The impression on my mind is that we noticed the fracture before we moved the skull cap. The skull cap was not sawn all through. I think I did a little of the sawing. I will swear it was properly sawn. I watched it very carefully. I cannot answer the question whether or not it takes very little force to fracture the inner table of the skull. If one or two inches of the inner table were not seratched it would take more force than if scratched. This was not my first post mortem. It was my second in private practice.
