The Advocate ought to have stated fairly that while Mr. Call succeeded in preventing Mr. Gibson from building the road one year and asked for a contract for his alleged "Company" the following year he utterly failed to show that said company had complied with the law or had the means with which to go on with the work. The Provincial ecretary was right in refusing to place interest required that he should stand between the treasury and Mr. Call's designs upon it. As to the Advocate's month they are sufficiently answered already. Indeed, as it turned out, there was so much joy diffused throughout this household by the slaying of the stag that Jack Melville, communing with himself, decided that his ill news might keep. He would take some other opportunity of telling Shortlands the result of his mission. Why destroy his very obvious satisfaction? It was a new experience for him; he had never shot a stag before. The cup of his happiness was full to the brim, and nobody grudged it him, for he was a sound hearted sort of man.

One rather awkward incident arose, however out of this stag episode. In the midst of the dinner talk Yolande suddenly said:

"Papa, ought I to send a haunch of venison to Lynn Towers? It seems so strange to have neighbors, and not any compliment one way or the other. Should I send a haunch of venison to Lynn Towers?
