 and Beauharnois with 19,888. The population of the constituencies ranged from the above to 76,858 in Jacques Cartier and 69,717 in Toronto East Centre. I noted carefully the hon. member's remarks in reference to the committee on Ontario, and as a member of that committee I have a right to defend myself against any unjust attacks. The smallest ridings laid out in the province of Ontario so far are the county of Haldimand with 21,428, and the county of Brant with 21,202. The ridings range from those figures up to 61,800 for one of the Ottawa seats and an average of 58,000 for the Toronto seats, although some of them are larger, and up to 66,943 for the county of Wentworth.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has my hon. friend the figures for Nipissing?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad the hon. gentleman has referred to Nipissing. There are two Nipissing ridings laid out in the bill, but whether they will go through in that form I do not know: one with a population of 40,000 and the other with 31,359, or if they are combined, the total population will be 71,359. We started out with the idea of taking out as few rural ridings as we possibly could, and I think that we have taken out fewer rural ridings than in any previous redistribution of which I have been able to get the figures. I believe that that fairly well answers the hon. member's objections as regards the city ridings, and his charge that the people of Canada do not exercise the franchise.

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The Minister of Public Works told us a few moments ago that redistribution creates disturbances in the constituencies, and that if it is left alone long enough people will settle down and will not be disturbed if they do not have a redistribution. Well, I was here at the last redistribution and we made a strong plea for the Niagara district. Our people are beginning to get tired because they have been settled down so long now on the basis of seeing some other counties electing from two to four members with the same population that gives us only one representative; it is time now to get some unsettling done. We have a population in the two counties of Lincoln and Welland of approximately 140,000, and there are two members. Kingston, as has been pointed out by the minister, has a population of 26,000. So one man's vote in that county is the same as two from my county or three votes from Welland. I ask if that is a fair deal.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, it is not.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Very well, if it is not fair, this house is not the place to settle it. You won't settle it here in six months. You have to do it in another way, and it has to be done more equitably than it is being done in this bill.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

What does a redistribution mean? Do you intend to be fair? Do you intend to give to one county a number of votes that will elect only half a member when the same number of votes in another county elects a member; or, if you cannot divide a member into two, with the same number of votes we elect one member and another county elects two. In the case of Welland the people have only one-third of a vote, and only half a vote in my county. I heard the Minister of Agriculture in the late government making an appeal to the Prime Minister to be fair. He could be fair. I ask him to be fair to people who have been settled down too long. We want to get unsettled.

Mr. J. F. FAFARD (L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in discussing the present bill before the house, I wish it to be well understood that I am not championing my own personal interests, which have no place in this debate, but I do ask that fairness be shown to those who did me an honour in choosing me to represent them in the house. I have no favour to ask, I simply request fair play for my fellow citizens of the county of L'Islet.

The measure under discussion provides for the annexation of the county of L'Islet to that of Montmagny with the exception of the parishes of St. Roch, Ste. Louise, St. Damase, Tourville and Ste. Perpétue of the old county of L'Islet, and the parishes of St. François and Berthier of the old county of Montmagny.

The counties of L'Islet and Montmagny were created in 1860, and their respective boundaries have always remained the same heretofore. I cannot see why it is necessary to carry out this change in 1933. This difference in population of 213 does not justify this change. L'Islet, in 1923, was thought sufficiently populated, and after an increase of 1,545 within the last ten years, it is found too small and sacrificed to create an English speaking constituency in the city of Montreal.

The county of Montmagny with a population of 20,239 is considered too small and it is sacrificed to form a new county which will be known as Chapleau, comprising a population of only 21,705 souls.

If we consider that the normal population of Montmagny is 22,000—that is according to the census of 1921—it is an outrage to suppress this county and create another having the same population and size. The reason given is that the city of Montreal has greatly increased and that, in the general interest, the counties of L'Islet and Montmagny must be annexed.

I greatly regret this decision; I should have preferred to see these old counties maintain their identity. However, if the general interest demands it, I accept the union, on condition that they be entirely merged and not cut up as the bill before the house intends to do.

Moreover, there is no reason to transfer parishes from one county or the other. The two counties united together form a population of 39,643, which is many thousands less than the unit fixed by the census of 1931. Besides, 50 per cent of the counties have a population of more than 40,000. To mention only the counties neighbouring Montmagny-L'Islet, we have, for instance, Témiscouata with a population of over 42,000; Beauce, with over 50,000; Charlevoix-Saguenay, with over 55,000; Chicoutimi, with over 55,000; Gaspé, with over 47,000; Lake St. John, with over 50,000; Matane, with over 48,000; Mégantic, with over 44,000; Nicolet, with over 47,000. This being the case, why not completely join together Montmagny and L'Islet, since they have less than 40,000 population?

If the wedding of these two counties is thought necessary in the interest of the country, as a whole, let us celebrate it in an atmosphere of peace, friendship and harmony, so that the union may have beneficial results to the people of the two counties united. Preserving their closely bound parochial, provincial and judicial institutions, they will live together in an atmosphere of peace, harmony and prosperity. By removing from the county of L'Islet the parishes of St. Roch, Ste. Louise, St. Damase, Tourville and St. Perpétue, you place in the county of Kamouraska parishes which belonged to the judiciary district of Montmagny, and the parish of St. Pamphile will be so situated that the people of that parish will be unable to reach their principal town or the St. Lawrence river without passing through Kamouraska county.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Just as it was, previously, in the county of Montmagny, as regards Bellechasse.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I regret, sir, that I was not consulted in this affair. I have been in the house one of the longest, and I was entitled, I think, to a better treatment from my opponents. The only compromise which was suggested to me through our representative, last Thursday, was the following: If you wish to accept the changes proposed in the bill, we are willing to remove the parish of St. Pamphile, where you have a minority of 130 votes, and the parish of Tourville, where you also have a minority of 30 votes, and place them in the county of Kamouraska.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Will the hon. member permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): My reply to such a bargain was not long forthcoming. I felt insulted, because it was contrary to the principle I had laid down: that both counties be completely annexed. I had no desire to accept such an offer because I am attached to these parishes. St. Pamphile is a colonization parish which has grown before my eyes. The majority of these people vote against me, nevertheless, I visit them every year and I am very fond of them.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): You have a liberal heart.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Another reason for my refusal is that I want the people of those counties to see the injustice and infamy you are perpetrating under pretence of justice.

Were I to consider only the political and personal advantage gained by it, I would be tempted to accept this offer, but why disturb the municipal, provincial and judicial institutions of a county, when the thing is not justifiable and is unnecessary? Why disorganize our institutions when unity and cooperation is needed? The citizens of these two counties have grown, worked and prospered together. Since 1860, these counties have grown side by side, they have their municipal and provincial governments, they have their agricultural and cooperative societies. If you transfer parishes from either one or the other county, you disorganize them in every way. Take, for instance, the parishes of St.-Roch, St-Louise, St-Damase, Tourville and Ste-Perpétue; in provincial matters they will belong to three counties: Kamouraska, L'Islet and Montmagny; in municipal matters, they will cease to be part of L'Islet and its council. The warden of the county of L'Islet will find himself in the county of Kamouraska. There will be a complete disorganization in connection with farming.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The county council is a provincial matter and not federal.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Will the hon. member maintain order.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Were I to maintain order, I would, first, tell the hon. member not to read his speech.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): He is reading figures.

Mr. ST. PERE (Translation): As many members do.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): When the hon. member is chairman, he may then give his opinion as to the correct procedure to follow. The hon. member might regret it, should I set aside my notes.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Let the hon. member set them aside.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I stated a moment ago that the agricultural societies would be completely disorganized and would cease to function. The president of the agricultural society of L'Islet would, in the future, reside in the county of Kamouraska. There is another reason which might bespeak in favour of the complete annexation of the two counties. As the hon. member for Montmagny is well aware, farmers who are members of the society of agriculture, gather, at various seasons, at parish exhibitions. What will happen? A large number of the people of the old parishes of the county of L'Islet will no further be able to meet their friends. They will no doubt meet people as honest and friendly, however, a certain aloofness will exist in discussing farming questions.

As I stated at the outset of my remarks, the reasons which prompt me to protest against this bill are on a much higher plane than the political and personal interests of the two members. I am convinced—that is, I was—that the feelings that move me will be shared by the hon. member for Montmagny, known for his impartiality and broad-mindedness, and especially looked upon as the champion of minorities. I am convinced that after listening to the reasons given, he will wish for an intact Montmagny united to an intact L'Islet.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I have no objection.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I feel confident that after thinking it over he will recall that in the parishes, for instance, of St-François and Berthier, at the last election, a minority of 255 conservatives voted and placed their trust in him. They were the ones who elected him in Montmagny, because his majority was 222 votes.

I shall even go further: in 1904, the hon. member for Montmagny was a highly gifted young man, with great resources, he came forward in politics bearing the standard of Laurier. The liberals of Berthier and St. François cast their votes in his favour. He polled both the conservative and liberal votes in these two parishes, and I now wonder whether, after thinking it over, the hon. member will cast aside the weapon that these people gave him in 1904, which permitted him to pass many years in political life, and which again they gave him in 1930, or whether he will now turn it against them.

Political life has a certain attraction; however, I would rather withdraw from it than be false to my people.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): All of us were elected by people who trusted us. Let us not betray them whatever may be our political standard. We were sent here to represent our counties and not to cut them up. Let us be just, if we wish that justice be done to us. If the government persists in its policy, the public will soon note that the conservatives are panic stricken because, it is an extraordinary thing, the members opposite hardly wish to have anything to do with their constituencies this year; they would like to remove all those who heard them deliver speeches or make election promises.

This discussion, sir, cannot last very long, let us remember that when this Parliament is dissolved, the two present members of the counties of Montmagny and L'Islet, will equally disappear. Unless chosen by the convention, they cannot be candidates. Let us suppose that the hon. member for Montmagny is chosen by the convention—and I most heartily wish that he will be so favoured—I am certain that he would be more at ease, if he were able to state, from the hustings, that he championed the cause of minorities against a hostile majority. If my hon. friend, for personal reasons, decided to quit the political arena, he would equally be more satisfied in quitting the arena where he shone, thinking that he was true to the county that had placed their trust in him and that he had proved himself the champion of minorities.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation). Hear! hear!

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): After all, political life is too short to soil it with one's personal aims. It is better to quit than to betray those who elected us. At least we would leave to future generations a reputation of honest men who perferred sacrifice to betrayal —because it is indeed a betrayal to use the weapon entrusted to us by the people to stab them in the back. It is not too late to remedy the evil, and that is why I place my grievances before the house previous to the discussion of the various appendixes of the bill, assuring the hon. member for Montmagny and the government, generally, that should it decide to maintain the two counties of Montmagny and L'Islet, as a whole, the question will soon be settled, because the unanimous support of this side of the house will be assured.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I listened with much attention and interest to the hon. member for L'Islet. I regret that he did not disclose his views sooner. I first wish to inform him that I never went near the committee on redistribution and took no hand in the rearrangement of the counties.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): You should have attended to your own county.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I shall attend to yours next time.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I invite you and shall expect you.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Very well. With your leave, sir, we shall continue the debate without being interrupted by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Brasset) on a subject with which he is not acquainted.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I am better acquainted with your county than you are.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I have no objection in preserving the old county of Montmagny such as it is—none. I have known the people of St.-François and Berthier for 30 years and I greatly regret their leaving me, although the large majority of them vote against me. I can well understand the attitude of the hon. member for L'Islet, I was told, however, that L'Islet had to be divided. I am sorry for it. It perhaps gives me as much sorrow as it does to the hon. member for L'Islet—perhaps, a little less, because I consider that my hands are clean in receiving in the county of Montmagny former voters of L'Islet.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): You soil them in chasing the vote away.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I am chasing no one away from my county and when the hon. member makes such a statement, he speaks of something about which he knows nothing.

The county of L'Islet must be rearranged.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri) (Translation): No, the county of Montmagny must be rearranged.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I shall refer to this later. If L'Islet must be cut up, I am willing to agree that it be cut in two halves. I think it is only fair. If L'Islet must be cut up—which I regret—we must give part of it to Kamouraska and part of it to Montmagny. A number of my constituents wrote to me on the subject and I always replied to them that I had nothing to do with the rearrangement of these counties, and all members in the house are aware of it.

I shall now make an offer to the hon. member for L'Islet. We agree on the fact that the figures given by the committee show that the county of Montmagny L'Islet comprises 30,800 people and the counties of L'Islet and Kamouraska also 30,800 people. The hon. member for L'Islet, with cause, does not wish to divide L'Islet. I agree with him. I am willing to propose that the county of L'Islet be not cut up but that it be annexed to Kamouraska.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Why not annex L'Islet to Montmagny?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Why not annex Kamouraska to L'Islet?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): It is because you are afraid.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I pass for a coward, such is my reputation; especially when the hon. member for St-Denis (Mr. Denis) speaks, I then shiver with fright, and feel feverish!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Do not try to be smart, you are too old for that.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I do not have to be smart, the hon. member could not understand me. I call the hon. member to order; he should address himself to the chair. He has been long enough in the house to know the rules

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I have not been here as long as you have, however, I am less pretentious.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): With cause.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): We could count the stupidities, you say.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Those of the hon. member for St-Denis are countless.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Yes, because there are none to account for.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I again, sir, make my offer. The hon. member for L'Islet does not admit that it is acceptable. He does not want, with cause, the annexation of L'Islet to Kamouraska. Why annex it to Montmagny and create a county comprising a population of 40,000, when adjacent to it there is a county of 20,000 people only? If L'Islet must be split up, let us divide it equally between Montmagny and Kamouraska. It would be a fair division; otherwise, we shall have Kamouraska with 20,000 population and Montmagny L'Islet with 40,000 and more. I therefore state: Why not wholly annex it to Kamouraska? My hon. friend from L'Islet does not want that and he is quite right.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I never made that statement.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): You are willing to annex L'Islet, as a whole, to Montmagny.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): If you will allow me to make the redistribution I shall do so and quite satisfactorily to myself.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): If the hon. member will keep the right proportions. It will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): If the hon. member wishes to put me in charge of the redistribution, I shall accept and it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member is fully aware that I cannot do that no more than I can take charge of it myself. He is equally aware that I kept away from the committee so that I might not be asked to make suggestions. He is further aware that changes must be made in certain counties because of the decrease in the number of rural counties; therefore, I wish to state, that he may keep the county of L'Islet intact, if he wishes, as I have no objection, and I am ready to second him if he wishes to annex it entirely to Kamouraska.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Who issues the orders in this respect?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I do not know, I issue no orders.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Who told him that?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): It must be the committee.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Who told the hon. member that the county was to be split up?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I have just read the bill and have noted the fact. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) can read, he therefore can examine the bill as I did.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I can read but I thought, perhaps, the hon. member withheld a little secret.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I am not withholding any little secret. The hon. member for Témiscouata, perhaps, knows that in my career I have been keeping a little secret. Does he wish me to tell him?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have no objection.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): It refers to the time he begged of me to see that no Tory came forward against him, in his first election.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Yes, I wish to thank the hon. member for it. I have never forgotten his kindness and that is the reason why I have never spoken against him in Montmagny.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The hon. member's proposal is to annex the county of L'Islet to the county of Kamouraska. In the course of the debates of the house, we often listened to the beautiful patriotic views expressed by the hon. member as well as by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger). Would it not be apropos to unite the counties of Montmagny and Bellechasse and we would then have the finest abode for patriotism in Quebec.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I shall prove that I am more sincere than many other members. I am ready to accept your offer and perhaps the hon. member for Bellechasse would not have any better or warmer partisan than I would be.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): I fully appreciate your kind words.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Turn-coat!

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): All I have to say to the hon. member for St. Denis, is that when my coat is soiled I clean it.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): When it is very warm the coat is discarded.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I am willing to accept the offer of the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier). If hon. members think that I am very anxious to represent a county in this house, they are mistaken; I would be better off at my office. If it were a case of annexing the county of Montmagny to that of Bellechasse, I would be very willing to accept. I do not wish to be more frank than that. Now, if the county of L'Islet must disappear, there is just as good a reason to annex it to Kamouraska as to Montmagny.

The hon. member stated a moment ago that the council of the county meets at Montmagny; that is absolutely under the jurisdiction of the province. Federal redistribution in no way affects the county councils. If the hon. member for L'Islet wishes to be candid, he will agree with me. If his county must be divided—which I regret—should we not rearrange it, as much as possible, so as to establish an average of 30,800 people in Kamouraska and in L'Islet, respectively? That is what the committee endeavoured to do. I think that this reckoning is quite fair. If it is not to be split up, then let us annex it to Kamouraska. I am sure that the two members will feel satisfied because they are fair, they hold the same views, the same policy, the same ideas and they would be glad to come to an understanding. As to the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Henri, I accept it. I still have enough heart—

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Oh! Oh!

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The member for St. Denis—

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I think you are a hypocrite.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): We know from whose lips such nonsense is uttered.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I am sincere, because I am not continuously changing politics as you do.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the insults of the member for St. Denis do me honour and, the more I am insulted by people of his stamp, the more I should be considered worthy by my fellow citizens. I shall close my remarks in stating that if the county of L'Islet is to be divided, I certainly did not request it. More than that, if it be possible, I am ready to agree that the county of Montmagny be annexed to the county of Bellechasse. If the county of L'Islet must be divided, I think it should be equally divided, one half going to Montmagny, the other to Kamouraska.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The counties are being sawed off.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to sincerely thank the hon. member for Montmagny for having been so fair-minded with reference to the proposals I made to the house. I think that I must have expressed myself wrongly, because I never intended to say that the hon. member had soiled his mandate. If such was the impression gathered from my remarks, they were wrongly interpreted, and I regret it. As to the county of L'Islet, we agree on one score, that the county be not divided but, as a whole, annexed to another county. For the sake of comparison, I was taking the description we find in the bill where it is proposed to partly annex the county of L'Islet to the county of Montmagny. I based my argument on this information because it is so stated in the bill. However, even if L'Islet is, as a whole, annexed to Montmagny, there is still a population of less than 40,000—namely, 39,643—when 50 per cent of the counties in the province have a much larger population than that.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That would only leave Kamouraska with about 22,000 people, which is a very small county, adjacent to a large county comprising Montmagny and L'Islet. It matters little to me, I did not appear at the committee or go near it, and when I was asked my views, I refused to give them.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): The hon. member is rather lucky that he was asked his views, they did not approach me. I greatly regret that they intend to blot out Montmagny which had a population of 22,000, in 1921, so to replace it by Chapleau which has a smaller population.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): So as to make the case clear and inform the house what was the proposal made by this side, may I read to the house the following letter:

Ottawa, April 27, 1933.

Mr. Charles Dorion, K.C., M.P.,
Chairman of the Sub-committee on the Redistribution for the Province of Quebec.
House of Commons, Ottawa.

My dear colleague,

After seriously considering the question of redistribution of the constituencies in the province of Quebec, I have come to the conclusion that it would be preferable to follow the system adopted during the last forty years and to carry out the least changes possible in the rearrangement of counties. There are a number of them over which the committee have agreed.

There are, however, natural problems which thrust themselves upon us, as for instance, the disposal of counties whose population is less than the approximative unit, fictitiously or otherwise established—for rural counties also as to the number of divisions to be given to Montreal.

When two counties immediately contiguous are to disappear, as separate counties, they should be entirely merged, as in the case of l'Islet and Montmagny. When a county which should be eliminated is surrounded by other counties not having the electoral quota as laid down, its complete merging should be carried out with the contiguous county which offers the least difficulties both as to their topography and complete merging.

As to Montreal, the existing condition should prevail so far as the boundaries of the divisions are concerned. Naturally the increase in population of the island of Montreal entitles it to an increase in representation. Such an increase should be foreseen both for the western and eastern parts of the island.

The boundaries of the Montreal divisions should not extend outside of the island.

Yours truly,

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): By whom is this letter signed?

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier - Outremont) (Translation): By myself, as representative of the Liberal party in the sub-committee on the redistribution of the province of Quebec. I naturally submitted this letter to my two colleagues and we established a policy which we advocate and desire the house to adopt, that when there is to be a merging of the two counties, this merger should be carried out, as a whole. In the case under discussion, we have two counties L'Islet and Montmagny, which have at present a population of 39,643.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Merged.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier - Outremont) (Translation): Merged. The hon. member for Montmagny does not contest these figures?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): No, I just wanted to get the information.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier - Outremont) (Translation): I closely followed the speeches made on the subject and I find the situation as follows: it is intended to eliminate in L'Islet and Montmagny a Liberal majority of 585 votes, and transfer them to the adjacent counties, which are overwhelmingly Liberal and do not need these votes. Why not carry out the integral amalgamation of these two counties? The hon. member for Montmagny, for some reason unknown, states that the county of L'Islet must be rearranged.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I am not the one who made that statement.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier - Outremont) (Translation): You stated that you were willing to keep intact the county of Montmagny but that, for one reason or another, the county of L'Islet had to be rearranged.

[Mr. J. A. Mercier.]

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Because Montreal is given new counties.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier - Outremont) (Translation): The merging of the two counties is necessary. The population of both counties is less than the unit of representation and, therefore, an amalgamation must be carried out just as it must be worked out between certain counties in the Montreal district.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The amalgamation could be worked out just as well with Kamouraska.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier - Outremont) (Translation): I will discuss this matter in a moment. The counties which must be eliminated, according to the figures of this population, are Yamaska, Bagot, Beauharnois, and Laprairie, Napierville all in the Montreal district, and the county of L'Islet. The population of the counties of L'Islet and Montmagny joined together is not too large to prevent them being amalgamated. The population of Montmagny and L'Islet together comprises 39,643 people and, while the neighbouring county, Gaspé, has a population of 47,160.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): A rather remote neighbour.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier - Outremont) (Translation): In the same district.

The county of Kamouraska has a population of 30,852; Matapédia Matane, 39,977; Rimouski, 40,208 and Témiscouata, 42,679. May I, sir, quote the population of the various counties in Quebec. A number of our hon. friends have complained of not having these figures handy. There are but 65 counties, it will therefore not delay the house too long; I shall quote these figures so that they may be consigned to Hansard and can be referred to, to-morrow, because if I am not mistaken the discussion in connection with Quebec will last a few days.

The following is the list and population, according to the bill on redistribution: Argenteuil, 27,441; Beauce, 51,614; Beauharnois-Laprairie, 41,399; Bellechasse, 27,480; Berthier-Maskinongé, 34,545; Bonaventure, 36,184; Brome-Missisquoi, 32,069; Chambly-Rouville, 40,353; Champlain, 37,526; Chapleau, 21,705; Charlevoix-Saguenay, 55,594; Châteauguay-Huntingdon, 24,412; Chicoutimi, 55,724; Compton, 31,858; Dorchester, 27,156.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is rather weak!

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Drummond-Arthabaska, 53,338; Gaspé, 47,160; Hull, 49,196; Joliette-Montcalm, 39,154; Kamouraska, 30,852; Labelle, 28,287; Laflèche-St-Maurice, 46,781; Lake St. John-Roberval, 50,253; L'Assomption-Terrebonne, 47,215; Laval-Two Mountains, 31,896; Lévis, 28,548.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is rather weak!

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Lotbinière, 30,546; Matapédia-Matane, 39,977; Mégantic-Frontenac, 44,440; Montmagny-L'Islet, 30,869; Nicolet-Yamaska, 39,338; Pontiac, 42,950; Portneuf, 37,305; Québec-East, 58,145.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to make an observation?

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Yes.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The figures he has just quoted include the part annexed, according to the bill, and the same applies to Kamouraska L'Islet, 30,852. The proportion I think is quite fair.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): I have not yet understood the reason for the separation of Montmagny and L'Islet and why should L'Islet be annexed to Kamouraska and not to Montmagny.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Neither I, but it is being split up.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Quebec South, 33,441; Quebec Southwest, 43,417; Quebec-Montmorency, 40,152; Richelieu-Verchères, 35,782; Richmond-Wolfe, 36,568; Rimouski, 40,208; St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, 42,720; St. John-Iberville, 32,259; Shefford, 28,262; Sherbrooke, 37,386; Stanstead, 25,118.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): That is weak!

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Témiscouata, 42,679; Three Rivers, 44,226; Vaudreuil-Soulanges, 21,114; Wright, 27,107.

And in the island of Montreal: Cartier, 70,000; Laurier, 65,000.

These figures are approximative so far as the island of Montreal is concerned; details have not yet been given to the committee, however the figures are approximatively those I have quoted.

St. James, 65,000; Ste-Ann, 56,000.

These figures seem to be exaggerated.

St. Henri, 69,000; St. Laurent-St. Georges, 50,000; Verdun, 64,000; St. Denis, 67,500; Outremont, 57,500; Mount Royal, 65,000; Maisonneuve-Rosemont, 65,000; Lafontaine, 65,000; Hochelaga, 75,000; Mercier, 70,000; St. Antoine-Westmount, 57,500; Jacques-Cartier, 57,500.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Do these figures include births since the last sitting of the committee?

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): These are the figures given to the committee; however, I wish to state that as regards Montreal they are approximative and subject to revision.

Referring to Montmagny and L'Islet, you will note, by the figures given for the province of Quebec, that these counties, to-day, have a population of 39,643. There is no reason why these two counties should not be merged, as a whole. The change proposed consists in transferring a liberal majority of 585 votes to these two united counties. The hon. member for Montmagny stated that he was willing to keep the Montmagny county intact but that the county of L'Islet had to be rearranged. I do not know why. It is not because of its population, since the counties of Montmagny and L'Islet merged together have but a population of 39,643.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): According to the enumeration given just now by the hon. member, I think the figures are very fair.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Why split the county of L'Islet in two, why not keep it as a whole?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): It appears that it is to create new counties in Montreal. I have no knowledge of it. The hon. member is aware that the province of Quebec has 65 members and that this number cannot vary. Montreal has a population equal to half of that of the whole province; it should have twenty new members according to her population.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): 24 in all.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is not the question; however, we must add new constituencies to Montreal.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): They are given new ones and L'Islet county is eliminated.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): When the committee met for the first time we were informed that it was an understood thing that the following counties were to be eliminated: Yamaska, Bagot, Beauharnois, Laprairie, Napierville and L'Islet; the elimination of these counties had to be carried out owing to the small figures of their population. The hon. member for Montmagny has just stated that he is willing to keep the county of Montmagny intact, but, for some reason or other, he wants to divide the county of L'Islet in two.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I did not make that statement. I said if it was desired to keep both intact, I was quite agreeable to that.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): That is what we wish.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): So do I.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Let us keep L'Islet and Montmagny intact, just as they exist to-day. It is proposed to remove from these counties a liberal majority of 585 votes, according to the last election figures and transfer it to the adjacent counties. Let us keep them exactly as they are to-day, with their boundaries and population. Why amalgamate them?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member does not follow me, I said that I was willing to keep the counties intact; I do not wish to amalgamate them.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is another distinction.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Then, why not join the county to Kamouraska? It is also adjacent.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It is not in the same judicial district.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Why the change? Why choose Kamouraska rather than Montmagny?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): There is no more reason for one than the other. However, I must say that it would not please the opposition as well, because the present members for Kamouraska and L'Islet would have to fight over it, and that would be very unpleasant.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It is because it is not the same judicial district.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is a political reason.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): The political reason is to be found in the refusal of my hon. friends to amalgamate these two counties and in the fact that a Liberal majority of 585 votes is transferred.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I want to join them together.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Is that not also a political reason?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): On the contrary, I wish to join them together.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Such as they are?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): We will amalgamate them such as they are—Kamouraska and L'Islet—will the hon. member consent to this?

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): That question was never broached.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): It is strange, what a change has taken place. It is indeed extraordinary!

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I am referring to that part of the bill, as submitted by the Conservative sub-committee of the province of Quebec.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ASCENSION DAY—VICTORIA DAY

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, as Wednesday is a statutory holiday—Victoria day, as it is described in the revised statutes—and Thursday is Ascension day, which to a number of hon. members is a day of obligation, I suggest, if it is acceptable to the house, that the house meet at three o'clock on Wednesday and on Thursday. That will enable those who have Arbor day duties and matters of that kind on hand for Wednesday to dispose of them, and I believe it is satisfactory to our friends if they have the morning free until three o'clock on Thursday. If that is acceptable I shall be glad to make arrangements accordingly, and would give notice that I shall move to-morrow morning in that sense.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 23, 1933

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

ADDITION OF TOWNSHIPS TO NORTH YORK CONSTITUENCY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the course of the discussion last evening with respect to the redistribution of 1924 a difference of opinion or rather a difference with respect to certain facts developed between the hon. member at present representing North York (Mr. Lennox) and myself as respects the effect of the addition of the townships of Markham and Vaughan upon the results of the election in 1925. I had made the statement that the addition of the townships of Markham and Vaughan in the redistribution of 1924 gave a distinct advantage to the Conservative candidate. I said later that I was under the impression that the addition of those townships had been subsequently responsible for my defeat in North York. From his seat in this House of Commons last night the hon. member for North York spoke, and his words are reported at page 5288 of Hansard as follows:

If it had not been for the assistance he received—

That is that I received.

—from the new municipalities which were added, instead of having a majority of 494 I—

That is, Mr. Lennox.

—would have had a majority in the old constitueney of 681.

Then later the Prime Minister emphasized what had been said by the hon. member for North York. He is reported at page 5290 of Hansard as follows:

It turns out as a matter of fact that had it not been for the two townships that were added by the redistribution of 1924 he—

That is, myself—

—would have been beaten by a much larger majority than he was.

The facts will be found in the report of the chief electoral officer for the fifteenth general election, 1925, at pages 179 and 180. The figures there given are—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the right hon. leader of the opposition consider this a question of privilege?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I wish to make the necessary correction.

53719—335½

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman is merely contradicting another member's statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I am stating the correct position—

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a matter of debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —in a matter with respect to which I have been misrepresented. Surely your honour does not take exception to my placing on Hansard the facts with regard to misrepresentations which have been made on the part of the Prime Minister and the hon. member for North York.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not take objection to the hon. member raising a question of privilege, but as yet I fail to see that he has raised one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question of privilege is that it has been stated by the hon. member for North York and by the Prime Minister that the statement I made was not correct. I am giving evidence from records to show that what I did say was correct.

Mr. SPEAKER: That same state of affairs existed probably a hundred times yesterday. Members accused each other of making incorrect statements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I hope your honour is not going to prevent me from placing the official figures on record, and allow Hansard to retain statements made by the Prime Minister and the hon. member for North York which are not correct. I am asking only to be permitted to put on Hansard the figures as they appear in the chief electoral officer's report.

Mr. BENNETT: The house is still in committee on the bill. It seems to me that that is the proper place to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Prime Minister wishes me to make the statement at another time, I shall be happy to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ASCENSION DAY—VICTORIA DAY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I shall now move the motion of which I gave notice yesterday when the house adjourned. I move, seconded by Mr. Rhodes:

That this house shall meet at three o'clock p.m. Wednesday, May 24, and Thursday, May 25, notwithstanding the resolution passed on May 8, 1933.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

STE. ANNE DE BELLEVUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Is it within the knowledge of the Minister of Pensions and National Health that the medical officer in charge of the chest cases in the hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec, is not a returned soldier, is not bilingual, and that he says to French-Canadians who do not understand him, "Why don't you talk a white man's language"?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I shall make inquiries.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you. And he is insolent and arrogant.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The clerk assistant having proceeded to announce the order of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): This is the second or third time that the clerk assistant has not waited for the orders of the day to be called but has proceeded at once to announce one of them. I wish at this time to take exception to that procedure.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Speaker called the orders of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Last week it happened on one occasion.

Mr. BENNETT: But it did not happen this morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I beg the pardon of the clerk assistant and of His Honour the Speaker.

CONFERRING OF TITLES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I say that the Prime Minister has evidently overlooked something. He stated yesterday that he would reply to-day to a question I asked him respecting the conferring of titles, and the views of the government as to the resolution passed by the house in that connection.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I was about to rise and say that I had prepared a memorandum, but as it has not been typewritten I shall defer answering until three o'clock because it is not yet completed.

VALCARTIER CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to draw the attention of the government to a dispatch appearing in Le Devoir with reference to the camp at Valcartier wherein it is stated—I do not know whether it is true or not—that there is no Roman Catholic priest at that place.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I may say that arrangements have been made for the regular attendance and care of the people by a Roman Catholic priest.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps they belong to the Oxford group.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

The house resumed from Monday, May 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. 2 to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—Mr. Smoke in the chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Three cheers for Kinistino!

Mr. McPHEE: There's the answer to your gerrymander!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, I quite understand the joy of my good friends from Saskatchewan. That verdict in the constituency which is represented here by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) is the best evidence that no carving of constituencies, no incision or excision or manipulation can prevent the voice of the people being made effective.

An hon. MEMBER: The handwriting on the wall.

An hon. MEMBER: We found that in North York especially.

An hon. MEMBER: You will find it next time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before I continue, my hon. friend the member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has handed me a telegram in which he is given the information that Kinistino has been won by a majority of 2,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before beginning the observations I desire to make, which will be very few at this stage of the bill, I wish to refer to a somewhat personal matter. In my absence from the house yesterday I am told that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister seemed to suggest that the special committee that had been formed to negotiate on this question did not sit because I had gone home. I must tell my right hon. friend that I am rather surprised that he is not better acquainted with the facts. The committee, which had made good progress on Friday morning, as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) said in the house, was adjourned to 2.30 in the afternoon. I went there at 2.30, so did my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Acadia, but we did not meet the other members. At six o'clock my right hon. friend the member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) told me that we would meet at 8.30. At eight o'clock in the house the Prime Minister suggested that we should proceed with the bill, but on request agreed to postpone it until yesterday. Sir George Perley then crossed the floor and told me that it was useless to go to the meeting room because all was off and there was no possibility of an understanding. I left for home the following morning.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to refer to the two reasons given by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister for the changes which are being made in the electoral map of the province of Quebec. On two occasions he said that first this parliament must undo what had been done in the previous redistribution—of course, I assume he means done unfairly. Secondly, he said there must be a readjustment on account of the increase of population in the cities. With these two principles I agree. And I wish to say immediately that in any place or any constituency where any change was made, as my right hon. friend suggests, in 1924, which should not have been made—I go further, any change that was made either fairly or unfairly—I am quite willing to undo. But it is not necessary to change the whole map of the province of Quebec for that purpose.

As to the second reason, the increase of population in the cities, Montreal being given three more seats, it is easy to unite two counties in three places without carving them, without disfiguring them, and provide the additional seats required by the increased population in the city. I repeat; with these two principles I agree, I accept them as a basis for a fair redistribution of seats in the province of Quebec.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before I show what is being proposed, I desire to say, for the benefit of those hon. members who perhaps do not know conditions as they exist in the province of Quebec, how deeply attached the citizens of that province are to their municipal lines, which have existed from time immemorial. That applies to the municipal lines, the county lines, even the district lines. If the province of Quebec has grown united as it has, it is due to that spirit of union which has always existed. Every man, woman and child there in those old parishes of Quebec is as a member of one family. Then, the counties have always existed. There is a moral bond uniting those various places in every constituency of the province of Quebec from time immemorial. It was so in old France, la commune, and even in England. This house is called the House of Commons; the commons representing the counties between which there has always been a noble spirit of emulation and, of competition. The people of Quebec want to live together; they are living together not only municipally, but in their agricultural and other associations. There is a spirit of friendly rivalry between the various counties, the men serve as jurymen in the district courts, and they meet together very often. Now what is proposed is to carve up most of the counties of Quebec, to change absolutely the boundaries and, even to create constituencies by adding together four or five parts of adjoining constituencies. I say it is a desecration of the fair province of Quebec, and I do not believe that this bill will go through in its present form when my right hon. friend has considered the matter as it should be considered. I do not blame him so much as I blame those who know what the conditions are in the province and who yet have not only permitted this thing to be done but have insisted that it should be done.

I propose to show what the situation will be in my own district of Quebec, where there are twenty-five seats, leaving to my hon. friend the member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) the task of showing what is done in the Montreal district. There are twenty-five constituencies in what is commonly called the Quebec district. Out of those twenty-five it is proposed to keep two and to alter twenty-three. I am going to show, from the first to the last of these twenty-five, whether the principles as set out by my right hon. friend could be applied in the changes which are proposed, namely to undo what has been done or because of the necessity of increasing the number of seats in Montreal.

We start with the constituency of Gaspe, which it is proposed to change by the addition of two parishes, being in the townships of Dalibaire and Romieu West, the parishes of Mechins and Capucins. These parishes now are in the county of Matane. For what purpose is this change proposed? Gaspe is one of the largest ridings in Canada in point of territory, as all hon. members know. There are three provincial constituencies included in that area, Gaspe North, Gaspe South and Magdalen Island. To go to Magdalen Island the member for Gaspe has to proceed to Pictou and sail from there. The population of Gaspe at present is 45,617, while Matane has a population of 45,000. Why put those two parishes in Gaspe, where they do not belong? The constituency of Matane is represented here by a Conservative member, accidentally. Two parishes are being transferred from Matane to Gaspe in the northern part of the riding, but that is not all.

The second constituency is Bonaventure and the Baie des Chaleurs. There again three Liberal parishes are being moved from Matane to Bonaventure in order to try to save the head of my hon. friend from Matane (Mr. Larue). He is a nice fellow, but I do not believe it is necessary to disfigure these constituencies and tear away these places which always have been in Matane and which should stay there, in order to get rid of some Liberal votes from that constituency.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend said they were being put in Bonaventure?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. The first two parishes to which I refer are being put in Gaspe while the other three are being put in Bonaventure. Matane is changed accordingly. The next constituency is Rimouski, which has a population of 33,151. Three places are being taken from Témiscouata and added to Rimouski, Begon, Ste. Françoise and Trois-Pistoles. These places are not in the same judicial district as Rimouski; Trois-Pistoles always has been a proud town of Témiscouata county, and it has nothing to do with Rimouski. These places are being taken away from Témiscouata and added to Rimouski in an attempt to deprive my hon. friend from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) of one of his strongholds. Well, I know the conditions there better than they are known by any man in this house, and particularly any man who sat on that committee. I am a native of Témiscouata; I was born a few miles from that town of Trois-Pistoles. I know the feeling of resentment which will be created there if they are forcibly detached from Témiscouata. Trois-Pistoles was the home of Hon. L. P. Pelletier, who was a distinguished Conservative minister from Quebec. He was very fond of his parish, and once he was a candidate in Témiscouata. I should like to know what he would think of the very idea of taking Trois-Pistoles away from Témiscouata in order to serve some political end. Against this I protest, as every one in Témiscouata will protest, and if it is done for the purpose of trying to defeat my hon. friend from Témiscouata let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that he will be elected next time by a much larger majority than he had at the last election.

On the western side of the constituency Notre-Dame-du-Portage, another fine place, is added to the adjoining riding of Kamouraska, which is changed not only by this addition but by the further addition at the western end of three or four parishes from the county of L'Islet. You will see something very interesting here when the maps are laid on the table. They take from the county of L'Islet parishes that usually give a Liberal majority but at the end of the line, near the United States boundary, there is a strong Conservative place, St. Pamphile, which is left in L'Islet. Then L'Islet is added to Montmagny, forming a united constituency of Montmagny-L'Islet. As to this I have nothing to say; I agree that one constituency should disappear there. I submit, however, that L'Islet, with a representation of 19,000 and Montmagny, with 20,000, should be joined without being carved at both ends. This would make a constituency of 39,000, which is still below the unit of representation, and there are many constituencies in the province which have a greater representation. I say L'Islet and Montmagny should be joined as it is proposed, but they should not take away those parts of L'Islet and Montmagny which are Liberal, St. Francois and Berthier, which are perhaps the largest Liberal places in the county of Montmagny. It simply is not fair. Yesterday I was pleased to hear even my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) say he was prepared to keep St. Francois and Berthier; even he seems to admit that this redistribution is not fair, but he asks why we do not unite Kamouraska and L'Islet instead of Montmagny and L'Islet. Well, there is this difference, that Kamouraska already has a representation of 24,000 and with the addition of Notre-Dame-du-Portage that number will be increased, while Montmagny has only 20,000. That is the first reason, and the second is that Montmagny and L'Islet are in the same judicial district. They go together for various purposes, while Kamouraska is in another district altogether. Instead of seeing L'Islet and Montmagny carved in the way they have been, I should prefer to have Kamouraska and L'Islet together. I should prefer to have that rather than see that carving perpetrated. Of course, the natural division is to add L'Islet and Montmagny, for all the rules of the game are in favour of that amalgamation instead of the other one. But I protest against the carving of L'Islet and Montmagny by separating St. Roch des Aulnais, that fine old place in L'Islet, proud of having been part of L'Islet. As my friend from L'Islet (Mr. Fafard) said yesterday, we have the absurdity now that the warden of the county of L'Islet will be an elector of Kamouraska after this has been achieved.

We come now to Bellechasse. My hon. friend, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) is rather a fortunate being. Bellechasse is what is commonly called a Liberal hive, a strong Liberal constituency. Well, it is being proposed to make it stronger by adding to it part of Dorchester, part of Levis —and you will see how interesting is that part of Levis which goes to Bellechasse—and part of Montmagny.

Mr. BENNETT: The population is only 21,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but that is no reason for carving all the Liberal parishes from the adjoining constituency and putting them into Bellechasse.

The next constituency is Levis. Levis is an old historic constituency situated in front of Quebec city. There are two towns. There is the city of Levis, which has a population of about 11,000; there is the town of Lauzon, and there is also the large village of St. Romuald there. It is a county with an historic background. The population as it stands today is 35,656. It is in many respects a city constituency, because the city of Levis is situated in the riding. But it has only a population of 35,656. Now it is proposed by this bill to take away the old parishes of St. Henri de Levis and St. Jean Chrysostome, which are among the oldest places in the province of Quebec, as well as Riviere Boyer and St. Henri village, and to put them all in the county of Bellechasse, which is situated east of the county of Levis. To achieve this result you have to make a geographical monster. The county of Bellechasse is extended behind the town of Levis and St. Romuald, these fine places being driven from the county of Levis.

But that is not all. The western part of Levis is also composed of Liberal parishes. they are drawn into the county of Lotbiniere, which is another Liberal stronghold, where no Conservative has been elected since confederation. It is simply carrying coals to Newcastle. They have taken from Levis St. Etienne de Lauzon, St. Lambert de Lauzon, St. Nicholas, St. Nicholas Sud and the village of St. Redempteur, and this is being done for the purpose of trying to build up a Conservative seat in Levis. Levis, as I have said, is a city constituency with a population of only 35,000, and it will be reduced to 27,000, when so many rural seats have 40,000, 45,000 and even 50,000 of a population.

This is unfair on the face of it; it is a manipulation that cannot be excused. People laughed when this change was suggested. Nobody believed that it would enter into any sane mind to do this in the county of Levis, and my hon. friends on the other side representing the province of Quebec know the feelings of the people there. They know for instance that St. Nicholas is the home of the Paquet family as well as of so many other prominent families in Quebec—people who are proud to call themselves sons of Levis. And now they are to be thrown into Lotbiniere.

My hon. friend from Levis (Mr. Fortin) is a good fellow; he is an excellent physician. But let me say to him in all sincerity that I do not think that Levis should be disfigured just to save his political head. I do not think this wound should be inflicted on the fine old constituency of Levis just for the purpose of trying to save a Conservative candidate. Everyone knows that it is not necessary; it is not useful, it is inexcusable. How therefore can we accept such a proposal as this?

Lotbiniere, the next constituency, as I have said, is a Liberal stronghold, and it is being added to from Nicolet, from Levis, from Megantic and from Beauce. My hon. friend from Lotbiniere (Mr. Verville) said to me, "There has been an increase on all sides except the north, because in that direction lies the St. Lawrence river and they could not very well put it into Lotbiniere."

Now we come to Dorchester. In Dorchester there is a place called St. Luc, which has been erected into a municipality in that county. It has always been there; it was included in Dorchester when it was created a municipality; it has always been part of Dorchester, provincially, federally, municipally and otherwise. It is a small place, but apparently there is virtue in its smallness, because it has always voted unanimously Liberal; it has always given a large Liberal majority. My hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) wishes to put St. Luc in the county of Bellechasse. He mentions also St. Maxime de Scott, which, when originally erected, was situated partly in Beauce and partly in Dorchester. Geographically, as the map will show, it should be in Dorchester, because, as I have said, it is in Dorchester provincially and should be federally as well, as it has been since 1924. I am quite willing to abide by what I say. I think it is a fair thing to put St. Maxime de Scott in Dorchester because it is there provincially and it is there geographically. The population of Beauce is over 50,000 while the population of Dorchester is under 30,000. If my right hon. friend wants to undo what has been done, I am quite willing. St. Maxime de Scott was put there in 1924, so let him take it away if that is the purpose of this redistribution bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Dorchester forms part of three counties.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Dorchester has existed since 1850.

Mr. POWER: Since 1792.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. GAGNON: Since 1791.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Dorchester has always been an old county by itself and this seems to be a clever distinction made by the hon. member for Dorchester. After all, I think he must have suggested these changes. The municipality of Honfleur is part of the county of Bellechasse but why was it not sent to Bellechasse? It is a Conservative community, as is Ste. Sabine, which is partly situated in the county of Bellechasse.

Mr. GAGNON: May I ask my hon. friend a question? If he will read the act of 1924 he will see that there was no change made in the bill which is before the house with respect to the municipality of Ste. Sabine. The same thing applies to Honfleur.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member has not asked a question. He states that no change has been made but these places are Conservative. They are situated partly in Bellechasse but they have been allowed to remain in Dorchester.

Mr. GOBEIL: Who made the change?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We were compelled to listen to my hon. friend in the committee and he will have to listen to us now.

Mr. GOBEIL: That does not say who made the change.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend from Compton will kindly let me proceed, it will be much better. The county of Beauce has been altered to include the parishes which I have mentioned. For the riding of Lotbiniere they took part of the county of Nicolet, but I suppose the hon. member for Richelieu will deal with that matter. In the case of the riding of Megantic, certain Liberal parishes of the county of Wolfe have been thrown in. The voters there have been opposed to the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. LaFlèche). As far as the north shore is concerned, I have nothing to say about the three seats in Quebec city. A change has been made in the seat of the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré). A rural section was added in the redistribution of 1914 but I agree that this should be a city seat altogether. I am quite agreeable to the change being made.

Mr. DUPRE: By this change I am losing a normal majority in the rural part of about sixty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know about that. My hon. friend might wait to make his remarks a little later.

Mr. DUPRE: I wanted to point that out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite sure my hon. friend is generous enough to give that up. In the case of the riding of Quebec South, the municipality of St. Colomban de Sillery is being taken away, but I have no objection.

This is naturally part of Quebec county to be represented by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion). I have been told that a small addition is to be made in Quebec East. I do not see this in the bill and I will reserve my remarks until later. As far as the constituency of Quebec-Montmorency is concerned I do not think the changes will effect any result. But why take away Ste Brigitte de Laval and put it into the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay, which is a province by itself and contains a larger population? I am quite sure when we reach the schedules my hon. friend will give some good reasons for this change. I should like some explanation in connection with Valcartier. This is part of the county of Portneuf but it has been included in my hon. friend's constituency. Has this change been made because there is an unemployment camp situated there where the men selected by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell) are sent? Is it intended that these men shall be in the constituency of Quebec-Montmorency? I do not see any reason why Valcartier which is part of Portneuf should be sent back to Quebec county. There is no population worth mentioning outside of the unemployment camp. The vote in that particular area may not be exactly as my hon. friend desires it to be. The riding of Charlevoix-Saguenay is changed by the addition of Ste Brigitte de Laval. The riding of Portneuf is changed by including Donnacona and some other places which were in Quebec West and by excluding La Tuque. There is a new constituency formed called Lafleche-St. Maurice, which is being made out of Three Rivers, St. Maurice and Champlain. This is very ingenious strategy. The strong Liberal communities of Shawinigan Falls and Grand Mere are being added together in a strong Liberal constituency. The hon. members for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois) and Champlain (Mr. Baribeau) will benefit by being rid of these thorns in their flesh. These are the changes which have been made in the district of Quebec.

If these changes can be justified I am quite willing to listen very attentively to any explanations which may be given. This whole thing is considered as a tremendous gerrymander not only by the Liberal members of the house but by the population as a whole. It is going contrary to elementary political morality. No one in a democracy has the right to lend himself to the loading of the dice in such an obvious and glaring manner. Even newspapers which are usually Conservative have been criticizing this scheme which has been submitted. Even the Montreal Gazette said the other day that they could not understand why this wholesale change had been made in the province of Quebec. They were curious to know the reason. L'Evènement of Quebec which has always supported this government, had a strong editorial in yesterday's issue protesting against this action. They asked why do this? Why create this embarrassment to the Prime Minister whom we love—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have a great respect for my right hon. friend, but I am speaking the language of L'Evenement. They are blaming his advisers from Quebec for having done that and they predict that instead of its having the effect which those gentlemen wish to produce, a contrary one will result. This is my initial speech; I have some further remarks to make and if the province of Quebec is sacrificed as is proposed in the bill as submitted, I shall have some frank, honest words to say on the third reading. I think I have given a bird's-eye view of the changes which are proposed to be made in the Quebec district, and I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you listen to my hon. friend from Richelieu who will give the rest of the story so far as the province of Quebec is concerned.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): I have not been very much associated with the committee on redistribution nor with the committee of elder statesmen which dealt with this question in the last few days. I intend only to answer, to a certain extent, some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). If I may divide his speech into two parts, I may say that he objects on two counts, first, on account of municipal lines, and second, on account of electoral results. I do not know whether I am mistaken, but this is approximately the division I can make of my hon. friend's speech.

Of course when changes occur, they cannot be made unless somebody on either side of politics is hurt to a certain degree; but speaking generally, and thereby answering my hon. friend by a sweeping statement, I may say that the federal distribution has nothing to do with municipal lines. Provincial constituencies are not changed; we do not and we cannot touch them and it is on provincial demarcations that the county councils and judicial districts are based. Therefore all the arguments of my hon. friend about tampering with constituencies and the harm that can be done to every one of them, municipally or provincially, by the changes he describes, falls to the ground.

Mr. POULIOT: Why not put St. Sauveur into Témiscouata?

Mr. DUPRE: May I point out again to my hon. friend, since I think there are eighty-two provincial ridings—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Ninety.

Mr. DUPRE: Thank you—ninety provincial ridings and only sixty-five federal constituencies, necessarily the demarcations and lines of the provincial constituencies have to be changed; we cannot do otherwise.

But there is another aspect and it is to consider the changes in a general way. I deplore the fact that in the district of Quebec we had to lose one constituency on account of the adjustment based on urban population.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. DUPRE: Certainly.

Mr. POULIOT: He says that the changes in Quebec were made on account of the increase in urban population. Is that the reason that the new rural constituencies Chapleau and Lafleche-St. Maurice have been created?

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend does not seem to understand my point. I am telling him that one of the main reasons there were some changes and new lines of demarcation necessary in the district of Quebec was that we had to lose one constituency which necessitated new lines in some others.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend permits me, I do not wish to interrupt him again—

Mr. ROBINSON: Sit down!

Mr. POULIOT: The Solicitor General is more courteous than is the hon. member for West Essex; he allows me to put a question. My hon. friend should learn manners from the Solicitor General; it will improve the tone of the house.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smoke): Will the hon. gentleman ask his question?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. We have been told that changes have been made in the rural seats because of the three new seats in Montreal. I ask the Solicitor General why it has been decided by the government to create two new rural seats, one in the Ottawa and the other in Three Rivers district. If three new seats in Montreal were too many, why did the government decide to create two new rural seats when there was no necessity for so doing?

[Mr. Dupré.]

Mr. DUPRE: If my hon. friend will follow me, he will understand my point. I will answer him immediately. Since we had to find new lines in Quebec district and lose one constituency in the district of Three Rivers and one in the district of Montreal, necessarily we had to form new divisions and in some special cases we had to create new constituencies. I deplore, as I said, that we had, on account of the readjustment of urban population, to lose one seat in the district of Quebec. If I could have prevented this, I would have done so with great pleasure, and in fact I tried but I did not succeed. At one time there was a question of taking away two constituencies from the district of Quebec and to this I objected. Yesterday I heard the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Fafard) complaining about the new lines in his constituency. I agree with him that this is most unfortunate, but we could not help it. I agree also that the hon. member for L'Islet, who has always been an acquisition to this house and who is a distinguished member, will find a way to come back, because we like his presence here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think he will.

Mr. DUPRE: But if hon. members will consider the new districts, they will see how everything has been divided. For instance, around Quebec there are on the south shore from Levis up to Kamouraska different constituencies side by side. What is the result of the new adjustment? There is Levis with a population of 28,548; Dorchester next to it with a population of 27,156; Montmagny-L'Islet, the new proposed constituency, with a population of 30,869, and Bellechasse with a new population of 27,480, and Kamouraska with 30,852. Thus there are five constituencies side by side, each with approximately the same population.

My hon. friend has been talking about Levis. May I point out to him that with the new adjustment Levis will have about the same population as the four constituencies around it. Besides that, under the new adjustment there are nine constituencies in the province of Quebec with populations less than the population of Levis. Taking first Levis, with a population of 28,548, the others are:

	Population
Argenteuil	27,885
Bellechasse	27,480
Chapleau	21,705
Chateauguay-Huntingdon	24,412
Dorchester	27,156
Shefford	28,262
Stanstead	25,118
Vaudreuil-Soulanges	21,154
Wright	27,107

Therefore we have nine constituencies with populations less than the population of Levis. Of these constituencies with populations less than Levis there is one new one, five constituencies represented by Conservative members and three represented by Liberal members.

If, being dissatisfied you put back into Levis the parishes of St. Henri and St. Jean, you will have the following result: The population of Bellechasse will drop down to 24,315 and the population of Levis will increase to 31,713. But as it is, with the new proposals the populations of Levis and Bellechasse will be approximately the same.

If my hon. friend from Quebec East will revert to Quebec South, which is an urban constituency in the heart of the city of Quebec, he will see that Levis which is not fully urban, but only semi-urban, has with the new adjustment a population of 28,548 while Quebec South, which is fully urban, will have a population of 33,441, which is only 4,893 more than Levis. I have heard that in the past the county of Richelieu which could be compared to a certain extent to the county of Levis, because both contain a city of about 11,000 population—has remained for twenty-one years with a population of approximately 21,500. I shall not dare to add that very likely the stationary character of its population was due to the fact that it was a Liberal constituency. I should not like to be accused of such an argument, but the fact is that Levis has 28,500 while Richelieu, for 21 years, has remained at the figure of 21,500. Another reason for the change in Levis is that Bellechasse, next to Levis, has a population which does not increase or decrease. In fact in the last ten years the population of Bellechasse has decreased by about 106. It is stationary. If the hon. member for Quebec East will refer to the statistics he will find that the population of Levis increases from 3,000 to 4,000 every ten years. If this increase continues in ten years Bellechasse will have the same population as it has now, while the population of Levis will be about 32,000 or 33,000, which is approximately the same as that of Quebec South at the present time.

A moment ago I heard the hon. member for Quebec East deploring the fact that the Paquet family of Levis will for federal purposes have to live in the county of Lotbiniere. I may add that this is a most respectable old family. They are countrymen, farmers, and real gentlemen. It is a family for which I have as much respect as my hon. friend. They have given some remarkable men to politics, to the professions, to agriculture and to industry. I hope however that my hon. friend does not mean to say that the fact that the Paquet family has been thrown into Lotbiniere for federal purposes is a disgrace to them. The county of Lotbiniere, so far as I can see, is as good a county as Levis or Bellechasse. The Paquet family for federal purposes will belong to the county of Lotbiniere, and for provincial purposes will continue to belong to the county of Levis.

Coming back to Dorchester, I have a few words to say. I think the hon. member for Dorchester is able to take care of himself. I have not to defend what has taken place; in fact, I do not know what has taken place, because I was a member of no committee and attended no sessions of redistribution committees. I say to my hon. friend from Quebec East, however, that very likely we can agree on Dorchester for the following reasons: My hon. friend from Quebec East admits that so far as the parish of Ste Maxime de Scott is concerned, he has really no serious objection, because it is a parish which belonged to the county of Beauce (Mr. Lacroix). So far as the two parishes of St. Zacharie and St. Aurelie are concerned—

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are not in the bill.

Mr. DUPRE: No, because there has been a misprint. I understand there will be an amendment, because the county of Dorchester has not been properly described in the bill before us.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then I shall have to oppose that. It is still worse.

Mr. DUPRE: The proposal is to add the parishes of St. Zacharie and St. Aurelie to the county of Beauce. I might say that this has been done with the approval of the hon. member for Beauce. I have his own figures and his own writing before me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. DUPRE: Let us study the situation in the district of Quebec, as outlined by my hon. friend. What is the result of these changes? I am considering what might happen from an electoral point-of-view, and I am assuming for the sake of argument that the figures will be the same as in 1930. What is the result? Quebec East, which has been so well represented by the ex-Minister of Justice, remains as it is. Therefore chances are that he would be elected by the same majority.

An hon. MEMBER: More.

Mr. DUPRE: Quebec South is about the same. The Liberal majority by the new changes, as far as Quebec South is concerned, is just a little increased.

As far as I am concerned, Quebec West is about the same, with the difference that by taking away the rural part of my constituency I will lose 60 votes of the Conservative majority. In Lotbiniere, basing ourselves always on the same figures, the Liberal majority will be increased; I am sure my hon. friend from Quebec East will not object to that. In Bellechasse, always taking the same figures, the Liberal majority will be increased. In Charlevoix-Saguenay it will be about the same, perhaps the Liberal majority may be increased by a few votes. Is that anything to complain about? In Kamouraska the majority will be increased also; what have my friends opposite to complain about? In Bonaventure the Liberal majority will be increased. In Gaspe the Liberal majority will be increased. My hon. friends smile as I give these figures—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Because you seem to be a real fortune-teller.

Mr. DUPRE: I am only basing myself on the figures of the last election. In Portneuf there is a change, both parties will be about equal. I hope my friends will not complain at having to fight in a constituency where the chances are equal. In Montmagny and in Quebec-Montmorency it will be about the same as in 1930. In Dorchester and Levis I admit that the Conservative majority might be increased and that, based on the figures of 1930 the chances of the Conservative candidate will be better.

Mr. POULIOT: Listen to that!

Mr. DUPRE: If you are kind enough to follow my argument—

Mr. POULIOT: This is not an argument, it is a prognostication!

Mr. DUPRE: —there are seven or eight constituencies where the Liberal chances will be increased, and only two where the Conservative chances will be increased. Is that unfair to my hon. friends?

There are other arguments, which I will not cover just now because they will be discussed later in connection with the different constituencies. But there is one thing to which I wish to draw attention. It is this: my hon. friend from Quebec East has spoken about the general principle of municipal lines, judicial districts and so forth. My answer, and I ask pardon for repeating it, is that the federal demarcations have nothing to do with the municipal lines or judicial districts, because these municipal lines and judicial districts are based on the provincial constituencies, which are not changed, and which we cannot change. But there is another principle much more important than that. It is that in the new redistribution there will be in the province of Quebec no more solid blocs. There will be no more Conservative and no more Liberal blocs. I draw to the attention of my hon. friend from Quebec East the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier many years ago when he said it would be a most unfortunate situation if we had a Conservative or a Liberal bloc either in Ontario or Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: Did the Liberal bloc elect twenty-seven Conservatives in the last election?

Mr. DUPRE: That does not change my argument; my hon. friend does not seem to understand me. He is going back now to the old divisions. We must be fair, we must be broadminded and we must think of principles and ideals. I say it is a most unfortunate situation when there is in the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario a solid bloc either Liberal or Conservative. And I draw the attention of my hon. friends opposite to this fact, that we have been able to fight and we have been able to win some seats when we were in the opposition, and we are going to fight again and to maintain our position in the next federal election. What I want them to understand is that the days of Liberal domination are finished.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: That is a good explanation.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu): I think, Mr. Chairman, that the last word uttered by the hon. Solicitor General will be regretted by him when he becomes a little more calm. His last observation is far from indicating a spirit of fairness on the part of the government in the working out of the redistribution project that is being placed before the house at the present time.

I quite realize the difficulties encountered when preparing a redistribution of the province of Quebec. Under the British North America Act we are in a very difficult and embarrassing position; we cannot increase the number of seats beyond the sixty-five allotted to us by the pact of confederation, and we have to take care of the English minorities in that province. I may say to the honour of the citizens of Quebec that that obligation has been more than respected during the past years. So when it comes to figuring out the allotment of constituencies in Quebec we are limited by those two important considerations. And it is impossible to attain a satisfactory result when drafting the boundaries of constituencies in the province of Quebec if too much weight is given to the factor of population. It is utterly impossible to equalize population in the constituencies of that province in view of the two considerations I have just indicated. Then there is also the big city of Montreal, and the city of Quebec which is growing very rapidly; it is impossible, I repeat, to have equality of population in all the constituencies of that province. Since confederation there has been always a big discrepancy between the population of certain constituencies, even in the rural sections of the province. So I am driven to the conclusion, and I take the risk of expressing what is in my mind that the time has come or will be here very soon when the basis of dividing seats for the federal house will have to be changed and the British North America Act amended.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARDIN: It is unfair, with the growing population of the province of Quebec to keep our representation at the same number, 65 seats, when we have to take care of the English-speaking minorities as we have been doing in the past years. I am not afraid of a change in the British North America Act in that respect. When our number was fixed at 65 at the time of confederation it was done in order to protect the populations in the small provinces of Canada. But the trend of population has not been as foreseen by the fathers of Confederation; their estimates have proven wrong. At the time of confederation the maritime provinces were afraid, not of the province of Quebec, but of the province of Ontario, which at that time was expected to develop more rapidly than any other and to increase its population much more than Quebec. They wanted to be protected against the increase of the province of Ontario by assurance against reduction of seats in certain cases. The exception which was made at the time was for the protection of the maritime provinces, but circumstances have been such that the province of Ontario in fact is benefiting by the exception which was made with the intention of helping the maritimes. So the principle must be redrafted, and the sooner it is done the better it will be, and the sooner we will have a fairer representation in the House of Commons.

If I understood his words correctly the Prime Minister said that his party had made some sacrifices in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in order to avoid altering the boundaries of constituencies. I believe the Prime Minister said that in one province the Conservative party lost one seat because they wanted to respect the boundaries of the constituencies. Let me tell the right hon. gentleman in all frankness that if he would apply the same principle to the province of Quebec this question of redistribution would be settled in no time at all. It would be the easiest thing in the world to deal with this matter if the right hon. gentleman would apply that principle to the province of Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: If I may interrupt the hon. gentleman, I trust he realizes that the electoral divisions in Quebec now comprise parts of many communities. For instance, the old county of Dorchester takes in parts of three provincial counties. That is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but I may answer that this situation prevails in a relatively small number of the constituencies in Quebec. It applies very little in the Montreal district, which has from forty to forty-two seats. I am quite ready to agree that this principle of respecting boundaries could not be applied everywhere; I admit that in certain cases exceptions should be made, but I urge upon the Prime Minister that generally speaking the principle he has applied in making sacrifices in the maritime provinces should be applied in the province of Quebec as well. I still hope, as I have said to a number of my hon. friends who are complaining with regard to the redistribution bill, that when the true picture is placed before the Prime Minister he will set aside some of the recommendations which have been made by his supporters and insist on having a measure brought before the house which will be fairer and more equitable to all parties in Quebec. I still have the firm belief that before we are through with the schedules many changes will be made which will bring about a better understanding among the citizens of the province of Quebec and will indicate more broadmindedness on the part of those who have the majority in this house. It is all very well to speak of equalizing the population, but if this is the aim why reduce the representation in counties which at present are below that unit; why reduce them still more? There are several constituencies in Quebec below the unit of representation, according to the last census. Instead of trying to increase them or even keeping them as they are and as they have been for many years, it is now proposed to reduce their population.

Then a new constituency is to be created in the northern section of Quebec, in order to give a chance to a very nice gentleman, the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois), and in order to give a chance to another very nice and bright young man, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Baribeau). These hon. members are to be helped by taking from their constituencies a certain number of Liberal centres. A new county is created, with a population of only 21,000. This is the answer to the argument of my good friend the Solicitor General that so far as possible we must equalize the population in Montmagny and L'Islet and the two adjoining counties.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Would my hon. friend allow me a question? Would he tell me the area of that new constituency?

Mr. CARDIN: The area does not mean anything when there is no one living in that area. You could take all the northern section of Quebec or all Ungava and you would not have a large population.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. CARDIN: It is an answer; there is a small population in that territory at the present time. The only justification for the assertion of the Minister of Marine is that in the future that area may be developed. Many things may happen in the future in these constituencies in the centre of Quebec which are being carved up to-day. By these proposals constituencies with populations of 40,000, 42,000 and 45,000 will be increased to 50,000, 55,000 and possibly 60,000 in the next ten years; so we had better bank on realities rather than expectations, as my good friend the Minister of Marine is trying to do in order to justify the present project. There is no justification for reducing the representation in counties which are too small now, or for creating a smaller constituency in a new section, in order to protect two members already sitting in this house. I wonder why hon. gentlemen opposite, representing constituencies where they have been elected by majorities of 500, 600, 1,100 and so on, are afraid to go back to the electors a second time. I cannot understand that.

Mr. DUPRE: Would my hon. friend permit me a question? I do not want to interrupt his argument, but the same point would apply to the Liberal party, because I have already named seven or eight constituencies in which the Liberal majorities will be greatly increased.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, I can see the position taken by the Solicitor General. He is trying to hive all the Liberals he can gather together in a certain section of the province in order to weaken the chances of the Liberals in the section where the Conservatives were elected at the last election. That is the whole story, the whole purpose of the present redistribution bill, and I say hon. gentlemen opposite lack a certain amount of courage if they are afraid to go back to the electors who sent them here, if they are afraid to face them under the same conditions that existed during the election of 1930. My hon. friend the Solicitor General said that he was very strongly opposed to the changing of provincial counties, and that this bill does not change them. Let me tell him that in the proposed redistribution of the Montreal seats and the rural section of the district of Montreal the boundaries of the provincial seats are being changed.

Mr. DUPRE: We cannot change the provincial districts.

Mr. CARDIN: It is being done.

Mr. DUPRE: If my hon. friend will permit me, we cannot touch the judicial lines because they are based on the provincial constituencies. My theory is that whatever changes may be made in federal constituencies the provincial constituencies and judicial lines remain the same.

Mr. CARDIN: But the provincial constituencies do not remain the same under this bill; the provincial constituencies are changed, and I can give a very good illustration.

Mr. DUPRE: We have no authority to change provincial lines.

Mr. CARDIN: That is not the point; we are not discussing here any changes in the judicial districts of the province of Quebec. We are talking about provincial districts, provincial constituencies and federal constituencies. If I gathered rightly the observations of the Solicitor General, he said that the provincial counties were not being changed by this redistribution. Perhaps I was wrong in my interpretation of his remarks, but I think that was what he said. Well, my answer to the hon. gentleman is this: You are changing the boundaries of the provincial counties; you are changing them in the district of Montreal, and changing them very materially.

Mr. BENNETT: We are not following the lines of the provincial counties.

Mr. CARDIN: I thank the Prime Minister. I say, you are not following the lines of the provincial counties in Quebec.

Mr. DUPRE: We agree on that.

Mr. CARDIN: The Solicitor General said also that we have to make changes because the Quebec district has to provide one seat to be given to Montreal, or to the northern section of the province of Quebec. If the Quebec district has to provide one rural seat to be given to Montreal or to the north, why change all the other constituencies in the Quebec district? What has Levis to do with the counties of Montmagny and L'Islet, which are supposed to be joined in one way or another? To obtain that additional county for the Quebec district it would be sufficient to join two counties or possibly four. But what about the rest? Is the division of the county of Levis changed for the purpose of giving one seat to Montreal? Is the county of Gaspe changed in its limits for the purpose of giving one seat to the north? They are mere changes of parishes here and there. You are not taking the seat you want for Montreal from the changes which are being made in most of the constituencies in the Quebec district.

Mr. POULIOT: Neither in Témiscouata.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend referred kindly to the county of Richelieu, which had been kept for a considerable time a small county of 21,000. For his information I may say that the county of Richelieu has been changed. It was changed in 1892. The parish of St. Marcel of the county of Richelieu was placed in the county of Bagot. That parish came back later on to the county of Richelieu, and in 1914 when the redistribution was carried out by the government then in power, the parish of St. Marcel was placed in the county of Yamaska. Changes have been made, though, I am ready to admit, not of very great importance. But the county of Richelieu is not the only county with a small population and which has not changed. There are much smaller constituencies in Canada and in the province of Quebec than the county of Richelieu; and I do not object very much to the increase which the present redistribution bill makes in Richelieu. They are giving the constituency now, according to this redistribution, part of Yamaska, part of Verchères and part of St. Hyacinthe, and they are increasing the population to 35,000. It is more 38,000 than 35,000. I do not object so much on that account, because I realize that my constituency, although it was not the smallest, should be increased; I admit that. But they are making changes for which there is no justification at all.

If I understood rightly the main argument of the Solicitor General, the justification was that they increased the chances of the Liberals in the constituencies they have, and increased the chances of the Conservatives in their constituencies. That is the principle of the whole redistribution which has been forced upon the Prime Minister of the country and which I am sure he will not accept when he is in possession of all the facts which are going to be placed before him.

I am not going to dwell very long on the situation in the island of Montreal. I confess that, living in a rural section of the province of Quebec, I am not as familiar with the island of Montreal as are the residents of that city. But the island of Montreal was practically settled when the committee of elder statesmen met, and when I was called before that committee as a witness; I got the impression that the island of Montreal had been agreed to. If that understanding had been signed at that time there would be no difficulty in regard to the island of Montreal. The difficulty came when the elder statesmen of the Conservative party consulted with their supporters in the island of Montreal and surrounding districts. The elder statesmen were quite ready to accept the plan as it had been modified, but the other gentlemen who advised those statesmen wanted to put forward a project of their own and so forced a disagreement on the committee.

I cannot understand for the life of me why, according to the redistribution bill which is before us, the county of St. Mary in the island of Montreal should disappear—the county which is more clearly defined than any other; the county which is more explicitly described on the map; the county which is most perfect geographically speaking, so far as the city of Montreal is concerned, and a county which has a population of 66,000. I cannot see why that population of working men, labouring people who have been together for twenty or thirty years, knowing clearly the boundaries of their constituency, and with a population of 66,000—I cannot understand, I say, why that county should disappear and why a new county is created with a population which is smaller than the population of St. Mary. St. Mary disappears, and they are creating a new county which is called Lafontaine. That county of Lafontaine, according to the figures given to us, is going to have a population of only 65,000 while the county of St. Mary, which is to disappear, has a population of 66,000, and is moreover more easily described and is much more interesting from the point of view of geography and regularity of lines.

What is the reason? Why do away with St. Mary and create another constituency? The county of St. Mary could have been increased a little, as all other constituencies in the county of Montreal have been increased. The county of Hochelaga could have been increased also, and St. Mary could have been left where it is at present, and no one would have suffered on that account. But why make a gerrymander of this sort in the heart of the island of Montreal in order to create a new constituency, doing away with an old one against which nothing can be said? I repeat, I cannot understand why that county of St. Mary is to disappear.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Is my hon. friend not aware, was he not told by the members of the committee, that our friends on our side agreed to restore the division he is mentioning, St. Mary—

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but—

Mr. DURANLEAU: —not because we thought it was a better redistribution but because we wanted to yield to the wishes of the hon. gentleman's friends. Is he not aware of that? Is it his wish now, is it the wish of my hon. friends opposite, to make political capital? If it is we will again yield to their wishes if they desire to make political capital out of it.

Mr. CARDIN: No political capital is being made. The only political capital which is being sought is sought by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine, as I will show in a moment. When there was a meeting before the elder statesmen the question was discussed with respect to the county of St. Mary. The only difficulty was that St. Mary was disappearing. The members from Montreal were asked for suggestions and they suggested that a new constituency to be called Lafontaine should not be created but that the populations of St. Mary and the other adjoining constituencies should be increased. But what were the observations of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley)? He said: In doing that are you not destroying what has been practically agreed upon in the other sections of Montreal? The answer was, "no." This would only affect St. Mary, St. James and Hochelaga. The hon. member for Argenteuil did not want to destroy St. Mary or change the boundaries of St. Antoine and other constituencies in Montreal. He said that they might agree to effect changes in regard to St. Mary without changing what had been practically settled upon and accepted by certain Conservative members from the island of Montreal. He was told that that would not change the position and he said that they might agree. What is the new proposal now being made? It is that a change be made with regard to Outremont. Other changes were to be made in other sections of the island of Montreal. That is the proposal to which the Minister of Marine referred. If he would come to us with the proposal which was practically accepted by the hon. member for Argenteuil and accepted to a large extent by himself, there would be no objection on the part of Montreal. Why is there any objection? It is because they want to do something new and make changes on the island of Montreal which would be contrary to the views expressed by the hon. member for Argenteuil. That is why we cannot accept the new proposal which has been made. It is not the proposal to which the Minister of Marine agreed before the committee of elder statesmen. If it was, I would be the first one to advise my colleagues from the island of Montreal to accept.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The suggestion made with regard to Outremont was to restore that seat. The objection raised by the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) was that we were changing the lines of Outremont, and we are now suggesting that they be restored.

Mr. CARDIN: Why go back on the proposals which were made three or four weeks ago after it was practically agreed in the special committee that St. Mary should be restored without disturbing the other constituencies except by increasing the populations of the surrounding constituencies? Why revive old difficulties? That is what my hon. friend is trying to do at the present time.

I hope I shall be pardoned for the heat of my observations. I have no desire to hurt the feelings of anyone but I have not the advantage of being able to switch to soft tones. It is my nature and I cannot change it. I do not mean any offence to hon. gentlemen who do not share my views. There may be much heat but there is no ill feeling at the bottom of my heart.

Let us leave the island of Montreal and go to the constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon. To a large extent the county of Huntingdon is to remain in the same position as it was. It is a small county which has been represented practically continuously by an English speaking representative. As far as I am concerned I am willing to make sacrifices in order that this riding shall not be disturbed. This is a small constituency but it is being reduced still further by this proposal.

Mr. BENNETT: It will have 4,000 more than Richelieu.

Mr. CARDIN: The present proposal reduces it by over a thousand. If it will satisfy the Prime Minister, I will not object to leaving it as it is. I would be ready to do that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It was done to meet our hon. friends' wishes, as a matter of fact.

Mr. CARDIN: I beg your pardon, it was not.

Mr. DURANLEAU: You objected to joining Beauharnois and Soulanges.

Mr. CARDIN: I objected to joining two counties which were separated by lake St. Francis and the St. Lawrence river without any bridge communication. That was the proposal made by the Minister of Marine. There is not even a regular ferry service and in the winter time it is impossible to go across. The only justification which could be offered by my hon. friend was that some day there might be a bridge. I know they will say that they did not change Soulanges which has only 21,000 population. I asked them to change it logically by taking in Ste. Anne de Bellevue which at the present time is in Jacques Cartier. That would be the natural way to increase the population of Vaudreuil-Soulanges. It cannot be increased to the north because of the lake of Two Mountains; it cannot be increased to the south because of lake St. Francis and the St. Lawrence, but it could be increased by taking in Ste. Anne de Bellevue. There are two bridges crossing the Ottawa river to provide communication. But Vaudreuil-Soulanges remains as it is because they do not want to increase it in the logical and fair way. That is why it is being kept at 21,000.

Mr. DURANLEAU: You would have to cross two rivers.

Mr. CARDIN: Where there are two highway bridges.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Toll bridges.

Mr. CARDIN: That is better than trying to cross the St. Lawrence and lake St. Francis where there are no bridges.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a railway bridge.

Mr. CARDIN: I have no great authority to speak for my party but as far as I am concerned personally I would be willing to accept Chateauguay-Huntingdon as it is at the present time. The proposal is to take Lacolle in St. John's-Iberville and join it to Chateauguay-Huntingdon. I cannot see any justification for that and I would be inclined to oppose this transfer. But that is not my main objection to what is proposed for Chateauguay-Huntingdon. My hon. friend will understand me when I say that in the county of Huntingdon there is a parish called Ste. Barbe. The proposal of the bill is to take that parish of Ste. Barbe from the county of Huntingdon and transfer it to the county of Beauharnois which is going to be a hive to which surrounding Liberals will be brought. That is not all. There is in the county of Beauharnois the little Conservative parish of St. Etienne. It is taken from the county of Beauharnois down to the county of Huntingdon to assist the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Moore). That is the present proposal which is being made and it is the one to which I very seriously object. It is not a matter of joining counties together or adjusting population or increasing population. My hon. friend by that process is reducing the population of his constituency, carving the parish of Ste. Barbe from it and taking in its place the parish of St. Etienne. The reason is obvious; it is to get rid of the little parish of Ste. Barbe which is Liberal and to take in the parish of St. Etienne which is Conservative and which he wants to get nearer to his heart. That is the position. As regards the constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon, if that is not gerrymandering, I wonder what gerrymandering is. In reality is it worth while to change the configuration of the county of Beauharnois, to make a hole in the south-eastern boundary of that county in order to get the small parish of St. Etienne?

An hon. MEMBER: Not a hole.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, it is a hole and as far as the municipality of Ste. Barbe is concerned, it is a little block which is added to the extreme southwestern end of the county of Beauharnois. These changes cannot be justified by any process of imagination nor for any reasons which can be advanced. If we are to apply the principle advanced by the Solicitor General that we have to find constituencies to give to Montreal and other places, it is not necessary to change Ste. Barbe or St. Etienne for that purpose; there is no reason for doing so. But I repeat, I would be ready, so far as I am concerned, to leave my hon. friend's constituency the way it is at present.

As regards the new proposal which is being made, in view of the fact that my constituency has been compared by the Prime Minister with that of Chateauguay-Huntingdon, under the new redistribution, I can say that the constituency of the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon will have a population of 24,000 and the new constituency of Richelieu will have a population of 35,000, so if there has been any discrepancy in the past the present bill takes care of it so far as I am concerned, but not so far as the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon is concerned.

Let us make a trip into the adjoining county of Beauharnois which is Liberal. The county of Beauharnois which they wanted to send across the St. Lawrence or across lake St. Francis, they wish to add to the county of Laprairie which is also Liberal. But unfortunately there is no contact between the two.

Mr. DORION (Translation): The obstacle!

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. They are separated by a portion of the county of Chateauguay and the present bill is creating a corridor in order to join the counties of Beauharnois and Laprairie. Inspired by what was done by the diplomats of Europe after the war, my hon. friends have created a new corridor; they have transplanted on the soil of Quebec the idea which originated in the minds of European diplomats. So we have a corridor joining the counties of Beauharnois and Laprairie. At a certain section it is very narrow. If I were to carve on a sheet of paper the counties of Laprairie and Beauharnois and try to keep them together by the small piece of paper which would represent the corridor, it would not keep them together; it could not stand the strain; it is so flimsy that on account of the divisions of the parishes which exist there, you could not join the two counties properly. Even at that, if there was a necessity of uniting constituencies, it is a lesser evil to have Laprairie and Beauharnois that way than to have Beauharnois and Vaudreuil-Soulanges on the other side of lake St. Francis. If that had to be done to help those constituencies to disappear and to give one more seat to the island of Montreal, arguments could be put forward and settlements reached. But I repeat what I said in regard to Chateauguay-Huntingdon: If Beauharnois is joined to Laprairie through that corridor, it should be joined as a whole, not after having the parish of St. Etienne carved out of it and the small parish of Ste. Barbe added to it. If you want to join those two constituencies, join them as they are through the corridor narrow as it is. If this were the only objection, I would not fight very strenuously in order to come to an agreement and do away with the unpleasant example which is at present being given to the country. I cannot think—and I am most sincere in saying this—that in these dying days of the session, in these days when we are ready to go home and when a large number of members have already left, in the end we are going to be forced to swallow the proposal which has been made and we shall not be able to come to some understanding. Surely there should be a possibility, with every one of us making a little compromise, of reaching an agreement and settling the matter amicably as has always been done in the past. The Prime Minister, when speaking the other day, said that on another occasion he was on a committee and they did not agree at first; they fought strongly, one against the other; they had conflicting proposals, but the fact remains that in the end they agreed. After a strenuous fight, they came to an understanding. Why not try to come to an agreement in this case? Why not be as generous as we can, make little concessions here and there and do away with the follies in connection with certain sections of Quebec which are proposed by this bill? Why not do away with that and try to agree on general lines? If we follow generally the principle advocated by the Prime Minister and try to preserve as far as possible the county boundaries, we can reach an agreement and the small difficulties outside can be very easily adjusted by the leaders of the two parties.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: As we are compelled to ask for the attendance of the House of Commons to secure royal assent to the New Zealand extension trade agreement in order that the proclamation may be issued to-day, in view of the fact that it expires to-morrow, I ask that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, May 23, 1933.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate chamber this day at 8.15 p.m. for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hour of 8.15 was selected because the Senate does not meet until eight o'clock. The right hon. gentleman is not in his seat, but I might explain that the necessity of securing royal assent is to enable proclamation to be made in connection with the New Zealand treaty for a further extension of six months. The treaty expires to-morrow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I thank my right hon. friend for repeating his former statement. I was here while he was speaking, however. As I came in I looked at the clock and it was exactly three o'clock. I must point out to His Honour the Speaker, as I have privately on two or three former occasions, that frequently the bell is rung ahead of time, and I believe in this instance the Prime Minister, according to the clock in the chamber, began to speak before three o'clock.

CONFERRING OF TITLES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In reply to the question asked yesterday by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, I have to inform him that section 17 of the British North America Act, 1867, provides that there shall be one parliament of Canada, consisting of the Queen (King), an upper house, styled the Senate, and the House of Commons, and it is the considered view of His Majesty's government in Canada that a resolution passed by one house of parliament is legally effective only as an expression of the opinion of those who support such resolution in that house, and this is particularly true with respect to the prerogatives of the crown.

The sovereign can only be deprived of a prerogative right by statute of parliament, in very special form, which the government does not propose to introduce. There is apparently no opportunity at this time for discussion of the matters referred to by the right hon. gentleman.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

The house again in committee on Bill No. 2, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

53719—336½

Mr. CARDIN: When the committee rose at one o'clock I was dealing with the proposed arrangement between the counties of Beauharnois and Laprairie. Before proceeding any farther I should like to insist upon the point which has been disputed—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes, and should not speak again before another member has spoken.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Chairman, last night when the committee rose I was saying that the reason we objected to the division of Montmagny and L'Islet was that it took away the Liberal majority. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet suggested that—

Mr. LAVERGNE: Not yet.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): The hon. member for Montmagny suggested, as a counter proposition, that L'Islet should be put with Kamouraska. I was about to answer him upon that point when—

Mr. LAVERGNE: I did not suggest that. I said, "Why not?"

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Yes, the hon. member said, "Why not?" I was about to correct him when eleven o'clock came, and the right hon. Prime Minister suggested I should continue to-day. The reason I have not an answer to give him to the new proposal he made was that that which he had suggested was not the proposition laid down in the bill. The bill which we have before us dealt with Montmagny and L'Islet. Had the bill referred to Montmagny and Kamouraska it would have been a different proposition. However the proposition before us last night was that of joining up Montmagny and L'Islet, thereby taking away the Liberal majority of 585 votes.

Mr. CARDIN: Now that we have complied with the rules of the house I ask the indulgence of hon. members to proceed with the rest of my remarks in regard to the redistribution bill before us. When I was speaking this morning the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Moore) expressed a doubt when I said that in the proposed merger of the counties of Beauharnois and Laprairie an encroachment was being made on the county of Beauharnois in order to get around the small parish of St. Etienne, and to bring it into the county of Huntingdon. There is no doubt about the matter; I looked at the map to refresh my memory in regard to the point. There is no doubt in the world that the taking of the parish of St. Etienne from the county of Beauharnois creates an encroachment on the county of Beauharnois, and creates a hole in the southern section of the constituency. If there is any doubt in the minds of hon. members I need only place before your eyes a map of what is going to be the county of Chateauguay-Huntingdon. Anyone can see the white section at the right of the map I now hold in my hand. The part to which I am now directing the attention of hon. members is that part taken from the constituency of St. Johns-Iberville. That is the Lacolle section. The small white part at the top of this map is the parish of St. Etienne which is taken from the county of Beauharnois and is to be placed in the constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon. At the corner of this map there is the parish of Ste. Barbe which, according to the project, is taken from the constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon and put into the new constituency of Beauharnois-Laprairie. There is no doubt about my contention of this morning. Anything I have said is amply supported by the maps which have been prepared showing the different constituencies, and which have been distributed to all hon. members. I need only pass before the eyes of hon. members the map which I hold in my hand showing the new county of Beauharnois-Laprairie, including the corridor I mentioned, to prove my statement. I am placing before you a design of what is going to be the county of Beauharnois-Laprairie.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): It looks like a tape-worm.

Mr. CARDIN: This small section to which I am pointing is only about two miles wide. That is the corridor by means of which connection is established between the present counties of Laprairie and Beauharnois. I suggest that my contention of this morning is perfectly justified. Then hon. members will see the little hole which is taken out, and the little tail added by the addition of the parish of Ste. Barbe. That is the position. Surely no one would contend that this change has been made in order to give more seats to the city of Montreal. More seats could be given to that city without disturbing these two parishes. If we must unite the counties of Beauharnois and Laprairie I do not object so much. Please add them together, but do not take out of one county a certain parish which satisfies a group and leave out another section of the adjoining county. I think it is unfair, and this is enough to show what has been the spirit of those who have engineered the project of redistribution that we are dealing with at the present time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I might be asked what would be the logical method of doing away with the county of Beauharnois, which is a small constituency. The logical course—though I admit that there are difficulties and that several objections could be raised, not from the point of view of geography but other considerations—the natural and logical course would be to join both Beauharnois and Chateauguay-Huntingdon. They are both part of the triangle which is formed by the St. Lawrence river, the American boundary and the counties of Laprairie and Napierville. This would be a perfect delimitation of the constituency. I recognize that it would make a very largely populated constituency, that is true. And there may be another objection of which I am ready to take cognizance. It would make that county an overwhelmingly French-Canadian county, and my friends could raise the objection that an English-speaking constituency in the province of Quebec was being done away with. That is one of the reasons for my observation that this plan would be reasonable and logical but there are serious objections to it which we ought to take into consideration, and to which I would be the first to give due weight. It would be probably a too largely populated constituency, and as to the division between the English-speaking and the French-speaking communities, it might be unfair to the English-speaking minority of the province of Quebec. Therefore in that case we are forced to abandon the logical course, the reasonable course, and try to adjust the matter in some other way. If nothing better is offered I am ready to accept the establishment of a little corridor to join the counties of Beauharnois and Chateauguay and Laprairie, but I insist that these two counties be united in the position in which they are at the present time, that they be not carved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us come to the next county which presents a serious difficulty, the county that my good friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) is trying to create for himself. He was elected in the riding of Chambly-Verchères with a majority of nearly 1,200 at the last election. I am very much surprised that he is not ready to go and face the same electors again. Generally speaking the changes that he proposes to make are not going to help him to create a seat in the island of Montreal. The change of the limits of his constituency is for other reasons than finding another constituency in Montreal. He was elected in the riding of Chambly-Verchères, and according to the new proposal he wants to make me a gift of the county of Verchères. As far as that is concerned, and if I were the only one to be considered, I would be very much pleased. There is no better population in the whole of Canada than the population of the county of Verchères. That population comes in a direct line from those who discovered this country and who first established Christianity in Canada. In the parishes of the county of Verchères we find the best citizens and the best Canadians to be found anywhere in the Dominion. As far as I am concerned, personally, I would see no objection to taking them into my county or giving them to someone else who may replace me at the next general election. Why my hon. friend is abandoning that county of Verchères I do not, I cannot understand. The reasons which have been given up to the present time are no reasons at all, they are not even a pretence capable of justifying the scheme of the present bill. But my hon. friend wants to give me the county of Verchères, excepting a section which he wants to keep with him in the county of Chambly. That section is that part of the county of Verchères included in the municipality of the town of Beloeil, the village of McMasterville, and the municipalities of Ste. Julie and St. Mathieu. I frankly admit that when we discussed the matter before that solemn committee of elder statesmen I did not raise any great objection to that. I wanted to accommodate the Minister of Marine; his summer residence is in the town of Beloeil and in view of that fact I was ready to concede that he might keep part of the county of Verchères. I mention this fact only to show in what way the work of preparing this plan of redistribution has been organized. This is an illustration of the ideas that prevailed; it shows very clearly the desire of those who are the masters and who prepared that redistribution. But the Minister of Marine is not satisfied with leaving out of his constituency the county of Verchères; he wants to carve from the county of Laprairie a small section, a small community which is at present in that county and which is to be added to the county of Chambly to satisfy his desire. He said: Well, it does not amount to much, it is a small territory. If it does not amount to much why not respect the limits of the county of Laprairie and not go to the expense and trouble of encroaching on it by taking that small and unimportant section to add to the county of Chambly? He wants to replace the county of Verchères—which apparently he does not like because he wants to get rid of it—by the county of Rouville. There would not be so much objection if he wanted to take the whole county of Rouville, but no. He wants to cross over the river. They do not like to cross over rivers in other sections of the province, they want to make the rivers the boundaries, but my hon. friend is not afraid to go over the Richelieu river and to take part of the county of Rouville, a part in which he expects to be a little more successful than he was in the county of Verchères which he wants to detach from his constituency. If he wanted to take the whole county of Rouville, well and good. If he wanted to replace the county of Verchères by the county of Rouville in its entirety I would agree to that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The whole or nothing.

Mr. CARDIN: But his objection is that that would make too large a population. He said: With what I have to-day, with what has been carved out for me, I have 40,000 population. If he would take the rest of the county of Rouville that he refuses and leave the part of Verchères he wants to retain, the population would come within a reasonable figure. But he does not want to take the whole county of Rouville for reasons which are obvious. There is a section in that county where he might be very successful and there is another section in which his success would be rather doubtful at the present time and under present circumstances. Mr. Chairman, I think that that is not fair. Our complaints in regard to the situation are perfectly justified. To repeat what I said this morning, Mr. Chairman, I cannot understand why the Conservative members, including the ministers, who were elected in 1930 are afraid to go back to the electors who sent them here. Certain members on the other side of the house deserve credit and praise for their courage. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) is ready to go back to his constituency as it existed in 1930; the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) is also ready to face the constituents he faced in 1930, and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) is ready to do the same. This is a good example which should be followed by the two French Canadian ministers from the district of Montreal. Neither my good friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) nor my good friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) is ready to go before the electors by whom he was elected in 1930; each minister wants his constituency changed. Apparently these hon. gentlemen have not the courage that is possessed by the hon. members for Stanstead, Compton and Brome-Missisquoi.

That is the position, Mr. Chairman, and I say there is no justification in the world for the proposal which has been made with regard to the new constituency of Chambly-Rouville. That is not the proper name for it; if it were named according to the division which has been suggested it should be called Chambly-Rouville-Vercheres-Laprairie. That should be the name of the new constituency which has been carved out for the benefit of my good friend the Minister of Marine. This is most objectionable, and in order to bring about that result the riding of Richelieu-Vercheres must be composed of the old county of Richelieu, plus a section of Vercheres, plus a section of the county of St. Hyacinthe, and a portion of the county of Yamaska. This is the sort of constituency that is being created under this redistribution. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that it does not mean very much, but if that is so why not keep them as they are at the present time? That would cause less embarrassment and would indicate a little more confidence on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite in the electors whom they will have to face in a year or two.

I have dealt with the constituency of Richelieu-Vercheres, Mr. Chairman; now let us go to the constituency of Nicolet-Yamaska. Because of its small population the county of Yamaska is bound to disappear. It has been kept with a small population for many years, when circumstances permitted the keeping of small constituencies, such as Argenteuil with only 18,000 and Richelieu with only 21,000. That county of Yamaska, I repeat, we are practically agreed should disappear, but in my humble judgment it should disappear in a reasonable, fair and logical way. This is a small constituency.

Mr. BENNETT: 17,000.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, about 17,000 at the present time. Why not add this constituency to Richelieu or Nicolet, or even Bagot? I see my right hon. friend the Prime Minister smiling when I mention Richelieu; probably he is under the impression that this would make Richelieu a pretty safe seat for me. If that is what my right hon. friend has in mind let me tell him that with the carving they have done they have made my seat much safer than it would be with Yamaska added to it; so I do not need to be placed in such a position. They are giving me a very strong Conservative section of St. Hyacinthe; if I have to take these people I shall be glad to do so, because they are very good citizens, though it will mean a majority of more than 400 against me there. By this means they are bringing my constituency to the very door of the city of St. Hyacinthe; that is the situation in which I find myself. However, it has been thought desirable to unite the county of Yamaska with the county of Nicolet. Very well; we can agree on that, but unite it as a whole; do not destroy the old county of Nicolet.

Let me deal first with the section of the county of Yamaska which is near the county of Richelieu. The proposal in the bill is that the municipality of Yamaska be cut in two; one half is to be united with the county of Richelieu—because they are Liberals—and the balance is to be added to the county of Nicolet. That is the sort of work that is being done. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that the Yamaska river runs through that territory. That river goes through the municipality of Yamaska; they are not separate municipalities on each side. The Yamaska river is not a navigable stream; it is narrow, and at present there is a highway bridge connecting the two parts of the municipality. My hon. friends may answer, though it is not an answer, that in certain other places municipalities have been divided. Well, two wrongs never make a right, and if that anomaly exists somewhere else that is no reason why the same thing should be done this year. The municipality of Yamaska should not be separated into two sections.

Now let us come to the county of Nicolet. Is it proposed to keep that county as it is? No; in joining the greater part of Yamaska with the county of Nicolet they want to do away with six old parishes of the old county of Nicolet and throw them into the county of Lotbiniere. They want to carve that new constituency at both ends; adjoining the county of Richelieu they want to cut the municipality of Yamaska in two, and where the county of Nicolet touches the county of Lotbiniere they want to take away six parishes and include them in Lotbiniere. They want to hive those people with the Liberals in the county of Lotbiniere. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) said we should not complain if anything is done to make the Liberal seat of Lotbiniere safer. Hon. gentlemen opposite want to make it extra safe; they want to include in the county of Lotbiniere the Liberal parishes of the county of Nicolet. That is the sort of gerrymander that is proposed.

I have heard hon. members mention municipal lines and provincial lines, and I have even heard arguments based on what are called diocesan lines; that is, that we should not destroy the limits of the diocese of a bishop. By doing that you are destroying the diocese of the Bishop of Nicolet at both ends, taking six of his parishes in Nicolet and throwing them into the county of Lotbinière. I do not insist so much upon that because I realize the force of the argument that the federal constituencies should be constructed having in view federal exigencies. I refer to this circumstance however to answer certain arguments which have been advanced against concessions that have been refused in certain quarters of the province of Quebec. If these two counties of Yamaska and Nicolet are to be joined they should be joined as they are without being carved at both ends, as now proposed.

Before leaving the southern section of the St. Lawrence, let me say a word or two in regard to the counties of Richmond-Wolfe. The counties in the eastern townships have not been touched generally; that was the understanding, the idea which prevailed at first when the party in power prepared the bill. Stanstead is not disturbed; Sherbrooke is not disturbed; Compton is not disturbed; Shefford is not disturbed. Why then disturb the old counties of Richmond-Wolfe?

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): May I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. CARDIN (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Have you taken into account the population of these various counties? The county of Richmond-Wolfe has a larger population than any other county in the eastern townships. Did you compare the figures of the population of these various counties with those of Richmond-Wolfe? Richmond-Wolfe has a population of 41,867 while those of the neighbouring counties vary between 25,000 and 31,000. Richmond-Wolfe is the most populated constituency in the eastern townships and I consider that it is only fair and just that part of its population be transferred. That is what I wished to point out to the hon. member and the house.

Mr. CARDIN: I quite understand the observations which the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe is making. His argument is that the county as it stands at the present time has a larger population than the counties I have just mentioned in the eastern townships. But if that is the case, if his county is too large and if others are too small, why not increase the small ones? I am not the master of this redistribution; the government is the father of the bill. If the member for Stanstead has not a sufficient population why not increase it? If there is not a sufficient population in Compton—if I am not mistaken the figure is 29,000, but it does not matter —and if the county of Stanstead is too small, a county of 25,000, why not have an increase to a certain extent? If that were done we might find a justification for taking out from the counties of Richmond-Wolfe a certain proportion of their population. The idea that has been put forward since this discussion has started has been to increase the population of small counties. Why then reduce counties which are still below the number they should have according to the census? If my hon. friend's county of Richmond-Wolfe has 42,000, it is still lower than the figure which is given as a guide for redistribution. Why not keep as they are counties which have a reasonable population at the present time and so avoid the necessity next time of going over all these constituencies again, exposing them to changes as a result of every census? If the county of Richmond-Wolfe has 40,000 it is within the reasonable limits of population, and the county is not going to be disturbed by the next census; whereas if you reduce the county of Richmond-Wolfe to a population of 30,000 or 29,000, at the next census you will have to recast the whole thing and bring in a new scheme of redistribution. I understand my hon. friend's position, but a county with a population of 40,000 is not extraordinary, because one of the new counties being created in the north of the province of Quebec is to be established with a population of 41,000; and there are in the province of Quebec a number of constituencies which are not being touched and in which the population is higher than the population in the county of Richmond-Wolfe. One has only to look at the counties of Drummond-Arthabaska, 53,000; Charlevoix-Saguenay, 55,000; Chambly-Rouville, as at present carved, 40,000; and there are many others in the same position. Pontiac has 42,000, Rimouski 40,000, and St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, as now proposed, will have a population of 42,000.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Have you any objection to mentioning the counties which have less population?

Mr. CARDIN (Translation): I have no objection, absolutely none.

I have not gone through the list, but I admit, and it is undeniable, that there are several counties with a much smaller population than Richmond-Wolfe. I am not blind; I can realize that, and I know perfectly well that there are other counties in that situation. But I think I am equally right in saying that there is no reason for complaint on the ground that the population of the county is 40,000 when the present bill creates new constituencies in rural Quebec with a population exceeding that figure, and when by this bill we are increasing the population of certain small constituencies where the figure is lower than 40,000.

In my opinion therefore it is not fair to bring about such a change without the necessity for providing a new seat. This has no relation whatever to the creation of new seats in Montreal—none at all. The changes I have just mentioned affect only the relationship between counties and counties and do not help to provide one more county for Montreal or in the north of the province of Quebec. I think it is unfair to take away from Richmond-Wolfe five or six parishes which have always been included in that county.

The Solicitor General referred, as no doubt other hon. members will, to the changes made in 1924. May I point out that in the proposed changes in this redistribution bill there is nothing to alter what was done in 1924. If there is any complaint in regard to the changes made in 1924 it cannot be of any great importance because hon. gentlemen are ready to accept what was done at that time. Their proposed changes do not reestablish the limits before 1924. The changes that are being made are new ones, absolutely independent of the changes which were made in the redistribution of 1924, so that on that score there is no justification for hon. gentlemen opposite. They may cite a list of changes in 1924, most of them minor changes, and to which no one objected, but the proof that everything was satisfactory is the fact that hon. gentlemen were elected in 1930 on the strength of that redistribution. And they are not asking that a change be made now.

I am frank enough and fair enough to say that if the committee of elder statesmen had continued to sit I could have reached an agreement with the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe. I think he knows me well enough to understand that I would have been fair and I believe we could have found common ground upon which to agree with regard to Richmond-Wolfe. I submit that it is not fair that this thing should be done in the way it is being done by this bill. After all, this would have been a very small difficulty to adjust between ourselves. I know he is fair enough and I think he will credit me with also being fair. He may not have been the master of the situation but perhaps we could have gone over the head of somebody else and found ground for agreement in regard to this county. A constituency is being dismantled without justification. So much for the southern section of the province of Quebec.

Let us go north for a moment. The proposal made by this bill is that the counties of L'Assomption and Terrebonne be joined. Terrebonne is a large county and it does not need to be increased. Its population is larger than that of many of the constituencies which have been created by this redistribution bill. Terrebonne could be left without being disturbed because it has sufficient population. I submit it is a mistake to change the present constituency of L'Assomption-Montcalm. These counties were united by the Conservative party in 1914 and they go together better than any other two counties in Canada. They have common interests in the cultivation of tobacco, one of the most important industries in the dominion, and the addition of Terrebonne will change the whole situation. But if this has to be done, why should it not be done by joining L'Assomption and Terrebonne in their entirety. Why does the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) want to carve out of the county of Terrebonne the towns of Ste. Therese and St. Janvier? Why not leave these two places where they are; why disturb the boundaries of Terrebonne? Terrebonne could have been joined to L'Assomption to provide another constituency to take care of Montreal or the northern section of the province. But they were not satisfied to do that. They have created a riding which will cause some difficulties when considered from certain points of view. Instead of separating L'Assomption and Montcalm, I think we would be ready to join with Joliette, not only Montcalm but also L'Assomption. It is true that that would make a very large constituency but the county of Joliette—

Mr. DORION (Translation): We are willing to accept the hon. member's offer.

Mr. CARDIN: Without any restrictions? I have heard that a proposal of that kind would be permitted to go through provided we allowed the Postmaster General to get

Ste. Therese and St. Janvier. Other centres would be thrown into Montreal. That cannot be agreed to but if they want to avoid dividing the counties of L'Assomption and Montcalm and join them with the county of Joliette, as far as we are concerned we are inclined to agree. It would make a constituency with a little over 50,000 of population but we would not be afraid of that. There are other constituencies in the province containing more than 50,000 population. I have mentioned one already which contains 55,000.

I regret that I must abide by the forty-minute rule but I will complete my observations after another hon. gentleman has spoken.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Chairman, as was stated this morning by some hon. members on this side of the house, this redistribution was not desired by the party in power. It had to be done according to our constitution. At every decennial census it is the duty of parliament to redistribute the representation in the House of Commons. I think everyone will admit that redistribution is a very difficult task. The adjusting of boundaries of constituencies is a difficult problem and it is natural that diversities of opinion exist on the subject. It is manifestly impossible to make a division which will please everyone but after having heard my hon. friends opposite one would come to the conclusion that they want no redistribution at all. They want the boundaries of the counties left exactly as they are; they do not want to consider the changes in population and other circumstances which should be taken into consideration in a case like this. I was not a member of the committee but I have studied the map and the figures suggested by the committee and in my opinion it is a very fair redistribution. This committee has taken into consideration every circumstance which should be considered. Our friends opposite seem to have only one thing in mind—political circumstances.

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If a parish or a township has been taken from one county and put into another my hon. friends opposite will not admit that the committee had to take into consideration the equality of population. They say it has been for political purposes. I am not surprised to hear those views because our friends opposite have had their own way in the province of Quebec for forty years. They have ruled in that province, they have made their own political map and decided their own boundaries, provincially and municipally. As everyone knows, the political map of Quebec is the basis of redistribution in the federal field. Of course, if you look at the statutes of Canada you will not find many changes except perhaps in 1903. I might come to that later on.

Mr. POULIOT: In 1892.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not during the debate on this redistribution.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall be ready to meet the hon. gentleman on the matter.

Mr. DURANLEAU: A number of changes were made in 1903 and if many were not made in 1924, this was because the basis of our redistribution was the provincial boundaries. Our friends from Quebec who are not very scrupulous and I think the Dillon act, which is still on the statutes of Quebec, is a proof that they were not very scrupulous—

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has accused us on this side of not being scrupulous. I suggest that that is not parliamentary and should not be used.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Speaking to the point of order, I just stated that the Quebec boundaries were made the basis of the federal redistribution and I am trying to show that the lines of those boundaries were not very scrupulously made.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): It was not the boundaries the hon. member said were not scrupulous; it was the men who made the boundaries that he said were not scrupulous. That is unparliamentary and should not be used.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Boundaries have no scruples.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Shaver): The hon. member did not name any member; I think he is in order.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): He named the members on this side of the house.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Our hon. friends opposite are asking why so many changes in the province of Quebec have been made by the redistribution committee. Obviously, if we wanted to make a fair redistribution we had to make these changes. As has been stated, we had to give three more seats to the island of Montreal and on account of the increase in population from 36,000, the quota of representation of the last distribution, to a quota this year of 44,100, we could not do otherwise than make changes. Then we have to take into consideration the fact that our hon. friends opposite in the redistribution of 1924 did not seem to take into account the population of the province. Why? Was it because they were satisfied politically with the lines of the constituencies in Quebec in 1924 when they had friends returned in almost every riding? Was it because of that that they left a great number of seats in Quebec with a population of 20,000 although the quota was 36,000? Why did they do that?

Mr. FAFARD: Hon. gentlemen opposite have done the same thing this year.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Do they not think the duty of parliament in case of redistribution is to take into consideration the population of the province, not the fact that a constituency is Liberal and that a change might affect the chances of a Liberal friend? We have to take into consideration the population of every constituency and that is what has been done in this instance. The hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) admitted very frankly that it was a difficult task to make a redistribution so as to give to the population equality of representation. He stated that in Quebec we were anxious to preserve a few seats for the English speaking element of our province. I am quite in accord with my hon. friend's views on this question. It is true that we have always been trying to give to the minority in Quebec a fair representation in this house and I think this should be the case in all the provinces; every minority should have a voice in the House of Commons and that is why we have protected some of the English-speaking constituencies of Quebec.

The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Richelieu have laid great stress on the provincial or municipal boundaries of the constituencies of our province. According to them, it is a crime for this house to touch these boundaries.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a crime; it is a mistake.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Why do they say so? We do not deprive those citizens of their right of voting; we do not deprive them of the rights of citizenship. They have still the right to vote and I say that we give that population an opportunity to be in a better position to exercise their rights of citizenship than was the case before. We have to take into consideration the population of those constituencies.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

To my hon. friends who are so fond of speaking about respecting the municipal boundaries of Quebec, I say: That is fine to hear, but was it done in the past by the Liberal party?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If you read the Hansards of the past, you will find the principles which were laid down by the late great chief of the Liberal party in regard to the lines of municipal counties in Quebec, but what did they do after the speech of their leader on the subject?

Mr. POULIOT: They did right.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under my hon. friends there were in Quebec twenty-three federal constituencies, also provincial constituencies, which did not conform to municipal lines.

Mr. POULIOT: May I say just a word to my hon. friend?

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend wishes to make a speech, I shall not allow it, but if it a question, it is all right.

Mr. POULIOT: Just one sentence and it will be short. In the province of Quebec there have been changes pro forma, not to change but to maintain the old boundaries; that is all.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend should wait to make those statements in one of his sixty-five speeches. That is not a question.

Mr. POULIOT: But this was a speech in one sentence.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What was the date when that statement was made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Mr. DURANLEAU: During the session of 1899.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What date?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the date, but I can give the volume of Hansard and the page.

Mr. POULIOT: There was no redistribution that year.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There was the principle laid down by the Liberal party, but it was not followed. My hon. friends are like the reprobates of the Divine Comedy of Dante who left all their hopes at the door of the inferno. The Liberal party, before entering what they think is the heaven of power, leave at the door all their principles, to take them up again when they go out of power.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that principle when he said:

We think it is a principle which will commend itself universally to public opinion, that the basis of representation in this house should be municipal and county organizations.

After quoting the words of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the opposition in 1924 said:

It is upon that basis—

Municipal organizations.

—we shall expect the committee to whom the present bill will be referred to proceed.

If you look at the Quebec map you will find that there are twenty-three constituencies in Quebec, provincially and federally, which do not conform to municipal boundaries or county boundaries. Take Arthabaska, Brome, Compton, Drummond, Frontenac, Hochelaga, Hull, Jacques Cartier, Kamouraska, Labelle, Lotbiniere, Matane, Megantic, Nicolet, Richmond, Rimouski, Saguenay, Stanstead, and Témiscouata—those counties are not the same as are the municipal counties. Why? Because the Liberal party did not follow that principle. I say that owing to a lack of redistribution made in 1924, a great number of constituencies were left without any quota. The redistribution at this time has to be made complete, and that is what we are doing. It is no crime to depart from municipal boundaries—not at all. I think it fair that we give to the population, irrespective of municipal boundaries, a fair representation in population and in area. It is well known that in arranging the redistribution we had to take into account a great number of circumstances.

The hon. member for Richelieu has dwelt at length with almost every constituency in the vicinity of Montreal. After listening to this gentleman we are supposed to believe that this redistribution is a terrible piece of legislation, that it is a monster, that it is anything that is bad. Well, Mr. Chairman, I say that exactly the contrary is true. If hon. members would look at the map and consider all the circumstances which have to be considered in connection with a redistribution, they will realize that the report of the committee is fair and equitable to every citizen in all parts of the country.

The hon. member has spoken about two new constituencies which were made in the northern part of the province. One has about 21,000 population and the other about 25,000 or 26,000. The two to which he has referred are Lafleche-St. Maurice and Chapleau. If the hon. member would look at the map he would see that Chapleau represents almost one-fifth of the whole area of the province of Quebec.

Mr. CARDIN: One of the areas has a population of 46,000.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Chapleau represents practically one-fifth of the area of the province of Quebec. Its population is not centred in small towns, but is scattered throughout the constituency. I hold that this constituency, which is crossed only by a railway, is entitled to representation. The citizens in that district could not be fairly represented with the map as it previously existed. Anyone who is familiar with the province will admit that some representation should be given to that part of the province. It is a section under colonization. I do not say that the population will increase rapidly but I do say that owing to the area and the population that constituency should have a representative.

The same observations would apply to Lafleche-St. Maurice. It is a very large constituency with a large population. If hon. members would look at the figures they would conclude that a fairly reasonable division has been made. The hon. member has suggested that a change has been made in connection with Three Rivers in order that an easier seat would be made for the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois). But if my hon. friend would consider all the circumstances I believe he would change his mind and come to the conclusion that this redistribution has been fair and equitable.

My hon. friend spoke concerning the divisions in the city of Montreal. Both parties agreed that instead of giving thirteen seats to that city it would be only fair that with a population of over 1,000,000 people it should be entitled to at least sixteen representatives, with a quota of 50,000 to 75,000 representation. My hon. friend asked why a redivision should be made of all the constituencies in the city of Montreal. I hold such a change was absolutely necessary.

Mr. CARDIN: That is not exactly what I said.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We could not add three new seats to Montreal without retouching almost every constituency on the island. My hon. friend's own maps would show the same thing. Hon. members opposite admitted it had to be done. Hon. members say that the constituency of St. Mary has disappeared. Speaking frankly, I do not see anything in that. St. James, St. Mary, Hochelaga and Maisonneuve all have about the same population. It is a population of Canadians with large families, aspirations, people with the same habits. I do not see any crime in making a slight difference in the boundary lines. The only way to do it was to put St. James and St. Mary in one constituency. I say there was nothing wrong in that. As a matter of fact my hon. friend will admit that we were prepared to meet their wishes. We were prepared to give to St. Mary the very same lines which existed previously, although to my mind it made no difference at all. We were and are still prepared to do that. I say that my hon. friends are now trying to make some political capital out of this matter of redistribution. If I judge correctly from the tone of their speeches made this morning, that would seem to be their object.

My hon. friend spoke also of Outremont. I am glad he brought up this question. When the first draft was made by the committee my hon. friend representing Laurier strenuously objected to the lines of the city of Outremont being changed. Is that right or not?

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): All the division. I wanted Outremont to remain as it was.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That was the wish of my hon. friend. Now that we are reverting to the lines of the city of Outremont, my hon. friend seems to object.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I want to put that question to my hon. friend and when answering he might put his own question. Do I understand that my hon. friend representing Laurier-Outremont is now opposing the line of the city of Outremont? I want to know that, because we can accommodate my hon. friend otherwise. But I say this: if we have reverted to the line of the city of Outremont it is because it was the wish of my hon. friend at first and because it is the wish of a great number of citizens of that part of the constituency.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): The question that I wanted to put to the minister is this: will he explain exactly what is to be done with Montreal? We have heard so many rumours we do not know where we are. If the minister would say now what is to be done to Montreal that might clarify the situation and there might not be any discussion at all.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not intend at the present time to give all the details of the redistribution in the island of Montreal, it would take too long. It will come in committee when we discuss each and every constituency in the island of Montreal. But I thought it was the wish of my hon. friend that we should revert to the city lines, and that is what we are doing. Anyway we will come to this point later. Now my hon. friend from Richelieu said: Why touch the lines of the counties in the city of Montreal?

Mr. CARDIN: That is not what I said. My hon. friend ought to be fair. I said: Why change the agreement practically reached before the special committee of what is called the elder statesmen?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Because we did not agree.

Mr. CARDIN: We were satisfied, we agreed.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): We might agree now, but we do not know where we stand.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If you do not know now you will know later on. But I may say our friends in Quebec have changed the boundaries of the counties in the island of Montreal time and again. My hon. friends will remember 1923 when my county of Laurier was cut in half to make a Liberal constituency, which is called to-day the Mercier division.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): That was not federal.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, but I say our friends opposite did not respect county boundaries at all. They divided the counties to fit their own purposes, their political purposes. It is surprising to see how scandalized and amazed they are to-day because we have made some redistribution to give a fair representation to the population of Quebec.

My hon. friends have dwelt at some length on the new constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon and Beauharnois-Laprairie. Well, I suppose my hon. friend will not complain of the fact that we have left Vaudreuil-Soulanges with 21,000 population without any change whatever. I suppose my hon. friend will not object to that?

Mr. DUPUIS: And Laprairie will have to pay for it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think my hon. friend has studied the situation carefully, when he makes that statement.

Mr. DUPUIS: I know one thing, my riding is cut away.

Mr. DURANLEAU: At first we thought that Beauharnois should be united to Vaudreuil-Soulanges. Of course everyone knows that Vaudreuil-Soulanges is on the boundary of Ontario, no population can be taken from that side. Vaudreuil-Soulanges have about the same population as Beauharnois; the church interests are the same, their bishop is at Valleyfield, they have their courts at Valleyfield and they go to Valleyfield for their business—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Not at all. I come from Valleyfield, there is no bridge, there is no communication.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a railway bridge.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Two trains a day.

Mr. DURANLEAU: And apart from a little portion on one side of the lake the river St. Lawrence is not very large there, and not deep at all. As a matter of fact we all know—

Mr. CARDIN: You cannot walk across, there is enough water to prevent you walking.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, but you have the railway bridge.

Mr. POULIOT: Do you see the farmer with his cart crossing on the railway bridge? He would be killed by the train.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend is very cute.

Mr. DUPUIS: The farmer would not be so cute.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Your proposition is more cute.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The proposition was fair, it would give a population of from 40,000 to 42,000. But my hon. friends objected so strenuously that we had to yield and say, all right, we will not touch Vaudreuil-Soulanges. But the committee had to do something with the other constituencies. I admit it was a very difficult task, not because we wanted to make a Conservative constituency, my hon. friends opposite will admit that Vaudreuil-Soulanges is a Liberal constituency, and my hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) will admit that Laprairie and Beauharnois will be a Liberal constituency. I do not think there is any question about that. When my hon. friend speaks of the corridor, I say exactly the contrary; there is a corridor existing now and we are doing away with that corridor by joining Laprairie and Beauharnois. If you take the map you will see that Chateauguay-Huntingdon is on the boundary of the United States, down below.

Mr. DUPUIS: Down below!

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, my expression may not be appropriate. I hope my hon. friend will be happier in his expressions when he will address the house. I say that a part of Chateauguay goes as high as the St. Lawrence river perhaps three or four miles or more, while Chateauguay-Huntingdon goes as far as the St. Lawrence river, starting from the United States boundary. The committee thought the only thing to do was to use that strip of land as a connecting link between Beauharnois-Laprairie. It makes a very reasonable constituency. I do not say it is perfect, it is impossible to make things perfect under these circumstances, but they have the population. If you look at the figures you will see that they have a fairly good representation, 41,399. Now you have the national route starting from Montreal to Malone which passes through these two constituencies. As a matter of fact the future representative of Beauharnois-Laprairie will visit his whole constituency in a day on account of that national road. The population of both constituencies have the same habits and the same interests.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): We are not a band of Zulus!

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think my hon. friend can object very strenuously to the joining of these constituencies.

Mr. POULIOT: They hear the same things on the radio.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend from Richelieu admits that in these circumstances the joining of those two counties would be accepted, except the removing of St. Etienne and Ste. Barbe from one constituency to another. My hon. friend made a good deal of fuss about those two parishes. Well, I think if you look at the map you will see that these two parishes are on the edge of the constituencies, and the change does not destroy the lines materially.

Mr. CARDIN: The minister is not serious, surely, when he makes that statement.

Mr. DURANLEAU: One of our hon. friends opposite said that since the report of the committee the map of Quebec has been a sort of puzzle. Well, Mr. Chairman, the map of Quebec has been a puzzle for years. My hon. friends had their own way in that province, and I would invite our English-speaking friends from the other provinces to look at the map of Quebec as it was after the redistribution of 1924. The map is nothing but a puzzle, and if you look at the map to-day you will see that it is much better.

Mr. CARDIN: Still worse.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The map is at the disposal of my hon. friends; my hon. friend from Témiscouata knows it very well.

Mr. POULIOT: I know the map by heart, as well as the minister does.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What about the Indian reservation near Caughnawaga? You are getting away with that if you leave it in Beauharnois.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It forms part of Laprairie, and it is not disturbed.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Do those Indians go into Chambly?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, not at all. I will come to that in a moment; there is nothing extraordinary about my own constituency. My hon. friend from Richelieu said there was only one thing to do, and that was to join Beauharnois with Chateauguay-Huntingdon.

Mr. CARDIN: I did not say that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That was what I understood; if I am wrong I should like to be corrected.

Mr. CARDIN: I said that could be done.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend admitted that it would be quite proper.

Mr. CARDIN: No, I said it could be done; geographically that would be the best thing, but there are other objections.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will admit that if this had been done it would have been a departure from the principle that, so far as possible, we should protect the seats of the minority.

Mr. CARDIN: I said that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If Beauharnois had been joined to Chateauguay-Huntingdon it would have nullified the chances of an English candidate in that constituency.

Mr. CARDIN: That was one of the objections I mentioned as against the geographical advantages.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend made particular reference to the division of Chambly-Rouville and St. Hyacinthe and Richelieu. That was also a very difficult problem with regard to population. As my hon. friend knows, Richelieu had a representation of only 21,000. Surely we could not have Vaudreuil-Soulanges with a population of only 21,000 and Richelieu with the same population as well, so the committee thought that a division should be made in order to give a fair representation in population to Richelieu. This is why the larger part of Vercheres was joined to Richelieu. My hon. friend says the member for Chambly-Vercheres was not satisfied with the citizens of Vercheres. I can tell my hon. friend that I have more friends in Vercheres to-day than in any other part of the province; I have no better friends than those in Vercheres. The committee did not only consider the interests of the member; we had to give fair representation according to population, and that is why the committee thought a part of Vercheres should be added to Richelieu.

My hon. friend went to to say that a part of Laprairie was also added to Chambly. I am afraid my hon. friend does not know the conditions existing there. As a matter of fact that was done against my wish. The committee asked me if I would consent to take a strip of land in Laprairie because the population of St. Lambert and Greenfield Park, which are two cities on the bounaries of Laprairie, had overflowed. This overflow formed part of Greenfield Park and St. Lambert so far as religious purposes and other interests are concerned, as a matter of fact a part of this population is called St. Lambert annex. I was asked, and the committee was asked by some citizens of that locality, if there would be any objection to joining this little strip of land to the population of St. Lambert and Greenfield Park because as a matter of fact they had nothing to do with Laprairie except to pay taxes there. All their relations were with St. Lambert and Greenfield Park. I said I had no objection, but personally I do not care whether or not I keep that part of Laprairie that is added to Chambly.

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the minister allow me a question? Who gave him this information that these people had nothing to do with Laprairie?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will have to ask the committee about that, but I know that someone representing that population came to the committee and asked if this would not be advisable. The population only numbers a little over 700, so it is not very important. They claim that all their relations are with St. Lambert and with Greenfield Park.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Shaver): The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. CARDIN: I think the committee had better let me finish to-day and get rid of me. I have only a very few observations to make in order to complete what I have to say, and I think it would be better to finish my remarks now. When I was reminded that I had spoken for forty minutes I was dealing with the counties of L'Assomption, Montcalm, Joliette and Terrebonne. My point was that there was no reason for destroying the present county of L'Assomption-Montcalm and that if there was any justification for increasing the population in the county of Joliette we might as well add the counties of L'Assomption and Montcalm to the county of Joliette. I understand that would make a total population of a little over 50,000, but this is no great objection when we see that many other constituencies have representations of 50,000 or more. An intimation came from the other side of the house that the Conservative party was ready to accept the suggestion and join the three counties of L'Assomption, Montcalm and Joliette. If this was a clear understanding certainly there would be no objection, but with that suggestion from the other side came certain other conditions. These other conditions were that the present Postmaster General should retain the supposed advantages he is getting from the bill now before the house. The Postmaster General is asking that the town of Ste. Therese in the county of Terrebonne and St. Janvier also in the county of Terrebonne be added to the county of Two Mountains, and that the three parishes of Pont Viau, Laval des Rapides and L'Abord a Plouffe, which are at the present time in the county of Two Mountains be transferred to the county of Mercier. We object to that, but if the question with regard to L'Assomption, Montcalm and Joliette can be decided without regard to these requests from the Postmaster General we will agree. We cannot however agree to the proposal to allow the Postmaster General to take from the county of Terrebonne two municipalities and throw from the county of Two Mountains three municipalities in the county of Mercier. We cannot accept that.

I contend that the county of Two Mountains, being a small constituency, should be increased rather than reduced. It is true that by adding St. Janvier and Ste. Therese you would increase somewhat the population of Two Mountains, but by throwing out of Two Mountains Laval des Rapides and L'Abord a Plouffe you are reducing the two counties to that extent. Why change the boundaries of that county?

There is also the county of Argenteuil, which is a small constituency.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Would not my hon. friend admit that these three parishes on the other side of the bridge practically form part of the island of Montreal?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Are not the residents of these three parishes almost all citizens of Montreal—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —having their place of business in Montreal.

Mr. CARDIN: That is not the case. These municipalities have formed part of the county of Two Mountains for years.

Mr. DURANLEAU: But now there is the overflow in Montreal.

Mr. CARDIN: You object to taking into the county of Nicolet and Yamaska the western section of the village of Yamaska because there is the river of Yamaska, and now you want to throw across Riviere des Prairies the three parishes I have mentioned and which are now in Two Mountains. If you wish to keep Yamaska river as the boundary in one case, you ought to keep Riviere des Prairies as the boundary in the other, as it has been for years. These municipalities are not inhabited by citizens of Montreal; they are municipalities and centres by themselves and the population lives there the year round. There is no comparison between these three centres and other centres along lake St. Louis in the county of Jacques Cartier. These people are summer residents, in the section of Dorval and along St. Louis in the constituency of Jacques Cartier; but L'Abord a Plouffe and Laval des Rapides have always been in the county of Two Mountains, and there is no more objection to their being in the county of Two Mountains because they are small villages than there is to the town of Ste. Therese. If the minister wants to discard these centres because they are villages, why does the Postmaster General want to take Ste. Therese from the county of Terrebonne and place it in the county of Two Mountains? In my opinion there is no justification for such a proposal.

The proposal before us now is to increase the county of Argenteuil, which at the present time—

An hon. MEMBER: It has been settled this afternoon.

Mr. CARDIN: I am not speaking of what has transpired since negotiations took place. In the bill before us it is suggested that the county of Argenteuil should be increased by taking the southeast corner of the county of Labelle and transferring it into the county of Argenteuil, building up the population from 18,000 to about 28,000 in the county of Argenteuil. But there is no need to destroy the county of Labelle as it exists. That county should remain as it is. There is no reason for making such a change. The population of the county of Labelle is not very large, but it is larger than the population of surrounding counties, and if the county of Labelle is large enough, the county of Argenteuil being a small county, why arrange matters in such a way that, instead of having a large county and a small one, we shall have two small counties now? If you take that part of the county of Labelle and place it in the county of Argenteuil, Argenteuil will still be a small county and you will only make the county of Labelle smaller than it is at present. There is no reason for such a change. It would be easy to make adjustments in Argenteuil. It could be joined to Terrebonne, which would be logical. The more logical step to take, from the point of view of population and boundaries, would be to join Argenteuil to Two Mountains; they are two small counties. But I am fair enough to recognize that it is probably asking too much to propose that you place two ministers together, one in front of the other. Throwing the hon. member for Argenteuil into a fight with the Postmaster General would be logical, taking into consideration the constituencies, the boundary lines and the population; but it might not be fair so far as personal feelings are concerned. Therefore I do not insist on that. I mention it only to show what would be the more logical thing to do, joining two counties that have not sufficient population if they remain as they are. You might also join the county of Two Mountains and the county of Terrebonne; that would be much more logical than joining L'Assomption and Terrebonne. There are many ways whereby the difficulty might be adjusted. I will go further. If the government is ready to join together L'Assomption, Montcalm and Joliette, I am prepared to leave all the other constituencies in that vicinity undisturbed—no change in Terrebonne, no change in Two Mountains, no change in Argenteuil, no change in the county of Labelle. So far as I am concerned, I would just as soon leave the county of Argenteuil as it is; it is an English speaking constituency with a population of 18,000, and I would just as soon have it that way as with 25,000 or 26,000 or even 28,000 because it would still be a small constituency. It would still be too small a constituency and any readjustment in population would not improve matters very much.

I think we could all agree and leave the rest of the northern section of the province as it is. That would be a very satisfactory settlement. I would not be afraid to have in the province of Quebec certain constituencies where the population was below the required number. It would not matter very much because whatever we do we cannot equalize the population in that province. That is impossible, so what is the use of carving out of a constituency a certain number of parishes in order to increase the adjoining constituency by a small number? The result is that even with the addition, the population has not been brought up to the number required by the last census. What is the use of disturbing all the harmony which has existed in that section of the province in order to achieve a result which is not better than the present situation? Let, if you will, Joliette have a population of 51,000, and do not disturb the rest. I think that compromise could be accepted.

This completes my poor observations and I ask to be pardoned for having spoken so long with regard to this matter. I may have something to say later on but I want to conclude with the expression of a thought which is very deep in my heart, that we should be capable of doing better than has been done by this bill. We should be capable of stopping this disgraceful fight about small things which are not going to mean very much or have a very great significance when we place our arguments before the electors of the province of Quebec. I hate to see the province of Quebec made the subject of such criticism and such fighting. According to the information I have received, this will be the only province in which there will be a bitter fight to the end. Concessions have been made by the government in other provinces in order to reach an agreement and avoid disgraceful discussion in the House of Commons. Why are our Conservative friends from the province of Quebec not ready to make some concessions and put a little water in their wine in order that our province may not be held up as a disgrace? Why should we show the public that we are incapable of understanding, why should we fight over little things like the taking of a parish of less than 200 out of the county of Huntingdon, or a parish of a few hundred out of the county of Beauharnois? These are small things when compared with the problems with which the Prime Minister has to deal. A few parishes have been taken out of the county of Nicolet and put into the riding of Lotbiniere in order to make the former a safer ground for a Conservative candidate. It is considered that he would have a better chance but how does that compare with the problems which we have to solve in these times of difficulty? What is that compared to the good reputation of the province of Quebec? These small matters could be disposed of and the bill could be corrected with five strokes of the pen. This could be done if we were reasonable on all sides and if our friends were willing to make legitimate concessions. I feel sure in the bottom of my heart that we can agree. Why should such a poor example be set for all the other provinces of Canada? Sacrifices have been made there by both sides of politics but in the province of Quebec we cannot agree.

Our friends on the other side want to take a small parish from Huntingdon to place it in Beauharnois; they want to put certain parishes in Chateauguay-Huntingdon and they want to take the Liberal parishes from Richmond-Wolfe and put them in Megantic. I think I can see my way clear to speak for the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche) and say that they will make a compromise. There is a difference only of five or six parishes. I would be willing to cut that difference in two and give my hon. friend some satisfaction. I would do the same thing with the six parishes in Nicolet which it is proposed shall be thrown into Lotbiniere. I would be willing to make a sacrifice of three and possibly four in order to reach an agreement. These are some of the sacrifices I would be willing to make as a Liberal and as the leader of a very small section of the province of Quebec. I am ready to make these concessions in order to avoid the disgrace which is going to fall on the province of Quebec because we cannot agree.

Very serious sacrifices have been made in the province of Ontario in order to solve the difficulties there. I know it has not been an easy matter to have certain counties in Ontario kept as they are; I know it has been a very hard job for the hon. members who got together to keep the constituencies as they exist at the present time, but sacrifices have been made by the English speaking colleagues of the French ministers. I am told that sacrifices have been made in the face of protests and objections which have been raised. They have decided to agree and now the province of Quebec is the only province which has not agreed. Why? Because the French Canadian ministers and certain French representatives on the other side of the house want to carve out constituencies and change the boundaries of counties in which they were elected in 1930 by very substantial majorities. Why should we not all be men enough to stop these petty criticisms? It is all very well to say that we have had our way for forty years, but that did not prevent hon. gentlemen opposite from being elected. The supposed gerrymandering which took place at the last redistribution did not prevent the Minister of Marine being elected in Chambly-Vercheres. It did not prevent the Postmaster General and other French members now sitting on the other side being elected. This supposed gerrymander could not have been so bad because they were elected in spite of it.

Let them have the courage to go back before the electors who sent them here and whose mandate they have exercised in this house. Let them take a lesson from the man they call their god, from their leader the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and not go to him as they are at the present time with a stuttering and shivering prayer asking that they be taken out of the constituencies which have elected them and be given safer seats made by the carving up of other constituencies. I have never been so seriously convinced as I am at the present time that the answer of the Prime Minister will be: Young men, take courage, because fear has never spelled victory for any man or any party.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have listened very patiently every minute of every hour of yesterday and all of to-day to the arguments that have been made in this house against the bill which is now before this committee for consideration. I have endeavoured to approach the problems dispassionately, but there are certain facts that cannot be overlooked and one would be indeed an unfair and unjust man who would not recognize them. Redistribution in its very nature is a task that has always invoked passions in the House of Commons, sometimes in a moderate and sometimes in a most immoderate way; sometimes because there has been a frank recognition on the part of all parties that an effort is being made to take advantage of redistribution for political purposes; at other times for other reasons.

Let me remind the committee that in the days of the first prime minister of this country there were great difficulties about redistribution and that the leader of the opposition who finally succeeded in destroying the Conservative party in 1896, pledged his party that if he came into power, an effort would be made to have a redistribution effected by a committee of the house. As a matter of fact, the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was responsible for one redistribution and one only, in 1903. The census was taken in 1901 and the redistribution was made in 1903. Being curious to ascertain whether there was that measure of perfection that we might expect because a parliamentary committee had been set up, I took the trouble to turn up the journals of the house and it is amazing to find just what those journals disclose. At page 87 of the journals for 1903, there is the following entry:

Ordered, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier have leave to bring in a bill to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

He accordingly presented the said bill to the house, and the same was received and read the first time; and ordered to be read a second time to-morrow.

On a further page there is the entry of the second reading of the bill and the setting up of a committee which was established for the purpose of determining what the boundaries should be. That, I am sure, was regarded as a reasonably fair committee. It consisted of Messieurs Fitzpatrick, Sutherland (Oxford), Hyman, Davis, Borden (Halifax), Haggart and Monk, with instructions to prepare schedules. But before the committee was set up and second reading was given to the bill, a debate arose as to the interpretation to be placed upon the British North America Act and a division occurred, the question being whether there should be referred to the courts the issue as to the legal interpretation to be placed upon the act. That the government defeated by 72 votes to 37.

The committee did its work and if those who may be interested will take the trouble to turn to page 575 of the journals of that year, they will find that not only were there profound differences in the house, but they were expressed in terms of motions on the third reading in which motions the principles declared for by Mr. Borden in the committee—and the details will be found at page 576—were voted upon in the house again on third reading, the vote being 28 to 65. The principles that Mr. Borden in the committee asked to have passed, one might well have thought, after listening to what has been said here by the opposition, during the last two days, had been declared by them. I mention that because it must be apparent to every thoughtful man in the house that those out of power always charge those in power with failing to apply what they conceive to be the correct principles for redistribution; and those in power declare that they are applying the principles which their opponents applied when they were in power. That is the situation. There were five or six divisions on the third reading, but I will read only two or three. The first resolution, as it appears on page 575 of the issue of the journals for September 25, 1903, was moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and seconded by Sir William Mulock, that the bill be now read the third time. Mr. Haggart moved, in amendment, seconded by Mr. Kaulbach, that it be recommitted to the whole house for the purpose of rearranging the schedules in accordance with the principles laid down by Mr. Borden to the select committee. Those principles are:

(a) The municipal county boundaries shall be those as set forth in chapter 3, revised statutes of Ontario, 1897, and the word "county" herein shall include any provisional county or territorial district established by the said act.

(b) The separate representation to be allotted to the city of Toronto shall first be fixed and determined before proceeding with the representation of the rural constituencies.

(c) The unit of representation for such rural and city constituencies shall be determined by deducting from the total population of Ontario the population of the city of Toronto and by dividing the remainder by the total number of seats to be allotted to such rural and city constituencies.

(d) The population of any city receiving separate representation shall be excluded in computing the population of the county within which it is situate.

(e) The redistribution of the representation of Ontario shall then be determined as follows:

Then they follow setting forth what counties should be entitled to one member, two members and three members, the maximum rising to 82,000 and making the sum total, after the application of those principles, of 86 members for the entire province.

Then came the question of Prince Edward Island, with a motion and an amendment as to that; then an amendment with respect to Manitoba where the whole schedule was to be dealt with. Finally, on those divisions the redistribution bill was passed. That is the only redistribution bill with which the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to deal.

In 1914 the government of Sir Robert Borden had to deal with redistribution. There was set up a select committee which consisted of a larger number of members having regard to the increased size of the house. A debate took place on the second reading and finally a committee was set up consisting of Messieurs Beland, Bennett (Calgary), Buchanan, Macdonald, Pardee, Pelletier, Reid (Grenville), Rhodes and Rogers. Three of the members of that committee are still in the house, and at least one, if not two, of them are members of the other chamber. That was on February 9, 1914. As the hon. member for Richelieu has just said, that committee took a long time over its deliberations. Finally it made a report which is found at page 673 of the journals for that year. It will be observed that that committee did not arrive at unanimity, but it made a report, the second part of which reads:

Your committee have prepared and unanimously agreed to report upon the description and the return of members contained in the several electoral divisions, which are set forth in the schedules hereto appended, in respect to the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon territory, and upon the description and the return of the several electoral divisions which are set forth in the schedule hereto appended, in respect to the province of Nova Scotia, with the exception of that portion of the last named schedule which relates to the return of two members for the proposed united counties of South Cape Breton and Richmond, in the province of Nova Scotia, to which a majority of your committee have agreed.

Then followed provisions with respect to Prince Edward Island which had the result, in the end, of an amendment to the British North America Act whereby it was provided the total representation in the House of Commons of any province should not fall below its representation in the Senate. The bill passed, as I say, without amendment. A short time was taken to consider it, some slight amendments were made, and at page 726, on June 12, it was ordered that the bill be read a third time. It was read a third time, without amendment.

Then came the redistribution of 1924. That there were serious differences in 1924 need not be questioned. That in the end they arrived at what might be regarded as a half compromise is quite apparent, because the bill having been introduced on March 3, 1924, it was given its second reading and referred to a second committee on March 25. I am leaving out the fact that in 1923 the then government endeavoured to pass a redistribution bill. A committee was set up and failed to arrive at a conclusion. In the last minutes of the session the bill was abandoned and set over until 1924.

In 1924 the special committee was set up, and made its first report. The chairman of the committee was the Hon. E. M. Macdonald, Pictou county. Later they prepared a report which is found in the journals of the house of July 11, 1924, at page 546. I direct attention to the fact that the suggestion has been made that this legislation is being pressed in the closing days of the session. As a matter of fact in 1924 it was dealt with on the last two days of the session, and part of the third; that was all. I mention that only in passing, because I suggest it is not proper to charge that because we are dealing with the bill in the closing days of the session it is part of a deliberate plan. However, about that I shall say something later. The committee will pardon me if I direct attention to the words of the report.

Mr. Macdonald (Pictou), from the special committee to whom was referred Bill 2, an act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, with instructions to prepare schedules to contain and describe the several electoral divisions entitled to return members to this house and to report the same, prescribed the second report of the said committee which is as follows:

Your committee have prepared and unanimously agreed upon the description and the return of members contained in the several electoral divisions, which are set forth in the schedules hereto appended, in respect to the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon territory, and upon the description and the return of members contained in the several electoral divisions which are set forth in the schedules hereto appended, in respect to the province of Ontario, with the exception of the electoral divisions of South Hastings, West Peterborough, Hastings-Peterborough, and Fort William in the said province to which a majority of your committee have agreed.

Your committee have also considered section 4 of the said bill and have unanimously agreed to recommend that the said section be amended. The proposed amendment is appended to this report, and submitted with the several schedules for the consideration of the house.

Some slight changes were made in the Senate with respect to the language of the bill. The words "Missisquoi-Brome" were deleted and for them were substituted the words "Brome-Missisquoi," that being strongly but unsuccessfully advocated in this chamber by Mr. McMaster.

Let us pause for a moment, endeavouring if possible to be perfectly fair in this matter, and look at the position of the parties in this house, bearing in mind the conditions which existed in the province of Quebec. Let us for a moment look at what the position was in 1921. There were elected to this house from the province of Quebec sixty-five Liberals —see page 316 of the Parliamentary Guide— Conservatives none. So it would appear that when the redistribution was made the Conservative party was without representation in this chamber from the province of Quebec. Behold the result. In the succeeding election, notwithstanding the fact that the Conservative party polled between forty per cent and forty-five per cent of the entire votes, they did not elect any candidates. I ask this committee if that, in itself, does not give cause for thought. I am endeavouring to be as fair as a man can who has had some little legal training, and I shall stick to a recital of the facts. Will any judge say that the fact I have recited would not, in itself, give cause for thought? Does it not cause every thoughtful man in this house just to ponder a moment on the situation?

Then in 1931 we have another census, and in 1933 we set up a committee. It was a committee which, I submit, must be regarded as a fair and reasonable committee of this house. It was selected after a great deal of care and attention had been given to the matter. From British Columbia there were Mr. Barber and Mr. Reid—I believe I am departing from the strict rules of the house by mentioning names. From Alberta there was a parliamentarian of long experience, the Hon. Charles Stewart, together with Doctor Stanley of Calgary and Mr. Kennedy of Peace River. From Saskatchewan there were Mr. Turnbull and Mr. Totzke; from Manitoba there were Mr. Burns, Mr. Beaubien and Mr. Heaps. From Ontario, there was, Hon. H. A. Stewart, who became chairman of the committee; Hon. Mr. Manion, succeeded by Doctor Cotnam; Mr. MacNicol and Hon. Mr. Elliott, a former minister of the crown; from Quebec there were Mr. Dorion, Mr. Gobeil and Mr. Mercier of Laurier-Outremont. From New Brunswick there was Mr. Bell; from Nova Scotia, Mr. Ilsley and Mr. Smith of Cumberland. As there was no change possible in Prince Edward Island no member from that province was placed on the committee.

I ask members of this committee if those members were not representative of the different parts of Canada. Is that not reasonable representation? Is that not a reasonable cross-section of this house, for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion? On November 25, this committee was appointed. I made it my business—myself—to have sent to each member of the committee information which had been prepared in the bureau of statistics for the purpose of enabling the committee during the recess to obtain a reasonably fair appreciation of the problems with which they had to deal.

At the threshold of inquiry you have to determine the unit of representation upon which redistribution shall be made. If hon. members who are interested would turn to page 3 of the information prepared by the bureau of statistics they would find these words:

> Unit of representation: While the number of the members of the House of Commons has been growing steadily since confederation, the unit of representation—one-sixty-fifth of the population of Quebec within its boundaries prior to the 1912 extension—has also been increased after each census in consequence of the expanding population of Quebec. The units of representation as shown by the seven decennial censuses taken since confederation, are as follows: 1871, 18,331 persons; 1881, 20,908; 1891, 22,901; 1901, 25,368; 1911, 30,819; 1921, 36,283; 1931, 44,186.

Thus you have in the province of Quebec a more difficult task than you would have ordinarily in other provinces because of its unit of representation being 44,186 and there being 65 members—no increase and no decrease—you have a complex problem; as the former Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) very properly said to-day, a very much more complex problem to deal with than otherwise would be the case.

But the problem has become complicated in two of the largest older provinces by reason of another circumstance, namely the steady trend of population from rural to urban centres. That fact you will find dealt with on page 6 of the information sent out to the members. I will only point out that the entire rural population of the Dominion of Canada in 1931 was 4,804,728 and the urban population 5,572,058; in other words the percentage of rural population in 1931 was 46·30 and urban population 53.70, a change since 1921 from 50·48 rural and 49·52 urban. Now bearing in mind the increased urban population I ask the committee to be good enough to look with me for a moment at just what the situation was with respect to that great centre of population, the island of Montreal. The entire population of Quebec in 1931 was 2,874,255, and of that number 1,060,649 was rural and 1,813,606 was urban. Now let us turn for a moment to the island of Montreal. If the committee will be good enough to turn to page 26 it will be found that the island of Montreal had a population of 1,003,868 souls. I wonder if it has ever occurred to the members of this committee that that is within 57,000 of the entire rural population of the province of Quebec. Imagine the difficulties that confronted the committee—sixty-five seats in the province of Quebec, 1,004,000 people, in round numbers, on the island of Montreal, and 1,060,000, in round numbers, of rural population in the entire province. The committee, confronted with that difficulty, together with a unit of representation of 44,000, realized of course that what could be said with respect to Montreal could be said—with less force, it is true—with respect to Toronto and the rural portions of the province of Ontario.

The committee endeavoured to deal with that problem. Every word that was said yesterday by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), the former Minister of Public Works, represented the appeal that was made from time to time to that committee not to overlook the rural population. The hon. member for West Middlesex pleaded that there should be no dealing with this matter on a hard and fast mathematical and mechanical rule whereby the representation of the rural population would be so sadly cut down. What was said this morning by the former Minister of Marine, reechoing in part what was said by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), indicates that if a hard and fast mechanical rule, a purely mathematical rule, is applied, not only will there be departure from county boundaries and municipal and parish lines, but such confusion will be caused by the carving out of constituencies in conformity with mathematical requirements as to bring about a condition which will be at least offensive to the people of the province of Quebec. Yesterday we were reminded that there were large differences in population in some of the counties in Ontario; that one county had 83,000 and another 26,000, one 30,000, another 55,000 and another 75,000. Everything said by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) was said before the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power. The very same considerations were urged. But once in power there has not yet arisen in this country any committee prepared to disregard county boundaries and municipal lines in the provinces. The very plea made in this house by hon. members from Quebec, the very plea made by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this morning, pointing out how people become attached to their county, become attached to their county town, become attached to their market town as part of their constituency—everyone knows that is so. Yet I believe that what the former Minister of Marine said is true; after listening to everything that has been said, after looking at the figures as carefully as one can, I am convinced that the time must come when parliament must be prepared to apply a different rule with respect to some of these smaller seats in all parts of Canada than has been heretofore applied. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce was perfectly fair when he said yesterday that the blame does not attach to the committee. He said it attaches to all members of the house, because every representation made to the members, the friendly members of the committee, by the members of this chamber constituted an effort to maintain the status quo. There is no doubt about that. I was struck by the force of what the former Minister of Trade and Commerce said in that regard, because it represented the conviction I had arrived at—and I am going to explain in a moment what my position has been with respect to this redistribution measure. Having seen a committee set up, a committee in which I had confidence, I believed it was not my duty to say to the chairman or any members of it that you should do thus or so with respect to particular areas. I could not tell you to-day definitely what are the boundaries of my own constituency of West Calgary. Doctor Stanley spoke to me from time to time, and I said: Whatever conclusion you arrive at is entirely satisfactory to me. And that represents my position now.

Confronting that problem I put this to my hon. friends opposite; I say to you: Gentlemen, for forty years or more you have been responsible for the boundaries of counties in the provincial legislature and for the distribution as it now stands. There is only one thing I should like to say with regard to the admirable observations made by the former Minister of Marine in some parts of his speech, and that is this, that he cannot have read very carefully this book or he would have observed that the county lines have been departed from in the existing distribution. For instance, Dorchester comprises parts of three counties as the counties are defined by the provincial legislature, and if you will take the list and look at the second word, that is the county name, and the population of the county, you will find that the variation between the county population and the electoral division population represents the extent to which county boundaries have not been followed in Quebec. What is true in Quebec is true in other parts of Canada also. I do not allege for a moment, and I do not think it necessary to do so, that in 1924 or in 1903 men so lost their sense of fairness as to desire to do what was unjust and unreasonable to their fellow members. I do not charge that at all, but knowing human nature as I do and knowing the instincts that govern men with respect to political matters I do say that I am perfectly clear that when there was a favour possible by doing a thing in one of two ways, with either way just and proper, they would choose that method which gave the greatest benefit to themselves and their friends. Is there any doubt about that? What have we here to-day? The closing appeal of the former Minister of Marine is one which cannot be lightly disregarded in this chamber, but what have we listened to for a day? We have had statements that something was done this way instead of that way; that is what it gets down to, that instead of doing it the way you want it done we have done it the way we want it done. Had there been any voice to raise in this house in 1924—unfortunately there was not—exactly the same thing would have been said. I do say to this committee, sir, that on Saturday last I asked to see the old and new maps of the province of Quebec. Having heard all that I had heard in this house, with the charges that had been made, as man to man I can say frankly that I was amazed when I saw the map that had been prepared. I found that the map of 1924 contained all these jogs, these little differences and variations in order to effectuate what was regarded as a fair redistribution. Then when I took the map of 1933 and looked at the boundaries there shown I saw exactly the same sort of thing, varied, it is true, to meet the changed conditions of population. Undoubtedly where two courses were open our friends chose the course that was more helpful to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, just as in 1924 the course chosen was the one more favourable to the party then in power. Now it gets down to a contest as to the acceptance of your plan, under a given contingency, or the plan of the committee under a given contingency; that is the fact. If I may be allowed to say so, when this committee of elder statesmen met, about which I shall have something to say presently, it was amazing how the number of complaints narrowed themselves down to so few, and some of those were capable of simple adjustment. It became apparent, however, that as soon as one point was yielded the whole thing stopped and started all over again. It was just as the former Minister of Trade and Commerce said yesterday; every member was playing his own hand in his desire to secure his own position. As soon as he found that some change had been made to meet a certain condition he thought, "Well, I must have my way too," and the result was that we were getting nowhere.

That was the reason I said to the house the other evening that we had reached agreements with regard to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba. There was very little disagreement with regard to British Columbia; that has been adjusted and the agreement has been signed. The disagreement in Alberta is slight, nothing that I conceive to be very serious, and in the two older provinces and Saskatchewan, to which I shall refer presently, the disagreements were more serious. What do the disputes narrow themselves down to? Simply the complaint that in order to meet a situation that was real—and it has been admitted to be real, for the reasons I have given and for the reasons mentioned by the former Minister of Marine—and in the effort to adjust those actualities of population, of convenience and of the desire, as I have said, to cause as little friction and disturb existing conditions as little as possible, a certain course has been chosen. Some hon. gentlemen say it is highly immoral that these choices should be made in the way they have. The answer given by the committee is this: "We have chosen these because in our opinion these were the most convenient changes to make, and the least inconvenient to all parties concerned." That is the old province of Quebec, and I do not think anyone will say that I have not stated the facts just as they are. I have set them before the committee, not in malice; I have not overstated anything and I am certain that I have not understated the position from the standpoint of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Under those circumstances I wholly agree with what was said by the former Minister of Marine. He made a very earnest appeal for agreement and accommodation but I must remind him that appeals such as his, unless evidenced by conduct, are as faith without works, which is dead. That is the difficulty. However willing he might be to yield on this or that point the committee finds itself up against an absolute stone wall when it asks that those concessions be made that would at least indicate a reasonable willingness for accommodation. I am not going to traverse all these various constituencies, though I have taken the trouble to go into them with some care. For instance, I find that the basis of population around the city of Quebec now has been equalized within a few hundred, and it is said that this has been done with the least inconvenience to the people affected. It is perfectly clear that the population does not average more than 30,000 per riding in that territory; it is perfectly clear that the unit of representation throughout Canada is 44,000, but I for one believe that in this country at this time it is desirable that we should not treat the rural population on an entirely different basis from that which has prevailed hitherto, by making the absolute unit of population 44,000, which would have the effect of cutting down the seats outside the island of Montreal and the cities to a point that in one sense would be almost negligible. In the very nature of things you cannot apply the same tests in the rural portions of the country that you can apply in the cities, and this committee has not endeavoured to do so.

Without going into the details, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I have not yet reached the point where I believe that human nature is so constituted that those who for the moment are out of power are unwilling to recognize that fact. In all sincerity may I say that while the Liberal party is in the ascendancy provincially, and federally in point of the number of members from the province of Quebec, in this parliament there happens to be in power a Conservative administration. Is it not fair to say that hon. gentlemen opposite must recognize that fact, and to recognize the further fact that when a choice has to be made in one of two given ways you must expect that choice to be made in the way that will be most advantageous to the party in power. Is that unfair? Is that not what has always happened in regard to anything? I do appeal to those who sit to the left of the Speaker to recognize that fact with regard to the province of Quebec. I think I understand something of their point of view. I know it is not always easy to reconcile one's self to a fact; it is not always easy to become reconciled to a fact when it is believed that the fact never should have been. But just let me quote one line, if I may, from what Sir William Harcourt said away back in 1882, when Gladstone was moving his measure of closure in the British house:

> It is essential to secure to a majority the right to prevail which lies at the bottom of parliamentary institutions. To recognize in one-third or one-quarter of the house an absolute right to postpone indefinitely the decision of a question is, in my judgment, to give a formal consecration to the principle of obstruction. Why is it to be assumed that the minority will not abuse their veto when it is taken for granted that the majority will abuse their clôture?

These were the words of Sir William Harcourt, who at least was the spokesman for a great school of thought of which Gladstone was the chief, when he was introducing his measure of closure.

I have endeavoured to approach this question not from a partisan point of view, and I suggest to those members of this committee who, representing the majority of deputies from the province of Quebec, represent also the opposition, or the party that sits to the left of the Speaker in this chamber, that any little inconsistencies or incongruities, or anomalies that appear in the bill can easily be ironed out without any difficulty in the world.

I was struck this morning with the observations made by the former Minister of Justice. He denounced in unmeasured terms what he conceived to be, as he said, a gerrymander; yet the very illustrations he gave were illustrations which in my judgment proved that a continuance of the condition that now exists would be the perpetuation of an unfair distribution of seats, having regard to population and what followed from the redistribution of 1924. That is all I have to say at the moment with respect to the province of Quebec except to say that, so far as the island of Montreal is concerned, we are faced with a difficulty of the first magnitude. The entire population of that island, I repeat, is equal to the rural population of the province of Quebec less 57,000; and if you accorded to them representation by population they would be entitled to one-tenth practically of the entire representation in this house, which would be 24 seats. The committee have said that 16 seats amply represent what is fair and just with respect to the island of Montreal, and that leaves 49 seats to be distributed between the rural and urban population in the rest of the province of Quebec. Now, the committee have earnestly striven, as everyone can see, not unnecessarily to eliminate seats at this time, not unnecessarily to disturb existing conditions in the rural communities—because the population in many of these counties fell below 30,000, and in some instances below 25,000—but to maintain them, some of them being, I repeat, as strongly Liberal seats as one could possibly find. The committee endeavoured to retain them, having striven to assert this principle, that you could not apply the unit system of 44,000 mathematically to the rural population of that province.

I turn now for a moment to the province of Ontario. There you have the great city of Toronto with its surrounding territory. The population is something less than a million souls. They have necessarily increased the population of that section of Ontario, and you have the same problem which you had in the province of Quebec. The question is: Shall you, as the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested, just simply say, "There is the unit of population of 44,000; let us go out and ruthlessly apply that mathematically to the whole province of Ontario."

Mr. MALCOLM: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the sense of it.

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It meant nothing else.

Mr. MALCOLM: Oh no.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will read his words—

Mr. MALCOLM: I have; I have read them to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: —he will find that he put forward the idea that population must be the governing factor.

Mr. MALCOLM: I mentioned two exceptions.

Mr. BENNETT: What are they?

Mr. MALCOLM: I know the Prime Minister does not want to be unfair. I mentioned especially the fact that the small percentage of voters in a city did not justify the unit of population being the same—the small percentage of people polling their votes.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman, then, made the distinction that in the city, where apparently they thought it unnecessary to go to the polls—

Mr. MALCOLM: They apparently did not go to the polls.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the answer to that is that, in the illustrations which the hon. gentleman gave, the people were so certain of the result that they did not think it necessary to go to the polls.

Mr. MALCOLM: That may be.

Mr. BENNETT: That seemed to be the case which the hon. gentleman selected for the purpose of illustration. I will not discuss this afternoon the question of compulsory voting; that will have to be done some other time. I do say however that if you applied the rule of dividing the population of the province of Ontario, outside the great cities, by 44,000 and saying, "There are your seats," you would create complete chaos and dissatisfaction throughout that province, because in that province you have the same situation that exists in the province of Quebec.

The committee have certainly not been governed by political considerations in Ontario. I know exactly what the hon. member for North Bruce contends. I know—at least I have been told, because it is only hearsay and one cannot say one knows—of the difficulties in connection with Southeast Grey and the taking of certain portions of a constituency and putting them in that rather than another. All these are matters of detail, but the great principle is that in the rural part of Ontario there has been no application of the rule I have referred to, namely, the division of the population by 44,000. Not only has there been no effort to do that, but because it has not been done you have in Welland to-day 83,000 people represented by one member, just as they were at confederation in that constituency. That cannot be said to be fair; and yet, if you endeavoured to apply the 44,000 rule and set about doing so, you would so disorganize the whole rural population of Ontario as to create a condition not only of dissatisfaction but of chaos. I would point out that the very principles which in 1903 were moved for on the third reading of the redistribution bill—the first redistribution bill of the Liberal party—were principles such as are now asserted by the opposition here. But when the government of Sir Robert Borden were charged with the responsibility of redistribution they realized that you could not apply these principles, and the committee unanimously arrived at this conclusion: You had here a small constituency and there a large one; you had county boundaries, municipal lines, the convenience of a great population, and in some instances the historic and traditional circumstances connected with the riding itself. This committee have not departed from that; if they did, it would be such a radical and complete change applied to the dominion that I do not believe that this house would adopt any such redistribution measure. I do not believe that any government which this country has ever seen could put through a redistribution measure on that basis.

Now, the eastern provinces are disposed of. Let me say in passing what I said the other day with respect to Nova Scotia. There is the oldest province in which elections have been held in Canada. When Cornwallis signed the warrant for an election in the ward-room of his ship, the first divisions of constituencies were made in Canada. There are a number of counties established in Nova Scotia, counties that have grown up with our municipal system during the course of a century and more. What have you? You have down by the sea Guysborough and Antigonish united, with a population of 25,000. Following along the seaboard you have the old county of Halifax, and you come to Shelburne and Yarmouth; you have Lunenburg and Queens—counties on the Atlantic seaboard. Now, what had the committee to face in that province? There had to be faced the question whether or not you would break up, as might have been done, the county of Colchester, represented in this house by a Liberal. Add half of it to Cumberland and you would still be under your population.

You would not be over the population according to the unit and you have eliminated the one seat that had to be eliminated on the mainland. What did the committee do? Because county lines are so highly regarded in that province it left Cumberland, Colchester and Digby; it left Antigonish-Guysborough with its 25,000 and left Shelburne-Yarmouth with the addition of the parish of Clare from the county of Digby. It then took the county of Digby, the county of Annapolis and the county of Kings and made them into one riding without disturbing the lines, and this new riding has a population of 50,000. It is said that according to the principles laid down, that is unfair but the committee felt that rather than dismember counties, rather than split them in two and put part of the population here and part there, it was better to have a county which was 6,000 over the unit than to have all the consequent confusion and ill feeling which would arise from following the course I have mentioned. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Short) objected, and very properly so. He still objects and doubtless will voice his resentment when the schedule for Nova Scotia is reached. He says that at his time of life he cannot contest a constituency 125 miles long. I heard some hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan say something about there being 125 miles in a constituency. In the first election to this House of Commons which I contested I was the candidate for the whole district of Alberta. This comprised all the territory from the extreme north, south to the boundary line including Lethbridge, Macleod, Calgary, Edmonton and Wetaskiwin. That was the position in 1900. Mention is made of 125 miles, but I had 300 or 400 miles to cover. In this instance, 125 miles in the province of Nova Scotia means a great deal.

In New Brunswick one member has been dropped from Saint John-Albert, and that is the end of that. There is a Conservative seat again, but other arrangements could have been made in that province.

Prince Edward Island has not been disturbed because it still has four seats.

I have dealt with Quebec; I have dealt with Ontario and I come now to Manitoba. Is it not amazing that in Manitoba where you have such sharp political differences they have been able to arrive at agreement? Each side made concessions and the Liberal party did not go unrepresented. But it realized what the situation was and that arrangement was made.

We come now to the province of Saskatchewan. It was most unfortunate in my judgment that the difficulties in Saskatchewan should have been discussed at such length. What do these difficulties amount to? This one group who say that they constitute the majority in Saskatchewan insist that the redistribution should be made north and south. They say that is the way in which it should be done. There was some little difficulty south of Qu'Appelle and the Saskatchewan river but the committee arrived at some sort of, we will say tentative understanding. We then get into the north country. The province of Saskatchewan under Liberal guidance united the Battlefords and the Battlefords are now one provincial riding. Is there anything that has been held up to us in days gone by as being more desirable than that wherever possible the federal and provincial boundaries should coincide? That being so, why should there be any great complaint if the committee arrived at that conclusion?

The right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is a former minister of the crown and former prime minister whose constituency is in Saskatchewan. The former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is the second ex-minister from that province. The former Minister of Agriculture contended that he had been very unjustly and unfairly dealt with. In the end—I desire to remove any misapprehension on the point—the committee agreed to give him the boundaries of the constituency for which he asked. It was not done at my instance and I did not know of its being done until after it was done. As a matter of fact I believed, and I stated my belief, that the extent to which they would go in agreeing to his contention would jeopardize any chance of unity in the whole. And I was right. Look at what we have. Because the committee yielded to the importunities of the former Minister of Agriculture we are now told that the whole thing is bad and wrong and must be set at naught.

That is not all. I was rather surprised when the right hon. leader of the opposition suggested that there was a deep laid plot to have him driven from public life. If I had my choice there is no man I would rather keep in public life than the right hon. gentleman. That is all I have to say. It would be far from me to suggest and I say sincerely that I do not believe that any member of the committee desired that the right hon. gentleman should be driven out of public life by any redistribution made in Prince Albert. What are the facts? The facts are that the Liberal member from Saskatchewan agreed to the boundary of Prince Albert being extended south beyond its present boundary. He has said in the committee that he agreed to that, and he has repeated it. It therefore follows that there was recognition by the Liberal member from Saskatchewan that the existing boundaries were wrong. Having recognized that the existing boundaries were wrong, the question then arose as to the extent to which they should be remedied.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) does not want to be unfair to me. I did say that the southern boundary of the constituency of Prince Albert was wrong but I did not agree to the southern boundary as suggested by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull).

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has not been following me carefully. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), who was the representative of the Liberal party from the province of Saskatchewan on that committee, has admitted that the boundaries of Prince Albert should be rectified. He has admitted that the southern boundary should be extended further south, and he made his extension. The Conservative member from Saskatchewan said that that was not far enough south having regard to the movement of population to the north. There was an acute difference of opinion as to where the boundary should be, whether it should be x miles north or y miles north. That is the only issue. Now, is there not the greatest likelihood for a difference on that point?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not the only issue.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has left out the fact that a considerable part of another constituency has been added to Prince Albert notwithstanding the complaint that Prince Albert was too large and must be cut down.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not overlooking that factor. Rectification of the boundary was asked for and there was a difference of opinion as to how it should be effected. That is something that arises in every redistribution or in every case that ever comes up in a court of law. What is the basis of all our institutions? Our whole legal institution is based upon the fact that when there are differences they must be settled, not by fighting as they used to be in the old days but by recourse to the courts. The right hon. gentleman has said very properly that this is the high court of parliament. It is very seldom that it divides on other than party lines, nevertheless it is the high court of parliament. The issue in Prince Albert is this: How shall the boundaries be rectified, it being admitted that they are wrong at the present time? Let that never be forgotten. How can you talk about indignity or a lack of chivalry being shown on the part of any party or men who say that there is the necessity for this rectification, and admit the only question at issue is: How shall the wrong be righted? That is the issue. Speaking for myself and for the government as well, I say, the government say and every member of the government says that we desire to work no wrong to any man with respect to redistribution, and if on the subject matter under discussion it becomes apparent that the boundaries suggested by the Conservative members of the committee can be adjusted on a fairer or more proper basis, that will be done. But it is wrong to say, when you have an admission of the fact that the boundaries are wrong and the only issue is that of rectification, that therefore your opponents are guilty of all the crimes and misdemeanours that can be found in the calendar. That does not make for securing what is desired to be secured; it does not make now and it never has made. I leave it to the judgment of this committee, if every member of it ever heard a more provocative speech than that which the leader of the opposition made yesterday morning. But it was not and it will not be met in that spirit, so far as we are concerned. I repeat that in respect to the province of Saskatchewan it has been in the main admitted that there must be rectifications; that is admitted by everybody. Why? Because the population has moved north. One hon. gentleman says that that will rectify itself in time by the population moving back. He may be right, but in the meantime we have to deal with actualities and realities, and the reality is that there is no change in the number of members to be returned and that therefore all one has to do is to adjust the same membership to new boundaries for a shifted population; that is all.

The facts disclosed before this committee indicate that the matter has been approached, if the individuals were left alone, in a spirit of compromise and accommodation; but some people say: No, we will not do this; that is all there is about the matter; we are not going to do it. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) said that he did not like the name "Touchwood." Touchwood is a name older even than the fifty years of Yorkton, but if it will be any satisfaction to change the name from Touchwood to Yorkton, it will be changed. One is not to have a quarrel over redistribution merely because a man prefers Yorkton to Touchwood. Some hon. members suggest that the word "Battleford" should be "Battlefords." The fact is that the original manuscript contained the word "Battlefords," and it will be so if that will appease the feelings of the hon. gentlemen in the matter. But if you go through the whole representation of Saskatchewan, you have just this difference: an unwillingness on the part of those who sit to the left of the Speaker to recognize that if the choice has to be made between a line that way and a line this way to accomplish the same result, the choice lies with their opponents, they being a majority in the house, and not with them. Should not that fact be recognized? Is that unfair? That is all that is at issue.

I am not yet advised as to the whole issue in Alberta and not having had an opportunity to discuss it fully with anyone who could inform me, I am not going to do more than say that I believe the former Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) with his conciliatory spirit, and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) will have no difficulty in working out that problem. But let me say this: Alberta is a difficult province to redistribute. Why? On account of the mountains and rivers, and in building of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the crossing of the Battle river was one of the great difficulties experienced by the engineers. You have the Saskatchewan river, the Battle river, the Bow river. When we were dealing with redistribution as long ago as 1914, the difficult problem was what to do with that centre seat that became Bow River. It represented just what was left of the rest of the province; that was the only way in which it could be worked out and there was great difficulty in doing so. To the west you have that long range of mountains; away up in the northern part of the province you had the hon. member for Peace River representing half an empire and a new seat had to be found there. It has been given the name of Jasper-Edson. There had to be retained by readjustments the seats in the south and one more seat added to the north. In the readjustment, having regard to population, I daresay there may be some difficulties; there were in 1914. I remember in the case of the late Doctor Clark who represented the constituency of Red Deer, the line as drawn and as it remained for weeks put the late Doctor Clark and myself in the west riding of Calgary. The problem which engaged the attention of the committee then was whether the line should be drawn so many townships south or so many further north. To-day the problem of the boundaries of Bow River is one of some difficulty, but I think there should be no really insurmountable obstacle in the way of its solution.

As regards British Columbia, since this discussion began an agreement has been made that, I trust, is satisfactory to everybody, as I believe it is. On the mainland there was a certain area that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) thought should properly go to Vancouver North, and to Vancouver North it has gone. That has been arranged. It is only a small matter, and on a question of choice it may be the majority of the committee prefer it should go some other place, to Comox-Alberni, but the wishes of both Mr. Munn and Mr. Neill, if I might mention their names, have been met, and that part of the mainland, at least that portion from Bute inlet south, now comprises the constituency of Vancouver North.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: There being no business under the heading of private and public bills the house will resume in committee consideration of Bill No. 2.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 2, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I have to attend at another place, so I shall continue my remarks at another time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Is clause 1 carried?

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): No. Some newspapers have stated that in opposing the schedule and sections of this bill, members are struggling for their political lives. I am not afraid of my political future. For over eight years I have represented my constituency and have done the best I could for my people. I have abandoned a profitable legal practice to give all my time to my parliamentary duties. My electors appreciate that fact, and I am very thankful to them for what they have done for me.

Every member of parliament incurs a great number of responsibilities, and in staying here during long sessions, and in abandoning his private business he sacrifices a great deal. For instance, early last year I was busily engaged in some personal work which I have not yet completed. I resumed my work here in Ottawa, intending to use the library, and was told that I could not have the services of a stenographer and could not even have a typewriter if I did not fulfil entirely my parliamentary duties. I did so conscientiously and to the best of my ability, and I am very much surprised to hear some hon. members opposite complain that I take too much of the time of the house. Perhaps some of them work as much as I do; I do not boast of working twenty hours a day. I do say however that none of them works harder. When I come here Saturday afternoons and Sundays to work in my little office upstairs. when I receive books from the library I see hon. members in the building, but I very seldom see any who come as regularly as I do. I do not say that by way of boasting, but merely to place some facts before the committee. I see the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and I see the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) who stays here some week ends. I see other hon. members from the west. At times I meet my genial friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) who comes here on Sundays. We are all doing our best, and any hon. member will say that we cannot do that without a great amount of sacrifice.

My second statement is that I ask nothing from the government. I ask for nothing. I ask for no favours. I wish only to put the facts before the house in the same manner as I would put the evidence of a witness before a judge who in the first instance states such evidence is not necessary but admits it might be useful at the court of king's bench. When I speak I am not speaking particularly to the government; they may take it if they wish. I am very independent about it. I place myself on record to show what I have said, and that the proof or the evidence is complete. When I go back to my people I will tell them that I have put those facts before the Prime Minister and his colleagues, and if they do not listen to the remarks I make in plain English, they will be judged accordingly.

My only reason for being here to-night, when I should have been attending the funeral of a dear friend in my constituency, is that I feel it my duty to support petitions which have been sent in regular and due form by heads of families in my constituency to this House of Commons protesting against the proposed changes. In doing so I am following their example. They have been faithful to me; they have been devoted to me, and I intend to be just as faithful and devoted to them.

I cannot understand how hon. members opposite can say: "Those people at so and so may be excellent people, but we cannot listen to them. The Paquet family is a great family, but we may dispense with them, and it will not matter whether they vote in this or that constituency." When a man has his heart in the right place he cannot forget the ties which bind him to those who for years and years have been so kind to him. In my constituency there are about 20,000 voters. In that number there are only about one hundred people who have not voted for me at least at one election. I know them. I do not know if there are many hon. members who can say the same thing. I know by name about ninety-nine per cent of my electors. I know the history of each of them, and last year when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) came to my constituency with the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) there came from distances as far away as sixty or eighty miles about eight hundred people, in spite of the bad weather. I introduced each one to the leader of my party by giving each person's name and family history. I know those people, and it is because I know them that I love them. It is because I love them that I will not let anyone take them away from me, even by brute force.

Another reason for my speaking is that Bill No. 2 to readjust the representation in the House of Commons does not bear the name of any junior member of the cabinet. It bears the name of the Prime Minister himself. It is a measure of such importance that I am in duty bound to put all the facts before the house in order that the Prime Minister and his colleagues may see to it that something is done. But mark you, sir, I ask for nothing, the facts will speak for themselves. I ask for no favours. At the same time I have no fear—I never had any.

An hon. MEMBER: Why should you?

Mr. POULIOT: The history of the legislation on redistribution as given by the right hon. Prime Minister this afternoon is far from complete. I am here to express the viewpoint not only of the electors of Temiscouata but also of the electors of the province of Quebec.

May I take this opportunity to offer my warmest congratulations to my hon. friends who spoke yesterday, and especially to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) who gave such admirable orations to-day. Sir, let us go back eighty years, to 1853. At that time an enactment was passed creating new electoral constituencies in the province of Quebec. I will speak only of the province of Quebec, because while I do not know the details of what happened in other provinces, I am very familiar with what has been done in the province of Quebec.

In 1853 an enactment was passed setting the boundaries of many constituencies in Quebec which have existed until now. This piece of legislation has served for provincial as well as federal elections—for provincial elections until 1886 and for federal until 1892. In the province of Quebec in 1886 the only change was to divide three constituencies, that of Chicoutimi-Saguenay, that of Drummond-Arthabaska and that of Richmond and Wolfe, which had been united in 1867, in order to have only 65 seats in the province. The only change made by that legislation in 1886 was to make the constituencies exactly as they were before confederation. In the federal ridings minor changes were made in 1882, minor changes had been made previously in 1872, but until the gerrymander of 1892 the legislative enactment that served for provincial purposes served at the same time for federal purposes.

There is another thing that I wish to bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman: always the federal acts relating to redistribution in the province of Quebec have referred to the provincial electoral districts after the new legislation had been passed in the province of Quebec. For instance we see the names of those constituencies which do not exist for federal purposes in their entirety; Papineau, Frontenac, Matapédia, Abitibi-Témiscamingue, Charlevoix East, Charlevoix West, Gaspé West and Gaspé East, Papineau, Roberval, Lake St. John East, Lake St. John West. May I now tell the Prime Minister that the provincial boundaries are as much respected in the province of Quebec as they are in Nova Scotia; they are just as sacred in Quebec as in Nova Scotia, and I do not see why what is good for Nova Scotia is not good also for Quebec.

The right hon. gentleman spoke about redistribution that had been made under the first Prime Minister of Canada. If my memory serves me rightly the first Prime Minister of Canada after Confederation was Sir John A. Macdonald. In 1872 under Sir John A. Macdonald there was a redistribution. What was done by that act, 35 Victoria, chapter 13? St. Félix du Cap Rouge was transferred from Portneuf to Quebec. There were three new electoral districts in the city of Montreal. I mean that the electoral districts already existing in the city of Montreal were changed in 1872. That is all that Sir John A. Macdonald did in the first redistribution after confederation. And mark you, sir, even Portneuf county and Quebec county were not defined in that year by a federal statute, but the description of that constituency in 1872 was found in the old statute of 1853 that I have already referred to.

In 1882, while Sir John A. Macdonald was still alive, by 45 Victoria, chapter 3—and I would ask my hon. friend the Solicitor General to listen to me; these are things that might interest him, because yesterday he proved that he did not know even the number of the Quebec seats in the local house.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A mesage was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting a certain patent of Genter Thickener Company.

An Act to amend the Pension Act.

An Act to incorporate The Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 2, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: In 1882 the act 45 Victoria chapter 3 was passed. The townships of Salaberry, Wolfe and Grandison were transferred from Argenteuil to Terrebonne, and the same year, by the same legislation, St. Monique was transferred from Terrebonne to Two Mountains. In that act there is a new description of the electoral district of Bellechasse: Madeleine islands are annexed to Gaspe and Anticosti island is made part of Chicoutimi-Saguenay. That is all. This means that in the redistribution of 1872 and 1882 only minor changes were made in the legislation of 1853, which served also for provincial purposes. On June 6, 1891, Sir John Macdonald died—the first Prime Minister of Canada since confederation. Sir John Macdonald cannot therefore be held responsible for the gerrymander of 1892. What was done in 1872 and 1882 resulted only in slight changes in very few constituencies. In 1892 a real gerrymander was perpetrated by a moribund government. I will not enter into details; I will only quote a few words from my late leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and also a statement made by one of the Conservative ministers of the time, the Hon. Mr. Ouimet. I will give the page of Hansard so that the Minister of Marine may easily find it among the records. On April 29, 1892, Mr. Laurier, as he was then, said, as reported at page 1866:

> I must say at once that as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, in so far as I can see it at first sight, the apportionment seems to me to have been the most arbitrary that could have been designed. I am sorry, sir, that those who were in charge of that measure from the province of Quebec did not choose to follow the principle which was laid down as far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned; that is to say, of making the changes in the line of existing divisions.

On the same date Mr. Laurier said:

> But when we come to the counties south of the St. Lawrence river in the province of Quebec, where the strength of the Liberal party has always been for twenty years or more, we find gerrymander on such a scale that it will be impossible to recognize the counties now in existence. No attention has been paid to existing limits, parishes which have been united together for very many years are now divided and are jumbled over into five or six different counties. The county of Verchères, an old county which was represented in the old parliament of Canada by Sir George Cartier, for, I believe, more than 15 years, now disappears and is distributed into three different counties, Richelieu, St. Hyacinthe and Chambly.

I would remark here that history repeats itself.

Then the county of Chambly receives a portion of the county of Rouville, and the county of Rouville receives a portion of St. Hyacinthe, if I remember aright, and a portion of Bagot also. What reason or what justification can there be for that? As far as the city of Montreal and the county of Hochelaga are concerned, I cannot speak with very great accuracy because the limits have been given in only a very imperfect manner, but so far as I can see enough has been given to enable me to congratulate the Minister of Public Works, who had in the county of Laval a very soft bed before, and who will have in the new county of Laval a still softer one now.

What I have just read appears at page 1867 of Hansard of the date mentioned. Now there is not only one minister who is preparing a soft bed for himself; there is the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), there is the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauve), and there is the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre). They are all looking for Marshall mattresses in the province of Quebec but they will find thorns.

Now let me quote what Mr. Ouimet said. I am sure it will interest every member of the house, because that gentleman used exactly the same language as was used to-day by my hon. friends the Minister of Marine and the Solicitor General. He is reported on page 1870 of Hansard of April 29, 1892, as follows:

> . . . we thought it would be very useful to temper the very pronounced Liberal colour of St. Hyacinthe by adding to St. Hyacinthe the two parishes of St. Marc and St. Antoine.
> As to Bagot, we had to take from Richelieu the parish which was next to it and which properly belongs to it, and my hon. friend, the member for Bagot, was so sensitive that he was afraid of being open to the charge of having taken away too many of his opponents in the parishes of St. Pie and St. Dominique, and he took the Liberal parishes from Drummond and Arthabaska, which have already too much population. These two Liberal parishes he expects to manage so that in the future they will be good Conservatives. Those are St. Guillaume and St. Bonaventure.

Is that not the same thing we have heard to-day? The story repeats itself. But what was the flaming language used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself, a man who was always very prudent in his expressions? Forty-one years ago, referring to the redistribution drafted by the Conservative party, he said, as reported on page 1862 of Hansard of April 29, 1892, "that is a gerrymander with a vengeance." Referring to this bill as it relates to the province of Quebec, I use the same words as those used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier—this is a gerrymander with a vengeance. That is why we fight it and will fight it to the last.

This morning the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), my leader in the province of Quebec, said some kind things about my constituency and myself. I want to tell him how grateful I am and how much I appreciate his kind words. I appreciate them the more because he was born in my constituency. He knows the different places just as well as I do; he knows the people just as well as I do and he likes them just as much. The only trouble is that perhaps they like him a little more than they do me.

The intention of the government is to take three parishes away from the east side of Temiscouata constituency, the parishes of St. Jean de Dieu, Ste. Francoise and Trois Pistoles. They are taking away the parish of Notre Dame du Portage on the west side, a very beautiful parish.

Mr. DUPRE: They are all beautiful.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre) will not deny that they are beautiful.

Mr. DUPRE: I said that they are all beautiful.

Mr. POULIOT: I have the old statute book of 1851 and I shall read the description of the county of Temiscouata which it contains. I see the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Laurin) laughing, but I want him to know that I am speaking of serious matters. He should be ashamed of himself and should hide instead of showing himself in the House of Commons.

Mr. LAURIN: I had nothing to do about Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: He should not laugh when we are talking about these matters. This is not a joke and I am most serious. He should fix his hair with a brush and it would help him. I am sorry I cannot do it for him but I am too far away. The statute contains this description:

> (Translation): The county of Témiscouata will be bounded on the northeast by the county of Rimouski, as above described; on the southeast by the northeast lines of the parishes of St. Andre and St. Alexandre and the township of Parke, and its extension to the provincial line; on the southeast by the provincial line, and on the northwest by the St. Lawrence River, comprising Ile-Verte and all the islands in the St. Lawrence river nearest to the said county of Témiscouata, and opposite such county in whole or in part; the said county so bounded consisting of the parishes of Trois-Pistoles, St. Eloi, Ile-Verte, St. Gregoire-de-Kakouna, St. Arsene, St. Patrick de la Rivière-du-Loup and the township of Whitworth, Viger, Begon, Denonville, Raudot, Demers, Hocquart, and the seigniory and settlements of Témiscouata.

What I have read proves that for eighty years the boundaries of the county of Temiscouata have been the same for federal, provincial, municipal and judicial purposes. Two years ago this district was divided for provincial purposes, but it was divided as a whole. A line was drawn from the east to the west dividing the lower and upper parts of the constituency. The new constituencies are called Riviere du Loup and Temiscouata. Those who have framed this bill have proved to be so ignorant that they did not even know the names of the provincial constituencies which had been formed out of the federal constituency. It will be necessary to amend the schedule as it relates to the electoral district of Temiscouata, because the description as it now appears is false. It mentions Temiscouata but it does not mention Temiscouata and Riviere du Loup. St. Jean de Dieu, Ste. Françoise and Trois Pistoles are not taken away from Temiscouata, they are taken away from the electoral district of Riviere du Loup. This shows how negligent, how ignorant and how insipid have been those who drafted it.

Mr. GAGNON: I rise to a point of order. We on this side of the house have discussed this matter very strongly but we have been careful not to offend and not to insult hon. gentlemen on the other side. I submit respectfully, Mr. Chairman, that the words "ignorant and insipid" as addressed to members of the committee are not parliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. POULIOT: In answer to that may I say that there is brain work and manual work to be done. The brain work is done by the big men while the manual work is done by the clerks. I suppose the members of the committee said to the clerks: take three Liberal parishes from the east side of Temiscouata, from Pouliot's constituency, and take another one from the other side.

Mr. GAGNON: I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking strictly on the point of order and I hope time will not be taken from that allowed for my speech.

Mr. SPENCE: You speak too long anyway.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) does not understand a word I am saying and he might just as well go and smoke a cigarette.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Will the hon. member confine himself to the point of order?

Mr. POULIOT: My contention is that I do not believe any member of the committee took the time to write out the descriptions of the electoral districts. My contention is that they gave instructions to the clerk to make some changes and the clerk was ignorant of the changes which had been made in the provincial law. This is why it is so badly drafted. Speaking again to the point of order, I say that I did not name any member of the house when I called the fellows who had drafted that section ignorant and insipid; I said that about those who are responsible for it. It is a mistake and so much a mistake that even if the government or the majority in the house were to take those parishes from my constituency, they would have to change the drafting which is erroneous. Therefore, as a gross mistake has been made, am I not justified in calling the ones responsible for it, ignorant and insipid? I did not name any member of the house.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): On the point of order I would suggest that the hon. member restrain his language as far as he is able to do so.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you. Why are those parishes being taken away from that riding? The excuse which has been given for credulous people who do not read between the lines is this: Too much population. What was the population of Témiscouata when the census was taken in 1931? It was 50,163. What is now the population of Rimouski? It is 33,151. How many electoral districts have a population of less than 33,000 by virtue of this legislation?

Constituency—	Population
Argenteuil	27,441
Laval-Deux-Montagnes	31,896
Another minister's seat.
Vaudreuil-Soulanges	21,114
St. Jean-Iberville	32,259
Chapleau	21,705
A new constituency which has been created at our expense.
Labelle	28,731
Wright	27,107
In the eastern townships:
Brome-Missisquoi	32,069
Chateauguay-Huntingdon	24,412
Compton	31,858

The constituency of the hon. member for Compton, who sat on the committee, has not been changed.

Shefford	28,262
Stanstead	25,118
The following in the district of Quebec:
Bonaventure	32,432
Kamouraska	30,852
Montmagny-L'Islet	30,869
Bellechasse	27,480
Levis	28,548

And 7,800 people have been taken way from this constituency.

Dorchester	27,156
Lotbiniere	30,546

This afternoon the Prime Minister said that the constituencies around the city of Quebec have an average population of 30,000. It will be seen that these nineteen constituencies, according to the new law, will have a population less than that of Rimouski as it was before, and seven of them are in our own district of Quebec. Therefore, if the change were necessary for Rimouski, why was it not necessary for the others which are just as much rural constituencies as is Rimouski?

There is another argument: If someone says that the population of Temiscouata of 50,163 is too much, how is it that other constituencies will have the following populations?

Constituency—	Population
Beauce	51,614
Charlevoix-Saguenay	55,594
Chicoutimi	55,724
Drummond-Arthabaska	53,338
Lake St. John-Roberval	50,253

There are at least five rural constituencies excepting the cities of Montreal and Quebec which have a greater population than Temiscouata has now, and outside Quebec and Montreal there are eighteen constituencies which have a smaller population than Rimouski had formerly. Why then is it necessary to increase the population of Rimouski at the expense of Temiscouata? This is a question I ask in all fairness to those who will speak after me, in order that they may explain the situation, and thus put me in a position to give satisfactory answers to my constituents when they ask me questions about the matter.

The Prime Minister this afternoon spoke about the difficulties of an electoral distribution. There were thirteen seats in Montreal; the number has been increased to sixteen. There were three seats in Quebec city; the number is not changed there. We see that Montmagny is annexed to L'Islet, Beauharnois to Laprairie, L'Assomption to Terrebonne.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: I started to speak at twenty-five minutes to nine.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. L. E. PARENT (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, after hearing the discussion on the redistribution bill and listening to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), who was chairman of the committee on redistribution; the ex-Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) who made such a remarkable and clear statement on the redistribution of the counties comprised in the northern district of Quebec, including the district and county of Terrebonne which I have the honour of representing in the house; the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau); the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who made a statement on the principles which should guide us and which must have been heard by all those who were present in the house, I believe that it should be possible to come to a friendly understanding on the redistribution of counties both in Quebec and other parts of the country. I shall be brief. I was somewhat astonished at the information I obtained a few weeks ago, in connection with certain changes and annexations which were proposed for the county of Terrebonne. I therefore deem it my duty to rise in the house and furnish the committee with certain information which, in addition to those already given, might probably induce this committee on redistribution, to accept our fair and rational requests.

At present, the county of Terrebonne is surrounded by the five following counties: Argenteuil comprising a population of 18,580, with eighteen municipalities and 7,900 voters; Labelle, comprising a population of 30,953; Laval-Two Mountains, with a population of 30,434, 30 municipalities and 13,700 voters; Joliette, with a population of 27,959, 18 municipalities and 12,700 voters; L'Assomption-Montcalm, with a population of 29,214, 17 municipalities and 14,000 voters; and finally Terrebonne with a population of 39,555, 31 municipalities, and 18,300 voters

I understand, sir, that when the study of the redistribution of the counties in Quebec and throughout the country was first taken up, the question of the required unit of population in each county was broached. Must we be forced, we representatives of rural counties to acept the principle that the representation of urban centres must be increased to the detriment of that of rural sections? I shall not delay the house in discussing this principle, because we will have to accept it such as it is. The committee has therefore decided to add three constituencies to the city of Montreal and two in the northern parts of Quebec. To reach this aim it was necessary to choose the localities where these constituencies would be created. The committee cast its eyes on the map, north of Montreal, and found that a redistribution could be carried out there and thus solve the problem in a fair and rational way. The following is what was decided. Argenteuil, at present, has a population of 18,000.

The population of this county will be increased by annexing six or seven municipalities of the county of Labelle, with a total population of 8,666 and the municipality known as St. Colomban will be transferred from the northern part of the county of Two Mountains. The area of St. Columban is more than 5,000 acres and has only a population of 243. These two sections are annexed to the county of Argenteuil, the first is taken from Labelle and the second from the county of Two Mountains; they comprise in all a population of 8,909. I shall point out just now why part of the counties of Labelle and Two Mountains are transferred to increase the population of Argenteuil. Labelle, which comprises the counties of Labelle and Papineau, had a population of 36,900 before the last census. This number is less than the unit of representation, 40,000 agreed upon by the committee for rural counties in Quebec. The committee fixed the unit of representation for urban centres at 70,000 and for rural counties at 40,000. Why then remove nearly 9,000 people from the county of Labelle to place them in the county of Argenteuil?

The population of Laval-Two Mountains is fixed at 31,940, when actually there are only 30,434 people. To what means did the committee resort so as to readjust Laval-Two Mountains? I do not wish to convey, sir, that the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Sauvé) who is Postmaster General, asked the committee to favour him, because he personally told me, in an interview which he was gracious enough to grant me, that he never asked the committee for any favour.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): He was wrong.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): He asked for no favour. I accept his word; however, he never stated to the committee that he was opposed to the transfer to his county of the parishes of St-Janvier and Ste-Thérèse, as well as the town of Ste-Thérèse, which have always formed part of the county of Terrebonne, ever since the latter was established. However, so as to compensate for this population of 6,162 from the parishes just mentioned, 4,656 people were taken from Laval county. It is clear that the liberal majority of about 400 votes which these three municipalities give did not suit the hon. Postmaster General. He did not request it, but nevertheless the change is made. It is also quite evident that the members of the committee must have weighed the political advantage which it would give the representative of that county before arriving at that decision.

[Mr. Parent.]

The county of Montcalm is annexed to Joliette increasing its population to 41,392, with 35 municipalities. Finally, the committee tackles the county of Terrebonne with a population of 39,555, although the unit of rural counties is fixed at 40,000, the county of l'Assomption is annexed to it with a population of 15,781, which brings it up to 55,336, from which is deducted 6,162 from the municipalities of Ste-Thérèse and St-Janvier. There still remains a population totalling 49,174 with 45 municipalities.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What do you suggest?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Just a second, I am coming to this. I am asked, sir, what I have to suggest. It is quite simple. There is no easier problem to solve. It is only necessary to know one's national and municipal geography and to glance at a map to find out, and thereby, the problem is solved. I have here a map prepared by an official of the Interior dept., it should, therefore, be acceptable to the committee. To the left, there is Argenteuil with a population of 18,976. I pause a second, sir, the hon. Minister of the Interior who presided over the committee on redistribution. . . .

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): The Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I beg your pardon, sir, the hon. Minister of Public Works, chairman of the redistribution committee stated, when he commented on the bill, that he had recommended to the committee to base the redistribution of the counties on population. Should we rely, sir, on population to carve out a county, among a group of counties, we would choose the smallest, not as regards area but population. Which among them had the least population? I have just pointed them out. Among the counties which I enumerated, there is one only that has less than 20,000 people. They have all 27,000, 28,000 32,000, 33,000 or 39,000 of a population, except the county of Argenteuil.

I have made three suggestions to the committee, and among the three, it could only be a question of annexing the county of Argenteuil to that of Laval-Two Mountains. I well realize that political interests had to be considered. As the majority is with the government, it was clear that it would be irrational that two ministers would have to fight it out at the next election.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That is well thought out!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): When parliament is dissolved at the next election, will not both the minister and member be on an equal footing before the eyes of the people of their respective counties.

An hon. MEMBER: (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): The only difference between a cabinet minister and a member is that the former holds a more responsible position and must render to the people a more exacting account of his mandate, otherwise they stand on an equal footing before them. Whether he be a member of the government or a simple member, both have an opponent to face when an election is at hand, and the people are free to vote for one or the other. I wonder, sir, basing ourselves on this principle, whether we should not consider merging the county of Argenteuil with that of Laval-Two Mountains as it was done with l'Assomption and Terrebonne.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What do you suggest?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): My suggestion? I submitted three plans. If you have not seen them, I would advise you to glance over them, it would give you some geographical knowledge of the counties.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri) (Translation): Where is your plan?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I have it here. I submitted it to the committee, together with three solutions, by writing. The plan is as follows: The county of Argenteuil has but 18,580 population; Two Mountains, 14,488; Laval, 16,150. These three counties joined together would form one with a population of 49,218.

I have here, sir, a plan which I look upon as a logical and remarkable solution in itself, with reference to the counties I just mentioned. The merging of Argenteuil with Two Mountains would give a total population of 33,000, 34 municipalities, and 15,178 voters; Joliette-Montcalm, 41,000, 35 municipalities and 19,000 voters, and, lastly, Terrebonne which, at present, has 39,550 people, 31 municipalities and 18,300 voters.

You will note, sir, that the various populations, the number of municipalities and voters are about equal in all these counties; on the other hand, the government has a committee at its disposal to work out a scheme for the city of Montreal and elsewhere. Moreover, I state that when a county is annexed to another, one must bear in mind and moreover, endeavour to discover whether there has been any evolution, development or change in the population of these counties.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Has there been any in your county?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Yes, there has been as I shall prove to the hon. member.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri) (Translation): Carry on!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): In 1867—you will note, sir, that I have gone away back in my search for information in connection with the evolution and development of the rural counties north of Montreal—the county of Argenteuil had a population of 12,896; and in 1931 almost a century later, the population was only 18,580, an increase of about 50 per cent.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri) (Translation): Not bad!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): The county of Two-Mountains, represented by the hon. Postmaster General, had in 1867 a population of 18,400; in 1931, the population was only 14,284.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri) (Translation): Shame! shame!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): It will interest the hon. member who interrupted me just now to know what was the population of the county of Terrebonne which I have the privilege of representing. In 1867, it had a population of 19,300; in 1921, 33,900 and in 1931, 39,500, namely, double what it had at confederation.

An hon. MEMBER: (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I suggested, sir, to drop the scheme of annexing l'Assomption to Terrebonne, and joining it to another county because the county of Terrebonne has the required unit of representation, however the committee refuses to give up their scheme in connection with Ste-Thérèse and St-Janvier.

It may astonish hon. members when I state. . . . .

Mr. LAURIN (Translation): What was the scheme submitted by the representative of the Liberal party?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I do not know; the plans of the Liberal party were not submitted to me.

Mr. DORION (Translation): It is of little import that you should know them.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I do not think the Liberal party would have submitted any scheme with reference to the county of Terrebonne without consulting me. I submitted one and I was entitled to do so, as I represent the most important county of the district, so far as the population is concerned.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Apart from Berthier-Maskinongé.

Mr. PARENT (Trans.): At all events, sir, the committee thought proper, without any request from the Postmaster-General who represents Laval-Two Mountains, to annex to that county the parishes of Ste. Thérèse, St. Janvier and the town of Ste. Thérèse. I had an opportunity, since then, of visiting my county and discussing the matter with a few people of those parishes. They are greatly indignant over the whole affair. To such an extent that they forwarded to me a copy of a resolution adopted by the municipal council of the parish of Ste. Thérèse. It is as follows:

Ste-Thérèse, May 2, 1933.

Province of Quebec,
County of Terrebonne,
Municipality of the Parish of St-Thérèse.

At a general, monthly and regular, meeting of the Municipal Council of the Parish of Ste-Thérèse, held at the regular place and hour of its meetings, Tuesday, the second day of May, nineteen hundred and thirty-three, were present: His Worship the Mayor Mr. J. A. Coulombe and Messrs. the Councillors: Richard Hamilton, Jean Franc, Cyprien Charron, Elphège Dubois, Emilien Charron and Evariste Brosseau, forming a quorum under the chairmanship of his Worship the Mayor.

Whereas it is intended to annex this parish to the county of Laval-Two Mountains, in connection with federal matters,

Whereas this readjustment is not in the public interest and therefore not justified.

Therefore, this Council strongly protests against all measures or steps taken to carry out this division.

That copy of this resolution be forwarded to Mr. L. E. Parent, member for the county, with a request to strongly support it.

Certified true copy of the minutes of the meeting of the Municipal Council of the Parish of Ste-Thérèse.

Antonio Forget,
Sec.-Treas.

Will one single member of the committee on redistribution still persist in imposing on the hon. representative of Laval-Two Mountains, 6,000 people who, by this resolution passed by the representatives of the municipality, refuse to join the county of Laval-Two Mountains. May I point out that this resolution was adopted. . .

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): In what year?

[Mr Parent.]

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I shall inform the hon. member. It is exactly what I am looking at. It is dated May 2, 1933.

An hon. MEMBER (Trans.): At what hour?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): At the regular hour of the council's meetings. Since that date—Wednesday of last week—municipal elections were held in that locality and all the members of the council were re-elected. This resolution, therefore, expresses the wish of the people. Notwithstanding this fact, an attempt is made to transfer to the county of Laval-Two Mountains, 6,000 people who entirely refuse to form part of any other county than the beautiful county of Terrebonne, of which this parish has formed part since the county was established.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Will the hon. member permit me to ask a question?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Would the scheme proposed by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin), namely the merging of the county of l'Assomption-Montcalm with the county of Joliette, receive the approval of the hon. member for Terrebonne?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I certainly cannot object, my county is in no way affected; nevertheless, the intention is to deprive me of Ste. Thérèse and St. Janvier, and I am opposed to that. Will the hon. member allow Ste. Thérèse to remain in Terrebonne? First of all, is he authorized to give me a definite answer? If it were his neighbour, the hon. member for Quebec Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), chairman of the sub-committee on redistribution for the province of Quebec, I could rely more on such an answer—however, I do not expect an answer from him.

I strongly protest, sir, against the county of Terrebonne being gerrymandered, I resent any single parish being taken away from Terrebonne. And why? Because the county of Terrebonne is not a creation of recent date, in Quebec. It is one of the first counties established before confederation. It was established before 1825. It is an historical county because of the men who represented it. The following is a list of its representatives: In 1841, Terrebonne was represented in Parliament by the Hon. J. E. Turcotte; in 1844, by the Hon. L. H. Lafontaine; in 1848, by the Hon. L. M. Viger; in 1851, by the Hon. A. M. Morin; in 1854, by the Hon. G. M. Prevost; in 1857, by the Hon. L. S. Morin; in 1863, by Mr. Labrèche Viger and at Confederation by the Hon. Louis François R. Masson, who became Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec, and who represented Terrebonne until 1878. His successors were: In 1882, the Hon. Guillaume Alphonse Nantel, who later on was Minister of Agriculture in the provincial government; and in 1896, Mr. L. A. Chauvin. Up to 1896, all the representatives of this county formed part of that conservative phalanx of that period. To-day, it is proposed to detach from this county parishes which placed their trust in the Conservative party's predecessors. The Conservatives are acting thus because, since 1896, the county of Terrebonne changed its political allegiance. It was the Hon. Raymond Préfontaine who, in 1900, won this county to the Liberal fold. Since then, it was represented: In 1908, by Doctor Desjardins; in 1911, by the Hon. Wilfrid Bruno Nantel, who was a member of the government at Ottawa, for a number of years and later, a member of the railway commission. In 1921 this county was represented by the Hon. J. E. Prévost, who to-day is in the Senate.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Have you not forgotten the name of Sir Adolphe Chapleau? He also represented that county.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): He represented it in Quebec.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You forgot to mention him just now.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): He represented the county in the Quebec Legislature. You have no knowledge of your parliamentary history. Purchase a dictionary and an encyclopedia, and study them.

The members of the committee, sir, do not seem to be greatly impressed by the principles laid down by the one whose name is often on their lips, and also by this great French-Canadian statesman who was a credit to our race and country, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to whom we often refer. Members opposite often quote Macdonald and, we also delight in hearing praises bestowed on this great statesman. Sir John A. Macdonald. Do you think, sir, that if the latter was present at this sitting he would advocate the same policy as the one we have just heard uttered by the right hon. Prime Minister?

What was Sir John A. Macdonald's policy? According to Hansard of 1872, p. 929, referring to the policy of preserving the identity of counties, Sir John A. Macdonald expressed himself as follows:

> It is, I think, a grand system that the people of Canada should have the opportunity of choosing for political promotion the men in whom they have most confidence and of whose abilities they are fully assured. All that great advantage is lost by cutting off a portion of two several counties and adding them together for electoral purposes only. Those portions so cut off have no common interest: they do not meet together and they have no common feeling except that once in five years they go to the polls in their township to vote for a man who may be known in one section and not in another. This tends towards the introduction and development of the American system of caucusses by which wire-pullers take advantage of their political ability only, and not from any personal respect for them.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Then, why did the hon. member change his political allegiance?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I was never a Conservative. I wonder whether you, yourself, changed.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order, please!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): If the hon. member never changed, it is because his heart is in the wrong place.

Three municipalities, sir, are to be detached from the county of Laval-Two Mountains. The reason, so far as it affects Laval, is to justify the annexation of three municipalities of the county of Terrebonne to that of Two Mountains. I closely followed, this afternoon, the hon. Minister of Marine who stated that when it was a question affecting Vaudreuil-Soulanges, there could be no discussion about crossing the Ottawa river over two bridges so as to secure a few votes in the county of Jacques Cartier. The hon. minister is quite aware that there are two bridges spanning the river des Prairies and leading to Pont-Viau, l'Abord-à-Plouffe and Laval-des-Rapides, three municipalities situated across the river. Why does he state it is not to the advantage of Vaudreuil-Soulanges? It is neither to the advantage of Laval. Why oblige voters to cross a river? I cannot follow his argument; however, I state that the same principle should apply everywhere, an if one is wrong, so is the other.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): The right hon. Prime Minister, this afternoon, with all the eloquence we agree he possesses . . .

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): . . . stated in the course of his remarks, that he had recommended to the committee to respect the boundaries of counties as regards Nova Scotia.

Does not this principle apply as well to Quebec? If the boundaries of the counties of Nova Scotia were respected, why were not the demarcation lines of the counties of Terrebonne and Laval-Two Mountains respected? The same principle should apply as much in one section of the country as in the other.

In his remarks on redistribution the hon. Minister of Public Works stated:

> Redistribution should be based on the proportion of population with no greater disturbance than necessary.

Is it not, sir, disturbing a county to detach a section comprising three municipalities? Bear in mind that the parishes of Ste. Thérèse and St. Janvier are crossed by the national highway from the intersection of the railway at Ste. Thérèse, as far as St. Jérôme, and that the highway which now crosses the county of Terrebonne from its southern portion to its northern extremity will be shortened by 14 miles, just for the pleasure of annexing three municipalities of Laval-Two Mountains. The Ste. Thérèse railway, the first built in a northern direction, that famous line, the work of one whom many of you know by reputation, the "curé" Labelle. If the latter was in the house this evening, as he so often was in Quebec to defend the rights of the settler and help colonization north of Montreal—he was then known as the "King of the North"—what would he think? He would feel shocked; no words would express his indignation because of the transfer of the parish and town of Ste. Thérèse from the county of Terrebonne; because of the removal of the only classical institution from the county of Terrebonne. Are such reasons not sufficient to convince the committee that they should reconsider their decision?

The first reason I set forth is that the hon. Postmaster General, who represents the county of Laval-Two Mountains, does not request Ste-Thérèse or St. Janvier. He perhaps does not state that he objects to them, but he has not made the request. Why hand them over to him if he does not request them? Permit me to keep them, because I want them. They form part of the county, and if they have not been as faithful to our cause as I was entitled to expect, nevertheless I foresee that there will be a change at the next election. At the last Dominion election, the town of Ste-Thérèse gave the Liberal candidate a majority of 263 votes; while the parish of Ste-Thérèse unfortunately outnumbered this majority. Why? Because the Conservative party had placed their election agents throughout the rural districts of Quebec. They did not neglect the county of Terrebonne and told our good farmers that they had been forsaken by the Dominion government so far as the tuberculin test of their cattle was concerned and furthermore that they were not receiving for their butter the price to which they were entitled. They promised them 40 cents per pound for their butter.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): My time has expired. I trust that I have sufficiently pleaded my cause, and that I shall be permitted, in all fairness, to retain Ste-Thérèse and St. Janvier.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. P. A. SEGUIN (L'Assomption-Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak I am not so conceited as to think that I shall convince my hon. friends opposite who are on the point of perpetrating the monstrous injustice embodied in this bill, as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) recently put it, that the measure must be carried even if to do so, the brutal force of the majority must be resorted to.

I cannot do less, however, than protest in the strongest way possible, against this shameful injustice of blotting out from the electoral map of this country the county of L'Assomption-Montcalm, by annexing the county of Montcalm to that of Joliette and the county of L'Assomption to that of Terrebonne. The committee seems to ignore that the county of L'Assomption-Montcalm has a population of 29,188, and that it could have been possible to suppress another county, among the twenty others that have a smaller population.

I wish to make it clear to the house that in the attitude I take I am not prompted by personal gain and I have two excellent reasons for that: first, after devoting almost half of my existence to public life and served to the best of my ability according to my humble gifts, my county and country, I cannot expect that I shall be spared many more years in politics. Another reason, perhaps as important as the first, from a personal viewpoint, is that the annexation, as embodied in the bill, of the county of L'Assomption, where I reside, with the county of Terrebonne, where I practised my profession as notary during the first seven years, cannot but appeal to me on more than one score, because I am certain of finding there a great number of my old friends with whom I fought for the great cause and contributed my quota in electing the hon. Raymond Préfontaine, Jean Prévost and Doctor Desjardins, all three of whom I cherish the memory.

However, above all personal interest, and speaking purely and simply as the faithful servant of those who for a quarter of a century have honoured me with their confidence, I cannot do otherwise than to state in the house and before the country that the injustice that the present leaders of the Conservative party are on the point of perpetrating is most iniquitous and greatly to the detriment of the best interests of these good farmers of L'Assomption-Montcalm, whom I have the privilege of representing in the house.

First, when in 1914, the Conservative government of that date thought proper of merging the counties of L'Assomption and Montcalm, they recognized that this section of Quebec was bound by the same interests and differed from most of all other rural counties of our province, because a special industry, that of tobacco, proper to that district, made of the two counties of L'Assomption-Montcalm a necessary entity.

Later on, always bearing in mind the special industry of this part of Quebec and the particular interests of the tobacco growers who are so numerous in these two counties, the government, at the cost of many hundred thousands of dollars, established and maintained an experimental farm of tobacco which to-day is the pride and has benefitted the entire farming community of L'Assomption-Montcalm and the neighbourhood.

May I add, sir, that there exists another primordial reason which tends to promote the union of the two counties of L'Assomption and Montcalm, it is the numerous associations existing in this county, such as the Tobacco Growers' Association of L'Assomption-Montcalm, the Co-operative Tobacco Society of L'Assomption-Montcalm and others.

By its new scheme the Conservative government also disregards the boundaries of the judicial district, detaches the county of L'Assomption from the Joliette district so as to annex it to the district of Terrebonne and thereby tends to destroy the mode of life, customs, judiciary relations, etc., of the people of L'Assomption to which up to this day the natural course of life has linked them. What will be the result of this new scheme? The present population of the county of Joliette is 27,585, that of Montcalm 13,865, which will give the new county of Joliette-Montcalm a population of 41,450.

The population of the county of Terrebonne is 38,611, that is when the 5,651 required by the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) are deducted. I say required by the Postmaster General, although my hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Parent) just stated that he did not ask for them. One thing certain is that he will not give up this annexation to his county. Therefore, by removing from the county of Terrebonne the 5,651 people of Ste-Thérèse, town and parish, and St. Janvier, the population of Terrebonne is thereby reduced to 32,960; then, by adding a population of 15,323 from the county of L'Assomption, the new county of L'Assomption-Terrebonne will have a population of 48,283. You will admit, sir, that these figures are rather large, if compared to those of a great number of counties of Quebec but especially to those of the county of Argenteuil, even after being increased.

What are we to think also of the 155 square miles area or more of the new county of L'Assomption-Terrebonne? It will certainly be an imposing county which, owing to its large population and area, will certainly do honour to the one who will represent it. However, you will agree with me, sir, that this county seems to have too large a population and an area of unreasonable size. Why not allow the county of L'Assomption-Montcalm to remain as it is with its population of 29,188?

I cannot therefore think otherwise that the present bill, so far as the county of L'Assomption-Montcalm is concerned, is most unfair, cannot be justified and will be greatly detrimental to the people of this county as a whole, and more especially to the tobacco growers. The particular interests of the county of L'Assomption-Montcalm require that it be not split up, and as a last resort, I think that, in order not to harm the material interests of L'Assomption-Montcalm, it would be infinitely better for it to be, as a whole, annexed to another electoral division, if hon. members opposite persist in their desire to see it disappear, because it has opposed their policy.

I deemed it my duty to protest against the serious consequences which will have to be borne by the good farming community which I have the honour to represent in the house. In closing my remarks I again strongly protest against the despicable iniquity and incredible injustice which is being perpetrated against the constituency of l'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. L. DUBOIS (Nicolet) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, at this late hour, I do not intend to delay at length the house in discussing the present bill. Moreover, the interests of my county, as well as those of Yamaska, were admirably defended this morning and this afternoon by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin).

I, however, wish to protest on behalf of my constituents against this bill known under various names, which, however, I shall simply designate for the present, as an unfair measure, so as to remain within the bounds of a frank and loyal discussion.

Useless to state that I resent the odium of this redistribution bill, since I protest against this gerrymander which the opposition want to inflict on the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska. You will allow me, sir, to state what took place in committee, since the present bill was introduced. The first scheme, sir, conceived by hon. members opposite was to annex Yamaska to Drummond and Nicolet to Arthabaska; moreover to detach from the county of Nicolet the town of Nicolet, the principal town of the county, the parishes of Ste-Perpetue and Ste-Brigitte-des-Saults so as to annex them to the county of Yamaska-Drummond. The intention was to also detach from my county the parishes of St-Pierre, Ste-Cécile and Ste-Sophie so as to annex them to the county of Lotbiniere. The scheme was absurd. On May 9, in the presence of Mr. Alfred Gaudet, advocate of Nicolet, my opponent at the 1930 election, and Mr. Comtois, defeated candidate in the county of Yamaska, I met the hon. members in charge of the sub-committee on redistribution. After giving my explanations, the members of the committee decided to reconsider their decision. Finding that the first scheme was absolutely absurd, the committee decided to make the present changes, at the suggestions, probably, of Mr. Comtois.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): He is the future candidate.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Instead of adhering to the first scheme, the committee decided to annex Nicolet to Yamaska. I was in fact requested to effect a compromise in the matter.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You were wrong.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): It is unfair for the majority to ask for a vote; however, if such be their wish they possess the power to do so. If the majority of the house wishes to complete the shameful deed begun in the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska, it is free to do so. I do not intend to say unpleasant things to my hon. friends opposite. I shall put off doing so until we discuss the bill item by item.

[Mr. Dubois.]

Meanwhile, I intended to discuss matters with our good friends and request them to reconsider their decision and weigh every circumstance and reason which tend to favour the complete merging of the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska and not those that tend against the annexation of parts of these counties. I hope to reach an understanding with our friends. When they hear the reasons I shall set forth and after pondering over those given this morning by the hon. member for Richelieu, I am sure that they will find it only fair, reasonable and right to preserve intact the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska by merging them. I have no objection that Yamaska and Nicolet be merged. Under present circumstances, this merging would be but natural, because the county of Yamaska has not actually a sufficient population to remain on the federal map. Moreover, I have among the people of Yamaska a great number of friends both Conservatives and Liberals. I shall take pride in seeing them form part of the county of Nicolet, and I am willing to welcome them with open arms, because these people have the same habits and characteristics as the people of Nicolet. They belong to the farming classes as do those from Nicolet; they have about the same needs, habits and mentality.

The committee should not detach from the county of Yamaska half of the small parish of St. Michel in order to place it in the county of Richelieu. No doubt that the people of Yamaska would find good friends in the county of my hon. friend from Richelieu, but why split in half this small parish which has formed part of the county ever since confederation. There is no more reason to do this than there is to detach from the county of Nicolet the parishes of St-Pierre, Ste. Cecile, Ste. Sophie, Manseau, Lemieux and Ste. Marie. These parishes form part of the county of Nicolet ever since Confederation. Why thus split up two counties where people have the same habits, the same mode of life, the same interests; two counties which form part of similar judicial districts and have the same provincial requirements? The county of Nicolet is a distinct entity in provincial matters, as well as the county of Yamaska. Why detach from these counties these six parishes and half of another. I beg of the committee, of hon. members opposite to be fair in this matter. By treating me fairly, they will, at the same time, show their spirit of justice to the people of these few parishes.

I broke the news of this division to my constituents as well as those of Yamaska, and I received strong protests against, first, the cutting up of my county and then that of Yamaska. May I read to the house a resolution adopted by all the municipalities of the county of Nicolet, protesting against this readjustment that the committee is about to make in the county of Nicolet, as well as in the county of Yamaska:

Canada,
Province of Quebec,
County of Nicolet,
Municipality of,

Whereas a redistribution of the electoral seats in view of representation in the House of Commons is proposed pursuant to the last census.

Whereas it is proposed to split up the county of Nicolet, by detaching of said county the parishes of Ste-Pierre les Becquets Ste-Cécile de Lévrard, Ste-Sophie de Levrard, Manseau, St. Joseph de Blandford, Lemieux and Ste-Marie de Blandford in order to annex them to the county of Lotbinière.

Whereas the annexation of parts of the county of Nicolet, either to the county of Drummond or the county of Arthabaska or the county of Lotbinierè is contrary to the interests of the people of Nicolet as much from an electoral viewpoint as from a diocesan, judicial, commercial, farming and educational viewpoint.

Whereas the interests of the said various counties are not the same, but are rather opposed to one another and that the readjustment of the new counties such as proposed, might create regrettable and harmful conflicts of interests.

Whereas if there must be merging it should be carried out by the annexation of the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska which are two essentially farming counties, this annexation seems to be more advantageous from an economic, geographical, educational, religious and civic viewpoint.

It is therefore moved by seconded by that the council of the municipality of acting as the interpreters of the rate payers of the municipality of the strongly protest against splitting up the county of Nicolet as proposed, and humbly suggests to the Dominion government to maintain the county of Nicolet as a distinct entity, such as it is at present, considering that it has a sufficient population, and furthermore that, if merging is necessary, the two counties of Nicolet and Yamaska be merged as a whole, under the names of Nicolet-Yamaska, this last choice would make for the stability of the representation of this farming district, and thus the electoral representation would conform to the senatorial representation.

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister of Canada, the member of the county of Nicolet and to the chairman of the committee on redistribution.

This resolution as I stated a moment ago, was signed by all the municipal councils of my county of which I shall give the list:

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Will the hon member pemit me to ask a question? Would you object to the county of Nicolet being annexed to that of Arthabaska?

[Mr. Dubois.]

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): I have just expressed myself very clearly on this point. What is most natural, at present, is the merging of the county of Yamaska with that of Nicolet. I consider that the annexation of the county of Nicolet to the county of Arthabaska such as advocated in the first place, is absurd.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That would make too Liberal a county.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Will my hon. friend allow me to put a question? What will be the population of the combined counties of Nicolet and Yamaska?

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): The total population will be 47,000 and some hundreds. I have no objection to accepting a population of 47,000.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Does not my hon. friend consider this figure somewhat high, compared with the adjoining constituencies?

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): I may say to the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) that it is not exaggerated at all. The hon. minister needs but to refer to the county of Drummond-Arthabaska, for instance, which adjoins mine, and he will find that it has a population of 53,338.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The county of Richelieu will have 35,000, the county of Gaspe, 47,160, and the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay, after the present redistribution, will have a population of 55,594.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): No change is being made in Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): One parish is being added to it.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): That is not much.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Chicoutimi county, 55,724. I may therefore say to the hon. Minister of Marine that it would be in no way excessive to give me a population of 47,000, especially when the union is so perfectly natural. I have no objection to accepting that number of people, when it makes it possible for them to remain together, as they have done ever since confederation. I may point out to the hon. Minister of Marine that in giving to Nicolet-Yamaska a population of 47,000 he will be creating a constituency that will need no further changes, a constituency that will be practically everlasting.

I would further point out to the hon. minister that both Nicolet and Yamaska are essentially agricultural and that, if we annex them together, we shall have the satisfaction of having set up in the heart of Quebec one of those fine farming counties that are the pride of our province.

The county of Yamaska having at present no representative in this House, I protest once more on its behalf against the transfer from it of one half of the village of St. Michel. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine will agree with me that this transfer is an injustice. However, in order to show you that I have well interpreted the feelings of the people of Yamaska in protesting on their behalf against the removal of half the village of St. Michel, I shall, with your permission, read a letter that I received this morning from a person of that county:

Pierreville, Que., May 20, 1933.
Mr. Dubois, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Sir,—

During the past few days I have had the opportunity of meeting the principal citizens of the county of Yamaska. They all seem satisfied to have the county as a whole joined to Nicolet, but they all strongly protest against the separation of the parish of Yamaska, the east and west sides form a single parish, having but one church, which is on the west side. We ask you to protest against the injustice that would result from placing this parish half in Richelieu and half in Nicolet.

We trust you will succeed in preventing the division of this parish, which bears the name of our county.

Believe me, dear, sir,
Yours truly,
Aimé Laperrière.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Was that letter written at your request?

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): I thought the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) was very nice—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation) —more intelligent than that.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): No, I would not say more intelligent, but he is usually nicer than he is tonight. The question is quite a serious one and I should think the hon. member could give me credit for other intentions than those. I am not acquainted with Mr. Aimé Laperrière, of Pierreville. I did not ask for that letter. Mr. Laperrière expressed the opinion of the county. It is natural for constituents to protest of their own accord against the injustice that would result from removing from Yamaska county—note how ridiculous it is—one half of the parish of St. Michel to place it in the county of Richelieu, when it has been part of Yamaska ever since confederation.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): I have also received protests from the parishes directly interested, such as Saint-Pierre, Sainte-Cécile, Sainte-Sophie, Manseau, Lemieux, Sainte-Marie. These parishes have sent me petitions signed, I venture to say, by all their citizens, asking that they be retained in the county of Nicolet. Their petitions read as follows:

Whereas the House of Commons will shortly be called upon to consider the question of the redistribution of constituencies throughout the Dominion;

Whereas the plans, as drawn, would divide up the county of Nicolet and annex its parts to various adjoining counties;

Whereas St-Pierre-les-Becquets in particular, as well as Ste-Cécile-de-Levrard and Ste-Sophie-de-Levrard, are to be annexed to the county of Lotbinière;

Whereas the proposed changes would be inconvenient in many respects, both from the religious and the material point of view;

Whereas the proposed redistribution would reduce, in the province of Quebec, the rural representation in the House of Commons, to the detriment of the agricultural class;

Wherefore, we, the undersigned electors of St-Pierre-les-Becquets, earnestly and respectfully pray the members of the House of Commons:

1. To preserve the identity of the county of Nicolet;

2. To maintain the parish of St-Pierre-les-Becquets and its two neighbours in the county of Nicolet, to which we are proud to belong and to which we desire to remain faithful, our religious and material interests being closely connected with it.

This petition is signed by the tax-payers of the parish of St. Pierre-les-Becquets. I have others to the same effect signed by the tax-payers of the parishes of Ste-Cécile, Manseau, Ste-Sophie, Lemieux and Ste-Marie. The following one, bearing nearly 400 signatures, is from the Conservative parish of Ste-Brigitte-des-Saults:

We, the undersigned electors of Ste-Brigitte-des-Saults, declare that we are opposed to any change, in connection with the electoral redistribution, that would divide or dismember our beautiful county of Nicolet.

We do not object to the addition of other electoral divisions to our county.

We humbly submit this petition, with the conviction that our member, Mr. Lucien Dubois, will constitute himself the advocate of our cause before the governmental authorities.

This document was addressed to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, to the chairman of the redistribution committee and to myself. I trust they have taken cognizance of it and will consider the recommendations of these parishes, whose names I mentioned in order that they may be recorded in Hansard to serve as an acknowledgment of the splendid civic spirit and great fairness that my good friends have shown in having resolutions passed by their respective municipal councils and in signing petitions protesting against the partitioning of the county of Nicolet.

I have sought, but in vain, the reason for not merging the county of Yamaska as a whole to the county of Nicolet. I fail to understand why the identity of both counties should not be preserved. I requested Yamaska, but I was told that the electoral division resulting from the union of those two counties would have too large a population. I am ready, as well as my constituents, to face an election in a county of 47,000.

I asked the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) and the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) to cut up neither my county nor Yamaska. We seek a fair and rational redistribution, one that all the people of the province can approve. I asked the officers of the committee to give us a plan that would also command the approval of the thoughtful press of the province, but instead we have been given this altogether inacceptable bill. In order that they may understand the situation, I would request my hon. friends who sit to your right, Mr. Chairman, to put themselves in the position of the people of the parishes it is sought to remove from the counties of which they have formed part for more than one hundred years.

I have already given the reasons that render the integral merger of the counties of Yamaska and Nicolet advisable. I shall repeat them: Both counties are inhabited by a farming population whose interests, mode of life, customs and needs are identical. The two counties form distinct and complete municipal entities. Provincially, they are each a complete unit. Why, then, should we partition them? Why should we divide them? The idea is unacceptable.

When we are called upon to examine the bill in detail, I shall have changes to propose, and I hope that, after due consideration of the reasons I have advanced to-night, it will be found possible to get together and effect a fair, logical and reasonable union of the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska. I do not see why we should refuse to act in accordance with the wishes of the people of these counties. One-half of St-Michel, a Liberal parish, is being taken away from me, as well as six Liberal parishes of Nicolet county. Do my friends opposite think that by thus carving my county and that of Yamaska they will establish a Conservative stronghold? I urge them to dismiss that idea. Should the government carry through its intention to partition these two counties, the Liberal candidate's victory will be greater at the next election than it was in 1930.

The people, even the Conservatives, will feel compelled to convict a government guilty of such a shameful act. I am sufficiently acquainted with my constituents, with their mentality and their feelings, to state, Mr. Chairman, that Conservatives and Liberals will unite to give a unanimous vote to the Liberal candidate as a protest against the wrong inflicted upon them and of which they rightfully complain. I wonder if it is to gild the pill that the hon. Solicitor General said this afternoon: We are establishing, for our friends of the opposition, safe Liberal counties; why should we not establish safe counties for our own party in the province of Quebec? These are, roughly his words. Mr. Chairman, you who know what impartiality is, you who are conscious of your responsibilities as a representative of the people, can you tell us since when we, members of parliament, are entitled to traffic with the votes of the people?

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): I think the hon. Solicitor General will regret these words, just as he will regret the last ones he uttered when he said that he did not want to see any further Liberal bloc in the province of Quebec.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Or Conservative, if you wish. You do not want a solid Liberal bloc or a solid Conservative bloc, and you have taken this means to achieve your ends. Let me say to the hon. members opposite that neither they nor I control any solid bloc in the province, that it is the people who decide on polling day whether or not there shall be a solid Conservative bloc or a solid Liberal bloc. Let us respect the rights and privileges of the people instead of violating them.

I shall close my remarks. I hope my recommendations will be considered. I have submitted them in all possible sincerity and once more I ask the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) and especially the hon. Minister of Marine to put themselves for a moment in the place of the people of the parishes they seek to remove from the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska. They will understand, for I think I may truthfully say that they are men with a sense of feeling, that these parishes should not be thus expelled. I do not say they will not find good friends in the counties to which it is proposed to attach them, but I do most energetically protest against their separation from the county to which they have belonged ever since confederation.

Mr. J. A. VERVILLE (Lotbinière) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the bill submitted to us will be carried by the vote of the majority in this house. We have been told it would be and we are certain of it. In so far as the county of Lotbinière is concerned, I wish to register my humble protest. If the members of the redistribution committee, actuated by a feeling of generosity, have sought to make a present to Lotbinière county by inordinately enlarging it, I have at least the right to protest, and I intend to do so. Since confederation, the boundaries of the county of Lotbinière have never been touched by any political party, whether Liberal or Conservative. Since 1867, the two great political parties have several times succeeded each other in the administration of the country and never at any time has a Liberal government or a Conservative government dared to lay hands on that county. We had to live in the present era, an era of depression—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Is it a crime to touch your county?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Perhaps it is, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Its name is Touch-me-not.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): We had to live in the present era to see such things.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): We have given you some beautiful Liberal parishes.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): This year, actuated by a very special zeal, animated by a blue flame, they have said: We must lay hands on every county that has not elected a Conservative in the past. By the way, I thank the members of the committee, especially my excellent friend the member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), my university confrère, for the beautiful gift he wishes to make the county of Lotbinière, of which I am to-day the representative.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): If you are satisfied, why do you protest?

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Come, come, senator.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Have you not understood? I said that I was protesting. Lotbinière has to-day a population of 23,034, living in 22 parishes and 11 villages. The bill now before us would add to it six parishes and one village, with a population of 5,336, taken from the constituency of my friend from Nicolet (Mr. Dubois). On the south side it would get, from Megantic, six parishes with a population of 4,532. From Levis there would be added to it five parishes with 3,943 souls.

Mr. FORTIN (Translation): Will you please state that the parishes from Levis were given to you at your own request, made in November, 1932, when I did not yet know there would be a redistribution?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I shall have to insert a parenthesis here. One day, when the enlargement of Lotbinière county was in question, I happened to meet my good friend Dr. Fortin, now member for Levis, and I said to him that in the event of my county being enlarged, three parishes from his county; St-Nicholas, St-Etienne and St-Lambert, would quite naturally be transferred to it. There was not mention of St-Rédempteur. We met several times since and the three parishes I have just named were the ones in question. How is it that St-Rédempteur figures in this bill? Did you ever mention it to me?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I know that I should address the Chair. I ask my hon. friend to state whether St-Rédempteur was ever mentioned.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It has been given to you in addition.

Mr. FORTIN (Translation): Unfortunately, I have to contradict my hon. colleague from Lotbinière and to state on my honour that on three different occasions you told me that the Chaudière river would form the dividing line between Lotbinière and Lévis. On the first occasion when mention was made of giving me the parishes you named I had witnesses who are not very far away, for the deputy-speaker of the house was there. It is fear that prompted you to make the offer you did make to me, as there was talk at the time of annexing Lotbinière to Nicolet or. .

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That is a good idea.

Mr. FORTIN (Translation): ..or Lotbinière to Arthabaska.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): In the first place, you should address the Chair when you speak in this house. You have made a statement on your honour. Perhaps my word is worth that of the member for Lévis.

A MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I maintain that there was no reference in these conversations to the Chaudière river and that St-Nicholas, St-Etienne and St-Lambert were alone mentioned.

Mr. FORTIN (Translation): You admit that the parishes of St-Etienne, St-Nicholas and St-Lambert were mentioned, but not St-Rédempteur. Well, is it possible to annex these three parishes without including St-Rédempteur, which is bounded on the west by St-Nicholas, on the south by St-Etienne, on the north by St-Nicholas and on the east by the Chaudière river. . . .

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It is bounded all around.

Mr. FORTIN (Translation): Would there be any means of communication between St-Rédempteur and the county of Lévis? There could be none. How, then could you annex these three parishes from Lévis county without taking in St-Rédempteur, which is surrounded by the parishes you yourself have requested?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman. would you kindly render a Solomonic judgment in order to determine which of the two hon. members is telling the truth.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): It is a most involved matter.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I must say that I never, under any circumstances, asked for these parishes. I simply told you, when I met you, that if Lotbinière county had to be enlarged, it would be rational to add to it the parishes of St-Nicholas, St-Etienne and St-Lambert. St-Rédempteur was never mentioned and I never asked for those parishes which form part of Lévis county. I demand a retraction.

Mr. FORTIN (Translation): I beg your pardon, you did ask for them; I call to witness the deputy-speaker of the house.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order. Hon. members must not address each other; they must address the Chair.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): He is the judge; he cannot be a witness.

[Mr. Barrette.]

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I maintain that I never asked for any parish from Lévis and that I never signed any arrangement in that connection. Furthermore, I never agreed that the four parishes from Lévis county that are presently being transferred to Lotbinière form part of the latter without my consent. I told the hon. member for Lévis that if it were desired to enlarge the county of Lotbinière the natural way would be to annex to it the parishes of St-Nicholas, St-Etienne and St-Lambert. There was no mention of St-Rédempteur. No reference was ever made to the river, nor to the removal of the boundaries in order to form an enclosed territory as the hon. member for Lévis has just said.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is true.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It is not a river, it is a brook.

Mr. MERCIER: (Translation): Let us dump all that into the Chaudière and get on with the bill.

Mr. FORTIN (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I call you to witness; you were there. I hope that when you leave the Chair you will kindly bear testimony.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The hon. member for St-Henri and I were present at all the conversations and it is the member for Lotbinière who is right.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri) (Translation): I do not recall the matter exactly, but it is highly involved. Let us dump it all into the Chaudière and get on with our business.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I hold the hon. member for Lévis in high esteem; I am aware of all the annoyances he has suffered since his election. . .

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): He has suffered annoyances?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): . . . . I respect his integrity and his good qualities.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I have always considered him a truthful man and I should like to be able to accept his word, as I am at all times ready to do on any other point.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that on one side of the river there is being added to Lotbinière county the parishes of St-Lambert, St-Etienne and St-Nicholas. . . .

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): The school-children's patron.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Do you object to St-Rédempteur?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Very much.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): I think it is your salvation.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, St-Rédempteur has a population of 657; St-Etienne, of 588; St-Lambert, of 1,188; St-Nicholas, of 851; Nicholas-Sud, of 659, which makes a total of 3,943 added to the population of my county. As representative of the county of Lotbinière, I am pleased to welcome all these people and to ask them to maintain the same feelings, the same ideas, the same customs. . . .

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): . . . .the same opinions, the same practices as when they belonged to the county of Lévis.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): With them you will be saved.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): From the Nicolet side, the county of my birth, the redistribution projected by my friends opposite brings to the county of Lotbinière a population of 5,386 with six parishes and one village.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): A beautiful village.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): St-Joseph-de-Blandford, 533; Manseau, the birth-place of my friend Savoie whom death has recently taken, 530; Ste-Marie, 574; St-Pierre-les-Becquets, 1,212.

Mr. DORION (Translation): St-Pierre-Becquets?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): "Les"-Becquets, if you please, Ste-Cécile, 707; Ste-Sophie, 1,439; Lemieux, 341.

Mr. DORION (Translation): It is for the best.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I do not think it is for the best. That makes six Nicolet parishes annexed to Lotbinière. From an election point of view I do not think I need them. The matter was well explained just now by the hon. member for Nicolet: it is done in order to try to take away a Liberal majority of 730 which he had at the last election. . . . . .

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): You must have a great deal of influence.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): —and to place it in the county of Lotbinière. To that end they made an indentation so as to take in Lemieux and Ste-Marie. To all these citizens I offer, on behalf of the people of Lotbinière, a most cordial welcome. I already informed the hon. member for Nicolet that neither I nor the county of Lotbinière had asked for his constituents.

Mr. BRADETTE (Translation): He is not very sure of that.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, since the committee is giving these citizens of Nicolet to Lotbinière, I must tell the hon. member for Nicolet—and I ask him to transmit the message to his constituents —that the electors of Lotbinière are happy to welcome them, because they entertain the same sentiments and ideas, and they hope to see them continue as always to vote for the right party.

Certain manoeuvres affecting the county of Megantic have to be explained. The first plan laid before the committee would have placed in Lotbinière county the residence of the hon. member for Megantic. When my friends opposite noticed this was not sufficient to bring him into Lotbinière, they said: We will take this county seat, and they placed Inverness in Lotbinière. Following numerous discussions and adjustments and, I suppose, after invoking the Holy Spirit, the members of the committee concluded that the project was nonsensical. They left the hon. member for Megantic in his own county and they left him his county seat, but they insisted on transferring part of his territory to Lotbinière, and this is what they did: they took Lyster, Ste-Anastasie, Nelson township, Leeds, Leeds-East and St-Jacques-de-Leeds, with a population of 4,532, and placed them in Lotbinière. And, mark you well, in order to do that, they managed to carve out what I may call a flute with the county of Megantic, thereby joining it to Frontenac county. To these citizens of Megantic county, as to those of Nicolet and of Lévis that are being transferred to my constituency, I extend, on behalf of the people of Lotbinière, a most cordial welcome. May they always follow the example set by the people of Lotbinière.

I must further state, as the hon. ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) so eloquently said this morning, Nicolet has its natural neighbours: on one side, Nicolet, on the other side, Lévis, and on the south, Megantic. I have been lengthened, or, I should say, my constituency has been lengthened in the direction of Beauce.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You have been extended.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That would suit many people.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Your expression may be the better one; thank you. They have extended Lotbinière in the direction of Beauce and attached—some say annexed—to Lotbinière county St-Elzéar and St-Séverin.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Jack-knife factory.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): That makes 1,700 more of a population. The people of Lotbinière county will certainly be glad to learn that these good citizens of Beauce are going to join them. On behalf of my present constituents, I extend to them, as I did to the people of Nicolet, of Megantic and of Lévis, a most hearty welcome. May they, once in Lotbinière, share the views of the present citizens of that county.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Do not forget the elections.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have made the round; I still have the horizon before me. I do not know whether you have ever travelled in my country, which is not very far from your own. Lotbinière county happens to be bounded on the north by the river St. Lawrence. While the bargaining in connection with the county's boundary lines was going on I often wondered whether some way would be imagined to pull a few parishes out of the river in order to attach them to Lotbinière. The former Minister of Justice stated this morning that that plan did not succeed, and I thank the members of the committee for having refrained from forcing me, or rather from forcing the people of Lotbinière to take steps to secure the erection of a bridge in order to fetch a few electors from Portneuf. Such a suggestion was made not long since and it seems to me it would not be any more ridiculous here than elsewhere.

I wish to state that this enlargement has never, in any manner whatever, been requested by the county of Lotbinière. Should some people call you to witness, Mr. Chairman, you are too honest not to tell the truth and you will therefore tell the truth. One thing is certain and that is that my friends opposite have said to themselves: Since confederation Lotbinière has always elected a Liberal; we have tried in every way to capture it, but in vain. We will therefore rearrange the constituency in such a manner that he who comes forward as a candidate will find himself faced with a discouraging task.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): To build a stronghold of it!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I know the people of my county well enough to say that they never lose courage, especially in the defence of a just cause.

This afternoon I heard the hon. Minister of Marine say that there existed certain counties of which the municipal or judicial boundaries had never changed, and he mentioned Lotbinière. I would point out to the hon. Minister of Marine and to all those who would say like him that never, in the past, have the municipal boundaries of Lotbinière been adjusted to suit the provincial and federal boundaries. We have, of course, the county council which represent all the municipalities that elect the representatives to the Ottawa and Quebec parliaments. That has always been and still is, but it will no longer be under the new plan that is to be adopted. And now, Mr. Chairman, in order to show that, in the past, judicial, municipal, provincial and federal boundaries have been adhered to as much as possible, I shall quote a statement made many years ago by one who, when he spoke, knew what he was saying. The following statement of a former prime minister—Sir Wilfrid Laurier is to be found in Hansard for 1914, page 845:

> The selectmen in every county have to meet several times a year for the discharge of their judicial functions as jurors and their municipal functions as municipal councillors, and at these meetings they prepare themselves for the public life of the country. They discuss not only the matters pertaining to their judicial or municipal functions, but naturally the larger questions which concern national problems. It it evident that this predisposes men to proper and safe judgment upon all matters of public interest. It seems to me obvious that if you interfere with the lines of the county unit, separate those who meet periodically for the discharge of their municipal and other duties, and provide that they shall only meet once in four or five years to decide on political questions, you detract from, rather than add to, their appreciation of public questions.

The principle laid down by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1914 holds good to-day, but you depart from it when you attach part of Nicolet, which belongs to the judicial district of Nicolet, to Lotbinière, which belongs to the judicial district of Quebec. By what right do you arbitrarily place people in a county belonging to a judicial district other than their own? I ask you to respect the established municipal and judicial, as well as county, divisions. If you have to take one or two counties from the rural districts, take them, but join them in their entirety to others. Merge even four counties if you have to, but, at least, do not carve them. Do not split up parishes. Do not, for selfish political or personal considerations that are probably not worth the trouble, divide a village by a river that happens to flow through it. For Heaven's sake, respect established lines.

Mr. JEAN (Translation): Mr. Chairman, would you kindly call it eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 24, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. E. N. RHODES (for the Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table order in council P.C. 980 passed pursuant to the provisions of the relief legislation.

QUESTIONS

ELECTRIC COMPANIES—ALLEGED COMBINE

Mr. BUTCHER:

1. Was a petition for an inquiry under The Combines Investigation Act alleging that an illegal combine consisting of: Canadian General Electric Company Limited, Canadian Marconi Company (limited liability), Canadian Westinghouse Company Limited, Northern Electric Company Limited, Western Electric Company Limited, Standard Radio Manufacturing Corporation (now the Rogers-Majestic Corporation), Canadian Radio Patents Limited, is operating and has operated since January 19, 1927, filed with the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act, during the year 1930?
2. Did the registrar make an investigation and report to the minister?
3. Was the report of the registrar of such a character as to induce the minister to transmit the complaint, the petition, copy of the evidence taken at the investigations and other necessary documents to the Attorney-General of Ontario for appropriate action under section 31 (a) and (b) of the Combines Investigation Act?
4. In view of the fact that the Attorney-General of Ontario did not institute proceedings against the alleged illegal combine, has the minister considered the advisability of applying any of the other remedies enumerated in section 31 of the Combines Investigation Act, and what decision has he arrived at in connection therewith?

Mr. BENNETT (for Mr. Gordon):

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. Yes, but no further action is contemplated.

ALFRED, ONT., PEAT BOG

Mr. BERTRAND:

1. Is the government advised that an English company, Fuels Development, Limited, has decided to work the peat bog at Alfred, Ontario?
2. Has this company asked the government to grant a subsidy for the furtherance of the undertaking?
3. Will the government assist the development of such peat bog?
4. If so, in what manner?

Mr. BENNETT (for Mr. Gordon):

1. No.
2. Yes.
3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.

MONTREAL HARBOUR BOARD

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the government aware that the Montreal harbour board employs American subjects as timekeepers in the place of Canadian-born British subjects?
2. If so, what are the names of these American subjects, and were Canadian-born British subjects replaced by them?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

The following information has been furnished by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal:

1. All timekeepers on the staff of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, without exception, are Canadian-born British subjects.
2. Answered by No. 1.

BONAVENTURE COUNTY—PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Have any public works been authorized by the Department of Public Works, for the present year, in the county of Bonaventure?
2. If so, what are their nature, what amounts have been authorized, and in what localities?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

For a copy of orders in council P.C. 1947 and P.C. 1948, together with a copy of telegrams, cablegrams, letters and other correspondence relating to subject matter of said orders in council as at present on the files of the Department of External Affairs.

NORMAN JOLLIMORE

Mr. VALLANCE (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents, regarding the dispensing with the services of Norman Jollimore, mail carrier between Halifax and Lower Prospect post offices, and the awarding of the service to J. Bernard Umlah of Terrance Bay from the 1st of March of this year, and also with regard to changing the contract so that the services will be from Lower Prospect to White's Lake connecting with the mails from Upper Prospect.

RELIEF FUNDS—GLACE BAY

Mr. VALLANCE (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all correspondence, evidence, reports, and other papers and documents respecting the investigation recently held regarding the administration of relief funds at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia.

POST OFFICE—FIELD, ONT.

Mr. HURTUBISE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions, reports and other documents in possession of the government, respecting any change made since 1930 in the postmastership or in the location of the post office at Field, Ontario.

SUTHERLAND COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) (for Mr. Gott):

For a copy of the report, evidence and all information obtained by the Sutherland commission, in the investigation into tobacco buying conditions in the province of Ontario, following alleged report of combine and application for investigation under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this had better stand.

Motion stands.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

COAL INQUIRY

Mr. WOODSWORTH (for Mr. Mitchell) moved:

For a copy of the report and evidence arising out of the investigations of Fred McGregor, registrar, under the Combines Investigation Act into the importation of British coal.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) a few days ago made clear the position of the department with respect to this matter. The evidence in question has been transmitted to the attorney general of Quebec, and the report of the registrar upon the evidence would prejudice the position of any person who might be brought to trial. Under the general provisions of the law and the rules that regulate the conduct of government I submit that in the first place it is improper to ask for the papers and, in the second place, that the government would have to resist the motion because it cannot prejudice the position of any person who might be accused under the provisions of the act. The report of the registrar upon the evidence is calculated to prejudice the fair trial of any person who might be accused.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the Prime Minister if it has not been the practice in certain cases to publish such evidence, and if so why should there be any change of policy in this particular instance?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot answer that question. If it has been done in times past that is no reason why the position of a possible defendant to a criminal charge should be prejudiced by the premature publication of comments upon the testimony on which he might be adjudged guilty or innocent.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member withdraw the motion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is the only thing to be done, I suppose, if the government will not give the information.

Motion withdrawn.

PATENTS ACT RULES AND REGULATIONS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

For a copy of (1) amended rules and regulations governing the administration of the Patents Act; (2) regulations and forms for carrying into effect the Unfair Competition Act of 1932, which were made effective September, 1932.

Mr. CAHAN: It would be impossible for me to comply with this order within the next twenty-four hours, but if the hon. gentleman will withdraw it I shall see that copies are sent to him at the earliest possible date. Some of these rules are under consideration and are before council for modification, and I will send him the amended copies as soon as possible.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Very well; stand.

Motion stands.

CONFERRING OF TITLES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the reply he made yesterday to my inquiry with regard to the government's view with respect to the conferring of titles. Yesterday the right hon. Prime Minister stated:

> . . . it is the considered view of His Majesty's government in Canada that a resolution passed by one house of parliament is legally effective only as an expression of the opinion of those who support such resolution in that house, and this is particularly true with respect to the prerogative of the crown.
> The sovereign can only be deprived of a prerogative right by statute of parliament, in very special form, which the government does not propose to introduce. There is apparently no opportunity at this time for discussion of the matters referred to by the right honourable gentleman.

The matter referred to by myself, mentioned in the last sentence, was as to whether the government would undertake to say that no titles would be conferred until parliament had been given an opportunity to discuss the matter anew. I wish now to ask the Prime Minister whether he will give the house the assurance that we will have an opportunity to discuss the question of titles before the government advises His Majesty in any way with respect to the exercise of the royal prerogative in regard to the conferring of titles in Canada.

I should like to add to my question, if I may, that the reason I urge that this assurance be given is that the house has all along been under the impression, until the reply of the Prime Minister was made, that a resolution of this house would bind the government. The question with respect to titles was asked at the beginning of this part of the session, I think, but was answered only a day or two ago so really no opportunity has been given the house to discuss the question as I am sure it would have wished to do had the opinion of the government been made known.

I might add further that, as my right hon. friend will recall, on February 14, 1929, the house refused to entertain a motion of the present hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) that a special committee be appointed to inquire into the question of titles with a view to considering whether the resolution of the House of Commons of May, 1919, should not be rescinded. That motion was voted down by a very large majority, I think it was 114 to 60. In view of that fact, and because on two occasions the house has expressed itself as opposed to the conferring of titles, and also since there has been an understanding on the part of hon. members that the resolution of 1919 would be binding, no intimation to the contrary having been given until yesterday—

Mr. BENNETT: Some days ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I accept my right hon. friend's correction; I believe the statement of the government's position was made a day or two ago, but the question as to opportunity being given hon. members of discussing the matter was not answered until yesterday. I do not imagine hon. members would wish to discuss the matter at this stage of the session; before, however, His Majesty is advised to exercise the right of conferring titles I think an opportunity should be given for a full discussion of this question.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I regret that I am unable to give any such assurance with respect to any matter of that character. I can only add that personally I have never held the opinion that a resolution of this house had any effect upon succeeding parliaments, or that it was binding upon anyone other than the persons who were parties to it or who desired to be bound by it. A resolution passed by this house stands in exactly the same position as a resolution passed by any other deliberative body in Canada whether it be a city council or a town council, so far as the effect on the legal position is concerned. I do not care to give any assurance with respect to a matter of executive government or with respect to what might be, without governmental intervention, the exercise of the prerogative rights of the sovereign, which have not been limited in any sense by any action taken by this parliament, and which could be limited only in the special manner which I indicated yesterday.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): I hesitate to interpose my remarks in connection with a question on which I was not consulted, but I was just wondering whether the resolution passed by this parliament, called the Nickle resolution, is not in direct conflict with the statute of Westminster. That is a phase of the matter which should be looked into. It seems to me that the Nickle resolution was for the advice of the Imperial government, and that the king exercised his prerogative on the advice of the Imperial government. In view of the statute of Westminster I should think this resolution would become void because of the new position assumed by the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose it is not proper to debate this question at the moment, but the point just raised by my hon. friend shows the desirability of having the question debated by the house before any steps are taken. If he will permit me to do so I should like to say to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that his reply raises an even larger question, inasmuch as I take it to mean that the prerogative of conferring titles may be exercised by His Majesty the King altogether apart from the advice of his ministry. I submit that the exercise of all the royal prerogatives are subject to the advice of the ministry, the one with regard to titles quite as much as the one with regard to pardons.

Mr. BENNETT: With Your Honour's permission I only desire to direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman, who is widely read, to the life of Mr. Asquith. My right hon. friend will recall the communication sent to Mr. Asquith by his sovereign, who made it abundantly clear that it was not on the advice of anyone that he asked Mr. Asquith to accept an earldom. The prerogative of the sovereign is still in existence; it has not been taken from him and can only be taken away in the manner I have indicated. I only mention that to be correct legally. My right hon. friend will recall another instance in which the same action was taken by the late Queen Victoria.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But may I say that the exercise of the prerogative in each of those cases was in accord with the well known and established custom at Westminster. The contrary is the case here.

Mr. BENNETT: As the right hon. gentleman will recall, that is hardly the fact. When the late Baron Parke left the bench it was recommended to his sovereign that he would be made a life peer and he was gazetted a life peer under the title Lord Wensleydale. The committee on privileges in the Lords met and decided that the prerogative of the sovereign could not be exercised to create him a life peer but only an hereditary peer. Accordingly his patent as a life peer was cancelled and he was made an hereditary peer, because it was ascertained as a constitutional matter that there was that limitation upon the exercise of the prerogative.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to deprive my right hon. friend of being made a life peer if that is the intention of His Majesty, but all I would ask is that before a title of that kind is accepted by himself or anyone else an opportunity be given this parliament to express its views with respect to titles in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why say that?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of privilege I suppose I should say that if the right hon. gentleman thinks he has added to the courtesies of debate, or established for himself any firmer position in the regard and esteem of the people of the country, by the observations he has just made in answer to an explanation with respect to the limitation of the prerogative of the crown, I am content.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I am content also if my right hon. friend thinks his lecture will improve the amenities of parliamentary discussion. What I said was perfectly reasonable in the circumstances. It was a remark which was understood by members of the house and which will be received by the country in the spirit in which it was meant.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 106, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the amendments?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The only amendments made by the Senate are with respect to two sections. The first amendment has to do with the pilotage authority, a word or two having been added to the section. The section provided that in the absence of the minister the authority would be vested in the deputy minister, and the Senate has provided that it shall be in the absence of the minister from Ottawa. The other amendment is merely a minor change in the last section. Paragraph 12 of section 1 of the statute will come into force at a date to be proclaimed by the Governor in Council and published in the Canada Gazette.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 2, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.
