Mr. Speaker, I am trying at my age,—because I sometimes feel that I have ceased to be a young man,—to disabuse myself as far as I can of any prejudice and party spirit, and I am trying to look at things calmly as one judging a game from the side lines wherein he can see the mistakes and the excellencies of the players of both opposing teams. It is almost a truism that this party spirit should long ago have been abandoned; and I am glad to say that, as far as my observation goes, it is pretty nearly at an end in this country. I loath this intense party spirit on which we were brought up, and point to the fact of sixty-five Progressives being here as a significant proof of the truth of what I am saying. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) turned to them the other day, and he put to the Progressives from the prairies this rhetorical poser: "Do you think all the wisdom of Canada is centred in you?" I think that ex-soldier was playing with a double-edged sword. I think a fair implication as to the meaning of that remark was that he possibly thought that in his own mind there was more wisdom than in the minds of the whole of these dwellers upon the plains and their splendid representatives in this House. I must state in all good nature that I resented the question. I have two brothers in the West. They went out there just as strong Liberals as my hon. friend now professes to be a Conservative. Just as strong Liberal as I am. If I were out in the West I have no doubt I would see with the viewpoint of the people who dwell there and the representatives who come here from those districts. Those two brothers of mine supported the member who is now here from Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner). They are no longer Liberals, they think that party spirit is an absolutely foolish fetish and they lament having wasted so many years in the worship of it. Now they are Progressives. They belong to no party. They are dissatisfied with both the old parties. I say that in this present state of affairs we should all try to sink, as far as possible, this ridiculous handicap of frenzied party spirit. We can get an even wider outlook. Mr. Speaker, I lately saw the review of a book. I forget the name of the author, but the subject of the book was The Patriotism of Humanity. That author put forward the position, and I saw it most favourably reviewed, that the man who to-day thinks that all the virtue is confined to his own country, and that all the undesirable elements of a nation are limited to some rival or some foreign country, is an antiquated specimen in the civilization of to-day, and I fancy that is the right way to view it. Do you imagine if our blessed Master were back on this earth that any more now than when He was here, we would appreciate Him as belonging to one country and being a partisan of that country and an enemy of every other. He and His great doctrines were intended for the whole world, and the sooner we learn to take that infinitely wide outlook the better for all concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I know that some recoil at the very word "compromise", but I remember reading a speech by Sir George Foster, who now adorns the Senate, in 1895 or 1896, when a troublous question was before this House. He said: Let us grasp and bear aloft the torch of friendly compromise under which the Fathers of Confederation marched in times far less prosperous and far more troublous than our own to an era of progress and continued peace. I think that view is peculiarly in point in presence of the problems of the present day.

In conclusion I merely wish to say that, as I judge the atmosphere at this time, at this capital city, and in this parliament, I am in hopes that the budget, which the present administration is working so hard to evolve, will be one in which the greater number, and the preponderating influence in this country will find a magnet upon which to unite in a friendly and an honourable compromise that will be to the lasting benefit of this Canada of ours.

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): Had it not been for the announcement of the Minister of Justice the other evening touching the extravagance of this House in regard to time, I do not think I should have stood up in my place to, in the first place, review some of the statements that have been made from both sides of the chamber, for I must confess that here outside appearances do not always reflect inside experiences. But, Mr. Speaker, I can plead that perhaps in the past I have not taken up the time of this House at any too great length, and when I have spoken I trust I have been enabled to place some matters before this House, at least believing them to be true.

In the first place, I would like to congratulate and offer my felicitations to all the sons and daughters of the Emerald Isle upon the 17th of March, the day they honour their patron saint. May the land of the shamrock be favoured with prosperity and blessed with national unity, tempered with equality and justice. I am sure that these words express the view of all those living in the Land of the Maple. I trust that any remarks I may make will be devoid of offence to all, and if I err, Sir, I hope it may not be a serious error.

I might as well say at the outset that I am of Irish and Scotch parentage, but I am a Canadian, and if, in the course of my remarks, I demonstrate some of my Scotch or Irish traits, kindly remember that one cannot refuse an inheritance, especially the Scotch. It did not cost me anything. You know an Irishman is reported to have said that every man should be proud of his native country, whether he was born there or not. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am proud that I am a Canadian and born in the county I represent, and, for your information, may I add that I am in rather a distinguished company in this House, because the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) was born in that county; the dean of this House, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) was born in that county, and the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) was also born in that county. It is a good county, a county where industry and agriculture work hand in hand, a little different from some of the counties I have heard from in this debate. If sentiment at any time draws me to the side of the birthplace of my parents, it is only, I hope, because I love both the shamrock and the heather, but not more than the maple leaf.

We are all delighted to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) back in his place; and may I express the hope that, during his recent visit to our cousins in the South, he has been physically benefited, nay even inoculated with that American spirit and principle of looking out for number one, and that he may transmit to his cabinet and followers in this House, and through them into the veins of public life of Canada, that serum which will result in a return to a sane policy that a Canadian government should look after Canadian interests, especially when every other country is adopting such a policy. If the Deputy Speaker had not been in the Chair, I would like to refer to the long political experience of the Speaker of this House, of some 28 years, and I would ask him if he had ever, in all the records of this House remembered such a situation as we have to-day. Last session we found the government in the position of practically being afraid to bring in legislation without first stating that the measure would not be considered a party measure. This session we have no sign of improvement, no signs of stability, but rather symptoms of a nervous break down, a complication of internal disorders that may result seriously.

I will review some of the strange situations during the Prime Minister's absence. But before doing so, may I remind the hon. Prime Minister that I read the other day that an Italian had invented a delicate instrument whereby he could tell where earthquakes were going to take place and when; and I would suggest to the hon. Prime Minister that he equip his department with one; in fact some of us may have the opinion that he already has one, and that when he heard the murmurings and rumblings in his own party he decided, perhaps, that a visit a little further South might benefit him. No doubt, Sir, what has taken place during his absence has been placed before him, but I would like to refer to it. I may refer to—what shall we call it—the anguished indecision of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler); or the position taken by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), the supporter, we will say, who longs to bless, but who is constrained to curse; or the position of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) who, having heard his leader promise at Brantford that no legitimate industry would be interfered with, and which upon comparing this statement with the announcement of reduction in the tariff on instruments of production, must lead him to add perhaps to what he has already so well said. I thought when the ex-Solicitor General, Hon. D. D. McKenzie, left the House that we had no authority left on Biblical quotations but I notice the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) is an adept at it, and I will have to be very careful with any statements, I may make in that respect; but I would think that the attitude of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) will be found in these words—

> Yea, mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me.

And I suppose to this the Prime Minister will no doubt reply—

> They profess me with their lips but their hearts are far from me.

Then another incident took place, and I am mentioning these things in an endeavour to find out, if we possibly can, what the policy of the government is, or what their attitude to the country is. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) suddenly became converted, but his conversion will only remain permanent provided certain things are done in his riding. Then we have the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) who, in a statement given to the press—and strange things are happening now—comes out in favour of one of the greatest combines, mergers or trusts, that this country has ever heard of, and he announces himself at the same time in favour of the protection of the minority. I do not wish to put him in a false light, but the hon. member has come out strongly and declared himself in favour of the greatest ecclesiastical merger or trust that he can conceive; that is church union.

Mr. BROWN: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear". While in my public career in municipal life, when I was a member of the local legislature, and also in this House, I have never been afraid to face any question, and I resent very much some of the campaign literature of one of the sides of this question. If my hon. friend had not said "hear, hear", I doubt whether I would have gone into it; and especially had I not been sent a printed pamphlet in connection with one of the contesting parties in the Presbyterian church, which I attend, on this question, which pamphlet states that no doubt when this question comes up in the House politicians and members of parliament will take the line of least resistance. That has never been my attitude. I will not take the course of least resistance; but I will exercise that liberty of conscience that, I claim, is my right, and when the time comes, I will vote the way I think, in spite of petitions or letters that may be sent to me. I think I have a perfect right to hold to the views that I maintain, as part of our civil and religious liberty.

Mr. BROWN: That is the Scotch coming out now.

Mr. WILSON: It may be Scotch, but I am proud of it. I am proud of this, that I practise what I preach. I am not like some other people that preach and do not practise.

I would also refer to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). I do not know, to be candid, what position he was in, because, while he spoke from this side and he received the greatest amount of applause from my hon. friends to my left, in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) he was not making love to the then leader of the government (Mr. Graham), but he was practically what I would say skylarking with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). To-night, I saw him sitting over on that side, and I wondered if something had taken place, because while there is no doubt in my mind he is an ardent free trader, I think he is in the position of a prodigal son. I remember his speaking about the corn; I suppose there were corn husks where he was, and he evidently is anxious to get back. I suppose when he considers the statement made by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) about dropping the pilot, he may think there may be a change and it is pretty nearly time for him to get back.

I said that we were anxious to know what the trouble was. The other night the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) inquired of different members sitting on the government benches if they would enlighten us as to what the Speech from the Throne meant. I know there are still certain members from whom we on this side would like to hear. I should like to hear from the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy). You know the hon. member for North Essex says:

> King needs Tim; Tim needs King;
> Tim and King, that's the thing

We would like to know the position of the hon. member for North Essex on this tariff question at the present time. It would be well worth while having the opinions of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell), the gallant member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), the hon. member for Lothbinière (Mr. Vien), and the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault). As regards the last three members, I can remember in previous sessions when they were sitting on this side, they were very active critics of the government; they never failed to express their opinions, and I wonder how they stand on this question to-day as presented by the government. There is another one in the ranks of the Progressive party that I would like to hear from. We have heard from the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I would like to hear from the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Elliott). It is, however, for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to tell what the trouble is. I have wondered, as a great many people have wondered, what the trouble was, but you know the Minister of Agriculture has that—what should I call it?—sort of perambulating "roaming in the gloaming" style of telling you, and you know just about as much after he is through as you did before he started. His statement, however, will perhaps, convince some of the members of the House and the country what the trouble is. I hope my hon. friends of the Progressive party will agree with what he thinks of it, because I think he advocates mixed farming in the West and some of them do not take kindly to that. This is an address given by the Minister of Agriculture before the Women's Liberal Association in Ottawa, and it is taken from the Journal of 22nd January, 1924. Speaking before a women's club, this Sampson of politics had to fall for a Delilah of the Liberal Club; he had to tell wherein his strength lay or wherein the weakness lay. What does he say? The paper said in its report of his speech at this club:

> It was not a prepared speech. . .

> While believing in the two-party system of government, which he traced from the Cavaliers and Roundheads of Charles I, if people desired more than two parties they must make up their minds to have unstable government, said Mr. Motherwell. That of which he was a member was an example, carrying on without a majority, but still able to carry on. More parties invariably meant more confusion. It would probably do neither Great Britain nor Ramsay MacDonald harm to have the Labour government experiment in England. Things would look differently to Mr. MacDonald when he got into power.

I want to say this to my Progressive friends that if they ever happen to get into power, things will look differently to them. Further on he says:

> In Canada at present politics had descended to "cut-throat euchre", with the government in the position of the dealer. It was regrettable at a time when the country needed strong legislation that the government's hands should be tied, "and that we should have to count noses before we move".

Mr. STEVENS: Who said that?

Mr. WILSON: The Minister of Agriculture. The Assistant Clerk of this House deserved great credit when he could call the names of the members of the House; but I hope the Minister of Agriculture has no intention to introduce legislation to compel him to count noses when a vote is taken. The Minister of Agriculture has just come in. Let me repeat that I am talking about him and his wooing of the ladies of the Liberal Club of Ottawa.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON: The minister says, "hear, hear." The minister described the position of the government in saying that the game was "cut-throat euchre." It may be euchre, because as I look across at the other side of the House, the Prime Minister is not in his place, but I know that he has lost his right bower and also his left bower, and the only thing which he does now is to appeal to my hon. friends to my left and to take his partner's best, in this case the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I want to tell him that that game is out of date. It is not according to Hoyle. You cannot take your partner's best.

Mr. MARTELL: The joker is over there.

Mr. WILSON: I might ask the Minister of Agriculture if the embargo is still on, and if it is still on, what does it prevent from coming into this House or this country? The hon. member, as I stated, goes further as regards the cut-throat euchre. He said:

> It was regrettable at a time, when the country needed strong legislation that the government's hands should be tied, and that we should have to count noses before we moved. Yet the people in their wisdom placed us in that position.

Further on he says, as regards the National Railways:

> Sir Henry Thornton had made good—

And then mark this:

> —and so long as he continues to make good be will have the same freedom he enjoys to-day.

So Sir Henry had better be careful, he had better "watch his step," or he will get into difficulties, too.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with certain statements that have been made during the course of this debate. In calling attention to a prediction made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), I would add that if his other predictions are all as far at sea as this one we do not need to pay much attention to them. He said:

> The Conservative party is coming back—

Then he paused, and added:

> —but with reduced numbers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON: My hon. friends applaud. Drury said that. Drury said the Conservative party was coming back with reduced numbers in the province of Ontario. If my hon. friends to the left, or my hon. friends across the floor, will count noses first, or if they will give us a chance of letting the electors of the Dominion decide, they will soon find out that the Conservative party will come back to power with ever increased numbers.

Mr. MARTELL: Premature consolation is but the remembrancer of sorrow, as Goldsmith says.

Mr. WILSON: I again appeal to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) if he has not legislation that deals with pests, I think he calls them. The hon. member for Springfield says that he is going to raise his voice in this chamber against a minority group criticizing the government. Well, what do hon. members think of the minority government that is now in power? True, they are in power because the annex has been turned into a lean-to for the support of the government; or to use a western phrase, the annex has become a corral for horses that are soon broken, but from which two at least did bolt—one other, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) I presume may be considered to have strayed into the corral.

The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam) criticized my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) for being a protectionist. Well, I am not afraid to say that I too, am a protectionist. I am proud of the principle of adequate protection for agriculture and manufacturing industry in this Dominion. The hon. member for Springfield referred to this policy as having reached its allotted span. Will the hon. member tell us of any industry that has been benefited by the introduction of free trade? I was brought up in the hardware business and have dealt with farmers of all kinds, and I remember the agitation for free coal oil, free binder twine and free barbed wire; and the farmers in those days swallowed the bait just as readily as the hon. member for Brandon swallows this policy—hook, line and sinker. What did they get? At that time we had twenty-two binder twine factories; to-day we have three. My hon. friends to my left try to tell us that they decreased the cost. Can they honestly say that to-day they are buying twine as cheap as they did when there was a protective tariff on it? No, by no means. Our friends condemn trusts, mergers and combines, but when they took the duty off barbed wire they put themselves into the hands of the United States Steel Trust, there is no question of that; and when they took the duty off coal oil they put themselves in the hands of the Standard Oil Company, because although they are known as the Imperial Oil Company in one province and the Queen City Oil Company in another, they are one and the same concern, the Standard Oil Company; but while my hon. friends condemn trusts, mergers and combines, yet they cannot show any instance where they have benefited by tariff reduction.

Now, my hon. friend from Brandon says:

> I am pretty sure that if the Canadian manufacturer of implements would say, "I don't want any protection; I am going to give the farmer the benefit of free implements," such a sentiment would be created in favour of the Canadian manufacturer that he would very soon get that mass production that he says he wants.

Well, an awful change must have come over the West, because in the catalogue issued by the company to which a number of the farmers of the West belong we found a very large percentage of American articles advertised even when there was a duty. Everybody is aware that there is no sentiment in business. And how could our manufacturers get mass production, if with a duty they have shown their preference for goods of American make? I wish to refute his statement by quoting his own statement. He says:

> The trouble to-day is not over-production but lack of consumption. Inability to buy, that is the trouble in Canada to-day. I do not know what the Massey-Harris Company, for instance, are turning out to-day, but I have no hesitation in saying that they are not turning out over one-third of the machinery they were turning out ten to fifteen years ago.

Fifteen years ago the tariff on agricultural implements was 12½ per cent preferential and 17½ per cent general; to-day it is 10 per cent. Notwithstanding the reduction, our factories are not turning out machinery in as great quantities as they did under protection, and yet the farmers are paying higher prices for their implements.

The hon. gentleman also said:

> If that sympathetic feeling could be cultivated to-day, I am sure that a vast amount of new machinery would immediately be bought, and with the mass production that would result the implement manufacturer could, I think, get along very well almost without protection.

Well, Sir, you might as well shut off the gasoline and expect your engine to run, or chloroform your patient and expect him to remain conscious and alert. The theory of free trade may be all right, but it does not work out in practice.

Now I come to the address of another member of the Progressive group, the gentleman who represents the county adjoining my own (Mr. Good). When I heard him reading I did not know whether he was reciting Bedtime Stories or Little Benny's Note Book. He was referring to a candlestick maker or something of the sort. I mean the hon. member who referred, not to Goldsmith's deserted village, but to Good's deserted farm. Well, I would say that such advertising is not for the county's good, it is rather for Good's good. I had heard observations from this side of the House upon the advantages of living on the farm and a condemnation of the parasites who live in the city—and I am glad to see the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) here, because I wish to say something to the reverend and hon. gentleman from that constituency upon that point. I was reading the other day of an American who claimed that if you wanted to become famous all you had to do was to prohibit something. You know, we have passed through what is known as the stone age, the bronze age and the steel age; we have now what they call the prohibit age. This article says:

> If you would be great, prohibit something and shout about it. It does not matter what it is, though it is preferable to select what the other fellow likes and you don't.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Ontario Temperance Act?

Mr. WILSON: Well, that is going to be put to the test pretty soon. Prohibit dancing, prohibit card playing, prohibit oleomargarine, prohibit smoking, prohibit drinking and prohibit betting, and I am sure the hon. member for Brant will not find the conditions as vastly improved as his theory would lead us to believe.

I happen to have been a follower of one of the greatest leaders that this province has ever produced. I sat in the local legislature under the late Sir James Whitney, and although, perhaps, some of the statements he made have been forgotten by many, they at least contained truth and embodied practical suggestions that have turned out to be well founded. He said on many occasions that you had to have a preponderance of public opinion behind any measure before you could enforce it. Now, somebody said something about the Ontario Temperance Act. I do not know whether he referred to me or not, but so far as that is concerned I am one of those who do not preach temperance but practise it. I have never been off the water wagon in my life, but I do not insist on forcing my views on the other fellow.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Not even protection?

Mr. WILSON: No. What I think we should do is get together—the East and the West. In fact, there should be no East and no West. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) says this:

> There is the debt under which the farmer is labouring; there is taxation; there is the tariff; there is transportation.

Well, I may tell my hon. friend that in Ontario the greatest part of the debt is due to the farmer administration. The debt of Ontario increased from $97,000,000 in 1919 to $243,000,000 in 1923, and this by the party that had promised economy, this by the party who said that, on the good roads policy, they were going to build roads for all the people and not certain roads for certain people. I well remember that some three years ago, I think it was, when I tried to present to this House what I thought at that time was the correct view to take in connection with the building of roads in my county, I was met with determined opposition by the then hon. leader of the Progressives, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). I did not blame him, in a way, because I think somebody on the opposition benches at that time said we were making political capital, getting ready for an election. That may be true or it may not, but the statements I made then were not exaggerations. I pointed out that in the county which I represented, roads were being built, water-bound macadam roads, with asphalt top, at a cost of $82,000 a mile; and somebody on this side of the House, a member of the then opposition, wanted to know if those were the streets that were paved with gold. And what do you think? In a return brought down in the local legislature this year the cost was stated of the construction of the road between Toronto and Clappison's Corners which is in my county. I wish the Progressives could come and see that work. They may talk about extravagant expenditures, but they should come and see how the ex-Minister of Public Works of Ontario built roads under the Farmer administration. This road, thirty-two miles long, cost over $96,000 per mile. The hon. member says, "there is the debt under which the farmer is labouring."

Mr. BIRD: May I ask a question? Has the party which the hon. gentleman represents discovered any political corruption in relation to those roads?

Mr. WILSON: I am glad my hon. friend asked the question.

Mr. BIRD: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to finish? Perhaps he is equally well acquainted with the debt that burdens our Manitoba farmers at the present time, and its sources.

Mr. WILSON: Increased by the present Bracken government. But in the province of Ontario we have good reason to know what the debt is.

Mr. BIRD: I was not referring to any increase on the part of the Bracken government, but rather to the sources of the debt under which the farmers of Manitoba are labouring at the present time. That is what I was referring to in my speech, if I was referring to that particular phase of debt at all.

Mr. WILSON: If you go into it, you find that it was a general statement—the debt under which the farmers were labouring. When I rose in this House and condemned the expenditure of money in my own constituency, I took an attitude which, I think, is not often enough taken in this House. I condemned the extravagance of that government. I condemned the attitude of the ex-Minister of Public Works of Ontario, who sits in the seat I formerly occupied in the local legislature. I condemned it because it was extravagant. I said it was not fair for Ontario or for this government to be compelled to hand over its share of the $20,000,000 grant and give that large proportion to the county of Wentworth. I want to say to the credit of the Department of Highways that they did not approve of the roads that I condemned. The late government did not approve of them, and this government, to their credit, have not approved of them. Mr. Drury, Mr. Manning Doherty and the other satellites came into my constituency during the last Dominion election and did everything they possibly could to defeat me. They stated that I was opposed to good roads, although they knew I was not, but that I was opposed only to the extravagance of their road policy. I told the farmers of that community that although the minister was saying those roads would not cost them anything, I was satisfied that when they got the bills the story would be different. And what is the position of the county of Wentworth to-day? Twenty per cent of the cost, which we have to pay, means that the county of Wentworth has to issue debentures for $842,000. That is our share, and we have to pay it.

Mr. WARNER: I protest against the time of this House being taken up with matters that are outside of our control. I would rather have the hon. member talk about the $300,000,000 that is left to us of fixed charges which should have been partly discharged during the war.

Mr. WILSON: Mr. Speaker, I do not know but that I am perfectly in order. The hon. member is using the tactics that were adopted by the leader of the Progressive group when I was speaking once before. He tried to prevent me, and I was saved on that occasion by the present Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy), who was very anxious to get the facts; and I may say that if my speech was in error at that time the Liberal Association of the province of Ontario ordered 10,000 copies of it. When my hon. friend from Strathcona (Mr. Warner) gets up in this House and says that I should talk about something that is connected with this House, he apparently does not know that the Department of Highways under the Dominion has something to say as regards the expenditures on roads in this country. I might retort that I have never taken up the time of this House in talking about the agricultural show held in my county, as he has done on many an occasion.

I would suggest this to the Department of Highways. I understand that the appropriation has been spent; I think I am correct in that as regards the province of Ontario at least, and an appeal has been made, and further appeals will no doubt be made, to this government for additional money for road building. I approve of the principle of road building, but not of the extravagant principle of road building, and I also suggest to this government that; when they draw up the next regulations in connection with the paying out of money for good roads, they take a tighter grip of it and first approve of the project before it is started. I am not casting any reflections on anyone, but I know what happened in the past in the province of Ontario, and I think it is well to offer this suggestion which I have done in the best interests of the country.

Now let me tell my hon. friends to my left, and the hon. member who just recently interrupted me, and who may not realize the fact, that the extravagance and non-fulfilment of their pre-election pledges led to the defeat of the Farmer government in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) speaking in this debate a few days ago said, referring to what is promised in this clause of the Speech from the Throne: "There is transportation." I trust that the hon. member does not preach that the transportation problem will be solved by the panacea for western ills, the removal of the tariff on agricultural implements.

I also want to take exception to a statement he made in regard to residents of cities, whom he called parasites. The constituency I represent is perhaps one of the largest urban and rural constituencies in the province of Ontario. We have a great number of workers, and I do not know that it is very becoming for the hon. member to refer to them as parasites, or very becoming of him to refer to the cities as big swollen parasites that suck the life-blood of the producer. We do not look upon them in that way in the constituency from which I come, because we have there the best home market for the farmers than is to be found anywhere in the province of Ontario. I believe it is the largest market in the Dominion of Canada.

My hon. friend for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher) said, "Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the vultures be gathered together." That was the statement the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) corrected for him. Now in the urban centre of Hamilton we can truthfully say, and this is the revised version, "Where industry thrives there are the farmers gathered together." Let me prove my point by a reference to the Hamilton market. It is a great thing to hear these Progressives and the United Farmers of Ontario say—and we heard the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) say the same thing to-night: Do away with the middleman. In the city of Hamilton market the middleman is eliminated. Yet we are told that the home market is of no value to the farmer. I have here some figures furnished me by the market clerk of the city of Hamilton. The Hamilton central market is for the sale of fresh meats, poultry, fish, butter, eggs, flowers of all kinds, fruit farm and garden produce. To that market in the city of Hamilton which is the urban centre, we have brought in each day, 9,000 gallons of milk to the two city dairies from 450 producers in the country. Yet they say the home market is of no use. Here is some further information about this home market, this Hamilton market that we are so proud of. It can accommodate 1,000 vendors of all classes in one day. I do not wish to go into all the details, but I will take just one month, that of September, 1923, and I will show you how many farmers attended that market:

Transient farmers..	4,795
Farmers reserving stands..	2,213
Butchers reserving stands..	258
Fishmongers (all citizens of Hamilton)..	72
Stalls occupied by different dealers in produce.	144
Florists..	279

In the butter hall where the farmers' wives sell their produce there were 1,621, or a total of farmers and their wives selling on the Hamilton market in the month of September, of 9,382. Yet our friends from the West tell us that the home market is of no value to us. Let me tell them what is sold there. You know, there was a United Farmers of Ontario organization—there is not much of it left to-day—for co-operative dealing, co-operative buying and selling. We heard a lot about that, but the farmers in our county have realized that it does not pay to sell through that organization, and the farmers bring their produce into the market. In the month of September there was sold on the Hamilton market, carcasses of beef, 468; calves, 599; lambs, 700; sheep, 78; hogs, 180.

I resent, Mr. Speaker, any member referring to the residents of the cities as parasites, and I want to say this so far as my constituency is concerned: In 1914 those so-called parasites toed the scratch. They were the men who went without conscription. They walked right in, and signed up, and fought for the protection of this country and of the British flag. They may be parasites, but we are proud of them. I do not mind anyone calling me names; you can call me what you like, but I do resent the people I represent being called names.

On one occasion Mr. Biggs, ex-minister of Public Works of Ontario, made the statement that "politics was the dirtiest game he ever was in." I sometimes get sick and tired of hearing people say that if they had the opportunity they would do the same as others have done for their own profit. Any game is just what you make it. If you play the game fairly you would never be able to say that politics is a dirty game. But I think if we possess our souls in patience we will find that the declaration I have just quoted will be established,—that it will prove a boomerang to the man who uttered it.

I wish to say this as regards the policy of protection. I represent a manufacturing town, the town of Dundas. I also represent a large portion of the city of Hamilton. In that portion there are more American industries than in any other city in the Dominion. To those who claim that protection has not been a good thing I want to know how it is these American industries came to Hamilton. Was it because of free trade? No, it was because there was a tariff against their goods coming into this country, and they decided to come to Canada and to manufacture in this country. That I consider is a benefit to the Dominion. In my constituency we believe in the protection of labour, we are not in favour of creating a standard of living lower than that which exists to-day. We maintain that the artisans of Wentworth county are entitled to protection; are entitled to the fair-wage clause in public contracts; are entitled to the eight-hour day; are entitled to the Minimum Wage Act; are entitled to the Workmen's Compensation Act as it exists in Ontario; and are entitled to better their condition of living. We not only believe in a policy of protection for the working men but we believe in a policy of protection for the fruit growers and market gardeners of the Niagara peninsula. We say they also need protection, and we ask the government to grant this protection. We say to our friends in the East who declare they wish to encourage agriculture: Is it fair to ask the workers in our county, in our market gardens, who work early and late, to compete against the southern states where the climatic conditions are such that it is utterly impossible for us in this Dominion to produce fruits and vegetables at as early a season as they do. I heard the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) refer to producing pineapples under glass. That may be a debatable question—putting a tax upon oranges, bananas, pineapples and lemons.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Grapes.

Mr. WILSON: There is a duty on grapefruit, and there is a duty on grapes. But let me ask this question: Do hon. members know what made the price of grapes go up in the province of Ontario?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Prohibition.

Mr. WILSON: Yes, it is due to the fact that hon. gentlemen to my left, the Progressives and their friends who pronounced in favour of prohibition, absolutely refused to interfere with native wine. They preach one thing and practise another. To-day we are in this ridiculous position in the province of Ontario: It is perfectly legal to make wine from the juice of the grape, but you must get a permit if you wish to make it out of dandelions; it is perfectly legal for a wine manufacturer to sell wine containing 20 per cent of alcohol, he can manufacture it, but if he advertises it he violates the law; we cannot have 2½ per cent beer but we can have wine with a 20 per cent kick in it. I believe in temperance, I make no bones about it—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Who passed that law?

Mr. WILSON: The Conservative government. I am not in favour of the repeal of the Ontario Temperance Act, I am in favour of sane legislation, and I commend the Premier of Ontario for the fact he has backbone enough to fulfil the pledges he gave to people when he was appealing for their votes. This should be an example to my right hon. friend the Prime Mininster of Canada. The trouble to-day in our public life is that the leaders of thought in religion and in municipal, provincial and Dominion politics are not living up to the pledges they gave the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WILSON: My hon. friends may laugh, but they should remember that Drury laughed at one time. I ask them to remember the old saying "Empty vessels make the most noise".

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to go further and refer to the industries in the city of Hamilton as an evidence that protection is a good thing. The leader of the government the other night made a strong appeal in peroration to the Grand Old Man of Hamilton, Mr. Adam Brown. We are proud of Mr. Adam Brown in the city of Hamilton, and the Dominion should be equally proud that when he was in political life he was a man of vision. He was one of those who believed that Canada had a great future. Mr. Brown was a member of the House in 1887, and speaking of the protection that was being afforded to the iron industry, a protection that was opposed by the Liberal opposition, he said,—and I quote from Hansard of May 17, 1887, page 494:

> Mr. Brown: Hon. gentlemen opposite say hear, hear. I hope they will get some sense knocked into them before long that they will see this in a proper light. They do see it, Mr. Speaker. The wriggling way in which they have gone through the question to-day shows that they see it. Here and there some of them try the circus trick, riding on the backs of two horses, free trade here and National Policy somewhere else. At the same time they feel that the country is so sound on the question of the National Policy that they dare not come out openly and speak against it. This change in the tariff, I believe, will secure for the National Policy a position which it has never had before, because it strikes at the root of the whole matter. It protects the labour that is required to produce the article.

The letter was read stating—

> Your telegram received; we wired you this morning: "We think changes made in the tariff will be found satisfactory and will, as intended, rapidly develop the iron business." We are surprised to know the decided stand made by the government upon the tariff, the same arguments having been offered before and no result came. We had feared that the matter would be left as before, especially as such strong protests are made by prominent parties. The action of the government in taking this firm and comprehensive stand will, before long entitle them to the praise of all who take an interest in the development of this country. Increased wealth and population are sure to follow. Every ton of the ore and coal that now lies worthless in the ground, that is manufactured, adds so much to the wealth of this country.

Has Mr. Brown's prophecy been fulfilled?

This government has been presented with a petition on behalf of the industries of Hamilton. It was moved in the council by a Liberal controller and was seconded by a Conservative controller, and another controller a Mr. Davis, who was past president of the Liberal Association, said that this was a question that certainly interested Hamilton, and what he was in favour of was not a reduction on agricultural implements, but that he was in favour of a return to the Laurier tariff. Now if you give the manufacturers the Laurier tariff on agricultural implements I think they will be more than satisfied, and that comes from a gentleman who was a Liberal candidate in the last provincial election. This petition is addressed to the government and is from the city council, and has been sent to the Acting Minister of Finance. It says that a reduction in the duties threatens the life and existence of many other Hamilton industries. They are referring to the Libbey-Owens Glass Works, and more especially to the agricultural implement manufacturers. In the city of Hamilton we have some 72 branches of American factories, and you ought to know what is taking place by the reduction even of last year. We have what is known as the International Harvester Company,—and I cannot understand why the government would single out any one industry, and especially why should they single out practically the hospital ship of Canadian industry, and they are not even going to give it a fair burial, but they are going to torpedo it; there is no question what it means. At the present time the International Harvester Company have an investment of fifteen million dollars in Hamilton and Stratford. They pay one million dollars per year in freight rates. They have in Hamilton,—under ordinary conditions in the past, an employee list of four thousand. To-day they have four hundred and fifty. That is four hundred and fifty as against four thousand. The National Steel Car Company, with a list of fifteen hundred employees, has to-day twelve hundred. Why have they twelve hundred? Why is it when the other company has a great proportion of their men out of work, the National Steel Car Company seem to have a large number of men at work? The reason is that the department of the Canadian National railways has given an order to the National Steel Car Company for a thousand cars. We have another industry which so far has not been affected,—and if the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Gordon) were in his place, he would bear out this statement—I refer to the Canadian Westinghouse. They ordinarily employ three thousand people. They have at the present time twenty-five hundred, and the reason they have so many is because the electrical industry has not been disturbed to a great extent. The Hydro-Electric development in Ontario has been a factor in keeping these men employed. But to sum up, in the past, the 72 American industries had on their payroll 17,463, and they paid out $360,000 per week. To-day they have only 7,939 on their payroll. That is a reduction in the number of 9,524, and their payroll has been reduced in these industries alone from $360,000 per week to $165,210. Now, we have in the city of Hamilton other industries, and I just want to mention this fact because when the hon. Prime Minister referred to the former member from Hamilton, Mr. Adam Brown, I want to know if the prediction made by that gentleman in this House has come true. In 1879 the population in Hamilton was 34,208, and the assessment was $15,168,280. In 1923 the city of Hamilton had a population of 120,235 and an assessment of $145,000,000. There are employed in the Hamilton industries 30,454; capital invested $142,000,000; payroll per year $40,000,000. Then we have an annual incoming railway tonnage of 750,000, we have an outgoing railway tonnage of 2,500,000 tons. We have a lake shipping, outgoing of 53,000 tons, and incoming shipping of 46,000 tons.

What is the trouble to-day in the Dominion of Canada? In the first place, a great deal of our troubles arise from unemployment. And unemployment is brought about by what? The failure of someone to provide industry, the failure of the government to bring in a stable fiscal policy and the fact, as I said before, that a great many people have lost faith in the present leader of the Liberal party. They were talking about the emigration to the States. I will give the House one instance. I am not talking in the calamity strain that I sometimes hear in this House, but I will refer to one of the employees of one of the industries in Hamilton who had been for seventeen years with the same company. He has a family of eleven children, all Canadians, seven of whom are of working age. But they cannot find employment now, so he has had to resign his position, and with his family, go to the States. You talk about the policy of immigration, but do you not think, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, that we should have something to which we could invite the immigrants to come? We do not want to be a clearing house for the United States. That is what we are to-day. We are paying for the education of the people who come here, and they drift, and drift, and drift, over to the United States. Now then, if this agricultural implement industry is torpedoed, if they are driven out of business, what will happen? I would like to know from the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and leading members of the Progressive party what is going to take place supposing we do not get the tariff reduction. We heard the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) say to-night that he would be satisfied, and the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) said that he would be satisfied, with the government. I think it would be better if they would approve the idea of practically crossing the floor of the House. They cannot any longer admit that they are an independent group, because practically every one of them has said: We will support the government provided that so and so is done; we will support the government if they build the Hudson Bay railway.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON: My hon. friend says: "hear, hear." I do not deny that perhaps the Hudson Bay railway should be built, but certainly what should be done is first to have a careful investigation whether it is going to be any good or not. I have been an advocate of public ownership; I stumped the whole province in the interest of public ownership in connection with the Hydro-Electric; but I could not follow Sir Adam Beck entirely when he advocated the system of hydro-radials that he did advocate, I voted against it in my own constituency; my constituency voted for it. I am in favour of electric raliways; I am in favour of railways being built where they are needed; but I am not in favour of a policy in Ontario as regards electric roads similar to what we have in regard to steam roads. If you go into Cobourg or any of those places on the way to Ottawa, you will see three railways within a stone's throw of one another. We should be careful of what is done and we should spend our money to the best advantage.

I have already delayed this House at too great length; I apologise if I have taken longer than I should; but I hope the government will realise that the country expects something from them. The country should have had some announcement, if not in the Speech from the Throne, then one that will set at ease capital and industry in Canada. Our problems to-day, as I said, are unemployment, stagnation of business, sectionalism, transportation and proper marketing. I think one of our solutions would be the appreciation of the industrial East of the agricultural West, and the appreciation of the agricultural West, of the industrial East. Let me conclude by saying what I believe should be—and I quote in verse—the policy of this country:

> Consider well 'tis not the time to stunt our growing powers,
> And place this country's destiny in other hands than ours;
> So let our final answer be, and let East and West be told.
> We'll weld together what we have, and what we have, we'll hold.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Tuesday, March 18, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 8, to change the name of The Travellers Life Assurance Company of Canada to "Montreal Life Insurance Company"—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 9, respecting The T. Eaton General Insurance Company.—Mr. Sheard.

Bill No. 10, to confirm an Agreement between The Ottawa Electric Railway Company and the City of Ottawa.—Mr. Chevrier.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 19th March, instant, and every subsequent Wednesday until the end of the session the House will meet at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a petition from the Rev. T. Crawford Brown and others in opposition to certain phases of a proposed bill to incorporate the United Church of Canada.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT —EXCURSIONS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to amend the Railway Act 1919.

He said: The object of this amendment is to restore to the public the privilege of cheap tickets for such occasions as weekend holidays, excursions, fall fairs, conventions and sporting events which they enjoyed before the war. This privilege, I may say, has been restored in every other country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Might I be permitted to ask if the government intends to recognize the claims of British Columbia in filling the vacancy on the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, so far as the government is aware there is no vacancy on the board.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland, resumed from Monday, March 17.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have been an interested and docile listener for two weeks, during which time I have learned a good deal, because no man can listen to any intelligent speech without getting some new angle on the questions that are being discussed. I have learned that it is hard to satisfy the opposition—in fact I learned that many years ago. In other years the government has been chided for its sins of omission in the Speech from the Throne, it has been chastised for the things that it has left undone; but this year it is being criticized for what it has done. In other years we were told that the Speech was too lean, that it was notable rather for what it did not contain; this year we are told it is too fat, that there is too much in it. It reminds me somewhat of the discussion over the British cattle embargo. Inspectors found some stockers too fat, and they had to be slaughtered; the next day they found some that were too lean, and as it took too long to feed them they could not be accepted either. It strikes me that the Speech from the Throne contains a good deal of meat. While I am not going into it in detail, may I be permitted to say, it looks as if it had thrown some consternation into the ranks of the party led by my right hon. friend opposite (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the country, too.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend says, "And the country, too"—he being the country. It has been recounted in this House that certain highly respected gentlemen on this side have expressed views divergent from those which the leader of the opposition says appear in the Speech from the Throne, and that is looked upon as a tremendous blow to the Liberal party. Why, that is the pure essence of Liberalism: members of the Liberal party can differ on details and still be true to the great principles of Liberalism. What would have happened on the other side of the House if some member had got up and talked free trade? He would have had a very cool reception all through the lobby; the chances are that he would have moved out. That is the difference; members of the Liberal party do not take carefully selected views of others as their own, but are at perfect liberty to express their own opinions; and when it is suggested that the views expressed by certain gentlemen on this side were really an explosion, I want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that those who so express themselves are but following out the instincts of real Liberalism.

I think that my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition's trouble is religious in its character, and that his depression is caused by certain views he holds—I do not mean church union views. There is a large sect the members of which face the east when they pray, but since December, 1921, the people of this country have compelled my right hon. friend to face the West when he prays in this House. That to my mind accounts for the great depression.

Certain references have been made to the Canadian National Railways. While I do not intend to enter into any lengthy discussion of that great national undertaking, I do wish to say a word or two. It is the greatest undertaking of its kind in the world, and it is the longest line of railway. The difficulties surrounding its management, semi-parliamentary and semi-private, are very great; no one understands them better than I do. The present management has a task unprecedented, a task that was not imposed on the former management. Sometimes we are apt to forget, in making comparisons, that in former years, prior to the time that Sir Henry Thornton became president of the Canadian National Railways, there were two systems, managed by two boards with two presidents, the Grand Trunk, and what then comprised the Canadian National Railways. These two have been merged, and the load upon the president at the present time far surpasses the load placed on the shoulders of the head of any other railway system in the world. To amalgamate these two staffs, to get them in working order, to bring together men who had been keen competitors in the years gone by, was a task in itself that would try the mettle of any man, however great. That friction cannot be wiped out in a few days or in a few months, but the management of the road and the service that it gives are, I think, an evidence of the fact that these wrinkles are fast being ironed out.

Some person has said that the President of the Canadian National Railways makes mistakes. So he does. There is only one class of people that make no mistake. They are dead. The live man, the man who is alert and who is putting every pound of energy behind his job, is sure to make mistakes. If the errors made by the managements of private companies were discussed year by year before this House and the country, it would be found that Sir Henry Thornton had made fewer mistakes than the average man who manages a big concern. I think it was a mistake at that time to acquire the Paris building; I have no hesitation in saying that—Liberalism is free to express its opinion. But it will not be so grievous a mistake as some people are trying to make the country and the world believe. The greatest enemies of the Canadian National Railways are not found among the men who honestly oppose government ownership; its real enemies are those who, while pretending to be its friends, take advantage of every opportunity to decry it. A sample: At one of those very large meetings held in the province of Quebec—perhaps more than one—which my right hon. friend attended, he had with him a former colleague—a colleague on the weekly instalment plan, I might say, because he was there but a very short time. This gentleman had the temerity, in the presence of my right hon. friend, to refer to Sir Henry Thornton as a "foreigner"; to say that the Government of Canada had appointed a foreigner to manage the Canadian National system. I want to ask this House, since when did a British subject become a foreigner? Why was it said? A little cheap clap-trap in order to make the railway men of Canada and the people generally believe that we had brought in a foreigner to manage a national enterprise. Sir Henry Thornton originally was an American. Trained on one of the best-managed railway systems in the world, the Pennsylvania Railroad, he went to the Old Land and was given very important work by the Allies during the war; and so competent was he in that work that His Majesty the King called him in and knighted him in recognition of his services to the Allies. This man comes to us a British subject not by birth but by choice. And, forsooth, in order to get a few hand-claps and to make capital against him, an ex-minister of the Crown of the Dominion of Canada refers to him as a "foreigner." The people, Sir, resent that kind of thing. Our forefathers, a great many of them, were foreigners, but they came to this country and applied themselves to its development, and the sturdy race we see in the Dominion of Canada to-day is the offspring of these men whom the gentleman, a former minister of the Crown, would describe as "foreigners."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. member may be misinformed. I do not know to whom he refers, but the only one I heard refer to Sir Henry Thornton was Hon. Mr. Monty, speaking in French, and I do not know what the French word was that he used.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my right hon. friend understands French pretty well, because he read French to us the other day and then translated it. There is no question but that the gentleman referred to Sir Henry Thornton as a foreigner. I have the reports in several papers up in my room.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to interrupt, but the reason I mention it is this. It will be recalled that on a former occasion in the case of Lord Dundonald, a reference was made to him in the French language as a foreigner. It was so translated into the English language, but the explanation given showed that the French term had an entirely different meaning.

Mr. GRAHAM: I read it in a Conservative newspaper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: An English paper?

Mr. GRAHAM: An English paper, but if it had not been the proper translation, surely, surely such an attack would not have gone this long unanswered. My right hon. friend must have read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never read it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, is that not interesting. He did not even read his colleague's speech. He did not understand it in French, and he would not read it in English. I am making no plea for Sir Henry Thornton, but what I ask the people of Canada to do is this: Give the manager of the road, the president and the board who have undertaken this great work on behalf of the people of Canada, at least the same chance for success, as is given the manager of a private company.

Some person has suggested that the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways might be reduced. That is a very large question, and I just want to place this viewpoint before the House. There are many securities out against the units that form the Canadian National System, and to write down the capitalization would be to retire these units. It is not as easy a proposition as it looks. It must be remembered that the Intercolonial railway, the Prince Edward Island railway, the National Transcontinental, and the Hudson Bay railway, are not in the capitalization. These roads have no capitalization, having been constructed by the government. There have been certain amounts charged to the railways, but they are put in what is called the inactive list and are paying no interest at the present time. It might be possible some day to consider the question of writing off these amounts which are charged to the Canadian National System as loans.

Now I want to have a word with our manufacturing friends. This House should not be led to believe that the manufacturers of Canada as a whole are against the sales tax. We who are members of the government have in our desks and on our files many letters written a year ago by men who are now complaining but who then asked the government to do just what we did with the sales tax—put it in one amount, in one place. I want to say, further, that some of the men engaged in the largest industries in this country have during the past ten days informed me that notwithstanding what the Manufacturers' Association has officially said, they are and always have been in favour of the sales tax, and they urged the government through me not to remove the sales tax as it was most equitable. Further they pointed out, which was the truth, that in not a few instances the sales tax is lighter than the tax paid the previous year. I know it is unpleasant to pay taxes; nobody likes to do it; it is uncomfortable at times. I am a firm opponent of capital punishment, Mr. Speaker, and the only time and occasion when I doubt the soundness of my opinion on that subject is when I hear or read the words of men who got rich during the war and who are now kicking about paying their share of the cost. These men before the war, lived in ordinary residences like most of us, but they now live in palaces. Before the war they felt like saying "Thank you" and felt honoured if they were allowed to stand on the running board of a Ford car; but now they ride up in a Packard and say: Cut down the taxes! cut down the taxes! I am not a communist, but if anything would lead me to squint in that direction it is the chattering of these men who made their wealth out of the war, and who are able to pay, but who now refuse, or are trying to get out of, paying their share of the taxation. Taxes must be imposed; taxes must be collected. Are we ashamed of the part we took in the war? No. The mothers of the boys who lost their lives in the war are wearing emblems to-day indicative of the bravery of their sons, and they feel honoured in being allowed to wear them, though wearing them in sorrow. The wives of the men who lost their lives during the war are also wearing these emblems with the same proud satisfaction. As a tax payer of Canada I am proud of the honour of paying my share of the war taxes of this country. I look upon that as an emblem of the part I am allowed to take. The war was not over when the armistice was signed, the financial war was just beginning; and we in Canada must face those difficulties. We must face taxation; we must face all the problems that the war has brought to us. And we are not worthy of the boys who laid down their lives if we shrink from that duty.

If I might be allowed to correct my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, again —for he leads his innocent following astray at times—the other day, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was discussing the Canadian National Railways in connection with the debt, my right hon. friend interposed with these words:

> Mr. Meighen: I am grateful to hon. gentlemen for their applause, but I do not need it. I was only going to ask the Prime Minister if he would be good enough to tell us how much of an obligation the country has incurred by guarantee of railway bonds, which is the plan this government has taken instead of lending the money directly out of the treasury.

Now, the Ottawa Journal, believing that there had been no bond issue by the former government and that all the carrying charges and indebtedness had been paid out of the treasury, fell into this trap.

> Among the chief reasons for the debt increase in 1921-22 the railways now resort to bond issues.

I might read a little before that:

> Surely the Prime Minister knows better than that. For what are the simple facts? Simply that Mr. King's government has changed the system whereby instead of making loans to the Canadian National Railways—among the chief reasons for the debt increases in 1921 and 1922—the railways now resort to bond issues.

Now that is not the case. There was a bond issue in 1920-21 of $50,000,000, and for Canadian Northern short term notes there was an issue of $11,000,000, making a $60,000,000 bond issue for that year 1921-22 which is the year referred to by the Journal. The readers of the Journal have been led astray, and I think it is my duty to correct that wrong impression because the system has been for years, could not be otherwise, than that at certain intervals there was a bond issue. Mr. Fielding—excuse me I am referring to him in that way in his absence—the Finance Minister in 1922-23 did what the Journal says the preceding government did. There was no bond issue in 1922-23; the Finance Minister under this government paid out some $85,000,000 to the railways and had no bond issues. Had there been a bond issue in 1922-23 the surplus that year would probably have been something like $50,000,000. This year there has been a bond issue of $50,000,000 and an equipment issue, which is a separate thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much to equipment?

Mr. GRAHAM: If I remember right the issue is $22,500,000. I am free to say this that if the errors as to bond issue had been left out the right hon. gentleman would be right in saying there was a larger amount loaned to the railway out of the treasury than there was during the past year; there is no question about it. But the railway situation is getting better, it must be improving else we would be in a sad dilemma. But the returns show it is improving, and this year there is to be a payment out of the treasury I think of some twenty-four or twenty-five million dollars. I am expressing my own view now when I say it appears to me that as the conditions improve on the Canadian National Railways, what is strictly capital expenditure should be provided for by bond issues, and the people at the present time should not be taxed for what is rightly capital expenditure tending to improve the property and to bring better returns to the railways. Under the Inter-state Commerce Commission laws it would be impossible to do anything else, because the railways of the United States are not allowed to expend out of operating surplus any amounts for truly capital expenditures. The principle is clear. Money earned by railways belongs, after the current overhead charges are paid, to the shareholders, and no company has a right to take the money of the shareholders, earned in a proper way, and use it in capital expenditure. The principle further is, that money gained in operation ought to go to the shareholders for their dividends, and to the reduction of rates. I am expressing my own views when I say I believe the principle ought to be adopted on the Canadian National Railways, and it practically is at the present time, that railway capital expenditure ought to be provided for by bond issues extended for a term of years, at least as long as the betterments which have been constructed will last, and the balance if any in Canada will have to be raised by taxation.

Now. Sir, leaving the Canadian National Railways and the question of bond issue, may I turn for a moment to the things that took place at the Imperial Economic Conference, and I must be excused for again saying to my right hon. friend that I think he led some of his followers astray in what he said on this matter. It is a kind of impediment to good government to have such implicit confidence in one's leader that the members of a party fail to turn up the facts for themselves.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the case over there.

Mr. GRAHAM: Even the whip of hon. gentlemen opposite will not allow me to compliment his leader. In reference to what took place at the Imperial Economic Conference there is apparently a misapprehension abroad judging by some speeches I have heard, particularly that of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie). The hon. member said, if I remember correctly, that the Prime Minister of Canada sat silent and did not say a word at the Economic Conference, although things were transpiring that were of much interest to Canada. The hon. member mentioned preferential duties on fruit, and particularly apples, if I remember correctly. I want to tell him now that the man most responsible for having apples placed on the preferential list at that conference was the Prime Minister of the Dominion. So far from sitting silent he was very active in regard to every question. I know my hon. friend will say "I did not see it in the official report" which the hon. gentleman said he did not read. There were two conferences. It was the first time in the history of the Empire, I think, that two conferences took place simultaneously. Previously the Imperial Conference included the Imperial Economic Conference. On this occasion there were two conferences, the Imperial dealing with the larger lines of Imperial matters, and the Economic Conference dealing with economic questions. Of necessity, as the right hon. leader of the opposition will know, the greater part of the proceedings at the Imperial Conference proper were of a confidential nature and could not be published, but I sat beside the Prime Minister time and again in that conference. He was one of the most active spirits in it; and without giving away any secrets, policies that I have since heard announced were advocated by the Prime Minister of Canada. He was very urgent at that conference that each part of the British Empire, each dominion, should have a right to sign its own treaties where the matters in question affected only that particular dominion. The Imperial Conference unanimously adopted that conclusion. There are others to which I might refer but I will not detain the House.

I want to come now to the question of preference. Some people have the view that Canada should approach the Motherland as she approaches other countries in the matter of trade. That has not been the policy of the people of the Dominion of Canada. This country gave a preference to the Motherland in the time of Laurier and Fielding, against some opposition but because these men and the people of the Dominion thought it was a wise thing to do. It would knit more closely the relationships between the outposts and the centre of the empire, and in addition to that it was best for the people of the Dominion of Canada. Never was Great Britain approached by Canada in a bargaining spirit, but this preference was given to her out of the hearts of the people of the Dominion of Canada—not altogether altruistic because the people of Canada believed, and it has turned out to be true, that giving a preference to the Motherland would be for the benefit of our own country, the Dominion of Canada. When the Economic Conference opened the Prime Minister was there, as he was always on the spot when duty required in the Old Land. I will not read all his remarks on that occasion, but I will read what he said concerning the question of preference. It as as follows:

> Mr. King: Perhaps I had better leave the question of Preference for more mature and careful consideration at some sitting of the Conference when that subject will be specially discussed. I should like to say this, however, with regard to trade Preference, that Canada feels not a little pride in the circumstance that she was the pioneer in granting a preference to British goods. At the present time we are giving a preference averaging 33⅓ per cent, or more, on all goods coming from Britain and also from different parts of the Empire. In the last session of our Parliament, we made a slight additional increase in the preference by undertaking to give a discount of 10 per cent of existing duties on any British goods that came through Canadian ports. We had in mind there development of trade by the "All red" route, but we had also very much in mind the action of the British Government in undertaking to remove the obstacles to the importation of our cattle into the British markets here. Throughout, the Canadian attitude in the matter of Preference has been one of goodwill; it has been based on goodwill; bargaining has not been the basis of it. We have done what we have done believing it would be to our advantage, but believing also that it would be helpful to the countries to which the preference was extended, and especially to the Mother Country; and I would like to repeat that the action we took at our last session in increasing the preference was due primarily—and I can speak with a knowledge of the circumstances which governed it—to the action of the British Government in meeting us, as they did meet us, with respect to an important commodity of trade and commerce. Now that spirit of seeking each other's mutual advantage will, I believe, go further than anything else to help to build up the trade and further the industrial development of the Empire.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would my hon. friend be kind enough to tell us what he is reading from?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am reading from the proceedings of the conference, as published in the Times. He will find it also in the official report of the Economic Conference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As tabled?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. I think a copy was placed in the box of every hon. member. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), in one of his speeches at one of these small gatherings in Quebec made reference to what your humble servant had said or had not said. The quotation only went this far in the papers.

Now note what Mr. Graham said.

The discussion branched off into something else, into some other line, and I think it is only fair to myself that I should put on Hansard what I said, following up the speech of the Prime Minister, because it is very essential to the people of Canada, to the people of the British Empire, and to the people of the world, that they should understand Canada's attitude on this question of preference, and I believe the attitude taken by the Canadian representatives in London is the attitude of the people of Canada. This is from the official record as well, and occurred at the opening of the preferential discussion—

I do not know that I can say anything further as to the Committee. I am not in favour of Royal Commissions except to do things which we do not want to do or cannot very well do ourselves, but in regard to this question of the Tariff I want to repeat what I said before, this is the proposition made by the British Government, this is the best proposition they can make. I am bound to say that it will help some of the other Dominions more than Canada, but it will help the Empire, and it must not be considered that it is really missionary work among the Dominions because the first thing the British Government must look after, as the first thing that the Dominion Governments would look after, is the interest of their own people, and as far as Canada is concerned, we are glad to accept that proposition without any discussion. If the British Government desire to enlarge it that might help us but it is their business primarily and not ours. After all, trade is developed on sentiment to a certain extent, and I can assure you that the Canadian people, if they can, on equal terms, would prefer to buy British goods rather than American goods. The feeling at the present time is that our friends across the line, and these are really the only neighbours that we have in trade in close proximity, have raised the bars so high that though the action may be aimed at us it will injure them to a certain extent and eventually they will probably reduce these duties. But that is their business again and not ours. In the meantime we should like to develop wider trade in every respect with our relatives within the Empire, in all parts of it, but for practical purposes, as it is your duty to look after the interests of your people, we are compelled at every step to keep in view, as the paramount question, the interests of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

I want to know if that is a fair position to take or not. Where is the criticism? Where is there something that is worthy of criticism in this attitude? At the very beginning of the discussions on preference we tried to make our position clear. But let me follow that up a little further—and the House, I am sure, will pardon me for reading these extracts, as I find it impossible to place the viewpoint clearly before this House in any other way. Further, it must not be forgotten that the real negotiations at these conferences did not take place in the conference, they took place at private conferences outside. And the Prime Minister (Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King), the former Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and myself occupied as much time having conferences and holding meetings for discussions with the members of the British government as we did in the conferences themselves; and the result, as shown in the records of the Economic Conference, is, to quite a large extent the result of private agreements which were made binding—so far as conferences can make them binding—when the conference met. I wish to read a letter to make it clear that whoever says that the Prime Minister was silent got the wrong tip from his leader. Here is a copy of a letter which is not even in the official record, it is just correspondence. The House will understand, as I said before, that many private conferences took place, and the result of these conferences was crystalized into resolutions at the conference, if all were agreed. The Prime Minister, acting with his colleagues, had discussed certain matters with Sir Philip Lloyd-Greame, the chairman of the Conference, and as a result this correspondence took place. First, we have a letter to the Right Hon. Arthur Neville Chamberlain, M.P., Chancellor of the Exchequer, from the Prime Minister of Canada (Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King) which reads:

Dear Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

I enclose a copy of a letter which I have just sent to Sir Philip Lloyd-Greame as Chairman of the Imperial Economic Conference. It contains, in the form in which we should like to present it, the reply to your request for our opinion of the proposals submitted and for suggestions as to how, in the event of other fiscal changes being made, the interests of Canadian producers would be most effectively furthered by a preference.

I notice in one of the morning papers an intimation that the government is contemplating subsidizing shipping freights for goods coming from Australia and New Zealand, so as to cheapen the cost of placing their main exports on the home market. This probably is nothing more than surmise. If by any chance, however, the government is considering subsidizing shipping freights, I sincerely hope that what may be done in this regard for any of the British Dominions, will be done in like manner for Canada.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

I desire to read another letter which goes to show what the Prime Minister and his colleagues were doing. They were not always attending dinners, even in the evening, they held a consultation every night and almost every morning as to the views to be expressed before these two conferences; and notwithstanding what may have been stated in the press in any part of Canada, let me say that the views expressed at these conferences by any individual of the Canadian representatives were the views of all three representatives:

The Ritz Hotel,
London, October 23, 1923.

The Right Honourable
Sir PHILIP LLOYD-GREAME, K.B.E., M.C., M.P.,
President of the Board of Trade,
Great George Street, S. W. 1.

My dear Sir Philip:

My colleagues and I have been considering with care the proposals as to preferential duties put forward by the Government of Great Britain at the meeting of the Conference on October the 9th, and which I discussed with you in our conversation at the Board of Trade on Saturday morning.

These proposals, which it was observed were within the framework of the existing fiscal system of Great Britain, will, we believe, be received in Canada with due appreciation as of distinct value to Dominion producers.

On two subsidiary phases of these proposals, questions have been put for consideration by the Dominion representatives.

(1) The duty on "other dried fruit" is proposed to be imposed on "such fruit, e.g. apples, pears, and peaches, as the Dominion representatives may consider of interest to their trade."

That is in a letter written by the Prime Minister of Canada, and I desire to call the attention of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) to these words—"Apples, pears and peaches."

The dried fruits suggested, in addition to those already included, appear to comprise those in which our producers are chiefly interested.

(2) As to tobacco, two alternative proposals are made, stabilization of the existing duty over a term of years, or an increase of the preference from one-sixth to one-fourth. An increase of the preference would, in our belief, present most in the way of advantage to the producers of tobacco in Canada. As to the course which the British Government and Parliament should follow, we would not venture to express an opinion.

More important are the general issues raised in the statements made by yourself in your presentation of the present proposals, and by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I may quote from the statement made by the Chancellor:

"We want you to tell us whether what we have proposed is going to help you, whether our proposals can in any way be improved, and if so, in what direction. That does not bind us to accept any suggestions that you make to us, any more than you are bound to accept any suggestions we may put to you as to what we might desire by way of increasing our trade with you; but it does give us the opportunity at any rate of realising what the position is, and then it will be for us to say whether, consistently with the interest of our own people here, we can carry out what you have suggested to us."

In response to this welcome overture, I have pleasure in giving you a brief statement of our position.

Canada has been the pioneer in the modern development of preferential trade within the British Empire. She gave us the first preference to British goods in 1897-8, and took the initiative in requesting the abrogation of treaties which stood in the way of Imperial preference. This policy she has steadfastly maintained. The Canadian preference now covers, in varying degrees, practically the whole range of competitive British exports to the Dominion. During the last session of Parliament, a ten per cent. discount on existing duties, constituting a further increase in the prevailing preference, was provided in the case of British goods imported through a Canadian port. Canada has given preference in her own interest as well as in what she conceived to be the interest of the rest of the Empire. It has never hitherto, in the case of the United Kingdom, been made conditional on the grant of an equal preference in return. We have at all times recognized the importance of conceding to each Government concerned the right to legislate as its own interests might demand, on tariff matters, or, in other words, complete control over its own fiscal policy. Should the British peoples decide at any time that it will be in their own interests as well as what they conceive to be the interests of the Empire to make far-reaching changes in their present fiscal policy, Canada will naturally expect that in the establishment of a tariff, full and adequate consideration would be given, through preferential duties, to the interests of Canada's producers and to the substantial preferences which Canada accords to British goods.

Coming specifically to the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we state what preferential duties would be of most advantage to our producers, and noting that the Chancellor quite properly observes it will be for the British Government to consider whether such duties would be in the interest of the British people, I now outline some of the chief Canadian exports to Great Britain in which an effective preference would be of most value. The list, of course, is not exhaustive.

Wheat obviously comes first and easily foremost. It is our most important article of export: the quality is unquestioned; the market is now highly competitive; Canada's export surplus is greater than the total British import.

Next in export importance among the grains comes barley, of which Canada normally produces sixty to seventy million bushels, and exported to the United Kingdom last year about ten million bushels.

Milling, particularly of wheat flour, ranks high among Canadian industries. It is closely and naturally connected with our agricultural industry. The production of flour normally runs about 15,000,000 barrels; last year our exports reached nearly 7,500,000 barrels, of which nearly 5,000,000 came to the United Kingdom. The industry is capable of very great expansion if greater markets are opened. Flour is, of course, a commodity of which the production and milling capacity in Great Britain is large. The effect of a duty would, therefore, depend very largely upon the extent to which the Canadian miller was put in a less advantageous position than the British miller; a duty which was distinctly protectionist rather than preferential would not, in the long run, we believe, be as advantageous to Canadian millers as the existing situation.

Of the other agricultural products, excluding those already covered, the most important are fresh fruits, apples, peaches, pears, and plums, all of which Canada produces in unexcelled quality, and, especially in apples, in very large quantities, with difficulty at present in finding profitable markets (for Canada, a preference on fresh fruits is of much more importance than on dried or preserved fruits); cheese, butter and eggs, bacon and hams, canned vegetables. Of our fishery products, canned salmon, which is faced with competition from the United States, Japan, and Russia, would at present be most helped by a preference.

I want hon. gentlemen from British Columbia to note these lines, because 4 p.m. the Canadian representatives urged that apples and salmon should be put on this list, and they were.

Of our fishery products, canned salmon, which is faced with competition from the United States, Japan, and Russia, would at present be most helped by a preference.

Our forest products, with due observance of conservation principles, are capable of great expansion, notably lumber, newsprint paper, millboard and strawboard, and chemical and mechanical pulp. Canada has also large resources in ferrous and non-ferrous metals, and in the non-metallic minerals, which a substantial preference would assist in developing. Our iron and steel and other metal industries, including agricultural implements and electrical apparatus, our wood-working, rubber and other manufacturing industries would supply a wide range of products.

I understand it is not your desire at this stage to obtain other than a very general statement. On all the above, and any other branch of Canadian industry which might be included within the range of duties to be imposed at any time ,our Government would be pleased to avail itself of the opportunity, as occasion arises ,of making suggestions in further outline and in detail.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

I went to the trouble of reading this because some of the criticisms concerning the Prime Minister are so at variance with the facts that it is but fair to him, to the country, and to this House, that his work at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference should be placed on Hansard in order that the people may appreciate just what service he did perform in the interests of the Dominion.

Now, in addition to the letter which I have read, I took the liberty of presenting a memorandum to the Economic Conference as the enlargement of the Canadian attitude towards the British preference. I must again ask the indulgence of the House while I read this extract from my presentment to the conference:

I would like to call the attention of the conference to this phase which I am now going to present, but to which I made reference yesterday. That is the allegation that has been made time and again in the press, that Canada is merely a place for the assembling of products of other countries to be forwarded to Great Britain in order to secure the benefit of Great Britain's market.

The statement is sometimes made here in the press and in public discussion that Canadian manufactured goods are not rightly entitled to a preference in the British market, as they are not really manufactured in Canada, but are merely assembled from imported parts and sent over here as Canadian products. It may be pertinent to our discussion to-day to state that this conception is wholly erroneous. It could not survive a visit to Canada's manufacturing centres or a study of the statistical reports of the development of our industries.

Our chief manufacturing industries are based primarily on the natural resources and extractive industries of Canada. For example, our two largest manufacturing interests, flour milling and meat packing, represent the two broad divisions of Canadian agriculture; our third largest is lumber; our fourth, pulp and paper; and our fifth smelting. Of scores of our other largest industries—based in part, according to the universal practice, on imported raw materials—it needs but to mention them to note that they are wholly Canadian, as for example our textiles, rubber goods, chemicals, agricultural implements, boots and shoes, etc.

The British people have in general exactly the same measure of assurance that goods which come from Canada and claim preferential tariff rates are distinctively Canadian as the Canadian people have that goods which come from Britain and claim our preferential rate are distinctively British. When Canada first granted a preference to British goods, complaints were raised that German and other goods were coming through Britain and securing the benefit of our preference. It was therefore provided that no goods imported into Canada should be entitled to the preference unless at least 25 per cent of the value consisted of British labour and materials. When this country adopted a limited preferential system a few years ago, it adopted the same rule.

But it is not merely on these general considerations that I wish to rely in repudiating the reckless statements that have been made, I may take the specific items which bulk largest in our export of manufactures to Great Britain and to the Dominions and India. Paper, particularly newsprint, takes a high place in this list. It is a 100 per cent Canadian product, made in Canadian mills from Canadian wood. Wheat flour and rolled oats are also widely exported, again, made in Canadian mills from Canadian wheat and Canadian oats. Sugar now comes first among our exports to Great Britain which receive a preference. While we grow larger quantities of sugar beets in Canada, our raw material in this case comes preponderantly from outside, but the refineries are out and out Canadian; and further the sugar which we use for our exports to Britain is drawn mainly from the British West Indies, to which Canada gives a very substantial preference. Under the British regulations, the preferential rates apply only to sugar produced within the Empire; and by a further application of this principle, which goes beyond anything in our regulations, preference is not accorded on jam or condensed milk, unless the jam or condensed milk is made in Canada, and the sugar used is refined in Canada from raw sugar grown within the Empire. Automobiles are another large factor.

And this is very interesting.

In some instances, our motor factories began as assembling plants, but this stage has long been passed. Our motor factories are substantial and efficient organizations, carrying the process of manufacture from the ground up; it is almost exclusively from these factories that the half million cars which Canadians themselves now use, have been drawn—one car for every four families. Engines, radiators, axles, wheels, springs, sheet metal work, hardware, upholstery, tyres, are all manufactured in Canada; one company draws upon 485 Canadian sources of supply. Of the two cars of Canadian make most largely imported into Britain, not 25 per cent, but, in one case 60 per cent and in the other, 80 per cent of the cost is represented by material and labour of Canadian origin; and in the case of the car chiefly exported to other parts of the Empire, the percentage runs still higher. It is not necessary to go into further detail; the items mentioned constitute the bulk of our export of factory products; the same story would be told of the great majority of other manufactured exports.

I apologize for taking so much time. I think I have gone far enough into the subject, both generally and in detail, to explain our position. I wish again to say how thoroughly we appreciate what the British Government has seen fit to do in its proposition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the hon minister reading from correspondence?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have read from nothing except what is in the official record.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought my hon. friend said a moment ago that he was reading letters which were not in the record. Perhaps the letters he has read are contained in the correspondence which has already been tabled? I am asking merely for information.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I ask my hon. friend whether the correspondence—I am not referring to the official record—has been tabled or not?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no objection to tabling it right away. As I explained at the outset, the letters are not in the official record. What I have just read is an extract from the official record.

I mentioned a moment ago that what might appear to be a preference on our flour would probably be no preference at all. For example, this commodity is now allowed free into Great Britain. British millers are capable of milling their own flour. Suppose Great Britain imposed a duty on flour, then, even if Canada were accorded preferential treatment, our millers would not be in as good a position in the British market as they are at the present time, because what appeared to be a preference in favour of Canadian flour would in fact be a great benefit to British millers, a punishment to our millers, and a greater punishment to foreign millers. So your representatives thought it was in the interests of the flour industry of Canada to urge that unless a duty were put on foreign flour, and Canadian flour still remained free, it would not be preferential treatment to the Canadian producers at all, but would leave them in a worse position than before.

With respect to motor cars, this industry has greatly increased its exports to Great Britain under the preferential treatment given to Canada. Under the preferential tariff our trade has increased most in three commodities—sugar, moving picture films, and motor cars. Perhaps the House will bear with me while I read a few figures to show that the preference accorded by Great Britain is of great benefit to the Dominion. This table has been prepared by the Bureau of Statistics and shows that during the past five years our exports have increased to a very substantial extent. For instance, our export of automobiles has increased from a value of $713,920 in 1919 to $9,110,752 in 1923; sugar, from $3,185,853 in 1919 to $13,641,327 in 1923; unmanufactured tobacco, from $35,911 in 1919 to $248,374 in 1923; moving picture films, from $130,953 in 1919 to $707,964 in 1923. There is no question that a preferential tariff, if Great Britain saw her way clear to give it to us, would be of aid to Canada, but as I said before, the fiscal policy of Great Britain is in the hands of the electors of Great Britain. While we are glad to accept a preference, as we have given them a preference, the fact still remains that so long as the great British market is wide open to the Canadian people, and until they see fit to give us a preference, we will meet our competitors in that market on the present terms.

I know it is tedious reading, and I fear that it will be tedious listening, but I think it would be wise to put on Hansard the specific proposals that the representatives of Great Britain made at this Conference, so that the information may be available to hon. members who may wish to deal with the matter among their constituents or elsewhere. These were not the original proposals, but they were the complete proposals, including the additions,—apples and several other things—which are of particular interest to Canada and which were made largely at the request of the Canadian representatives. If hon. gentlemen will refer to page 241 they will find a summary of the proposals. I quote:

Dried Fruit.

At present dried figs, raisins and plums (includes apricots) are dutiable at the rate of 10s. 6d. per cwt., if from foreign countries and enjoy if of Empire origin a preference of one-sixth, i.e., of 1s. 9d. per cwt.

It is proposed to admit these goods free of duty from the Empire so that Empire raisins, figs and plums will enjoy a preference of 10s. 6d. per cwt.

Currants.

At present dried currants are dutiable at the rate of 2s. per cwt. and enjoy a preference of one-sixth, which on the existing duty only amounts to 4d.

His Majesty's government are prepared to offer free admission to Empire currants and to consider what increase in the duty on foreign currants may be necessary to make the preference effective, such increase to come into force at a future date to be agred upon.

Other Dried Fruit.

At present there is no duty on any other dried fruit, but whilst continuing to admit such Empire dried fruit free, His Majesty's government would propose to impose a duty of 10s. 6d. per cwt. on such foreign dried fruit (e.g., apples, pears and peaches) as the Dominion representatives may consider of interest to their trade.

Other Preserved Fruits.

Preserved fruits other than those mentioned above are not dutiable save in respect of sugar contents, if any. It is proposed in addition to any such duty on the sugar contents to impose an all-round duty of 5s. per cwt. on the principal forms of preserved fruit not at present dutiable, except fruit pulp for jam manufacture, which will remain free of duty. All such fruit will be admitted free from the Empire.

Sugar.

At present sugar is dutiable according to a scale dependent on the polarisation of the sugar with a basis rate of 25s. 8d. per cwt. on fully refined sugar. Empire sugar enjoys a preference of one-sixth or 4s. 3½d. per cwt., being nearly a halfpenny a pound on refined sugar.

It is not possible at present to offer an increase in this preference, but His Majesty's government are ready to guarantee that if the duty is reduced the preference shall for a period of ten years not fall with it, but be maintained at its present rate of nearly ½d. per pound so long at least as the duty on foreign sugar does not fall below that level.

Tobacco.

At present the duty on tobacco varies according to kind, being of course higher on cigars than on unmanufactured tobaccos. On the latter it is about 8s. 2d. per lb., on which the Empire enjoys a preference of one-sixth, or, say, on raw tobacco of 1s. 4d.

His Majesty's government would be prepared to adopt the course proposed in regard to sugar, i.e., to stabilise the existing preference for a term of years or alternatively they are prepared to increase the preference to one-quarter, i.e., to about 2s. on unmanufactured tobacco at present rates, the amount of the preference of course varying as the basis varies.

As a result of consultation with the oversea representatives concerned, it has been decided to adopt the second alternative, i.e., to raise the preference from one-sixth to one-quarter.

Wine.

The proposals are:

1. To double the existing preference of 2s. per gallon on the duty of 6s. per gallon on wines of a strength exceeding 30° and not exceeding 42°. The rate of duty on such wines coming from the Empire would thus become 2s. per gallon.

2. To increase from 30 per cent to 50 per cent the preference on the surtax of 12s. 6d. per gallon on sparkling wine.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson) is not here, after his remarks of last night, to hear about the decision of the conference on wine. Now, coming to something which is of particular interest to Canada—and this is from the official record again; what I am going to read now was not included in the first proposals—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I understand the statement was made that by reason of the preference which Canada now has in the British market, enormous quantities of automobiles were exported to that country from Canada, also sugar and some other items. Would the hon. member tell us what the tariff is against these articles? I think the statement was made that the British market was wide open to Canada, and also that Britain had no tariff; that she was a free trade country. How comes it that Canada has a preference on these articles, and if so what is the tariff against them?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not the tariff at my hand. Great Britain has a tariff, in some instances, but where Canadian products are allowed to enter that market free and a tariff is imposed against similar goods from other countries, that is the essence of protection in our favour.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is the existing tariff that I am asking about.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not the existing tariff with me. I was reading that quotation from the memorandum to show that the British preference was of some use to us and that it undoubtedly might be of further use to us.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): May I ask whether the regulations defining the percentage of manufacture in Canada required in the case of automobiles exported from this country to Great Britain have been somewhat modified, and whether greater freedom is allowed in the bringing of parts of automobiles from outside into Canada and the shipping of them across as Canadian made?

Mr. GRAHAM: The percentage of Canadian labour and manufacture that must enter into the exported product is still necessary to entitle it to the preference in the British market.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is it defined to what it must be in regard to automobiles?

Mr. GRAHAM: It must be 25 per cent.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And 75 per cent is made up in Canada, is that the idea?

Mr. GRAHAM: The law in Great Britain is that at least 25 per cent of Canadian labour or raw material must be included in any imports that get the benefit of the preferential tariff, and the same applies in Canada in the case of goods coming from Great Britain. As a matter of fact, as I tried to point out a few moments ago, in the automobile industry of Canada the amount of Canadian labour and raw material included is far in excess of 25 per cent. In the case of one factory it is, I think, 85 per cent, and in the case of another, 60. I doubt whether any of them run as low as 25 per cent. Year by year the Canadian manufacturers are including in their products a greater percentage of Canadian labour and Canadian raw material.

Now, if I may be permitted to go on, I was coming to a very interesting part of these proposals. The next reference is to raw apples, which were not included in the first proposals made. The memorandum says:

Raw Apples.

It is proposed to levy a duty of 5s. per cwt. on raw apples of foreign origin and to admit raw apples from the Empire free of duty as at present.

Canned Salmon and Canned Lobster, Cray Fish and Crabs.

It is proposed that a duty of 10s. per cwt. shall be imposed on foreign canned salmon and canned lobster, cray fish and crabs, and that these goods shall be admitted free of duty from the Empire.

Honey.

It is proposed that a duty of 10s. per cwt shall be imposed on foreign honey, and that honey of Empire origin shall continue to be admitted free of duty.

Lime, Lemon and other Fruit Juices.

The proposal of His Majesty's government is that a duty at the rate of 6d. per gallon shall be imposed on foreign lime and lemon juices and His Majesty's government would consider a list of other fruit juices which the dominions regarded as of interest to their trade: Fruit juices from the Empire will continue to be admitted free of duty.

I must apologize to the House for reading these extracts, but I did not see how otherwise I could possibly place the case of Canada before the House as it was presented at the Imperial Economic Conference.

Now, I come to a question which is of vital importance to the Dominion of Canada, and that is the cattle embargo. I trust that the stock raisers of Canada will not consider me bumptious in attempting to deal with this question. Let me say at this juncture, lest I forget, that the representatives of the Canadian Civil Service and others who accompanied the delegation to London need not take second place to similar representatives of any country in the world. I think it is only just to the Civil Service of this country to say that every man behind us giving us the necessary information was the equal, at least, of his counterpart in the British Civil Service and in the service of the other dominions. We prized their work. Without their aid nothing could have been accomplished of any consequence, and what would have been accomplished would have been done in a rather slovenly manner.

The cattle embargo is not a new thing. For thirty years, except in one or two instances, Great Britain has kept her markets closed to the cattle of the Dominion of Canada. Time and again it has been pointed out by representatives of the Canadian government that this embargo was merely a subterfuge, and I use the word with its full meaning. The reason given for keeping our cattle out of the British market was the fear of contagion, while as a matter of fact, Canadian cattle have been free from any disease that would bar them out from the British market for many, many years. That was admitted long years ago, and in 1917 an effort was made by the Canadian government and, I think I can safely say, a pledge was given—by the British government, to have the embargo removed; but is was not brought about. In 1922 the Finance Minister and the present Minister of Justice in this government while in London came to a distinct understanding with members of the British government that an act would be introduced to provide for the admission of Canadian cattle into the British market. The terms of the act were agreed upon. There were, as a matter of fact, two acts. One provided as I have just intimated, and the other act, which was to be brought into force by proclamation or by order in council, provided for the admission of Canadian breeding cattle into the Old Land.

The first act was introduced in the British House of Commons, but an amendment was made to it while it was passing through parliament which nullified to a great extent its provisions. This amendment made it possible for an inspection to be held, and nullified to a certain extent the provisions of the act. In addition to that, the act which was to be brought into force by proclamation or by order in council never was so brought into force. As a matter of fact, we found when in Great Britain that the Minister of Agriculture in the Baldwin government was in our opinion, unalterably opposed to the admission of Canadian cattle into the British market; we may as well use plain language. Indeed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and myself were accused of being brutal in our frankness in dealing with this matter. I shall not trespass on the time of the House to read what we said in the Economic Conference but we were both roundly thumped in the London press for talking so strongly. We placed the viewpoint of the Canadian stock raiser before them in no uncertain way. Now the act is amended, providing for inspection that was never anticipated when the act was introduced or when the arrangement was made between the Finance Minister and the present Minister of Justice. And how was this inspection carried on? It was pointed out by your representatives at the Economic Conference, as a sample, that a load of cattle, of one hundred head, if I remember correctly, were shipped across the ocean, half of them being landed at one British port and the other half at another. One-half of the cargo was admitted as stockers and the other half were nearly all rejected as being too fat. Thus by inspection the British government took into its own hands the power to tell the farmers of the Old Land that they could not buy the Canadian cattle they wanted to buy, although the British government had agreed with the Canadian representatives that they should be able to buy them. At the conference I had a number of photographs in my hand, and to my surprise some of these photographs showed that some of our Canadian cattle were rejected because they were too thin. That was the reason given in that case—these Canadian cattle that the British farmers wanted to fatten were rejected because they were too thin. It made a clear case that what the British government had in the back of its head was the protection of the cattle industry in Great Britain and the prevention of our cattle entering that market.

The injustice to the Canadian cattle producer was two-fold. Not only was there an injustice to the cattle raiser who sold his stock to be sent across the ocean, in that they might be slaughtered when they got there and he get only half price for them, involving a great loss on every head, but another injustice was done. The cattle that were considered stockers here, only partially fat and capable of being finished for a month on the other side, were slaughtered on the dock without being allowed to go to an abattoir, and this half-fed beef was sold on the British market as Canadian beef. Thus the reputation of our beef was injured, and a monetary loss caused in the slaughter of cattle that should have been still further fed. Remember too that Canadian cattle slaughtered bore the official stigma of disease although they had no disease.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What number of cattle were shipped from Canada during the year the embargo was off, and what number the year previously?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Agriculture will give me that information in a moment. I also want to point this out in connection with the cattle embargo. When the question was introduced at the conference, no progress was made. I am afraid we were not in a temper to take excuses on this cattle embargo question. The case was compared by the Minister of Agriculture to a license given to a picture show, that it really did not mean what it said, that while the language of the act was quite plain to us and meant a certain definite thing, it was never intended to be enforced in that manner. As a matter of fact if the regulations had remained as they were when the Economic Conference met, Canadian cattle, stockers and all, would probably have been shut out of the British market.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Slaughtered when they got there.

Mr. GRAHAM: They would slaughter them on the dock. They would not even go to the abattoir. We met in several subsidiary conferences, which were found to be much more helpful in straightening out some of the difficulties than discussion in the open conference. Let me say this in passing—and I am not passing nearly rapidly enough—that our former Governor General, the Duke of Devonshire, was a friend of Canada every inch of the way, and we owe a great deal to him for his efforts in straightening out this difficulty. We met in conference on several occasions and it was finally decided, after plain talk had been indulged in across the table, that the Minister of Agriculture was to place in writing with the Prime Minister of Canada what had been agreed on. I am afraid I will have to weary the House over this correspondence because it is not as yet on record, but this is really what was agreed on between the Minister of Agriculture of Great Britain and the Canadian representatives. Here is a letter, which was written by the Prime Minister of Canada:

The Ritz Hotel,
London, November 8, 1923.

Dear Sir ROBERT:

I am in receipt of your note of November 5th including memorandum re your proposed administration of the Importation of Animals Act 1922, insofar as it affects the admission of stores from Canada.

Your memorandum sets forth substantially the conclusions reached at the meeting in the Colonial office on October 31st. If your inspectors carry out the instructions contained in sub-clauses 1 and 2 of clause (b) of section three of your memorandum, we believe the export of store cattle from Canada to Great Britain can be carried on with quite a measure of success, and we wish to express our appreciation of the proposed changes in administration of the act.

In view of your Government's definite decision not to amend the law, or place the order for breeding cattle before parliament, in accepting the proposed changes outlined in your memorandum, and the proposal for reciprocal trade in pure bred cattle, we would like to have it clearly understood that Canada does not in any way abate her claim for the complete removal of the embargo against any of her cattle, and she will from time to time continue to press for the same treatment, in the matter of "Diseases of Animals," as she is accorded by other countries.

Yours sincerely,
W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

Sir Robert Sanders, M.P.,
Minister of Agriculture,
Whitehall Place, S.W.I.

The memorandum follows. I think I ought to place it on Hansard because it is really an agreement with us that was arrived at by conference, and this letter of the Prime Minister of Canada confirming it, with the warning, mark you, that Canada did not accept it as a final solution, but would from time to time press her claim to have her cattle, and all her cattle, admitted into the British market:

Canadian Store Cattle

Memorandum by the Minister of Agriculture

1. At the meeting at the Colonial Office on the 31st ultimo I promised to put into writing the proposals I made to meet the points raised by the Canadian representatives as to the interpretation and administration of the words in section 1 (8) of the Importation of Animals Act, 1922, which inter alia define store cattle as castrated or spayed animals "which are intended for feeding purposes and not for immediate slaughter."

2. It was made clear that the British Government are not prepared to propose any amendment of the Act in this respect, but they are ready and anxious to co-operate in arriving at a satisfactory settlement of the manner in which the definition should be interpreted and administered, having regard always to their responsibility to Parliament to see that the law is observed.

3. In view of that responsibility the Ministry of Agriculture cannot surrender the final word in deciding whether any particular animals come within the facilities afforded by the Act and as to the conditions under which their movement should be licensed out of the landing place. But subject to this I am prepared to give instructions to the Ministry's Inspectors as follows:—

(a) In the case of any cattle which the Inspector is satisfied can reasonably be regarded as suitable for feeding for a further period of not less than 28 days before slaughter, the inspector will on application grant a license for their removal from the landing place to any special authorized market or other premises, subject only to the conditions embodied in the Schedule to the Importation of Animals Act, 1922.

(b) In the case of cattle where the Inspector is not so satisfied, the Inspector will on application either:—

(1) Grant a license for their removal to a slaughter-house for slaughter with such conditions as may be considered necessary to secure their slaughter thereat and will not, as at present, require them to be slaughtered at the landing place. or,

(2) If the owner of the cattle is prepared to undertake that they will be fed for not less than 28 days before slaughter, the inspector will grant a license for their removal to premises other than a slaughter-house subject to such conditions as may be considered necessary to secure that the undertaking will be observed.

In either case the additional conditions imposed by the Schedule will necessarily apply.

4. Cattle for which a license is not applied for or in respect of which a license cannot be granted in accordance with these instructions will have to be slaughtered at the landing place as heretofore.

5. It must be understood that cattle which have not complied with the conditions applicable to stores, i.e. three days isolation and supervision in Canada and supervision by a veterinary surgeon on the ship, must continue to be landed at an imported animals wharf and not at an imported animals landing place and will accordingly be slaughtered in the wharf. The ministry has no power to allow such cattle to be moved from the wharf to a slaughter-house.

6. I make this offer with the desire of meeting as far as possible the case made by the Canadian representatives, consistently with my primary duty to safeguard the interests of British agriculturists, but I couple it with the request to the Canadian Government that they on their part will co-operate with us in carrying out the provisions of the Act and that they will give instructions to their officers not to certify as store cattle animals which cannot reasonably be regarded as suitable for feeding for the period above referred to.

7. The Ministry of Agriculture has no desire whatever to whittle away by administrative means the privileges granted by Parliament to Canada for the importation of her store cattle, and the Ministry is confident that with goodwill on both sides the provisions of the Act can be carried out satisfactorily. It was inevitable that some difficulties would arise in the early stages, but there is every reason to hope that the trade will soon adapt itself to the conditions so that it can be carried on to the mutual advantage of both countries. The Ministry of Agriculture will spare no effort to secure this result, and I am confident that the Canadian Department of Agriculture will do the same.

R. L. SANDERS.

Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries.
November, 1923.

Mr. WHITE: Mr. Manning Doherty was credited last year with being the means of the removal of the cattle embargo. Just where did his activities end?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know what effect his activity had on the minds of the British people. We did not encounter it over there.

There is only one other point to which I will refer in connection with the Economic Conference, although there are many questions of interest, and that is this: The Canadian representatives declined to become a party to the establishment of a permanent Economic Committee. I think the same thing was proposed in 1921, and was not then adhered to by Canada. The position that Canada's representative took, and I think it was right in both cases, is that a conference is a conference and nothing else. We were there from different parts of the Empire to discuss problems of mutual interest; the conference is not an executive body at all. It makes no laws, it makes suggestions, an economic committee would have to have something to do. And something that the Economic Committee might attempt to carry out might be altogether at variance with what people throughout the Dominion wanted such a body to look after. It is said that if you get one live man, and give him a chair, a desk, and a pencil, he will soon surround himself with a staff and some work, but there was nothing which Canada wished to refer to such a body as an economic committee. We were further established in this view during the discussion because the representatives from one of the overseas dominions when asked by myself "What subject would you refer to this body" replied "Well, the effects, for example, of the dumping clause in tariffs might be referred". Of course, when that suggestion was made it began to get into the minds of Canada's representatives what possibly might be meant. There might be, perhaps not in the mind of any person except ourselves, the thought that it might prove the introduction of the thin end of the wedge of having other people interfere with our fiscal property.

So far as Canada is concerned, whether she is right or wrong Canada proposes to manage her own affairs, and make her own fiscal policy. The government in charge of Canada's affairs is subject only to the electors of the Dominion of Canada. That being the case, we saw nothing for the economic committee to do that would be a benefit to us. All the other overseas committees of the British Empire approved of the establishment of such a committee. However, the new government, giving the reason which Canada gave for not establishing such a committee, has declined to establish an economic committee.

I will not deal with this matter any longer. I hate to acknowledge that I have got to the time when my age is referred to. Coming into the House to-day I heard two of the younger members say "the Old Man is going to talk to-day." Being in that category, without scolding or lecturing, perhaps the young men of this House will allow me to say a few words from a long experience. I have been in public life a great many years, and I am not making any insinuations that I intend to quit. I want to take this opportunity of saying two or three words. It is a wholesome sign to see the young men taking part in public life. We are not, or at least we should not be, in the frame of mind in which we were in before the war. If the war accomplished anything, it has taught us to have a broader view and an outlook that includes others besides ourselves. One word of advice I would give to the younger men in this House is this. Do not be too pessimistic. That feeling grows on one just as rapidly as the measles at high tide. You may allow yourselves to get into a groove where everything seems to threaten danger and there is no way out of the difficulty, because the rut gets deeper the further you go. As I said, the war taught us some lessons, and one of them is this: that bravery and courage are needed; they are needed now by us as much as they were needed a few years ago in Europe. We should not shirk our responsibilities but should bear them, as I know we will. There are so many more things in life that have a bright side and a golden tinge than those that have a sombre side If you can—and I am speaking now to the younger men—turn your attention more to the bright things in life, cultivate the spirit of optimism, even under great difficulties, and you will be suprised to find how this will grow on you.

Every day as we rise in the morning we will find that life is full of brightness and there is no burden cast upon us that we are not able to bear. There is another thing I would like to say to young men just entering public life. Do not, under any consideration, either for party's sake or personal vengeance, allow yourself in your public duties to handle the muck rake. I have been in public life a great many years. I see the pathway strewn with the wrecks of men who tried to climb into power and prominence over the ruined reputations of men whom they attempted to assassinate. Sometimes that kind of thing will succeed temporarily, but eventually it recoils on the men who handles the muck far more seriously than the man for whom the muck was intended. We in Canada have no need to despair. If we value our assets and liabilities as any business man does, we have no right to complain. The liabilities of the Dominion of Canada all told are something over three billion dollars, while the wealth of Canada is estimated at twenty-three billions. If any man in business life could show such a balance sheet as that to his bank, he would be given all the credit imaginable, up to the limit of his wealth. True, we cannot count Canada's assets in the same way, but that is one of the bright sides of life and one of the bright pictures. Our taxes are high. We are going through a time of depression. But our fathers went through times of depression. The men who made the Dominion of Canada in years gone by came to this country, cut down the trees, built their little log cabins, clearing half an acre, then an acre, two acres, three acres, four acres, until they got a hundred acres cleared, and the families they raised are now among those who are aged, or are gone. But they left stock able and sufficiently courageous to face any difficulty that ever can confront them in this country. Then, with reference to the young men who have come to us, I may be allowed to say a word that may be personal. Notwithstanding all the discouragements, there is not a young man or a comparatively young man in this House who came to Canada from elsewhere who to-day would return to the country from which he came. That is a fairly good test, I imagine. There are opportunities here. We must buckle on our armour, and refuse to become members of the Ancient Order of United Gravediggers. We must stand erect, look to the future, take lessons from the past. As strong Canadians, members of the greatest empire the world has ever seen, let us march forward as men worthy of our fathers, realizing that the Creator has given to us in this country of ours a heritage second to none in the whole world.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I am sure we are all inspired by the words we have just listened to from one of the elder members of the House. I wondered, however, if he has not made a mistake in thinking it was he who was referred to as "the Old Man." I do not know, but I am inclined to think that some of the younger members who sit behind me might have referred to myself as the old man who was to speak to-day. I remember that on one occasion, when visiting some of my French friends, one of them spoke of me as an old man. "Why," I said, "I am only a boy." "Well," he said, "your hair he lie on you."

I desire to call attention for a short time to some of the remarks made in this House and some of the opinions expressed to which I think sufficient consideration has not been given. I desire, first of all, to direct a few remarks to the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson) who spoke last night. He was wonderfully jubilant, evidently expressing the sentiments of the group to which he is attached. His jubilance seems to result from the Ontario elections held last summer. I am not disposed to minimize the significance of by-elections, or any elections. I recognize that sometimes straws show the way the wind blows. But perhaps we do not get any great distance in discussing these matters. However, just in order to throw a little cold water on the hon. gentleman, I wish to call attention to the fact that there were elections held somewhere else. It will be remembered that there is a Progressive government in Manitoba, and some cabinet reconstruction last fall necessitated two constituencies being opened and by-elections held. The Conservative party in that province had been carrying on a campaign, all through the summer, trying to bring together its shattered remnants; for in no place is it more shattered than in Manitoba. They carried on a campaign of misrepresentation such as they did against the Drury government, and they hoped to meet with an equal degree of success. The time came when two constituencies were opened and ministers were to be returned. Instead of following what is now the generally accepted custom and allowing these ministers to be returned by acclamation, they considered it a good time to put the matter to the test and see whether the campaign had had any effect. I can speak for one of those provincial constituencies, the one in which I live, and I can say that never was a more determined effort made to capture a by-election than was made at that time. The results, however, were undoubtedly most disappointing to the men who were looking forward to them. In one constituency the Conservative candidate lost his deposit, while in the other the candidate saved it only by a small handful of votes. The result was in a large measure attributable to the fact that in Manitoba the people have long memories and they connected these things with what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) spoke of the other day as a love feast that was being held at Saskatoon. Perhaps I might issue a word of warning to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) in the words that were once used in a warning that was given a king of Israel:

> Lo thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt; whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it.

I think the application is very obvious. So that there are indications that seem to point in the other direction. There is a story I heard last summer from the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) that seems to illustrate the situation. A traveller was in the state of Texas and it was one of those periods to which the prairie countries also seem to be subject. There were great winds blowing and there were storms of dust in the air. This traveller inquired whether there were any cyclones in Texas. "No," said the man to whom he asked the question; "two or three came along one time and tried to start something, but these steady winds blew Hades out of them." Now, what hon. gentleman have taken for the steady wind is simply the little whirlwind that passes over the prairies; they forgot about the great wind that is still blowing in the direction of progress, and will continue to blow.

The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson) made another unfortunate allusion: he introduced at this stage the subject of church union. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a subject that will engage the most serious attention of this House at the proper time, and it will call for all the sane judgment we possess. We shall require to approach it with all the Christian tolerance and charity that we can command; and by this time the hon. member, I think, will recognize that it was a piece of gross impropriety to bring forward a matter on which parties will necessarily be divided and make it the subject of an attack on the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party.

I desire to direct a few remarks to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in connection with some of the subjects he discussed. With some of his opinions I am entirely in accord; with others I must differ. With the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), I think that the country owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for the clear analysis he made of our present financial position. We are greatly indebted to him, and I say this because I wish to point out later the particular field in which I think the hon. member will find great scope for the ability he undoubtedly possesses to handle large problems and discuss large matters. He made one reference to the fact that there are still outstanding some $915,000,000 of tax-free war bonds. In my judgment that was one of the worst iniquities ever perpetrated on the people of Canada. I quote here a short extract from an editorial that appeared in the Citizen of last week:

> During the war, people were urged in many patriotic orations to give, or to save, till it hurt. Most people responded earnestly: usually, the people who could least afford it imposed the severest privation upon themselves. Some bought war bonds sincerely under the stimulus of patriotism. Upwards of 1,000 million dollars in tax-free war bonds passed into the hands ultimately of a comparatively small number of investors who enjoyed the double thrill of patriotism and profit.

Put side by side with that the sacrifices of those men who, as the Minister of Railways pointed out, took the field in 5 p.m. our defence. It is not yet too late in the day to indicate the contrast which we have frequently found in this connection. I had something to do with selling some of these war bonds and I have distictly in mind one man who borrowed $500 at eight per cent interest and invested it in war bonds. Put that side by side with the horse-buying scandals and the scandals connected with the purchasing of drugs and surgical supplies, in which people of Ottawa were in some degree interested. Put these two things side by side and then let us remember that those people who profited during those times, largely the people who made money out of war contracts, are now coming out in opposition to the income tax. In my judgment the income tax must be retained. I have no patience with those who advocate that we should discard that system of taxation. It is at least an attempt to get money from those who have it and not from the people who have it not; for upon the people who have had little in the past the great burden has lain. It is true the Income Tax Act must be revised. Certain amendments have been suggested since this parliament met and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has refused to accept them under the plea that the entire act must be revised. I agree that it needs revision. We must retain it, but there are some points in which it can be improved. Let me suggest one or two. More consideration must be given than at present to the source of income. A distinction must be made between salaries and investments. My present disposition is to agree with what was said by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), that industry might be freed from that particular tax, but that personal incomes must be made the subject of taxation. One of the grossest inequalities that we find in the system as at present administered—and I have talked this matter over with some of the officials who are now administering the act—is found in the fact that in some cases husband and wife are classed as having a joint income while in other cases their incomes are treated separately. In one case they can claim only the individual statutory exemption, and in the other case they can claim exemption both for husband and wife. Take an illustration. A farmer and his wife—and sometimes all the family—are engaged in work on the farm, and their income is considered as joint. They have an income estimated at $2,500. If there are no other exemptions claimed than the statutory $2,000, they will pay income tax on $500. On the other hand, I have cases in mind—cases brought to my attention by one of the heads of the department that came under his notice—one, for instance of a man and his wife living in Winnipeg. They have no family. They live in a little suite and are able to take in all the city amusements. He is earning $2,500, and his wife is earning another $1,800 as a stenographer. They can both claim exemption up to $2,000 because they are married. If we accept the words in our marriage ritual, "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder", and "With all my wordly goods I thee endow", then I think for taxation purposes we must accept the principle that the income of both husband and wife must under all circumstances be considered as joint income.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) drew attention to the fact—and I do not dispute it for a moment—that our farmers are paying only 2 per cent of the $46,000,000 income tax collections. I do not know why the hon. member introduced this into his speech. I think he is too much of a gentleman to insinuate that the farmers are evading the tax. I do not think he meant to imply that at all. Then why did he introduce it? It seems to me it does nothing to strengthen his case, while it does a great deal to strengthen ours, when we submit that you can offer no better proof of the things for which we have been contending than just that fact, that we are not in a position to pay any bigger share of the income tax.

Now I come to the National Railway System, and it is on this particular matter that I see fit to differ with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) this afternoon placed before us in a very clear way certain facts relating to our National railways. I wish to present the subject to the House from the standpoint of the common people throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and in speaking as I propose to do I believe I shall be voicing the views of the great majority of our people. I regret that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George marred his speech, as I thought, by his reference to the government ownership of railways. Of course, he has the right to express his opinion on this subject as on any other. But it is frequently urged upon us that we should consider facts and not theories, and in this particular matter we have passed the academic stage of discussion and must consider the position simply as it is. During his speech a question was asked by some hon. gentleman behind me, "How did we get the railways?" Perhaps that was not a pertinent question at the time, but a perfectly pertinent question would have been: How does the hon. member propose to get rid of the National railways? On that particular subject we have not yet been given any light, and I think his address is weak in that particular, as is everything that is said by those who oppose government ownership of railways, simply because they have not offered us any alternative. Let me illustrate the point by another story. Two Irishmen, Pat and Mike, were out in the bush. They were some distance apart, and Mike heard a great row going on. He ran towards the noise and found Pat wrestling with a wildcat. "Hold on Pat! Hold on Pat!" "Bedad!" exclaimed Pat, "I can't let him go!" That seems to be somewhat the situation in which we find ourselves in regard to our government railways. We have not had indicated to us any plan by which we can let them go without finding ourselves in a position where our last state would be worse than our first. Are we asking too much then when we request hon. gentlemen who are opposed to government ownership of railways to present to us some reasonable proposition as to how we are to get rid of them, and on what terms? There is another story going the rounds of the press which I think is quite apropos in this connection. A coloured preacher was in the habit of using big words. His congregation disapproved of the practice, and they sent a delegation to remonstrate with him. In his defence the preacher said, "Don't I argify and sputify?" "Yes," replied the delegation, "you do argify and sputify, but you don't show wherein." Now, in my judgment, we have a right to put that proposition up to the member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and all others who take a similar position, that they at least should "show us wherein." Let us suppose, for instance, that we went to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or to any other corporation or syndicate, with a proposition that they should take over national railroads with all their encumbrances. They would very likely regard it somewhat as a man would regard a leap-year proposal from a widow with ten children. But even if they did consent to talk the proposition over, what is the first thing they would do? They would probably go to the Railway Commission and ask for an increase of rates to enable them to carry the burden, and that benevolent body would very likely grant the request. What would that mean? It would mean if we are to have uniform rates all over Canada, that we would have the same rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the situation for the railways would be lovely. But supposing they agreed to take over our system at a fair valuation, then we would certainly have to meet the problem which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) says is so difficult—the problem of capitalization. Some figure would have to be arrived at to represent the value of our national railways, and the difference between this figure and the original capitalization would have to be put over to the general debt of the country, where I think it should be. There has been a good deal of controversy in the past as to who is responsible for our present railway situation. Let us suppose that former governments, both Liberal and Conservative, have been guilty of bad railroad financing. The consequences of that mistaken policy ought not to be borne by the users of the road; it ought to be borne by all the people of Canada. And so I say again to those who condemn government ownership of railways, let them show wherein.

Now, do we want to get rid of our National Railway system? The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) I am sure would say, No, most emphatically, and what he says I am certain the people of Canada would say. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) told the House last night that during the recess he had attended a conference in Kansas City. I remember that on his return to Winnipeg he met a group of the organized farmers who were gathered together there and made an informal report respecting the conference. I was very much interested in what he said. He reported that during his visit he had come in contact with a great many of the leading business men of that part of the United States, bankers and others standing high in all departments of big business. They told him that they were greatly interested in watching the railroad situation in Canada. They put it this way: "We believe you have the ideal system. You have forty-five per cent of your roads under private ownership and fifty-five per cent under government ownership. We think that is better than if they were all under government ownership, because no matter how efficiently the railroads were operated there would be no standard of comparison, and it would therefore be easy to raise prejudice against the system and convince the people that the enterprises were not being efficiently managed. But when the government-owned road is placed side by side with such a system as the Canadian Pacific Railway there is an incentive to good work and to efficient management on the part of both institutions." It seemed to me that there was much food for thought in that statement of view. On the other hand they said: "If the railroads were all under private ownership you would be in the grip of a monopoly just as we are." It may be interesting to know that there are about 150 different railway systems in the United States under private ownership, and their rates are higher than ours. I thought I had brought with me a clipping from a New York paper which indicated the keen interest that the United States financial people were taking in our roads, but I find that I have not got it among my papers.

We are glad to know that the national railways are prosperous. We are glad to know that there is improvement in the whole system. We are glad to believe that we have at the head of the system a man of outstanding ability. Sometimes people say, "You are treating and speaking of Sir Henry Thornton as if he were a superman." Not at all; we are thinking of him as the equal of the men who have been at the head of the great Canadian Pacific Railway system—Van Horne, Shaughnessy and Beatty—of the men who are making an outstanding success of that enterprise; we are thinking of him simply as their equal and nothing more. As I said in speaking on this matter last session, we have given Sir Henry Thornton the biggest job that ever has been given to any man in the business world. I think he recognizes that, and I believe he is big enough to rise to his opportunity and to make a success of these roads, with resulting enhancement of his own reputation and general benefit to the whole of our country. Let me say to the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot), I think it was, who wanted to sell the National Railways for a dollar, and to other members who are opposed to government ownership of railways—and I know I can speak most emphatically for all this group and for the people we represent in the prairie provinces—that the people of Canada are not going to put the National Railways on the bargain counter.

Mr. LANCTOT: That may be the case for your part of the country, but it is not the case for my people.

Mr. BROWN: Well, a little education will perhaps change their point of view.

Mr. LANCTOT: You may come to my constituency of you like, and I wish you all the success that you may get.

Mr. BROWN: I do not think there is any occasion for thinking that there is enmity or undue rivalry between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not think we should look upon the Canadian Pacific as our enemy, as perhaps there has been a tendency to do in the past. I know that members of the farmers' organization in Manitoba—and I can speak for that organization—found that it was greatly to their benefit in the discussion of various railway problems, to confer with officials of that system. It was for our good, and I believe they recognized that it was for their good; and we have worked out some very amicable arrangements in regard to certain matters of interest to agriculturists. While not thinking of any undue rivalry between the two systems, I believe there is necessity for increasing the business of the national roads. We must get our share of the business, undoubtedly, but in the main the railroads are to be made a success by getting new business, and therein lay the iniquity of the killing of the branch lines bill last session.

I do not propose to deal at any length this afternoon with the tariff. This evidently promises to be a tariff session. We have had a good deal of discussion on the tariff in the course of this debate, and the budget debate will naturally be productive of further reference to the subject. I notice also that there are two resolutions on the order paper dealing with that subject. I shall not, therefore say very much on the merits of the question, but will make a few general remarks with regard to it. I took a little squib out of the Winnipeg Free Press the other day, which runs like this:

A tariff song for a Brantford M.P:
This country's tariff has such glories
That men called Grits oft act like Tories.

That is the greatest charge a lot of people seem to be able to bring against the Grits, that they often act like Tories. When facts and figures are presented to the House in the discussions of this matter, we should expect them to be absolutely reliable. It is difficult to know how to handle statistics; as was pointed out by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), statistics may unfortunately be made to prove anything that the person using them desires to prove. It is very necessary that hon. members and the people throughout the country should know exactly what the facts are in relation to any given matter that is placed before the House. I am going to draw attention to absolutely misleading statements that have been given to members of this House and to the country—not by members of the House, but to them. I have here some of the literature that is being circulated by those interested in the woollen industry. You may think this is a small matter, but straws show which way the wind blows, and when you find that people are not strictly truthful in regard to certain facts of which you have knowledge, you doubt the accuracy of their statements when they talk of things of which you have no knowledge. I quote only a part of one paragraph:

The duties on tweeds and similar cloths from Great Britain, he stated, were lowered by 2½ per cent in 1922, which necessitated the closing of the company's mill at Lanark.

The members who received that circular probably took that as a statement of fact. Not wishing to rely on my memory, although it is generally pretty good in relation to dates, I wrote to a friend, and the information I obtained confirmed what had been my own impression, namely, that that particular mill —note the date—was burned down on January 21st, 1917.

Mr. CALDWELL: When was the reduction made?

Mr. BROWN: The reduction complained of was made in 1922 so that the mill in question had been burned down fully five years before the budget effecting that reduction was presented to the House. Can you blame us when we sometimes question the statements made in the literature that we receive? We want to know the facts; we want to deal fairly with the people, and we insist that they deal fairly with us.

Here is another. I have a clipping here from a little paper published in Winnipeg called Canadian Farm Implements. This article from which I quote was written in reply to an address given by President J. B. Reynolds of the Ontario Agricultural College, at a meeting of the Canadian Society of Technical Agriculturists. He made some reference to farm implements to which the writer of this article took exception, and here is what he said:

Despite this fact, and the professor did not tell this to the technicians, at the present time the cost of all the necessary implements for a half-section farm are four per cent lower in price than they were in October, 1914. True, some implements cost more than they did then, but this is offset by the fact that other implements cost a great deal less.

When I read that statement first in the Farmers' Sun, which quoted it, I was amazed knowing the facts as I knew them, that such a statement should be made anywhere. I wrote a letter to the Farmers' Sun asking for an explanation of those figures, but I was not satisfied, so I found out where this paper was published, and I went to the editor and got from him the sources of his information, and my intention was at one time, on the basis of the figures that were put into my hands by the man who was responsible for that statement, to have those figures put on Hansard. I have them here, but since the editor of that paper and the man who is responsible for such a statement being made admitted to me that it gave an entirely wrong impression to the country, and since I am told that he admitted it later to a meeting of his own salesmen that he gathered together, I shall not go any further with the matter unless some person wishes to assume responsibility and stand behind the statement I have just quoted. In that case I shall be most happy to discuss the matter with him and show wherein the whole statement is absolutely absurd. Again I say, Mr. Speaker, that we consider we have a right when manufacturers or any other set of business men undertake to place any of the details of their business before us or give any reasons why they take the position they do, to ask that they treat us with absolute fairness and not make as was done in this one case an absolutely false, and in the other case a misleading statement.

I want now to turn my attention for a short time to the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I do not wish to accuse that hon. gentleman of making deliberate misstatements of fact. I do not wish it for a moment to be thought I am doing so, but I do wish to point out that his error in discussing his own amendment, which so far has received very little attention, was not in giving wrong facts but in dragging facts into the discussion which had absolutely no place in it, and cluttering up the records with a lot of superfluous material. You will remember that in the course of his argument, after pointing out the amount of animal and vegetable products imported into Canada for food purposes, thinking to strengthen his argument, no doubt, but as a matter of fact it only weakened it, just as any argument is weakened when unnecessary material is drawn in, he mentioned some $43,000,000 of vegetable products other than foods that were imported, and a question came from this corner of the House, what was included in that list? "I do not know", he said. Evidently he did not think it was worth his while to find out. Some suggested that it would be very desirable to find out just what was included, and on the spur of the moment I asked the hon. member if it included rubber. He did not know. Well, the force which his total had in the discussion depended very largely, if not altogether, upon the particular items which it included. I do not know whether he has since taken our advice and found out what is included in that list, but here is his opportunity.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was referring to the importations into this country of vegetable products which were foodstuffs and also animals and animal products. After having done so, I pointed out that in addition to that there was some $43,000,000 other than foodstuffs.

Mr. BROWN: That is just what I have been trying to tell the House, only the hon. member has expressed it probably more clearly than I did. My complaint is that in dragging in that $43,000,000 he was simply dragging in unessential facts. The figures that I shall give do not cover exactly the same period, but that is not a particularly important matter. They cover, however, a similar period. They cover the fiscal year that ends March, 1922, but the argument holds no matter which particular period you take. I have not all the articles that might be considered as vegetable products other than foods, but I think perhaps the list I shall give includes the principal ones, and the only point I want to make is that the figures he introduced had absolutely no bearing on the discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was referring to the increase in the importations of such commodities since the United States put their tariff as high as it is at the present time. The hon. member is undertaking to quote importations prior to the adoption of the present tariff by the United States.

Mr. BROWN: I do not see that that has any bearing on the subject at all. The same argument would apply to the present situation just as it applies to the particular period for which I have the figures. The total I have here is $64,410,281, of which alcoholic beverages accounted for $24,524,202.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is that a foodstuff?

Mr. BROWN: I do not understand the hon. gentleman. I distinctly said that I am dealing with importations other than foodstuffs, just as the hon. member said himself. Evidently the gentlemen who have compiled these figures have not adopted the theory that alcohol is a foodstuff, for they include it here. Gums and resins, $1,958,395; total oils, vegetable not for food, $5,554,180, and perhaps I might point out that under that head there is a small item of $112,369 of linseed oil that could be considered a Canadian product. The other articles included are plants, shrubs and trees, which may or may not be produced in Canada, $934,242; rubber and its products, and this was the thing I wanted to find out about; including some manufactured rubber the imports amounted to $7,142,258; seeds, $2,936,335; tobacco, $21,360,669. There are a number of smaller articles, but I have given enough to make my point. The two large items in that total are alcoholic beverages and tobacco, and I can say this to the House, that if there is any proposition to increase the duties against alcoholic liquors and tobacco, or any proposition made to curtail their use, the chief opposition is not going to come from those who sit in this corner of the House. So, when you take out those two large items, and the $7,000,000 of rubber, the $5,000,000 of vegetable oils not for food, which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) said the other night were used for making soap, we have left less than $1,000,000 for plants, shrubs and trees, and less than $3,000,000 for seeds, and these are in large measure used by farmers. So I submit that in cluttering up the record, as the hon. member did with vegetable products other than food stuffs, he was simply introducing irrelevant matters into the discussion that might very well be left out.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to direct attention to some remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). Perhaps it might seem to be unkind to him after the almost complete and utter annihilation he suffered at the hands of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) last night, even to utter another note of criticism. And yet there was one point in the hon. gentleman's speech that was not dealt with by the member for Springfield to which I would like to direct attention; that part in which he dealt with the trade of Canada with Great Britain and other countries, and with the United States. When I listened to that part of his speech it sounded to me absurd. I do not wish to use the term in an offensive way but simply as we used to use it in euclid, as something that does violence to our reason and our judgment. I read that part of his speech over a number of times, and the oftener I read it the more absurd it seemed to be. The hon. member has given evidence of his great ability in the accumulation of facts, and I am not going to dispute them, but we have to take exception to some of his conclusions. Turn to that part of his speech and you will find that he points out that for a period of fifteen years our exports to the United States were double the amount of our imports; that for the same period our exports to Great Britain and other countries were two and three times, and in some cases perhaps more, the amount of our imports; and that with respect to Great Britain and the United States there was a considerable balance in our favour. And the hon. gentleman does not seem to take any satisfaction out of this because of the fact that our bills have to be settled in New York. He asked the question: Is our policy so framed at the present time as to bring about a proper distribution of our foreign trade? That is just the trouble with protectionists. They think it is incumbent upon them to settle every little detail in foreign trade, and the trouble is when you interfere in one way you never know the effect is going to be what you expected it to be, and then you have to do something to counteract the effect of the thing you have already done. I may say this: The theory which he propounds seems to me to be preposterous, even if the argument as to the balance of trade is true—that any advantage that we may have from the fact that the balance is in our favour is offset by the fact that we have to make our payments in New York. But let me refer more particularly to what he said with respect to the exchange in New York:

> Now there is a vital significance in that fact, and that significance is apparent, for one thing, in the exchange of four per cent against the Canadian dollar in New York. It was apparent to a marked degree three years ago when the exchange stood at nineteen per cent on one occasion against our dollar. But the main point I am making is that for this period of time we have had this adverse balance of trade as regards the United States and there has been no real advantage from the favourable balance of trade in relation to Great Britain.

The hon. member has fallen into what is a very common fallacy, perhaps the most common of all fallacies, known to logicians as post hoc ergo propter hoc—after this therefore because of this. He sees two facts and he places them side by side, and then he begins to establish the relation of cause and effect between two facts that simply co-exist. That seems to be the fallacy into which protectionists have fallen or into which they have deliberately walked—either the one or the other—in discussing this question of the balance of trade in relation to foreign exchange. Ever since this question of the rate of exchange became an acute one it has been the practice for the protectionists, and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen)—unless he has been misrepresented as he generally is—to fall into the error of accrediting this variation in the rate of exchange entirely to the fact that there was an adverse balance of trade. Some of us venture modestly to suggest that there might possibly be other factors in the problem; and our complaint against the men who take this position is that they persistently ignore these other factors, because they seem to wish to make a certain situation created by the war an occasion for preaching certain economic doctrines. We modestly suggest that there may be other reasons; and it is some satisfaction, when you do not pose as a financier or economist yourself, to have opinions which you formed at the back of your head confirmed by men who are economists. So I am going to quote from a little book entitled Foreign Exchange Before, During, and After the War, by T. E. Gregory, of the London School of Economics and Political Science:

> This little book does not in any way pretend to be an exhaustive treatment of the problems of foreign exchange. Let me hasten to add that it is not incomplete in the sense that it scamps what I believe to be the real matters of principle at issue. Exchange experts at the present time divide themselves into two camps: those who think that the exchanges are dislocated because of inflation, and those who think that they are dislocated because of "an excess of imports over exports." To the inexpert reader I have hoped to make clear the underlying principles, but I should be glad if, to my colleagues of the universities, and the counting house also, my defence of the first of these schools of thought should prove of interest. Fortunately, there is less reason now to emphasize one's belief in this school than there once was.

I do not know whether he would have written that sentence if he had been in the Canadian House of Commons:

The view that the "adverse trade balance" is an effect, and not a cause, which sounded so strange a little while ago, is being accepted fairly generally at the present moment, though not always, perhaps, very consciously.

Now if we accepted the theories advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre we would expect that the exchange rates would vary just as the balance of trade was adverse or favourable. But is that what we find? We find absolutely the reverse. I have here some statistics obtained from the Bureau of Statistics covering the imports of Canada and the exports from Canada to the United States during the years 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915; and during the years since the war, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923. In giving these figures I should say that the imports include dutiable goods and free goods, and the exports are divided into Canadian produce and exports of foreign produce. But since the imports deal only with those for consumption in Canada I shall deal only with the Canadian products which were exported from this country.

	Imports	Exports
1911..	$297,824,265	$104,115,823
1912..	331,384,657	102,041,222
1913..	436,887,315	139,725,953
1914..	396,302,138	163,372,825
1915..	297,142,059	173,320,216

I want to direct attention particularly to the totals. The totals are:

$1,737,540,434	$682,576,039

The point I want to draw attention to in the totals is that during the five years before the war as I have quoted, our exports to the United States were only one-third or little better than one-third—I am not giving the absolute proportions, but a little more than one-third—of our imports at a time when the common people knew nothing about exchange, when exchange was at par and was only an academic question. That was the situation that prevailed then. Now what happened since? We will take the last five years, and I think I had better place the figures on Hansard:

[Mr. Brown.]

	Imports	Exports
1919..	$750,203,014	$454,873,170
1920..	801,097,318	464,028,183
1921..	856,176,820	542,322,967
1922..	515,958,196	292,588,643

Notice the totals again. The total imports were $3,464,425,096, as against exports of $2,122,893,181. That is, the proportions during these five years were two to three, instead of one to three as they were before. And yet we would have expected, if there was anything in the argument which that particular school advanced, that the situation would be absolutely the reverse. It is not possible for the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), or anybody else, to establish on the basis of the trade returns that relation which they seem to think exists between the balance of trade and the rate of exchange. But he says further:

Have I not just been pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that that is exactly the result that is being obtained in a natural way. Is not the effect of the depreciated currency at New York simply to curtail our purchases in New York? I had a striking example of that brought to my notice four years ago. When travelling on the train I came in contact with a business man, a westerner, going to England to buy one hundred thousand dollars' worth of jewelry, which under ordinary circumstances would have been bought in the United States; so that this matter was being reflected in the export trade to the United States, bringing about in a natural way just what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre says he wants to bring about by a tariff.

I do not presume, Mr. Speaker, to enter into a discussion of the question of the rates of exchange in all its intricacies. It is a complicated question, and so far as governing my own conduct is concerned, I would take warning by the old adage which says that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread," All I will say is that my judgment revolts from the theories propounded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, and perhaps I cannot do better than quote a remark made in the British House of Commons on December 21st, 1920:

Lieut. Col. Hurst: Of course this subject of foreign exchanges is one I know very little about, and I believe very few people do know anything about it. Indeed, I have read that only one person knows the real arcana of foreign exchanges, and he is in a lunatic asylum. The late Lord Goschen was thought to know something about it, but to the great mass of the people it is a very difficult subject indeed, and very humbly and tentatively I make the suggestion to my right hon. friend that it might be wise to appoint a small committee of experts, if any in this country, who do understand this question.

The only point I have been trying to make, in so far as I have dealt with this question of exchange rates, is that the protectionists are simply making use of the situation created by the war by laying all the emphasis upon one factor in the problem of exchange factors, to the neglect of others in order to promote their economic theory.

I will come now to the question of prosperity to which reference is made in the Speech from the Throne. I know it is possible for those on the mountain tops to get a view of the things in their proper perspective, which those who live upon the plain cannot get. Perhaps those who have drawn up the Speech from the Throne have been able to get a vision which is withheld from those who dwell on the plain, or it may be that the Prime Minister is only the servant of the prophet who was bidden to go up and look towards the sea, and who, after going seven times, came back with the welcome news that there was a cloud the size of a man's hand in the sky. If he has really seen the cloud, even if it be only the size of a man's hand, giving promise of abundance of rain, it is most welcome news. But what of the Ahabs and the Jezebels who have seduced Israel during the last forty-five years to worship at the shrines of the false gods of protection? The temper of the country would seem to be that while they will hail with delight the news of an abundance of rain, if it is really coming, there will be but little consideration given to those who have led us into the worship of these false gods during all these years.

But after all, what are the criteria of prosperity? I remember once hearing Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose name is honoured and revered in this House, giving an address in the city of Montreal. It was in the election campaign of 1896 and he was discussing the question of prosperity. He said, "When we come into power you will not need statistics to tell you that you are prosperous; the people will feel it in their pockets". It is possible to prove by statistics that there is prosperity. You can take the railway returns, the trade returns, and the annual reports of the banks, and, as I say, it is quite possible to prove from these sources that the people are prosperous. Nevertheless we know that back on the farms, in the remote regions, instead of enjoying prosperity the great masses of the people do not as a matter of fact know what their next move will be. I had intended going at some length into this matter, but you will observe on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, a resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) dealing with the question of soldier settlement. It seems to me that we are going to realize the prediction that some of us made more than four years ago, namely, that with the falling prices of farm produce there was a danger of the whole soldier settlement scheme going on the rocks. I have not seen fit to modify my view in that respect one iota. It will be a calamity if it comes, but I am afraid that such an eventuality is more imminent now than before. However, we shall discuss this matter more fully when dealing with the resolution in question. And what the soldier settlers are going through the farmers all over Canada are experiencing; at least this is true of those for whom we speak. The situation is more serious than is generally recognized by those who live in the East. I desire to conclude my remarks before the House rises at six o'clock, and consequently I cannot on this occasion go into the matter to the extent that I had intended. That the situation is serious cannot, however, be questioned. Men have seen their savings of a lifetime wiped out. It may be said that the same thing is seen in the cities. That may be true, but in the city when a man goes out of business he remains there and enters some other line of activity, whereas when a man goes out of business in the country he simply goes to swell the ranks of the unemployed in the cities.

This party of which I am a member is often looked upon as representing selfish class interests, but that is far from being the case; we have had a larger outlook than that. We have seen this tendency, and in some respects perhaps it is inevitable, emphasized undoubtedly by certain economic policies; and it has been going on for years. Let me say, without decrying the character of the people in the cities, that the whole wealth of the country is being poured into the great centres of population while there is not enough left on the farms to maintain that standard of life to which the farmers of the country are entitled equally as much as the people of the cities. This is the problem we have been endeavouring to solve, and it is a national problem, because, as the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) pointed out last night, the farm is the place from which the nation draws its life. If you go back only two or three generations you will find that the great majority of the men prominent in public life are the men who came direct from the farm. If therefore we lower the standard of public life it will be disastrous for the future. In closing let me quote the words of Sir Horace Plunkett, taken from his book. The Rural Life Problem of the United States:

> The country life movement deals with what is probably the most important problem before the English-speaking world at this time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne, this year, reminds us rightly of an improvement in our finances, of the approaching realization of the so long cherished hope of balancing our budget, and also of what we looked forward to most anxiously, true signs of a happy return to prosperity. It is a fact, Sir, that the leaders of the Liberal party took hold of the affairs of the country, in 1921, at a very critical time. Indeed, during the last years of the late administration, our country had been plunged into an abyss of debt and a sad economic plight. It was the duty of the present government to solve these difficult problems and remove the serious dangers which threatened our industrial and agricultural welfare. The views of the administration may have differed, but they showed that they had but one thought, one aim; to find the right policy which the country demanded. Faced with new problems which are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, they realized that, by discussing the subject together, not with the set idea of having their own personal views adopted, but with the patriotic object of uniting their wisdom and prudence, they might find new means of restoring the prosperity of the country. The government understood clearly that Canada had to be saved from bankruptcy, disunion and impending distress. In view of the success this government has obtained, and is obtaining, realizing that our finances are being put on a sound basis through a remarkable decrease in expenditure and the balancing of our budget for the first time since 1911, and considering that a decided improvement is being effected in the operation of the National Railways and further that a sound economic policy is prevalent throughout the service, may we not congratulate the government on the work already accomplished? For my part, I can at any time return to my county and tell my electors:

It is the Liberal party that deserves your confidence, it is that party which will restore prosperity to our country in an admirable "entente cordiale" in a pledge of the heart and soul so manifestly necessary to this country.

Among the tasks accomplished by the government, none is more to the fore than the question of immigration and repatriation. In a young country like ours, with vast stretches of farming land and with the greatest variety of natural resources, there is the need of a Minister of Immigration and Repatriation, whose entire work will consist in finding settlers and placing them on fertile lands. The government has understood the importance of this work and has created the Department of Immigration, entirely independent of the others, they have organized it with the two-fold aim of repatriation and immigration.

Much has been said in this debate, on the emigration of our people to the United States, the exodus of these numerous Canadians who are flocking to the neighbouring republic; it has been computed that 2,000,000 of our countrymen have taken up residence in the New England states. I think that it is now more than time to look after the repatriation of our people. Unemployment is, indeed, at present, being felt in certain Eastern states of the republic to the south, and, I believe that the time is ripe to give more encouragement to that policy. I am aware that the present government has created that movement. I, therefore, beg of them to still continue encouraging and supplying it with all the necessary funds so that it may expand and succeed in repatriating a greater number of our people. It would be a pleasure to me to see allotted to this branch of repatriation, a greater amount of the funds which are voted to the Department of Immigration. I think the government would be approved throughout the Dominion, if it equally encouraged repatriation and immigration. The repatriated person would prove more useful to the country than the immigrant, since he is already a citizen familiar with our habits, while, the fact of a foreigner residing in Canada does not prove him to be a Canadian. The government would, therefore, act wisely by placing repatriation and immigration on the same footing. Moreover, this work should come directly under the Minister of Immigration. However, a deputy minister should be appointed who would have full charge of the work and be the prime mover in all matters pertaining to that department. The repatriation of Canadians would thus take place on a large scale for the greatest benefit of all the provinces of the Dominion. The deputy minister would have under his supervision agents, missionaries and publicity. Already, many centres of the eastern part of the United States have been advantageously canvassed; there exists an extensive field of action, but everybody knows that this staff of agents, missionaries and advertisers is indispensable for the success of such an enterprise. It will also be necessary,—and I have no doubt that the government is well disposed in this respect,—to help in the homeward coming of these people by issuing reduced rates on railways for themselves, their family and their luggage. Where poverty exists, I even maintain that the fare should be issued gratuitously to these families, and care taken of them in the homes of settlers until they have chosen a lot where they will settle down. Briefly, I would like to see the same favours extended to repatriation as is extended, at present, to immigration.

Far be it from my thoughts, to wish to minimize in any way, the importance which we must attach in this country to the question of immigration. I had the opportunity not long ago to visit western Canada, and, I was present, in the large city of Winnipeg, at a banquet given in honour of Lord Shaw upon the occasion of his visit to this country for the Canadian Bar Conference. This distinguished English barrister made the remark that our western plains were vast but that they are not peopled and that it would evidently be in the interest of Canada to bring over a great number of immigrants who might easily be assimilated and would settle in those vast plains. I fully agree with those views, so often expressed by the public men of this country, and I think that a sound immigration policy is absolutely necessary. There is, Sir, in the Speech from the Throne, a passage which especially drew my attention. It is this:

> National unity, not less than national prosperity, depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate western from eastern Canada and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land. Foremost in this regard are the problems incidental to tariff readjustments and to the marketing of agricultural and other natural products.

The readjustment of the tariff is not a new phrase prompted by circumstances, but a plank in the Liberal party's programme, proclaimed on several occasions. The readjustment of the tariff, meaning the lowering of duties aiming at a tariff for revenue, has been the aim of the Liberal party since the convention of 1893. This object the Liberal party, on the first opportunity desired to attain at the time of the reciprocal pact of 1911 with our neighbours, and it again proclaimed it at the Liberal convention of 1919. Therefore, we, of the Liberal party, prove our consistency by adhering to this policy of the government which favours the lowering of duties in regard to instruments of production. If Laurier were still living he would gladly welcome this passage in the Speech from the Throne. But there is yet another reason for sympathizing with the downward revision of duties so greatly desired by the representatives of the western provinces, it is because, above all, we desire national unity so as to conform to the spirit of the Fathers of Confederation, our great statesmen of 1867. National unity, in this country, is not a passing fancy; it is not without importance to the sparse population inhabiting a boundless territory and geographically partitioned by physical barriers. Do you know what was the greatest concern of the Fathers of Confederation? It was national unity, Without that unity the confederation was but a myth. It was for its sake that they burdened the country, from the outset, with the great cost of the construction of the Intercolonial so as to unite the Maritime provinces to the central provinces, and, they gave away millions of dollars in land to the Canadian Pacific Railway so as to link both the western plains and British Columbia to the central provinces. With that end in view they encumbered our country with these great expenditures. To-day, in order to preserve this unity, in order to follow the traditions of the builders of this country, should we not still strive to make all possible concessions to one another so that we may agree and work together more efficiently for the prosperity and greatness of our country.

Mr. Speaker, the interests which I represent in this House—and this is one of the main reasons why I take part in this debate—oblige me to draw the government's attention to two questions of interest to my county. They are not, properly speaking, local questions, because they are of general interest. I wish, first, to broach the subject of branch lines of the National Railways. Last year, the House adopted a measure for the construction of branch lines to be added to the National Railways. Unfortunately, the Senate threw out the bill which had been submitted to parliament.

The Speech from the Throne acquaints us with the decision of the government to again submit, for the approval of parliament, this important measure. Nothing, at present, is more urgent for my county, than that proposed branch line which will connect the village of Saint-Rémi d'Amherst, in the county of Labelle, with the metropolis of Canada. There already exists a line formerly known as the Montfort railway; but this line has no direct connections with Montreal. It is therefore simply a matter of completing a line in operation, by the construction of twelve miles of railway between the historical village of Saint-Eustache and Saint-Jerome,—which would allow direct connections with Montreal—and by the construction of only two miles of railway between the present terminus—where the Canadian china clay mine is located—and the village of Saint-Rémi d'Amherst.

I do not see, Sir, the necessity of again going over the arguments which militate for the completion of this branch line. Let me only state that an entire region has been awaiting for a number of years the building of these means of communication. It is also in the interest of the management of our National Railways to immediately provide for a large source of traffic. I have no doubt that the government, during this session, will bring down this important measure, which, I hope, will be supported by the members sitting on your right, Sir, as well as those on your left. I think that we should by all possible means, adopt the necessary legislation for this branch line which, after all, consists only in works of improvement or maintenance. This branch line cannot be compared to those which require the construction of more or less extensive lines. It is simply a matter of building a few miles of railway so as to link together that region of my county with the metropolis of Canada and thereby connect it with the main lines of the national railways. I think that an undertaking of this nature, should not, this year, be exposed to undergo the treatment that was meted out last session, to the construction of new branch lines. I am therefore, confident that this question will be the object of special consideration on the part of the government and that the people from that part of my county will not be deceived in their legitimate hopes.

The other subject which interests the county of Labelle, is that of assistance, by means of subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the extension of its line between Mont Laurier and Sainte-Anne-du-Lac, a distance of twenty-seven miles. It is, in this instance, a matter of the construction of a railway by a private concern, in a territory suited to settlement. Therefore, the county of Labelle, which desires the success of this enterprise, makes an appeal similar to that of railway companies petitioning the government—either provincial or federal—to obtain assistance, thus enabling them to extend their lines and thereby contribute to the development and progress of a section of this country. The history of the growth of the district of Labelle tends to show that, within the last four years, through the endeavours and inspiration of the apostle of colonization, curé Labelle, the Laurentian region has opened wide its gates to settlers and colonization has spread as far as the valleys of the rivers Rouge, Kiamika and Lièvre. To-day, it is a vast organized territory, which has become a constituency for the province of Quebec; it has also been a judiciary district for the last ten years and a diocese has been established with an episcopal seat at Mont Laurier.

This work of settlement is, in my opinion, the most important that a government can accomplish, and, it can only materialize and be carried out by means of a railway. To the north of Mont Laurier, in the valley of the Lièvre, where are to be found the best lands which have been opened to settlers for a number of years, over a vast stretch of country, several very prosperous parishes have been established. Therefore, the construction of a railway would absolutely be necessary for the people of that region, and, also to help in the development of our great agricultural, industrial and mining resources. After all, I only request the government to kindly grant, for this railway extension, the traditional assistance given to such enterprises in settled parts. I but ask for the possible means to add this new line to so many which make up the important railway of Mont Laurier. I am aware that the whole scheme is under the absolute control of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but this control should be exercised so as to promote the interests of the region, if the governments—provincial or federal—promise the usual assistance by way of subsidies. This assistance, I am fully convinced, should be given because our public men cannot remain indifferent to the development of our country. It is the duty of those who are placed at the head of public affairs to provide against the exodus of our people by keeping on the land those whose calling is the tilling of the soil.

In closing my remarks, Sir, I have but a word to add regarding an important event which recently took place. At the beginning of this session, we witnessed a very imposing ceremony, presided over by you, Mr. Speaker, and graced by the presence of His Excellency the Governor-General and the Lady Byng of Vimy. In the hall which adorns the approach to this Chamber, the memorial of one of our predecessors Lt.-Col. Geo. Harold Baker, a colleague who fell on the battlefield, was solemnly unveiled. The heroic deeds of this elder brother were then proclaimed by you, Sir, in the lofty accents of your inspired soul and nothing remains therefore to be added to the eloquence which marked this apotheosis. This memorial will always remind us of the participation of Canada in the Great War, the bloody sacrifices and the heroism of her sons. This bronze statue erected on the threshold of the House of Commons is like a symbol, and, we trust that the soldier's uniform will henceforth stand at our door as a sacred safeguard against war.

We shall succeed in maintaining peace with the whole world through our peaceful acts and well known aims of our policy to discountenance conflicts and whatever may lead to them, as we gave proof, last year, when war was impending in the Near East. We will still thrust back this scourge of war, by adhering to the Liberal principles, which allow no authority to pledge Canada's responsibilities without the nation having had an opportunity to acquiesce or not through the authorized channel of its representatives assembled in parliament. And, in order that the work of reconstruction may be carried out on the most sound and lasting basis, we will still further remove this war possibitity by supporting the International Council of the League of Nations. I am not willing to admit that this council is so constituted as to settle all conflicts without having recourse to arms, but this tribunal is well worth the one at the Hague! Experience has not yet convinced me that this council is such as to force the nations at war to submit to its decrees; I do not much relish the indifference shown towards it by certain states at the time, for instance, of the Greco-Italian mix-up, and it is, perhaps, deserving the reproach, made, and more or less admittedly deserved, of the predominating influence of certain states in the League of Nations, to the detriment of certain other members. The Canadian nation is, perhaps, paying a high price for the privilege of being embroiled in European affairs, but I admit that the League of Nations, with the amendments which may be added to its constitution, will exert a great moral influence. And, because in this regard it is a blessing, in principle, I congratulate the government in taking part, but with certain reserves.

Before taking my seat, allow me, Sir, to congratulate the Canadian representatives for the leading part played by them at the Imperial Conference and at the meeting of the League of Nations. I, particularly, congratulate them for the noble efforts made to ameliorate Article X, efforts which had the double effect of preserving the autonomy of parliament and preserving to the League of Nations its exclusive pacific character. On several different occasions the Minister of Justice and his predecessors were the promoters of these sound principles and their action was endorsed by public opinion in this country. I, therefore, approve, in principle, the participation of our country, as a self-determined unit, in the League of Nations, with the noble idea of suppressing together with the dangers of conflicts, the ruinous expenditures of maintaining a permanent army and also with a view to making Canada appear, among the civilized nations as one of the best organized countries in regard to its industries, means of transportation and abundant natural resources which but await the necessary capital and labour to expand.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Mr. Speaker, I had decided to take no part in this debate, but owing to the fact that some remarks have been made concerning the policy of the late government with regard to the construction of a drydock at Esquimalt, and also relative to the building of some wooden barquentines at Victoria, B.C., I feel it is only fair that I should place the facts relating to these two cases before the House in as plain terms as possible.

Before proceeding to do so, however, I would congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address for the very efficient manner in which they discharged their task. Allow me also, Sir, to express my very deep regret at the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), a personal friend, and a man who has established a splendid reputation throughout the country, whose name is revered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and whose advice will be very seriously missed in this chamber. I am also sorry to notice that the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) does not occupy his seat. During his short term of office he had created a very excellent impression in our party and in the House generally, and I am sure that his absence, too, will be a distinct loss to us all.

During the course of his speech the other day the Prime Minister apparently was stung by the articles appearing in MacLean's Magazine, on Ottawa's Orgy of Extravagance, and he made an effort to hang as much blame as possible upon the late government for this alleged extravagance. Perhaps he was playing a fair game, and I do not object seriously to it, for I presume every hon. member has the right to adopt his own course in such matters, but I am sorry that one occupying his high and responsible position did not pay a little more attention to the facts before making the statements he uttered regarding the Esquimalt drydock. The writer in MacLean's, too, filled with enthusiasm, has departed from the high plane of journalism and attempted to be sensational in the hope of attracting attention. His statement regarding the Esquimalt drydock is very inaccurate indeed, and while it makes very excellent reading it suffers from one severe handicap—it is untrue. But if the story had been told plainly it would have lacked political sting, and no doubt this would have very seriously interfered with its commercial value. Had he taken the trouble, he could have found the facts within the pages of Hansard. Ananias and Baron Munchausen have probably gained a very much wider reputation for the extravagant and the marvellous in fiction than our friend of MacLean's; certainly they are notorious. We all know that Ananias' effort was rather disastrous to him. The Baron, I think, simply indulged in fantastic tales as a pastime, but not as a means of livelihood. Unfortunately such articles as have appeared in MacLean's recently in connection with the public service inflict severe injury on a great many people who have no possible opportunity of defending themselves. I am now referring particularly to those who occupy positions in the Civil Service of this country, men and women who have devoted their whole lives to the public service, who have done splendid work in their time and who have played a very important part in building up Canada. Such sensational articles convey an impression throughout the land which is very unfair to those people.

I have talked often about the Esquimalt drydock and I do not want to repeat my remarks unduly, but under the circumstances I think it is only fair to the late government, to the member for the constituency in which this drydock is situated, and to myself, that the facts should be fairly placed before the House. In the first place, no drydock is being built at Victoria, B.C., as stated by MacLean's magazine. The drydock is not in my constituency, but in that of the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie). Then again, it is not 450 feet in length, but 430 feet, and the difference is a very important item if you are trying to dock a ship which is a little longer than 430 feet. That drydock has been built for about forty years; it has rendered very excellent service, but it is too small for the mercantile and naval vessels that are being built to-day. During the war a number of warships, four during one year, had to seek dock facilities in the United States owing to the small capacity of the dockage on the Pacific coast of Canada. All that work was lost to our Canadian workmen at a time when they needed it very badly, and the American workmen benefited accordingly. It has long been recognized that larger drydock facilities are necessary there. A site was purchased at Esquimalt in either 1913 or 1914, at a place called Lang's Cove. This was at least three years before I entered public life, so that the statement made in MacLean's magazine and the inference thrown out by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the course of his remarks the other day, that the Esquimalt drydock was built for the purpose of electing Dr. Tolmie on the occasion of the by-election in 1919, are hardly correct. I was not connected with the project in any way, directly or indirectly, at the time the site was purchased, and I have not since then been connected with it in any way except as representative of the city of Victoria.

Yarrows Limited, the great Glasgow shipbuilding firm, decided to locate a branch plant somewhere on the Pacific coast, and after making a very careful survey of the whole of that area, both on the American side and on the Canadian side, they decided that Esquimalt was the best place to put their plant. During the war no efforts were made to carry on construction of this dock, as might reasonably have been expected; we had other more important things to take care of. But at the conclusion of the war strong pressure was brought to bear in the matter and every effort was made to have the work carried on to a conclusion The Hon. Mr. Carvell, then Minister of Public Works, announced on June 27th, 1919, that the dock would be constructed. Shortly after that, very early in July, boring operations were commenced at Lang's Cove under the supervision of the Department of Public Works, with a view to the securing of such information as would be necessary in preparing the specifications. Early in July $500,000 were voted for the purpose of commencing the work. At that particular time I had no intimation whatever that I would be offered the position of Minister of Agriculture. Some time after that, upon my return to the coast, I was offered the position, and I accepted it, and remained in the office for a period of two years. I want to say right here that so far as the drydock is concerned my acceptance or otherwise of the position would have made no difference whatever, because we felt that the drydock was a necessity and we certainly should have continued to press for its immediate construction, particularly in view of Mr. Carvell's statement that the work would proceed.

A very important ship repairing business has already been established at Esquimalt. The commerce on the Pacific has increased by leaps and bounds. The traffic over to Australia and to Asiatic ports has increased very largely during the last ten or fifteen years. Apparently this fact has not been appreciated by those who are criticising the construction of this dock. Numbers of vessels are now traversing the Pacific of a burthen of 20,000 tons, and large vessels are becoming more numerous in proportion to the small ones, so that a small drydock is of no use for their accommodation. The development of the wheat business through the port of Vancouver has been tremendous. Just the other day when I left Vancouver on my way to the opening of the House there were no less than forty-four vessels lying in the stream at the port of Vancouver waiting for cargo, these ships having a capacity of over eight or ten thousand tons each.

Mr. JACOBS: May I ask whether any of the Canadian merchant marine were awaiting there?

Mr. TOLMIE: I did not stop to examine their teeth. There was also a tremendous growth in the United States shipping from all the ports from Seattle down to San Francisco and further south. To give you an idea of the importance of the establishment of Yarrows at Esquimalt, let me say that during the twelve months ending March 1st, 1924, 111 ships were repaired by them, having an aggregate tonnage of some 280,000. Twenty-five vessels occupied the dock, one of them for a period of two months, indicating that a large trade has already been built up at that point. Other vessels were turned away because the present dockage facilities are far too small for their accommodation. This trade is a very important one. I recall that during the war one ship occupied the drydock at Esquimalt for a period of five months, the bill for repairs on which amounted to nearly half a million dollars. Only Canadian workmen were used in that work. In the case of crippled ships it is necessary to have dockage at a very convenient point, and Esquimalt is particularly well suited for this purpose.

To give you an idea of how our live American friends are taking care of the dock situation, I may point out that there are no less than sixteen floating and graving docks between Seattle and San Francisco as compared with our two docks in use at present and two on the British Columbia coast under construction. Is it not better to be able to provide the accommodation for these vessels so that the work on British and Canadian vessels may be done on the Canadian side by Canadian workmen? The late government deserve very great credit for their far-sightedness in commencing the construction of proper docking facilities at the port of Esquimalt.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), when in opposition, objected very seriously indeed to the building of the Ballantyne pier at Vancouver, stating that it was an extravagant expenditure, that it was quite unnecessary, and that it would not be occupied for years. What is the situation now? The whole of the accommodation is taken up. This Ballantyne pier is rendering very valuable service, and I am quite sure that the Minister of Justice has seen the error that he made, and particularly at the time he had the honour of opening that pier amidst the popping of champagne corks. In fact my Liberal friends have always been rather slow to appreciate the great development on the Pacific coast. They object to the construction of the Esquimalt drydock, which I think I shall prove in a few moments to your entire satisfaction is a very timely piece of work indeed.

They have objected very sterenuously to the building of the Ballantyne pier. They even objected to the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway and some of their leaders of that day got up in the House and said: "This line will never earn its axle grease. Where is it going? It is only going to British Columbia, where there is nothing but a sea of mountains." In spite of those statements, and in spite of the fact that the country has been handicapped by Liberal governments since that time, the Canadian Pacific has made good and to-day it is one of the greatest transportation organizations in the world. However, as we say in the racing game, the Liberals are only riding to form in connection with the Esquimalt drydock when they object to its construction. I want to predict to my Liberal friends that before very many years it will be found that the dockage facilities on the Pacific coast are inadequate. If the increase in shipping proceeds at the rate at which it is going at the present time, I am quite sure we will not have to wait very long for that day.

Our friend the correspondent for MacLean's Magazine also takes violent objection to the location of this dock. Now, while it has always been recognized that he possessed a good deal of ability as a correspondent, I have never been informed that his services have been in demand as an expert on the location of drydocks. As a matter of fact, Esquimalt is very well located for drydock purposes. Situated on the Straits of Juan de Fuca, fifty miles from the Pacific on that arm of the sea through which every ship bound for southern British Columbia ports and for Puget Sound ports in the state of Washington must pass within a distance of twenty miles, this port is almost fog-free during the whole year, so that it is readily accessible at all times. The rainfall is very light indeed. The temperature at that port will run probably about 42 in winter time and about 60 in summer, with about five-and-a-half or six hours sunshine daily, on the average, throughout the year, enabling the workmen to work outside on these ships without the least inconvenience and without any artificial heating such as is necessary in eastern yards.

Situated from the Columbia river north to about the middle of the west coast of Vancouver Island, and covering the entrance to the Straits of Juan de Fuca, is what is known as the Graveyard of the Pacific. There is a tremendous current that sets in from the Pacific ocean to that coast. This current varies a great deal, and sometimes it attains a speed of five miles an hour. In thick weather vessels attempting to make these straits are affected by this current and frequently carried to the Vancouver Island coast and wrecked. I think I am safe in saying that more wrecks have occurred in that particular neighbourhood from the Columbia river north to the point I have mentioned than on any other part of the Pacific coast. Esquimalt is situated about eighty or ninety miles closer than any other drydock on the Canadian or American mainland, so the drydock is very conveniently situated for the ships in the event of their getting into trouble.

Esquimalt has long been recognized as a very central point. In very early days when the Hudson's Bay Company decided to locate in southern British Columbia and give up the territory lying north of the Columbia river to the Straits of Juan de Fuca, they had the selection of all the ports in western Canada, but they decided to establish one of their principal ports at Victoria and Esquimalt. Then when the British navy was looking for a location on the Pacific coast, after giving the place a thorough looking over, they also decided on Esquimalt as the most appropriate place for a naval station. Then Yarrows, Limited, one of the largest shipbuilding firms in the world, located there, and to give you an idea of the size of that firm, in four years of the war they constructed no less than 58 war vessels, all of which were put into commission and stayed on top of the water, which is quite a different record to that made by some other shipbuilding concerns during the war. There can be no question, I think, as to whose argument should be accepted in favour of the location of this particular drydock, either the experts of Yarrows, Limited, engineers of long experience and specialists in that particular line, or the correspondent for MacLean's Magazine.

There has been an attempt made, I am sorry to say, by some members of the government during their meanderings over the western provinces last summer to make political capital out of the building of this drydock. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at Victoria had no criticisms to offer of this drydock at all. In a very pleasant way, and with a bland smile, he said there should be unity in Canada, that we should travel together shoulder to shoulder to make this a great country, that there should be no Easterners and no Westerners, no French-speaking and no English-speaking, but all one for the unity of Canada and for the building up of this country. This was all very excellent sentiment, but the good people of Victoria were impressed with his inconsistency. They could not understand how he would preach unity at the Pacific coast without preaching it in his own native province of Quebec, particularly, say, during the election of 1921. They could not understand why he with his associates during the election in Kent had preached anything but unity, in fact, why they had made efforts, to create racial prejudice for the purpose of getting votes. But when the Minister of Justice reached the prairies about a thousand miles from the sea, where the ozone from the Pacific did not permeate his nostrils any more, where the people did not know much about drydocks, and where he thought he was absolutely safe, his bland smile faded and with an indignant snort he announced that the previous government had built the drydock at Esquimalt for the purpose of electing Doctor Tolmie. He knew much better because he sat in the House here at the time this whole matter was discussed. But here was an opportunity, when he was safely away from the sea, and where nobody knew much about drydocks, where it would be difficult even to find a man who knew a drydock was something to put a ship into or to tie it up to, to make such statements. He saw a chance there to attack the drydock and the previous government and he could not resist the opportunity.

The right hon. the Prime Minister, speaking in this debate, made statements that I was very sorry to see him make. I was sorry that he did not obtain as full information as possible before he touched upon this subject. A private member on the government or the opposition side can take a chance occasionally, but we look to ministers of the Crown to set an example to the whole House. Let us return to the days of the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a man whose name was respected from one end of this country to the other, a man whose ability was recognized and whose honesty of purpose was never doubted, a man who filled his position with dignity and who hesitated to make an inaccurate statement, a man who was fair in debate and who encouraged his associates to follow his example—compare this, if comparison is possible, with the example set by the two hon. members to whom I have just referred. Further, when we take into consideration the history of broken pledges, when we take into consideration the history of misrepresentations that have been going on since 1921, we must realize how the mighty have fallen and how a once great party in Canada has degenerated. On coming into power in 1921 the present government stopped the operations at Esquimalt for a period of several months. This incurred heavy damages from the contractors, and it is generally accepted at the coast that it was entirely unnecessary. Everyone knows that with the efficient Public Works department in operation, with their engineers actually on the ground watching every move of the contractors, that any information regarding the construction of the work could have been obtained within a few hours and this serious delay—throwing a large number of working people out of work and at the same time incurring a very heavy extra expenditure—would have been unnecessary. I want to say that the Minister of Public Works, in contrast to his colleagues and with a more particular knowledge of conditions on the Pacific coast, was manly enough to state that this dock was not only a good work but should have been commenced in 1912. Therefore I appreciate the action he took in this connection. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the drydock situation. I want to close by stating frankly that we have not got any more dock accommodation on the Pacific coast than is going to be necessary, and I think the late government deserves great credit for their foresight in being able to look into the future, the same as Yarrows Limited, and taking measures to promote the great prosperity of the Coast.

The Minister of Justice in his speech on March 14, referred to the construction of four wooden barquentines in the city of Vancouver, and pointed to the gross extravagance of the late government in building these ships. Here again one is struck with the partial statement of facts. I am prepared to tell the story clearly and fully to this House and through this House to the people of Canada and let the case stand on its merits. In the first place the contract for these ships was not let in 1919, as stated by the Minister of Justice, but on March 16, 1920. He did not say a word about the desperate unemployment conditions that existed at the Pacific coast at that time. These ships were primarily constructed to meet that very serious situation which existed in British Columbia during 1919 and 1920. It will be remembered that when demobilization took place the returned soldiers were offered a chance to demobilize in any part of the country they wished. The result was that a very large number went out to the Pacific coast and were demobilized there. In consequence there were thousands of returned men on the Pacific coast, many thousands more than had enlisted in the province. greatly increasing the unemployment situation. The lumbermen of British Columbia, noticing the success of lumber carrying in wooden sailing ships, had long argued that if sailing ships were available they could convey lumber from British Columbia to distant ports of the world at very small expense. In the case of one of these barquentines such as was built at Victoria the crew numbered only fifteen or sixteen men, the carrying capacity would be around 2,000,000 feet of lumber, and, without any fuel being necessary, the transportation of lumber was done at the lowest possible cost, providing a reasonable trip was made. On looking round for some means of employment for the returned soldiers out of work it was decided that wooden ship construction offered the very best opportunities to provide the most work for the greatest number of men. In the first place work would be necessary in the woods in getting out the logs. Then it would be necessary to transport these logs to the sawmill, where work was provided for the men in the cutting up of the logs. Then followed the transfer of the cut timber to the ship yards where the returned men could take part in the building of the ships. So there was no other particular line of work offered as much opportunity for employment as the construction of the wooden ship at that time. Strong pressure was brought to bear on the government by returned men and others at that period, and finally a delegation consisting of returned men, labour representatives, and merchants, headed by the mayor of the city of Victoria, came here in December, 1919, and urged the government to undertake the construction of these ships. The government refused to build ships on their own account, but after a while a compromise was reached whereby a company was to be created in the city of Victoria. They were to subscribe a certain amount of the money, and the government was to advance the balance needed for the construction of each vessel at 6 per cent interest, and to have a first mortgage on the finished ship. Some six hundred of Victoria's citizens co-operated with a view of helping out the situation and doing something towards getting the returned men re-established. In the contract a clause was inserted making it necessary to employ not less than 60 per cent of returned men, and every man was to be hired through the government labour bureau. Due to the men being new at the work—many of them having had no previous experience in ship building—and also due to a lack of capital, the project did not turn out successfully, with the result that only one ship was finished. She turned out very well and conveyed several cargoes of lumber to the distant ports of the world. Finally the ship got into a very severe hurricane in the southern seas, had to put into the port of Honolulu for repairs, and on her return to Victoria was disposed of by the government. The other ships were partially finished, the hull of one being about half done, another one fairly well advanced, and the keel of the third one, I think laid. When this government came into power it required from December, 1921, to October 3, 1923, to wind up the affairs of this company, almost two years. During this period there was a very serious loss incurred from the deterioration of material of various kinds but had this matter been handled in a more businesslike manner by the Minister of Justice, who was then Minister of Marine, many thousands of dollars would have been saved. I may say that the shareholders lost all their money in connection with this venture. There were several organizations, such as returned soldiers' bodies, that offered to take hold of these yards, but no bargain could be made with them. The Minister of Justice quoted a letter from Mr. Ballantyne addressed to me in which it was stated that he would take no interest in the construction of these ships. Let me say that during the whole period of the construction of the vessels the work was carried on under the supervision of the Department of Marine, Mr. Ballantyne's department, which maintained a man on the ground to supervise the work.

Let me point out too, Mr. Speaker, that the present Labour government in Great Britain to meet the existing labour situation there which is aggravated, but which is no
9 p.m. worse than the situation on the Pacific coast at the time I mention, have recently let a contract for the building of five cruisers. The British government do not really need the vessels, they are building them simply to meet the existing situation. I claim that the late government in Canada followed the only course it was possible to follow in the construction of these wooden barquentines and in undertaking other work on the Pacific coast to provide for the unemployment, and that this was ten times better than the adoption of the dole system which has very bad results on our working people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no further remarks to make in this connection. I only hope that I have made my explanations concerning these two ventures very clear to the House.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): It has been gratifying to me, Sir, and to some of us in this part of the House, that the present debate has turned almost entirely on the tariff question. Old political prophets such as Cartwright and Blake foresaw this day. They knew it had to come. They said it would take more than a generation for the people of this country to wake up to the position they were placed in by the Old National Policy. It has taken more than a generation, but the day has come, and this question has got to be settled first. The trade penalty known as the tariff, is a tax that must be paid by a class who receive no benefit from it. In the case of Canada it is chiefly the farmer who pays because he is not able to pass on the unjust charge to any other class, and he can no longer bear the burden. Every advocate of trade penalties in this House during this debate has drawn an awful picture of what is going to happen to Canada if the tariff is abolished or even lowered. But they have not even deigned to notice the state of agriculture as it is to-day. That state has been brought about by the tariff during the years since the National Policy was first inaugurated. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has stated that the reference to the tariff in the Speech is like the sword of Damocles hanging by a single thread, a slender thread, over the heads of the manufacturers. He declares that they cannot purchase their raw material without a proper interpretation of what this means. The inference is that they must have a privilege maintained or go out of business. But one thing which has appeared very striking to me, Sir, during the whole of this debate, is that those who have taken part in this discussion and advocate protection, look upon it, not as a concession, but as an inherent right. But there has never been anything in this House before that has so nonplussed the manufacturers as the inference in the Speech from the Throne that the Liberal party is coming back to its own platform. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) indulges in his usual accusation of the density of mind of myself and my colleagues here, and indeed he almost despairs of penetrating that density in his plea for the manufacturers, in propounding the old joke of a home market. To me, Sir, the incongruity would seem to be that the hon. member is trying to elucidate a theory which the Romans four thousand years ago found to be a fallacy. That was when for a time the slave dealers of that period were successful in getting the ear of their government. The hon. member says at page 304 of Hansard—

> I must be most weak in placing my argument if I cannot make myself clearly understood.

I wish to inform the hon. gentleman, since it is evident he does not know, that there is no logical argument for class privilege, or as he would call it protection. At best it is an imposition, it is a trade penalty, and in the end is bound to prove a boomerang even to those for whose benefit it was first inaugurated. Even on the hon. gentleman's own admission, which I do not admit myself, the woollen industry is in a serious condition, a most hopeless condition, after enjoying for 40 years this privilege of extracting from the home consumer at least one-third of their income, for which they have given nothing in return. No one can deny that the consumers of this country have paid one-third more for their woollen goods than they could have been bought for in the markets of the world. According to reports the Canadian Manufacturers' Association held a meeting at Hamilton on January 24th. It was devoted almost entirely to the tariff. Since then, I believe, they have been presenting demands to the government here for increased import penalties. Now, the manufacturers have had protection since 1879, and since that time they have obtained privileges such as the manufacturers in other countries never dreamed of. They pleaded then for privileges because they were infant industries. They have abused these privileges. They have destroyed their own market. And now, like the dope fiend, they come back for more of the stuff that has brought them to this state of imbecility. The report of the special committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association on taxation is perhaps the most illogical product of biased minds imaginable; and the resolution previously passed, and again reaffirmed at that meeting is almost ridiculous, to say the least, as it declares that the adoption of a stable and sound fiscal policy based on an adequate customs tariff will bind together more firmly the provinces of Canada in national unity. The report declares that this policy will attract capital, commercialize our natural resources, strengthen existing industries, and create new industries: raise revenue, encourage immigration, provide employment, increase traffic for the railways and for our national ports, lower freight rates and make farming profitable, create new markets abroad and facilitate profitable bargaining by means of tariffs with other countries. Well, everybody is to be made rich and happy. Producers and consumers alike are to be benefited simply by the process of reducing imports or prohibiting imports, the government is to reap an increased revenue from a diminished source—most remarkable. A protective tariff cannot benefit every citizen alike. If it did it would not be protection at all. And the fact that Canadian manufacturers have benefited is because they have charged an unjust price, a price not based at all on competition for their goods which the home consumer must pay Without going into the whole question and answering all the statements in that resolution, I want to say that protection does not increase employment and importation does not lessen it. Why? Because all imports must be paid for by exports.

In this connection, I was surprised to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) declaim against the evil of spending $1.50 in the United States for every dollar they buy from us. This is an old argument, and to some extent in the past our people have believed that an evil did exist in the fact. But what are the real facts? The protectionist is equally averse to the importation of goods from Great Britain even though Great Britain buys a great deal more from us than we do from her. The United States does not want our wheat, which forms the bulk of our exports to England; and when trade is free as it is in Britain, Britain cares not whether she pays for that wheat by goods shipped to Canada, to the United States, to Brazil or to any other country. Indeed, Sir, what a ridiculous argument it would be for a British statesman to tell his people that they should do without Canadian wheat unless Canada bought the equivalent in British manufactured goods. In that case what would be the condition of agriculture in Canada?

Last year my friends to the right were very emphatic in the prophecy that Britain was going to adopt protection. The leader of the opposition in his speech on the present occasion however, did not once refer to the cause of the defeat of the Baldwin government. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association today are parading the bogey of depreciated currency and the cheap labour of the war-impoverished nations of Europe. Well, they are just as much alarmed at the competition of a rich nation with dear labour as they are of the impoverished nations of Europe. The United States currency is not depreciated; yet hon. gentlemen are as much afraid of the United States, the richest nation in the world, as they are of the poorest countries across the sea. The hallucinations of the protectionist mind have always been to me a strange enigma; the protectionists see danger in everything. The truth of the matter is that our tariff-fed industrialists in this country have never yet found their place in the industrial world, and after fifty years of protection, which has improverished the basic industry of the country, we find the Canadian manufacturers coming to the government for increased protection. They are still the whining vagrants of the nation.

Let us look for a moment at the argument in regard to the depreciated currency, or, as they like to call it, "the invisible bonus." They say that the franc, which is normally worth about 19 cents, is now worth only 5 cents, and the inference is that the dollar has a purchasing power in France equal to these depreciations; that is to say, that 5 cents will now buy what previously cost 19 cents. According to that argument, then, in Germany 1 cent ought to buy several dollars' worth of goods. Let us take the case of the franc, for example. If five pairs of boots can be purchased in France for 125 francs and the same number of francs converted into Canadian money will buy only two pairs of boots, then France will export boots to Canada, because the exporter will have to sell only two pairs of boots to get as much money as for five pairs at home. But if prices should rise in France, as they have done, and 125 francs there will buy only two pairs instead of five, then their export business in boots is bound to fall because it can be carried on only at a loss. And the figures taken from the trade returns have proved this to be the fact. In the case of Germany, in the year ending March, 1914, we imported from that country over three and a half times more than we sold her; in other words we imported $14,586,223 while we sold her only $4,049,019; and in 1922 we sold her over twice as much as she bought from us. So that the statement of the Canadian manufacturers in this regard is just another misrepresentation; we are actually selling to Germany twice as much as we are buying. In the case of Italy, where also the currency is depreciated, we are selling them over twelve times as much as we are buying from them. The question then is, how are they paying for the goods? They are paying us by creating credit somewhere else. This credit, in the case of Italy, is created mostly in the United States, and the United States ships goods to us to liquidate the debt. This, no doubt, accounts for the heavy imports from the nation to the south of us, and this fact would surely go to show that rather than increase our tariff against Uncle Sam we should cultivate closer trade relations with this rich uncle.

In the same statement referred to, the Canadian manufacturers say that adequate protection will bind together the provinces of Canada in national unity. This is perhaps the most remarkable utterance of a biased, prejudiced mind that I have ever heard. What is the cause of the present discontent either in the Maritime provinces or in the West if it is not that iniquitous trade-prevention law of privilege known as the tariff? Does any man expect that unity can be brought about by giving to one class the privilege of exploiting another, thereby depriving them of even their very rights as citizens? It is simply economic madness to suggest that a feeling of unity can be promoted by any other means than placing all the people on a footing of equality. All political unions are based on economic equality; and if ever true peace is to be established among the nations of the world by the League of Nations it will have to be on such a basis. If ever a British commonwealth is created of Britain and the overseas dominions it will be based on a free trade policy acceptable to all the nations concerned. I think the demand of the delegates at the Imperial Conference last year for a preference on the products of the dominions was foolish, and it was both unjust and unfair to Britain. I cannot help thinking that the demand is bred of the same greedy callousness which characterizes that class in this Dominion which has walked roughshod over the rights of our people. They thought to bring the British under the same yoke, but Britons would have none of it. The demand may simply be termed the selfish whine of a set of petulant children to the mother who nurtured them, rather than the dignified deliberations of loyal, patriotic statesmen from countries seeking nationhood. They could with some consistency advocate a preference for their products in the British market did we and the other dominions admit British goods on the same basis as Britain admits ours.

England has had a free trade policy since 1846, and under that policy she has accumulated great wealth. It was that policy which enabled her to come successfully through the most exhausting struggle that any country ever waged for its national existence. It was that policy which also enabled her to advance over two billion pounds to her Allies. Later we find Great Britain the only country to whom credits for over one billion pounds were extended by that great protectionist country, the United States of America. Free trade Britain has restored her financial credit, while every protectionist country in Europe has its currency and its financial credit hopelessly impaired.

What shall we say then of our selfish policy in face of all these facts? And why do our manufacturers need a preference in the British market? I have here a cutting from the Commercial Intelligence Journal, of April 15, 1922, which informs me that 480 Canadian firms have agents in the United Kingdom, these firms dealing in goods all the way from agricultural implements, foodstuffs, household utensils, domestic woodenware, chemicals and tools of all kinds, to articles used in the cotton and woollen mills. Will the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) say that our tariff helps our manufacturers to export to European countries? Does Britain give them a preference on the goods mentioned, or how is it that they can compete in the British market when they whine for a protective tariff at home?

I also find in the last number of the same journal a statement from Mr. Beddoe, our trade commissioner at Auckland, New Zealand, showing that in 1923 New Zealand imported 12,359 motor cars, of which 7,380, or nearly two-thirds, worth £966,384, came from Canada. Do the Canadian manufacturers enjoy protection in the New Zealand market for motor cars? If not, what is the inference? Do they export automobiles to New Zealand and charge to the home consumer a price that will assure them a profit on all their export trade? Do they need it? Canada sent to New Zealand 925 motor lorries and motor busses during 1923, of a value of over $4,000,000, while the United States sent only 437, and Britain a still lower number, merely 217. So we find our manufacturers are quite capable of competing against all comers in every country in the world except their own. Perhaps the member for St. Lawrence-St. George, or the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) can explain why our manufacturers need tariff protection with respect to the home consumer. Either they can compete in the markets of the world without a preference, or else—if we admit their professed helplessness—they are dumping goods in Britain at a price below cost and are charging the loss to the home consumer—something which the tariff enables them to do.

Indeed, Sir, the farmer has been placed in this position with regard to his own products for many years, and it is well known to-day that flour manufactured from our own wheat can be dumped into the countries of Europe at a price below the cost of production, and that the home consumer is charged a price for his flour to ensure a profit over the whole transaction. The farmer of the West to-day is placed in that position. I know there is seldom any relation between the price at home of unmilled grain and the flour milled from it.

The finished product at the point of production is as dear as, or dearer than it is in the countries to which our wheat is exported. This is one instance, surely, of how the tariff hurts the home producer. The farmer has to sell his products in competition with the products of mills in all parts of the world, he has to compete with the cheap labour of the whole world, and not once have I ever known the price of any commodity in this country at the local points higher than the world's prices. But we are quite willing to compete against them on any fair basis. But the time is come when the agriculturist must have freedom in buying as well as in selling. The duty on instruments of production is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne as being about to be reduced. But it will make little difference even if they are placed on the free list unless they are withdrawn from the application of the dumping clause. The words "fair value for home consumption" are no longer impartially interpreted; they are interpreted according to who the importer happens to be. It is not the business of any government to discriminate between one citizen and another; the laws of the country should be the same for all. I say these words are interpreted according to who the importer happens to be, and no co-operative concern can buy for co-operative distribution anywhere in Canada. They cannot get their supplies without being penalized under the anti-dumping clause. If anything is done at this session to lighten the load which at present bears upon the farmer of this country, it should be to abolish the anti-dumping clause. Of course if anything worth while is done it will be a general cut on the whole list so that the cost of living may be brought down to a lower level. But the anti-dumping clause as it stands to-day and as it is being applied to-day is the one thing that stands in the way of any co-operative effort of the people themselves to lower the cost of living.

The agriculturist has borne pretty well the whole burden. I fancy I can hear hon. gentlemen say that if we abolish the anti-dumping clause we shall be overwhelmed with goods from Germany, from the United States, and perhaps from some other countries. I want to tell this House that the agriculturists of this country can stand a good deal of dumping at the present time. People on the farms to-day are short of every commodity they need, but the distributing combine, which, according to the president of the Canadian Manaufacturers' Association, is sixty per cent too great in number, is so completely organized so far as this anti-dumping provision is concerned that they have got the prices too high to permit our people to purchase the goods they need, even after marketing the biggest crop in the history of this country. Our purchasing power has been destroyed through the operation of the anti-dumping clause and this condition will prevail as long as certain interests are protected by these measures. We sell our produce in line with the world's prices, after having to raise it under these conditions.

Coming to a remark made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) regarding the percentages of increases of our products, and of our commodities. I wish to correct him in one or two particulars. He says that the price of one or two of our chief products increased in 1923 over the 1913 price by 51 per cent. It is not so. Taking his own figures which he himself gives, the increase works out at 28 per cent, and not at 51 per cent as stated by him. The hon. gentleman may not have meant to create that impression, but an error of 23 per cent is rather too much to go uncorrected. Then again, on four of our chief products he says there is an increase of 44 per cent. Again taking his own figures, we find that the increase is not 44 per cent but 35 per cent. I am referring to the figures he gave as found on page 311 of Hansard.

Although there are hard times in Canada to-day, I am not one of those who would write "Ichabod" over the portals of this nation. But I do want to give notice to some of those who are responsible for the policy of this country. financial and industrial, and who are responsible for the present conditions of life on the farms as well as in the centres of industry, that they have no right to saddle themselves on the backs of the workers, whether farmers or labourers. This nation needs a whole course of civic and national instruction, but at present it seems that our schools and colleges are muzzled by privilege. Our moneyed magnates and industrial kings are simply goading men into rebellion, and they have these measures to protect them. Let us treat men as men, and a display of the militia with their bayonets and rifles will not be needed to preserve order The working man of this nation, whether the farmer or the labourer, must be given his share, he must have his rights recognized. And when men are given their rights they willingly assume the responsibilities of citizenship. To this end the cost of living must be no longer burdened with trade penalties, and the efforts and enterprises of the people individual and co-operative, must not be held down by any class privilege.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I shall receive the gratitude of my associates—of my word weary associates, I might say—when I announce that I am not going to say a word about the tariff. It is a great temptation, I admit, but I have steeled my heart and my conscience and I am not going to say a word more about it I only want to speak for a few minutes about some remarks that fell from the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). He reproached the cabinet benches, more particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I think, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), warning them that whatever we might expect from the common herd of members, at least from the cabinet, from men of their position, we expected a measure of fairness and truth in their pronouncements. Surely that was a very modest statement, I hope, Sir; the standard of our Canadian statesmanship as exemplified by ordinary common members is not so low as to cause us not to expect some measure of fairness and truth even from the common herd. However, he confines it entirely to the demand that those on the front government benches shall have some measure of truth and fairness in their utterances. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if that is also extended to ex-cabinet ministers? I recall some months ago an ex-cabinet minister coming—shall I say, returning?—to British Columbia, after a careful and no doubt thoughtful and thorough survey of the political conditions of Canada, and, like all politicians, when he came home he told us what his reasoned judgment was as to those conditions. He told us that in the election, which he said was imminent, Quebec was going to return a large number of Conservatives. He told us that Nova Scotia, as evidenced by the recent by-elections there, would be probably solid Conservative. Ontario was going to tell the same glad tale, but it was when he came to the prairies that his enthusiasm fairly boiled over; he said that the Progressive party was breaking up and flocking in large numbers to the Conservative standard. I cannot imitate to the full the beauty of his language, but it gave the impression of a mighty ice-bound river breaking up and the people who had been caught on the ice making all possible attempts to reach the haven of rescue which he described as being within the Conservative party. He gave us the impression that it would be like the children of Israel who, after they had been bitten by serpents, had only to look to the brazen serpent to their right and all would be well. Curiously enough he did not tell us anything about what was going to happen in British Columbia, because we might know what is going to happen there. It is noble to seek truth, Mr. Speaker; it is beautiful to find it, is it not?

Before I pass on to what I really want to speak about, and that is the drydock, I would like to say a few words about the question of wooden ships or ships of any kind that were built during the war in Victoria. I am sorry that any man from British Columbia has raised that question here to-night, for it is one that none of us who know the circumstances can recall with anything but reproach. I know something, a very little, of the way those ships were built, and what I do know gives part of the reason why we are paying such enormous taxes to-day. Graft was rampant in every detail in the manner in which they were built. I had a friend who went there to work. He was a carpenter, employed in putting in panels, and he wanted to hold his job. Poor foolish man, he thought that working was a necessity to hold his job, and he started to put in his best licks. Along about eleven o'clock the straw boss came along and asked, "How many panels have you put in?" He spoke harshly, and the carpenter thought he was finding fault. "I have only put in five," he said, "but I guess I can put in another before noon, and once I get in my stride I will do better than that." "Good Lord, man" was the reply, "do you know what is a day's work here on these panels? Five panels is a day's work, and don't you put in another panel to-day." That is an absolute fact, recorded by a man who was there. Another man told me that his greatest difficulty was to keep out of sight. That was all he was asked to do. He registered when he went in and again when he came out, and all he had to do in the meantime was to keep out of sight. Those are facts perfectly well known on the Pacific coast, and it ill becomes any man from British Columbia to talk about the scandal connected with the building of ships in Victoria. I would not have mentioned this if it had not been forced upon me.

My hon. friend began his remarks, very much to my surprise, by a criticism of the articles appearing in MacLean's Magazine. I was very much surprised because I thought the general trend of those articles was distinctly favourable to the party of my hon. friend. If I recall correctly the very first article ended with a recommendation to turn the present government out of power. You would think that was more or less of a partisan statement, and I think the trend all through has been somewhat similar. Now my hon. friend finds fault with these articles and with the man who wrote them, but his views are not shared by the remainder of his party. In MacLean's Magazine of March 1st I find two pages of eulogies from various prominent statesmen, politicians and newspapers. One is from Mr. George B. Jones, M.P. who writes, "I feel sure the criticism will do good, and we do know that it is truthful." Then we have Senator Gideon D. Robertson giving the articles his blessing. We find also the Hon. H. H. Stevens, of Vancouver, giving them his blessing. How are the mighty fallen from their seats! There is also a whole page of eulogies from newspapers. I do not know them all, but the British Columbia ones which I do know, are distincly Conservative in their attitude, so my friend in finding fault with the writer is going contrary to the traditions of his party, which is generally all to stick together.

He has told us a great deal about the need of a drydock. He told us how a certain portion of the Pacific ocean is known as the graveyard of the Pacific, and he drew some kind of analogy that the one needed the other, But you do not need drydocks to rescue ships, not at all. After a boat has gone on that west coast there is very little hope for it. If it is pulled off it will be pulled off by a wrecking crew and a ship adapted for that purpose. It would be towed to the drydock; you could not tow the drydock to the ship. So all this talk about the west coast and the graveyard of the Pacific has nothing at all to do with the point. I failed to hear, but that might have been my misfortune, two years ago and again last year when I was in this House beseeching the Minister of Marine to take the necessary steps for properly safeguarding that graveyard—I failed to find my hon. friend with all his local knowledge and with his position as an ex-cabinet minister lending the weight of his great influence to my representations. But to the honour of the minister those improvements were for the most part put in order, and to that it can be ascribed that there have been very few wrecks there since then. One small addition alone, that of the direction-finding machine at Pachena, has been the means of saving several ships this winter. In the month of December alone they had seven hundred calls, which they answered. Of course, many of them were from ships just testing their position, but in many cases this improvement has saved valuable ships from going on the rocks, and that is far more use than this drydock after you have got it on the rocks.

But the point made by my hon. friend was that the Prime Minister in his opening speech made the statement that this drydock was built to elect the hon. gentleman. The Prime Minister did not tell us it was not a drydock or should not be a drydock, he said the drydock was built to elect the ex-Minister of Agriculture, and I will endeavour to show how much of that is true. By the way, in his closing remarks the hon. member said that this drydock was going to be necessary. There are a lot of things going to be necessary, but we do not spend five millions on them before they do become necessary.

The Prime Minister said that the drydock was built to elect the hon. member. Victoria, I am sorry to say, although I am not a native of that city, has always been a city that was peculiarly susceptible to invitations, we will call it, of that character. It always needed a hand-out in plain English. That is one of the reasons perhaps we find that the representation in parliament from rural constituencies is—I will not say a cleaner body—but a less approachable body than those from the cities. You could bribe one big city with a drydock or with a great many other things, but you cannot bribe a whole agricultural community, because the little town that gets the graft will be vehemently opposed by all the other little towns. But in the case of a city like Victoria they look for, and generally get, a hand-out of some description. Far back in the history of British Columbia politics I can recall when railway charters were the order of the day. The government then was practically a Victorian government. I always used to notice that it did not matter where the railway was projected, either in the extreme eastern part of British Columbia or elsewhere, so long as the terminus of the proposed railway was in the city of Victoria they could get a charter for their railway no matter how outrageous and unreasonable it was. So it has gone all down the line. I can recall two elections, because the government generally carry one on the promise and one on its tardy fulfilment, that the government won on the building of enormous expensive docks. Of course, the fact that they were unnecessary had nothing whatever to do with it. That was many years ago, and even to-day those great ocean docks are not connected with the railway. But that did not matter. They had to have the docks, and it was only after they were built—I do not know why, because there was so little shipping—that they discovered that the dock was four feet too high or four feet too low and that no large ocean-going boat could dock there, or ever will dock there for that reason. Twenty or thirty years ago members who come from the Old Country will recall that there was a great cry in magazine articles, "What shall we do with our boys?" The boys were growing up; the colonies were but little known then, and every other magazine had an article on, what shall we do with our boys? Very often they sent them to Canada, to the great benefit of this country. But in Victoria the question has arisen among the latter day statesmen: What shall we do with our docks? Various suggestions were made, but the brightest one came a few months ago when the tide of wheat began to flow into Vancouver. One man wrote a series of articles in the papers to prove that the proper thing was to ship the wheat from them. The wheat was to be brought to Vancouver and transported thence to Victoria then I presume carried by wagon from the terminus of the railway to the dock, to the docks that were four feet out of level, and then put into the ship, and as the writer pathetically said, "It will be something to do with our docks." As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, and I think perhaps it is a good idea for every one to speak the truth on this matter, that drydock should have been built in Vancouver, and I defy the members for Vancouver, any one of them, to stand up in his place and contradict me. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) went into facts and figures, and I am pleased to follow him. He said that the drydock site was bought in the year 1913 or 1914 at a place called Lang's Cove. That is quite true, but there are some half truths that are worse than an absolute deception. I have no doubt that a site was bought. The sum of three or four hundred thousand dollars was spent, but the site was not worth anything because you could not make a dry dock there. Perhaps it was never intended to put one there. However it served to carry the election at that particular date. Later on came this other election, and it was felt that something really had to be done this time; the people would not stand putting off any longer and a drydock had to be built. However the dock was not built at Lang's Cove, it was built at Skinner's Cove. Now, the money was voted on the 27th June, 1919, that was five years after the false dock site was bought and found to be unsuitable. So they got busy. On the 27th June, 1919, the money was voted to go on with the dock, and on the 2nd August, the hon. member was sworn in as Minister of Agriculture. Could anyone see a connection between those two facts? On the previous occasion the site was bought at a place that was no good and the matter had not been touched for five long years, but at the crucial moment—not at the crucial moment, I am exaggerating, but five weeks before my hon. friend was sworn in, it was discovered that the site was not suitable. Another site was bought, and parliament voted the money to build this drydock. My hon. friend tells us further that half a million dollars was set aside out of that sum in July for boring to find out whether it was suitable or not, and he was sworn in on 2nd August of the same year. With true modesty my hon. friend merely told us that he was sworn in "some time after that".

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member tell us who was Minister of Agriculture at the time the vote passed this House?

Mr. NEILL: No, but the hon. member for Victoria was the expectant minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I tell the hon. gentleman that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was minister and there was no expectation whatever.

Mr. NEILL: I do not suppose the hon. member for Marquette was instrumental in getting a vote for his successor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was the member of the government who recommended it to this House.

Mr. NEILL: On the advice of whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On his own advice.

Mr. NEILL: On his own advice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Marquette recommended a dry dock for Victoria on his own advice? Do I get that right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said, and I do not propose to be misrepresented, was that he was the member of the government which recommended it. When the hon. member asked me upon whose advice he was a member of the government, I said, on his own advice.

Mr. NEILL: I did not refer to the creation of the hon. member for Marquette, I was talking about the creation of the drydock, or rather the vote for the drydock.

Now, I propose with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to quote a few extracts, a very few, from the Victoria Colonist. Those who are familiar with it know that the Victoria Colonist is a strong Conservative paper, and therefore its absolute accuracy can be relied on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Much better than yours.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. member wants to speak I will be happy to yield him the floor.

On October 16, 1919,—by the way I may say that while the hon. member was sworn in on the 2nd August, 1919, the election was not held until October 27—that date is important; October 27. So we find on October 16 an editorial reading as follows:

> The announcement is made that tenders for the drydock will be called for immediately.

That was eleven days before the election. Just about the psychological moment was it not? On the same date in the same paper at a meeting we find Hon. Dr. Tolmie speaking as follows:

> They tell you that this drydock scheme is merely a vote catching one. Before I left Ottawa I had the definite assurance from members of the Cabinet that this work will be proceeded with. I fully believe that assurance.

On October 19, we again find my hon. friend making the following statement:

> As to the drydock there is no camouflage so far as I and the government are concerned. The government has given me its solemn pledge that the work will be proceeded with and I am here to say the work will go on.

You see he had to be emphatic because this was the second time the drydock had been undertaken. Then again, on October 21, in his printed manifesto to the electors my hon. friend used this language:

> We secured a vote for it (the drydock) at end of June (1919) and work will be proceeded with without delay.

On October 26, as the final windup before the election, which was next day, we find an editorial reading as follows:

> People will attest by their votes their estimate of how much Mr. Tolmie was responsible for having made it possible for this great shipping facility to be begun this winter.

And there are more with which I will not burden the House.

There is just one other point I wish to allude to. The hon. member (Mr. Tolmie) said in his speech, and so did the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) that, after all, Esquimalt, where this dry dock is, is not in the district of Victoria but in that of Nanaimo. That is just one of these truths which is true but misleading. It is perfectly and literally correct that it is not within the actual confines of the district of Victoria, it is in that of Esquimalt which extends up to Nanaimo eighty or a hundred miles. But Esquimalt is, to all intents and purposes a suburb of Victoria about two and a half miles distant and connected with it by tram line. Citizens of Victoria live out that way in pretty villas, and so on. The working people of Victoria go out there to work and vice versa. They are one and the same to all intents and purposes. The expenditure of $5,000,000 in Esquimalt would accomplish as much benefit and be as successful in vote getting in the city of Victoria as a like expenditure in Ottawa would be in the city of Hull; the parable is an exact one. While it is perfectly true it is in the Nanaimo district, yet to all intents and purposes the benefit and the vote catching value of it would be just the same as if it were in the actual city of Victoria. Truth is a noble thing. Truth is supposed to be at the bottom of wells, but some wells are very deep.

Now the text of my hon. friend's eloquence was directed towards the statement of the Prime Minister that the drydock was built to ensure his election. I maintain that I have sufficiently demonstrated the facts to hon. members to make up their minds. As to whether the Prime Minister was correct in that assertion I will leave it to them to say—I recall that some years ago, in the time of the great boom there was an intensive campaign to advertise motor cars throughout the States. One man advertised: "This is the best car." A second advertised: "This is the cheapest car." A third man said: "This is the safest;" and so on. But one particular man thought he knew the mind of the American people, thought he knew the class of people to whom he was appealing, and he advertised his car with these words: "This is the dearest car." He knew his clientele; he was out to catch the purse-proud millionaire who wanted to be able to say: "My car cost more than anybody else's." So we find a parallel to-day in the case of my hon. friend. He goes about the country a great deal, during the parliamentary recess, engaged in a business which is a sort of collateral to his political duties, and he will be able to point to himself as "a pearl of great price." I remember that when Paul was haled before—was it not Agrippa?—in the course of his trial it came out that he was a Roman citizen, a great honour in those days. The chief captain looked at him and asked how he came to be that. Paul said, Yes, he was a Roman citizen, and the chief captain replied, "With a great sum obtained I this." So my hon. friend can say "With a great sum obtained I this seat." But the commoner, the ordinary members from the prairies and other districts, can perhaps say, like Paul, "But we were free born."

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I wish to deal briefly with the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), but before doing so I wish to express my regret as a young man—and I am sure many hon. gentlemen feel the same way—at the absence of one of our Canadian statesmen, the Minister of Finance, the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). We all miss him in this House. We miss the brilliancy of his mind and the soundness of his judgment. I had not anticipated making any references to the remarks of the last speaker, but he has hurled at me and my colleagues from Vancouver a defy regarding the Esquimalt drydock. He says that he defies the members from Vancouver to contradict the assertion that a drydock should have been built at Vancouver. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to deny this assertion and say that a drydock should have been built at Esquimalt, but may I add, as actually happened, another should have been built at Vancouver. I was much interested, really more interested, in the fact that the hon. member rose in this House for the first time as a champion of the government. He is the man selected to answer perhaps the most popular member of this House, the hon. member for Victoria City, and he seeks to throw ridicule upon him, invective, and to charge him with insincerity. Any hon. member who knows the hon. member for Victoria City knows perfectly well that none of those allegations could be applied to him, and these remarks, coming from an hon. member and a gentleman who for many years has known the reputation of such a distinguished member of this House as the hon. member for Victoria City, are somewhat surprising to me. I would have thought perhaps the government would have chosen someone from some other portion of the country to have performed this kind of deed, let me say, to use parliamentary language. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni reminds me of the experience of a friend of mine who was travelling from New York over to a great convention of Rotarians in Edinburgh, and, as many of you know, each Rotarian carries the badge on the lapel of his coat, with his name, place of residence and occupation. On one beautiful Sunday morning a certain serious-minded,—should I say long-faced—individual, proceeded about the boat, and without any explanation or without any words whatever, he would come to one member after the other, take hold of the lapel of the coat, and examine the badge with a magnifying glass. My friend proceeded with his reading, but soon this individual found his way to him, and the friend suddenly saw a large hand appear under his nose which hand grabbed the lapel of his coat adjusted the magnifying glass and examined the badge. The gentleman looked up in great surprise and this is what the man said: "I am Alex. Smith of Spokane undertaker; I am looking for somebody". The double application of the story rather fits the present situation. The hon. gentleman has endeavoured to answer the hon. member for Victoria City with arguments and assertions, which are witty, but which are not nearly so substantial, and not nearly so sound in fact as the assertion we have heard from the hon. member for Victoria.

Before proceeding with the main portion of my remarks I would like—and it is with a little diffidence I undertake this duty—to refer to the words of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) this afternoon. That hon. member is generally fairly accurate, but to-day he launched into a torrent of political argument, no doubt for political effect, with regard to a certain statement made by Mr. Monty at Montreal. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that although the Minister of Railways may be good in the administration of his department he was a little bit out in his French, not that I profess any excellent knowledge of French, but I have special means of knowing something about it. The actual words which were published in the press on Tuesday, the 29th January, 1921 were as follows—

> Les libéraux, dit M. Monty, n'ont pas tenu parole; ils avaient formellement déclaré que les chemins de fer nationaux seraient remis à une compagnie privée; au lieu de cela, on destitue les commissaires et on fait venir un étranger pour les administrer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for the interpretation of those words I have not only my own authority but the authority of one more skilled in interpretation than I am. The interpretation of that word "etranger" literally means stranger, not in the sense of meaning foreigner, but someone outside our gates. The French language is full of delicacies and sentiment which I am afraid most of the Anglo-Saxon race do not appreciate.

Mr. BROWN: Give us the whole quotation, because we require to hear the whole of it to understand its significance.

Mr. LADNER: If the hon. gentleman's French is in working order to-night he will have understood it.

Mr. BROWN: Read the English version of it.

Mr. LADNER: The interpretation of it would be—

> "The Liberals," said Mr. Monty, "did not keep their word. They formally declared that the National Railways would be returned to private ownership, instead of which they dismissed the directors and had a stranger appointed to administer them."

A foreigner and an alien would be a different individual in sentiment and warmth of feeling, from an ordinary stranger. There is that line of demarcation on which the Minister of Railways in his characteristic, witty and skilful manner has seen fit to take a political advantage of and make a great fuss over, so that the newspapers would have a Lord Dundonald case all over again.

Most of the discussion in this House has been directed to the question of tariff. We have heard advocates of tariff and more tariff. We have heard advocates of duties and less duties, and, if I remember my history correctly, I think for the past 70 years public men have been advocating the pros and cons of the principles of free trade and protection without giving actual practical application of those principles to the conditions of the country as we find them. I was reading the other day in the Life of Sir Alexander Galt, a speech which he made in the House in 1850, when he was raising the duty from 7½ to 10 per cent, and in that speech he was remarking on the disaster that would fall upon the United States because they had such high duties. I think they were 25 per cent, and he had it skilfully worked out that people would leave the United States because the cost of living would go up and they would come to Canada. He used the very arguments which hon. members to my left are advancing, which arguments have been proven in the light of history to be absolutely without foundation.

I propose to say a few words with respect to the portion of the Speech from the Throne dealing with the question of banking. The Speech from the Throne says—

> The amendments made to the Bank Act in the last decennial revision of the last session provided better guarantees for the public in banking operations; their wisdom has already been abundantly apparent.

I suppose the wisdom which has already been abundantly apparent may be found in the disaster of the Home Bank, as to which some hon. members of the government have had some information. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that although the Banking Committee sat three and a half months, and took a great amount of evidence, which, with the report covers 1,060 pages; yet the government, in the full possession of a number of facts which I shall disclose to the House, made scarcely any changes in the act, in the face of a situation which is becoming inimical to the best interests of the country and of our banking institutions. The banks constitute the heart of our economic system. Our agriculture, our industry, our business generally, all live or die under that system. To continue the parallel, money is the life blood of the economic state; and so long as the heart of the economic system pulsates normally and distributes that life blood properly throughout the whole economic being, the national health will be maintained in vigour and be able to carry all the burdens of war and taxation which bear down on the shoulders of this virile northern race. The banking question is not a very complicated one. The functions which the banks discharge are simple. They are to receive the savings of depositors subject to repayment on demand, and to act as a medium for loaning those moneys to the business of the country. Banks, like other businesses, must take their chances; the shareholders and creditors must take a certain amount of risk. For nearly one hundred years parliament has seen fit, in the public interest, to make laws respecting our banks, and our banking institutions have performed a splendid service in this country. There is no question about that; in fact, I think we have one of the best banking systems in the world. Like all good systems, however, the banking system in Canada is capable of improvement, and I hope to demonstrate this in a few moments. With respect to the Committee on Banking and Commerce and its report, the responsibility lay primarily on the government. What did they do as a matter of fact? Briefly, these are the accomplishments. They restricted the loans to bank officials. They made a change in the form of monthly returns, but with little improvement. Amendments were made to make more effective the shareholders' audit and to give greater power to the minister to investigate the banks. The trouble, however, is that the powers which the minister has in that regard are generally not exercised until after the failure has occurred or until some catastrophe has overtaken the institution.

The most important change was the amendment in connection with the famous section 88, under which the Dominion banks advance moneys to business concerns and have a first charge on the goods. The government proposed—and it was inserted in the bill—to add section 88 (a), by which notice of intention to borrow is filed with the Receiver General for the express purpose of giving notice to the public of the existence of a charge against these particular goods of the business. The real truth is that this amendment, pretending to be in the interests of the public and of our business institutions, was nothing more nor less than a sham, because it was a very simple matter for a man to borrow under section 88, file his notice, order his goods from England and then borrow again under section 86, repaying what he got under section 88, cancelling the notice under section 88 (a), and then standing before the world as though his goods were not encumbered, whereas, in fact, they would be just as much encumbered as they were before. It was not from any lack of information that the government pursued that course. An expert witness from Great Britain explained the matter, as can be seen by reference to the Banking Committee's report. Yet the government pursued that policy, which was fair neither to the public nor to the business institutions. In fact, it was deceiving; and business men will easily carry on their affairs under that amendment believing that there are no encumbrances against particular goods when in fact there may be. What is it that the government have failed to do? They have failed to grapple properly with the question of rural credits. Years ago when the banking institutions were first started in this country their purpose was as we see in the preamble to the bill incorporating the Bank of Montreal in 1817, namely, to use the words of this preamble:

> The advancement of agriculture and commerce and the promotion of the prosperity of the province.

What a change has come over the institution of banking in one hundred years! We know to-day that banking is adapted to the commerce and industry of the country; short term loans are made covering periods of sixty, ninety and a hundred and twenty days, and money which is loaned over a longer period—investment money—is placed usually in long term bonds and mortgages for three and five year terms. But there is nothing to enable the farmer to secure a loan for nine, twelve or fifteen months. In that respect the last decennial revision of the Bank Act failed to grapple with the problem of rural credits, and nothing has been accomplished; no step has been taken to stop the absorption by the larger banks of the smaller ones, I will deal with that phase of the matter in a few moments.

Then we have the extraordinary situation in connection with the small amount of capital which is carrying an immense amount of deposits of the people. And nothing was done with regard to excessive rates of interest. I know that you cannot legislate on the question of interest rates, but steps can be taken to make impossible such incidents as were disclosed before the committee where on loans an interest of 10 and 12 per cent, was charged farmers in remote sections of Saskatchewan. Then, again, in connection with audit and inspection, it is well known that the government has not accomplished anything of advantage. They made certain amendments but they do not solve the question. It is generally understood that the government will probably provide some measure this session, but nothing satisfactory has been accomplished so far. There is also the question of penalties for false or incorrect returns. These penalties do not attach to the officials of the institution in the way they should in order to bring home the responsibility when such a catastrophe occurs as happened in the case of the Home Bank. Let me add that these are not dark and mysterious questions which cannot be investigated nor understood. The history of the development of banking and financial institutions in Canada discloses the fact that time and again problems have arisen before the Banking committee and solutions have been suggested, tried and failed. In that respect the government, I think, have failed entirely to fix the responsibility, and they have not solved the problem as they should have done.

May I now direct the attention of the House concretely to some of the very important indications of the general tendency of events to-day. After all, the course of events to-day is merely a connection between the past and the future. I have obtained certain information from the returns given by our banks under the Bank Act and published in the Canada Gazette. In 1867 there were 22 banks in Canada; in 1890 there were 40, affording a wide field for competition. In 1900 there were 36, in 1910, 28, and in 1923 the number had been reduced to 14. What will the number be in 1933? If this does not indicate the trend of events, let me call attention to the question of the capital invested in the banking business of this country and the volume of the business carried on. In 1890, we had $60,000,000 of paid-up capital; in 1900, $67,000,000, in 1910, $100,000,000 and in 1923, 123,000,000 While during the last 23 years the capital has increased 84 per cent the volume of business done, as indicated by bank clearings and liabilities to the public, has increased 1100 per cent. So that you will see what a disproportion there is in the respective increases. It is true that a large reserve of $123,000,000 has been built up, I will deal with that shortly. In 1900 the bank capital was $67,000,000 and the bank clearings were $1,500,000,000; in 1923 the capital had increased to $123,000,000, and the bank clearings to $17,500,000,000.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a more significant feature than this. The bank premises in 1890 stood at $4,000,000, in 1900 at $6,500,000, in 1910 at $25,000,000, in 1923 at $70,000,000 plus $6,000,000 in other real estate. Leaving aside the reserves, we find this extraordinary situation, that out of a total of $123,000,000 capital invested in the banking business of this country, no less than $76,000,000 is frozen or locked up in the premises and real estate on which the business of the banks is carried on. In many cases these are handsome pillared institutions of considerable architectural beauty, presenting an appearance of solidity and substance to depositors. Let me repeat that out of a total capital invested in the banking business of

In order the better to understand my contention, may I ask the House to visualize a base representing $47,000,000 in net capital, and on top of that an inverted pyramid representing $2,686,000,000 liability to the public. The House will thereupon appreciate the delicacy of the situation in the event of business disturbances throughout the world, and it will understand the need for a substantial increase in this capital, or some other arrangement to meet any difficulty which might arise through international complications.

It is not because the business has not been profitable that we find this reduction in the number of banks, because the returns furnished by the banks show that, taking the net earnings or dividends of all the banks, good and bad—and some of them are bad—the dividends paid were: in 1890, 6½ per cent; in 1900, 7 per cent; in 1910, 8 per cent; in 1923, 11 per cent, while the reserve has increased from $34,000,000 in 1910 to $123,000,000 in 1923. I suggest that these figures are very significant. But perhaps the most astounding discovery which I made while examining these returns was in connection with the deposits which the public have placed in the banks, and which the banks loan to the institutions of the country to carry on their business. Out of $2,050,000,000 and more of deposits, no less than 70 per cent—and these calculations are practically accurate within ½ per cent—are to be found in the four largest banking institutions of the country, while the ten smaller institutions endeavour to carry on their business with 30 per cent. The course of events during the past thirty years shows a most interesting development in relation to these deposits and their distribution among our banks. In 1890 thirty per cent of these deposits were in the four largest banks, and seventy per cent in the remaining institutions; in 1900, the percentages were 40 per cent and 50 per cent respectively; in 1910, 45 per cent and 55 per cent respectively; but in 1923, 70 per cent are found in the four largest institutions and only 30 per cent in the others.

Now, in face of these facts, whether in regard to capital, deposits, number of banks, or the creation of reserves, my submission is that unless something is done by co-operation between our banking institutions and the federal government—and the responsibility is primarily on the government—we must ask ourselves—What will be the situation in 1934? For my part, I do not think it is in the national interest or the interest of our banks that the banking business of the country should be centralized in four or five large institutions. When the decennial revision of the Bank Act is taking place we find, and quite properly so, the most experienced and able men in the banking world appearing before the committee to make their submissions. They are the master minds in the banking world. What opportunity has the average member of parliament or the average man in public life of offsetting their advice so far as the public interest is concerned? Though looking after the public interest the member is very seriously handicapped. The point I wish to put frankly before the House is this; the course of events is tending towards a strong centralization of our banking business, and the government, with all its protestations against mergers, combines and trusts, has failed to take any action whatsoever to correct this tendency during last session after an exhaustive inquiry into our banking system.

Mr. VIEN: Would my hon. friend submit his proposals to prevent the tendency he complains of?

Mr. LADNER: That is on the next sheet of my notes, and I shall be pleased to tell him exactly what I would do. I would suggest that as the banking business is a monopoly under our Bank Act, and properly so, placed entirely in the hands of our chartered banks, with certain great privileges, such as note issue up to the extent of a bank's unimpaired capital, and likewise with certain obligations —I would suggest that parliament should assume its responsibility to the public and at this juncture stop the course of events by adopting the principles governing the Federal Reserve Bank of the United States and the Bank of England which are applicable to Canada—incorporate them in the Bank Act, and give this country an institution which will be representative of both the banks and the people, and so control the course of events which is now only too apparent. We need such an institution. Some of the older members in this House may smile or cast doubt upon my proposal, but if they will study the history of the development of our banking system, and will face the facts squarely and assume their responsibilities to the public, they cannot help but realize the necessity of taking some steps to carry out a proposal on the lines I have suggested. If the government and parliament fail at this juncture to take the necessary action, it is only a question of time when a similar proposal will be put into effect.

These are some of the reasons why we require a reserve bank. We need a check on the rediscount facilities provided by the Bank Act; we should divorce the banking business from the government; we should put it in the hands of the bankers. These rediscount facilities are not complete at present and do not operate to the best advantage of the country. There is hesitancy on the part of the banks to take advantage of them. And we all know the necessity for such facilities.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is not the rediscount system obtaining to-day in the United States eminently satisfactory? It is in the hands of the government.

Mr. LADNER: I do not think it is.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The bankers of the United States and the public say it is.

Mr. LADNER: I will tell my hon. friend why I think it is not satisfactory. The rediscount facilities of the United States make for inflation, because the appointment to the Federal Reserve Board is largely a political appointment, it is in the hands of the President. During the war this is what the Federal Reserve Board did. They held their interest rate low, thus encouraging business and encouraging expansion during the time they were selling their Liberty bonds, and when they had flooded the market with these bonds, drawing a slightly higher rate of interest, they raised the federal reserve rate, with the result that Liberty bonds fell from par to 78. That was simply a case of political power being used to disrupt the course of events in trade and commerce. I would prefer to take the rediscount idea from the Bank of England where rediscount is penalized, where you do not rediscount unless you need to, and if you need to you are willing to pay for it. That is what should be done in this country. We must have rediscount facilities; otherwise how can the business of the country be carried on? We have $47,000,000 of liquid capital, less than what we had in 1900, with a liability of two billions to the public. Let hon. gentlemen visualize the illustration I gave a moment ago of the base and inverse pyramid; can they not see what difficulties would arise from an international disturbance, and how delicately poised the balance is in that regard? Take the case of the smaller bank which is not able to carry a manufacturer of lumber, let us say. The conditions are something like this: The manufacturer in question has a large supply of manufactured lumber on hand. Some disturbance in business affairs takes place and a depression occurs. The bank goes to this manufacturer and says: "You have an overdraft of $50,000; we require one-half of that in thirty days." Now, the manufacturer may not be able to pay it, but under the present system he is forced to pay it and he has to sacrifice his goods in order to do so. His competitor must do the same thing, and then there is a lowering of prices, there is a rush to sell goods, there is depression, there is consternation in the business world and misery and failures right and left. That is what happened in the United States in 1907.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend allow me a further question? Does he think that the federal board system would be any better in Canada than it has been in the United States, where one hundred banks have failed of late?

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman has apparently altogether missed my point. I am not advocating the adoption in Canada of the principle of the federal reserve bank exactly as it is applied in the United States. I have said twice that that system should be improved upon; that it is the Bank of England system we should use here, where rediscount is penalized. But we should have rediscount facilities. To continue my illustration: the bank cannot carry this manufacturer of lumber, because the bank, like other institutions, must pay its debts—and the banks have a lot of debts; they owe more money than any other institution I know of. Now, under the rediscount system, if the manufacturer cannot pay up, the bank takes his paper to the federal reserve bank, hands it over and gets money in its place, and the federal reserve bank carries the manufacturer over the awkward period. In every commercial country of the world to-day except Canada you have rediscount facilities, and in Canada you have a pretence at it in the Finance Act. We have just reached the stage of a halfway measure, and the course of events is forcing us on, impelled by the power of an economic force which hon. members have not, I believe, perceived, which the public have not perceived and never do perceive until disaster overtakes them—and then public men are driven on by the force of public opinion instead of acting as leaders of public opinion.

Then, we need something in this country in connection with our smaller banks. How many hon. members here honestly believe that in the face of the official data which I have given to the House to-day our smaller banking institutions, which have only 30 per cent of the total deposits of this country on the basis of which to carry on their business while the larger institutions have 70 per cent—how many hon. gentlemen think that these institutions can go on under these circumstances? They cannot reduce their overhead, as one banker told me the other day. With the failure of the Home Bank, the agitation that has prevailed among the public and the consideration of the matter by parliament, there has been a weakening of that most delicate and powerful instrument of finance—confidence, and the result is that very quietly—we might as well face it; we might as well talk about it and assume our responsibility in that connection—very quietly the deposits are being taken from the smaller institutions and placed in the larger ones. Does anyone think the larger institutions are objecting to that? Not at all. And if they are not being placed in larger institutions they are being placed, as I know for a fact, in the United States, or, if not there, they are being put into Victory Bonds or other securities, resulting in an investment of money on long terms which should be used in the commerce and business of the country. So Mr. Speaker, I say that we must do something to maintain in the competitive field the few small banks which now exist, because there is no doubt that if we do not take some action they will go out and we will have a financial oligarchy in this country which will dictate not only to business and finance but to governments, federal and provincial. Experience has shown time and again, as would be proved if we had an opportunity of going into some of these facts, the wisdom of parliament's assuming its responsibility early before disaster occurs.

I have already referred to the question of interest rates. The federal reserve system is the most effective way of correcting unfairness in connection with interest rates in different districts. The federal reserve bank does not deal with the public, as a rule, but only with member banks. There is one occasion, however, when they do deal with the public. If in some districts the banks get together and endeavour to force a high interest rate, as happened in Canada, according to the evidence which was revealed before the Banking committee, where the rate was never less than 10 per cent and was often 12—if a situation of that kind arises, under the federal reserve system a board of trade or some other public body or individual may protest against it, and the federal reserve bank then operates its only power to deal with the public, called its open market operations. They go into that district and they offer the money at 7 per cent, and by the law of supply and demand the banking institutions which had refused to give a fair deal are forced to reduce their rate to a fair level. We have no such institution in Canada; we have no protection of that kind, and having public responsibility I think it is our duty to say something about these things and to endeavour to bring about some improvement in regard to them.

Then, a federal reserve bank would be the proper institution to handle that most delicate and most difficult question of inspection and audit. We have had much discussion in the House on this subject, and still more before the Banking committee. It is something that cannot be handled by men who are not experts in the business. I believe that in the United States a great deal of good has been accomplished in that regard. Then there is the question of note issue. Our note issue at present is carried on under the Finance department; that should be placed under the federal reserve bank—our gold reserve and the control of our notes. Moreover, the federal reserve institution is a splendid thing in connection with foreign trade, as has been eminently established in the United States. I see no reason also why the government should not place all their business in one banking institution. If you had a federal reserve bank acting on behalf of the state as well as the other banks, an institution in which all banks were members, the government could carry on its financial business with that federal reserve bank. Then there is the very important question of disciplinary authority. There must be many occasions in connection with the relation of our banking institutions to the public where certain discipline would be helpful to the banks as well as to the people. A federal reserve bank could accomplish that.

Before I close I wish to give one or two reasons why parliament should act in this matter now and not ten years hence at the next decennial revision of the Bank Act, when we may have four or five banks left. A depressed situation arises and becomes acute owing to war or other extraordinary conditions. In all history wars have been the cause of disaster in finance and in business. Our debt in Canada increased from $330,000,000 before the war to two and a half billions after the war. The Great War was financed not as other wars, by the accumulated savings of the people, but upon the principle of inflation, and any of you who have gone into the question at all will know that just as the banks build up their assets and liabilities, debits and credits, so the government borrows from the public and from the banks. After absorbing all the accumulated savings in Great Britain and in Canada and after drawing upon the savings of the United States they were forced to resort to inflation in order to carry on the war, and the results has been that the purchasing power of the dollar has gone down through deflation, to the extent that it will never, in my opinion, attain the same purchasing power that it had reached before the war. Let me impress your mind with the seriousness of the situation by informing those who perhaps have not the information, of the colossal expenditure which this war has meant. During the six years from March 31, 1914, to March 31, 1920, more money was spent by the British Empire than it spent during the 226 years prior to that date. That is official data from authorities that are accepted as such. In other words, from 1914 to 1920 there has been more money spent than there was back to 1688, when the national debt of Great Britain was commenced. What does that mean? It simply means taxation. It means obligation on the backs of the people. It means an encumbrance on all financial operations, and the obligation of the state to recognize the necessity in the course of events to co-operate with the banking institutions, and in the face of obligations of that kind face the future, as we will be bound to do a few years hence if we do not do it at the present time. Let me remind you that the Napoleonic wars from 1793 to 1817, some twenty-four years, cost Great Britain 1,200 million pounds while the late war cost the Empire 11,268 million pounds during the six years from 1914 to 1920, and you will remember that the Napoleonic wars waged from one end of Europe to the other, and bear in mind the shortness of the late war. These are wide-world factors which have created the present financial situation.

Mr. Speaker, had I not occupied so much of the time of the House, I would like to have had the opportunity of saying a few words—which I will not do—in connection with the development of banking institutions in Canada. But the Prime Minister, whom I see in the chamber, may be interested in learning of an incident which occured away back in 1837 in connection with one of his ancestors, a distinguished Upper Canada reformer, Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie. Mr. Mackenzie instigated a run on the Bank of Upper Canada, and historians tell us that the bank paid the notes in silver and kept friends at the counter all day, and at night these friends brought back the specie in wheel-barrows. The analogy I wish to make is this: We have in this present generation a run of a different kind by his descendant. It is a run on the revenues of the country coming from agricultural implements and instruments of production, and while this descendant carries on a run of that kind, his cabinet friends carry on a run on other business in the country by increasing taxation and bringing back the money to the coffers of the government in that way. It is true these are in different ages but they have a political effect as they may have had at that time.

So far as the tariff is concerned, British Columbia wants a reasonable protection. The outlook of British Columbia is one of commercial, industrial, agricultural and mercantile development. We have diversified interests. Our agriculture amounted last year to $55,000,000; fisheries, $20,000,000; minerals, $44,000,000; forest production, $92,000,000. We have many things which we can send to the prairies, and they have their wheat which they can send to us, but I think that after all the West, British Columbia, and the prairies, together have one thing in common, and that is the claim for equalization of freight rates and the elimination of the discriminatory rates. I shall refer to this matter only in a general way because it has been so well threshed out that it is unnecessary to go into details. When one listens to this debate on the tariff and hears hon. members rising to lofty heights of eloquence on the subject of free trade or protection, one wonders exactly what the consequences would be if the tariff on agricultural implements were altogether eliminated. I suggest to hon. gentlemen to my left that more would be gained in a single month by equalization of freight rates than they would gain in ten years by the elimination of the tariff on agricultural implements. Mr. Speaker, the whole question is a farce so far as the tariff is concerned. It is a political farce, and anyone who has observed the attitude of our Progressive friends this year, as compared with last year or the year before, will realize the apparent intent, and in that connection I would ask the leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), to bear with me while I take him on the course of events which may lie before him in the near future when the budget comes down. The leader of the Progressive party claims with great enthusiasm that the promise in the Speech from the Throne is a renewal of the Liberal platform of 1919. I wonder what he will say when the actualities are divulged in the budget. I suggest to him that he will be in the position of the Scotchman who was being married, and if I listen rightly I would judge that the hon. member for Brandon is connected with the Scotch himself. In the middle of the ceremony this Scotchman stopped; he could not go any further. The best man rushed up to him and said, "Jock, what ails ye. Have ye lost the ring?" "No," said Jock, "but I have lost my enthusiasm." I think the member for Brandon will find himself in that position when the budget comes down.

In closing, I wish to make an appeal to the members of this House on the question of making permanent the bonus which now forms a portion of the pension given to the soldiers. I am not aware that any comment has been made on this subject, but I do know from representations, from resolutions that have been passed and public meetings that have been held from one end of Canada to the other, as well as from newspaper comment, that the soldier body of this country is greatly exercised over this matter. There seems to be an idea that this bonus, which under the Pension Act of 1920, automatically expires on the 1st of September next will not be renewed by the government. If the government has any intention of not renewing that bonus, I think it is only fair and proper to the soldiers who are in receipt of this pension to say so.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend suggests that the government should make known to the country whether it is their intention to extend the payment of the bonus to the soldiers. Six weeks ago in Toronto, before the Amputation Association, I was asked that question and I answered it, and my statement was published in the newspapers. It was to the effect that the government intended to introduce legislation to extend the bonus to the soldiers.

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. LADNER: May I ask for how long?

Mr. BELAND: When the legislation is introduced, my hon. friend will know.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask if the principle of extending the bonus is to be carried out, or is the bonus to be made a portion of the pension?

Mr. BELAND: I have made my statement.

Mr. LADNER: And that leaves the country in the doubt in which it now is, and it is because of that we find the most deserving group of men perhaps in Canada coming here to Ottawa in a great convention on the 5th and 6th of next May. The Amputations Club of Canada propose to come here and hold a convention. Along with other organizations they have submitted a petition to His Excellency the Governor General and "to the honourable members the House of Commons in Parliament assembled." The relief sought is this:

> We therefore humbly submit that the payment of the bonus should be abolished, and the amount of the pensions commensurately increased in each case by the sum now paid as a bonus; in other words, the pension should consist of such a sum as is now paid as a pension with the addition of the present bonus.

This petition is signed by The Amputations Association; the Imperial Veterans in Canada; the Great War Veterans Association; The War Widows and Widowed Mothers Association. I think when you consider what the pensions amount to, no member of this House would have the ingratitude to endeavour to either lessen the pension or restrict it to a bonus. Let me remind the House that a total disability pension is $50 The bonus amounts to $25. If a man has an arm off he is paid at the rate of 60 to 80 per cent disability. If he has a leg off he is paid at the rate of 40 to 80 per cent disability. If he has two legs off below the knee he is paid at the rate of 80 per cent disability. A widow's pension is $40 and the bonus amounts to $20. The first child receives $15, the second $12, and the third $10. We must bear in mind the depreciation in the purchasing power of the dollar. a depreciation which—as in the case of the Napoleonic wars—increased by 70 per cent and has never returned to the rate it was before the war. The purchasing power of the dollar in this country will never, in the light of history and the knowledge of present day events, return to the rate at which it was before. With that one simple fact before us, and with a knowledge that the total disability of a man who has two legs and two arms off only entitles him to receive $75 a month, may I ask in all seriousness is there an hon. member in this House whose memory is so short, whose gratitude is so small, whose conscience is so callous that he would hesitate one moment in granting the prayer of the petition which has been presented to this House.

I thank hon. members for their courtesy in listening to me with such patience, and I say this in conclusion: When this convention of the Amputations Club shall take place in Ottawa what a gracious act it would be on the part of the parliament of Canada if it were to receive these heroes as the Romans were wont to receive their heroes in the days gone by when they presented them with the laurel wreath of victory in recognition of their distinguished service in defence of the country. Instead of a laurel wreath we might give to these gallant men the solemn obligation of the parliament of Canada that so far as the pensions are concerned they need have no worry, and that the gratitude of the people of this country would be expressed through the parliament of Canada by making the present bonus a permanent portion of the pension.

Mr. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, to the complimentary words of preceding speakers, I ask the privilege of adding my felicitations to those gentlemen who have so gracefully moved and seconded the Address to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne. And, with a mandate fresh from the people, I wish to acknowledge the pleasure afforded the people of Nova Scotia by the visit of their Excellencies to that historic province last summer. Whether as Commander of the Canadian Army Corps in France and Flanders, or as the representative in Canada of His Gracious Majesty, the people I have the honour to represent are proud that His Excellency is in spirit and in deed all that those who occupy high places in a democracy should aim to be. Such I can assure you is the appreciation of His Excellency in that historic province by the sea which I am proud to own as the province of my nativity and life long home, than which none of the provinces of this great Dominion more proudly acknowledges and values its British allegiance and traditions.

I think it right and proper that His Excellency be congratulated because of the fact that in his early career, serving as a subaltern in one of England's celebrated regiments, the 10th Royal Hussars—which fought at El Teb—he now has been selected as its new Colonel.

I desire to express my regret at the absence of my personal friend, the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fielding), because of severe illness; I hope that he may soon be restored to his usual good health. We, as boys, travelled the streets of Halifax together, each pursuing his respective calling, and whilst I have followed a retiring life, my lifelong friend has occupied a prominent position in the government and history of our Dominion.

To the former Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) I extend my sympathy, and trust that the balmy winds and the warmth of the Sunny South may be of lasting benefit to him.

I desire to extend congratulations to the hon. member (Mr. Lapointe) who has been selected as Minister of Justice, and to the member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) who has taken the portfolio of Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

If, in exposing to this House the hardships and grievances under which my province is labouring, and which the trying post-war conditions have served not to create but only to clarify, we protest against our established order of things, please rest assured that it is not because of any slackening of fealty to the Crown. But we do indeed hold the view that unless all parts of the Dominion shall enjoy equal opportunity for prosperity, no prosperous Dominion can exist. Nova Scotia, having surrendered much and suffered much through her adherence to confederation, asserts the right to equal participation in the vast opportunities opened up by confederation in this great Dominion.

It is true that, for many years past, I have given allegiance to the Conservative party. I believed in the principles of that party, I believed in confederation, I believed in the wisdom of uniting the British communities of North America in one Dominion. I believed in the National Policy, and I believed that never was national decision more wisely made than when at the outbreak of the Great War, Canada's government of the day placed itself and the country unreservedly on the side of those who sought to repel German aggression. I have believed that in the great national issues confronting it, the Conservative party adopted the right national course and I have faith that in adjusting the balance of differences and setting the Dominion in the way of a new national prosperity, we are more likely to succeed under the direction of Conservative policy than under that of the present government. You may ask, Mr. Speaker, why I hold this view. My answer, in a word, is that the government has not kept faith.

My life has been spent in a commercial atmosphere trading in a community where contracts and commitments once made were adhered to, no matter at what cost. Now, I ask has the government adhered to its contracts and commitments? I ask were the commitments made in solemn convention in Ottawa in 1919 adhered to? Indeed, it is notorious that they were not. They have been more honored in the breach than in the observance, and the breach has been repeatedly and cynically condoned by the Prime Minister himself and by the hon. Minister of Finance who, laughing in his sleeve at what he thinks is the gullibility of the electorate, advances his unworthy view that platforms are only useful to attain power. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a too low and debasing plane on which to conduct public business; it is unacceptable and repugnant to our people; it will not wash.

Why, when the government's candidates presented themselves for election in 1921, they pledged themselves to bring us to a golden era, they were willing to promise anything that would secure political support. The hon Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) promised, if sent to Ottawa, to move a resolution in the House for an increase in the duty on coal to a level that would provide "real" protection instead of what then existed and what he called "fake protection" Have any of the members of this House encountered the "golden era"; have any of the members seen the resolution of the hon. Minister calling for "real" instead of "fake protection" on coal? And during the campaign in North Cape Breton in July last, the press reported the same minister appealing to the electors of that riding at North Sydney on July 28 as follows:—

> A revision of freight rates on the Canadian National railways has been prepared and is now awaiting the return of Sir Henry Thornton from the West to put them into effect. It provides for a general reduction in rates affecting local traffic between Ontario and the Maritime provinces.

Polling day passed, and again the electors trusted the government. Have any of the members of this House seen the revision of freight rates? Seven months have passed and no one in Nova Scotia is conscious of any reduction. They continue to labour under rates which Hon. E. H. Armstrong, the Liberal premier of Nova Scotia describes as "excessive freight rates choking our industrial life."

Leaders of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia were formerly much addicted to the use of a slogan "Trust the people." It is founded on an axiom which must properly prevail in all democracies, but it carries with it a natural corollary that the people should trust the elected representatives. The representatives must needs be worthy of trust. Can any one wonder that, in view of the broken promises to which I have alluded, the high-spirited electors of the city and county of Halifax should have turned from their false gods and sent to Ottawa a member to support the opposition. So it was in Halifax and so it was in Kent. And now I find myself honoured with a seat in this House, not as, primarily, a Conservative partisan, but as a protest against the perfidy of politicians and with a mandate to strike hard for the rights of my beloved province. To that mandate I shall be true, no matter if it should lead to a breach in the present happy relations which have always existed between my leader and myself.

I am going to ask for time to set out the embarrassing position with which the province of Nova Scotia finds herself confronted to-day. Hansard p. 4220, June 19th, 1923, reports the hon. Minister of Finance as follows:

> Many institutions which were prosperous in the Maritime provinces before confederation are complaining to-day. I do not want to discuss the question of confederation. I simply state a fact. I remember when there were twenty wholesale houses in Halifax all doing a prosperous business; to-day there is hardly one of them left. They have all been driven out by Montreal.

In order to get a proper setting for the picture of to-day one must recall those prosperous and self-contained conditions hinted at by the minister in those days. Ten banks were then operated and controlled in the province. To-day not one so remains. Fortunes were then being made by many different importers, exporters and shipping men, their varied activities affording generous employment to all who wished to work. To-day conditions are hard and, according to a reliable local authority, 30,000 of our best people are going annually to the States—driven to find a solution of their embarrassment in emigration to a foreign land and under an alien flag. Mr. Speaker, these things ought not so to be. These were not the prospects that were held out to Nova Scotians at the time that Ontario and Quebec statesmen were proposing that the Maritime provinces should enter a union to safeguard the defence position of the country and create a nation. When these statesmen toured the lower provinces after the Charlottetown conference, they naturally dilated on the benefits that would follow the adoption of a plan of confederation. The politicians who attended the conferences were in favour of the adoption of their scheme, of course, but it was received coldly by the public of the province. Indeed, it has never at any time been approved by the voters. Perhaps Cartier put the invitation to enter confederation as tersely as any one of the Fathers of Confederation. Speaking at Halifax on 12th September, 1866 he said:

> I have heard since I have been in Halifax the objection thrown out that you will be absorbed. It will be very easy for me to dispel such fears. I answer them by a question: Have you any objection to being absorbed by commerce? Halifax, through the Intercolonial Railway, will be the recipient of trade which now benefits Portland, Boston and New York. If you are unwilling to do all in your power to bring to a satisfactory consummation this great question, you will force us to send all this trade, which you ought to have, through American channels. It is as evident as the sun shines at noon that when the I.C.R. is built—and it must necessarily be built if confederation takes place—the consequence will be that between Halifax and Liverpool there will be steamers almost daily leaving and arriving at the former. In fact, it will be a ferry between Halifax and Liverpool.

At St. John on the 14th September, he said:

> Canada has population and territory to make a great nation in course of time. But she wants what the Maritime provinces possess, an outlet to the sea.

He then explained how business would develop.

> —when the goods of the Maritime provinces are exchanged for the goods of Canada—

And that > —the products of British Columbia and the vast prairies would also pour through Halifax.

Mr. FINN: May I ask my hon. colleague what was the policy prior to 1896? Were the subsidies given by the Tory government to the line to Portland or Halifax?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): As it is evident that the hon. gentleman has not heard much of the debate, I will proceed. The irony of the situation to-day is that the Canadian government, through its ownership of the Grand Trunk, with its chief railway terminus at Portland, is the chief instrument through which United States ports continue to be enriched by trade from the provinces situated west of New Brunswick. The present government has gained some friends by providing lower duties under the preferential tariff when goods enter through a Canadian port, although like much of their legislation the step is faltering and incomplete. And the idea of Canada now "taking the products of Nova Scotia in exchange for Canadian goods" is a joke. Geography and the fiscal system adopted by the Dominion are preventing that province from reaping the benefits of its maritime position, and are forcing its people to become hewers of wood and drawers of water to the central provinces. "Canada," as it was called before Confederation, finds a good market in Nova Scotia for its products manufactured and sold under a 10 per cent to 35 per cent tariff at correspondingly high prices, and takes payment, not in trade, as Cartier foretold, but in cash, which Nova Scotians raise by selling their fish, potatoes, fruit, lumber and other natural products in the highly competitive markets of the world. Located on the circumference of a circle, Nova Scotia cannot become a factor in the Canadian industrial system because she cannot overcome the costly carrying charges to reach the centre and the other side of the circle in competition with the mass producers situated at the centre of the circle in Hamilton, Kitchener, Toronto, Montreal, and other cities. And her banking control, with its collateral benefits, has gone to the latter mentioned cities, absorbed, not by commerce, as Cartier prophesied, but as the result of legislative enactments imposed quite naturally by those sections who command a majority in the councils of the nation, who also naturally make the fiscal policy suited, not to the needs of the smaller provinces, but to their own. Our smaller factories of former days, with a few notable exceptions, have been driven out of business by the mass producers centrally located, and new factories with us are unknown. It is an interesting fact, and it tells its own story, that the 700 Canadian manufactories and branches of United States concerns erected in Canada in the last 25 years have passed up the Maritime provinces as a location for their factories. Their benefits accrue to Canada, but not to the East.

In 1867, those who opposed confederation did so because of the disadvantages and losses that they feared would follow. To-day the successors of the "antis" need invoke no one's imagination; the worst fears have been realized. The advantages then enjoyed from control of fiscal policy were surrendered; the advantages that were to take their place have not materialized. Along with the other supporters of confederation, we seek a remedy that will afford the residents of this province the same opportunity for profitable activities and development of its resources as are enjoyed by any sister province. Surely a way can be found. To admit failure is to concede that that province has no place in the Dominion, and this concession we do not wish to make. The present severe business depression in the Maritime provinces—the total building permits of their 1,000,000 people only amounted in 1922 to 2¾ per cent of the total of Canadian building permits—has caused a questioning of underlying conditions, and a feeling of exasperation that has not existed there in a lifetime. You find it in conversation with nine out of ten of the people you talk to. I would that you, Mr. Speaker, and the House and the country generally, should appreciate the difficulties which have weighed on us so heavily, but which have been borne in silence compared with the vocal prairies, who are making better material progress, and who, never having enjoyed large realized wealth, as our people formerly did, have surrendered nothing, and have no good old days to look back to.

Some Liberal partisans in considering the dilemma which confronts us assert that it could have been avoided had we accepted the reciprocity pact of 1911. There is something in their contention. Putting aside for the moment the instability of that arrangement, I willingly admit that between conditions in Nova Scotia to-day and what they would have been under reciprocity, we are worse off. While reciprocity lasted we could have marketed our natural products to better advantage than we can now market them in the competitive markets of the world. But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that when my province refused to approve of reciprocity, it did so on the highest national grounds. We were told at that time that it was essential to maintain an east-and-west system of transportation to which the treasury of the country and our national destiny had been overwhelmingly committed. That was good enough for us. Our imaginations carried us forward to the day when our east and west transport systems would include an All Red route from Vancouver to Liverpool which would carry the fertilizing stream of commerce and travel on Canadian soil alone and under the folds of the Union Jack by land and sea, and the immediate monetary advantages of reciprocity we passed up in favour of the grand idea of nation building.

But we never contemplated the idea of carrying Canadian trade part way east and west by rail and the surrendering it to the enrichment of Canadian Atlantic winter ports situated in a foreign land. In this our province has again been betrayed. We went on in good faith and while we have been let down, allow me to express the conviction that it is only for a season. We demand and shall insist on the remedy. No government since that day has addressed itself to the task. While the war was on we in Nova Scotia considered it our duty to devote our attention to its prosecution to the exclusion of all interprovincial differences. That peril is, fortunately, past, and the duty before all bluenoses now lies clear. No government can ignore it except to forfeit all support. In this matter I feel confident that I speak with authority.

The question of taxation is a very serious one, but this government it would appear by the Speech from the Throne, after two years of slumber, seems to have awakened to a realization of conditions in our Dominion, especially in relation to taxation under which our people are groaning. Possibly the thunder from Kent and Halifax is responsible for this awakening. Relief is indicated. Let us "wait and see."

In my province, we are not at all interested in discussing who is or who is not to blame for this or that thing in the past. Hair splitting and casuistry do not interest us. We are confronted by vital living issues; we want a chance to live and we shall have it. We intend to place forever behind us the day when an ambitious young man or woman, in order to attain success, must desert his or her place of birth and go to the States—or migrate even to Montreal or Toronto. We feel that no political party can afford to write off even the decimated fourteen seats that will be our lot after redistribution. And we intend in future in our province to speak with a united voice. I have the honour of being here to-day as the first public spokesman for that voice.

The city of Portland, Maine, the chief Atlantic winter terminus of the publicly-owned Canadian National Railways, recently formed a 100,000 Club. The "Outlet" radio station at Providence, Rhode Island, is fond of broadcasting the importance of its city as an outlet for export trade. Less than a year ago, the state legislature of Rhode Island was assured by our railway people that if the charter of the Southern New England Railway was renewed construction would be completed by the Central Vermont and Canadian National Railways, whose subsidiary it is, and another Canadian Atlantic winter port in a foreign land be thus established. The people of Nova Scotia, Mr. Speaker, are opposed to the policy of upbuilding Canadian National ports under an alien flag while their own harbour fronts are idle, the wharves deserted and the longshoremen unemployed. No longer are they content to remove from Halifax and reside in Portland and Providence in order to benefit from Canadian production, Canadian industry and the expenditure of the money of the Canadian taxpayer. For such, in truth, are the deficits of the Canadian National Railways. For over two years, these matters have gone on without a protest being uttered in this chamber by our representatives—the former solid sixteen—elected by the votes of the people on the promise of the candidates that they would usher in a golden era, reduce the high cost of living and generally ease the conditions under which the people were labouring.

Hon. E. H. Armstrong the Liberal Premier of Nova Scotia, stated in the Montreal Gazette on April 24th of last year that:

> The people of the Maritime provinces feel keenly that they have not been fairly treated by the rest of the Dominion. They have been made to feel that they are and should remain isolated, more or less forgotten, tolerated at the best, and not provided for like the more fortunate provinces to the west of us.

Sir, I have arrived at the time of life when I could fairly claim a period of rest, quietness and ease. It was only at the earnest solicitation of patriotic Nova Scotians that I consented to forsake the easier way and offer myself for election in opposition to this government which has so signally failed to solve any of the difficulties that their candidates promised to solve. Living, as I did, in pre-confederation days, throughout the early days of the Dominion, and up to the present, confident of the great destiny of our country, provided its fortunes are directetd by men of wide vision, I come before you to-day and plead for consideration of the conditions I have outlined. I implore the government to rectify the grievances. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and the country, that early action is imperative. I warn you that failure will bring us all to regret, if not to disaster.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, let me refer to one or two matters. The right honourable gentleman, the Prime Minister of this Dominion, on March 3 last, told this House that the by-election in Halifax was won on local issues—that the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) was in the constituency making appeals of a sectional character, and he drops the subject with these words,—"This by-election had no significance whatever." I will venture this statement, Mr. Speaker, that never in the history of this country have members of government sat in this House with greater anxiety, uneasiness and disappointment than do the gentlemen occupying the chairs on your right at the present time, because of the result of the election in Halifax—an election "with no significance whatever"—says the Prime Minister. Their position has been made still more uncomfortable by the electors of Kent who sent to this House my good, capable friend, roommate and desk mate (Mr. Doucet). Give us, in the Maritime provinces, Mr. Prime Minister another opportunity, and we will still further add to the discomfort of our friends opposite.

If this by-election had no political significance why was it necessary to arrange by cable with the Prime Minister, then in England, to address a political gathering in Halifax just before polling day? In order that the right hon. gentleman might be in time for this meeting, the steamer on which he was a passenger was diverted from her course and came to Halifax. The Prime Minister was not the only speaker at this gathering, but was supported by half a dozen more or less of his ministers. His party was further fortified during the campaign by many hon. gentlemen, members of the once solid sixteen, representing in this House surrounding constituencies. "No significance whatever" in the Halifax by-election? I leave it with the House to decide whether or not it had any significance. The electors of the city and county of Halifax heard and read what the battalion of speakers had to say, heard their promises and pledges, thought out in their own minds the vital questions affecting our country, and decided for themselves. The result is well known to this House, and by none is it more keenly realized than by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

In passing I might mention that one reason given, but not the real reason, why the Prime Minister should divert his steamer and land at Halifax, was that he desired to reach Ottawa at the earliest possible moment. This is a distinct compliment to the port of Halifax, and I thank the hon. Prime Minister for it, as it emphasizes the fact that starting from Great Britain or any eastern point the quickest and most direct route to the West is via the port of Halifax.

The hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) has been referred to by the right hon. leader of the government. I want just here to say that this hon. gentleman was in my constituency during the campaign, that he did excellent work discussing the problems of our country, and that his forceful way of presenting the truth to the electors added greatly to our success.

Our campaign was carried on on the basis of a fair, broadminded discussion of matters concerning our great Dominion. Our friends opposite seem to have dwelt upon promises and to have pinned their faith to these, but there were already too many broken and unfulfilled promises, and this the electors full well realized and acted accordingly.

Much has been said on the question of an elevator for Halifax. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, taking up the time of the House at the present moment discussing this important matter. Suffice it to read the words of the Minister of National Defence, who represents the county of Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) in relation thereto. Speaking at a large gathering a few days prior to election day, he said:

> With the prospects of an enormous grain crop, the government, carrying out the policy of Canadian trade through Canadian ports, had decided upon the erection of a grain elevator at Halifax, modern and complete. Tenders had been called for and eight had been received. If Hon. W. S. Fielding, the acting Prime Minister, had not taken ill upon his return to Ottawa the other day from Halifax he would have called a council meeting and the contract would have been awarded by now. But just as soon as the Prime Minister returned to the capital—

He was then in Halifax, thirty hours' journey from Ottawa.

> —the contract would be awarded by the Cabinet and the work of construction would start at Halifax immediately. (Cheers).

Of course there would be cheers.

Mr. FINN: I would like to correct my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FINN: I was at the meeting—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FINN:—and the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) said nothing of the sort.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Well, hon gentlemen opposite are so fond of commissions that I suggest they might have one appointed to examine the reporter and ascertain whether or not that language was used. Anyway, this was another of that hon. gentleman's promises which is still unfulfilled.

No elevator has yet been arranged for in Halifax. If this government was sincere, if it was in earnest about even considering maritime traffic—that is, the sending of Canadian goods through Canadian ports—why should it not make some use of the elevator now standing there? A beginning could easily be made with the existing facilities. Why not employ Canadian Merchant Marine steamers in this business instead of having them carry cargoes at low rates to American ports? But like all else with the present administration, it is a case of "let us wait and see."

Some items promised in Halifax prior to the election of December 6th were: elevator, pier, railway sidings—well, I shall not take up the time of the House in mentioning them all. Hon. gentlemen have heard of the promises that were made in regard to the elevator as well as in regard to numerous other things.

I might again refer to the inconsistency of hon. gentlemen opposite. One minister, the Minister of National Defence, for the improvement of our valuable fisheries promised Halifax a fishery station, while at that moment his colleague the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was touring the county of Kent, New Brunswick, and telling the electors of that constituency that he would not allow officers of his government again to enter that county to stop illegal fishing for lobsters. Consider the situation, Mr. Speaker: a minister of the Crown telling the people of this country that he will assist them in violating the laws, especially those of his own department!

It perhaps is not generally known by members of this House that of late complaints have been reaching this country from England and the continent about the quality of the tinned lobsters sent to those markets. May these complaints not arise from the fact that lobsters are illegally caught, caught out of season when not fit for human food, packed in cellars and barns, swamp water being used in the process? Such are the facts, and in the face thereof the then Minister of Fisheries not only condones these offences but rather encourages them. The lobster industry is too valuable to trifle with in this way. With so much instability on the part of this government, is it to be wondered at that depression exists throughout our Dominion?

I was much gratified to hear from the lips of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay), some encouraging words on the subject of Canadian Trade through Canadian ports. Yesterday when speaking he, as a member of this government, placed himself on record in unqualified terms as favourable to that policy, and I cannot do better than quote the hon. member's words which I will read from Hansard of March 17, pages 377 and 378. He said:

> It has been decided that an officer will be placed in New York who will there clear goods in transit for western Canadian ports and also goods coming from western ports to eastern Canadian points. But in the order making provisions for an officer at New York the government have thought it wise to stipulate that goods so moved should be placed in British bottoms, that is, ships of British or Canadian register. It is hoped that by this provision there will be established sailings of British or Canadian ships from Canadian Atlantic ports which will fully accommodate this traffic.
> Mr. Ladner: May I inquire whether there are any lines operating ships of British or Canadian register which send vessels that way?
> Mr. King (Kootenay): Yes, there is one line, and recently the Canadian National Railways have indicated their intention to put on two ships. I am informed also that there are two or three lines which propose to establish a regular service between eastern and western Canadian ports this summer.

Mr. Ladner: Has the government any definite arrangement with those lines, with a view to making certain that the goods will be carried?

Mr. King (Kootenay): I am satisfied that lines will be established if there are goods to be carried, and we have reason to believe that there will be a very considerable amount of business offering, because it is within the knowledge of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) that no less than two, and possibly three, lines are prepared to enter into this traffic.

Mr. Ladner: Why would it not be in the interests of traffic to allow any competing lines which would give the service at the reduced rates to have the benefit of the establishment of the customs officer at New York?

Mr. King (Kootenay): There will be a customs officer at New York and goods shipped to that point will have an opportunity of entering into ships of British registry.

Mr. Ladner: My question is, why not other ships?

Mr. King (Kootenay): I think it only fit and proper that we should endeavour to keep this trade within Canadian channels. It will travel over Canadian railways to Canadian ports and will there enter into ships of our own register or of British register to be transported. We are satisfied that in the British merchant marine we have facilities which are sufficiently extensive to give accommodation and to bring about a competition which will control rates in the matter of this tonnage.

I regret to say that one important public body in Vancouver has taken exception to this ruling and contends that these goods should enter ships of any registry and be allowed to move freely. Now, as a representative of British Columbia and a Canadian I do not agree with this contention. I think it absolutely essential, if we are to grow as a nation, that we develop and maintain our national ports. No maritime nation can afford to build up the ports of an adjoining country at the expense of its own. I am satisfied that the people of British Columbia as a whole will endorse this attitude. I am sure that if the position were reversed and the people of Alberta and central British Columbia were to find it more acceptable to ship their goods via the ports of Seattle and Portland, our friends of the Vancouver Board of Trade would be the first to take exception and to insist on certain restrictions that would tend to confine this business to our own ports.

Mr. Ladner: Is the government in possession of any assurances to make certain that the nature of that arrangement does not mean that the rates by water will be adjusted somewhat on the same basis and at the same rate as by rail in which case the advantages of going via New York would be virtually nullified so far as lower rates are concerned.

Mr. King (Kootenay): The government will always have it within their power to amend that regulation if it is found that the people who are going to engage in this business are trying to make excessive profits out of it; but primarily, I think, we are on safe ground. It is the policy of this government to develop our own national ports, and this business, which I believe is going to become of very great importance not only to our people in western Canada but I think of even greater importance to our manufacturing friends in central and eastern Canada, should certainly remain in the channels where the people of Canada will derive the most benefit from it.

Mr. Speaker, this is a move in the right direction—the policy which the Maritimes have been asking for for years. Apply it to transportation between Canadian Atlantic ports, and Canadian Pacific ports then it cannot be denied to transatlantic business.

I do not wish to further detain this House but hope to again refer to this subject, which is of such vital importance to the Maritime provinces.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): May I on behalf of the House extend to the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) its congratulations upon his maiden speech, and express the surprise of the House at the rather brusque manner in which he scorned his colleague.

I have listened to the debate with a great deal of interest, and I am going to take up the time of the House for only a few minutes; but I wish to say that I do not think I ever heard a better debate in this House than the present one. It has been marked by a great deal of independence, independence on the part of the last speaker, independence on the part of the speaker who preceded him (Mr. Ladner) in regard to banking institutions, and a great deal of independence from the other side of the House. Certainly three of the best and most independent speeches in the debate came from supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite. There has also been a great deal of independence shown by the hon. members from the western provinces, and, speaking in the sense not of a critic but one who has observed this House for a good while, I think the most encouraging thing to-day is the splendid spirit that is manifesting itself in regard to political affairs by the men who have come to this House from the West. I cannot endorse all that they say, but I think it is a good sign.

I am going to take up the time of the House just for a few minutes to refer to the issue now before us, and it is this: I happen to represent in this House 100,000 people, as shown by the last census, and to-day, if I can judge aright, I represent over 130,000. My neighbour in East York (Mr. Harris) represents at least 100,000 people, and my neighbour to the west of me, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), I should think represents 100,000 people. Over 300,000 people are represented in this House by three members, representing three constituencies, made up largely of the city of Toronto, of the growing township of York, and the growing townships of Scarborough and Etobicoke. Yet we in this House have only three votes, while, the other member for York, the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King)—and it is not his fault at all, and I make no comment upon him in that respect—represents 25,000 people. At this time and under these conditions, judging by what we heard in the Speech from the Throne, confirmed more explicitly by the Prime Minister when he said there was to be a substantial change in the tariff as applied to instruments used in one of the basic industries of this country, and still further outlined and exemplified by hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party, there is not any doubt in my mind that an effort is now about to be made perhaps to wipe out the national policy of protection of the industries of this country, with which policy I have been identified for many years. I wish to take this opportunity of saying that that should not be done before at least two things transpire. Before that should be done, the first thing that we owe in an issue of this kind, which is far-reaching, which is a reversion of the past, and which may involve a great change in the future, is that the Redistribution Act should become a fact; and that the still more important act bearing on representation and the franchise should be revised. While that is being done the question of what should be done with the tariff policy of this country should be held in abeyance until revision in those two respects is made, or what has been put forward in this House very prominently, that there should be a conference or an attempt made by the different parties in this country to get together in regard to the tariff.

Further a policy which has been advocated in this country, and which I think ought to obtain, is the appointment of a royal commission of experts, to hear evidence from all quarters and to make a report to the House as to what the revision of the tariff ought to be. I believe the tariff question can be better dealt with in that way than in any other manner, and I should like to see that policy carried out. On behalf of the people of Toronto—and I think I may also speak for the three ridings of York—I should like to say that they will regret, and will certainly protest against, this effort to change the National Policy without affording them an early opportunity of expressing their opinion in regard to it. I also want to point out that amongst the three hundred thousand people who live in the portion of Toronto of which I am speaking, and the county of York, the half of them are women, and the coming vote of Canada may be largely the women's vote. On account of their husbands, their sons, and their female representatives, they are just as much interested in the National Policy as anybody in this House. I say, therefore, that a great mistake is being made, and a departure from parliamentary practice is taking place, in changing the present tariff policy without due consideration, and without creating the public machinery whereby a full and adequate expression of opinion can be obtained from the people of this country. Before that opinion is obtained there should be a revision of the Redistribution Act and of the Representation Act of this country. With all the emphasis I can command I make the point that there should be no revision of the tariff without carrying out these two essentials at any rate; a thorough hearing by trained experts of the pros and cons of the case and recommendations by a tariff commission to the House, and an appeal made to the people on the issue. Hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen to bring up the tariff issue, and they are taking advantage of the situation in rather an unfair way. All I have undertaken to do here to-night is to express the view—on behalf of my own constituents, on behalf of the city of Toronto, on behalf of the people of York, and also on behalf of the great industrial population of the city of Montreal and other industrial centres in this country which are absolutely under-represented—that the question of revision should be held up until we can have a thorough investigation, can hear evidence, and the people are put in a proper position to decide the question at the earliest date, if it be remitted to them. I think I am absolutely on constitutional grounds when I say that, I do not think the Progressives should oppose that proceeding. I think if they are the Progressives they claim to be, and think they are, they must listen to the people of Toronto and the people of Montreal. I am a democrat, and I am not the only one in this House, and I demand on behalf of democracy and progress, on behalf of the principle of government by the people, that the revision of the tariff shall be undertaken only after a thorough and competent investigation, that there shall be a revision of the act of distribution, and that there shall be an acceptance of the principle of equality of votes as between constituencies. It is not fair that one constituency with a population of 25,000 should have the voting power of a constituency with a population of 50,000. That does not obtain in any other modern country with a political practice similar to ours. They have that equality I want to see in the United States. Certainly the people who live in the industrial centres and pay their full share of the taxation of this country should have that share in the representation in parliament to which they are entitled.

I think I am speaking on behalf of the industrial centres of this country in saying that they want a hearing before a competent board in regard to the tariff policy of Canada; but before even that they want the representation and the redistribution question so adjusted that there will be an equality of voting power, and an improvement in the franchise. If these essentials are not granted and one attack is made on the tariff, we may hear of many other changes proposed by this irresponsible parliament that undertakes to deal with it. There has been no mandate from the people to this parliament for changes in the tariff. I should only like to point out—and I am not going to discuss the question at any length to-night, I will have the opportunity of doing so when the budget comes up,—to the members from the West that their real relief does not lie so much in change in the tariff. The farmers of the United States have tried it and failed. Real relief to our western farmers—they have had their trials, I know a great deal about them and they have my sympathy—lies in other measurse perhaps than the tariff. It is their right to ask for tariff changes but I cannot agree with them that it is the proper course to pursue. When the budget is brought down I shall take an opportunity of showing that greater relief can be brought to the farmers of this country, and especially to the people of the West in certain other directions which ought to meet with the approval of the whole House, of all the parties in this Chamber, for the amelioration of the unfair conditions under which agriculturists live.

Mr. Speaker, this is all I have to say on this occasion. I shall have an opportunity later on to discuss the Banking Act, to discuss the question of the tariff and of railway legislation. In the meantime I enter my protest against this beginning of a whittling down of the tariff policy of this country, without at the same time making provision for an immediate appeal to the people on that issue. By that issue I agree to be judged and to accept the consequences whatever they may be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not rise to take any part in the debate but to what may be called perhaps a question of privilege. I am not desiring to correct any hon. gentleman, but rather to correct myself. I find that when I stated to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) at the time given by him for the passing of the estimate for the Victoria drydock was Minister of Agriculture, I was mistaken. I was a month out in my recollection. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) resigned on the 4th of June, not on the 4th of July. Not only was he not minister at the time the estimate was passed, but on research I am convinced he was not in the government at the time the estimate was formulated; so that he can dissociate himself from the estimate altogether.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the vote is taken I would ask hon. members on both sides of the House, kindly to facilitate the task of the officers of the House in the polling of the vote. The custom is that leaders vote first, members then rising in their seats in succession, row by row. It will facilitate matters if this practice is closely adhered to.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Sutherland) which was negatived on the following division:

King, Mackenzie (York),

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed the lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House during the present session, presented this day, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the select standing committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records, with the exception of the committee on Debates and that on the Library of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH PREFERENCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the Table of the House a copy of the correspondence which took place during the proceedings of the Imperial Conference, between members of the government of Great Britain and myself on the subject of the British preference.

CATTLE EMBARGO

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I wish also to lay on the Table of the House copies of the correspondence that took place during the proceedings of the Imperial Conference between the Minister of Agriculture, Sir Robert Sanders, and myself, with respect to the cattle embargo.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: At the conclusion of last session the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) spoke to me about the negotiations that were proceeding between the government of Canada and the government of Japan in respect to the restriction of immigration from Japan, and asked if I would inform the House at that time what progress had been made with these negotiations. I intimated that I was not in a position to bring down the correspondence at the time, but that I would do so as soon as the House reassembled. I desire now to lay on the Table copies of the correspondence between the governments of Japan and Canada with respect to the subject of restriction of immigration. My hon. friend will see that the Japanese government do not, under the administrative measures now adopted, contemplate that the number of Japanese emigrants going to Canada as household servants and agricultural labourers will exceed 150 annually.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SHIPMENTS THROUGH CANADIAN PORTS

Mr. MacLAREN:

1. Has the National Railway management, as a matter of actual practice, been diverting all unrouted shipments for Atlantic export through Canadian ports? If so, since what date?
2. Has the National Railway management given any assurance to the government that unrouted shipments shall be transmitted only through Canadian ports?
3. If not, does the government propose to take such steps as may be necessary to ensure that unrouted freight be transmitted through Canadian ports?

Mr. ANDERSON:

1. Has the Campbellville drill shed property been sold?
2. If so, who was the purchaser?
3. What was the purchase price?
4. Was it sold by tender or auction?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. Yes.

2. Messrs. Murray Crawford, Ltd., Campbellville, Ont.

3. $205 for the building only.

4. Sold by public tender. The site was reconveyed to the original donor, Mr. Felix Devlin, as required by the original deed.

MEDICAL BRANCH, D.S.C.R., PORT ARTHUR

Hon. Mr. MANION.

1. Has any change been made in the medical representative of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment at Port Arthur, Ontario?
2. If so, what is such change and why was it made?

Hon. Mr. BELAND.

1. Yes.

2. Dr. Crozier was replaced by Dr. Brown. Both men had war service. Dr. Crozier was overseas and Dr. Brown in Canada. The latter, who is the senior by several years, had to tender his resignation in 1918 on account of insomnia, nervousness and generally impaired physical condition after four years of strenuous duties. He, however, recovered sufficiently to be appointed medical representative in March, 1919, and after six months was replaced by Dr. Crozier. At that date the Unit Medical Director certified that Dr. Brown's services had in every way been most satisfactory. Dr. Crozier has been titular for over four years and in view of Dr. Brown's seniority and poor physical condition it has been considered equitable to reinstate him for a time.

ST. LAWRENCE-GREAT LAKES CANAL SYSTEM

*Hon. Mr. MANION:

1. Have the governments of Canada and the United States yet appointed the engineers who are to report upon the costs of the proposed St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canal system?
2. Has a time limit been placed upon the investigation to be made by these engineers?
3. If so, what is that time limit?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government of the United States and Canada have not as yet appointed the engineers to report upon the cost of the proposed St. Lawrence-Great Lakes system.

IRON ORE BOUNTY

Hon. Mr. MANION:

1. Has the government been notified that the Ontario government is offering to give a bounty upon iron ore, providing the Dominion government gives an equal bounty?

2. If so, has the government decided upon its policy in this regard?
3. What is that policy?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Yes.
2. Receiving consideration.
3. Answered by No. 2.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. What portion of the $350,000 appropriation for work on the Hudson Bay railway was actually spent during the season of 1923-24?
2. What was the nature and extent of the work done?
3. What wages were paid the trackmen engaged on this work and what was the weekly deduction for board?

Hon. Mr. ROBB (for the Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. $112,963.27.

2. Building wye at mileage 81.0, engine house at The Pas and renewing track ties.

3. January 1st, to July 15th. Track foreman $69.60 per month and board, Labourers 25c. per hour without board.

July 16th to December 31st. Track foreman .55c. per hour without board, Labourers .30c. per hour without board.

Board. January 1st to April 30th, $6.50 per week. May 1st to December 31st, $6 per week.

EMBARGO ON LIQUOR IMPORTS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Has the government of the United States or any department thereof refused to allow the transportation across Alaska via Skagway of liquors sought to be imported in bond from Canadian ports to Yukon Territory by the government of that territory?
2. If so, how long has said embargo on Canadian imports been in operation?
3. What steps, if any, is the government of Canada taking to have this embargo on Canadian imports removed?
4. Has the government been advised as to whether said embargo will be removed? If so, when is it to be removed?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Yes.
2. Since the summer of 1922.
3. Negotiations are now proceeding with United States authorities upon the subject.
4. No.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE —COAL

Mr. NEILL:

1. What tonnage of coal was supplied to the boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine operating on the Pacific ocean during each of the calendar years of 1921, 1922 and 1923?

2. Who supplied said coal, in what quantities, and at what ports were deliveries made in each of the said years?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Hon. Mr. ROBB (for the Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. The following coal was supplied to steamers of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine operating on the Pacific coast during the years 1921, 1922 and 1923:

Year 1921.. .. .. 18,410 tons
Year 1922.. .. .. 27,936 tons
Year 1923.. .. .. 41,820 tons

2. Name of Supplier—Quantity—Port Deliveries Made:

1921—Western Fuel Corporation, 13,201 tons, Nanaimo; Wellington Comox Agency, 5,209 tons, Union Bay.

1922—Western Fuel Corporation, 20,083 tons, Nanaimo; Wellington Comox Agency, 7,853 tons, Union Bay.

1923—Western Fuel Corporation, 32,372 tons, Nanaimo; Wellington Comox Agency, 9,448 tons, Union Bay.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. NEILL:

Is it the intention of the government to appoint a committee this session, to inquire into, and report on, the subject of old age pensions?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the intention of the government to appoint a committee at this session to inquire into the subject of old age pensions.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS— PENSIONS

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is it the intention of the government to introduce during the present session a uniform Superannuation and Retirement Bill, on behalf of the employees of the National Railways?

2. If so, will the government introduce this measure at an early date?

Hon. Mr. ROBB (for the Minister of Railways and Canals): The question of a general superannuation or pension plan for employees of Canadian National Railways is at present under consideration by the management. When the matter has been dealt with by the Board of Directors and the representatives of the employees the government will take any necessary steps to provide requisite legislation.

MAIL CARRIED BY CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

Mr. WARD:

What percentage of the mail of Canada is being carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway between eastern Canada and the Pacific Coast?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): (For the Postmaster-General): Expenditure on account of the railway mail service for the whole of Canada for fiscal year, 1922-23:

Canadian Pacific Railways	$3,683,232.80
Canadian National Railways	3,178,411.02
Other Railways	615,839.07
Total	$7,477,482.89

The above figures represent approximately the percentage of mails carried by the different railways.

In every case the department has to be governed by the requirements of the postal service in the territory served by the railway, but wherever it is possible to do so preference is given to the National Railways in the carriage of the mails and the establishment of new services.

CIVIL SERVICE—SUPERANNUATION

Mr. GAUVREAU:

Is it the intention of the government to introduce at the present session, a Superannuation and Retirement Bill for the employees of the Civil Service of Canada?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: Yes.

2. What is the approximate value of this material?

Hon. Mr. ROBB (For the Minister of Railways and Canals:

1. and 2.

General plant .. ..

1. Yes.

2. By Order in Council P.C. 1632 of August 17, 1923. To effect economy and efficiency in the public service.

3. Under the supervision of a sub-committee of Council known as the Government Contracts Supervision Committee, of which Colonel Lafleche, formerly Chairman of the Purchasing Commission, is secretary.

WATER DIVERSION FROM GREAT LAKES

Mr. WHITE:

1. Has the government of Canada ever agreed to the diversion of any water from the Great Lakes by the Sanitary District of Chicago?

2. If so, when and for how many second-feet?

3. Does the government know how much water is being diverted at the present time?

4. If so, how is the information secured?

5. To what purpose is this water being diverted? Is it for sanitary purposes for the generation of power, or for the purpose of improving navigation conditions in American waters?

6. If the Sanitary District of Chicago is diverting water in excess of agreement (if any has been made) what steps is the government taking to prevent that condition continuing?

7. If no agreement has been made, what protest is being made by the government of Canada and with what results?

8. Has the Sanitary District of Chicago or the United States government made any request that Canada agree to the diversion of certain amounts of water?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Not definitely.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Claimed to be diverted for sanitary purposes and also utilized for power.

6 and 7. Representations have been and are being made to the government of the United States against the diversion of water referred to.

8. No.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT RENT, TORONTO

Mr. HOCKEN:

What is the total amount paid as rent for accommodation of the Customs department in the city of Toronto?

Hon. Mr. COPP: Building 276 King Street, West, $11,000 per annum, month to month lease. Buildings 52-54-56 West Wellington Street, $18,000 per annum, (lease expires March 1st 1925). Total annual rental $29,000.

LIGHT KEEPER, CEDARS, N.B.

Mr. JONES:

1. When did the position of Lightkeeper, Cedars, Parish of Kingston, King's County, New Brunswick, become vacant?

2. Who were the applicants for the position?

3. Were any applications received from returned soldiers?

4. Who was appointed and on whose recommendation?

5. Is the department aware that Sanford Evans, a returned soldier, with 22 months' service in France and also having two brothers each having served four years in France, was an applicant for this position?

6. Why was a returned soldier not appointed to this position?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. 14th August, 1923.

2. Frank Butler Gorham.

3. No.

4. Frank Butler Gorham, on the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

5. No.

6. See answer to No. 3.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ST. JOHN, N.B.

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. Is the Department of Railways and Canals aware that the Canadian National Railways recently issued a map, showing the rails of that road from Halifax, Sydney and Yarmouth to Prince Rupert and Vancouver and also to Portland, Maine, and to New London, Connecticut?

2. Is it true that the said map also shows Edmundston and Campbellton as connected with the Canadian National Railways?

3. Why is not St. John shown on map as connected with the rails of the Canadian National Railways?

4. How many copies of said map have been issued, at what cost and how have they been and how are they being distributed?

5. Why does said map not show the Canadian National Railways rails as extending from Moncton to St. John?

6. Why is not St. John even shown on the map?

7. To whose neglect or ignorance is this omission attributable?

Hon. Mr. ROBB (For the Minister of Railways and Canals): Map referred to was small skeleton map, approximately 3 x 5 inches, prepared by one of the constituent companies prior to amalgamation of Canadian National System, and used on inside cover of small publication entitled "Montreal-Canada," issued somewhat over a year ago by passenger traffic department. On this skeleton map St. John was unfortunately omitted. The oversight was unintentional but none the less regrettable. The booklet in question is now out of circulation. The management has been in correspondence with the St. John Board of Trade regarding the matter and steps will be taken to see that such oversight does not occur again.

DUTIES—HIDES AND WOOL

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. What are the respective quantities, values and amount of duty collected on the importation of: Raw wool, worsted tops, noils and wool waste, for the years ending March 31, 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

2. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on the imports of manufactured or partially manufactured products of wool for above years?

3. What are the quantities and values of the exports of the articles mentioned in questions one and two?

4. What is the estimated production of wool in Canada for the years mentioned in question one?

5. What are the respective quantities, values and amount of duty collected on sheep skins, imported, also quantity and value of skins exported during the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

6. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on importations of mutton and lamb, also quantities and values of the exports during the years mentioned?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Imports entered for consumption—

ADULTERATION OF MILL FEEDS

Mr. EVANS:

1. Is it the intention of the government to enforce the bill for the prevention of the adulteration of bran, shorts and other mill feeds?
2. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. COPP.

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.
2. Answered by No. 1.

INCOME TAX, 1922

Hon. Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. What was the total amount of Income Tax collected for the year 1922?
2. What was the total cost of collecting same?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Business profits war tax, $22,815,666.58; income war tax, $78,684,354.80; total $101,500,021.38.
2. (Including bonus) $2,277,349.78.

The cost of collection covers the administration of The Business Profits War Tax Act and The Income War Tax Act, as both acts were administered by the same employees.

R.C.M.P. AND MEETINGS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Were members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police present at a labour meeting at Nanaimo, September 16th, 1923?
2. Is it the policy of the government to use the police to report on the activities of the labour organizations?
3. Is it the policy of the government to use public funds and public officials to report the meetings of the other political parties represented in this House?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The minister is informed that two members of the force attended a public meeting on that date.
2. No.
3. No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. How many boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are now in service?
2. How many have been sold?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Thirty-eight.
2. Four.

STEEL PLATE MILLS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

What assistance, if any, has the government given in establishing mills in Canada for the production of steel plates for ships?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN: No assistance by the present government.

CAMPBELLO-ST. ANDREWS MAIL

Mr. GRIMMER:

1. Why was the contract with James R. Brown for carrying mail between Campbello, Deer Island and St. Andrews, cancelled?
2. By whom is the service now performed and what is the difference in cost?
3. What tenders were received for the new contract and at what figures?
4. What additional contracts have been let to cover, in part or in whole, the work performed by Mr. Brown and what is the cost of same and by whom is the work being done?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) (For the Postmaster General):

1. Representations having been made that the mail routes in that district could be rearranged to give a more efficient service at a lower cost to the department, public tenders were invited to ascertain cost with the result that offers were received which made it possible to put an improved service into effect at a saving of $170 per annum. In accordance with the terms of his contract Mr. James R. Brown was then given three months' notice of its cancellation.

2 and 4. The establishment of the improved service necessitated the supersession of the services between (1) St. Andrews and Wilson's Beach, performed by J. R. Brown at a cost of $4,800 per annum; (2) Fairhaven and Lambertville, performed by A. H. Lambert at a cost of $1,070 per annum; total $5,870 per annum; by the following services: (a) Lord's Cove and St. Andrews, performed by Messrs. Calder and Newman at a cost of $5,300 per annum; (b) Lambertville and Lord's Cove performed by L. Lambert at a cost of $200 per annum; (c) Chocolate Cove and Cummings Cove performed by A. C. Fountain at a cost of $200 per annum; total, $5,700 per annum.

3. (a) Lord's Cove and St. Andrews—Tenders received: Herbert Calder and Arthur W. Newman, Wilson's Beach, $5,300 per annum; Foster G. Calder and Frank W. Farris, Fairhaven, $5,700 per annum; James Haddon, Lord's Cove, $9,000 per annum; Harvey Johnston, Campobello, $9,100 per annum; (b) Lambertville and Lord's Cove, only tender received, L. Lambert, $200 per annum; (c) Chocolate Cove and Cummings Cove, only tender received, A. C. Fountain, $200 per annum.

RITCEY BROTHERS, RIVERPORT

Mr. LADNER:

How much money, if any, has been paid to the firm of Ritcey Brothers of Riverport, Lunenburg County, in the years 1922 and 1923, by the Department of Public Works and for what services?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the Fiscal Year 1922-23, $6,850.08 was paid for coal for Dredge No. 5.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS —VANCOUVER

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. Under what arrangement is the Canadian National Railway operating over the Great Northern Railway tracks between New Westminister and Vancouver?
2. Is it proposed that such arrangement shall be permanent or are steps being taken to provide the Canadian National with its own right of way into Vancouver?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: (For the Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. The arrangement is by running rights over the Great Northern tracks between the north end of the bridge over the Fraser river, at New Westminster and the Canadian National property at False creek, Vancouver.
2. No decision has been reached as to this by the management.

ACADIA CONTRACTORS, LIMITED

Mr. LADNER:

How much money, if any, was paid by the government to the Acadia Contractors, Limited, of Halifax, Nova Scotia, during the years 1922 and 1923, for dredging at Lunenburg harbour, by their dredge, the New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay): $37,480.76 was expended in the summer of 1923. No expenditure in 1922.

BELLEISLE CREEK POST OFFICE

Mr. JONES:

1. When and for what reason was the location of the Post Office at Belleisle Creek, King's County, changed?
2. How far is the new Post Office distant from the old one?
3. What difference in cost is there between the service from the Railway station to the old Post Office and to the new Post Office?

4. What difference in cost is there between the Rural Route numbers one, two and three, serving the old Post Office and serving the new one?

5. Was James McCreary, a returned soldier, an applicant for the position of Postmaster?

6. Why was McCreary not appointed?

7. Who was appointed to the new Post Office and on whose recommendation was the appointment made?

8. Were any letters or other communications received by the Department in connection with this Post Office from the Prime Minister and Dr. D. H. McAllister, Liberal candidate at the last general election?

9. If so, what are the dates of these letters and what requests were made by the respective writers?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argentenil): (For Postmaster General)..

1. Vacancy in office due to death of postmaster on 1st of August, 1923.

2. 2/5 miles.

3. Temporary arrangement at extra cost of $215 per annum. Tenders invited.

4. Rural route No. 1, increase 22.14 per annum, rural route No. 2, increase $24.16 per annum, rural route No. 3, not affected.

5. Yes.

6. (a) Office would not be conducted by Mr. McCreary; (b) District Superintendent's report states Mr. McCreary's location would not be favourable to postal patrons; (c) Not sufficient room in private residence for sortation of mails and separations for rural routes; (d) Location offered by person appointed by Civil Service Commission more central than that offered by McCreary; (e) McCreary had no post office experience whereas the person selected had two years' post office experience.

7. Miss Florence McAfee, appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

8. From Prime Minister, no. From Dr. D. H. McAllister, yes.

9. August 13, 1923, suggesting the appointment of Miss McAfee; November 14, 1923, recommending the appointment of Miss McAfee.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION EXPENDITURE

Mr. BOURASSA:

What was the total expenditure of the Civil Service Commission for the years 1911, 1922 and 1923, respectively?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

Bonus allowance $16,233.52.

WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS

Mr. MILLAR:

1. What contracts, if any, entered into by this government, or its predecessor, for the construction of the new Welland Canal or any section thereof have been cancelled, and for what reason?

2. At what point or points, and for what sums of money has this government contracted for the erection of government elevators since last prorogation of parliament?

Hon. Mr. COPP (for the Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. No contracts for the construction of the Welland Ship Canal were cancelled; four were abandoned under agreement of surrender in the spring of 1918 when work was closed down because of the war. Following the war the work was resumed for a time on a cost plus basis. This was followed by consolidation of certain of the sections and a return to a contract basis.

2. On October 19th, 1923, a contract was entered into by the Department of Railways and Canals for the construction of a million bushel storage annex to the Port Colborne elevator with E. G. Cape & Co., of Montreal, the contract price being $376,000.

NORTH ARM, EXPENDITURE

Mr. LADNER:

1. What amounts of money have been spent by the government of Canada during each fiscal year, on the North Arm of the Fraser river from the gulf of Georgia to the city of New Westminster, from the year 1911 to date, showing separately the amounts spent in dredging and the amounts spent otherwise?

2. On what date, or in what month and year was dredging last done on the North Arm of the Fraser river between the Fraser Avenue Bridge and the mouth of the said North Arm, and what was the cost of the same?

3. Is dredging work now being done on the North Arm of the Fraser river, and if not, when does the Department of Public Works expect the same to start?

4. Has the Minister of Public Works or his department received any requests, and if so, from whom, regarding the necessity of certain dredging to clear out sand bars or other obstructions on the North Arm of the Fraser river which actually interferes with existing traffic?

5. Was an appropriation for dredging on the North Arm of the Fraser river made during the last Session of the House of Commons? If so, how much was the appropriation?

6. Has any portion of the appropriation been expended on the North Arm of the Fraser river?

7. If so, how much, on what dates and what was the nature of works done?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1.—Fiscal Year	Dredging
1911-12	$61,938.82
1912-13	18,375.56

2. Dredging done between December 25th, 1922 and June 8th, 1923. Cost, $20,041.24.

3. No. As soon as the urgent work in the main river channel is completed.

4. Yes. From the joint committee of the reeves, members of the councils and presidents of the Boards of Trade of Point Grey, South Vancouver, Burnaby and Richmond municipalities.

5. No special appropriation, expenditure charged to general vote—Dredging—British Columbia.

6 & 7. $55,920.63 is the approximate cost of operation of departmental dredge on this work, chargeable to the general dredging vote for British Columbia: April 9-14, 1923; April 24-July 4, 1923; redredging channel to depth of 10 feet at low water and width of 150 feet.

ANNIEVILLE BAR DREDGING

Mr. LADNER:

Has dredging been done lately at the Annieville Bar or near Port Mann, or both, and is the same completed?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. Port Mann completed, Annieville Bar under way.

B.C. FISHERIES COMMISSION

Mr. McQUARRIE:

Is it the intention of the government to give effect to the recommendations contained in paragraphs 10, 14, 15, 18 and 25 of the Report of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission, 1922?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

Re paragraph 10, it was found after consultation with the Department of Justice that the difficulty could be removed without legislation. This has been done.

Re paragraph 14, special life saving arrangements have been in operation throughout the winter.

Re paragraph 15, no restrictions are placed on the catching of dogfish, and their capture is encouraged; but it has not been decided to pay a bounty for their capture.

Re paragraph 18, matter has been referred to the Biological Board for consideration.

Re paragraph 25, legislation for reorganizing the Biological Board was procured last session, and the Board has been reorganized accordingly.

DARTMOUTH PIER SITE

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. From whom was the site purchased for the pier at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia?
2. What was the price paid for said site?
3. What is the size of said site?
4. How much money was voted at the last session of parliament for the Dartmouth pier?
5. Who had the contract for the said pier?
6. What is the contract price?
7. Is there any dredging to be done in connection with said Dartmouth pier?
8. If so, has the dredging been awarded, and to whom?
9. What is the estimated cost of said dredging?
10. Will the money voted last session complete the pier?
11. Will it pay for the site, pier and dredging?
12. Has the government any waterfront property in Dartmouth near or adjoining the site selected for the Dartmouth pier which would have been available for the purpose without buying the site selected?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Messrs. Beazley Brothers.
2. Price agreed upon is $6,802.
3. 2,464 square feet of land and 27,850 square feet of land covered by water.
4. $75,000.
5. The Halifax Dredging Company, Limited, and The Standard Construction Company, Limited.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HALIFAX COUNTY

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Was a railway siding constructed by the Canadian National Railways with or without the approval of government, in 1921, in or near Queensland or Hubbards, in the county of Halifax, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, at what date was the work of construction commenced, and at what date was it finished?
3. What is the length of the siding, and what was the cost of it?
4. Is the cost of the siding a public charge in whole or in part? What proportion of cost does the public bear?

Hon. Mr. ROBB (For the Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. No.

2, 3, and 4 answered by No. 1.

REPORTED LOSSES ON EXCHANGE

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince):

Is it a fact that through some carelessness in the Finance Department during the war, that Canada will lose twenty-four million dollars in exchanges?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: The hon. member's question is answered in the negative.

In the settlement of financial matters between the Imperial and Canadian Governments, the question arose as to the rate at which sterling advances to Canada in London would be credited against the Imperial Government's indebtedness to Canada in dollars. Canada advanced a claim based upon the current rate of exchange. The Imperial Treasury officials resisted this. They contended that certain "set-offs" under which by agreement the book debts had been reduced at intervals by wiping off certain amounts of sterling advances against an equivalent amount of dollar advances, were to be regarded as finally settled at the par rate of exchange. They further pointed out that it would have been quite beyond the contemplation of the Treasury to have incurred such a heavy exchange charge, and that the alternative would be to consider the total Canadian advances as a debt to be settled by Britain in dollars when that could be done or when exchange reached par. Negotiations having resulted in failure to reach an agreement satisfactory to both sides, a friendly arbitration was arranged for by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with Rt. Hon. Mr. Asquith as arbitrator, the result of which, namely the award to Canada of $8,199,333 by way of exchange, was announced to the House last session.

CANADA'S WAR EXPENDITURE

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince):

1. What amounts are due to Canada by Great Britain on war account and what amounts, if any, have been paid on same, and how are they classified?
2. What amounts are due Canada by other countries on war account?
3. What are the names of each country, the amounts due and payments made, if any?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. $66,880,496.35 at February 28, 1924, according to the books of the Department of Finance. Credits to the account include the numerous charges and advances, during the war period and thereafter, arising from the financing by Great Britain of Canada's commitments overseas, other amounts determined to be due the Imperial Government by Canada in the adjustment of war accounts and cash payments in dollars, which since April, 1922, have amounted to $62,000,000 on account of principal.

2 and 3. Debts of Foreign Countries: Belgium, $6,709,874; France, $5,730,000; Greece, $8,174,274; Roumania, $23,969,720; Russia, $55,571.

SCRIBE HOTEL, PARIS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

With reference to the Scribe Hotel in Paris, the Honourable the Minister of Railways advised the House on June 7, 1923, as follows:

"A syndicate has been formed to take it over. A gentleman is leaving New York, I think on the 15th of June, to conclude the details."

1. What are the names and addresses of the men who compose this syndicate, and of the gentleman referred to as leaving New York?
2. What was the total amount paid by, or on account of, the Canadian National Railways for the Scribe Hotel?
3. What was the total amount paid by the syndicate for the Scribe Hotel?

Hon. Mr. ROBB (For the Minister of Railways): No syndicate exists. London capitalists offered to advance the money up to £700,000, but conditions found to exist in Paris, causing delay, and a heavy depreciation in British currency, rendered it advisable to abandon this method of financing. A company, incorporated under the laws of France, holds the property, and the stock of the company is held by the Canadian Northern Realties, controlled by the Canadian National Railway Company. A vote to pay for the property is included in the Canadian National Railway estimates.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION EXPENDITURE

Mr. CHURCH:

What was the amount spent by the Department of Immigration and Colonization during the past four years:

(a) In promoting immigration from the British Isles;

(b) In promoting immigration from the United States of America;

(c) In promoting immigration from the continent of Europe?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

(a) British Isles. 1920-21, $423,562.92; 1921-22, $302,373.04; 1922-23, $332,610.09; April 1, 1923 to January 31, 1924, $362,278.01; total, $1,420,824.06.

(b) United States, 1920-21, $456,870.41; 1921-22, $419,956,02; 1922-23, $525,363.90; April 1, 1923 to January 31, 1924, $428,488.99; total, $1,830,680.22.

(c) Continent of Europe,1920-21, nil, 1921-22, nil, 1922-23, $51,353.54; April 1, 1923 to January 31, 1924, $78,500.21; total $129,853.75.

SOLDIERS' BONUS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the government to continue the present rate of pensions paid to soldiers, and will the existing bonus paid to soldiers to next September be continued?

2. Is it intended to this year turn the said bonus into straight pension?

Hon. Mr. BELAND:

1. Legislation will be introduced in due course providing for the extension of the pension bonus.

2. Answered by No. 1.

ESTIMATES FOR 1925

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Is it true that a serious mistake was made in the preparation of the estimates for the fiscal year 1925?

2. If so, does this mistake involve the compulsory reduction in salary for several permanent statistical clerks during the fiscal year 1925?

3. What steps have been taken to rectify this mistake?

4. Who was the official responsible for this mistake?

5. Has any disciplinary action been taken with regard to this official?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is clearly an error in this question. It is worded: "Is it true that a serious mistake was made in the preparation of the estimates for the fiscal year 1925?" These estimates will be presented to parliament this afternoon.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. Has any progress been made in the promised negotiations with representatives of Japan in regard to more effective restriction of Japanese immigration?

2. Has any arrangement been arrived at? If so, what are the details?

3. Is it proposed to modify the existing 'Gentleman's Agreement' between Canada and Japan?

4. Is it the intention of the government to request the Imperial Government to abrogate the Japanese Treaty in so far as Canada is concerned?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this question will be found answered, in so far as it is advisable to answer it, by the correspondence I placed on the table a few minutes ago.

CRIMINALS PAROLED

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1. Haw many criminals have been paroled or pardoned since the election of the present Solicitor General on October 24, 1923?

2. What are their names, where were they sentenced, and when paroled or pardoned?

3. What was length of each sentence?

4. How much of each sentence has been served?

Hon. Mr. McMURRAY: Some explanation is due with regard to this question. The number of criminals paroled by pardon under the present system is 663. Quite a number of these deal with the remission of fines in liquor cases. As to the other questions asked by the hon. member, I do not think they should be answered. It has been the practice of Ministers of Justice in the past not to answer questions of this kind, and if my hon. friend desires authority on that point I would refer him to Todd's Parliamentary Government, page 651.

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I just submit at the moment that what is subject to the confidential reservation are the reports which come from the judges, wardens and the like, and certain correspondence of that character.

Mr. McMURRAY: I may say to the right hon. gentleman that Todd's Parliamentary Government lays it down as sound practice that the question of clemency is one of the high prerogatives of the Crown resting purely with the cabinet. Of course, it is obvious why the particulars should not be given in this case. Everyone will realize that it is hardly fair to a criminal under ticket of leave that he and his relatives should be exposed again to the country by putting these particulars on Hansard.

DR. J. P. MALLOY

Mr. HANSON:

1. Is Dr. J. P. Malloy of Morris, Manitoba, employed by the government or any department thereof?
2. If so, in what department and at what salary or compensation?
3. When was he appointed, and upon whose recommendation?
4. Was he appointed by the Civil Service Commission?
5. If not, under what authority was he appointed?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Yes.
2. Department of Immigration and Colonization; $200 per month plus expenses for a period not to exceed three months.
3. December 26, 1923, upon the recommendation of the Minister.
4. Appointed under Section 23 (4) of the Civil Service Act, 1918 as amended.
5. Answered by No. 4.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the government aware that the government of the United States intends turning the Chicago Sanitary Canal into a canal to connect the Great Lakes to the Mississippi?
2. Is the government aware that such a project would tend to lower the level of the St. Lawrence waterway?
3. Has there been any correspondence exchanged between the governments of Canada and the United States on this subject?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. The Government of Canada is aware that there are several bills before Congress for appropriations to build a nine-foot waterway from the west end of the Chicago Sanitary District canal to the Mississippi river, but, until appropriations are made, work cannot be started.
2. Yes.
3. In connection with this waterway Canada has filed objections to any diversion of water from the Great lakes.

FEDERAL APPEAL BOARD

Hon. Mr. MANION:

1. How many final decisions have been given by a quorum of the Federal Appeal Board?
2. Does the claimant receive a copy of the final judgment signed by the respective members of the quorum outlining its reasons for allowing or disallowing the appeal?
3. If not, is this final judgment with reasons for the decision signed by the individual members of the quorum and placed on the man's file where it can be seen by the man or his representative?
4. Will the Minister furnish a copy of the final judgments to date, outlining the reasons for the decision and signed by the respective members of the quorum of the Federal Appeal Board in the cases where the claim of the man was rejected and the decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners and Soldiers Civil Re-establishment upheld?

[Mr. McMurray.]

Hon. Mr. BELAND:

1. Twenty-nine.
2. P.C. 212, February 8th, 1924 provides in clause 3 (c) that the formal judgment shall be signed by the Chairman or presiding Commissioner and the Secretary of the Board. Such judgment may or may not contain reasons for allowing or disallowing the appeal. The claimant receives a copy of the judgment.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Yes, if a motion is placed on the Order Paper for the production of papers and providing that the judgments do not contain personal information of a confidential nature, which would be prejudicial to the interests of the appellant.

PENSION APPEAL CASES

Mr. JONES:

1. What is the total amount of pension paid up to March 15, 1924, inclusive, by the Board of Pension Commissioners on all appeal cases where their decisions have been reversed by the Federal Appeal Board?
2. What is the total amount of pension up to March 18th, 1924, inclusive which would have been paid by the Board of Pension Commissioners on all appeal cases, if the final decision of the Federal Appeal Board had been in favour of the claimant instead of upholding the decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners?
3. What are the names, salaries, and hours per day devoted to duties of the Soldiers Advisers appointed under the amended legislation of 1923?

Hon. Mr. BELAND:

1. $7,402.24.
2. Information not available. The pension payable in any case is determined only after assessment of the disability by the Board of Pension Commissioners upon receipt of a decision of the Federal Appeal Board in favour of a claimant.
3. (a)

Sedger, G. H., Victoria, B.C.	200 00

(b) Soldiers' Advisers are employed on a part-time basis, their hours are not fixed but are regulated by demands made upon them by claimants.

INDUSTRIAL REQUIREMENTS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

Have the Canadian Manufacturers submitted to the government, a report showing what the different industries of the country need for their establishment, maintenance, progress and development?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: A deputation from the Canadian Manufacturers Association presented to the government on February 23, 1922, statements of its recommendations on such subjects as the French Treaty, Canadian customs appraisal of depreciated currencies, anti-dumping legislation, marking of country of origin on imported goods, taxation, preferential tariff—Australia and Canada—and other subjects relating to trade and commerce.

CANADIAN REPARATION CLAIMS

Mr. KNOX:

1. Who is in charge of the Canadian Reparation Claims for loss by submarine warfare?
2. What salary is paid to him for work in this capacity?
3. What is the total cost of this work to date?
4. How many claims have already been made?
5. On how many of these has a decision been reached?
6. Have any claims been paid? If so, how many and what is the total amount?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. The Honourable William Pugsley, K.C., LL.D. was appointed by Order-in-Council (P. C. 165) dated 13th March, 1923, under the provisions of Part I of the Inquiries Act, Chapter 104 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and Amending Act, Chapter 28, 2 George V., a Commission for the purpose of determining whether claims by Canadians for reparation come within the categories referred to in the First Annex to Section 1 of Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles, and the fair amount of such claims, and to make such findings as may be of assistance to the government in determining which, if any of such claims should be paid and the extent of payment thereof.

2. $9,000 per annum.

3. $21,813.77 (29th February, 1924).

4. 1143 claims have been filed to the value of $42,260,664.83.

5. No report has been made in any one case, although 431 claims to the value of $28,075,559.49 have been heard.

6. No.

EMPIRE CABLE INTERESTS

Mr. NEILL:

1. What are the respective interests in Britain, Canada, Australia and New Zealand in the Pacific Cable?
2. What representatives has Canada on the Pacific Cable Board, what are their names and how were they appointed?
3. Is it a fact that telegraphers appointed by the Board are obtained only in either Britain or Australia?
4. Is the government disposed to make representations to the Board, looking to a just proportion of the appointments being allotted to Canadian citizens, preferably returned men?
5. Will the government advise their representatives on the Board to object to Orientals being employed at the cable stations in Canada?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Great Britain five-eighteenths; Canada, five-eighteenths; Australia, six-eighteenths; and New Zealand, two-eighteenths.

2. Lucien T. Pacaud and Sir Campbell Stuart, K.B.E. appointed by the Governor in Council.

3. It is understood that Canadians have been appointed to the staff and that applications from Canadians for appointments are considered by the board

4. The question will be referred to the Canadian members of the board with a request that they make representations for a just proportion of the appointments being allocated to Canadians, preferably returned men.

5. This matter will similarly be referred to the Canadian members of the board.

NET DEBT OF CANADA

Mr. BOYS:

1. What was the net debt of Canada at the end of the following fiscal years: 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?
2. What was the amount of the net debt on March 15th, 1924?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1919	$1,574,531,032.44

2. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on eggs imported, also the quantity and value of eggs exported from Canada, during the years ending March 31, 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

3. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on butter imported during the years above mentioned, also the quantity and value of butter exported?

4. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on the imports of pork and pork products such as fresh, salted and cured bacon and hams, lard, etc., also the exports of same for the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

5. What are the respective quantities, value and duty collected on imports of oleomargarine for the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

6. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on imports of material used in the manufacture of oleomargarine for 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

7. What are the quantities and values of the exports of oleomargarine for the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Stand as an order for return.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It ought to be easy to secure the answer to this question in the course of an hour or two in the department affected.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, there is a rule of the House which gives the government the privilege of answering a question by bringing down the information in the form of a return. This applies in the case of questions involving long answers.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

VICTORY BONDS—LIABILITY OF BANKS

Mr. STEEDSMAN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, agreements and other documents, exchanged between any person or persons, or corporations, or banks, and the Department of Finance or any other department of the government, relating to the responsibility and liability of the banks in holding or keeping Victory Bonds issued in favor of private individuals or coporations.

BELLEISLE CREEK POST OFFICE

Mr. JONES:

For a return giving a copy of all correspondence, memoranda and other documents relating to the closing of the post office at Belleisle Creek, King's County, and the opening of a new post office in its stead; and including all information in the possession of the department as to the cost occasioned thereby; also for copy of all correspondence, tenders and other documents in connection with Rural Routes numbers one, two and three, in relation to the closing of the old post office and the opening of the new; and of all correspondence and other records in connection with the appointment of a postmaster at Belleisle Creek.

R. DENORAN, YORKTON

Mr. CAMPBELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and other documents in the possession of the government in connection with a claim held by the government against R. Denoran, of Yorkton, Sask., which claim covers a number of fines collected by him in his capacity as a Justice of the Peace in the province of Saskatchewan.

COAL LEASE 2241

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents referring to coal lease 2241, and all correspondence between J. H. Thornton and the Department of Interior in reference thereto.

KENTVILLE-HALIFAX SERVICE

Mr. MARTELL:

For a copy of all minutes of evidence, documentary evidence, applications, letters, judgments, orders for judgments, arguments of Counsel, and other documents relating or in anywise appertaining to the application to the Railway Commission of Canada by the Dominion Atlantic Railway for leave to reduce railway train services between Kentville and Halifax in the Province of Nova Scotia, and in connection with the hearing of said application in February, 194, by said Board of Railway Commissioners.

YUKON COUNCIL

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

For a copy of all correspondence between any officials of the Department of Interior, and all other correspondence in possession of the government, concerning the sessional indemnity of members of the Yukon Council, such correspondence being dated since January 1st, 1922.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER POWER

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, applications, agreements, letters and other documents exchanged between the government of Ontario and the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario and the government of Canada, relating to the construction of a power dam on the St. Lawrence River near the town of Morrisburg for the generation of electric power for the use of the people of the eastern part of the Province of Ontario.

EMBARGO ON PULPWOOD

Mr. HANSON:

For a copy of all Orders in Council passed since the last session of Parliament relating to the question of an embargo on pulpwood, and of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents relating thereto, exchanged between the government of Canada or any member thereof and any person, firm, company or corporation, including the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association or the American Pulp and Paper Association.

J. B. LEVESQUE

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and J. Bte. Levesque of Trois Pistoles, Quebec, during the year 1923, and also correspondence between the government and any department of the government of Quebec with respect to the said Levesque.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY ACT—REGULATIONS

Mr. MACLAREN:

For a copy of all regulations and conditions passed by the Governor in Council under Section 11, Chapter 13 of the Statutes of 1919, being The Canadian National Railway Act, since the 21st of February, 1923.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM GREAT LAKES

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, petitions, protests, letters, resolutions and other documents exchanged between the government and any person or persons or organizations, or Provincial governments or other public bodies in Canada, protesting against the illegal diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes by the Chicago Drainage Commission and of any and all correspondence with the government of the United States, the International Joint Commission or others on the subject.

CANADIAN NORTHERN BRANCH LINES, ONTARIO

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all papers, letters, contracts, estimates and agreements, telegrams, and all other documents (including the cost of construction) and relating to the abandonment of the C.N.R. line between Orono and Cherrywood and the electrification of the line between Bowmanville and Pickering and for the construction of a national railway between Bowmanville and Oshawa and also between Pickering and Cherrywood joining the C.N.R. at that point, including all reports of the engineers, officials, and other experts of the Canadian National Railways recommending such a duplication of railways and the abandonment of the original C.N.R. line throug Durham and Ontario counties, and of all petitions and other correspondence opposing this duplication and paralleling of existing line.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: There is no objection to bringing down correspondence and petitions, and so forth, concerning this situation, but it is deemed to be inadvisable and not in the public interest at the present time, owing to certain negotiations that are in progress, to bring down estimates, agreements, contracts, and so forth. I would therefore ask my hon. friend not to press his motion except as amended.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend would consult with me I can point out to him that portion of the motion that should be stricken out in the public interest. To the balance of the motion we would have no objection. We will let the matter rest until to-morrow on that understanding.

Motion stands.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and that of the United States regarding the carrying out of the joint international report relating to the St. Lawrence Waterway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think all this correspondence has already been brought down. The first of it was tabled last session, and two or three days ago, I laid on the Table the correspondence that has since taken place. I think my hon. friend will find that the correspondence is all down.

Mr. CHURCH: I think the House is entitled to the correspondence which has taken place between the two governments. The last time a motion for the production of papers on this question was before the House, the Prime Minister brought down two or three letters only referring to the most economic problem before the country. In the dying days of last session the government were asked for the correspondence showing what had been done up to that time, and the reply was made that the time was not opportune to produce it. During the parliamentary recess there must have been considerable correspondence between the two governments on this very important question, and I think the House is entitled to have the information as far as it is possible to obtain it.

Mr. SPEAKER: No debate, of course, can take place on this motion. I understand from the answer given by the Prime Minister that the papers asked for have already been laid on the Table.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that the motion be allowed to pass. Even if it involves repetition no harm will result.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the slightest objection to the passing of the motion. I simply wish to make it clear that the request has already been met.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1924-25

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1925, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb, (Acting Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

[Mr. Graham..]

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned a day or two ago that when the estimates were brought down hon. members would be able to see the intention of the government with respect to the bonus to be given to civil servants. The relevant item will be found on page 61, of the estimates just tabled, under "Miscellaneous", it is item 363, and reads—

Provisional bonus allowance for the inside and outside services of the Civil Service, to be paid to such persons and classes of persons, in such amounts and at such times as the Governor in Council may determine: $3,800,000.

That is $1,700,000 less than the amount which this House voted at the last session for bonus to be paid civil servants in addition to their salaries. The government did not feel, in view of the retrenchment which they are finding it necessary to make and seeking to make, that they would be justified in longer continuing the bonus to members of the Civil Service who are unmarried, and who have no one dependent on them. On the other hand, with respect to members of the service who are married, or unmarried members of the service who have one or more persons dependent on them, it was represented to the government very strongly from many quarters, that to withdraw the bonus in their case pending a revision of civil service salaries might work a considerable hardship. This aspect of the matter was brought to the attention of the government more particularly by the hon. members for Ottawa who, perhaps, more than any other members of the House, are familiar with the circumstances of many members of the Civil Service, and the government have taken carefully into consideration such representations as they and others have made.

With respect to members of the Civil Service other than those who are unmarried and have no one dependent on them, the government proposes, as respects all such as are receiving a salary of $1,200 and under, to continue the bonus at the rate at which it was continued last year. With respect to members in the service receiving a salary of over $1,200 and up to $1,560 inclusive, the government proposes to continue the bonus at the rate of two-thirds of the amount which is being paid at the present time. To those receiving over $1,560 and up to $1,800 inclusive, one-third of the present bonus will be continued. In other cases the bonus will be discontinued.

I should mention as related to this matter of the bonus that the government intends to have an immediate revision made of the salaries of the Civil Service. It is our intention to ask the Civil Service Commission to undertake this work in conjunction with the deputy heads of the government departments and the Audit Board which has been appointed under legislation enacted last session, they will be asked to report to the government what, in their opinion, should be done by way of revision of the salaries of the civil servants. When the report is received, the government will take such action on its recommendations as in the circumstances appear to be warranted and justifiable. I should say also, in connection with this revision of salaries, that the government will seek to have provision made whereby the members of the Civil Service themselves, through their representatives, may appear before the commission and be taken into conference in the matter.

There is a feature that perhaps it is well to mention namely that at the time the bonus was added to the salaries of the Civil Service, there was a great deal of unemployment throughout the country. It was very difficult for persons to obtain ready admission into other employment, should they leave the service. Conditions in that particular have considerably improved. There is the further fact that from the time the bonus was first given, there have been in the case of most of those who are permanent in the service, statutory increases, year by year, which have increased considerably the amounts they were receiving at the time the bonus was first granted. The government realises that this is a very difficult question to deal with, and in announcing what I am at the moment, I am putting before the House what after very careful consideration of the interests of the civil servants and the public interest has seemed to the government the wise course to adopt.

I should mention also that the government intends at the present session to introduce a Superannuation Act. It has been felt that to complete the work of reorganisation of the Civil Service, as this reorganisation has already been undertaken and is being carried on in part by the Audit Board, it was desirable, in order that justice may be done those who are in the service at present and whose services may be dispensed with or who may subsequently enter the service, that a Superannuation Act should be immediately put through. The bill will be introduced in this House at the present session.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister say whether this Audit Board is given all its powers under the authority of the act of last session, or has the government vested it with powers under some other act as well as under the act of last session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The act of last session, as I recall it, gives the government power by order in council to extend the powers of the Audit Board in certain directions, or rather to authorize the Audit Board to undertake certain additional duties. Such duties as the Audit Board has had imposed upon it are those given by order in council or under the act as it stands, not by other legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the Prime Minister bring down the order in council or orders in council empowering the Audit Board, because if what he says is correct to-day, the announcements in the press are entirely wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will take great pleasure in placing on the Table the order in council to which my right hon. friend refers. As to the press reports, I do not know the particular press reports to which he alludes. If he is referring to his own press, I quite admit that some of the reports are wholly incorrect, but I think the country is now generally in possession of the facts.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. SPEAKER: By tradition of the House, it is customary to permit the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) to ask a question or two, but a statement made by the leader of the House (Mr. Mackenzie King) under these circumstances is not debatable.

LIFE INSURANCE LAPSED POLICIES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, subject to certain reasonable charges including a certain sum for overhead expenses, lapsed policies of life insurance of companies with federal charters should be returned to the insured, and that in the interests of the insured such confiscatory powers of these companies should be further revised.

He said: The purpose of this resolution is to guarantee to the public the full benefit under all insurance policy contracts. This matter has been referred to by the Department of Insurance of the government in their reports for some years past. My motion would provide that, in the case of lapsed policies there should be a certain return to the insured. It means, not that the whole sum should be returned, but that the sum, subject to reasonable charges, as the resolution says, should be returned to these unfortunates. This motion is to press the government to have parliament look into the recommendations of their own insurance advisers and to see if they cannot amend the statute accordingly. Last session was devoted very largely to the Bank Act for the protection of depositors, and as regards life insurance, it is not altogether fair to the poorer class that their policies should lapse. These insurance companies take in millions of dollars in lapsed policies, and we seek protection against such confiscatory powers as life insurance companies have at present. The present law is not altogether fair to the man of small means; he is fighting a large corporation. The war has made a great difference in this respect. If you look over the report of the Department of Insurance, you will find that in a table on page 7 the amount is going up from year to year—especially during and since the war—of lapsed policies of people who are not able to pay their insurance premiums and whose policies are taken away from them by law. The amount runs into millions of dollars. Many of these people in days like these are out of work through no fault of their own; many of them are returned men who have been driven to the wall by hard times and the high cost of living, and the first thing to go has been the insurance policy, because the premiums cannot be kept up. As regards the high cost of living to-day, the table speaks for itself; it shows that in comparison with other countries, Canada is at the top of the list. The money held by these companies really consists of funds that rightfully belong to the estates of these unfortunate people, who permitted their policies to lapse after making a sufficient number of annual premium payments to give their policies some insurance value. I would suggest that the law be amended so as to provide that, after a sufficient deduction is made for overhead expenses, the policy holders should have a substantial part of their premiums paid them. The money confiscated by these companies consists of funds which rightly belong to the estates of unfortunate persons who in hard times were driven to allow their policies to lapse, after having made a sufficient number of annual premium payments to give those policies a paid-up or substantial insurance value. Some of the companies are lax in not acquainting the poorer policy holders with the law in regard to lapsed policies. The law provides that after a period of three years a policy holder shall have a claim upon the company in the event of a policy lapsing; but some of the companies are not informing the policy holders of this fact. The Insurance Act, like the Bank Act, needs revision. In the United States the statistics show that in the past twenty-five years policies have lapsed to the extent of $10,000,000,000, and a survey of conditions in Canada should, I think, be made to discover the losses to the working classes in this country from this source. If such a survey were made I believe that a similar state of things would be revealed. The failure of companies fully to advise their policy holders of the value of their policies is responsible in part for this condition. Many persons who have permitted their policies to lapse do not know that such policies have a value if they have been in force for more than three years, and it has been pointed out that the insurance companies, taking advantage of this ignorance on the part of the public, have failed to notify the holders of lapsed policies of such value. I do not say that the companies all do this deliberately; but undoubtedly, through negligence at any rate, the policy holders are made to suffer in this way.

It is only fair, however, as pointed out by the Superintendent of Insurance, to say on behalf of the companies that, as in everything else, there are two sides to this argument. Section 180 of the Insurance Act of 1917 provides for a surrender value on policies of which three or more annual premiums have been paid. Sub-section 4 of this section provides for extended insurance until the cash surrender value is accepted or until the surrender value has been used up. And in the case of a policy lapsing when in force only a short time, both the insured and the company suffer. The policy holder loses the status he has achieved from beginning his insurance policy and acquiring the protection, and the company loses the business before it becomes profitable, as the cost to the company of acquiring new business is often in excess of the first premium. These are the views of the Superintendent of Insurance as expressed in a letter written to myself. He concludes:

> As to the amount of the cash surrender value, it should always be borne in mind that while the policy is being in force the company is liable for the face of the policy which liability is worth something to the insured and the cost of which must be deducted in arriving at the cash surrender value.

In Ontario there has been a great deal of complaint in this direction in regard to provincial companies. Many friendly societies have not been able to make ends meet and have by legislation cut down the amount of the policy and raised their rates, and I would suggest that when an investigation is made into this matter it should embrace the whole subject of insurance in Canada covering both provincial companies and those doing business under a federal and provincial charter. In the larger cities the condition is serious, and from the district which I represent I have received many letters from insured persons complaining of the remissness of the companies along the lines I have indicated. The loss ratios by provinces for the year 1923 as compared with the year 1922 show on the whole an increase. In this connection I might read the following statement from the Inspector of Insurance made on the first day of October, 1923:

> The total amount of business lapsed and surrendered in 1922 in Canada amounted to $288,838,320. Five years ago, in 1917, the total new business effected in Canada was $282,120,430. The business lapsed and surrendered in 1922 amounted to 50 per cent of the gross business issued. So long as this high rate of premature discontinuance prevails life insurance will fail to convey the benefits which by its very nature it is designed to convey to the insuring public, and it is to be hoped that investigation will lead to the discovery of the cause of this form of waste and to its ultimate removal.

Many of the companies are being criticized in Canada, and the other day one company was ordered by the department to deposit $50,000 more and additional security for the protection of its policyholders in order to hold up the financial end of the concern. I think there should be a survey made of all the companies before they fail. Who would have suspected before last June that the Home Bank would collapse? According to some of the pamphlets that were put out by the Bankers' Association, people thought it was almost impossible for shareholders or depositors to lose their money. It all goes to show that the whole insurance situation needs a revision in the interests of the insured. The same catastrophe that overtook the Home Bank might to-morrow occur in connection with the insurance companies. There is necessity of a thorough survey of all insurance companies, from the financial and other standpoints for the protection of policy holders. There can be no doubt of its necessity. In the last annual report of the Canada Life, one of the best companies we have in Canada, the following statement appears:

> It is unfortunately unavoidable that some policy holders should through various circumstances find it impossible to continue their insurance, and during the past two or three years these terminations the world over have been aggravated by prevailing conditions. We have not escaped our share of this misfortune but, despite it, we have made the very substantial gain of $51,454,000 in our total assurances, bringing them up to $412,435,000. We have again been favoured with unusually low death losses, reflecting not only a generally good public health but a careful valuation by our selection committee of the lives offered us.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me express the hope that the government will see to it that the recommendations of the Superintendent of Insurance be carried out and that in the recess of parliament some independent inquiry and survey be made of the whole insurance situation with regard to the solvency of the companies and from the point of view of their compliance with the law and their whole affairs. If the minister can give me some assurance that this will be done I shall be glad to withdraw the resolution. I suggest, however, that he should endeavour to carry out the very able and very sensible recommendations which have emanated from his own department. The department is a very good one and the report to which I have referred is a very fine report. I hope that the minister will encourage the officials to extend this inquiry and to see to it that the law is enforced and that the smaller policy holders and those whose policies have lapsed get additional protection.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the mover of this resolution (Mr. Church) has touched upon a very important feature of our business and of our national life. His remarks, I may say, went much further than the resolution goes, and I am inclined to agree with his remarks rather than with the resolution itself.

It is very important that the insurance business should be thoroughly investigated by a committee of this House, just as the banking business should be investigated. The resolution refers to one aspect of the matter, but there are also other features which should be considered. The amount of life insurance done in this country is tremendous and the number of policies in force is very large. I believe that the insurance companies have had a comparatively easy time in getting money for which in many cases they do not give a proper return. One question has been brought to my attention which should, it seems to me receive consideration, and that is in regard to participating policies, as they call them. I am told that in the United States no insurance company is allowed to write both participating and non-participating policies; that is, a company must choose which form of policy it will issue or which form of business it will do. In Canada, however, our insurance companies may write either participating or non-participating policies, and I am told that in the case of non-participating policies the policy holders are in many instances paying money for which they get no return of any consequence; that is to say, they pay an extra premium for the privilege of participating in the profits of the company but they have no chance in the world of even getting back the amount that they are paying by way of extra premium. If that is so, these insurance companies are taking the people's money for nothing. That of course does not apply to all insurance companies. I think this is a matter which should be thoroughly investigated. I am strongly of the opinion that the subject of insurance is one which should receive the attention of the House, and I suggest that the proper way of doing it would be to refer the whole question of life insurance business in Canada to a proper committee of the House.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has introduced a very large and a very wide question, that of providing for old age and providing for dependents. It is the duty of the Department of Insurance to protect the insured rather than the companies; to see that ample justice is done to the insured and that his investments are properly protected. There appears to have been some misunderstanding between the whips with regard to the resolutions coming before the House this afternoon. I imagine that a number of hon. gentlemen desire to speak on this question, because everyone is interested in insurance. I have here a memorandum from the Superintendent of Insurance which indicates that he has been trying for some days to reach the hon. member for North Toronto, to find out what information he really desired in connection with the resolution. It would seem—and I gather that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) has the same impression—that the remarks of the hon. member for North Toronto open up a much wider field than that included within the resolution itself. If it is agreeable to him I would move the adjournment of the debate so that we may take the matter up some other day when we may hear from all members of the House who are interested.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

EQUALITY OF GROUNDS FOR RELIEF AS BETWEEN THE SEXES

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, legislation should be introduced in order to place the wife on an equality with the husband as regards the grounds upon which divorce may be obtained.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I present to the House is very narrow in its compass and will not, I think, be the subject of much debate. At the outset I would like to make it abundantly clear that the resolution does not propose in any way to widen the grounds for divorce. I quite realize that many members of the House, and certainly a large number of persons outside the House, have conscientious objections to the granting of divorces, but this resolution aims only to place the husband and the wife upon exactly the same plane so far as the grounds for divorce are concerned.

The law of divorce in Canada has been described as a patchwork law, and I think it has probably been correctly described. I want just for a moment to indicate the situation as I understand it to-day. The federal government has exclusive jurisdiction in matters of marriage and divorce, but it was provided in the British North America Act, by which this exclusive jurisdiction was vested in the federal government, that the laws in force in the various confederating provinces and the courts in existence therein were to be continued until repealed or altered by some competent authority. Then by another section of the British North America Act it was provided that a similar provision should apply to provinces that might subsequently join the confederation. Now under those circumstances it is necessary for one to ascertain the conditions in the various provinces. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island before confederation each had a divorce court operating in those provinces, and those courts are in existence to-day. In Nova Scotia either party to a marriage contract may secure a divorce on the grounds of adultery, impotence, cruelty or consanguinity. In New Brunswick divorce may be secured on the grounds of adultery, impotence or consanguinity; in Prince Edward Island the grounds are impotence, adultery or consanguinity. These courts, as I say, are constituted and organized and are effective to-day so far as granting divorces is concerned. In those Maritime provinces there is no question whatever but that the wife and the husband stand on exactly the same ground so far as the causes for divorce are concerned. Now, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, —and with respect to the latter province I speak subject to correction by my legal friends from Quebec,—there are no divorce courts, that is, no courts which have jurisdiction in granting divorces or dissolutions of the marriage tie.

Turning our eyes westward for a few moments I would like to direct the attention of the House to the situation in the four western provinces. Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta each have divorce courts. These courts in divorce matters are governed by the English law as it stood on the 15th of July, 1870. The courts of the province of British Columbia having jurisdiction in divorce matters are governed by the English law as it stood on the 19th of November, 1858. The result of this is that in the four western provinces the Matrimonial Causes Act passed by the Imperial parliament in 1857 is in full operation and effect.

Mr. GRAHAM: That has been amended recently, has it not?

Mr. SHAW: The law of England has been amended, and I shall come to that in a moment. The section of that act to which I wish to draw the attention of the House reads as follows:

> It shall be lawful for any husband to present a petition to the said court, praying that his marriage may be dissolved, on the ground that his wife has since the celebration thereof been guilty of adultery; and it shall be lawful for any wife to present a petition to the said court praying that her marriage may be dissolved, on the ground that since the celebration thereof her husband has been guilty of incestuous adultery, or bigamy with adultery, or of rape, or of sodomy, such cruelty as without adultery would have entitled her to a divorce a mensa et thoro, or of adultery coupled with desertion, without reasonable excuse for two years or upwards; and every such petition shall state as distinctly as the nature of the case permits the facts on which the claim to have such marriage dissolved is founded: Provided that for the purpose of this act incestuous adultery shall be taken to mean adultery committed by a husband with a woman with whom if his wife were dead he could not lawfully contract marriage by reason of her being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity; and bigamy shall be taken to mean marriage of any person, being married to any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place within the Dominion of Her Majesty or elsewhere.

Translated into ordinary simple English this section means that while a husband may secure a divorce from his wife on the ground of adultery, the wife must, in order to succeed, be able to substantiate one of the following charges: 1. Incestuous adultery; 2. Bigamy with adultery; 3. Rape; 4. Sodomy or bestiality. And next we come to the two grounds to which I wish to particularly direct the attention of the House; they are adultery coupled with such cruelty as without adultery would justify judicial separation, and adultery coupled with desertion without reasonable excuse for two years or upward.

That is the English law as it stood in 1870, and those are the grounds only on which a married woman could secure a divorce from her husband. Why was equality denied in England, you may very well ask, at this particular time? Well, the debates of that day indicate that one of the main reasons was that men made the law, and the second reason given was that adultery was considered a more grievous offence against the wife than against the husband because of the possibility of the introduction of illegitimate children into the family. In other words, by this particular legislation the law created a monopoly so far as redress was concerned in the interests of the husband. It is rather interesting, however, to note that even in that day there were staunch advocates of equality between the husband and the wife. Lord Lyndhurst, in a very able address in the British House of Lords, presented the view for equality, and may I be permitted just for a few moments to read to the House the statements of Mr. Gladstone in that debate. Mr. Gladstone himself was conscientiously opposed to the granting of divorces, but he urged equality as between the sexes in these words:

> For my own part I shall always assert the principle of equal rights. It is impossible to do a greater mischief than to begin now, in the middle of the 19th century, to undo, with regard to womankind, that which has already been done in their behalf, by slow degrees, in the preceding 18 centuries, and to say that the husband shall be authorized to dismiss his wife on grounds for which the wife shall not dismiss the husband. If there is one broad and palpable result of Christianity, which we ought to regard as precious, it is that it has placed the seal of God Almighty upon the equality of man and woman with respect to everything that relates to these rights: and I will offer the utmost resistance to any attempt to induce this House to adopt a measure which, I believe, would lead to the degradation of woman.

Now how does the legislation work out in actual practice in the four western provinces? As I have already pointed out in order to secure a divorce the woman is called upon to prove something more than the man is called upon to prove. She must in addition to adultery prove legal cruelty or she must prove desertion. Now one naturally questions the meaning of cruelty. If one were to examine the dictionary one would ascertain that it means inhuman treatment, or a disposition to inflict unnecessary pain or suffering on others, but in its legal sense the word has an altogether different meaning. I want to read from a judgment of the Appellate Court of Ontario which gives in a very few words the exact legal definition of cruelty.

> To establish cruelty one must show treatment likely to produce or which produces physical illness or mental distress of a nature calculated permanently to affect her bodily health or endanger her reason, and that there is reasonable apprehension that the same state of things will continue.

These words are taken from a decision of the Appellate Court, in 1920. It is rather interesting to note, however, that Chief Justice Meredith, while he reluctantly agreed with the decision added these significant words:

The law is not in accord with modern views as to the relations between husband and wife. That it is such is to be deplored. Her life may be made a veritable hell upon earth and she is without remedy if robust enough to suffer it all without impairment of her physical health or her mentality.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not a fact that in several of the provinces where there are divorce courts the majority of judges, although cruelty is given as a ground for divorce as well as adultery, interpret cruelty to mean adultery?

Mr. SHAW: No, cruelty is never interpreted to mean adultery. I presume my hon. friend means that perhaps the courts, upon finding adultery presume cruelty. I take it that, perhaps, is what he means by his question. If my hon. friend will listen to these few instances I propose to quote he will see that his view is not the interpretation which the law bears in the various cases I wish to mention. In an Alberta case cited as B. vs. B. and found at page 894 of Volume 3 of the Weekly Western Reports for the year 1919, Mr. Justice Scott, now Chief Justice Scott, held that—"the fact that on one occasion a husband came home drunk and called his wife vile names before other people did not constitute legal cruelty sufficient together with acts of adultery to entitle her to divorce, the admitted adultery alone not entitling her to divorce."

In the 1921 case of Torsell vs. Torsell, reported at page 200 in 16 A.L.R. Chief Justice Harvey in giving the judgment of the appellate court used this language:

It has been accepted in England that legal cruelty to support a wife's claim must be such as to cause danger to life, limb or health present or future. There may be much room for dissatisfaction, but that is a matter which can be easily and effectively cured by the legislature if it desires.

In that case untrue charges of infidelity were made publicly by a husband. In Saskatchewan I find the case of Moon vs. Moon in the year 1913, reported in 6 S.L.R. at page 41. In that case the husband accused his wife, in the presence of a thirteen-year-old daughter, of adultery and under circumstances greatly aggravating the offence. The judge held these facts did not constitute legal cruelty, but he significantly added that he was pleased to have the English authority of Russel vs. Russell with which to justify his ruling. All these cases, I may say, are based upon a judgment in the year 1790 in the Matrimonial and Ecclesiastical court in England, and the latest accepted exposition of the law is the case of Russell vs. Russell, decided in England in 1895 by a 5 to 4 decision of the House of Lords. British Columbia courts afford some instances of similar rulings. In Walsh vs. Walsh, reported at page 482 in 20 B.C.R. in the year 1914, it appears that the wife stated that she became nervous because her husband kept a razor and sharp knife under his pillow in the bed where both slept. The husband stated that he wished to protect himself. The wife asked —I am quoting from the record—"Why do you want to protect yourself?" To which the husband answered, "I thought you might do me some harm while I was sleeping." The court held that legal cruelty was not established, that mere nervousness was not sufficient, and that the wife had not stated that she feared acts of violence, or that the weapons were kept by him for that purpose.

Let me also quote the Manitoba case of Dorset v. Dorset, decided in 1921 and reported in 57 D.L.R. at page 636. In that case the husband's adultery in his own residence was clearly proven. The court held that the husband's adultery in his own residence, where his wife stayed during a period of convalescence, did not constitute legal cruelty entitling her to divorce because the evidence did not show that her health was thereby impaired. In that case Chief Justice Mathers used this language:

Respondent's conduct in brazenly committing adultery with a paramour without any attempted concealment and in utter disregard of all decency no doubt constituted cruelty in the popular sense but not in a legal sense.

I am not stating these cases for the purpose of criticizing the courts, because I think the courts have followed precedents and have given, in my humble judgment, correct interpretations of the law. I do so, for the purpose of showing the difficulties that a wife labours under in the four western provinces when she seeks to establish her right to divorce, even where adultery on the part of her husband is admitted. Nor is that all. The courts require that the cruelty should be corroborated, and if anyone questions that I would refer them to the English case of Judd vs. Judd, which was decided in the year 1907 by the probate division in England. Now, it is seldom that the husband commits either adultery or cruelty in public, and if when adultery is committed the wife must have corroborative evidence to prove the cruelty then you can understand the difficulty and the tremendous handicap under which she, in my judgment, wrongly labours. On the other hand suppose the wife, in addition to proving the adultery, does not rely upon legal cruelty but is forced to rely on the ground of desertion for two years and upwards. Hon members will note that the statute reads:

Desertion for upwards of two years without reasonable excuse.

Now, the words "without reasonable excuse" afford a very wide latitude for a husband to escape from the consequences of his conduct. The situation then, Mr. Speaker, is clearly this—that a husband may indulge in every variety of infamy connected with adultery, he may use every refinement of cruelty short of legal cruelty, and he may violate every human law, and yet escape the proper and legitimate consequences of his act. That is the situation, in short, in the four western provinces. Of course it may be urged that parliament grants divorces. That is quite true. The parliament of Canada does grant divorce, and applicants before this parliament stand on an even footing. But I need only point out, that if one examines the list of applications for divorce from the western provinces you will find comparatively few. The initial expense—the fees totalling something like $210—is of itself a considerable deterrent. To that must be added the expense of attendance in the city of Ottawa; the expense of the attendance of witnesses in this city perhaps for longer or shorter periods; and the result is that so far as the parliament of Canada is concerned it is practically inaccessible to women who contemplate applications for divorce.

Mr. MARTELL: I do not want to be interrupting my hon. friend, but I am interested in this matter, too. We have our divorce court in Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick has its divorce court, and I think what my hon. friend is advocating already obtains in both these provinces, and possibly in British Columbia. I think of late it has been decided that the new provinces in the West have the right to grant divorces without the applicants coming to parliament, and under the rules in force here I understand that women are on an equality with men. Now, what my hon. friend is advocating is that these rights be conferred on the courts of the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, divorce being a matter of federal domain in those provinces.

Mr. SHAW: Quite right.

Mr. MARTELL: In the final analysis, if these rights are transferred to the provinces the whole thing becomes a matter of procedure in the provincial courts.

Mr. SHAW: No, it is not a matter of procedure in the courts, because the exclusive jurisdiction in these matters rests with the parliament of Canada.

Mr. MARTELL: I understand that.

Mr. SHAW: And unless the parliament of Canada legislates, the applicants for divorce must labour under the difficulties found in the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857, at least so far as the four western provinces are concerned.

Mr. MARTELL: The parliament of Canada has no right to take away from us the right we had before confederation.

Mr. SHAW: Quite right. I mentioned that in opening. The British North America Act protects the rights of the Maritime provinces and other provinces in that regard. The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857, by which our four western provinces are governed now, is not now the law of England. In the year 1912 a very representative commission was appointed in England for the purpose of going into this whole subject of divorce, and it made a report to parliament. It is a very comprehensive report. The individuals who composed that commission are security enough to show that the whole matter was thoroughly and amply ventilated. They called witnesses from every part of England, and from practically every walk in life, and representatives of every religious denomination. As a result of their report, while they disagreed upon some things, they at least were unanimous on this matter of placing the sexes upon an equality, so far as grounds for divorce are concerned. I wish to take the privilege of reading to the House one or two very short extracts. In the report of this commission I find this statement—

Apart from abstract justice the strongest reason for placing sexes on an equality is that, where two standards exist, there is a tendency to accept the lower for both parties. The social and economic position of women has greatly changed in the last hundred, and even in the last fifty years. The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has given them a new status in regard to property; they engage freely in business and in the professions, and in municipal, educational and Poor Law administrations, and claim equality of treatment with men. In our opinion it is impossible to maintain a different standard of morality in the marriage relations, without creating the impression that justice is denied to women, an impression that must tend to lower the respect in which the marriage law is held by women.

I suggest that the reasons given there apply with equal force to the conditions in Canada. I will read, in conclusion, the recommendation of that commission. It reads—

> Our conclusion is that no satisfactory solution of the problem which is raised as to the personal relations between husband and wife can be found, except by placing them on an equal footing, and by declaring that, whatever grounds are permitted to a husband for obtaining a divorce from his wife, the same grounds shall be available to a wife in a suit against her husband. It may be safely left to a woman to consider whether she will exercise her rights, and it may reasonably be expected that, as has been proved by actual experience in Scotland, physical, social, pecuniary, and other considerations will have their natural effect, and lead to such rights not being exercised, at any rate in the great majority of cases, without such good and sufficient reason as will meet with the approval of relations and friends of the wife.

Now, actuated by the report of this commission, the English parliament in the year 1923 passed a law amending the Matrimonial Causes Act, and this clause was substituted for the provisions which I have previously referred to:

> 2. It shall be lawful for any wife to present a petition to the Court praying that her marriage may be dissolved on the ground that her husband has, since the celebration thereof and since the passing of this Act been guilty of adultery: Provided that nothing contained herein shall affect or take away any right of any wife, existing immediately before the passing of the Act.

That is all the legislation that this parliament needs to pass on the matter—simply that and nothing more. It will simply place the married woman in the four western provinces on a parity with the female applicants for divorce in the Maritime provinces and before this parliament of Canada. This is the only form in which redress can be given for that injustice. In my judgment justice calls imperatively that this parliament should take some action along the line indicated.

Hon. E. J. McMURRAY (Solicitor General): I find myself in considerable agreement with the sentiments expressed by the speaker who introduced this resolution. He has reviewed the law as it exists in the various provinces of Canada, I think, fairly and reasonably. There exists in the Maritime provinces, as he has said, legislation inherited from the Old Land, that supplies that which he demands on behalf of woman in his resolution. The same exists to-day in the province of British Columbia. In section 5, chapter 67, there is a provision that a woman is entitled to judicial separation for an act of adultery on the part of her husband.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend is differentiating between judicial separation and absolute divorce. It is a different thing.

Mr. McMURRAY: No, I did not attempt to do that. I say she has the right to judicial separation in British Columbia. A large portion of my hon. friend's argument was devoted to the fact that woman found herself in a position where she was obliged to suffer humiliation, degradation and cruelty, that her life in fact was one of constant humiliation and misery; but there does exist, I think, in all the provinces of Canada—at least in the western provinces—a Married Woman's Protection Act, which provides that no woman is required to live with her husband when he is guilty of adultery. She can demand a separation from him and he must support and take care of her and her children; so that the only disadvantage a woman would be under in this case—and undoubtedly she is entitled to have that removed—would be the fact that she could not be married again. But, so far as that is concerned, she is not held down to a judicial separation. The Senate of Canada has always granted bills of divorce on a broader basis than that which was adopted in England. Adultery alone on the part of the husband has been always sufficient for the Senate committee of this parliament to grant a divorce.

Mr. SHAW: Might I ask a question?

Mr. McMURRAY: Yes.

Mr. SHAW: Can the hon. gentleman give the figures indicating the number of divorces granted by the parliament of Canada to applicants from the four western provinces of Canada, say in the period of the last three or four years or ten years?

Mr. McMURRAY: I have had a very brief opportunity of looking up this matter; in fact it only came to my attention this morning, but I think my hon. friend will find himself in the same position that I occupy in being unable to give those figures. How many cases are there where the wife has been refused a divorce on the ground of adultery alone? In nearly all these cases where a woman makes application for divorce, there is, coupled with adultery, cruelty and desertion. Sinclair, in his book on Parliamentary Divorce in Canada at page 2, states:

> Under the British North America Act, Canada obtained a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, and within the limits of the subjects assigned to it the parliament of Canada is supreme, and its power is as plenary and ample as that of the parliament of the United Kingdom. While in the exercise of such power the Canadian parliament has authority to grant divorces for any reason that may seem to it sufficient, still in exercising such authority, parliament is guided by and practically conforms to the principles upon which divorces are granted by the courts of England. This statement is, however, subject to this exception, that in Canada divorces are granted on the application of the wife on the sole ground of adultery, while in England, it is necessary that the adultery should be accompanied by cruelty or desertion, or the husband must have been guilty of incestuous adultery . . .

And so on.

Mr. SHAW: Does my hon. friend suggest that that is the law in England now?

Mr. McMURRAY: I do not, but at the time this work was written, in 1915, that was the law in England. My hon. friend has correctly stated that within very recent years, I think last year, the act was amended so that divorce is treated in England on the same grounds as it is in our Maritime provinces and as it is by the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend take the author of that work as an authority when he says that the constitution of Canada is similar to the constitution of the United Kingdom? Does he not know that Mr. Dicey, one of the greatest authorities on Canadian constitutional matters, says that when one says the Canadian constitution is similar to that of Great Britain, it is the greatest piece of official mendacity that obtains?

Mr. McMURRAY: I do not propose to discuss extraneous subjects with my hon. friend.

Mr. MARTELL: It is not an extraneous subject.

Mr. McMURRAY: I am dealing with the question of divorce and not with that of the constitution of Great Britain.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member is dealing with an authority.

Mr. McMURRAY: The resolution that my hon. friend has placed before the House is a very important one. It brings into this parliament for the first time in its history, so I understand, a bill dealing with divorce. I may be wrong; I believe there was a bill a few years ago which passed its second reading and died, but before that I know of no such measure ever being introduced into this House. Undoubtedly, the question is so important that I think my hon. friend should have introduced it in parliament in the form not of a resolution, but of a bill with all the details carefully worked out. I do not know what the attitude of the different governments of the western Canadian provinces or the Maritime provinces will be on this. They are exercising the law that they have there, and we have no evidence as to what their attitude may be.

Mr. SHAW: Presuming that I should introduce a public bill designed for the specific purpose outlined in the resolution, will my hon. friend undertake to see that the public bill is disposed of at this session?—in which event I am quite prepared to withdraw the resolution and to have the bill discussed in parliament.

Mr. McMURRAY: I should like to see my hon. friend's bill before I would pledge myself to support it. There are difficulties in the road of a bill of that nature, and seeing that the divorce law has been so long in its present form such changes as my hon. friend suggests should receive very careful consideration. He must recognize in this also that it makes the securing of divorce easier. I believe, however, that as regards practical suffering of women under this act confined to such a small area in Canada and under the relief granted under our Senate divorce rules, there is actually very little suffering. As a general proposition laid down, I find myself pretty well in accord with the remarks of the hon. member who has moved the resolution, and my remarks on this occasion are simply to put the matter in such a way as to show what privileges a woman has at the present time in Canada by reason of the courts that exist, the laws existing in them and by reason of the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of saying anything in support of this resolution; but after listening to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMurray) I felt compelled to say a few words. I listened very carefully to his remarks, and until he finished his last sentence I had no idea where he was going to land. He is in favour of the resolution, and I do not see why he cannot support it at the present time. It is a very simple resolution; it means simply to put a man and a woman on exactly the same footing. If I know anything about the laws of Canada, as regards the criminal laws, civil laws, or any other laws outside of the matter of divorce, I think a man and a woman are very much on the same footing. If a woman commits a crime, she is tried under the same laws and she suffers the same punishment. I cannot understand why in moral matters there should be any distinction between a man and a woman. I do not want to pose as a Puritan; but I think, simply as a matter of justice, this change should be no longer delayed. An hon. gentleman who spoke a little while ago said that this matter has been a long time in abeyance, so why bring it up at the present time? If it has been a long time in abeyance, the quicker it is brought up the better, and the quicker the matter is solved the better for everyone concerned. Often while reading some of these cases in the newspapers, I have felt myself burning with indignation at the injustice women were suffering in this respect, and I hope this matter can be successfully settled in the not far distant future as regards the four western provinces.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to intervene in this debate, because in Nova Scotia we have a divorce court which we had and enjoyed prior to the advent of confederation. I do not believe any measure should be pursued which makes divorce easy. I need not refer to the scriptural admonition that says:

> Whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery.

It is very hard for a member to sit in the House of Commons and to find that his religious and also conscientious views regarding divorce are abused, because many of us are entirely opposed to the principle of divorce. I, therefore, believe that divorce should not be made easy; but as regards the resolution of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), I think it is absolutely fair. If we are going to have divorce in this country, if we must have it thrust upon us, there is no reason whatsoever why there should be a distinction between a man and a woman as regards the grounds for divorce. As I understand the argument of the hon. member for West Calgary, he says that the divorce courts in the West came into existence a few years ago, and they find that to-day the women in the three western provinces are not on an equality with men as regards reasons for divorce. His object is that this parliament, which alone has control over marriage and divorce, shall bestow upon the courts of those provinces the right to give woman equality with man in regard to the reasons for securing divorce.

As I have already said, we in Nova Scotia have always had an equality in relation to men and women on this particular question. I believe there are three grounds in the province on which divorce may be secured. The law in Nova Scotia is based on the old English law and I believe that our people would resent any extension of it by providing further grounds for divorce. The three grounds I have mentioned are adultery, cruelty and impotence, or inability to consummate the marriage vow. Fortunately for us, the judge in divorce has always interpreted cruelty to mean adultery: In other words, the desire is to restrict as far as possible the grounds for granting divorce in that province. To me it is a matter of great delight to find that the court so interprets this particular law. What I think my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) is asking for is that the people of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta shall have the right to grant divorce to women on exactly the same grounds as divorce is granted to men. I have not followed the laws in those provinces and therefore I am unable to say what the law in this particular is in that section of the country. However, I am prepared to take my hon. friend's statement in this regard. Even if the hon. member is wrong in his interpretation of the law I feel that nothing is to be lost by the parliament of Canada extending that power to those provinces. If we are going to have divorces, then in the name of everything that is good, in the name of everything that is equitable, in the name of everything that is fair, let us confer upon the courts of the land the power to act in this matter so that those who want divorce may be able to go to those courts, where evidence can be properly adduced and these matters be decided upon, instead of having the parties come to Ottawa and the cases discussed in parliament. If we are to have divorces, I say, let the courts decide these questions Let us legislate on all other matters, but let us try as far as we can to keep the marriage vow inviolate.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Coming as I do from the province of Quebec, where divorce and rumours of divorce are very rarely heard, I could well afford to allow this resolution to pass without any remarks on my part. But inasmuch as this is a matter that concerns the parliament of Canada, a federal matter, I feel it is only right for me to rise in my place and declare that I am fully in agreement with the statements of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) on the resolution he has introduced to-day. I could not help thinking, while the discussion was proceeding on this question, that if the parliament of Canada were only to adopt the old Levitical law there would be no question at all about the rights of wife and husband. But I am afraid this will not be done, at least in my day and generation.

I have always been in favour of perfect equality between the sexes both in regard to law and in all the relations of life. Now, why is it that we have a law declaring in favour of the man and against the woman, not only in this particular case but in many other respects? I will tell you: It is because the laws have been made by men. And I have no doubt that if women had made those laws they would have had a section similar to this declaring in favour of the woman against the man. Now that women have the right to sit in this House, I think we ought to recognize the advisability of making these changes as quickly as possible, before the ladies take the bit in their teeth, so to speak, when they get into the majority in this House, and make it very hard indeed for us. The law which my hon. friend from West Calgary referred to, strange as it may seem, had its origin under the old Roman system. Under that system there was one law for men and another for women; there was one law for the Roman citizen and another for the stranger. This practice found its way into the civil law and the canon law in all European countries, and that explains why it was the law in England for hundreds of years. After the French Revolution the Code Napoleon changed the system; it is declared in the Code Napoleon, which is now the civil code of France, that women and men stand on an equal footing in the matter of divorce. Let me read to you the law of the province of Quebec. You will understand that there was never any revolution in the province of Quebec; that is to say, when the revolution in France took place Quebec had already become part and parcel of the British Empire. Here is the law of the province of Quebec:

> A husband may demand a separation on the ground of his wife's adultery, and the wife may demand a separation on the ground of her husband's adultery, if he keeps his concubine in common habitation.

That is the law in Quebec to-day. In order that the wife should obtain a divorce from her husband she would have to show that the lady who lived under his protection was living in a domicile or home to which she the wife, had the right to repair if necessary. It is not necessary that he should bring the woman into the house where the wife lives; if it is shown that he has provided a habitation reserved especially for the lady upon whom he confers his favours, then and only then has the wife the right to obtain a divorce. That would seem to be the law in the western provinces. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) protests that it is not.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I think my hon. friend used the wrong word in referring to the law in Quebec. There is no divorce in the province of Quebec.

Mr. JACOBS: That is right; we have no divorce in Quebec. But in order to obtain separation from bed and board the conditions are as I have cited them. I am one of those who believe with Hamlet:

> Why, let the stricken deer go weep,
> The heart ungalled play;
> For some must watch, while some must sleep:
> So runs the world away.

I believe that both "must watch" and both "must sleep", but I am not in favour of one watching and the other sleeping; and for that reason I support the resolution, which I trust my hon. friend from West Calgary will introduce in the form of a bill. If he so introduces it I shall have much pleasure in voting for it.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I am inclined to agree with the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) in one particular; I think it is asking a great deal to ask the House to pass a resolution of this kind which must be in more or less indefinite form, as indeed the present resolution is. It would be much better if the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) would introduce a bill setting forth the changes which he desires to have made in the law. It seems to me that the Solicitor General and the hon. member for West Calgary almost got together on this question, but that there was a misunderstanding. I take it from what the mover of the resolution said that he desired an assurance from the Solicitor General that the bill which he would draft and which he was prepared to submit to the House would not be sidetracked, as so many bills have been, during previous sessions. He did not ask that the Solicitor General support the bill; he simply wanted the Solicitor General's assurance that the bill would be dealt with during the session, and I think that the Solicitor General might very well give that assurance.

Another statement was made by the hon. Solicitor General with which I am certainly not in accord. He said that the women of the western provinces have really no complaint because they could come to the Senate and get a divorce just as the men could and on the same grounds, without the necessity of proving desertion or cruelty. It is quite true—

Mr. McMURRAY: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I think he has misunderstood me. What I endeavoured to convey, whether I did it well or not, was that their situation was considerably modified by reason of the Married Women's Protection Act, and by reason of the fact that they could come to the Senate and secure a divorce. I did not say it was complete alleviation, but that it was a modification.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The Married Women's Protection Act has nothing to do with this matter. With regard to the married women of the western provinces having the right to come to Ottawa to secure a divorce, I may say that there have been a few cases where men and women have come from the West for that purpose. Last session a petition was presented by a woman who nominally resided at Vancouver, but who now I think, is temporarily in the Old Country. But these cases are very rare indeed, and the reason is obvious: the expense involved is prohibitive. People residing in British Columbia, for instance, can only in a few cases take advantage of the Senate procedure—that is, in cases where the petitioner has ample means. For my part I do not think that divorces should be granted by the Senate at all; it is not the proper way of handling the matter. All applications for divorces should be made to the courts, and there should be uniformity in regard to the granting of divorces. That suggestion has been discussed during previous sessions and there always seemed to be violent objection to it. I presume that that objection was considered as well founded in the quarters from whence it came, but my point is that all matters of divorce should come before the courts; the petitioner should not be forced to come to Ottawa.

In regard to the arguments adduced by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), they are unanswerable so far as they suggest that there should be the strictest equality as between man and woman and that the grounds of divorce should be the same in both instances.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be little difference of opinion as to the law between the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) and the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray). The Solicitor General suggested that the member for West Calgary should introduce this matter into the House in the form of a bill, and the member for West Calgary approved of the suggestion, provided that the Solicitor General would give an undertaking, not that the bill should pass, but that ample opportunity should be given for its consideration. To that the Solicitor General said that he would like to see the bill first. Well, whether the bill is a bad bill, a poor bill, or an ill-drafted bill, certainly it would be a bill touching an important matter which should merit the attention of the House, and I think the Solicitor General might well undertake that if the matter be brought before the House again in the form of a bill, that bill will receive consideration this session. That would close the matter for the time being and allow us to proceed with other business.

In support of this suggestion let me just make these observations. I can well understand that there are men in this House who, through religious training or conscientious objection, believe that divorce should under no circumstances be granted. That is a perfectly reasonable position to take. It is not my own position, but that makes no difference; it is a position which may be assumed by reasonable persons who believe that it is better that some unhappily married people should "dree their weird" rather than that divorce should be introduced. But, after all, we have divorce in this country; and that being the case it seems to me that we should have divorce on the most even basis of equality between husband and wife; that a man should be liable to be sued for divorce for precisely the same reasons as apply in the case of a woman.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Does the hon. member believe in the principle of increasing the number of cases in which divorce may be granted or does he believe rather in their restriction?

Mr. McMASTER: No, I would keep the bounds of divorce within a very narrow ambit indeed, but within that narrow ambit I would make no difference between the sexes. I would take the view that within that ambit men and women should stand, as I believe they stand before the Supreme Judge, on exactly the same basis.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Taking the situation as it is to-day, again I would ask the question: Does the hon. member for Brome favour an increase in the number of cases in which divorce is granted, or does he favour a restriction of the number?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not wish to see divorces increase, but if through an application of even-handed justice divorces should increase, I believe that the necessity for even-handed justice is a greater necessity even than the artificial restriction of divorce.

The parliament of Canada grants divorces by special private acts. We grant them to men and women without distinction, men and women being subjected to precisely the same law. I understand that in Nova Scotia, where divorces are granted under provincial enactment, the law is equal between the sexes. In certain of the western provinces the law is not equal between the sexes, and that is the inequality and the injustice which the legislation shadowed forth in this resolution would cure. Can there be any opportunity for difference of opinion between fair-minded people in this House, whether they agree with divorce or not? Cannot the Solicitor General give the undertaking? Cannot the member for West Calgary introduce his bill? If that is done and the bill comes before the House for consideration the matter could be more adequately dealt with.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings): I cannot say that I disagree in any particular with the subject of the resolution before the House, nor can I say that I would be in favour of such a bill as the hon. member may see fit to introduce until I have had an opportunity of examining it. But it does seem to me strange and rather an unusual condition of affairs when we examine the jurisdiction of the different provinces in this matter and the law that prevails to-day, and it seems to me that some remedy should be afforded, and that at once. We have in one province a certain law, interpreted in a certain way; in another province we have another law, interpreted in a different way; and in the province of Ontario we have no divorce law at all. Now, that seems to be an anomaly. We are all one people, living under the same general jurisdiction, and a man and a woman when they enter into the marriage contract undertake similar obligations, and I do not see why there should be any discrimination between the rights granted to a husband and those granted to a wife. It is an anomalous condition where we have one law in one province administered in a certain way, and another law in another province administered in a different way, and another province with no divorce law at all. That whole situation might very well be cleared up and one general law passed, saving, of course, those people in our Dominion who are entirely opposed to the granting of divorces under any circumstances—one general law which would meet the whole situation, and under which the courts of the different provinces would have the same jurisdiction and the grounds upon which divorce could be granted should be clearly defined by Act of Parliament. Then, it seems to me, the rights of the two parties, the man and the woman, would be properly protected.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): One of the greatest difficulties which the Fathers of Confederation had to contend with when the British North America Act was drafted was to overcome this question of divorce. Confederation was a union of provinces, and there was a strong opinion against divorce in both the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec, as there is to-day, not only among Roman Catholics but among Protestants as well. The spectacle we have witnessed here in the last few years, together with what is going on in the United States, should open the eyes of some of our thinking people. The Fathers of Confederation accepted divorce because it existed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and a special clause was put into the act by which in certain cases the Dominion parliament could come to the relief of certain people without by that mere fact instituting divorce as a permanent institution in this land. Parliament took upon itself to come to the relief, and every divorce bill passed by this House has those words in its title—"An Act for the relief" of such-and-such a party. In the years when I first attended parliament in this House it was customary when these bills were called—and they were far less numerous than they are to-day—for those who were opposed to divorce to enter their protest and call for a division at every step both in committee and in the whole House.

I know we are not discussing the merits of divorce, because a divorce law exists in certain of the provinces; but divorce was considered at that time a question of civil rights, and I question very much whether a law passed by this parliament would be operative in the province of Quebec, or whether divorce courts could be established in that province, because there would have to be a breach of the understanding of Confederation. However, what we are discussing now is merely a question of putting the woman on an equality with the man. Of course, I am opposed to divorce, always have been, and I am more opposed now than I ever was. In view of what is taking place in the United States and what seems to be taking place in Canada, but especially in the United States where one out of every ten or twelve marriages is dissolved—

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the hon. member be opposed to the granting of divorce in any case?

Mr. MARCIL: Certainly, and I have good authority for that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What reasons has the hon. member?

Mr. MARCIL: You will find them in the Scriptures, in the teaching of our Saviour. The hon. member for West Calgary has asked the Solicitor General to bind himself at the present time to consider a bill which is not yet before the House. I can undertsand that such a request might be made if we were now at that stage of the session where the government, having all the days taken up with its own business, no public bill could be called without its consent. But the hon. member has the privilege now, as every other hon. member has, of introducing his public bill without consulting the Solicitor General, and his bill will be called in the regular way once or twice a week until such time as the government takes the whole time of the House for itself. Being opposed to divorce as I am, and being bound to vote against any measure that will increase the opportunities of divorce—and such a measure certainly would—if any change is to be made in the law in the West I would sooner see the change made the other way, so that instead of increasing the number of opportunities for divorce they would be decreased—

Mr. IRVINE: Would the hon. gentleman be willing to place men on exactly the same basis as women now are with regard to divorce? That would give equality and restriction at the same time.

Mr. MARCIL: I am not in favour of divorce for a man or a woman. I am in favour of a system we have in the province of Quebec, which was described by the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) where if a man and woman cannot live together and they have certain valid reasons which are recognized by the courts, they can go before the courts and get a separation from bed and board. No divorce bill ever passes through this parliament without a second clause. Now what does that second clause say? It gives the right to marry again. That is the whole object. For these reasons I do not think it would be fair to ask this House to accept this resolution, and especially to ask the Solicitor General to bind himself to support any bill that is not before the House.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I did not intend to speak on this question because I feel it is an injustice against woman brought about by man, and I want the men unassisted by what I say to remove that injustice as I am sure they will do. The member for George Etienne Cartier told the exact truth when he said that the cause of this was that the law had been made by men. When you read the laws, not only this but a great many others, and read history, you will find they are everywhere the handiwork of men, describing their own actions and forgetting that after all they are only half of the great human family.

Mr. LOGAN: The worst half.

Miss MACPHAIL: I would not say that. The hon. member who sits across the way (Mr. Marcil) is anxious that divorces should be made fewer instead of more. I had written on a piece of paper here just the question that the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) asked my hon. friend when he was speaking, that is, would he be willing to put men on the same basis in the four western provinces as women are in regard to divorce? If he is willing to do that it will remove restrictions and result in bringing about equality between the sexes. The very fact that men would take this step to place women on an equal footing with themselves will in itself have the effect of bringing about a feeling of good will. I think men hardly realize how deep in the heart of women is buried the resentment which they all feel against what they know to be an injustice, not only in this particular matter but in other things. That is one of the causes for the great woman's movement throughout the world. Women have felt that only by organizing and influencing public sentiment in this way could they obtain justice for themselves. I therefore ask hon. members to adopt this resolution out of a sense of justice for women and a proper regard for the spirit of fair play.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am entirely opposed to the resolution of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). I think it is liable to have a pernicious influence because its object is to give freer access to divorce. It is quite evident that by this resolution, we are subject to increase the number of divorces in certain provinces of the Dominion. Consequently, by creating opportunities for divorce cases to be submitted to the courts, we countenance, after all, the theory of divorce. This is why I am opposed to this resolution.

Divorce is certainly contrary to the divine laws and the laws of man. It has proved a great calamity to those countries that have adopted such a means. It is unfortunately the scourge of modern times. It assails at its very root home life which is the foundation of society itself. It is quite easy to perceive to what a disastrous end would lead such legislation opening a wider door to divorce. Canada is a Christian country and the countenancing of divorce would tend to the destruction of the conjugal ties which is a fundamental part of Christianity.

So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, our laws are entirely opposed to divorce. It is true, as it was mentioned by one of the hon. members who spoke before me, that the Civil Code of Quebec recognizes separation on well defined grounds; but the tendency of courts is to restrict as much as possible this recourse and section 185 of the Civil Code lays down the following rule.

Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties; while both live, it is indissoluble.

A previous speaker recalled rightly, the principles which guided the Fathers of Confederation in matters of divorce. In a conciliatory mood, the British North America Act included a measure to allow divorce in certain cases, but the Fathers of Confederation had not in mind the introduction of this measure so as to favour and pave the way for divorce, neither was this measure introduced with the aim of spreading the demand for divorce. The adoption of this resolution, under the plea of placing the two sexes on the same footing, would tend to generalize the pernicious principle of divorce in our country.

There is no need of recalling the history of the different measures which have been moved in this House since confederation aiming at enlarging on the Act authorizing divorce, under the British North America Act. On all occasions, when this House was requested, for instance, to establish a special divorce court in certain provinces all our statesmen opposed it. Sir John A. Macdonald, himself, in 1875 and later on, rose in this House to declare that there should be no legislation of a nature to facilitate divorce and make it a more common practice in any shape or form. I think we are faithful to those guiding principles—which have always been proclaimed by all statesmen throughout the country—in opposing the resolution of the hon. member for West Calgary.

Whatever movement is undertaken in this country to encourage divorce, it becomes an outrage to the conscience of 2,500,000 Catholics. This minority is required to live in the midst of the majority and it has a right to the respect of its religious convictions. I therefore, strongly oppose this resolution and I still hope that the hon. member for West Calgary will be persuaded to withdraw this resolution; I am convinced that if we are called upon to vote this resolution will certainly be defeated.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix and Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker before this resolution carries, I think it is the duty of the representatives of Quebec to express the views of that province on this question. We have already heard from the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Fortier). They have respectively expressed their opinion on the subject. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) rightly stated that this question is of paramount importance, and dates back to confederation.

He pointed out that, when it was a question of the union of the Canadian provinces, this problem was fully debated and was closely studied by the most eminent men, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Etienne Cartier and all the Fathers of Confederation. If this question was so important on such a memorable occasion as to when it was a matter of the union of all the provinces, to have been a cause of discussion, and even of dissension—which finally disappeared following protracted conferences and a long delay—I think we should not be too hasty in adopting, to-day, the resolution which is before the House. Those who suggested to the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) the introduction of a bill with reference to this question, so that a discussion might take place in a proper way on such an important matter, are quite right.

In the province of Quebec the separation may be granted for certain specific and defined reasons. We have no divorce court. Some years ago, when we were in the opposition, I remember that the ex-member for Kingston, to-day the Attorney General for the province of Ontario, introduced a bill aiming at the establishment of divorce courts in this country. I recall that all the hon. members of the province of Quebec, even those who do not share our religious convictions, voted against this bill; not that this measure was against their religious beliefs, but because it carried with it a tendency to increase divorce cases, in such a way as to undermine the fundamental basis of society.

The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) has pointed out the specific reasons which enable a person to obtain a separation in the province of Quebec. That province has always kept up the French laws and the Code Napoleon, and I am not aware that we have ever found fault against the law as it exists. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Fortier), who has just preceded me in this debate, referred to the section of the Civil Code which declares that marriage may only be dissolved by death. We have often heard it said, on many an occasion: When a person marries, it is "For better or for worse."

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Why, certainly.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Will tell us that it is "For better of for worse;" is it not for life?

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It is for life; it is exactly what I say. Indeed, one of the sections of our Civil Code specifies that marriage can only be dissolved by death. The axiom that I have just quoted and to which my hon. friend drew my attention, is a way of expressing oneself. When marriage has been consecrated, if the union is happy or unhappy, the contracting parties must accept the accomplished fact. In a number of cases, notwithstanding that there might have been reasons for which persons might have asked for divorce, they have been well advised to have recourse to separation. As the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) expressed it this afternoon: often persons who seek divorce have in mind and desire to remarry.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) spoke just now on this subject to vindicate the rights of women and claim justice, equal rights for all. I sincerely congratulate her on the way she unfolded her arguments in the name of all those whom she has the honour to represent, and whose interpreter she is for the whole Dominion, being the only representative of her sex in the Canadian parliament. I congratulate her, I say, for the way she gave the reasons which militate in favour of womanhood, in the western provinces, so that they may be placed on the same footing as man. I congratulate her, but I cannot entirely side with her, because notwithstanding all legislation or law which might be adopted, aiming to grant women the same rights as men, there will always remain a difference, something which will not be identical. This difference exists since the creation of man. There has always existed and there will always exist in woman, an inborn weakness, a marked inferiority. I am not saying this with the idea of depreciating woman, because we have all had mothers. And we know that if woman, notwithstanding her nature and weakness, may render services to her country, we are also aware that she is unable to accomplish as much as men. On the other hand, woman, is looked upon—and with reason—as the angel of the home, as a gentler being than man.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Am I to understand from the hon. member's remark that woman is the anget of the home regardless of the religion to which she belongs?

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It is exactly what I have just said: that woman is the angel of the home. However, if woman is the angel of the home and may, in certain circumstances, become the mainstay of a family or organization, it is not less true that according to the laws of nature, woman is differently constituted from man, that is physically.

Mr. VIEN (Translation): Physiologically speaking.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Yes, physiologically, to use the right expression of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien). In spite of our granting the franchise to woman, in spite of our placing her on the same footing as man, in all spheres of action, notwithstanding that we grant her the same rights and the same privileges, it is not less certain that you will never be able to pass a law making woman equal to man. The latter will always have that superiority which characterizes him and places him at the head of society. And even in the home, although woman is the queen, although she is the one who brings up the children, although she is the one who, very often, through her advice, prevents her husband from blundering, is it not, finally, man that is the master?

The hon. member, Sir, for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laflamme) has, at the outset of this debate, twice, put a question to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), and he insisted on the fact that if the resolution of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) was adopted, and, if a bill based on this resolution was introduced, what would happen in the western provinces, would be that divorce could be obtained still more easily. The hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laflamme), with whom I am well acquainted, a man who has a wide knowledge of men, women and the world, one of the greatest criminal lawyers in this country, who understands the human heart and human nature, fears that if we open any wider the door to allow certain persons to dissolve the ties of marriage, it might, perhaps, be to their detriment and to that of society. I am of the same opinion as the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska. As I stated at the outset of my remarks, the principle of the present resolution is the same as the one which was at stake in 1919 or 1920, at the time of the debate introduced by Mr. Nickle, then member for Kingston.

If I am not mistaken the hon. member for West Calgary, in introducing this resolution, wishes to obtain relief for certain wrongs which exist in the western provinces. I do not think that he will succeed, not that the religion of the majority of those who sit on your right, Sir, are opposed to divorce; but because I notice that many of the members belonging to a different religion than ours, share in a way our views on this question. I, therefore, ask the House to postpone the continuation of this debate to a future date, so that we may consider the subject in all its phases and from all angles. We cannot and must not, on such an important question, express an opinion lightly, as we are asked to do, for the excellent reason that it might, perhaps, sanction a principle and acknowledge a fact which, next year, might serve as a precedent to ask this House the adoption of another bill or another resolution to still widen the door and give more facility to all who, for very vague reasons wish to obtain a divorce. It gives me much pleasure to proclaim in this House and throughout the country that I firmly believe in the teachings of the religion to which I have the honour to belong, and as for myself as well as for the majority of the members who sit on your right, Sir, I believe that if we were ever asked to vote on a similar measure as the one now before us, we could not act otherwise than the way we did in the past, when a similar measure was introduced in the House, that is to vote against any measure which might appear to be a sanction of the principle of divorce. Again do I state our beliefs would not allow us to do otherwise. It is impossible for us to force our conscience to accept a measure which, looking at it from all angles, would injure the principles of our religion, principles that we have sworn to safeguard when we were baptised and confirmed.

It was stated in the course of this debate, that it would be preferable to have a uniform legislation and create special divorce courts throughout the country, as they exist all over, where the people of the various provinces might register their complaints. It is a repetition of the same thing. These bills or resolutions only aim at opening the door to divorce, making it easier and less costly to obtain. There is a desire to increase the causes of disunion and quarrels which exist in our country instead of decreasing them. I think they exist enough, to-day, without trying to increase them by adopting such a resolution without making a deeper study of the question. I have, perhaps, been repeating the arguments already brought out by speakers who have preceded me in this debate, however, I think, Sir, that we should not adopt the resolution of the hon. member for West Calgary, under the present circumstances, when it is introduced at the beginning of the session, and a great number of members have hardly had time to digest the debate on the Address, and have not had time to carefully consider this question as it should be. I have, perhaps, expressed on this subject views which may seem contrary to those of the hon. members who sit on your left, Sir, but it is permissible to differ in opinion from our colleagues. By virtue of the British principles which govern us, and which have united the Dominion, everybody is free to think and to freely express his thoughts. That is what we wish to do. There lies the reason that I was not backward, a moment ago in stating that any measure or resolution the object of which is to weaken the ties of marriage and to do away with the impediments to divorce, would be legislation of a pernicious character. It is preferable that a few should suffer, rather than spread a plague existing in a number of countries and which threatens to attack us, if we do not strive to restrain and check it. What is happening in the great American republic? The ease with which divorce is granted in the case of many persons having married thoughtlessly.

A great number of soldiers were married in this way in Europe, during the war; immediately after their return to this country, they perceived their error and took the means of obtaining a divorce. And we now witness a great number of broken homes, families separated and persons who will lead a miserable existence for the remainder of their lives, who will make their wives and progeny unhappy and be a desgrace and dishonour to their families.

I would have liked, Sir, to be better prepared to carry on this discussion and I must beg your indulgence and that of the members of this House, and if I have not given to this question the preparation which so important a subject deserves, it is that I did not think that this resolution would be brought up to-day and that we would be called upon to express our views immediately on such a serious subject. This is the reason, Sir, that I have not before me the statistics that I wished to quote and that I have neither, perhaps, brought out the most convincing reasons, the best and strongest arguments for the solving of a problem having such import.

We heard, as I mentioned, a moment ago, a number of the oldest members of this House—among others the hon. member for Bonaventure—who gave their reasons, in the name of their fellow citizens and constituencies which they represent, why they oppose such a measure. For the same reasons, in the name of my fellow citizens of the province of Quebec and the electors of the county which I represent, I, myself, must disapprove of this resolution. Its principle seems to me wrong. I do not think a vote will be taken on it, to-day, and, therefore, when the debate will again come up, I shall be better prepared and shall give stronger reasons to have it rejected. I even question, if the hon. member for West Calgary, wishing to do justice to the citizens of the provinces which he mentioned in his speech, is not rather doing them irreparable injury in the near future? I am fully convinced, Sir, that the resolution of the hon. member will not in any possible way better the situation which he has described.

As it is six o'clock, Sir, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate ajourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 20, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

AUDIT BOARD

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) asked me yesterday if I would lay on the Table of the House a copy of the order in council giving some particulars with reference to the Audit Board. I have pleasure now in laying the order in question on the Table.

GRATUITIES TO GRAND TRUNK EMPLOYEES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): The other day I laid on the Table a report with the evidence taken by the commissioner appointed to investigate certain payments made to Grand Trunk officials and others. I wish now to lay on the Table copies of the exhibits that were taken with the evidence.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Can the minister suggest when he will be able to lay on the Table the results, and advise the House of what is being returned?

Mr. GRAHAM: I might say that up to the present time nothing has been done, but I will discuss the matter at greater length at some other time.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Not a word, Mr. Speaker, can be heard in this corner of the chamber.

Mr. GRAHAM: That adds to the other regrets that my hon. friend has in finding himself over there. I was saying that no money had been returned by certain persons to whom the Grank Trunk had paid gratuities and other sums, and that at some future date I would discuss the matter further.

PENITENTIARIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the Penitentiaries Act.

He said: The first section of the bill is for the purpose of removing any doubt as to the powers of the wardens and other officers of the penitentiaries in preventing the escape of convicts or in recapturing them. In the case of prisoners who were convicted of offences which were felonies the officers have more authority than when the offence was a misdemeanor, and this section is to remove all differences in that regard.

The second section is a consequence of the amendments which were added to the Criminal Code last year by the Senate, and accepted by this House, to give to convicts the right of appeal against their sentence of conviction. It is for the purpose of keeping them in a provincial jail while the appeal is pending, instead of removing them to the penitentiary. The penitentiary, of course, is a place for punishment, it is not intended for the imprisonment of men who are still awaiting conviction.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Fruit Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to make a slight correction in the French version of the Fruit Act of last session.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRUSTS, MERGERS AND COMBINES

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. What prosecutions, if any, have been held under federal legislation against trusts, mergers, and combines in restraint of trade in Canada during each of the years 1922, 1923, and 1924?

2. What penalties were imposed during those years for the offences committed by any or all of said trusts, mergers and combines in restraint of trade?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. During the year 1922 and until August 25, 1923, when a registrar was appointed under the Combines Investigation Act, 1923 the only federal legislation in effect under which prosecutions could be held was the Criminal Code (Sections 496, 497, 498). No prosecutions were held under this Statute. Under the Combines Investigation Act, 1923 no prosecutions have taken place, though complaints informally laid have been investigated, with results which have avoided the necessity of prosecution.

2. Answered by above.

AGRICULTURAL IMPORT DUTIES

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. 3. What previous experience or training has each of the said members had in forestry or in the pulpwood business?

4. What witnesses have been heard, and what are their addresses, names and occupations?

5. Is the said commission authorized to inquire into the question of the export of fir, cedar or other logs to the United States from the province of British Columbia?

6. If so, has the government directed such inquiry or has the government received requests that such an inquiry be carried out in the interests of the manufacture of lumber and shingles in British Columbia?

7. At whose request or upon what information was the Order in Council of June 10, 1923, passed exempting pulpwood sold or to be sold for a period of ten years from any embargo which might be enacted?

8. Did the government promise to exempt farmers' pulpwood from a possible embargo?

9. Has not the Forestry branch of the Department of Interior and the Provincial Government Forests Services full information relative to the subject matter authorized to be inquired into by the said royal commission?

STEAMSHIPS SUBSIDIES

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What number of steamship companies are receiving subsidies from the government?

2. What are the names of these companies?

3. What amount of subsidy is paid to each?

4. Under what conditions are these subsidies paid?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. COOTE:

1. What was the total cost of administration of the Soldier Settlement Board, in each year since the institution of the board?

2. What is the estimated total amount of interest which has been rebated or will be rebated to settlers under the Act of 1922?

3. What was the total number of employees each year since the formation of the board?

4. How many loans have been made in each province in each year by the board?

5. What was the total amount due by settlers in each province in each year?

6. What is the total amount paid by soldier settlers in each province in each year?

7. In how many cases did the board purchase lands for the settler?

8. On what terms were these lands sold to soldier settlers?

9. In how many of these cases has the settler abandoned his farm?

10. How much land has been purchased by the board in each province, and for how many settlers in each province, and what was the total price paid for same?

11. What amount was loaned in each province for purchase of stock and equipment, and what was the average loan for each settler for this purpose, in each province?

12. What was the total number of salvage cases in each province, and the total amount owing to the board under such cases at the time of salvage or abandonment: (a) for stock and equipment, (b) for lands?

13. What amount had been previously paid to the board in such cases by soldier settlers?

14. What amount of salvage lands have been resold, and what is the total sales price of these lands?

15. What is the value of the land still held by the board at the purchase price?

16. What amount has been received from the sale of stock and equipment in salvaged cases?

17. In how many cases have auction sales been held for land or equipment of soldier settlers?

18. On what terms are salvaged lands being sold to the public?

19. How many soldier settlers are now in arrears on their payments, and what is the total amount of such arrears?

20. What is the amount of future payments due to the board: (a) by soldier settlers; (b) by civilians?

21. What is the total amount now held in the Soldier Land Settlement Assurance Fund?

IMPORTATION OF VELVET

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1. What was the amount of velvets, velveteens, silk velvet and plush not over 24 inches in width and silk fabrics not over 26 inches in width imported into Canada per month during the months of October, November and December, 1923, and January, 1924, (a) from all countries and (b) from France, Italy and each of the other countries receiving "most favoured nation treatment"?

2. What was the amount of velvets, velveteens, silk velvets and plush over 24 inches in width and silk fabrics over 26 inches in width imported into Canada per month during the same period, (a) from all countries and (b) from France, Italy and each of the other countries receiving "most favoured nation treatment"?

APPEAL BOARD—WAR RECORD

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

What is the war record in Canada, in England and in France, of each of the members of the Federal Appeal Board appointed by the present government?

Hon. Mr. BELAND: I do not exactly grasp whether my hon. friend wants all the data respecting the time during which the members of the board served either in Canada, England or France, or not. I may say orally to-day that the five members of the board served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The chairman, Colonel Belton, served in Canada only. The four other members, Captain Meath, Lieutenant Reilly, Colonel Roy, and Dr. Wickware, all served in Canada, England and France. If my hon. friend wishes to get the dates of each member's service in the different countries, the question must pass as an order for return.

Mr. ROSS: I would just as soon have it pass as an order for return.

OTTAWA WINE VAULTS BUILDING

Mr. HANSON:

1. Did the government purchase within the last year a property in Ottawa on York street, known as the Ottawa Wine Vaults building?

2. If so, at what price?

3. What was the previous city assessment on the building?

4. Who were the owners of said building?

5. With all the unoccupied government property in Ottawa, what was the urgency of purchasing this property?

6. What is it used for at present?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND CIVIC TAXATION

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Does the Canadian National Railways pay to the city of Montreal yearly any sum by way of taxation or otherwise in respect to property formerly belonging to the Grand Trunk Railway and now occupied and used by the Canadian National Railways? If so, how much and on what basis is such payment made?

2. What was the assessed value of such property before the same was taken over by the Canadian National Railways, and what was the rate at which the same was taxed? At what sum is such property rated to-day and is any distinction as to assessment made between it and other taxable property in the city?

3. What representations, if any, were made by any Minister of the Crown as to the future taxation by the city of Montreal of the properties of the Grand Trunk at or previous to the taking over of the same by the Canadian National Railways or the Crown?

4. What sums, if any, does the Canadian National Railways pay to the city of Prince Rupert as taxes or otherwise in respect to Railway Terminals or other property formerly belonging to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and now the property of the Canadian National Railways?

5. At what amount are such properties valued for assessment and at what rate are they taxed and do such valuations and rate differ from those in respect to other taxable properties in the city?

6. Does the Canadian National Railways pay any sums whether as taxes or otherwise to other cities and municipalities in Canada in respect to properties formerly belonging to the Grand Trunk Railway or to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company? If so, what —giving places, and amounts paid in each?

7. Does the Canadian National Railways pay to the city of Portland, Maine, any sums as taxes in respect to the railway terminals and other properties in that city, formerly the property of the Grand Trunk Railway Company? If so, how much? At what value is such property assessed for city taxes and at what rate does it pay, and do such valuation and rate differ from those in respect to other taxable properties in the city?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The information asked for by this question is quite voluminous and will require quite a little research. I ask my hon. friend to let it stand as an order for a return.

QUESTIONS AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

OBJECTION BY MR. MEIGHEN

On the Orders of the Day.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): There are some questions that have been asked to stand as to which request no valid objection could be taken, as the questions involve long replies which could not and do not need to go on Hansard. As to others, I protest against the government abusing the rule and requiring them to stand as orders for returns. I instance especially question No. 28 which I understood the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) asked to stand as an order for return. If there was ever a simple question, seeing that the answer to it could be put on a postage stamp, it is question No. 28. It is first asked:

Did the government purchase within the last year a property in Ottawa on York street, known as the Ottawa Wine Vaults building? If so, at what price?

Perhaps it would take a large postage stamp to contain the answer, but it should not require a long time to give the reply. Then it is sought to learn:

What was the previous city assessment on the building?

Surely it is a gross abuse of the rule to ask that that question stand as an order for return. Finally:

Who were the owners of said building?

With all the unoccupied government property in Ottawa what was the urgency of purchasing this property?

What is it used for at present?

There is absolutely no excuse for asking that this question stand as an order for return.

Hon. Mr. KING (Minister of Public Works): I think it is important that this should be a matter of return, in order that the House may be fully advised as to the price paid for this building and the valuation of the property. The question will not bring out that information, and I think the House ought to have it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister's explanation is amusing. There is no need of this question standing as an order for a return. If the minister should make his answer a little more full than the question requires we do not object to it. All that is asked for is an answer to the question.

DUTY COLLECTED ON SKINS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) yesterday asked a question in respect to quantities, values and amount of duties collected on the importation of calf and cattle skins, and so forth. In the absence of the Minister of Customs I asked that it be allowed to stand as an order for return. I find the Minister of Customs has prepared an answer for it but it is somewhat lengthy. I should like to have it either placed on Hansard as an answer or let the question pass as an order for return. If my hon. friend would like it to appear on Hansard it might be inserted in the list of questions to-day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should like it to appear in Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

[The question and answer referred to are as follows:

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. What are the respective quantities, values and amount of duty collected, on the importation of calf and cattle skins, also the quantity and value of calf and cattle skins exported from Canada during the years ending March 31, 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

2. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on eggs imported, also the quantity and value of eggs exported from Canada, during the years ending March 31, 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923.

3. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on butter imported during the years above mentioned, also the quantity and value of butter exported?

4. What are the respective quantities, values and duty collected on the imports of pork and pork products such as fresh, salted and cured bacon and hams, lard, etc., also the exports of same for the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

5. What are the respective quantities, value and duty collected on imports of oleomargarine for the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

6. What are the respective quantities, value and duty collected on imports of material used in the manufacture of oleomargarine for 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

7. What are the quantities and values of the exports of oleomargarine for the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

PAINTING OF LATE PRESIDENT HARDING

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government is taking any steps to officially recognize the. presentation by Mr. R. J Cromie, publisher of the Vancouver Sun, to the National Press Gallery in Washington, of a large painting commemorating the historic visit of President Harding to Canada which occurred in Vancouver last summer. This painting commemorates the visit in question, and portrays the late president on the occasion of his addressing some forty thousand citizens of Canada in Stanley park. I might add, with your permission, Sir, that this very important and historic painting is being exhibited in the leading cities. I should like to ask, therefore, if there is any official recognition being made of this very excellent step taken by Mr. Cromie, and whether or not provision will be made to exhibit the painting in Ottawa on its way to Washington. It is to be presented some time in April, according to my information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend was kind enough to mention to me before the House assembled that he intended to ask this question. I brought with me, therefore, a communication which I sent to Mr. Cromie at the time I learned it was the intention of the Sun to make the presentation to the Press Gallery at Washington of the historic painting referred to. This telegraphic communication is as follows:

Ottawa, February 15, 1924.

To The Vancouver Sun:

On the occasion of the Sun's presentation to the National Press Gallery at Washington of the picture commemorating President Harding's greeting to the Canadian people at Vancouver, it gives me great pleasure to associate myself in the proceedings by expressing the hope that the feelings of mutual trust and good-will, which this presentation symbolizes, and which it was Mr. Harding's aim to promote, may ever continue to subsist and strengthen as time goes on.

W. L. MACKENZIE KING,
Prime Minister of Canada.

I sent that communication semi-officially in the hope that it might help to give the presentation something of the national character which I think my hon. friend has in mind. I also intimated to Mr. Cromie that at the time the formal presentation was made I would send a communication from the government of Canada to the authorities at Washington, or whoever might be in charge of the presentation there, extending greetings on behalf of the Dominion in connection with the occasion. As to the exhibition of the painting at Ottawa, I confess that until my hon. friend spoke of the matter I had assumed that the presentation of the painting was a private enterprise on behalf of the Vancouver Sun, and that the matter of the exhibition of the painting rested with the proprietor of that paper, but I can assure my hon. friend, after speaking to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), that the minister will be glad to see that arrangements are made for the painting being brought to Ottawa, if it is the wish of the Vancouver Sun to have it exhibited here.

WINDSOR PLUMBERS AND STEAMFITTERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I wish to draw the attention of the government to the complaint of the United Association of Journeyman Plumbers and Steamfitters of Windsor. The complaint which has apparently been made to the government is to the effect that, while the city of Windsor has been obliged to open up a mission to feed and take care of the unemployed this winter, nevertheless, against the regulations of the Department of Immigration and of Labour, American workers have been brought from Milwaukee to do work in Windsor in connection with the erection of an ice plant which is being put up by a Milwaukee firm. The work is that of steamfitting and pipefitting, and at the present time there are 20 experienced pipefitters out of employment in the city of Windsor.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The Department of Immigration, so far as I know, received no complaint from any person in the city of Windsor. And—may I point out to my hon. friend—it is just possible the work these men are doing will provide work for other men when the staff gets busy.

NAVIES OF OVERSEAS DOMINIONS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I noticed a despatch in the press the other day, I think it was dated from London, which induces me to ask the government, whether the announcement of the Parliamentary Secretary of the British Admiralty that the Overseas dominions will develop their navies in accordance with a common doctrine is correct.

I do not wish to ask an awkward question, but if there is any information along that line, I would like to know what a "common doctrine" really means.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The press item has reference, I think, to discussions which took place at the Imperial Conference. As my hon. friend knows, there has been for some little time a controversy as to whether there will be a centralized navy, one navy contributed to by the different dominions, or whether in the matter of naval defence the dominions should have their own naval services under the control of their own governments. At the Imperial Conference it was definitely determined that as repects the self governing dominions the policy of naval services owned and controlled by the government of the dominions was the proper policy to follow in regard to naval defence. In connection therewith it has always been assumed that where the dominions have navies of their own, that as between the dominions, matters of organization and administration would be carried on along lines more or less similar so that, in the event of there being a desire to co-operate or co-ordinate the several naval services, they would as a result of similar methods of training, similar rules and regulations in respect of discipline and the like, be able to co-operate efficiently. That is the extent, I think, to which a common doctrine is presumed to have application in this case.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I might be permitted to call the attention of the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) also, that in the despatch to which he refers it is distinctly stated that the policy being pursued was inaugurated and adopted three years ago.

SUBSIDIES TO WESTERN PROVINCES

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): I wish to ask the government a question regarding increased subsidies to the three western provinces as shown in the estimates. Is this increase based on the rate per capita as fixed by statute, or is it on some other basis.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this question would properly come when the estimates are before committee of supply. It is not proper, at this stage, according to the rules to ask a question on a subject of that kind.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING BILL

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill No. 6, respecting Quartz Mining in the Yukon territory.—Mr. Black (Yukon).

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This bill is not printed in both languages.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is printed only in one language; therefore it must stand.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I am prepared to go on,

Mr. SPEAKER: The objection is taken and I must observe the rule.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It is true this bill does not appear on the order paper as printed in English and in French, but if it is passed over, it will be through no fault of the hon. member in charge of it, and it may never be reached again. I would think the objection might well be waived and the hon. gentleman allowed to go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection if he wishes to go on with it now.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): The objection is that the bill is not printed in both languages. I raised the objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The bill can be gone on with only by unanimous consent. The fault is not that of the hon. member. Bills put in since his have been printed; I cannot understand why this one has not been printed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As long as it is understood the bill is going to committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there were unanimous consent, the hon. member (Mr. Black, Yukon) could proceed; but the objection has been taken and I must observe the rule.

Order stands.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—EXCURSIONS.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to amend the Railway Act, 1919.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): If the hon. gentleman is not going to discuss it, I have something to say.

Mr. CHURCH: I think the Minister might let this bill go to the Railway Committee. It is not a very large demand to make of the railway companies. It was good legislation before the war and worked out very well. In the United States they have this provision for week-end excursions for different purposes. A large deputation desire to be heard before the committee. It will not take more than half an hour. I hope the Minister will let the bill go to committee, where it will be discussed.

Mr. GRAHAM : That is just what I wanted to do myself, but if it got a second reading without being sent to a committee where all parties could be heard, it might get through the House without members having any information with regard to it. The railways of the world are not having an easy time just now, and I think it would be unfair to amend the act in any way imposing any duties on them, or giving them any new privileges, unless all parties interested had an opportunity of being heard. I have not given the matter much thought, but, without admitting the principle of the bill, if the hon. gentleman will move that it be referred to the Committee on Railways, I have no objection at all to the second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN NORTHERN BRANCH LINES

Mr. CHURCH moved:

For a copy of all papers, letters, contracts, estimates and agreements, telegrams, and all other documents

(including the cost of construction) and relating to the abandonment of the C.N.R. line between Orono and Cherrywood and the electrification of the line between Bowmanville and Pickering and for the construction of a National Railway between Bowmanville and Oshawa and also between Pickering and Cherrywood joining the C.N.R. at that point, including all reports of the engineers, officials, and other experts of the Canadian National Railway recommending such a duplication of railways and the abandonment of the original C.N.R. line through Durham and Ontario counties, and of all petitions and other correspondence opposing this duplication and paralleling of existing lines.

He said: I ask that the motion stand in view of the objection yesterday of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham).

Motion stands.

TIMISKAMING DAM

Mr. LAPIERRE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government and Mr. John Sloan, Mattawa, Ontario, or his legal advisers, relating to the indemnity which he received due to the accident that happened to him while engaged on the government works at Timiskaming dam.

CANADA'S CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the governing powers of Canada as constituted by the British North America Act as amended and as altered from time to time hereafter ought to possess under the British Crown the same powers with regard to Canada, its affairs and its people, as the Parliament of Great Britain possesses in regard to Great Britain, its affairs and its people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable hesitation that I introduce this subject to-day. I am quite well aware that it is a matter that, perhaps, ought to be dealt with by a constitutional lawyer. I make no pretence whatever to understand at all in detail the various questions which may be involved; but, during my short experience in this House, on a number of occasions we have been faced with very practical difficulties which, it would seem, make necessary some such resolution as this. Again and again we have been told that we were not capable of passing certain legislation because this came within the jurisdiction of one of the various provinces. It is for these practical reasons that I have been wondering how it would be possible to introduce measures which would enable us to make our administration more efficient. I have been thinking particularly with regard to the group that I have been trying to represent, the Labour group who, perhaps, because their problems are more recent than some of the other problems which have, from time to time, been placed before the House, find that it is the more difficult for them to receive proper treatment.

In this resolution, I might frankly say, I have adopted a formula suggested by Sir Clifford Sifton in an address on constitutional Relations of Canada. Sir Clifford Sifton knows nothing whatever of my use of his suggestion. In all probability, he might be annoyed that I should be the one to put it forward on the floor of this House. On the other hand, while I must openly admit that I am not a very great admirer of some of Sir Clifford Sifton's policies, I see no reason whatever why I should not make use of a suggestion which appeals to me as accomplishing the ends which I have in view.

There are, perhaps, two questions involved in the resolution which I have suggested. The one is with regard to our relation to the Motherland, and the other is with regard to the relationship that exists between Canada and the various provinces. One of our western papers, in commenting on this resolution which I have placed upon the order paper, suggests that I should make very clear what my position is in this matter. I cannot make it much more clear than it is made in the terms of the resolution itself. It means simply that Canada regards herself as grown up and that, being in that position, she believes that she has the right to full self-determination and to the fullest measure of home rule. As you will observe, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is that, under the Crown, we should have precisely the same rights as are enjoyed by the people who reside in England or in Scotland; that the parliament of this country should have the full right of deciding upon the destinies of the people of Canada just as the British parliament has the full right of deciding the destinies of those who live in the Motherland. There is no suggestion whatever that we should loosen the ties that unite us with the Motherland; none whatever. Our position is clear and straightforward; we believe that the time has come when we should have the undisputed right to decide upon questions that concern us without going abroad in order that we may obtain permission to exercise that right. I cannot see why an Englishman who leaves England and comes to Canada to reside in this country ought thereby to be placed in an inferior position. I cannot see why it is that because, say, my great grandfather left Great Britain to come to reside in Canada I should not have an equal right with my cousins who happen to be still in Great Britain. It seems to me that we are travelling along the very lines that all forward-looking Canadians have advocated for some generations in this country. As I have said, the practical difficulty is that which has forced me to take this position. I introduced the question of an eight hour day in this House and we were told that nothing could be done in that regard because the matter is one of a provincial nature; I introduced the question of unemployment insurance, and, although Canada is one of the signatories to the Peace treaty, we are told that the Canadian federal government cannot deal with this matter because it is a provincial matter and under the British North America Act it is a matter that must be dealt with entirely by the province. These are very practical difficulties, and the question is, how can they be solved? It might be that a conference could be called by this government at which there could be representatives of the governments of the various provinces, and the whole problem might be gone into with a view to settling the jurisdictional question. That is a possible way of meeting the difficulty. In that case, however, we should still have to go to the Motherland in order to obtain the ratification of our arrangements here.

There is a question that has come before this House frequently in years past, and that is, either the reform or the abolition of the Senate. We find that certain measures which are passed by the elected representatives of the people of this country are thrown out by the upper House, and apparently we have no redress. It is a constitutional question as to just how we could manage to get the Senate itself to consent to its own annihilation or to such modifications as would make the government of this country really democratic. It is these practical problems that make one feel that the time has arrived when we should be able to consider in this House all the matters that concern us and to decide upon our own course of action. I need hardly remind the government of the recent trend, which I think is more or less promoted by the Liberal party in Canada, towards a larger measure of self-determination in foreign affairs. And yet I take it that we are hardly in a position to-day to say, for example, whether or not we should go to war. Possibly, if we claimed now that Canada should be consulted before she went to war, we should still have to confess that Canada might find herself, at least technically, at war whether she liked it or not. There is a most anomalous situation as regards our relation to questions of foreign policies of the Empire. I asked a simple question last year on the floor of the House as to whether the government of Canada had endorsed the project of the British government of that day for the construction of a naval base at Singapore. Our papers ridiculed the idea that such a question should be put on the floor of this House. I submit, however, Mr. Speaker, that questions of this kind must be asked and answered on the floor of the Canadian parliament; we cannot allow ourselves to be more or less committed to policies in which we have no voice whatever. With regard to this very Singapore question we are told that Canada has not offered any advice. Again we are left completely in the dark as to what responsibilities we have; and I may say that so far as I can see from the report of the Economic Conference I cannot discern that any very great light is thrown on the question by the resolutions which were adopted at that conference. However, I am glad to think that there has been, through the years, a gradual growth of a spirit of independent action. You will remember that in the time of Sir John A. Macdonald, as far back as the year 1885, there arose the question as to the relationship of Canada with regard to foreign wars. Sir John Macdonald, among other things, said:

> Why should we waste money and men in this wretched business? England is not at war, but merely helping the Khedive to put down an insurrection; and now that Gordon is gone the motive of aiding in the rescue of our countrymen is gone with him. Our men and money would therefore be sacrificed to get Gladstone and Company out of the hole they plunged themselves into by their own imbecility. Again, reciprocal aid to be given by the Colonies and England should be a matter of treaty, deliberately entered into and settled on a permanent basis.

If anyone in this corner of the House should venture to use such strong language as that I fancy that some of those who claim to be the successors of the Conservatives of that time might castigate us very severely indeed for giving utterance to what they might term disloyal sentiments. I think, however, that the time has come when we ought to be able on the floor of this House to give full and free expression to our opinions regarding national and imperial affairs without being called disloyal. Another of the great national leaders, one who had so much to do with the outlining of the fundamental policies of Canada, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in the House of Commons on the 5th day of February, 1900 in connection with the despatch of troops to South Africa, said:

> I claim for Canada this, that in the future Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act, to interfere or not to interfere, to do just as she pleases, and that she shall reserve to herself the right to judge whether or not there is cause for her to act.

We all know the attitude that was taken more recently by the present government with regard to the Near Eastern affair. I do not know that I need detain the House by reading the correspondence in that connection; it is fresh in all our minds. In my opinion, not only the majority in this House but the majority of the people throughout Canada were absolutely behind the government in the action which was taken at that time.

Let me quote another authority with regard to the status of Canada. Sir Robert Borden, in the course of a debate in this House on September 2, 1919, referring to the Peace Conference at Paris, spoke as follows:

> It is desirable to note an important development in constitutional practice respecting the signature of the various treaties concluded at the conference. Hitherto it has been the practice to insert an article or reservation providing for the adhesion of the dominions. In view of the new position that had been secured and of the part played by Dominion representatives at the peace table we thought this method inappropriate and undesirable in connection with the Peace Treaty. Accordingly I proposed that the assent of the King as High Contracting Party to the various treaties should in respect of the dominions be signified by the signature of the Dominion plenipotentiaries, and that the preamble and other formal parts of the treaties should be drafted accordingly. This proposal was adopted in the form of a memorandum by all the Dominion Prime Ministers at a meeting which I summoned, and was put forward by me on their behalf to the British Empire delegation, by whom it was accepted. The proposal was subsequently adopted by the conference and the various treaties have been drawn up accordingly so that the dominions appear therein as signatories, and their concurrence in the treaties is thus given in the same manner as that of other nations.

Further, in reference to the Versailles treaty of peace we have Sir Robert Borden answering Mr. Fielding in these words:

> His Majesty the King and his advisers have recognized the right of this parliament to express its opinion upon this treaty. I made that pledge to parliament, and the British government have been informed of that pledge. They recognize the situation, and they are not disposed to deal with this treaty, so far as Canada is concerned, apart from the approval of the Canadian parliament.. .. ..
> I tell him (Mr. Fielding) that it is recognized by the ministers of the Crown of Great Britain that this treaty must be submitted to the Canadian parliament for its approval, and that we desire, we insist, upon the judgment of the Canadian parliament in regard to it before we advise the King on behalf of Canada that the treaty should be ratified.. .. ..
> If my hon. friend means that, notwithstanding the arrangements which have been made, the conventions which have become recognized, the status which has been accorded to the dominions during recent years, we are still subject to have this treaty ratified by His Majesty on behalf of Canada whether the parliament of Canada is willing to ratify it or not, then I tell him he is dealing in ancient history and that his ideas should advance with the progress of recent years.. .. ..
> His suggestion was that ratification by the parliament of Canada is merely a farce, that the government of the United Kingdom possesses such constitutional right in respect of this dominion that they can impose their will upon us without regard to this parliament. I repeat that if such is the opinion of the hon. member he is thinking in terms of a hundred years ago and not of to-day.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

We have advanced in this country, if not by purely legal means, at least by actual constitutional practice throughout these years, and we ought to recognize now, in some formal way, the status which we have attained.

I was struck by one little clause in the constitution of the Irish Free State, and I should like to think that this expresses what ought to be the situation in Canada. This is the clause:

> All powers of government and all authority, legislative, executive and judicial, are derived from the people, and the same shall be exercised in the Irish Free State through the organizations established by or under and in accordance with this constitution.

Surely we ought to have come to that stage in our national development when we would frankly recognize that all authority is vested in the people—and I would add, in the people whose country is being administered, not in the people of some other country thousands of miles away.

Now, why have not some such independence of action, not merely in our foreign affairs but in our internal affairs as well? I am not going to discuss the Halibut treaty, which of course is very closely related to this matter and perhaps is intermediary between our foreign, and our purely domestic affairs. But there are a number of matters to which I have made the very briefest reference a few minutes ago in regard to which we have no liberty of action. It appears that we cannot amend our own constitution. Why should we not be able to amend it? The House will recognize that the resolution is put in a form which simply affirms that we believe we ought to be able to do these things. We cannot change the relative jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments; we cannot in that way, as I have said, provide for efficient action on some very important questions that confront us under our modern industrial system; we cannot change the executive government of the province in such a way as to affect the office of Lieutenant Governor, which practically makes our authority of very little value indeed; and we have no extra-territorial jurisdiction; all these powers are lacking to us.

regard respecting internal affairs; its constitution can be amended by a simple act of parliament. Australia has the same power, but the amendment must go before the people as a referendum. In both cases, however, the people have the privilege of amending their own constitution. Why should we in Canada be placed in a less favourable position than South Africa or Australia? We are told that the British North America Act stands in the way. To a certain extent the act may be regarded as more or less our written constitution. Again without going into the constitutional aspects of this matter in any detail—and I quite frankly admit that I am not prepared by any legal training to do so—may I suggest several points which, it seems to me, might appeal to a large number of hon. members who are not looking at the question from the narrowly legal standpoint? Great Britain, to whom we look for guidance in the affairs of government, has no written constitution, and it has always been the boast of her people that their parliament is supreme. If we are really one of the grown-ups in the family of nations, we ought surely, to have more or less flexibility in our governmental machinery; we ought not to be tied by a hard and fast constitution. It might be in any given case more difficult for us to amend our constitution than it would be for the United States, whose constitution, as everyone knows, is very rigid.

May I point out further, that England herself has advanced a very long way since the British North America Act was put on the statute books? Why should we continually have to go back and take our guidance from the England of a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago, rather than be helped by the England of to-day? Only last night on the floor of this House we had references to the situation that prevailed in England, I think it was in 1790, and we found it very difficult to follow the action of England in 1921. Why should we be forced to follow the lead of the England of the past instead of the England of to-day?

Further than that, the conditions in Canada existing at the time of the British North America Act were entirely different from those which exist at the present time. Then Canada consisted very largely of a string of pioneer settlements extending only part way across the continent. Now with the revolution in transportation, we have also revolution in our whole industrial, commercial and financial life. If I may adopt the figure which I have heard my colleague use, if we want to fix an automobile why should we be forced to go back to an ox-cart in order to get our models and our tools? There is the difficulty that we find to-day. We are dealing to-day with an elaborate organization of society, built up on our present industrial system. The British North America Act was formulated at a time when the greater part of the people of this country were living in little quiet agricultural settlements, and were not faced with the complicated problems which face us at the present time. We have our electric light fixtures to-day. Why should we be constantly referred to the period of candles, and be taught that we ought to light our houses in the way that our grandfathers did, and be limited entirely by the modus operandi of those earlier days?

On more than one occasion in this House some of us have been referred to the British North America Act; of some measure designed to meet a pressing modern need, we are told: You cannot find it in the British North America Act, or it is against the British North America Act. Well, I submit that half the legislation that takes place on the floor of this House finds no warrant whatever in the British North America Act, none whatever. Some of the principles may be there. My good friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) suggests that they are there. They may be there in germ, but I submit that we cannot find stated specifically the grounds upon which we are acting to-day. The old-time legislation and the old-time constitutional provisions are quite inadequate to meet the needs of the present situation. Might I give just one illustration of this? Last year we had a bill presented on the floor of this House dealing with the lake of the Woods levels. Some claimed that the federal government should have jurisdiction in a matter of this kind; others claimed that this was a matter which came entirely under the jurisdiction of the provinces concerned. Now in the era before electricity it might have been comparatively easy to decide whether the water-powers of a river were a matter that concerned the provinces merely, or concerned the whole country; but now that we have the generation of electricity by water-power, and as the water-power is dependent upon maintaining levels on various rivers, the old ways of dealing with this question, the old points of view become absolutely inadequate. They are too antiquated for practical guidance. Under those circumstances we ought to be able readily, without any roundabout methods, to alter our constitution so that we can more effectively deal with various situations as they arise.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): May I interrupt? As the hon. gentleman is no doubt aware, the British North America Act was a contract entered into by the various provinces of the Dominion at that time, and that act cannot be amended now any more than any ordinary contract can be amended, and certainly it cannot be amended by this parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not quite sure, looking at the matter from the standpoint of the ordinary citizen of Canada, that I could concede that the British North America Act was simply a contract between the various provinces. It is altogether different in type from an ordinary legal commercial contract. Moreover I would suggest that there is no reason why even legal contracts should not be amended, none whatever; and in the case of many of the long-term contracts I think it is understood that in certain cases modern changing conditions make it necessary for the law to step in and modify even some commercial contracts. The question which has been asked suggests an opinion which was given me the other day by an official of this House who took the ground in discussing this amendment: If Canada wishes to amend the British North America Act there are only two possible ways; first, as the American colonies did, and I suppose that means by revolution; or second, by petition to the Imeprial parliament, asking them to amend their act.

I am not going into the exact form or manner in which this resolution, if it is passed by the House, should be acted upon. That is a matter for the government to decide; that is a matter of mere form. But I would suggest that, looking at the question from a very practical standpoint; if the people as represented in this House decide that the time has come when we should have the right to amend our own constitution, when we should have the right to decide our own affairs without reference to the Motherland, then I would think that the authorities of Great Britain would hesitate before refusing us such a right.

In some ways it might be considered well for those of us who represent Labour to leave things as they are, for I fancy that if on any matter we went to the Motherland where a Labour government is in power we would stand a better chance, than we ever have done before of getting what Labour in this country wants. Notwithstanding that consideration, I feel that this matter should be taken up and decided on the floor of this House. Even if we have to wait a little bit longer, I am a sufficient believer in democracy to think that we in Canada must work out our own salvation. I know that there are some people who might perhaps say there is a danger that certain portions of the country would forfeit certain privileges or rights which they now have. I cannot see that such an objection is well founded. Surely the Canadian people can be trusted to be very jealous indeed of the rights which have been recognized in times past. I cannot think that we must go over the seas in order to obtain power that would force us to keep our contracts or carry out our various undertakings in this country.

Perhaps those of us who live in the West, out on the prairies, look at this matter from a little different angle from that of those who have lived in the East and perhaps have been accustomed a little bit longer to the traditional point of view. Out there we have a strange mingling of peoples, not only from Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces, but also large numbers directly from England and Scotland, some from the United States to the south of us, and some from the various countries of Europe. We feel very strongly that all that mingling of the people is more or less typical of what is going on throughout the length and breadth of Canada. We feel that we have practically attained our nationhood, and having obtained it if we are to have an united Canadian people it can only be as the people recognize and practise their full responsibilities.

We have heard a great deal in this House in the last week or two about the necessity of binding together the different parts of Canada. I too should like to see the different parts of Canada bound more closely together, but I submit that that cannot be done without it being possible for each section of the country to work out its own destinies in a manner that appeals most strongly to it. I cannot see that there is likely to be any trouble whatever if representatives of all the various provinces of this country can come together and decide upon those policies which are in the best interests of the country at large; and as far as the Motherland is concerned, we must surely recognize that the ties of sentiment are much stronger than any ancient legal ties. There is no danger whatever at this period in our history that we shall repudiate Great Britain simply because there have been a few lines altered in a certain old act. Surely our loyalty to the Motherland is based on stronger foundations than that. I take it that we are quite in keeping with the expressions and viewpoint of the present government in Great Britain, when we say that it is not in the interests of the Empire that we should build up one strong centralized organization, but rather a community of nations. Such a commonwealth will prosper in the future to the extent to which each particular part is allowed the fullest freedom of self expression and self determination.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What has my hon. friend in mind when he speaks of the "governing powers of Canada"?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the questioner in return what he has in mind?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Because the French version of the resolution states:

La Chambre est d'avis que l'Exécutif du Canada tel qu'il est constitué par l'Acte de l'Amérique du Nord. . .

Whereas the governing powers of Canada might be assumed to mean the governments of the legislatures of the different provinces, that they shall be taken as representing the provinces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not what I had in mind. I do not think that is what the resolution states.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The powers you ask would be vested in the Governor in Council sitting in Ottawa?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh no, not at all.

Mr. McCONICA: Does my hon. friend's resolution propose the abolition of provincial governments?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it does not touch that matter at all. Things would remain just exactly as they are, except that we should have the right to amend our own constitution.

Mr. McCONICA: How do you propose to govern Canada as England is governed? There are provincial governments here, and this parliament could not have the power the English parliament has.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not proposing the abolition of provincial government at all. Let me read the resolution, I do not know whether my hon. friend has read it carefully:

That, in the opinion of this House, the governing powers of Canada are constituted by the British North America Act as amended and as altered from time to time hereafter ought to possess under the British Crown the same powers with regard to Canada, its affairs and its people, as the Parliament of Great Britain possesses in regard to Great Britain, its affairs and its people.

Mr. VIEN: If this power were given to Canada to amend its own constitution would the hon. gentleman give us an idea of the amendments he would suggest?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I think that is rather a large order.

Mr. VIEN: I only wish to get a clearer idea of what my hon. friend would do under the new order of things.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think my proposition is very clear now. It might possibly be that in order to bring about some of the alterations which I have merely mentioned —for example a clearer understanding as to the relative jurisdiction of the provinces of the Dominion, as to any alteration in the Senate, or other such matters—it might be necessary to call a conference of the various provinces of the Dominion, and gradually work out a programme of such changes in the constitution as may be desirable. But I am not venturing at all to deal with these larger questions to-day; my resolution is a formal declaration which if passed will give us power to deal with such questions. That is all I wish to do at present, and in doing this I had in mind merely asking that we should make more explicit the powers which practically have been conceded to us since the war.

Mr. VIEN: I should like my hon. friend to allow me to put another question. I should like to know what he had in his mind as regards amending our constitution, with respect to the Senate, does not my hon. friend believe that we could amend the constitution of the Canadian Senate just as well as we stand to-day as we would be able to do with the amendments which he proposes? In respect of the rights of the various provinces I would imagine that before we follow him there, it will be necessary to have a further explanation of what he has in his mind as to changing the various powers that rest either with the federal parliament or the provincial legislatures.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I can only cover the ground that I have already covered. What I have especially in mind is the solution of some of the difficulties we have encountered during the last two or three years. It is quite true that we might possibly pass a resolution with regard to the Senate in this House, but in order to obtain any action we would require the support of the Senate itself, and then we should need to go over to the British parliament, to another and superior power, in order to ask them to consent to the change. I say that we ought to have the power of deciding here in this country what form of administration would best meet the needs of Canada. I think that should make clear what I had in mind. As to particular instances of disadvantages under which we labour, there are matters in regard to our internal affairs that have arisen in connection with our industrial life during recent years, and for which there does not seem to be any adequate provision in an act drafted so many years ago when conditions were not as they are to-day.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. gentleman propose to amend the constitution so that the parliament of Canada may take from the provincial legislatures powers which were given to them at confederation?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not my suggestion.

Mr. MILLAR: Is it my hon. friend's thought that each province of Canada should have the same powers as the states in the United States have at the present time, that each should have a constitution of its own with power to amend that constitution?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not go that far. I had not the United States in view, nor did I contemplate any particular change in our form of government. Of course at the present time each province has more or less of a constitution of its own under the British North America Act, but if this resolution were carried, and we proceeded to act along these lines, we would have it in our power, in consultation with the different provinces, to alter the constitution in such a way as would meet the immediate needs with which we find ourselves confronted.

Mr. VIEN: Have we not already all that is required to amend our constitution? Can we not suggest this amendment, and is it not a safeguard for all concerned to have an appeal to the Imperial parliament to protect those interested?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not think we have any power along that line. We may go to the Imperial parliament with certain requests. We have no powers whatever; and as to the safeguards, as I said in an earlier part of my address I cannot see why we should have such absolutely colonial minds that we believe we must go to some imperial power in order to let them tell us what we may do. That point came to a great many of us very clearly with regard to matters of peace and war. I urge that we have a perfect right in this country—and I say this because I have a good deal of the old spirit of British independence in my own make-up—to decide whether we want to send our men to the front as have the people who live in England, and I do not say that in any disparagement of the people in England, but because I consider myself British, shall I say, from away back, for generations? It is not that I am at all repudiating British traditions; it is because I am cherishing British traditions and want to see them carried forward in this country.

Mr. T. H. McCONICA (Battleford): I think this resolution is rather ill advised. We have not such a form of government as they have in England. Our governmental powers are divided between the provinces and the Dominion. Certain authorities and certain governmental powers are vested in the provinces. Certain others are reserved to the Dominion. Now, that is not so in England. Their whole power is vested in the Imperial parliament, and for us to pass a resolution that this House should possess the same power as the parliament of England means that we abolish provincial governments.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish the hon. member who is speaking would read the resolution. It does not suggest at all what he has been trying to make it suggest.

Mr. McCONICA: You take away the power. If the power is all vested in this parliament, what is the use of provincial governments? You must divide somewhere. You must say "this is vested in one authority and these things are vested in another"; and you would not allow one to trench upon the authority of the other. Therefore, I say the resolution is not well stated at least. You cannot preserve the provincial governments and pass this resolution as it stands. I do not look with much favour upon this idea that the British North America Act is interfering very much with the people of Canada. I think the people of Canada under that act are as free as any people on the face of the globe. In what way is the Mother Country impeding us in any direction? We make our country what we see fit to make it. All powers, so far as our own affairs are concerned, are vested in us, and there is not a man, woman or child in Canada who has felt the least restraint in the last twenty-five years because of the influence of the Mother Country. The hon. gentleman says we should have the right to determine whether we should go to war. We have that right. That right was recognized when the British North America Act was passed. For ages it has been the boasted right of England to control her warlike representatives by refusing supplies. She had the strangle-hold on her rulers who saw fit to go to war. She could withhold supplies. When the British North America Act was passed, that power was placed in the hands of the Canadian parliament. We have that right and have always had it, and it is a distinct recognition of our right to determine when we shall send our sons to war, and what more do we want? Why should we reaffirm it? I see nothing in this resolution that should recommend it to any single member of this honourable body. Why, he says, we are told that certain things are provincial. Of course they are. But that is necessary as a result of maintaining the provincial governments. I look upon this resolution as ill-advised, and hope the hon. member will withdraw it.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): I had expected that the hon. mover of this resolution (Mr. Woodsworth) would present some argument to show us that it was opportune at the present time; and that he would show us how we were prevented in the past from having amendments to our constitution adopted by the Imperial parliament. He has not shown us that such amendments have been refused. The hon. gentleman has failed to answer our questions in detail. He hinted at a debate which took place last year in respect to some labour trouble which occurred in the western provinces, and in regard to which the question of provincial rights was raised. It was a question of contract, of a closed shop—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to know what the hon. gentleman refers to. I referred to no labour trouble whatever.

Mr. VIEN: I understood that my hon. friend raised the question of a closed shop, in a debate late last session.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I raised no such question.

Mr. VIEN: My memory may serve me badly; but my hon. friend has said that in several instances the question of whether a right was federal or provincial was raised in this House, and that it was often impossible to find out whether it was within the purview of the federal parliament or of the provincial legislature; and that was one of the reasons he put forward to prove that his resolution was opportune, if I understood him rightly. I say, Sir, that this is not a good argument to prove that the resolution is opportune. The constitution of Canada, to be found in the British North America Act, provides certain powers which were given to the federal authorities, and certain powers which were left to the provincial legislature. My hon. friend would like to bestow on the governing powers of Canada authority to amend our constitution without reference to the British parliament. This needs further explanation. What are the governing powers? The governing powers of Canada under the British North America Act are this parliament and the provincial legislatures. Therefore, if the provincial legislatures and this parliament were united in suggesting an amendment to our constitution, no doubt such an amendment would pass, and no power under the sun would object to such an amendment, and since 1867 several amendments have been brought to the British North America Act and there has been no objection whatever.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the hon. member think it consonant with the dignity of a sovereign state to go to the legislature of another state to ask permission to change its constitution?

Mr. VIEN: There is much in favour of the contention that Canada has now reached an age where it is time to sever all tutelage. There are quite a few who, though recognizing the King of England as the head of this state, would like that all other powers be vested in Canada and Canada alone. In respect of that, I am in sympathy with much of what was said by my hon. friend; but Canada has a very peculiar complexity. Many students of conditions that prevail in Canada have said that we have not one country, but five, on account of difference of interests, difference of ideals, difference of ambitions and aspirations of the various sections of our country. Some think the Maritime provinces, Quebec, Ontario, the prairie provinces and British Columbia differ materially from one another in respect of, not only tradition, but aspirations and interests.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the hon. member mean to suggest that a country 3,000 miles away can understand this peculiar complexity of Canada better than we can ourselves?

Mr. VIEN: I was coming to that very point, and if my hon. friend will bear with me patiently, I think I can completely satisfy his query. I was saying that the differences of interests, aspirations and character that distinguish these various provinces made it imperative for the British parliament, when they enacted the British North America Act, not to centralise the powers, but to give to the different provinces a certain self-determination and home rule within their own provinces for local affairs. My hon. friend, in explaining the purport of his resolution, led me to understand that one of his purposes was to change materially the province of the federal and provincial powers; that he had in mind to further the change in the scope of the authority of the federal and provincial powers.

Mr. IRVINE: If the peculiar conditions of Canada are such as to require that power shall not be centralized, does my hon. friend suggest that if we had the power to make our own constitution we would be foolish enough to centralize it when it should not be centralized?

Mr. VIEN: Before being able to judge fully the object of this resolution, I wanted to determine what my hon. friend had in mind as a motive for the resolution, and the only motive that I could detect from his explanation was the fact that, in a discussion which took place, he was sent to the provincial authority because it was a matter within provincial jurisdiction. That was the main reason which he gave for introducing his amendment. In respect of the Senate, which was the other reason, I think I showed, and he admitted, that the amendment would by no means help him to solve the question. It will not be easier to amend the constitution of the Senate when the remedy that he suggests has been introduced into our constitution. Therefore, if what my hon. friend has in mind in bringing about the proposed amendment, is to restrict the provincial powers and to enlarge the powers of the Dominion as regards the scope of its legislative authority, I think we must object to that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I urge that that is not a true statement? There is no thought of restricting the powers of the provinces; there is not a word in the resolution looking to that, nor was there in my speech The governing powers are the federal and the provincial governments. The hon. gentleman seeks a motive. I was very frank in answering his questions and I would ask him: Is any ulterior motive manifest?

Mr. VIEN: I asked my hon. friend what were the amendments which he had been unable to promote and which he would suggest in the future; I asked him what was the real motive behind the resolution. And, outside of the amendment to the constitution of the Senate, the only reason that he could give me was that at a time, when raising a question here, he was referred to the provincial authorities. I may say, for ourselves, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) was absolutely right when he said that confederation was a contract. It was a contract entered into by all the colonies that constituted British North America at the time. This contract was entered into in full cognizance of the conditions that it created, and my hon. friend cannot to-day contend that that contract, which is the basis of our confederation, can be amended by any central authority. I understand the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) put him a question to cause him to define more clearly what he meant by the governing powers of Canada. The governing powers of Canada are the federal parliament; the powers that govern the provinces are quite different.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the words in the resolution read:

> The governing powers of Canada as constituted by the British North America Act.

And I think they are plainly the federal powers plus the provincial powers.

Mr. VIEN: Even at that, I contend that it would not be opportune to introduce a resolution which is supported by the argument offered by my hon. friend. I sympathise very fully with the idea of obtaining for Canada a greater degree of autonomy, and a couple of years ago I suggested that it was hardly in keeping with the dignity of Canada to send the cases in our courts of justice, for instance, to the final appeal of the tribunal sitting in England. Outside of the question of the royal privilege of granting a pardon to criminals, and the question of our constitutional rights, I would simply do away with appeals to the Privy Council. It seems to me that the Supreme Court of Canada can well dispose, in last resort, of all our cases. Then, again, there is the question of our representation abroad. It is humiliating for a Canadian in Paris, in London, or elsewhere—but particularly in Paris and in foreign countries on the continent—not to have the right of acting through a fully accredited representative of this country in touch with the government of the country in which he happens to be at the time. I know of a distinguished Canadian statesman who wanted to have an interview with President Poincaré at Paris and he was unable to do so through any representative of Canada in that city; he had to go through the British Embassy to secure, through the diplomatic channel, an interview with the President of the French Republic. Yet a national of Monte Carlo could easily obtain an introduction to the French President through a representative of his own country.

Mr. JACOBS: That is probably because he knows how to play the game.

Mr. VIEN: They are independent and have accredited representatives near the heads of foreign states. I repeat, it is quite humiliating for Canadian citizens to be unable to do the same. I understand that this humiliation is felt to-day by our representative even in London, who. in all public functions, is not on the same footing, has not the same precedence, as the representatives of much smaller countries abroad. Changes in respect of such questions as these are desirable and advisable. But as to the suggestion of my hon. friend, namely, the elimination of certain differences between the provinces and the restriction of provincial rights, or the changing of our fundamental basis of government in relation to the jurisdiction of the provinces and the federal government, I say that he has failed to prove, at least to me, that his resolution is at all timely or desirable; and unless he can implement his explanations I shall be compelled to vote against his motion.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): One of the most remarkable things about this resolution is the fact that no one seems to know precisely what it means, and least of all, I think, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Woodsworth) who introduced it. Under these circumstances, is it quite worth while for us to take up any considerable length of time in debating it? We are face to face this year with a programme that apparently makes for economy. This House is asked to pare down the Civil Service considerably and to effect stringent economies in every department. Is it, then, too bold a thing to suggest that we should begin the practice of economy in this House by setting an exemple to the country in confining our discussion to things of real and immediate interest to the people, to things of immediate and vital value, instead of spending our time discussing mere academic questions with reference to which no one in the country is at all excited and no substantial body of people want any alteration? That is the position I take; and to economise the time of the House I shall refrain from making any extended remarks on the question under consideration. I will simply crystallize my suggestion in an action which I hope the House will endorse: I move that the resolution be further considered this day six months.

Mr. McMASTER: I will not attempt—

Mr. BAXTER: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. McMASTER: I will not—

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been moved by Mr. Woodsworth, seconded by Mr. Irvine.

That, in the opinion of this House, the governing powers of Canada as constituted by the British North America Act as amended and as altered from time to time hereafter ought to possess under the British Crown the same powers with regard to Canada, its affairs and its people, as the parliament of Great Britain possesses in regard to Great Britain, its affairs and its people.

To which Mr. Baxter moves in amendment, seconded by Mr. Stevens, that the motion be further considered this day six months. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is debatable, and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has the floor.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I beg to say a few words, since my name is coupled with the amendment as seconder. I agree with the sentiments expressed by the mover of the amendment, (Mr. Baxter) in this respect, that undoubtedly there is no demand amongst the public of Canada for any change in the constitutional status of this country. While I quite agree that academic questions of this kind are properly brought before the House for discussion, nevertheless I am opposed to the principle set forth in the motion, and I merely rise at this time to place my position clearly before the House. I think the suggestion is a proper one that it might be more profitable to have the question set over for consideration at some future date when there are not so many pressing and more practical problems before the House. In the meantime any hon. member of the House who is vitally interested in the question of changing the constitutional status of Canada might very well be given some opportunity for the expression of an opinion on such a highly important matter, without an attempt being made to force the House at this time to come to any conclusion regarding it.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): It is not my desire to discuss the wisdom of the motion, but I presume I shall be in order in taking up very briefly the subject matter of the resolution. I would first draw to the attention of the House the fact that the resolution provides that the governing powers of Canada, as constituted by the British North America Act as amended and as altered from time to time hereafter, ought to possess, under the British Crown, the same powers with regard to Canada as the parliament of Great Britain possesses in regard to Great Britain herself. In respect of a great deal of what the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has said, I am in complete accord. I think, however, there are certain aspects of his speech and of the resolution which are open to misconstruction, and therefore it seems to me it would be wise to make a slight amendment to the resolution as drafted, and this I purpose to do before sitting down.

There are some in this House and in the country who possess the "colonial mind" and who hug to their hearts the idea of subordination. I am inclined to believe, and with joy, that those people are becoming less and less numerous year by year. And I rejoice to think that the development of the spirit of Canadian nationhood has not been carried on under the auspices of any one political party. Sir John A. Macdonald was a strong nationalist, Edward Blake was a strong nationalist, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a strong nationalist, Sir Robert Borden was a strong nationalist, and therefore I believe that we need not make of this a party question. I think we all desire to see Canada grow to the full stature of nationhood, and that we do not wish to feel as citizens in a free state that our state is subordinate to any other state, or that we possess less rights of nationhood than, let us say, Uruguay or Ecuador. I think I can leave that aspect of the question for the moment.

The member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) was right when he said, we have a peculiar country with certain complexities which perhaps do not exist in other countries. I suggest, however, that the very best welding factor which exists in this country is the spirit of nationhood, and that the more and more we become imbued with a sane national spirit—not a narrow, not an insular national spirit; I wish to see our national spirit developed side by side with a sane international spirit—the sooner we shall become truly national in our outlook, which will make us put in the forefront the great fact that we are all Canadians, and that our differences are merely secondary in importance. I do recognize, as every student of our constitutional history must recognize, that the British North America Act was of the nature of a contract ratified and consecrated by legislation, and that we must be very careful to see that any power which would be given to the Canadian people to change their constitution must be exercised with the consent of the original four parties to the constitution. Therefore to bring my remarks to an end, because I do not wish to unduly delay the House, I propose, seconded by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Pritchard):

> That the following words be added to the resolution: "That no amendment of the British North America Act should be effected except with the consent of the majority of the provinces, in which majority the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario should form part."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: My hon. friends in the other corner of the chamber are amused by this amendment. The Americans have the right to amend their constitution after two-thirds of the states have delivered their approval. Is there, then, anything ridiculous in the proposal that we should have the right to amend our constitution?

5 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not amused at that, but at the distinction the hon. gentleman draws between the importance of the various provinces.

Mr. McMASTER: It is not the ground of the difference of importance, it is because we might propose to change the original contract, and it would only be right to have the people who made the original contract consent to its change, because a contract cannot be changed unless all the parties thereto agree. I do not see anything ridiculous in the proposal.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend agrees that it is a contract, how can he suggest that the majority of the contracting parties can compel one of their number to agree to an amendment?

Mr. McMASTER: That is precisely what I have guarded against by providing that an amendment can only be made by a majority of the provinces, in which majority the four original contracting parties must form part.

Mr. VIEN: I think my hon. friend has failed to understand my question. Perhaps I did not put it with sufficient clearness. Does not my hon. friend see that if he agrees that the British North America Act is a contract, by his amendment he compels a contracting party to be ruled in respect of any proposed amendments by the majority of the contracting parties?

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. VIEN: To change a contract agreed upon, you must have the consent of the contracting parties.

Mr. McMASTER: I thought I made that perfectly clear. That is just what I wish to avoid.

Mr. VIEN: No.

Mr. McMASTER: Let me take a specific case. Suppose we had the right to amend our constitution, and it was decided to make the Senate elective, the amendment would have to be passed by the parliament of Canada, it would then have to be agreed to by a majority of the provinces, and in that majority each one of the following provinces would have to form a part—New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec and Ontario. We would have to have the four original contracting parties as a unit and agreed before the change could be made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman consider, for example, British Columbia any less a contracting party than New Brunswick, inasmuch as British Columbia afterwards, seeing the terms of confederation and the provincial rights there accorded, said, "By way of contract we are ready to come in and agree?"

Mr. McMASTER: There might be something in what my learned and right hon. friend suggests, it might be necessary to have British Columbia form one of the majority. It had escaped my notice for the moment that the province of British Columbia was in the same position as the four original contracting parties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And also Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HUGHES: Every one came in under those conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think I have a way to solve the whole question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MICHAUD: Will the hon. member withdraw his motion?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With regard to the motion moved by the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), "That this resolution be read a second time this day six months"—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not like rising to a point of order in respect to a motion moved by so prominent a member as the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter), but really I do not think a motion asking for the deferring of the reading of a resolution such as this is in order. A resolution is not read, it is considered, and passed or rejected. The motion would have to be that the resolution be passed this day six months, which would certainly be out of order on the very face of it. I do not recall the six months' hoist being moved in regard to a resolution of a private member.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): The only resolutions which are read a second time are those which have to be concurred in, usually from Committee of Supply and Ways and Means; but this resolution is not of that kind, and the amendment is out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion moved by the hon. member for St. John City, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is out of order, the resolution now before the House not being one which requires to be read a second time. For the reasons stated by the right hon. gentleman I quite agree that it is out of order, and must be ruled out of order, and I would cite Beauchesne's Rules, paragraph 512, as indicating that authority clearly. The question is on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) seconded by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Pritchard):

That the following words be added to the resolution, namely: Provided that no amendment of the British North America Act should be effected except with the consent of the majority of the provinces, in which majority the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario should form part.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I wish to say only a word or two on the resolution. With many of the arguments set forth by my hon. friend who introduced the resolution (Mr. Woodsworth), I would rather be in agreement. On the other hand, I think he does not consider the powers of Canada as possessed to-day as great as I consider them myself. I think this resolution implies that we are in a state of subordination, which I do not think we are in. My hon. friend seems to believe that we are not in any way in possession of the powers of the people of Great Britain with regard to their own legislation and administration. That is not the feeling, the view, the opinion, of Canadian public men during recent years. We certainly have had evolution in this country, and there are articles which have been added to the British North America Act possibly which are not written in the act. May I quote the words of Sir Robert Borden with regard to the powers of Canada as compared with the powers of Great Britain? I am quoting from the memorandum which he circulated in March, 1919, prior to the signature of the Peace treaty, and here are his words:

The Crown is the supreme executive in the United Kingdom and in all the Dominions, but it acts on the advice of different ministries within different constitutional units, and under Resolution 9 of the Imperial Conference, 1917, the organization of the Empire is to be based upon equality of nationhood.

That is the principle now admitted not only by Canadians but by British statesmen, and my hon. friend himself said that he could not conceive that Great Britain would ever refuse to pass any legislation changing our constitution or refuse even to give us the right to change it, Now what does that mean? It means that the position we are in is of our own making, and it is. There is no inferiority or subordination in a state which we want to have ourselves, and which we have made ourselves. The British North America Act and the limitations which are imposed upon our powers, if there are such limitations, are made of our own free will. There is no inferiority in that. It is the result of a treaty as my hon. friend from Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) said. It is a treaty between various colonies which entered into an agreement. They fixed what the powers of the central parliament should be, and they also fixed what the powers of the various provinces which succeeded the colonies of that time would be, and this was ratified and accepted by the Imperial parliament of the time. Everything we have or have not is because we wanted it so. Now this treaty cannot be changed, it has been the contention of many constitutional authorities, and I think it is only fair that no change should be accepted, without the consent of all those who were parties to it. It is a sacred treaty just as is any other treaty; it is no "scrap of paper."

My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) suggests that if we have the power to amend our own constitution, because after all I think that is the only power which we do not possess without applying to the Imperial parliament to ratify our will in the matter, that power should not be exercised without the consent of the majority of the provinces, and in that majority he includes Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, which were parties to the original contract. Now I ask, would the other provinces of Canada relish being placed in such a state of inferiority? Would such a suggestion be accepted by the other five Canadian provinces? I think it would be a source of conflict and difficulty. I do not think it could be accepted. The only other way would be to have unanimity on the part of all the provinces agreeing to a change before that change should be made. Perhaps this might be discussed, if we ever go to the limit proposed by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). This is, of course, a very important matter, and it is rather unfortunate that it comes up at this stage of the session when members of the House have not had the time and the opportunity to study and consider it. I think my hon. friend has served his purpose by placing the whole question before the public of Canada, and perhaps he would be well advised to withdraw the resolution for the present time and give the people of Canada, as well as the members of the House, the time and opportunity to consider the various phases of this question. There are people who think that the written constitution fixing the powers and the limitations of the authorities of the governing bodies is a better one than a constitution which is not written, and which is modified as the British constitution has been modified in the course of centuries to meet practical necessities as they arise. This question is a debatable one. But after all, I do not think we have to suffer very much from the condition as it is to-day. Every time we have claimed a right or a power we have merely exercised it, and nobody has complained about it. I do not think it is absolutely necessary to assert, as in this resolution, the power and the authority which we possess, and the limitations, which are all of our own making and of our own free will.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): It does seem to me that the suggestion just made by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), which would involve the concurrence of all the provinces, is perhaps the only way out if we are to understand that the British North America Act is a definite contract. It seems to me it might be well worth while considering if, with that understanding it is not advisable to proceed to some definite recognition of our right of self-determination. It may be all right, as the minister has just said, that we have these powers, but nominally, we do not have them and we choose to assert our powers in spite of our status, which denies them. It might be worth while at some time in the not distant future to consider the propriety of explicitly defining our status, and giving to us in a definite and explicit way that power which we are said to possess in connection with amending our own constitution. In regard to the remark of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) as to the British North America Act being a contract, and therefore how can it be altered, surely we must admit that contracts must be open for modification.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend will allow me on one point—with the consent of all contracting parties, but no party being committed to the amendment by a majority of the others.

Mr. GOOD: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has put the point very clearly indeed. However, the point I wish to raise was not that, but this: Evidently the objection that exists in the minds of many as to this proposal is the fear that Canada will not protect provincial rights as well as Great Britain. It was not definitely stated, but I think that fear is latent in the minds of a great many, and they are relying upon the British government to protect them in the maintenance of provincial rights. Well, I just want to suggest that after all, when it comes down to the last analysis, the Canadian parliament is just as capable of protecting the provinces in the enjoyment of their special privileges and rights, and just as willing to do so, as Great Britain. It may be just as well to recognize that frankly.

There is only one other point I wanted to refer to and it deals with a practical problem: What are we going to do about the Senate? I am not a constitutional lawyer, but I presume that so far as the Senate and the Commons are concerned they have co-ordinate powers, and we have been perpetually and everlastingly blocked from doing anything to reform the Upper Chamber. Is there any way of securing either Senate reform or Senate abolition without the consent of that body? We do not want to be reduced, at this stage in the history of the world, to the methods that were adopted in the time of Cromwell; and yet it is a practical difficulty we are up against. I should like to see some proposal made as to how to go about settling this difficulty; we shall have to tackle it sooner or later. Apparently we are blocked. This matter has been discussed for years and years. It has been generally admitted that our Senate is antiquated, to say the least, and that it does not function properly. Are we going to be for ever reduced to inefficiency because of certain constitutional limitations that have been placed upon us? I should like to see this practical problem dealt with in a practical way. And then, in connection with that practical problem, the general question of having our rights defined in respect to the modification of our own constitution appeals to me. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I think it might be worth while to take this matter up again, possibly not in the immediate future but when people have had the chance to think over it, and to devise some definite method of asserting those rights which I think it has been admitted we do possess, and I sincerely trust that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and those others,—and there are many of them in this House who are interested in this matter—will bring forward some practical suggestions in that direction.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I only wish to say a few words in placing myself on record in this matter. I think I am very British in sentiment, and yet at the same time I am an absolute believer in Canadian nationality. I think it was Carlyle who said "Do the duty that lies nearest to your hands", and we have a great many duties lying very close to-day that demand our immediate attention and perhaps are going to be very difficult to solve. I do not think we are suffering any great injustice, or any great grievance, at the present time, so far as the British government is concerned.

I admit the truth of what the last speaker stated, there may be some difficulty in reforming the Senate. But I do not believe it is going to be reformed this session anyway. In any event we are doing very well. There are a good many of these things that we must solve, and solve once and for all, before we start out for absolute nationhood. However, I just wanted to put myself on record. If this comes to a vote I shall vote against the resolution and amendment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): When I read the resolution of my hon. friend I thought it was a mere assertion of the position I had always regarded we had in Canada. I confess that as I listened to his speech I began to see that the interpretation he was putting on the words of the resolution was different not only to what I conceived its purport to be but different also, I believe, to what Sir Clifford Sifton ever intended. My hon. friend says he has taken it from some resolution or some address of Sir Clifford Sifton. I am perfectly sure that Sir Clifford Sifton is too good a constitutional lawyer not to include under the heading "governing powers of Canada" the provinces as well as the Dominion. I am perfectly certain that Sir Clifford Sifton, when he drafted the resolution, or delivered the address referred to, wished to make it clear that so far as the powers—legislative, executive or judicial powers—of this country were concerned in regard to Canadian affairs, divided as such powers are between the provinces and the Dominion, that taken together they to all intents and purposes should be the same as the powers of the British parliament in relation to the British people and their affairs. Now, the fact that my hon. friend in his own interpretation of his resolution has placed a different interpretation from that which I think most members of this House place upon it—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not ignore the provinces as being part of the governing powers of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I heard what my hon. friend said and I think he has already been corrected in the particular I have mentioned, not only by myself but by other members who have spoken. I gathered distinctly from his remarks that the "governing powers of Canada" as referred to by this resolution, related to the powers of the federal parliament and ignored the powers of the provincial legislatures.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have already stated two or three times that that is an entire misunderstanding of my position. By "the governing powers of Canada" I have reference not merely to the federal authorities but to the provincial authorities as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very glad indeed to hear my hon. friend give that interpretation because I think without it the resolution would not represent the opinions of the gentleman whose words have been quoted with respect to it.

Now as to the governing powers of this parliament and the provinces combined, I contend, Mr. Speaker, that to all intents and purposes this parliament and the legislatures of the several provinces have, with respect to Canadian affairs, as regards everything except the amendment of our constitution, exactly the same powers as the parliament of Great Britain has in relation to its people and their affairs. If that be true what is the necessity of creating, not only in this House but throughout the country, an impression that at this stage of our existence as a nation we possess a colonial status which not a single member of the House is prepared to admit we have. The resolution considered in relation to the speech made by my hon. friend would convey the impression to the people of Canada and to the people of Great Britain, and to people in other countries throughout the world that we in Canada, in some particular, felt our subordination. I do not know any particular in which the people of Canada, speaking broadly and generally, feel any sense of subordination whatever. Nor do I believe there is in fact any position of subordination. Take the one matter of the right to amend our own constitution; if the representatives of the Dominion government and the representatives of the provinces met together, framed any amendment they wished to the British North America Act and asked the parliament of Great Britain to sanction that amendment, is there a single member of this House who believes that the British parliament would hesitate to carry out the wish of the Dominion and the provinces in that regard? If that be true, are we not merely creating a shadow to obscure the reality and substance which is that, with respect to their own affairs, the people of Canada can do as they like, just as much as the people of Great Britain can do as they like in regard to their own affairs.

Mr. GOOD: What about the question of appeals to the judicial committee of the Privy Council? Are we not in a position of inferiority?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say that if the people of Canada ever decided it was unwise to have an appeal to the Privy Council, and asked to have an amendment in that particular, it would be made. There is no limitation put on us in virtue of some position which is being taken from across the sea. As the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said, any limitation which exists, exists in virtue of the circumstance that, everything being considered, it has been thought wisest and best by those who have had to do with the maintaining of the constitutional relations of the country to keep it so.

Mr. IRVINE: When the government of Great Britain recently recognized the union of the Soviet Republic, did that mean that Canada had also recognized that union? Or has the Canadian government recognized them separately?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Canadian government will take its own position in regard to the Soviet republics, just as we would take our position in regard to anything else.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On that point, I should like to ask a question. A year ago a gentleman applied for a passport to Russia, but the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs advised him that it was impossible to secure passports from Canada to Russia, since Great Britain did not recognize Russia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When Great Britain takes a certain position in an international matter, the Dominion government may, for the same reason, take a similar position; but so far as the question of whether or not Canada in any particular matter affecting its own people and their relations with other countries is concerned, we will exercise in these matters the same rights as the parliament of Great Britain would exercise in relation to their people and their relations to other countries. In order that my hon. friend may not have reason to think that this is a mere theory, let me say that what I am saying at the moment is the position I took at the recent Imperial Conference in England, and it was taken in the very words of the resolution which my hon. friend introduced here. Repeatedly, in regard to questions which were presented before the Conference, I stated that, so far as I was concerned, I was simply a representative of the government of Canada, I was one among a number of ministers, and that all of my colleagues should have the same right to pass upon a question which affected the people of Canada as I had, just as British ministers had equal rights with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. But I went further than that. I said that not only would I hesitate to speak in the name of the government of Canada. but that I would assert, with respect to any matters likely to bind the people of Canada in any way, that the parliament of this country should have the final say, and I took the position that our government and our parliament, with respect to Canada and its affairs, was in exactly the same position as the parliament of Great Britain was, with relation to the affairs of the people of Great Britain. That position was never contested or questioned. No one raised objection to it, no member of any dominion government, and no member of the British government. But more than that, the members of the conference were prepared to go the length of stating that position in black and white in the proceedings of the conference itself. My hon. friend spoke a moment ago about defence. He said we ought to have the right to say what we were going to do in the matter of going to war, or what we were going to do in the matter of military expenditures and the like. If my hon. friend will read the report of the Imperial Conference, page 16, which deals with the question of defence, he will find the following:—

(1) The conference affirms that it is necessary to provide for the adequate defence of the territories and trade of the several countries comprising the British Empire.

(2) In this connection the conference expressly recognizes that it is for the parliaments of the several parts of the empire, upon the recommendations of their respective governments, to decide the nature and extent of any action which should be taken by them.

What could be more definite and clear? There is an emphatic declaration that, in regard to military matters, participation in war, or any question of the kind, it is for this parliament to decide the nature and extent of whatever action, if any, is to be taken by this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask if my right hon. friend's interpretation of that little phrase which he throws in "whatever action, if any" is that Canada is absolutely free from any responsibility should her parliament so decide?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So that there may be no mistake I will read the words again—

In this connection the conference expressly recognizes that it is for the parliaments of the several parts of the empire, upon the recommendations of their respective governments, to decide the nature and extent of any action which should be taken by them.

I take that to mean exactly what it says. If parliament decides that no action is to be taken, no action will be taken. If parliament decides that action to a certain extent shall be taken, it will be taken to that extent and no further. That is what the language means. It is as plain as English can be.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What does the first clause mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It means exactly what it says. It says—

(1) The conference affirms that it is necessary to provide for the adequate defence of the territories and trade of the several countries comprising the British Empire.

Several countries.—Australia, Africa, New Zealand, Newfoundland, Canada, the British Isles—are all countries comprising the British Empire. In the words of the resolution it is necessary that they should provide for the defence of their trade and territory. Does my hon. friend say that Canada should not attempt to provide for the defence of her territory or her trade?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What I would submit, Mr. Speaker, is that the words of the first part of the resolution seem to imply that Canada has certain imperial responsibilities. Does the Prime Minister deny that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the day will never come when I will deny that Canada has some responsibility to other parts of the British Empire as well as to herself, and I hope the day will never come when Canada will hesitate to recognize her responsibility, but I say that that responsibility and the extent of it will be determined by this parliament and will be determined, I believe, in a manner which will accord with the hearts and the feelings of the people of this country.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the resolution adopted at the Imperial Conference recognized in international law as binding other countries as well as the members of this Imperial Conference? Would any country, if it were at war with any portion of the British Empire, recognize our standing as free to determine whether we could go to war or not; or could they attack us?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is another question, which I think is open to debate; at another time we might debate that particular question.

I think I have made myself perfectly clear as to what the position of this parliament is with respect to matters affecting the Canadian people when a comparison is being drawn between the rights of this parliament and the rights of the British parliament in a similar connection. Let me go a step further. My hon. friend spoke about questions of foreign policy. I took the position at the Imperial Conference that Canada had matters of foreign policy which were pretty largely exclusively of her own concern; that the greater part of our foreign policy was concerned with questions affecting our neighbours immediately to the south, and that it was for us to decide those questions and to act on our own initiative. That point was never disputed, never questioned for one moment. There are other obligations which Canada has, of an international character, which are larger and wider in their bearings and ramifications, and which may affect other parts of the British Empire. In those circumstances, surely we would expect to give the same treatment as we would expect to have meted out to us, namely, to consult with other parts that may be affected before final action is taken. Let me read the statement which the conference made in regard to foreign policy. It will be found at page 13:

> This conference is a conference of representatives of the several governments of the Empire.
> [Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Stating in so many words the position of equality of status which has been referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

> Its views and conclusions on foreign policy, as recorded above, are necessarily subject to the action of the governments and parliaments of the various portions of the Empire.

That is as emphatic a declaration as anything can be that with respect to foreign policy, the matters discussed at the Imperial Conference are not binding in any particular on this country and on this parliament, unless our government and parliament so agree. I contend when, with respect to matters of defence, of foreign policy and the like, it has been determined by an imperial conference that our government, our parliament, has the same rights with respect to those questions as the British parliament has in relation to its own people in regard to the same questions, the necessity for a resolution such as my hon. friend has introduced is, to say the least, questionable, as likely to convey an entirely erroneous impression when it is read abroad.

In regard to the one matter in which we are alleged to be in an inferior position, namely, the right to amend our own constitution, as I have already pointed out, if the different provinces that go to make up confederation were to unite with this federal government in any suggested amendment to the British North America Act, I believe the British parliament, regardless altogether of what the terms of that amendment might be, would immediately agree to pass the necessary amendment. If it would not, then would be the time to raise a question such as my hon. friend has raised. There have been four amendments to the British North America Act; one passed in 1871 relating to the establishment of new provinces, one in 1872 regarding the privileges of the Canadian parliament; one in 1896 regarding the representation in the Northwest Territories, and one in 1897 regarding provincial subsidies. So far as I know, these are the only cases in which the parliament of Canada has asked the British government to amend the British North America Act. When in that particular the British parliament has done all that we have requested, when we know that if we made a similar request, a like action would be taken hereafter, even to giving us the power to amend our constitution as we please, is it wise, if it gives a sense of greater security to the different provinces of the Dominion and to the Dominion itself, to have its constitution in the form of the written constitution in which it is at the present time, at this particular stage to suggest that this parliament should take a course that is wholly unnecessary and that, if taken, would certainly create an erroneous impression both abroad and at home? Let me say that if I thought for a moment, the parliament of Canada combined with the legislatures of the several provinces had not, as respects the people and the affairs of Canada the same rights as the parliament of Great Britain has in relation to the people and the affairs of Great Britain, I would be the first to advocate a change in existing conditions. But believing that we have all the powers of a free people, all the constitutional rights and privileges which are enjoyed by British subjects in any part of the British Empire, I for one hesitate to disturb that impression in the least.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are asked by the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) to pass the resolution; by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) to pass the resolution amended; and by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) to carry the discussion over and to review it again another day. I am opposed to all three, and particularly to the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant. The resolution itself, I think, has been divorced from those pertinent facts that have to do with its merits, and a discussion has arisen on the rights of Canada at present, the amplitude of those powers and rights of which we boast so much. As regards the rights of the Dominion now, I am in complete accord with the words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe); I am not quite so fully in accord with the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), because I do not think they were carefully enough expressed. That we have all rights as to our domestic affairs, there is no question at all, and we have other rights in respect of external affairs as well save to the extent that as yet we are not empowered to amend our constitution; nor do I think we are empowered as respects certain extra-territorial jurisdiction in regard to which some controversy has arisen.

I want to express my pleasure at not only the words of the Minister of Justice, but those of the Prime Minister respecting the position and rights of Canada at this time. That we can decide our own course in things domestic and things external, there is no question. I will go further and say that, save in respect of, perhaps, a feeling of obligation to minorities in Canada and a preservation of Great Britain's duty in regard to those minorities, there is no right the majority of the people of this Dominion want to assert that would be resisted for one moment by the authorities of Great Britain. Nor is it only true that our rights are ample now in respect of everything save what I have suggested, but they have been ample for years and for decades, ample for the last half century. The Prime Minister read from a resolution of the conference of 1923 to prove to hon. members that we have the right to decide whether we go to war or do not, just in the same way as Great Britain has the right to decide, under all the circumstances of the hour. Yes, we have that right. That resolution was passed; but similar resolutions have been passed at conferences for years back, and one almost in the same language was passed at the conference of 1921. There has not been, from any one in authority or recognised in any sense as having a voice, whether in this country or in the Old Land, a word or a breath to dispute that right on the part of Canada for decades, and all talk about this being a recent achievement is simply a dramatic attempt to burst heroically through an open door.

I now come to the portion referring to the so-called attributes of nationhood that we do not possess. The hon. member is quite right. To South Africa, to Australia, the latter being a federacy, the same as Canada, having what we call provincial authorities and governments as well as federal—to those dominions the right to amend the constitution in each case is accorded. And if this Dominion could go to the British parliament and show that majorities and minorities in Canada, such as originally were recognized, now desired the same right, there would not be a moment's reluctance in the matter on the part of the British parliament, judging by its attitude on all corresponding occasions in the past.

Now, could majorities and minorities in Canada go to the British parliament and make that representation? I think we have had evidence in this House this afternoon that they could not. Not only is there a contract between the provinces and the Dominion as a whole, between the minorities as represented by the provinces and the majority as represented by the Dominion, a contract which is sacred and which we must all preserve; but, as well, I think, it can be affirmed that another party to the contract for the protection of minority rights is the British parliament itself. And I believe it is a fact that to a degree minorities in Canada—minorities racial and minorities religious—rely not only upon the merits of the contract as between the various parties in the Dominion, but as well on the contract between the Dominion and British parliament. When the parties to the contract in Canada are prepared to give up that extra security, when minorities and majorities are agreed to ask that we here in Canada be permitted, under any conditions which we shall suggest, to amend our constitution, then we shall not have any longer to wait. There lies the reason, which I think was well expressed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), why in Canada we have deemed it wise to rest in our present position, believing as we do that in reality our powers are for practical purposes as ample as are even those of Australia or New Zealand.

I do not share any of the apprehensions that are suggested by some others, and I am not worried by the ghosts that seem to be always before some people; I do not think, with them, that we have been waging a terrific battle against a reluctant Downing Street in order to gain our rights. I do not share the view that we are in any sense oppressed and subordinated; we are in no sense whatever subordinate to anyone on earth. The moment we are in a position to assert among ourselves the right to do certain things, and believe that it is better that we should do those things, then that right will be ours. But simply because there is this additional security for minority rights, the people of Canada, minorities and majorities alike, desire to rest in the position we are in at the present time.

I stated that there might be some other respects in which we had not exactly the same powers as the British parliament. I do not pretend to be at the moment in a position to discuss them; I refer to one of them, the matter of extra-territorial jurisdiction. Suffice it to say that if this parliament is of the view that, in respect of extra-territorial jurisdiction, we should have added powers, there would I am convinced be no difficulty in procuring them. Be it remembered, that in the present position we occupy, whenever a request is made for added powers, if it concerns only the Dominion as a whole and does not at all affect provinces or minorities, the address of this parliament is quite sufficient. As regards all these matters, if there are any such outstanding, no difficulty lies in the way at all; but mainly because minority rights rest on the sure foundation of the British North America Act, I think it is infinitely better that we should retain our present position.

As regards the amendment of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) I fancy he himself scarcely has very much confidence in its merits now. It could never be said that our constitutional position rests on a basis of contract merely as between the provinces and the whole Dominion or as between the provinces and the whole Dominion and the British parliament; it also rests on the foundation of a contract as between minorities and majorities, even not identical with provinces. So that the argument of the hon. member would not apply at all. Furthermore, it would never do in the world to distinguish between the status of provinces in relation to the power of amendment; there is no difference at all between the right of Quebec or Ontario and that of Manitoba or Alberta. It is true that Alberta did not exist at the time of confederation; but it is true that British Columbia and Prince Edward Island were provinces then. Consequently, as the hon. member admits, their position, so far as contractual right is concerned, is the same as that of Ontario and Quebec. But the people of Alberta existed; the people of the Northwest Territories existed; and these people acquiesced in the Act of Confederation on the basis of the British North America Act, the cornerstone of the compact. Consequently they are parties to the contract the same as the others. This only serves to disclose the very weakness of the motion itself. The effort of the hon. member for Brome to find a solution, and the failure of that effort, expose as nothing else could just exactly the difficulty that confronts us, and surely make clear the fact that this difficulty, in the words of the Minister of Justice, has been with us all through these years; and our position now is not a position imposed on us from without but is one decided upon by ourselves.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the discussion upon the resolution of my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has taken a very wide range, and almost every phase of our relations with the Mother Country has been referred to. At the outset let me say that I think the resolution is hardly cast in such a form that it may be regarded as a very serious attempt to grapple with the problem. Naturally, the discussion of the resolution has been somewhat academic, because if we were proposing to approach the Imperial parliament with a view of having an amendment made, either by a change in the British North America Act or by the passage of a supplementary act, for the purpose of giving the country some further powers than she now enjoys, it would have to be provided for in a resolution addressed to His Majesty and the Imperial parliament. I must confess that I feel rather disposed to agree with my hon. friend from Battleford (Mr. McConica) in his criticism of the wording of the resolution; indeed a great deal of doubt has been expressed from all quarters of the House as to what the mover of the resolution exactly intends. Taking the language itself, and throwing aside for the moment those interjections which are not necessary to enable one to understand precisely what is proposed, we find it to be as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the governing powers of Canada as constituted by the British North America Act ought to possess under the British Crown the same powers with regard to Canada, its affairs and its people, as the Parliament of Great Britain possesses in regard to Great Britain, its affairs and its people.

As I think my right hon. friend and leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointed out, this language would only be apt as applied to Canadian conditions if "governing powers" were intended to mean not merely federal powers but provincial as well, because if we are going to have the right to legislate and deal with affairs to the widest extent to correspond with the governing powers of Great Britain, such governing powers must necessarily be vested in both the federal and provincial parliaments, and when my hon. friend reaches that stage in the interpretation of his resolution, he will readily see that he comes to a point where he is certainly not practical in dealing with the question. For instance, unless the combined view is taken of our legislatures and parliament, how could the legislature of Ontario, for example, be endowed with the same right and power to legislate for the province as the Imperial parliament possesses with regard to Great Britain. Therefore it would seem to me that the House ought to hesitate before committing itself seriously to the consideration of a resolution drafted in this form, and that if we really desire to amend our constitution an appropriate resolution should be prepared and presented for the consideration of parliament.

For myself, I am at a loss to understand some of the arguments which have been presented in support of the resolution. As was pointed out by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), the British North America Act of 1867 laid down in very clear and distinct terms the respective powers of the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures, and it has not been found necessary since 1867 to amend those powers in any material point. An amendment was passed in 1871 conferring on the Dominion parliament the right to create new provinces, and a further amendment in later years effected a change in the mode of representation in this House. Both those amendments were granted to the federal parliament without any question.

It must be borne in mind that the Canadian constitution of 1867 was not made by the parliament of Great Britain, but by the representatives of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They solemnly met together in council and after full deliberation determined what the constitution of this country should be. Every line of the British North America Act was written by Canadian hands, every provision that is to be found in the four corners of that act were placed there by the Canadian statesmen who conferred together to bring about confederation. And confederation was no easy thing to consummate. It is all very well, after fifty-seven years of national life, to say that, because the world has not got back to normal conditions after the Great War, there are certain things in our constitution which should be amended, but I submit that where you have a constitution that was designed by the forefathers of confederation in this country, by the men who laid the foundations of Canada, a constitution that has worked well for over half a century of national life, we should hesitate to hysterically demand that some radical change be made in it. It protected the rights of minorities which was a very vexed question. There was given to the provinces the very wide powers which the provincial legislatures now enjoy, powers in regard to which they are just as supreme as we are in matters under our administration, powers with reference to which we cannot interfere so long as they act within their jurisdiction. Then, with reference to the suggestions that have been made for abolishing appeals to the Privy Council, the legislature of each province of the Dominion under the powers conferred upon the provinces under the British North America Act of dealing with the constitution and maintenance of the courts, lays down where appeals can be made to and limits the right of appeal.

Mr. SHAW: Is it not a fact that in the Criminal Code of Canada we seek to prevent appeals to the Privy Council?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I was coming to that phase of it. I was pointing out that under the powers conferred upon the provinces the legislatures deal with the constitution and maintenance of the courts, and that the provincial legislature lays down where appeals can be made to and limits the right of appeal in regard to civil cases. Very rarely in the history of appeals to the Privy Council have there been appeals from Canada on criminal matters. Last year Attorney General Raney in Ontario, recognizing that the right to limit these appeals rested in the provincial legislature introduced a bill in the Ontario legislature for that purpose. True, in regard to criminal matters, where we legislate, we can limit the right of appeal in a similar way; but the question of limiting appeals has always centred very largely around civil cases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not a fact, anyway, that it is altogether in the hands of Canada, through either provincial or federal authorities?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Quite so. Then, over and above any question of power residing elsewhere either in this parliament or in the provincial legislatures, we could determine the question as to whether there shall be appeals to the Privy Council on any subject. That is not a matter to be determined by any Imperial legislation, and the Imperial parliament do not interfere with us or impose their views upon us in that regard. So also in regard to the question of our right to make treaties, which has been discussed time and time again in this House. There is no manner of doubt now that the right of Canada as a self-governing Dominion to make treaties affecting the interests of the Canadian people is recognized and unquestioned.

In regard to legislation, the provinces have long claimed supreme rights within the limits of Section 92 of the British North America Act. Hon. gentlemen who remember politics in the province of Ontario not so many years ago will remember the stern battles that were fought between the political parties in that province on the question of provincial rights; and as the days have gone by and each province, particularly the larger ones, has increased in importance and wealth, the rights which are to be exercised by these provincial legislatures are a very serious and very important matter, touching as they do very intimately the lives of the people in education and other questions closely related to their home life. The powers vested in the legislatures in that regard are very, very wide indeed.

Now, what does my hon. friend wish to propose by his resolution in regard to these provincial powers? Is he going to interfere with them in any way? Is he going to say that in some great central body there shall be vested the full rights which exist in the parliament of Great Britain? Realizing the problems in this country, where we have nine provinces and local legislation in each province rendered necessary on account of the religion, language and the business interests of each and every province, does my hon. friend propose that there shall be some great central body that is going to interfere with the rights of the provinces to legislate locally, as each provincial legislature now has the right to do?—and is exercising that right to-day without the slightest interference from Great Britain at all. And so with this parliament. Hon. gentlemen who have had some experience in this parliament will fail to remember any time in Canadian history where there has been any interference on the part of the Imperial parliament with the full right of this parliament to legislate in regard to all the subjects contained in Section 91 of the British North America Act.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the minister recall the province of Nova Scotia passing certain legislation which seemingly was within the jurisdiction of the province under the British North America Act, but which was nullified by this parliament not so very nong ago? Was that a violation of the British North America Act?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend, if he wishes to discuss a matter that we discussed last year, can do it at some other time. I am endeavouring now to devote my time to this novel proposition that he and his friend are putting forward, that we require some extraordinary powers to be conferred upon the Dominion and the provincial parliaments that we do not exercise to-day, that our freedom in some mysterious way is being interfered with by the Imperial parliament. That is the question we are dealing with, and I say that there has been no such case of interference, and there is no necessity for the legislation that is proposed.

With all deference to my friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) whose suggestion was that you could review this new constitution, when it was formed, by providing for the approval of a majority of the provinces, which majority should include the four old provinces, I feel sure that with his experience as a lawyer he would not, on due deliberation, stand by that proposal as a permanent solution of this question.

Then as to a central authority so that there shall be no over-lapping, if all these bodies are going to be endowed with the absolute and unlimited rights that the British parliament has,—for that is what the suggestion of my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg means to those who read the English language, —that would bring about an absolute trespassing upon the rights of our provincial legislatures, and an absolute conflict between the two authorities, with no independent body or central authority to determine where or how that conflict could be avoided. Hence it is that, realizing that our right to make our own treaties is recognized, realizing that we have not been interfered with in the last fifty-seven years of our national life in any way, realizing that the constitution under which we are working to-day was not imposed upon us by the Imperial parliament but was the work of the Fathers of Confederation, I submit to the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg, as did my right hon. leader and the right hon. leader of the opposition, that having had this discussion of the question, and seeing that his resolution is not so framed as to have any practical effect,—seeing, indeed, that it could have no effect whatever if passed,—and having given us no evidence whatever of mature deliberation or suggested any real solution of the difficulty under which he thinks this country is labouring, I submit that his purpose has been served by this discussion and I would suggest that he withdraw his motion.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): I think the discussion of this afternoon and this evening has been eminently worth while, as it has directed our attention and the attention of the people of Canada, to what seems to me must necessarily be in the future a very vexed question indeed. I am not in sympathy with those super-loyalists who, immediately anyone proposes to consider this difficulty, accuse him of disloyalty. I think it is important that the people of Canada should know what their status is. We have been groping in the dark for a great many years, and I think we are still groping in the dark so far as this particular matter is concerned. I find that, on the one hand there are those who tell us that, in association with the other parts of the Empire we are a partnership, although, as a matter of fact, we have few of the incidents which ordinarily go with a partnership, and on the other hand, there are others who tell us we are one of a commonwealth of nations. And there are still other voices that proclaim with no uncertain sound—and distinguished jurists at that—that we are subordinate and colonial. Now, whatever our situation may be, I think, as I suggested before, that we should know where we stand if it is possible for us to ascertain that fact. There is no doubt from the discussion to which we have listened this afternoon that we have no power to amend our constitution. We must, if we desire a change, secure practically the unanimous consent of those interested in Canada, and then we must seek relief from the Imperial parliament. In the days of confederation, it may have been desirable to fasten a constitution on us in that particular way; but since that time several self-governing Dominions have been formed, and I find that the same situation does not prevail with regard to Australia, with regard to South Africa and with regard to the Irish Free State. Each one of these self-governing dominions have the right themselves to change or amend their own constitution. It has been suggested that, if we gain unanimous agreement in any particular matter and if we go to the Imperial parliament, that parliament will gratify our wish as far as possible. I quite agree with that, but at the same time there are many principles on which, in this country, we can never become unanimous. For instance I need only mention one referred to by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), and that is the matter of the Senate. I think there is not anyone within the confines of this House but would agree that some change is necessary, we must do something, in order to make that body responsible to the people in some way. And not only that. If it is going to be a body that functions, it must be charged with some definite, specific duties perhaps not unlike the United States Senate. What can we do in Canada with regard to the Senate? We may speak, volumes and volumes have been spoken with regard to that ancient chamber, yet nothing has been done, and I presume the Senate never will consent to anything being done. Are we to remain helpless and tied down by this constitution forever just because we cannot get unanimity on that particular matter in this country and must make a unanimous appeal to the Imperial parliament for relief. If I remember correctly, unofficial representations were made to the Imperial parliament some years ago with regard to a possible change in the Senate's constitution, but indications were given very plainly that unless unanimity was secured in this country on that matter no relief could be granted, and none was secured. Not only that, it may interest hon. members to know that even in the Imperial parliament they have, in some instances at least, the right to change our constitution without reference to us at all. Of course, they have that right in any event, but they have been specifically granted the right, in an act known as the Irish Free State Consequential Provisions Act passed in 1922. Section 67 reads as follows:

> His Majesty by order in council may make such adaptation of any enactment so far as they relate to any of His Majesty's dominions, other than the Free State, as may appear to him necessary or proper as a consequence of the establishment of the Irish Free State.

Sir, the Minister of Justice may find that without him knowing anything about it the Imperial parliament may pass some legislation consequential upon the formation of the Irish Free State. Are we in any particular way handicapped by reason of this constitution which we have and as a result of our inability to change it? I think that is the practical problem which we should consider. Well, I have already pointed out our difficulties in connection with the Senate.

May I mention one or two other matters of some interest. This parliament, from time to time, passes legislation about which constitutional questions are continually raised, and we find that we have to make special arrangements if we want to organize such a board as a board of commerce. If we want to legally organize it, to regulate the prices in this country, then we find that we have in other cases to circumvent the provisions of the British North America Act in a particular way. If we want to get adequate liquor legislation, and if the people want a wheat board, special arrangements must be made to secure not only the concurrence of this parliament but that also of the various provinces interested.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend think that what he is complaining about just now is rather the rights of the provinces than those of the British parliament?

Mr. SHAW: I do not quite understand the Minister of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is complaining of the rights which the provinces possess, because it is those rights which prevent this parliament from legislating as to the wheat board and the board of commerce, and about the eight hour law mentioned by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) this afternoon, not the British parliament.

Mr. SHAW: I quite agree. I am making no complaint, but this constitution has been fastened upon us as the result of our own act admittedly, but the distribution of powers is so vague and indefinite that it is a continuous source of employment for the constitutional lawyers and jurists of this country.

Mr. MARTELL: If you arrogate to the federal authorities all these powers, will it not be stealing from the provinces powers which were granted to them by contract? Then when you add particular powers to the federal authority, will there not always be danger in going to the courts and having it determined what is intra vires or ultra vires of the provinces or of the federal parliament?

Mr. SHAW: The hon. gentleman has apparently suggested that I desire to take away from the provinces certain powers, or that I desire to give the federal parliament certain powers which it does not now possess. I am not proposing anything of the kind, I want to see under any constitution that the safeguards given by the confederation pact to minorities, and to others, should be preserved, and should be safeguarded. I am with him to the fullest extent in that regard. But as far as regards the distribution of powers in Canada it may be they should be redistributed in particular ways, in order that our constitution may function effectively in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. MARTELL: Is not that a matter of agreement between the federal and provincial parliaments? Should we arrogate to ourselves powers without the consent of the provincial legislatures?

Mr. SHAW: I am not proposing that the federal parliament should arrogate to itself any powers at all. Whatever distribution of powers is made under our constitution will necessarily be the result of an agreement between the federal government and the various provinces of Canada.

Now, I was referring to some of the matters about which we have had difficulty. I read in a newspaper the other day that a little piece of innocent legislation we passed last year in regard to oleomargarine might be made the subject of an appeal to the Privy Council, to find out whether or not the Dominion parliament had the right to say to the manufacturers of oleo that they could not manufacture the commodity in this country.

Another difficulty in connection with this constitution—at least it seems to me a difficulty—is that it is interpreted three thousand miles away. I have great respect for the members composing the judical committee of the Privy Council, but I do say that constitutions particularly must be interpreted in the light of existing condtions and in the light of the facts as they exist in the particular country covered by that constitution. There are some who say that the fact that it is interpreted three thousand miles away is not a good thing, and I have some sympathy with that particular view. I think that our constitution should be interpreted in Canada, and I think that our jurists are just as competent to interpret it, and probably would be able, in the light of existing conditions, to interpret it so that it will function much more efficiently than it would if it were interpreted without reference to the conditions. Let me illustrate what I mean—and I trust I may interest the hon. gentleman from Battleford (Mr. McConica) who seemed so critical of this resolution this afternoon. The United States constitution, for a period of some twenty years, I think, was strictly interpreted. If that variety of interpretation had continued I think there is not the slightest doubt that the people of the United States would shortly have found that the constitution was utterly unfitted for their purposes, and that the time would come when it would be necessary for them to shelve it completely. But fortunately Chief Justice Marshall, the chief justice of the United States Supreme Court, in a long series of decisions, gave the most liberal interpretation to that constitution, made it function and made it function well, so that the spirit of his judgments persists even to this day. I simply suggest that constitutions are made for people; not people for constitutions. Constitutions must be just and must be interpreted not to bind and shackle the people, but to meet the changing conditions of the times.

So much for internal affairs in Canada; what is the position with regard to external affairs? As the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) stated this afternoon, not being a sovereign nation, we have no jurisidiction over our extra-territorial rights; and so far as our foreign affairs are concerned, I venture to say that we have about as much control in the matter of peace and war as we have over these extra-territorial rights. It is true there is a process of consultation, a long-distance method, by which our authorities here are advised—generally subsequent to the event—of exactly what policy is being undertaken and of exactly what action has been taken. That is of no use to us here. If we are going to be committed to a policy that may involve us in war, it is absolutely essential that we should be fully familiar and have a part in the formulation of that particular policy. It cannot be done by merely attending colonial conferences or imperial conferences every two or three years. It must be done in some different way from that, or we should have no consultation at all. I think I pointed out once before in this parliament that a distinguished statesmen refused to have any part in consultations because, he said, consultation means responsibility. Now a valueless consultation that means responsibility should not be undertaken. I will give an instance of what I mean. The British Empire stood on the verge of war in the month of September, 1922. The ex-Prime Minister of this country, in an address which he gave to the Toronto Business Men's Conservative Club, suggested that the policy of Canada in connection with that should be "Ready, aye ready; we stand by you." Then he went on to indicate that it was necessary for Canada to maintain her obligations, so far as particular treaties were concerned, and I take it from that that he intended that we should stand by the Treaty of Sevres. The interesting part of it is that the Treaty of Sevres had been ignored by everybody, even by the nations which signed it. The result would have been that my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition would have plunged this country into war for the sake of a treaty which did not exist.

That is just the situation as I have indicated it. If the leading statesmen of the country are not familiar with the foreign affairs, how can you expect the ordinary common people of Canada to be familiar with these affairs? It seems to me the proper attitude on that occasion should have been "Steady, aye steady," In order to give the people an opportunity to know the facts, so that if we were to be plunged into a war we would at least know that it was in a righteous cause, and one which we were justified in supporting.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend says that the right hon. leader of the opposition might have plunged Canada into war without waiting for the "Ready, aye ready." Is it not a fact that if Great Britain declares war to-day, Canada is at war irrespective of whether she wishes to go to war or not? We are a portion of the British Empire and we are bound by what the Imperial parliament does.

Mr SHAW: I am inclined to agree with what the hon. gentleman states, and for the purposes of determining whether we are at war or not, I would like to investigate the attitude of the enemy's mind at that time.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. gentleman must be a psychologist.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman think it is very fair on his part to introduce this subject at a time when he knows I cannot reply and correct his misrepresentations?

Mr. SHAW: I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to allow the ex-prime minister the fullest opportunity of replying to me here or elsewhere.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman cannot do it.

Mr. SHAW: Perhaps the House will give unanimous consent for the purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM: A bad precedent.

Mr. SHAW: May I refer to one or two remarks made by the Prime Minister (Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King)? He has indicated to us this afternoon the attitude assumed at the Imperial Conference last fall with regard to defence matters. I must confess that in reading the resolutions as passed I felt some apprehension that perhaps the country was committed; because I note that the language used is certainly open to the suggestion that we are committed to a policy of co-operation, and that it only remains with parliament to decide the nature and extent of any action to be taken. I think the wording is perhaps unfortunate and somewhat ambiguous. If it had read, "To decide the nature and extent of any action, if any," then there could be no question about it. But I am prepared to rely upon the interpretation given by the Prime Minister that under no circumstances are we committed to any action, so far as naval defence is concerned, unless the parliament of Canada first approves; that is, that the responsibility rests primarily and always with this parliament, and that no action can be taken committing the people of Canada to any naval defence policy without first securing approval here. I think that is important, because, after all, the question of naval defence is linked up very closely with the question of peace or war. And war in these later days is not a pleasing thing to contemplate. In its actuality it is a terrible thing. It may involve the loss of thousands of our countrymen; it necessarily involves the loss of millions of our treasure. It is important that no action in a serious matter of that kind, which may involve us in any catastrophe such as war, should be undertaken without securing the full and complete consent of Canada's parliament.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the resolution moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) has been badly framed because, while in many of the things that he is advocating I am in thorough accord, the resolution is so sweeping in its character that to my mind, it means the nullification or abrogation of an agreement that was entered into between the various provinces of this Dominion, what may be termed the provisional trustees for the now federal authority at the time that the confederation pact was entered into. In other words, at the time of confederation, an agreement was entered into by the various provinces, which were then independent entities as regards self-government, and representatives of the now federal authority. The chief things which were allocated to the provinces are to be found in section 92 of the British North America Act with several clauses, sixteen in number. Section 91 of the British North America Act with its twenty-nine clauses gave what are regarded as the powers of the federal authorities. In addition, there is what is known to lawyers as the non obstante clause which, in effect, says: notwithstanding anything that may be found in section 92 of the British North America Act, the powers of the federal authorities are not restricted. That is a contract. Two parties are necessary to a contract and there must be mutuality. The people who consummated confederation entered into this agreement, and it was confirmed by the British parliament. That is the constitution of Canada as we have it at the present time. For this parliament to endeavour to arrogate to itself the right of taking extreme powers, powers which belong to the provincial authority, or which in any wise would affect the provincial authority, would be an abrogation of the agreement or contract entered into in 1867. But let us eliminate that. As I understand the resolution of my hon. friend, his idea is that Canada shall have equal rights with all other nationalities; that is to say, that Canada within the British Empire shall be regarded as a nation, Australia as a nation, New Zealand as a nation, Newfoundland as a nation; that these nations in dealing with other nations shall be regarded as absolutely independent; that they shall have the right to send ambassadors; that they shall have the precedence that belongs to their several countries as independent entities. In that respect, I am in full accord with my hon. friend.

But for any persons, notwithstanding their pretensions to be constitutional lawyers—and we have many in the House of Commons—to stand up in this chamber and say that we are not compelled to go to war when Great Britain is at war, is an absurd misnomer.

Supposing Great Britain to-day declared war, then Canada is at war whether Canada wants to be at war or not. The only thing that Canada can do is to call her parliament, and if we want to send troops, Canada's parliament might refuse to vote the supplies necessary to give us sufficient money for the purpose of carrying on that war. But if Great Britain, having declared war, wished to pass a statute of the Imperial parliament applying it to every portion of the Empire, even if she meant that everyone of us could be conscripted, or that every possible piece of land or that all the funds of Canada could be taken for the purpose of carrying on that war, we would be compelled to obey that statute. That as a legal pronouncement cannot be gainsaid.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MARTELL: We are a portion of the British Empire, and notwithstanding everything that some hon. members may say, we have simply colonial status. Great Britain has been generous with us. If you read the constitutional authorities, you will find that Great Britain can pass any act for the Empire and apply it to any portion of the Empire. It is said that as regards the English-speaking provinces of the Dominion of Canada, when we came here we brought with us every portion of the British common law save in so far as it is inapplicable to our situation as a colony. We brought none of the English statute law save as it is made applicable to us as a colony. If the English common law has not been altered in this country by statute so as to make it inapplicable to the Dominion of Canada, then the English common law is still in force in this country. We have the Colonial Laws' Validity Act; we have several other acts, and if the British parliament to-day passes an act making it applicable to every portion of the Dominion of Canada, it is applicable irrespective of what this parliament can do. Therefore, it is absolutely absurd for any hon. member from his place in this House to say that we are not bound by laws passed by the British parliament. Personally, I would like to see us bound by those laws so long as we are going to remain a portion of the British Empire, and relying upon the fair play of the British paliament and the British people in general, I believe they will not pass any laws which will make things repulsive to the people of the Dominion of Canada. That is my attitude in regard to this matter.

Let us not be carried away with the idea that we are a great independent nation. We are in truth a great nation, but a great nation within the British Empire, and Heaven prevent the day from coming when we shall not be regarded as such. While I am in accord with many of the principles which my hon. friend is trying to get at, though he does not express them properly, if his resolution is so framed as to say that we are going to recognize nothing that is done by the British parliament, that is tantamount to saying that the Dominion of Canada wishes to be independent. That is all the resolution means; but in fairness let us examine the constitutional authorities in the light of our position within the British Empire, and we shall find that all that we may say or do cannot alter our status in the British Empire so long as the British parliament does not consent thereto.

Some of my hon. friends, in the course of their disquisitions, have referred to the Senate. Although I am not a great constitutional lawyer, I may say this without fear of being charged with egotism. Many men in this House occupying high positions either in the opposition or on the government benches regard themselves as eminent lawyers on account of their position, and it might seem, therefore, as if we back-benchers should be seen and not heard.

Mr. McMASTER: No, no.

Mr. MARTELL: But from my reading—and I may say that I try to keep in line with my profession—I have come to the conclusion that the House of Commons has no authority —and even the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada in conjunction have no authority—to amend or to cast out the Senate without the consent of the various provinces of the Dominion of Canada. At the time the confederation pact was made, certain powers were given to the provinces and certain matters were set up by agreement with the provinces in order to provide the constitution of a parliament to administer federal affairs. One of the conditions was that the Houses of Parliament of Canada should consist of a House of Commons and a Senate. Therefore, if you want to interfere with the Senate, you must, of necessity, get the consent of the other party to the agreement, namely, the various provinces of the Dominion of Canada. If you examine the British North America Act, you will find that power is not given to this parliament to change the constitution of either of the Houses, but explicit power is given to the various provinces to change their systems of government, provided that they do not interfere with the office of Lieutenant-Governor.

That is the constitution of the Dominion of Canada; and before hon. gentlemen stand in their places and declaim against it they should first thoroughly familiarize themselves with the provisions of it. Our constitution is known as the British North America Act and, as I have said, it is a contract entered into between the several provinces of the Dominion and what is now the federal authority. It was a condition precedent to the entry into confederation by these various provinces that certain things should be done from the point of view of federal administration, and therefore this parliament to-day has no right to ask for an amendment of the Canadian constitution without first obtaining the consent of the provinces who were the other parties to the confederation pact.

I am sorry that my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) has badly framed his resolution; but anything that will take from the rights of the provinces, anything that will deprive our people of what was granted them at the time of confederation, will meet with my opposition so long as I am a member of this House. I do not believe that we are going to get anywhere by demanding changes every day. There is an old Latin maxim that says: Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis,—Times are changed and we are changed in them. And there is another which it behooves us to take to heart—"Festina lente." Sometimes, when radical changes are advocated, changes which are obviously unwise, I almost consider myself a Conservative, though God forbid that the day should ever come when I should want to be one. Resolutions of this kind, purely academic in their nature, are not, I think, properly matters for discussion on the floor of the Canadian House of Commons. They waste time and get us nowhere. The Fathers of Confederation provided a means whereby disputes between the provinces and the Dominion might be settled, and that is by reference to the supreme courts of judicature in the land. If we infringe upon provincial rights we can naturally expect the provinces concerned to take action in the courts to see if the federal act is intra or ultra vires; if the federal authorities claim to be in the right, in the courts of the country they have a means of settling their claim. That is a wise method, and by the decisions of the highest court of judicature for the land we are bound to abide. So that we are fully safeguarded; and in all things I think we should try to leave intact as far as possible the work of the Fathers of Confederation. It has satisfied our requirements for a good many years and should not lightly be tampered with by faddists.

[Mr. Martell.]

Mr. HUGHES: May I ask the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) for some information regarding his amendment? Does he mean it to imply a different or an inferior status to the provinces that entered confederation after 1867 as compared with the original provinces? If the amendment has that object in view, then whatever may be the merits or the demerits of the original motion I think the amendment would render it indefensible, and for that reason at all events the amendment should be withdrawn.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether or not I am in order in replying to the hon. gentleman, but he has directed a question to myself and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will answer it. I have been impressed by the arguments that have been advanced against my amendment and equally impressed with the expression of opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that the useful purpose of discussing this matter has been served by the fact of its discussion. If therefore the mover of the resolution withdraws it my amendment will fall with it. I did not like the apparent inference that the province of Prince Edward Island was placed in a position of seeming inferiority as compared with the other provinces. That would be disgraceful.

Mr. HUGHES: It would be disgraceful, and I was surprised that the hon. member for Brome should have introduced the question in his amendment.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I think, Mr. Speaker, that some good at least has come of this discussion: excellent arguments have been advanced in support of the resolution while some strong arguments have been offered against it. Personally, I believe that had the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) who moved the resolution been somewhat more specific in regard to what he intended to accomplish in having greater powers extended to Canada, perhaps the House would be better informed concerning his attitude on this question. In my estimation the resolution as framed, if passed, would be tantamount to a declaration that there should be absolute independence on the part of Canada. Now, I do not think that the Canadian people are quite ready for that yet; I do not think they will be ready for it for very many years to come.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. member whether the resolution as it is phrased, that we should have power "under the British Crown" indicates entire separation from Great Britain?

Mr. CARROLL: The phrase "under the British Crown," in my opinion, destroys the whole force of my hon. friend's motion, because if we are going to have all the plenary powers of Great Britain then we cannot consistently at the same time be under the British Crown.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would suggest to my hon. friend that there is a distinction between being under the British parliament and being under the British Crown.

Mr. CARROLL: Probably; but I do not think we have very much to be afraid of in being under either the British Crown or the British parliament. Now, I do not altogether agree with my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell) when he says that Great Britain has absolute power to legislate on all matters in this country. For example, Great Britain, by the British North America Act, has given to this parliament plenary powers to legislate on the question of divorce; and she has given, also under the British North America Act, absolute power and authority to the various legislative assemblies to legislate on questions of civil rights. This being so, it seems to me rather inconsistent to say that the parliament of Great Britain could legislate on these specific matters in relation to which the parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces have been empowered to act.

Mr. MARTELL: If the parliament of Great Britain gave that power has it not the right to withdraw it?

Mr. CARROLL: Unquestionably. But my hon. friend said that the British parliament to-day had absolute power to legislate on these specific matters I have mentioned, and on others in regard to which it has given full powers to the Dominion and to the provinces. Before the British parliament could do such a thing it would have to withdraw the power it has given. No doubt it has the right to do so, but I venture to say that such a thing will never be done. I agree with my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) that there are some inconsistencies in our constitution, and he mentioned one of them. Had he so worded his resolution as to provide that steps should be taken, for example, to secure to the federal parliament the power of legislating on the eight-hour day, I would agree with him to the full.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the hon. member would offer a resolution along that line at a suitable time, I would be glad to support it.

Mr. CARROLL: I shall be glad to. I have some very definite, specific and, I think good reasons for agreeing with my hon. friend that the power of legislating on the eight-hour day should be in this parliament. I will tell the House why if it will bear with me for a moment. I believe in the eight-hour day. I think the time is coming when we shall have such a working day for our general industries, and the quicker that time comes the better it will be for all concerned. But supposing the legislature of Nova Scotia were to enact an eight-hour day law, what would happen? In the neighbouring provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island they have a ten-hour day and, in some lines of industry, a twelve-hour day, and the moment the legislature of Nova Scotia put such legislation on the statute books the artisans of the neighbouring provinces would swarm into Nova Scotia to take advantage of the shorter working day. That is the main reason why there should be given to the Dominion parliament power to legislate in this matter. In the absence of such power, I am afraid we are going to have difficulties in getting the various legislatures to initiate the necessary legislation.

I agree with my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) that there are other things in the constitution which should be perfected. He made reference to the Board of Commerce. I believe that if this board had properly functioned it would have done a great deal for the common people. But what did we find? Ultimately it was declared to be ultra vires of this parliament. What would be the good of any province creating a board with powers similar to those conferred on the Board of Commerce? Such a provincial board would not maintain its existence. Therefore I repeat, something should be done to amend our constitution in this respect to empower the Dominion parliament to create a Board of Commerce which would be immune from attack on constitutional grounds.

I have something else in view. Last session the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) put through this House certain amendments, which later were killed by the Senate. While many people decry the upper chamber for having murdered that child of the Minister of Labour, I rather think they acted wisely, because in my humble estimation—and, like my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell) I am not posing as a great lawyer—those amendments were absolutely ultra vires. I notice the minister proposes to re-introduce those amendments this session. I would give him a kindly word of advice, namely, that before he attemps to put them through this House again he seek an opinion from the Department of Justice, for I feel quite safe in saying that they will advise him that the amendments are absolutely ultra vires of this parliament. But assuming such amendments become law, what will happen? Their constitutionality will be attacked and ultimately the question will be taken to the Privy Council, with the probable result that the amendments will not only be declared ultra vires, but the decision will involve the abolition of the Labour Department as well.

I agree then with those who say that our constitution needs amending in some particulars, but I do not agree that we have not already the means at our disposal to accomplish this. There is no reason in the world why our provincial governments should not agree absolutely with the Dominion government on a change in the constitution which will give this parliament sole power to deal with such a question as that of the eight-hour day; there is not much doubt in my mind that the respective governments could get together and reach a unanimous conclusion regarding the creation of a Board of Commerce; and so on. I have no hesitation in prophesying that they would be unanimous in agreeing to such changes in our constitution as would put an end to the doubt which at present exists in our minds as to the jurisdiction of the federal parliament in enacting the concilation law.

Therefore while I agree with my hon. friends as to the desirability of certain changes in the constitution, I do not share their view that we have not at the present time the necessary machinery for bringing those changes about. All we need is to reach an agreement between the provinces and the Dominion, and thereupon we need have no fear, Sir, as to what the British parliament will do in the premises; they will crystallize the agreement into law and it will become a part of our constitution.

With respect to adequate liquor legislation, concerning which my hon. friend from West Calgary had something to say, it is one of the anomalies of our law that notwithstanding the fact that the provinces are supposed to have plenary powers as to certain subjects and the Dominion plenary powers as to other subjects, and while it is a sound proposition of law that neither authority must encroach upon the field of the other, it does seem to me to be rather inconsistent with the view of the constitution which all Canadians hold, that when we read our law books we find that the privy council has declared in more than one decision that the Dominion parliament has absolute right to legislate on liquor laws, and it has also declared that the local legislatures have plenary powers to deal with the same subject, within their orbit of course.

There has been something said to-night about the Privy Council. As a Canadian and as a British subject I have the greatest admiration for the courts of England from the lowest to the highest, and I have a marked admiration for the judges who have filled the high judicial positions in the Privy Council from 1867 down to the present time. But I do say, Sir, as my friend from West Calgary has said, that I believe we in Canada would be as well if not perhaps better off, if appeals might not be carried to the Privy Council, and if our last court of appeal should be the Supreme Court of Canada. There are always local conditions entering into lawsuits, peculiar conditions entering into practically every lawsuit unless it involves some constitutional question, which I think put our Canadian judges in a better position to judge of the whole situation than people who are not familiar with our customs and our habits, and who are not as familiar with our geographical and other local considerations. I believe that the leaders of the various governments in this country would be well advised in making a recommendation to the British parliament that the only cases which could be appealed to the Privy Council of Great Britain should be cases affecting the constitution. There will always be grievances on the part of the provinces respecting the constitution of Canada, and if they were limited to the Supreme Court of Canada in their appeals they might think that they were not getting that measure of justice which they deserve, and therefore I think it is a good thing in such cases to have a more or less independent tribunal such as the Privy Council to decide cases affecting our constitution. But when it comes to appealing cases involving millions of dollars, from the Supreme Court of the provinces or the Supreme Court of Canada to the Privy Council, I say that the Privy Council then becomes the rich man's court. I have known cases, not altogether in my own personal practice, but in the practice of barristers in the province of Nova Scotia where after the plaintiff had won damages against a big corporation in the Supreme Court of Canada, the case was carried to the Privy Council and the poor plaintiff could not follow it there. There was the trouble, and that is the only trouble that I find with the Privy Council of Great Britain.

Something has been said with regard to the Senate. I consider myself a democrat, Mr. Speaker. I consider that I am one of the ordinary, plain, common people, but I believe that there have been cases in this country in which the Senate has taken a course that has absolutely justified its existence. I think that a body such as the Senate, which is not amenable to public opinion in that it does not have to go to the country to seek the suffrages of the people, has a great restraining influence, and such an independent body very often proves a bulwark against hasty legislation by Commoners. May I give two instances? During the premiership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, promoters came to the government of the day, and in some way or other that I could never understand they impressed the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier with the desirability of building a railway into the Yukon country. A more impossible proposition, in my humble estimation, was never put before the Canadian parliament, and I say again I could never understand how a government, especially a government led by dear old Sir Wilfrid should attempt to legislate to bring the iron horse into the Yukon. The Senate of that day killed that legislation, notwithstanding the fact that it had passed the Commons, and I say that by that act alone the Senate of Canada has justified its existence. To show my friends across the way that I am not partisan, may I give another illustration which justifies the existence of the Senate? In 1913, under the leadership of our good friend Sir Robert Borden, certain proposals were made in the House of Commons for giving assistance to the British navy. The proposal was that millions and millions of dollars were to be sent out of this country to be paid to the artisans of Great Britain in building battleships, which would, of course, be for the general benefit of the Empire. I am not criticising the government of that day for the attempts that were made to put that legislation through, although I remember spending two sleepless weeks attempting to frustrate that legislation in this chamber, but we were unsuccessful in killing that bill, and I am not going into the reasons why we were unsuccessful. The Senate killed the bill, and I say that is another reason which justified the existence of the Senate in this country.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing subordinate about Canadians. There is nothing colonial about Canadians. We are as free as the people of Great Britain; we are as free as the people of Scotland. There is nothing we cannot do that is not against the law. There are no limits to our freedom. No stretch of the imagination can bring to mind any people under the canopy of Heaven with more freedom than Canadians enjoy. It is true that we pass laws from time to time restricting that freedom, but I say that when we keep within the law there is no freer people on the face of the earth than the Canadian people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Coming down to realities, are not Australia and South Africa and the Irish Free State freer than Canada with respect to this particular question?

Mr. CARROLL: Australia, South Africa and the Irish Free State are not as free as the people of Canada, and if my hon. friend wishes to enter into a discussion of that question and compare the constitutions of these different countries I shall have no hesitation in the world in doing battle with him on that very subject.

Mr. MORIN: Can Canada amend its own constitution? Australia can.

Mr. CARROLL: Canada may amend its own constitution. It may take a little longer to amend our constitution than it does to amend the constitution of Australia or South Africa, but that does not mean that the people of this country are less free than the peoples of these other countries. What does freedom consist of? Does it consist of the fact that the constitution can be more easily amended in some other country? It does not. Freedom means the enjoyment by the inhabitants of a country of the rights of human beings, provided they do not defy the law of God or the laws of that country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend laughs, I dare say he has defied both. So have I.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that he has no right to say of another hon. gentleman that he has violated the laws of--

Mr. CARROLL: I did not say "violated." I used the word "defied."

Mr. SPEAKER: Nor is it permissible to use the expression "defied" in that connection.

Mr. CARROLL: In making use of that remark I had no intention of saying anything ungentlemanly toward another hon. gentleman. You will notice however that having used the word "defied" I made it applicable to myself also.

I should like to see an amendment to this resolution, or at any rate see another resolution brought in at some time to carry out the views which the member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) and myself have in common, and that is in reference to the distribution of powers under the British North America Act. I think there is a strong argument for such a change. I have made the argument and gone a little further perhaps than my hon. friend the member for West Calgary. But I shall be unable to support the resolution as it stands at present. When everything is said and done I feel that it goes too far. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) doubtless contemplated nothing further than he proposed in his speech, but the resolution to my mind goes so far that I shall be unable to support it. However, if an amendment is brought in expressing the views of the hon. member for West Calgary and myself in this matter, and also proposing to curb the right of appeal to the Privy Council, I will vote as heartily as any member in this chamber to give effect to the recommendation.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): This resolution has been so far pretty much of a happy hunting ground for students of constitutional law. Not being able to claim for myself much knowledge of that particular subject, I nevertheless venture to suggest an idea or two which, perhaps, might carry to the average man in the street, if he ever troubles to read the splendid debate which has taken place here to-day. As a Canadian born in the British Isles this discussion has been very gratifying to me, because I cannot imagine any higher tribute to the genius of British statesmanship than to find so much willingness on the part of representatives of the Canadian people to still remain quietly under the hand of the Mother Country. But while that speaks admirably for the genius of British statesmanship, it does not speak so well for the regard of Canadians for that equal freedom which the British enjoys, and which they would not yield were Canada in a position similar to that which the Old Land occupies at the present time.

Some hon. members have deplored the time taken up by this discussion, and one hon. member thought the subject should not be debated at all because he did not understand it. I am glad, however, that the House did not sustain the hon. member in that opinion, because I think some excellent things have been disclosed. For instance, the hon. member (Mr. Carroll) who has just taken his seat has actually discovered one instance where the Canadian Senate is of service. That is something.

An hon. MEMBER: Two instances.

Mr. IRVINE: Well, that is still better. We have also discovered that we do not know whether we have a status or not. That is something worth while discovering. We have also heard that the proper functioning of the Senate is that it should be sustained as the murderer of the legislative children of the Minister of Labour, and so there is a future for that institution which I did not dream of. The hon. member who has just taken his seat also started out by saying that Canada did not want her independence, and he finished by arguing that this country had that independence and had it to an equal extent with any of the other nations within the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Mr. CARROLL: If my hon. friend is referring to me I did not make any mention of "independence" at all. I did allude to "freedom."

Mr. IRVINE: I recall that the hon. member for Cape Breton South did, perhaps, discuss what constituted freedom at the close of his remarks, but I think if he reads Hansard to-morrow he will discover that he also made mention of "independence" in the early part of his speech, suggesting—as I heard him from here, I may not have heard him correctly—that no one would claim that Canada was prepared for independence. And then, as I say, he finished by saying that we had that independence to the extent of Ireland, even Australia, or any of the others. But as I was remarking when interrupted, we have at least got this substantial contribution, that if Canada has any status as a nation no one knows what it is. It has been asserted with great oratorical power by the Prime Minister to-day that Canada is absolutely free. That statement has been repeated by other hon. members, but I think the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) and the hon. member for one of the Nova Scotia constituencies —I just forget which—when they declare that Canada has the status of a colony are perhaps nearer the truth. However, here we are falling between the horns of two dilemmas. On the one hand we are told that we are not independent and must not be independent. On the other hand we are told that we are absolutely free and ought to be free. Again we are told that we have the status of a colony, and must not think or dream of asking for anything else. Now, will any member tell us what status we do have? I think the Canadian status, as has been revealed by the discussion to-day is just about as clear as mud to me. If it is clearer to other hon. members, I shall have to conclude that I have been unable to follow the argument properly. It has been said on the one hand that we have absolute independence. It has been said by the very same speaker that we have some obligations to something called an empire. Now national independence, as I understand it, is absolutely incompatible with any imperial idea so far known to history. It is inconceivable to me how any hon. member of this House in the same breath can boast of our national freedom and at the same time of our imperial relations and obligations. These two things to me together are absolutely incompatible. I think the discussion has proved also the necessity of some more thought on the part of all of us and on the part of the people of Canada on this subject.

Next, I will assert that we have in Canada no more liberty than we are prepared to claim. The Prime Minister insists that we have full liberties; but he would seem to imply that while we have full liberty we must not say it, or if we do say it, we must say it in some after-dinner speech, we must not say it in a resolution by the parliament of Canada, —that would be saying it too loudly and those who are concerned might hear it. That is the impression which I got from his declaration of liberty. We cannot have that liberty of which he spoke so well, if we have to go cap in hand to pray to any power outside of our own country to give us what we want. You may say "Oh, but Great Britain is so kind, so noble, so considerate, and so understanding that she will always give us what we want." That is a fine tribute to Great Britain I agree, but it is not satisfactory to me as a Britisher, for I want that same liberty, that same power of self-determination for my country which is Canada, as they have in Great Britain, and as I had when I was there, and I hope that no Canadian will be satisfied with anything short of that. Much has been said to-day about the sacredness of the British North America Act in its capacity as a contract. I am not, of course, schooled in law, but I am prepared personally to challenge this idea of contract. I do not think we can speak of a treaty between nations in the same manner that we can speak of a contract between two individuals. I do not think that the British North America Act can be considered a contract in the truest sense of that term. It can only be a contract during the lifetime of the signatories to that contract, or during the lifetime of those who authorized its being signed.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman contend that the legal representatives, even after the death of the contracting parties, are not bound by a contract?

Mr. IRVINE: I will answer my hon. friend's question by giving him an illustration of how ridiculous a thing that appears to be in my view, and then tell him more clearly what I am trying to explain. Supposing the great grandfather of my hon. friend had entered into a contract with his next door neighbour, that, three generations later, when my hon. friend was born, my hon. friend should be married on a certain day to the child of a certain individual, would my hon. friend have kept the contract? I question very much whether he would do so. His statement that, because 57 years ago the forefathers of the Canadian people now living were forced by circumstances to enter into certain negotiations with the British Empire and satisfied their wants at that time thoroughly and adequately, that half a century later, finding that we had developed new difficulties and had new problems to face, we should be bound by that same treaty, is equivalent to the illustration which I gave him. If the contract is going to be sacred, that contract must of necessity be ratified by every succeeding generation. That is the only possible intelligent way I can conceive of in which we can attribute sacredness to any kind of contract of this character.

In conclusion, let me say that it is not enough for us to feel glad that Great Britain would accede readily to any demand which we might make. That, as I have already said, is creditable to Great Britain, but is not so creditable to Canada. That is not the spirit of nationhood, that is not the spirit of that freedom which we enjoy from Great Britain. It goes much further than that. Personally, I am for the complete independence of Canada. Why should hon. members be afraid of that? I notice in particular to-day that some hon. members who speak the French language took exception to this resolution. Why should they take exception? Why should they feel afraid of coming entirely under the jurisdiction of Canada? Is the spirit of Canadians not as noble, and not as just, as that of Britons? Is Canadian statesmanship not big enough to continue to each province that minority right with regard to education and religion, which is in the constitution, the British North America Act, and which have won for it just repute and respect? I believe that Canadian statesmanship would be willing to give that. I believe that the Canadian spirit is just as noble and just as free as the spirit of Great Britain. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that what we need in Canada more than anything else is the development of a virile national consciousness. You speak of putting the East and West together and you speak of unity. There can be no unity without national consciousness, and there can be no national consciousness without national responsibility. So that I hope those who have voiced their interests in this unifying principle will recognize this, and that before long Canada shall have her independence which we as Canadians would like to see her have, and at the same time have possibly a closer relationship with Great Britain than she has at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is little which I need to add to what my hon. colleague has just said.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) speaks now, the debate will be closed. If any other hon. gentleman desires to address the House on this resolution he must do so now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I may be permitted to make one or two remarks in closing. It has been suggested that the time is not opportune for a discussion on such a subject as this. I should like to point out that every precedent was once an innovation, and that since our forefathers have been wise enough and able enough to make laws and to build up constitutions which served their day, but which were different from those which had preceded, we ought to have sufficient of the spirit and wisdom of our forefathers to do in our day what they did in theirs. It has been suggested by some of my hon. friends to my extreme right, in a rather superior way, that I ought not to introduce this resolution since there was no body of public opinion behind it. I do not quite know why they should arrogate to themselves the right to say what resolutions should be introduced on the floor of this House, or to suggest that public opinion is not behind such a resolution. I throw out that suggestion, particularly after the vote of two nights ago.

There is a growing body of public opinion across this country that frequently has not had any opportunity for expressing itself, and if sometimes those of us who represent that group speak, perhaps, in a way that does not convey the idea as fully as it should be conveyed, members of this House must give full indulgence, as we have not the experience in this House that some may have had. We are trying to voice opinions which may not be popular to the majority here; but we were sent here to voice those opinions, and that is our justification for bringing them up.

I was just a little disappointed at the attitude of some of my French friends sitting immediately in front of me. They sometimes claim to be nationalists, and yet they would refuse to support a resolution which looks, not, it is true, in the direction of complete independence, but still which would give the very largest measure possible of home rule. They have a good deal to say with regard to minority rights. Let me suggest to them that, perhaps, it is right and wise that they should remember that other parts of this country also have rights. We had, last night, a debate relative to the question of divorce. Some of us who are residing in the western provinces claimed that those western provinces should be placed in the same position as are the other provinces of Canada. I think it would be only fair that they should rush to our assistance if they themselves would claim certain minority rights. As my colleague has just said, I can hardly understand the fear that some have expressed with regard to their fellow-Canadian citizens. I hope that the people of Canada may be trusted to keep the spirit of guarantees that have been given.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asserted in one breath that we had not a colonial status, and still he had to admit in the next that we cannot revise our own constitution. That anomaly stands notwithstanding all that has been said by various members of this House, and it was to meet that situation that I introduced this resolution this afternoon. It has been said that the resolution has not been carefully drawn. I should like to suggest that, perhaps, it is more carefully drawn than some of the members have recognized. At least, it was drawn with sufficient care to draw a very considerable expression of opinion from all sections of this House. The Prime Minister says that at the Imperial Conference he took the position indicated in this resolution. All I am asking is that this parliament should openly state that self-same position. It may be that we shall not always have a Prime Minister who takes that position. If it is right that the Prime Minister over at London should personally, on behalf of this country, state his opinions, surely it is quite right that this House should in a very moderate resolution of this kind, re-echo those self-same sentiments.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and one or two other hon. members have suggested that since my purpose in introducing the resolution has been served, I should now withdraw it. It is not often that members in this corner of the House withdraw their resolutions, because one of the objects for which we introduce these is, very frankly, to have the other members of the House state exactly where they stand. But since they have so done, so very fully to-day, I must say I cannot see any very great advantage in pressing the motion to a vote. We have had the rather imperialistic admissions of the Prime Minister, and we have had also the—shall I say?—nationalistic aspirations of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) As we have had these frankly placed before us, I beg leave to ask that this motion should now be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion cannot be withdrawn unless the House disposes of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). I do not see the hon. member for Brome in his seat; but I understood from him when he spoke a moment ago, that he had no objection to withdrawing his amendment. That he can do only with the consent of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the hon. member who made the motion have leave to withdraw the said motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule of the House will be found in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms at page 113:

> Where an amendment has been proposed to a question, the original motion cannot be withdrawn until the amendment has been first disposed of by being agreed to, withdrawn or negatived, as the question on the amendment stands before the original motion.

This is taken from May, page 250.

Motion withdrawn.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. JOHN MILLAR ('Qu'Appelle) moved:

> Whereas the project of deepening the St. Lawrence River is one of first importance and involves enormous expenditure; and
> Whereas public meetings, Boards of Trade, etc., in Western Canada and elsewhere are, as a result of active propaganda carried on by American and Eastern Canadian interests, passing resolutions urging the immediate undertaking of this project by this government, and
> Whereas it would appear that this propaganda is grossly misleading in some respects, and particularly in regard to the saving to be effected on the transportation of wheat, which is repeatedly said to be eleven cents per bushel.
> Therefore, be it resolved that the standing committee on Railways and Canals be requested to inquire fully into, and report on the matter of saving that may be effected on transportation of grain by deepening the St. Lawrence River, and apart entirely from the saving that may be effected through the deepening of the Welland canal.

He said: In dealing with this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make my position perfectly clear. The object of the resolution is not to place any opposition in the way of the project of deepening the St. Lawrence river. I do not wish at this time to pass upon the merits of that undertaking; but so that I may make plain what I intend by the resolution let me point out what has taken place in connection with the Welland canal. For some years we have been spending a considerable amount of money on the Welland canal and the question has been asked in this House: From whom came the request that the Welland canal should be completed? The Minister of Railways, being asked that question at the last session of parliament, was able to show by his records that resolutions had been passed in western Canada by boards of trade, and that it was partly as a result of these resolutions that the work on the Welland canal was being carried to completion. I felt at that time, as some others in this corner have felt, that we were placed in a false position. Those who are supposed to benefit by the opening of the Welland canal had not really requested that this project should be undertaken. A few had made that request by resolution, and we were very much inclined to think that the request was based on information which was far from complete; and it was through fear that the same thing might take place in connection with the deepening of the St. Lawrence river that I placed the present resolution on the order paper. At the present time a campaign of propaganda is being carried on in western Canada. A gentleman representing a large organization in the United States has been holding meetings in that part of the country, and among his statements there seem to be some that are very much exaggerated. Nevertheless, he is meeting with success in having meetings pass resolutions urging the immediate undertaking of this work by the Canadian government, and I believe that the strongest argument he is putting forward is the one that is likely to serve as the most attractive bait, namely, the promise that the people will save on the transportation of wheat as much as 11 cents a bushel. Some have put it at a little less, but that is the saving that is suggested. Now, many of us are deeply interested in this question, having studied it carefully, because it is one of vital significance to us; and we are inclined to think that this statement as to the possible saving to be made on the transportation of wheat is grossly exaggerated; as a matter of fact the saving would be very small. We feel that perhaps the same thing that occurred in the case of the Welland canal will take place in this connection. Resolutions will be sent to the minister, and probably the government, finding the pressure become too strong, will be induced to undertake this vast project immediately involving an expenditure of several millions of dollars. I am not going to question the right of those in the United States or in eastern Canada, who are interested in having this work proceeded with, to send men to western Canada for the purpose of carrying on a campaign of propaganda; but I do question their right to make statements that do not seem to be borne out by the facts and which are bound to be misleading. I question their right to make such statements and then, on the strength of action taken in good faith on the basis of these statements, to have this great project undertaken. If it were not for the rules of the House, I could repeat a statement made recently during this session showing that the same arguments that were advanced in favour of the Welland canal are now being used in connection with the St. Lawrence scheme; that is to say, that the matter is about to be undertaken for the benefit of those who are interested in grain growing in western Canada. I do not think that those who are interested in eastern Canada and expect to use the electrical power that will be generated there are particularly concerned about those who are growing grain in the West.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does the hon. member imply that it is the people who are interested in the development of electrical power who are spreading the propaganda he speaks of?

Mr. MILLAR: They are not the people, to my knowledge; but they are people living near the St. Lawrence river who, I believe, are deeply interested in the matter because they expect to get cheap power. With that wish I have sympathy, and when it comes to a discussion of the project as a whole I shall have to take the attitude—which I believe my colleagues will also take—that if it can be shown that it will benefit a large section of the country whose needs are greater than the needs of other parts of Canada we ought to give serious consideration to their request. But the point I wish to make is that those who wish the undertaking to be carried out are the ones that should get behind it. Let it not be saddled on those who are not asking for it. Do not let false propaganda—and it is my opinion that much of the propaganda in this matter is based on false premises—be the means of getting people who are not so much interested, to pass resolutions urging that the work be done; because, afterwards, when it is found to be too expensive and that it does not pay, these people will be blamed. When the people in some parts of the country, particularly the section in which I live, ask for an expenditure of money or for any particular undertaking which is very much needed, such for example as the building of branch lines, they are met with the assertion that a vast amount of money is being already spent in their interests. They are told: "A great deal of money is being spent in the interests of you people who live in the West, for the Welland canal is being opened up for your benefit." Now, it seems to me that the same argument will be used if the St. Lawrence project is carried through; we shall be told that it is being done for our benefit. In order to counteract the influence of this propaganda I have taken what seems to me the wisest course, and I would suggest that there be referred to the select standing committee on Railways and Canals this particular phase of the matter as to the amount of saving that will be effected in the transportation of grain; because that is the argument that is catching most of the people in the West who are passing resolutions in favour of the undertaking. If this committee will investigate that question carefully and report as to what they believe will be the actual saving, I am inclined to think it will be found to be very much less than 11 cents, which is now promised by the propagandists. The reference of the matter to the committee would in my opinion serve as a necessary check to the tendency to pass these resolutions. If the people in any part of Canada, including the western provinces, having the full facts before them, declare that they desire to have this work undertaken, I have no objections. But I very much object to having these resolutions passed by people who are placing themselves on record in the absence of anything like complete information.

I am anxious not to say anything to provoke a general discussion on the St. Lawrence route at this time, for the reason that the subject is likely to come up again on the resolution fathered by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church). For that reason I shall avoid entering into the merits or demerits of this great project, unless there is further discussion necessitating my doing so in reply. Being a member of the railway committee, it is possible that if I made the same request to that committee they would at once investigate the subject matter of my resolution. But I wish to make sure that an investigation will be conducted, and that is why I have placed the resolution on the order paper. I hope it will pass with little or no discussion.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the project to which my hon. friend has referred is of great magnitude, and negotiations have been in progress between the two countries affected. Copies of these negotiations up to date I think have been placed on the Table for the use of members. But my hon. friend has already noticed the announcement by the government that it is in process of appointing what might be called a "national committee" to investigate the very thing that he wants referred to the railway committee. This is not a small matter; it is a matter that requires the closest investigation and the most serious consideration by the best men we can find in the Dominion. The United States have appointed a committee to investigate the project from their standpoint, and the Canadian government is proposing to do the same. Now, it would not be becoming to ask a committee of this House to enter upon the performance of duties which are to be referred to this national committee, and the object my hon. friend has in view will, I trust, be better and more fully attained by that body than could possibly be the case were it referred to the railway committee.

I do not want to enter into any discussion as to the Welland canal or as to this great project, but I do want to tell my hon. friend that this national committee, as I call it, will have placed in its hands the very thing that he wants the railway committee to investigate, and I submit that the national committee will be the most competent body to ascertain what our government and parliament want to know. The railway committee is composed of 130 members, and if a committee were selected to investigate the question it would not be the railway committee, on account of its size, I think it is too unwieldy to undertake the details of such an investigation.

I sincerely hope that my hon. friend, having stated his case, will withdraw his resolution, under the circumstances when the government is preparing to appoint a committee to carry on this very work, a committee which will have wide powers and be representative of all Canada.

Mr. MILLAR: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: The speech of the hon. member will close the debate.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend does not see fit to withdraw his resolution, several members will want to speak on it. If he does not see his way clear to accept my suggestion, under all the circumstances I think it would be wise to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MILLAR: Perhaps I might ask the minister a question? How long is it before the committee referred to will be likely to report? I may be permitted to point out that the International Joint Commission did not in any way deal with this specific question on which I want information—the cost of transportation of grain. It is a question of vital importance to western Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I might be allowed, Mr. Speaker, it would be very difficult to say when such a national committee could report because, as the hon. member has intimated, the question is a very vital one. But no steps will be taken of a practical nature so far as Canada is concerned until the information required is obtained. One of the very questions to be referred to the national committee will be the economic question and what gain will be ours, economically, by the construction of this great project.

Mr. MILLAR: Might I ask the hon. minister another question? Is it because of the magnitude of the inquiry, or because of a lack of courtesy to the national committee, that the minister objects?

Mr. GRAHAM: We are all out of order, Mr. Speaker, I admit. This is a question of such magnitude that I submit, with all deference to the railway committee, that the board which the government hopes to appoint will be in a better position to get information thereon and view it from all angles than will the railway committee with its other work. I think it would be unwise to refer to a committee of this House a question for the settlement of which the appointment of a special body has already been announced, and I hope my hon. friend will on further consideration share my view.

Mr. MILLAR: In view of the explanation and objection of the hon. minister, I would ask leave to withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

PACIFIC HALIBUT FISHERY

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend section six of the Northern Pacific Halibut Fishery Protection Act, chapter sixty-one of the statutes of 1923, which relates to Canadian and United States nationals and ships liable to seizure for engaging in fishing for halibut in prohibited waters, by limiting the time for an offence thereunder to the close season as defined in the Act, and by repealing section nine, relating to the seizure of foreign ships.

Motion agreed to.

STANDARD PLATINUM GOODS

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: On behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) I beg to move that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913, to provide a standard quality for platinum goods.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): I recognize that the hour is a little bit late, and that we cannot go into supply except by unanimous consent, but if the House were willing I should like to move that we go into supply this evening for the purpose of taking up one particular item under Public Works.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The House could not go into committee of supply to-night for the simple reason that it is impossible on Thursday or on Friday to take up anything that has not been taken up on other days.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is this item which is in such a rush?

Mr. ROBB: I might explain to the House that the deeds for the Canadian building in London have been completed, and we received a cable this evening that the agents were prepared to make delivery. An appropriation has been provided in the Estimates, and we are prepared to pay, but, of course, the appropriation has to be voted by the House. If my hon. friend objects we will not press for it to-night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would waive my objection to going into committee on this occasion, but I would give the minister warning that I think it will take some time to get the item passed.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend offers any objections, we will go into supply tomorrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, the rule is very clear, as stated by the leader of the opposition. Rule 17C provides:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

I left the chair a moment ago governed by that rule and believing that the House had given its consent. Otherwise, of course, I would not have left the chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: If unanimous consent be not given, we will go into supply on Public Works to-morrow; but if it were agreeable, we might go into supply to-night and not attempt to pass the item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am prepared to give consent to going into supply on the understanding that the government will not continue indefinitely in the vain hope of passing the item.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to be understood as agreeing to going into supply to-morrow on the estimates of the Public Works department, because it would mean we could not make any motion at any future time with respect to that department.

Mr. ROBB: With that understanding I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

PUBLIC WORKS

Public Works—Ottawa Parliament Building, $600,000; Ottawa, Addition to Dominion Archives Building, $275,000; London, England, Canadian office, $1,300,000.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): The item I would like to discuss to-night is "London, England, Canadian office, $1,300,000." As the House is aware, it has been the desire and intention of the government to secure proper quarters for Canadian offices in London. Up till last spring the Canadian offices were down in Victoria street, and those who have visited London will realize that they were not suitable and did not properly represent Canada as it should be represented in London. Last year when the Estimates were up for discussion, the Prime Minister made a statement in which he suggested that the government would inquire into the Cox Bank building. Investigations were carried on in regard to that building, but the price was considered higher than we were prepared to pay. Later on the High Commissioner suggested that the Union Club building could be secured, and this estimate is for the purpose of purchasing that building.

In addition to the purchase price, it is proposed to expend some £75,000 on improving the building. The Union Club building is well located. It is in the centre of the City of London and occupies probably one of the best sites that could be procured for a Dominion public building. The whole matter has been thoroughly canvassed, and the High Commissioner has recommended that this building should be purchased by the Dominion government. It is a four-storey building, with basement, and has a frontage of about 90 feet to Cockspur street and about 118 feet to Trafalgar Square. The total floor space is about 25,000 square feet. The following is a description of the property and the site by Messrs, Knight, Frank & Rutley, Estate Agents, Hanover Square, London, who examined the building at the request of the High Commissioner.

> The site occupies one of the finest positions in London, and, indeed, in the world, the Cockspur street frontage being exceptionally valuable on account of its being the centre of the West End Railways, shipping, banking, and insurance quarter, while a notable feature on the eastern side is the open outlook over Trafalgar Square.
> The opportunity to acquire such a property very rarely occurs, and if these premises had been available they would have been eagerly sought after, especially with the knowledge that the freehold belongs to the Crown, who are, almost invariably, willing upon suitable terms and conditions to grant renewals of leases.

The Canadian High Commissioner in London states that the position of the Union Club building is one of the best and that the building itself can, with certain alterations, be made one of the finest in London. The interior will have to be fitted for office requirements. The outside, while good from the architectural point of view is only stucco on brick and the High Commissioner suggests, if the building is purchased, to reface it with stone, similar to that adjoining, which belongs to the Royal College of Surgeons, and in the same manner as the facade of Buckingham Palace was treated. The cost of the alterations required to fit up the building for the purposes of the High Commissioner's and other Dominion government offices has not yet been fully determined, but it is estimated that it will amount approximately to £75,000.

Since this memorandum was made we have received the plans of the architecture. That is their estimate, and that is the estimate we are carrying for the improvement of the building:

> That the building in question stands on a site owned by the Crown, as represented by the government of Great Britain, which ground is held under a Crown lease for a period of 60 years from January 5, 1903, having therefore still 39 years to run approximately; the rental is £2,000 per annum.

That is to the British Crown. Within the last few weeks the government have taken up with the British government, through the High Commissioner, the desirability of extending that lease for 100 years, making a full 100 year lease. The British government have consented to the extension making the Crown lease for 100 years, but they have asked an additional £855 making the Crown rental for the extended lease to 100 years £2,855 per annum. The price asked by the Union Club for the property is £225,000. That is for the building. As to the reasonableness of this price, the following extract is taken from the report above mentioned of the real estate agents of Knight, Frank & Rutley:

> Having regard to the improbability of being able to acquire any other site of this character and importance in such an exceptional position, and to the fact that the premises were not in the market, we are of the opinion that £200,000 (Two hundred thousand pounds) would be a fair price for the lease to anyone who must have an important building in this immediate vicinity. Indeed, a higher figure might have to be paid to secure such a property.

The High Commissioner in his report states:

> I think that the price is very materially less than the property is worth.

The following statement shows the value of the properties adjoining the Union Club building:

> South African government (Morley's Hotel), corner Trafalgar Square and Strand.
> Crown Lease purchased in 1921 having 10 years to run—Cost $135,000. Annual rental £2,000.

That is the ground rental.

> Ground Area—about 5,000 square feet. Purchased about 1919.
> Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. Ltd. 15/16, Cockspur Street.
> Crown Lease, about 30 years—Cost £80,000.
> Annual Ground Rent—£5,000.
> Subsequent freehold acquired at additional cost £160,000.
> Ground area about 5,500 square feet.
> Purchased about 1919.

Barclays Bank (Kinnaird House). Corner Pall Mall East and Haymarket.
Crown Lease for 80 years and modern building, cost £250,000. Ground rental £8,000.
Ground area about 11,500 square feet.
Purchased about 1914.
Royal Mail Steamship Co. Corner Cockspur St., and Spring Gardens, (immediately opposite Union Club) Freehold purchased since 1910 at a cost of £80 per square foot.
Area about 3,600 square feet or £288,000.
Purchased about 1912.
Cox's Bank, corner Waterloo Place and Pall Mall.

That is the building I think the Prime Minister referred to last year as being under consideration at that time.

Crown Lease 80 years—cost £200,000.
Annual Rent—£7,500.
New Building about finished, £500,000.
Ground area—10,000 square feet.
Purchased about 1922.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us the ground area of this property?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, 25,000 square feet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the floor area, not the ground area?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not know that I have the ground area here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Without it the comparisons you are giving are meaningless.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not believe I have the information in front of me. I will give it to the House tomorrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend would bring down other information as well tomorrow, in that way we may save time. For example I think the House will want to know at the very inception of this matter what it is going to cost. Perhaps my hon. friend can tell us now what the cost is, and, what the annual cost to the country will be in owning these premises. Then, perhaps he will tell us what will be the cost per annum in interest and taxes of owning this place.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The purchase price is £225,000, the estimated cost of alterations £75,000, and the annual ground rental £2,850.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the annual interest?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A saving in rents will be made in London by consolidating the offices in this building.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister will answer the question, and give us the information as to the annual interest in taxes on top of all this.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not figured it up. We will have that figured to-morrow and submit it to the hon. member.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister give last year's taxes? Then we will get some intelligent information.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am simply giving the House an outline of the proposal now. Later on we will discuss the details. I will have the information available to-morrow as to the annual cost. I think perhaps I have it here, if I could only put my hand upon it. We are paying comparatively large rentals in London which we will save by taking over this building. Then we shall have the Canadian offices there centralized. The government deem it essential that Canada should have a proper building in the English capital, it being the seat of the Empire. The matter has been very carefully canvassed and I am satisfied that the price as suggested is one that is in the interest of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the minister if there is not some proposition that we purchase the building owned by the British Columbia government?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, that was under consideration but the government declined to dispose of the building.

Mr. STEVENS: The provincial government declined to dispose of the building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister in the information he is to bring down to-morrow advise us what the total amount is now being paid for rentals for offices in London which will be accommodated in this building. He might at the same time tell us what our position will be at the end of the 100 years' lease, and what rate he proposes to set up for the yearly amortization of our interest during those 100 years, and what the carrying rate will be. The amortization of course goes to the value of the lease as such, it being a lease for a term stated, apart altogether from the question of the depreciation of the building which he has to consider when he is making his calculation. We would also like to know at what rate of interest the amortization is to be considered, both of the lease as well as the depreciation; and also the rate of interest that the minister thinks should be allowed at arriving at the annual cost to the country of the investment in the property. Then it is suggested that the taxes change. Of course they do change. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) suggested that. Perhaps the best thing we could have on the question of taxes would be the production of the tax bills for the last three years, showing the whole amount of taxes payable. I do not suppose the bills are here, but the information must be here, because I assume this matter has been carefully considered by the High Commissioner; in fact the minister told us so; and undoubtedly when anybody makes a purchase of this magnitude one of the first things he would consider would be the tax commitments. In addition to that, perhaps we could get some information as to the character of this building by finding out what the insurance rate upon it is, and what the insurance charges will be. Of course, over and above that, I assume the information in regard to taxes will not only include the usual municipal rates but would include all services. I think the minister is well aware that they have special services and special rates that apply in England, and in London particularly. I have no doubt the Minister will have it all. We are proceeding under the assumption that there has been a change in the personnel of agents buying property in our consideration of the matter. I do not suppose Mr. Aronovici had anything to do with it, but perhaps it would be just as well if the minister would tell the House who the agent handling the matter is, the commission, and the names of the present lessors.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will be glad to supply any information I can obtain to the committee to-morrow.

Progress reported.

PROHIBITION IN UNITED STATES

CONVENTION BETWEEN HIS MAJESTY AND THE PRESIDENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it be resolved by the..... House of Commons that it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention between His Majesty and the President of the United States of America, signed at Washington on the twenty-third day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, for the purpose of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States, on the subject of alcoholic beverages, a copy of which has been laid before parliament.

That a message be sent to the Senate informing their honours that this House has adopted the above resolution and requesting that their honours will unite with this House in the approval of the above-mention convention.

And that the clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

He said: Mr. Speaker, very shortly after the opening of parliament, I laid on the Table a copy of a convention between the United Kingdom and the United States of America, respecting the regulation of the liquor traffic. This subject was one of consideration and of discussion at the Imperial Conference last fall. It is referred to in the summary of proceedings of the conference which has also been tabled. I might quote from the reference, to be found on page 12 of the summary, the paragraph that is pertinent. It reads as follows:

During the session of the conference, the question of the regulation of the liquor traffic off the American coasts and of the measures to be taken to avoid a serious conflict either of public opinion or of official action was seriously debated. The conference arrived at the conclusion that, while affirming and safeguarding as a cardinal feature of British policy the principle of the three mile limit, it was yet both desirable and practicable to meet the American request for an extension of the right of search beyond this limit for the above purpose, and negotiations were at once opened with the United States government for the conclusion of an experimental agreement with this object in view.

I should like to give to the House the essential provisions of the convention, or treaty as it may be called, and will do so, in as brief a form as possible:

The principle that three marine miles from low water mark constitute the proper limits of territorial water is upheld.

Appropriate provision is made for the searching of British vessels under stated conditions; and when there is reasonable cause for belief that the vessel has committed or is committing or is attempting to commit an offence against the laws of the United States prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages the vessel may be seized and brought into the United States for adjudication.

It is provided that this right of seizure may be exercised within the distance from the coast that may be traversed in one hour by the vessel suspected of endeavouring to commit the offence. Where a transfer from one vessel to another is contemplated, it is the speed of the latter vessel which is to determine the distance from the coast within which seizure may be made.

The treaty also provides that no penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States shall attach to the carriage of alcoholic liquors by British vessels when listed as sea stores or as cargo destined for a port foreign to the United States, provided that such liquors are kept under seal continuously while the vessel is within the territorial waters and that they shall not at any time or place be unladen within United States territory. Such carriage is to have the same status as now provided by law with respect to the transit of alcoholic liquors through the Panama canal. Provision is made for reference to a joint commission of claims for compensation where a British vessel has suffered loss or injury through any unreasonable or improper exercise of the rights conferred by the treaty. The treaty is subject to ratification in the usual manner, and is to remain in force for one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications. Three months before the expiration of the year modifications may be suggested by either party, and if no agreement is made with respect to them the treaty is to lapse; otherwise it is to continue from year to year subject to a similar right of proposed modifications. The treaty is also to lapse if either of the parties is prevented by judicial decision or legislative action from giving full effect to its provisions, and in case from any cause the treaty comes to an end, such party is to enjoy all the rights he would have possessed had it not been concluded.

The convention was signed at Washington on January 23 of this year by the British ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes, representing His Majesty the King, and by the Hon. Mr. Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States, representing the President. It has since been ratified by the Senate of the United States on March 13, by a vote of 61 to 7. It will be ratified by the King as soon as approval of the treaty has been given by the parliament of the United Kingdom and the parliaments of the several self-governing dominions. On January 12 of this year the Canadian government was asked if its ministers approved of the terms of the treaty, and also if they were agreeable to having the British ambassador sign the treaty. On the day following a reply was sent to the British government intimating that the terms of the treaty were agreeable to our ministers; also that the government was agreeable to having the British ambassador sign. The reply drew attention to the particular clause in the treaty which refers to vessels which may be illegally seized and brought into port. We felt that if the vessel seized should happen to be under Canadian registry it was but right that the British representative on the board appointed to adjudicate upon the matter should be a person nominated by the Canadian government; we also felt that the government should only give its approval subject to the subsequent approval of this parliament. These two intimations were given in our despatch, and in the reply which was received from the British government it was intimated that the wish of Canada in both those particulars would be fully respected.

I will, for purposes of greater accuracy, indicate to the House more or less in the language of the despatch itself, the form in which our approval as a government was given to the terms of the treaty. The despatch, sent on January 12 intimated—that: The government of Canada, subject to acquiescence by the British government in the conditions therein mentioned, approved of the proposed treaty with the United States, and approved of the signature of the treaty by His Majesty's representative at Washington. It had been decided that parliamentary approval should be obtained before concurrence in ratification should be intimated. It was stated that the Canadian parliament would probably meet before the end of February. That the Canadian government's present approval of the proposed treaty was given on condition that it was understood that if a joint board to report upon the claims of compensation by a vessel of Canadian registry is required to be constituted under Article 4, the selection of the person whose name is to be submitted to his Majesty for appointment to the board will be made by it. In conclusion the despatch said it was assumed that an undertaking by the British government on this point would be sufficient and that provision with reference thereto need not therefore be included in the treaty.

The reply sent stated that it was quite understood that the Canadian government would wish to obtain the approval of the Canadian parliament before ratification, and that a similar course was contemplated in the United Kingdom; that his Majesty's government would readily leave to the Canadian government the nomination of the person to be the member of the joint board referred to in Article 4 in respect of vessels of Canadian registry and agreed that it was not necessary to make provision in the treaty, further that the same procedure was contemplated in case of other dominions.

As I have intimated, the treaty was signed on January 23rd by the British ambassador. In this connection may I point out to the House that the practice followed with respect to the signature of this treaty is the one decided upon at the recent Imperial Conference and set out in the report of the Summary of Proceedings of the Imperial Conference to be found on pages 13, 14 and 15 in the part of the report relating to negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties. With reference to the signature of treaties there are the following provisions:

(a) Bilateral treaties imposing obligations on one part of the Empire only should be signed by the representative of the government of that part.

The Halibut treaty which has been the subject of discussion in this House is of that character. It is a bilateral treaty which imposed obligations only on Canada, not on other parts of the British Empire, and as such according to the procedure which the Imperial Conference has thought proper in this matter, it should be signed by a representative of the government of Canada. Now I continue to quote from the report of the proceedings:

The full power issued to such representatives should indicate the part of the Empire in respect of which the obligations are to be undertaken, and the preamble and text of the treaty should be so worded as to make its scope clear.

(b) Where the bilateral treaty imposes obligations on more than one part of the Empire the treaty should be signed by one or more plenipotentiaries on behalf of all the governments concerned.

This treaty between His Majesty and the President of the United States is a bilateral treaty which imposes obligations on more than one part of the Empire. It imposes obligations on all parts, and therefore it is, in the language of the procedure set forth by the conference, to be signed by one or more plenipotentiaries on behalf of the governments concerned. It would seem quite sufficient that the British Ambassador should be sole plenipotentiary for this purpose. I might say I am informed that the governments of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Newfoundland, and the Irish Free State have all approved of the terms of the treaty, and have all expressed their acquiescence in having the British Ambassador sign the treaty in so far as their interest in the matter is concerned. The act of ratification is an act of the sovereign. The treaty while it has been ratified by the United States has not yet been ratified by His Majesty the King. That ratification awaits, as I have already intimated the concurrence of the governments of the several parts of the Empire before that step is taken.

In regard to the ratification of a treaty, the Imperial Conference has the following to say with respect to procedure:

Ratification of treaties imposing obligations on more than one part of the Empire is effected after consultation between the governments of those parts of the Empire concerned. It is for each government to decide whether parliamentary approval or legislation is required before a desire for or a concurrence in ratification is intimated by the government.

It will be seen by the statement I have just read that it is not essential to ratification that parliament should approve treaties. Ratification being an executive act may be taken by the executive independent of parliament altogether, should the executive of the country, in other words the government concerned, so desire. We have felt that in these important matters of treaty the parliament should be asked to approve before the government would concur in the ratification. It is with a view of obtaining the approval of the parliament of Canada that to-day we are asking this House to pass the resolution which I have just presented. In recommending the adoption of the resolution, I do so on the grounds which have been urged in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, namely: First of all, there is the ground of morality, that it is obviously desirable for countries to unite in endeavouring to give effect to the laws of other friendly countries, particularly where those laws have in view serving a great moral purpose. There is next, and closely allied, the ground of international good-will. There is reason to believe that the United States is most anxious that this course should be taken; that this treaty should be passed, and we in Canada, as a near neighbour, will I think, feel gratified at an opportunity of being able to facilitate in any manner possible the furtherance of friendly relations between Great Britain and other parts of the British Empire and the United States. By giving our approval in a whole-hearted manner to this treaty, I think we shall be helping to serve that end. Finally, it has been represented by British shipping interests that it will be very much to their advantage that this treaty should be enacted. While, on the one hand, it gives to the United States government the privilege of the right of search beyond the three-mile limit to a point which, roundly speaking, it has been estimated might be set at somewhere within the vicinity of twelve miles, with a view of assisting the United States government to enforce its legislation restricting the importation of alcoholic beverages, on the other hand, it gives to British shipping interests the right to carry alcoholic beverages under seal into United States ports, provided that those alcoholic beverages are kept under seal when within the three-mile limit. On these grounds, therefore, of commercial interest, moral obligation and international good-will, I recommend the adoption of the resolution by the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the Prime Minister closes, I would like to ask first this question: Does the treaty entirely fail of effect if it should be that the parliament of any single one of the dominions fails to ratify it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that the British government would reconsider the present wording of the treaty if any of the parliaments of the British Empire should refuse to approve it, possibly exempting the particular country concerned from the provisions of the treaty; but I should expect that in this case a question of that kind would not be apt to arise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are two other questions on another point which the Prime Minister referred to, namely, the point of the formality of the execution. First, how is it determined whether a treaty is bilateral, affecting one part or dominion alone? What precautions are taken to make sure of that? Second, in the event of its being found to be a bilateral treaty affecting one part alone, upon whose recommendation does His Majesty act in authorising the execution by the appropriate dominion representative?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the first question which my right hon. friend has asked: How is it ascertained that a bilateral treaty applies to one particular part of the Empire or more than one, I would answer that that fact would be ascertained by the terms of the treaty itself, its subject matter and by conference between the different parts of the Empire. The paragraph in the report of the Imperial Conference which deals with the subject of negotiation of treaties, contains, I think, what will answer my right hon. friend's question. The paragraph reads:

> (a) It is desirable that no treaty should be negotiated by any of the governments of the Empire without due consideration of its possible effect on other parts of the Empire, or, if circumstances so demand, on the Empire as a whole.
> (b) Before negotiations are opened with the intention of concluding a treaty, steps should be taken to ensure that any of the other governments of the Empire likely to be interested are informed, so that, if any such government considers that its interests would be affected, it may have an opportunity of expressing its views, or, when its interests are immediately involved, of participating in the negotiations.

If that course is pursued, I think it will soon become apparent to any particular self-governing dominion or the government of the United Kingdom, whether the treaty which it proposes to negotiate is one that concerns only one part of the Empire or more than one part. In these, as in all matters, common sense has to govern in the last degree; hard and fast lines cannot be laid down; but the broad intelligence that is usually applied to matters of this sort would soon, I think, make it quite apparent and clear whether a self-governing dominion or the government of the United Kingdom would be justified in regarding a treaty as imposing obligations only upon itself.

As to the second question which my right hon. friend has asked—on whose advice does His Majesty act in ratifying a treaty, was it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, in a case, for example, of a treaty which, after the conference, the other dominions and the United Kingdom should agree affected Canada alone. In that event, some Canadian is authorized by His Majesty to sign. Upon whose advice does His Majesty act in authorizing the execution, thus approving the terms of the treaty?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In this report of the Imperial Conference is mention of the legal adviser of the Foreign Office, who was present when the particular matter to which my right hon. friend refers was discussed at a subsidiary conference. His name is Sir C. J. B. Hurst. Perhaps I can best illustrate the point of view which was expressed at that time, by recalling, as best I can at the moment, an answer made by Sir Cecil Hurst to a question that was asked by one of the dominion prime ministers. It was in the nature of a rhetorical reply. In the event of advice being given to His Majesty which might prove to be not proper advice, and the necessity should arise for impeaching the minister or prime minister who had given it, would it, asked Sir Cecil, be the British Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain, or the minister or prime minister of the dominion concerned against whom impeachment proceedings should be properly started? That question was put in that way to elucidate where the responsibility began and where it ended. I gathered, I think rightly, that the interpretation which the Foreign Office placed upon the matter to which my right hon. friend just referred is this, that the government of the Dominion which was tendering the advice in such a case was the government that was responsible; that it was advising His Majesty direct in regard to matters which were of sole concern to the dominion; that in the transmission of that advice the British government was acting as the channel through which that advice was transmitted, but was not the government which was formally tendering the advice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand, then, that the Prime Minister intimates that for the sake of approving of a certain treaty a Canadian should be appointed to execute it and that the British government itself would entail no responsibility; in other words, that His Majesty would act solely on the advice of his Canadian Privy Council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take it that the view of the British govenment is that it is prepared to trust the governments of the self-governing dominions "all in all or not at all" in this as in other matters; and that on a matter in regard to which a dominion government has a right to advise His Majesty direct, such as the question of who should be appointed to sign a particular treaty which comes within the group of bilateral treaties, to which I have referred, which impose obligations on only one part of the Empire, the responsibility shall rest with that particular government and not with the British government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If such is the case, and if the approval of the British government is not at all essential, is not indeed obtained, why does the transmission take place through the British government and not through His Majesty direct?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will see that these are all matters of constitutional development. Up to the present time all communications have gone to His Majesty through the British government. It will also be seen that it is obviously desirable to have some central agency or channel through which all communications may pass and where they may be noted. I think it would be palpably unwise to have different parts of the British Empire communicating direct with His Majesty, without any knowledge on the part of other parts of the Empire that such advice was being given in that way. I consider it advisable that in the working out of a great constitutional evolution—for that is really what is involved in these matters—steps should be taken slowly and with great caution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I take the responsibility of stating the situation as I understand it. and which I think is a more correct statement of the actual constitutional result. The function of the British government will consist in making a recommendation; the wording of the transmission to His Majesty will be a recommendation. I do not think the Prime Minister would venture to deny that. The British government having been first apprised of the terms of the treaty and having agreed that the matter is purely one that concerns Canada, the recommendation will in every case be cheerfully given; but it will signify to His Majesty the approval by the British government of the treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is always prone to assert his own views as against the views of everyone else. I have given him my understanding of the situation, arrived at after a conference with the British authorities, and the prime ministers of the other dominions in the presence of Lord Curzon who as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presided; at a subsidiary conference of the Imperial Conference held expressly for the purpose of considering these very matters. As I have intimated, when the matter was discussed, the conference had the benefit of advice from the legal adviser to the Foreign Office, Sir C. J. B. Hurst, who is perhaps the greatest authority on international law in the world. I believe I have accurately stated the position; it is certainly the basis upon which this government is proceeding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As regards the merits of the treaty itself, I do not propose to take general exception to its terms as generally outlined by the Prime Minister. As respects the last point, whether I am right, or whether the Prime Minister is, will I think wholly depend upon whether a recommendation actually goes from the British government; whether the document that passes from them to His Majesty contains a recommendation or merely transmits one of ours. I shall be interested to know just how the matter develops and whether such a recommendation passes or not. This arrangement having been arrived at as between the dominions and the United Kingdom on the one hand and the United States on the other, for the settlement of a somewhat vexed matter of controversy between them, I feel that on the part of this parliament there will not be a disposition to refuse ratification. With regard to the necessity for ratification by parliament, I only emphasize that this is no new development; this is no accretion in the evolution of our constitutional relations; it is something that has been meticulously observed, in respect of matters both of great and of little consequence, in at least the last decade of our history.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order that there may appear correctly in Hansard the references to the persons concerned in the subsidiary conference to which I have referred, I would direct the attention of hon. members to the opening paragraph in the summary of proceedings of the Imperial Conference. I have reference to the section relating to negotiations, signature and ratification of treaties.

The principles governing the relations of the various parts of the Empire in connection with the negotiations, signature and ratification of treaties seemed to the conference to be of the greatest importance. Accordingly it was arranged that the subject should be fully examined by a committee, of which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was chairman. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Prime Ministers of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and Newfoundland, the Minister of External Affairs of the Irish Free State, and the Secretary of State for India as head of the Indian Delegation, served on this committee. With the assistance of the legal adviser to the Foreign Office, Sir C. J. B. Hurst, K.C.B., K.C., the following resolution was drawn up and agreed to:—

Then follow several paragraphs relating to negotiations, the signing of treaties, and their ratification. It was as a member of that conference that I heard stated the position as I have given it to this House; and it was, I think, quite beyond question in the mind of anyone present that the position was exactly as I have indicated. Indeed, I might say to my right hon. friend, so important did I consider the matter, that at the conference I asked the particular question to which he himself has referred, and received the reply which I have given to the House.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Is this treaty reciprocal? I mean, is there an extension of the old three-mile limit on behalf of the British Empire, or any of its component parts, commensurate with the right which is given to the United States? Or does the treaty provide only for the protection of the United States against the infraction of its prohibitory law, while leaving certain provinces of Canada, which have equally rigorous laws, subject to the old three-mile limit?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it was considered by the British government that the treaty had distinct reciprocal advantages. I know, as I intimated in the course of my remarks, that the British shipping interests considered it of the greatest importance that they should have the right to go into American ports with liquor aboard their vessels under seal, whether taken to and fro across the Atlantic or in transit to some other port. From the point of view of commercial interests I believe there was felt to be a distinct advantage to the shipping interests, whether they were in part Canadian or largely, as I believe, confined to the United Kingdom.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not think I have made myself quite clear to my right hon. friend. I appreciate what the Prime Minister says about the shipping interests, but let me put a concrete case to him. Take the shores of New Brunswick, for instance. There we have a prohibitory law as rigorously drafted and as unrigorously observed as any law on the continent. Now, assume what is highly improbable, an attempt to invade the province of New Brunswick with liquor. Have we a twelve-mile protection within which the government of Canada can seize an American vessel which is seeking to infringe our prohibitory law?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That particular phase of the matter was not considered in the discussion, but I have not the least doubt whatever that if my hon. friend feels the need of such legislation there will be no difficulty in securing it.

Mr. BAXTER: If—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

M. BAXTER: If I may be permitted to proceed a little further?

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. BAXTER: If there is no objection. I understand the British shipping interests have gained a substantial advantage as under this convention they are able to take liquor within the confines of the United States, something which they could not have done before. I would ask my right hon. friend whether there has been any attempt on the part of the Dominion government to demand from the United States the letting down of the same barriers against Canadian interests as a consideration for this concession, which must be of very great value to them morally and on other grounds? In other words, what do we get out of it, from the Canadian standpoint?

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, no objection has been raised to this cross-examination and as the question is a very important one, affecting vitally the interests of both countries, by unanimous consent I have allowed these questions and answers, but such procedure is not in accordance with the rules of the House under which each member may speak only once. However, I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, although undoubtedly under this treaty the right of Great Britain to send British vessels into American ports with liquor has been finally admitted by the United States, it should never have been necessary to have such admission, as Great Britain undoubtedly always had that right. In addition to the apparent omission which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) has called to the attention of the government, I would mention another Canadian problem which I think might very well have been discussed and settled in connection with this treaty. It concerns the province of British Columbia and the Yukon territory. Because of the geographical situation it is impossible to send anything into the northern part of that province and the Yukon territory except through Alaska. Now, the United States in the interpretation of its prohibition law holds that it is illegal to send liquor across any portion of the United States. In British Columbia and in the Yukon territory liquor is handled solely by the government. Up till 1922 no objection was raised by the United States authorities to the importation of liquor across Alaska for the use of northern British Columbia and the Yukon, but early in that year they announced that no further importation would be permitted. I understand negotiations have taken place between the government of Canada, on behalf of the government of the Yukon territory, and the government of the United States, but that as yet our neighbours are unwilling to concede us—shall I say this privilege? I prefer to call it our right—they are indisposed to revert to the former practice, although the liquor is sent up the coast in Canadian vessels in bond, unloaded into railway cars at the dock and within a period of two hours transported across United States territory in bond into Canadian territory. Consequently we are prevented from receiving any further importations there. The attitude of the United States, to my mind, is nothing more nor less than that of the dog in the manger; they will not themselves have liquor in Alaska, and they will not let us have it in the Yukon.

There has been no illicit traffic in liquor from Yukon to Alaska. As a matter of fact the government of the Yukon territory imports only such a moderate quantity as, after careful calculation, they are assured is sufficient to meet the reasonable needs of their population. I submit the same question as that put by the hon. member for St. John in the language of the United States: What do we get out of this? That is the question the United States asks on every occasion, international or otherwise. I submit there is not enough in this treaty for us, and if by holding up its ratification the government can bring about a restitution of the right of importation by the government of British Columbia across Alaska into the Yukon territory, most certainly this course should be taken. It is a very important matter for the people of that part of Canada. The governments of British Columbia and the Yukon derive quite a large revenue from their control of liquor. There is no intemperance because the government importations are, as I have already stated, strictly limited to local needs, so that naturally there is an absolutely temperate use of liquor. In the old days saloons were just as numerous there as in other parts of the Dominion, but under the present system the use of liquor is not abused.

The action of the United States in this matter is decidedly unfriendly and absolutely unnecessary, and could be reversed quite easily if they wish to convenience us. Although, I understand, correspondence is now proceeding between the government of Canada and the government of the United States in relation to renewal of our right to import liquor across Alaska for government purposes yet the earlier correspondence extending over the past two years has been entirely without avail, and I submit that once this treaty is ratified and the United States get what they want, Canada will never secure what she is entitled to. I would therefore urge that the government should take into consideration this very serious problem of the Yukon territory and northern British Columbia and withhold consent to the treaty until the United States changes its attitude in the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) closes the debate, if any other hon. member desires to speak he should do so, now.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, those who are interested in the province of Quebec were made aware some months ago that there is quite an industry there in the smuggling of liquor into the United States. It may occur also from the United States into that part of Canada, but not to the same extent. I notice the treaty refers to water-borne traffic more especially. I should like to know if any negotiations have taken place with the United States with a view to putting a stop to this illicit traffic from Quebec, and, if so, with what result

Mr. MACKENZIE KING Beginning last fall, negotiations took place, first by correspondence and subsequently by personal conference, between representatives of our government and of the government of the United States with respect to enforcement of laws to prevent the smuggling of liquor from Canada into the United States, These negotiations have been continued, and I hope very shortly to be able to report to parliament the result. This, I think, answers what is in the mind of my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). The question to which the hon. member for the Yukon has referred has been carefully considered. The view of our Canadian government was that it was not advisable to confuse the two discussions, the one relating to the right of search on the high seas, and the other a matter of negotiations between Canada and the United States respecting amongst other matters the importation of liquor into the Yukon. The subject of which I am speaking this afternoon has relation only to questions affecting the high seas.

I may say to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) that the remarks he has made on this occasion bear out the very strong representations made by the government to the United States authorities in this matter. I would not like to suggest and the House has apparently not thought so—that this treaty should be held up, for the reason that I have in my hand a message from the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald asking that if possible the matter be proceeded with with as little delay as possible, as the British government are anxious to have this treaty ratified just as soon as it can be arranged.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Once this treaty is out of the way, has Canada any leverage on the United States by which it can obtain from them the rights she now seeks?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The United States have made a large number of requests of our government in the matter of assisting them in the enforcement of their laws, and we have the leverage that is afforded there in helping to solve the problem.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BRANCH LINES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to ask the government two questions; first, is it the intention of the government this year to introduce the Canadian National Railways branch lines bill in the Senate before it comes to this House? If not, how soon may this House expect the branch lines bill to be brought down?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: (Minister of Railways and Canals): The reply to the first question is, no; the reply to the second, next week.

QUESTIONS AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

OBJECTION BY MR. HANSON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the Orders of the Day are called I have a question to ask of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), and a request to make. Yesterday at question time the Minister of Public Works asked that question No. 28, standing in my name, should stand as an order for return. The motion carried while I was temporarily out of the chamber, and I wish now to ask him why a short, concise answer should not be given to this question forthwith. If it is desired to supplement the information, that could be done at a later date. I want to protest against the motion which was passed—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think I have already explained to the House that the Speaker, by Rule 37, subsection 3, and the minister, by section 4 of the same rule, may ask that a question be answered in the form of a return. Here is the rule:

> If a question is of such a nature that in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the Table of the House, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the House, be deemed an order of the House to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ERROR IN ORDERS—PROCEDURE AS TO DISCUSSION OF MOTION CONCERNING TREATY WITH UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the order paper to-day; it is most misleading. On page 3—

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps out of courtesy to the right hon. gentleman and the House I may say that a mistake has been made by the printer in inserting the first item under "Government Notices of Motions;" it should have gone to another page under a different heading. The French edition is correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has misled hon. members on this side; it was the impression that with that kind of heading under Government Notices of Motions, the Prime Minister's motion regarding the treaty on alcoholic beverages would go into committee upon carrying. While I remember quite well that in the case of previous motions there was no committee, it would seem to me most appropriate that there should be. When a motion comes before the House of the significance of this motion, with no facility for general discussion, no privilege of question or of ascertaining the full effect of the proposal—for example, for the pressing of such questions as the hon. member for St. John (Mr Baxter) was prevented from putting—it does 4 p.m. not do justice to the hon. members of the House or to the subject itself. I do not know that there is any method now of getting the resolution into committee. I would suggest that under the circumstances the government agree either that we go into committee upon the resolution or that the debate be adjourned until Monday, when we can take it up and conclude it. I am sure there are questions which hon. members desire to put and which in justice to the subject should be put and answered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that the procedure has been entirely regular, and that it is also in accordance with precedents followed by governments with which my right hon. friend has been connected. I have no desire to shut off any discussion. No doubt the questions which have been asked to-day may be asked on some other occasion in reference to some other matter. In fact, I think I have fully answered all questions that have been put. If there are other questions that hon. members desire to ask on the Orders of the Day, I shall be prepared to answer them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not disputing the regularity of the proceedings at all, but I was disputing the regularity of the order paper, which misled us. From the present form of the order paper one might readily conclude that we would go into committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, here is the way it reads—I know it is a mix-up, but it could quite readily lead to a wrong conclusion:

February 28—The Minister of Marine and Fisheries —In Committee of the Whole—the following proposed resolution:—

March 6—The Prime Minister—That it be resolved..

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that I am not the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that, but the Prime Minister sees very readily that the resolution immediately following was his own. It is a mix-up; it is a misprint; it is entirely wrong, and I am not attributing the fault to the government; but it is quite clear that the House could very readily be misled.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The French version is all right; why do you not go by it? You speak French.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could read it, I think, but I cannot read both at once. My suggestion is that the debate be considered postponed until Monday. I do not see why that cannot be done, but if not, then let it be resumed this evening so that we may proceed with the discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to do other than meet the wishes of hon. members. My right hon. friend usually reads with a great deal of care whatever is put before him. If the House is agreeable to it, I have no objection to resuming the debate now, and concluding it, but I do object to going on either to-night or on Monday. If it can be made regular to reopen the discussion at the moment, I am quite willing that that be done; otherwise I think the record should stand as it is.

Mr. SPEAKER: As stated a moment ago by the right hon. leader of the opposition, the resolution is regularly where it should be though there is a misprint immediately before it. I felt myself during the debate a moment ago that the question was of such importance that I should relax the rule and let hon. members speak once, twice and even thrice as if it were in committee of the whole. The resolution was carried by the House and so declared, but of course the House can always reverse its decision and order the Speaker not to consider the resolution as carried. I might perhaps remind hon. gentlemen that this resolution will come back to the House from the Senate, so there will be another opportunity to discuss it. It must be concurred in by the Senate. That is why the resolution is couched in the form in which it is: "That it be resolved by the .....House of Commons."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite agreeable to that if on its return from the Senate the matter can again be debated by this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is amended, in concurrence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the Prime Minister will agree that we may debate this matter again when it comes from the Senate I am satisfied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it can be so arranged that we may continue the discussion now. So far as the government is concerned I am quite prepared to do that.

Mr. BELAND: The next speaker.

Mr. BAXTER: There seems to have been some misunderstanding—

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. It would appear to me that this resolution has been carried and cannot be returned to without the unanimous consent of the House. It seems to me that a good deal of time is being, I would not like to say wasted, but inadequately distributed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the said resolution be reinstated and be considered as not carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the resolution carried.

BANFF PARK WATER-POWER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior if an application has been received from the provincial government of Alberta seeking water-power privileges in the Spray lakes area of the Banff National park, and if so what is the attitude of the government toward that application?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The Alberta government have made application, but they asked that they be given an opportunity to make examination before finally deciding whether they wished to proceed on that application, and that has been granted.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS —ST. JOHN, N.B.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City): I do not wish to complain too bitterly with regard to an answer given to a question of mine on Wednesday last; the answers generally, I think, are as fair as may be expected. The incompleteness of the answer to a number of questions is rather due to what I might call the official view which, perhaps, is not sufficiently impressed with the importance, as it may seem to other people, of the subjects dealt with in the question which I put some days ago. I asked this question—No. 31:

Is the Department of Railways and Canals aware that the Canadian National Railways recently issued a map, showing the rails of that road from Halifax, Sydney and Yarmouth to Prince Rupert and Vancouver, and also to Portland, Maine, and to New London, Connecticut?

Is it true that the said map also shows Edmundston and Campbellton as connected with the Canadian National Railways?

Why is not St. John shown on map as connected with the rails of the Canadian National Railways?

How many copies of said map have been issued, at what cost and how have they been and how are they being distributed?

Why does said map not show the Canadian National Railways rails as extending from Moncton to St. John?

Why is not St. John even shown on the map?

To whose neglect or ignorance is this omission attributable?

As an answer I did not, like my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), get a return thrown upon me; I only got this rather skeletonized answer:

Map referred to was small skeleton map—

Undoubtedly it was a skeleton, and some of the bones must have been left out.

—approximately 3 x 5 inches, prepared by one of the constituent companies prior to amalgamation of Canadian National System—

I would have been obliged if I had been told which one of the constituent companies had done this preparation and when.

—and used on inside cover of small publication entitled "Montreal—Canada," issued somewhat over a year ago by passenger traffic department.

I presume, of the Canadian National Railway system and not of a constituent company, although I do not know.

On this skeleton map St. John was unfortunately omitted. The oversight was unintentional but none the less regrettable. The booklet in question is now out of circulation. The management has been in correspondence with the St. John board of trade regarding the matter and steps will be taken to see that such oversight does not occur again.

Now, it may not be of great importance to the country but I want to know how many copies have been issued, I want to know what this blunder cost, and to whose neglect or ignorance the omission was most attributable. and I really submit that fairly I ought to be given that information. I am not making this as a direct or indirect attack on the minister in charge of this department, I do not suppose he ever saw this answer. But it does seem to me that this represents a sort of official view which says "Oh well, there was a little blunder made there, but we are not going to tell you anything more about it than we have to." I think that in justice to the people affected, a blunder of this character is entitled to be answered slightly more fully than has been done. I would therefore ask that the question be restored to the order paper so that it may be answered properly.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I submit that the question is answered pretty fully. If anything vital has been omitted we will be able to furnish it to my hon. friend without restoring the question to the order paper. If I had asked the question myself I should feel that I had been more than answered.

PULPWOOD COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I want to ask the government if they are aware that some members of the Canadian Royal Pulpwood Commission are reported to have gone to Washington, and if so, what they have gone there for?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not heard of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would my hon. friend make inquiry and find out, and advise us as to the purpose of the visit?

Mr. ROBB: I will but I do not admit they have gone to Washington.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they have—?

Mr. ROBB: I will find out.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Public Works—Chargeable to Capital

Public Buildings—
Ottawa Parliament Building..	$ 600,000
Ottawa, addition to Dominion Archives Building..	275,000
London, England, Canadian office..	1,300,000
	$ 2,175,000

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay) (Minister of Public Works): I might advise the committee that the information requested last night has not yet been received. I will be glad to furnish it as soon as I can obtain it. I gave a general statement of the proposal last night.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the hon. minister asking to have it stand?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think there will be further discussion on the item.

Mr. STEVENS: Certain information is asked for, and I understand the minister to say it is not yet ready.

Mr. KING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I presume the item will stand until that information is brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the hon. member have any objection to our going on with other items of Public Works this afternoon, on the understanding, of course, that our taking up estimates to-day will not preclude him from taking advantage of the rule which prevents our going into supply, except under certain conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to see the time of the House wasted, and on condition that the government calls Public Works estimates on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, I am ready to agree. I hope the government will forgive me if I recall that a similar request courteously made was indignantly refused two years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not recall the occasion, but since my hon. friend has been so courteous this afternoon, I will concur in his request.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was done in my absence.

Item stands.

Ottawa Parliament Building.. .. ..$600,000

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The vote asked for is $600,000—a revote of $320,000. This vote is for the completion of the tower, the memorial chamber, and some electric light equipment and fixtures. This should complete the tower as far as the external appearance is concerned. It will also install the electrical equipment and elevators, make provision for the clock, and also make electrical provision for the chimes which it is proposed to put in later.

Mr. McMASTER: I would make the suggestion to the government that they defer the building of the tower until we make our financial books balance. The tower does very well as it is for the time being, and I think the fact that it was left in an incomplete condition, abiding the balancing of the budget, would be a constant object lesson as to the desirability of that performance, and might be an object lesson to the whole country, in helping everyone to devote their energies to that end.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The government considered the advisability of not continuing it just now, but we found we had a contract with the contractors who have large equipment on the ground, which has been retained here from 1916 to the present time, and we feel it is better to proceed and complete the external portion of the tower this year, rather than have that equipment go away, to be brought back at a later day.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the government looked into the question whether saving would be effected by doing the work now rather than three or four years from now, when the country's financial position might be better?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think it would cost more in the end.

Mr. McMASTER: It is pretty hard to figure, we cannot tell.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister inform the House whether the government will pay for the removal of the contractor's buildings or not? If it is the contractor's loss and not the loss of the government, we had better leave that matter for the contractor.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I think not. These buildings were erected when the work was first started for the erection of the parliament buildings; the stonecutting, plant and machinery were brought here under an arrangement with the contractor. That machinery is here now, and if it is removed a new contract would have to be entered into and new machinery placed on the ground. We have considered it very carefully, and I think it is wisdom to complete the masonry and get it finished now. The architect also has a commission to go on.

Mr. WALLACE: Does this vote cover the external construction?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I will give you the estimate for the external construction. It is as follows:

Masonry as per bill of quantities, Memorial Chamber	$ 81,820
Main Tower	293,808
Elevators: push button elevator and tower elevator not including moneys already paid on tower elevator	15,000
Electric wiring: interior wiring for lighting, power; clocks, illuminating four clock dials, beacon light, wiring for chimes, flood lighting projectors only, wiring for flood lighting; four lamp standards for above lighting fixtures in tower reflectors to illuminate window openings	28,950
Roofing: Flexicrete rolls—24 oz. copper roof, moulded cresting dormer windows—slate louvres, etc	16,500
Ornamental iron: elevator enclosures spiral and straight stairs, ladders in tower—flag pole	7,640

In addition to that it is proposed to spend some money within the building. The following are some of the items:

Carpentry and doors to Commons and Senate chambers	$ 9,000
Stone carving and modelling for interior	10,000
Electrical work, Library	8,000
Painting and decorating	4,000
Special lighting fixtures	50,000

We have been rather moving very slowly in the matter of these fixtures. Most of the fixtures in the hallways, as hon. members will notice, are temporary in nature and we have not gone as yet to any large expenditures. I notice in the estimate for the expenditure of $600,000 there is an amount of $50,000 for special lighting fixtures, and one of $10,000 for wrought iron work. Those are the principal items.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much higher is the tower to go? What will be the total height of it when completed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not that in mind. I will give it to my hon. friend a little later on the estimates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree that the tower should be completed. I do not like the outside appearance of the building with an uncompleted tower. There is no doubt some force in the reasons advanced by the minister for going ahead with the tower at the present time; but at the same time the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has urged a question which we should likewise consider, whether or not at this time we feel that we have money enough to expend $600,000 this year in a work of this kind. We would all like to see the building and the tower also completed. I would put that almost foremost amongst public works in the country; but if the condition is such that we are called upon to hesitate in regard to completing this tower, we should well consider another part of this item, No. 139, which is now before the committee, namely the expenditure of one and a quarter million dollars or more for a building in London. I have a very strong opinion that the acquisition of the building in London described by the minister last night might well wait a year, or two years, or even five years. If there is to be any postponement for purposes of economy, that is the item that should be postponed rather than the tower, although at the same time good reasons might be shown why the tower also could wait for one, two or perhaps three years. I should, however, like to see the tower completed within some reasonable time.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to bring this to the minister's attention in supporting, in a measure, what my hon. friend has just said. Let us grant for the moment the desirability of completing the tower as regards external appearances. I hurriedly took down a few items, not all by any means, which the minister mentioned of what might be called more or less luxuries in connection with the tower. Someone suggests the term "frills." I do not want to cast any aspersions upon this splendid building, but certain things are not altogether necessary, for instance, reflector lights for windows, $27,000. I appreciate that it is very nice to have these windows beautifully illuminated, but at present $27,000 seems to me a large sum to expend on that particular class of work. There is an item of $16,000 for copper roofing. That is, I take it, merely for the tower. Perhaps that might be necessary if the tower were gone on with, although a less expensive roofing might do for the time being. I do not, however, press that point. Then there is an item for elevators in the tower. I know it is going to be very nice in years to come to provide an elevator in the tower for tourists and sightseers to go up this splendid tower and to have the view. I believe about $30,000 is put in for that purpose. That is an item that could very well stand. We have an item for electric light fixtures through the building. I think hon. members will agree that we are pretty well satisfied for the time being with the light fixtures through this building.

Mr. CARROLL: What does my hon. friend mean by "for the time being"?

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps for the next five years. At least let the existing fixtures wear out their life of usefulness. It will be necessary, in any case, before very long to replace a certain portion of them. If they are more or less temporary, they certainly are not very objectionable to the eye; they are not offensive to anyone. Let them remain as they are for a while so that we shall get the full value of their temporary nature, and then put in your permanent fixtures. For that I think $50,000 is put in, a very large sum. There is an item for certain fancy grill work, $10,000. That might very properly be left for a few years. We have been putting up this building for about eight years; the government has brought the building to a fairly good stage of completion and I think there is quite a bit of national pride in the building, which pride I believe, is justified. I have mentioned items —and I have missed some—totalling about $140,000 that might very well stand over for one, two, three, four or five years. Perhaps no particular harm would be done if these items stood over for four or five years. A moment ago the minister mentioned some equipment and I presume he referred to the equipment in a building next to the Connaught building. I am not aware of the exact conditions of the contract; but if I recall it correctly, it is a cost plus contract. If we do not go on with the work, we do not pay for it. If the work stands, there is no outlay, no demurrage, no penalty on the government for delay. I do not think the contractors would lose or suffer anything or be unjustly dealt with if nothing were proceeded with. I will not, however, press that point. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has brought it forward, I think, properly, and it is desirable that it should be considered. Assuming, however, that we go on with the tower, would it not be quite sufficient to finish the substantial portion of it, that is the stone work and the brick lining—the masonry—without finishing the fancy work in the interior—elevators, electric light fixtures, grill work and so forth? I would suggest that the minister review the estimate and delete from it those extras, at least, and ask the House for simply a sum necessary to complete the tower as regards external appearance. There are some other suggestions I wish to make regarding the other items before the whole resolution passes, but I should like to have the minister's opinion on this point first.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The advisability of going on with the tower was given careful consideration, and after the whole situation was reviewed, it was concluded that it would be better for us to continue the work and complete the tower. As regards the electric wiring, anyone accustomed to building knows that that class of work should go on during the time of construction. It can be properly done then. As regards the elevators, the government has already made a large expenditure on elevators, and this is an additional sum. As to lighting the tower, I do not think anyone would say that we should refrain from expending a certain sum of money which must be expended if we do not want the tower to remain dark. If we put up the tower, it should surely have a light, and the clocks, when they are put in, should be properly lighted. These things are all necessary; they can be better done now than at a later period, and I think we should go on with them. I am not very particular about the carving and electric fixtures in the building; but we have a very fine building with fine corridors, and many people from all parts of the world visit this parliament the year round. It is quite proper that in such a place of interest, a building the beauty of which people visit the Capital to admire, we should have things as nearly as possible in perfect harmony. We have succeeded in cutting this estimate down quite appreciably and I can assure the House that it is not the intention of the government to enter upon extravagant expenditures; but as regards these fixtures I think it is only right that from time to time we should get them installed until gradually we have the whole building completed.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the estimate provide this year for all electrical fixtures?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. McMASTER: I dislike wearying the House with my economic notions, but there are a few words which I desire to say in addition to the plea that I have made that this unnecessary work be not proceeded with. First of all, it is absolutely unnecessary. There is no more reason for proceeding with the work this year than there was last year, and we were able to discharge our legislative duties perfectly and in comfort then without this tower. I want to submit these reasons in the hope that the government will be brought to see the matter in the same light as I do. We have a demand from the taxpayers of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that economy shall be the first order of the day. The government—and I give them credit for it—have courageously started cutting down; they have cut down the Civil Service in Ottawa. Under these circumstances I would ask them to consider the feelings of some poor man who has lost his position in the Civil Service, who is unable to find other employment and is walking the streets of Ottawa, and who would see this tower being erected knowing that it is a work that is absolutely unnecessary, however beautiful it may be. So far as the embellishment of the building is concerned, I think the whole structure is beautiful as it stands, and if it is to be embellished it must receive the very best works of art. These works of art will be acquired as the years go by, and we ought to see to it that they are the very best that can be obtained. If we get such works, we shall of course have to pay for them accordingly. While the minister was speaking, and particularly when he stated that one expenditure must inevitably lead to another, I could not help thinking of the young couple who were almost ruined because, at the time of their marriage, some rich relation gave them a beautiful mantel clock. A rug had to be bought to be in keeping with the clock, something else had to be obtained to be in keeping with the rug, and so on, until finally they had the whole house furnished on a scale very much higher than they could afford. I really believe that the government would be meeting the views not only of the vast majority of the members of this House but of the vast majority of the taxpayers if they would abandon the idea of putting up the tower to the height originally intended. After all, it is not as if the building were an ugly one as it stands. I would remind the minister of that beautiful building in Paris, Notre Dame cathedral, on which there are two short towers; it is a question among architects whether it was intended to have them built higher or not. The tower on this building undoubtedly is not as beautiful now as it will be when completed, but it is not by any means unsightly; and I cannot imagine many works which would so cast discredit upon the bona fides of the government and their attempt to economise as the continuance of this unnecessary work.

Mr. CARROLL: I remember that some years ago criticism was levelled at the then Conservative government for the extravagance with which it was charged in connection with the problem of putting up this new parliament building. I am glad to be able to say that I was one of those who did not criticise the government of that day for the building they proposed erecting on Parliament Hill, and to-day I shall be amongst those who will have no criticism whatever to offer if the present government endeavour in every legitimate way to make this building a citadel worthy of the Canadian people. I am surprised that a gentleman of the robust Canadianism of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) should criticise the government at this stage for attempting to place on Parliament Hill such a building as we ought to have here. My hon. friend declares that it would be extravagant to continue this work, and he says that the government should stand for stringent economy. He tells us that in five years' time we might proceed with the work.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not mention any specific date.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member did not, that is right; but some other hon gentleman on the other side made the suggestion. Well, I think that in five years' time it will be just as extravagant as it is now to complete the building, and perhaps more so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There might be a more economical government in power then.

Mr. CARROLL: I daresay when the Progressives get into power we shall have a more economical government than we have had in either of the old parties.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Just as there was in Ontario.

Mr. CARROLL: At least that is what they tell us; and of course you cannot challenge the words of gentlemen in parliament. Now, what does the Minister of Public Works propose? He proposes to do exactly what the people of the country proposed in the first instance when Canada was in the throes of war. We were not afraid then to expend millions in erecting a building on Parliament Hill in which the representatives of the Canadian people should deliberate; and if we had no qualms about spending so much money on this building at a time when the fate of the British Empire was in the balance I do not see any reason for compunction now, when, as I think, there is some measure of confidence on the part of the people as to the future of the country. It is only fitting, I think, that we should have something better than the barn which my hon. friend from Brome would like to see us assemble in.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARROLL: The mere fact that we may be comfortable should not be the only consideration. When parliament met in the Museum the hon. member was no doubt comfortable. But, as a sturdy Canadian, would he be satisfied to see a building on Parliament Hill of the kind which we had in London for so long? Would he have us meet in a building of the sort that has been a public disgrace to Canada for half a century? The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) spoke yesterday about Canadian nationhood. Well, if hon. gentlemen have aspirations in that direction let them see to it that we shall have a building in the capital city worthy of the Canadian nation. I know that we are passing through strenuous times, and there are various ways of retrenching; but from my point of view it would be a mistaken economy to retrench in the way suggested in this instance. Millions of United States citizens visit Washington to see the Capitol and the many other architectural features which go to make it the most beautiful city in the Union. And I, for one, Mr. Chairman, stand for making Ottawa the most beautiful city in the Dominion.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) in regard to economy. With respect to what the last speaker (Mr. Carroll) has said, I doubt if a sense of the practical nature of things always lessens appreciation of the beautiful. I am sure there is many a farmer working between the handles of a plow who enjoys the beauties of the sunset just as thoroughly as some artists who pride themselves on their artistic perception. I admire this building, but I would inform hon. members that in Winnipeg, there is a legislative building of still greater architectural beauty. The members recline on cushioned chairs in the utmost comfort, while the time of the legislature is wasted by lengthy speeches. But there are not many people in the province of Manitoba who to-day feel very well satisfied with that building.

Mr. CALDWELL: It was not built by the Farmer government, either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Three-quarters.

Mr. FORKE: No, the Norris government was not responsible. My right hon. friend knows that very well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was responsible for about three-quarters of the building.

Mr. FORKE: They were very much in the same position as this government—they had to complete what had already been undertaken by a former government. I do not think we can find fault with the appearance of this building, but we shall be in a better position to deal with the vote after we have received some further information from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King). For instance, which would be the more economical course,—to leave the building as it is for a few years or to complete it at once? If I understand correctly, the architect is under a contract to finish the tower, and the contractor is under a somewhat similar obligation. The tower is a very important part of this structure, and it is something that the architect should be held responsible for the completion of. For example, the addition of the final third to its height might develop some latent weakness in the foundations, and therefore it is important that the man who designed the tower should be the man to finish it. Will he be available five years hence? The contractor has a large plant in the city, and I understand the government are paying him a certain sum to hold it here for future use.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. FORKE: If the machinery is removed and the architect not available five years from now, can the work be done as economically as if it were undertaken to-day? I should like some more information from the minister in this connection before I commit myself, because I sympathize with what was said by my hon. friend from Brome. At the same time I want to be practical, I want to know whether it would be a waste of money to defer completion for four or five years. I agree with him that there is nothing unsightly about this building. While the addition of the upper part of the tower might result in greater symmetry the structure is one of which we are all proud. I would rather that we did not spend any more money at the present time, but if I am convinced that it would not be economical to postpone completion for five years, I would say, "Go on and do at least what must be done now, but leave undone anything the postponement of which would not hurt in the long run." I do not know whether the minister can give us any more information that will help us in arriving at a decision on this point.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As I stated before, the government canvassed the situation very carefully, and, as is evident to all hon. members, we have been trying to economize wherever possible. Our technical advisers tell us that it will be more economical to finish the tower now and do the other work I have outlined. We have an arrangement with the architects to complete the designs for the tower. We have also an undertaking with the contractors in regard to their plant now on the ground; it is in these terms:

[Mr. Forke.]

They to furnish the necessary plant for the purpose of such erection without further compensation, provided the plant is held for this work not longer than December 31, 1924. Should it be held later than that date, the contractors are to receive compensation for the use thereof.

We might cut the estimate now, but in the end I think it will cost us more to complete the work, and certainly the delay will not help the building. I am of opinion that we should proceed and complete the external appearance at least and the electrical wiring, which is part of the early construction and should be installed.

Mr. CLARK: What is the value of the plant?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contractors' estimate is $80,000.

Mr. CLARK: Is that for the whole building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understand that is the value of the portion of the plant required to complete this part of the building. A portion of the original plant has been removed.

Mr. CLARK: I suppose it is also a portion of the original plant used in the construction of the main building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. BOYS: Is there any liability to the contractors or architects under the present contract? I understand the contract requires that the machinery shall remain until the 31st December of this year. Supposing the work is not proceeded with are the contractors entitled to anything? Because, if so, that might be a reason for going on with the work now. I notice about the building many smooth face stones; are these to be cut?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Only a comparatively small portion.

Mr. BOYS: What is the liability?

Mr KING (Kootenay): They have arranged to keep the plant on the ground up to the 31st December next. More as to any liability I could not say.

Mr. CLARK: Last year the amount of the vote under this head was $700,000, and this year's appropriation is a revote of $320,000. Can the minister tell us what was done with the $380,000 that was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Expenditure for 1923-24: Pay list and services, $59,036.25; materials, $9,526.18; furniture and fittings, $13,200.28; paid to contractors in settlement of claim, $253,217.79; coal, $1,497.61; freight on stone from battlefields, $10,378.26; memorial to late Colonel Baker, $9,974.08; sundries, $11,549.31; total $368,379.76.

Mr. CLARK: One would be led by the estimates to believe that the money had been spent on the construction of this building. What was the nature of the claim settled by the government in the amount of $253,000 odd?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That was by way of commission paid to the contractors. In the original contract there was a limitation as to the fee to be paid to the contractors as a percentage and also the fee on the total amount. In the case of the architect, after the expenditure had exceeded $5,000,000 —the limit which had been placed—and was growing larger, the Parliamentary committee in charge of the construction of the building reviewed the situation and made further payments in addition to those due on the $5,000,000 expenditure. In 1921 the architect was demanding more money from the committee, and on the defeat of the late government he resigned, or walked off the job, saying that he could not continue unless he was paid more money. A committee of this House, not appointed by the House but consisting of representative members, conferred with the Minister of Public Works and with the technical officers; the whole situation was reviewed; and it was decided that owing to the alteration in the plans, the extra cost of construction, the changes that followed rapidly after 1916-17, these people were entitled to a reasonable fee. Accordingly a settlement was made and they were paid. The amount of $253,000 was a payment of extra commission earned by the Lyall contracting firm.

Mr. ARTHURS: What about the architect?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The architect was not paid out of this amount. He was paid out of the 1922-3 appropriation.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): What has been the total expenditure on this building up to date, and what was the original estimate?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The total cost to date has been about $11,000,000. The original estimate was $5,000,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: Were plans submitted on which that estimate was based, and if so who was responsible for the changing of the plans to provide for a building that would cost $11,000,000 instead of $5,000,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The architect submitted sketch plans to the minister and to the committee and gave his estimate, I believe, as to the cost. It was supposed that there would be a limitation of $5,000,000 upon which the fees of the architect should be applied, but the architect refused to sign the contract as regards the limitation of fees, and he was allowed to continue and did continue with the construction without a signed contract as to the limitation.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was there not a signed contract as to the amount of his fees?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, the amount of his fees was agreed upon but not signed for in the contract. When we dealt with this matter last year a substantial reduction was made in respect of the amount upon which the architect was to be paid fees; I think $1,600,000 odd was deducted. The total commission paid to the architect, on the estimate we had last year when the settlement was made, was between four and five per cent, which, all will understand, is a very low commission for work of this character. The contractors' commissions were on a different basis. For the first $4,000,000 they were paid eight per cent and on the other $1,000,000 they were paid seven per cent. In our settlement with them we made a substantial reduction from the total cost and paid them seven per cent on the balance.

5 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister did not give the full terms of the contract. Did the commission not extend to a certain maximum, and not beyond?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have said that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not hear the minister say it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I said the architect refused to sign the contract as to that limitation, but was allowed to continue as architect and to construct these buildings.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the minister say whether the contractors are satisfied with this payment of $203,000, and whether that relieves the government of all responsibility up to the present date?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They have released all claims.

Mr. BOYS: I have a recollection that when this item was before the House last year I supported the completion of the tower. It seems to me that when it comes to the question of completing a building like this, in which we have eleven million dollars or more invested, it would be a most unfortunate thing that it should remain an eyesore for five or six more years when the completion of the building now would add very greatly to its appearance. While I say that, I do not want for a moment to be taken as supporting many of the items which appear in this item of $600,000; for some are of such a character they may well stand. At the same time in constructing a tower such as this it goes without saying that other works such as the installation of elevators, putting in conduits for wiring, and so on, to be done economically must be done at this time. Then there is the further point: If the country is to be liable to the contractor or the architect if the work is not proceeded with this year that is perhaps a further reason why the tower should be completed. I presume if the machinery is taken away now it will cost more to bring it back again and complete the structure at a later period. Therefore I want, so far as I have anything to say, to support the exterior completion of the tower, and the completion of all parts of the structure which are more or less essential such as the wiring and so on, having in mind the promotion of economy. I should like very much if the minister could give us an idea of what portion of the $600,000 would be required for the external completion of the tower, and all such portions which should be finished while the external part is under construction.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is it estimated that this $600,000 will actually complete the tower?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will not require $600,000 for the completion of the tower alone. The estimated cost is: Memorial chamber $81,820, and the tower itself $293,808. Then there is the roofing which I think is essential.

Mr. BOYS: The roofing of the tower?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. In this connection there is the copper roof, dormer windows, slate louvres, and so on. I think that will have to be done. Then there are the elevator, enclosures, spiral and straight stairs, and door leading into the tower. These are essential if the work is to be properly attended to. After the tower is completed elevators are necessary. You have nothing to gain by not putting them in when you are at it. The electric wiring, I think, is also essential. This will bring the total to $383,898 for the tower. Adding the other items to which I have referred will bring the amount up to $465,718. As to the height of the tower the present height is 152 feet, and there will be an addition of 128 feet making the total height 280 feet.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The necessity for going on with this work at the present time, having regard to the need for greater economy, has hardly been proven. Three attempts have been made to secure from the minister some definite statement as to the directions in which economy can be effected but without result. Neither he nor any other member of the House can definitely state that it would be more economical to build now than five years hence. We have in power a government that is pledged to economy. If it is going to reduce the cost of living in the country, possibly it may be more economical to complete this work five years from now than at present. I am delighted to support the position taken by the hon. member for Brome; I think he is on solid ground. With all due respect to my hon. friend (Mr. Boys) I do not think this building in its present state is an eyesore. I think it is a magnificent structure and possibly will be even more magnificent when completed. But at the present time, when the government is discharging many hundreds of civil servants, as one hon. gentleman has pointed out, it is going to be a greater eyesore to these people to see this building completed than to leave it uncompleted. I intend to vote against the item.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have listened carefully to the discussion and I do not find that a case has been made out to warrant the completion of the tower just now. I do not see that there is any urgency for the completion, or that anything will be lost by waiting. It does not seem to me to be an eyesore. While there will of course be an improvement when the building is completed, conditions are not such as to justify us in proceeding with the work at the present time. When one considers the great buildings of the world there is nothing commoner than to find that years and years are occupied in their completion. It is the commonest experience in connection with the great cathedrals of Europe that the towers are not finished until long periods have passed. The precedents of the past are all in favour of taking adequate time to complete a building of this character. I hope the minister will allow this matter to stand for further consideration.

Mr. McBRIDE: As I view this question I think it is about time Canada took a step forward, and there is nothing that will give the country greater confidence than action on the part of the government in a matter like this. It is certainly time the government completed this tower; the uncompleted state of the tower has been an eyesore ever since I came to parliament. I think the government is using good judgment in undertaking its completion; it is time the work was carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One aspect of the question has not been mentioned, and that is that the tower is intended to be a memorial to the men who lost their lives in the Great War. There is to be placed in the tower a memorial chamber in which will be recorded the name of every man and woman who served overseas. I believe the architect has received from the government of Belgium and also from the French government, the stone which is to go into that chamber; it comes from the fields of Flanders. Other stone has been received, I understand, from the British government. The material has been brought to Canada, and the governments of these countries have been thanked for their gifts. It is understood this stone is to form part of this memorial. The architect, Mr. Pearson, who has the matter in hand, feels it is imperative that if this work is to be completed it should be done soon. Mr. Pearson, himself as the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) has intimated, is not a young man; he has given his life to this work; he is anxious to see it completed. The government has considered the question of economy most carefully. I think no one who has looked at the estimates which have been presented to parliament and which show a difference of over $46,000,000 contrasted with the total estimates for last year, will fail to realize that if there had been any other direction in which economy could have been practised the government would have followed it.

We have been trying to save all along the line. We talked with the architect and with the technical officers, as the Minister of Public Works has intimated. It was pointed out to us that these contracts were in existence, that keeping the materials stored, keeping the plant stored, and possibly having to reacquaint all the parties who were interested in the work of construction, would involve longer time and greater expense in the end. Consequently we thought it would be mistaken economy not to complete the tower, to say nothing of the memorial feature which I have just mentioned and which the government regards as an important one.

There have been suggestions about placing in the tower a carillon of bells. Anything of that sort which it seemed possible to postpone we have postponed. Putting in an elevator has been mentioned this afternoon as something which was not necessary during the process of construction, and that it could be put in at any time. The reason this work appears to be necessary is that if it is not done while the work of construction is in process, some part of the work will have to be torn down when such things are put in later on. We have an obligation to the future as well as to the present, and I submit, as the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. McBride) has just stated, that it is somewhat of a reflection upon the faith we have in the future of this Dominion, that all over this world the parliament buildings of Canada should be advertised as an incomplete structure. I think that national pride may be appropriately spoken of in this matter, and that the people of Canada would like to see their parliament buildings—so far at least as their external appearance is concerned—in the final form in which it is hoped they will be for centuries to come.

Mr. BRETHEN: With all due deference to the experience of the hon. minister who has just spoken, I think the greatest memorial we can offer the people is to make Canada a better place to live in. I believe this is a time for essentials. I believe the viewpoint of the people back home, or out in the country, should be considered. I do not believe that viewpoint is favourable to expenditure that is unnecessary at the present time. I think the finest example we can show this country is to begin the economy right here where it touches ourselves, and I believe the people outside will accept this as true economy. There are some things that are very good for the country, such as the deep waterways, but which are not always expedient. There are some things that may be good if we had the money, but are not very feasible at the present time, and I believe this is one of them. People outside of this House are not only doing away with extravagance, but are even passing up the essentials of life because of the necessity due to present conditions; and I believe this House would give a good lead to the country if it would postpone this matter, and I therefore move that this item of $600,000,, as far as it relates to the building of the tower, be struck out.

Mr. WARNER: As there is a motion slightly different from the original motion before the committee, I wish to speak to it. It is a little difficult to undertake to discuss all these things in one item. I am not well enough acquainted with the facts to discuss the London building, or to say whether it should be there or should not be there; but I have some ideas with regard to the tower that are quite clear. I gather from what the minister (Mr. King, Kootenay) has said that there will be practically no deterioration if it is allowed to rest for a while before being completed. From the people who are corresponding with me I have had more urgent requests for economy than in regard to any other matter. I have not had one request from any community asking that money be expended in that community for any such purposes as the completion of this tower. There are to my knowledge a great many places where people are in sore need of the completion of railways, and that is a matter that would go a long way towards keeping people in our country, so that they might earn something to help build this tower. It is not my wish to make it hard for this government or any other government, but it is a matter of considering where it is best to put our money, because we have not enough to do all we want to do. And, that being the case, I will ask the government to seriously consider the matter before they go ahead with the completion of this tower. I have been asked to press for rural mail routes, and people are applying for mail service a long way from the railways and the centres. I have always been told that the government were not supplying mail routes, and could not do it because they did not have the funds. I hope I will be pardoned for bringing up such matters as this in comparison with the question of the completion of the tower, if it is a sin for me to do it. But the people in the West, in many new localities are pleading for economy, and the privilege of living and making a home in that country. We are spending money to bring people into the country, and we do not want these people to see people going away when they are coming in.

Mr. McGIVERIN: If this amendment carries it seems to me that it will be a case of false economy. We are all agreed that we should practise the greatest economy possible. We had an example of that fact the other day in the reduction made in the Civil Service bonus and in the reductions also made in the Civil Service. Both of these facts I deeply regret and will discuss them at their proper times. But notwithstanding that it seems to me that the postponement of the building of this tower is a serious mistake. Leaving this beautiful building in an unfinished state seems to show a lack of faith in the future of our country. It is all very well to go slowly but we have been going altogether too slowly in completing these buildings. For three years they have been in this uncompleted condition and it is time that the memorial chamber in the tower which will be considered as Canada's tribute to our war heroes should be completed.

To my mind the reasons given by the Minister of Public Works are sound, namely that there will be a considerable cost in depreciation to the tower and to the machinery but more particularly because the architect who planned the building should be the one to supervise the final work.

Mr. CLARK: The Prime Minister has advanced the only reason that I have heard given that would influence me to support this appropriation, namely, that it is in the nature of a memorial to those who gave their lives in the Great War. But, on reflection, I recall that the official memorial to those who fell is being erected in France and, I think, this year. Personally, I should like to have seen the main memorial erected in Canada. I have seen the plans for the memorial in France; they are magnificent; but if the main memorial had been erected in the vicinity of the parliament buildings, if we have room, and models of it were erected in positions in France and Belgium, that would have been much more appropriate from the point of view of the country. The idea of this tower being a memorial is splendid; I endorse it; but I draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that the Hall of Fame is likewise part of this memorial, and we have made a start. The sentiment exists; we look upon it as a memorial; I for one am quite content to wait, and I feel I voice the sentiments of the majority of the returned men in this country when I say that as regards the completion of this tower as a memorial, the returned men would be content to wait. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) remarked that it is time that this country showed some confidence and took hold and made a start. I likewise endorse that sentiment; I think it is time that we showed confidence in ourselves; but if this building is only a start, where are we going to end?—we have made a pretty fair start. The start that I suggest and that will create confidence in this country to a greater extent than any other start that we can make as members of this House, is to show the people of Canada that we are really sincere in our desire to retrench. The only way in which we can bring that home is to stop spending. A vital principle is involved in this vote in that it is the first vote coming before this House, and the time is now ripe to put ourselves on record if we are really determined to carry out this policy of retrenchment. Furthermore, following the minister's reasons for completing the tower, I am afraid I cannot agree with the soundness of those reasons. He says that it is more economical to go on with the work now. The only reason advanced for that is the fact that some plant and equipment are tied up to the value of $80,000. I think if we wait we shall probably save $80,000 in years to come in cost of construction. Let us remember that that plant and equipment are the remainder of the plant and equipment used in the construction of the entire building, not specially brought here for the purpose of erecting the tower, and any depreciation of that will be infinitesimal as compared with the capital cost that the country is facing in completing the tower. Therefore, I do not think there is any force in that reason. That is the only liability the country is under to the contractor.

Mr. MARTELL: Who let the contract for this building?

Mr. CLARK: I do not care who let the contract for the building. I am not concerned with that. Do not think for one moment that I do not want to see this building completed. I am heart and soul with the idea of completing this building. All that I am suggesting is that there should be a temporary delay in spending any money that we are not absolutely compelled to spend. The reason was advanced that we have the architect with us now. I hope we shall have him with us in the future; but if unfortunately we do not have him with us in the future, we have his plans. His plans do not go with him, and any other architect can follow those plans. The contractors of to-morrow will, we hope, be better than the contractors of to-day, and we shall get just as much efficiency out of the contractors to-morrow in completing this tower as we shall to-day. Consequently, I do not think it is of vital importance that the contractors who are building this on a cost plus basis should be the contractors who will complete the tower.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), and I am interested in knowing where he stands on this and every other item of expenditure that comes before this House. Is he going to carry out this contract with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and support every item that comes before the House, or is he going to carry out his pledge to the people of Canada to effect economy?

Mr. FORKE: I will make it plain how I am going to vote before the vote is taken.

Mr. CLARK: Two alternatives are open: First that any unnecessary expenditures should be eliminated this year; second to support the government because they have introduced this estimate. I hope and trust that the leader of the Progressive party is with the majority in this House, who whether they vote with the hon. member who moved this amendment or not, in their hearts I am sure are with him. We are therefore all very much interested in knowing where the leader of the Progressive party stands on the point.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I have much pleasure in protesting against the amendment, for the simple reason that it will be false economy to leave this tower as it is at the present time. The appropriation is for $600,000. Of that, $320,000 was voted last year and not spent, so that, in other words, we are asking for only $280,000. I am a firm believer that any money that can be spent in this country in an economical way should be spent. It will give an impetus to our country by letting people know that we are advancing. Last night an item was brought up in connection with the colonial building in England to cost $1,250,000, and $750,000, for additions or repairs. When that item comes up again, I will voice my protest against spending that money, because all that we can do by spending that $2,000,000 is to save rent. We could spend that $2,000,000 in Ottawa and save rent, and it would give employment to our own workmen in Canada. I shall have much pleasure when the time comes in voting against the amendment.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have great pleasure in associating myself with other hon. gentlemen in the House who have pleaded that the time has not come for false economy. This building in Ottawa does not belong to the city of Ottawa alone, and it is not purely and simply a parochial sentiment that causes me to rise at this moment, though I am very happy indeed, with my senior colleague, (Mr. McGiverin) to be fortunate enough to represent in this House the capital city of the Dominion. These parliament buildings symbolize the aspirations of the Canadian people, and all that is best in Canadian life, and I take it that hon. gentlemen who sit across the floor having been sent down here to represent the ideals of their constituents, must feel that they owe a duty to them and therefore to the Dominion at large to see that the construction of this monument wherein those ideals are to be given expression to be completed. For some years the tower has remained unfinished. It has been my privilege to enter daily for two years the Hall of Fame and I have met there every day tourists from all parts of the world, who in no unmistakable terms have expressed their admiration of this beautiful building, but who could not refrain from observing that it is a pity, and indeed a shame, that an appropriate tower has not yet been completed to crown the building. During the summer, streams of water flowed through the front of the hall, and masons have been engaged in cleaning and cutting the stone to remove the marks that have been left by the water that has drained through the tower. No doubt at this moment the country feels the need of retrenchment more than it ever did before. But it seems to me that the Canadian people would have no objection whatever to the completion of this monumental building wherein the deliberations of this young nation take place. I do not think that anyone, be he in humble circumstances or be he affluent, will seriously object that the work be carried out to completion. My colleague and I have to meet the cry for economy, and very stringent reductions have been made, for instance, in the bonus. I do not agree with those reductions. Dismissals are taking place to-day, and with those I disagree. The time will come when I shall have an opportunity of expressing in this House my views on these subjects. But at the present time, although we all feel the pinch of economy—our own constituents do, and I think the same is true all over the Dominion—I also do think it is advisable that the tower be completed so that we may have a fitting building for the parliament of Canada to meet in, and one worthy of the ideals of this Dominion.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have endeavoured two or three times, Mr. Chairman, to catch your eye, but being small I am not easily discerned. I asked the minister some questions which he did not answer, one of them being, whether the estimate of five million dollars for the parliament buildings was based on plans that were completed at the time the contract was entered into.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I said no; the plans were not completed; they were only sketch plans.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it possible that the government of a country could enter into an arrangement for the erection of a building of this kind without a definite plan before them? If so, I do not wonder that the work has cost more than double the original estimate.

It is of course futile to lock the door after the horse is gone, but I think the method adopted in the letting of the contract for this building was absolutely wrong. The contract was let on a cost plus basis both to the architect and to the contractor. Obviously, therefore, their whole object was to make every part of the construction as costly as possible in relation to the amount of labour expended; and they reaped a larger reward by building extravagantly than they would otherwise have done. If they built a wall, say, that was worth only $1,000 and they spent $2,000 upon it, they doubled their reward. That is a principle that is entirely indefensible. Expert engineers, I understand, were employed to decide how much of the old walls might safely be retained, and if my memory serves me correctly they reported that there were walls that were safe and sound to the value of some $2,000,000. It might have been more than that, but I think I am safe in stating that figure. As hon. gentlemen know, a committee was appointed by the House to superintend the construction of the work; but I am safe in saying that that committee never functioned as a building committee, and the first thing they knew was that this $2,000,000 worth of walls had been torn down by the contractor without reference to themselves. The contractor got the cost plus for tearing down the $2,000,000 worth of walls although those walls had been declared to be fit for incorporation in the new building. And they also got cost plus for erecting the $2,000,000 worth of new walls that replaced what they had torn down. That made $4,000,000 that was expended at the outset, and they were only where they started at the commencement. There was 8 per cent paid to the contractor on that $4,000,000, for doing what he should never have done, and 4 per cent paid on the same sum to the architect.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is wrong. He has given the $2,000,000 twice, but they were not paid $2,000,000 for pulling the wall down, but only on the cost of pulling it down.

Mr. CALDWELL: I accept the minister's correction; I was wrong in that regard. However, I should like to have the information as to what it did cost to pull the old walls down. Now, one of the reasons advanced for proceeding with the construction is consideration for the architect. If I remember rightly, about a year ago, or possibly before that, this same architect held up the completion of the building because the government would not accede to his terms for what he had already done. I do not think, therefore that we need worry much about the architect and his feelings in the matter. If I am wrong in regard to any of these points I desire to be corrected as I go along. Another matter to which I would refer is the saving that would be derived from postponing the work. I think the minister should seriously consider accepting the amendment of the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Brethen). Let me show what might be saved if the work were postponed. If we did not proceed with it we should save the $600,000 which would otherwise be spent; and there would be a saving of at least 5 per cent. in the way of interest on that money. Someone behind me suggests 6 per cent., but I am putting it conservatively because I do not want to convey any impression of exaggeration. At 5 per cent., that would mean a saving of $30,000 a year in interest; and if the completion of the tower were postponed for a period of five years we should have a total saving in that time of $150,000. As a matter of fact, it would be more than that, because in all probability we should have to raise the money to pay the interest the first years and the interest would therefore be compounded. Possibly in the five years the amount that might be saved would run to about $175,000. It has been stated that the plant to be retained here is worth $80,000. So if we had to replace it new at the end of five years we would still be $100,000 ahead. I do not think any member believes for a moment that the plant to erect a $400,000 structure would cost $80,000. I imagine all of the $80,000 worth of plant would not be needed in the completion of the tower, and I do not suppose such is contended for a moment. I think the minister stated that there were no plans prepared when construction was entered upon. I should like to know just what the undertaking was. Was an architect turned loose by the government of the day to proceed with the construction of a building, without receiving any instructions from parliament or the government as to its dimensions, architectural features and cost? Did somebody just make a random guess that such a building might be erected for $5,000,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I might again review the early history of the construction of this building. In 1916 the old building was burned down. The government of the day decided on reconstruction and arrangements were entered into with Mr. Pearson and Mr. Marchand, two eminent Canadian architects, to submit plans to a joint committee of both Houses. Sketched plans were submitted showing the character of the building, with an estimate based thereon as to the total cost. They suggested that $5,000,000 would be the cost.

Mr. HALBERT: Were those the same plans which were used later on for the construction of a $5,000,000 building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will come to that. The sketched plans originally submitted showed the type and character of the building at an estimated cost of $5,000,000. The plans and estimate were apparently accepted by the committee, and the work proceeded. From time to time changes were made in the plans, with the concurrence of the committee, indeed with the concurrence of parliament, because the vote for the building was discussed each and every year in this House, and as changes were made naturally they involved increased cost. In addition to that, it is not necessary for me to remind the committee, there was a gradual increase in building costs from 1916 onward, and this also accounted for a very considerable portion of the excess over and above the original estimate. I am rather surprised that those who are really anxious to practise economy now suggest that after we have expended some $11,000,000, we are to leave the building uncompleted for the sake of an additional $600,000.

Mr. McMASTER: No, we are only urging a postponement of the expenditure.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You are going to delay completion of the job for five or six years. There is no occasion for this. Besides, every delay so far has cost the people of Canada very considerable sums of money.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the minister tell us in dollars and cents what it would cost approximately to postpone this work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is impossible to furnish such an estimate; it would depend on conditions five years from now, and no one can tell what they will be then. I am informed by our technical advisers that it is better to proceed with the completion of the building now, and that each delay in the past has meant extravagance and increased expenditure. I am satisfied that if this building had been proceeded with right along without delay many thousands of dollars would have been saved to the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to express my gratitude and appreciation of the attitude of the minister in answering the aspersions of the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell). I have observed many a time that when a subject comes up as respects which there is an attitude of fairness on the part of the Liberal party to the right of the chair, there always arise among those ultra-Grits to my left hon. members who cannot possibly lose an opportunity—which they only imagine exists—of casting some slur, arising wholly out of the basest and most ignorant of partisan prejudice, against the late administration in the construction of this magnificent building. What the minister says as to the plan adopted is precisely correct. The Public Works department could not possibly disrobe itself of responsibility with respect to the construction, but it did disrobe itself of every possible attribute that could be considered partisan, and parliament on the recommendation of the government placed in the hands of a committee of this House and the Senate, composed of members from both parties, all questions connected with the selection of architects, the adoption of plans. and the method of construction, whether on a cost plus basis or by contract. Everything connected with the undertaking was disposed of and decided by that committee, without any qualification, without any exception. All this I think has been known to ordinarily informed members of this House for many years.

It is true a difficulty arose, having to do with the question of whether a portion of the old building could be used or not. I remember that for some time the committee felt it would be an economy, and wise, to utilize a considerable portion of the old structure. But subsequently they decided otherwise. The wisdom of their decision time has vindicated, and more than vindicated, and I am sure hon. gentlemen by the score can be found on either side of the House to affirm what I now say. It is true—I speak now from memory alone and subject to correction, that one member of the committee, who, I think, was not present at the time the decision was arrived at, afterwards took exception to the course pursued and resigned, but Liberal members of the committee, more than one, were present and affirmed the conduct of the committee and stood by the committee to the last. And now their judgment has proven to be correct. I do not think anyone to-day would seriously argue that that portion of the building could have been used, and I do not think anyone would like to have his argument remembered against him in the future who would suggest that $2,000,000 was wasted by not using the old walls, and $2,000,000 more thrown away because they were torn down. The whole history of the structure is a history honourable to Canada in every way. This is the most magnificent edifice in the Dominion, and in respect of the entire enterprise, from its inception to the present day, there has not been a breath of aspiration as to the honesty of the whole execution.

Mr. CALDWELL: Will the right hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope it is better than his speech.

Mr. CALDWELL: Will the right hon. gentleman deny that two competent engineers have stated that $2,000,000 worth of the old walls were structurally sound and could have been built upon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not deny it, but I know they have been found to be wrong.

Mr. CALDWELL: By whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: By the committee and by the majority of engineers.

Mr. CALDWELL: I should like you to prove that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You can get an engineer, as you can get a member of parliament apparently, if you are careful enough in your selection, to say almost anything.

Mr. CALDWELL: Were not those engineers selected by the government of which you were a member?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Quite so, but there is a difference of opinion there as elsewhere. But we now know, we are not now engaged in any speculation. We know which was right and which was wrong; experience has proven it.

Mr. HALBERT: Were those two engineers discharged, or were they retained until the completion of the building?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not on the committee; I had nothing directly to do with it at all. I assumed my responsibility as a member of this House—and what the minister says is correct, that the conduct of the committee and the decisions of the committee were ratified not by a partisan majority, but by the House as a whole. The credit for the venture, therefore, belongs to the House as a whole, and nothing but the most extreme party fanaticism could now endeavour to give it any other aspect or to cast a slur on either party. This being said, I should not sit down, I think, without stating my position on the vote. If I followed my personal inclinations I would support the minister, and very strongly so. I would like to be convinced that his reasons for going on are sufficient, but he has not convinced me that they are. I do not think there would be very much loss in a little longer delay. I suppose there would be some interest on the investment, and after it is carried beyond the 31st of December of this year there would be, I presume, some depreciation, but it could not be very large; and I fancy there are a great many things in Canada we would have to go on with if we are going to count that reason against delay sufficient to compel us to start now. We voted $700,000 last year and only paid some outstanding claims, which, I presume, should have been paid. The matter has stood until now, and we are really not in as good a position as we were in a year ago. I have a fear that even if the money is voted the government will not spend it; I fancy that is likely to be the result of it all. I suggest therefore to the minister that he accede, perhaps not to the amendment as it stands, but to an amendment reducing the amount of such sum as it is essential to spend this year,

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As I have already explained, arrangements have been made for completion this year. In fact, the drawings are already being made and within a few days after this item is passed the contractor will be cutting stone, if he is not already doing so. Now, let us just look over this whole situation again.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

Bill No. 10, to confirm an Agreement between The Ottawa Electric Railway Company and the City of Ottawa.—M. Chevrier.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Ottawa parliament building, $600,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Just before six o'clock I was going to make a further statement regarding this expenditure. I am rather surprised at the attitude of some hon. members as to the expenditure this year. The government did not originate this expenditure, it was necessitated by a fire which destroyed the parliament buildings. The government of that day saw fit to undertake this obligation and, I think, properly so; the work of reconstruction was concurred in and agreed to I believe by all. At the end of the year 1921 when there was a disagreement the architect retired. After his retirement the present government came into power, and had certain adjustments to make. Those adjustments have been carried out properly and fairly, I think, and to the satisfaction of all members of this House. In 1922 this parliament voted sufficient money to complete the tower and to finish these buildings. During 1923 it was the feeling of parliament that this work should be done. That being the case, and such having been the attitude of parliament during those two years when adjustments were being made between the government and the architect, and the contractors, the government naturally assumed that they could come before parliament this year and ask for a reduced vote, an amount not as large as the vote of last year. We asked $700,000 last year. We have cut down the expenditure, and we come to parliament and ask for $600,000 now, in order that we may complete the undertaking of the late government and the people of Canada. It has been suggested by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) that he will oppose this expenditure and he suggested that $80,000 worth of machinery was a mere bagatelle. Well, it means that if that machinery goes out of the buildings, and if five years from now the government of the day have to enter into a new contract, they will not get a contractor to put the machinery in those buildings and do the work for seven per cent. The architects are eminent in their profession, and I think it is desirable that they should continue the work; and as far as I am personally concerned, as Minister of Public Works, I have gone a long way in order that the construction of this building might be continued, and that those men might complete the construction. I think it is only reasonable and fair, and in the interests of this construction, that those who designed and carried on the work should have an opportunity of completing the building. We have an arrangement with the architects whereby they will design and construct or supervise the construction of this tower at five and a half per cent commission. When we came to deal with Mr. Pearson last year, after we closed out the old arrangement with him, did Mr. Pearson offer to do it for five and a half per cent? He said: "No, ten per cent, and fifteen per cent on some features."

An hon. MEMBER: There are other architects.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We insisted that the architect should carry it on at five and a half per cent. If this work is not continued at the present time, and if it becomes necessary for the government—I do not say this government, but any government—to enter into a contract at this time for this work, you would not get it done for five and a half per cent, because that is not in accordance with the architectural fees charged in this country. In addition to the plant that is already there and will be available for the completion of this project until December of this year, the government, in the original expenditure, constructed very large sheds or workshops in order that they might satisfy the requirements during a period of four years, because it was intended that this building should be completed in that time. It is now nearly eight years since this work was undertaken, and I am advised that an examination last year of the foundations of these workshops, which cost a considerable sum of money, shows that if we had started the machinery in those shops there would probably have been a catastrophe. They have been deteriorating during the last five years, and if you leave them there for five years more they will be an eyesore, and you will have to renew them, or spend a large sum of money to put them in shape for this work. Is it desirable for the people of Canada or the members of this House that we should have this hill littered with construction material for five years? Is it the desire of the members of this House that we should destroy the organization built up for the construction of the buildings and delay the work for five years? I think not. I think, in the interests of economy, in view of the fact that this parliament has on two occasions voted money for this work, that it should not be stalled at this time, and that we should proceed with the construction of the tower, the electrical equipment, the installation of elevators, and do the things necessary to complete the work. I do not believe it would be wise, in fact I think it is absolutely unwise, that we should delay at this time. It is very easy for one to say "The construction of this tower means nothing to me or to my constituents. It is better for me to ask for something for my constituents." But we are dealing with a matter that is national, and I am satisfied that my constituents in British Columbia have sufficient pride in the central parliament buildings of Canada to desire that that tower shall be constructed, and to take the advice of the men who were employed, in whom we have confidence, and complete the construction this year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the estimate for brick and stonework on the tower?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount is $383,898. That would be for the Memorial tower and the Main tower. I am satisfied that if hon. members will give this matter a little more consideration they will change their attitude on this question, and I am hoping that the hon. member who moved the amendment that we should not construct the tower but should reduce our estimate by that amount, will see fit to withdraw that amendment, and accept the appropriation. I am satisfied it will be absolutely false economy for us not to continue at this time. If it is left over it will cost a good deal more in the end and we will have the disadvantage of having an uncompleted building in the Dominion of Canada, and this building is one of the first buildings, surely, that should be completed. If our hon. friends would go down to Sussex street to-morrow morning and see that shop, then come up to Parliament Hill and look at the lumbered-up condition there, and then say that they desire to have that remain in its present condition for five years,—that we should stop construction, and at the end of five years build new workshops and bring in new machinery, get a new contract and a new architect—then, so far as I am concerned I do not agree with that, and I think it would be a great mistake.

Mr. STEVENS: Might I bring to the hon. minister's attention the suggestion I made before recess? I cannot see for the life of me how you are going to construct or install your elevators this year in any case. I do not think it is physically possible. Why vote some $30,000 for that? Then there is no possibility of installing that very fine and elaborate electrical plant, the reflector, for which $27,000 is to be voted. Why bother about that this year? As I said before, in so far as the lighting system in the building where it is not finished is concerned, I remember looking over some of it at dinner time and it struck me that it was at least not repulsive; and while we would like to see everything finished up in tiptop shape, and all the carving and so forth finished —and I notice the minister provided a very substantial sum for carving—yet these are things that could wait for a while. I would suggest the minister could very well do with $400,000 at the outside, and have ample to save his investment in equipment and machinery, which seems to be impressing him very much, finish the masonry work on the tower and leave the extras for another year, in view of the fact that very little of it, if any, can be finished during this year. One reason why this appeals to me as reasonable is this—and there are other items in the resolution in the same position—that the government has been making very considerable capital, shall I say, out of the reductions in the Civil Service. For instance, as near as I can see, there are about three or four hundred thousand dollars' worth of reductions in the Civil Service in Ottawa. Here we are providing for an expenditure of at least $200,000, in this one item, which apparently is unnecessary and almost impossible to use this year. At the same time we are reducing the staff in Ottawa and discharging employees. I am not complaining about that for a moment; but there is something in connection with this that offends one's sense of justice and decency, and I would suggest to the minister that he drop from the item these extra charges and costs and reduce it to the bare necessity for finishing the masonry work.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As regards the electrical wiring and the elevator, I think those who have knowledgs of building will agree with me that wiring should be done during the period of construction.

Mr. STEVENS: The conduits, but not the finished reflectors.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The elevator was bought for this tower prior to 1921-2 it is now in the basement or in storage, and it is not being improved but is deteriorating by being there. I think that installation should go on. I think the lighting or the arrangements for lighting should go on. I do not think there should be large expenditures in carving, and that is not intended at all. Last year parliament voted $700,000. We have not carved those stones; we did not expend that money. I think there is certain work that should be done at certain points in this building in order that we may get the benefit of the expenditure that has been made. Parliament during two years in succession passed this vote when we were not able to go on because we had certain matters to settle, and personally I was not prepared to go on until they were settled and this thing was cleared up. This thing has been cleared up; we are prepared to go on, and I think we should proceed. I am not desirous of having any great carving done; I am satisfied as regards the lighting, but I think we should proceed, and we shall have to proceed gradually in order to take care of this building and bring it into the position into which it was intended to be brought. I do not think the opposition to this appropriation can be serious because, after all it must be the desire of every Canadian that this building should be completed and not left as it is to-day. I would appeal to hon. members to reconsider the matter and to let us have the money necssary to complete the tower and to do what we find it is economical to do in the matter of wiring, elevators, lights and such things.

Mr. GOULD: When the minister speaks of the item of $700,000 which was voted last year, it may be that we are right in our conclusion that the government had not the same vision of the need for economy as they have this year and as is expressed by the smaller amount of money asked for. Yet, I must confess, when I read this item, I received the first shock to my sensibilities, in that it seemed to prove to me that the minister or perhaps even the deputy, had not yet fully felt the real need for economy which obtains and has obtained throughout this country for many years now. After leaving the chamber last year and spending about seven months amongst the people who are everlastingly approaching their representatives to demand economy, I find this thought arising in my mind quite naturally: If I could lay this item before the 30,000 odd people who live in my district and ask them what they would do with it. I am quite sure, contrary to the sentiment expressed by the minister to-day, they would say: "Leave it alone; you do not need it at the present time; look at the hundreds, yes, thousands of things left in abeyance in this country longer than the completion of this tower". That is the way in which they would look at the matter. I do not agree with the attitude taken by the minister that we are going to lose so much money because plant, construction machinery, is left here. It seems to me that Peter Lyall & Company are having quite a nice time in receiving from this government certain sums of money for the protection of their implements here and there. I notice in the next item, No. 140, another item where money is to be paid to Peter Lyall & Company for expenses incurred in protection of works during a shut down. Therefore, possibly we may not pay so much attention to this amount of money which is going to be lost in taking care of those implements.

I can quite well understand the attitude of hon. members who represent this city. Naturally enough, as representatives of Ottawa, they would like to see the tower completed; but, perhaps, their interest and influence might better be exerted, if the money has to be expended, in trying to have the federal area here commenced. In my opinion, in this city, that is a need far greater than the completion of the tower. If the money has to be expended, why not take the full $600,000 and commence a federal area, so that we can have consolidation and co-ordination of our offices throughout the city? I am sincerely of the opinion that we should practise economy, and this item, the first item we have discussed, brings us to the point that we feel like opposing it. I should like the minister to take the initiative in this and, at least, to reduce the item by a considerable amount.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps hon. gentlemen are magnifying some of the details. I think the minister would have no objection to letting the item stand until he could look further into the particular items that are mentioned. There is, however, one particular aspect that we must not forget. There was a war a few years ago largely because one party to a contract did not keep it. In the present case there were certain difficulties, as every member, but particularly the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) knows, that had to be settled with both the contractor and the architect. This House voted money two years ago for the purpose of finishing this tower, the minister in the meantime endeavouring to settle these difficulties, because the prospect of settlement was the only weapon the minister had before he would proceed; he would not proceed with the work until he had this settlement made. This House approved that two years in succession and voted the money to go on with this tower. Had this settlement been accomplished a year ago, the tower would have been at least partially completed now, because parliament told the minister to go on and complete it. The settlements were made —and this is the point I want to bring out— with the contractor and the architect on the distinct understanding that the completion of the tower was to proceed. After the settlement has been made on that understanding, is it just what one would like to approve, for parliament to come along and say: "We have the settlement out of you; now we are not going to carry out our part and complete that tower?" It is, of course, an embarrassing position for the minister, but not nearly so embarrassing for him as for parliament, not to keep its share of an implied contract with both the contractor and the architect. Those are the plain facts of business. There is not a man in this House who would do such a thing in his own business. If he had given a contractor a contract for the construction of a residence and had an architect, and had made an agreement with the contractor and the architect to settle differences on the understanding that they would go on and complete the residence, there is not in this House a man who would say then: "Now I have this settlement; I am not going to build the house now; take away your plant."

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the minister realise that this information was not given to the House before? I think it is unfortunate that the minister did not give us before the information that the settlement with the contractor and the architect was made on the basis that the work was to proceed.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I gave that this afternoon.

Mr. CALDWELL: I did not hear it.

Mr. BOYS: That is the very question I myself asked, and what I understood the minister to say was that it had application only to December 31, the understanding being that the machinery was to remain there until then. That is a very vital point. The contract, I presume, is before the minister and if any agreement has been entered into that requires the department to proceed with the work we should certainly be responsible for a heavy item of damages if that work is not gone on with. Aside, however, from that, I have expressed my views in regard to the item; I am in favour of the tower being completed. Before the committee rose at six o'clock I took down some figures but I do not know whether I got them correctly. I understood the minister to say that the masonry work on the tower amounts to $293,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is right.

Mr. BOYS: And the completion of the tower, with elevators, wiring, and so forth, make a total of $383,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The total is $383,898.

Mr. BOYS: There is no question, then, that $400,000 would cover everything in connection with the tower.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Without the memorial chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might mention, in connection with this matter, that only last night Mr. Pearson the architect saw me at my office with reference to the amount which the government is proposing to pay him for this work. He showed me letters that had passed between himself and the Public Works department, the last of which, I think, was an intimation that in view of the settlement that had been made with him he was to receive five per cent or thereabouts for the work in connection with the completion of the tower. He complained that this was an outrageous figure for the government to offer him, and he represented that so unfair was it that the Architects' Association would doubtless protest very strongly against any such fee being paid for that class of work However, the correspondence revealed the fact that it had been pointed out to him that he was being given 5 per cent for the completion of the tower in virtue of his having received a certain sum for all the work that had been done up to that point in the settlement, and that it was part of the settlement. He accepted it for that reason, but he intimated in a communication that he did so only because of his love of the work and of the interest that he had taken in it, and because of his desire to have an opportunity of himself seeing it completed. He intimated to me that the government was not treating him fairly or properly and that nothing would induce him to accept the arrangement except the circumstance that he realized that, unless he gave his time immediately to the work and saw to its completion, he might never have an opportunity of completing it. The one phase of the work to which he has given more attention than anything else is the memorial chamber, to which reference has been made to-night. Now, we can dispense with that undertaking; if hon. members insist that this be done I am quite prepared to recommend to my colleagues in the government that we dispense with that feature of the work. But it is the one feature that relates to the men who have been overseas; it is the one feature to which the architect has given more thought than to any other;—as I mentioned this afternoon, he secured from the governments of France, Belgium and Great Britain the stone which is to be used in that chamber, and that stone is now in the city lying packed up in a building waiting to be put into place. I say, we can dispense with this work;—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—but I venture to say—and I am prepared to test the feeling of the House upon the question—that the people of the country will not approve of the action of this government in trying to economise on that particular item merely because it is not absolutely necessary to the completion of the tower.

Mr. CLARK: I was one of those who opposed the vote this afternoon, and I said then that what presented the greatest difficulty to me in opposing it was what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had said. I think the Prime Minister is appealing to the House on entirely wrong grounds at this moment. Personally, I do not know where he gathered the impression that any member in this House was opposed to a memorial chamber. I think the suggestion is absolutely misleading to the country that any member in this House objects to having a memorial chamber in the tower.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the very matter provided for in this item.

Mr. CLARK: I stated this afternoon that I wanted to see the tower completed with a memorial chamber; and I am quite satisfied that there is not a member in this House who does not want to see the work done. But what we do suggest is that the tower can be completed and the memorial chamber built in it later on under the plans which now exist.

Mr. STEVENS: It is there now, unfinished.

Mr. CLARK: We all hope that this particular architect will be spared to carry out these plans, but if he is not, there will be other architects available, and we can follow the plans some time in the future when we can afford to have the work completed. Let me repeat that the people of Canada expect us to retrench and do away with capital expenditures where possible, for the present, until the country can afford it. We will readily vote the money that is necessary for the tower when the country is able.

Mr. STEVENS: I might point out to the Prime Minister that the memorial chamber is already constructed in the tower, with the exception, of course, that the interior is not finished. The very argument I made a moment ago will apply equally well to the memorial chamber: I do not think it would be advisable to finish that chamber until the upper structure of the tower is completed, and that is not likely to be done within the coming fiscal year. Now, there are included in this vote items for extra finishing which is unnecessary and which, as I have pointed out, cannot possibly be installed this year. That being the case, why include that work now? If it is necessary to do certain work in order to save $80,000 in equipment—and I think there is an argument there that might be considered—if it is absolutely essential, in order to save that money, to go on with the masonry work, to which alone this equipment applies, then perhaps it might be desirable to do so. I should like to get the information definitely from the minister, because I do not think that the committee fully understands the situation, and certainly I do not. Does the masonry work cost $383,000 or $293,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The masonry costs $293,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I understood the minister to say a while ago $383,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I gave the figures for electrical equipment, masonry and so forth, but the masonry is $293,808.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister must have misunderstood the question. The masonry work will cost $293,000 or possibly $300,000. Does that include the finishing of the memorial chamber?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not include the finishing of the memorial chamber?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. STEVENS: But it includes the completion of the masonry work of the tower. The suggestion I made a moment ago to reduce the vote by $200,000 is very well within the mark. By so doing we would demonstrate to the country that we are quite sincere in paring public expenditures to the utmost.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that the minister and the government do not at all realize the situation which tens of thousands of our people are in at the present time.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would give some of them work.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quite recognize that resuming construction on the tower will give a certain amount of work to a few people here. I also recognize the fact that under a decent system of finance and a proper system of taxation we would have enough money to go ahead with this and a great many other expenditures. But we are dealing with the present financial system, under which, it seems, the government finds it necessary to cut down the most essential expenditures. We have had a substantial cut of the grant for agricultural education and of expenditures respecting public health. We must not forget that a great many people throughout the Dominion are struggling to hang on a bit longer while thousands are migrating to the United States to earn a living. I think of many agricultural communities to which I go where there are no proper roads, where men and women are living far from the ordinary social opportunities which they and their families ought to have; I think of hundreds of closed schools on the prairies where another generation is growing up without a chance of even learning to read and write; I think of men and women in my own city of Winnipeg who, not having the ordinary opportunities of acquiring a living, are pinching and scraping to exist,—and I know that this $600,000 must come out of the pockets of the ordinary people. There is no question but that we all feel the need for maintaining the dignity of Canada; there is no doubt whatever that we would all be pleased to have tourists look up with admiration at a completed tower; and I think there is no hon. member but values fully the aesthetic side of things. But until the government can see its way to make a great many other expenditures and to lighten the load which the people now have to carry, I cannot see that we are justified in voting for such an item as this.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chairman, the discussion has been fairly prolonged, and I think by this time members ought to realize what I have tried to make plain, that the government did not initiate this expenditure. It was initiated by the government of the day when it was decided to reconstruct the parliament buildings, it was endorsed by parliament at that time, and it has been reendorsed from year to year, the committee of parliament being in close association with the work and reporting to parliament from time to time. I think there can be no question that if the government had failed to put this item in the current estimates they would have been severely criticized by hon. members.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, no.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a matter for parliament to decide. In order that we may have a further opportunity to consider this vote—and it may be viewed from several angles—I would suggest that my hon. friend withdraw his amendment and that we let the item stand for the present.

Mr. McMASTER: Might I request that before we take this item up again, the minister supply to the committee a calculation prepared by the officers of the Public Works department as to just what the expense of postponement would involve?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think we can arrange to have such an estimate prepared.

Mr. SHAW: Might I ask the minister to also place on the Table of the House a copy of the contract, so members may have an opportunity of determining the responsibilities of the government in this connection?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, we will do that.

Mr. BRETHEN: I think it is the desire of every member to get the fullest information respecting this vote. Very little has been said to cause me to change my view in the matter, but I am perfectly willing to withdraw my amendment on the announcement of the minister that this item shall stand for fuller information.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Thank you.

Mr. STEVENS: When the minister is laying the contract on the Table, will he also furnish the documents setting forth the settlement with the architects?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. MARTELL: And will the minister also lay on the Table the full contract and all other documents concerning everything that was done under the late government?

Item stands.

Harbours and rivers—Ontario, $626,750.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the vote be taken item by item?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Belle River—Harbour Improvements, $30,000.

Mr. HANSON: Is that the wharf we heard so much about during the Essex by-election as having been built for the accommodation of rum runners?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a re-vote of $30,000 to provide for the contract that has been let for the following harbour improvements at Belle River:

For the construction of 1,400 lineal feet double close-faced sheet pile wall, consisting of double 3" sheeting for length of 1,100 ft and double 4" sheeting for length of 300 feet. Sheeting to be from 18' to 20' in length, securely waled to round piles on each side of sheeting placed at 5' centres; also round-pile stone-filled cribs triangular shaped 18' on each side.

The successful tenderers were the Detroit River Construction Company.

In addition to the above work, it is proposed in 1924-25 to dredge the 50 foot channel at Belle River to a depth of 10 feet at an estimated cost of $11,000.

The contract has been let and the work is under way. This is a re-vote in order that the work may be continued. In reply to my hon. friends' inquiries in regard to the much talked-of contract, I was not present when the item was before the House last session. There have been suggestions that this is a political item. That is not true. The man who initiated this expenditure is not to-day in this House, but he represented that district and was also a member of this government. He represented to the Department of Public Works and to myself as minister that this was a necessary and proper work, and so far as I am concerned the amount was placed in the estimates on his assurance to that effect.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the population of Belle River?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a prosperous village on the Grand Trunk railway, an important point on the Canadian side of the lake, seventeen miles east of Windsor. It is at present a harbour of refuge only for shallow draft vessels and gasoline launches, but it is expected that water borne traffic will develop to a considerable extent on the completion of the pier. The population is 608.

Mr. HANSON: Was the contract by tender?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. HANSON: What is the tonnage that it is anticipated will go over this pier?

Mr. HEALY: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to give the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) some information—he seems to be in need of it—with regard to this work? The work is not a dock, it is not a wharf, but it is a breakwater, to protect the entrance to the harbour of Belle River, on which previous governments have spent $28,000. The hon. member asks what connection this has with rum running. Let me tell him that the people of my constituency are not quite so familiar with rum running as those of New Brunswick, the province that he represents. There has been a great deal of misrepresentation with regard to this vote, and that misrepresentation has been carried up and down the highways and byways of this country since last year. Last year I came into this House a new member and I was warned that the leader of the opposition had something on me that would put me out of public life. I was at a loss to know what it was, but when the vote for Belle River came up last year I was almost terrified by the accusations that fell from his lips. Let me say now, as I said then, that never before that afternoon, and never since, except in the possession of the right hon. leader of the opposition and of a former Minister of Finance of this country, did I see the pamphlet that had been laid at my door. Upon my return to my constituency last year I inquired thoroughly as to where it came from, and not a member of my executive had seen it; not a member of the Conservative executive in the north riding of Essex will say to-night that I have any knowledge of it. The leader of the opposition is about to pay another visit to the constituency that I have the honour to represent. I will leave it to him to ask his own agents there whether or not I am telling the truth. Now, it is easy to attempt to ruin the reputation of a public man by muck-raking. The pamphlet that was held up with such unholy glee by the leader of the opposition and a former Minister of Finance last year has been made the subject of reference all over the country. The right hon. gentleman carried it from Halifax to British Columbia —and after all what was it? A question of a vote for $30,000 to take care of a harbour that had been recognized by every government for twenty years. On the recommendation of the former Conservative member of the constituency, a customs officer was appointed there. Belle River has a population of some eight hundred French Canadians

9 p.m.

Last year, out of $2,900,000 appropriated for Ontario, there was only one little vote of $30,000 for the French-Canadian population of Belle River, and that was the only vote that the leader of the opposition had the nerve to attack out of that amount of $2,900,000. Well, he has been accused of preaching the doctrine of hate up and down this country; if I had one or two of his speeches here—which I have not, because I did not know this vote was coming on—I would be glad to read from them. But in my constituency actions speak louder than words. As the hon. minister has said, I did not initiate that poor little vote of $30,000, but I was proud to support it, and I made the statement at Belle River and in the city of Windsor, a statement which I am prepared to make to-night, that any vote that was initiated by the former Minister of Railways, whom we were proud to honour in my constituency and whom this House was proud to honour, is good enough for me to support either in my constituency or in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy) has treated us to quite a disquisition. He seemed to come loaded this session and bound to attack me whether I said anything or not. I do not think I have referred to this miserable transaction more than a couple of times since last session, but I want to say to him that its aroma has not been the least improved by the experience meanwhile, and is not a whit better in point of morals or in point of business since it was initiated last session. The government, as the hon. member, tried to hide behind the skirts of the late lamented Minister of Railways; they said he initiated this vote. Well, it took a long while to appear after the initiation. It was not in the Main Estimates last year; it awaited the result of the election in North Essex, then on the hon. member appearing it came, toward the end of the session, in the Supplementaries. I, of course, can say nothing as to what the Minister of Railways did. There is always great pressure on a member to press for anything and everything in his constituency, and possibly the minister yielded; I know nothing of that. But I know from a visit to the riding and I know from correspondence since, that this vote is nothing more or less than an outrage, a robbery of the treasury of Canada; that there is no business in Belle River, it does not matter who inhabits the place. There is no business for the breakwater, or the dock or the wharf, or whatever it is. It is simply a waste of the money of Canada, as a reward—

Mr. HEALY: When the vote was up last year did the right hon. gentleman not admit that some dredging was required in this very harbour?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not recall admitting anything of the sort, but I know there is no business there. It may be a place used by gasoline launches—what was it the minister said—as a harbour of refuge? There may possibly be the like of that, but there is no need in the world for a dock or a wharf or a breakwater, and the people of Belle River know it as well as the people of the rest of the riding. Yes, I am going up there, and when I reach Windsor I will express myself as I express myself here in the House of Commons to-night. A pamphlet was published—who published it I think the hon. member knows as well as I, and who got it printed and circulated. Everybody knows it was printed and circulated, whoever did it, to help elect the hon. member himself. This was promised; other things were promised, and illegally the pamphlet was scattered through Windsor—several have reached me since. I do not suppose it would be put at the door of the hon. member; he would likely vote right without it, but it was scattered in those quarters where it would be likely to affect the vote, by reason of this promise, by reason of this bribe, and by reason of others that were embraced within it. The government is carrying it out, and on the government's head is the responsibility.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There seems to be an impression that this is a new work. Now, for many years the government have been spending money at Belle River. The engineers have suggested that by building these retaining walls it would be possible to prevent the sedimentation that has been taking place and the necessity for the continued dredging that has hitherto been required. That is, by building this retaining wall and confining the waters within a certain area the debris will be flushed out, and we will not be called upon each and every year to do this dredging. There is nothing new in this proposition. It is recommended by the engineering department as a proper expenditure, and it is hoped that by constructing these retaining walls we will be able to save money in the end. Representations on the subject have been made by various people. Take the Northern Navigation Company. They represent that this construction, and the deepening of the channel, will permit their boats to ply into that harbour. The item is not a new one. It is one that has come properly before the government, and received proper consideration after being reported on by the engineering department. A vote was properly placed in the estimates last year, the contract has been properly let, and we are now only asking for a revote.

Mr. HOCKEN: Will the minister tell us what depth of water there is at Belle River?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We hope to secure a depth of ten feet.

An hon. MEMBER: Would the minister tell us how much money has been spent to date at Belle River?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The sum of $28,211 has been spent to date.

Mr. STEVENS: In what period, since when?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the date.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to suggest to the minister that the $28,000, in round figures, of expenditure is since confederation, and represents practically nothing. Now the minister has intimated that this $30,000 is for certain revetment work, and he hopes to get a depth of ten feet. A moment ago he said the depth was not ten feet, so we presume there will be another vote for dredging. What I should like to ask the minister is this: In view of this expenditure, and the peculiar manner in which it was launched—and by the way I noticed the minister rather offered an apology—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No apology at all, I am only stating facts.

Mr. STEVENS: Who are the Northern Navigation Company, where do they ply their steamship line?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They operate between Windsor, Detroit, Michigan and Chatham, Ontario.

Mr. HOCKEN: Have they got any boats that can be sailed in ten feet of water?

Mr. HEALY: They have—

Mr. HOCKEN: I was asking the minister.

Mr. HEALY: And I am giving the information.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Here is what the company say in one of their communications:

> Our company, who operate a steamer line between Windsor, Ont. Detroit, Michigan and Chatham, Ont. will take advantage of the opportunity which the building of this pier and the dredging of an entrance thereto gives us, by having our steamer use same daily on the vessel's trip, and we believe that the opening of this harbour will materially add to the convenience of the people in the neighbourhood besides very much increasing the value of the property, inasmuch as a large picnic park would be built at this location and there would be thousands of people carried there that formerly did not have the opportunity of visiting the locality.

The manager of the Northern Navigation Company says:

> I have personally inspected the location and feel that if the harbour is to be made permanently useful another pier on the west side of the river should be built so as to prevent the bank from falling into the dredged channel, and we hope that the work will be fully completed by the first of June next.

Engineer Craig says:

> I am recommending for next year the provision of a sufficient amount to build a similar extension on the west side of entrance channel and to dredge a channel to a depth of ten feet between the two walls on their completion.

Mr. FORKE: I want to make a statement, now we are at the beginning of a consideration of the estimates. I sit here, in company with a great many other members, and we hear a wrangle when a vote comes up, the leader of the opposition making the statement that the appropriation is of no use, that it is simply a sop to the electors, and a member for the constituency telling us that it is an absolute necessity. Most of us here do not know anything about it. Now, what sort of position is it where two reputable members of the House make statements that are diametrically opposed to each other?

Mr. HEALY: May I point out that one member knows what he is talking about.

Mr. FORKE: The trouble is we are not very sure of it yet. The statement I want to make, and I want to make it to the government, is this: That henceforth we shall require some fair warning of what estimates are going to come up before the House, so that we may have proper time to make an investigation and obtain the necessary information on which to base intelligent criticism of the different items. We go back to our constituents and we are asked about these items, and all the information we have is what is brought out by the stock questions that are put from year to year. That was the case in almost every item that came up last year; there were a few stock questions put that did not amount to anything. What I want is that the government should give fair warning before estimates are brought up for consideration, the night before if they possibly can, so that we may have some opportunity during the next forenoon to make inquiries regarding the nature of the estimate that is to be passed. I want to make a protest against this method of putting estimates through when we have no knowledge whatever of what they really mean.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to say to my hon. friend that there is no intention at all on the part of the government—

Mr. FORKE: Excuse me, I do not want to make any insinuations against the government. I offer this suggestion because I believe it to be a good one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just going to say to my hon. friend that I do not think there has ever been an occasion that notice has not been given the night before of the estimates to be taken up next day. To-day it so happened that there was an understanding last night that one of the items in the Public Works department would be proceeded with. I asked the leader of the opposition this afternoon in the presence of the House, whether there would be any objection to going on with the estimates inasmuch as that notice had not been given. Any member, I think, might have objected at the moment, but the House being consulted in the matter did not object and we proceeded. Let me say that if there is the least objection at the moment to going on with these estimates I will ask to have them discontinued. The government has no desire to press the matter. This particular item was discussed last year, and a sum was voted, and all we are asking the House to-night is to revote the amount that parliament then considered and approved of and that was not used. Let me repeat, if any hon. member of the House does not wish to have a discussion of these estimates at the moment I would ask the minister concerned to move that the committee do rise and report progress.

Mr. HOCKEN: I should like to make the suggestion to the leader of the Progressive group (Mr. Forke), that if there is a conflict of opinion or statement about this wharf or breakwater he should select one of his members to go up and look at the work at Belle River. In the meantime the item could stand, and before it is again considered he could have a report from the member in question as to the character of the place, and the amount of the traffic or tonnage that enters it.

Mr. HEALY: I would be glad to take the hon. member up myself.

Mr. HOCKEN: I should like to ask the minister if he has any record as to the kind of tonnage that goes in and out of Belle River? How many gasoline launches, and how many steamboats, go in?

Mr. HEALY: May I be permitted to make a statement?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Certainly.

Mr. HEALY: The hon. member (Mr. Hocken) chooses to be a little facetious this evening. If he wants to know anything about Belle River I would be very glad, as I said before, to accompany him there, show him the work, and satisfy him that it is absolutely necessary. As to the tonnage, the Northern Navigation Company is identified with the Canada Steamships Company, that runs large freighters from Sarnia up the lakes. They also run a line of boats from Detroit to Chatham, drawing ten feet. They have offered to carry passengers daily from Detroit to Belle River and establish a park there just as they have done in other places. The tonnage that has been going in and out of Belle River for the past ten years—and that is the period the $27,000 covers—has been sugar beets from that district to Wallaceburg; and up to the time the channel closed up two years ago, gravel has been carried to build a highway in that district. I make the statement without fear of contradiction, that had that channel been open three years ago, on the gravel used for highways in that district, provincial and county highways, they would have saved $1.50 a yard in freight. Under the contract between the Dominion government and the provincial government the local municipalities all get a preference rate on the delivery of gravel. The contract is on file. The local points, such as Belle River, Dresden, Chatham and different points along the river taking advantage of this contract of the provincial government with the Dominion government, are able to buy their gravel and have it delivered at a dollar and a half a yard cheaper than it could be done elsewhere. Had the work been done when it should have been done, as far back as 1919 or 1920, the whole cost of $60,000 which is proposed would have been saved in the past four years to the people of that locality, and now it may eventually cost another $30,000 to protect it on both sides. The engineer is satisfied to try it on one side first. That is a definite statement of fact which is absolutely true.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), has seen fit on several occasions to twit me on the size of the majority that was given me in my election. It was only a little over a thousand, I admit, but I want to point out that in the whole history of that constituency there was only one larger majority given, and that was given to the late Minister of Railways; and we did not call it an election, we called it a landslide, because the people of that locality had decided to give the late Minister of Railways the election by acclamation, but at the last moment the hon. leader of the opposition insisted on election and handpicked a candidate. The gentleman was the handpicked candidate of the right hon. leader of the opposition, and he lost his deposit because half the Conservatives resented the tactics adopted, and voted for the late Minister of Railways. The leader of the opposition speaks of reducing the majority from 7,000 to 1,000. Outside of that one election no candidate in the riding of North Essex received as large a majority as the one given me in my election.

Mr. FORKE: What about the breakwater? That is what we want to hear about.

Mr. HEALY: This is the first opportunity that I have had to resent the slurs cast on me by hon. gentlemen. I think I pointed out the need of the breakwater. These people are entitled to have that channel kept open just as much as the people in any other locality in this country are entitled to have a channel kept open. They have had it kept open for twenty years. The most of the money has been spent in the last ten or twelve years. This is a business proposition, to get away from the continual annual waste of money by putting this small entrance—that is all it is—to this harbour in a condition so that the government will not be called upon from year to year to spend from two to five to ten thousand dollars for dredging. It is a straight business proposition. The files will show that it was not initiated by myself. But I came here as a representative of the people, and the first opportunity I had to take a hand in the matter was when the Supplementary Estimates came up, and, as representing that locality, I asked the government to include it in the vote. That is a simple statement of the fact. It is a very small vote, but it is just as necessary for these people as the millions voted for the harbour of Toronto are for the people there, and just as important as the millions being asked for by British Columbia and placed in the vote of this year. It is just as important as the amount asked for by Fort William and Port Arthur. These are larger places, but the smaller community has some rights in this country, and I am going to represent the small community just as much as the great city of Windsor, whenever I believe they have rights, and I am not ashamed to stand up and fight for their rights at any time either at home or here.

Mr. HOCKEN: Can the minister give me the information I ask for? There is a customs officer there and there should be a record.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the customs returns, but we are advised there is a quantity of sugar beets transported from that point. The sand and gravel business which has been mentioned is of interest to the municipality; in fact the municipality themselves have recommended that this work shall be done. This work would also permit of their bringing in coal, lumber and building material, and would help in the developing of the fishing industry. There was a suggestion that there would be a brick and tile works established there. I do not know whether that is the case or not.

Mr. HOCKEN: I understand the minister cannot give me the information I ask for.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the customs return.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think it would be interesting to this House if we knew how many gasoline launches or how many boats used those waters.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have not the customs returns in regard to the traffic in and out. I do not suppose it can be very big, because I understand the channel is blocked at the present time. It has been closed for two years. It is like many channels that have been allowed to fill up; and I should say, from what I can learn, that it should be opened up, and that these people should have access to the water to carry on their business. I would not exclude them by any means because of the fact that they are a small community. Parliament authorized an expenditure of $30,000 last year and a contract has been entered into. It is a revote.

Mr. HOCKEN: Do I understand that there has been no traffic there at all? Why not let the item stand until we get the customs return?—because we ought to have this information.

Mr. BOYS: I think we ought to have some description of this place. Has there been dredging done in the past?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BOYS: What is the depth of water at the present time, and how far out from the shore do you have to go to get the necessary depth of water? From what I have heard it appears to me a channel will have to be dug, and there is a bay inside, or something of that kind. I think we should have some proper description of the locality, and let us understand what it is. Is it simply an effort being made to make a harbour, or is there to some extent a natural harbour there which merely requires improvement? Is this place on the shore of lake St. Clair?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. BOYS: From the little I know of that locality, it is very shallow and you would have to go out a very long way to get ten feet of water. Can the minister tell me what number of feet the largest boat ever entering up to date would draw? Would it be anything like ten feet, or would it be three or four feet? If I know anything about it, I imagine you would have to go out six or seven hundred feet to get five feet of water. If this is an effort to make a harbour at a place where there is not a natural harbour, there is nothing to warrant it. I live on the shores of lake Simcoe and I could name any number of municipalities where they would be only too glad to get an appropriation for a breakwater, where they have a great depth of water. But that is no reason for such construction. If the department would listen to all the municipalities who would like to have something of this nature done, we could smother them with requests. The point is, is this needed? Is there any traffic there? Are there any boats of any size which come in and out, or is it merely a question of some pleasure launches that are used there for amusement? If the minister cannot furnish me with that information, perhaps the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy) would be able to do so.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are desirous of giving all information possible regarding this or any other item. This is an old harbour that has been used for many years. During the war, I think there was not much doing, and the harbour was allowed to silt up. Boats have been using the harbour from time to time, and suggestions have been made that it should be opened up again for the advantage of the people there. I would be glad to get for my hon. friend further information in regard to the customs returns and any other information desired. I would say: Let the item stand for the present until we get that information. There is no hurry.

The next item is Blind river, wharf construction, $10,000. I would move that that be struck out. I am advised that the contract will be completed and the money paid from this year's appropriation. It is not necessary to revote it.

Mr. STEVENS: What do we understand about the item under consideration? We agreed to take the items seriatim.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was the desire of the hon. member to have the item stand over.

Item stands.

Blind river—wharf reconstruction, $10,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What constituency is Blind river in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Algoma East.

Mr. BOYS: Why is this item being struck out? Is it needed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The work is undertaken and it will be completed in time to be paid from this year's estimates in which we have an appropriation for it. We will not, therefore, require the revote. I move that the item be struck out.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is not a saving at all.

Item dropped.

Mr. SHAW: I would suggest that we leave this order and go on to some other order. I know a number of members have been taken by surprise in the matter, and more progress would be made if, after investigation, these matters were taken up.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend want to go to the next order so as to say something on his resolution?

Mr. SHAW: I am prepared to do so, but I make the suggestion in connection with the estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to make it quite clear that every night before the House adjourns—and perhaps hon. gentlemen do not pay close attention to this, because some hon. gentlemen are out of doors before adjournment, and I suppose four per cent read Hansard if their own speeches are not there—the question is asked by the leader of the opposition or by whatever hon. gentleman is leading the opposition, if the leader is not in his place, what is the business for to-morrow? And the government, so far as it possibly can, gives the information that we shall have certain business and then go into Supply, naming the department or departments. To-day was a little different, of course; but I want to make it clear that if hon. members will look at the end of Hansard of the day before all through the session, they will find the very items and departments the government intends to take up.

Mr. FORKE: That is true with some modifications, because I have seen a number of items come up that were not mentioned the night before. We have jumped from one end of the estimates to the other on many occasions. I do not blame the government altogether, but we want all the information we can possibly get.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the minister will be grateful for the help I am giving him in relation to the Belle River item. I have the trade and navigation returns indicating the value of this port and the importance of expenditures of money on it at this time, of course, aside entirely from electoral necessities. In order that the House may have some comparison, I will read the returns for Windsor which comes right above:

	Windsor	Belle River
Import duties	$3,292,942 39	$1,235 51
Excise taxes	1,687,741 48	610 17
Excise duties	138,032 13	nil
Sundry collections	27,653 94	nil
Total revenue	5,146,369 94	1,845 68
Entries inwards	29,526 00	97 00

That will be customs entries, I presume.

	Windsor	Belle River
Entries outwards	$ 55,129 00	nil
Railway reports inwards	207,792 00	109 00
Railway reports outwards	376,764 00	nil
Seagoing vessels arrived	nil	nil
Seagoing vessels, departed	nil	nil
Coasting and inland vessels, arrived	441	nil
Coasting and inland vessels, departed	328	nil

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think that confirms what my hon. friend has said. There has been an implication that Belle River was a flourishing point with a fleet of rum runners and so on. Apparently the customs returns do not show that; and to make a comparison between Belle River and Windsor is absolutely absurd.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would the minister compare Belle River with?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would not compare them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is not a vessel inland or seagoing that comes in or goes out. As to rum running vessels, they are "ships that pass in the night." They do not register.

Progress reported.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING BILL

On the Order.

Second reading of Bill No. 6, respecting Quartz Mining in the Yukon Territory.—Mr. Black (Yukon).

Mr. SPEAKER: Objection is taken to the fact that the bill is not printed in French, and, of course, I shall have to enforce the rule. I hear no objection.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the hon gentleman will allow this bill to stand until Monday, I shall be very glad. I want to get some information in respect to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should not think that there would be any chance of its being reached on Monday. The Speaker's ruling is correct, and if there is any objection taken the hon. member cannot go on. In the case of public bills and orders, if an hon. member loses his chance during the first few weeks of the session it is practically hopeless for him to get an opportunity of proceeding. I hope the House will not insist on the rule.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the bill is gone on with it will involve some opposition, and I desire to have an opportunity of looking into it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill was not handed in until the last moment, and as it has not yet been translated objection was taken yesterday by some hon. members to its being proceeded with. I think it should stand.

Motion stands.

DIVORCE

EQUALITY OF GROUNDS FOR RELIEF AS BETWEEN THE SEXES

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 19, the debate on the motion of Mr. Shaw:

That, in the opinion of this House, legislation should be introduced in order to place the wife on an equality with the husband as regards the grounds upon which divorce may be obtained.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): The resolution is so reasonable that I think the House should pass it without very much more discussion. I was very much surprised the other day to find that a considerable number of hon. gentlemen objected to it on the ground that divorce would be much more easily obtainable if the resolution were passed and legislation were introduced in harmony with it. Those who listened to the argument as advanced by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Shaw) will be convinced, I think, that there is no reason for anxiety in that regard. All that is asked is simply that women be placed exactly on an equality with men with respect to the granting of divorces. There seems to be no real room for argument against the motion. There is one point I wish to mention. In this regard the province of Alberta, and I think the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan as well, are in a position of considerable difficulty; they have not the same rights as the provinces of Quebec aind Ontario. I do hope that the House will pass the resolution without further discussion.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): When this matter was last under consideration some fear was expressed that if it were introduced in the form of a bill and put among the public bills and orders it might not be reached. But in order that there might be an opportunity for full discussion I suggested—and I think the suggestion was accepted—that the resolution be dropped on the assurance of the government that if a bill were introduced it would be reached in due course.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): The arrangement which I had with the Minister of Railways was substantially as has just been stated by him. We both contemplated that the resolution would not be reached, and in view of the fact that some suggestion had been made that the matter should be put in the form of a public bill and so introduced, I then proposed to the minister that if he would give me an assurance that it would receive consideration in that form, despite the fact that it woud be among Public Bills and Orders, I would have no objection to presenting it as a bill. In view of the fact that the minister gives such an assurance I have no objection to withdrawing the resolution. I want it understood, however, that the motion is withdrawn on the understanding that when the bill which I shall introduce comes up for second reading I shall have an opportunity, before the end of the session, of pressing that reading.

Resolution withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

Monday, March 24, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House has appointed Messrs. Beaubien, Béland, Carmichael, Deslauriers, Euler, Garland (Carleton), Gauvreau, Good, Gouin (Sir Lomer), Hopkins, King, Mackenzie (York), Lapointe, Lovett, Meighen, Pritchard, Robinson, Ross (Kingston), Sheard, Sinclair (Oxford), Steedsman, and Walsh, a Committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as Members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the Members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz: Messrs. Baldwin, Charters, Chevrier, Coote, Euler, Fansher, Gauvreau, Hocken, Humphrey, Jones, MacKelvie, McConica, Malcolm, Marcil (Bonaventure), Michaud, Murdock, Preston, Prévost, Raymond, Rinfret, Robichaud, St. Père, and Thurston, will act as Members on the part of this House, on the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

HOME BANK INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My attention has been drawn to the fact that when I replied to the request of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) to lay on the Table of the House a copy of the Order in Council amending the Order in Council respecting the Home Bank inquiry, I did not at the same time lay on the Table of the House the original order respecting the appointment of the commission to inquire into the Home Bank failure; I therefore beg to lay this order on the Table.

THE PULPWOOD COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): On Friday last the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) inquired whether the members of the Canadian Royal Pulpwood Commission had gone to Washington. I have received a message from New York which reads—

Your wire 21st, Chairman Picard, Deputy Chairman Anstie and self came here informally to consult well informed men on statistics and other matters relevant inquiry. Also to check up some opinions expressed during inquiry. Have not been and do not intend going Washington, as majority of points cleared up here. Fully expect return Ottawa Monday noon.

This is signed by the secretary Mr. E. H. Finlayson.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

On the Orders of the Day.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the government what their intention is in reference to the Redistribution Bill and when the appointment of a committee to deal with such bill, if such be the intention, shall be made. No time should be lost.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is the intention of the government to have the second reading of the bill this week, probably to-morrow or the day after.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HOME BANK DEPOSIT

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Were moneys of the Canadian National Railways placed on deposit in the Home Bank of Canada on or about May 28, 1923?

2. If so, to what amount?

3. Was this amount still on deposit on June 1, 1923, in the said bank?

4. Were the books of the said bank closed for the year on that date (June 1st) and submitted to the shareholders at the Annual Meeting as exhibiting the position of the bank resulting from the year's operations?

5. On the said showing so made, was a dividend on the bank's stock declared? If so, to what amount?

6. Were the said moneys of the Canadian National Railways drawn from deposit shortly after June 1, 1923? If so, on what date?

7. Was the deposit of the said amount in the said bank authorized by the directors of the Canadian National Railways? If so, when and by what directors?

8. Whose signatures were signed to the cheque or cheques on other banks covering the said amount of said deposit or was such deposit made in cash?

9. Was such cheque or cheques before being issued submitted to any auditor or auditors for authorization?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1 and 2. Deposit of $1,000,000 agreed to May 21; voucher dated May 25; receipted for by Home Bank, May 28.

3. Yes.

4 and 5. The annual report of bank, as filed with the government, shows that the directors declared a dividend of 7 per cent on operations of the year ending May 31, such dividend being declared on profits and not determined by the deposit of May 28.

6. On June 2, 1923, the deposit was transferred, on request of the management to the Bank of Montreal.

7. Authorization would have been secured in due course at the June meeting of the board had deposit remained with the Home Bank. The matter was broached by Mr. Gough at the conclusion of the May meeting of the board, but did not come before the directors. Pre-authorization of such matters is not customary.

8. The cheque was signed by J. A. Yates, General Treasurer, and C. D. Cowie, Assistant to the Financial Vice-President.

9. Vouchers covering this transaction were duly approved by the heads of the accounting department and recorded in the accounting and cash records.

Mrs. MARY ELLEN SMITH

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Was Mrs. Mary Ellen Smith, Liberal member of the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia, sent to England in the employ of the Dominion government? If so, when, in what capacity and upon what terms?

2. What is the total amount paid said Mrs. Smith for salary, allowances, expenses or otherwise?

3. Is it the intention of the government to further employ said Mrs. Smith? If so, when, for what purpose and on what terms?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Yes. July 16, 1923. To give series of lectures on Canada; $200 per month and expenses.

2. $1,967.59.

3. Question for future consideration.

WAR PENSIONS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Is it the intention of the government to increase the amount of pensions now paid to former members of His Majesty's forces, their widows and dependents, by the amount of the bonus now paid in addition to pensions, making the permanent pension equal to present pension plus bonus?

Hon. Mr. BELAND: The answer is: Under consideration.

EXPERIMENTAL TOBACCO FARMS

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. What are the names of the superintendents and assistant superintendents of the experimental tobacco farms and stations in the Dominion?

2. What salary is paid to each, and what are the respective dates of appointment?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1 and 2. Farnham, Que.—J. E. Montreuil, superintendent, salary, $2,400; date of appointment, March 3, 1919. J. R. Cossette, assistant to superintendent, salary, $1,500; date of appointment, March 24, 1923. Harrow, Ont.—D. D. Digges, superintendent, salary $2,460; date of appointment, Januaary 12, 1915. O. G. Williams, assistant to superintendent, salary, $1,620; date of appointment, July 1, 1921. The farm at Harrow, Ont., was formerly used as an experimental tobacco station but is now a regular experimental station.

FRUIT MARKS ACT

Mr. PORTER:

1. How many convictions have been made during the years 1919 to 1924, inclusive, for breaches of the Fruit-Marks Act in Ontario?

2. What is the name of the person or persons convicted, and what penalties were imposed?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. 40.

INCOME TAXES

Mr. GOULD:

1. Has the government lost revenue on account of allowing individuals and corporations to pay income taxes on the instalment plan on account of such individuals or corporations leaving the country?

2. If so, how much was lost in this way in each of the respective years of 1920, 1921 and 1922?

3. Does the government still allow or grant such privilege to persons or corporations?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Accurate information not available but it is reasonable to assume no loss has been sustained.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes, under authority of section 7 of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, as amended 1920.

DUTY ON WHEAT

Mr. GOULD:

1. Is there a duty imposed upon Canadian wheat entering Japan?

2. If so, what is the duty and when was it imposed?

3. Prior to the said duty being imposed, was the Canadian government given notice?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. Yes.

2. A duty of 77 sen per 100 kin, i.e., 29 cents per 100 pounds, was imposed on wheat from all foreign countries, including Canada, by the Japanese customs tariff law which became effective on July 17, 1911. This duty has been suspended at certain times, the last suspension having been by Imperial ordinance of September 17, 1923. Wheat was then made exempt from duty until March 31, 1924, but an amending ordinance was enacted on February 26, 1924, which restored the ordinary duty on wheat from that date, except that provision was made for exempting from duty until March 31, 1924, wheat contracted for before the date of the amending ordinance, or which was at that time en route to Japan.

3. On February 29, 1924, the Consul General of Japan in Canada advised the Department of Trade and Commerce of the passing of the amending ordinance of February 26. This information was published in the Commercial Intelligence Journal of March 8, 1924.

SALES TAX—EXEMPTIONS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What, if any, articles or commodities have been exempted either in whole or in part by order in council or otherwise from the consumption or sales tax, since July 1, 1923?

2. Have applications for exemptions of other articles or commodities from such sales tax been made and refused?

3. If so, what are such articles or commodities?

4. Have applications for exemptions of other articles or commodities from such sales tax been made and are not yet disposed of?

5. If so, what are such articles or commodities?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Barley meal.

Usual coverings to be used exclusively for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax; materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of usual coverings to be used for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax; woollen rolls or wool yarn milled for a producer of wool from such wool supplied by him for his own use; articles admitted to free entry under Customs Tariff item 692; goods enumerated in Customs Tariff item 139; bakers' cake and pies, not to include biscuit.

Printing paper for use exclusively in producing newspapers and quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines, weekly literary papers unbound, hymn books, religious tracts and Sunday school lesson pictures—reduced by fifty per cent, on the amount of consumption or sales tax.

2 and 4. Applications have been made and are under consideration.

3. and 5. Baking powder, barrels, books, biscuits, candy, penny and five cent bar candy, coffee, roasted and ground, cut flowers and potted plants, confectionery, corn syrup, dextri-maltose, granulated wheat flour, hospital supplies, insulin, ice cream, liquid eggs, meat scrap and meat and bone scrap, manufacturers' mail order catalogues, house organs, magazines, memorials, multigraphing, news print, packages, parchment, leather aprons, paper tubes, wool felt, machinery repairs, etc., used in botany yarn industry, raw materials of magazine publishers, religious publications, rolled oats and molasses mixed, shredded wheat, school books, soap, spray or other materials used in the control of pests, macaroni and vermicelli, extract of rennet.

SINGAPORE NAVAL BASE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What correspondence, if any, was exchanged with the government of Great Britain or other overseas dominions regarding the Singapore Naval Base and its continuation?

2. What position did the government of Canada take on the question?

3. Will the government lay the papers herein on the Table?

4. Will a time be set by the government for a discussion by this House of the resolution adopted and laid before the Imperial Conference, 1924? If so, when?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government of Canada has had no communication with any of the other overseas dominions on this subject, excepting such communications as took place at the Imperial Conference. This matter was discussed at the Imperial Conference, and such reference as it was thought advisable to make thereto is contained in the report of the Imperial Conference at page 17. The pertinent paragraph is the following. After quoting certain principles in accordance with which defence should be carried out, section 4 reads:

> In the application of these principles to the several parts of the Empire concerned the conference takes note of:—
> (a) The deep interest of the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, and India, in the provision of a naval base at Singapore, as essential for ensuring the mobility necessary to provide for the security of the territories and trade of the Empire in eastern waters.

Such correspondence as has taken place with the British government since the conference has related to the form in which an announcement on this subject should be made in the British parliament. I do not think it would be in the public interest to place that correspondence on the Table. There is nothing really confidential about it, but it is, I think, of such a character that the British government would not wish to have it made public at this time. I have, however, in my hand copies of the correspondence, and I propose to pass them over to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), who might look them over and show them to any of the members of his following who may wish to see them. I would ask also that they be shown, upon a like understanding to the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke).

2. I think at the moment it is not advisable to say more than is in the report of the proceedings of the Conference but I have no objection to stating the position taken by the government at any time the matter may come up for discussion in the House.

3. I have answered this question by handing copies of the correspondence to the right hon. leader of the opposition.

4. Matters relating to the Imperial Conference might, I think, be best taken up when the House is considering the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. That would give ample opportunity for a discussion of all phases of the conference. As probably the House would like to take up these matters at an early date, I shall endeavour to arrange to have these estimates brought on at an early period of the session.

GRAND BEND PIER

Mr. DRUMMOND:

1. What repairs were made to the pier at Grand Bend, Ontario, in 1923?
2. What was the cost of said repairs?
3. Were the said repairs done by tender?
4. If not, how was the work done?
5. Who was the contractor, and what is his address?
6. Was the said work passed by a government inspector or official?
7. If so, what is the name of said inspector?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Twelve new round piles driven around south guard pier and two rows new waling placed, one at water level and one 4½ feet above water level, and also general repairs to decking on north pier.
2. $1,099.70.
3. No.
4. Day's labour.
5. Answered by No. 4.
6. Yes; District Engineer H. B. R. Craig, London, Ont.
7. Answered by No. 6.

QUEBEC-ORLEANS FERRY SERVICE

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. Does the "Compagnie de Navigation Maritime Industrielle," of Levis, which performs the ferry service between Quebec and the Island of Orleans, receive any subsidy?
2. If so, what is amount of subsidy, and why is it paid?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1 and 2. No, but a subsidy of $4,250 per season is paid to the Quebec and Levis Ferry Company to carry mails six times per week each way between Quebec and the Island of Orleans from the close of navigation each year until the completion of the ice-bridge road, and from the breaking up of the ice-bridge road until the opening of navigation each year.

R.C.M.P. OFFICER, POINTE-AU-PIC

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What is the name of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police officer who was stationed at Pointe-au-Pic, Charlevoix county, last summer?
2. How long did he stay there?
3. What was his salary?
4. By whom was he paid?
5. At whose request and upon what instructions was he sent there?
6. Has he made a report to the Department of Justice?
7. If so, what was the nature of said report?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Constable James A. Acheson.
2. From the 8th July, to the 9th September, 1923.
3. That of an ordinary constable, namely, $2.10 per diem.
4. By the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Department.
5. At the request of the Department of Marine. He was sent to Pointe-au-Pic by the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.
6. No, he made a report to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.
7. Constable Acheson reported that after some difficulty with the cab and taxi drivers, who up to the time of his arrival, had been in the habit of forming a blockade at the head of the slip-way leading to the boats making it almost impossible for passengers to leave the dock by any other method than taxi or carriage, he had succeeded in having a system adopted by which satisfactory order was maintained at the dock.

PACIFIC CABLE BOARD

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Who is the Canadian representative on the Pacific Cable Board?
2. When was he appointed?
3. Have these duties not been performed in the past by the Canadian High Commissioner?
4. If so, why has change been made?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Lucien T. Pacaud and Sir Campbell Stuart, K.B.E.
2. Mr. Pacaud appointed January 15, 1923; Sir Campbell Stuart appointed August 14, 1923.
3. Sir Campbell Stuart was appointed in succession to Mr. William L. Griffith, following the latter's retirement from the Office of Secretary of the High Commissioner. Mr. Pacaud was appointed in succession to Mr. Alexander Lang.
4. Answered by the answer to No. 3.

GRAND TRUNK SHAREHOLDERS

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Were members of the government interviewed by, or on behalf of, holders of Grand Trunk preferred or common shares in England during the past year?
2. If so, what commitments or intimations were made by the Prime Minister, or by any other member of the government to such shareholders which, in certain contingencies, could be used as a basis for advancing claims on their behalf in the future?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. No commitments or intimations of the nature suggested were made by the Prime Minister or any member of the government in England. The government's position is set out in the letter of the Hon. G. P. Graham (Minister of Railways and Canals), dated February 7, 1924, of which a copy is tabled herewith.

The letter tabled is as follows:

[February 7, 1924

Dear Sir:

I am now in a position to write you concerning the representations made to the Canadian ministers at the Ritz Hotel, London, on November 5 last, which were to be further considered on our return to Canada. I would have written sooner, but desired to discuss the matter further with my departmental advisers, and also with my colleagues in council, and, as you are no doubt aware, the return to Canada of the Deputy Minister, Major Bell, was unavoidably delayed until quite recently. The position of the Grand Trunk shareholders is admittedly most difficult and unhappy, and it is not without feelings of sympathy for their unfortunate plight that my colleagues and I have again reviewed the circumstances leading to the acquisition of the property. It is beyond question that such arrangements as were made to effect the transfer were considered by all concerned to be the best solution that could at that time be determined. As things turned out, it would no doubt have been infinitely better for the shareholders had the previous management accepted the original offer of the government of rental in perpetuity based upon the average dividends of the ten-year period preceding 1917. That offer was made at a time when no question had arisen concerning the propriety of certain of the dividends paid during that decade; and made also despite the fact that the Drayton-Acworth commission had publicly reported that there was neglect of the physical property in the interest of dividend declarations. It was made also in the face of the default of the Grand Trunk's subsidiary in respect of the lease of the Transcontinental railway. That the former Grand Trunk management failed to take advantage of that offer clearly cannot be charged to the Canadian government. It is now very evident also that, the delay of the former management in facing an inevitable situation also was most detrimental to the shareholders. Negotiations were deferred until the Grand Trunk Pacific was plunged into actual, and the Grand Trunk dragged into virtual, bankruptcy. This, as it turned out, was the determining factor in the award of the arbitrators—the only difference among the three being Chief Justice Taft's view that the Grand Trunk, if left alone, would eventually have recovered. That view was problematic, was opposed to the ascertained facts, and was based upon the disregarding, by the Canadian government, of the Grand Trunk's unfortunate connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific.

After declining a proposition which was clear cut and definite, involving no uncertainty, such as arbitration, the management agreed, and the shareholders ratified, an arrangement by which the value, "if any," of the preference and common shares should be arrived at. There was contest over the inclusion of the words "if any" in the agreement because it implied that no value might possibly be found. The management was, therefore, aware that there was question as to whether, under all the circumstances, value might be found. The shareholders assert that the award of the arbitrators was based upon the situation of the Grand Trunk as of one certain day—the date of the assumption by the government of financial responsibility. As a matter of fact, the award was based upon a survey of affairs of the company and its subsidiaries, covering a long period of time, and of the troubles and difficulties which culminated in the agreement finally reached. It was an agreement containing the following clause:

"Grand Trunk Pacific guarantee and claims,—For the purpose of the valuation provided in this agreement, the obligations of the Grand Trunk as guarantors of any indebtedness of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, or of the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company, or otherwise, and the claims of the Dominion of Canada, against either of the above-mentioned companies, or against any company forming part of the Grand Trunk Railway System, shall not be treated as extinguished or affected by anything contained in the said Act."

After ratifying such an agreement, the shareholders now contend that it should not be enforced, because its enforcement would—in fact, has—wiped out their equity in the property. Recognizing this, the late chairman made a plea for compassionate consideration. Your committee go further and claim (public advertisement in the Citizen, of Ottawa) that "the question of the value of the equity was not settled, and has not been settled yet." To concede such a contention it would be necessary to disregard in toto the conclusions reached as a result of an extended and costly arbitration, confirmed on appeal on a point of law by the Imperial Privy Council.

On this suggestion of equity, the committee's proposal that the shareholders should be permitted the right to participate in future Grand Trunk earnings is no doubt based. To concede such a claim would be to nullify the arrangement under which the value of the stock was ascertained, and, in so far as it was declared to be worth nothing, vested in the Crown by order-in-council, under clause 13 of the acquisition agreement. Since the road was taken over, the Canadian taxpayer has had to provide more than a hunlred millions of new capital. Because of the provision of this capital, with consequent improvement of road and equipment the Grand Trunk to-day, under reorganized and resident management, is not the Grand Trunk of yesterday under the former management. It is now in a much stronger position and working in close harmony with, instead of competing against, other railways now comprising the National system. In the future earnings of this rehabilitated railway the former shareholders claim the right to participate. In other words, the Canadian taxpayer must find the means to make the road successful—for the benefit of the former shareholders!

It may be urged that recognition of the former shareholders might well be a charge on the railway and not necessarily on the taxpayer. The present management would quite naturally expect to have some say as to such a proposition. Public opinion in Canada is insisting not only on a reduction of taxation, for much of which railway requirements have been responsible, but is demanding as well the scaling down of interest charges which press so heavily upon the management. The scaling down of interest charges could only be effected by writing off loans and advances made by the government to formerly privately-owned roads. Thus, the government is being urged on the one hand to forego any prospect of future interest, and, on the other, to increase its already heavy burden by the reinstatement of former Grand Trunk shareholders to participating rights in future earnings.

I have gone more fully into the question than I intended as I am most anxious that you should have a clear conception of the difficulties with which the Canadian Government and the Canadian people are faced at this time, and of the circumstances which make it impossible to comply with the request on behalf of the former shareholders for recognition of an equity or the right of participation in future Grand Trunk earnings.

Believe me, dear Sir,
Faithfully yours,
GEORGE P. GRAHAM.

COL. O. F. BROTHERS

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1. Was Colonel O. F. Brothers in the employ of or paid directly or indirectly by the government of Canada in the year 1923?
2. If so, for what services was he so paid?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

Department of Immigration and Colonization.

1. Yes.
2. For publicity work.

SACKVILLE PUBLIC BUILDING

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Is the work on the Public Building at Sackville, New Brunswick, being performed under contract or by day labour?
2. If by contract, who is the contractor, and what is contract price?
3. If by day labour, under what management and under what terms and conditions?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. By contract.
2. E. F. Powers Construction Co., St. John, N.B. $29,802.55.
3. Answered by No. 1.

MONEY ORDERS

Mr. ARTHURS.

1. Has any regulation been passed regarding the hours at which money orders are payable at post offices in Canada?
2. If so, when was such regulation passed, and what are the hours?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) (for the Postmaster General):

1 and 2. Rule 13 in Book of Instructions for Postmasters in charge of Accounting Post Offices, which is of many years standing and is still in force, reads as follows:

(a) At offices in cities, from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., and later when so directed by the department.

(b) At offices in towns and villages where banks are situated, from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., and later if so required by the Post Office Inspector.

(c) At offices in places where no bank agency is established, from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m., or at such hours as the Post Office Inspector of the division may direct.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ROLLING STOCK

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. How many cars and locomotives were built in United States for the Canadian National Railway System?
2. How many cars and locomotives were built in Canada for United States Railways?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: Hon. gentlemen will see that no dates are attached to this question. The full answer up to last year will be found in the statement of the Minister of Railways in Hansard of last year. In a very few days I hope to have a statement compiled for this year.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does this question stand?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have answered it as fully as I can now.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PUBLIC PRINTING AND ADVERTISING

Mr. McQUARRIE:

For a return showing all moneys paid to newspapers in Canada for printing and advertising since January 1, 1923, showing the names of the companies and the amounts paid each newspaper or newspaper company.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

Mr. RYCKMAN:

For a return showing the names of all persons who acted in the service of, or as advisers to, Canadian representatives at the recent Imperial Conference and Imperial Economic Conference in 1923, together with the sum paid to each for such service and for expenses.

MR. CHARLES BLAKE

Hon. Mr. MANION:

For a copy of correspondence dated July 14, 1922, and July 28, 1922, respectively; and addressed from Charles Blake, barrister, of Brandon, Manitoba, to the Minister of Justice, relating to the withdrawal of professional work for the government service formerly performed by the said Charles Blake; and copies of the replies of the Minister of Justice to the letters mentioned above.

BUCTOUCHE BAY

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, engineering reports, estimates of cost and other documents in connection with the proposed public wharf at Buctouche bay, Kent county, New Brunswick.

DESPRES ROAD, N.B.

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the closing of the post office at Despres Road, Kent County, New Brunswick.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BUCTOUCHE

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, engineering reports, estimates and other documents relative to the proposed public building at Buctouche, Kent County, New Brunswick.

PROPOSED BRANCH-BUCTOUCHE-RICHIBUCTO

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, engineering reports, estimates of cost and other documents relative to the proposed railway branch line between Buctouche and Richibucto, in the county of Kent, New Brunswick.

NEW BRUNSWICK LOBSTER FISHERIES

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and any person, persons or corporations, relative to the enforcement of the lobster fisheries regulations in New Brunswick, during the years 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923 and up to February 29, 1924.

NEW BRUNSWICK SMELT FISHING

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents to and from the Department of Marine and Fisheries relating to the extension of Smelt Fishing in New Brunswick during the season 1923-1924.

THE JEANNE D'ARC

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents in possession of the government relative to the seizure and release of the vessel Jeanne d'Arc for infringement of Customs laws.

GREAT LAKES FREIGHTS

Mr. MacKELVIE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the government and American vessel owners, or vessel owners' organizations, since the passing of the Inland Lake Freights Bill, and relating to the carriage of freight on the Great Lakes and the compliance or non-compliance with the provisions of such act.

SALES TAX

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a return showing a copy of all orders in council or other authoritative orders or rules affecting the sales tax or making exemptions or rebates since the passing of the sales tax amendments to the War Revenue Act of last session.

IMMIGRANTS AT QUEBEC

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

For a return of any and all reports of the Commissioner of Immigration to the Minister, upon the operation of the contract system for feeding immigrants at the port of Quebec, and also all reports and correspondence with reference to the way in which that system is functioning at that port; and also all reports and correspondence in connection with the adoption of the contract system at the port of St. John, New Brunswick, and in connection with the substitution of the system of government supply for the contract system at the latter place.

MARITIME FREIGHT RATES

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, passing in the year 1923, between the Prime Minister or the government and the government of New Brunswick, requesting freight rate concessions to the Maritime provinces.

RICHARD FORDHAM

Hon. Mr. MANION:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters and other documents, exchanged between any member of the government and any member of parliament or other person with regard to the appointment of Richard Fordham as junior clerk-stenographer in the Customs department at Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, together with copy of advertisements showing this position to be vacant by the Civil Service Commission; also a return showing date such advertisement was issued; date position was filled; number of applicants examined and all other details regarding said appointment.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' SALARIES

Mr. DOUCET moved:

For a return showing all employees of the Canadian National Railways receiving $4,000 per annum or over, with the salary of each.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): In regard to this motion, while the government does not intend taking any objection to it, I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that by statute, the Canadian National Railways are operated by the Canadian National Railway Board, and the response to this motion will come from that board.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING EMPLOYEES

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between any member of the government or any member of parliament and any official of the Canadian National Railways with regard to employment, seniority, retirement or dismissal of any employee of the Canadian National Railway System.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, this has something to do with the Canadian National Railway Board and with members of parliament as well, and may necessitate the production of a very bulky lot of documents —at least I think my right hon. friend (Mr.

Meighen) so imagines. What I want to call his particular attention to is his use in the the third line of the words, "and any official of the Canadian National Railways." Where are we to draw the line respecting "any official?" There are thousands of men under the category of officials of the Canadian National Railways. If we can restrict the definition, I have no objection to the motion passing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As regards the last point, I am quite agreeable that it shall apply only to district superintendents and those above them. As to the correspondence being bulky, I should hope it would not be, but I do not think the government should feel alarmed on that score. A similar motion of mine, only a little wider in its scope, was passed last session, but instead of starting with letters from members of the government and members of parliament, a lot of utterly uncalled for, minor, negligible stuff was looked up by the government—

Mr. GRAHAM: Not by the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was brought down by the government. But the part which would have been comparatively small was omitted, and the session closed without the government having time to get to it; however, the chaff was all reached and the session occupied in bringing it down.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are not supposed to debate such motions, but might I be allowed a word? My right hon. friend, I think, will find it mostly chaff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Probably.

Mr. GRAHAM: But here is the point. When any person writes to me—as I think nearly all the population of Canada do— concerning anything on the Canadian National Railways, I transmit the letter with a note of mine to the board. Would that be considered my letter to the Canadian National Railway Board?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is nothing but transmission, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried as amended—district superintendents and above.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ORE TESTING PLANT

Mr. HUMPHREY:

For a copy of all memoranda, correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any of its members and other governments, corporations, or individuals, relating to the establishment of an ore-testing plant in the province of British Columbia.

[Mr. Graham..]

HOME BANK INVESTIGATION

Mr. IRVINE moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a parliamentary committee should be appointed immediately to investigate the Home Bank failure, with a view to discovering any weaknesses in the Bank Act which may be amended to prevent a similar occurrence; to devise some means of protecting depositors generally; and to make recommendation as to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the government has requested that this resolution should stand until Thursday of the present week. I am prepared to meet the wishes of the government, on condition that this resolution will be taken up by the House on the date mentioned, and that there will be full and ample opportunity for its discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the understanding is as my hon. friend has stated it.

Motion stands.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères) (Translation) moved:

For all copy of memoranda, correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any of its members and other governments, corporations or individuals, since the first of January 1922, relating to the St. Lawrence waterway route, and the establishment of dams on the St. Lawrence for the development of certain waterpowers.

You will not wonder, Mr. Speaker, if to speak of the St. Lawrence river I make use of the language of its discoverer, of the pioneers who explored it to its very sources, of the heroic toilers who settled on its enchanting banks still inhabited by their descendants. It may not, perhaps, be out of place to remind, at the outset of this debate, those who think that the history of Canada only begun in 1759, or a little later, that Jacques Cartier having sailed from St. Malo in 1535, ascended, on his second voyage, the St. Lawrence river as far as Montreal, and from 1615, the time when Champlain together with Etienne Brulé explored the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa river, lake Huron and lake Ontario, up to the time when Pierre de la Vérandrye and his sons, after his death, and Legardeur de St. Pierre, from 1731 to 1755, explored the water courses of North America, and penetrated as far as the Rocky mountains, all those routes were discovered and explored by Frenchmen, the glorious ancestors of the people of the province of Quebec.

There is nothing, Sir, to be astonished at, if, besides the material interest and sound policy for Canada to prevent the St. Lawrence river from passing into foreign hands, you find us unflinchingly determined, relying upon our veneration of the past, to resist all attempts which, in our mind, would border upon sacrilege. Therefore I was not astonished when, in the city of Sorel, the new Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) acknowledging the congratulations of his fellow-citizens, declared himself entirely opposed to this undertaking. Uncontrollable circumstances prevented me from being present at that demonstration; however, I take advantage of this present occasion to congratulate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on his promotion to the cabinet, and, to express to him all the admiration that I have for his character, his eloquence and all the reliance that I place in him as a safeguard to the interests of the district of Montreal.

In his speech on the Address, the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) expressed himself in the following manner on the subject:

> First, no scheme will be entered into at any time as far as I am concerned, and I think it is the policy of the government, until it is clearly shown that the present level of the St. Lawrence river at all points will never be lowered as a result of the works to be carried out: second, that all rights which any of the provinces may possess will be properly safeguarded.

In view of this statement, Sir, I would have felt inclined to allow my motion to pass without adding any futher remarks; but, the day following the statement, a despatch arrived from the President of the United States notifying us that an American committee had been formed, at the head of which were Mr. Hoover and a number of other prominent persons of the United States, who according to newspapers, were all in favour of the scheme. Having come to the conclusion that this announcement took even Ottawa by surprise, I feel it is most important that all correspondence and telegrams exchanged between the two governments should be placed on the Table of the House. The correspondence already published is to the effect that the commission which will be appointed, will examine the report of the International Waterways Commission of 1921 to find out the practicability of the scheme and its cost. May I be allowed, Sir, to state that this commission is fundamentally wrong, because the Conservative government of that date, as usual, had not failed to ignore the rights of the provinces of Quebec in this commission and replaced the Hon. P. B. Mignault, who, at present is a justice of the supreme court, by Sir William Hearst, ex-Prime Minister of Ontario.

Useless to add that the Commission having no one on its board to look after the interests of the province of Quebec, these were unsparingly sacrificed in the report of the commission.

The Prime Minister stated, last Monday that the committee which would be appointed to complete the inquiry of 1921, would take no decision which would not have been previously presented to parliament to be ratified. I am sorry to say that this statement to me, is not sufficient. The present government is worthy of congratulations for its policy of economy, we notice that the estimates have been cut down this year. I state, however, that if the government wish to persevere in that policy, they must not be drawn into an undertaking like that of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. I shall be more explicit, I will state that I do not approve of the proposed inquiry in connection with this scheme at the present moment. We have had some experience on the cost of inquiries. Even the initial cost such as salaries to engineers, experts and the incidental expenses of this inquiry is absolutely unjustifiable during the crisis we are passing through. If, Sir, we do our utmost to convince our electors that they are forced or obliged to retrench, if we are to preach to them self-denial, if we tell them that the government has not even the necessary money to carry out urgent works, to prevent buildings somewhat old from falling into ruins, the more so must we preach to them that the government to start with is cutting down expenditures on a large scale. I think, Sir, that I am able to prove that this scheme should be set aside immediately and this on many scores.

The first is that the cost is absolutely prohibitive, especially under the present circumstances.

The second is that the scheme is impracticable; it will not give the results expected; it will be an economic failure and a disastrous policy both for Canada and the province of Quebec.

Thirdly, I think, Sir, that it is not in the interest of Canada to undertake such a scheme jointly with the United States.

Finally, if it can be shown to us that the dredging of a deep waterway between lake Ontario and the city of Montreal is, under the present circumstances absolutely necessary and that from the economic point of view Canada is in a position to undertake such a scheme, I state that we should then, instead of deepening the St. Lawrence, build the Georgian Bay Canal route.

If you will allow me, Sir, I shall briefly pass in review the various contentions that I have enumerated. I mentioned that the cost was prohibitive, we have not forgotten how this St. Lawrence waterway scheme started.

In 1920, a commission was appointed composed of members of both the United States and Canadian governments. This commission appointed two experts the late Mr. W. A. Bowden, Chief Engineer of the Department of Railways to represent Canada, and Colonel W. P. Wooten, an American expert to represent the United States; a report was made in July, 1921; these experts estimated the cost of the construction of the St. Lawrence canal at $253,000,000. If we add to this amount an additional $18,000,000 that the experts have stated to be necessary to bring the depth to 30 feet, and moreover the cost of the development of the water-powers on the St. Lawrence, which the experts have further estimated to cost $236,000,000 we arrive at the total amount of $507,000,000 and even this amount does not cover all the costs. A prominent American engineer, Hugh L. Cooper, stated that the cost of deepening the St. Lawrence including the deepening of the canals, the development of the water-powers. would be $1,420,000,000. He further remarked that in winter there would be but 30 per cent of the water powers that could be utilized. But this is not all, so as to make this waterway useful, in order that the deepening of the St. Lawrence may fulfil the aim in view, it is absolutely necessary that the ports on the Great Lakes be deepened in such a way as to allow ships drawing 26 to 30 feet to enter those ports. At present the mean depth of the Great Lakes is 21 feet. In order to obtain a depth of 25 or 30 feet, it would first be necessary to dredge the St. Mary's river, between lake Huron and lake Superior; the St. Clair river between lake Huron and lake St. Clair. The deepening of the Chicago harbour would cost $10,000,000. We find close to the city of Buffalo a mean depth of 10 to 15 feet and it is only three miles out of the harbour of Buffalo that there is a depth of 30 feet which is necessary to make use of this canal. That only goes to show the additional cost of this scheme, it does not include the sum which would be needed for the harbour of Toronto and those of other Canadian cities situated on the Great Lakes to allow free access to ships drawing 25 to 30 feet of water. This, Sir, will give you an idea as to the cost of this scheme.

I was calling your attention, Sir, to the fact that it would be unreasonable for the government, owing to the economic crisis we are at present passing through, to disburse money for this scheme, I brought to your attention, Sir, the fact that we found it hard to convince the citizens of this country, in our respective constituencies, that even urgent and necessary work could not be carried out because the government had not the means to do so. For my part, Sir, there is a project which affects not only my two counties but the development of the city of Montreal, and I may say the province of Quebec and the whole of Canada, it has been discussed for many years. I refer to the construction of a new bridge between Montreal and the South shore. Were I to tell you Sir that the means of communication between Montreal and the South shore are actually less than they were in 1890, you would likely be astonished; however such is the case. In 1890, to connect the city of Montreal to the South shore, there existed on the Victoria bridge two vehicle roadways of 13½ feet. There did not exist, at that time, any motor car traffic there was very little tourist traffic. In 1910, one of these roadways was kept for vehicles, the other was given to the Tramway Company, so that the only means of communication for vehicles of all kinds, between the city of Montreal and the South shore, at present, consist in a roadway of 13½ feet in width. The conditions are entirely inadequate to the amount of traffic, they are dangerous and all those who have crossed the Victoria bridge have been able to satisfy themselves as to the danger that exists in crossing this bridge and the inefficiency of the means of communication. I have no desire, Sir, in this speech of requesting the government to vote the necessary funds for the construction of a new bridge, but I am here to protest against the expenditure of fabulous amounts for a scheme of which it is impossible to foresee the results,—such as the St. Lawrence waterway,—before we undertake the useful and necessary expenditure of building a new bridge.

As a general policy, Sir, no government should spend such considerable amount unless it is first assured that this expenditure is in the interest of the country. If I clearly understand the scheme of the promoters,—and I have been receiving pamphlets favourable to the scheme since the beginning of the session,—their aim is to deepen the St. Lawrence and the canals as far as the Great Lakes so as to allow ocean vessels to reach these lakes. I contend, Sir, that seagoing vessels, will never be able to compete successfully with ships on the Great lakes. This question was considered by the Shipping Federation Board of Canada; it was studied by a number of engineers specially conversant with the subject and the result was found to be as follows: Ocean steamers cost 80 per cent more than lake steamers; the latter have three times the cargo space with the same draught. This is easily explained: On the Great lakes you have very short waves, you are not forced to build ships with the same rigidity, the same strength, consequently you have not to lay out the same amount for construction as for the ocean steamers which are obliged to battle against much longer waves when crossing the ocean.

Now, there is one thing absolutely certain: If the ocean steamers were used to carry the wheat from the West to Montreal, they would be forced to return West without any cargo. It is a well-known economic principle, in the maritime world, that a ship which carries a cargo but one way and is obliged to return without cargo, cannot pay its way.

This is, Sir, in my opinion, one of the strongest reasons to prove the futility of wanting to have ocean vessels reach the Great Lakes.

It was stated that the construction of this waterway would bring down the cost of transportation of wheat. I see the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) in his seat. He introduced, a few days ago, a resolution, in which he contended—he must know of what he is talking—that the cost of transportation on wheat, from the West to Montreal, would not be lowered by the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. Moreover, the transportation by inland navigation, the transportation by rivers or lakes is, at present, an economic failure everywhere. Take for instance, all the canals that exist in America, all have proved a failure, all show, in their reports, at the end of the year, large deficits. The Mississippi canal, called the "Mississippi Warrior" has accumulated a deficit, since 1917, of $2,036,608; the Panama canal, has yearly deficits and the canal known as the "New York State Barge" is in the same predicament. Look at our own waterways, from Niagara to Montreal, if you look into the transportation of freight, from 1908 to 1914, you will find that there has been 8,279,477 tons of freight which were carried during these six years. Now, from 1914 to 1922—and yet we include in these the years of war during which the freight should have been greater—we find, instead of 8,279,477 the total freight transportation reduced to 5,424,420. The cause is quite simple; the shippers fight shy of the canals, they have misgivings in regard to water transportation, and the quicker they can send their goods to ocean ports the better they like it. We already have accidents with boats of three thousand tons in the canals, when a boat of the above tonnage hits the door of a lock, it means that perhaps, for five or six days or a week, the boat is held up. Wheat shippers are under contract to deliver their merchandise in Europe; all manufacturers of this country who carry on exportation, are under contracts, mostly on fixed dates, their goods must reach their destination within a time limit, now, they do not wish to run the risk of seeing their goods held up in the canal and delayed for five or six days or a week. If these three thousand tonnage boats are the cause of rather numerous accidents in our canals, so much more will it be the case should we be using 15,000, 20,000 or 25,000 ton ships.

Another reason given, it is claimed—I think it is the contention of some of my hon. colleagues of the West—that we shall economize large sums in the cost of the transportation of wheat. Let us suppose that we have a crop of, say, 400,000,000 bushels, and let us agree that we economize three cents per bushel, this would amount to $12,000,000.

If the cost of this canal system amounted to only $300,000,000—and I think that I have shown that it would cost at least $500,000,000—we shall have to pay an interest amounting to $15,000,000 per year, plus $2,000,000 for maintenance, this means a total amount of $17,000,000 that we shall disburse to economize $12,000,000. This establishes clearly that the St. Lawrence waterway scheme, economically speaking, admits of an expenditure which is at present unwarranted.

Moreover, I think that we should, by now, be wiser regarding our transactions with Americans. And this brings me to my third point: That it is not in the interest of Canada to construct so expensive a waterway system jointly with the United States.

In 1921, the International Waterways Commission's report was published, hon. members will recall some of the petitions that were presented to the United States Congress and Senate. Hon. members will recall that Senator King from Utah, introduced a motion to the effect that Canada should cede to the United States the whole territory comprised between the Richelieu river, lake Champlain and the northern boundary of the state of New York, Congressman Ten Eyck introduced a bill in congress to purchase from Canada the whole territory to the south of the St. Lawrence, all Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. A neutral zone like that of the Panama canal was proposed. Experience should have made us wise. The result of the war of 1775 which ended by the Treaty of Versailles, in 1783, swept away the whole territory to the south of the Great Lakes, part of Minnesota, all the states of Wisconsin Michigan, Illinois, Indiana and Ohio.

We were despoiled of the iron mines of lake Superior, the copper mines of Michigan, the oil fields of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, the bituminous coal of Indiana and Ohio, part of the anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania and finally 300 miles square of the richest territory in the world.

This proves, Sir, the ravenous appetite of our neighbours. We must also bear in mind the treaty of Ashburton and the treaty where we afterwards lost part of Alaska. Each time our best interests were sacrificed to the advantage of the United States.

The political aspect in regard to this project is therefore important. It is stated in the report that the cost would be proportionate to the benefits which the two countries would derive from it. Can you imagine our position in the face of the United States, who would probably be deriving 70 per cent of the benefits of the construction of this waterway having paid 70 per cent of the cost of the work? You can well form an opinion, Sir, regarding the situation of the representatives of Canada on a board of management of which 70 per cent of the members would be United States citizens.

We have still had a more recent test. Years ago the city of Chicago emptied its sewers in the Chicago river. The latter emptied in lake Michigan. It was claimed that, from a sanitary point of view, they would have to divert the waters of the Chicago river. A treaty was concluded, in 1910, between Canada and Washington by which it was agreed to divert the water course of the Chicago river—which emptied until then in lake Michigan—so as to give it an outlet in the Mississippi basin, on the well defined understanding that the total quantity of water which would thus be diverted from the Great Lakes would be 4,160 cubic feet per second, at the most. At present, 10,000 cubic feet of water is being diverted. The Canadian government protested. I am even informed that the Washington government itself protested to the authorities of the city of Chicago. It was of no avail; they continued to divert 10,000 cubic feet, and in one year alone the fact of taking 10,000 cubic feet of water has brought down the water level of the St. Lawrence, at Montreal, ten inches, causing $300,000 damages. Do you wish for another example? In 1918, the company known as the St. Lawrence Power Company was incorporated. It requested from the International Waterways Commission their leave to construct a dam at Massena, New York. The Canadian government opposed this request. A counsel representing the Canadian government went to Washington to protest Noticing that their protests had no effect, the government passed an order in council to further protest, in a more official manner. The Massena dam still remains, notwithstanding the protests of Canada. It is nothing more or less, that the United States government adopted in this circumstance a policy of "don't give a hang." It is the same policy which would prevail if we had the misfortune to enter into an agreement with them allowing to the two countries, a joint control on the St. Lawrence river.

There is no necessity, Sir, to mention the danger that would exist for navigation between lake Ontario and Montreal if this waterway scheme was carried out and if, at the same time, dams were constructed for the purpose of the water powers. All those who are interested in navigation, the Shipping Federation and other interested companies, are all unanimous in saying that these dams would lower the level of the river, at Montreal, and between Montreal and Quebec, and consequently, would prevent between these two ports, the navigation of heavy draught ocean steamers.

I think I have clearly established that the scheme is impracticable owing to its great cost, the results which would follow, and, owing also to the bad policy which would result from admitting the United States to a joint control with us over the St. Lawrence river. However, if, as I mentioned at the outset, it could be shown that it is in the interest of Canada to have a deep waterway between lake Ontario and the port of Montreal, if it could be shown also that the finances of Canada can sustain such an expenditure, I state, that before even thinking of constructing the St. Lawrence waterway, we should build the Georgian Bay canal. We would thus have an all Canadian route, we would have a waterway which would be in Canadian territory from its head waters to its outlet into the Atlantic ocean, a route three hundred miles shorter than that of the St. Lawrence river. By the St. Lawrence route, the distance is nine hundred and forty-three miles between Sault Ste. Marie and Montreal, by the Georgian Bay canal way, it would only be six hundred and sixty-one miles. We have reports of well known engineers on this scheme. I shall only mention one, Mr. Arthur Surveyer, president of the Institute of Engineers of Canada who stated that the Georgian Bay canal and the development of the rivers and lakes situated along the water course of this route would supply 1,000,000 horse-power, over and above the 2,500,000 horse-power that could be developed in that part of the St. Lawrence in Canadian territory. I might further add that this route is easier to build owing to the smaller volume of water. The Ottawa river not being as wide as the St. Lawrence river, the dams would not be sc wide, and therefore would be less expensive; there would exist more safety for navigation: we would thereby avoid lake Erie, which is exceedingly dangerous and where shipwrecks are of frequent occurrence, and finally, we would develop Northern Ontario and Quebec; we would open up a mining country which has not its equal in the world, and we would be building, as I said a moment ago, a route which would be entirely in Canada, and thereby accomplishing a truly national work.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to add to all these arguments that we must protect our St. Lawrence, that we must safeguard it as a sacred trust bequeathed by our ancestors, and resist with all our strength that it may not become an international river.

The propaganda emanated from the United States. It is not astonishing that they eagerly covet the most important and beautiful asset of our country. Cartier had already noticed this lust when he wrote, more than fifty years ago, these patriotic verses:

L'étranger voit, avec un œil d'envie,
Du Saint-Laurent, le majestueux cours,
A son aspect le Canadien s'écrie:
O Canada, mon pays, mes amours.

If we wish, Sir, that these verses remain true, we will not divest ourselves of any part, even trifling as it may be, of this inheritance. Let us therefore, oppose with all our strength any ambitious attempts of our neighbours, and, politely but firmly tell them in a language they will understand "Hands off the St. Lawrence."

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I have no objection to the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault); in fact, I was thinking of putting on the order paper a similar motion myself in regard to the production of papers, telegrams and correspondence of all kinds on this subject. Another reason why I do not wish to deal with the question at length is because the government have recently stated through the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that they are about to have a thorough investigation made of the whole question. I tried to follow my hon. friend in his eloquent French, but I am afraid my French is rather limited, and I could not follow him as well as I should have desired. But I think I caught the drift of most of his arguments. I take it that from the standpoint of the province of Quebec or of the city of Montreal he is strongly opposed to the St. Lawrence waterway project and holds the view that if we do anything of this sort we should devote our attention to the Georgian Bay canal scheme. He also suggested, if I understood him correctly, that a bridge might be built in his constituency which would be of much more importance to the country as a whole than the building of either of these canals. I have no objection to his standing up for his constituency. He always does that, as the rest of us do for ours, and I do not wish to argue against that either. But I understood him to give the opinion of an engineer, Mr. Cooper, of New York, that the cost of this project would be $1,400,000,000.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: More—$1,450,000,000.

Mr. MANION: He presented that figure in opposition to the estimate of the engineers of the International Joint Commission that the work would cost about $252,000,000.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will my hon. friend permit me to correct him? The engineer of the International Joint Commission stated that the cost would be $253,000,000, but this was without the development of the water powers, which would cost $236,000,000, bringing the total estimated cost up to $489,000,000.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is wrong in that. I do not happen to have any of the literature at hand, because I did not know that this question was coming up today. But I know that the figure given by the engineers of the International Joint Commission was $252,000,000, and that included the development of all the power in the international section of the river; in fact, it included the development of a million and a half horse-power of electricity. I am positive that if my hon. friend looks up the report he will find that this figure is correct. I am sorry I have not the report here, but I am quite familiar with the figures because I have read them many times. I well remember a speech by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), on my hon. friend's own side of the House, in which he brought out that very argument.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but will he tell the House what he means by the development of power in the "international section" of the river?

Mr. MANION: There is a part of the river, between Prescott and Cornwall, I think, although I am not sure I have the exact stations, but there is a part of the river east of Kingston, which is really international, running between the province of Ontario on the north and the state of New York on the south. Below that section you come to the really national part, so far as Canada is concerned, that is where the river runs between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario or through the province of Quebec.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The $256,000,000 does not include the cost of that second part.

Mr. MANION: I agree, but it does include the cost of the development of 1,500,000 horse power on the international section.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: For the Americans.

Mr. MANION: No, it is international power, to be divided between the two countries. Canada has as much right to half as the United States has to the other half. The $252,000,000 includes not only canalization but the development of that 1,500,000 horse power on the international section, and the report of the International Joint Commission claims that that 1,500,000 horse power could be developed so cheaply that in all probability the return from the electricity developed would pay the interest and sinking fund on the whole undertaking. My hon. friend shakes his head, and I know there are others as well who do not agree, but I am simply quoting from what the engineers say in the International Joint Commission's report. So the jump from $252,000,000 up to Mr. Cooper's figures is sufficient to cause further investigation, and in that I have no quarrel with the government.

In regard to the Georgian Bay canal, I think no Canadian would object if something was to be gone on with and the country could finance it, but personally, as between the two, I think that if we could develop the St. Lawrence route it would be better for the country as a whole because of the lesser expense so far as Canada is concerned, for the United States would pay half the expense. The International Joint Commission not only included that $252,000,000 in the total expenditure, but the $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 which is being spent anyhow by the Canadian government on the Welland canal. So if these figures are correct, Canada's share in developing the St. Lawrence route would be very much less than the cost of building the Georgian Bay canal. I looked up the figures a few months ago, and I remember that away back in 1904 or 1905 the probable cost of the Georgian Bay canal was estimated to be about $100,000,000. Of course, to-day with the higher cost of everything, that would be doubled or trebled. I was going on to say that the Georgian Bay canal from the Canadian standpoint, and certainly from the standpoint of western Canada, would be just as advantageous as the development of the St. Lawrence route. But when you consider that the cost of the St. Lawrence route is to be divided, and the fact that there are some 30,000,000 people in the United States who are much more tributary to the St. Lawrence project than they are to the Georgian Bay canal project, it makes the St. Lawrence project much more feasible from the standpoint of bringing about a new route for traffic.

Mr. CAHILL: In what states are those 30,000,000 people?

Mr. MANION: I do not mean in the states directly bordering on the Great Lakes; but the states of North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota and Kansas, for instance, which do not border on the Great Lakes, are tributary to the Great Lakes inasmuch as their produce, wheat and so forth, is carried over the Great Lakes, and the states that are tributary to the Great Lakes in that way include about 30,000,000 people, and these same states, it is claimed by the authorities, also produce some seventy per cent of the food and raw materials produced in the United States. I am giving these figures from memory from the International Joint Commission's report, and I am quite sure that my memory serves me correctly in this case.

My hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), if I understood him correctly, also took up the question of ocean boats going up the Great Lakes. I am not one of those who ever had a picture in my mind of ocean boats using these canals, if they are built and proceeding up the lakes to Toronto, Fort William, Chicago, Buffalo and other cities. But what would happen if this project was undertaken would be that the boats carrying wheat from the prairie provinces, instead of stopping as they do to-day at Georgian Bay ports, or at Port Colborne and transshipping to Montreal, or transshipping to New York via Buffalo would continue on to Quebec or Montreal, and one of these two cities would still get the traffic. I do not think there would be any injury to Montreal. And in that connection I would just like to give one thought that I think the people of Montreal and of that district should consider very seriously before making too much opposition to this whole scheme. If you will look at a map of the United States and Canada together you will find that from Oswego at the southeast end of lake Ontario to the Hudson river there is only a very short distance which would require to be canalized to have lake and ocean steamers traverse the Hudson river and out at New York, and the New York people are to-day very strongly advocating—especially in view of the opposition of some Canadian people to the St. Lawrence scheme—the building of a canal system from the Hudson river across to Oswego. If that scheme were gone on with, they claim, it would be cheaper for the United States than paying for their half of the St. Lawrence development, and Montreal and Quebec would be to a very large extent sidetracked because much of the traffic which now goes to them and which would certainly go to them by way of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes system—

Mr. CARROLL: Is it not a fact that the strongest ground the promoters of this scheme are taking is that ocean boats would go right up the lakes? I am not saying that it would be a bad thing, even if it did affect Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. MANION: Some people take that stand, but those who have given the subject a great deal of study—and from the layman's standpoint I think I can claim to be one of those—do not take that view, except as regards tramp steamers, but that the boats instead of stopping at the points I mentioned a moment ago would continue to Montreal or Quebec and trans-ship there. It would save trans-shipping at Georgian Bay ports or at Port Colborne. The grain from the West could be transported right through to Montreal, and it would convey to Montreal or Quebec, whichever got the traffic, much of the American traffic which now goes by way of Buffalo, because up to very recently—two or three years ago—about sixty and sometimes seventy per cent of all our Canadian wheat carried from the head of the lakes was taken to Buffalo and trans-shipped by the Erie canal to New York. I repeat in all sincerity that if this St. Lawrence scheme were gone on with Montreal stands to gain in every possible way, and not to lose at all, because she would get not only a large proportion of the Canadian traffic which she does not get now, but a large proportion also of the American traffic which she does not get now to any great extent.

Particularly am I impressed with the point that I mentioned just a few moments ago, that Montreal and the cities in that district should very seriously consider the danger of the American people deciding to build a canal from Oswego to the Hudson river. That project is very strongly supported. I think it was the New York Times, probably the strongest paper in New York, that came out in support of that scheme only recently. Certainly if it were gone on with, it would be a very serious matter for Montreal.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does my hon. friend seriously contend that if the St. Lawrence project reduces the depth of the water in the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Quebec, it will aid the development of that district?

Mr. MANION: I do not admit it would do any such thing. Neither do the engineers. My opinion is of no weight whatever on that question, because I do not pretend to have any engineering knowledge, but very good engineers claim positively that there would be no change in the levels of the waters below the canalization or the power scheme development. However, that is an important question, and if the further investigation which is to be made should show that that would be brought about, then of course there is much more reason perhaps for Montreal to seriously consider the matter.

I should like to touch one other point that my hon. friend (Mr. Archambault) made in regard to the saving concerned in this scheme. He mentioned, if my understanding was correct, that in the operation of this scheme he figured the cost would be something like $300,000,000, laying aside Mr. Cooper's figures, and he took the interest upon that, and figured it to be $15,000,000 and then said that the gross saving would amount to $12,000,000. I think that was his estimate of the saving on the grain of the West.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I thought I understood him. Then let us assume his figures are correct. I will not argue about them, though they are very much lower figures than those given by Mr. Herbert Hoover, who is a member of the American cabinet to-day. Furthermore, the figure of ten cents was given by Mr. Julius Barnes, whom everybody in the House knows. He is one of the best authorities in the world in regard to the handling of grain; and he made the statement that there would be a saving of ten cents a bushel on the wheat from Canada and the United States. It would be not only on the wheat shipped out, because that wheat fixes the price of the wheat left in the country.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is the actual cost?

Mr. MANION: The average cost last year from Fort William to Montreal was about twelve cents.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: You would save ten cents out of twelve.

Mr. MANION: No, I did not say that; I simply quoted Mr. Julius Barnes as saying it would save ten cents a bushel.

Let me point out to my hon. friend that once a cargo is put upon a steamer it costs very little more to carry it a long distance than to carry it a great deal shorter distance. You can carry freight to-day, I am informed, from New York to Bombay and from New York to Calcutta at exactly the same price, though the distance is two thousand miles greater for one than for the other. I am giving that as an illustration of the cheapness of carrying freight on boats, though I would not claim that ten cents would be saved out of twelve, I was simply quoting Mr. Barnes' figures. The price the year before—and my hon. friends from the West will bear me out—would not be the average price of twelve cents but nearly double that from the head of the lakes to Montreal.

I was going to point out another saving. In addition to the saving on grain we have the revenue from the horse-power; because the horse-power can be developed, engineers claim, on this section, at a very low cost, and can be sold at a sufficient price to pay not only the interest but also the sinking fund upon the scheme.

Referring to the great objection my hon. friend made with regard to any dealing between the United States and Canada, he appealed to our Canadian nationality, to our great patriotic feelings, against uniting with the United States in a deal such as this. Well, I must confess frankly that I have not those feelings in the matter that he seems to have. At the same time I do not wish to be misunderstood, I do not want to be understood as not advocating that we should take every precaution, if this deal were ever proceeded with, to look out for our own interests. One thing I have always noted with reference to the United States is that when they go into any deal they are very careful to look after their own interests, and I admire them for that. No one knows that better than my hon. friends to my left, because the United States are looking after their interests to the extent of barring out anything produced in Canada if it suits them to do so. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Archambault) that all precautions should be taken, but I do not agree that it would be necessary to find this an insuperable obstacle to the progress of the scheme.

I hesitated to speak on this question, but I felt there were a few points that should be laid before the House, and particularly the point which I will take the liberty of emphasizing another time; namely the possibility of the building of a canal system from Hudson river to Oswego, which would certainly do more harm to Montreal than this scheme would do.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): In common with my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), I was unable to understand the drift of the discussion on the other side on this question —in fact I was not able to understand any of it. It was not until my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River spoke that I could catch more than the drift of it; and as I spoke very briefly on this question the other day—in fact I did not speak on this phase of it at all—I would like to make some observations on one phase of it, namely the saving on a cargo of grain. I have been trying to arrive at what would be a reasonable saving, and I have approached the question in this manner. The Canadian people at the present time are building the Welland canal, and whether the international project proceeds or not, we are going to have the Welland canal completed in a few years. That project will permit boats to load at Fort William and proceed to the eastern end of lake Ontario. The largest boats will carry their cargo there. The fact that it will be some years before we can complete the St. Lawrence waterway, even if we decide to start at once, and the fact that we would have the Welland canal completed several years before the St. Lawrence scheme could be completed, mean that it would be necessary to build elevators at the eastern end of lake Ontario. It would be possible, of course, to transfer the wheat by floating elevators into barges; but as we will have to handle grain for even four or five years, I think it is a foregone conclusion that we would have to build some elevators at the eastern end of lake Ontario. According to the figures in other harbours, the cost of transferring grain from cars into boats through an elevator, rendering the same service as we would render at Prescott or Kingston, only in the reverse order—and I take it the cost in this case would be about the same—is a cent and a half a bushel. Hon. members will understand that I am making a comparison between the cost of handling the grain from the eastern end of lake Ontario to Montreal, and the cost as it would probably be after the St. Lawrence was deepened and the large boats were able to proceed to Montreal. If the cost of transferring the grain from the large boats through the elevator to the cars is one and one-half cents, we add to that the railway cost from Prescott, if we take Prescott, which is only 108 miles from Montreal. Taking the average of a long haul, the cost would be only a cent and a quarter. But owing to the fact that it is a short haul, it would only be fair to add considerable to that cent and a quarter, say we call it two cents and a half. Now, we have the grain carried from the boat at the east end of lake Ontario and placed beside the elevator at Montreal for four cents a bushel.

This covers all charges, and that I take it is a very liberal margin, considering that before 1910 in some years the average cost of carrying grain from Fort William to Montreal was only four cents. Now, suppose that we proceed with this project and that we are able to proceed upon the St. Lawrence with large boats to Montreal, there is now and always will be from 30 to 40 miles of canals, depending of course upon what you call a canal; I suppose there are places on the river where there will have to be a little dredging, but it is figured at from thirty to forty miles of canal. In these canals boats cannot move rapidly. In the Panama canal and some other large and differently constructed canals they can move at 5½ and 6 miles an hour. But in such a canal as this, engineers put the rate at four knots an hour, even though the vessels may be able to go at twelve or more knots an hour on the open water. The dangers are greater and the insurance will be higher than on the open water. One can readily see that, with a depth of even twenty-five feet, where depth is no impediment, boats cannot proceed down thirty-three miles of canal to Montreal and back again without making a considerable charge. All that will be saved will be the cost of such transportation by large boats from the end of lake Ontario to Montreal as against the route which I have just mapped out by rail. If the higher is only four cents and the lower must be something considerable, where under the heavens, I might say, are you going to get a saving of ten cents?

Let me set forth another factor in this connection. It is quite possible that the grain may be transferred by floating elevator to barges—these proved very satisfactory at New York—down this canal at a cheaper rate than the railway could carry it. If so, then the saving would be between four cents and the new rate under the better conditions; but it would be between the barge rate and the rate of the large boats after the canal is completed.

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend know the rate from Buffalo to New York via the Erie canal during the season of navigation?

Mr. MILLAR: I do not know it exactly, but I know that about a year ago eighty per cent of the grain that was going into New York went in by rail, not by the Erie canal. There is an argument that, I think, is worth while taking note of. The Erie canal has not been able to compete with the railway, and it is a question in my mind whether a canal that is deeper—that canal is just a large ditch—where vessels can go at only four or five knots an hour will have much advantage over the all-rail route.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of fact, I know the rate. The rate is from eight to ten cents on the Erie canal. As my hon. friend says, it is much in the shape of a ditch; it does not amount to anything; it is only for a few flat boats. The reason I asked the question was this. The same conditions, more or less, exist to-day east of Port Colborne, from Port Colborne to Montreal, as my hon. friend knows. He quoted a figure of four cents, but he did not give me the dates. I know he showed me the figures at one time, and about fifteen years ago those were the rates. Since the war, however, there have been no rates such as those, and there is no likelihood of the rates being as low again for many years to come.

Mr. MILLAR: I think I said prior to 1910. As I did not expect this question to come up, I have not the figures; but those figures were correct for some years prior to 1910, when the rate averaged about four cents from Fort William to Montreal. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) has referred to the possibility of a large canal being constructed from Oswego to New York. It is possible that this canal may be constructed, but I am very doubtful about that being done. Even if this canal were constructed to a depth of thirty feet as is proposed, there would always be this danger. If, later on, the St. Lawrence river project is carried out, as I hope and believe it will, and it should be a cheaper route, then the more expensive one will have to go out of business. As soon as two routes come into competition, then one that can give the better transportation is the one that is going to take the trade.

I think I have only one more point that I wish to touch on just now, and that is the possibility of boats traversing both the ocean and Great Lakes. I am quite convinced that only a few boats will traverse the ocean and go up to Fort William, for the reason that vessels that cross the ocean cost about three times as much, and because of the more expensive construction and more material in them, they can carry only about two-thirds as much grain. More money is invested, and such boats, having their return cargoes to Montreal where the distributing point must be for some years to come, and not Fort William, will go empty after they have discharged their cargoes at Montreal. They will have to crawl up through those long canals at the rate of four knots an hour, load grain at Fort William and crawl back again. I am convinced that they will never pay. They would also require larger crews.

I was struck with a sentence in an address delivered by Mr. Keefer of Port Arthur, to a body of business men of Montreal in regard to this matter. Many hon. members know that Mr. Keefer is, perhaps, one of the strongest exponents of this project, and in speaking before that body of men, he confessed that it was not likely that any great number of boats would traverse the ocean and proceed to Fort William and Port Arthur to load grain. He said: "A few boats may do so, will do so, but not very many." And I am convinced that that is so. It is really a fatuous dream to imagine that Port Arthur or Fort William is going to become an ocean port.

Like my hon .friend from Fort William and Rainy river, I am a little inclined to think Montreal might make a mistake in opposing this too strongly. I am not going to oppose the St. Lawrence river project; but I would oppose constructing it now, and especially on the strength of resolutions passed and letters written by those who believe they are going to gain eleven cents a bushel. I have sympathy with those who live near the St. Lawrence and believe that as a great international project, this would be a good thing —they will get their power cheaper, the power will in time pay for the project, and Canada will be better thereby. I am willing to listen very sympathetically to what they have to say; but if they are the people who want it, let those people ask for it. I believe the people of the West, if left alone, do not want it now.

Being unprepared and since this question has come up in this way, I shall not have more to say on this subject, but I am pleased that the government are taking the course they are. There are many matters involved, such as the lowering of the water.

5 p.m.

I understand a delegation was here a few days ago from Goderich claiming that the diversion of water at Chicago had caused a lowering of the level of water at the elevator there by either one and one-half or two and one-half feet, I am not sure which. They thought that a sufficient reason of complaint to justify them in coming to Ottawa about it. All these matters are involved, and it is well to go very carefully, to measure every step before we take it. But eventually the project should, and I believe it will, be carried out.

Mr. E. C. ST. PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): I have listened, Mr. Speaker, very attentively to the splendid statement of claims made, on behalf of Montreal and its surroundings, by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault). I represent, Sir, as you are aware, a large Montreal division most interested in the Maritime import and export trade; I, therefore, deem it my duty to rise in this House and set forth some of the reasons which justify the opposition of my constituents to the St. Lawrence waterway scheme.

The various opinions expressed heretofore, regarding this project are worthy of being considered. Hon. members representing Montreal and the province of Quebec are not alone in disapproving of this scheme and if we look outside of this House, we find that Governor Smith, of New York State, is entirely opposed to this scheme, so highly extolled within the last few months, a scheme which has been given widespread publicity in the newspapers, a scheme which is approved, morally at least, by a large proportion of the population of Ontario, and also by the majority of the population of the west. It is true, that this project is of American origin, it was conceived in the states of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, the two Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming, Kansas, Nebraska and Colorado. No doubt, the western provinces are interested, however, as it was stated just now, and much to the purpose, by the speaker who preceded me, in these days when all preach economy, the West is not particularly desirious that this scheme should immediately take definite shape.

We have heard the probable cost of this new waterway scheme discussed. I followed attentively, just now, the argument of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) who was trying to establish that the cost of this undertaking would not be much more than $250,000,000. Well, Sir, we must, in this House, speak plainly and discuss this question in a businesslike way; to the $250,000,000 which this undertaking is supposed to cost, must be added the interests as long as the system of canals is under construction, and so far as I have been able to judge, there is not one engineer, having made a survey of the ground who is in a position to state in a definite manner that the carrying out of this scheme will take place within a limited time. We are told, however, that the work on the St. Lawrence waterway would last from ten to twenty-five years; if we add to the cost of construction the compound interest, I leave it to you, Sir, to figure out what this scheme will have cost us when completed.

Governor Allan, of the state of Kansas, the greatest champion of this project, states that the United States would, using the St. Lawrence waterway, try and find a market for 200,000,000 tons of merchandise. After having made inquiries from a great number of shippers in my county, I can state positively. that it is absolutely impossible to find any other markets than those at present existing: London, New York, Liverpool, Hamburg and Montreal. Where could this new market be found for 200,000,000 tons of merchandise? That is the question.

We have read, here and there, that the electric power developed, by the St. Lawrence waterway scheme, would be sufficient to defray the cost of this undertaking. We should, Sir, accept such a statement, only if it can be proven that it is possible to find a market for the electric power so developed. This still remains to be shown.

I am aware that our western farmers have had somewhat to suffer, up to the present, from demurrage charges at the ports where the wheat is unloaded, and this source of complaint will disappear in the future, because we have built quite recently, at Montreal, in my division, a $10,000,000 elevator. This very up to date elevator is designed to store all the wheat that the western farmers may send us, and will facilitate the rapid loading of all the ocean steamers which may come to Montreal during the autumn season, to fetch the wheat destined to the European markets.

I must admit that I place very little reliance in the good-will of our neighbours to the south, when it is a question of business. I am not convinced that our neighbours favour the St. Lawrence waterway scheme with the idea of ensuring to our merchant marine the benefit of this new wheat transportation route. I see but one object which can urge them on to press for the carrying out of this undertaking: it is the development of the water powers. I was reading quite recently, in an American magazine, that Mr. Ten Eyck, an ex-congressman, suggested to his government the building of a new canal extending from Oswego to Troy. Can we reasonably suppose that our friends the Americans would take advantage of the St. Lawrence route and neglect the one extending from Oswego to Troy, and thence to New York by the Hudson river, simply to give proof of their good-will towards us? What our American friends covet above all, is our water powers. We have, up to now, suffered enough owing to the Rush-Bagot Treaty, without further making the mistake of going blindly into such an undertaking by handing to our neighbours advantages which we should keep for ourselves.

All public bodies, Sir, of the province of Quebec, and even the government itself of that province, are strongly opposed to that project. I share their opinion. Montreal is, to-day, a large sea port, which desires to expand, and, within five years, I feel certain, it will extend as far as St. Therese island. If Montreal is, at the present time, considered as one of the five large distributing centres of the world, I fail to see why we should hinder its progress by adopting—even in principle, I might say—a scheme which might have such a harmful result as to injure the great metropolis of Canada.

I am therefore acting as the spokesman for all the public bodies of Montreal; I am acting as spokesman for all those who, in my division, earn their living in the shipping business; I am acting as spokesman for all those who are truly working in the interest of the Montreal harbour. I approve, without reserve, the opinions advocated by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) and I beg the government to act with caution in this affair. And if, some day, a similar project is introduced, I will again side with the hon. members for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) and Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) to request that the Georgian Bay canal scheme be substituted for that of the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): Representing the constituency which would benefit most by the building of the Georgian Bay ship canal, I wish to say a few words before this discussion is concluded. I am one of those who believe that the commission which is to be named by the government will demonstrate to the satisfaction of our western friends, and to all those who are interested in the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway, the economic impossibility of that project, and that the development of the electrical power on the St. Lawrence is as a matter of fact the real objective of the great propaganda which has been in progress for several years. One of the reasons for the desire to have water-power developed on the St. Lawrence is the necessity that exists to-day for more electrical power in eastern Ontario. I maintain, however, that the building of the Georgian Bay ship canal would supply all the power needed in eastern Ontario, and at a very much cheaper rate than it could be developed along the St. Lawrence. The building of the Georgian Bay ship canal would enable us to develop 1,000,000 horse power, which would be available to eastern Ontario and Quebec, and would also provide an all-Canadian water route, should it ever become necessary, for the grain from the west at a rate every bit as low as that which could be obtained on the St. Lawrence waterway. Furthermore, it would enable Canadians to have absolute control of the grain rates, giving them an all water route to the sea. The Georgian Bay ship canal is a problem that has been discussed in this House for many years, and it has been declared by engineers as perfectly feasible. There is no doubt in my mind that had the United States possessed the same natural advantages, the Georgian Bay ship canal would have been built long ago. Northern Ontario is on the eve of one of the greatest mineral developments Canada has ever known. The potential wealth of that great north country is just being brought before the world. Within the next ten or fifteen years there will be a greater industrial and mineral development in northern Ontario than has ever taken place in any similar area in the world. The deepening of the Georgian Bay ship canal would give an impetus to the healthy development of the vast natural resources of that country and would no doubt stimulate the development of our rich iron deposits there.

In discussing this problem Mr. W. F. Tye, who has made a thorough study of our waterways, expressed the following opinion:

> With the rapid depletion of the high grade iron ores, and the increase in the cost of coal which must come from the great waste and rapid exhaustion of the easily mined high grade seams, the great advantages possessed by Pittsburgh and the Ohio valley as a manufacturing centre will disappear. With the disappearance of the great advantage now enjoyed by Pittsburgh will come Canada's great opportunity.
> The construction of the Georgian Bay canal will develop a very large amount of water power. It is conservatively estimated that the Ottawa and its tributaries will give 3,000,000 horse-power equivalent in power requirements to the mining of 40,000,000 tons of coal per annum. This water power, unlike coal, can never be exhausted, and with the rapid depletion of the coal and iron in the United States, and with the enormous horse-power of the Ottawa and its tributaries and the low grade iron ores of the Ottawa valley, it is easily possible that in years to come the great manufacturing centre of this continent may be transferred from the Ohio valley to the Ottawa valley. There is no reason why it should not if the people of Canada have the enterprise to make it so. For such reasons as this I believe that the construction of the Georgian Bay canal is a national necessity. I do not mean to say that the construction of the Georgian Bay canal will at once transform the Ottawa valley into a great manufacturing centre, but it will make it possible, as with abundance of iron ore, abundance of the cheapest and best power in the world with a deep draft canal permitting ocean freighters to penetrate into the heart of the Ottawa valley, there seems to be no reason why it should not become in time as great a manufacturing district as any in the world.

The Georgian Bay ship canal would give all the electrical energy required in eastern Ontario for many years to come. Lower down the St. Lawrence, the district of Montreal has all the water-power it will require for the next quarter of a century.

The development of the St. Lawrence waterways would entail a tremendous expenditure, which would simply augment the stupendous burden this country is already struggling under. The electrical power so generated would have to be transmitted to the United States. As we know, this would lead to the establishment of great industries there, and they having once enjoyed the privilege of receiving this power we should have to continue to supply their needs right along.

In a statement by Sir Adam Beck, Chairman of the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, on the possibilities of the Ottawa river for power development, made before the Railway committee of the House of Commons in 1912 he said:

> The Ottawa river must be the backbone of the supply of electricity to the province of Ontario. We are limited on the St. Lawrence by treaty obligations, and we must depend on one great source of supply, the Ottawa.

We of northern Ontario believe that before any steps are taken for joint international ownership of our great St. Lawrence waterway further study should be given to the merits of the Georgian Bay ship canal. Its construction would mean the development of 36,000 horse-power on the French river and would make it possible for boats to come further inland and supply the coal needs of northern Ontario; it would also serve as an outlet for the pulpwood and timber of that country. In the opinions of those who have studied the development which has already taken place in the north country within the last ten years, it would be a great deal more in the interest of the people of Canada as a whole that the Georgian Bay ship canal should be built in preference to any other similar project.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, the discussion on this motion has taken the trend of opposition to the St. Lawrence waterway, and in the case of the last speaker (Mr. Lapierre) of advocacy of the Georgian Bay ship canal. Coming from the centre of the province as I do, it would naturally be expected that I should discuss these rival projects, but I do not intend to do so. I only want to bring to the attention of hon. members that the subject raised this afternoon is the development of water-powers on the St. Lawrence, and I would point out, as I did the other day incidentally, that those who are seeking this development are not concerned in the propaganda which has prevailed in the West for the deepening of the waterway, nor are they behind that propaganda. We believe the time has arrived when electricity is essential to the needs of eastern Ontario, and that the development of this power should not depend upon either the Georgian Bay ship canal or the St. Lawrence waterway route.

The government of Ontario is anxious to develop electricity for the eastern portion of the province, and will undertake to carry out such development at its own cost. That is the point I want to impress upon the House to-day. Eastern Ontario has been very generous in its attitude towards the other parts of the province. We stepped aside while hydro-electric power was being developed at Niagara Falls for western Ontario; but we can stand aside no longer—electricity is vitally necessary to eastern Ontario. We have no large industrial centres there, outside of Kingston and a few smaller towns, so the industrial aspect is not of first importance. The primary desire is to have electricity to serve the needs of the settled part of eastern Ontario, principally those of our agriculturists. The development of electrical power on the Georgian bay ship canal would be absolutely useless to us. I do not know what the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) has in mind, but any power development north of the city of Ottawa could not be transmitted to the people of eastern Ontario in an economical way. Ottawa has all the power it wants or will want, but lying along the St. Lawrence river there are very thickly settled parts of Ontario where electricity is required by people living in small towns, and by farmers, and they need it now, not ten, fifteen or twenty years hence. Moreover, the erection of dams for this purpose will not, judging by what the engineers say, interfere in any way with navigation. As an example of this, I would point to the case of the Mississippi River Power Company, which is developing power on the Mississippi by means of a dam, with no resulting interference. I know that some time will be required for the consideration of the question whether or not the canal project is to go on, but I want to impress upon the government that the development of electricity is a matter of great importance to the part of eastern Ontario to which I have referred, and that is a need that the carrying out of the Georgian Bay project or anything else of that kind will not supply. Ontario is anxious to meet this need—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does my hon. friend say that the building of dams for the supplying of electricity as he suggests will not affect the level of the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Others who have spoken this afternoon have pointed out that they are not engineers; neither am I an engineer. But in 1913 the engineers of the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario stated that the erection of dams would not cause that interference, and I am pointing to an example, that of the Mississippi Power Company, which is developing many hundred thousand horse-power.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am not ready to take the word of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission's engineers.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): If any other commission can succeed as well or can get the results which they have obtained, their word should go a long way. I would direct the attention of the government to one other important point, namely, the change of water level along the Great Lakes. The water has gone down not two feet but three or four feet, and the emptying of the drainage and so on is going to be a great menace. The question is a very serious one which the government should take up at once, because the lowering of the water level must expose sewage, with resulting menace to the people of Ontario and of other parts of Canada, and to people of the United States as well. If this condition continues for another year I should not be surprised to see some very serious epidemics in this country.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to prolong this debate any further. There is, indeed, very little to add after the splendid speech of the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault). I cannot, however, resist the temptation of protesting against the press campaign which is, at present, being carried on in the United States and Ontario, in favour of the St. Lawrence waterway scheme, I think that the time is ill-chosen—when the people of this country are uniting in a retrenchment campaign to insist on the carrying out of such a project, which would cost hundreds of million dollars. The right hon. Prime Minster (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that it was simply a question of holding an inquiry, so as to judge whether the time was ripe for this undertaking. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) further stated, the other day, that this scheme will never be carried out so long as it has not been established that the level of the St. Lawrence will not be affected, and, he further stated that the rights of all the provinces would be protected. We are continuously being refused necessary improvement for our counties, because Canada is not in a financial position to undertake these improvements, and I cannot, under these circumstances, see the utility of this inquiry. which will certainly cost the country many thousand dollars.

The speakers who have preceded me in this debate have pointed out that each time we had disputes with the United States, they have never been settled to the advantage of Canada; the Americans have always succeeded in having their claims acknowledged to our detriment. We must, therefore, be on our guard against such a desire of seeing this project carried out immediately. At all events, Sir, if it was established that an undertaking of this nature is in the interests of Canada, I would rather favour the building of the Georgian Bay canal which would give us an entirely Canadian route. The Georgian Bay canal would create a waterway just as advantageous to the western provinces, and, according to the report of engineers, would facilitate the development of all the water powers of which we are in need, just as well as the St. Lawrence waterway, and it would greatly benefit both northern Ontario and northern Quebec which contain minerals and forests in abundance. The construction of the Georgian Bay canal has been urged for a great number of years, long before we ever heard of the St. Lawrence waterway, and, had it not been for our participation in the war, which brought on a disastrous financial crisis, I am certain that the government would have already begun the construction of that canal. Our financial situation does not permit, at present, the carrying out of that project, which would however be far less costly than the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. It is, nevertheless, a fact that the first great national undertaking that the government will be called upon to carry out, will be the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. All citizens of this country would gladly see the realization of this project which would establish a waterway located entirely on Canadian territory, of which we could be complete owners and not have to share the privileges and responsibilities with our neighbours to the south.

Before closing my remarks, Sir, I would request the government to proceed slowly and with caution and not to carry out the St. Lawrence waterway before it is clearly shown that this project will turn to the advantage of Canada.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I wish to say a word in support of my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) in his desire that the government should go slowly in entering into any contract with the United States for the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway. The history of international canals has not been such that a country, particularly a small country should hasten into a contract with a larger country. The history of the Suez canal and of the Panama canal will show that both the countries through which they were constructed lost control of the territory through which the canals ran, and it is quite possible that the same thing may happen to us with regard to the St. Lawrence deep waterway if we consent to make the St. Lawrence an international waterway. It is conceivable that at some future time the United States may be at war with some country and that Canada would wish to be neutral but it would be impossible for Canada to obstruct the passage of ships along the St. Lawrence of any country that might be at war with the United States; and vice versa, if Great Britain were at war with Japan, and the United States were friendly with Japan or neutral, I do not see how we could stop their ships from using this international waterway into the Great Lakes. There are many phases of this subject that require very careful consideration before we enter into a contract with the Americans for the construction of this canal. There is no doubt that the canal would be a good thing for the interior of the North American continent. It would mean cheaper transportation and better facilities for all that country. But we have an alternative route in the Georgian Bay canal that would answer the purpose very much better from the Canadian standpoint. My hon. friend the member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) pointed out that there were some 30,000,000 people tributary to the great cities on the Great Lakes.

Mr. BROWN: Has there been any estimate made of the cost of the Georgian Bay canal?

Mr. CAHILL: An estimate was made some years ago, and it was put at about $100,000,000.

Mr. BROWN: For what depth of water?

Mr. CAHILL: I cannot give my hon. friend the exact depth, but it was to be deep enough for ocean-going vessels.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Twenty-five feet.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River pointed out that there were some 30,000,000 people tributary to the territory around the Great Lakes, but those people would be from three to four hundred miles closer to the St. Lawrence outlet by way of the Georgian Bay canal than by way of the St. Lawrence waterway; that is, between Fort William or Chicago and Montreal the Georgian Bay route would be shorter by about three hundred miles than the St. Lawrence route.

So far as power is concerned, there is ample power in the Ottawa river for many, many years. It was estimated by the engineers in charge of the survey of that waterway that about 1,000,000 horse power could be developed within a reasonable radius of the city of Ottawa. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Ross) was talking of the necessity for power in his district. If he will come to my county he will find he can get power there at $12 per horse-power, which is cheap, if not cheaper than it can be had at any place in Ontario. We can develop power along the Ottawa river cheaper than it can be developed at any point in Canada. The Ottawa has numerous streams emptying into it over the Laurentian range which give a great deal of water power, all tributary to the Ottawa river as well as the power that can be developed on the Ottawa river itself. The Georgian Bay canal could be developed for less than the Canadian proportion of the St. Lawrence waterway, and it would be through all Canadian territory and under our absolute control, and therefore would involve no international complications. I am not saying that the government should rush into the building of the Georgian Bay canal at this moment, but if they are not prepared to build the Georgian Bay canal, they certainly should not commit themselves to the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway at this time. The Georgian Bay canal has been advocated for a great many years, and plans were prepared very carefully by eminent engineers, and I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am more converted than ever to the power of the press and of propaganda when the Canadian people have been brought to the point where they will seriously consider the St. Lawrence deep waterway in opposition to the Georgian Bay canal. A few years ago the Georgian Bay canal was the only proposal of this kind that was discussed in this country, before the great West was populated as it is to-day, and before it was producing the wheat it does to-day, but apparently this scheme has been dropped. There has been no appeal made to the people of the West to support the Georgian Bay canal as a cheap grain route to the East. The advocates of the St. Lawrence waterway have taken up that project and have campaigned vigorously in favour of it throughout the West, distributing literature and doing propaganda work until they have convinced a great number of people in western Canada and the western states that the St. Lawrence deep waterway would be the thing.

Mr. SALES: They have not convinced many in the West.

Mr. CAHILL: I trust the members of this House will consider the advisability of recommending to the government at the earliest possible date the construction of the Georgian Bay canal.

Mr. GOULD: I hope the hon. gentleman recognizes that the sentiment he spoke of in the West in favour of the St. Lawrence scheme does not represent western opinion.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the House I desire to move that this debate be suspended and that we now go into Committee of Supply for the purpose of putting through an Interim Supply Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it that it is the unanimous wish of the House that the debate be suspended for this purpose.

Motion agreed to.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

That a sum not exceeding $40,871,970.85 being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1925, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1925.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): A few years ago, there would have been a very, very fierce debate upon a resolution of this kind. The House would have been held up, and it would have been necessary, in order to do business, to find some method of choking off talk which was made for the purpose of preventing the ordinary business of the country from being carried on. But the years have passed and they have brought changes, some sad and some happy ones, and a happy change at any rate in this respect that there will be no attempt made to hold up public business. A few years ago, if we had the situation where parliament met for business in March, we would have heard very, very indignant speeches, and some of the most indignant and most forcible would have come from my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to the neglect of the government to call the House earlier and expedite public business. But, Mr. Chairman, we recognize that the country's business ought not to be held up by reason of government defaults and failures. If a contrary view prevailed, I am afraid an awful lot of things would be held up. And therefore on behalf of the official opposition, we consent to the usual grant for interim supply being now made, with the usual stipulation that all votes are open to consideration and censure. Everything is left wide open, as though this vote had not been passed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You do it gracefully.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1925, the sum of $40,871,970.85 be granted out of the consolidated revenue of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. ROBB moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20 for granting to his Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1925.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I assume this bill is in the standard form.

Mr. ROBB: I understand so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And that the grant is one-sixth the amount of the estimates as tabled.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under that assurance, Mr. Chairman, there is no objection.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS TOWER

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works: Before returning to the previous order, may I table a report asked for in debate? One is the settlement with the architects, and the other the original cost.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

The House resumed the debate on the resolution of Mr. Archambault.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I can say in a few minutes all I wish to say on behalf of the government on this motion. The motion is entirely in accord with the government's own policy of getting as much information as possible before proceeding in any official way with this great project, and also of having the public as fully informed as possible on all the aspects and bearings of the question. The hon. member (Mr. Archambault) who has introduced the resolution has spoken very emphatically of the many important considerations which this country should take into account before concluding any treaty as far-reaching as a treaty relating to the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway would be, and the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) who has just taken his seat has made mention of one consideration, namely the international complications that may arise at any time, which also helps to illustrate how important it is that every aspect and possible bearing on the question should be fully considered before anything in the nature of finality is submitted to parliament or is accepted by the government. It is for that reason the government has decided to appoint a national committee to advise on just such matters as have been referred to by hon. members who have spoken. The government recognizes that this is perhaps as large an undertaking as the country has ever been called upon to consider, and our view is there should be a national committee composed of outstanding citizens in whom the public at large will have confidence and to whom the government may look for careful, thoughtful advice in regard to the different aspects of the question. I may say I mentioned this matter a few days ago; my remarks will be found in Hansard of March 17, page 357.

The government has agreed to refer to an enlarged joint engineering board just such questions as the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) has mentioned, namely, the practicability of this scheme, its cost, and particularly the effect upon the river and lake levels. That will be an expert technical board which will report on that particular phase. The government has also appointed a small interdepartmental committee composed of officers of the departments of Railways and Canals, Marine and Fisheries, Public Works, Interior, Trade and Commerce, and Finance, to assemble such information as is contained in the departments of the government, and also to go carefully into this project from the point of view of the knowledge which government officials have in regard to it. These are all steps in the nature of caution, and if anything more is needed, it will be found in my announcement the other day that the government would not think for a moment of committing the country to any project as great as this, involving so much for both the present and the future as this project does, without first submitting the whole matter to parliament for its consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Archambault) replies, there are one or two remarks that ought to be made. In the first instance, it seems to me that, perhaps, it would be wiser if we had not so many declarations from government supporters of absolute opposition to the scheme, when the whole of this matter is to be left very largely in the hands of government employees to say whether the project shall go on or not. If we are to have this investigation, it would be just as well that the engineers investigated it without a threat over their heads or the dice being loaded. In the second instance, it seems rather extraordinary that hon. gentlemen find so much difficulty in having truck and trade with the Americans in connection with a matter which can be very easily made definite, permanent and binding, while on the other hand, they are prepared to hand over the whole of the country's markets to those same gentlemen merely on the face of a gentleman's agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does my hon. friend get authority for his last statement?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think we need go very far to find it. We have only to refer to the old Reciprocity pact that my right hon. friend talks so much about which could have been changed the day after it was written as regards the American market.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would have been a good thing for this country if it had been carried out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it is really a mistake that we should talk in utter ignorance of the facts. One hon. gentleman said that the grain rate from Prescott to Montreal would be probably two cents, and much lower if the proper through rate was considered. He forgot that he was talking about eastern territory where rates have not been cut down by any Crowsnest pass agreement.

As a matter of fact, the grain rate from Prescott to Montreal is thirteen cents a hundred pounds, so it would be just as well if we were to find out the facts.

Mr. ROBB: Such nonsense!

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I challenge my hon. friend to deny the authenticity of that statement.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member is quoting the rail rate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly, the rail rate, and that was the rate that was quoted before. It would be really just as well, if we are leaving this case fairly to those engineers, that we should leave it without expressions of opinion on matters of which we know nothing.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault). This resolution aims at deferring the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. I congratulate the mover on the splendid outline he has given us on the subject. In my opinion, the government was quite right to appoint a special commission with instruction to look into the report of the International Joint Commission previously appointed. The St. Lawrence waterway project has such far reaching effects. Canada and the United States, at present, have gone so far into the matter that we cannot give too much study to the reasons invoked by one or the other party. It is quite proper that Canada should be cautious and not venture in such an undertaking without having first foreseen all the consequences. It cannot be denied, this project will entail an enormous expenditure. In the original reports, the engineers claim that the canal system of that part of the St. Lawrence river, between lake Ontario and Montreal, would cost at least $252,000,000; if, however, we take into consideration the whole scheme,—from the Great Lakes to the ocean,—it is quite certain that an undertaking of this nature would reach into the billions of dollars.

Lately, the members of parliament have been receiving numerous pamphlets, some favourable, others unfavourable to the scheme. When this question was first launched, I am convinced that the most interested parties were not citizens of this country, but rather citizens of certain states situated in the neighbouring republic.

In this country, in western Ontario as well as in the western provinces the necessity of such an undertaking has not been felt. No request, that I know of, has been made by those provinces.

Have we not all the means of communication that we need? Have we not, to-day, numerous and well equipped railways, that have cost a great deal to this country, which, nevertheless, are too numerous, considering our present population? Have we not spent millions of dollars in establishing a canal system on the St. Lawrence? We have canals which are necessary to us, also means of transportation by rail. It is therefore, not in Canada, but rather in the United States that such a request originated. The St. Lawrence waterway would be constructed from lake Ontario to the ocean, nine tenths of it on Canadian territory, that is to say, that there would only be one tenth of the St. Lawrence waterway which would be located between the United States and Canada. This afternoon, the hon. member for Kingston) (Mr. Ross) claimed that eastern Ontario was deficient in water-powers so as to distribute cheap electricity in its rural districts. If that is what is needed, I think it will be possible to solve the problem in another way and that it will not be necessary to undertake the work on the St. Lawrence waterway. Already, in eastern Ontario, part of the electricity is supplied by the St. Lawrence water powers, such as the Cedar Rapids plant. The Ottawa river can supply that hydraulic power. The development of the water power at Carillon alone would suffice to supply electricity to all eastern Ontario.

This project supported by the government would be to the benefit of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. It would be necessary to dam the Ottawa river at Carillon, so as to develop this source of electric power and place it, at a reasonable figure, on the markets of the province of Ontario as well as the province of Quebec.

No great haste exists to carry out an undertaking of such magnitude. We have been at peace for a century with our neighbours to the south and it would be wrong to court occasions for misunderstandings, because this project might have the effect of wiping out the century old "entente mutuelle."

I again state, Sir, I share entirely the opinion so eloquently expressed by the hon.

member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) against the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. On the other hand, if the finances of the country were in a better condition, I do not think there would be a more popular project than the famous Georgian Bay canal.

We have not reached that stage; but I hope in the near future the finances of Canada will allow the government to carry out this project.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): In the debate on the Address the suggestion was made by some hon. gentlemen that there had been a great deal of propaganda in the West for the deepening of the St. Lawrence; and there is no doubt in my mind that, if this work were done and at some time in the future we found this country saddled with a debt of $300,000,000 or even more, we might be told that it was western Canada that had launched this scheme. It is well for the House to remember, therefore, just what has been the attitude of hon. members from the West during the past three sessions of parliament whenever this matter has been discussed in the House upon resolution introduced by any member from the city of Toronto. So although there may be a good deal of propaganda on behalf of the scheme in the West, especially in my constituency this year, it is as well to remember that at least two years ago there had been already organized in the East an effective propaganda for the same purpose. In order to show that sometimes our friends in the East endeavour to saddle the West with the responsibility of initiating the project, I shall quote from an article which recently appeared in the Port Arthur Chronicle:

> Swift Current has the honour of being the first organized municipality in western Canada to take up earnestly the cause of the St. Lawrence deep waterways scheme and place it before the people of western Canada as a feasible and desirable public work.
> From Swift Current there recently was issued a little booklet written and published by Mr. Bennett, at his own expense, telling of the benefits that will accrue to the whole country through the development of the St. Lawrence system.
>
> This pamphlet is already beginning to bear fruit as witness the formulation of the first St. Lawrence Canal Association in the West.
> Not only should this national waterway be improved for the benefit that it would bring to the grain growers of western Canada, but as a link to bind the separated parts of the Dominion into one whole.
> Swift Current is to be commended for the honour it has done itself and Canada, and may nothing stand in the way of the movement spreading from that town to all parts of western Canada.

It would seem from this article that the original propagandists wished to place the burden and the responsibility for the proposed development upon western Canada, and I am simply rising in my place to emphasize the fact that similar propaganda had already been organized two years before the appearance of this article and before any organization was attempted in Swift Current. I have the honour of representing Swift Current, and it is true that a great many municipalities and boards of trade in my constituency have already expressed themselves in favour of the immediate construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway scheme. But I do not altogether agree with some hon. members who reflect upon the intelligence of these western municipalities and boards of trade, for I do not think it is fair to assert that no investigation into the merits has taken place. We know that the scheme has already been investigated and reported upon. However, I am heartily in accord with the government's decision to institute a fuller and more specific investigation into the merits of the scheme. As showing the absolute necessity for this further investigation, we heard this afternoon an hon. member from my side of the House state that from a certain port in Ontario they could carry grain to Montreal for four cents, while shortly afterwards he was contradicted and told that it would be a matter of thirteen cents.

Mr. MILLAR: Is my hon. friend aware that I stated a fact and made an estimate? My fact was that grain is hauled long distances at a cent and a fraction a bushel. Does he deny that fact? As to my estimate, there is no similar condition with which to make a comparison where so many factors would be brought together all tending towards a lower rate. And, this being so, I made an estimate, which may be wrong, and yet it may be right. But does my hon. friend recognize that it was an estimate?

Mr. LEWIS: I am quite willing to admit that the hon. member has made an estimate, and I was not calling attention to it as such, I was simply endeavouring to show that figures on both sides have been used very freely. One article says there would be a saving of 10 or 11 cents between Port Arthur and Montreal when we know from the government figures that the entire rate from Port Arthur to Montreal was only 10.91 cents on the average in 1923. I was emphasizing the need for special investigation to show definitely what the real saving would be, and I called attention to the figure quoted by the hon. member to show that we were using figures in a very loose manner. When you are considering a scheme that would involve the country in the expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars it is not wise to rely upon estimates only; we want to be certain that there is going to be a saving if the scheme is adopted.

I do not think that Montreal need fear the loss of much traffic, because Montreal is three hundred miles nearer to Liverpool than New York, and if the St. Lawrence waterway development scheme is undertaken there is no doubt that a great deal of freight would pass over it from the sixteen middle western states. That would assist Montreal a great deal; in other words, the volume of business would necessarily be increased. I heartily commend the government for wisely staying their hand in this matter for the time being, especially when there is a demand for economy. I hope the investigation will be full and in detail and that there will be no political pull or interference in any way so that an investigation may be held which will result in a sane report setting forth to the whole of Canada, the East as well as the West, the benefits that would result from the development of this great scheme.

There is another point that I would like to emphasize. If the proposal originated in the United States and involves chiefly the development of power which they so much need, I do not think the Canadian people should be burdened with the cost of it. But if it can be proved that there are advantages on both sides, that we shall have our share of the power and that benefit will accrue to the Canadian people as a result of the devolopment, then I hope the time will come when we shall be able to afford the expenditure necessary to carry the project to a conclusion.

Mr. J. A. DENIS (Saint Denis) (Translation): I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to take up the time of the House and prolong uselessly the debate on this question. Representing one of the large electoral divisions of the metropolis of Canada, I deem it my duty to strongly protest against this St. Lawrence waterway scheme. The St. Lawrence river is the source of the prosperity and great development of the city of Montreal, and all which may affect this river is of vital importance to my fellow citizens. Considering the financial situation of the country, it does seem to me inadvisable to take up just now the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. I must, by the way, congratulate the government for having so clearly understood the present situation and endeavoured to economize, and, still more economize in order to extricate the country from the chaos in which it was so deeply plunged by the late Tory —Conservative government.

I wish, Sir, to assure my hon. friend, the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), and my hon. friend the member for Hochelaga (Mr. St. Père), who also represents one of the large industrial and manufacturing divisions of Montreal, that I entirely share their views and that I shall, like them, strongly oppose this scheme which, in my opinion, would greatly prejudice the interests of the Canadian metropolis, and would, in no way, facilitate the cheap transportation of western wheat. If the Progressives are sincerely striving to better their lot, I think that instead of supporting this scheme, they would be doing far better by supporting the Georgian Bay canal project. This route would greatly shorten the distance between Montreal and Fort William and would allow them to transport their wheat on better conditions and at reduced insurance rates. I am fully convinced that the whole country would benefit by this last project.

The government should endeavour to develop, first, the projects having a national import before thinking of international undertakings.

The aim of the St. Lawrence waterway scheme, is clearly to seize the water powers of the St. Lawrence river for the greater benefit of the United States. It is the duty of all the representatives of the large metropolis of Canada to strive to preserve this asset which the waters of the St. Lawrence represent to us, and prevent them from falling into other hands and thus endanger the future progress of our beautiful city.

I shall close my remarks, Sir, by congratulating the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères for having drawn the attention of the House to this important question, and for having given proof to the whole country that, to safeguard the national unity, we must not support the schemes which aim at favouring one section only of the country to the detriment of the others, but that we must work together for the common cause, the national welfare.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion on the order paper dealing with this same subject, and as the matter has been very thoroughly discussed here to-day, I should be very glad, with your permission, to withdraw the motion standing in my name and to confine my discussion of the subject to the present motion.

Two years ago a very admirable report was presented on this proposed scheme by a commission appointed by both governments. They heard evidence on both sides from the point of view of engineering, finance, traffic and so on. The report subsequently brought in emphasizes the fact that the St. Lawrence is one of the great natural waterways of the world.

The cost of the improvements will be divided between the two countries. The scheme is entirely practicable, according to the engineers, and the cost will be less than that of any other proposed route. The United States government, under the late President Harding, and under the present president in his message at the opening of congress, have taken very strong ground in support of this project. I do not think that anybody in Canada can find fault with the policy of the government to have a further inquiry, provided it be not too long delayed. On the United States side of the inquiry commission will be such men as Herbert Hoover. The report of the last commission has dealt with all phases of this question, but if there is any further information it is in the interest of the country that it be made known. This question should not be approached from any sectional standpoint. What should govern is the greatest good for the greatest number. It is one of the most important economic problems of the North American continent to-day and a right solution of that problem will mean a great deal to the future of Canada, not only eastern Canada but the country as a whole.

For the reasons I have given, and as the government has announced its policy, I support this resolution for the production of papers, and ask leave of the House to withdraw my motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) addresses the House, if any other hon. member desires to express his views on this question, the time is now. Meanwhile I will put the formal motion: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) shall have leave to withdraw his motion, No. 26?

Motion agreed to and resolution (Mr. Church) withdrawn.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, this motion being for the production of documents and the Prime Minister having assented to it, I shall refrain from answering the arguments made by hon. members who have spoken in the debate, reserving my right to discuss them if this question should arise on another occasion. I wish, however, to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion). He stated that during my address I said that the construction of a bridge between the city of Montreal and the south shore was more important than the project of the deepening of the St. Lawrence channel. I did not express it that way. What I stated was that it is very difficult for members in the present financial crisis to tell their constituents that many useful and reasonable local projects must be sacrificed because of the state of our finances, and it would be much more difficult in my own case to ask my constituents and those who live in the district of Montreal to refrain from asking the government to contribute directly in the building of that bridge if the government was to go into such an expensive undertaking as the deepening of the St. Lawrence channel. I am sure my hon. friend did not wish to misquote me, but probably the cause of his mistake was that I was speaking in French at the time, and I was not speaking Toronto French.

I also wish to answer one word of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). He compared the St. Lawrence project to the reciprocity pact of 1911 and waxed very indignant about the control of our markets that we were supposed to give to the United States by that pact. I may tell him that by the reciprocity pact we were not giving away any control of any kind to the United States, that in this project we are giving joint control to the United States over a most valuable asset of Canada, and in waxing indignant it was my hon. friend himself who lost control.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?—whether or not under present existing treaty rights of the United States that country now has the right of navigation in the inland waters?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes, there is no doubt that they have the right of navigation, but they cannot supervise navigation; they cannot build dams, for instance, or make rulings about navigation on the St. Lawrence. But if we were to adopt the project that my hon. friend likes so much we would give to the United States joint control over everything pertaining to the St. Lawrence, that is quite different.

Mr. MILLAR: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLAR: It is partly to put myself right. Unfortunately I was not in the chamber when reference was made to figures I quoted this afternoon. Reference has been made to present rates. May I ask the hon. member, who is more familiar with that route than I am, if he has ever known of a full carload of wheat being shipped from Prescott to Montreal.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I think there has been wheat shipped from Prescott to Montreal.

Mr. MILLAR: Was there ever a carload shipped that way?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I cannot say for certain. I do not see the point of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ROBB: I might say that some years ago, the Montreal Transportation Company built a very large elevator at Prescott, it is there yet, and millions of bushels have been put through that elevator. Some of the grain is shipped to Montreal by water and some by rail.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to appoint a Select Standing Committee to deal with all matters coming before the House which involve industrial relations.

He said: I am in the happy position of being able to introduce what I think is a non-contentious resolution. We have a number of standing committees in the House dealing with a great variety of subjects, banking, marine and fisheries, mines and minerals, railways and agriculture and so on. There is no committee charged particularly with questions with regard to labour and other matters affecting the relations of the people. It has seemed to me that there are a number of questions that might very well be sent to such a committee. We had last year amendments to the Criminal Code and Immigration Act which were sent to special committees. Some measures are being pressed this year that will have to be dealt with by committees. The government is becoming more and more related to the industrial life of the country. We have now our own national railway system; we are constructing a great many public works; and we have connections with various contracts which involve the Fair Wage clause and that kind of thing. It seems to me very necessary that there should be every facility given for discussion and understanding of these various questions in this House. We have been urging upon labourers and employers alike that, where possible, constitutional and parliamentary methods should be adopted in solving these problems. I take it, then, that we should have the machinery for a very full consideration of these questions. I have no intention whatever of arguing the case tonight. It seems to me the proposition itself is eminently a reasonable one. If the farmers feel in connection with their agriculture that they ought to have a committee, we in the Labour group feel that we might very well have a similar committee to deal with labour questions. I offer this as a suggestion to the government and the House, and would be very glad if the government could see its way to accept it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) was kind enough to mention to me before the House met this year that it was his intention to introduce a resolution of this kind, and he will recall I expressed to him the view that I hoped he would do so. I see no objection whatever to the object of the resolution. I would like, however, to point out to my hon. friend that we already have a very large number of select standing committees. I think the number of select standing committees in our parliament is about twice the number in the British House of Commons, although, of course, we have not more subjects or subjects of larger magnitude to consider. Each additional committee means something in the way of additional expense, not a very great expense to be sure, but nevertheless it does entail an extra clerk and stenographer or two, and other additional expense.

The government has been considering this matter and we feel that possibly the object my hon. friend has in view would be met, and a still larger object attained, if we were to consolidate two of the committees that are now separate committees, and form a new select standing committee on industrial relations; broadened, however, so as to make it not a standing committee on industrial relations only, but a committee also on international relations. Of recent years the importance of both of these classes of questions has very greatly increased. Members of the House will notice that more and more time has been taken up ever since the war with the discussion of international questions, such important matters for example as the one referred to in a question asked by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) relating to the Singapore base. There have been many questions relating to the matters that came before the Imperial Conference, and I venture to say that every few weeks we shall be discussing in this House some question of international import. It may well be that a select standing committee to consider these international questions would serve a very useful and helpful purpose. True, any subject can be referred under the rules of the House to almost any committee if there is relevancy at all, and so the House is not precluded from having any matter considered in a select standing committee, but there is an advantage, when committees are being chosen, in placing on each committee those members of the House who are likely to have a special interest in and a special knowledge of the questions to be discussed. I think the combination of industrial and international problems would be a very proper one. International questions deal in very large part with industrial matters, and certainly our industrial problems are becoming more and more international in character. To add a new select committee would require an amendment to Rule 10 of the House. That would require a couple of days' notice. But if members of the House generally approve of the idea, the government would be prepared to bring in an amendment to the rules suggesting a consolidation of two of the select standing committees and the formation of a new select standing committee on industrial and international relations. If that meets with the approval of my hon. friend I have no objection on behalf of the government in sanctioning the resolution as it stands.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To what extent would the minister substitute the statutory powers of the Minister of Labour by powers given to this committee? I notice they are to have full power to deal with all matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Powers to be given to this committee, I assume, are similar to powers given to other select standing committees; in regard to any matter that may be referred to the committee by parliament, the relations of the minister will be just what they are to-day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say that the suggestion of the Prime Minister appeals to me to be a most excellent one—far better than my original resolution,—and will carry out the purpose I had in mind.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the resolution pressed, or is it to be withdrawn?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it necessary to have an expression of opinion of the House? If not, I will simply withdraw the resolution.

Resolution withdrawn.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the abnormal deflation in the value of all farm products which has taken place since the year 1920 and which has been reflected particularly in the economic position of the returned men who have gone on the land under the provisions of the Soldiers Land Settlement Act, renders it imperative that immediate consideration be given to the question of a substantial reduction of their capital debt. And that a committee of this House be appointed to whom this matter may be referred with instructions to review the situation and report to parliament at the earliest possible date this session.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I introduce this motion only after having made a most exhaustive survey of the situation as it exists in my constituency, and also, since coming to Ottawa, after having surveyed the question from the broader aspect in discussions with various members of this House. I made that survey of my constituency and of other portions of Manitoba in company with, not only the local supervisors, but the district supervisor for Manitoba. Therefore, I introduce this question with a full realization of all that is involved in making a physical revaluation. If I were to suggest the measure that, I believe, would be in the best interest of the soldiers of my constituency and of the taxpayers of the Dominion of Canada, I would advocate a complete cancellation of the whole account. My reason for making that statement is this. After having made a survey of my constituency and after having secured figures from the various departments, I found that this condition prevailed in my constituency. There had been—I use the term "had," because I do not contend that the same amount is invested now—invested in that constituency through the Soldier Settlement Board, $2,750,000. Of that sum, on the 30th September last, abandonments had taken place to the amount of $600,000, of which the government or the board had been able to salvage only 18 per cent. If abandonments should continue for another two years at the same rate at which they have taken place during the last twelve months, we shall have lost all the returned soldiers but 15 per cent. That is the situation in my constituency. Therefore, if the abandonments continue at the same rate for another two years, we shall then be in exactly or almost the same position as we would be if we cancelled the entire account to-day. I am not, however, asking for cancellation of the entire account; I am asking for revaluation. Two years ago when a special committee sat considering these matters, I was one of the few members of this House who strongly advocated revaluation then. I think the chairman of that committee, whom I see in the House to-night, will recall that almost daily I waited upon him and urged that revaluation should take place; that I was sure it would have to take place some time. I think we have arrived at the time when revaluation is the only possible solution if we intend to retain the soldiers on the land. I secured some figures from the department at Ottawa on the question of abandonment and so forth, and I will give the figures for all the provinces in the Dominion:

	Percentage of abandonments
British Columbia	17
Alberta	19
Saskatchewan	14
Manitoba	25
Ontario	16
Quebec	34

That prosperous province!

	Percentage of abandonments
New Brunswick	23
Nova Scotia	15
Prince Edward Island	16

This makes an average of 18.1 per cent of abandonments. Nor does this tell the whole story. In discussing this question with the chairman of the Soldier Settlement Board at Ottawa the other day, I learned that the field supervisors, in submitting their reports, classified their soldiers something like this. There is a class that they call "good;" there is another class that they call "fair;" there is another class that they call "doubtful," and there is a fourth class that they term as "likely to quit." In the class that is likely to quit there were 12 per cent. If you add the 12 per cent of those who are likely to quit to the 18 per cent of those who have already quit, we have 30 per cent that have practically abandoned their farms. In the West we hear a great deal about mixed farming; in fact, to-day it is held out as the panacea for all our ills, and many of the soldiers in my constituency have attempted to readjust their position and tried mixed farming, but it has not stopped the exodus.

I have under my hand a report from the municipality of Lakeview which, I think, is in the constituency of Neepawa. In the Lakeview municipality there were settled 101 soldiers under the Soldier Land Settlement Act, of whom 53 have already abandoned their farms. One of the supervisors in my constituency advised me, just before I left for Ottawa, that 100 soldiers had left his district in the last twelve months.

I do not intend to go into this matter at any length to-night. Other members are present who, I know are anxious to say a few words on this particular question. I feel that with the situation as it exists to-day, there will be very little opposition to the matter of appointing a committee of this House, and we shall have an opportunity of discussing the question when the report of that committee, if one should be appointed, is submitted to the House. As the hour may be late when we conclude this debate, I do not intend to say more than merely to introduce this question, and I may have a few remarks to make in closing the debate. I would point out to the government, however, that if the purpose of the Soldier Settlement Act, namely, to establish the soldiers on the land, is to be effective, something must be done to build up the morale, to stimulate the hope and to improve the psychological condition of the soldiers. If something is not done, I am convinced that within two years from now, in Manitoba at least, we shall have lost practically all the soldiers.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the hon. gentleman gone into many of the reasons why, say, 18 per cent of our soldiers have left the land?

Mr. WARD: In making the survey that I mentioned at the outset of my remarks, I visited personally in the neighbourhood of one hundred soldiers' farms, went into their homes, talked the matter over with them and asked them why they were not able to make their farms pay. The question is simply one of high cost of production and low-priced products. Another reason that might be mentioned is that in many of the districts the soldiers were settled on land on which they should never have been settled. I have here the prices that were paid for land in the various provinces of Canada, and it may be interesting to hon. members to learn just how much was paid on the average in the West. In British Columbia the average price was $54 per acre; in Alberta $18 per acre; in Saskatchewan $17.50 per acre; in Manitoba $20 per acre; in Ontario $38, and in Quebec $30, the average over the whole lot being $22.50. In Manitoba, where the average price was $20.25, I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that no honest and practical man would value any of the land sold to the soldiers at more than $10 per acre. I am convinced of that. I believe that the land was sold to these men at prices that were at least 50 per cent more than should have been charged. I do not want to charge anything like wrong doing, because everything was inflated at that time. But there is no doubt whatever that these men paid altogether too much for the land they got. Land was greatly inflated then, and very high prices were paid for stock also, cows, for example, were selling then at $125 each, and I know of several teams of horses that were bought for returned men at as high as $500 and $550 apiece. It was exceedingly unwise, in the first place, to buy such expensive horses for the returned men going into the backwoods and on the frontiers; and high prices were paid for cows that are to-day worth not more than $20 apiece. This accounts largely for the failure of these men to meet their payments.

I want to reiterate, because of its importance, the fact that while the financial insolvency is a very serious matter, what I call the psychological insolvency is not less serious. Let me give an illustration of what I mean. I visited a home about a year ago last fall, and although the returned man himself was somewhat downhearted, at the same time his wife appeared to me to be rather elated; she had some hope of being able to augment the family budget, since she had decided to go into the raising of ducks. She raised 75 ducks last year, a beautiful flock of birds, and in the fall she crated them and shipped them to Winnipeg. In return she received a cheque that netted her 22 cents apiece for these ducks. You can imagine the pscychological effect of this circumstance upon that soldier's wife. Only the year before she had entertained high hopes of being able to help the family by providing the means for obtaining the necessary clothes and groceries which they would require. And this is what happened. I say, Mr. Speaker that the psychological conditions that surround the lives of a great many of the returned soldiers are such that it is impossible for them to carry on. I am sure that the House and the government will show in some way their appreciation of what the soldiers have done for us. Do not let us forget these men who went overseas and endured a virtual hell to save loved ones, homes and country and the lives of others who stayed at home fortifying ourselves against the days that were to come. I think that this parliament owes it to the returned men to show them every consideration which it possibly can. I will not take up more of the time of the House. but I beg to bring my remarks to a close with an expression of hope that the government will see its way clear to appoint a committee to go fully into the matter; and I shall be glad to give any information that I may possess, as I am sure other hon. members will be only too ready to do.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I wish to add a few words to what has been already said by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward). I think the hon. member is in a better position than any other hon. gentleman to speak for the province of Manitoba. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this is a subject, one might say, of almost tragic importance, and I desire the House to be fully seized of the situation and to know that all is not well with the soldier settlers. We have heard some glowing reports in regard to this matter, and while I do not suppose that they have been intentionally misleading, nevertheless it seems to me that this House should be made aware, as it is not, in my opinion, of the precise situation in reference to a great many of the returned soldiers out on their farms in the prairie provinces where I am acquainted. No doubt we have had right intentions so far as our dealings with the returned soldiers have been concerned. We are proud of the fact that no other country has done so much for those who went to the war as has the Dominion of Canada. However, we must not allow ourselves to feel that we have done all that we can do and that everything is all right. If anything can be done more than we have done we should seriously consider the matter and ascertain in what way we can relieve the situation of the returned men.

An hon. member on the other side of the House asked why the returned farmer soldiers had got into the condition in which they found themselves to-day. Well, it is not very difficult to answer that question. The House is continually hearing stories about the difficulties that confront the whole agricultural population of the country at the present time. We know that farmers who own their own farms, their own stock and implements, are experiencing great difficulty in keeping their heads above water, and when we reflect that the returned soldiers had to face a handicap when they went upon the land, I do not think we shall be surprised to find them in straitened circumstances today. There came to my office to-day a gentleman of ability, a man who had spent a number of years in the war. He told me that on his return he thought at first that he would find comparatively little difficulty in settling down; but, he added, so soon as he tried to buckle down he discovered that he could not, and it was quite a while before he was able to get into his stride. That is something that must be taken into consideration. We must remember, too, that a great many of these men were not highly experienced agriculturists, and they went upon the land because it offered an attraction: they naturally wanted to live an independent life and to earn an income that would support them. When the soldiers began to settle on the land in large numbers in 1919 and 1920, at the time the great bulk of the land and the stock and implements were bought, everything was at the highest price; things were higher then than they have been in the last fifteen or twenty years. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I am going to read some extracts from a few letters I have received. These letters are not anonymous; they are all signed, and while I will not give the names, I may say that the writers are all prominent business men in different towns in the province of Manitoba. The first is from the town of Eriksdale:

> In this district the settlers are having great difficulty to content themselves to stay with the farm as they realize that it is going to be a hard proposition to keep up these payments, for the number of years they will be obliged to, in order to clear themselves of the debt which is hanging over them.

The next comes from the town of Carman:

> Settlers are on the poorer land as the board would not purchase the best land at from $70 to $100 an acre. They will have a hard time paying for the land unless they go in for mixed farming, as it is very light.

I have another one from Eriksdale:

> There are very few if any soldier settlers in this neighbourhood making much progress as the majority started when prices were at their peak.

Another comes from Dominion City:

> Unless conditions are made much better for the farmer the land is not worth any more now than it was in 1913. Unless a change is made soon the soldiers can never make it pay, as they had to pay far too much to get a start.

The last one comes from Minnedosa:

> I yield to no one in my interest in the establishment of returned men on the farm, and speaking generally they have paid 33 per cent too much for everything.

This is signed by Hugh M. Dyer,—General Dyer, who made a name for himself in the war and who I am sure is a friend of the soldier. I have read these letters to show what is the general opinion all over the province of Manitoba as to the condition in which the farmers find themselves.

It is difficult enough for the soldiers, but the municipalities are suffering too. They are not able to collect taxes from these lands. As a result, in many districts in the province where soldiers have been settled, the schools are being closed and the children are receiving no education. We also find considerable debts due to the hospitals for treatment given soldier settlers and their dependents. I have a list before me of the various municipalities in Manitoba, with the number of soldier settlers and the number of those who have been forced to abandon their farms; but I will not deal with this because the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) has already given the percentages and I need not duplicate his remarks. But I find that the unpaid taxes in Manitoba—and this is not a complete list by any means—amount to about $42,000, while unpaid hospital bills run to over $3,000.

In order that the House may understand some of the circumstances that surrounded the purchasing of land for soldier settlers, let me give the figures respecting a quarter section. The land was obtained originally from the provincial government in 1906 for $720; in 1917 it was again sold for $1,760; but the Soldier Settlement Board paid $4,500 for the quarter section—a rise from $720 to $4,500. There is no doubt about these figures, and I can verify them at any time. If the original owner bought the land for $720, how in the world does anyone expect a soldier settler to be able to pay $4,500 for it, buy his stock and implements, and make a living? It is an utter impossibility, and the quicker the man gets off the land the better.

Mr. ROBB: What province was that in?

Mr. FORKE: Manitoba. I think there should be a thorough investigation. I am not blaming anyone for graft or other dishonest dealing. It is well known that the soldier settlers came into possession of their land, and bought their stock and implements when everything was at the peak. As I have already said, the farmer without any encumbrances on his land finds it difficult enough to make ends meet; but these poor men are up against an impossible proposition. When I think of some of these soldier settlers with their wives and families in the newer districts enduring hardships and confronted with many trials and difficulties, and then remember what the men did for us when the Empire was fighting for its very existence, I feel that we in our turn cannot do too much for them, and I would ask this House to institute a thorough investigation into all the circumstances, because I do not believe for a moment that our people wish to see the slightest injustice done to these veterans who were willing to sacrifice their lives that we might be free.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, having a goodly number of returned soldiers in my constituency, and knowing the condition in which many of them now find themselves, I cannot conceive of any resolution with which I am more heartily in accord. I will not dwell at great length on this question because it has already been pretty well covered. I believe the scheme was perfectly sound in its inception, but unfortunately it was started at a very bad time, at a time when land, horses, implements and everything else were at the peak and just starting to decline in value.

I have visited some of these returned soldiers, and they have appealed to me for support. A very great majority of them are very economical and hard-working men, and many of them are not as strong physically as they were before they went overseas. I have one man in mind now whom I visited last fall. He had a tidy place, and everything looked thrifty. He was not a strong man physically, in fact he was in a nervous condition, and probably he will never be as strong again as he used to be; and yet he was doing wonders, working long hours. He had built a cowshed of poles and straw, and although there was only about $45 worth of lumber in it, the result was a credit to any man. He was doing all that any farmer could possibly do to make a living, yet he was in financial difficulties.

In some cases the land purchased was not of good quality. The man I refer to was fortunate in having a sound knowledge of land and was able to pick a very choice quarter section, but where the men were not good judges they had to depend on inspectors of the Soldier Settlement Board to pick out their farms. The board itself at the outset had to take on untried men, and in some cases these men were not properly qualified for the duties required of them. Later on, I believe, this trouble was overcome, but in the meantime a goodly number of soldiers were placed on land that was not just suitable for farming. I do not know that anybody in particular was to blame, but that was the situation.

These men did their very best for us, they served us, as has been well said, faithfully and without stint. While some of us were able to profit by the war, these men sacrificed everything, and I should very much like to see this resolution taken seriously in order that we may help such deserving cases. Difficulties lie in the way, but I do not think they are insurmountable, and if we could have a revaluation made of the land and property it would give these men fresh hope and renewed courage to try to hold on to their farms. Otherwise they will slip away from this country the same as the 30 per cent already referred to. I have some letters also from returned soldiers somewhat similar to those read by my leader (Mr. Forke) but I do not think it is necessary for me to place them before the House. I wish to give the resolution my most hearty commendation and support.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman said that land was bought in his province for soldier settlers at the peak price. Does he mean to imply that it was bought at more than its ordinary market value?

Mr. MILLAR: No, for the most part it was bought at the regular price. Land, horses, everything was high; but in some cases land was bought for more than it was worth. I could give instances where land was bought at three times what it was worth, but these were isolated cases.

Mr. ARTHURS: I am sympathetic with the motion and am merely asking for information. Was the value of the land in the district referred to passed upon by the local inspectors?

Mr. MILLAR: It was passed by an inspector of the Soldier Settlement Board, but I do not care to dwell very much on this particular case, because I dealt with it in a former session and then took it up with the Soldier Settlement Board. It was an isolated case, and I do not know whether anybody connected with the board was to blame.

Mr. ARTHURS: As I said before, I am most sympathetic with the motion and am desirous of doing everything possible for the returned soldier. I am trying to get fixed in my mind the conditions in the West, and I think my position is similar to that of all other members in this section of the House. I heard the hon. member who introduced the motion state that in his province land was purchased at $22 an acre while the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) read a letter stating that land had been bought at from $70 to $100 an acre. I am simply asking for information.

Mr. FORKE: I want to make a correction. The letter I read stated that the Soldier Settlement Board would not buy land at $70 and $100 an acre.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just one or two words in support of this motion, and also to make a suggestion. Anything that goes to make a farm—land, equipment and stock—is of value eventually in proportion to the value of products which can be sold from that farm. Land may be sold, and possibly be resold, at a high price, but if a man has bought it and intends to make it his home, to live on it for twenty-five years and pay for it, he must pay for it eventually out of the value of his products, and it is the low value of the products in comparison to the capital debt on the farm that has largely brought about the present situation.

The act was orginally, I believe, a good act, but with the changed conditions its provisions became inadequate to meet the situation. Of course none of us expected at that time that there would be such a tremendous deflation of values, particularly in the comparative values—that is, the purchasing values—of farm products. I am not attaching blame to anyone, nor should any blame be attached. The matter is one in which all members of the House are equally interested, and I think, equally sympathetic. Two years ago we had hoped that the difficulty was met; we attempted honestly to meet it. But since then matters have developed and the soldiers' position has become worse. As the conditions change and as matters become worse we must change our act, if necessary, to meet the existing circumstances, just as we tried to do two years ago. However, I do not intend to speak of that so much as to point out one or two of the complexities of this problem which make it necessary that some such committee as has been suggested be appointed if the problem is to be dealt with intelligently, as it must be if it is to be dealt with satisfactorily.

There is the question, for instance, whether such readjustment of the capital debt should be retroactive, and if so to what extent, Some men have paid a good deal on their lands and others have paid very little, so the question whether it shall or shall not be retroactive must be given consideration. There is also the question of the basis of the revaluation, whether it shall be a physical revaluation or a revaluation by percentage. I think we pretty nearly came to the conclusion in 1922 that a physical revaluation was almost an impossibility, that is, to send men to every farm to value them in accordance with their respective market prices. In some parts of the country there is no market price because there is no demand for land and no land exchanging hands. But in any case the expense involved in making a complete and systematic investigation of every parcel of land and of all the equipment and stock on these parcels of land would be almost prohibitive. Further, it would to a certain extent discriminate against the careful settler in favour of the settler who was not so careful. The more careful a settler was, the better he farmed his land and the better the condition in which he kept his stock and equipment, the less would be the deflation in value, so that such a physical revaluation would to a certain extent discriminate in favour of the careless settler.

The question also comes up as to localities. There is no doubt that certain localities were not well adapted to farming and that there is greater deflation in those localities than in others. On the other hand, if the percentage basis was taken, if you simply reduced the capital debt by a given percentage, I suggest that you might have to adopt some kind of sliding scale percentage, based possibly to some extent on the locality and also to some extent on the years during which the purchases were made.

These are the complexities of the problem, and they have to be faced. In the first place, we have to safeguard the men who did so much for us, because after all it is not merely a matter in their case of dollars and cents; it is not simply a colonization problem. We endeavoured to assist these men, to put them on a better footing than that on which they would have been had they not taken out these loans—that was our purpose, in addition, of course, to our attempt to increase production through that method of colonization. The suggestion I would make, then, would be this. If the government see fit to accept this resolution, and I most certainly hope they will, I suggest that the reference should be somewhat widened. The resolution itself would refer to a committee simply the matter of a decrease in the capital debt. Now, that is involved with other matters; it is almost impossible to consider a subject of that kind by itself. I would therefore, with the permission of the House and of the mover of the resolution (Mr. Ward), move to amend it by inserting after the word "matter" in the second last line the following words:

"together with any other question relative to the operations of the Soldiers Land Settlement Act,"

The last paragraph would then read:

And that a committee of this House be appointed to whom this matter, together with any other question relative to the operations of the Soldiers Land Settlement Act, may be referred,—

And so on, I hope that the mover of the resolution will agree to the amendment and that the House will adopt the resolution as amended.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I asked one or two questions a few minutes ago, but not with the intention, as I stated then, of opposing the motion now before the House. It has my heartiest support; I honestly believe that something should be done to ameliorate the conditions of these men now upon the land. I agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) that perhaps the motion does not go far enough to provide for an inquiry. into all the circumstances, and I question whether the motion in its original form might not bring upon the country a greater expense than the saving to the soldiers.

There is no doubt that many of these men bought land when the land was at the peak price. Generally speaking the land was largely in the hands of local men whose honesty or dishonesty was well known throughout the community, and I think that on the whole they did the best they could under the circumstances. Since that time, not only in the West but in some portions of eastern Canada as well, the conditions have changed, and there is very good reason for the proposing of a motion of this kind at this time. We have an example in this respect that our friends to the left may not have noticed; the Dominion of New Zealand is at present engaged in revaluing all the lands sold in that country to returned soldiers. These lands were sold on a basis of a term of purchase of thirty-five years, a much longer term and with much smaller payments than applied in the case of our men, who were supposed to make a payment of ten per cent before the land came into their possession at all. New Zealand did not experience the boom that we had during the war period, for reasons which it is unnecessary for me to enumerate to-night, but they have found it necessary to revalue all these lands. I am thoroughly prepared to support a motion of this kind, whether moved by the hon. member who proposed it (Mr. Ward) or by any other member of the House, and I think that in doing so I am voicing the opinion not only of the group which immediately surrounds me but of every returned soldier in the House. I have some doubt whether it would be wise or unwise to make this retroactive; I have very grave doubts whether it should be on a percentage basis; but these are matters that should be threshed out by a committee of this House, and when we all put our heads together, those who are in favour of any action along this line and those who are opposed, we can no doubt suggest some plan whereby we can give these men presently on the land by our volition, not their own perhaps, fair play in this matter. I am in favour of a committee. I am opposed to a commission because I think it would take too long, cost too much, and not be entirely in the interests of those we desire to serve. So I support most heartily the amendment of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman).

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with those who are supporting this resolution. I prefer the resolution as amended because I think it covers the ground better, but I feel that I would hardly be doing my duty if I did not support this motion for a committee of the House. I have discussed this matter with the returned men in my constituency. There are many there who are in financial difficulties, as there are in other places. I visited them personally and talked with them, in order to get their viewpoint. The resolution asks for a revaluation. I am not particular myself whether it is a revaluation or a percentage cancellation of the debt. I think that could best be worked out by a committee of this House, after going into the matter thoroughly.

I might, however, give the views of many different men I have talked with. I asked for their ideas regarding a percentage cancellation of their debt, simply because I was led to believe from the former inquiries held that a revaluation would be very difficult. I asked them how much of their debt they felt should be cancelled in order for them to make good under present conditions, and their opinions varied all the way from thirty to fifty per cent as the percentage to be cancelled before they would be able to pay up and hold their land. But the committee would be able to determine that better than I could from the information I have.

I realize that from whatever angle this problem is attacked there will be difficulties. There are difficulties in a revaluation. If we have a percentage cancellation the man who has made the best and most intelligent effort, and who has been perhaps the most industrious, would be penalized more or less unless the cancellation were made retroactive. The soldier himself might be blamed in some cases, but on account of the deflation in values it is only the man who has had good experience and is very favourably situated who could have made good. I feel that we were all to blame more or less. I felt quite pleased when the government first decided to undertake this land settlement scheme. We needed the soldiers as producers, and we needed to find a place for our soldiers returning from the war, and this offered an opportunity. In some cases men have undertaken farming operations without proper experience, but I think that conditions generally are to blame more than anything else. I do not think that the men who were locating these soldiers, in many cases at all events, were dishonest or did anything dishonourable, but conditions are so bad that we must look into them, and I think that a committee of the House is the best way to deal with the question, and that is why I support the suggestion. The government will lose in any event. If they wait for the soldier to leave the land, discouraged as he would be, the government will lose in that way. If the soldier stays on the land and cannot pay, the government will lose in that case. So we have to make the best of conditions as they are, and it is for us to do what we can to provide a remedy to do the best we can for these men. For these reasons I am in favour of a committee being appointed.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): Mr. Speaker, though I do not pretend to know the provisions of the Land Settlement Act in detail, still I feel that I should say a few words on this occasion. As the House is aware, the administration of the Land Settlement Act is vested in the hon. the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, but at the present time my hon. colleague (Mr. Robb) has such important duties to discharge as Acting Minister of Finance that I felt perhaps the House would pardon me if I rose and said a few words on this occasion on behalf of the government.

The debate which has taken place has been in more than one regard informative. It has brought home to a very large number of members of this House some conditions not at all favourable which prevail amongst the land settled soldiers. The act which was passed some years ago was passed unanimously by this parliament with the best of intentions. At that time it was foreseen and expected and hoped that soldiers who decided to avail themselves of the privileges of the act would in time succeed in their new avocations. It is well to remember that at that time the price of land in Canada was at its peak, and almost without a moment's warning, after a large number of soldiers had availed themselves of the provisions of this act, the price of cultivated land in Canada started to decline. To-day conditions for agriculturists generally throughout Canada are far from being favourable, as we are all ready to admit; but what of the condition of the soldier who has to bear in addition the burden of the interest on a very large loan which he has received at the hands of the government? Taking all in all, it is impossible to say that the act has been a failure. In my opinion the act has been a success. It is almost miraculous that such a small proportion of the men who have entered upon this scheme have decided to abandon it or have been unable to carry on. Loans, generally speaking, have been repaid in a very respectable measure. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), has pointed out, I think perhaps better than any other hon. member who has spoken on this subject, the course that would likely be adopted as the more favourable, both from the point of view of the soldier settler himself and the country. My hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Ward) is asking that a committee be appointed for the purpose of investigating the subject and reporting to the House for its action. Every session since the war ended, the House has appointed a committee to deal with soldiers' affairs generally, with the exception of last year. Two years ago the committee generally known as the committee on Pensions and Re-establishment sat for many weeks, and not only examined the question of re-establishment and the question of pensions, but also dealt extensively with the question of land settlements, and submitted to the House a report on which certain action was taken, relieving in a certain measure the bad lot of the land settled soldiers. Last year no committee was appointed. This year the question of appointing a committee of a like kind has been under consideration by me for a number of weeks. I have so far not made up my mind whether such a committee would be indispensable or not. All that has been said this evening by hon. members who addressed the House would lead me to believe that a committee of the kind should also be appointed this year. Moreover the final report of the royal commission appointed to investigate and report upon the question of re-establishment will be submitted to the House within, I understand, two or three weeks, if I am to rely on the communications that I have received from the chairman of that commission. It will probably be necessary to appoint a committee when this report is laid on the Table of the House, in order to devise truly the proper legislation which will be indicated on the face of that report. I would make a suggestion to my hon. friend who has moved the resolution (Mr. Ward), and the hon. members who have supported it. If he will allow his motion to stand or to drop, I will undertake to move for the formation of a committee within a few weeks, in order that both subjects I have referred to—that is the one discussed this evening and also the final report of the commission—may be submitted to this committee. The investigation should not take very much time. I believe that if the committee were appointed, say in three or four weeks, it would be all that is necessary in order to discharge the duties that will be expected from it.

Some reference has been made, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) to the duty which this country owes to returned men. I do not hesitate for one moment to concur with the remarks which have fallen from his lips. I remember once in my capacity as medical man I had given my care and attention to a friend of mine who had been ill for a number of weeks, and happily nature came to my rescue very considerably and my friend recovered entirely. After a little while he sent me a note in which he said, "I wish you would tell me what that part of my debt towards you consists in, that which you call your doctor's bill. As far as the other part of my debt is concerned, I can never discharge it." I think the country may make the same statement to the returned men. The part of our debt to these returned men which is not counted in dollars and cents can never be discharged adequately. So far as I am concerned, I will in all possible ways assist my hon. friend who has moved this resolution, and if he will allow the matter to stand for two or three weeks, until we get the report of this commission, I shall move this committee, and all the subjects referring to the soldiers may then be gone into fully.

Mr. ARTHURS: It may be somewhat difficult for a private member to secure, before the formation of this committee, a copy or a substantial synopsis of the legislation passed by the government of New Zealand or Australia. Will the hon. minister endeavour to obtain for the use of members of the committee a copy of the legislation at present in operation in New Zealand or Australia? This can be easily secured, I imagine.

Mr. BELAND: I think that is feasible and we should be able to obtain that information within three or four weeks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the legislation of New Zealand or Australia will be in the Library just as quickly as it can come here. It comes over as fast as it can be sent.

Mr. WARD: I would be quite willing to agree to the request of the minister, if he will assure us that ample time will be given for the consideration of matters that it would be necessary for this committee to consider. There is one other question that I should like to emphasize.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member speaks on this motion, he will close the debate, he being the mover of the motion. Therefore, if any other hon. member wishes to speak, he should do so now.

Mr. WARD: Another matter that has come to my notice quite frequently is regarding pensioned soldiers who have taken land under the Soldiers' Land Settlement Act. While these men are pensioners, apparently they are not eligible for treatment from the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment doctor, and the thought in my mind when I suggested that there might be an amendment to the motion making wider the scope of inquiry was that these men should at least be afforded examination or some treatment free of charge by the doctor of that department. If, however, the minister will assure us that there will be ample time to hear any witnesses who may wish to come here, to consider the question fully and to submit a report to the House before the conclusion of this session, I shall be glad to agree to his suggestion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the hon. member who introduced the amendment consent to withdrawing it?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I shall be glad to consent to that, because this will cover not only the point that we wish to cover, but other points of equal importance.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—HALF-BREED SCRIP

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a bill to amend section 20 of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1921. We discussed this matter two sessions ago and it is up again at this session. I introduced the bill last session, but it did not reach the second reading. Objection has been taken to the amendment that was passed to the Criminal Code in 1921, because at the time it was passed, certain half-breeds on the borders of northern Alberta and the provisional district of Mackenzie had made somewhat strenuous efforts to secure an adjustment or redress in connection with what they claimed was a very severe grievance. Scrip was issued to half-breeds residing in the Northwest Territories, that is in the district of Athabaska, in the years 1900 and 1903. P.C. No. 918, passed on the 6th May, 1899, reads:

The practice heretofore followed in satisfying such claims under that provision has been.

1. To issue scrip, redeemable in land, to the extent of $160, to each half-breed head of a family, on proof of residence in accordance with the terms of subsection aforesaid.

That is subsection (f) of section 90 of the Dominion Lands Act.

2. To issue scrip, redeemable in land, to the extent of $240, or scrip entitling the grantee to 240 acres of land of the class open to homestead entry, at the option of the claimant, to each child of a half-breed head of a family on proof of such residence.

The minister therefore recommends that as to the half-breeds of the territory to be covered by the proposed treaty the following policy be adopted:

1. That every half-breed occupier of land in the said territory be confirmed in possession to the extent of 160 acres.

2. That scrip, redeemable in land, to the extent of $240, or at the option of the grantee, scrip entitling the grantee to 240 acres of land of the class open to homestead entry be granted to each half-breed found to be permanently residing in the said territory at the time of the Indian Treaty and not to have previously received scrip in extinguishment of his claim.

The Indians of the territory were met by the treaty by which they still receive treaty money and they also got the reserves. As regards the claims of the half-breeds, due to the fact that they were persons with mixed white and Indian blood, their Indian claim was extinguished through the issue of scrip, redeemable in land. A number of those scrips were issued in that territory, and it is claimed that several hundreds of persons living in the northern boundary of Alberta and in the Northwest Territories, were defrauded in connection with the transfer of scrip and its location. When the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) was Prime Minister of Canada, he visited the city of Edmonton in November, 1920. On the 11th November, a delegation of two half-breeds met him in the Macdonald hotel at Edmonton and presented this petition.

The petition of Philip Atkinson and Alexa Lafferly humbly showeth:

That your petitioners are persons of mixed white and Indian blood, residing at or near Fort Resolution, in the province of Alberta, and that your petitioners have been delegated by a number of persons of mixed white and Indian blood, residing in the environments of Fort Resolution, Fort Smith and Fort Chippewyan, seeking redress for what they believe to be a real grievance and to ask that justice be done them.

The next paragraph goes on to state that between the years 1900 and 1903 scrip was issued to a certain number of persons under certain conditions; and the third paragraph reads:

That unscrupulous speculators following in the wake of the commission entrusted by the hon. Minister of the Interior with the delivery of such certificates or half-breed scrip and, taking shameful if not even criminal advantage of the illiteracy and ignorance of the half-breed, purchased such scrip from the holders, paying—

And this is the point.

—paying therefor a proportion of the agreed purchase price, and agreeing to pay the balance, together with the expenses of the vendor in travelling to and from the land office at such time as the vendor might be called upon by the purchaser to come to the Dominion Lands Office and file upon the parcel of land located and selected by the purchaser. Many of the unscrupulous purchasers, instead of bringing the vendor to the land office and paying him or her the expenses of such trip, together with the balance of the agreed purchase price, by fraud, perjury, subornation of perjury and forgery procured other persons to appear at the land office and represent themselves to be the persons named in the scrip, and to file upon the land selected or located by the purchaser, and to forge the name of the real vendor to transfers and other documents in connection therewith, thereby committing a fraud upon His Majesty's government and a fraud upon the vendor. That in the north country in the neighbourhood of Forts Resolution, Smith and Chippewyan, there are several hundred half-breeds who have been defrauded and with respect to whose scrips His Majesty's government has been defrauded. And your petitioners pray that a commission be appointed to inquire into—

And so on. The then Prime Minister took the petition with him to Ottawa and it was turned over for attention to the Department of the Interior, the minister in charge at that time being Sir James Lougheed. A reply was sent from the department signed by Mr. Coté to the effect that requests of this kind for investigaion had been presented to the department on several occasions previously and that the department had not seen fit to take action. It was said in the letter:

The question has been before the department on several occasions in the past, and in view of your petition has again been considered. The scrip certificates issued in satisfaction of half-breed claims and scrip notes issued by the department were delivered to the grantees personally, and it is not considered that the department can be held responsible for subsequent action taken in connection with the location of the scrip; and if there were any fraud perpetrated in connection therewith it was open to them to take ordinary proceedings before the proper courts.

Now, the department having taken the stand that they had no further responsibility, and that such a length of time had elapsed that it would be difficult to dig up evidence that could be relied upon, suggested that if anyone had a grievance the right thing for anyone having a grievance to do was to go to the proper court. Consequently action was taken by a returned soldier, one John Graham, of Edmonton. On April 5, 1921, this man laid a criminal information before Lieutenant-Colonel G. B. McLeod, Police Magistrate for the city of Edmonton, charging a certain Edmonton millionaire with uttering a forged document in procuring a half-breed scrip. The result of the preliminary hearing before Magistrate McLeod was that Mr. Richard Secord of Edmonton, a prominent millionaire and the man referred to, was committed for trial before the first court of competent jurisdiction. That was in April 1921. The charge was that Mr. Secord had bribed a half-breed woman with $10 and a grey shawl to go with him to the Dominion Lands Office and there represent herself to be the holder of a particular certificate which belonged to a woman who was then living at Fort Rae. It was alleged that Mr. Secord had purchased the scrip from, I believe, Mrs. Elizabeth Hyslop, and had paid her a part of the agreed purchase price on condition that her expenses to Edmonton would be paid along with the balance of the agreed purchase price when the land was located. This scrip was located near Edmonton by the other woman, while Mrs. Hyslop was living about seven hundred miles northeast of Edmonton, near Lake Athabasca. As I have said, the result of the preliminary hearing was the committal of Mr. Secord for trial.

When we discussed this matter two years ago we spent a good deal of time dealing with the Secord preliminary trial. I want hon. members to bear in mind that this case was tried after the department had taken the stand that very little could be done by them, or that it was inadvisable for them to take any steps because it was almost impossible to get direct and reliable evidence in the matter. The complaint made by these half-breeds was not that any particular man, but that many unscrupulous speculators, had followed up the men who were issuing scrip to half-breeds, and had taken advantage of the ignorance of these people. I want to read an extract from the Morning Leader, of Regina, in this connection. It refers to the trial at Edmonton and its result, and also makes reference to the amendment that was made in the Criminal Code. Most of the newspapers in the West during the year 1921 seemed to think that the amendment to the Criminal Code shut out the possibility of proceeding further with the Secord case. Be that as it may, here is the point:

That the objectionable amendment in question was designed to cover more than the Edmonton case appears to be more than likely, for more than one reputed millionaire in the West owes his financial position to the utilization of just such practices as those alleged in the Edmonton case. Saskatchewan is not without representation in this class of half-breed scrip millionaires whose shady practices had brought them within reach of the law until a kind-hearted government at Ottawa legislated specially for the purpose of relieving them of all further liability to prosecution for their criminal offences.

The foregoing is from the Morning Leader of Regina, Saskatchewan, of August 23rd, 1921. The point I make is that whether or not this amendment was retroactive and affected the Secord case, it did shut out the possibility of prosecuting others who might be guilty and against whom action had not been commenced at that time. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me examine the amendment itself. It reads:

Any offence relating to or arising out of the location of land which was paid for in whole or in part by scrip or was granted upon certificates issued to half-breeds in connection with the extinguishment of Indian title.

This was inserted in the list of offences covered by the limitation of actions. In section 1140 of the Criminal Code we find:

That after the expiration of three years from the time of its commission no action shall be commenced if the offence be—

(1) treason, except treason by killing His Majesty, or where the overt act alleged is an attempt to injure the person of His Majesty,

(2) treasonable offences,

(3) any offence relating to the fraudulent marketing of merchandise; or,—

Then this amendment was inserted as paragraph (4). At first glance, it would seem to deal merely with an ordinary fraud in connection with the location of land paid for in scrip. But apparently it covers any offence, no matter how serious it may be, if it is at all connected with the location of land which was paid for in whole or in part by scrip. If the guilty person keeps out of the way for three years, and action is not commenced, thereafter he is immune. I cannot see any reason for this limitation.

Mr. MARTELL: As I understand the statute, action can be brought at any time within three years, and once information is laid and a warrant obtained the statute of limitations would not operate.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Forgery in connection with the title to other lands does not come within the statute of limitations, and the wrongdoer can be proceeded against even after the lapse of many years. And this is quite right. Such an offence is considered to be so serious, that the guilty person may be sentenced to life imprisonment. For subornation of perjury the punishment may be fourteen years' imprisonment. This restrictive amendment to the Criminal Code deals specifically with offences relating to the location of land paid for in whole or in part by scrip or granted upon certificates issued to half-breeds in connection with the extinguishment of Indian title; there is no similar limitation in respect to other cases of fraud of the same nature.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend state what under the law is regarded as the commencement of an action?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I am not a lawyer, but I may say that in a case of forgery there is no limitation of three years, and I claim there should be none when the offence is connected with half-breed scrip. People throughout the western provinces to-day are convinced that this legislation, introduced within fifty-five days after Mr. Secord was committed for trial in the city of Edmonton—the case having been started to demonstrate to the authorities at Ottawa that substantial evidence could be adduced in support of the claims of the half-breeds—some people I say are convinced that the amendment was passed to save, if not Mr. Secord, at least some others who possibly may have been as guilty as he in connection with the filing of other half-breed scrip in western Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will accept this bill to restore the code as it was previous to 1921. As I say, the amendment created a very bad impression throughout the West and has tended to discredit our parliamentary institutions. Therefore I hope that parliament will repeal the objectionable amendment in order that any people who have a grievance may get redress through the courts, or possibly through an investigation by the government itself.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when a similar bill was introduced two years ago it was accepted unanimously by the House, and therefore I do not see why I should object to this bill to-night. However, I do not think it is necessary as far as the special case is concerned to which my hon. friend (Mr. Kennedy) has referred. It was the opinion of the Department of Justice two years ago, and is still, that the amendment introduced in the Senate in the session of 1921 had no retroactive effect in that special case because the proceedings had been commenced before the amendment was enacted by parliament.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Would the minister state what effect it would have in other cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not sure that in cases in which the limitation or prescription had previously applied, this law would revive the offence which had been prescribed under the amendment of 1921. However, as I said before, there is no objection on my part to the bill being accepted by the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I certainly do not rise to oppose the second reading, any more than I did two years ago. I had not the least objection to the bill passing then, nor have I now, and I do not complain at all of the hon. member's introducing a bill on this occasion. What I do complain of is the intimation that he still seeks to press, that the amendment of three years ago was passed for the purpose of relieving a wealthy man in Alberta, and his attributing to the government and parliament of that day this intention which, he says, has had so baneful an effect through his province. He tells us to-night—

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Does the right hon. gentleman wish to deny that it has had that baneful effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, but the responsibility for that baneful effect is upon hon. friends to my left. That the baneful effect was there I do not dispute. This was part of the dust storm raised by hon. gentlemen to my left—I am afraid I must include also some in front of me—in that campaign. It was all part of a malevolent and wholly foundationless propaganda that the government was always the friend of the rich. In this particular case they said that the government passed through parliament legislation to relieve a millionaire in Edmonton, and did it after the Minister of the Interior, and the Prime Minister even, were warned of the great crimes that had been committed and after the Department of the Interior had acknowledged that they were powerless and had sent those who complained of the crimes to the courts. The newspapers were full of it. As I explained two years ago, I never even heard about the amendment until I reached Alberta and found the press alive with this frightful allegation against the administration. I explained at the time that such a bill passed when a prosecution was on could have no effect on the prosecution. But of course that could not be accepted; it had to go forth for the political effect it might generate; it had to go forth that the government had used the instrument of parliament to save its friends of the wealthy class against the poor half-breeds who were seeking to prosecute. So it went forth and so the baneful effect was produced. When this repealing bill was first introduced in the House I urged that the original legislation never affected the Secord case at all. I explained it in the plainest possible terms—

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What about the other cases?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I am at the Secord case now. It never could have affected the Secord case, and it was the Secord case that was filling the province of Alberta. I never heard of any other; in fact I never heard until now. If such a thing was mentioned two years ago it did not sink into my mind.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Did the right hon. gentleman read the petition that was presented to him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose I did. I do not doubt that there were general allegations in the petition, but if the hon. member ever attains office he will get a lot of petitions and he will not find it very easy to carry each line and each sentence in them for any great length of time in his memory. I am speaking of the Secord case. I made it clear it could not have applied; that no one with the faintest knowledge of law could have imagined that it would apply; that all it did was to place in the category of a three-year prescription this offence, the same as many others which were in a like category.

It would, of course, while it was in operation prevent prosecution of others where the offence dated back beyond the prescription fixed in the statute, but as to the Secord case it did not apply. I did not know anything about the amendment at the time, and as to those members of the House who were at that time members and are here to-night, I venture to say that not one of them recalls it even now. Very well; not only did I take that position, but other hon. members of the party here took the same view, and the Minister of Justice was frank to state and state most openly and clearly that it did not apply to the Secord case; that such was his opinion and the opinion of his department. But the hon. member makes his motion to-night and does not inform the House of that fact; does not say, as I think he should have said, that it could not have been introduced with any reference to the Secord case at all. And I fancy he would hardly think there were some others who, we feared, might be prosecuted and whom we were going to shield. The motion to-night should have been divorced from all reference to any special case at all. If there is reason in the public interest that the amendment should pass and that the prescription should be removed, all right. The government accepts it; I personally have no objection whatever.

Mr. FORKE: Just as a matter of information what reason was there for passing that sort of legislation in connection with scrip land more than in connection with any other forgeries?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no more reason than for passing other legislation that many a time passes this House.

Mr. FORKE: That does not explain it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about all the other prescriptive legislation in the statutes? Other forgeries were already prescribed.

Mr. FORKE: That does not explain why it was necessary in this particular case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister who had charge of the bill in the Senate—for the bill originated there—had the matter brought to his attention, I do not know by whom; I have asked him and he cannot remember by whom. But he mentioned to the Senate that he knew of one case in which he knew where prosecution had been entered alleging an offence some twenty years old. He knew of that himself, consequently he felt there should be a prescription, and this three years was inserted. That is all the connection he had with it. My hon. friend laughs.

Mr. FORKE: That looks fishy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It looks fishy does it? Well the hon. member does not do credit to himself to reflect on the honour of another member of parliament unless he has some reason so to reflect.

Mr. FORKE: I have the reason of the circumstances that have already been explained: that special legislation was passed at that particular time when a very shady transaction had taken place in connection with scrip lands. I have good ground for my suspicions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well the hon. member can entertain the ground all he likes. All I am seeking to urge is this: That it could never have applied to the Secord case, could not have been dreamed by the member who introduced it to have applied. The member who introduced it is a lawyer of some standing; he could not have had any such belief. As to whether he had in mind someone else, I have his own word that he had not. I never heard of any other case myself. But if hon. members want this passed, why, it can be done. I notice that a point is raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) as to whether a repeal now would revive heretofore prescribed crime. I would not like to express an opinion on that myself, I never had the point raised; but I should have thought it would. Personally I earnestly hope that the actual state of the law is such that it will revive; that the legislation passes, and that the government of Alberta is free to go ahead full steam—and then we will see what will be the effects of this amendment.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I think that when this amendment was brought in, the Attorney General of Alberta took the ground that it did apply to the Secord case. I realize that possibly he is not a competent authority to pit against the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. MARTELL: How could it apply if the information had been laid prior to the bringing in of that amendment?

Mr. KELLNER: I do not wish to discuss that matter. I am giving you the authority, and the opinion—

Mr. MARTELL: I would like to read the opinion of that man. If he said that, he is not fit to be attorney general.

Mr. KELLNER: I am very sorry that the hon. member makes a remark of that kind, for I understand that the present government is elevating him to the bench.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I doubt very much if he gave that opinion. I would like to see the opinion produced. I know who the gentleman was.

Mr. KELLNER: I hardly understand the leader of the opposition. Do I understand him to say that the attorney general did not make that statement?

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can hardly believe that the Attorney General of Alberta gave the opinion that the legislation would apply to a case where prosecution was already entered, and if he did it would be a curiosity to have that opinion produced in this House.

Mr. KELLNER: I am sorry I could not produce the evidence other than what is contained in the press. I am quite convinced it was contained in the press of Alberta at the time. If that was not the ground he took, it seems to me a remarkable thing that the prosecution was dropped. I can hardly see what excuse he could give if he thought that it did not apply, for there had been a conviction in the lower courts. I think the leader of the opposition has possibly taken this thing too seriously in so far as it applies to the Secord case. I think those who would like to see this amendment go through have no ambition to prosecute that case in particular. I think they desire to clean up many of these cases, and there are many men in Alberta who profited largely in these matters. I think it would be a good thing to pass this amendment and let them take their chances. I am quite convinced that sufficient time has elapsed. No one will get an unfair deal of any kind; and those not guilty have nothing to fear. There is an element of suspicion in the whole transaction, as our leader (Mr. Forke) suggested a moment ago. At the time, it was thought possible that some prosecutions would take place, and I think members will agree that there was a demand for that amendment from some source. Some felt that they had to take to cover, and they thought they needed that amendment. If it is the policy of the parliament of Canada to provide ways for people to evade their responsibilities, well and good; but on the other hand, if it is the policy of the parliament of Canada to see that criminals are brought to justice and have to take their chances under the statutes of Canada, then I think this amendment should be made.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): There seems to be an element of confusion in this matter, and perhaps if there was a little more law and a little less politics there would not be any difference of opinion among the members of this House. We are treated to newspaper extracts instead of to legal opinions, and so long as the law of the country is to be administered by the newspapers we shall probably have a very unique result, but one that, perhaps, will not always be in accord with law as a science.

There is no use in exchanging legal opinions in this House with gentlemen who profess they have no legal opinions, and who rely on the newspapers for their information as to law. The very extracts that have been quoted to-night show clearly that the newspapers have been actuated by political motives rather than by legal principles. We ought all in this House to be quite prepared to accept the legal opinions of the responsible officers of the Department of Justice. Two years ago when another gentleman, who had entirely the respect of this House was acting as Minister of Justice we had those principles enunciated by him. To-night, when a gentleman equally respected by the bar of Canada is occupying the position of Minister of Justice, we have those principles repeated without the slightest deviation, and we have not before this House one single syllable in support of the assertion that the Attorney General of Alberta ever took a position contrary to that enunciated by two Ministers of Justice of the present government.

There was a statement made by my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Stewart) that the deputy attorney general had apparently thought the prosecution could not succeed. That hon. member was not speaking at all in a legal sense, and two years ago I suggested, and I have never found that my suggestion has been met in any way that probably the difficulty in the Secord case was because they found they could not get the necessary evidence after a great lapse of time. That has sheltered many a criminal, great and small, in this country and in other countries, and there is no necessity to reflect upon the honourable gentlemen who occupy or have occupied distinguished positions in the province of Alberta. Every trial lawyer knows it is one thing to state an offence; it is another thing to prove it. You can only prove it by documents or human instruments, and sometimes one and sometimes the other, and sometimes none, is available, and without strict proof we cannot and we ought not to obtain conviction. You should not obtain conviction upon newspaper articles nor upon political prejudice. If we come down to that the level of the country will fall very low indeed, and we shall not improve matters if we attempt to tinker with the criminal law here solely from a political point of view.

No one in this House, as I understand it, is objecting for one moment to the repeal of this legislation which is being objected to. At the same time there is no reason why this House should assume that the Secord prosecution was one whit affected by that amendment which is so strenuously objected to. It was not, and it could not have been, and you can take what you like as the answer, but it must be one of a very few things. Either a blunder was committed by someone in knowledge of law, or the evidence was not available which would warrant the law officers of Alberta to assume that the prosecution could possibly be successful. I prefer the latter alternative, having respect for the law officers of Alberta. But whichever alternative is correct, that matter was settled absolutely in Alberta by people who could not be considered as in any conspiracy or in any connivance with members of a former government of this country. They had it entirely in their own hands, and if Secord has escaped any punishment that he merited he escaped it by reason of some failure in the province of Alberta, and not by any action of this parliament.

Now we are invited to consider other criminals, or possible criminals, who have not been prosecuted. Every one of them could have been prosecuted. Within three years from the passing of that objectionable legislation no one laid an information. Why? The law did not stop it. Perhaps the facts were not available. I think we can go a little further than that. I look at the debates of this House of two years ago, and I find that the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill made extended reference, and I think he has repeated it to-night, to a certain petition which was said to have been presented to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) asking, in effect, for an investigation of land frauds. He also presented quite fully to this House the reply of the Minister of the Interior, and while I do not wish to take up much time of the House, I think it is only fair to refer to a portion of the answer of the Minister of the Interior, who, as reported at page 3214 of Hansard of 1922, stated:

> Since the beginning of 1900 about 4,800 claims have been satisfied by the issue of land scrip calling for some 1,153,092 acres nearly all of which have been located and patents therefor issued either to the grantees of the scrip themselves or to their assignees. Many of these patents covering thousands of acres were issued nearly 20 years ago, the titles passing through many hands, and to question such titles now would, in the opinion of the department, be very injudicious and could result in no benefit.
> Moreover, many of the original grantees and witnesses are dead and it would be impossible, at this date, to locate many of the others or obtain satisfaction or reliable evidence relating to these transactions which took place so many years ago.

Now, if it is a matter of punishment, no one in this House wants to prevent the hand of justice falling heavily upon a man who has committed a crime. But time enough elapsed for anyone who knew the facts to enable a prosecution to be brought, and I presume successfully brought, against anyone who committed a fraud. The half-breed would not be particularly interested. They would get nothing out of the prosecution. Some one might be punished, but the half-breeds would not be restored to their rights. The hon. gentleman who introduced this bill two years ago was pressing this matter, and I think I heard him read to-night this demand for an investigation. But will anyone show me how the passage of the bill that is proposed to-night will result in one iota of an investigation into these 4,800 cases in which there may have been, and probably has been, some fraud? When we find the whole strength of the case put upon the Criminal Code, coupled with the extracts from the newspapers, and coupled with the suggestions we have had, and I think the rather unfair suggestion from the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) I think I am not unfair in making the deduction that this assumes entirely a political aspect. If my hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party and his stalwart supporters want to help the unfortunate half-breeds, why do they not introduce legislation into this House providing for that investigation, accompanied by provisions which will restore to the half-breed the rights of which they have been defrauded? When they content themselves with animadversions upon the change of the law which they wish to get rid of, and do not follow up the desire for the investigation, then I stamp the attack as purely a political one, as malicious as it is insincere, and as dishonest in its character as the stories of the land frauds, as it seeks to destroy the character of a man who ought to be considered beyond the pale of such attacks.

Now, are we to have some measures which will restore to the half-breeds the rights which, it is said, have been taken away from them? What measure of compensation has been proposed? What honest endeavour has the government been asked to make, and what honest assistance is the leader of the Progressive party prepared to give to restore to the half-breeds anything which has been taken from them? Do they know of all the cases? Can they point to one case where such a thing has happened? They come here two years afterwards with no more and no less information than they had two years ago. They come here with the eternal whine and eternal calumny and nothing better. No one objects to the passing of the bill, but what we do object to is the attempt to make the passing of this bill a vehicle of political persecution.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I am not going to enter into any discussion of the merits of the case which my hon. friend may have had in his mind when he moved the resolution, but I do think that the Minister of Justice will be well advised if he does all in his power to pass this amendment. I have some serious doubts as to the form of the proposed amendment, but that will be a matter for the committee to which the bill will be referred. I believe that there should not be in the minds of any of the people in Canada any idea that justice is being perverted in this country. I say I do not know whether it has been or not, but the hon. members on the other side who spoke on this subject must be aware of the fact that they had three years to lay the information in this case, and if they had laid an information they were not prevented—I am giving the opinion of a humble lawyer—from pursuing that criminal information to the end, by having a jury bring in a verdict either of guilty or of not guilty in the case of the parties who were charged, notwithstanding any legislation that might be brought down in this House.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): You refer to the Secord case?

Mr. CARROLL: I am referring to any case this act might cover in any way. If there is an information, if the case is pending in court, unless there is something in the amendment which brings these informations to a conclusion immediately without going further, then the information may be followed, if the persons behind the information want to bring it to a conclusion, by having a jury return a verdict of guilty or not guilty. I do not know the facts of the Secord case, but I wish to say that if there is in the minds of hon. gentleman from the East, the West or the centre of Canada any idea that legislation has been instrumental in allowing criminals to get clear, then I say we should go into that matter and show the people who had that suspicion that the parliament of Canada will not be a party to that. That is the only reason I have risen. I think the Minister of Justice will be well advised if he does everything in his power to have the amendment to the Criminal Code passed; and then if my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) who, I believe is sincere in this matter, or his friends who are promoting the cause, wish to lay an information against Secord or others they will have an opportunity of doing so. May I point out that the limitations in the way of bringing criminal charges and in the way of actions at civil law are not new. We have various limitations; practically every criminal offence you can think of, outside of capital offences—I am not speaking by the book just now, but I mention those—has those limitations. There are limitations in civil matters, in the case of slander, in the case of libel, and in the case of debt; and it may be the government of the day—I am making no charge against them—has no thought in the world of letting Secord or anyone else go free, but I say again if there is a suspicion in the mind of any part of the general public in any part of this country that an injustice has been done, or that an act has been committed whereby a criminal was prevented from being brought to justice, it should be remedied, and if the amendment of the hon. gentleman from West Edmonton is going to remedy that kind of thing, I would strongly advise the Minister of Justice to allow this measure to become law; and if criminals have escaped owing to the amendment, they may be brought to justice.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (South Simcoe): I know nothing about the facts of the Secord case, nor of any of the other cases, nor have I made any study whatever of the section in question; but as I sat and listened to the discussion in reference to the question of reviver, I was prompted to say just a word or two. It seems to me that the offence in question has not been extinguished at all. It is merely a case of limitation of prosecution being imposed. Let us assume for a moment that some one is charged with the offence in question after the passage of this proposed amendment, and counsel for the defence takes the point that the prosecution is not warranted owing to lapse of three years. I presume he would immediately be asked by the Crown prosecutor to cite his authority for his position. The limitation having been removed from the statute, it would not be there and could not be cited; there would be no section of the act stating that the prosecution must be commenced within three years. Therefore, I venture to suggest that if this proposed amendment becomes law, no matter how many cases there may be, the prosecution of them could be taken up and proceeded with. There seems to be a consensus of opinion from all quarters of this House in favor of the amendment, by all means let it be passed, let the doors be opened wide, and if any persons have been guilty of any such offence as is suggested, they can be successfully prosecuted.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): It seems to me that it is a very absurd proposal at this late date to make retroactive legislation. As I understand this matter, although I have no knowlege of the Secord case, an information was laid and a limitation of action was passed concerning offences of that nature. The information having been laid in the Secord case and the amendment that has been passed not being made retroactive, it could not affect that case. It was, therefore, open to the officers of the Crown or the informant or private prosecutor to press the matter from a preliminary trial to get the party accused committed for trial, then to have him brought before a grand jury, and if the grand jury found a true bill, to have him brought before a petit jury and either a verdict or an acquittal secured. As the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) and the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) have stated, statutes of limitation apply in all cases, both in civil and criminal matters. We have also other laws of somewhat the same nature, although they are not statutes of limitation, and those statutes have obtained for a great number of years. For instance, in some provinces there are statutes to the effect that a person cannot bring an action for the price of goods bought, if they be of a value of forty dollars and upwards, unless some memorandum appears in writing or some of the goods have been received and so on. This is commonly known as the statute of frauds. These are restrictions on the rights of people to bring actions. There are also limitations of actions for slander, actions for libel. There are limitations in the Criminal Code as to bringing prosecution in cases of assault, bribery, criminal libel. This is done for the protection of persons. Supposing such a limitation of action was not to be found in the statutes, insinuations might be made against a certain person; the action probably would not be brought for say ten or fifteen years afterwards, and the accused would be devoid of all his evidence that would enable him to make a complete and proper defence. The law in its wisdom has determined that it is absolutely essential to have limitations of action. Yet my hon. friend opposite seems to think that by this amendment he is going to have this Secord case revived, I would say that would be an absolutely absurd thing to do. Secord, at the time the information was laid against him was undoubtedly in possession of all the evidence that would enable him to carry on his defence. The statute was passed. It probably was not passed to meet the Secord case; it was passed in order to protect the public generally. He probably has lost his evidence; he probably has lost his means of making a complete defence on the merits of the matter. Therefore, to come back to-day and say that we should pass an amendment to the Criminal Code enabling that particular case to be tried again is unfair. It would be just as well to say that, because we have discovered evidence to-day in regard to an assault that a man committed twenty years ago, we should pass an act stating that the limitation as regards action for assault should not apply to assaults committed twenty years ago. We must have a termination in these matters. That was the wisdom of legislatures in days gone by; and so long as we tamper with these principles that have stood the test of time, we shall be legislating to meet mere insinuations as they arise. This is simply a statute of limitation of action, and I think my hon. friend should be satisfied with the law which is made, not for one case, but for all people.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): We are gettting tied up in our discussion with the Secord case. I am not particularly interested in the Secord case; but I am particularly interested in this, that the contention of the department "no evidence was available" does not stand, and that this calls for an investigation. That result of the Secord trial demonstrates that the department was wrong, and I think that is sufficient for our purpose as regards this case.

As regards this cry about limitation of action, I am not a lawyer; I never studied law; but to-day I read in Crankshaw's Criminal Law this:

> In the common law there is no limited time for the prosecution of proceedings at the suit of the Crown; and therefore, the proceedings in all criminal cases, in relation to which the time is not limited by statute, may be prosecuted at any length of time after the commission of the offence.

Mr. MARTELL: That is where the time is not limited by statute.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): The department having had questions of this kind up before, is it not strange that until action was actually started, no such limitation was ever put on actions of this kind? I suppose the Secord case is the first case where action was actually commenced and a wealthy man likely to get into trouble over it. Yet the department has had called to its attention, time and time again, that there was a possibility of just this very thing happening, and no suggestion appears to have been made that the time in which action could be commenced should be limited to three years. But fifty-eight days after the action was actually started by the half-breeds, we had the limitation in the statutes. Therefore, I think it is absolutely unfair to take the position to-night that we are playing politics or that we are not honest when we take the ground that this amendment should not have been passed at the time it was passed. If it had been passed five years before the Secord case was started, I do not suppose any objection would have been raised. The objection is raised because of the fact that a general demand for an investigation had been made, and this had, as I understand it, the effect of making it useless to hold the general investigation that was demanded by the half-breeds.

Again, it has been said that the three years in which to lay information had passed. Let us take the reading of section 1140:

> No prosecution for an offence against this act, or action for penalties or forfeitures, shall be commenced after the expiration of three years from the time of its commission.

I may be dense, but I cannot see that because these half-breeds may not have taken action before the expiration of three years from the passing of this legislation they should not have redress. In any case, the petition was presented on behalf of several hundred half-breeds in the northern portion of the province of Alberta and the Northwest Territories. I hope therefore that the legislation will pass and will open up possibilities of these half-breeds getting redress for any injustice they may have suffered. It is not common sense to say that because we cannot guarantee justice in one hundred per cent of the cases that come before our courts, or of the matters that are brought to the attention of our governments, we should not therefore give any redress at all. Innocent men have been hanged, and according to this reasoning we should on that account abolish capital punishment, and should refrain from prosecuting or sending to jail anyone who has been guilty of an offence simply because some innocent men have been made to suffer. There are some cases in connection with this matter in regard to which justice may be secured, and I hope that this bill will become law, if only to afford these people an opportunity to demonstrate whether or not they have a just complaint. During the last election it was stated that the three party leaders were communicated with, by telegram, by Mr. J. C. Calhoun of Edmonton, asking for a statement of their position in this matter. A telegram was sent to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and was not answered. One was sent to the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and was answered later by letter. And in reply to the telegram addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the following message was sent:

J. C. CALHOUN, Esq.,
King Edward Hotel, Edmonton, Alb.

If conditions are as alleged in statement presented to me regarding half-breed scrip I shall be only too glad to use my influence to have matter fully investigated and such legislation introduced as interests of justice may demand.

W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Rights saved and continued.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps the hon. member will explain what he has in view in subsection 2.

Mr. KENNEDY: I have had this matter explained to me by a lawyer, and I understand, that, even if the amendment to the Criminal Code passed in 1921 were repealed now, should any irregularity be found to have occurred during any part of the time that the amendment has been on the statute books, that is to say from 1921 to 1924, the limitation would still apply and might be an obstacle in the way of complete justice in any case that might be brought up. This section was drafted by parliamentary counsel to meet that situation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what I had in mind when the motion was made for the second reading of the bill. There was some question as to whether, if the prescription had already operated, the offence could be revived by repealing the amendment. There occurred to me at the time the decision of the courts of England in a case practically similar to the matter under consideration. I understand that this is what the hon. member has in view by subsection 2. But this subsection is not drafted to meet the case. the subsection reads:

Any offences in violation of the provisions of the section repealed by subsection 1 of this section, and committed between the fourth day of June, nineteen hundred and twenty-one—

That is, the date of the amendment.

—and the date of the coming into force of this act—

The present act.

—shall be dealt with as if this act had not been passed.

If it is dealt with as if this act had not been passed this prescription would operate.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): There is evidently a mistake in the wording of the section.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would suggest that the hon. member move that we report progress, so that another draft might be made of the bill.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not know upon whom this drafting of the bill should reflect, or what it is intended to cover. It might be the subject of investigation in future parliaments. However, I should like to know what subsection 2 as drafted means when it refers to "any offences in violation of the provisions of the section repealed by subsection 1 of this section," and so forth. The section which it is sought to repeal is the section as to procedure, and that does not create any offence; it merely states that you shall not prosecute after three years. Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that this creates an offence. We have had views from hon. gentlemen who are not lawyers, and in the discussion of this matter I think that fact has been absolutely demonstrated.

Progress reported.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING BILL

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, respecting quartz mining in the Yukon Territory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is rather late, Mr. Speaker, and I would suggest, if the hon. member has no objection, that the consideration of this matter be deferred and that the House adjourn.

Mr. BLACK: This bill has been up on two occasions now and I am afraid that if it is not dealt with at an early stage of the session it is apt to go by the board. I do not think it can be called a contentious bill. It follows pretty much along the lines of orders in council which constitute the law at present regulating quartz mining in the Yukon territory. The chief object of the bill is to state in the form of an act of parliament the laws governing quartz mining in the Yukon, which laws are now embodied in a large number of orders in council. I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that that is an undesirable method of government. Formerly the laws regulating gold-mining in the Yukon were contained in orders in council. But because of the fact that the government was far removed from the scene of operations, very often the regulations were found to be very undesirable in their effect. In many instances the government was not well advised by its officers on the spot, and the advice given enured to the benefit of persons who had not the best interests of the country at heart; in other instances the advice showed a lack of understanding of what should have been done. Ultimately the Yukon was given a representative in parliament, and a bill governing placer gold mining was introduced and passed into law. That law has worked very satisfactorily.

Up to the present, quartz mining has been carried on under orders in council, but the time has at last arrived, as it did in respect of placer gold mining, when it should be regulated by an enactment of this parliament. In this bill I have followed the language of the orders in council for the most part, and it expresses the law as now in force. It contains no radical changes, and if it is passed no radical changes will be possible in future except by parliamentary sanction. To-day radical changes are made in the regulations without notice to the parties most concerned, and such changes are not always in the best interests of the industry affected. Changes are made at times which are found to be undesirable, and after a remarkably short period of operation it has been found necessary to make further changes. At the present time there is an order in council running in the Canada Gazette making most material changes in regulations which were issued as late as 1922, on the advice of officers of the government who are out of touch with the situation, but the government acted in good faith. These frequent changes would not be necessary if the law was enacted by parliament. Each change has a disquieting effect on titles, property rights and methods of operation. I am sure that this is a necessary bill, and that if enacted it will be in the best interests of the territory and of the mining industry. If it is given a second reading, I propose to ask that it be referred to the committee on Mines and Minerals.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the second reading of the bill, provided that it goes to the committee on Mines and Minerals.

[Mr. Black.]

But I think my hon. friend will discover after the bill is in operation that quartz mining could be carried on much more acceptably by the old method of regulations. The complaint he makes that changes in the regulations prejudice the industry I cannot believe are well founded, because such changes apply not only to the oil industry but to other activities. If this bill is passed it will relieve the department to a considerable extent, because very frequently we receive requests for changes in the regulations. Each proposed change is carefully considered by the officers in charge, who have mining experience, and usually the changes are in the best interests of the industry. Once this bill becomes law, changes can only take place annually and upon the request of hon. members, perhaps at times when our officers have not an opportunity of making an investigation. However, the bill is quite acceptable to me provided it is referred to the committee on Mines and Minerals.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Tuesday, March 25, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

MEMBERS AND PRESS

COMMON MEETING ROOM PROVIDED FOR MEMBERS AND THE GALLERY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that representations, both last session and during the recess, were made to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) and to myself that there was a great need for a place in this building that would be a common meeting ground for members of the House and members of the press gallery. It was pointed out that with the present arrangement of lobbies and private rooms for members, there was little opportunity for intercourse between members. The minister and myself, after looking over the building for a suitable room, decided to place room No. 268 on the main floor, near the main entrance and opening out of the reading room, at the disposal of members of the House and the press gallery for the purpose referred to. The room has been furnished and is now open and ready for use.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the petition of J. B. McQuesten, Esq., David Burton Dewar, Esq., and John James Morrison, Esq., all of the city of Hamilton in the county of Wentworth, Ontario, protesting against the bill to incorporate the United Church of Canada, on the ground that the rules have not been complied with.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg) moved:

That the petition of John Forbes Michie, and others, ministers, elders or members of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, of the city of Toronto, county of York, province of Ontario; praying that the bill which is now being sought, to incorporate the United Church of Canada, be rejected and not proceeded with, presented on Tuesday afternoon, March 18, 1924, be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Act to amend the Judges' Act, chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1920, section seven, to provide that the salary of the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon Territory be increased from seven thousand to nine thousand dollars per annum, but the increase of salary so granted shall not entitle the judge to any increase in the annuity which may be granted him on retirement in excess of six thousand dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT BOARD—SURPLUS FUNDS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): In view of the fact that the Saskatchewan legislature has passed a resolution asking that the division of the surplus funds of the Canada Wheat Board should be made amongst the provinces according to the amount contributed by each province, and also in view of the fact that the representatives of the Saskatchewan Wheat Producers, Limited, have already interviewed the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) regarding this matter, I should like to ask the government what their policy is in regard to it.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): A deputation said to represent the different co-operative grain societies of the three provinces waited on me some time ago and made a claim for this money. I quoted the recommendation of the wheat board, the board that had the administration of the act when they remitted the surpluses to the government. They recommended that the money might be employed for the relief of settlers in western Canada, and I recall having pointed out to that deputation that as Acting Minister of Finance, my policy was: "What we have we hold," and that as we had already advanced something over $3,000,000, if my recollection is right, for relief in western Canada, I thought we should apply this amount to the redemption of that debt.

Mr. KNOX: I should like to remind the minister that this money was not contributed by people who were given relief owing to destitution; the money is being asked for largely by people who contributed it. I would ask the minister to reconsider his decision.

DATE OF BUDGET SPEECH

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I should like to ask the Minister of Immigration, in his capacity of Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he has yet thought of what day he would like to bring down the budget.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): I have not yet reached a conclusion. I will advise my hon. friend a few days in advance.

NATIONAL DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I wish to ask the following question. Will the government, when bringing down the estimates covering the expenditures on national defence, take into consideration the fact that Canadian expenditures for that purpose for the current year are considerably larger than those of other dominions, notwithstanding the fact that Canada occupies a less vulnerable position?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) is not in his place but I shall call his attention to the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I might ask, in the same connection, whether the government will take into consideration the undoubted fact that the expenditures are much less than those of the other dominions.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will call that also to the attention of the minister.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Fruit Act (French version).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Grades for fruit in closed packages.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister will tell us what he proposes to do in this bill.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As I explained when the bill was given its first reading, the purpose of this legislation is merely to make one slight change in the description of No. 2 apples. In the French version the word "eighty" appears, in reference to the percentage of apples that are free from scab and other defects and which shall constitute Grade No. 2, and the present amendment is to substitute for the word "eighty" the word "eighty-five," so that the French version may conform to the English version of the act. That is the sole purpose of the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This was not included in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think so.

Mr. MARTELL: What effect will this amendment have on special grade apples?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It will have no effect whatever on apples of special grades. The purpose of the bill is merely to make the correction I have mentioned.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT, 1907; AMENDMENT

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

[Mr. Meighen.]

On section 1—Statutory declaration to accompany application for appointment of Board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister explain the purpose of the bill?

Mr. MURDOCK: The change proposed in this section merely contemplates that, in cases where it has been impossible for employer and employee to meet and negotiate, a declaration may be accepted from the employees indicating that it has been impossible to secure a conference or enter into negotiations and that as a result a strike is likely to occur. There have been cases in the past where such a provision has appeared necessary.

Mr. CHURCH: There is before the law courts on the way to the Privy Council for decision at the present time the question of the jurisdiction of parliament to enact legislation of this nature, and the question at issue is as to whether this parliament can delegate to itself the power to regulate the public utilities of municipalities. The municipalities operate many public utilities such as light and power, and under section 91 of the British North America Act it seems to me that this parliament has enough to do in reference to federal utilities, such as the postal service, without encroaching upon the realm of the provinces and the municipalities. I do not think that parliament should pass any legislation that has any relation to the municipalities without the consent of those municipalities. I understand that the Department of Justice has given an opinion that this whole act is ultra vires, and that opinion is supported by two courts of record in the province of Ontario. I think that is good not only as a matter of law but of policy. For how can this parliament say: We are going to regulate the municipal activities of, say, Winnipeg, Edmonton or Vancouver, and virtually act as a court of appeal in labour disputes between those municipalities and their employees? It is not in the public interest that there should be such interferences with the harmonious operation of public utilities by municipal corporations from the commercial aspect.

I should like to know who is asking for this legislation, because I understand the Department of Justice has advised that it is ultra vires of this parliament. Until the Privy Council has given its decision in the case now pending as to the respective powers of the federal parliament, the provincial legislatures and municipal corporations, I think it would be unwise to proceed with the bill. Certainly if it is enacted it will stir up trouble all over Canada, and the operation of public utilities by our municipalities will be very seriously handicapped. The present law is working quite satisfactorily, and our public ownership bodies are paying the highest wages to their employees. In my own province there is no complaint that the law is not working well. On all these grounds, therefore, I am strongly of opinion that we should leave well enough alone, or in any event defer action until we get the decision of the Privy Council on the case now in the courts which decision may be expected next May or June.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, I have been told that this clause is very favourable and very just to labour. But it is in one sentence a page long, and I can make neither head nor tail of it; I do not know what it means. I am reasonably certain that very few labour men would be able to interpret the clause. Therefore I would ask the Minister of Labour to kindly explain once more what it really means, because I did not get his first explanation.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) will look at the explanatory notes on the right hand pages he will find that the only changes proposed are printed in italics, their purpose being to permit the acceptance of a request from employees for a board of conciliation, even although those employees are not able to declare that they have met the employer and exhausted negotiations. As long as they can declare that they have made all possible efforts to obtain a satisfactory settlement, that will be sufficient for the Department of Labour to act upon.

Might I say to my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) that the particular question which he dealt with is not referred to in any of these proposed amendments? He is quite correct in saying that a board appointed by the Department of Labour was enjoined from proceeding with an investigation in regard to certain employees of the Hydro-Electric Commission in Toronto. An application was made to the department, and following the usual practice of many years the department asked the Hydro-Electric Commission if they would agree to the formation of a board. The Commission hesitated for some time and finally did, in substance, decline to give their sanction to the formation of such a board. The department regarded the situation as so important that it proceeded to appoint a board, and the Hydro-Electric Commission at once took proceedings in the courts to obtain an injunction, which injunction the department has scrupulously observed. But we went into court to ascertain the rights of the federal Labour department under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. One judge issued the injunction and another judge, of equal standing, disagreed with his learned brother and referred the case to the Court of Appeal of Ontario, where argument was heard about a month ago. A decision is expected in a few days. As my hon. friend from North Toronto suggested, the case will probably go to the Privy Council for final determination. I may say that should it be decided that we have no right to appoint a conciliation board in the case of disputes between municipal corporations and their employees, it would simplify our work very much. But the proposed amendments have no connection with the question raised by my hon. friend, and I am quite sure he will not contend for a moment that the act is not applicable to recognized dominion-wide public utilities. The particular section we are now considering has no bearing on the case before the Court of Appeal.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the hon. minister go a step further and tell the House what the result would be, if the proposed amendments are passed, in the case of a strike of the employees of any government department, and the department in question refused to negotiate with the strikers? Could the strikers thereupon go to the minister's department and as a matter of right obtain a board of conciliation?

Mr. MURDOCK: I could not say what I might do or the department might do until we were confronted with the circumstances and were able to take them into consideration.

Mr. ARTHURS: Similar cases have arisen in the past, so it is nothing new. We had a similar case in Winnipeg, where a department refused to treat with strikers.

Mr. MURDOCK: I never before heard it intimated that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act applied to such disputes.

Mr. ARTHURS: As I understand the act, and as the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to explain it, it would seem to apply to any body of organized labour.

Mr. MURDOCK: The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act applies to public utilities which are specified in section 2 of the act. The Post Office Department would not be a public utility as contemplated by the act.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the minister read section 2?

The CHAIRMAN: This is an amendment to section 15 of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. It is a question whether that inquiry is in order.

Mr. CHURCH: The whole question of the power of this legislature to enact a law of this kind is now before the courts, and if the act is declared unconstitutional then this amendment would also be unconstitutional. If the act applies to municipal public utilities, why should employees of the Post Office Department not be given a board if they wish to make a declaration under the act? Moreover, they are getting only one-half what the Hydro-Electric employees are getting to-day. Their lowest wage is $790 a year whereas in the other case it is $1,200 or $1,300. I contend that this whole matter should be held over until next session pending the decision whether this parliament has power to pass legislation of this kind.

Mr. MURDOCK: In answer to the hon. member (Mr. Arthurs), I may say that section 2 of the act reads:

> In this act, unless the context otherwise requires—
> (a) "Minister" means the Minister of Labour;
> (b) "department" means the Department of Labour;
> (c) "employer" means any person, company or corporation employing ten or more persons and owning or operating any mining property, agency of transportation or communication, or public service utility, including, except as hereinafter provided, railways, whether operated by steam, electricity or other motive power, steamships, telegraph and telephone lines, gas, electric light, water and power works.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the meaning of the exception in parenthesis in lines 13, 14 and 15, section 1 (b), which reads:

> Except where the application is made by an employer in consequence of an intended change in wages or hours proposed by the said employer.

Mr. MURDOCK: That parenthesis has been there for a number of years. It does not contemplate any intention of an employer to lock out his employees, but he may have a justifiable intent of serving notice on his employees of his desire for a reduction of wages, and in that case he could make the necessary declaration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister look upon the post office as a public utility?

[Mr. Arthurs.]

Mr. MURDOCK: Not within the meaning of this act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does it cease to be a public utility because it is looked after by a department of the government?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not so long ago it was even held that this act did not apply to Intercolonial Railway employees because they were government employees. I think several decisions to that effect were made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I want to get at: The real distinction is that they are government employees, and that is why the department does not consider that the act applies.

Mr. MURDOCK: One other important reason is that they are not engaged as employees of a public utility as specified in section 2 of the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why on earth the whole act was placed in jeopardy through an endeavour to make other public officials, just as representative of the people as this body, subject to what we would not make applicable to our own people, I do not know. It is idle to say that there should be regulation of public utilities simply because they happen to be provincial in their character while on the other hand the same regulation should not apply to public utilities which are carried on by the Dominion government.

Mr. CARROLL: The other evening while we were discussing the resolution of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) I made some observations with regard to the necessity of having changes made in our constitution, the British North America Act, which would clearly define the respective powers of this parliament and the provincial legislatures with regard to labour and several other matters. The opinions of judges of our supreme courts, especially in Nova Scotia, with which I am more familiar, are such that there is grave doubt in the public mind whether parliament had the power under the British North America Act to pass this legislation. In a private discussion which I had with the minister the other day he suggested to me that there would shortly be a decision which would settle the question. I presume that he had reference to the case to which the hon. member for North Toronto has just referred. In that case the question may not be brought fairly before us whether or not the act is ultra vires. The case may turn on the question of whether it is a provincial public utility or a national public utility. I for one would like to see the Privy Council decide just as clearly and as quickly as it can be done whether the Industrial Disputes Act is within the power and jurisdiction of this parliament. I am one of those who think that the Industrial Disputes Act has been a tremendous power for good in this country. Innumerable disputes which would otherwise have led to strikes and disasters have been averted through the goodwill which was brought about between employers and employees by virtue of this act, and so far as I am concerned I would be sorry if in the end it was declared ultra vires by the Privy Council. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) suggests that the Department of Justice has given opinions which, in effect, declare the act to be ultra vires.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Merely against the municipality.

Mr. CARROLL: As against the municipality. I read some of these opinions last winter, and I am sorry to say that different branches of the Department of Justice have given different opinions as to the validity of this act. I hope the day will soon come when if this case is not taken direct to the Privy Council—and if the Department of Labour loses the case in Toronto they certainly will carry it to the Privy Council, but in case the Department of Labour wins, the people of Ontario may not see fit to carry the case to that court—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They will.

Mr. CARROLL: Then that will overcome the difficulty. I have my own opinions as a lawyer, very serious and, I think very well-grounded opinions. I am not going to give them to the House this afternoon; I did give them more or less the other day; but I think this matter should be settled. There should not be any doubt about the matter, and if there should remain any doubt after the decision of the Privy Council, if they do not give a clear-cut decision as to the validity of the act, I think the Department of Justice should even take the trouble of having our constitution so amended as to make it perfectly and amply and fully plain that this parliament has the power to legislate on matters of this kind.

I do not think the Industrial Disputes Act goes far enough. It seems to me that in all our great industries in this country there should be the means whereby a conciliation board could be granted, in order to give employer and employee a chance to fight their differences out before such a board. Let me give an instance. In the constituency I represent we have two great industries, the coal mining industry and the steel industry. If differences of opinion arise in the coal mining industry, and if the conditions of the act are fulfilled, the employers may get a board, and boards have done very much good in that part of the country; but if a difference of opinion arises between the steel workers and their employers, who are the very same people, the British Empire Steel Company, the poor steel worker is told that he cannot have a board to investigate his grievances, while his brother, the coal miner, working for the same corporation five miles away, has the right to a conciliation board. I would draw this respectfully to the attention of the Minister of Labour. It may make for a weakness in the act so far as legislative power is concerned, but I think the day should come when this parliament should take power under the constitution to give every industry, employers and employees, the right to a conciliation board. Let not a preference, so to speak, be given to a man because he happens to be working in an industry which comes under the nomen of a "public utility."

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Relation of parties to remain unchanged pending proceedings before a board.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is one point, it semes to me, that is hardly sufficiently guarded in this clause. The idea is that there shall be no change pending an investigation. If I am rightly informed in the case of the Nova Scotia trouble a year and a half ago, a board had been asked for, but the employers took the ground that since the agreement had expired there could be no change in the conditions; that is, they had been running along under the conditions of the old agreement, but the agreement having expired the employers took the ground that everything was at an end, and they proposed under those circumstances to change the rates of pay, the hours and working conditions. It was really that that led to the so-called "ca' canny" policy—"striking on the job," the men taking the ground that since there was no agreement they were not bound to give a certain amount of work. Now it is quite obvious that the company was not carrying out the spirit behind this legislation, and I wonder whether it would not be possible to draft the legislation in such a way that no employer or employee could disregard its spirit in that way.

Even although the agreement had come to a close at the end of the year, could not the conditions run along until a final settlement was made? I would ask the Minister of Labour if it would not be possible to insert such a clause as that?

Mr. MURDOCK: I fear it would be impossible to attempt to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth), for this reason: It would contemplate coercion possibly of both parties to an agreement, and we might have just as much or even more difficulty in securing the consent of the workmen than of the employers to a provision of that kind, which would, in effect, tie them to their tasks for a certain stated or uncertain time. I am sure we would have just as much difficulty under the circumstances suggested by my hon. friend, where you would compel the workmen to continue working under the conditions of an agreement after it had expired until a board had finished its sittings and had filed its award.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do you not do that in this case?

Mr. MURDOCK: We hope to secure the co-operation of both employer and employee to the end that no interruption of the industry's operations shall take place; but we would hope also to secure the co-operation of the employer and employee in seeing that agreements be not made that would automatically sever relations as between the two parties at a given time. The consistent thing, I think, for organized labour to do now generally is to make an agreement subject to sixty days' notice of a desire for a change by either party to the agreement. That would give reasonable latitude to the interests of the parties and the public for negotiations to be held and a new agreement to be reached.

Now, in the case my hon. friend cited the agreement expired at a certain hour on a certain given day, and, no new agreement having been arrived at, there was a complete stoppage of operations regardless of the public right in the matter, creating a situation which ought to have been avoided. But I suggest to my hon. friend that such a situation cannot be avoided by attempting to assert in this, or in any other law, a coercive restriction that will compel either the employer or the workman to continue operations, possibly in the case of the latter, at a rate he may not have agreed to.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (For the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4 to amend the Patent Act (French version).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1.—Inventions for which foreign patents have been taken out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The only object of the bill is to correct two words in the French version. The word "earliest" in the fourth line of the English version—you have it on the opposite page—was translated into French as if it were the "latest". The same thing at the end of the section, where the word "black" appeared as "white".

Mr. STEVENS: The translator who would translate "black" into "white", and "earliest" into "latest" needs an examination. I was just going to observe to my hon. friend that there have been quite a number of bills of this character. I noticed last session we had one or two cases, and this is the second one already this session correcting translation. It does seem to me that the government owe it to the House to see that its officers do better work in the translation than this. I am not offering this criticism of my hon. friend, but really I think a little healthy sharp criticism of an officer who will do such slovenly work as this is not at all untimely. I am not aware of any objection to the bill but there is need, perhaps, of a little castigation of the officer responsible for the errors.

4 p.m.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid these mistakes were happening quite frequently in former times without being noticed. However, the remarks of my hon. friend are to the point. And I may say that measures are being considered at the present time for the purpose of improving the translation branches of the government.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Commencement of act.

Mr. STEVENS: Does this make any change in the original act? The section reads.

This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of September, 1923.

Why is it necessary to have this clause?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think that was the date fixed in the original act.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the minister quite sure of that?—because the change may be far reaching.

The CHAIRMAN: An explanation is given on the opposite page.

Mr. STEVENS: It was in the original act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a little hurried, I have really not had time to look the matter over. I should judge from what is said on the opposite page that the act came into force by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette. The proclamation was issued, I gather, on 7th July, 1923.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And this clause is necessary in order to bring the French version into harmony with the English version? The act was brought into force by proclamation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, by proclamation.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC HALIBUT FISHERY

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend section six of the Northern Pacific Halibut Fishery Protection Act, chapter sixty-one of the statutes of 1923, which relates to Canadian and United States nationals and ships liable to seizure for engaging in fishing for halibut in prohibited waters, by limiting the time for an offence thereunder to the close season as defined in the Act, and by repealing section nine, relating to the seizure of foreign ships.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. CARDIN: The committee will surely remember that, following the treaty between Canada and the United States, an act was passed during the last session in order to make effective the provisions of the treaty. The first amendment which is proposed relates to section 6 which reads:

Every national or inhabitant of Canada or of the United States, and every ship, vessel or boat registered in Canada or the United States, or belonging to a national or inhabitant of Canada or of the United States, together with all furniture, apparel, appliances, gear, tackle and rigging thereof, engaged in or used in connection with fishing for halibut in prohibited waters or aiding or facilitating, or used for the purpose of aiding or facilitating such fishing, may be seized by any officer authorized by the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act to board and search.

The amendment is to add the words "during the close season" after the words "prohibited waters." As the section now stands, it prohibits fishing throughout the year, the words "during the close season" having been left out through error. We propose to repeal the whole section because, by a rule passed last session, when we amend part of a section, we have to repeal the whole section and ask that a new one be substituted for it.

The next amendment we have in view is to repeal section 9 which reads:

Every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, which,

(a) has been found fiishing or preparing to fish or to have been fishing for halibut in the territorial waters of the western coast of Canada in any close season; or

(b) has entered such waters for any purpose of which the execution is prohibited by this act:

may be seized by any of the officers aforesaid.

Section 9 is almost a repetition of section 5. The point covered by this section is already covered by section 5 which reads:

Every ship, vessel or boat, including all furniture, apparel, appliances, gear, tackle and rigging thereof, which is in any manner operated or used for the purpose of committing an offence against this act, or for aiding or facilitating the commisson of any such offence, may be seized by any officer authorized by the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act to board and search, and shall be forfeited;

Besides that, section 9 may be objected to on account of the fact that it states that only foreign ships can be seized. It appears that an exception is made in regard to vessels navigating according to the laws of the United Kingdom or Canada. I think these small amendments will not in any way change the situation in which we find ourselves now. They are not material at all. They are intended only to do away with some doubts which may arise between the interpretation of section 9 and section 5.

Mr. BAXTER: I should like to suggest to the minister that, in making the amendment, he might, perhaps, go a little further in section 6. The act itself defines the territorial waters of the western coast of Canada. It also defines the territorial waters of the United States. I cannot conceive that a Canadian customs officer would be intended, by this government, to attempt any seizure outside of our own territorial waters. Yet, if my hon. friend will look at section 6 as it stands to-day, he will find that apparently just as much power is given to a Canadian customs officer to seize at Seattle as there was for him to seize during the open season. I quite concur that it is correct to limit this legislation to the close season; but I think it would be just as well to make it clear to men who are looking to the statute for guidance, that their operations as regards seizures ought to be confined to the territorial waters of Canada. I would suggest for the purpose, not of criticism but of assistance, that after the word "seized" in the printed statute at the third line from the top of the page, there should be some definition of the place, that is, seized "within the territorial waters of Canada" or some similar expression, because I can understand how a zealous but mistaken officer might cause considerably difficulty by going outside of Canadian territorial limits altogether and making a seizure.

I would also like to suggest that section 9, which the minister proposes to repeal, might receive further consideration. Section 4 puts the owner or master of a vessel under a certain penalty. Section 5, as the minister very properly says, involves forfeiture of any vessel:

—which is in any manner operated or used for the purpose of committing an offence against this act, or for aiding or facilitating the commisson of any such offence.

I think that might very properly apply to vessels on our own register. I would think, however, that we would not be wise, to say the least, to attempt to create an offence or to inflict a punishment upon a foreign vessel, unless her act had been done within the ports or territorial waters of Canada. Under section 4 or section 5, it does not matter where the person or the vessel is. For instance, if a Canadian vessel were out on the high seas and made preparations there to invade the territorial waters of Canada for the purpose of illegal fishing, I think this law would apply and we could punish our own nationals.

Mr. MARTELL: Has my hon. friend read the treaty under which this resolution is framed? It will be found, I think, that there was entered into between Canada and the United States an agreement which gives to Canada, under the treaty, authority to seize United States' vessels which are found in Canadian or American water if they are violating the provisions of the treaty, and the Americans are to have the same powers regarding Canadian vessels found in Canadian or American waters. If Canada seizes United States vessels, she must hand them over to the United States for trial, and the same thing would apply in regard to Canadian vessels seized by the United States, the United States would have to hand them over to Canada for trial. If power were given to seize vessels only in territorial waters, you would not get them at all, because it is only in extra-territorial waters that the offence is committed.

Mr. BAXTER: Perhaps in a spirit of great national charity I was not designating the people of the United States as foreigners. As regards foreign ships, I was thinking of ships other than those of the United States. I had in mind the provisions of the treaty as my hon. friend has them in mind, although I'm blessed if I know whether there is a treaty or not. Perhaps my hon friend knows.

Mr. MARTELL: There will be.

Mr. BAXTER: Oh, there is to be.

Mr. MARTELL: It is in esse. It only needs ratification.

Mr. BAXTER: I have no objection to a treaty. The only thing is that this treaty appeared as a New Year's gift in some of the newspapers, and it has appeared several times since with little strings, tails, fins and little wiggly things all around it. A few days ago it came into this House as a subject of ratification. It did not matter if we were riding chariots through the Civil Service; it did not matter if we had forgotten how to cut down rates; it did not matter if we had stagnation in the Maritime provinces, a subject in which the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) ought to be interested—the great constitutional thing, the great light that had developed on the world, the great beneficence in the twentieth century was that a Canadian could sign his name upon a piece of parchment and bind some part of the British Empire; that is, if the thing was unilateral, or bilateral, or quadrilateral, or based upon some other angles that were not defined. My hon. friend wants to take great comfort out of this signature. I will tell him that I very much prefer to get down to something that has real meat in it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is fish.

Mr. BAXTER: It is all very well to indulge in flights of imagination, but really nobody cares a bit whether we sign treaties on this side of the Atlantic or on the other side; what we do care about is that we shall get something out of them. That is the real point.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I understand that when speaking in the Maritime provinces he took the view that reciprocity would have been of great benefit to us but we took the national view.

Mr. BAXTER: I am not going to be diverted from my course by any more of these remarks of my hon. friend. I want to be as complimentary to him as I can, but I do not think he should interrupt me in the way he has done. When he interrupted me a few moments ago I really thought that it was the Prime Minister who had shifted his seat and so I deferred to him. I see now he is not the Prime Minister. However, in all seriousness I would ask the minister to consider the suggestions I have made, which are offered entirely with the idea of assisting him to perfect the measure as far as possible.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Northern Pacific Halibut Fishery Protection Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

Public Works—Chargeable to Capital

Public Buildings—
Ottawa Parliament Buildings	$ 600,000
Ottawa, addition to Dominion Archives Building	275,000
London, England, Canadian office	1,300,000
	$2,175,000

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): When we were last in committee we had under consideration the estimate for completion of the tower and there was a suggestion that the government should explain to the House what delay in this work would mean not only in the actual cost but also from the point of view of the deterioration of the tower itself and of the buildings that have been used in its construction. I indicated at that time that the architect's commission was fixed at 5½ per cent for completion and that we had an arrangement with him to complete the construction. The plans have been prepared and are being submitted to the department under that arrangement. If we should decide to cancel our arrangement with the architect he would be entitled to receive from us 3 per cent on the plans to date, and at the end of five or six or ten years, whenever we might decide to complete the construction, we should either require to make a new contract with the present architects or engage another architect. In that case our expenditure would involve an additional 7 per cent in all probability, following the usual architectural fees, because we could not have the benefit which we should otherwise have in having the present architect complete the work. The first item of 3 per cent on the completed tower, on an expenditure of $565,000, would be $16,950; and the commission which it would be necessary to pay if we started to work over again, would amount, at 7 per cent, to $39,550. In regard to the contractor's commission, our arrangement is that he should complete the work at the old commission of 7 per cent. I believe that those who have had experience with contractors and who are familiar with work of this character will realize that the completion of this tower is probably one of the most difficult portions of the construction of the parliament buildings, and I have no doubt that if it became necessary some years later to enter into a new contract the builder would expect a larger percentage than even 7 per cent. Indeed, the officers of the department are of the opinion that it would cost at least 10 per cent; and on an expenditure of $480,000 that additional 3 per cent would mean an addition of $14,400. Now, if we should decide to delay construction for five or six years, I think it must be evident to all who know anything about the surroundings of these buildings that it would be necessary to clear the debris from the grounds and do other work of that kind, and we should have to have the grounds sodded and put into proper shape. The estimated cost for the removal of buildings used in construction, and of stone, brick, sand and other material, in addition to the cleaning up of the ground and completing the work of paving grading and so forth. is $20,000. We have a very large workshop on Sussex street which was erected primarily for carving and cutting the stone to be used in this building. It is built of substantial timbers and equipped with cranes and other machinery necessary for the handling of heavy stone. When built in 1916 it was not expected that it would be required for more than four or five years, and I am informed that last year it was discovered that dry rot had attacked the foundation timbers, necessitating the insertion of concrete blocks to maintain the structure in place. If we should decide not to proceed with the programme now contemplated, it will be necessary to tear down the workshop and from the timber construct a shed of sufficient size to store the stone and other material that will eventually go into the tower. That is estimated to cost $82,000. This figure includes the cost of removing the machinery and either installing it in a new building or else taking the stone to Montreal or some other place to be cut and carved, which means heavy cartage and freight charges. It will be seen therefore that any delay will entail a very considerable expense, in fact it is estimated by the department that about $172,000 will be the price of delay. It was suggested a few nights ago in discussion that so many hundred thousands of dollars at five per cent interest would mean so much money, and by delaying construction there would be a saving of this interest. But as a matter of fact instead of being a saving there would be a very considerable loss. Besides this, hon. members will no doubt have noticed that the sandstone used in this building darkens on exposure to the weather, and if we should delay construction for a period of years, there will be a marked difference between the new and the old work. In the course of years the two would probably blend harmoniously, but for some years after completion we would have the upper third of the tower sticking up like a sore thumb.

Now, I think it would be unwise for the committee to entertain delaying this construction. It is part of the scheme undertaken years ago after the fire, and I hope hon. members will be of the opinion, after the information I have just given, that we would be ill advised to delay the work. I might say that when the estimates for my department were first submitted to me by the officials they asked for a vote of $800,000. We have since reduced this total by $200,000. In my summary of expenditures last week I suggested certain lines that might be followed this year, but since last discussing the matter with departmental officers, I find that if we complete the tower in the manner described, installing electric wiring and elevators, and also doing what is necessary for the clock chimes, and complete the memorial chamber, we shall require an expenditure of $564,000. So the expenditure this year of the $600,000 will be largely confined to the tower itself.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister explain why it is necessary to revise these figures? The other night we were very particular about this and we understood that the $383,000 for the completion of the tower covered the exterior, elevators and electric wiring.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BOYS: I really believe a reference to Hansard will show that that is what the minister stated to the committee.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BOYS: And he advised us that the memorial chamber would cost about $80,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The masonry.

Mr. BOYS: Yes, the masonry for the tower and the interior improvements. I remember the first figure was $293,000, which was for the masonry, and then I understood it was increased to $383,000 to provide for the completion of the tower. Here is what the minister said, at page 576, of Hansard:

> I gave the figures for electrical equipment, masonry and so forth, but the masonry is $293,808.

And at a later stage of the discussion—I do not know that I can lay my hand on it at the moment—that amount was increased to $383,000 to provide for these other additions. Then the further cost of the memorial chamber was given at $80,000 odd. On that occasion I said that I thought the tower should be completed and I still think so. I also think it would be desirable to complete the memorial chamber, for the reasons given the other night. Anyway, it is a feature of this structure that we should not neglect, and I am quite prepared to support whatever expenditure is necessary to do the work. I took exception to the cost that would be incurred for cutting the flat stone that we see in this chamber. It is expensive work, and I think it might well be left in abeyance. If it is a fact that the amount required to do the work suggested is nearly $600,000, I would hesitate to support any reduction of the item; but unless I am assured of that I certainly think it should be reduced to whatever amount will be required for the work.

Mr. WHITE: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Parliamentary committee that had to do with the settlement of the architects' and contractors' claims, I probably had a better opportunity to get acquainted with the facts and to examine the buildings that have been referred to than hon. members who were not on that committee. At the time I noted with particular satisfaction the large amount of machinery that had been provided to take care of the stone work. One of the terms of settlement of the contractors' claims was that they should complete the tower at a commission of seven per cent. It appears to me that that was a very wise arrangement, the character of the work being such that if it were placed with another contractor the commission would probably be considerably higher. It seems to me that the work should be carried on by the original architects and contractors. There is a particular reason for adopting this course. There is a certain responsibility for the work already completed. In connection with the building of the tower a great deal of extra weight is to be placed on the present structure, and if any defects develop it will be easy to place the blame in the proper place. On the other hand, if some other contractor subsequently does the work it will be easy for one contractor to blame the other and it will be difficult to fix the blame in the case of defect. The minister gave two lists of items of proposed expenditure—page 558 of Hansard—and the second list, involving a total of about $81,000, was for stone carving, electrical work, special lighting fixtures, changes to doors, and so on. It seems to me that that amount of $81,000 odd could be struck out, because the building may very well remain as it is for a number of years. The outside work, the necessary electrical work and the elevators should be provided for, as well as the completion of the memorial chamber and all stone work in connection with the tower.

Mr. BOYS: May I put myself right with the minister? If he will look at page 574 of Hansard he will find what took place. In referring to the matter I said:

> Before the committee rose at six o'clock I took down some figures but I do not know whether I got them correctly. I understood the minister to say that the masonry work on the tower amounts to $293,000.
> Mr. King (Kootenay): That is right.
> Mr. Boys: And the completion of the tower, with elevators, wiring, and so forth, made a total of $383,000.
> Mr. King (Kootenay): The total is $383,898.
> Mr. Boys: There is no question, then, that $400,000 would cover everything in connection with the tower.
> Mr. King (Kootenay). Without the memorial chamber.

At a later stage in the discussion the figure for the memorial tower was given at about $80,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The figures included in the first statement I gave were as follows:

Masonry as per bill of quantities, Memorial Chamber	$ 81,820
Main Tower	293,808
Elevators: push button elevator, etc.	15,000
Electric wiring: interior wiring for lighting, power, clocks, illuminating four clock dials, etc.	28,950
Roofing	16,500
Ornamental iron: elevator enclosures, spiral and straight stairs, ladders in tower—flag pole	7,640

That amounts to $383,000 for the tower and $81,820 for the memorial chamber, a total of $465,000 in round figures.

Mr. STEVENS: The total of the figures just read by the minister is about $443,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, but I gave additional figures later.

Mr. STEVENS: They had nothing to do with the tower.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Just to clear the thing up, I will give the figures again:

Masonry as per bill of quantities, memorial chamber	$ 81,820
Main tower	293,808
Carving, main tower	20,000
Roofing	16,500
Ornamental iron	7,640
Elevators	15,000
Heating	2,000
Electric wiring	28,950

That is $465,718.

Mr. STEVENS: Does that not absolutely complete the tower, clock and all?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. Including the $81,820 for the memorial chamber, the total is $465,000, and when you add the clock and completion of the memorial chamber, it makes a total of $564,000. These are all connected with the tower; they are all within the estimate of the architect and to a great extent under the control of the contractor.

Mr. STEVENS: I confess that it is difficult to harmonize the figures given to-day with those given the other day. We do not wish to harass the minister with captious criticism about this work, but it is the view of members on this side that any work that is not absolutely necessary might very well be left undone this year. Generally speaking we have no great objection, I think, to the completion of the tower and the memorial chamber and any other really necessary work, but there are some items, even among those mentioned by the minister to-day, which seem to be unnecessary. Take, for instance, the $28,950 for electric wiring, flood lighting projectors, wiring for flood lighting, four lamp standards for lighting fixtures in tower reflectors, and so forth: I agree that it would be very nice indeed to have the tower illuminated, but I think we could very well afford to let that work, involving an expenditure of $28,900, remain over for this year. If the minister will take his figures for the masonry work of the tower, with such fixtures as it may be necessary to put in when the masonry is completed, he will find that he can very easily keep within $400,000; then if he adds to that the finishing of the memorial chamber, about $450,000 or $475,000 should be ample. If the figures given by the minister to-day are correct—and I am not doubting his word, though I do doubt the accuracy of his addition—we have not anything like enough money in this vote to do the work which is contemplated, because the other day he had on his list $50,000 for interior lightings, quite a sum for carvings, and some other items, all included in the $600,000. How he is going to apply $540,000 to the tower and then squeeze in all these other items and keep the amount down to $600,000, I do not know. But I do suggest that $475,000 will give him ample to finish the tower, including the work on the memorial chamber. By the way, the minister himself told us the other day that the stone and all the material required for the finishing of the memorial chamber is already here, and that undoubtedly is included in the estimates he gives us today, although the material is here and paid for.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. STEVENS: They are not included in that? In any case, the material is here and can be placed in position without any delay and be paid for. I want to suggest to the minister quite seriously that he cut this item by $125,000. I took occasion to go round the building and examine the fixtures. I am not an expert but I can see this, as anyone can who cares to cast his eyes around, that the so-called temporary electric fixtures in this building are good for a number of years, without causing the slightest offence to the artistic taste of anyone, and certainly so far as utility is concerned they are just as good for a number of years as permanent fixtures. In a few years, of course, their usefulness will be gone, and then they can probably be replaced, but I think it is a decided waste of money to take $50,000 now to remove these fixtures that are perfecly good and replace them with permanent fixtures when the money is needed very much more in other directions, and when the present fixtures are such that no one can possibly take offence at their appearance. I would therefore suggest once again to the minister that this item be reduced by $100,000 or $120,000. That would still enable him to complete the tower properly.

Mr. FORKE: I quite agree with the statements that have been made by the hon. member for London in connection with the finishing of the tower. The member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) the member for London (Mr. White) and myself, with the Minister of Public Works, were appointed a committee to look into the matter of the charges made by the architect and the contractors in the construction of this building. It was a rather difficult proposition to undertake, and it was not easy to arrive at conclusions that would be satisfactory both to the architect and contractors and to the people of this country, but a settlement was made that I think upon examination will be found to be very satisfactory. It was not entirely satisfactory to the contractors, nor to the architects, and perhaps it will not be altogether satisfactory to the people of this country, but I think it was a fair and just settlement. The contractor and the architect were to go on and complete the tower. They agreed to do that on the terms that have already been stated by the minister. I need not recapitulate the arguments in favour of completing the tower. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that it would be economy to get the main work in connection with the tower done now. I realize the need for economy. I realize that people all over this country might wonder why should we expend thousands of dollars to finish the tower when there is a dire need for money in other directions, but I think it can be conclusively shown that it would be a waste of money to wait for five years before starting to finish the tower. There is a vast amount of machinery lying down there that at the end of this year will have to be removed, or paid extra for if it remains there. There is also depreciation to be taken into account. I pointed out to some of my friends before the minister spoke just a few moments ago that if we left it over for five years there would be quite a difference for a number of years between the different sections of the tower in the colour of the stones.

There is another point that has not been emphasized. I have never seen the plans in regard to the tower, and I would not understand them if I did see them. I question if they are down on paper yet. I think they are probably in the architect's head, and they would not be available to anyone starting in to finish that tower some years hence. I do not think any other architect coming in would be able to complete the tower exactly on the lines projected by the present architect.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a model.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, but that is of the outside of the building. It does not show the interior. I do think, after listening carefully to all the arguments that have been made, though I am as much in favour of economy as anyone, that it would not be a mistake for the government to take the advice of the opposition, supported I think by a good many members in my part of the House, to cut off at least $100,000 from that estimate. I think everyone would like to see the tower finished and everything done up nicely. When it is finished the building will be a show place not only for the people of this country, but for visitors from other countries. I would ask the minister if he cannot conscientiously cut off $100,000 from this estimate, and I would then be prepared to give him my hearty support.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I should like to meet the wishes of hon. members, but with the knowledge I have I do not think it would be wise to cut this estimate and say: There, that is all; after that you can let your architect and your contractor go. We are under contract and we have architects' fees to pay, and I want to get this building out of their hands just as soon as we can. The sooner we get them out the less expense there will be. During the last two or three years we have had many votes under which we might have spent considerable sums of money, but we have not done so, and it is not the intention of the department to do so, in the future. We shall spend only what is necessary. We have a certain staff around this building, and there are times when we can utilize that staff to carry on important work, and if we are given a little leeway, I can assure hon. gentlemen, we shall not be extravagant. We never have been, and we do not propose to be. With a vote of $600,000 this year we shall be able to carry on and if it is not necessary to expend that amount we shall not expend it. But to say that we should cut off $100,000 from an estimate that the departmental staff originally recommended should be $800,000 would be hardly fair, considering their judgment and the care they have given to this last report. I can assure the House that great care will be taken in any additional expenditure that may be considered, and the money will be expended only if it is considered to be in the interests of economy to spend it.

I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to express my appreciation of the very valuable assistance I received from the hon. member for Brandon, (Mr. Forke) the hon. member for London, (Mr. White) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in arranging the settlement between the architect, the contractor and the Public Works Department. They gave a great deal of time and attention to this matter, and I wish to assure them that this was greatly appreciated by myself as Minister of Public Works.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask the minister a couple of questions. First, does he really think it is necessary to do stone carving around this building at the present time?

Mr. KING: (Kootenay): We are not doing any now, I think.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course, the minister is not doing it now, but the money was voted last session and that work has been going on. There is an item for stone carving again this year. Does the minister really think it is necessary at the present time to throw away money in stone carving?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The carving done last year was considered necessary. It was done above the throne in the Senate; it was necessary to put up the canopy and complete the work there. There has been no large amount of stone carving done, and we do not propose to do any except in places where it is considered necessary it should be done. In connection with the memorial chamber, of course, it will be necessary to do considerable carving.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a different thing entirely. We challenged the stone carving last year. Gentlemen who are interested in this subject, if they would go over to the Senate some time and observe some of the incongruous heads that are being carved there, out of all keeping with the general plan of the building and the general scheme of architecture, will see just exactly how necessary that work was. If anything further illustrating the throwing away of money were wanted it seems to me all my hon. friends need to do is to proceed to the next floor, go along the general court, and observe the tremendous amount of money that is being spent for the purpose of getting the proper architectural effect with the gothic arches we have there. They are supposed to be some of the finest gothic arches in the world. As to that I do not pretend to be a judge, but there you see the gothic arches and they are absolutely ruining the tracery by setting up the most expensive kind of modern, up-to-date bank fixture grilles, that are entirely out of keeping beside this architecture of the centuries that have gone by. I do not think that sort of stuff is necessary. If it is the work ought to be done by somebody who has an idea of the general scheme or spirit of the architecture of this building. The one reason that appeals to me for going on with the tower at the present time is in order to secure harmony, in order that the original conception or design can be adhered to.

Now, the minister says he cannot do this work for less than $600,000. I have not been able to accurately follow his figures at all. I was not here when the matter was discussed on Friday, but we have two sets of figures to-day and I confess that I am not enlightened by them. If the minister is wise he will realize that the sense of the committee is that the only thing that ought to be done is to finish the tower and the memorial chamber—that and nothing else. If he is wise he will—without haggling over a few cents here and a few cents there—consent to a change in the wording of this vote, so that this money shall be used for the completion of the tower and the memorial chamber only. If that is done I have no objection.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is practically the purpose in—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If it is practically the purpose there is no reason why you should not change the wording of the vote.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Take the one item of $8,000 for the electric wiring of the library. Now, any hon. member who goes into the library will see the absolute necessity of that work being done. Then there is the pay list, which represents a very considerable amount, for the work which may occur about this building from time to time. I think the estimate is a close one for the work that should be done this year. If the vote is not necessary it will not be expended.

Mr. STEVENS: An estimate for any work that cannot be foreseen cannot be included in this item, because the minister has given to us—unless he is misleading the committee, which I do not suggest—a definite list of the items for which he is asking this money.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not at all. It is the proposed list, the proposed expenditure, that I outlined.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this list a joke or is the minister sincere? Let me again draw the items to my hon. friend's attention, I have spoken of them three times already. There is the item of $50,000 electric fixtures. That is wholly unnecessary. I say it is absolutely unwise—and it has nothing to do with the tower at all—to tear down perfectly good electric fixtures and replace them with ornamental permanent fixtures. This work undoubtedly will have to be done ultimately, but in the meantime the present fixtures are apparently effective and perfectly good. There is $50,000 in one item.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): What item?

Mr. STEVENS: I have it in my hon. friend's own words "Special lighting fixtures." And then I asked for an explanation, and he told me what it was for—they were for the corridors. While speaking in regard to this matter the minister advances the view that the government have certain contracts to consider. Well we asked the minister to lay the contracts on the table. Here let me say that I do not like to waste the time of the committee by talking to deaf ears. If the minister will be good enough to listen—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am listening.

Mr. STEVENS: I asked the minister the other day if he would lay the contracts on the table. What was laid on the table was an order in council with the report of the special committee, to which my hon. friend has referred in some kindly words of gratitude, and I think well earned. This is all the information we have, and it does not give us the particulars we desire. Perhaps the minister may have more information and if so he should produce it. The only clause in the return that indicates a settlement is the second last paragraph which I will read:

> Under the circumstances and without reference to the technical legal aspects, the undersigned believes that a settlement with the architects, if it can be made on the basis of $123,004.20, covering Mr. Pearson's services in full, and $19,142.50 covering Mr. Marchand's services in full, or a total payment of $484,335.63 to both architects, of which Mr. Pearson would receive $412,344.92 and Mr. Marchand $71,990.71, is advisable and that it is probably quite as good a settlement as would be obtained by further delay and litigation, particularly as an interest charge would likely be added to any amount recovered, whereas in the settlement proposed above interest is not contained in Mr. Pearson's statement.

Now we have this recommendation of the committee—I think a perfectly proper recommendation and I am not questioning it—but the minister has not brought down any indication from the architects that they accept it. I asked the minister for a copy of the contract with the contractors, and also for a copy of the settlement with Mr. Pearson, and I suppose with Mr. Marchand as well. At present we do not have these documents. All we have is the recommendation from the spceial committee, and no indication that the settlement is accepted by Mr. Pearson. If the minister has any further information the committee is entitled to have it.

5 p.m.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understand from the officials that the papers filed are those that were asked for. It is true there was further correspondence with Mr. Pearson regarding the continuance of the work.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend wholly misunderstands me. The other day we asked the minister for a copy of the contract showing the settlement between the government and Mr. Pearson, or the architects represented by the gentleman. The minister said there was such a contract, and he again stated that to-day.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract is not the settlement. You have the terms of the settlement.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the document I have in my hand is not a settlement, it is the recommendation by the special committee, and there is no evidence whatever that Mr. Pearson has accepted it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is really the recommendation to council and the basis of the settlement, and Mr. Pearson accepted it.

Mr. STEVENS: Has Mr. Pearson accepted it? In that case would the minister let us have the letter, or contract, or agreement, or whatever he likes to call it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the official receipt. But I may advise my hon. friend that Mr. Pearson did accept and signed a receipt for the money in final settlement. That receipt can be brought down if my hon. friend wishes it.

Mr. STEVENS: We ought to have it, it is exactly what we are asking for.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A copy of the receipt will be tabled if my hon. friend wishes.

Mr. STEVENS: What does the minister mean by "receipt?" I notice that Mr. Pearson challenges a statement made once before, made not by my hon. friend but by the department, that he had accepted a certain settlement. The committee entered into quite a discussion of whether or not that is correct. The minister says, "Mr. Pearson has signed a receipt." It would not necessarily follow that Mr. Pearson had accepted the settlement that I have just read. The receipt might be an interim receipt accepting this money on account. It may not disclose a settlement at all. The reason I am pressing this matter is this: We do not want to vote $600,000, or $500,000, for the completion of the tower, on the assurance the minister has given us that it is necessary to do the work in order not to run into expense in the future, and then next session to be told: "Mr. Pearson has not made a settlement and we want a vote to settle with him." If Mr. Pearson has accepted this settlement recommended by the committee, which settlement I am not questioning at all, then his letter is on file and the committee is entitled to have the letter.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Certainly.

Mr. BOYS: The minister was to let us have a copy of the contract. I understand some arrangement was made whereby the machinery is to remain until 31st December of this year, and if the work is not proceeded with by then, the machinery is to be removed. I asked the minister whether or not we would be liable to the contractor if the work was not proceeded with, and his answer was that he presumed a claim would be made. I understand, if these arrangements have been completed with the contractor, they are not all oral. I presume they have been reduced to writing. I should think the contractor himself would want some protection, and whether he does or not, one would certainly expect that the department would want it. That is not made apparent. If, in accordance with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, this vote is reduced to $500,000, that would furnish all the money required by the minister for the work on the tower and the memorial chamber, with the exception of $20,000. If the minister's own figures are right and final, it would be proper to cut the vote down, perhaps not by $100,000, perhaps only by $75,000. But we ought to be sure of the accuracy of those figures as far as we can be sure of estimates. We have only to take the figures the minister has given us as reported on page 558 of revised Hansard and add them up, and we find at once that, according to his own estimates, $525,000 will do that work. I quite appreciate that below the first list there are items which I have also added up, and they total $81,000. If those figures are correct, only $519,000 is required to complete the tower and the memorial chamber.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Has the hon. member allowed anything for the architect's commission or the contractor's commission?

Mr. BOYS: Has the minister?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not there.

Mr. BOYS: I take it for granted that when a minister brings in estimates, which, of course, he receives from his department, they do not omit many things which they ought to include. If there are omissions, we ought to let the item stand in order that we may get a complete list. I am assuming that the figures the minister has given are not only complete, but accurate as far as any estimates can be; and if they are, I repeat that on the minister's own figures, only $519,000 will be required to do that work. I want to be perfectly fair, and to say that this does not include the special lighting fixtures which amount to $50,000, a big item. But if we have any desire to economise, surely we can get along with the lighting fixtures that we have in this building now. They are satisfactory, it seems to me, for the present. The total I have given does not include the $10,000 for stone carving and modelling for interior. There is $60,000 in those two items alone, and you are within $20,000 of the figure I have given. If the minister insists on getting $600,000 and gives us figures which will show that that amount is absolutely necessary to see that work completed, which I want to see completed, I am quite willing to support the item. But unless he can do so, I would support a reduction of this item by, at least, $75,000, because the vote reduced by that amount will do the work as provided by the minister and will accord with the minister's own figures to this committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does this item include the wiring for the Library? If so, could such wiring not be done without putting in very elaborate fixtures?

Mr. SPENCE: I think the minister is at fault. We should have a detailed statement showing the different expenditures and items. If we had that, there would not be so much cross-questioning. I am not criticizing the minister, but the strictest economy should be practised in this House. It is very easy to spend money and it is very difficult to make it. I am in favour of finishing the tower as regards the stone and brick work, keeping in mind the electric conduits and the beams in connection with the operating of the elevator, but we should not do anything at all that is not an absolute necessity. To say that $50,000 should be spent in electric lighting fixtures throughout this building is an absurdity, and such an expenditure should not be tolerated by this committee. I hope the committee will take this item into careful consideration. We should not pass this item to-day until we have a detailed statement and are able to see what we can take off. If $550,000 is required, then I say: Spend that amount, but do not spend any unnecessary amount in the work. In different governing bodies, it is often said, "You can never do the work as cheaply as now." That is wrong. You are doing it at the highest pitch, and to say that you can never do it as cheaply as now is pure imagination. One reason given for finishing the work now is that the present architect, if we delay the work, will not remain on the job to finish it. Surely we can get another architect just as efficient and good as the present one.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As regards the wiring in the library, it is not proposed to put in expensive fixtures, but it is absolutely essential that we re-wire. The present wiring is old, and it is reported that there is great danger. As regards the amounts that go to make up the $600,000, the matter has been canvassed pretty thoroughly, and I am satisfied, as I have already informed the committee, that there is no desire to start any extravagant expenditures. I think we should do those things that are essential in the tower,—complete the tower,—and the appropriation should not be reduced because other things may arise from time to time, where expenditures may have to be incurred. The estimate of $600,000 this year is a close estimate. The departmental officials asked for $800,000, and that amount was reduced by the government to $600,000. I think the appropriation should pass.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely concur that we should have any necessary wiring done in the library. That is something that can be looked after by an appropriate vote. Nobody would object to that. It can be added here or in the supplementary estimates. That work ought to be done; but that ought not to be made an excuse for leaving a vote of $600,000 open which can be used in any way the government sees fit around these buildings. I think the sense of the committee is that we should do only that which is absolutely necessary; that we should not do any more fancy carving or put any more expensive steel grilles, hand turned work or anything of that nonsense, at the present time. The one thing we think is necessary and proper to be done at the moment is to complete the tower and the memorial chamber. Therefore, I beg to move:

That the wording of vote 139 be amended by adding after the word "building" in the first line the words "for completion of tower and memorial chamber only."

The minister told me only a few minutes ago that that is practically all that is wanted. If that is all that is wanted, there ought to be absolutely no objection on the part of the government to accepting this amendment. The little question about the wiring in the library can easily be looked after.

Mr. SPENCE: Would the Minister of Public Works be willing to let this item stand over until to-morrow? I do not wish to obstruct at all, but I would like a detailed statement of what this item is for. I am sure the matter would be disposed of to-morrow in five minutes if we had that information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have studied these estimates carefully and it appears to me that in regard to these various items the same scrutiny with a view to economy should be exercised as would be practised in the case of any ordinary business. The people in the country in their private affairs are bound to exercise the most rigid economy and the same should be done in parliament. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Spence) that the government should submit a detailed statement of these matters so that hon. members migh be in a position to consider them to better advantage. If that were done the estimates would be disposed of more readily. As things are, we have to worm the information from ministers, sometimes apparently against their will. I have a very vivid recollection of the last nights we spent in this House during the last session of parliament when supplementary estimates were being rushed through with lightning rapidity; and apparently we are being asked to pass these items in the absence of adequate information. I do not think it is at all wise for the government to ask for money at this time to do something that is not vitally necessary, while it neglects other things that are imperative. The government are economizing today in regard to matters which in my opinion are absolutely essential and for which the various provinces will have to incur expenditures. I do not think that the people will approve of our spending money on something that can be postponed, when works that are absolutely needed are neglected. I think the amendment is a reasonable one. If it is necessary, as I believe it is, that the outer part of the tower should be completed in order to obviate a loss from possible deterioration, that I think is as far as we ought to go at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have surely discussed this matter at sufficient length to know our minds and I hope the committee will take a vote upon it without undue delay. The amendment is not, in my opinion, in order; but even if it were I contend that it does not carry out what is indicated by the general trend of the discussion opposed to the vote, namely, that we should not go the length of spending $600,000 on the tower and the memorial chamber. If I have gathered correctly the view of hon. members generally it is that the amount is too large for the purpose for which it is designated. The money is intended for work in connection with the Ottawa parliament building, and besides the tower and the memorial chamber it takes in some other matters such as the wiring of the library which are imperative and should be attended to at the present time. The minister could cut down the vote by, say, $50,000 and bring in supplementary estimates for the work in the library and the other purposes he has in mind. But I submit that it would be unwise for him to do so. There are staffs employed about the building, some of whom while work is in progress, are idle for a day or two at a time and have to be brought in whenever the contractor is ready to go on with some part of the work. It is very much in the public interest to allow the minister a sum sufficient for what may be necessary for the buildings as a whole, because, as he tells us, out of that sum he can take what is needed for the tower and the memorial chamber. What he has submitted to the committee makes it clear that he is not asking, for the tower and the memorial chamber, more than the technical officers and those who are in a position to advise him have recommended. When this matter came before the cabinet first, the estimates that were submitted to us were $200,000 greater than the amount which the government is now asking parliament to vote. We have gone through the estimates with a fine tooth comb and taken out every cent which we thought could be saved to the country. No one is more anxious to make a showing of economy than each member of the government. It is to our credit and interest alike to save every cent we can, and the estimates which we have brought down show that the government has done its utmost to economize. To restrict this vote by limiting it only to the tower, when we have asked for enough to build the tower and do what other extra work may be necessary, would be in my humble opinion a mistake. We shall require the amount we have asked for. I hope the committee will soon take a vote on the question, for if we keep on discussing it we shall soon use up enough public money to pay for the greater part of the tower.

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to the amendment of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), that item 139 be amended by adding after the word "building", in the first line, the words "completion of tower and memorial chamber only", I have reached the conclusion that the motion is out of order. Section 172 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads:

> It is not allowable to attach a condition or an expression of opinion to a resolution in the Committee of Supply, or to change the destination of a grant.

This is confirmed by May. At page 480 the following appears:

> The committee may vote or refuse a grant, or may reduce the amount thereof, either by a reduction of the whole grant, or by the omission or reduction of the items of expenditure of which the grant is composed: but the committee have no other function.

And in the footnote there is the following observation:

> Though undoubtedly out of order, amendments of this nature have been moved, but the proceeding has been either withdrawn, or subsequently negatived, such as the amendment of a building grant for the University of London, by a proviso, "That no part of such sum shall be applied to the erection of any building according to either of the designs now exhibited," which was omitted on report.

On these authorities I rule the proposed amendment out of order.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to say a few words in reply to the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), who, I think, is in error, The Prime Minister evidently did not have before him the figures which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) gave. We have a detailed statement by the minister, set forth when the vote was introduced, or during the course of the discussion the other day, and reported at page 558 of Hansard. The total as given by the minister is $525,000 odd, and included in that, is an item of $50,000 for special lighting fixtures, which the minister himself tells us is intended to replace temporary fixtures of which I have spoken on several previous occasions. Now, I positively object to that, as I think most hon. members do. In addition to that, there is an item of $10,000 for carving, which we claim is unnecessary. There is an item for grille work which is also unnecessary. So that there is a sum of $525,000 embraced in the description. That means that the minister can take $475,000 and complete the tower and memorial chamber, the wiring in the library and all these other items which we are not objecting to, and even that expensive and extravagant reflector lighting system which is included in that sum. We object to going beyond that. I shall move an amendment which I think you will admit, Mr. Chairman, is in order, and in moving it I think we on this side are offering something very generous to the minister, in that we are going beyond what we consider to be necessary to carry out the minister's request that the tower be completed. Seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Charters) I move that item 139 be reduced by $75,000 in respect of the item of $600,000 for the Ottawa parliament buildings.

Mr. WOODS: Mr. Chairman, while listening to the discussion the other evening I was inclined to agree that the completion of the tower might very well stand over for a few years, but after hearing the explanation given by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) this afternoon, I have come to the conclusion that sometimes it is a very serious mistake to indulge in hairsplitting. It looks to me as though there was a little of this attitude in the discussion. If this work is necessary—and I presume from what the hon. minister has told us that it is,—I think we would be very unwise not to undertake it. We know very well in connection with our own houses that if we let some necessary repair go by default, ultimately it costs us a great deal more than if it had been attended to at the proper time. Therefore I am in favour of putting the estimate through as it stands.

Amendment (Mr. Stevens) negatived: Yeas, 46; Nays, 96.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the item is carried, I wonder if the minister could now give us a clear statement of how much money he is going to spend on grille work and carving?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That I cannot give. It will be entirely in the control of the department, and will be just as little as possible.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has not my hon. friend any estimate at all? Does he not know anything about the details?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have one estimate—parliament building, $600,000—before the House. In making up that estimate the department has suggested certain expenditures, which are left to the judgment of the ministry, and there will be just as little expenditure as possible on grille work and other fancy frills which my hon. friend seems to fear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Again I am going to ask the minister: Has he any estimate at all, no matter how vague or misty it may be, either on carving or grille work?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have asked the minister a question.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have submitted certain estimates to the committee, and I think my hon. friend has had an opportunity to hear them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I ask the question again—I do not mind at all what the answer is so long as I get some sort of answer: Has the hon. minister any estimate of any kind as to the amount of money to be expended on stone carving and grille work? It is a perfectly plain and simple question.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no doubt that my hon. friend understands this very well. The estimate is for $600,000, and the money is to be expended within the judgment of the government as advised by its departmental officials. I have in my hand a suggested expenditure of $10,000. That does not mean that the government are going to spend $10,000. It is made up by departmental officials, but the total expenditure is left within the judgment of the government or of the department which recommends the expenditure to the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the figures which he gave the House the other day were a joke?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the details of expenditure left simply to the government?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then does my hon. friend concede that he is bound by the item of $10,000 for stone carving?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are not bound to do it, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary for me to show further the absurdity of the position. The whole of this money can be spent on the stone carving or anything else the government may choose to apply it to. We have not the slightest particulars to help us out at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, since we have not had any detailed statement of how much it will take to preserve the tower against deterioration, or to install the wiring and carry out other repairs included in this item, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss MacPhail):

That the item No. 139 as it stands be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment requires to be in writing.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the minister's statement that there is no limitation on the expenditure of this money so long as it is spent within the vote for the parliament building. In all good faith we accepted his statement that the vote was subdivided. Now, he tells us that there is nothing binding about the subdivision. If the completion of the tower costs $600,000, without any interior fixtures, he is at liberty to spend $600,000 upon it; or if the memorial chamber costs $200,000, he is quite at liberty to spend it if he so chooses as long as the total expenditure is within the $600,000. That, I think, is not treating the committee fairly. An hon. member said a moment ago that we were hairsplitting on this matter. I submit to the government that we are not hairsplitting. This is a big vote and we have a right to scrutinize it. Unless the minister's statement on page 558 of Hansard is a fair and accurate statement showing the direction in which this money is to go and the amounts to be expended on the items mentioned, then he has misled the committee, whether deliberately or not I am not stating. But I do not say that the committee were wholly misled and misinformed the other day.

Miss MACPHAIL: I want to say one word in support of the motion to strike out the whole item of $600,000. I am against the principle of a memorial chamber. I know that is not a popular attitude to take, nevertheless that is my view. I think we have too many stone memorials throughout this country and not enough sympathy in the hearts of the people for the wrecked humanity that is the living memorial of the late war. If this money were spent in helping the soldiers and their dependents; if the Pensions Board and some others were advised to treat the soldiers sympathetically; if the money were put into a fund that would be used to help desperate cases against which the law seems to be almost too hard, it would be more sensible. The tower, of course, looks as if it were not finished, but there are a lot of things in Canada not finished. I think sometimes it is hard enough on us to have to look at one another's faces without having to look at carved faces on the walls—I am thinking now particularly of the men. Electric lights and fixtures seem to cost more in the parliament buildings than in private houses. What sort of special lighting fixtures will it take $50,000 to pay for? Are there so many people using the library that there is not light enough for them now, or what is the difficulty? I never noticed that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod had dinted these doors at the end of the Chamber. I know they are only temporary, but they are doing very well. They are used by very many people besides the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod who enters two or three times a session, and I think they will do another year or two. The fact of the matter is that in this chamber we are apt to get too far away from the people, even those of us who pride ourselves on being near to them. The people not only want economy, they will have it, and if we do not give it to them they will send people here who will. The whole thing is atrocious and silly, the amount of money that it takes to do government work. I am against this vote of $600,000.

Amendment (Mr. Woodsworth) negatived: Yeas, 14; Nays, 124.

Mr. SPENCE: May I ask the minister when this work will be started and when he intends to have it finished?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I hope to have the work under way shortly. In fact, the architect's plans have been submitted and are in the department. It is hoped to have the masonry work completed before fall.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I still think we are setting a bad precedent at the beginning of this session. Did I hear someone say, "Obstruction?" I do not like to hear anyone use that word, because I have not taken up very much of the time of the House. But there is one thing I am going to insist on, if we have to sit here the whole year, and that is that there shall not be a repetition of what we had the last night of last session. There is need for economy and for paring down all proposed expenditures, and the government might just as well realize that first as last. If the minister thinks he can come before the House and get his estimates passed without granting reasonable requests for information, he is very much mistaken. The statement that was given to the committee the other night is at variance with the statement made to-day by the minister that $600,000 is required for this item. If you take the list given and go over it item by item you will find that it does not come to that amount, and the minister has now virtually admitted that he has no definite estimate from his department as to what this expenditure is for. That is what I rise to emphasize: a definite statement should be placed before the committee as to what is intended to be done in connection with the proposed expenditure.

Mr. BRETHEN: Is it necessary that the chimes be placed in the tower while the remaining construction work is proceeding?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not necessarily. We are providing for the chimes; whether they will install them this year or not I cannot say. Replying to my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland), I think I have tried to be courteous and to give all information asked for. But when members take an estimate and say that you are confined to that estimate as your expenditure, that is not what is intended at any time, and never has been. If that course were followed in connection with all amounts voted in parliament we would be here not five months but the year round. The amount asked for is what is considered necessary for the work, and the departmental organization must be depended upon as to how and when this money can best be expended; we must be guided by those officials. The estimates, of course, are those that are suggested by the department, but that does not mean that we are going to spend $50,000 in lighting fixtures. I can tell the committee we are not going to do that; at least, it will not be with my consent, I will advise against it. So, for the work this year in connection with the completion of the parliament buildings, it is necessary that we should have $600,000. The main item of expenditure will be for the masonry for the completion of the tower, the masonry in the memorial chamber, the electrical wiring, the installation of elevators, roofing, and so on. I have tried to make it clear that it is the government's desire to curtail expenditures wherever possible, and that is evidenced by the fact that we reduced the amount submitted by the officials as the necessary expenditure for this year. I have no desire not to meet the wishes of my hon. friend or of any hon. member, but to say that we must be tied down to the estimates given by the departmental officials, that has never been the policy in this House. It has never been suggested before.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to help my hon. friend. He points out that he does not agree with the estimate for lighting which has been submitted by his staff. I would like to strengthen his hands, and I propose to move that resolution No. 139 be reduced by the sum of $50,000, being the amount estimated for special lighting fixtures. That is something which ought to help the minister if his statement is correct, and I am quite sure that it is.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the amendment is out of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to say something on the question of the right to move such an amendment. I quite admit that a member would have no right to change by an amendment the destination of a grant; there is no doubt about that, but I submit with very great deference that he has a right to limit the destination of a grant, that he has just as much right to limit the destination of a grant as he has to move to reduce a grant. Here is an estimate; so much to build the tower, so much for the memorial chamber, and the rest. We really want to get the tower built and to limit the vote to that. But however that may be, I just want to point this out to you, Mr. Chairman; it does not make any difference whether the words "being the amount estimated for special lighting fixtures" are in the amendment or not. That is one of the ways in which you can test whether a motion is in order. There can be no objection made to a motion that resolution No. 139 be reduced by the sum of $50,000. That is not qualified by the simple statement "being the amount estimated for special lighting fixtures."

The CHAIRMAN: I would call the hon. member's attention to Rule 172 of Beauchesne's Rules: "It is not allowable to attach a condition or an expression of opinion to a resolution in the Committee of Supply or to change the destination of a grant". I am rather inclined to think that the hon. member in expressing an opinion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am merely stating what I am taking off. I do not think that is an opinion.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment moved by the hon. member for West York "that Item No. 139 be reduced by the sum of $50,000, being the amount estimated for special lighting fixtures" is in my opinion out of order in its present form, and comes under section 172 of Beauchesne's Rules. On page 480 and following pages of May, there are given a large number of instances where that rule has been applied. I must rule this amendment out of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I will just remove the explanatory line and move to reduce this vote by the sum of $50,000, and I will tell the House what the motion means, which is perfectly in order. I think most of us have the idea that $50,000 is not necessary for this ornamental lighting, and that part of the estimate that goes to make up this $600,000, an insufficient total at that, includes this item of $50,000 for lighting fixtures. It is all very well to talk about cutting out things that are unnecessary and the like. Here is a chance to vote on it.

Amendment negatived. Yeas, 44; Nays, 84.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

He said: The bill before the House is identical with the measure which was introduced at the last session, with the exception that an alteration has necessarily been made in the year. That bill, as hon. members will recall, passed its second reading, and was referred to a select committee of the House which reported at the end of the session as follows:

The special committee, to whom was referred the Bill No. 15, an act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, beg leave to present the following as their third report:

Your committee held several meetings since its appointment on the 22nd of February last. The preparation of the schedules to be annexed to the said Bill was entrusted to sub-committees. The greater number of such sub-committees accomplished considerable work and have, from time to time, reported progress to your committee. It has been found, however, that differences of opinion exist, and your committee have decided that it would be unable to complete the schedules before prorogation.

They therefore have agreed to report back the Bill without amendment, and recommend that a similar committee be appointed at an early period at the next session of parliament to consider such Bill.

Your committee also recommend that the letters, maps secured from the Department of the Interior and papers produced in the course of its proceedings remain in the possession of the clerk of the committee until the next session of parliament, and that the same be produced by him at the first regular meeting of the newly-appointed committee.

Your committee also submit herewith a copy of the printed proceedings and evidence taken before them for the information of the House.

This report is to be found in the votes and proceedings of June 29, 1923. On the motion of Dr. Beland (for Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) the third report of the special committee to whom was referred Bill No. 15 to readjust the representation in the House of Commons was concurred in on June 30.

I need scarcely remind the House that the government, in bringing forward this measure, is not exercising any discretionary power, but is simply discharging the duty which is imposed upon it by the constitution. The law, as hon. members know, provides that after each decennial census there shall be a redistribution of the seats of this House, and since confederation there have been several redistributions some complete and others in part.

When introducing the bill last session I dwelt upon this matter at some length, and it is hardly necessary to go over the entire ground again, but as some of the questions that are likely to come up in this debate may perhaps be best answered by anticipating them, I may repeat to the House a few of the essential facts that bear on the question of redistribution.

First then, as to the redistributions which have already taken place: There have been since confederation several redistributions. The first was made in 1872, the next in 1882, the next in 1892, the next in 1903; the last redistribution was made in 1914. There have been partial redistributions for the purpose of providing for the representation of provinces which were not in the Dominion when confederation was originally formed. There was a partial redistribution in 1871 to give Manitoba representation; a partial redistribution in 1887 to provide for the representation of the Northwest Territory; and there was a partial redistribution in 1907 to provide for the representation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta which were subsequently formed out of the Northwest Territory.

In 1915 an amendment was passed to the British North America Act relating more particularly to the province of Prince Edward Island. It was in the nature of a partial redistribution, and added to the British North America Act as section 51a the following provision:

Notwithstanding anything in this act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators representing such province.

By section 1, subsection 1 paragraph 2 of the Act to Amend the British North America Act, 1867, being 56 George V, Chapter 45, the representation of Prince Edward Island in the Senate was fixed at four members. The census prior to that partial redistribution would have affected the representation of Prince Edward Island to the extent of the loss of one member, but for this amendment which provided that no province shall have in the House a smaller representation than it has in the Senate.

Another partial redistribution was made to give the Yukon territory representation in the House of Commons. The Yukon territory obtained its right to representation under the act known as the Yukon Territory Representation Act, 1902, assented to on the 15th May, of that year. The clause that relates to this matter reads:

The Yukon territory as that territory is defined and constituted by section 13 of the schedule to chapter 41 of the statutes of 1901, shall be an electoral district, and shall return one member to the House of Commons of Canada.

The Yukon territory received its representation under the redistribution of 1903.

Perhaps it would be well also to put on record for the convenience of members the sections of the British North America Act which bear specifically on this matter of redistribution. The pertinent sections are as follows:

Section 37. The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this act, consist of one hundred and eighty-one members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia, and fifteen for New Brunswick.

Section 51. On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such a manner, and from such time as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules.

(1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members:

(2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained):

(3) In the computation of the number of members for a province a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number:

(4) On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards:

(5) Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

Section 52. The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

With the permission of the House I should like to incorporate a tabular statement giving the general and partial redistribution of federal constituencies from confederation down to the present time. This is a statement I gave to the House in full last session:

*Partial Redistribution.
†General Redistribution.

May I now say a word as to the application of the recent census to the redistribution about to be effected? First of all, I would point out that the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act, which was passed in 1912 and which enlarged the boundaries of Quebec at that time, contained a provision under which the population of the additional territory brought into the province was not to be counted, for the purposes of redistribution, as part of the province of Quebec in determining the unit of representation in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act on that point. The Quebec Boundaries Act contains the following section:

That the population of the territory hereby added to the province of Quebec shall be excluded in ascertaining the population of the said province for the purposes of any readjustment of representation of the other provinces consequent upon any census.

Account of this provision must necessarily be taken in determining the unit of representation according to the census. The population of the province of Quebec,—exclusive of the area added by the Quebec Boundaries Act of 1912—enumerated in the sixth census, June 1, 1921, numbered 2,358,412, which, divided by 65, gives a unit of representation of 36,283;—the unit was 30,819 in 1911. The quotient obtained by dividing the population of each province, except Prince Edward Island, as shown at the date of the census, by the unit 36,283 indicates, except where section 51 subsection (4) of the British North America Act applies, the number of members to which each province is entitled. The result is as follows. I shall give, for the sake of comparison the figures of redistribution effected after the census of 1911 as well as the figures of the 1911 census, and the figures of the redistribution to be effected under the last census, that of 1921, and the census figures themselves. Here again, if the House will permit me, I will put the tabular statement in the record. I gave it in full at at the last session:

I will not delay the House now by referring to the provision of the British North America Act having a bearing more particularly on the representation from Nova Scotia and Ontario. This I referred to last session, and hon. members will find my remarks of record in Hansard.

Let me now say a word as to the method which the government proposes to adopt in effecting this redistribution. In the old days, the government of the day brought into the House a bill in which the several constituencies were already delimited or defined. The government itself prepared the redistribution map, if I may so name it. As hon. members who have followed the political history of the country know, this method was looked upon as more or less arbitrary, if not indeed very arbitrary, and as giving to the government of the day, in virtue of its powers, opportunity for shaping constituencies pretty much as it wished, and thereby effecting what was commonly known as a gerrymander of the constituencies. In 1903, a different principle was introduced. Sir Wilfrid Laurier when in opposition had always contended that this was not a fair method of arranging the redistribution of the House of Commons. He contended that this arrangement should be made the subject of conference between the different parties in the House, and that both the government and the opposition should choose from their membership, a certain number to serve on a select committee, to which committee the bill dealing with this subject of redistribution would be referred. In the bill the number of members to which each province was entitled was set forth; but the actual defining of the several constituencies was left to the select committee with instructions to report back to the House after they had made out the redistribution map. That practice, which was adopted in 1903 for the first time, seemed to work so well that it was again followed in a subsequent redistribution after the census of 1911. That would be the redistribution of 1913 when Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister of this country. We propose, as we did last session, to adopt that method this year, and to have chosen from both sides of the House a limited number of members as a special select committee to whom will be referred the bill in the form in which it has been presented to the House, with a space for the actual constituencies in blank to be filled in by the committee. We will ask the committee to fill out the schedule and to report to the House its negotiations in this particular.

In this connection, I think it is well that we should make clear the lines on which we would expect the committee to proceed. There are guiding principles wihich have been observed in the past and which, experience would seem to indicate, it is advisable should be strictly adhered to. The first of these is the principle of following county municipal organization as a basis in whatever may be done in arranging the constituencies. There are obvious reasons why this should be a guiding principle. The municipal organization is the basis of our entire judicial system, of our municipal system, and by holding to the county unit, municipal organization, we are following a basis that is familiar to citizens of the country generally. It might be of interest to the House for me to quote briefly a word or two from former political leaders in this House as to the particular motive which they have had in advocating that this principle be followed. It was first asserted by the Right Hon. Sir John A Macdonald in 1872, at the time of the redistribution of that year. I have copied from Hansard of June 1 of that year—page 928—the remarks of Sir John A. Macdonald at the time, and they are almost as applicable at the moment as they were in 1872:

It is desired, as much as possible, to keep the representation within the country so that each county that is a municipality of Ontario should be represented, and if it becomes large enough, that it should be divided into ridings—that principle is carried out in the suggestions I am about to make. It is obvious that there is a great advantage in having counties elect men whom they know. Our municipal system gives an admirable opportunity to constituencies to select men for their deserts. We all know the process which happily goes on in western Canada. A young man in a county commences his public life by being elected, by the neighbours who know him, to the township council. If he shows himself possessed of administrative ability he is made reeve or deputy reeve of the county. He becomes a member of the county council, and as his experience increases and his character and abilities become known, he is selected by his people as their representative in parliament. It is, I think, a grand system that the people of Canada should have the opportunity of choosing for political promotion the men in whom they have most confidence and of whose abilities they are fully assured. All that great advantage is lost by cutting off a portion of two several counties and adding them together for electoral purposes only. Those portions so cut off have no common interest; they do not meet together, and they have no common feeling except that once in five years they go to the polls in their own township to vote for a man who may be known in one section and not in another. This tends towards the introduction and development of the American system of caucuses, by which wire-pullers take adventurers for their political ability only, and not from any personal respect for them. So that, as much as possible, from any point of view, it is advisable that counties should refuse men whom they do not know, and when the representation is increased it should be by sub-dividing the counties into ridings.

That, Mr. Speaker, is, I think, good, sound doctrine. Unfortunately, although it was enunciated by Sir John Macdonald, his government, I am afraid, did not always act in accordance with it. They departed so much from the principle that it became necessary later to get back to the principle originally intended, and in 1899 a bill was introduced in this House by Sir Wilfrid Laurier for a partial redistribution, or in other words a redistribution to undo the wrongs that had been perpetrated on the electors of Canada in 1882 and in 1892. In bringing in that measure Sir Wilfrid Laurier enunciated the same principle, in the following words:

I may say at once that the object we have in view in presenting this bill is not to make a total redistribution of the electoral districts under which the House of Commons is now constituted. We deem that it would not be expedient at this time to do more than undo, so far as we can, the most glaring violations of a principle which we have always held, and which has always been universally held by public opinion in this country, to be the fundamental principle of representation. We think it is a principle which will commend itself universally to public opinion, that the basis of representation in this House should be the municipal county organization. It is in the recollection of all the members of this House that this principle was to a large extent interfered with by the Redistribution Act of 1882. That act was a violation of the principle which had prevailed up to that time, and had been maintained not alone by the Liberal party, but by the Conservative party as well. There are many well-known reasons why the municipal county organization should be preserved as the basis of representation.

It is upon that basis we shall expect the committee to whom the present bill will be referred to proceed.

There is another principle which has been followed in previous redistributions, recognized by all governments from the time of confederation down to the present, and that is that, as respects the unit of representation, the unit for the urban constituencies should be larger than the unit for rural constituencies. The reason of that must, I think, be apparent; indeed, there are several reasons, the most obvious of which I shall mention. In the first place, the people in rural areas are scattered over a very much larger area. It is not possible in a widely scattered community to organize public opinion as readily as it can be organized in more thickly settled parts. Moreover, in the urban centres there are recognized organizations ready to hand, for the purpose of focussing public opinion at any particular moment. For example, there are the boards of trade that exist in the cities, and such institutions as the modern clubs and associations of business men which we have to-day. Again, the press of the cities is a much more potent, or, at least, is a more constant, factor than the press of the rural communities; it has a power of influencing public opinion and of keeping the urban point of view continuously before the people of the country. Further, it is I think a recognized fact that many rural constituencies are represented in parliament by members who reside in urban centres and who have a knowledge of urban conditions, perhaps in some cases even more intimate than they have of rural conditions. The reverse of that is not, I think, equally true; it is not often that a city is represented, at least in this parliament, by a member who resides for the greater part of his time in the country. These are all reasons which in the past have caused committees which have had to do with the work of redistribution to recognize the justice of permitting a larger unit for the urban constituencies than for the rural. I confess that the introduction of parties representing a class, if they are rightly to be so regarded, would be to my mind a reason for departing from that principle; but I hope that parliament will not become representative of classes as distinct from representatives of the people as a whole. It is important, I think, that all classes should be represented; but class representation would be in my opinion opposed to the point of view that a candidate when elected to parliament represents all the people from the community from which he comes, irrespective altogether of the classes to which they belong.

And that brings me to the third consideration which should be a guiding principle in the shaping of the electoral districts, that, namely, of the compactness of districts. An effort should be made, within county boundaries or within recognized defining lines as between urban and rural centres, to have constituencies as compact as possible so that public opinion within one given area will be as nearly true to the feeling of the whole community as it is possible to get it.

I think the one remaining important principle is that of maintaining, both in the case of representation in rural areas and in the case of urban areas, an equalization of population as between constituencies. The reason of that is obvious. It is desirable that the different constituencies should be, so far as may be possible, very much on an equality in regard to the numbers of the persons who compose them.

It will not, be possible of course, for the committee to work out a redistribution, following county municipal organization along the lines which I have indicated, with mathematical exactness. That has never been found possible, and never will be; but in this as in all matters common sense and fair play should be our guide. That is really the purpose of having a bill of this character referred to a committee, and it is also a reason why such a committee should not be too large in size. The idea is that a few members, well intentioned, may sit down around a table and work out a scheme to be presented to the House. It is not the intention to take away from the Commons their right to pass upon whatever may be the outcome of the committee's deliberations. The intention is to relieve this House as far as possible of a cumbersome load, of a duty which, with such a large membership, it could not begin satisfactorily to discharge. We want to get a few hon. members together around a table, actuated, as I say, by principles of fair play and justice to all, and have them work out a schedule of constituencies, and then to present it to the House for endorsation, amendment or rejection. It is with this end in view that I shall later on if the second reading carries, as I expect it will, move the appointment of a committee to whom the bill will be referred.

The government has but one object in view,—that the committee, following broadly the principles which I have indicated, shall work out on the basis of the new unit of representation the electoral districts for the representation of this House on lines which will commend themselves to the sense of fair play and justice of hon. members and of the people generally, so that this House of Commons may be, as far as possible, a true mirror of the public opinion of our country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the right hon. gentleman allow a question for the purpose of information? He invoked as a principle which the committee ought to follow that the electors in rural districts would necessarily be fewer than those in urban districts, and he gave several reasons for this principle. I should like to know just how he thinks that should be worked out—what fraction ought to be followed as nearly as possible? For example, is one county vote to be worth as much as two or three city votes? Or is one county vote only to be worth as much as one and a quarter city votes? I do not want to tie my right hon. friend down to any particular fraction, but I think we should have some general idea as to what this committee is to do, not merely the general principle that the counties as a matter of course are to get whatever extra representation they may require. Then another question. My right hon. friend's second principle was county representation; his third, equalization of the population of the different constituencies. How can we work one without offending the other?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I may answer my hon. friend's last question first, apparently he did not catch the exact words I used when I spoke about equalization. I said that, having regard to the differences between the urban and the rural districts, we should seek an equalization in rural constituencies of rural representation, and in urban constituencies of urban representation. As to the other question of my hon. friend, it illustrates I think the importance, as I said a moment ago, of referring this matter to a committee. It would be impossible for me to suggest offhand what the relative figures should be. For one thing, I would want to know what the total urban population is and what the total rural population is; I would want to have regard for a mass of statistical data which I have not had any opportunity of looking into. It would be for the committee to decide the point, and in deciding it to use their best judgment. If later the House thought that the committee had not exercised its discretion wisely, it would be open to the House, of course, to amend the findings of the committee.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my entire agreement with the Prime Minister when he promised to adhere to the county boundaries. I think that is a sound principle. I can go back in my memory, Sir, to the time when the counties were cut all to pieces and some constituencies were of the most grotesque territorial description. If we adhere to county boundaries we are following a safe and just principle. I am glad to hear the Prime Minister say that we should exercise common sense and fair play in fixing the boundaries of ridings. But I would call his attention to a good old Liberal principle which, I judge from his remarks, the government intends to depart from, a principle that was fought for over a long period of years in this country, but which has of late not received the respect that it deserves.

Mr. HALBERT: "Rep by pop".

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, you know it—the good old principle of representation by population. I would ask my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) and also my friend of the group here (Mr. Halbert), whether we are going to proceed upon the basis of property rights or of human rights in fixing the representation and electoral influence of the people of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am all for human rights, myself.

Mr. HOCKEN: Then we will have representation by population.

Mr. BUREAU: That is your view.

Mr. HOCKEN: I know what your view is.

Mr. BUREAU: What do you know now?

Mr. HOCKEN: It is not very many years ago—in my lifetime, Mr. Speaker—when it was necessary to have property in order to vote; for a long time the chief qualification for voting was the ownership of property. And if we go a little further back we shall find an exceedingly restricted franchise based upon the ownership of property. Well, we have been getting away from that, and the ownership of property does not now exercise so much influence as it did in earlier days when we had a much more limited franchise which led to very many and grave abuses.

My right hon. friend gives us some reasons why there should be a higher unit of representation in the cities than in the rural districts. One is that, in the latter, population is scattered and is not easily organized. That argument might have been good enough twenty-five or thirty years ago, but it is not of any weight to-day. The rural districts of every province enjoy good roads and the people there own motor cars; the press is scattered daily by the rural mailmen to every home in the farming districts; and I presume that by the time we have another general election radio will be added to these means of communication. So the farmer will be able to sit in the comfort of his home before the grate fire and listen to the speeches of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) and some of the other spellbinders of the Liberal party as well as of those of this party.

The Prime Minister suggested that the cities could be organized more easily than the rural districts. I doubt that very much. What with farmers' clubs and the widespread distribution of daily papers, the rural districts can be organized about as quickly as the cities. We have had proof of that: The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Halbert) knows it very well. He could go out and organize a rural riding in the course of a month or less, and get it working intensively, unitedly, and, as we have evidence on this side of the House, effectively. The argument that the population is scattered, therefore, entirely loses weight. As to some rural ridings being represented by men who live in the cities, why, that is a matter of choice for the electors themselves. No man can go out from a city and steal a seat from a man living in a rural district, against the wish of the electors. If the electors prefer to have a lawyer represent them rather than a farmer, that is a matter for themselves; so I do not think that argument can be used in favour of a difference in the unit of representation.

My right hon. friend refers to the class organizations that we have now. Well, they are before our eyes. How long that will last is a matter of conjecture. It did not last very long in Ontario; it may last longer in the western provinces. But whether it lasts or not, the fact that those interesed in the agricultural industry are so organized, places them, I submit, upon a parity with those who are organized in industrial life, and they should not ask, and should not receive, any greater favours in the way of added influence than the people who live in the city. Why should a mechanic have less political influence than a farm labourer? Why should his vote count for less? He is just as intelligent a unit of this population; he works just as hard and contributes just as much to the welfare of the country. Why does it take two men living in the city to have the same influence as one farmer? Well, the unit of population is 36,283 as applied to the rural districts, and if I understand the scheme properly, the unit for the cities is about 67,000. Why, we will have rural districts with a population of probably 25,000 or less. Upon every ground of justice to men and to women I submit that there should be the same unit in the cities as there is in the rural districts.

Mr. KELLNER: How long has the hon. gentleman had that idea?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have always had that idea. I believe in the good old Liberal principle for which George Brown fought—representation by population. I think that a business man in Toronto or Montreal is entitled to just as much influence as a man who is farming twenty acres out in the county of Glengarry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interject one remark? With regard to the matter of representation by population, there was one point I omitted that, I think, has a bearing on what the hon. member is just saying. Population in the rural communities—and this, I may say, was the argument that Sir John A. Macdonald used in defending the policy of giving the rural area a larger vote—is for the most part a stable population. Families remain on the land from generation to generation, occupying for the most part the same areas over long periods of time. The population in the cities is, in large part, a floating population; it is constantly changing. If my hon. friend will stop to reflect he will see that having regard to persons in the community over an equal period of time, say five years, the rural population would be entitled to a smaller unit in order that there should be true representation by population.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not agree with my right hon. friend's argument at all. Population in the cities may change. For instance, a man may move from Hamilton to Montreal, or from Montreal to Hamilton, but still he is a man, he is a Canadian citizen, and should exercise just as much influence in the election as a man who has been living on the same piece of land a considerable length of time. Take my own city, because I know more about it than about any other large city: so far as the discussion went in the committee last year it was proposed to give Toronto nine seats and Montreal a proportionate number—eleven, I think. Toronto ought to have fifteen seats and Montreal nineteen or twenty. We should look upon people as human beings, we should not deal with the matter simply from the point of view of the length of time they have lived on a certain piece of land. People are born in the cities; they live in the cities all their lives, and in my judgment they do not move about in any greater proportion than do the people in the farming districts. We have heard a great deal from our friends to the left about the exodus from western Canada. Well, if the population is maintaining its size, there must be as many coming in as are going out, so that the population in the agricultural districts in the West is changing just as it is in the big cities. I believe that that change takes place to as large an extent as it does in any of the urban centres.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this point should be taken into consideration by the committee. The government ought to lay it down as a policy that there should be an even unit of population for the cities and the rural districts; otherwise you increase the influence of one class of the community, which, I submit, is not fair. I have no thought in my mind that any man living in the agricultural districts should be discriminated against, and I would not for one moment suggest that his influence should be minimized or lessened as compared with that of people in other parts of the country. But I do not think it is fair to those who live in cities and who contribute as much as they can to the welfare and progress of this country—as much, I think, as any other class of people—that there should be this difference in the unit of representation. From the results of their labour come the great bulk of the taxes that pour into the national treasury, and if their work can produce the revenues necessary to keep this country going I do not see why they should be discriminated against when it comes to their casting their ballots in a general election.

I know that there are so many more members here representing rural constituencies than there are representing urban constituencies that my argument is not likely to prevail with them. But if they are fair, if they have a mind to be just and to deal fairly with Canadians in all parts of this country, they will give the cities the same representation in proportion to population that they ask for themselves. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker; I simply wanted to present these views before the bill went to the committee in order that, before it was too late, they might be presented for consideration.

Mr. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.): Just one question: when George Brown advocated representation by population, did he not refer to the matter as between provinces rather than as between rural and urban districts?

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. gentleman's knowledge of political history of that day is somewhat inadequate, I am afraid. Hon. George Brown advocated representation by population before confederation.

Mr. GRAHAM: That's what it is to be old.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I have no doubt that we all want to do justice. We are all honourable men. But our ideas of justice may differ, and we may honestly differ about some of the matters which we are discussing. The hon. member has spoken of the rights of the cities and the dominating—

Mr. HOCKEN: The rights of the people.

Mr. FORKE: The rights of the people in the cities; it is all the same,—and the dominating influence of the countryside. Now, all the information I have been able to gather rather points the other way, that the cities of the world at large have a dominating influence over the rest of the population. I do not think that fact will be disputed. There are conveniences and advantages to be found in the cities, educational institutions, for instance, that give the cities with all their centralization a dominating influence over the rest of the population.

In regard to class representation, hon. gentlemen to my right are very fond of pointing this way and talking about "class representation," "class thinking," and "class legislation." I think that perhaps every man is to a certain extent influenced by his environment and by his interests; that is quite common, and only human. If I lived in the city probably I would be quite prepared to stand up and speak for the city, claiming at the same time that I wanted nothing but absolute justice. At the same time "If self the wavering balance shake, it's rarely right adjusted." Consequently I approach a question of this kind with a good deal of care to see that I am entirely unselfish when I am speaking of the rights of the country people.

I should like to point out to the House that we have in this group four or five members who represent constituencies where the candidate does not know the result of the election for about two weeks after polling day because the returns are not in until after that lapse of time. I might mention the constituencies of Springfield, Mackenzie, Nelson and Selkirk, all large constituencies stretching away right up to the Arctic Circle. Does the hon. member for West Toronto put a compact centre like the city of Toronto in the same position as these constituencies scattered over such a wide area? Does he not think that in all justice and fairness they do want a little more representation per capita in this House than a centralized constituency like the city of Toronto? That is one aspect of the matter as regards justice.

The hon. member also referred to the fact that the country districts had been able to organize themselves. The only explanation I can offer for that is the justice of their cause and the absolute need for organization to protect their interests having regard to the interests of the better organized city centres. They are not organized in any spirit of antagonism to the cities. It seems to be taken for granted by some hon. gentlemen in this House that when we speak for the rural districts we are speaking in antagonism to the cities. I want to repudiate any such idea. I have no antagonism against Toronto or any other city; I am proud of Toronto, proud of its progress, of its culture and learning and all its acquirements; I have no quarrel with Toronto or any other city in Canada. But I repeat once again that the prosperity and the future of Canada depends upon the development of our agricultural population. I made a statement in the House the other day, and I repeat it now, that if you let the agricultural population of Canada sink to the grade of a peasantry, I have not much hope for the future of Canada. I want to see our agricultural people an educated, cultured and intelligent people.

Mr. HOCKEN: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. FORKE: A great deal. The very fact that you would restrict us shows it has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not propose to restrict the influence of the rural districts in this House. All I ask is that we should have equal influence.

Mr. FORKE: I am not imputing any unworthy motives to the hon. member.

Mr. HOCKEN: You got that twisted.

Mr. FORKE: I did not mean to hurt the hon. gentleman's feelings in any way. In regard to representation, it might not do any harm for me to inform the hon. gentleman that my constituency is more than half urban, so you cannot exactly put me down as a representative of a constituency with a sparse population. A great many members in this corner of the House have a number of urban centres in their ridings, so we cannot be regarded as representing strictly a class organization. I think I represent some 50,000 population, so after all we are not viewing matters from a purely class point of view. I know there are certain members in this part of the House who belong to a school where we do a good deal of independent thinking, and where one gets independent thinking you will get differences of opinion, and I want hon. gentlemen to remember that if we do not always follow one another like sheep it is because we think independently and follow the dictates of our own intelligence.

9 p.m.

In conclusion, I contend that in all justice and fairness the widely scattered rural populations in this country have a right to a smaller unit of representation than the highly organized centres of population.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): It would seem to me that there is very little doubt, when you look into the matter fairly, that the policy suggested or at least approved by Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier was eminently fair. I can well understand the contention of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) that if the opportunities were equal in the country and city, the unit of representation should be equal. Let me speak of the constituency of which I know most, and it is a fair type of the constituencies of western Canada. During the last election some of my constituents had to drive fifteen miles to the poll. That meant a drive of thirty miles to and from the poll. Fortunately for the rural districts on the last election day the weather was fine but when it happens that a blizzard comes up on election day, as it sometimes does, and the temperature is down to 30 below zero, as it sometimes is, what fair opportunity have the rural districts as compared with the urban centres where all the people require to do to register their vote is to step out and walk a few blocks to the polling booth? In my constituency, to vote means a drive of thirty miles for some of my constituents. That alone, I think, is quite sufficient, without any further argument to show that the unit of population in the urban districts should be larger and in the rural districts smaller.

I was pleased to hear my leader say what he did about class representation. I have tried since I have been here, and I think every other member has done so—and succeeded remarkably well—to take a national point of view in matters that come before us.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLAR: Some hon. members to my right are inclined to laugh. That causes me to go a little further and say that if there is any city whose representatives give me the impression of narrowness of outlook it is a city not very far to the west. I think those who listen to the debate will be able to judge who takes the narrow view, and who looks upon questions from the broad and national standpoint. Personally, I feel that I represent Canadians in the cities as well as those in the country. I think as much of one as I do of the other, there should be no antagonism between them.

Mr. HOCKEN: Give them equal rights.

Mr. MILLAR: That is what I want to do. That is why I think the unit of representation in the rural districts should be smaller. It has been claimed that the people can be organized more easily in the country than in the city. I do not think that is the case. In the city, in the majority of cases, people are through work at five or six o'clock and can easily attend a meeting in the evening. On the other hand it is well towards eight o'clock before country people have finished their chores, and then they have to drive several miles to the place of meeting. In conclusion let me say I think it would be most unfair to make the unit of representation the same in the country as it is in the cities.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): I feel compelled to offer a word, perhaps a suggestion. I am sure the Prime Minister, in common with everyone else in the House, realizes that Canada is top heavy with governmental machinery. I wonder, however, if the Prime Minister has ever thought what an opportune time this would be to reduce the representation in the House. As a result of that reduction I should perhaps be one of the first to fall by the wayside, but the constituency of Portage la Prairie would still remain. I should therefore like to suggest that the number of members be reduced by approximately one-third. It is true that the population of Quebec is really the pivotal point of our representation but in the course of events it is altogether possible—some may say it is not probable—that the other provinces will outstrip Quebec in the matter of population.

Mr. FOURNIER: Does my hon. friend think he can reduce the number of members of parliament without amending the British North America Act?

Mr. FORKE: Certainly he does not, he will deal with that point in a few minutes.

Mr. LEADER: I am coming to that point in a moment. In the meantime I may say that I did some figuring while previous speakers were talking. I find that if we reduce our representation in this chamber by one-third we will save the country $324,000. Surely that amount is well worth saving. Of course I know that such a change will require an amendment of the British North America Act. While doing that I would also reduce the membership of the Senate by one-third. By doing this we would save $256,000, so the total saving to the country would be over half a million dollars.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend suggests would amount to this: That the parts of the country that are in most need of representation in this parliament, the districts most sparsely populated, would have still fewer representatives in the House. My hon. friend, I think, instead of effecting an economy would be doing a great injustice to the newer districts of the Dominion.

Mr. LEADER: I realize that that result may follow but those districts would be just as well represented. However, I make these suggestions. I intend to urge them when proposing the motion I shall submit later on in support of certain practical economies. If the government would reduce the representation in the House of Commons and the Senate, and also reduce the number of cabinet ministers, it would be entirely unnecessary for me to introduce the motion in question which I contemplate doing at the first opportunity.

Mr. LANCTOT: If you cut the indemnity by $2,000 you can have the same number of representatives in parliament that there are at present.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I quite appreciate the arguments presented by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), a few minutes ago, and I find myself in sympathy with some of his views. I do not think, however, that the hon. gentleman is quite correct in arguing for the preservation of the extreme difference that at present exists between the representation of the rural and that of the urban districts. I will give a few illustrations. This discrepancy does not exist at the moment but there are some instances in the country, perhaps, as aggravated as the one in question. From 1911 to 1917 I represented alone nearly 200,000 population, whereas at the same time my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) I think, represented about 17,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No, 13,000.

Mr. STEVENS: There, I think, is one of the most extreme comparisons that could be made. Under the new redistribution with a member added to British Columbia's representation—assuming that the coast will benefit to the extent that was suggested to the committee last year—I would still be representing about 70,000 people. Now, there will be other ridings where the unit of population will be probably 20,000. I submit, perhaps there is too wide a discrimination in favour of the rural districts in cases of that kind. It is not, to my mind, a question of bringing the unit to an exact level, but I do say an effort ought to be made, if possible, to make the margin of difference a little narrower than it has developed into during the last twenty years, under the last two revisions. Quite a lecture was read to my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) because he put up a rather strong case. Naturally he was arguing from one particular viewpoint, and I think he put up a very strong case. It is in my estimation desirable that large cities like Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Hamilton, and such like, should have fair representation. I am quite prepared to admit that, as regards my province it would be unreasonable to expect an exact division or representation by population. For instance, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride), who I see is in his seat, represents a riding, which, I think, is at least one thousand miles in length. He has in his riding alone, a territory larger than some of the provinces—larger than several of the provinces. It would be absurd to ask that the unit of representation there should be brought up to the level of that in the cities. The same thing, to a lesser degree, applies to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) and perhaps to the members for East Kootenay (Mr. King) and West Kootenay (Mr. Humphrey). We have in British Columbia at least four or five ridings that would extend from 400 to 1,000 miles in length. Those are very extended territories and very difficult to get over. So, it would be absurd I think, to ask that the unit of representation should be the same throughout the province. On the other hand, we shall have, as I say, in the riding which I will represent at least seventy thousand, even under the amended law.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member says he "will" represent. Is he not a little premature?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think so. I am quite satisfied on that point. I invite my hon. friend to come out and view the constituency, if he will.

Mr. JACOBS: I have been out West already with good results to my party, and disastrous results to our opponents.

Mr. STEVENS: It would be a good thing if he would come out on behalf of some unknown and unnamed opposition candidate.

Mr. HOCKEN: It would make your election sure.

Mr. STEVENS: It would make our "calling and election sure"—I think that is the scriptural phrase. I see the necessity of perhaps some, perhaps very considerable, discrimination; but I think care should be taken not to carry that to an extreme, and there is, I think, a tendency at the present time to carry it too far. I really feel some sympathy with the view taken particularly by Montreal and Toronto. They are large cities having very important interests, and I think some of those who represent those cities will represent upwards of 100,000 people even under the new redistribution. That is a very large number. I see some hon. gentlemen shaking their heads, but those figures were given to me. We do not know exactly; the boundaries have not been fixed yet; but under some of the proposals which have been under consideration, this will be the result according to the figures that have been given to me. In order to suit the wishes of my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs), I will say that whoever does represent my riding in the next parliament or after this redistribution, will represent about 70,000 people, a very large quota. Therefore, while we may admit the old principle which has been in vogue for so many years, that rural ridings shall have some advantage—and I am inclined to agree with that view—nevertheless, I think care should be taken that the discrimination between the two is not too wide; that at least the larger centres should have fair and reasonable treatment in regard to representation.

Mr. HAMMELL: Could the hon. gentleman tell us what percentage of the votes were polled in those great cities, say at the last election?

Mr. STEVENS: I could not say. That is another question which I do not think affects this at all.

Mr. HAMMELL: It shows the interest these people take.

Mr. STEVENS: That is true, but I can recollect many rural districts where the number of votes polled has been comparatively small. That is a question of the sense of responsibility on the part of the citizens. I admit very candidly that, in many ridings, both rural and urban, too little attention is paid to the privileges of citizenship, and that not a very large vote is polled. All I can say for districts that I know is that very large votes are polled in these large, populous centres.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Perhaps what I am going to say will not bear much on redistribution; but my remarks are elicited largely by what my hon. friend (Mr. Leader) said a moment ago about reduction of representation, and particularly the suggestion that the ministers did not work.

Mr. LEADER: I would like to put the minister right there. I did not suggest that he did not work.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, if ten can do the work of seventeen, there must be seven that are not working hard. I drew the inference.

Mr. LEADER: The minister will, perhaps, know better than I.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I do. I admit the impeachment. A member can best represent his constituency the more frequently he can come into contact with his constituents and know their views. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), if he had room, can have every one of his constituents reach his central office in thirty minutes from his home. The hon. member can meet them every day. The representative for one of those larger constituencies has to bid his family good-bye, and the elector would also have to bid his family good-bye and to travel many miles to meet his representative.

Mr. HOCKEN: The minister would not have me interview 70,000 people every day?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would be more sorry for the hon. member than I would for the people. There is that essential difference, that a man in a city constituency can confer with his constituents very frequently on short notice, know their views and keep in touch with them, while the man in a rural constituency has a hard task to keep in touch with his constituents. Consequently, the man in the city can represent three times as many as the man in the rural constituency, and he can be in touch with their views all the time.

Mr. HOCKEN: The minister is not going to increase the unit, is he?

Mr. GRAHAM: One can never tell. I am afraid my hon. friend who referred to the ministers has not altogether grasped the situation. That section of the press, whose friends are now out, is very anxious that the number of ministers should be reduced. They compare the number of cabinet ministers in Canada with the number in the United States.

Mr. LEADER: I brought that out in the remarks which I made on this question last year, and I feel quite flattered that eminent journalists like Mr. Gratton O'Leary have been publishing certain figures which I gave last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad my hon. friend is flattered, but I want to put this viewpoint before the House,—Mr. O'Leary seems not to have published this—that no cabinet minister in the United States ever has to appear in congress; the cabinet ministers of Canada spend half their time in the House during a session of parliament. If you allow the members of the Canadian government to remain in their offices for twelve months in the year, not to have to appear on the floor of the House, not to have to prepare speeches, not to have to be responsible to the people, you can cut the number of cabinet ministers in Canada in two quite easily and they will not have to work half as hard then as they have to work now. There is another point. The number of cabinet ministers in Canada has been compared with the number in Great Britain. The practice in Great Britain is altogether different from the practice in Canada. In Great Britain you will seldom see, except on special occasions, more than one cabinet minister in the House, and that will be when something under his particular charge is being discussed. The cabinet minister in Great Britain is represented in the House by an under-secretary who takes charge of all details of legislation. Furthermore, if you desire to interview a cabinet minister in Great Britain you are bound to make an appointment with him a long way ahead, whereas the cabinet ministers of the Canadian government —and rightly so—are only too glad to meet members of parliament at any time, day or night, while the House is in session.

What I am trying to point out is that the comparison is not a fair one as regards the number of cabinet ministers in Canada, because the duties of the cabinet ministers in this country are far more arduous, so far as legislation is concerned, than those of the ministers of the Crown in Great Britain; while from the standpoint of general work those duties are far greater than the duties of members of the cabinet in the United States, comparing the sessions of our parliament with the sessions of congress.

Mr. J. W. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): The question of representation in this parliament is one of great importance and interest to the Canadian people, and of course it is well that the matter should be settled along certain definite lines and in accordance with certain definite principles. I agree with the principle that as far as possible county boundaries should be maintained, for the reasons as given already by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I might refer also to the fourth principle, that of maintaining as far as possible, as between rural constituencies, a uniformity of population. Where there is a conflict between these two principles, the principle of maintaining county boundaries and that of maintaining uniformity in population, the question arises as to which of them should be sacrificed, and whether or not it is to the advantage of the people as well as of the members that county boundaries should be maintained even though there may be a great disparity in population. The question often arises, if county boundaries are to be maintained, where a large town or a small-sized city happens to be in one county and a neighbouring county happens to be practically all a rural population. I am rather of the opinion that the people are more concerned in maintaining their county boundaries than they are in having population nearly equal as between county constituencies. So that in my opinion the fourth principle should be sacrificed to the first when there is a conflict between the two.

I am interested in the discussion that has arisen on the second principle, namely, that the unit for urban representation should be larger than the unit for rural representation. That has always been recognized; it has been recognized by all governments and all parties in this country ever since confederation. In the last redistribution, that of ten years ago, under the government of Sir Robert Borden, the unit of representation in the city of Toronto was 50,000, when the unit for the whole Dominion was in the neighbourhood of some 30,000.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is getting worse.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): That was a disparity that was recognized at that time as a proper difference as between rural and urban population. If today the unit of representation is to be 36,000 for the whole country, the unit of representation for the city of Toronto in the same proportion would be about 60,000 which would not entitle that city to more than nine members. There is another question that enters into a consideration of this matter, as referred to by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Hammell), and that is the interest which the people in a constituency take in public affairs. I remember that not long ago the question was debated in this country whether or not electors should be disfranchised when they neglected to use their franchise. If that is to be taken into consideration at all it will be instructive to see what interest the people of Toronto have shown in public affairs. I have just jotted down the number of voters who voted for candidates in the last general election. I do not know what the population of Centre Toronto is but I believe it is considerable, and of the large number of electors there only 11,161 took enough interest in the election to cast their vote. I represent a rather small rural constituency and in that riding 16,224 persons voted in the election. In another constituency in Toronto, East Toronto, just 15,002 electors voted at the general election in 1921. I do not know how many voters were on the list because I have not the figures with me; I just jotted down these facts a few moments ago. In North Toronto the people showed some more interest in the election, this being due perhaps to the popularity of one of the candidates running in that constituency. At any rate, 20,985 persons voted in that constituency. But the very popular representative from South Toronto (Mr. Sheard), and all the candidates running in that constituency, could not induce more than 7,566 electors to vote; while in West Toronto 11,764 persons voted. And in the beautiful city of Brantford, represented by my genial friend across the way (Mr. Raymond), 13,049 electors voted in that election. These figures I think give us an indication of the interest which the people in these constituencies take in public questions. I have taken at random a few rural constituencies. I do not know whether they are large or small as compared with other rural constituencies, but they will illustrate my point. I have already given the constituency of Glengarry and Stormont. In the constituency of Carleton 13,473 electors voted; in Dundas, another small rural constituency, 11,225 voted; in Durham, 12,516; in North Grey, 14,996 and in Halton, a small constituency, 12,207 persons cast their votes. So that in all these rural constituencies, as compared with an equal number of urban constituencies which I have picked at random, the vote in the country was larger than the vote in the urban centres, with the exception of North Toronto; and although the disparity in population may be very great the disparity in representation is not so great after all. That is, I think, an added reason why in the coming redistribution the unit of representation for the rural constituencies should be very much smaller than that for the urban constituencies.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, personally, I do not want to enter into any very detailed consideration of our cities or towns, but I should like to express my general accord with practically everything that has fallen from the last speaker (Mr. Kennedy). I hesitate, in discussing this subject, to touch upon any province other than my own. I believe if there is one matter more than another which we should endeavour to keep our hands off it is the very delicate question of representation, and that so far as it is possible to do it each province should rather settle that for itself. I do not mean through the agency of the local legislatures, of course, but through their representatives in this House. The problem of Toronto or of Montreal is a purely local one having relation to the population and representation of the rest of Ontario or Quebec. The conditions there cannot be thoroughly understood by a man in the Maritime provinces, and it would be presumptuous for me to discuss representation in British Columbia or in the three western provinces. The people there know the local conditions far better.

The conditions in my own province, of which I will just say a word, are these: A comparatively stable population, changing not very much even in the cities, though changing there more than in the rural districts, with the cities of course constituting compact constituencies. All you have to do is to ask any candidate whether he would rather run for a city or a rural constituency, and the answer unhesitatingly will be that he will run for the city constituency, because it saves him a tremendous amount of work and is much easier to keep in touch with. Therefore, so far as my province is concerned, I would favour, to whatever extent may be necessary, a larger unit for the constituencies that include cities, and a smaller unit for the purely rural districts.

But I would not stop quite there. I admit that if you apply pure theory to this matter, one man is just as good as another, and should have just as much to say as another, and in order to give him an equal opportunity, you ought to make everything mathematically equal. But you cannot do that in human affairs. That is the practical answer; and in our form of government sentiment, to my mind, plays a far greater part than mathematics. There are one or two instances in my own province, small though it may be, where the people have grown around a certain centre and have their well-defined boundaries. There is, for example, the shire town towards which all eyes look; it is the political home of both parties. If, except under the greatest necessity in the world, you disrupt that and try to force those people into new relations with other parts of the province, you are going to cause far more dissatisfaction than you will confer benefit. You do not, at present, perhaps, have mathematical equality, but you do have a rough and ready measure of justice for the people who are accustomed to certain conditions, which conditions it is not worth while to disturb. Therefore in a province like my own, where there is no change in the total number of representation, I would say: Let conditions remain as they are. They have been fair enough in the past. My province has never had to protest against anything in the nature of a gerrymander, and there is no reason for unduly disturbing conditions. Those are the principles that, so far as they may be applicable, I should like to see applied throughout Canada—simply a spirit of fair play and no more unncessary disturbance than you are obliged to make to fit new conditions.

Nor would I draw too strong an inference from the number of people who have voted at one particular election. Another element enters there,—the very human element. It is partly the issue, and it is also partly the candidate. Now, I do not think you can build up a very strong argument because in the city of Toronto a large number of people did not think it worth while to turn out to secure what was no doubt regarded as an inevitable result in that city. But when you get into other constituencies, whether rural or urban, in any of the provinces, you will find that just in proportion as you make the contest a doubtful one you will bring out a much larger voting strength; and a very great deal depends also upon the personalities of the candidates. Those are factors which are not always equal. Perhaps even deductions drawn from a number of elections would not have much value. All this can be dealt with, not under a basis of representation, but by a consideration of the suggestions put forward as to whether it is not time to treat the franchise as no longer a privilege but an absolute and imminent duty, and to regard a man as failing in the duties of citizenship who does not exercise his franchise. Even if he does not care for any of the candidates, it is at least his duty to make a choice of the least objectionable of two or more evils—a duty which ought to be discharged by every voter.

But for the present all I would say is: Let us approach this matter of representation in a broad, fair, non-political spirit, not with the idea of jockeying for party advantage, but to give the people the fairest and best opportunity of getting representation if they can, and realizing that those candidates who have to travel hundreds of miles in order to seek the franchises of the electors, or those electors who have to travel scores of miles to record their votes, are entitled to some more consideration than those who have only to spend ten or fifteen minutes for the purpose.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): A good deal has been said as to the disadvantages of rural residents, and as to the necessity of giving them a larger representation. Might I point out that these disadvantages are not quite so real as has been suggested? In a good many countries there are several towns and occasionally small cities, but the greater number of the people are rural. That sometimes gives the rural people a decided advantage, because some candidate can be proposed who is very largely acceptable to them, and on the other hand there is no one living in the little town who is sufficiently strong to carry the whole majority of the people throughout the riding. It seems to me that there can be no real basis other than that of representation by population. But I would agree with the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) when he suggests that in certain peculiar constituencies where the geographical situation is such as to make the population very scattered there may need to be certain modifications. But certainly the idea ought to be as near as we can approximate to it that one Canadian's vote is just as good as another's, and should be as fully represented on the floor of this House.

There is another point, moreover, that I should like to mention. The Prime Minister said that as far as possible it seemed wise to maintain the county as the unit. We in the West do not know a great deal about counties, but I suggest that if this principle is to be applied to well recognized units such as eastern counties, it ought decidedly to be applied in the case of cities. That has not been the case in the past. I think now of one of our western districts where three constituencies centre into one city. In each the representative is a rural member, and that quite large city has been effectively deprived of any representation in this House.

It would seem as if, to carry out this principle of fairness, the city ought as far as possible to be regarded as a unit.

Mr. CARROLL: If large enough.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If large enough, yes.—I say, as far as possible. In the particular case I have in mind it is large enough, yet it has been divided up as I have said with these three constituencies centering into it. I understand that a proposal was made in the committee appointed last year that, in regard to another city that there should be a division in that same way—uniting certain portions of the city with a country district stretching fifty or sixty miles away. It would seem to me that any such proposal as that is pre-eminently unfair, as it gives no chance whatever to the people of the city to express themselves.

I would further like to make a plea that at this time we should reconsider a question which was discussed last year on the floor of this House, the question of proportional representation. Mention has been made of the fact that there was a very small vote in the city of Toronto and also in some constituencies in the city of Montreal. Surely the reason for that lack of interest is the lack of anything like proportional representation. When people are confident that one side only stands a chance of winning, they can hardly be induced to go to the polls. If there were grouped constituencies where the minorities would have some chance of electing a man to represent their special viewpoint, a great deal more interest would be taken in the election and the various cities would be represented on the floor of this House much more nearly in accordance with the real opinion of their people. Whether or not the system of proportional representation is generally adopted at this time, I would urge that it be given a fair trial in one or two cities. In the city of Winnipeg we have for some years been accustomed to proportional representation in municipal and provincial affairs, and I think I am correct in stating that the large majority of the people of that city are well satisfied with the proportional representation system. We are accustomed to it; we have found that it works well, and we can see no reason why it should not be tried out in federal affairs. I would urge that—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon member that the bill under consideration is for the representation in the House of Commons, not for the mode of electing. I understand, of course, that the two questions might easily be confused. but the hon. member should speak on the bill, not on the mode of election.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that I was getting away from the purpose of the bill. I was discussing the outline given to us by the Prime Minister of the fundamental principles which should underlie the method of distribution. However, I will simply say this: I hope that during the discussion in connection with the mode of election we may not overlook any of these principles which seek to give us a fairer representation under the conditions that prevail to-day in our larger urban centres.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): Mr. Speaker, one point that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) brought out is deserving of consideration before the House deals with this question. He said that it was easier at the present time to focus public opinion in the urban ridings than it was in the rural ridings. In my opinion that is not the case. The hon. member for Glengarry and Stormont (Mr. Kennedy) gave some figures in regard to the vote in the city ridings compared with that in the country ridings, and in my humble opinion he proved conclusively that it was not easier to focus public opinion in the city riding than in the urban districts. All these arguments which have been handed down from generation to generation with regard to representation in this House and as recited by the right hon. Prime Minister, are, we must admit, beginning to lose their weight. We are living in a new day now. When the Prime Minister cites the principles that were in vogue as long ago as thirty and forty years, I would point out to him that at that time the means of communication in this country are not what they are to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not go back past 1870. It was the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) who went back to 1830.

Mr. HARRIS: Thirty or forty years, I said, and the right hon. gentleman went back to 1870. Well, I am a fair mathematician at that: we will say he went back fifty years, and see how that will suit him. The means of communication to-day are advancing very rapidly, and in my opinion it is time we got a little closer to the principle of representation by population. You will find, if you look through the report of the Chief Electoral Officer, that in the constituency of North York, for instance, with its 14,418 voters, 12,273 polled their vote at the last election. In the riding of East York, which is very largely a city riding, with its 48,783 voters, 18,536 polled their vote. So that explodes entirely the argument made by the Prime Minister when he said it was much easier to focus public opinion in the urban ridings. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that as time goes on we should get closer to representation by population with a view to satisfying the people of Canada generally.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I think the well defined principles enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the guidance of the committee are eminently fair, but it seems to me that some other principles that are also vital may have been overlooked and possibly will not be considered by the committee. One of these is that existing boundaries should be regarded as closely as possible, and another is that cognizance should be taken of the railway facilities. There are particular cases already, I understand, where it has been suggested to cut a small country town completely off from a large part of the country that it serves. I have one particular case in mind of a plan drawn up where the country on one side of this town is cut off right at the boundary of the town. I think that is not altogether fair. With regard to adhering to existing boundaries, I think that is very, very important. Take, for instance, a constituency that has about sixteen municipalities. I have one in mind at the present moment. We will say that there are four municipalities east and west, and four north and south, sixteen in all. Under the new plan it will still have sixteen municipalities, but two rows are taken off the north and added on the west, which would mean that the new constituency is half the width it was before and double the length. Now it is impossible to have that constituency properly served in such a case, and it seems to me that these two factors should be taken into consideration by the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg to move:

That Bill No. 2 intituled "An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons" be referred to a special committee, the names of the members of which to be given at a later date, with instructions to prepare schedules to contain and describe the several electoral divisions entitled to return members to this House, and to report the same.

I am sorry not to be able to give the names of the committee to-night, but I would point out that on two previous occasions a motion was presented in this form.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, the motion as it is drafted would not be accepted in the British House of Commons, because no question can be referred to a committee unless the committee is appointed and the members of the committee named. But as the right hon. the Prime Minister states we have two Canadian precedents. I have one just now which is fresh in my mind. On the 3rd of May, 1921, the right hon. the Prime Minister of the day referred Bill No. 2, "An act to amend and consolidate the law relating to Copyright" to a special committee to be subsequently named, after it had been given its second reading. The motion passed and the next day, the 4th of May, the special committee to consider the bill was appointed, consisting of several members. I presume the right hon. gentleman intends to follow that precedent, and under those circumstances I would consider that with the unanimous consent of the House the motion is in order, although it would not be in order in the Mother of Parliaments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it were not for the circumstance that the Whips and some of the members are absent to-night, I would have been able to arrange the committee. It is just a misfortune that they are absent to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a case where we make an exception to the British practice in favour of the Canadian precedent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just to clear up one point, the motion as read states that the names are to be given at a subsequent date. I assume they will be given in the ordinary way, that is by a motion in the House appointing members to that committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, certainly

Mr. SPEAKER: That is in accordance with the precedent I have just cited.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Public Works—Ottawa, addition to Dominion Archiv. Building, $275,000.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): This vote is to carry on and complete the contract let for the building of an addition to the Dominion Archives building. There was a vote of $150,000 last year, and of the $275,000 vote this year, $75,000 is a revote. The contract is let to P. Lyall & Sons, being the lowest tenderers, for an amount of $294,797.

Mr. STEVENS: What amount has already been expended, and what is the necessity for this building? What is it to provide for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is expected that the sum of $75,000 will be expended on foundations, cutting stone and erecting steel work in the coming year. As to the necessity for this addition, I think it is generally conceded that very valuable documents are in the care of the Dominion Archives, and it has been found necessary to enlarge the quarters in order that these documents may be carefully preserved. The advantage of a place of record of this character is recognized not only by the department at Ottawa but by other institutions throughout Canada. There are many people who use the Archives in studying the history of this country.

10 p.m.

Mr. STEVENS: How many tenders were received?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There were nine in all.

Mr. MILLAR: Where is this building? Is this part of a general plan to consolidate the buildings?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Archives building is on Sussex street, and this amount is to provide for the building of an additional wing to give further room for housing the archives.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry & Stormont): The total amount the minister is asking this year and last is $425,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. Outside of the contract there are fittings, steel cabinets, supervision and contingencies, amounting to $55,203, making a total expenditure of $350,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister expect this will complete the building and furnish it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, that is the intention.

Mr. STEVENS: Do you expect the building will be completed this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—London, England, Canadian Office, $1,300,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When this item was under discussion a few days ago my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) asked certain questions to which I am pleased to give the answers this evening. The ground area is 9,254 square feet, and the total floor area 25,000 square feet. Taxes for the year 1921 amounted to £3,424-19-8; in 1922, £3,455-10; 1923, £3,074. Those are taxes paid by the club. There will be Crown exemptions for 1921 of £1,149, for 1922 of £1,207, and for 1923 of £1,032. The Crown taxes the Dominion will probably pay will be—1921, £2,275-19-8; 1922, £2,248-10; 1923, £2,042.

The amount of insurance carried by the club of £71,245, at the rate of 1s. 6d. equals £53-11 premium. The maintenance, as estimated by the department, for a building of this character would be £1,600. That would include caretakers, char service, firemen, engineers, heating, water, light, supplies and repairs. The annual interest charge on a 4 per cent basis would be £12,000, and the annual sinking fund £243, making a total of £12,243.

Mr. STEVENS: Why the 4 per cent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The 4 per cent is the percentage we will figure on. We are so advised by the High Commissioner.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the government now borrowing money at the rate of 4 per cent, is that all money is costing them?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my hon. friend the other night asked to have these figures produced, and we are advised by the High Commissioner that it should be figured at the rate of 4 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Because the money can be had for that.

Mr. STEVENS: On that point, the minister does not mean to say that the money supplied for the purchase of this building will only cost this country 4 per cent. We are paying 5 or 5½ per cent.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): During negotiations last year—and this indicates probably what the percentage will be—the bankers in the Old Country offered for the Dominion bonds a rate of 4 per cent and the High Commissioner in replying to our questions has figured this on a basis of 4 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will take it at 4 per cent. What is the amount again?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The total, that is the annual charges, for interest and sinking fund is £12,243. The ground rental is an additional £2,855, making a total annual charge of £15,098. If we add maintenance, repairs and insurance together we will have a total annual charge of £18,940. The rentals of the premises the government are occupying today amount to £10,889. Deducting that annual charge, the excess cost of occupying the new building would be £8,051, or, at an exchange rate of $4.50, a total of $36,229. We are advised that by consolidating the various offices in London there will be a very considerable saving in the number of the staff and again in efficiency. At present there are four premises being occupied.

Mr. THURSTON: Would the minister give us the number of staff at the present time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not that information here. However, there are four premises being occupied requiring in each case, I imagine, caretakers, charwomen, firemen, a separate supply of coal, and all the other costs there are in maintaining separate apartments. As a result of the consolidation there will be a reduction undoubtedly in the matter of door keepers, caretakers, charwomen, firemen and engineers, and probably, also under the head of contingencies. The High Commissioner himself states there will be a saving in number of staff, and also that the work will be carried on more efficiently.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister will give us the amount of saving the Commissioner is going to make each year, also what the staff numbers at the present time and what it will be reduced to?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have not those details in our office. I do not imagine the Commissioner himself knows what the consolidation will actually accomplish. That can only be told when it has taken place.

Mr. HARRIS: How much of the maintenance cost is sinking fund, and at what rate is the sinking fund figured?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I thought I made that plain. The sinking fund will be £243 per annum at 4 per cent.

Mr. JACOBS: What departments will be housed in this new building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The High Commissioner's office, the Immigration Department, the Trade Commissioner's office, and Pensions.

Mr. FORKE: According to those figures, it will cost about $40,000 more to operate this new building than to operate the old one.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Roughly. The figures carried out in dollars and cents are $36,229.

Mr. HARRIS: What is the sinking fund, £243, for, in connection with this large investment?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is supposed to wipe out the purchase price of the building at the end of the lease—one hundred years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister may be out of power then. The minister has given us the floor space of the building. Will he tell us the floor space actually occupied by those various branches, including the High Commissioner's own staff, at the present time, and let us see if it does not aggregate far more than the floor space in the new building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I cannot say at present.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think there will not be room for any more than the High Commissioner's own staff in the building according to the space so occupied now.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are not so advised by the High Commissioner.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would like to know.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The plans do not show that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What advice has the minister from the High Commissioner as to the space occupied by these branches now as compared with the space in this building.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have none as regards that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what good is the High Commissioner's advice?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The High Commissioner has sent plans showing the alterations in the new building; he has sent specifications for those alterations, and he has stated that he is going to place certain departments in the building. That is the information the department has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We want to know how he is going to do that. My information is that he cannot get them in unless he can contract them very much, and I do not think that has been his practice. My information is that he has in this building just about as much space as his own staff occupies now. So this will mean that we shall be spending about $36,000 more than we would be if all those were not housed in the building. As a matter of fact, they will not all be housed in the building—I am safe in making that prediction now from the information I have —and, as a consequence, this is going to mean the expenditure of a great deal more than $36,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is based on a 4 per cent interest charge. How in the world the High Commissioner justifies that, I do not know. The minister ought to advise Sir Henry Thornton and also the Minister of Finance about this source of money. If we can get money at 4 per cent there, I cannot comprehend, for the life of me, a number of the loans that we are making now. Why is this based on 4 per cent? There is no justification for that. The minister is not going to satisfy the committee by saying simply: "the High Commissioner told me this; he did not tell me how he was going to get all these branches in; he just says: 'I am going to do this.'" That leaves the committee in rather a blank position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might say to my right hon. friend that I had the privilege of going through this building with the High Commissioner and of having him point out just wherein he thought it was going to be possible to accommodate the different staffs in London at the present time. It is true that, with the numbers in the offices, as they stand at present, of the Trade Commissioner, Soldiers' Pensions, Immigration, and also of the High Commissioner, and the Union Club building remaining as it is at the moment, there would not be accommodation for all. It is, however, anticipated that once it is possible to assemble under one roof the several staffs, a material reduction can be effected in the numbers of the staffs. Some of these staffs have been perhaps, unduly large during the period of the war. The High Commissioner says that he can exercise no real authority or supervision over them, scattered as they are through different parts of the city. He feels that if the different Canadian offices in London were brought into one building, it should be possible, through the economies to be effected, to reduce considerably the number of officials overseas. In addition to that it is contemplated, under the amount the government is asking for, to enlarge this building somewhat. I do not know whether an additional storey is to be added, but some material addition is to be made to the building as it stands, making it more suitable for the purposes it is intended to serve.

Mr. THURSTON: Is it possible to enlarge the building without purchasing too valuable property on the other side of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is possible. One way in which it can be enlarged—and I understand the High Commissioner has in view alterations for that purpose—is to add another storey in part or addition in the rear. That whole matter has been carefully considered by the High Commissioner.

Mr. CLARK: Are these additions included in this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: What are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Provision is made for alterations to the building necessary to make it suitable for the purposes it is intended to serve. These alterations have been carefully arranged for by the High Commissioner in consultation with architects on the other side.

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister give us particulars of those additions and alterations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will hardly expect me to tell him where a particular addition is to be made. If I mention to him that the High Commissioner is a gentleman of wide business experience who has had, perhaps, more to do with business and commercial establishments than any dozen or more representative business men of our country, I think the House will feel it may be justified in taking his judgment in a matter of this kind.

Mr. CLARK: I appreciate that he may be a man of wide business experience; but at the same time I do not think he should object to furnishing the Prime Minister, his government and this House with particulars of the additions and alterations that are proposed, that apparently he is asking money for this year, and that are included in this particular appropriation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think he is objecting at all, but I think he assumes that the government in a matter of this kind will be prepared to trust his judgment and sagacity.

Mr. CLARK: We are not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to little additions, where a room may be added or changed or what may be altered, I do not think it would be worth the time of the country for the government to have exchanged too much correspondence in regard to that kind of thing. We should either trust a High Commissioner when we have him, or dispense with him altogether. If the hon. member really wants information that is important, I think he will be able to get it; but I do not think the question of what particular form of alterations may be made at the present time to a building is one that the House is primarily interested in; I would think it was more interested in knowing that the accommodation was adequate.

Mr. CLARK: What proportion of this appropriation is for alterations? I was under the impression that probably a large proportion of this appropriation was for additions and alterations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am told that £75,000 is what is asked for alterations.

Mr. CLARK: A very considerable amount, it seems.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: We ought to know what it is for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The site of this particular building is the finest site, not only in London, but in the world. To have that building put into shape for offices may require for purposes of alteration a good bit in the way of expense. Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to complete what I have to say about the building, and I shall be glad to answer questions later.

For at least twenty-five years the government of Canada has been trying to secure in London suitable accommodation for the offices of the High Commissioner and such other officials as this country has in the capital of the Old World. Lord Strathcona, while High Commissioner, endeavoured unsuccessfully to obtain a suitable building, as also did Sir George Perley when he was overseas in a similar capacity. Since he has been High Commissioner, the Honourable Mr. Larkin has been endeavouring to find adequate and creditable accommodation, and although at first he also was unsuccessful he has been extremely fortunate in being able to acquire a building occupying one of the finest positions in the world. The building is situated on the corner of Trafalgar Square and Cockspur Street; and notwithstanding an incredulous smile which I observe opposite, I repeat that it is the finest site that could be obtained in the world.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought that the finest site in the world was occupied by the Scribe hotel.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The finest site in Paris perhaps; but London is ahead of Paris. I repeat, it is something of which we may be proud that Canada has been fortunate enough to secure what may well be regarded as the finest site in London, and, being in London, the finest in the world, for its offices in England. In regard to the necessity for these offices, it is all a matter of how one wishes to view the status of the Dominion. Australia has exceptionally fine buildings in London; South Africa a couple of years ago acquired on the other side of Trafalgar Square a building known as Morley's hotel which it owns to-day. Canada, on the other hand, has been in an obscure position notwithstanding that she is the leading dominion; and, so far as she has been known to the people in London by any distinctive building, she does not appear to have been on the map, so to speak, until the change of position of which I have been speaking. I might mention that there are also in London at the present time offices of the provinces of Canada. The province of Nova Scotia has finer offices for its agent than has the Dominion for its High Commissioner; and British Columbia has a building which is infinitely superior to ours. Indeed, when we sought last year to purchase their building from the government of British Columbia for the Dominion of Canada we could not acquire it. A stranger visiting London to-day and knowing little about Canadian affairs might think, from the accommodation enjoyed by the respective governments, that Canada was a part of British Columbia instead of British Columbia being a province of the Dominion. When we tried to acquire from that province the building which it owns in London we discovered that the provincial government had found it so good an investment, notwithstanding that it was a very large building, that the province refused to sell it.

A feature that should be taken into consideration in connection with the present purchase is the importance of the site, which of course is a most important element in the selection of a building. And there is the further fact that this particular building happens to be on ground which is the property of the Crown in Great Britain, and that may prove an all important consideration should it come to a question of renewing the lease at some future time. So far as the Dominion government is concerned, I hope it may expect to receive from the British government at all times fair treatment in the matter of the lease which it will hold, and the opportunity to acquire a property such as the one that we have secured might never come again. That was one reason why the High Commissioner asked the government at the time whether he would not be justified in taking an option immediately on the premises of the Union Club. It was a mere chance that the Union Club was prepared at that moment to give up the site and move to another part of the city. Had it been generally known that the site was available it is extremely doubtful whether the Dominion government would have been able to acquire it; but the matter having been negotiated quietly it was possible for us to secure this highly desirable accommodation.

Although it does not bear directly upon the matter under consideration, I might mention at this time that we have no official residence for the Canadian High Commissioner in London. It is my opinion that the country ought to own its own residence in London for its representative. It did originally own a residence, at the time, I think, that Sir Charles Tupper was High Commissioner. That residence was subsequently disposed of when Lord Strathcona provided one on his own account. However Mr. Larkin, the present High Commissioner, has purchased a very valuable residence in London and is using it in the service of the country in a very generous way. He happens to be well-to-do and is prepared thus to use his money in the service of the country. I think Canada is under a great obligation to him by reason of his willingness to further her interests in this way apart altogether from the important duties he discharges in connection with his office as High Commissioner. That is an additional reason, in my opinion, why at this time, when Mr. Larkin is High Commissioner, we should do all in our power to assist him in carrying out a project which is obviously in the national interest, and in which he is taking a very special interest on behalf of Canada.

Mr. FORKE: Who began the negotiations for the building? Did the Union Club offer it for sale?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. Mr. Larkin ascertained that there was a possibility of the Union Club moving to some other part of the city; it was while he had one of two or three other buildings in view that he learned this fact.

Mr. FORKE: Personally I think it is rather unfortunate that this should have occurred at this particular time when there is so great a cry for economy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not share that view. On the contrary, I think it is rather fortunate that the transaction did take place this year, because, among other reasons, this happens to be the year of the British Empire Exhibition, and every Canadian who goes to London this summer will feel a sense of pride as well as of relief in the fact that Canada has in the heart of London a building of which he may be proud. This building is conveniently situated in relation to important railway, banking, commercial and business institutions, and it can be reached from any part of London by underground railway. In short, a better site could not possibly be obtained. I might add—a matter that came to my attention while I was in England—that the building which South Africa purchased only a few years ago had a lease of ten years to run; the Corporation of the City of London have decided to widen the space at the entrance to the Strand and have arranged for the expropriation of the necessary ground, which means that the Morley's hotel building is to be torn down, and the width of the Strand as it approaches Trafalgar Square will be considerably greater, than it now is. The Canadian building will then face that splendid approach. I mention that because it is a factor, once this alteration is made, it will vastly enhance the value of the building which we have secured. I submit that the building is a good one, the value is good, the site is good, and the time is opportune; so that altogether it is very much in the interests of the Canadian people that we should acquire this property without delay.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, my right hon. friend a year ago observed on this subject of the acquisition of a building in London:

> We felt that it was desirable to acquire a building in which all these offices could be brought together and which would be large enough also to accommodate the representatives of the different provinces.

That was a rather reasonable aspiration, and was expressed in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross). Now, if I gathered correctly what the hon. Minister of Public Works said, it is a question whether all these offices can be accommodated in the new building.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I made the remark which my hon. friend has just quoted I was referring to a building known as the Cox Bank building, which is much larger than the Union Club building. It would have accommodated the offices of the different provinces as well as those of the Dominion, but it would have cost very much more. For Dominion purposes the present self-contained building is perhaps better.

Mr. STEVENS: But my point is this. From the statement made by the Minister of Public Works it is a question whether this building will accommodate the various departments referred to—Trade and Commerce, Immigration, High Commissioner's and the Soldiers' Overseas Work. Apparently the minister is not sure whether this expenditure of $1,300,000 will give us a building that will accommodate the offices of the federal government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not expressed any doubt.

Mr. STEVENS: Can the minister tell us that it will?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am so advised by the High Commissioner.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister seemed doubtful a little while ago.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. STEVENS: He could not give my right hon. leader information as to the floor space now occupied. The fact remains that the minister is not in possession of the information. He says Mr. Larkin thinks the building is quite likely to accommodate our present federal offices. But an investment of $1,300,000 should not be made on such—shall I say?—precarious information. Another point we are going to assume an annual obligation—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—of $36,000 more than we carry at the present time. That is a very large sum, and even then it is questionable whether we will have barely enough accommodation.

Now, in regard to this building, my information is that the construction is such that there is no possibility of adding another storey. If we are going to spend £75,000, or over $300,000, in repairs to this building, and not be able to very materially extend the accommodation, and the total accommodation is then going to be barely enough to meet our requirements, I cannot see the soundness of the investment. I am leaving the site out of the question altogether. It may be the very best in London, I do not know, but certainly from the information we have we are not making a very advantageous investment of $1,300,000. The right hon. Prime Minister said that it would be very nice for visitors to London this year to see Canada's offices all in one building. Does he expect to have the building ready this summer?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, my hon. friend has misconstrued my remarks. I would ask him to compare his feelings had he turned up at 17 Victoria street, where the old building is, with what they would be at being able to point out the particular site which Canada has now obtained. Then he will have in mind what I tried to express.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think many visitors are likely to go to Victoria street and then over to Trafalgar Square to see a building which is undergoing extensive repairs. We may dismiss that particular advantage, whatever its value may be. I submit that for this expenditure of $1,300,000 we are not getting the accommodation that was anticipated. Certainly the minister cannot give us any assurance that the building will accommodate the federal offices now in existence in London. The most he can say is that the High Commissioner hopes it will. That was the word my hon. friend used—the High Commissioner "hopes" it will. But we have no information upon which to base such a conclusion. Will the minister tell us the names of the agents who negotiated the sale, or alleged sale, or proposed sale?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The vendor's agents are Messrs. Collins & Collins, who will be paid by the vendors the usual commission of 2½ per cent. It is proposed to make an addition to the rear of the building. The present floor space is 25,000 square feet; on the completion of the addition the floor space will be 30,000 square feet. I have no personal knowledge as to whether the High Commissioner will be able to consolidate his staff in the new building, but he informs me that it is his intention to do so.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Chairman, last year I was rather favourable to the provision of Canadian offices in London. My idea was that we would, in a measure, emulate Australia in gathering together all our offices in one building. When you go down the Strand you see a large white building which is known as Australia House, and it contains all the offices of the states of the commonwealth. When you look for a Canadian House, you have to go down the Strand where you find a small building that you might pass a dozen times before you would know that it contains the offices of the provinces of Ontario Then you go up by Trafalgar Square and down another little street to find a splendid building representing British Columbia. The attraction is not so much architectural as the exhibition made by British Columbia and the interest which their agent is taking in his work. Then you go by Westminster and eventually reach Victoria street, and there you find in an out-of-the-way place the offices of our High Commissioner. Last year my idea was that we were to get together with the provinces and gather all the offices, both federal and provincial, under one roof and have a truly Canadian House, similar to Australia House. Now we are asked to vote a large sum of money. For what? To remove the offices of the High Commissioner only from away down at 16 Victoria street up to Trafalgar Square,—to a site where the traffic is very small. We are simply expending this large amount of money for the removal of the offices of the High Commissioner from Victoria Street to Trafalgar square, and we are making no effort whatever to co-operate with the provinces in the matter. This is an expenditure which I do not feel like supporting, and I do not intend to support it. I have not been in consultation with anybody else, but I do think it is a scheme that Canada will not be very proud of. The offices of the soldiers—a very small affair, I think—will be removed from somewhere about Oxford street, but these offices will gradually go out of existence. It seems to me that Canada should co-operate with her provinces with a view to federal and provincial officers being located in a building that Canadians can be proud of. If a Canadian from Ontario goes over he finds his own little provincial house on the Strand and then he will find the Dominion house up on the far side of Trafalgar Square. I say it is not a condition that we should be proud of, and I do not think any person who has been in London will be proud of it either.

Mr. McBRIDE: I am most pleased to hear the remarks that have been made to-night about the British Columbia building. When that building was erected the provincial government was ridiculed from one end of the province to the other. It was alleged that there had been graft in connection with the transaction and that the property would be a white elephant on the hands of the province. But here to-night it is held up as a sort of example of good business and as something that Canada has reason to be proud of. I am more than pleased to hear what has been said and I have no doubt that if this building is purchased for the purposes that have been mentioned it may have the same history.

Mr. GRAHAM: The British Columbia building, as my hon. friend (Mr. McBride) says, is something of which his province may be proud. I am inclined to think that the representative of British Columbia had something to do with the business ability that has characterized the activities of British Columbia in London. That building now—and I would like hon. gentlemen to be sure to hear this—is carrying itself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the representative who is there have anything to do with the purchase?

Mr. GRAHAM: I was not saying anything about that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister might tell us who made the purchase.

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine it was the McBride government that made the purchase, but if the purchase had been made and nothing else had been done, they would never have attained the success that they have attained. There are two reasons why Canada cannot have a building which would include the offices of all the provinces. First, there is no chance in the world that British Columbia would leave their present building, in connection with which they are making a profit, and move into another. The provinces, I believe—at least some of them—are not in favour of joining with the Dominion in the erection of a general building for all. In the second place, you can imagine what a building would cost that would accommodate all the provinces and the Dominion, with all their activities—even if you could get it; and I doubt if you could go into London to-day and either purchase outright or secure a lease of a building that would accommodate all the provinces and the Dominion. And what would happen to an estimate for a building of that kind when this moderate estimate for a building for the federal activities meets with so much opposition? Now, I am not going to compare Canada with Australia, because I think Canada is away ahead of Australia, to put it mildly; the various activities of Australia are not nearly on so large a scale as those of Canada would have to be in any building.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is Australia not getting a pretty large percentage of immigration from the Old Country?

Mr. GRAHAM: We might have had greater immigration if we had had an attractive building and adequate offices. But last year Canada got greater immigration from the British Isles than all the overseas dominions put together.

Mr. CLARK: From Great Britain?

Mr. GRAHAM: From the British Isles.

Mr. CLARK: That does not correspond with what the minister read a few days ago from a book which was called, I think, the Parliamentary Journal. Those figures were not shown there.

Mr. GRAHAM: That statement was made and not denied at the Imperial Economic Conference during the discussion of the plan of the British Empire Association for emigration to Canada.

Mr. CLARK: Can the minister give the figures?

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely I cannot give the figures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister mean the calendar year 1923, or the last fiscal year?

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot say that; I did not charge my memory with it. But I know the statement was made and it has never been denied. Perhaps I shall be able to produce the figures. We were discussing immigration there at close range, and the figures were given in that connection. Now, I have seen this building on Trafalgar Square, and, more than that, I have done what the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) has done: I have hunted up and down the street to find the Ontario office. Not only did I have trouble in finding it, but I could not come across anybody who could tell me where to find it. I walked up and down the street for an hour; I knew I was within two or three blocks of the place. I looked into a window and saw some preserved fruit or something of that kind on display; I went in and discovered that it was the Ontario building. The building on Victoria street was not a fit building for representatives of the Dominion of Canada. People who went in there had a good deal of difficulty in finding the High Commissioner. The High Commissioner in former years was charged with not seeing people who went to call upon him. The fact is that the offices were to my mind altogether inadequate. The High Commissioner himself has a small office that no member of the Canadian parliament would trade his office in this building for. At present the High Commissioner has some rooms in a building on a corner of the Haymarket. I drove down there to hunt up the High Commissioner and I discovered that I had to find him out among a lot of other people who were occupying the building. He is the only representative of an overseas dominion whom it is difficult to find in London. Canada loses immensely by having her High Commissioner housed in a building which is altogether unfitted for a representative of this great country. I went into this building on Trafalgar Square. It has a splendid location. I do not know whether you could build another storey on it or not, but I do know that it looks out on Trafalgar Square and that the daily traffic past this building is such that more people will be brought in touch with Canada in a few months than would be the case in ten years on Victoria street. Surely it is not a bad investment for Canada to have a building of her own in the heart of London if we intend to continue to do business in the metropolis of the world. Australia has her representatives disposing of her products in London, and I think the same applies to New Zealand. We have not gone that far, but perhaps we shall want to go that far before very long. Our first step, however, is to provide a building worthy of this great Dominion and to let the people of London and the people of the world who go there know, through our High Commissioner, through our Trade and Commerce department and through our Immigration department, just what we have in this country. I have enough faith in Canada to believe that when the people of the world know what Canada is and what we have, we shall have no trouble in filling up our vacant spaces in this great country. British Columbia has made money on her investment, and I have no doubt in the world but that Canada could in a few years sell her equity in this property for much more than she is paying for it to-day. I do not look upon an investment where you are getting value for your money as throwing away your money at all. It is not an expenditure in the ordinary sense of the word; it is simply transferring cash into its equivalent in real estate, and the real estate in this case will bring to the people of Canada, to my mind a return in every way. Our citizens when they go to the great metropolis will not be ashamed to say, "I am from Canada", for Canada has now a suitable place for her representative. If it were a private concern acting under the same circumstances I think they would consider it a good investment, both nationally and commercially.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who would like to see a Canadian building in London. I have always harboured that hope, and I do not want it to be represented that the reason it was not acquired under the late government was that we could not find one. That was not the reason according to my recollection. The reason was that we had so much other expenditure to take care of that we thought it would have to wait. The hope at that time was—and I did not know it had been abandoned, apparently it has only been abandoned during the last few months—that we would be in the fulness of time, when we could afford it, get a building in which the representatives of all the provinces could be held. I know that British Columbia now has a building in London and a fine one. I suppose they made a good real estate investment. I do not want to withhold credit from them, but really I do not feel like falling down in adoration before the financial or commercial discretion of a government merely because real estate has gone up in value. Nor do I share the argument of the minister that this is going to be a paying thing because real estate in London is going to go up more in value. I do not know whether it will or not; I do not think anybody else knows whether it will. A great many people have often thought real estate would go up, and now are very sorry that they thought so, and the experience of Canada may be the experience of England. No one knows. In my judgment—not that I think it is worth anything, I do not think the judgment of anyone here is worth anything on this matter—but for myself, knowing present real estate values in London compared with what they were before the war, I would rather be on the bear end of the market if it were the right and proper duty of the government of Canada to be speculating in real estate.

But, coming to the right course to pursue to-day, it is not to buy with the idea that real estate is to go up; that is not our function at all. Our function is to get, at the proper time, a site for the purpose worthy of our country. Now, I would not want to give up hope that Canada could have a building in which the provinces yet would come,—and possibly British Columbia, which has a little debt, might be disposed to apply its profits upon its real estate in London to that debt. They may not be so disposed. They have a perfect right to decide themselves what they are going to do with it. But I do not like the idea of the provinces of Canada being separately represented over there in separate buildings scattered all over the city of London, to appear in adverse fashion before various departments. I would like to see them all together, and I would like to see a whole lot more cohesion in the representation of this Dominion in the capital of the Empire. Surely it is not too big a thing to look for that Canada will have a unit representation there, not nine representatives there, not ten representatives there, some working not in consonance with but in competition with the others—striving for the highest seats in the synagogue and all the rest of it. It is not a spectacle that is alluring and it does not seem to me consonant with the structure of confederation that this individual representation should continue, and especially in isolated fashion in the Motherland.

Now, even according to the minister's hopes, based on the unspecified predictions of the Commissioner over there that he is going to be able to house four different departments in this building, though upon the best information we have here—for the minister has none at all—it is only the size of that now occupied by his own department, one of the four, and is going to cost us $36,000 a year more than the other four together. Besides, notwithstanding the encomiums passed upon the building by the Prime Minister, I learn from other information maybe not as good, —and I may as well mention one of my informants and only one, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black), who is pretty well acquainted with London, that this building is on a street close to a heavily travelled street but not itself heavily travelled. It is near to being a good site but it is not the best by any means. But would it not be better to wait and try to work out what we have been struggling towards, and also wait till we are in a better financial position than we are in this year of grace? Do not let the minister imagine that he is going to get this in shape by spending $300,000 on it. It is not going to be in a very alluring condition when the British Empire Exhibition is on. I hope we will have a display at that Exhibition which will be a credit to Canada, without our having to buy a $1,250,000 or $1,500,000 building in order to have a side attraction.

It seems to me the part of wisdom to get along as we are for the present. We managed in other times and right up until the war was well on, to entice a large volume of immigration here, even though we had no very pretentious office in London, and I fancy that it we have good wholesome conditions in Canada we will get immigration here. The volume of our immigration is not going to be enlarged by the size of the window panes of a building in the middle of London, but by the letters home of the people who get work in Canada. That will affect immigration much more rapidly than the character of the building we happen to have in any section of the capital. That is my suggestion to the government. I do not yield to anyone in the pride I feel in the fact that some day we will have a home there worthy of the whole Dominion, and not merely one that is going to be a sort of fairly well placed edifice, but which after all will take second place even to the building that represents the province of British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the first part of my right hon. friend's remarks perhaps affords the strongest of reasons why the government should purchase this very property. He has intimated that he hopes to see the day when the offices of all the provinces of the Dominion as well as of the Dominion itself will be housed under the same roof. It so happens that this building adjoins the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, and had the government felt that parliament would be prepared at this time to purchase the entire frontage facing Trafalgar Square, and which would give to the Canadian building an entrance on Cockspur street and also on Pall Mall East, I think the government might have proceeded with an effort to secure the building of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons as well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am told it cannot be secured.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has been told that possibly it can, although not immediately. The College of Physicians and Surgeons building is held under lease from the Crown, just as this building is. I think the Dominion has reason to believe that the British government would aid it in furthering any object of the kind it had in view; and it is not unreasonable to expect that in the course of a little time, perhaps, when the country is in a better position to incur additional expenditure, the adjoining building —the building which this immedately adjoins but which is really part of the same structure—will become available. That is one reason, I think, why we ought to take this site while there is a chance to take it. More than that. As to postponing the making of a purchase I might call the attention of the committee to the fact that our lease of the building on Victoria street expired a year ago. We could not renew it unless we were prepared to take it for another term of years. The government did not feel it would be justified in leasing such a building for another five or six years; it was long out of date many years ago, and at the present time we have come into temporary quarters. We are there only for the period of a year with the right of renewal for another year; there is no certainty we will be able to stay there any longer. All these circumstances have to do with the considerations which, in the government's mind, make it imperative to purchase the site at once.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am really distressed at this vote. I think it would be a blunder for the parliament of Canada to purchase this property. I am familiar with the property, I know its location, and if the Prime Minister also knows it he should have told this House that while the building is on Cockspur street the traffic of that thoroughfare is on the other side of the street. This building is in the delta formed by Pall Mall east and Cockspur street at the foot of the Haymarket. When you talk of the traffic expected on the side of the street the building is on, you are talking of traffic the volume of which is not nearly as great as that which passes 17 and 19 Victoria street; there is no question about that. The British Columbia building has been referred to. Compared to the building in question here the British Columbia building is a palace. The building of the Bank of Montreal on Waterloo Place, across from the British Columbia building, would put a building of this kind—which the Prime Minister refers to as such an acquisition to Canada and likely to cause all Canadians who go there to look at it in admiration —completely and absolutely in the shade. On that point I defy contradiction from anyone. Furthermore there must be something or somebody who has a great urge to buy this building? Who can it be? It cannot be the person who got the opinion of Messrs. Knight, Frank & Rutley put on Hansard on Thursday last. I want the members of this House to read that letter, which was something like this: If you want to buy a property you want it in this exact place. As the man you want to buy it from is not very willing to sell it £200,000 would be a fair price. Now, the price this country is asked for is £25,000 in addition to that. Read the letter, That is the plain statement of the advisers who have been called in to decide as to the fairness of this price. At this particular time when it is necessary to practise economy by purchasing this building, which cannot be extended, we shall be putting ourselves in a cast-iron mould, and Canada consequently will have but a secondary site in the first city of the Empire. I hope, Mr. Chairman, it will not go abroad that the right hon. Prime Minister has passed his judgment to-night that this is the finest site in London—I think he even said in the Empire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the world.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The finest site in the world, that is his description of it. I think that will reflect upon the judgment of the Prime Minister. I think the public—certainly in London who know this building, and the public in Canada who also know it—will say it is not a question of veracity, but a question of judgment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend tell me a finer site in the world than Trafalgar Square?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Tell me.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I certainly will. There would be a beautiful site for this building where the British Columbia building is on Waterloo Place. But, talking of Trafalgar Square, this building will be on the dead side. There will certainly not be so many people passing on that side of Trafalgar Square or Cockspur street as pass 17 and 19 Victoria street where the offices of the country were before.

Mr. LOGAN: Nonsense!

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend says "nonsense". He has certainly not had experience or he would not make that remark. At this time when the country is being asked to save money where it can this purchase should not be made. How was it Lord Strathcona could live and carry on business on Victoria street, also Sir George Perley? But we have a new High Commissioner now and the idea is that money should be spent and spent in large amounts. I am against this vote, and I think that everyone who knows the location and the facts will be of the same opinion. In conclusion, I pin my judgment to the letter of Messrs. Knight, Frank & Rutley whom the government got to support this purchase.

Mr. CLARK: I am once more amazed to find the great interest taken by hon. members to our left in expenditures. We have two expressions from that quarter on this vote; one from the leader of the party in his usual critical terms, to the effect that it is unfortunate that this vote came this year. Well, if it is unfortunate that the government proposes to spend this money this year, surely it is unfortunate that the party to our left sit quiet, without protest, prepared to allow the vote to go through.

Mr. KELLNER: Do you not want a chance to speak?

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. CLARK: No, I was not looking for a chance to speak. All I was looking for was a chance to vote against this item, and I am going to see that I get it. Like my leader (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross), I do not think any member is more anxious to see the government properly housed in London or more anxious to see justice done to Canada in Great Britain than I am. Canada has done very well as the leading British dominion for a great number of years, with immigration that largely exceeds the immigration of today from Great Britain, with immigration that largely exceeds the immigration that we can look for from Great Britain for a period of years to come, and I think we can reasonably say that that business was fairly well handled by our former High Commissioner. As I stated the other day, what we are here for, particularly this year, is to see that every item of capital expenditure that is proposed by the government and that we can do without this year or for a period of years to come, should be cut out ruthlessly from the estimates. What is the effect of passing these various items of capital expenditure that we can do without? It means that the promise contained in the Speech from the Throne for a reduction of taxation cannot be carried out, unless that reduction in taxation is the mythical reduction in taxation on agricultural implements by reducing the tariff. That, to my mind, is not a reduction in taxation at all. That will increase what is commonly undersood by the people of this country as taxation. The other day the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred to taxation in this country as compared with taxation in Great Britain and other British dominions. The comparison which he gave, with all due respect to his opinion, was not at all applicable to our present condition, because the system of government in those dominions is entirely different, and it is almost an impossibility to arrive at the per capita taxation in this country as compared with that in New Zealand, for instance. The Minister of Justice shakes his head. He knows that we have a federal government—

Mr. LAPOINTE: What about Australia?

Mr. CLARK: I am talking about New Zealand just at the moment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see.

Mr. CLARK: I will come to Australia. The Minister of Justice was referring to New Zealand and Great Britain where the system of government is entirely different.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I said that, too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARK: I can surely give my reasons.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. gentleman is out of order because he is referring to a debate which took place previously during this session. That has been disposed of.

Mr. CLARKE: I quite understand that, and what I propose to do is to give my reasons why this vote should be struck out. If the Chair rules that I cannot give my reasons why this vote should be struck out, I will bow to the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member cannot refer to a debate which has been carried on during the same session at a previous time of the session. That is the point exactly. There is no question at all that he can give his reasons.

Mr. CLARK: I was saying that if we do not reduce expenditures in this country, we cannot reduce taxation. I was about to compare the taxation of the country, which is our real competitor, namely the United States, with that of Canada. The Minister of Justice, I think, stated that our federal taxation was $37 per capita. The taxation in the United States, our real competitor for capital and for industry, is $29 per capita. Until we can approximate the taxation in the United States, we cannot hope to encourage capital to invest in Canada. Capitalists in this country will not invest in industry to-day. They are investing in bonds, tax-free bonds where they can get them. I know of capitalists to-day who are investing in western Canada in investments which they know will not yield an income, relying upon the increased value in the properties they are purchasing in the next ten, twelve or fifteen years, in order to get away from taxation. They absolutely refuse to invest in any industry to-day on account of, first, taxation and, second, lack of stability in Canada owing to the fiscal policy of this government. For those reasons chiefly, I am opposed to this vote, and I would, therefore, move that resolution No. 139 be reduced by the sum of $1,300,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not wish to support this resolution by a silent vote, and I would like to make an appeal, futile though it may be, to hon. members on the treasury benches not to force this vote through the House. I think more and more the people of Canada are feeling that if there is possible for us an independent national existence, our governmental expenses must be cut and cut to the bone. I cannot, for the life of me, see why it should be necessary to make more ample provision for our representation in London than what has proved, perhaps, not sufficient or perfectly adequate, but at least practical, for the last ten or twelve years. I have no desire to see this government embarrassed, but I have a desire to see them not place themselves flatly in opposition to what I believe to be the views of this country on the question of governmental expenditures. There is only one policy that will satisfy the Canadian people, and that is that anything that we can possibly do without, we should do without in attempting to balance the budget.

I am not familiar with the situation in London of these buildings. This may be an excellent building that is proposed. I am not going to deal with the question whether the scheme under ordinary circumstances would be a good scheme or not. The question with me is what expenditure should be incurred of anything but an absolutely essential nature if the country's finances are in the conditions they are in. I would ask the government to realize that non-essentials must be cut out. I would like to raise my voice in protest against the idea that the prosperity of this country in the future, its importance in the world, is going to be judged by the size or the grandeur of our offices in London or Paris or any other place in the world. The sensible people of this world will think a great deal more of Canada's balance sheet than of Canada's architectural or building possessions in this, that or the other city. I do not wish unduly to take up the time of the committee, but I would implore members on the treasury benches to realize the temperate spirit of the country as regards expenditures and not to endeavour to force this vote through.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no desire on the part of the government to force anything, but as I intimated a moment ago the lease of the building in which the offices were formerly situated has expired and we are now in temporary quarters. There is not the least doubt that if we go on renting accommodation as we are doing to-day it will cost us much more in the end than if we purchased a building outright. By the purchase of the building we shall save in the way of rents. As pointed out by the minister in charge of the estimates (Mr. King, Kootenay) there will be economies the moment that the different departments are brought within one building. It is perfectly clear that offices scattered in four different parts of London, none of them in a position at all comparable to this, involve a great deal of waste both in money and time on the part of those engaged in public work in England on behalf of the Dominion and on the part of people who go over to transact business there. The government have gone into this matter very carefully and if we were not convinced that it would make for economy in the long run we would not venture at this time to make the purchase. I think I have given to the House reasons sufficient to show why the chance we have now or a similar chance might not come again. I intimated first of all that a site of this kind is not always available. An hon. member said that the Morley's hotel was a much finer site. I do not know whether he heard me say that that building is to be destroyed; as a matter of fact it is being pulled down to afford a wider space at the entrance to the Strand. The moment that building is removed the value of the property we are acquiring will go up materially. One side of Trafalgar square, as hon. members may know, is occupied by the National Art Gallery, and on the other sides there are the main approaches of London, one down the Strand to the east of London, the other towards Westminster, and yet other approaches to the west of London. Altogether for our purposes there is not a finer site anywhere. An hon. member spoke about the greater part of the traffic being on the other side of the street. Well, that only makes the position of this building all the more advantageous. It is office accommodation that will be required, and it will be very much to the advantage of those who will occupy the building, as well as convenient to persons looking for it, not to be on the crowded side of the street. Moreover, it presents to persons searching for the offices a view of the building much more conspicuous than if the building were located on the congested side.

There is another feature of the situation which perhaps is worth noting. My hon. friend who spoke a moment ago (Mr. McMaster) is aware of the state in which London exchange has been in the last year, and I can say to the House on fairly good authority that so favourable has the exchange been towards us that having regard to our financial transactions in London we shall save enough out of the difference practically to pay the cost of purchase of the entire building. I have here a communication addressed to me from Mr. Larkin dated February 16, 1924. It is written from the office of the High Commissioner for Canada and reads:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

My dear Prime Minister,

Union Club

The enclosed is copy of a letter I have just received from Messrs. Charles Russell and Co., which speaks for itself.

Since the purchase of the building we have saved about $30,000 by not having to pay the money out, as exchange has dropped from 4.70 odd to 4.43, and I think it will come down further. Anyway, I think it would be worth while not sending the money over here until we need it which, as you will see, will be on the 25th of March next. The amount is as set forth in the letter to the Minister of Public Works dated 19th January.

This letter is signed by Mr. Larkin. He points out that since the purchase of the building there has been a saving of some $30,000; that is to say, since the time the option was taken. This is a factor that might be taken into consideration. I see my hon. friend shaking his head. Now, I do not urge it as a reason, but at least it is a consideration which I think might well appeal to hon. members. In any event the government is committeed to take this building and is prepared to stand or fall by it.

Mr. FORKE: I regret very much that the Prime Minister saw fit to make the statement with which he closed his remarks, that the government would stand or fall by the purchase of this building.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have to. We cannot be a government and enter into contracts which we are not prepared to carry out.

Mr. FORKE: Well, if the vote is taken I will vote against the item.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to make clear one or two points which I think the committee should take note of. First of all, there is absolutely no satisfactory evidence before the committee that the building will serve the purposes which it is alleged that it will, that is to say, accommodate the federal offices. That is not clear to me, nor has it been made clear. There is another point. We shall pay $36,000 more per annum than we are paying for the existing accommodation. Again, this is a case where the money is going out of the country and is not serving to relieve in any way distressed people in Canada. The Prime Minister tells us that we shall save rents. I do not think we shall; I rather think that this will add to the present cost.

Mr. CARROLL: What is your evidence of that?

Mr. STEVENS: The evidence of the Minister of Public Works, for whatever it is worth.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) is of the opinion that the federal offices will not be accommodated, but that is merely a repetition of statements that have no foundation in fact. The High Commissioner advises us to the contrary. As regards the question whether the dominion government should allow its present offices in London to remain scattered or should consolidate them in a proper building, I do not think it will be disputed that it would be in the financial interests of the country to take the step which is proposed, and I am satisfied that the people of Canada will approve of the action of the government on the ground that it is desirable that we should have proper quarters in London.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are some particulars which I still desire and which the minister has failed to give to the committee. Before I ask for them however I should like to emphasize this fact. The minister should never have come for a vote of this magnitude without being able to demonstrate by actual facts which were easily at his disposal that there is enough space in this building to take care of the offices which at present occupy the various other buildings. The minister cannot give us the space we occupy, or the space we require; all he can give us is a hope of Mr. Larkin's that everything will come out all right. There is no evidence that Mr. Larkin has measured the space; he has looked at the building and he thinks that if he gets it it will provide the necessary accommodation. He does not know what the office requirements are in regard to immigration, or pensions or any other branches, but apparently he has an idea that if he can acquire this building he will be able to crowd these offices into it. That is really what he has told the minister in effect. Is not that simply a pig in a poke? When does the government's ground rent agreement run out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Thirty-nine years under the £2,000 a year; with the extension of the lease the term will be ninety-nine or one hundred years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: More?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, sixty years more.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I know. But if the government took over merely the present lease it would run for thirty-nine years. Is the minister sure it is thirty-nine and not twenty-nine?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is thirty-nine years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, as I understand it, a new lease has been made for ninety-nine or one hundred years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A lease will be made, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What will be the rent then?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The rent will be £2,855.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For ninety-nine years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the government any information at all as to when the term expires for the building next door, the College of Surgeons' headquarters?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is freehold. It is held on a peppercorn lease.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is held on a nine hundred and ninety-nine year lease.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there not a rent of so much a year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A penny a year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So the freehold really has to be purchased, that is what it amounts to, and all that possibly exists there is the hope that it can be bought; there cannot be anything else.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Crown holds the fee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know but the Crown does not own the building. The building has to be purchased from the present tenants. So all we have got is this one building which, according to the hope of Mr. Larkin, will hold only our own federal offices, but which the government has not any data assuring us that it will. The government has signed a contract and bound the honour of Canada—this government that has been boasting for months that they took no steps to bind the country without the authority of parliament.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is an option.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the option need not be taken up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We would lose the deposit we have paid.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A small amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a new feature altogether. We ought to know the amount of the deposit.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A hundred pounds has been paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are pretty hard up if we cannot afford to lose one hundred pounds. Although the government's existence is not worth a great deal, surely they should not stake it on a hundred pounds! All we have at stake is a hundred pounds; the honour of the country, I am told now, is not bound at all. So hon. members can surely see themselves free to save this dive into the dark for the purchase of a building that at best is not going to be any great credit to us. Certainly it is not going to serve the purposes we have had in mind for years, and its purchase will alienate from Canada $1,300,000 in a year that is perhaps the worst in decades in which to send money out of the country.

Mr. BOYS: When does the option expire?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): On the 25th March —to-day.

Mr. BOYS: Then it is no longer an option. If it expires to-day, and has not been accepted, the opportunity of getting this building is gone.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BOYS: If the option has been accepted, then I presume we are bound and the honour of the country is at stake. Has the option been accepted?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, we carry on for the time being at a 5 per cent interest rate.

Mr. BOYS: I do not know what the minister means by saying, "We carry on". Has the option been accepted?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The High Commissioner has accepted the option.

Mr. BOYS: There should not be any mystery about this. It is a very simple proposition. We are told there is an option, and that it expires to-day. If an order in council has been put through authorizing the acceptance of the option, when was it signed? If it has not been signed, the country is not liable at all and our rights will be gone in about twenty-three minutes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The option has already expired.

Mr. BOYS: Yes. That may raise the question whether the time is up in Canada or in London.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Dominion government paid one hundred pounds as a deposit on the purchase price at the time of the signing of the agreement, and the balance of $1,224,900 is payable on the 25th day of March 1924. That is the situation apparently, and if the balance of the purchase price is not paid on the 25th March instant, interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum is to be paid the vendor.

Mr. BOYS: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be too positive about anything I have not seen, but if I may draw what seems to be a natural deduction from what the minister has just read, it looks to me as if it never was an option. What is it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Really an agreement to purchase—the same thing.

Mr. BOYS: Then why are we told it is an option one minute and an agreement the next?

Mr. STEVENS: I notice in the letter read by the right hon. Prime Minister that the High Commissioner advised that the money should not be sent forward until March 25th. Has it been remitted to London?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, certainly not.

Mr. STEVENS: The money has not been sent forward?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. DOUCET: Although I have been following the debate pretty closely, I am yet without certain information. First, we are told that we have an agreement to purchase, then that we have an option. It seems to me that this obscurity should be cleared up for the benefit of the committee. It is either an option or an agreement to purchase. I would ask the minister not to press this vote until he has given the committee the floor space of this building with the addition contemplated, and the floor space of the four buildings now occupied as Canadian offices in London. Only then will we be in a position to say whether this proposed building will be sufficiently large to accommodate our offices. Up to now we have nothing to rely on but the hope of the High Commissioner that the building will afford the necessary accommodation. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) seems to be in possession of valuable information as to the location of the building in question, much more possibly than that possessed by many hon. members who have already spoken and who have advised as to the necessity of hurrying forward the purchase. Before any hon. member can give an intelligent vote upon this enormous expenditure of $1,300,000—at a time when we are all preaching, and wish to practise, economy—we must have the information called for this evening.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems to me that we are in danger of overlooking what is actually a very grave departure from proper practice in connection with this transaction. Does anybody know the date of the order in council under which the contract was made? Does anybody know under what pretended authority the country was committed to a contract involving the expenditure of this large sum of money without the slightest expression of opinion from parliament? I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), what is the legal justification for this alleged contract? Can he tell me? He cannot, simply because there is not any. And this from the party that was going to be so very constitutional, the party which was going to do nothing of which parliament did not first approve—this party pledged the honour of the country and themselves without the slightest parliamentary authority. And it is not as if this were the only case of its kind. We were given an illustration of it last session when we had the case of the Scribe hotel; and here we have another purchase apparently without the slightest authority. If there is any, can we get it? Is the cabinet absolutely dumb? I would like to refer them to their own protestations, to what they themselves said hundreds of times when they were on this side. I would refer them to some of the utterances of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister about autocracy, about the usurpation of power, the responsibilities of government, the rights of the people, control by parliament, and the iniquities of orders in council. Yet here we have these very same gentlemen apparently ready to spend over a million dollars absolutely without authority. I am going to ask again—perhaps I can get an answer this time—what is the date of the order in council authorizing this agreement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has spoken about consulting parliament in the matter. If he will take the trouble to refer to the debates of last session he will find that when the estimates of the High Commissioner's office were before the House I referred to the necessity of our purchasing a building in London. The matter was discussed, and the occasion was alluded to by two or three speakers this evening who mentioned that at that time it was intimated that we were going to get a much larger building. If the House had any objection to the purchase being made, that was the time the objection should have been offered. The matter was brought forward purposely at that time in order that the High Commissioner might receive instructions whether he should proceed with the negotiations which, as I mentioned to the House at the time, were in progress. Having brought the matter up in the House and having had it discussed here, the government instructed the High Commissioner to proceed with the negotiations. As I think I mentioned on that occasion, it was not advisable to have undue publicity in connection with the effort to obtain particular buildings; that if they were to be purchased at a satisfactory price it would not be wise to advertise the circumstances too freely to intending vendors. The whole matter was discussed in the House last session, and the government certainly took it from the discussion that the members of the House were in favour of the purchase of a building in London; indeed, the expressions of opinion given were practically all to that effect. The High Commissioner was instructed to go ahead with the negotiations. He kept the government fully informed, step by step, of what he was doing. The government authorized him to enter into an agreement which would give us the right to obtain this property. We have not yet put through an order in council acquiring the property, but one will be passed as soon as this amount is voted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my right hon. friend is not serious when he says he has no authority for the making of this contract. There was talk about purchasing something—it might have been about the purchase of anything. There was no vote, there was nothing which anyone coming into this House for the first time in his life could refer to as an authority for anything. So we now learn that Mr. Larkin was instructed to sign the contract; it is a contract which Mr. Larkin has entered into on the authority of instructions of the government. How did the instructions get to Mr. Larkin? Which department looks after that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Department of Public Works.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that there has ever been a precedent for this situation in the history of this parliament. It is apparent from the confessions of the government, although some of the confessions are wholly contradictory to others previously made, that they have actually a contract signed, an absolutely binding contract under which this country undertakes to pay $1,300,000 in England. I do not think a member of the government dares to get up and dispute that. That is the position we find ourselves in to-night—not even a contract in which there is a clause making it subject to the vote of parliament and thereby relieving us of damages in the event of the vote not being taken. And the Prime Minister says, "We have authority to do it, because I mentioned it a year ago; because I said we were thinking of buying a building somewhere in London." This is the responsibile government for which the battle was fought in 1921. Let us all be careful; let us listen to every word that falls from the lips of the Prime Minister and from every member of the government; for if they venture to express the hope that some day we will own something we may expect the next year to find ourselves bound hand and foot and the money practically sent over. Really I cannot conceive of a member of a government making a plea of that kind before an intelligent committee. Talk about responsible government! Certainly a government must make contracts. Sometimes it is bound to do so in emergencies; sometimes it even has to call in the aid of Governor General's warrants. But in a case of that kind it makes its contract subject to the will of parliament. It does not come to parliament and say, we are tied hand and foot and we have either got to stand or fall—and "O, what a fall was there, my countrymen!" if this government actually fell. The government has no sense of its responsibilities when it ties the hands of this parliament, making us mere automatons, putting us in a position where we have no say at all, binding us to an investment overseas in respect of which not a single member of parliament outside the government had the faintest knowledge and with regard to which we have mighty little knowledge even yet. That is the position the committee finds itself in now, landed there by a government elected to restore —mark the word—to restore responsible government in Canada, to gather the shattered remnants—

Mr. JACOBS: We have not yet spent five million dollars on graving docks to elect a minister of the Crown.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not think you have spent $5,000,000 on graving docks, but you are spending it as fast as you can on that graving dock, and your minister says you should have spent it sooner.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. JACOBS: That dock only elected a member of the government which was in office for but a few months.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and the Minister of Public Works censured us a year ago because we had not gone ahead with it sooner, declared that we had thereby lost a lot of business for Canada, declared that was the only fault he could find with it. However, we had better not get slid off into a graving dock. Whatever we did we had the authority of parliament for, and I would like to see the authority of parliament produced for this.

Mr. JACOBS: We are getting it now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the purchase is made. That is the hon. member's idea of responsible government—have ourselves bound with chains and then told, you have to do it, the honour of the country is bound, and all you are here for is to do it; and the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) is slave enough to come right up to the mark and do it.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman and his cohorts have the right to vote against it now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And anyone who has some real interest in responsible government is likely to do so, but those who talk the loudest about it trifle with it the freest. We have a beautiful illustration of that to-night. We did not know until we arrived on the scene that we were in this position.

Mr. HEALY: May I ask a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the hon. member for "Belle River" is here.

Mr. HEALY: More rude than clever! Might I be permitted to ask the right hon. leader of the opposition a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. HEALY: Had the vote passed the House and the contract been entered into, what would have been the attitude of the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not have needed to take an attitude. If the vote had passed the House they would not be back here for another. There was an instance like this once before, and I will remind hon. members when it was. It was when another government that doubtless boasted of its sense of responsibile government tied us hand and foot to a railway running into the Yukon territory, tied us to a railway contract in which there was no clause exempting us in the event of the money not being voted by parliament. Parliament refused to pass the vote, and parliament was mulcted in damages to the extent, if I remember correctly, of about $12,000,000.

Mr. PARENT: Does the right hon. gentleman not remember another case when he was in power, when the Quebec and Saguenay railway was bought before parliament was ever consulted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Never; not at all. The hon. member's memory is very weak. There was nothing done there except it was expressly stated to be subject to the vote of parliament.

Mr. PARENT: But the contract had been entered into.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That clause left parliament free. Is parliament free to-night?

Mr. PARENT: Undoubtedly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Free? When the minister tells us there is an absolutely binding contract and that the country will have to pay damages if the money is not voted, and we are liable to specific performance? That is the position we are in to-night.

Mr. JACOBS: Where does the hon. gentleman get his law for that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I get it principally from the fountains of common sense.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member thinks law and common sense are one and the same thing, and he is a lawyer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My sense of law is common sense; I am afraid the hon. member's sometimes is not. The position is this: If we are bound and there is no relieving clause making it subject to the vote of parliament, why are we not liable to specific performance?

Mr. JACOBS: Whom will they sue?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sue us unless we refuse a fiat, as the Minister of Justice did last session in the Marshall case. That is the only way we could get out of it, and it is not a very honourable way. Now we know the position we are in, and we know who have placed us in this position.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We have to-night the remarkable spectacle of the Prime Minister making the direct statement that this country is committed to the purchase of this property, and immediately afterwards the Minister of Public Works, under whose department this matter comes, informing the House that the country is not committed, that it has an option and the option is going to expire in about three minutes. Now we are given to understand that the functions of this parliament are simply to ratify what the government does. This is their sense of responsible government which we have heard so very much about. We all remember how the Prime Minister and those associated with him toured this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific a short time ago denouncing the autocracy of hon. members who now occupy this side of the House. If ever there was a clear case of autocracy and of contempt for parliament it is exhibited in the action of the government in this matter. I am surprised that certain members of the government can sit in their seats and listen to the directly contradictory statements that have been made by their colleagues and expect parliament to vote this $1,300,000 through without any further discussion.

12 midnight

We have heard arguments advanced why this vote should be passed. The Prime Minister himself admits that the property is not a desirable one unless the property adjoining it can be secured at some time in the future, and he has no assurance that it can be secured. He has not been able to show the House that it can be secured. We have heard the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) telling the House that it is going to be a good investment. You would think that this government were annoyed with all the money they have on their hands for investment, and that they had no idea what to do with it. We have been told that it is going to be a great advertisement for Canada, that there are many people over in the Old Land who have not heard of Canada, but who when they see this building in the middle of London will be coming out here by the thousands. Immigration is going to be furthered, we are told, by this purchase. I notice that the estimates for Immigration and Colonization this year are $2,000,000 more than the estimates for the same purpose in 1921-1922. We are dealing in millions to-day as we used to deal with thousands formerly. Have the government lost all sense of the position of this country at the present time? Have they forgotten about the enormous deficits which have daily to be met? I quite agree with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that it is our duty to pare down to the bone everything that can possibly be pared. We must cut expenses as fine as we possibly can.

In view of what happened with regard to the item for $600,000 which was put through the House a few hours ago, I should not be at all surprised if the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), after a night's rest, would vote a different way from what he has intimated to-night. He did that on the $600,000 item, and will probably do it again.

Mr. FORKE: I challenge the hon. member's statement that I voted differently from what I said I would do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I understood the hon. member to say that if he was going to vote on this he was going to vote against it.

Mr. FORKE: I want your ruling, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member said that I voted differently from what I said I would do on the $600,000 item. I never made the statement that I would vote against that item.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I may be a little in error in that. I think the hon. gentleman intimated that he would support a vote to reduce the item by $100,000, as I think Hansard will show; but he could not support a motion to reduce it by $75,000 or $50,000.

Mr. FORKE: I made the statement that the government might reduce it by $100,000, but I never made the statement that I would not vote for the $600,000 item.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We have extracted, practically with a corkscrew, so much information from the government during the last hour that if the matter stands over for another day we may be able to get some more information regarding it. If this option was to expire to-night it shows why the government are so anxious to have this vote pass, the first item of the estimates they introduced into the House. Why were the government not frank? Why did they not inform us that an option had been secured on this property, and that it would expire at a certain time? But we have the assurance of the Prime Minister that the government are committed to this enterprise absolutely, and all that parliament is called upon to do is to vote the money. Is that treating parliament as it should be treated? Is the function of parliament merely to ratify what the government bring forward, even though the House is in session and has a right to be informed of all that has transpired? And the Minister of Public Works informs us that the option expires on the 25th March. Who are we to believe, the Prime Minister or the Minister of Public Works? One or the other is not correct in his statements. Consequently I say we are entitled to have the contract in this matter placed before us so that we may ascertain the facts. If we cannot take the word of members of the government in regard to a subject of this kind, we ought to have in our possession the document under which the country is committed to the expenditure before we pass this vote.

Mr. MacLAREN: Coming back to a question we discussed earlier in the evening, namely the facilities for gathering round this building the various provincial offices, I should like to ask what is the size of the adjoining lot, the lot occupied, I think, by the building of the College of Physicians. I have been in that building and my recollection of it is that the lot is not a large one. I should like to have information on that point if the minister is in a position to give it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the dimensions of the adjoining lot. Some hon. members who have seen the building may be able to give that information.

Mr. MacLAREN: I did not hear the minister, will he please repeat his statement?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I say I have not the extent of the adjoining lot, that information is not here.

Mr. MacLAREN: Well, that is a very important omission. If it is a small lot it will not be sufficiently large to permit the grouping of the various provincial offices of the Dominion and that, I believe, would cause profound disappointment in the country. I should like to have a clear understanding of the question as it stands. Has this property been bought or is it under option?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is an agreement to purchase.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the sale is not completed by March 25, what will happen then? Will the sale be off or are we still liable?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have agreed to buy.

Mr. BOYS: There are two or three matters I should like to submit. In the first place I can hardly think the minister, or the government, will want to put this item through without supplying some needed information. I think it will be admitted by everybody that we have a somewhat unusual situation in connection with this property. I am going to assume now that what we have is an agreement; if I am wrong I may be corrected. I think we ought to know the date of it, and who signed it. I presume the minister has a copy of the agreement before him, and I certainly should like to see it. I should also like to see who signed the document on behalf of Canada. Further I should like to find out who sent the authority to London, if it was sent there, for the completion of this agreement. I presume, in the first instance that some person on behalf of the department, or the government, had an investigation made regarding this building, and the terms upon which it could be purchased. I also presume that information was sent over and was duly considered. I understand there was no order in council passed. Was there even a letter signed by the minister, or by any responsible person on behalf of the government, authorizing the closing of this contract? Now, who signed it pursuant to that letter, and under what authority? I think before we are asked to pass an item involving $1,300,000 we are entitled to this information. If it cannot be given now—the minister I see nods his head so I will be pleased to sit down in order to get the information. If there is no objection I should like very much if the minister would be good enough to let a copy of the agreement, or the agreement itself, be passed over here for us to look at.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was an agreement signed on the 26th June, 1923, between Charles Drummond, 49 Charing Cross, and General Sir William Henry Mackinnon, Sir Bertram Blakiston Cubitt, and Sir Lawrence Edward Halsey, on behalf of the trustees of the Union Club, and the Hon. Peter Charles Larkin, High Commissioner, on behalf of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the date?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The date was 26th June, 1923.

Mr. BOYS: I appreciate that information which answers my question as far as it goes. But the minister has not given me any information regarding the nature of the authority sent to Mr. Larkin to sign the agreement on behalf of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen opposite really wished to get the true position of the matter they would have ascertained from my remarks a moment ago that in a transaction of this kind it is necessary for the government to trust to some agent and to have the negotiations carried on as quietly as possible. If you are negotiating a purchase for the government it does not do to proclaim the matter from the house tops, it is necessary to trust your agent or your representative in matters of the kind. I mentioned that last session the government discussed in the House the intended purchase of a building in London. The building we were trying to acquire at the time, or that we thought of acquiring, was Cox's Bank, the price, however, was much higher than we expected. It would have been a building that would have accommodated the different provinces as well as the federal government. We found that a commission was being claimed by a certain party in London on the purchase of that building, and as soon as the High Commissioner learned that a commission was to be made by someone he immediately ended the negotiations without further discussion. He then continued to see what might be possible with respect to the Union Club; he had been negotiating with respect to different buildings. In case the Cox building should not be acquired he had been inquiring also about the Union Club building, He did not know whether we could get the Union Club building. In connection with the acquisition of the Union Club building, it was necessary to have arrangements made with the club itself involving the taking of a vote on the part of the members whether they would dispose of the Club building. Matters of that kind rendered necessary the giving of some assurance on the part of the government that the building would be acquired subsequently, and the government authorized Mr. Larkin to proceed with the negotiations, to keep us informed as to the price at which the building could be obtained, and he would receive further advice as the government got additional particulars. At each step of the negotiations, Mr. Larkin kept the government informed by cable and he received his replies by cable. He made the agreement for the purchase. He is the High Commissioner for Canada. If any government official is entitled to the confidence of the government and the country, it is surely the High Commissioner of this country in England. If there is one business man above another who has had experience in large transactions of the kind and who knows values in the matter of the purchase of a building, that person is the Hon. Mr. Larkin. The government had entire confidence in his judgment, business ability and acumen in this matter, and we therefore entrusted him to make what was necessary in the way of agreements to secure the purchase of the building.

Mr. CLARK: I have one observation to make on the Prime Minister's remarks. The government knowing that Mr. Larkin was going to purchase this building, knowing that he had been authorized to purchase and knowing that he had actually signed a contract to purchase it, before the House prorogued last session, it seems a remarkable thing to me that the Prime Minister did not take the House into his confidence and tell us that a contract had been entered into.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I answer my hon. friend right there? I think I said a moment ago that, in a transaction of this kind, several stages were necessary. Before Mr. Larkin could get the Union Club to vote on the question whether they would move to some other premises or not, he had to give some assurance that the building would be taken by the country if it were disposed of. That vote had not been taken while parliament was in session; if my recollection is correct, it was some little time before the matter was finally concluded.

Mr. CLARK: It appears from the date the minister gave us the contract was actually signed on the 26th June before the House prorogued.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No contract was signed. There was an agreement that the building would be purchased.

Mr. CLARK: An agreement is a contract and Canada was committed before the House prorogued, according to the information the House has in its possession now. If Canada was committed to an expenditure of $1,300,000, I still submit it is an extraordinary thing that the House was not so informed before it rose last session. Knowing the Prime Minister's declared policy, in regard to forcing votes or measures through this House without due consideration, I am sure he will be the last one to attempt to force this vote through to-night. Knowing also his distaste for sitting in the early hours of the morning, and knowing the great desire of our Progressive friends, who have all gone home, except eleven, to vote on any measures which will save the country—

Mr. McBRIDE: I would like to call the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Clark) to the fact that on one occasion I took the count in this chamber only two of his bunch were present.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the tables are turned to-night. I will venture to say that on that occasion a million dollars were not at stake.

Mr. IRVINE: Let me point out that the Labour party is present in full force.

Mr. CLARK: In fairness to my hon. friends to my left who, I understand, are great economists and whose great ambition it is to see the expenditures of this country cut, I think proper opportunity should be given to them to gather here, to express their views on this subject and to vote. Therefore, I will move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. HANSON: In view of the last remark made by the Prime Minister, I should like to ask him if we are in this position with regard to this purchase. Is it true that on the 26th day of June last the Hon. Mr. Larkin bound Canada to a contract for the purchase of this building, and that in that contract is contained a clause that it was subject to the ratification of members of the Union Club, but not subject to the ratification of parliament?

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that there is a motion that the committee rise and report progress, a motion which is not debatable, and a vote must be taken on it.

Motion (Mr. Clark) negatived: Yeas, 30; Nays, 62.

Mr. HANSON: I should like to repeat the question which I put to the Prime Minister and which you ruled was out of order a few minutes ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think hon. members will hardly expect me to be able to remember what took place on one particular day, the 26th or 29th or other specific day of the month.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The contract is here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why cannot the contract be read?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have in my hand Hansard of last year which will show that the matter was being discussed at the time and what was under discussion. I read this at page 4630 of the House of Commons Debates:

Mr. Meighen: Has the government taken an option for the purchase of a building in London.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Not that I am aware of. As I said before my right hon. friend came in, negotiations were under way for the possible acquisition of the Cox Bank building. Those negotiations have been dropped, however, and I think the High Commissioner is at present considering the possibility of securing another building, but has not taken any official action upon it.

Mr. Meighen: No option has been secured?

Mr. Mackenzie King: I cannot say that an option has not been secured. I think the High Commissioner has arranged that at any rate before a certain building is disposed of he will be given the refusal of it. More than that I cannot say.

That was the Union Club building that I was referring to. I am reading from Hansard of June 29, 1923:

Mr. Baxter: Sir Henry Thornton may possibly have bought a castle or two in London, and perhaps the thing may come in that way.

Mr. Ross (Kingston): May I ask whether the question will be considered of assembling all the Canadian offices in London? It seems too bad that the Ontario office should be in the Strand, the British Columbia offices in Pall Mall, and the High Commissioner's office in Victoria street. In the Strand one finds practically all the Australian offices combined in one building, the result being splendid advertisement for Australia. It struck me as being too bad that a similar situation could not be created for Canada.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I am glad my hon. friend asked that question because he has reminded me of the fact that last year we tried to acquire the British Columbia building. The federal government would have been prepared to take that building over had the British Columbia government been willing to part with it, but they have found that in that large building, which is so favourably located, they have an excellent investment; as a matter of fact I think they are making money on it. The present situation is that Canada has a much inferior building to that maintained in London by one of its provinces. The federal government rents part of the British Columbia building for offices connected with immigration work. The government has felt that Canada has been handicapped as compared with the other dominions in having its offices scattered about in various buildings throughout London—not only the offices of the different provinces, but the different federal offices that were created during the war. The office which has to do with the soldiers' overseas work is in one part of the city. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has offices for his agents in another part of the city. The immigration offices are in still another part and the High Commissioner's offices are elsewhere. We felt that it was desirable to acquire a building in which all these offices could be brought together and which would be large enough also to accommodate the representatives of the different provinces, but that kind of a building in London is not easily acquired, and rather than make a purchase which would not meet with the general approval of the country we have proceeded slowly in the matter. But the object is to do the very thing my hon. friend has said—to acquire a building that will serve all these purposes in a way that will reflect credit on the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was three days after the contract was signed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The contract was not signed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The committee will see the difficulty we are in. One moment we are told that the contract was signed on the 26th and now the Prime Minister says that on the 29th the contract was not signed. We are trying to get at the truth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me quote again from the same page:

Mr. Meighen: No option has been secured?

Mr. Mackenzie King: I cannot say that an option has not been secured. I think the High Commissioner has arranged that at any rate before a certain building is disposed of he will be given the refusal of it. More than that I cannot say.

More than that I could not say then, because I had not the knowledge. These matters were under negotiation in the way I have indicated. My point is that the matter was discussed in a frank, open manner, and in view of the fact that the government having tried the year before to purchase the British Columbia building, but without success, and then having endeavoured to secure the Cox building, it was the duty of hon. gentlemen at that time, if they considered that we were not proceeding in the right way, to have said so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps it would help matters considerably if we could see the contract. What mystery is there about the contract? We asked for its production an hour ago and while hon. gentlemen opposite have been reading it we have not been able so far on this side to see it. Why cannot it be produced?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have a fine exhibition to-night of the authority of parliament. The Prime Minister was asked a year ago whether an option had been secured and he answered, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not answer, "no". Please tell the truth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister is getting excited.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. The Prime Minister is by no means excited, but he has the right to ask any hon. member, not to say the leader of a party, to stick to the truth.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is hard for him to do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me read what the Prime Minister said. I asked the following question:

Mr. Meighen: Has the government taken an option for the purchase of a building in London?

Mr. Mackenzie King: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let my hon. friend read further down:

Mr. Meighen: No option has been secured?

Mr. Mackenzie King: I cannot say that an option has not been secured.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Apparently the Prime Minister has two or three ways of answering a question, but it does not matter a fig what particular words he uses.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see that there is much reason for the hilarity of hon. gentlemen opposite—evidently a million dollars does not matter much to them. The question was asked whether an option had been secured, and it does not matter whether the Prime Minister answered yes or no, or whether he said, "I do not know," or "I am not aware." It does not matter at all, because we have the sense of his answer. He goes on to say that there were negotiations in regard to the British Columbia building, and so on, and that because he had talked in that frank, open way, therefore there was the authority of parliament to go ahead. Now this is seriously addressed to people who are supposed to be intelligent. I would not say that it was wrong for the government to negotiate for a building, but they could have come last session and asked for a vote. It would not have injured them in the least in their negotiations had they done so. Or they could have done something else in regard to which very little criticism could have been offered: they could have secured an option which could have been subject to approval by parliament. They could have done any of these things. They had no authority to do any of them, but there would have been no great criticism, because such things are frequently done. But this government has tied parliament hand and foot.

Mr. JACOBS: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let us see the contract.

Mr. JACOBS: Parliament is not bound by the contract. Until parliament votes the money the contract is not worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The money cannot be paid until parliament votes it, but the binding is there. Does the hon. member mean to say that parliament cannot be bound, and the honour of Canada bound, if the contract is not observed?

Mr. JACOBS: That contract was made subject to the money being voted by parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that stated in the contract?

Mr. JACOBS: That is the law, and my hon. friend knows that it is not necessary to mention it in the contract.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it was necessary in the Yukon case.

Mr. JACOBS: We are not talking about the Yukon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am.

Mr. JACOBS: We are not discussing a post mortem.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that this country had to pay damages in that case; a government which my hon. friend supported paid damages just because there was no relief. But is it not remarkable that we cannot have a look at the contract? The honour of Canada is bound in this matter and the government has virtually admitted over and over again that the excuse is that there was some talk by the Prime Minister last session about the wisdom of getting a building. That is his authority to go ahead. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very much interested in the contract. One after another reads it, but hon. members on this side of the House are not allowed to see it. Why can it not go on Hansard to-night? Surely the people's representatives have a right to see just what the contract is.

Mr. McMASTER: If the contract is to be read at all let it be read audibly.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is the document:

An agreement made the 26th day of June, 1923, between Charles Drummond of 49 Charing Cross in the County of London, Esquire, General Sir William Henry Mackinnon, of 15 Ovington Square, in the county of London, G.C.B., K.C.V.O., Sir Bertram Blakiston Cubitt of the War Office, Whitehall, in the county of London, K.C.B., and Sir Laurence Edward Halsey, of 64 Elm Park Gardens, Chelsea, in the county of London, K.B.E., the Trustees acting for and on behalf of The Union Club (hereinafter called "the Vendors") of the one part and The Honourable Peter Charles Larkin, P.C., High Commissioner for Canada, 19 Victoria Street, in the county of London, acting for and on behalf of the Canadian government (hereinafter called "the Purchaser") of the other part

Whereby it is agreed as follows:—

1. The Vendors agree to sell and the Purchaser agrees to purchase for the sum of £225,000 all that piece of leasehold land situate in the Parish of St. Martin, in the Fields, in the county of London and being on the west side of Trafalgar Square, together with the messuage and buildings erected thereon and known as the Union Club House as the same is held under a Crown lease dated the 6th day of June, 1904, and made between the late King's Most Excellent Majesty of the first part, John Francis Fortescue Horner, the Commissioner of His Majesty's Woods of the second part, and the said Charles Drummond and others, the then Trustees of the Union Club of the third part for the residue of the term of 60 years from the 5th day of January, 1903, at the yearly rent of £2,000 and subject to the covenants on the part of the Lessee and conditions therein contained.

2. The Purchaser having this day paid to the Vendors the sum of £100 as a deposit and in part payment of his purchase money on the 25th day of March, 1924 (or on such earlier day as the Vendors may by not less than 21 days previous notice in writing to the Purchaser state that they can give him vacant possession) at the office Number 1 Bedford Row, London, of Messrs. Rawle Johnstone and Company, the Solicitors of the Vendors at which time (whichever be the earlier date) and place the purchase shall be completed and the Purchaser paying the balance of his purchase money shall as from that day be let into possession and pay all outgoings and discharge all liabilities of the Vendors under the Lease and up to that day all rent rates, taxes and other outgoings and liabilities except any liability for outside painting (the cost of which shall fall upon the Purchaser) shall (if necessary) be apportioned and the balance shall be paid by or allowed to the Purchaser on completion and if from any cause whatever other than wilful default on the part of the Vendors the completion of the purchase is delayed beyond the day fixed for completion the balance of the purchase money shall bear interest at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from that day to the day of actual payment thereof Vacant possession shall be given to the Purchaser not later than the 25th day of March, 1924, but the Vendors will give such possession on the earliest date reasonably possible Provided that if the Vendors shall be unable to give vacant possession to the Purchaser on the said 25th day of March, 1924, the Purchaser at his option may give notice in writing to the Vendors that unless vacant possession is given within 21 days from the date of the notice the Purchaser will rescind this Agreement in which case the Vendors shall within one week thereafter repay to the Purchaser his deposit money which shall be accepted by him in satisfaction of all claims on any account whatever and the Purchaser shall return forthwith all abstracts and papers in his possession belonging to the Vendors.

3. The Purchaser shall within fourteen days after delivery of his Abstract send to the said Messrs. Rawle Johnstone and Company a statement in writing of all the objections and requisitions (if any) to or on the title or evidence of title or the abstract or this agreement and subject thereto the title shall be deemed accepted and all objections and requisitions not included in any statement sent within the time aforesaid shall be deemed waived and an abstract though in fact imperfect shall be deemed perfect except for the purpose of any further objections or requisitions which could not be taken or made on the information therein contained and an answer to any objection or requisition shall be replied to in writing within ten days after the delivery thereof and if not so replied to shall be considered satisfactory and time shall be deemed in all respects as of the essence of this clause. If the Purchaser should take any objection or make any requisition which the Vendors are unable or on the ground of expense unwilling to remove or comply with and the Purchaser should not withdraw such objection or requisition within ten days after being required so to do the Vendors may by notice in writing delivered to the Purchaser or his Solicitor and notwithstanding any intermediate negotiation or litigation rescind this Agreement and shall within one week after such notice repay to the Purchaser his deposit money and the Purchaser shall return forthwith all abstracts and papers in his possession belonging to the Vendors and shall not make any claim on the Vendors for costs or otherwise.

4. The Vendors are the registered Proprietors under the Land Transfer Acts 1875 and 1897 with a good leasehold title. The Purchaser shall be entitled to a copy of the subsisting entries on the Register relating to the property and to a copy of or sufficient extract from the field plan and to a copy or Abstract of the said Lease and of any documents of title prior to the Land Certificate and the Vendors will give to the Purchaser an authority in writing to inspect the Register. The said Lease under which the property is held or a copy thereof having been already produced to the Purchaser's Solicitor the Purchaser shall be deemed to purchase with full notice of the contents thereof and of the state of the property as to repairs insurance party walls and all other matters.

5. The statutory declaration to which the purchaser is entitled under section 16 of the Land Transfer Act 1897 as regards matters declared by the Acts not to be incumbrances shall be prepared by and at the expense of the purchaser.

6. The receipt for the last rent accrued due previously to the date fixed for the completion of the purchase in respect of the property shall unless the contrary shall appear on the face thereof be accepted as conclusive evidence of the performance and observance of all the covenants and conditions in the lease under which the same is held or of the effectual waiver of any breach (whether continuing or not) of any covenant or condition up to the actual completion of the purchase without proof being required of the title or authority of the person giving such receipt.

7. Upon payment of the balance of the said purchase money at the time and place aforesaid the Vendors will execute to the Purchaser a proper Transfer of the property and at the same time deliver to him the Land Certificate and lease. The transfer shall be prepared by and at the expense of the purchaser and shall be left at the office aforesaid for execution by the Vendors not less than ten days before the day appointed for completion. The Vendors being Trustees will give only the usual implied covenant against incumbrances.

This agreement is conditional on the consent of the Ground Landlord (if any such consent is necessary) being obtained to the assignment and on a resolution being duly passed by the members of the Union Club at an extraordinary general meeting to be held on the 12th day of July 1923 approving this present sale and on the Vendors or the purchasers obtaining from the Ground Landlord his license to enable the Canadian government to carry on its business upon the said premises. And if consent is not obtained or such resolution is not passed within 3 calendar months from the date hereof or such extended period as the purchaser shall consent to or if from any cause other than the default of the purchaser such license shall not be granted by the Ground Landlord before the day fixed for completion this agreement shall be void and in that event the Vendors shall forthwith repay to the purchaser his deposit money which shall be accepted by him in satisfaction of all claims on any account whatever. A certificate signed by the Secretary of the club certifying whether or not such a resolution as aforesaid has been passed shall be accepted as sufficient evidence of the fact and of the fact that the meeting at which the resolution was submitted was duly convened and if passed that the same was duly passed.

9. The purchaser shall comply with any conditions required by the Ground Landlord to enable the Vendors to obtain the said license including the preparation of plans and specifications if required and shall pay all sums payable to the Ground Landlord in respect of the said license in excess of £21.

As witness the hands of the parties the day and year first above written.

Signed by the said Charles Drummond in the presence of T. R. Johnson.

That is the agreement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is to be observed, Mr. Chairman, the fidelity with which the trustees of the Union Club discharged their trust, it is to be observed that they took very good care that their shareholders were to have the opportunity of saying whether they liked the contract or not, and this is all the more noticeable when we observe the absolute failure on the part of our representatives to incorporate a similar provision for securing the approval of the parliament of Canada. The case is worse than where there has been an ordinary overriding of parliament, because not even ignorance can be pleaded here. You have gentlemen on the one side who are looking after the people whom they represent and are making sure that their rights are protected, while no such degree of consideration is given in connection with Canada. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier said a good deal about the country not being bound. In one sense he is quite right, but in the other sense is there anything at all in what he says? There is an absolutely hard and fast, carefully drawn agreement which entirely binds the Canadian High Commissioner. Why the country is without any plea, the government is without any plea as against him. They told him to do it, so that the commissioner certainly is bound, and the government is in honour bound to make good any loss that he might suffer in connection with a transaction which he put through under their instructions. So we know what this contract is; it is exactly what was suggested before. I wonder if the Prime Minister thinks he should force a vote on this question now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I felt for one moment that hon. members had not had ample opportunity to discuss the matter I should certainly say that such further time should be granted as might be necessary for the purpose. I am very sincere when I say that the government is anxious to get on with the business of the country. We have spent a good deal of time over one or two items and we would like to get this estimate through to-night. I am not going to try to force it through, but I do submit that in the interests of the country, in the interests of economy, of which my hon. friends opposite have been speaking so much, it is desirable that the government should get the estimate through. The government will take the full responsibility for its action in this matter. This building could not have been acquired in any other way and the government, having all the circumstances before it, took the course which it believed to be in the public interest. My hon. friend says that the Union Club protected itself, and asks why some clause was not put in the agreement under which the parliament of Canada at such and such a time should exercise certain rights. If that clause had been put in, the agreement never could have been signed. There was just one chance of the government being able to secure that property, and it was a question of the government giving the High Commissioner the latitude which was necessary to enable him to make the purchase. We believed that the purchase would commend itself to the country, and knowing all the circumstances we felt that we were taking the right course in authorizing the High Commissioner to make the agreement that was entered into. If that agreement is not honoured certainly the country is not honouring its obligation. The government feels bound to stand by its obligation. As I say, we cannot be a government if we have no authority. If I had not discussed the matter fully last session and intimated what we were contemplating at that time, I would bow in a moment to what has been said about trying in any way to ignore parliament. But I submit that we have gone very fully into the matter; we have taken parliament into our confidence and have made a bargain which I believe the people of Canada will regard more and more as the years go by as one of the best investments which could have been made for the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend appeals to me on the ground of economy. If I answered him from the same point of view I would have to tell him frankly that the cheapest way out of this difficulty is to pay your damage and refuse the vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We need the building; we have no premises. My hon. friend forgets that the lease of the building we were in had expired, and that we had to rent temporary quarters in the meantime. These are all factors that bear on the situation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Could the lease not have been renewed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It could have been renewed for another seven or eight years, but it was thought unwise in the interests of Canada to renew a lease on Victoria street for that further period.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Could it not have been renewed for five years?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the Prime Minister intimated earlier in the discussion that it could.

Mr. MILLAR: There is one matter on which I would like some information, and it is information upon which my vote in the matter will depend. Could this property have been secured on an option.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: From what Mr. Larkin has told us I do not think the property could have been secured in any other way. I think he had to be in a position to assure the Union Club that the government would take the property if the membership of the club gave the executive permission to sell. That was the only way he could get it. The property being what and where it is, situated, as has been intimated to-night, on Trafalgar Square, the leasehold being from the Crown—taking all these facts into consideration, and having in mind that we were getting a site not for a day but for years and possibly centuries to come, the government felt justified in authorizing Mr. Larkin to proceed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was a copy of the contract—I mean a duplicate—handed over to the trustees of the Union Club at the time of execution?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I suppose so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister seeks to persuade us that the government simply had to proceed as it did; that otherwise a great chance might be lost forever; that we had to do it, though we had not the vote of parliament, though we had not the slightest semblance of authority. Well, it does seem to me that the correspondence that led up to what finally authorized the execution of an agreement on that basis should be brought down. I must admit for my part that it does not matter what the correspondence is, no government had the right to tie this country to an expenditure of that sort, placing the High Commissioner in a position where he had to put up every cent, having no authority from parliament to proceed. The government knew that the lease was expiring; if they felt it was a fearful thing to stay on in this place why did they not come last session and ask for a vote of parliament? That is the procedure that is followed every session. We may plan to erect a public building here or there, we do not know just on what site; a vote of parliament is asked for, and on that vote the government proceeds. In this case nothing is asked for at all; the government, in effect, affixes the seal of this Dominion to a contract involving the expenditure of a vast sum of money, and parliament is in the position of helplessly having to support it—except as regards those who want to protest against that method of carrying on the public business. I think we ought at least to have the correspondence, and further I think that every hon. member owes it to the country to record himself in this matter. We should not come to a decision to-night but rather at a time when hon. members can be present and record themselves yea or nay.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What was the date of the contract?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The twenty-sixth of June.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The House will remember that a year ago last November or December the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was in England; he had been at the conference in Geneva and was subsequently in London. While in London he took this matter up with the High Commissioner. The Minister of Finance was himself very strongly in favour of the purchase of the Grand Hotel, which is on the other side of Trafalgar Square, and that was one of the buildings which the government thought of acquiring. We found, however, that to purchase the Grand Hotel would mean an expenditure away out of consideration, and that project was not pursued any further The Minister of Finance, I think, is as careful of the honour of the country, of the responsibility of the Ministry to parliament, as any hon. member of this House has ever been or ever will be, and the Minister of Finance was present in the cabinet when all these transactions were discussed, was a party to the communications that were sent to Mr. Larkin, and I think he would have been the first had he thought it was in the public interest to disclose the fact that Canada was seeking to make this purchase, to have placed a sum in the estimates at the time .My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) asks why we did not put it in the estimates. He knows why we did not. We were trying to make the best bargain possible for this country, and if a cable despatch had gone from Canada to England that the Canadian government was appropriating $1,500,000 for the purchase of a building in London that would have ended in five minutes all the negotiations Mr. Larkin was making with any hope of getting a contract consummated at a reasonable figure. I ask hon. members as business men to concede to the government the right to proceed in these matters with the same degree of caution and in the same manner as they would proceed in their own private business transactions when carried on in a large way. If they are prepared to do that, I think they will agree that the government in this matter have had the public interests to the fore at every stage of the transaction.

As to the matter of bringing down correspondence there is no reason why all the correspondence should not be brought down, but unless hon. gentlemen are merely seeking to obstruct this vote there is no reason why it should not go through to-night. If there is anything in the correspondence or in the transaction for which the government should be condemned hon. members will have the rest of the session to bring in a resolution in regard to that, but I do submit that if we are to save the money of this country by getting through with the business of parliament, and we have spent a good part of the day on this one item already, it would be quite justifiable to have this vote go through to-night rather than have the matter held up further.

Mr. STEVENS: May I point out to the Prime Minister that any delay there has been was the result of the government not being frank with us. Let me give to him exactly what we were told when this discussion opened on Thursday. After reciting a lot of matter that was not germane to this immediate point the minister went on to say:

> Investigations were carried on in regard to that building but the price was considered higher than we were prepared to pay. Later on the High Commissioner suggested that the Union Club building could be secured, and this estimate is for the purpose of purchasing that building.

A very innocent remark, but why did not the minister produce the contract and tell us exactly what the Prime Minister has told us in the last half hour or so. If he had done so, I venture to say there would have been far less discussion, whatever our views may have been. It has not been by obstruction but only by persistent cross-examination that we have been able to get the information that should have been produced by the government without a question being asked as soon as the vote was called. This information and this contract should have been before parliament at that time and the Prime Minister must bear me out in this, that it is only by the most persistent cross-examination that we have been able to obtain only the most ordinary information that is given upon all items that come up for discussion. That is what we complain of, and that is what our criticism of the government is, as much as the other phase of the question, the inadvisability of the purchase as well as the fact that the purchase does not represent what the government hopes it will accomplish. That I persist in reiterating. If it did, there might be some justification for the government's persistence, but it will not accomplish it, and personally I think the government deserves censure for the manner in which this whole vote has been handled on Thursday and to-day. There has been nothing but a resistance against getting the most ordinary information.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I wish to say that my vote in opposition to this is not with the intention of obstruction. I
1 a.m. took the position last year. and I think my question last year will show it, that I considered the proposition was to enter into the purchase of a building which would represent all Canada and combine all the provincial offices. That was distinctly stated. Now we are not told to-night that any effort has ever been made to get together all the provinces except the province of British Columbia. I wish to point out further that if this building is purchased it forever prevents us realizing the vision we had of all getting together, because there is not accommodation there for the provincial offices, and it will simply mean that the Dominion government will be in one office and the provincial offices will be spread all over London. If we purchase this building we are preventing the realization of that vision we had, and which we all want to see realized.

Amendment negatived. Yeas, 31; Nays, 56.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The item includes the three figures?

The CHAIRMAN: The first two items have passed, and the question is now on the last item for the Canadian building in London.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to have a vote on that.

Mr BOYS: I understood the Prime Minister to say that he would lay the correspondence on the Table to-morrow if a vote was taken to-night. Is it understood that that correspondence will be laid on the table to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Item carried on division. Yeas, 57, Nays, 32.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 1.01 a.m. (Wednesday).

Wednesday, March 26, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN BUILDING IN LONDON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I promised hon. gentlemen opposite last night that I would lay on the Table to-day the correspondence between the government and the High Commissioner with respect to the London building. The correspondence is being copied and I hope to have it on the Table before the House rises. I might mention one circumstance in connection with the matter. Hon. gentlemen will realize that as between myself and the High Commissioner there are many letters which deal with a large number of topics and which are written sometimes with a good deal of freedom of expression. I doubt whether it would serve any useful purpose to have those letters placed in full on the Table of the House, but I assure the House that any facts relative to the building will be brought down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume that the Prime Minister proposes laying on the Table the actual contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All the correspondence that has passed between the government and Mr. Larkin will be laid on the Table.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But I mean the contract; it has never been submitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, certainly.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. PRESTON ELLIOTT (Dundas): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to present the petition of the Rev. John D. Cunningham, M.A., one of the plaintiffs in the action of Cunningham et al. versus Pidgeon et al. protesting against the petition filed praying for the passing of an act to incorporate the United Church of Canada on the ground that the said petition is not in conformity with the standing orders of this House.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS —TORONTO BUILDING

Mr. BOYS:

1. What were the total rents paid during each year by tenants of the building at the northwest corner of King and Yonge streets, Toronto, and purchased by the Canadian National Railways, for the years 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

2. What were the taxes payable on the said building and the ground on which it is erected for each of the said years?

3. What rental was charged the Grand Trunk Railway Company for its tenancy of a portion of the said building for each of the said years?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. At date of expropriation, February 23, 1923, the following annual rentals were in force:

Grand Trunk Railway Co.—
Ground floor	$32,500
First floor	1,000
		$33,500
Other tenants—
Ground floor		22,200
Other floors		20,782
		$76,482

As leases have fallen in the entire building has been gradually taken over for railway purposes. For this accommodation the Canadian National Railways are being charged the following rentals:

Entire ground floor and basement	$54,215
Upper floors	41,931
	$96,146

In purchasing property Imperial Bank had been obliged to take over certain improvident leases on the upper floors on which they estimated their loss to be $20,000 per year. The rental charged the railway for the upper floors is computed at $3.00 per square foot per annum, which is the same rental as the railway has been paying for premises elsewhere.

2. So far as the department is aware there has been no change in assessment and the taxes payable in 1923 were $18,000.

3. On expiration of lease former owners increased Grand Trunk rental by $5,000 in December, 1922, for privilege of remaining another year. Grand Trunk rentals prior to increase $28,500; subsequent to increase $33,500.

AGRICULTURAL PUBLICATIONS

Mr. COOTE:

1. How many reports, bulletins, or other publications were issued by the Department of Agriculture, in each of the last five fiscal years, and what was the total cost of same in each year?

2. What amount was paid by the Department of Agriculture for advertising during the first nine months of the fiscal year 1923, and to whom were these payments made?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DIESEL LOCOMOTIVE

*Mr. SINCLAIR (Oxford):

1. Have the officials of the Canadian National Railways made an investigation of the practicability of the Diesel locomotive?

2. If so, has a report in this connection been handed to the Minister of Railways?

3. Will such report be laid upon the Table of the House with such other information on the subject as he has in his possession?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, this is something of which I know but little. No such report has been handed to the Minister of Railways. If such a report has been made to the Canadian National Railways Board, certainly the government has no objection to laying it on the Table. I will make inquiries.

PORT NELSON WORKS

Mr. BIRD:

1. What is the amount, in cubic yards, of the dredging that will be required before ships can dock at Port Nelson?

2. What work remains to be done in order to complete the artificial island at Port Nelson, and what is the estimated cost of this work?

ST. MARGARET'S BAY ROAD

Mr. JONES:

1. How much, if any, federal money has been paid out of the good roads appropriation towards the St. Margaret's Bay road in Nova Scotia?
2. Does the amount paid represent forty per cent of the cost of production? If not, what per cent?
3. How many miles have been constructed upon which the Dominion payment is applicable?
4. If nothing has been paid, is it intended that any Dominion money shall be contributed toward this road?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. $136,091.49.

2. Total outlay $459,789.09; Federal subsidy restricted to 40 per cent of $340,228.72, as recommneded by the Chief Engineer of the Highways branch as being reasonable and necessary cost in accordance with the requirements of the Canada Highways Act.

3. 17.5 miles.

4. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—THE BOARD

*Mr. SENN:

1. Has the government of Canada appointed a representative of agriculture on the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways?

2. If not, is the subject being considered?

3. If so, to whom was the appointment given?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The members of the Canadian National Railways Board have not been appointed with reference to their calling or any particular class, but rather with reference to the district in which they reside.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT FUND —INCOME TAX

Mr. HANSON:

1. Which department of the government controls and manages (a) The Retirement Fund of the Civil Service; (b) The Dominion of Canada Income Tax?

2. Is not the retirement fund made by retaining approximately 5 per cent per annum, or some other percentage, from the salary of each civil servant employee in the service of the government of Canada?

3. Is not this amount retained without the consent of the civil servant from whose salary it is deducted, and in some cases contrary to his expressed wish in that regard?

4. Are not the salaries of the civil servants of Canada paid from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada?

5. Are not the allowances paid on the retirement of a civil servant, paid from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada?

6. Do not the amounts retained by the government for such salaries for the purposes of the retirement fund remain a part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada until they shall have been paid over after the retirement or death of the civil servant from whose salary they were retained?

7. Has the civil servant from whom said amount is deducted for said purpose while he remains in the service any control over or management of the money so retained?

8. As a matter of practice does the government recognize the right of a civil servant who dies while in the service to give effective testimentary disposition of the sum or any part thereof?

9. Does the government recognize the legal claim, enforcible at law, enabling the devisee, executor or administrator or any of them to collect this amount or any part thereof?

10. What orders in council have been passed and are now effective with regard to this fund and what are their provisions?

11. What is the total amount of the fund at the present time?

12. What amount approximately was assessed against civil servants on account of this fund in the years 1922 and 1923 respectively and how many civil servants were affected by said assessment?

13. Does the Commissioner of Taxation assess as income any, and if so what portion, of the amounts so retained from civil servants and remaining in the Consolidated Revenue Fund?

14. Does the Commissioner of Taxation tax a civil servant on income on any portion of the retirement fund while it remains part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada?

[Mr. Graham.]

15. In the event of the Commissioner of Taxation assessing and collecting income tax on the yearly amount retained from the nominal salary of a civil servant for the retirement fund, if the civil servant subsequently retires from the service, is the whole amount again assessed as the income of the recipient when paid over to him after he leaves the service?

16. If a civil servant dies while still in the service and the amount retained from his salary during his lifetime for the retirement fund is paid from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada to some members of his family, is the recipient assessed on the amount as his or her income?

17. Does the government intend to repay to the civil servants or their dependents affected either at retirement or death the amount so assessed and collected from them?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Finance.

2. Yes, from those to whom Part 11 of Chap. 17 R. S. applies.

13. Yes. The amount retained from the civil servant who is liable to taxation.

14. Yes, to the extent of interest placed to the credit of the civil servant who is liable to taxation.

15. No.

16. No.

17. Payments from the retirement fund are authorized by sections 29 and 30, Chap 17, Revised Statutes.

ACCREDITED HERD TESTING

Mr. KELLNER:

1. How many veterinary inspectors are engaged in accredited herd testing in each province?

2. How many cattle were tested in each province during the last fiscal year?

3. Of those that reacted after the first test and were not slaughtered, what percentage reacted when given the second test?

4. Of the cattle reacting and slaughtered, what percentage were reported afflicted with tuberculosis by the carcass inspector at the plant?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. The number of veterinary inspectors available for accredited herd work, as required, on March 1st, 1924:

Prince Edward Island	3
Nova Scotia	1
New Brunswick	3
Quebec	19
Ontario	29
Manitoba	18
Saskatchewan	12
Alberta	14
British Columbia	7
Total	106

Veterinary Inspectors are not detailed to deal exclusively with accredited herd testing, but also handle such work as municipal testing, mange, hog cholera and glanders inspection, as required.

In some provinces the amount of accredited herd testing is but a fraction of the work performed.

2. Fiscal year ended March 31, 1923.

Prince Edward Island	900
Nova Scotia	515
New Brunswick	537
Quebec	14,306
Ontario	20,152
Manitoba	8,253
Saskatchewan	2,951
Alberta	3,298
British Columbia	1,636
Total	52,548

3. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, and under the accredited herd plan, only one animal, which reacted after the first test and was not slaughtered, was retested. It did not react to the second test.

Of 5,586 animals slaughtered as reactors, 1,232, or 22 per cent, did not react to the first test but reacted to the second, or subsequent tests.

4. 91.8 per cent of cattle reacting and slaughtered under the accredited herd plan in the year ending March 31, 1923, showed visible lesions of tuberculosis on post mortem examination by veterinary inspectors.

NATIONAL DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I should like to answer a question put by my hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) yesterday when I was not in the House, as to whether the government were taking into consideration the rate of expenditure for military purposes in Canada compared with such expenditure by the other dominions. In order that the facts may be made clear, the per capita expenditure in February last was as follows:

Canada	$ 1.46
New Zealand	2.33
South Africa	2.92
Australia	3.30
Great Britain	15.32

It will be observed that ours is the lowest expenditure per capita of any of the self-governing dominions.

PENSIONS TO EX-MILITIA MEN

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Is it the intention of the government to increase the amount of pensions now paid to former members of His Majesty's forces, their widows and dependents, by the amount of the bonus now paid in addition to pensions, making the permanent pension equal to present pension plus bonus?

Hon. Mr. BELAND: This question was answered on Monday last.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I understood the reply was that the answer was under consideration.

Mr. BELAND: The answer was, that the matter was under consideration. I think my hon. friend will have to withdraw the question and put it on the order paper at some other time.

HEARING DEBATES.

FORMAL REQUEST FOR GREATER ATTENTION TO AUDIBILITY

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I speak not merely for myself but on behalf of all those who are somewhat removed from the immediate neighborhood of the government. When questions are asked and replied to in a purely conversational tone of voice it is quite impossible for hon. members in distant parts of the chamber to hear what is being said. I think I am in order in drawing formal attention to this condition of affairs and in expressing the hope that all concerned will endeavour to give the benefit of their observations to all the representatives of the people.

Mr. BELAND: As I think the remarks of my hon. friend applied to me—

Mr. McMASTER: Not more than to others.

Mr. BELAND: —I will attempt to have my voice carry as far as the hon. gentleman's seat in order to apprise him of the nature of the "conversation" which passed between my hon. friend from Yukon (Mr. Black) and myself. He had placed on the order paper a question as to what the policy of the government would be in connection with the pension bonus, and I answered orally last Monday that that policy was under consideration. The question still appears on the order paper, and I ask my hon. friend to let it drop. He objects to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I observe it is those in front of me who call "louder". I am sure those at a distance heard all right.

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the minister said when he was speaking in a low voice was correct. His answer yesterday was that the question was under consideration. If this is the case the question should remain on the order paper. Now he says the whole matter is under consideration. I am quite agreeable that that should be taken for the answer in the meantime.

Mr. BELAND: The answer appears in Hansard as follows: "The answer is: Under consideration."

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I submit the question should remain on the order paper and be answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

LEGAL SERVICES IN ALBERTA

Mr. GARDINER:

1. What amounts have been paid by the various departments of the Federal government for legal services in the Province of Alberta, from the 1st of January, 1922, to the 1st of March, 1924?

2. What are the names of the lawyers or firms of lawyers to whom payments have been made and what amount was paid to each?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

HON. MR. MACDONALD AND FREIGHT RATES

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters and other documents relating to, forming the basis of, or the justification for the statements of Honourable E. M. Macdonald in North Sydney on the 28th day of July, 1923, in which assurance was given of certain reductions of freight rates for the Maritime Provinces by the Canadian National Railway Board.

GREAT LAKES LEVELS

EFFECT OF DIVERSION OF WATER BY CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take some definite and immediate action to prevent the illegal diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes through the Chicago Drainage Canal and that action should be taken to prevent further waste and to secure specific enforcement of the Treaty between Canada and the United States as to this matter, inasmuch as this diversion is not only seriously lowering lake levels but is a danger to the public works of Canada and its provinces and an interference with the harbour development of our country and with navigation and is such a direct violation and breach of the Treaty as calls for immediate action by the government of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion speaks for itself. The subject matter which it covers is one of the most important which is likely to engage the attention of the House this session, as the illegal diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes through the Chicago drainage canal is a very serious menace to our country not only from the navigation and power standpoints, but from the standpoint of the Dominion, provincial and municipal interests involved. The motion urges that some additional steps be taken by Canada to prevent this illegal diversion. This matter has been made a football, so to speak, in the American courts, in the state legislatures, and before the Rivers and Harbours Committee of the United States Congress, and it is time for Canada to act.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members on both sides if they would kindly refrain from conversation during the debate, in justice to the speaker who is addressing the House. The remark made a moment ago by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was quite in order; too many members are chatting with each other and preventing the speaker from being heard.

Mr. CHURCH: Although Canada is suffering most—in fact almost entirely—from this diversion of water which is going on every minute in the hour and every day in the year, Canada is standing still, is taking no active steps to prevent a breach of the Boundary Waterways treaty of 1909 relating to this matter, a convention entered into between His Majesty's government of Great Britain and the United States of America. The consideration of this treaty occupied several weeks of the time of this parliament in 1909, and it was debated at length in the British House and in the United States senate and congress. Professor Coleman, one of the greatest geologists on the American continent, says that if this waste goes on much longer, lake Erie and lake Ontario will become nothing but a duck pond and the falls of Niagara will dry up. The people of Canada have been too lax in this matter, and I say that not only of this government but of the previous government as well. Canada should long ago have insisted upon adherence to the terms of the Boundary Waterways treaty in order that the rights and privileges of the people of this country might be respected. The treaty provides as follows, by section 1:

> The high contracting parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall for ever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally.

The treaty provides that the section which I have just quoted, as to preserving the rights of navigation, shall apply to lake Michigan and the harbours, rivers and streams in and about lake Michigan, and that the interests of navigation are paramount. But still we have to-day the condition of which I speak.

I would like to give a short sketch of Canada's side of the case. The Great Lakes constitute the largest and the most extensive navigable inland waterway in the world, and the diversion of water by the Chicago Drainage commission has permanently lowered the level to such an extent as to interfere with the development of navigation. The Chicago drainage canal has lowered the levels of the Great Lakes by diverting an amount of water equal to the volume that goes over the American Falls at Niagara, the reduction in level being effected by a diversion of the natural flow from the St. Lawrence and the gulf by the construction of channels to the gulf of Mexico by way of the Des Plaines, Illinois and Mississippi rivers. Under natural conditions these waters would flow through the lakes and down to the seaboard. This reduction in the lake levels is a matter of national concern both to Canada and to the United States. The waterways treaty from which I have quoted provides definitely for the conserving of the water levels of the Great Lakes for navigation purposes, regarding that condition as essential. The treaty provides that no diversion of boundary waters between the two countries shall be made without the express authority of the governments of both countries, and corresponding provision is made with respect to the diversion of other waters which materially affect the level or flow of these boundary waters. The present diversion through the Mississippi valley, which is a scheme carried out by the city of Chicago on the principle of the dilution of sewage and the flushing of the sewers, gives rise to conditions which certainly call for discussion and adjustment as between the governments of both countries. I am sorry to say that the government of one of the provinces and officers of municipalities along the Great Lakes, seeing that the Dominion government did not appoint some one to put forward their case, found it necessary last week to send a deputation to Washington, to appear before the harbour and rivers committee of a foreign country with regard to a British treaty and the preservation of the rights and privileges accorded under that treaty to municipalities and provinces of Canada.

Let me give in a few words a brief sketch of the Chicago side. Their case is very largely founded on a fallacy and a misstatement of facts with respect to the treaty. The Sanitary Commission of Chicago has jurisdiction over all sanitary matters in connection with the greater city of Chicago, and operates over a definitely prescribed area. For many years, from 1848 down to about twenty years ago, Chicago had a great deal of difficulty in handling its sewage problem, as is the case to-day with every large city on the Great Lakes. They tried many systems, and subsequently a commission was appointed by the state of Illinois and the engineers recommended the dilution principle to which I have referred, involving the taking of water illegally from the Great Lakes. This sanitary commission is in difficulty by reason of this illegal diversion of water from the Great Lakes system to the Mississippi river. The water is diverted, of course, for the purpose of diluting the sewage effluent with sufficient water to render it inoffensive. The Chicago commission are now seeking authority from the Rivers and Harbours Committee of the United States for the use of water now being diverted from the Great Lakes system, and they have been sending delegations to cities on the Great Lakes to try to turn aside opposition to their programme. One of these deputations including the chairman of the commission, visited Cleveland, Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa for this purpose. As a remedial measure in this connection the Chicago Drainage commission say that they are prepared to construct storage dams at a cost of $2,500,000, one to be erected above the Niagara Falls near Buffalo and another at the Galops rapids in the St. Lawrence. But nothing these gentlemen can do in the way of erecting dams can return to the Great Lakes and to the rivers of Canada the 4,167 cubic feet per second of water which is diverted every second all the year around and turned into the Mississippi valley. The storage dams that the Chicago Drainage commission propose to erect will not compensate Canada, which is losing $35,000,000 per annum by this diversion. It is pointed out by the Chicago officials that these storage dams will restore the lake levels which have been disadvantageously affected by this diversion, but that cannot be done. No storage dams can ever compensate for the 12,000 cubic feet per second which the Chicago commission are diverting all the year round and the resultant economic waste to Canada.

This question has never been properly presented to the Canadian people—the people of Canada have really been asleep on this question, as well as their legislatures and the federal government. They are not alive to the great and serious menace to the business and transportation interests and trade and commerce of this country by this illegal diversion of the water of the Great Lakes. There is no use standing still and allowing a treaty between the two countries to be regarded as a scrap of paper by the people and the government of the United States. The United States government have too long allowed this diversion, as the International Joint Commission has pointed out, as the Supreme Court has also pointed out, as Secretary for War, Mr. Weeks, has also pointed out and urged that action should be taken in a federal way to prevent this illegal diversion of water. Two supreme courts have declared this diversion to be illegal under the boundary treaty between the two countries. I am glad to say that the government at Washington have come to the help of the municipalities on the other side of the border, and yesterday Mr. Secretary Weeks took very strong ground against this illegal diversion, as appears by a despatch appearing in the newspapers of this country to-day. I quote from the Toronto newspapers of Tuesday, March 25:

> Because the diversion by Chicago of water from Lake Michigan does "substantial" injury to commerce on the Great Lakes, even to the harbour of Montreal, Secretary of War Weeks to-day reported against the Madden bill, intended to authorize withdrawal of 10,000 feet per second of lake water.
>
> The secretary's report was sent to S. Wallace Dempsey, chairman of the House, Rivers and Harbours committee, which is considering the Madden measure.
> Secretary Weeks intimated that Chicago ought to be as well able as other lakes cities, to provide for purification of sewage without taking so much of the lake water that levels are lowered to the damage of navigation interests. He also showed that the compensatory works proposed in the bill could not be constructed without the consent of the Canadian government.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, the government of the United States are awake to the situation, and there are at the present time two suits pending before the United States Supreme Court to prevent this illegal diversion.

Who are the interests in Canada and the United States who are opposed to this diversion? Every important navigation interest in Canada right up to the head of the lakes has protested against this diversion, and they have presented their case at the bars of various tribunals, petitioning for a remedy. The proposal of the Chicago Sanitary District is to install regulating works to compensate for the water taken from the Great Lakes, but it is impossible by artificial means to compensate for the thousands of cubic feet per second which are being illegally diverted from the Great Lakes to the Chicago Sanitary District works. The interests of Canada are being seriously interfered with. Against this illegal diversion there are also the states of Wisconsin, Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota and Pennsylvania, who all come to the help of the Great Lakes system. After a conference with Solicitor General Beck of the United States, these five states have joined with the federal government in an application to the Supreme Court of the United States to prevent this work. In addition 350 municipalities in the province of Ontario, comprising practically all the cities, towns and villages in the more settled portions of the provinces, including such large cities as Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, Kitchener, Brantford and Windsor, which have the municipality-owned Hydro system—representing an investment of $250,000,000 have all protested through the Canadian government, and the United States government as well, against this illegal diversion. The states of Michigan, Wisconsin and New York, and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the federal government of this country and the United States federal government have all registered strong protests against this illegal diversion, and the press almost without exception on both sides of the line, except in Chicago, have taken the same stand. One of the ablest papers in the United States, the Cleveland Plain Dealer, points out:

> Two suits are now before the Federal Supreme Court challenging Chicago's right to this diversion of water. The four Illinois bills, on whose behalf the Chicago delegation journeyed to Cleveland this week, would reverse the anticipated decision of the court before it is made. They constitute a reflection on the court, as the errand of the Chicago delegation reflected on the common sense of Cleveland. This effort of Chicago should be resisted at every point. Particularly it should be resisted by the lake cities on both sides of the international boundary. Congress and the parliament may well join hands to end the illegal, unfair and destructive policy of water diversion. Investments totalling untold millions are jeopardized. More than that, the friendly relations of the Republic and the Dominion are threatened. We have expressed the opinion before that it is hopeless to cry for Canadian co-operation on the St. Lawrence as long as the government at Washington even appears to condone Chicago's continued theft of lake water. No real friend of this international waterway will lend an ounce of support to one of these drainage diversion bills.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer shows that the real water pirate of the Great Lakes is not Sir Adam Beck, but the Chicago Sanitary District, which is now launching an electrical development project and a Chicago-to-the-Gulf waterway in the hope of getting the help of southern Illinois and the states of the Mississippi valley in its fight to retain the stolen waters of Canada and the states fronting on the Great Lakes.

I might also point out that the Attorney General of Wisconsin, Mr. Ekern, in a very able brief which he prepared for a conference of the Great Lakes harbours, showed that for every inch of depth lost in the lakes the shipping companies lost three quarters of a million dollars per annum. The Chicago diversion has lowered lake Michigan nearly seven inches and lake Ontario nearly five inches. The mayor and council of Milwaukee are also very strong opponents of Chicago in this matter. The Attorney General of Wisconsin in his brief says that the lakes save the two countries $5,000,000 annually in transportation costs, which indicates the importance of preserving intact this waterway.

I might point out that if there is any dispute as to the construction of the treaty, that is a matter for the International Joint Commission. That commission in its report presented to this House in January, 1922, took very strong ground against this diversion of water from the Great Lakes and urged that the matter be referred to that commission to prevent.

In addition, we find opposed to this illegal diversion the Attorney General of Michigan. The cities and towns in his state are very much alarmed. He says that the two largest rivers that flow into the lake at Chicago are the Grand and the Fox, contributing approximately 10,000 cubic feet per second. The state of Wisconsin also is very much interested in this matter, and Attorney General Ekern says in his brief before the court, "If Chicago is to be permitted to illegally divert the water of the lakes, why not Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo and other cities?" With reference to the proposal of the Chicago sanitary officials that compensating works could not be erected, he expresses the opinion that they have no thought of ever carrying out that policy. It is necessary that the federal governments of both countries should be urged to prevent this illegal diversion. Great international interests such as navigation, with all the complicated questions which navigation involves, are at stake. Water levels in the harbours and rivers of the Great Lakes and of the St. Lawrence, and water powers, are affected as well. All these interests are in jeopardy every day and every hour because of this illegal diversion of water, and it is most important that the government of Canada should call on the government of the United States to respect the treaty and compel the Chicago Sanitary commission, which have treated it as a scrap of paper, to respect it.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the interests of navigation should be paramount. The treaty recognizes the fact, and it declares that any subsidiary rights must be subsidiary to the rights of navigation. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec are interested in this question. Subject to the rights of navigation the surplus waters of the Great Lakes system, the beds of rivers, the beds of streams and the banks and rapids belong to the provinces. That, I think, will be admitted by the law officers of the Crown. Yet the rights in these, to say nothing of the rights of navigation belonging to Canada, are in very serious jeopardy at the present time by the diversion complained of. The depth of water in the harbours of the Great Lakes has been lowered to a serious extent. I have already shown how that reduction in depth has interfered with navigation in the American ports on lake Michigan and lake Erie, in fact in the ports generally on the American side of the border. I can speak with practical knowledge and certainty as to conditions in Toronto and other lake harbours. I am the chairman of the Harbour Commission at Toronto and the Toronto Harbour Board received the representatives of the Chicago commission when they visited Toronto last summer. They spent several days in our city conferring with the Harbour Commission and Provincial Hydro. They came to Toronto and tried to make out that the conditions were not as bad as they were represented to be, and to eliminate opposition to their plans contended that our harbours were not suffering to the extent alleged as to lake levels, but the reports of our own engineers, the reports of the engineers of the federal government and of the governments of Ontario and Quebec show that the depth of water in the rivers and canal systems of this country is being seriously lowered and interfered with by the diversion of the Chicago Sanitary commission. As I say, the federal government is interested in this question to a very important degree in connection with navigation rights. The province of Ontario has also very important interests at stake. The surplus waters in the Niagara river, for example, belong to the government of Ontario which has erected works on that river involving an expenditure of $275,000,000. The provincial government consequently takes the position that if the federal authorities will not move to prevent this serious encroachment upon their rights it will have to do something itself. And the municipalities of Ontario have adopted the same position. The diversion of water has had very serious results upon navigation in some of the smaller Canadian ports on lake Ontario, lake Erie and lake Huron. In consequence the Dominion government has been compelled to make large expenditures for dredging in small harbours in order to increase the depth of water. Let me say to those who have been preaching economy that that is one of the reasons why the federal Department of Public Works has been obliged to undertake so much dredging and harbour votes in the province of Ontario. In olden times, before there was any such diversion as we now complain of, there was no harbour work carried out at many of these smaller ports. But the lowering of the lakes water level has made dredging compulsory and consequently every year we see votes of money for dredging purposes in harbours where work of this kind never used to be done. This aspect of the question is not denied by those with knowledge of the matter; it is acknowledged by all authorities on this question. It was acknowledged that lake levels were affected by W. J. Healy, president of the Sanitary Drainage system, when he came to Toronto to endeavour to get support for the application of the commission to divert ten thousand cubic feet of water per second. It is admitted by all that the Chicago diversion seriously interferes with the navigable capacity of the waters of the Great Lakes, and their connecting rivers.

The officials of the Hydro-Electric commission also say, "That the provisions of the Canadian treaty for a settlement by joint commission on questions or matters of difference between the United States and Canada offer a further reason why no administrative officer should authorize a further diversion of water, manifestly so injurious to Canada, against Canadian protest."

This question has never, at any time, received the consideration in the House which its importance demands. Last year only one question was put to the government on the subject, the most important that parliament could consider. The government were asked by me on April 13, 1923, whether any protest had been made against the diversion. The reply to me of Hon. Mr. Lapointe was "Yes, but not recently." The then Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated:

> The government believes that the diversion of water at Chicago has injuriously affected the navigable capacity of the connecting channels of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River.

The importance of this question can be estimated from the fact that the diversion of ten thousand cubic feet of water per second belonging to the people of this country means a loss to Canada which has been estimated by hydraulic engineers to reach the enormous sum of $35,000,000 per annum. Furthermore, Mr. White, of the Conservation commission agrees with this in his report and the engineers of the Hydro Electric commission have also estimated that the wastage to the people of Canada involved by the diversion represents a sum of $400,000,000. If the interested municipalities on this side of the International boundary cannot get the federal authority to take action they intend to place their case before the Rivers and Harbour Committee of Congress at Washington themselves and seek redress there.

Where is this diversion going to stop? The city of Chicago has been proceeded against in a large number of cases arising out of the unsanitary conditions which prevail there. The death rate from typhoid in Chicago once is said to have been one of the highest on the continent. They have to do something to provide a sanitary remedy, They will either have to spend $100,000,000 on a modern extended sewage disposal plant, or else use additional water from the Great Lakes in order to get rid of their sewage and flush their sewers. All this illegal diversion has been going on with the quasi consent of the government of Canada. The time for further procrastination has gone by. The moment has come for action on the part of this government. They have ignored the wishes of the Canadian government, and the sanitary commission of Chicago has continued to divert water greatly in excess of the 4,167 cubic feet per second for which it has the sanction of its own government. It has not the sanction of the treaty to divert that quantity of water per second. They only do it by virtue of a temporary permit from one of the previous secretaries of war, Mr. Alger. It has never had even the sanction of the government of Canada for the diversion of 4,167 feet. The diversion of that quantity of water is illegal under the treaty without the consent of other countries and it is costing the people of this country thousands of dollars. But the United States are not satisfied with diverting 4,167 cubic feet. The commission admitted in Toronto, and they have admitted before the courts, that they are diverting water in excess of this amount, even up to the amount of 10,000 cubic feet per second, without attempting to secure permits from the proper authorities. In designing the canal the Sanitary commission, although they only had a temporary permit to divert 4,167 cubic feet, designed their canal so as to serve a population many hundreds of thousands greater than the population of Chicago to-day. One of the engineers admitted in Toronto that the capacity of the canal was 14,000 to 16,000 cubic feet per second. The action of the Sanitary commission in diverting from the Great Lakes system this enormous quantity of water which is being turned into the Mississippi and gulf of Mexico is illegal, and it is without parallel in the annals of the continent to which we belong. It is illegal for them to divert from our great system of waterways this great quantity of water for the benefit of a few people in that country. In my opinion the minister should tell the House what active steps he has taken to prevent the continuation of this diversion, inasmuch as the protests which have been made from time to time have been made by his own government, and by the Dominion Marine Association, the Civic Federation of Montreal, the Atlantic Shipping Company, the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and the Harbour Commissioners of Toronto, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, the Canada Steamships Company, the Canadian Water-power Board and the boards of trade of the Dominion, including the Montreal and Toronto boards of trade, and many other organizations. Now what does the government propose to do, in view of all that I have said? The most eminent geological engineers have pointed out the effect it is going to have on this country. Professor Coleman, who is backed up in his opinion by other eminent geologists, states that this cannot go on forever. He states that it will have very disastrous effects, and says that the Niagara river will be dried up, and the St. Lawrence river will become unnavigable. He says:

> A tilt of fifty feet would drain the whole of the Great Lakes into the Mississippi. "Is this beyond the possibilities of modern engineering skill?" he asked. "It is not. A mere deepening of three drainage canals would result in a similar state of affairs. It is entirely possible to drain the whole of the Great Lakes in this way."

The great geologist is backed up in his opinion by the son of one of the former presidents of the United States, Professor Ulysses Grant, a great geologist of the Northwestern University of the United States, who says—

> Even as it is nature is playing its part in drying up the lakes system and reducing the rivers to streams.

He says that in 2,000 years the school children of Buffalo will gaze at the dry cliffs that were once Niagara Falls and listen with wonder to their teachers telling them that a mighty river once tumbled over it at the rate of 220,000 cubic feet of water every second.

By 3924, Professor Grant declares, Niagara will cease to flow, leaving lake Ontario stranded.

It is a long report. He says the diversion of the Chicago Drainage canal will destroy many rivers and harbours on the 4 p.m. great lakes. Professor Coleman says that the Niagara river, small as the Ottawa, would be draining lake Erie, and that was all.

Professor Coleman further says that the immediate cause of the present receding of the lake levels is the Chicago Drainage canal and its diversion.

Now there you have the opinions of geologists who are studying the question of lake levels and the geology of the Great Lakes, and whose duty as professors is to study such problems. They say that the direct effect is as I have stated. The Chicago people say, "Oh, Canada is taking water from the Niagara river for power purposes." The treaty provides that the rights of navigation are paramount, and that the rights of the people of Canada, so far as the Niagara river is concerned, are as follows:

> Canada is allowed by the treaty 36,000 cubic feet per second and the United States by the treaty is allowed 20,000 cubic feet per second.

Hon. gentlemen must remember that that means 16,000 to the good for Canada, but we must remember the United States is exporting from Canada 12,000 cubic feet of Canada's allotment. Adding 12,000 to the 20,000, it means that the United States is taking 32,000 cubic feet per second, and Canada 36,000. Canada has carried out the treaty to the letter both as regards navigation and as regards the water of the Great Lakes for sanitary purposes and for power purposes. The people of the United States, through the Chicago Drainage commission, have violated almost every clause of the treaty. Do not forget that the water which Canada takes from the Niagara river for power purposes is all returned to the river. The water which they take out of the river at the village of Chippewa for the Chippewa Development is returned to the river at the village of Queenston, but in the case of the diversion by the Chicago Sanitary commission from ten to twelve thousand cubic feet per second are taken which never comes back. It is diverted through the streams of Chicago and the county of Illinois, right down the Mississippi river, and flows out through the gulf of Mexico. The people of Canada have kept their treaty, but the people of the United States have not by allowing Chicago to act this way.

I may say that Canada's power resources have been sacrificed at the present time, and I say Chicago has no right legally even to the 4,167 cubic feet per second.

They have been given permission to take it by their own government, but Canada has not concurred in that as the treaty provides. They are illegally diverting 4,167 cubic feet without Canada's permission, let alone the addition up to 10,000 cubic feet which they are illegally now taking. They are not only taking this water for sanitary purposes, but are diverting it for power purposes. The Chicago Sanitary commission has become a hydraulic power commission for part of that city. They are utilizing the illegally diverted waters of the Great Lakes, and a part of it is being diverted for hydraulic power illegally.

With regard to the compensating features, the compensation works are not a compensation for the great power lost. Obviously, the proposal to make an investment in some permanent works of only $2,500,000 as is proposed by the Sanitary District, could not be taken into serious consideration as a means of compensating for an annual loss of upwards of $35,000,000 per annum to Canada as estimated by hydraulic engineers.

Now, it is impossible for the Chicago Sanitary District or any other agency to do anything by means of the regulation of levels of the Great Lakes to compensate the Dominion of Canada for its loss in the international waters which Chicago is diverting. It cannot be said that the proposed compensating works on the Galops rapids on the St. Lawrence river, costing $2,500,000, or the compensating works on the Niagara river, could be considered as a sufficient compensation for the illegal taking of this water. No fixed sum could ever compensate the people of

[Mr. Church.]

Canada for the loss of from 10,000 to 12,000 cubic feet of water per second on the Great Lakes. These excess waters belong to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec for power purposes, and from the point of view of the electrical energy to be developed from them they are worth some $35,000,000 a year altogether apart from the question of navigation. This loss is annual; the people are losing money every hour of the day through this diversion of waters that should be used for the development of electrical power; and when it is borne in mind that the cities and towns on the Great Lakes are to-day suffering from a shortage of power for commercial purposes it will readily be seen how serious a matter this is to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

We had a visit in Toronto from these gentlemen of the Chicago drainage commission, among them being W. J. Healy, president and the engineer. They had visited a number of cities on the Great Lakes for the purpose of combating the opposition to their programme; and their object could be stated in three or four words. These gentlemen admitted that it was a question of dollars and cents with the people of Chicago; they illegally diverted the waters of the Great Lakes for the purpose of flushing their sewers instead of treating the sewers locally as other cities on the lakes have to do. There was no equivocation on this point; they admitted that their motive was a financial one, and apparently it was immaterial to them whether they broke treaties or not. Now, there is a legal phase of this question and I desire to read a part of the treaty. I have already dealt with Article one, which provides that the rights of navigation as between the two countries shall be equal and paramount. So that, notwithstanding what interests may be at stake on either side, the parties are bound by the provisions of this treaty as to navigation. This fact has been admitted by the Supreme Court of the United States as well as by the Canadian authorities. The second part of the treaty provides that the contracting parties shall enjoy similar rights as regards the use of these waters for the purposes of navigation. As to the different purposes for which these waters shall be used, a certain order of precedence is laid down which shall be observed. I quote from the treaty:

The followoing order of precedence shall be observed among the various uses enumerated hereinafter for these waters, and no use shall be permitted which tends materially to conflict with or restrain any other use which is given preference over it in this order of precedence:

(1) Uses for domestic and sanitary purposes;

(2) Uses for navigation, including the service of canals for the purposes of navigation;

(3) Uses for power and for irrigation purposes.

The foregoing provisions shall not apply to or disturb any existing uses of boundary waters on either side of the boundary. The requirement for an equal division may in the discretion of the commission be suspended in cases of temporary diversions along boundary waters at points where such equal division cannot be made advantageously on account of local conditions, and where such diversion does not diminish elsewhere the amount available for use on the other side.

It is provided that if there is a dispute between the parties, they shall resort, not to the Supreme Court of either country but to the International Joint Commission appointed for the purpose. And this they have not done in the present instance. When these people appeared before the harbour commission and Hydro Electric Power commission when in Toronto, the chairman asked the attorneys for the sanitary commission whether they had consulted the treaty on these questions, and what the treaty had to say about them. Counsel for the sanitary commission of Chicago declared that the requirements of the drainage commission of the city of Chicago were paramount because they had reference to sanitary matters which had precedence and priority.

But the treaty between the two countries never contemplated that the waters of the Great Lakes should be diverted by the Chicago Drainage commission, for if that had been the intention it most undoubtedly would have been explicitly stated. There is not a word about the Chicago Drainage commission anywhere in the Boundary Treaty, and lawyers will tell you beyond any question that the treaty should be construed strictly; you cannot read into it words which would convey a meaning that never was intended between the parties originally contracting. As I have said, however, counsel for the Chicago commission admitted that the financial consideration was the one that moved them; and their engineer gave the whole thing away when he interrupted his associate, declaring that it was a matter of dollars and cents. He said, "We may as well tell you that we want to flush our sewers, and the diversion of the waters for this purpose will save us millions of dollars."

I may say that a temporary permit for the diversion of the waters was granted in 1899. In March of that year congress passed an act placing the navigable waters of the United States under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War, who automatically assumed control of the Chicago river, which is considered navigable. Many of the Canadian people wondered what the Secretary of War had to do with the rivers and harbours in the United States, because in this country they are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works. However, acting on that act of congress, the courts of the United States declared the Chicago river a navigable stream within the meaning of that law, and on the 8th of May, 1899, the then Secretary of War of the United States authorized a temporary diversion of 5,000 feet per second. In 1902 this was reduced to 3,333 cubic feet, and in the same year, in December, it was increased to 4,167 cubic feet. In June, 1910, a provisional permit was issued limiting the flow to that quantity, but this permit was not agreed to by this country. On June 30, 1910, Mr. R. S. Oliver, Acting Secretary of War, issued a provisional permit to the sanitary district to open a channel from the Calumet river to its existing main channel so as to substitute two routes instead of one between lake Michigan and its canal, one of the conditions being that the amount of water withdrawn from lake Michigan through the Chicago and Calumet rivers together should not exceed the 4,167 cubic feet per second, already authorized to be withdrawn through the Chicago river alone. The Calumet-Sag channel extends from a junction with the little Calumet river to a connection with the main channel at Sag, a distance of 16.2 miles. Its function is to reverse the flow of the Calumet river diverting all the sewage of the district south of 87th street away from lake Michigan. Work was commenced on September 18, 1911, and the water was turned into the completed channel on August 25, 1922. The legality of the diversion of water for sanitary purposes was tried before Judge K. M. Landis, one of the ablest judges in Chicago—now High Commissioner of Baseball. Judge Landis reserved his judgment and did not give a decision until 1920. Even then he merely handed down an oral decision in which he said:

"The finding of the court is, on the evidence in this case, that diversion has resulted in the lowering of the lake level and the reversal of these currents (the Chicago river) which latter fact is not controverted. On the evidence that the lowering is an impairment of navigable capacity, even though it amounts to no more than three or four inches, and as to the lowering to that extent there could be no controversy on the record, the court's finding is against the contention of the defendant (the sanitary district) on the proposition that this is a necessary thing for the salvation of this community. That is, that without this water this community will be at the mercy of disease germs from which it suffered before this diversion began, and from which it has by this diversion been practically relieved, as shown by statistics.

"The court has complied with this rule of law, that navigable rights are paramount, and even though the sanitary district is driven to the necessity of making some other provision, granting that the War Department and Congress should refuse to give contention to this question of sanitation (i.e., refuse to permit the desired diversion in the interests of sanitation?) it is entitled to the law, which I must obey, that a navigable right is paramount. In the last analysis, should Congress and the War Department, in consideration of all these matters, decline to permit the necessary diversion, the burden is on the district of providing some other method of relief. In other words, the defence that the diversion is necessary for the purpose of sanitation, as against the rule that a navigable right and navigation right is a paramount right, is immaterial." In order to allow the sanitary district a chance to appeal to the War Department for relief no order was made restricting the flow.

On the retirement of Judge Landis from the bench without having issued an order the case went to Judge Carpenter of the federal district court, who went over the evidence and arguments, and on June 20 last, a formal order against the diversion from lake Michigan of more than 4,167 cubic feet of water per second was entered against the Sanitary District of Chicago, but the district was given six months to appeal the case to the Supreme Court. This appeal and one other is to-day pending before the Supreme Court of the United States. In order to subvert what has been done by the courts of the United States, Senator Madden introduced a bill in congress this session, known as the Madden bill, which last week was considered by the Railways and Highways committee. The province of Ontario and the city of Toronto and other municipalities were represented. I am sorry to say that the Dominion government was not represented. The bill is to be reconsidered further on the 15th of April, and I hope the Dominion will then have a representative on hand to look after Canadian interests.

This question has been made a football by interested parties in the United States. But a treaty between two great nations should not be considered as a mere "scrap of paper". Therefore I am glad to see that at last the government of the United States is going to insist on the observance of the treaty and take the necessary steps to put a stop to the illegal diversion of water from lake Michigan by the city of Chicago, which is at present proceeding at the rate of 10,000 cubic feet per second.

Three hundred and seventy-three Ontario municipalities have at stake an investment of $275,000,000 in power development, and I was requested by the district from which I come to bring this matter before the House. I think there should be an effective answer made in this House to the country to the illegal claims of the sanitary commission of Chicago. The commission laid their case before Toronto, Hamilton, and Montreal, and before the Dominion government, but many statements in their brief were proved to be incorrect. There is no question whatever that the diversion is not sanctioned by the treaty. This is not contested even by the sanitary commission of Chicago, and it is admitted by them that they are diverting the water for sanitary purposes without any treaty priority in order to save the city the cost of installing a proper sewage system. The diversion seriously interferes with the water levels of the Great Lakes. This is admitted by the engineers of the Chicago Sanitary commission, and they also admit that sanitary and power purposes are entirely subsidiary to those of navigation. Therefore their case falls to the ground.

I want to see the government do something stronger than sending a telegram or simply drawing up a memorandum of protest. The treaty should be observed. There should be a meeting of the International Joint Commission, which was constituted for the purpose of dealing with and preserving the navigation interests of both countries, and also their power interests, on which trade and commerce so much depend. I urge upon the Prime Minister and the government that immediate representations be made to the United States government that this is not a question for the courts but for the International Joint Commission, which should be directed to exercise the powers and functions vested in them under the treaty, and so put a stop to the illegal acts of the municipal government of Chicago, and to the Boundary Waterways treaty being treated as a scrap of paper so far as Canada is concerned. Both countries should stand by their honourable treaty herein.

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): Mr. Speaker, I wish, as seconder of this motion, to add a few remarks to those so ably advanced by the mover of the motion. He has given a complete history of the case, has shown the loss to shipping through the lowering of the Great Lakes levels and lowering of the levels of all navigable waters to the Atlantic ocean, and also the loss to the public works of Canada. Now it seems to me that this diversion is for any or all of the three following purposes: The disposal of sewage from the sanitary district of Chicago, the aid to navigation of American rivers and the generation of hydro-electric power. The sewage disposal system adopted by Chicago is an antiquated one; that of allowing a large amount of water to flow into the sewage and of diverting it through the Chicago drainage canal to the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers down to the Mississippi. I suppose that as Chicago grows the demand will be for more and more water and that, if allowed, she will take very much larger quantities than 10,000 second-feet, according to her own sweet will.

Canada is not alone in protesting against this modern example of buccaneering. The states of the union bordering on the Great Lakes have all recorded their objections to the selfish action of the city in diverting water in excess and in defiance of the ruling of the Secretary of War of the United States, who has jurisdiction over such matters. There are now several bills before congress dealing with features of navigation and power development in this area, and they all assume that 10,000 second feet will be allowed the city of Chicago. This is only an effort on the part of Chicago to secure legal sanction for what it has been doing illegally for years. On the other hand, there is the suit by the state of Wisconsin against Chicago, before the United States Supreme Court, seeking to determine that the city of Chicago is going beyond its rights in the diversion of water. I would like to quote from a report of the Chief Engineer of the United States army, General Bixby, who advised the Secretary of War under date of January 23rd, 1911 "that for the purposes of navigation a diversion from lake Michigan of less than 1,000 second feet is all that will be necessary".

The sanitary district when designing and constructing its canal no doubt had in mind the plan it has been steadily pursuing, The original designs provided for a waterway with a capacity to carry 10,000 second feet of water, but this was enlarged in construction to a capacity of 14,000 to 15,000 second feet. The canal is 160 feet wide and deep enough to accommodate, a depth of 22 feet, which would amount to about 15,000 second feet of water flowing at the rate of three miles per hour. Compared with the Soo canal and the new Welland canal, now in course of construction, the cross sectional area of the Soo canal is 1,215 square feet, that of the new Welland canal 2,000 square feet, and that of the Chicago Drainage canal 3,520 feet. In other words, the Chicago waterway is larger than the other two combined. This tremendous waterway was constructed at a time when the United States government, through its Secretary of War, allowed only 4,167 second feet, and at a time when the navigable water of the Mississippi had a depth of about 22 feet at its mouth and 14 feet further up. And, finally, when the water of the Great Lakes was discharged into the Mississippi, it had a depth of 8 or 9 feet. I think it is a reasonable conclusion that this supply of water which is ostensibly being used for sewage disposal is really being used for the purpose of providing a deep water channel from Chicago to the Gulf of Mexico and for the generation of hydro-electric power.

That the sanitary district and the state of Illinois are fully alive to the prospect of power development is shown by a report of Engineer Hering that 47,300 horse-power could be developed in the canal. I would point out that if that power is developed in the canal the whole of it belongs to the United States, while if the water is not diverted and is allowed to go over Niagara Falls, Canada will then become the possessor of the larger portion of it, 64 per cent, to be exact, and, as shown later, multiplied four times.

In this connection I quote from a report of a special board of engineers to the United States Secretary of War, under date of January 23rd, 1911:

> The future diversion of water from Lake Michigan for any purpose is fraught with difficulties. Not only has Canada an interest in the maintenance of lake levels which the United States must recognize, but every foot of water flowing through the Chicago drainage canal lessens the flow at Niagara Falls and at the power sites along the St. Lawrence river, where due to the fall available the same amount of water will create about four times the power that can be generated from it on the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers.

From the same source there is also a statement that "10,000 cubic feet per second will eventually and permanently lower the levels of lakes Michigan and Huron about six inches and that of lake Erie 4¾ inches." These reports of experts show that the lowering of lake levels and the diversion of an immense quantity of water by Chicago means that there will be just so much less water available for power development in the Niagara district.

The development by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario has been tremendously successful, so much so that although very little power was being developed prior to the adoption of the Boundary Waterways treaty, there is now being developed more than 500,000 horse-power. This power is all being used in the western half of Ontario, and there is a continual increase in the demand. The minister of power in Ontario, Sir Adam Beck, is authority for the statement that in two years' time a power shortage will develop.

I would like to refer to the popularity of this public utility in the city of London, from which I come. Speaking in the House last session I gave a few figures in this connection and in doing so I had to trust to my memory. Subsequently checking up my statement I found that it was altogether too modest. I have here a statement from the general manager of the Public Utilities Commission of London, dated last June, in which he says that while the privately owned company which supplied the city with electric current generated by coal prior to the hydro development charged for domestic use and light 10 cents per kilowatt hour, the average charge to-day made by the Hydro is 1.8 cents, or less than one-fifth of the original cost. He says further:

> Power for factories was supplied by the privately-owned company for $10 to $150 per horse-power per annum. This department is supplying power to-day at from $20 to $25 per horse-power per annum.
> The amount spent on plant in London is $2,000,000. Other assets, such as stock and accounts, amount to $300,000, while the net debt is less than $1,000,000, so you will see that in addition to supplying power and light at the above low rates the department has net earnings of over $1,000,000. The saving to the citizens of London is inestimable, but might be placed conservatively at over $5,000,000.
> The amount of power originally contracted for by the city from the Hydro-Electric Power Commission was 3,000 horse-power; to-day we are using between 18,000 and 19,000 horse-power. Hydro is doing work in London that would require 200,000 tons of coal a year. Practically every house is connected, there being 17,000 customers, and 4,000 of these are using hydro for cooking.

Since that was written, extensions of the system have been made in the country districts surrounding the city, and the service seems to be as popular with the rural dwellers as it is with the city people. When a public utility is patronized to such an extent by the masses of the people as it has been in London and district it will surely become as popular, when available at as low prices, in every city, town and hamlet in the country. Indeed, it has even now become such a necessity that any interference with the source of supply is little short of a calamity.

The Ontario Minister of Power is authority for the statement that if 10,000 cubic feet of water per second were diverted by Chicago and were returned to its natural channel, it would develop at the falls and rapids of the Niagara and St. Lawrence rivers approximately 500,000 horse-power. If the power shortage which is mentioned by Sir Adam Beck develops, it means that we must use more American coal than we otherwise would, with its attendant adverse trade balance and adverse exchange rate.

[Mr. White.]

It would seem that Article 5, of the Boundary Waters treaty makes some provision for domestic and sanitary use, and if in the interpretation of the Boundary Waters treaty some small diversion of water is allowed Chicago, it would seem the part of wisdom that this government should insist on having free access at all times to the water flow records of the Sanitary District of Chicago, and free access also to the regulating works and all other parts of its canals for the purpose of checking records or making water flow measurements.

This seems necessary in view of the answer given by the government on March 19, to a question I had on the order paper as to how many second-feet Chicago is now diverting. The answer was that the government did not know definitely. As Chicago has shown such a disposition to override the rights of others, it would seem that a strict account and checking up of her diversions would be quite in order. Chicago is a big city, and has shown all the arrogance of the huge and great in this matter. She has all the problems of a big city, but that is no reason why she should shift her problems to the territory around the Great Lakes. Her plain duty is to install modern sewage disposal works, so that this undue diversion of water need not take place. She should be taught that there are such qualities as fair dealing and honour between municipalities and governments, as well as between individuals.

If the United States government, in spite of the protests which have already been made, continues to allow Chicago to divert this tremendous amount of water from the Great Lakes, it is equally guilty, with the city of Chicago, in a breach of the Boundary Waters treaty, and that course of action does not make for friendly relations between the two countries.

The province of Ontario has taken an active part in the protest at Washington. I hope the government fully realizes the importance of this question in the matter of navigation and in relation to public works, and that they will take steps to protest vigorously against any further extension of this diversion of water, and will insist that the Boundary Waters treaty be strictly observed.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): I am sure that no one will object to the vehement protests that have been made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for London (Mr. White) with reference to the diversion of water from the Great Lakes by Chicago for drainage purposes. I did not come in contact with this question until the middle of the past summer, but one does not need to have very much information upon it to realize that all that the hon. member for North Toronto has stated with respect to this diversion is true, and that his statements as to the effect upon the levels of Canadian waters were not exaggerated at all. It is a serious thing for navigation, and more so still for power purposes—power being so very much needed in connection with further development in Ontario and along the lower stretch of the St. Lawrence—that 10,000 second-feet of water should be diverted from the Great Lakes and international rivers. It is needless for me to reiterate what he has said. He has stated that in 1902, without consultation and without the permission of the Canadian government, permission was given to the Sanitary District of Chicago by the United States government to divert for sanitary purposes 4,167 per second-feet of water. Additional amounts have been taken from time to time by the Chicago Sanitary District; I need not go into all the details because they have been given by my hon. friend, but at the present moment the amount diverted is in the neighbourhood of 10,000 second-feet.

This diversion of water has been a matter of controversy during the past eight or ten years between the citizens of Wisconsin, Illinois and Michigan, bordering on the shores of the lake. The question appears to have come actively before the Canadian government in 1912. In 1909, when the International Joint Commission was appointed, this water was already being diverted, and as my hon. friend has pointed out this question has never been referred to the International Joint Commission by either government.

I might point out that the situation has become particularly acute during the last summer—and I am not offering this as any excuse at all for the diversion—by reason of the low levels of lake Superior and its tributary waters and coming through the Soo there has been a shortage almost equal to the amount of water diverted by the Chicago Sanitary commission. I am not offering that as any excuse at all for the extreme low levels that prevail in the St. Clair river, in lake Ontario and in the lower stretches of the St. Lawrence, but I just mention it in passing when I say that the most acute stage has been reached during the past summer, with considerable inconvenience for the municipalities along these waterways.

In addition to the diversion of this water for sanitary purposes, there is at the present moment a bill before the United States Senate for the purpose of creating a ship canal from Chicago to the gulf of Mexico. That, of course, is sponsored and backed by the interests diverting this 10,000 feet of water, and more, if possible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just before the minister leaves that point he said that the question had never been referred to the International Joint Commission by either government. Will he explain why not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Answering my hon. friend offhand, I think the fear was that the International Joint Commission's jurisdiction did not extend prior to 1909. The diversion was never agreed to by Canada, but was granted by the Secretary of War of the United States. That may have been the reason, but I really cannot explain why reference has not been made to the International Joint Commission, but undoubtedly the question could be referred to them. Judging from the records, the government of Canada would appear to have pinned their faith to an objection to a diversion not only of 4,167 feet but of any diversion of any sort whatsoever, and I get that impression from the first report that was made to the American government. There was an order in council passed by the Canadian government on the 27th of March, 1912, No. 249, which recommends the appointment of certain gentlemen to go down to Washington and protest against this diversion of water. It authorizes them to attend the meetings that were to be held at Washington in March of that year in connection with the Chicago drainage scheme, and to oppose on behalf of the Canadian government any proposal which would result in lowering the levels of the international boundary waters and in the St. Lawrence river. So, apparently, the government of Canada were not willing to concede that Chicago had the right to divert one single foot of water from the Great Lakes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has given us one protest, and the date. Would he be kind enough to follow that up?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I propose making reference to all of them. At the moment I wish—in a brief way because my hon. friend (Mr. Church) has covered the whole ground very thoroughly—to rehearse what has happened. In 1902, as I pointed out, Chicago got permission to divert 4,167 feet, but from time to time the project in Chicago has been enlarged until the proposition now before congress is for the construction of a canal, in addition, of course, to the use to which the drainage organization have been putting this water. Recent statements would indicate that this concession is not to be granted.

As I pointed out a moment ago protests have been registered repeatedly by the people of the United States. They were joined in this protest by the federal government itself, so that Chicago in asking for the diversion of water was opposed by the surrounding municipalities and states backed by the federal government. The reference to the court that my hon. friend speaks of is still before the Supreme Court of the United States. The recent development, I wish to mention in passing, is the request by bill for the provision of a canal to the gulf of Mexico. I do not intend, nor do I think it would serve the purpose of the House, to read all the protests that have been made by Canada. Suffice it to say that, so far as I understand the matter, every protest registered through the British Ambassador to the Secretary of State of the United States was emphatically against any diversion whatever. That is the stand the Canadian government have taken throughout the whole of these proceedings. The first on record is, as I have pointed out of 27th March 1912. On November 23, 1912, despatch No. 45 was sent in protest and there were protests on February 25, 1913, June 8, 1916, June 9, 1916 and April 15, 1921. The despatch of the last mentioned date contains this statement:

The Canadian government are therefore confident that the government of the United States will not countenance Chicago application, or take any step in the matter affecting Canadian interests without arranging for discussion with Canadian government. My ministers would be glad if you could take an early opportunity of making representations in this sense to Secretary of State.

All these representations—without reading them all, or placing them all on Hansard—are of the one character, that of protest. That, I wish to impress on the House this afternoon, has been the attitude of the government throughout.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) said that particular notice had been given to this matter by the International Joint Commission, and that in their annual report for 1922 they draw the government's attention to the matter as it then stood. Is that correct, and if so what did they say?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not that report before me, and I am not familiar with the statement of the commissioners, but I may say that during the course of the investigation of this matter I interviewed Mr. Magrath, a member of the commission and asked him whether, in his opinion, this matter had not been referred to that body. His answer was largely along the lines that I have indicated to the hon. member who asked the same question a few moments ago. In the case of the application for the diversion of 4,167 feet there was nothing to prevent a reference of the matter to the commission except that I do not think the Canadian government, following the position taken by previous administrations, admit that any diversion has been authorized or agreed to by the government of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend would not mind reading the protests that have been made during the present emergency. The matter has become very much more acute of late, and it would be desirable to know what position has been taken during the last two or three years?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have in my hand a copy of the representations that were made in a letter of 19th December, 1923. It reads as follows:

Sir,—I have the honour to represent that numerous communications have been received by the Canadian government from various interests and corporate bodies directly concerned, protesting vigorously against the diversion of water from lake Michigan. The position of the government of Canada in opposition to and in protest of the injurious effects of this diversion, both to navigation and water power has been fully declared in representations which have been made to the government of the United States. The attitude of the Canadian government was clearly made known in a brief filed with the Secretary of War of the United States on the 27th March, 1912, and in subsequent despatches under date of the 23rd November, 1912, 25th February, 1913, 8th June 1916, 9th June, 1916, and 15th April 1921, to His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington for transmission to the government of the United States.

In connection with the aforementioned representations, it has been brought to the attention of the Canadian government that on or about the month of June 1923, the government of the United States was granted an injunction restraining the sanitary district of Chicago from diverting water from lake Michigan, and further, that this injunction would not become active for a period of six months, to permit the sanitary district time in which to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I am accordingly to ask that His Excellency the Governor General may be humbly moved to request His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington by telegraph, to inform the government of United States that the declared attitude of the government of Canada in the above matter is unchanged.

I am further to suggest that His Excellency may request His Majesty's Ambassador to cause appropriate enquiries to be made regarding the legal proceedings undertaken by the government of the United States, which the Canadian government confidently trusts will be vigorously pressed.

I may say that on February 13, and again about ten days ago, two other despatches have been sent to the Secretary of State through the British Ambassador, to which we have not yet received replies. I would not therefore care to give the contents of these communications. Suffice it to say they are, if anything, more vigorous in character than the preceding despatches. However, all are along the same line, and the moment we receive replies I shall be glad to place them on the Table.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps there is a reply to the despatch of December 19?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No I have not the reply. When the replies have been received I will be glad to place them on the Table. I do not feel at liberty to table the despatches to which replies have not yet been received from the United States. You will see, therefore, Mr. Speaker, how grave the government of Canada believe the situation to be.

My hon. friend said that we had contented ourselves in making a protest. That is true. The government of Ontario and the municipalities were represented before the committee of the Senate who were hearing representations with respect to the bill that I have just mentioned. We have taken the opportunity to place on record our protest against this diversion. We have treated it separately entirely from the matter of the St. Lawrence waterways, although we fully believe it is very vital to this project when the whole matter is under review by the Engineering Board, as it is sure to be one of the matters that will have to be taken into consideration. If I might express a personal opinion, I would say that I hope that most of the members who are interested in this matter in agreement with my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church), will raise their voices in protest in parliament. We are doing our part as far as humanly possible. We are not making threats, it is true, but we are pointing out what a very great menace the diversion of this water is to the international waterways, so far as Canada is concerned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The government has made a protest. In addition to that protest, has the government asked the United States government to carry out the terms of this treaty?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The treaty, as my hon. friend well knows, does not deal with the original protest. I pointed out that Chicago appeared to be on one side, and the federal government and the states surrounding Chicago, particularly Illinois, where a great nuisance has been created by the diversion of this water, on the other; and they have registered a most vigorous protest against the treatment of the sewage by the city of Chicago. We have registered our protest as an interested party, and received fair assurance that further diversion would not be permitted; and as the American federal government had joined in the protest and in the fight against Chicago, we felt on fairly safe grounds in that regard. If more drastic measures should be taken, I think the government of Canada stands ready and willing to take them, but beyond that, so far as I know we have not gone.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What would the hon. minister suggest as a drastic action? Would it be a claim of reparations for damages?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not a legal mind, but my hon. friend will see at once that if it comes to the question of settlement for damages, there must be an admission of the destruction. So far we have vehemently and strongly taken the position that we did not at any time and do not now agree to any diversion at Chicago of the international waterways. That is our position.

5 p.m. I pointed out to my hon. friend a moment ago that one of the reasons, as far as I could gather, why the matter had not been referred to the International Joint Commission by the Canadian government was that they did not want to change that position, that they did not want to admit in the slightest degree that in any way they were agreeing to 4,167 cubic feet being diverted, but rather against even one foot of water being diverted.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): I wish to refer very briefly to this resolution—not briefly because it is not important, for I believe it is important, but briefly because it has been fully dealt with by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), the hon. member for London (Mr. White) and the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). I can readily understand that the manufacturers can point out at once the loss that it means to the manufacturing, as well as to the shipping interests, and to those who live along these waterways. I wish, however, to touch on a point or two in connection with the transportation of grain, because to the grain grower this is a matter of vital importance. The part of Canada which is growing most of the grain at the present time is placed in a peculiar position. We have been permitted to continue for the last decade, I may say, in the growing of grain, largely because in Russia, where they have large areas of fertile land close to navigable rivers, they have been somewhat backward in their methods of dealing; but I fear that in the very near future Russia, if she comes back, as I believe she is likely to come back, is going to be a very keen competitor with Canada, and if we are going to hold our own and continue to grow grain so far from tidewater, where transportation means a great deal, every few cents saved is of vital importance. A matter that is affecting the level of our lakes at the present time is the forests. They are being cut away quite rapidly, and the more they are cut away the lower the level of the water in our lakes. A short time ago, perhaps a year, I read the report of a commission. I have not it at hand, but I remember it made the statement, in connection with the carrying power of boats, that when a large carrying boat is loaded down to about fifteen or sixteen feet, every extra inch means eighty tons: that is if it is loaded to go one foot deeper, it will be carrying 960 tons. Hon. members can readily see what it means to be deprived of six inches of water. To those not accustomed to shipping, who do not look deeply into the matter, the loss of six inches may seem to be a trivial matter, but I remember quite distinctly reading that evidence to which I have referred in the report of a commission. Many of the ports along the Great Lakes at the present time have a depth of about 19, 20 and 21 feet, and if we lose a very few inches of water, it will cause trouble for the boats that are now on the lakes. They will simply be compelled to make their trips with less than a proper load, which will add greatly to the transportation costs of grain, and that will react on those who are producing the grain. As I pointed out before, it may dry up the flow of grain from the western prairies to the European markets much sooner than would otherwise occur. I believe that in the course of twenty years the flow of grain from the prairies of western Canada to the European market may be greatly lessened by the keen competition of other countries, the one to which I have referred particularly, but it is likely to increase the trade with the United States. I believe that the United States will be compelled inside of twenty years to remove their tariff against Canadian grain, but in the meantime, as I have pointed out, every inch of cargo capacity on the Great Lakes means a gain to those who are producing the grain. I was going to say that, judging from the minister's reply, it was quite apparent they had been taking this matter quite seriously, but I hope they will use every power and every weapon they possess to prevent the diversion of, not merely 10,000 feet per second, but 4,000 feet per second which seemed to be agreed upon between the Chicago interests and the federal power of the United States. I am glad that this matter has been brought up and fully discussed, and I will close by urging upon the government the importance of this question to the growers of grain in the West.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): I endorse every word that has been said on this important question. A few years ago I had occasion in this House to bring up a similar subject and I had great hopes at the time that the grievances which I voiced would be relieved. But I never saw any practical result from that discussion. In 1842 a treaty was signed between the United States and Canada in connection with the boundary between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick. With regard to this treaty, I may quote from the statutes of the United States Congress, volume 1, under the caption "Constitution of the United States:"

> The laws of the United States made in pursuance hereto, on all treaties made and to be made with other countries, including those with respect to boundaries between Canada and the United States, are to be regarded as the supreme law of the United States, and every state in the union is bound thereby, notwithstanding any legislation it may pass.

I may say that by the Ashburton treaty it was provided that, in order to promote the industries of the inhabitants of the state of Maine and of the province of New Brunswick, the waters of the river St. John and its tributaries were to be free for the transportation of the products of agriculture and of the forests. Now, the treaty was signed in 1842, when the river St. John was accepted as the international boundary between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick. In 1841 an application had been made in the state of Maine by a private company for a charter authorizing the diversion of waters tributary to the St. John, but that application was refused. In 1846, however, another application was made and it was granted, authorizing a company to dig a canal to divert the waters from one of the tributaries of the St. John into a river in the state of Maine. Later on, still another application was made by interested parties in the state of Maine to build dams at the heads of certain lakes in order to provide more water for the Penobscot river, which prevented the waters of these lakes from flowing into the St. John river. As I indicated a moment ago, the St. John river comes within the scope of the treaty, and it is very important that there should be a sufficient quantity of water in the river to facilitate the floating of lumber. Our American friends as a rule claim everything that is coming to them under a treaty, and very often a little more. When the people of New Brunswick found that the Americans in the state of Maine were building a dam at the head of lake Chamberlin they sent a lawyer to Augusta, the capital of the state, to register their protest, and he did so, very forcibly. Unfortunately, however, that protest was of no avail and since that time we have been suffering from the action of our friends on the American side. Every year, in the months of June and July, a large number of logs have to be floated down the St. John river in New Brunswick, and at that particular time the water is so low in the river that it is almost impossible to drive the logs below the Allegash river in the county of Madawaska. We are therefore obliged to go to the government of the state of Maine and importune them to raise the dam in order that we may have enough water to float our timber. This is an undesirable and an unfortunate condition of affairs. By treaty we have equal rights to the waters of the St. John with our American friends, but they have taken upon themselves to deprive us of our privileges and to-day we are suffering in consequence of the failure on their part to live up to the treaty that was signed between the United States and Canada. But there are other instances, besides this, in which our American friends have done the same thing. Some sessions ago I heard that the same thing had happened somewhere, I believe, along the boundary of the province of Saskatchewan or Alberta; and a similar situation arose on one occasion in connection with some river flowing into lake Superior,—I think it was a tributary of the Rainy River. My point is that if we leave our big neighbours to the south of us free to trespass on our rights, sooner or later we shall have much more serious difficulties to solve. I would suggest that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) get down to work; the sooner he does so the better, so that we may find out where we stand with our American friends on these important questions, more particularly on one of such international significance as this.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings): I have the honour to represent a constituency in the province of Ontario in which there is an important port, and I shall certainly support the resolution that is now before the House. I refer to the port of Belleville, which, according to the fiscal returns, carried the third largest tonnage of shipping in Ontario. I am not so sure that this port has not already been affected by the diversion of waters that has been taking place. We have found, within the last two or three years particularly, that navigation is becoming much more difficult in that port, and during that time I have on different occasions brought to the attention of the government the fact that ships have been stranded in the harbour at Belleville. Incidentally, I might remark that the present difficulty there might easily be removed if sufficient dredging were done in the harbour, but the government does not see fit to undertake this work. I want to express my full sympathy with the resolution; in fact, I would urge it, if it were in my power to do so, in terms much stronger than those used by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church). The hon. gentleman has placed the matter forcibly and fully before the House, and this discussion has revealed two facts: the first is that there has been a steady diversion of waters from the Great Lakes; the second is, that the only step taken to remedy the evil is by way of protest. Now, is it possible that Canada is to be put in that position? She may make just as many protests as the government see fit to transmit to Washington, but the only action on the part of the United States is either a telegram or other communication in acknowledgement. Surely there must be some way of remedying the wrong that we claim we are suffering. If there is any question whatever as to the ownership or the jurisdiction over these waters, now is the time when it should be finally and effectively settled. The very best international relations exist to-day between Canada and the United States, and this being the case it occurs to me that it would be a wise course and in the interests of both countries to now deal with the question speedily and effectively, otherwise it may eventually develop into a serious international difficulty.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has perhaps urged sufficient reasons why the government should at this time take action. But it occurred to me during the course of his speech that we might well look at the other side of the question for a moment. Those representing the Chicago drainage district have made certain submissions to the authorities in this country, but so far as I have been able to gather, they have never undertaken to say that the only relief for the conditions that exist in Chicago is the diversion of the waters of lake Michigan. Not one of their representatives has been bold enough to urge the point. So I think we may very naturally conclude that that is not the only means of relief. If it were, from considerations of charity and humanity we might well see fit to forego the strict letter of our rights and grant Chicago some relief through the diversion of this water. But that is not the case at all; it is simply a matter of what are the just rights of Canada and the United States respectively. By the expenditure of money, be it great or small, the Chicago drainage district can very well provide a means for disposing of their sewage, and I think we should see that they proceed in this direction. The United States boast that they have more money than any other nation on the face of the earth. Let them translate that boast into action and provide a sewage system for the Chicago district.

We recognize the importance of our waterways, and we take a just pride in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence waterway, which we believe to be the finest in the world. We hope that some day ocean-going ships will reach the Great Lakes. For that reason, in addition to others, we cannot afford for a moment to jeopardize our rights by allowing this question to drift any longer. Therefore I strongly support the resolution, and I am satisfied that every hon. member will realize not only the justice of Canada taking action, but the necessity of her doing so at an early date.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I am sure our thanks are due to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) for bringing this very important matter to our attention. It is not often that we are all of one mind as to what ought to be done. I do not know that we will all agree with what has been done so far, but I am confident that we are all in accord as to one thing, and that is that Canada is suffering grievously as the result of the non-observance of her sacred treaty rights. I inquired of the minister to-day as to whether the government had requested the United States to carry out the terms of the treaty. This question has been in dispute for years, harm to the country has been increasing all the time, and it has now reached an acute phase. My own view is that if the matter was fairly and firmly placed before the United States authorities, they would be among the first to say that they intended strictly to observe their treaty obligations, and would discipline their citizens when our rights were violated. We have not heard from the government at all as to the breach of treaty obligations alleged by the hon. member for Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). Perhaps the government will tell us something about that.

I do not think this debate should close to-day. A return has been asked for concerning the papers that have to do with this question, and I think my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will agree with me that the proper course to take to-day is to adjourn the debate, so, that we may have the papers before us, and that he should undertake to give the House an opportunity of resuming this very interesting discussion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think the suggestion my hon. friend makes is a very proper one at this stage of the debate. Some days ago the government communicated with Washington intimating that we desired to lay on the Table of the House the despatches that have passed between us. We are awaiting a reply before we bring the despatches down. I assume there will be no objection to our request on the part of the United States authorities.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With the concurrence of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate so that the papers referred to may be tabled and the debate then resumed.

Motion agreed to.

BOYD CALDWELL COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I wish to make a correction of a statement I made the other day. It will be recalled that in speaking of the Lanark woollen mills I made a statement that would seem to reflect on the good faith of the Boyd Caldwell Company. I have taken the pains to get the facts of the case, and I find that the particular mill I referred to was burned on the date given.

I find also, however, that in the same village there was a smaller mill that had been in operation, the existence of which I knew of, but I was not aware that the mill belonged to the company in question. I wish to point out that I was in error to that extent, and I regret that I made a statement that might have conveyed a wrong impression.

LIFE INSURANCE LAPSED POLICIES

On the Order being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Church—That, in the opinion of this House, subject to certain reasonable charges including a certain sum for overhead expenses, lapsed policies of life insurance of companies with federal charters should be returned to the insured, and that in the interest of the insured such confiscatory powers of these companies should be further revised.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, as the minister has promised that the inquiry being made by the Insurance Department will be continued, in the recess of parliament, I suggest that this motion be dropped.

Motion withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—HALF-BREED SCRIP

House again in committee on Bill No. 5—(Mr. Kennedy, Edmonton)—to amend the Criminal Code. Mr. Marcil in the chair.

On section 1—Rights saved and continued.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): The other day when this clause came up it was found that there was something wrong with the wording of subsection 2. If it is in order I will move that subsection 2 as it appeared in the original bill be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

Any offence relating to or arising out of the location of land which was paid for in whole or in part by scrip or was granted upon certificates issued to half-breeds in connection with the extinguishment of Indian title may be prosecuted as if the said section 20 of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1921 had not been passed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have seen this new draft of subsection 2, and it meets with what my hon. friend had in view and also with what was the general desire of the committee when the bill was first studied.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, April the 16th next, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, April the 22nd next.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I should like to say a word on that motion, Mr. Speaker. I would point out that five days is a rather awkward number of days to adjourn, especially for members from the western prairies. It will mean they will be compelled to stay in the city over the holiday. But if we adjourn for eight or nine days it would give them a chance to go home and spend one or two days looking over their work. I would like to have it made nine days if that was the wish of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it should appear, after the Whips have a chance of conferring with the members of the House, that there is a general desire on the part of the House to extend the time, the government would be quite willing to act in accordance with that suggestion. Our view at the time I drafted the motion was that, as this year we met a little bit later than last, if we made the Easter holiday somewhat shorter than it was last year we would probably get through the business of the House a little quicker. As to the days that are taken as holidays, of course, Saturday and Sunday would not be days when the House would be sitting in any event, so really the only days that are taken off are Good Friday, Easter Monday and the Thursday before Good Friday, which I believe is a fast day. So we are really taking only a three days' holiday having regard to Saturday and Sunday being days on which the House does not sit as a rule. I think it might be well to let the motion stand for the moment. I brought it in this early in order that hon. members might have a chance of considering the matter, and if it should appear from the views ascertained by the Whips that it is the general desire of members to have the period extended, the government will be prepared to take that request into consideration.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I would like to support the suggestion of my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke). I know that in a matter of this kind it is largely a question of meeting the personal convenience of members. I appreciate the position of members from the far West who cannot go home under any circumstances, but at the same time the great majority of the members can go home, and there is another proportion for whom two or three days extra would make it worth their while going home. I wish to support the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As far as the government is concerned, its members would welcome a longer vacation because it would give us a chance to do some departmental business, but we thought we were meeting the wishes of the House in taking the shorter period.

Mr. FORKE: I might just explain the circumstances. Most of us over here are farmers from the West, and Easter is the season when farming operations commence. Speaking personally just for a moment, I have a pretty large farm; I left it a month ago, and I shall probably not see it again until next July. But if an extra day or two were added to the Easter vacation it would give me a chance to get back and look things over for one or two days.

Mr. L. J. LOVETT (Digby-Annapolis): We are not here concerned with farming. We are here to do the country's business, and it is very awkward for the members from the Maritime provinces to have to sit here session after session and remain in the city over a long holiday. I think the holiday should be made as short as possible so as not to waste any of the time of the session, and to give members a chance to get home earlier in the summer.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I should like to say just a word—

Mr. SPEAKER: I might say the motion was carried. Is it the pleasure of the House to have the motion reconsidered?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I think a great many members of the House would much prefer to see a short recess at Easter and have the House adjourn not later than twelve o'clock on any night. I want to protest against this House sitting so late at night. I think it is a physical impossibility for most members to sit here much later than twelve o'clock at night except on rare occasions, and I think it should not be done except with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just say a word in reply, because my hon. friend's remarks carry an implication. I think if he looks over Hansard of last year he will find that for the greater part of the entire session the House seldom sat past eleven o'clock. We rather adopted the rule of adjourning every night at eleven, and the hope of the government is that we shall find it possible to follow that same rule this year. True, last night the House sat a little later, but I think every member recognizes that it was an exception, and as a matter of fact, there were not very many members in the House last night. I will say to my hon. friend, though, that certainly so far as the government is concerned its wish is entirely in accord with his own, of adjourning every night at eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the motion stands.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to have it clearly understood that the government is wholly agreeable, if it is the general desire of members of the House to have a longer vacation, to meeting their wishes in that regard. It is immaterial to us whether the House adjourns from Tuesday the 15th to Wednesday the 23rd, or whether we hold to the dates fixed in the resolution. I put forward what I gathered was more or less the general view, but if any hon. member will move an amendment the government will be quite prepared to accept it if the feeling of the House seems to be in accord with it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the motion stands?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as read? Carried.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BRANCH LINES—RESOLUTIONS ORDERED FOR CONSIDERATION

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways) moved that on Tuesday next the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the several resolutions with respect to branch lines standing in his name on the order paper.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of these resolutions recommends them to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

AGRICULTURE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Experimental farms, $1,400,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I do not know why on earth this item is called unless it be for the purpose of slipping agriculture in,—that is, without a proper motion to get into the estimates for Agriculture. That can be the only reason it is done; there was no notice given of it at all. The opposition has a right to the regular motion to go into committee of supply, having regard to the different departments, and the customary motion with respect to the Department of Agriculture has not yet been moved.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Was the hon. gentleman going to move any motion? Is he hurt?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not understand the remarks of my hon. friend from Pictou.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Is the hon. gentleman hurt in any way?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member will see what I am going to do when I do it. I am not asking him for permission to speak. I am just pointing out that there was no regular motion—and I stand corrected if I am wrong—to go into supply, having regard to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and I think under the ordinary rules the opposition has a right to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the proceeding has been perfectly regular. The government has no intention of going on with the Agriculture estimates this afternoon; but, as my hon. friend knows, unless the government has already gone into supply of a particular department, it is impossible for it to proceed on either Thursday or Friday with the estimates of that department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We shall proceed with the estimates for the Department of Agriculture either to-morrow or Friday. I intended to announce to-night that we would take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture after we got through with the Home Bank discussion to-morrow; if not to-morrow, then Friday. It is in order that we may be able to go on with supply on Friday and to get through the business of the House that we are going into committe to-day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my right hon. friend will agree with me that we have the right to debate the question of going into supply in connection with any department the first time it is called.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has that right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman moves the House into supply. We are already in supply on Public Works. We need no motion to go into supply on Public Works. There was not the slightest intimation made in the motion put by his honour the Speaker that my hon. friend was going into supply for any other purpose except Public Works. He certainly did not say anything about Agriculture until we were in committee.

6 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must be very much mistaken. I understood one of my colleagues mentioned to my hon. friend that the intention was to go into committee of supply on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I objected to it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I object to reporting progress. After all, I think that is a pretty old rule and regulation of this House. All we want to know is exactly how we are going to be treated, and we can accommodate ourselves to it.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN BUILDING IN LONDON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I promised to lay on the Table before the House rose some papers relating to the Union Club building in London. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) is here now, and has the return. I have been looking over other papers, which relate to certain efforts the government made to acquire a building in London, and in order that members may have the full report before them, I will ask that some of this correspondence be added to what has been brought down. It does not touch the Union Club building but refers to other buildings.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 27, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

FEDERAL APPEAL BOARD

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I desire to lay on the Table the third return to an order of the House, dated 19th March 1924, showing the number of appeal cases heard and the number of decisions rendered by the appeal board.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, on the very same point of order that I rose yesterday: That the Ministers do not speak loud enough.

Some hon. MEMBERS (translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER (translation): I shall request the hon. minister to speak louder.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) (Translation): I desire to lay on the Table a return to an Order of the House dated 19th March, 1924, prepared at the request of the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Bowen).

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): I desire to present the petition of the Montreal Branch of the Presbyterian Women's League, protesting against the bill to incorporate the United Church of Canada.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CIVIL SERVANTS—AVERAGE SALARY

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. What was the average monthly salary paid to full time civil servants in Canada for the month ending February 28, 1914?

2. What was the average monthly salary paid to full time civil servants in Canada for the month ending February 29, 1924?

3. What is the percentage of increase?

4. By what percentage are the cost of living figures for the month of February, 1924, as compiled by the Dominion Department of Labour, greater than those for the month of February, 1914?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Mr. Speaker, I desire to comply as far as possible with the wishes of the Prime Minister in regard to these inquiries, and I am going to suggest that questions 1 and 2 be confined to the Departments of Customs and Agriculture. These two departments are chosen because in the case of the former the staff is largely clerical and in the case of the latter, technical. So I have redrawn these questions and would submit them to the House, if it is agreeable to the Prime Minister, in amended form. I have added another question, No. 5, as follows:

5. Is it not true that the salaries fixed in the reclassifications were based on normal living costs?

I can read the question as amended if you so desire.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon member would be more in order if he allowed this question to be dropped and put his amended question on the order paper.

Question dropped.

EXPORT OF PULPWOOD

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

Under what authority of what statute did the government pass Order in Council P.C. 1563 of August 14, 1923, guaranteeing to permit for a period of ten years the shipping out of pulpwood from Canada under existing contracts?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under authority of chapter 46, Statutes of Canada, 1923, 13-14 George V.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. HANSON:

1. When was the Quebec Harbour Commission created?

2. Under what statutory authority?

3. What loans or advances have been made to said commission since its creation, and under what authority?

4. Is it not a fact that loans or advances over and above those authorized by statute have been made by the government to this commission?

5. If so, when were such loans or advances made; in what amounts and under what authority?

6. Has the Governor in Council authority to order advances or loans to this commission over and above those specifically authorized by statute?

7. If so, where is such authority to be found?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. As at present constituted, in 1912.
2. 2 George V, Chapter 44.
3. 1912 to date—$7,724,800.
4. No.
5. Answered by No. 4.
6. No.
7. Answered by No. 6.

L'EPIPHANIE EXCISE OFFICER

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. What is the name of the excise officer at L'Epiphanie, Quebec?
2. What is his salary and the date of appointment?
3. Whom did he replace?
4. What salary was paid his predecessor at time of replacement?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. Ovila Gariepy.
2. Employed at Montreal, July 23, 1917; transferred to L'Epiphanie, January 1, 1919 at a salary of $900; permanent appointment, April 1, 1921; present salary, $1,440.
3. J. T. Brick.
4. $900.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

Mr. EVANS:

How much of the vote of $350,000, Hudson Bay Railway, passed at last session, has since been expended on this work?

Hon Mr. GRAHAM: $112,963.27

VANCOUVER—FISHERIES INSPECTION

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Is it the intention of the government to close the fisheries inspection office in Vancouver?
2. If so, what are the reasons?
3. If closed, what other facilities will be provided for those engaged in the fishery industry to deal with questions constantly coming up and seriously affecting their business?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN: Under consideration.

COST OF RURAL MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. MILLAR:

1. What has been the cost to Canada during the last year, for which figures are available, of rural mail delivery in each of the following postal districts: St. John, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Calgary, Vancouver?
2. What is the number of routes in each?
3. What was the average cost per mile in each?
4. What was the total expenditure during the same year on rural mail delivery in the three prairie provinces, and those portions, if any, of adjoining provinces included in the prairie province postal districts?

2. Is the government aware of any complaints made about the present grading of potatoes in said province?
3. If so, who made said complaints?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. The Canadian Horticultural Council has no jurisdiction over the matter of changing potato grades.
2. No.
3. Answered by No. 2.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ROYAL COMMISSIONS

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. What royal commissions have been appointed since the present government came into office?
2. How much has each commission cost the country —(a) in remuneration to the commissioners; and (b) in expenses or other outlay?
3. What of these commissions are now in existence?

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—SALARIES IN EXCESS OF $3,000

Mr. HODGINS:

1. How many appointments with a salary of $3,000 or more has the government made since coming into power?
2. What position does each appointee fill?
3. What is the salary in each case?
4. What are the new positions created?

MANITOBA BREWERIES

Mr. WARD:

1. What breweries have been operating in Manitoba within the period 1915-1924?
2. What requirements, if any, as to plant, capacity, etc., and what undertakings, if any, as to continuity of operation, observance of law, etc., are made of those securing brewers' licenses?
3. What fees are required to be paid for a brewer's license?
4. What additional brewers' licenses, if any, have been issued for Manitoba since July, 1923?

5. Does the government's policy limit in any way the number of brewer's licenses which may be issued in Manitoba?

6. What inspection or supervision, if any, is made from year to year of brewers' plant or operation?

7. What quantities of beer were manufactured by each of the brewers in Manitoba in the years 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, and what taxes were paid by each in respect of these quantities?

8. What brewers, if any, in Manitoba were convicted of infractions of the law during the calendar years 1922 and 1923?

9. Has the government yet established any policy as to the issue or continuance of licenses to brewers convicted of infractions of law, and if so, what is its policy?

10. How many convictions for having or operating illicit stills occurred in Manitoba in each of the years 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

11. Has the government given consideration to the proposal that it should adopt the policy of refusal to issue permits for manufacture of liquor within the bounds of those provinces in which the importation and sale of liquor for beverage purposes is prohibited? If so, what conclusion was reached or policy established?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU: I would ask that part of this question stand as an order for return and that the questions which involve the policy of the government be placed upon the order paper as separate questions. Some of the questions ask for information going back as far as 1913, which would take some time to get and would be quite voluminous.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands partly as an order for return. The balance of the questions should be re-drafted.

Mr. BUREAU: All I ask is that the part of the question which touches upon the policy of the government shall stand as a question, and that the rest of it be passed as an order for return.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS—INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the Standing Committees on Mines and Minerals, and on Forests, Waterways and Waterpowers be consolidated into one standing committee under the name of the Committee on Mines, Forests and Waters; that a new standing committee be formed under the name of the Standing Committee on Industrial and International Relations; and that Rule 10 be amended accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to call the attention of yourself, Mr. Speaker, and of the government to question No. 8, which reads as follows:

1. What royal commissions have been appointed since the present government came into office?

2. How much has each commission cost the country —(a) in remuneration to the commissioners; and (b) in expenses or other outlay?

3. What of these commissions are now in existence?

Why that question should stand as an order for return is a mystery to me. The answer must be relatively brief. Although the numbers of commissions are rather extensive, still, to make it an order for return and keep it out of Hansard is merely a ridiculous abuse of the rule.

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State): As my right hon. friend knows, these inquiries are in the ordinary course sent out to the different departments with a request that the information be furnished. I find that in one of the answers a statement has been included of the work in which the royal commissions in question have been engaged. I hold the statement in my hand, and my right hon. friend will see that it is quite long, consisting of about eight pages.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not responsible for that. I did not ask for that at all.

Mr. COPP: As the return has been made in this form it seems to me that under the circumstances the question should be made an order for return. I do not think it is necessary to have all these details spread upon Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I must protest against this reasoning, that because the minister's staff insist on answering a lot that is not asked, the government should make the question an order for return. I want only what is asked, and certainly less than half a page would contain the whole information.

Mr. COPP: It seems to me that if the different departments feel that the information ought to be furnished in whole instead of in part, the matter should be dealt with as an order for return.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House knows as well as I do of the drastic rule, No. 37—

Mr. BUREAU: Drastic?

Mr. SPEAKER: Rule 37, subsection 4, provides that:

If a question is of such a nature that in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the Table of the House, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the House, be deemed an Order of the House to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

I am, of course, governed by that rule.

POSTAL SERVICE SALARIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government has definitely promised a revision of the postal service salaries during this present session, and if so, is it the intention of the government to make such revision retroactive to April 1923?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In answer to my hon. friend, I stated in the House a few days ago that the government intended having an immediate revision made of the salaries of the Civil Service, which will, of course, include the salaries of the clerks to which he has just referred. The government is proceeding in accordance with that undertaking. As to whether or not there will be anything in the nature of retroactive action will depend upon the recommendation made by the Civil Service Commission in that regard.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask one further question? In view of the fact that the Post Office Department has been reorganized, and in view of the further fact that it would take perhaps a long time to complete the total revision, is the government prepared to consider an early revision of the salaries of the Postal Department as distinct from the whole Service?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that the government has already had representations along the line my hon. friend has just mentioned, and it was our intention to see that those representations were made known to the Civil Service Commission. We will expect the commission to take them into account in connection with the revision.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I would judge from what the Prime Minister has said that the Civil Service Commission is to make the revision of salaries. Is he aware that the Civil Service Commission is just a little more than through with the last revision?

Mr MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it the Civil Service Commission which is to make the revision?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend was in his seat when I made the statement the other day that the Civil Service Commission would be asked to do so—yes, certainly.

[Mr. Stevens.]

HOME BANK

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): The other day I drew to the Prime Minister's attention the fact that the extended commission in connection with the Home Bank allowed no inquiry into the formation of that bank and the circumstances under which its charter was granted. My right hon. friend said that the government would consider the question. Has the government yet arrived at any conclusion?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think the House will agree that the government has been wise in not reaching a final decision on the point to which my hon. friend has referred until after hearing the discussion on the resolution which is to be taken up this afternoon.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the government lay on the Table of the House—which has not yet been done according to my inquiry—the petition from the Home Bank depositors on the basis of which the first order in council was passed calling for a commission investigation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will lay it on the Table this evening.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move that we proceed to Notices of Motion to take up the resolution which appears on page 19 of the order paper with reference to the Home Bank, standing in the name of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine).

Motion agreed to.

HOME BANK INVESTIGATION

MOTION BY MR. IRVINE FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a parliamentary commitee should be appointed immediately to investigate the Home Bank failure, with a view to discovering any weaknesses in the Bank Act which may be amended to prevent a similar occurrence; to devise some means of protecting depositors generally; and to make recommendations as to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think it is somewhat unfortunate that through certain misunderstandings, which perhaps are difficult to avoid, and also through certain misrepresentations on the part of the press at times, I feel it incumbent upon me to say at the outset that I have not the slightest intention in the world of seeking to destroy the Canadian banking system. You will recall that our investigation of last year led to certain misunderstandings of that absurd character. Our investigation, of course, was dealing with the fundamentals of the finance system. Today we are dealing rather with the technique of that system; and while I believe that the time is coming when we shall have to have a new finance system, yet I want to see the system which is in vogue working as efficiently as it is possible for it to work while we are using it.

May I also add that in moving this resolution there is not the slightest intention on my part to seek to embarrass the government in any way. I recognize the difficulty of the situation with which the present government is confronted, and I am in hope that a frank discussion of this question by parliament, and some conclusion by parliament thereon, will be of some assistance to the government in dealing with this question before this session closes.

The resolution proposes a course of action by parliament in respect to a grave situation which cannot possibly be ignored. The House will recall that at the last session of parliament the Bank Act was revised, or, to be more specific, it was reviewed, and the pronouncement was made to the country that we had the best banking system in the world. Impressions were created both by the Bankers' Association and to some extent by this parliament that the banking system of Canada was on a very sound basis, that there was no chance of depositors suffering any loss whatsoever. That impression was undoubtedly created. The bill passed. And when we passed that bill we virtually said that this parliament can make no further improvements on this act, and upon this ground we granted a charter for ten years, notwithstanding the fact that a number of us pressed for the delaying of the ten-year charter for another year. But scarcely a year has passed when it is proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that there are grave weaknesses either in the Bank Act itself or in its administration. Under the present Bank Act, or in spite of the present Bank Act, wildcat schemes of financing have flourished undisturbed for decades. Gambling by responsible or irresponsible individuals who are regarded under the act as the guardians of the public savings has taken place. The depositors—including widows, orphans and the aged—are unprotected under this act; and recent events have swept the savings of 60,000 of the Canadian people away from them in one night. It is regrettable that it required a catastrophe of this magnitude to convince the general public and perhaps to convince this parliament—I will not say to convince the Bankers' Association—that there is need for amendments somewhere in the Bank Act. There are, of course, greater and graver and more fundamental weaknesses with regard to our finance system, than the failure of a bank, but I will not deal with them here. I will merely express the hope that parliament will not delay action on these until a greater catastrophe compels attention. I need scarcely remind hon. members of the series of events since the last session of parliament which have not only justified many amendments to the Bank Act which were proposed and rejected, but which have shattered the confidence of the public to a dangerous degree, impoverished thousands, and created a situation which makes action by parliament imperative.

To go no further back than just a few short months we find ample cause for that approach to panic which has characterized the action of the public with regard to banks, and that is also sufficient reason, I trust, to convince this parliament that something must be done. What are these disturbing events? In recent months two banks, which were considered beyond reproach, have been forced through their speculative proclivities to write off millions of dollars of loss. It was only by the merest chance—not by the prudence, not by the integrity, not by the efficiency of the management—but by chance that these losses were not sufficiently great to wreck the institutions concerned. This was closely followed by the absorption of the Bank of Hamilton by another bank, as the only possible escape from bankruptcy of one or both institutions. Then came the crowning calamity of this short period in the failure of the Home Bank with all its attendant losses, followed by a comatose condition of La Banque Nationale which was only revived by the injection of $15,000,000 from the Quebec treasury. And the end is not yet. I regret as much as any hon. member, the unfortunate circumstances that necessitate the reiteration of these unpalatable facts; it brings no special comfort to me to draw the attention of the House to the danger signal which points toward the future. I do so, however, because I honestly believe that it is within the power of parliament to avert the impending danger, and this resolution indicates one way of averting it. Not only have these unfortunate incidents undermined confidence, but there is no reasonable means so far proposed, either by the Bankers' Association or by this government, upon which confidence may be re-established. Our largest banks have, on an average, a surplus of about 12 per cent of assets over liabilities, but that 12 per cent includes frozen assets, profitless loans, depreciation of real estate, and fixture values, as well as bad debts. Our banking institutions are I submit not prepared for a situation which might very easily arise out of the present state of public opinion. If things go on as they are now going then further mergers, or the alternative of bankruptcy, is the inevitable destiny of a number of our financial institutions. In support of that contention I should like to quote one short paragraph from an editorial in the Vancouver Sun under the caption Canadian Banking System has Collapsed:

> When we say this, we mean it. We do not mean that the Canadian banks have collapsed but that their system has. The system of one man management; the system of public audit instead of government inspection; and the system which pays only three per cent on deposits and gives no guarantee; we repeat this system has utterly failed to sustain Canadian business and to maintain Canadian confidence.

When a paper of this repute and influence so boldly states that the system has collapsed, is it not reasonable for us to conclude that there is a very large percentage of the Canadian public that, with the editor of this paper, has lost confidence in the banking system? I do not need to tell this parliament that if the public have lost confidence in the banking system then the banking system has already gone, it cannot be maintained; and so the future can only be safeguarded by restoring public confidence. And public confidence cannot be restored by a pious expression of confidence on the part of the Bankers' Association. Public confidence cannot be restored by words from anybody, public confidence can only be restored by action; and the first act is to reimburse the 60,000 depositors who lost their money in the Home Bank failure. For I can assure this House that those depositors, with their families and friends numbering at least 300,000, a considerable percentage of the population, are not going to be lulled into quietness by assurances that this thing will not occur again. My argument is that the position of some of our banks is rendered more precarious by the well-founded fear inspired by recent events to which I have alluded. There have also occurred runs on banks which are evidences of the lack of public confidence. It is natural for people to think that the large banks are the safer institutions for them to put their savings in. It by no means follows that because a bank is larger it is safer, but it is nevertheless a general idea. Now that will lead to this—has already led to it; that the public will draw their money from the smaller banks—which may be safer in reality than the larger banks—and will deposit in the latter institutions, but with the result that the smaller banks will be wrecked. So that I prophesy—whether it be dangerous to prophesy or not—that in a very few years we shall have a considerable number of bank failures or a considerable number of mergers. One of these two results is inevitable under our present banking system.

In further support of the argument that the confidence of the public has been shattered, and that the shattering of that confidence endangers the whole banking system of Canada, I would refer to the fact that the deposits in the provincial savings banks have increased enormously since the failure of the Home Bank. I would also refer to the fact that a great many people, some my personal acquaintances, are hoarding their savings,—afraid to put them into any bank whatsoever.

So that it is in the interest of the banks, as well as in the interest of business and industry and in the interest of the depositors generally, that we should take some action in this parliament to restore the confidence of the Canadian public. "But," you say, "they will read the bank reports of last year", and these reports, you will contend, are quite reassuring being as they are filled with optimism. For instance, I have here the last report of the Bank of Montreal. It is an excellent report. I have also the report of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, another excellent report. But I have also before me the last report of the Home Bank of Canada, which is also an excellent report. Now, what assurance have I, or what assurance has any person in Canada, that there is any more ground for confidence in these other reports than there was for confidence in this report of the Home Bank? These reports of the Bank of Montreal and of the Canadian Bank of Commerce may be truer than that of the Home Bank, and they may not; there is no basis for assurance that they are not of the same character. A bank report in one month may prove the bank to be in a healthy state, while, the next month it closes its doors, and the auditors discover that the bank has been in a bankrupt condition for a decade.

Now I anticipate that some hon. members may advance, against this point, that the amendments to the Bank Act of last year will provide ground for greater confidence in these bank reports than could have been inspired by the last report of the Home Bank which was made before the Bank Act revision. The Bankers' Association has anticipated this discussion, and has prepared for the edification of parliament a pamphlet entitled, The Bank Act, and seeing that they have dealt with this point, I must answer their arguments, because I am going to argue that there is a need for further amendment to the Bank Act. But if this report of the Bankers' Association contains the truth, then any further amendments to the Bank Act would be superfluous. So that I must of necessity answer their argument if only on this one point. I would say the Bankers' Association, endeavours in this pamphlet to which I have referred to establish confidence on a false basis, and I have noticed also that a considerable section of the press, simultaneously with the issuing of this pamphlet, came out with editorials making a plea that the Bank Act, the dear Bank Act, should be given another trial. Now I recall an incident of my early boyhood. I remember seeing a couple of youths trying to get two roosters to fight; they succeeded, and one of the roosters was severely beaten. He ran to his own backyard around the barn, and got up on that old straw stack among the old hens, and he crowed and crowed as if he had been the master of all the henneries of the universe. Well I would characterize this pamphlet as the cock-a-doodle-doo of the Bankers' Association. Listen to it. It says:

> But no one can candidly survey the business mortality—

Mark the word:

> But no one can candidly survey the business mortality in 1920 and 1922 without reaching the conclusion that the bankers of Canada have marvellously well weathered the storm and conclusively demonstrated the soundness of the system under which they operate and the general prudence and skill of the management.

With studied care they have ignored the tragedy resulting from the mismanagement, the imprudence of bankers and the incompetence of the system over which they crow, and when they come to dealing with the merger of the Bank of Hamilton they say:

> As to the merger of the Bank of Hamilton with the Bank of Commerce, it merely follows a long line of precedents that are numerous in Great Britain.

Now, if a doctor who had lost a patient with smallpox had said to the family, "Huh! this is following a long line of precedent very numerous in the Philippine islands," do you suppose it would be refreshing to the rest of the family? I cannot see the reassurance in that. Let me hasten to say that there is not a single clause in the Bank Act that gives any basis for such assurance as is put forth by the Bankers' Association. I claim that it is immoral, it is criminal, for any institution, or for any parliament, to endeavour to build up an assurance on such an unstable foundation as that. Now the bankers' pamphlet in an endeavour to create the impression that the system is now safe, points to the great rock of safety—the efficient management, the integrity and so forth, of the banks and the bankers. There is no great change in this regard since the Bank Act was passed. The banking system is such as to force prudent men at times to be imprudent, to force well-balanced men to take chances. I say, the branch bank system of Canada, which gathers all the funds from the four corners of the Dominion and centralizes them in the hands of a few individuals who must lend out that money, sometimes actually compels men to be imprudent. But to answer their point: We had prudent bankers before the failure of the Home Bank, and yet their prudence did not save the Home Bank depositors. We had efficient management before that, and that did not prevent this failure. If we have not been safeguarded by prudent management in the past, how can we feel sure that we shall be safeguarded by prudent management in the future? Prudent management is not enough.

The next safeguard which they lay down as a basis for confidence is a slight amendment to the clauses dealing with auditors, which were made at the last session of parliament. Now, there is no real safety in any scheme of audit. I am sure every hon. member will agree with me in that statement; if not I would be very much amused to hear some hon. gentleman argue the contrary. There is no real safety in any scheme of audit, and no real safety in any type of auditor. There is no scheme of audit provided for by the Bank Act which will warrant the public of Canada feeling safe with regard to any bank in Canada. The government system of audit, which was defeated largely at the behest of the representatives of the Bankers' Association last session, would come nearer being a safeguard than any other type of audit, but we have not got that, because the Bankers' Association said it would not work, or offered some such excuse as that. But by a strange disregard for logic, the Bankers' Association are more nearly correct in the latter part of their pamphlet, when arguing against the advisability of providing a guarantee to depositors. In this regard they say, first, that there can be no guarantee of deposits which would be practicable, because deposits are without limit. I am glad to hear the Bankers' Association admit that. They would not admit it last year. We argued that deposits were without limit, and since deposits are without limit, the loans are without limit, and since the loans are without limit, we are virtually under a system of limitless issuance of paper currency. But they tried to saddle that on me and to say that I was a Bolshevik financier, who wanted to start a paper mill down in Ottawa to turn out bank notes. That was the impression they gave, but they virtually have that system now. I just point that out in passing.

Listen to this. On page 15 of the pamphlet they argue—in fact, they state—that deposits are a fourth mortgage. I hope that all depositors will realize fully their proper relationship to the bank. They have got a fourth mortgage which cannot go into effect if the first one goes into effect, because there will not likely be anything left with which to meet the fourth mortgage after the first, second and third mortgages have been paid. But here is the crowning absurdity of the Bankers' Association statement, and one which ought to be sufficient to induce that association to hire a logical thinker to prepare its propaganda. After having argued as to the safety of depositors under the audit system which was provided at the last session of parliament, and finishing that section of the pamphlet with the striking, self-evident fact which I quote:

> A law under which an unsound bank dare not continue to operate is a law which is effective.

—which was intended to apply to the present Bank Act, but which obviously does not; after having said that and argued that the auditing system is sufficient guarantee, the pamphlet releases the ferocious feline from the bankers' bag of tricks by proving the impracticability of guaranteeing deposits. The writer of the pamphlet had forgotten all about his previous argument, about the safety provided by the new audit system. That had been completely wiped from his mind, and this is what he said:

> If we had a system of guaranteeing deposits, there would then not be the same inducement to prudence on the part of the bank manager. He might, and very probably in some instances would enter upon speculation, incur grave risks, gamble on a chance with his funds knowing that if misfortune overtook his bank the depositors would suffer no loss.

May we not ask the Bankers' Association where their auditors would be all this time; the auditors considered a page or so before to be sufficient for the safeguarding of the depositors? Could the auditor who is so well fitted to protect deposits not stop this banker who had forgotten about his prudence, who had gambled with public funds? In other words, if the audit is so perfect as to constitute a safe basis for depositors, would it not prevent a bank manager at the same time from gambling with the depositors' money? That is where their lack of logic lands them. No, there is no safety for deposits under the present act, and those who argue that are only opening the doors of a fool's paradise. The general public must have some assurance of safety beyond any provision that now exists. If this is not given, members of this House would not be honest with themselves if they endeavoured to restore confidence on the present basis. Therefore, in the best interests of the banks themselves, of business and of depositors, I urge that something must be done.

Some hon. members may argue that that is a pretty vague statement to make—something! —and no doubt a number of hon. members will ask: "Yes, but what is the something?" That is what I want the committee for. This resolution calls for the appointment of a parliamentary committee to find out what "something" should be selected. I cannot imagine any member of this House, however, disagreeing with me on the necessity for doing something at this time. We are dealing now, not with theories of banking, theories of finance, but with a menacing situation.

I will briefly state what, in my opinion, might be done under the purview of this resolution. First, though perhaps not most important from the future national viewpoint, the depositors of the Home Bank should be reimbursed. But immediately someone will say: "How can that be done?"

4 p.m.

And some may even say that it cannot be done. I reply that this parliament should say unequivocally that it must be done; first, as a basis of re-establishing the necessary confidence for the continuation of banking and business in Canada; second, from the point of view of justice to those who have lost their savings in the Home Bank failure. While it is not for me to outline exactly how that should be done, yet I might intimate that, so far as I am aware, there are only two sources from which funds sufficient to reimburse the Home Bank depositors could possibly come. The first is from the banks themselves; the second is from the public treasury. Frankly, I believe that in view of the nature of the charters under which the banks do business, it is the bounden duty of the banks to make good the loss of the Home Bank depositors and to create a fund, as well, which will be a guarantee against a similar occurrence in the future. I will go so far as to say that parliament should make it known to the Bankers' Association that unless this is done, their charters will be cancelled.

With regard to the other source, it will no doubt be argued by some that it is unfair to tax all the people of Canada to make up the losses of a few of the people of Canada. That sounds plausible; but since we, the representatives of the people, are ultimately to blame for having failed to safeguard the public interests to the extent that a large section of that public has sustained a severe loss, the people must be prepared, if necessary, to pay for the blunders of their representatives. In any case, it is going to be more difficult to continue with a banking system which is really now taking away from the many in order that the few may have some, than it would be even to tax the general public to make up the loss of the Home Bank depositors. It is going to be infinitely more difficult to continue a system which permits bankers to gamble with the savings of the people without giving any guarantee to depositors. In this connection, may I quote a pararaph from the editorial column of the Ottawa Citizen which suggests another way of doing this:

> When the Canadian Northern Railway defaulted during the war, the government found it feasible to make an issue of financial credit from the national credit reserve. It would seem to be quite as necessary to protect the interests of bank depositors, as of railway financiers. National interests are just as much involved in the situation created by the failure of the Home Bank as they were in the failure of the private railway companies.
> Perhaps the government and the Canadian Bankers' Association do intend together to consider the possibility of taking care of the Home Bank depositors.

But another point of even greater importance than that of reimbursing the Home Bank depositors is that the Bank Act must be amended so as to provide, so far as is humanly possible, against a similar occurrence. This could be done perhaps by instituting some method of government inspection. Such a proposal was repudiated last year both by the bankers and this parliament, but I shall quote a short extract from Mr. Clarkson's official report to show that had there been a government inspector or auditor as far back as 1915 or 1916 the true position of the Home Bank would have been disclosed with much less disastrous results to the public. He says:

> It is submitted that an audit in 1916 would have revealed the fact that there was an absolute and definite loss to the bank of $500,000 in respect to the New Orleans deal, which, in itself, would have wiped out the reserve of $300,000 and impaired the capital to the extent of $200,000. It would have disclosed that the so-called Pellatt loans were advances on securities of loan companies which were in effect indirect advances on the security of lands contrary to the provisions of Section 76 of the Bank Act. In addition to this, it would have shown that to a large extent the business done by the bank was not a regular banking business and that there were potential losses in many other accounts where interest had been accumulated on "frozen" and unreliable securities.

Since the bank was in this deplorable state of potential bankruptcy since 1916 and continued well on until 1923 without the public knowing anything of the risks they were taking as depositors, is it not possible, and even probable, that there are other banks in the same condition, their annual reports to the contrary notwithstanding?

What might render the appointment of a government auditor not so necessary would be guarantee of deposits. That is, as a condition of granting them their charters we should demand of the bankers that they set aside a fund as a guarantee to depositors. What is the actual situation to-day? The bankers take deposits without giving any security at all. They conduct their business almost entirely on these deposits. But they also gamble with them. If they win in the gamble they retain the winnings; if they lose, the depositors suffer. Or to put this in another way, the bankers own the banks while these institutions are making profits, but when they become bankrupt the depositors take the place of the bankers and bear the losses. The Bankers' Association in their pamphlet go into this question of a guarantee fund at some length in an effort to show its impracticability. I would refer hon. members to the pamphlet, for I believe they will find it the very best argument to prove not only the practicability but the necessity for providing the very security which the bankers object to.

Now, if the House agrees with me that something should be done, although there may be wide disagreement respecting the definite proposals which I have suggested, may I hope that all hon. members will endorse my statement that not only must something be done, but it must be done now, and no further dilly-dallying permitted? Immediate action is required in the best interests of the banks themselves. I need not recapitulate; I merely refer to what, I submit, I have already proven, that public confidence has been shattered, and that unless something is done to restore that confidence we are going to have more bank failures, we are going to have more bank mergers, we are going to have more difficulty in doing business, and a larger section of our population is going to suffer.

But there is a human element to this that I want to draw to the attention of the House. Approximately five hundred accounts, aggregating $190,000, were lost in the Home Bank failure in Blairmore alone. Now, fifty of those accounts were in the names of little school children. Just think of the lesson to Young Canada which comes from that! A banking system that is heralded as the best in the world walks off with the savings of little children! Surely that is not a good argument for our citizens of to-morrow, neither is it a very good basis upon which to construct a real, sound Canadian patriotism. Ten widows lost all their savings and insurance moneys in the failure, in this same town. We are all champions of the widows and orphans,—shall we not do something for them now? Surely we are not going to let this opportunity pass of coming to the assistance of these widows who have lost all their means through the incompetence of parliament in years past—through the carelessness of the representatives of the people. But this is not all. At this same branch there were one hundred and ninety savings accounts in the names of working girls and married women. Two hundred and fifty accounts were in the names of miners.

I will not detain the House with any further tragic stories from Blairmore, neither will I deal with the distress caused by the failure of the bank in Fernie and Coal Creek, although I may say that I have a long list of sad stories that would make very moving reading. But I will refer to one or two other features. The Blairmore school district, for instance, which sustained a loss of $10,000 in the Home Bank failure, may be forced to close its schools; many workers that had saved some of their earnings through years of toil, and were depending upon these savings to carry them through periods of unemployment and other difficulties which confront the ordinary mortal from time to time, find themselves practically penniless and in distress; merchants of the town were also affected, and their inability to advance the necessary credit to their customers is bringing about a most depressing condition in the community.

I would again emphasize the point, that, apart from the business necessity for doing something at once, there is the human element—sixty thousand distressed people are looking to this parliament for immediate relief. We cannot ignore their plea; we must respond, and at once. I repeat, parliament cannot ignore this tragedy; it must act at once. If it is agreed that something must be done, and that at once, I hope hon. members will be of one mind that parliament must do that something. We cannot throw our responsibilities upon anyone else. We cannot even pass them on to the shoulders of a royal commission! This is expressly the business of parliament. I would appeal to the Prime Minister in this regard. Perhaps Canada has never before had a prime minister who has stayed more closely by the principle—at least, in utterance—that parliament should be the final authority, and should be consulted in all matters of public interest. Surely, here is an opportunity to put that principle into practice on a matter of urgent public importance, a matter that does not enter into the political arena at all,—or should not; if it does it will be a tragedy. This is a matter in which all hon. members may co-operate in order to meet a definite and menacing situation. In that regard I want to quote one sentence from the Winnipeg Tribune:

> Neither the government nor parliament has any right to evade responsibility for any part of the Home Bank inquiry by the reference to a royal commission.

My resolution asks for the appointment of a parliamentary committee to investigate this matter, with a view to amending the Bank Act, if it is found to be faulty in any particular; to provide for a guarantee for depositors; and to recommend some means of reimbursing the Home Bank depositors. I anticipate that it will be argued as against the appointment of this committee that a royal commission has already been appointed and it will therefore be superfluous to appoint a committee of the character asked for by the resolution. I am aware, of course, that the commission has been appointed, but if you have read carefully the ground which the commission had been instructed by the Privy Council to cover you will be convinced that there is a difference between the ground of the inquiry and the result sought, in the case of the royal commission, and those which apply in the case of my resolution. I will merely summarize the instructions to the royal commission. It is to decide what representations, if any, were made to ministers of finance in 1915, 1916 and 1918—that has been extended to cover the period from the granting of the charter to the bank until the time of its failure. Next, whether such recommendations by the directors of the bank warranted any action on the part of those then holding the office of minister of finance. They have to inquire also whether the ministers of finance took any action, and if so what action did they take. They have also to inquire what would have been the probable result had such action been taken in the said years, 1915, 1916 and 1918, and so forth. Then they have to find out what was the financial position of the bank at that time and whether the institution could have been saved by some action of the government of the day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If my hon. friend will permit me, does he understand that the references to the commission in that first order in council were based upon the statements contained in the petition presented to the government on behalf of the depositors? The order in council follows the allegations of the petition.

Mr. IRVINE: I quite understand, Mr. Speaker, the basis upon which the commission was drawn. I wish also to add that, as hon. members know, the scope of the commission has been extended to cover the whole period of the bank's existence. I suppose it would be of some value for Canada and for parliament to know whether any finance minister was negligent or whether he was not, or which finance minister was negligent and which was not. That would be of some political interest at least. But for the life of me I cannot see how that would affect the Home Bank depositors. I cannot see that the discovery that Sir Thomas White or some other minister of finance had been negligent would put one dollar in the pocket of a depositor.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If my hon. friend will again permit me, the petitioners, representing, as they alleged, sixty thousand depositors, stated that if these allegations were true it would become the duty of the government to reimburse the depositors. The government have isued a commission for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the allegations are true.

Mr. IRVINE: I would like to ask whether the minister has assured the depositors that in the case of the finding of negligence on the part of some minister the government has decided to reimburse the Home Bank depositors? If that is the ground upon which the commission was appointed, I think my question is a reasonable one. If they are not prepared to do that, what is the use of going to the expense of appointing a royal commission in the matter? But I find, on the contrary, that the government has very carefully safeguarded itself against making any such allowance. The order in council says:

> The petition alleges that, for reasons of a public and national character, owing to the state of war then existing the then Minister of Finance may not have deemed it advisable to exercise the power—

And so on; then it says:

> In view of the foregoing allegations the Committee of the Privy Council, without in any way accepting the view that in the circumstances mentioned it is proper for the government to expend moneys in the relief of the depositors of the said bank, are nevertheless of the opinion that it is expedient that an investigation should be made—

And so on. Now, if the government are not prepared to carry out the findings of the royal commission should negligence be found on the part of a government official, why put the public to all this expense? So we will wait, and I hope that the government, if they are not going to adopt my resolution, will definitely make this promise to parliament to-day. Otherwise we shall have to charge them with spending money foolishly. I am in hopes, however, that they will make that promise.

Frankly I have not much faith in royal commissions in matters of this kind. Royal commissions have in one or two outstanding historic instances been of some service, although I do not recall those instances myself. I will not be so sweeping in my criticism as to say that a royal commission never did any good. But I think perhaps I could put it better by quoting a paragraph from a correspondent in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday. Now, this correspondent is a very prominent Canadian; perhaps you will recognize the writer from the tone of his letter. He says:

> A government fears to face a question—a problem to be conveniently shelved—political friends in need of a job; and so your royal commission is set up, and with the usual benedictions, references—and expense money—goes on its costly way. What happens then is told chiefly in the auditor-general's report. Huge travelling expenses, private secretaries for commissioners, clerks, stenographers, prolonged hearings—and finally a report which nobody reads, much less acts upon, and which serves chiefly as additional printing contracts for others of the hungry faithful.
> I have sat in the parliament press gallery for twelve years. During that time I have seen countless royal commissions come, take their toll, and go; yet offhand I cannot recall a single report of a royal commission being translated into law. Not a single one.

I am not suggesting that any of these things apply to the government's intention in appointing a royal commission in this case—not in the slightest degree. But I am arguing that the public has just about as little faith in a royal commission as this man has. That is a fair and accurate representation, to my mind, of what the general public thinks of royal commissions, and it is a fair and accurate statement as to the results of royal commissions in the past. So that I have very little faith in the royal commission in this case doing very much.

But that is not the only reason why I press this resolution notwithstanding the appointment of a royal commission. We want action, and the royal commission proposes no action. The government did not say they will do this, that or the other thing; all they say is that they will get some information. Now, that information may be a dangerous thing so far as getting right action is concerned, because the royal commission is going to land the whole thing into a political squabble. How, you say? Well, I imagine it will be very good political propaganda. If it can be shown, on one hand, that Sir Thomas White committed any act of negligence whatsoever, I would imagine that the opposition, true to their past and standing on the dignity of their party, would naturally come to the defence of one of their party. Then, on the other hand, according to the public press the name of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) has been associated with the Home Bank, and it would be in the interests of the party to my extreme right to make as much political capital out of that as possible, and in the interests of the other party to smooth it over, if anything was to be smoothed over; and even the party to my immediate right the Progressives, have some interest, because the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) had some dealings with the Home Bank in its earlier stages and this investigation is going to cover the whole field. So the three major parties in this House are interested in a political sense in the findings of that commission. Only the Labour party has no clothes to wash in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the hon. member a question? Concede for a moment that all he has said just now is perfectly accurate; is it his opinion that there would be less of political squabbles if this investigation were made by a parliamentary committee rather than by a judicial body such as the commission?

Mr. IRVINE: I am very glad the Prime Minister has asked that question because it gives me an opportunity to point out more clearly just what a committee would do. According to the commission given by the Privy Council, the royal commissiion, to put it briefly, is to find some goat upon which to place the responsibility for the Home Bank failure. Now, a parliamentary committee would not be looking for a goat, it would be looking towards the amending of the Bank Act and towards reimbursing the Home Bank depositors. There is a basis for co-operation. Let the royal commission go on and find the goat if it wants to find one, and then we will have a political squabble to boot; but do not let us mix up a political squabble with the immediate demands of sixty thousand depositors who have lost their money. There is the point.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I assume my hon. friend does not want to be unfair, but every criticism he is making of this royal commission is a criticism of the assertions made by the depositors themselves, who came to the government setting out only these facts which we are investigating, and asked for a commission—the most impartial tribunal you could get in this country, consisting of the chief justice of a province where there are no Home Bank depositors, a learned jurist and a man who is not being paid for his services.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend, being an able student of law, understands, I have no doubt, the reason for that presentation of the case by the Home Bank depositors just as well as I do. He understands that they cannot come to this parliament with a direct plea that they be reimbursed; but on the special ground that during war time and in the public interest the finance minister of that day allowed this thing to go on, they want to make a compassionate plea to this government for reimbursement, and my hon. friend is aware of that. They had no other foothold than the one they took, but parliament has. We have another foothold, and I want to get that now; that is why I want this committee.

Now let us follow the argument just one step further. We want action at this session of parliament. The government cannot give us an assurance that the commission will be done with its sittings this session; indeed, it cannot assure us, perhaps, that the commission will be done next year. It has not assured us that there will be any report made when the commission has done its work. It may report this year, it may report next year, it may report never, and every day we are getting farther away from the tragedy and there will be less inclination on the part of parliament to do anything. This is the time, this is the moment for action, and I submit that the way of the royal commission is the way of death to the hopes of Home Bank depositors if we are not very careful. On the other hand, the parliamentary committee would get action immediately on the points that are of immediate interest. It need not necessarily clash with the investigation which the commission is to make. I have pointed out the difference. Of course we want to know if our public men have been culpably negligent, because it would serve us in good stead during an election, it would give us material for speeches; it would be "good stuff,"—so to speak—we want that; but more than that, we want reimbursement of the Home Bank depositors; and more than that, we want the Bank Act so amended as to make this thing impossible in the future. Then the parliamentary committee would secure full co-operation.

I do not believe there is a party in this House that would dare, in a parliamentary committee of the character I am asking for in this resolution, to make political capital out of the situation; I do not believe that they would want to. I would like to see the government take parliament into its confidence in this matter of public interest, and give parliament a chance to co-operate. I believe it would work. I believe we would find a way out, and particularly would it be of advantage to the government, situated as it is in a minority, and perhaps forced, if it takes action at all, to take action which would constitute a precedent; it might be to the government's interest and advantage to have the full co-operation of parliament in anything that might be done. And so I would urge the government to accept my resolution. I urge it now in all sincerity. I urge it with the very best of motives. It may be that hon. members will show how badly mistaken I am in doing this, but at least grant that I am sincere, and I am just as assured that the government is sincere; and if they are sincere, as I believe they are, they will listen to my argument and they will see the advisability of appointing a committee in order that the action which is necessary may be taken immediately.

But if the government will not accept this resolution and will not support it, I have three questions that I want to put, and I hope that the Prime Minister or some other member of the government will give specific answers to them.

1. If the committee is not given, can the government guarantee that the commission will report to this session of parliament in time for parliament to deal with any recommendations which the commission may make?

2. Will the government promise that the depositors of the Home Bank will be reimbursed from some source, or in the event of the commission discovering negligence on the part of any government official at any time will the government promise on that ground to reimburse the Home Bank depositors?

3. Will the government give a reasonable assurance that the Bank Act will be amended this year, either as I have suggested or in some other way that will meet the requirements more adequately?

Mr. E. C. ST. PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Since, Mr. Speaker, the failure of the Home Bank, the Canadian and foreign press have never ceased commenting upon the unfortunate consequences of this financial disaster. Not only those most intent on being reimbursed but the public at large have shown considerable interest regarding the charges made and explanations given. Indeed, the failure of the Home Bank has been a national calamity. Those who are more directly concerned are mostly humble toilers, and, as sympathy is still deep-rooted in the Canadian soul it naturally extends to those who suffer after having endeavoured to economize. Therefore, all expect that this parliament, this government, and the bankers will find means of coming without delay to the rescue of the unfortunate depositors. I mention this parliament, Sir, for it is not to a party in particular that the losers, at present, direct their appeal. They submit this request to the whole House, for their common misfortune ignores party differences.

This banking disaster did not spare my constituency which, already, had felt the sad effects of a similar catastrophe when the run on the Ville-Marie Bank took place. At the time the Banque Nationale was established, the Hochelaga district was chosen for a branch office to carry on business, and following the merging of this banking institution with the Home Bank, the latter made strenuous efforts and did much canvassing to establish a good connection with thrifty depositors. I lay stress, Sir, on "a connection with thrifty depositors" so as to bring out the kind of transactions carried on by the Home Bank in our midst. "No discount or very little" such were the instructions given to their local manager. A fine institution, an institution which obtained from our workmen all their savings, to have outsiders benefit by them! As "to helping" the local trade, no one gave it a thought, or, to express it better, they refused even to give it a thought.

More than 1,800 residents of the suburbs of Hochelaga and Préfontaine as well as the church wardens of the two Roman Catholic parishes of the same district saw their savings and parish revenues, to the amount of over $300,000, engulfed in this failure. It is, therefore, easy to understand the extent of the moral and financial disaster caused by this wreck of a bank that all thought established on a sound basis. Thrifty workmen, widows, guardians, old people, lost all they possessed, less 25 per cent received a few months ago. Useless to add that the future is a source of worry to them. They appeal not only to the government but to parliament and to the banks to obtain assistance.

Their request for help is based, first, on the following contention that the government, parliament and the Bank Association must recognize that the depositors were insufficiently protected by the Bank Act of 1913, but which was amended in 1923. The depositors contend that this act gave a free hand to unscrupulous bankers to include in their financial statements to the government, bad debts or loans of a doubtful character as forming part of a liquid asset easily redeemable.

While reading over attentively a passage in an editorial of the Gazette, the proposed amalgamation of the Hochelaga bank and Banque Nationale is highly approved, we find a censure of the old system of reports to the government, in the approval given to the system established since last autumn. I shall read the English text following it with the French version:

The amendments to the Bank Act made last session of Parliament appear to have directly affected the career of the Banque Nationale, as the penalties provided therein against a banking institution making returns not entirely justified by the banks true financial conditions were such as to deter the management from attempting to include doubtful debts or actually bad ones as a part of its current assets. It is understood the position of the Banque Nationale was of a character that, had the government not arranged for its absorption by the Banque d'Hochelaga and given the new combined institution a line of credit, failure of the Banque Nationale would have resulted thereby injuriously affecting a number of solvent institutions and creating a very widespread depression. It must be remembered that the Banque Nationale had 230,000 depositors, citizens and traders in the province of Quebec, who would have been at least temporarily without funds to pursue their avocation and in many cases, unquestionably, this would have led to real distress.

The text is explicit. "The present boards of directors of our banks would find it impossible, under the new act, to 'deceive' the government." The old act, therefore, did not provide the same safeguard for the Department of Finance. The depositors, therefore, conclude that they have been the victims of the defects of an act, and it is in their interests as well as those of the country, not to let them be crushed by a legislation forgetful of their rights of property and of the safeguards enacted for the protection of their savings.

[Mr. St. Père.]

I further state, Sir, that these depositors are neither distrustful nor pessimistic. They do not even see in the working of the Canadian banking system, the cause of all the great financial disasters, such as the failure of the Home Bank, but it is on the inefficiency of an act leaving an open door for false statements to slip through that they base their claims upon. And they are right in so doing.

The depositors request assistance on another plea. It is of a purely economic order. These unfortunate people were, no one will deny, producers of capital, this child of labour and thrift. The thought and cares of the future, the natural longing for a lasting improvement of their condition, at the cost of an increase of labour and sacrifices dating back a number of years, had induced these people to deposit regularly their savings at the wickets of the Home Bank. And these savings what did they intend to do with them? To wipe out mortgages, to provide for their old age, to defray the education of the children, to guard against the days of unemployment, and so forth. In a word, it was forethought under the name of thrift. To refuse to come to their assistance would be equivalent to convincing them, that to provide for the future and economize, are but passing virtues, since the governing powers would refuse to recognize its worth and merit, in days of great financial catastrophies.

My policy, Sir, was never one of sowing gloom and pessimism, but I have never failed to look at facts in the face. How many persons have come to me to tell me that they had no further desire to economize; some have stated to me that they would hoard their savings in the future, and what is more, little children have declared that their savings would not be deposited in the school banks. What is the use of saving, all seem to exclaim in chorus, if our denial and sacrifices of legitimate pleasures are but a source of disappointment and regrets? Let the most crafty economists, the financiers of our "Wall Street," the most skilled bankers bring them such consolation as: They must take courage, the future belongs to those who struggle. All these depositors, robbed by an administration to say the least ignorant of the most elementary principles on banking,—I am sorry I cannot say more, the directors of the Home Bank are, at present, awaiting their trial—will answer their comforters in the manner in which the old Jew of the novel of Edmund About did to his son who had lost his money: "Do not say that you will earn again this money; money lost is never again earned."

I previously stated, that a reason of an economic nature justifies their request. All the merchants of my division approve of such a reason, as it is fully shown by a resolution recently passed by the association of business men of Hochelaga and Maisonneuve, Indeed, the credit for articles of consumption has been greatly perturbed by this failure within the boundaries of the districts where the Home Bank carried on business—with the depositors, I mean—we all know that there exist very numerous cases where credit for the necessities of life is justified, and I might add that in cities this kind of credit is necessary. It is owing to the savings from his salary, during profitable periods, that the workman can set aside a reserve for rainy days. It, therefore, follows that the loss of this reserve places him in the impossible position of meeting his bills, and, consequently places his tradesman in an awkward financial position, easily understood. All the merchants of Hochelaga were set back by the failure of the Home Bank. They associate their request for assistance with that of their unfortunate clients. Local trade would return to its normal state if our intervention gave the depositors the means of entering into possession of the balance of their savings.

The depositors appeal to our parliament because they think it is in a position to emulate, with the co-operation of the banks—for the latter would benefit by re-establishing confidence among the depositors—the generous action of the Quebec government towards the depositors of the Banque Nationale.

It is necessary to remember—states the Montreal Gazette—that the "Banque Nationale" had 230,000 depositors recruited among the citizens, tradespeople of the province of Quebec, who, in many cases, would have found themselves temporarily without funds to carry on their business, this fact would undoubtedly have been the cause of real distress.

Have not the 60,000 depositors of the Home Bank representing an aggregation of about 400,000 people, the same acquired rights as those "temporarily without funds?" Let us again read the Gazette: Its extracts are interesting and justify the benevolent attitude that parliament should adopt towards the depositors of the Home Bank:

Sir Robert Horne, speaking before the Canadian Club, recently, remarked that credit was at the basis of commerce and prosperity of all countries, and that anything which would prejudice the credit of Canada, and particularly of this province, was of a nature to create in finance and commerce a degree of confusion difficult to gauge at present. Two eminent bankers, Sir Vincent Meredith and Sir Herbert Holt, shared the same opinion and although not condemning the principle of the bill, favour the latter and approve the idea of the government of safe-guarding the credit of the province and maintaining the indispensable stability of its financial situation.

These three great financiers will, no doubt, be the first to admit that the failure of the Home Bank—failure which extends to many provinces—has thrown such confusion into commerce that it is difficult to describe. They will admit, moreover, that the intervention of the government together with the banks would contribute for the least "to the financial stability" of those who were plundered through the failure of the Home Bank. I state again that this failure occurred as a result of special developments and under the purview of an act that gave no assurance as to the truth of the statements forwarded to the government.

An hon. member recently stated in this House, that business and sympathy were always at loggerheads. Yes, if we consider the existence and prosperity of a people as being intimately linked to the conception of living so as to devote ourselves to things material; no, if the conception of that existence and that prosperity has a more latin turn of mind, that is to say, if while appreciating the business end of it to its full value we insert in the solution of certain financial problems, an amount of good-will—a moral virtue which disposes us to wish well to our fellow creatures regardless of our own interest, and which is the more so justified that its commandments impose upon us greater sacrifices. The depositors of the Home Bank expect this good-will from the hon. members of this House.

I know, Sir, that the request made by the depositors meets with some opposition. The objection is that no law protects the depositors. This is a reason more to implore in their favour for it would be an opportunity to do away with this new maxim of "nullum jus, summâ injuriâ." Let us not forget that those who take refuge behind strict legality—the absence of a protective law for the depositors is strict legality—for those who oppose their request—and exact their pound of flesh, are sometimes very unjust. Let us put justice to a true test! It resembles that leaden tape of the Lesbian architects, which conforming to the irregularities of the stone, follows its shape and contours.

Are we to re-imburse the depositors from the public treasury? The answer of the depositors is this: The King, in the words of the statute, can do no wrong, but let us not forget that the kingdom is not for the King, but the King for the kingdom, and that it is easy for him through the voice of his parliament to remedy the ill effects of a law having brought on a disaster. Moreover, since when has the soul of the Canadian people so much changed? Has it decided not to lean any more towards the humble and refuse to listen to the complaints of those who suffer? The depositors have a right to their money. Let us make an appeal to justice to render unto others what belongs to them. On the other hand, the Canadian people—and it would be such a trifle to them—would be performing such a worthy act of charity by giving what is theirs to the depositors.

The duties of charity and justice differ; but, if we must not confuse them let us beware of separating them, for they are closely linked together.

This re-imbursement would create a dangerous precedent. Not so, if we are to take the word of certain bankers conversant in the matter, who assure us that the new Bank Act will prevent false statements in the reports forwarded to the government, and consequently also prevent failures. Moreover, must not the first cares of a legislator be those of establishing the rightfulness of his orders by showing that they conform to the dictates of conscience? What beautiful and laudable precedents would we establish if they always agreed with them.

The Bank Act will be held in greater respect in the future, are we assured. So much the better! If not, we would be justified to apply to it Shakespeare's word:

> ...It is a custom > more honoured in the breach > than in the observance.

The Home Bank was not the only institution where depositors could place their savings. They lost; so much the worse for them. They should have chosen a sound bank. They are responsible for their actions. May Heaven come to their rescue! It is true, they were free to place their savings in a sound bank; but was it not preached to them in all possible manner and in all the newspapers that the Canadian banking system rested on a sound basis? Has it ever been explained to church wardens, who are obliged according to law to deposit the parish funds in chartered banks, what institutions are covered by "this" or "these" sound banks? To choose a sound bank? Would the banks have dared to advise the public at large, previous to the Home Bank disaster, such a thing as to deposit in a sound bank? Certainly not, for they would by the fact have hinted to the depositors that there were some tottering ones among them, a statement which would have been in direct contradiction with their conception of soundness throughout the whole banking system, and, including all of its constituent units.

[Mr. St. Père.]

Are the depositors responsible? No, for the failure of the Home Bank cannot be attributed to them. "But, might it not be said: they should have known that the government did not guarantee and does not yet guarantee the deposits in banks. Civil justice makes no allowance for the plea of ignorance. To this we answer that a great number had no knowledge of the law, but had an unshakable faith in the soundness of banks, impressed upon them through the reports published in the official Gazette of Canada, in the name of the shareholders and by the statement of the highest integrity of the board of directors of banks. Now, that they have been wronged because they believed in the honesty of others, a sentiment which disposes us to trust in them, to confide to them even that which they might take advantage of to our detriment; because these people had this frame of mind of trusting in the constituted authority; because they shared this feeling of security. inspired by the great Canadian financiers and, what is more, by certain financial newspapers of high standing, which, commenting on the debates of the sittings of the banking committee of 1923, ridiculed and qualified as idiots and fanatics those among the members who insisted on more guarantees for the depositors, and a more thorough system of inspection, we now say to these people: "Be gone, you were wrong to believe in the truth taught in this maxim of Latena: "Confidence is the esteem of oneself extended to others." I ask, Sir, should not responsibility before the law be altered in favour of the depositors, in view of such a situation?

A number of resolutions appear on the orders of the day. Nothing must be neglected in these days, for hardships prevail among a great number of families, merchants complain of delay in the collection of debts, finally, this failure has created a kind of panic in many provinces. To come to their rescue would give the measure of the efficiency of such legislation in the shape of whatever results are secured, and it would be judged accordingly to the actual benefit derived from it.

The government has decided to hold an inquiry into the affairs of the Home Bank. Let it be thorough, even if we have to go back to the days when Mgr. Charbonel received as a deposit the first savings of the diocesans of Toronto. No one should be spared. Let it have a practical result.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, allow me to support the request for assistance and relief addressed to the government, parliament and the Bankers' Association, by the 400,000 afflicted, anxious of learning what will be our attitude, by the passage of this encyclical letter where it is written: "that the rights wherever they may be found" must be religiously respected; and the state must guarantee them to all the citizens by preventing or by avenging their violation. However, in the protection of private rights, it must make special provisions for the failings of the poor. The wealthy class in a way make a rampart of their wealth and are less in need of public protection. The poor on the contrary, without means of guarding themselves against injustices, rely especially on the protection of the state. If the law of justice, Sir, does not provide for all men a sufficiency in all their wants, there will always remain, let us not forget, a wide field of auxiliary and sublime usefulness open to compassion and charity.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has so ably and fully covered the ground in his admirable presentation that there does not appear to be very much left to say. However. I wish to corroborate some of his statements, and, if possible, to present some new thoughts in connection with the banking system of Canada. Money as it circulates through the community may be regarded as the life blood of the country. Trade and commerce, all the varied enterprises of the nation, are dependent upon an efficient and stable currency. To my mind it is beyond question that our people generally have regarded the banks as safe places in which to deposit their money, and parliament in any legislation touching banks should do its utmost to protect the interests of the public. If parliament fails to do this, then it is undoubtedly lacking in that proper regard which it ought to have for the welfare of the people. We as members of parliament should thoroughly realize the responsibility that devolves upon us as legislators to do our utmost to protect the public interests in this respect. Canadians have been in the habit of depositing their money in banks, not as an investment but in order that it might be safe and available when they needed it for immediate use. In that respect deposits of savings are very different from deposits of money required for investment in industrial enterprises or for purposes of speculation. The people felt when they were making these deposits that the banks were perfectly safe, and that they could get their money at any time they needed it. The failure of the Home Bank came to them as a terrible shock. We have heard this afternoon what happened, by reason of that failure, to various classes in the community who had placed their savings in the Home Bank quite confident that the money was secure beyond all question. We have heard this afternoon of many people who have deposited money in this bank for safe keeping who have lost it all. We have heard about the labouring classes, young men and young women, who deposited their money expecting to be able to withdraw it when they required it and who have been unable to do so. Alas, the failure came. Men and women, widows, hard-working men, old men and old women who desired to withdraw their money from this bank found the door closed, and a sign above it "No admittance". Some of these widows, I believe, had deposited the life insurance of their deceased husbands which was probably their sole means of sustenance, and it was all lost. Old men who had retired had deposited in the bank the little bit of money they had saved, and these men were unable to obtain even a portion of their deposits. I believe many of them turned away in tears. The ones who are suffering most are not the wealthy class, or the ones who could well afford to lose a little money; but the greatest sufferers were those who depended on their deposits in the bank to sustain them in their old age when other things failed, and they were shut out. I think it is very important that the hard-earned money of the working men and women, upon which they are dependent for their old age, should be properly safeguarded, so that they would be assured of it when required for necessary use. In the locality where I live a great many have suffered. In a little town not a great distance from where I live, very close to $400,000 was deposited by people of that class. In another town quite close to my home over $100,000 was deposited by the same class of people.

It is very important that the people should have confidence in our financial and banking institutions of the country. Last year we revised the Bank Act. I am not going to say that there were not important amendments to the Bank Act placed on the statutes at that time, or that some of the amendments were not an improvement, but it appears to me they did not go far enough.

The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has referred to bank inspections. One amendment in regard to inspection was urgently pressed before the committee last year, but the Bankers' Association was unfavourable to it. The bankers have their own audit system and appoint their own auditors to do the work. What for? Not primarily to safeguard the interests of the public, but to safeguard the interests of the bankers and the shareholders of the bank. So far as the depositors and the general public are concerned, they have not that same safeguard of their interests as the bankers have. If an inspector or auditor who was independent of the banks, not appointed by the banks but by the government, were charged with the investigation of the banking system of this country, I cannot see why it would not to a great extent safeguard the interests of the depositors and those who did business with the banks.

With reference to the amendments which were made to the Bank Act, as I view it, as a member of that committee, I think the amendments went possibly as far, and no further in my opinion, than the Bankers' Association was willing to concede.

Mr. FOURNIER: Is it not a fact that the Home Bank suspended its operation before the revised Bank Act of last year came into operation? Is my hon. friend prepared to say that if that Bank Act had been revised many years ago as it was revised last year it would have prevented such a failure as that of the Home Bank?

Mr. WOODS: I am not prepared to state that such a revision would have saved it, but the Home Bank was in a precarious condition many years ago—long before the revision of the Bank Act last session. As I have already said, the masses of the people of this Dominion believed that the Bank Act and the banking system were and had been in years gone by of such a character that there was no possibility of a bank failure and that their deposits would be absolutely safe. After the failure of the Home Bank, individuals came to me and referred to that, stating that they considered that the government was responsible to depositors for money deposited in a chartered bank. That was the general impression amongst the people; having that impression, they deposited their money with confidence, and the banking system has fallen down to such an extent that depositors have lost millions of dollars which they expected they would receive.

I said that the Bank Act was under revision and that in my opinion, a government inspector or auditor of banks would have in some way helped the situation. Some time ago, we listened to an address by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), who, to my mind, gave us a great deal to think about. He gave us some information regarding a federal reserve bank. But whatever system it is thought wise to adopt by the men who transact the affairs of this Dominion—and we have wise, capable men, men who have no peers, I believe, in any other country—it is a fact, so we are informed, that government inspection and a federal reserve bank system have proved to be a good thing in the United States, and something should be done to lift the banking system of this country above what it is to cause the people to have confidence in our banks, and to make it impossible for men and women who deposit their money, not for speculation, but for investment and safekeeping, to lose it. The government should take hold of the situation and work out some scheme that will put the banking system of this Dominion in such a position that an occurrence like the Home Bank failure will be impossible in years to come.

The hon. member for East Calgary has referred to the action the government has taken in appointing a royal commission. Many questions have been asked about it. I hope that commission will make a thorough investigation into the whole system, as it has been appointed to do, and that its report will be laid before parliament before the close of this session.

I am not going to make any definite statement in regard to my attitude on the question of reimbursing the depositors further than to say this: If it is proved satisfactorily that a minister of finance, past or present, in years gone by or whenever the occasion was, was remiss in his duty, or that the government of that day neglected to investigate thoroughly the affairs of the Home Bank; if it is proven to be the case, as a minister of finance of the last government in a statement in the public press excused himself in that regard, that the investigation did not take place at the time because the war was on and because there was a danger of upsetting the financial system of the country and breaking the confidence of the people in our banks; if the then minister of finance neglected to undertake the duty of investigating the affairs of the Home Bank in 1915, 1916, or any other year, on the ground that this inaction was in the interest of the people of Canada; and if as a result of that inaction on the part of the minister, hundreds and thousands of the people of this country lost their little all, the little money they had in the banks, and citizens are suffering thereby,—then, in my opinion, the government and the people of the Dominion of Canada are bound to reimburse the men and women who have suffered in the public interest. ,

The ground has already been thoroughly covered, and I believe the attitude of the great majority of hon. members is to do justice to the poor, the widows and children. If the poor people, widows and children, have suffered because of the public interest in 1915, and 1916, those same people should be reimbursed for their losses in that regard.

Mr. R. H. HALBERT (North Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to take up much of the time of the House, because the situation has already been extremely well covered by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine). I should, however, like to put on record this petition:

We, the undersigned petitioners, being your constituents and depositors in the Home Bank of Canada, and the friends and neighbours of such depositors, respectfully submit as follows:

Whereas the Home Bank of Canada did at the time of suspension have on deposit by the citizens of North Ontario a sum upwards of three hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars, divided among approximately two thousand people, mostly of small means.

And whereas the suspension and subsequent insolvency of the said bank has caused and is causing serious hardship among many people.

And whereas your petitioners are led to believe that the insolvent condition of the bank was known to the government for many years and that it was allowed to continue business because its closing might have occasioned a serious crisis in more difficult times.

We therefore your petitioners do hereby respectfully request you to use your utmost endeavour and your influence as a member of parliament at Ottawa to induce the government of Canada to take whatever action may be necessary to ensure the depositors full payment of their deposits.

And your petitoners will ever pray.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this petition is signed by William Brethour, R. C. Brandon and six hundred and seventeen other persons in my constituency. We have already heard of the many hardships resulting from the failure of the Home Bank. Allow me to stress the baneful consequences to many war and other widows in our small towns, where this bank had most of its branches. These widows sold their property in the country, moved into the small towns and villages because it was cheaper for them to live there, and many of them deposited the proceeds in the local branches of the Home Bank. But, worse still, many of these widows were induced, by the prospect of receiving higher interest, to become stockholders of the bank. The result is that not only have they lost their deposits, but they are also subject to double liability. This means that many a little home purchased in these small towns will have to be sold to meet that double liability.

Undoubtedly, as has been already stated, the impression prevailed generally throughout the country—although unfortunately it proved not to be well founded—that money deposited in a chartered bank was practically safe as the Dominion government was, in a sense, behind the bank.

Now, to appoint a royal commission to investigate the failure of the Home Bank and apportion the blame upon the responsible parties with a view to their being sent to jail, will not help the widow and her small family. On the contrary, it will rather increase her burden, because the wreckers who are incarcerated will have to be maintained in jail by, among others, their victims. Then again, in some cases those in charge of the bank who speculated with the money of the depositors were guilty of even more than robbery. I would characterize their crime as practically murder in the first degree, because some of the unfortunate depositors who lost their all in the wreck have gone out of their minds. I hope this parliament and this government will see to it that justice is done to the innocent victims of the unscrupulous manipulators who were responsible for the Home Bank failure.

While it may not be possible under the present Bank Act for the government to reimburse the unhappy depositors, I think perhaps something might be done by way of an insurance scheme out of which some of the losses might be met. I think also that we might have a more extended government issue of currency instead of leaving this important privilege in the hands of our banks. I say this by way of protest against our present system of banking and the abuses which it sometimes leads to.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have been an interested listener to this debate. I have understood fairly well the addresses delivered by three of the four hon. members who have preceded me, but regarding the third hon. gentleman I must say, "Je ne vous comprends pas." His speech seemed to imply that there is a great responsibility resting upon this honourable body, to the extent of reimbursing some sixty thousand citizens who have suffered a severe financial loss. I am in agreement with many of the views enunciated, more especially those of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine). He presented the resolution in an admirable way and his facts were well marshalled. But I cannot say that I would accept all his facts and arguments nor agree with all his conclusions. I realize that the resolution calls for debate on a matter that is of great importance to the country. I agree that the financial business of the Dominion is something that interests all of us, because not only is the confidence of the public in our banking system at stake, but also the very stability of the country itself. We are not so much concerned about the stability of our banks alone, but our very national existence is at stake in regard to financial matters. That is why every hon. member should be interested, and in fact every one throughout the country whose business brings him in touch with the banks—all are vitally interested in our banking system, for federal, provincial, municipal and private business is carried on through the facilities afforded by our banks.

The chartered banks of Canada control possibly $2,000,000,000 of the deposits of our people. We can scarcely realize the magnitude of this sum. To-day fifteen banks control these moneys. They have assets of something over $2,600,000,000, and their liabilities reach up almost to their assets, but not quite —I am relying on the statement issued by the Finance department on January 31, 1924. Intermingled with that banking business we had the Home Bank of Canada, operating seventy-eight branches throughout Canada from Quebec to British Columbia. The bank had been in existence for some eighteen years and had a president and a board of directors—who, by the way, did not direct very well. Its last annual report was issued on the 31st May, 1923. It may interest the House to hear one or two short extracts from this report, showing how the directors viewed their business. On page 12 we read:

> In view of the somewhat depressed condition of industry in general during the past year, the affairs of the bank, as will be seen by the statement, may be considered very satisfactory.

Further on appears the following:

> The net profits for the year, after providng for bad and doubtful debts, rebate of interest on unmatured bills under discount, payment of municipal taxes, cost of management, etc., amount to $232,539.17.

Then at the back of the report we have a motion, duly moved and seconded, to this effect:

> That the thanks of the shareholders are due, and are hereby tendered, to the president, vice-president and directors for their careful attention to the affairs of the bank.

That was the summing up of the annual report as presented to the shareholders by the directors and general manager. Now, this bank had a capitalization of $2,000,000, with a rest or reserve account of $550,000, and it controlled interest-bearing deposits of the people of Canada to the amount of something over $17,000,000. People had their money in that bank, no doubt thinking that it was safe, but shortly after this glowing report appeared they came to the realization that their money was mostly all gone. In fact, I think all they are going to recover is about 35 cents on the dollar, or a total of a little over $6,000,000, making a net loss to the depositors of something over $11,000,000. Now that has taken place in, and affected, six of the provinces, and it is only reasonable, natural and logical that this parliament should take cognizance of what has happened and that a debate of this kind should take place in reference to the matter.

I would judge from the remarks I have heard from previous speakers that they are influenced to some extent by the fact that there were branches of the Home Bank in their respective constituencies. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but so far as I am concerned there was no branch of that bank in my constituency. I am here as the representative of some 45,000 citizens and taxpayers of Canada. I do not like the small parochial or even the provincial view; I prefer looking at matters from the Dominion viewpoint; I prefer that hon. members should approach all matters from the point of view of the good of Canada rather than that of narrow provincial or even constituency issues. It is true, nevertheless, that when we are putting forth our constituency viewpoint we are to some extent putting forth a Dominion viewpoint as well. I have been led to ask myself one question. What would the 45,000 citizens of Canada, whom I have the honour to represent wish me to do in this matter? Would they wish me to concur in the remarks of previous speakers to the effect that this parliament is financially liable to the extent of $11,000,000 in regard to the failure of the Home Bank, or would they not? Well now, I have a few suggestions to make.

While our Bank Act may not be all that we might wish it to be, the fact that one bank has become bankrupt does not justify our saying that the Bank Act is a useless scrap of paper or that it has utterly and completely fallen down. We cannot from the fact that one bank has failed conclude that our banking system is of no use, nor should we deem it a justification for putting the crowbar under our whole banking system and overturning it. We cannot prevent the people from depositing their money where they please. Those who put their money in the Home Bank did so in the belief that they were putting it in a safe place. I doubt whether we would be justified in reimbursing the losers in the case of the Home Bank. I suppose it would be more popular to take the other view; one's remarks would perhaps meet with more general favour if he argued that we should reimburse the depositors, because in addition to the 60,- 000 people who lost, there are sympathizers of these people in every province who feel that the poor children and the widows who lost all they had should be reimbursed. Nevertheless I fail to see the logic of the argument that this parliament is in duty bound to make good those losses. I might remind you that other losses have been suffered by people in this country. For instance, a great many people went into our western country, largely at the instigation of the Dominion government and took up homesteads; they branched out into the farming business and lost all they had. Nobody would suggest that the Dominion government should recoup the losers in that case. Moreover, out in the western country we have had in the past a vicious system of subdividing properties adjacent to small towns. I think I am safe in saying that hundreds and thousands of people have lost thousands of dollars there through buying up subdivision property. There may not have been in those cases the guarantee afforded by legislative machinery but legislative machinery permitted that kind of business to go on, and many people, some of them poor people too, lost large sums of money.

There is also a question in my mind as to how docile the representatives of the Maritime provinces would be if it were proposed to reimburse even 60,000 losers out of the taxes of the whole Canadian people. There were no branches of the Home Bank in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; would the people of these provinces view very favourably a proposal to pay out $11,000,000 to compensate for the losses incurred in this catastrophe? I doubt very much if they would. I also doubt very much if other portions of the country would be favourable to the paying out of Dominion money for this purpose. If the deserving people, such as widows who lost their all or old men who had all their earnings on deposit, could be separated from what I might call the less deserving people, it might be different—for we must remember that not all the 60.000 people who lost are children or widows or deserving poor; there were some corporations and there were some people who could afford to stand their loss. But if reimbursement were made at all, all would have to be treated alike.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that there is any legislative club by which people can be forced to deposit their money in any particular bank. We not only had the Home Bank in Canada doing business for the past eighteen years, but several others. In the city of Ottawa we had a branch of the Home Bank, but we had branches of other banks as well. Now the people who deposited in the Home Bank, so to speak, said: Here, I trust the directors of the Home Bank to handle my money, and I am placing my $100 or my $1,000 in their care to handle for me and pay me 3 per cent interest. They had a perfect right to do that. But we might put forward the question: Why did they not put their money in some other place? They were not compelled to give their money to the Home Bank of Canada. In the city of Moose Jaw there was a branch of the Home Bank, but there were branches of other banks there as well. That may not apply to all points, but it does apply to some.

Also Mr. Speaker, it is not compulsory for people to put their money in any bank at all. We have a Post Office Savings Bank in Canada, connected with 1,307 post offices throughout the Dominion. Those 1,307 offices will accept the deposits of the people in any amounts from $1 up to $1,000 in any one year, and they will pay 3 per cent interest on the deposit. Was there anything to prevent the depositors of the Home Bank from putting their money in the post office, and thus giving to the country the benefit of the profits that might be made? There was absolutely nothing.

So far as the province of Ontario is concerned, they have a provincial savings bank that pays 4 per cent interest. Why did not the Home Bank depositors in the province of Ontario put their money in the Ontario Government Savings Bank, with the whole resources of the province behind it? They would have been almost sure that they would be repaid, and in addition they would get one per cent more interest than they got in the case of the Home Bank.

Out in the province from which I come, Saskatchewan, we have a Farm Loan Board that during the past several years has been very anxious to secure the money that the people have and cannot make use of. So anxious have they been to secure it, that they have been paying 5 per cent interest. Now, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, why, let me ask, did not the depositors of the Home Bank put their money on deposit with the Saskatchewan Farm Loan Board and help out their own province and incidentally help themselves to the extent of an additional 2 per cent over and above what they got from the Home Bank? Or if any of those investments did not appeal to them, we have in Saskatchewan an admirable investment in the way of purchasing tax sale certificates. Every town, city, village and rural municipality in the province is compelled yearly to put up on tax sale the property on which the taxes have not been paid, and any purchaser who has the money to invest will receive 10 per cent on the investment, and the investment, Mr. Speaker, is more secure than the investment in any bank. Now, we might ask, why did the people not put their money in any of these more safe investments?

But there are other reasons, Mr. Speaker. If the government of this country should find it incumbent upon them to reimburse the Home Bank depositors, would it not establish a precedent that would be very hard to get away from? Would they not be virtually saying that from now on they will guarantee all the deposits in all of the banks in Canada? In other words, they would be guaranteeing the sum of two billions of dollars. More than that; if they found it necessary to reimburse the losers in this case, would it not be necessary to make the action retroactive and reimburse losers in other cases, notably the depositors in the Farmers Bank, which failed some time ago?

Another reason why I would be opposed to reimbursing depositors, would be that it would tend to make the bankers more reckless than they are, if that is possible. It would tend to make them feel: The government of this country is standing back of us and will pay the bill if we lose; so let us leap in and speculate. They would say; If we lose $11,000,000 or $20,000,000, what is the difference?—the government will come to our rescue. I do not feel, Mr. Speaker, that our government should compromise the country to that extent.

But there are some things that we may do. I cannot say that I am wholly in accord with the resolution. It asks for the appointment of a parliamentary committee immediately. I fail to see the necessity for appointing a parliamentary committee immediately or later. We have a Banking and Commerce committee, made up of ninety members of this honourable body, and I fail to see the need for any other committee than the one already appointed. I do not agree with that portion of the resolution. I have absolutely no objection to inquiring into the weaknesses in the Bank Act, but that should be done through the Banking and Commerce committee. I do not agree with that part of the resolution which asks for a recommendation for saving the Home Bank depositors from loss. Therefore, I could not vote for this resolution, but I would be in favour of referring the matter to the Banking and Commerce committee and suggesting to them that they should review,—not the entire Bank Act, because I do not think the entire Bank Act upon which we spent so many days and weeks, yes, months of time last year in reviewing and discussing, should be again ground up piecemeal and evidence taken in regard to it,—but I do think that possibly some sections of that act that bear more directly on the Home Bank case should be reviewed, and if possible amendments to such sections should be proposed. I would be in favour of reviewing more especially the sections dealing with the inspection of banks. I know that last year in the Banking and Commerce committee the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) took a stand against government inspection of banks on the ground that government inspection entailed government responsibility. He might be correct to a degree, but if government inspection is going to eliminate Home Bank failures and the like, then, Mr. Speaker, we should have government inspection and we should have it quick. I do not think that it is a physical possibility—well, it may be physically possible, but it is almost a financial impossibility—to inspect all the branches of all the banks in Canada, but we could adopt a system of government inspection whereby the head offices would be inspected, and possibly by so doing we would strengthen our banking system and overcome some of the weaknesses and some of the tendencies to failure.

As well as those suggestions, Mr. Speaker, as soon as this country has come to realize the success of public ownership, which it is coming to realize more and more every day in every way, as soon as it realizes to the full extent that public ownership is not only a feasible but a profitable proposition, I would suggest that at that time there is the possibility of the government of Canada going into the banking business in a similar way to that in which the Commonwealth of Australia has gone into it, not by tearing up our banks and throwing them overboard, not by adopting some scheme that is more or less wild and weird, but by starting in the banking business alongside of our present banking institutions. I am quite sure that if the Dominion government should venture on such a scheme they would be just as successful as the Commonwealth of Australia, which has made over $18,000,000 in some ten years of business, and which has kept the rates of interest down near the earth, and has the resources of the country back of every deposit. Just think, Mr. Speaker, with what confidence a person could put his deposit in a bank owned and controlled by the Dominion of Canada. I understand the total wealth of our country is placed at some twenty-two billions of dollars. Such being the case, a depositor could put his money in such a bank and feel perfectly safe. I am well aware that this suggestion is possibly a little premature, and I do not look for action to be taken in regard to it in the immediate future. But I feel quite convinced that action could be taken in the years to come along this line, and that such a proceeding would be perfectly safe. I do not feel that I can support the resolution as it is worded, and therefore I shall have to vote against it.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): In rising to address the House on the motion proposed by the hon. member for East Calgary I might say that I find myself in accord with at least a considerable part of the resolution. The resolution says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a Parliamentary committee should be appointed immediately to investigate the Home Bank failure, with a view to discovering any weaknesses in the Bank Act which may be amended to prevent a similar occurrence; to devise some means of protecting depositors generally.

I can endorse that part of the resolution; but with regard to the latter part I am not quite so sure. I do not intend at the present moment, until I hear further discussion, to say whether or not I should be willing to go to the extent of saying that the government should make itself liable for the loss of the depositors of any bank. I am well aware the Bank Act which was revised last year might possibly be made better than it is, but I do not think it is possible for any government to pass an act which will completely prevent fraud and dishonesty on the part of the managers of any bank or any other private or public corporation. The Bank Act as it stands is fairly effective, and if its provisions are enforced I think it is almost sufficient to guarantee the deposits of the people who put their money in a bank. So far as the government are concerned, and its responsibility to see that the managers perform their duty to the depositors and shareholders, it is possible that they might be more active in that regard. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has said that inspection by the government adds responsibility. I would be in favour of a greater inspection of banks, not so much by the government as by an independent audit. The government might appoint an audit board. Such board could be paid by making their salaries a charge upon the banks, and that could be supplemented by the government. That independent audit board could go through the records of the bank at any time if they thought there was need, and make a report, not only to the Bankers' Association, but to the government and to the directors of the bank. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that in most cases banks have succumbed to failure because of inefficiency and lack of knowledge of banking institutions and banking procedure on the part of the directors. Chief Justice Meredith, when acting as commissioner for the Farmers' Bank, made such a statement. He said it was significant that the directors of the Farmers' Bank had no experience whatever in banking or in large business of a financial character of any kind. He attributed the failure of that bank largely to that cause. I understand, and I believe it can be substantiated, that the directors of the Home Bank under discussion to-night had no experience in banking. They had no knowledge of banking procedure, and I am confident that the failure was the direct result of inefficiency on the part of the directors, and possible dishonesty on the part of the management. Even if you have an inspection by a government auditor, it is possible that such defalcations on the part of the bank might not be discovered.

In reference to the Home Bank, I think its condition has been precarious for a number of years, and I believe that Sir Thomas White did make an investigation of some sort, and it is somewhat significant with regard to that investigation that the gentleman who was appointed to look into the condition of the bank was in some way taken into the employ of the bank itself. That is a significant fact which will bear investigation—as to why it was that Mr. Lash, appointed by the Finance department to look into the affairs of the bank and make a report, was almost immediately afterwards taken on as the solicitor for the Home Bank.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not true that Mr. Lash was solicitor for the bank before he was appointed by the Finance department.

Mr. ANDERSON: I believe he had done some independent temporary work for the bank previous to that, but I think that it was after his report was made that he was taken on as permanent solicitor, not in a temporary capacity, but that he was not in that position at the time he made the investigation.

With regard to revision of the Bank Act, I think it is possible also that certain provisions might be made to give a greater security to the depositors. I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael), that as the government has no direct control over the affairs of the bank; that as those who place their money in the bank do not seek information from the government, that they are in no way responsible for the action of the management of the bank; and that it would be thoroughly unjust to say that, while the bank is in a good working position and is making dividends for its shareholders, and paying interest to the depositors, the government should have no interest in it but that immediately it becomes a failure and the money of the depositors and shareholders is lost, the government should step in and say: "We will take all the loss." At the present time when the country is in such need of economy, when we have such a large indebtedness and a great amount of money to raise each year, it would be unfair to ask the government and the treasury of the country to become responsible for defalcations in banks. That would be establishing a precedent which might lead to very grave conditions in the future. Nobody knows where it would stop, as it would need to be retroactive, because it would be impossible to select the depositors of the Home Bank and say to them: "You will be a select few whom the government of this country will reimburse for your losses," and not do the same thing for others. I want to state emphatically that if the government should take that attitude, they must then reconsider giving recompense to the depositors of the defunct Farmers' Bank and other banks as well that have failed in the last few years. You cannot say that the depositors of one particular bank shall have a claim on the bounty of the government and that the depositors of another bank shall not.

Mr. CHURCH: Why should there not be created some reserve fund ear-marked for the protection of depositors similar to the present redemption fund for the protection of noteholders? Are they not equally creditors and do they not have an equal priority?

Mr. ANDERSON: Possibly so. I would not be opposed to an insurance scheme by which the depositors would be protected from loss; but that ought to be put up to the banks themselves, that their circulation and assets should be assessed for that fund to the extent of their proportionate assets. Either that should be put up to the Bankers' Association and to the banks to finance themselves, or the government might take that over—I am not much in favour of that—and create an insurance fund by which the depositors might be reimbursed. I think the money for that purpose should come from the banks.

I am taking up this question more for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House the failure of the late Farmers' Bank. Since it was a Farmers' Bank, and the shareholders, depositors and directors were largely farmers, I think hon. gentlemen to my left should be interested in that bank as much, as in the Home Bank. Moreover, the failure of that bank was even greater than that of the Home Bank. The Farmers' Bank was an utter failure, an absolute wreck; not one cent came back to the shareholders or depositors. A large number of shareholders particularly were made absolutely bankrupt. There was great distress, perhaps not so great as the amount was not so large as in the case of the Home Bank; but many of those cases were devoid of all means of support. I know of one instance where the matter preyed so much on the mind of a shareholder that he lost his reason. Others were unable to carry out obligations which they had undertaken previously for the education of their children. The claims of the depositors and shareholders of the Farmers' Bank can be put on the same basis as those of the shareholders and depositors of the Home Bank; one claim is no worse than the other. The Farmers' Bank has not been properly wound up yet. The parliamentary committee that should be appointed to investigate the Home Bank should have a free hand to inquire into everything connected with the bank from the time of its incorporation down to liquidation, and even through liquidation, because even after liquidation commences, a commission or the government or somebody should be in charge to see that those matters are carried out expeditiously, and that depositors and shareholders do not lose large sums of money through a long drawn-out process of litigation with heavy lawyers' and liquidators' fees and in the end get very little. In the case of banks, liquidation proceedings are too cumbersome and expensive, and there is very rarely anything coming back to the depositors or shareholders.

I have said before, and I wish to repeat, that bank failures are due, not to any deficiency in the Bank Act, but to deficiencies in the management and directorate. If you guarantee the depositors, and possibly the shareholders, their money, you will not make for better management of banks. in fact, I think the management is more liable to be careless, knowing that the depositors will be guaranteed by the government. I do not believe it would be in the best interest of the banks themselves that the government should guarantee the depositors.

With regard to the Farmers' Bank, I will state as briefly as possible its affairs. That bank was incorporated in 1904. The time for issuing the charter was extended on three different occasions, and it was finally granted in November, 1906, long after the bank was first incorporated, which showed that the bank had a great deal of difficulty in getting shareholders in order to start business. The bank was incorporated with a capital of $1,000,000. I want to bring these statements before the House so that hon. members will see clearly that the depositors and shareholders of that bank have as much claim upon the government for recompense as the depositors and shareholders of any other bank. Its failure was as much due to negligence on the part of the government and perhaps more so than that of the Home Bank. I do not say that the failure of the government to look into this case carefully was the cause of the wrecking of the bank. As I said before, the failure of that bank was due to the dishonesty and incompetence of the management. I am not making any statement against the directors. They were honest men, but they had no knowledge of or experience in banking. They took the word of the manager as actual fact. They had no knowledge in themselves; they could not go over the statements of the bank and see wherein the manager was or was not telling them the truth. The consequence was that prior to the date of the failure they believed that the bank was in a sound condition. No charge or even suspicion was held that they were dishonest in the management of either the bank or their own affairs. One of the directors of that bank, a substantial gentleman of my own county, a retired farmer of advanced years, said that after paying his double liability he had not enough money left to buy himself a silk hat. That man believed implicitly that dividends were being paid out of the earnings of the bank, but of course they were as a matter of fact being paid out of capital. As the evidence proved conclusively, the manager of the bank was guilty of gross fraud and perjury. He was sentenced to the Kingston penitentiary, but he was released at the end of two years, the balance of his term having been remitted.

At the time the bank received its charter on the 30th November, 1906, it did not have the requisite number of shareholders nor sufficient deposits to warrant application for a charter. Subscribers who had not the cash had given promissory notes for their shares, and in order to deceive the Minister of Finance, the manager, Mr. Travers, deposited these notes with The Trust and Guarantee Company of Toronto as security for a loan to the extent of $80,000, which was afterwards increased by another $20,000. These funds formed a part of the $250,000 which he deposited with the Minister of Finance when making application for the charter. The report of the commissioner who investigated the failure of the Farmers' Bank in 1913 shows conclusively that this and other facts were brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance before he granted Mr. Travers' application. For corroboration of my statement I would refer hon. members to sessional paper 153a. The gentleman who warned the minister were Sir Edmund Osler, then a member of parliament, Mr. David Henderson, also a member of parliament, and Mr. Leighton McCarthy. They called the minister's attention to the fact that the statements contained in Mr. Travers' affidavit were false. Mr. Clouston, of the Bankers' Association, also wrote to the minister to the same effect. Of course, Mr. Travers protested to the minister that his affidavit was absolutely in accordance with the facts and thereupon, in spite of this information, the charter was issued to the Farmers' Bank on November 30, 1906, the very day that one at least of the warning communications reached the Finance department. Subsequently, on April 17, 1907, Mr. Vankoughnet, manager of the local branch of the Farmers' Bank at Milton wrote to the deputy minister of finance, advising him that promissory notes given in payment of shares were being discounted at the bank's branches. That was less than two weeks after the bank started business. There was then ample opportunity for the Finance department to put a stop to the bank's operations, and thus save the depositors and shareholders the severe losses which they sustained a few years later by reason of the gross mismanagement and deception of the manager. No charge is made against the Minister of Finance, but there may be some criticism of his negligence in not paying more attention to the warnings he received concerning Mr. Travers' bona fides. But I am prepared to admit that had the bank been honestly and efficiently managed it might have been a success. The same remark applies to the Home Bank. Indeed, in every case of a bank failure I think it goes without saying that the failure is due to lax and inefficient, if not dishonest management.

In less than four years the Farmers' Bank was utterly wrecked. Mr. Travers invested something over half a million dollars in the Keeley mine and other unprotected loans, and this tying up of its assets was the principal cause of the failure. For instance, the Keeley mine was afterwards sold for the comparatively insignificant sum of $141,000. Sir W. R. Meredith, in summing up the causes of the bank's failure, said:

The subsequent management of the affairs of the bank was characterized by gross extravagance, recklessness, incompetency, dishonesty and fraud, and has resulted in the entire loss of the paid-up capital and the whole of the deposits, and that after allowing for all that can be extracted from the shareholders on their double liability a loss amounting to no less than $1,806,437, making a record unparalleled in the history of any bank in Canada, or, as far as I am aware, in any other country.

Subject to deductions in respect of some of the times of sums amounting in the aggregate to $42,377, during the short career of the bank, the bad debts amounted to $598,565; the operating losses, including the cost of printing bank notes and stationery, to $281,119; the organization expenses to $87,279; the sums stolen by officers of the bank, after deducting what has been and is expected to be recovered from sureties, to $134,118; the dividends paid, to $50,772; the losses on expenditures on bank premises, fixtures and furniture, to $108,801; the loss on the purchase of the Keeley mine, to $509,886, from which, however, is to be deducted what may ultimately be realized from the sale of it; loss on the purchase of stock in the Keeley Mine Company, $15,000; besides other losses amounting in the aggregate to approximately $63,274.

And that in the short period of three years or a little over! How could any bank act prevent the failure of a bank that was run like that? How would it be possible to make an act of such a character that it would prevent defalcation of that kind when the manager of the bank had no idea of his responsibilities to the public, had no regard for what their losses might be so long as he himself was retained in his position? The directors of that bank guaranteed Mr. Travers $5,000 for the first year and an increase of $1,000 in salary for four years, making a total of $9,000, and if at any time he was deprived of his position in the bank he was to be given a pension of $1,500 a year for life, so that he was to be well looked after. When the provisional directors severed their connection with the bank and the regular directors were appointed, $20,000 of the bank's funds were distributed amongst the provisional directors for their work in connection with the organization of the bank.

The matter of this bank has now been before the public for something like ten years, and a statement to the shareholders of that bank from the liquidators has not been submitted. The shareholders employed a liquidator to look after their interests in the liquidation of the bank, and they have a right to know what the assets of the bank were, how its debts were paid and what returns might be expected to depositors and shareholders. Such a statement has not been forthcoming, or was not forthcoming up to a short time ago. Last January I made an application to Mr. Clarkson, the liquidator, for a statement in the interests of the shareholders, mentioning that I myself was a shareholder. I received no reply to my letter. Other men had asked for a similar statement but did not receive any. When I came to Ottawa at the opening of the session I took the matter up with the Finance department, and I must say that the Finance department acted very promptly; they wrote Mr. Clarkson asking him for a statement of the bank's affairs, showing what had been done with the assets and what amount of debts had been paid. I wish to read Mr. Clarkson's reply, addressed to Mr. J. C. Saunders, the Deputy Minister of Finance, Ottawa, under date of March 4, 1924:

Re Farmers' Bank of Canada

I am in receipt of yours of the 29th ult., and in reply thereto would say that in April, 1923, I had an extract of the accounts of the Farmers' Bank made with the intention of whipping the matter into shape to give you the statement then asked for. Thereafter, however, I gained the understanding that the necessity for the statement had passed when revision of the Bank Act had been disposed of, and consequently I did not complete it.

That was rather a peculiar reason for not giving the statement.

In order that you may understand the conditon of affairs, I wish to say that in dealing with the affairs of the Farmers' Bank we adopted the only policy open to us which would admit of our passing accounts before the court from time to time and as receipts and disbursements were made. To do this statements were prepared of every individual receipt and every individual disbursement, the latter so that vouchers for every expenditure could be placed before the court. This meant that while all receipts and all disbursements were passed no statements were prepared or asked for by the court which required the subdivision of receipts and disbursements under headings which would allow of a comprehensive statement being presented.

I may say that I had given the headings under which I wanted the statements presented with regard to the disbursement of the assets of the bank. The letter continues:

Under the above circumstances when you ask me for a statement it now means that I have got to take the accounts passed by the court and extract every individual item of receipts and disbursements under headings so as to show what was realized from receivables, interest, double liability, collections, securities, real estate and fixtures and furniture, while on the other hand I have got to divide the expenditures to show payments of circulation, salaries and preferred claims, wages, branch expenses, liens, preferred accounts, set-offs, bank collections, legal fees, liquidator's remuneration, court costs and other charges. Having regard to the fact that there are thousands of entries involved and the liquidation spread over a period of more than ten years you will see what your request means. The extraction and the allocation of the items is now under way, and I would say that we ought within one week to be able to supply you with the information. This I trust will be satisfactory.

Mr. Clarkson sent me a copy of the letter he wrote to the Deputy Minister of Finance, and I must say that in a week a statement did come to hand. I wish to put that statement on Hansard as being the only one that has been issued with regard to the liquidation of the Farmers' Bank, although that bank failed fourteen years ago. The shareholders have had no knowledge whatever of what was done with their money, of what became of the assets of the bank, although they had a right to know. The statement is as follows:

IN THE MATTER OF THE FARMERS' BANK OF CANADA

With reference to the item "Shareholders' Test Case—costs allocated against estate, $3,500", I might say that the shareholders contested their obligation to pay double liability, and the case was fought in the courts of Ontario and in the federal court, and the shareholders lost out. I might add that the commissioner who was appointed to investigate the affairs of the Farmers' Bank was given every means by the government of the day for investigating the whole proceedings of the bank. He was empowered as follows:

In pursuance of the Commission of Your Royal Highness, dated the twelfth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and twelve, by which I was appointed a commissioner to make investigation into all material and relevant facts in relation to:

(a) The incorporation by Act of Parliament of the Farmers' Bank of Canada and the organization thereof;

(b) The application for and the giving by the Treasury Board of the certificate permitting the bank to issue notes and to commence the business of banking;

(c) The conduct and operation of the business of the bank, the amount of capital subscribed and paid up, the causes of the suspension and failure, and the extent of the liabilities and the value of the assets thereof.

The commissioner was given a free hand to investigate every aspect of the Farmers' Bank from its inception up to the time of its liquidation, and I would recommend this government to do the same thing with regard to the Home Bank.

The government has said that they wish to get the opinions of members of the House with regard to what shall be done, whether the inquiry should be by a commission or by a parliamentary committee. I would prefer a parliamentary committee, and that it should be given as free a hand as the commissioner was given in respect of the Farmers' Bank, to inquire into everything in relation to the bank from its incorporation to the time of closing its doors, and after, so that the committee could look into the matters of liquidation and see that they were carried out properly, and see that all persons who owe money to the bank pay their liabilities in order that the depositors may receive everything that is coming to them. The depositors have a right to expect that everything will be done in that regard. When a bank fails I think it should be the duty of some person, either the attorney general of the province or the Minister of Justice for the Dominion, to see to it that action is taken to inquire into the causes for the failure, and to ascertain who is to blame. If the manager or the president or a director is responsible, if he has been fraudulent in his acts, if he was dishonest in the incorporation of the bank, he should be brought before the courts and properly punished. Too many of our bank managers and bank presidents who wreck banks get off too easily. They are not prosecuted as they should be, and the consequence is that there is every incentive on the part of dishonest men to make an effort to get rich at the expense of the depositors and shareholders.

I want again to impress upon the government the advisability of looking into every matter concerned with this bank. I would prefer a parliamentary committee, if possible, but the inquiry should be made either by a parliamentary committee or by a commission —by some competent authority—and every attempt should be made to see that justice is done.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I was quite unable to hear the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Anderson)—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. GOULD: It is very seldom that it has been necessary for hon. members in this chamber to call "Louder" to me.

[Mr. Anderson.]

Like the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) who addressed the House this afternoon, I can say that I do not speak for the depositors of the Home Bank resident in the electoral district which I represent. I regard this as a national question, and I shall be intentionally brief in the few remarks I shall make to-night because of the clearness of the resolution itself, and more particularly because of the clear and able presentation of the case by the hon. member (Mr. Irvine) in whose name the resolution stands.

The resolution contains three clauses, all very specific and needing very little elucidation, and in my humble opinion they are such that no one in the Chamber should object to their fulfilment. The first asks for a parliamentary committee to be appointed "with a view to discovering any weaknesses in the Bank Act which may be amended to prevent a similar occurrence" to the failure of the Home Bank; the second seeks "to devise some means of protecting depositors generally;" and the third clause reads "to make recommendation as to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss." I think each of these three clauses very laudable; and again I say, I do not see why any hon. member of this Chamber should object to a committee being appointed for the purpose of proceeding along the lines indicated in the resolution.

I might state that while there are no depositors of the Home Bank in my constituency, and no branches of that bank, yet I was interested enough in this matter to appear in the city of Moose Jaw during the month of January last and listen to a presentation of the case by a committee who spoke for the depositors in the province of Saskatchewan. I had the opportunity of addressing that committee for a few minutes, and in my remarks I first of all expressed my sympathy for the depositors, and secondly I stated that I would do all in my power to assist them in recovering the losses they had sustained. That remark was qualified by the statement that I should be glad to assist if there would be no added burden thrown upon the already overburdened taxpayers of the Dominion of Canada. Since I have listened to the presentation of the case here to-day, and having since the occasion to which I have referred, met many of the depositors personally, and having received many recommendations from various organizations throughout Canada setting forth the case more clearly than I had seen it presented up to that time, I may say that to-night I have no occasion whatever to change the sentiments I expressed in the city of Moose Jaw; in fact, I am prepared to state that the sentiments I then expressed have been intensified since.

I think the resolution as it stands to-day, in its three clauses certainly points the way whereby the ends there outlined may be attained. We have to look at this question, firstly, from a more or less psychological point of view, because people who deposit money in our chartered banks in Canada are what might be termed the best class of our citizens. They are not extravagant people or the wasters; they are the people who have conserved the money they have made and deposited it in our institutions in the firm belief—and that belief has been taught them from their youth —that these institutions were safe and sound. But we have had many cases, and particularly the grievous failure of the Home Bank, which have shattered the faith of many people in this country in our banking institutions, and particularly those who have had money deposited in them. Not only that, I believe I am safe in assuming that many people who have money deposited in the other chartered banks of Canada entertain a doubt at times as to whether the foundations upon which those institutions rest are as secure as they have been led to believe. That is a very serious thing to say with respect to our financial institutions.

It seems to me that if a former minister of finance is rightly credited with the assertion that he knew of the workings of the Home Bank many years ago, the question at issue hinges upon two things: First, whether it was known at that time that the Home Bank was an almost shattered institution; second, whether the people of Canada benefited by allowing it to continue. If, because of the silence of the finance minister of that time, the people of Canada derived a benefit, a committee appointed now might endeavour to find out what the extent of that benefit was. The question naturally arises also: If that former finance minister was aware of the actual circumstances, is it not fair to assume that succeeding finance ministers likewise knew of the condition of the Home Bank during and following the war period? These are questions that are being asked and the people have a right to receive replies to them. If it is established as a fact that the people of Canada did so benefit then I state my opinion most positively that they are under an obligation to the depositors of the Home Bank. I am prepared to state my belief that Canada did benefit as a result of the silence maintained from 1916, which was during the war period, until the crash came. I believe the people of the district that I represent would not object to paying their fair share or fair proportion of the loss sustained by the depositors, under some plan that would enable them to meet the burden without difficulty, providing it can be clearly established that Canada did profit as a result of the silence in question.

It may be that the ex-minister to whom the statement referred to is attributed is not culpable. If his culpability is established, our duty is all the more manifest, and the people at large, in my opinion will gladly reimburse those who have lost their deposits, in accordance with some suitable plan upon which a committee may report after due investigation.

The question may naturally be asked—and I think is being asked at the present time:—did not succeeding governments accept the income taxes which the Home Bank continuously paid into the Dominion treasury? These taxes certainly must have been accepted, at any rate the statement is made in an explanation issued in connection with the bank's affairs. The government should have been as diligent in watching the affairs of the Home Bank as they are in scrutinizing the transactions of other institutions. Had they maintained such a keen scrutiny the actual condition of the bank could hardly have escaped their notice. A short time ago Canada covered itself with glory when it rushed to the assistance of Japan, following the terrific earthquake which devastated portions of that empire, Because of the aid then rendered Canada has been lauded internationally. And yet, although we rendered such assistance, Japan was collecting a duty on our imports of wheat. It seems to me that if Canada did the right thing in going so promptly to the assistance of the people of a foreign state, it would be even more justified in moving in the interest of those who have suffered from a calamity such as the failure of the Home Bank.

I could recite many distressing tales of the results of that failure, but I refrain from narrating such pathetic experiences. I simply rose to give expression to my earnest convictions in this matter. I am quite in sympathy with the resolution, and I see no reason why every hon. gentleman should not support the appointment of the committee asked for.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): At times the good things of life are close to our hands. As we are engaged in trying to find a remedy for the existing banking troubles my good friend the member for Macdonald (Mr. Lovie) hands to me a newspaper clipping advocating a remedy which, however, I think would be very far-reaching. The clipping in question, which is from the Brandon Sun says:

> There are few bank failures in China. When a bank fails there the official responsible is beheaded.

I wish to refer very briefly to the resolution before the House. There were $225,000 of deposits in the Home Bank in the district I have the honour to represent. Now, I do not wish to claim that because some of the people of my constituency have had bad crops, or are poor, or have suffered greatly, or have lost all they had, through this bank failure, that that is any reason why we should act regardless of justice and set a precedent that would be dangerous. I do maintain, however, that it is a reason why we should be very careful to give these sufferers justice to the extent of one hundred per cent. I have received many letters from Home Bank depositors, and also petitions some of them containing over one hundred signatures, asking that consideration be given to the depositors, and that the government undertake to make good their entire loss. As yet I have an open mind on the subject, although I am free to admit that my heart is with the losers. I have heard it stated that a member who had branches of the Home Bank in his own constituency is not competent to act impartially. I do not admit that would be true of myself, and yet my sympathies are strongly with those who were depositors and shareholders and have lost everything they had. I might just refer to the case of one depositor, a man who was hard working, who had a little more funds and a little more backing financially perhaps than most of the other depositors and yet who earned his money laboriously. He placed in one of these branches, a few days before it closed its doors, $7,000, the return from his last year's crop. Perhaps he is not so much to be pitied as some others who had not the $7,000 to deposit, and yet it seems very hard indeed that a man should, within a few days of the failure of this bank, place in trust $7,000 hard-earned money, when those who are collecting this money in this way look upon it not as a sacred trust to be invested where the security is only of the very best, but rather look upon it as an unlimited fund with which to engage in wild-cat schemes, and that is the way it is treated. Our Bank Act I believe is a good act, but it certainly has its weaknesses. This I think has been amply shown. I think if we had some measures of protection such as they have in the United States it would be an improvement. They have found in that country that a reserve fund bank is very useful—a bank to which other banks can resort in case they require funds, where they can have their paper discounted. Those who have studied the banks of the United States carefully believe that at one time there would have been a serious crash if it had not been for the federal reserve bank; but through the efforts of that federal reserve bank other banks that were in financial difficulties, not because they were insolvent but because of pressure at the moment, were able to resort to that bank and have their paper rediscounted; and thus were able to carry on. I fancy that if we had some scheme similar to the federal reserve bank of the United States, by which somebody would be appointed who would be able to arrange a rediscount, a bank in Canada would not find it necessary to close its doors in case of financial pressure. One difficulty with our banks in the past has been that when times were good they were too ready to loan, they had plenty of money, the depositors were numerous and the borrowers few. Then when times became bad, those who had plenty of security and who had a right to expect that they would be able to borrow money, and those who would receive money under a proper banking system were not able to obtain that accommodation. I have known men to go out with Victory bonds of considerable amounts and find themselves unable to borrow one dollar on them. That state of affairs should not exist. It has been said that even in the United States where they have government inspection, banks fail. It is true that such things occur; and yet I am inclined to think that a proper inspection by the government—not such an audit as we have had in the past, which seems to me to have been entirely ineffective, but an inspection that would examine very carefully the reports from the various banks, and have a nose for trouble the same as a newspaper man has for news—would have discovered something wrong with the returns from the bank which has caused us so much trouble. If such banks as these were inspected more carefully, and the loans the bank had made examined thoroughly, such a disaster as has occurred would not be repeated. I am inclined to think the banks are standing in their own light. This failure has shattered confidence in our banking system, and, I think the banks by standing together, by not adopting such measures as will prevent such a catastrophe as this, have done themselves a very great deal of harm. It seems to me the claims of the depositors rest to a very large extent on this point: It is claimed by some that Sir Thomas White, when Minister of Finance, being notified of the condition in which this bank stood, withheld his hand in the interests of the public good, and that Canada at large benefited thereby. I think, if that be proven, I have found a very strong claim and a very good reason why the country at large should bear the loss. I am watching these matters very carefully. I hope the investigation will be thorough. I am glad that it extends from the time the bank was created up to the time it closed its doors.

9 p.m.

I would like to refer to a remark made by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Irvine), that I think, was rather unfortunate. I feel that I cannot let it pass without a reference. It was to the effect that the commissioners usually write reports that nobody reads, run up large bills of expense, and that their reports are very seldom translated into legislation. I think if the hon. member (Mr. Irvine) had thought seriously he surely would not have made that statement. I have gone back carefully in my memory over the commissions I have known, and of the men who have been employed on these commissions, and I can find no justification for any such statement. A clipping was read from a newspaper, supposed to be a statement from a newspaper reporter, to the effect that having sat three years in the gallery he knew of no case where the report of the commission had been translated into legislation. I have in mind at present such men as are working on these commissions even now, and coming from Winnipeg, on my way to Ottawa a short time ago, I met the Grain Commission, and when I saw these men and talked with them I found they had just returned from Fort William and Port Arthur, and I can well say that their solicitor was worked to the last pound of his strength. He had done all that any man could possibly do. He is a man of great ability and high attainments. Surely such ridicule should not be heaped upon such men as Chief Justice Turgeon, such men as Dean Rutherford or Mr. Scott of Winnipeg, or such men as Professor Gibbon. These are not men of the stamp that are wasting their time and public money writing reports that nobody reads. I can assure the hon. member for East Calgary that there are men all over the country who are deeply interested in this matter of the grain trade, and they will read with the greatest care the reports that have been issued. It may be—and I believe it is the case—that three-fourths of the people are not interested in that matter and do not read the reports. Why should those who are interested be deprived of the benefit of the reports because some people will not read them? I desire to refer to two or three commissions of which I have actual knowledge. How did we get the co-operative elevator companies? It was because the report of the commission was translated into legislation. The Royal Grain Commission of 1906 and 1907 made twenty-six recommendations, and twenty-four of these recommendations were accepted by the organized farmers of western Canada, and were incorporated into the Canada Grain Act of to-day. I am asked, do we get any results? Let me read to the House two or three paragraphs which will be good reading at any time in this connection or in any other connection. I read from the Regina Leader of April 27, 1910:

> In the matter of the Port Arthur elevator and the Empire elevator, the charges were taken up and on investigation were all sustained and the department at Ottawa instructed their counsel here to prosecute and the case came up before Police Magistrate Daly on Friday, April, 1923. The Port Arthur elevator was proven guilty on five charges of false statement and fined $500 for each offence. The Empire elevator was found guilty on six charges of a similar character and fined $500 for each offence.

Just one other short paragraph, because I have heard many slurs cast on the work of commissions from time to time, therefore, I dwell for a moment on this question. A question was asked as to the result of the Grain Commission. Let me read two or three lines from a clipping from the Farmers' Advocate of November 17, 1909. This shows the result of measures put into effect on the strength of the report of that commission:

> In 1908, the shortage on out-turns totalled 50,000 bushels, a loss of course which indirectly affected the price paid for grain at Fort William.

I will now give the returns after the remedial measures were put into effect.

	Bill of Lading Bushels	Out-turn Bushels	Net shortage Bushels
Wheat..	8,470,287	8,463,925	5,956
Oats..	2,377,311	2,375,096	2,214

I think that is as far as I need to go in regard to this matter. When commissions are working hard on very important work and are doing as faithful and honest service as members of this House, it is a grave mistake to undermine their work, to leave the impression that it is useless, that their report will not be translated into legislation. Let me close by asking this question: Does any member amongst the 235 in this House believe for one moment that the report of the present Grain Commission will not be translated into legislation? I think there is not one.

I believe it will be better to refer the resolution to a committee of the House rather than to a commission; but I feel just a little undecided at the present time whether it will be better to refer it to a special committee than to the Banking and Commerce committee. I hope, however, wherever it goes, it will be dealt with in a very effective manner, so that such disastrous failures as we have had in the past will not occur in the future.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken part in this debate but for the fact that I come from a city in which my office is a few doors away from the head office of the Home Bank and that a large number of the depositors have asked me to speak on their behalf. I had a great deal of business to transact with nearly all the chartered banks of Canada while a municipal officer. The Home Bank had a lot of people trying to get the city of Toronto deposits. They offered a higher rate of interest to municipalities; they engaged lobbyists also, as you will see from the papers to secure business; they advertised for deposits and had a good advertising campaign. I remember the start of this bank. It commenced as a loan company and it started with poor people. Of the directors of the bank, with the exception of Mr. Daly, only two or three had as much as $3,000 or $4,000 stock in it. Mr. Daly had a large amount of stock in the bank, and some of it was transferred to his wife. Those in charge of the bank, the president, the directors, the manager and the rest of them, as Mr. Clarkson pointed out in his report, had no banking experience. In my opinion, the Bankers' Association should bear the brunt of this disaster. All last year while we were getting the Bank Act revised, they appeared around these legislative halls asking that it should not be laid over, that not one day was to be lost to get the new act through. For it had been contended that the act should be laid over for a year and a survey made of all the banks, and that auditors should be put to work. It was proposed that a survey should be made in the recess of parliament in regard to all these banks, because what has happened to-day in the Home Bank may happen to another bank to-morrow. I do not think the Canadian Bankers' Association dealt fairly with this parliament in regard to this legislation. They issued booklets, pamphlets of all descriptions, and they described the Canadian banking system as the finest system in the world. They talked in these treatises about the "uninformed agitators" amongst the farmers of the West. They put into the hands of members books containing a sort of catechism between the farmer and the student on the different banking systems in the world. This pamphlet in a white book is called Banks and Banking, and there are articles under various headings such as "Protection to depositors", "Priority for depositors equal to that of note holders", "Redemption fund." The people of Canada had a shock last August from which they have not yet recovered. Members of the cabinet were over in the Old Land last summer looking for more capital to come to Canada. How can we expect to get capital in Canada under the present banking system and Bank Act? With all due respect to the gentlemen who compose the Canadian Bankers' Association, I would say that everything they say in this pamphlet can be proved to be incorrect since last August. They have criticised the banking systems of other countries, and we find, under our own banking system, the disaster of last August which happened only three months after these gentlemen had been running around these legislative halls telling us not to lay over the revision of the Bank Act, not to appoint auditors. They forced the act through, saying that not an hour was to be lost. With all due respect to what the late government did in the case of the Farmers' Bank, I would say that that government took a certain stand at that particular time, but two wrongs do not make a right. Public confidence has been shaken in the banking system we have in this country. A few years ago there was a case in point when the Canadian Northern Railway was taken over by the government of Canada under an arbitration presided over by Chief Justice Meredith, to whom the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) referred to-night. There was a hypothecation of title deeds to the government by the Canadian Northern Railway for almost all their assets throughout Canada for advances. Subsequently to this claims were made for further advances. Some advances were made to the Canadian Northern by the Canadian Bank of Commerce amounting to $10,000,000 or $15,000,000. When the arbitration was in progress, what did this parliament do? Although the parliament of Canada had priority and could have foreclosed the system without paying a dollar, and preserved its priority under those title deeds of the Canadian Northern Railway System, this legislature paid them $10,000,000, although in my humble opinion, they had no legal claim, let alone a moral claim. What is good for a large corporation like that should be good enough for the poor depositors in the Home Bank. We have been told that there is a difference between a note-holder and a depositor. A bank has two classes of first creditors. One is a note-holder and the other is a depositor. In the old days of the banking system of this country there was a difference in the way bank notes were regarded. Some people would prefer the notes of one bank to those of another. I remember the time in Toronto when people would not take the notes of certain banks because they were not considered safe. After the disaster to which I have referred parliament revised the Bank Act and provided for a note redemption fund, which was formed by each bank contributing five per cent of its note circulation. This fund to-day amounts to six or seven million dollars, and noteholders are thus protected when a bank fails. The same legislation should be extended now to depositors and a sinking fund established.

Now a disaster has overtaken the depositors of the Home Bank, and I know that many people in Toronto have lost all their savings and will be driven into the poorhouse. All the inquiries whether by royal commission or otherwise will not recoup those unfortunate people. Instead of futile investigations, I contend this parliament should say to the Canadian Bankers' Association: "You were the leaders in passing our banking legislation, you are our partners by reason of the note redemption fund, and you are in charge of the banking system of this country; therefore it was your duty to save the Home Bank from going to the wall; you might very easily have saved it as you did the Merchants' Bank; we have enough problems on our shoulders without assuming your work; you must come across with sufficient financial assistance to take care of these depositors." Would it not have been far better if the Bankers' Association had come to the rescue of the depositors to the extent of six or seven million dollars? In fact, four or five million dollars would probably have been sufficient, because some of the securities of the defunct bank may yet be realized at par. Would it not have been far better for the credit of this country had the Bankers' Association taken that course? It must be borne in mind that the chartered banks have to come to this parliament for their charters, under which they are granted valuable and exclusive privileges, and as a result they have made and are still making millions of dollars of profit out of the people of this country. I do not think the Bankers' Association played the game last year with this parliament—they did not "play cricket"— because two or three months after the revision of the Bank Act was carried through by parliament, largely on the advice of the bankers themselves, large losses were written off by the Union Bank and the Standard Bank, the Bank of Hamilton was taken over by the Bank of Commerce, then came the failure of the Home Bank, and later La Banque Nationale was saved by the wise action of the government of Quebec. After all the assurances by eminent bankers that the Canadian banking system was absolutely sound, that government inspection of chartered banks was unnecessary and uncalled-for, and that everything in the Canadian banking world was perfectly satisfactory, it was a rude awakening for the people of this Dominion to find these assurances of the prosperous Bankers' Association were not borne out by subsequent events.

I repeat, the government should say to the Bankers' Association: "You must come across with such financial assistance as will take care of these unfortunate depositors of the Home Bank." And the association can do so if they want to. They have held up other weak banks, and have pointed with pride to their wonderful system which enables them to do this. Sir Edmund Walker wrote a little pamphlet on Canadian banking which was circulated at the time the revision of the Bank Act was proceeding, and dealing with depositors he laid down the following principles:

> Under our banking laws, as is very properly the case, the claim of the noteholder is preferred to that of the depositor in the event of a bank getting into difficulties.
> We must not expect that any government will relieve a depositor from the necessity of using discretion as to where he places his money. Governments never have done and never can do that. Men must use their intelligence, and after measuring the security offered, judge where they should intrust their money. It is perhaps easier for a man with limited intelligence to make a selection if the banks have large capital and are of semi-national importance, provided, of course, the basis of the system is not unsound. In Canada, we do not obtain deposits from abroad, although we might not object to do so if money could be obtained at low enough rates of interest; and we do not lend on real estate. There are probably few countries in the world where greater security is offered to depositors.

His words were proved to be incorrect when a month or two later the country was shocked by the failure of the Home Bank.

There have been five revisions of the Bank Act since confederation, and amendments have been made from time to time to protect depositors and shareholders. But all to no purpose, as the Home Bank failure demonstrates; losses still arise by reason of gross mismanagement, and to-day the confidence of the public has been shaken in our banking system. Consequently it is now the duty of parliament to impose further restrictions to safeguard depositors on lines similar to those by which a few years ago noteholders were protected. To this end the Bank Act should be amended. The Bankers' Association say that depositors are voluntary creditors, while noteholders are involuntary creditors. In my opinion this is simply a distinction without a difference. Undoubtedly if the depositors of the Home Bank had been warned of the kind of directors to whom they had entrusted their deposits they would not have been voluntary creditors; they would have placed their money in the post office or in a provincial bank.

It is significant that the Home Bank used quite up-to-date advertising methods for the purpose of attracting deposits. For instance, in 1913 we find them using these axioms:

A dollar in the bank is worth two in the pocket.

When in doubt, leave your money in the bank.

Everything comes to him who saves his money while he waits.

Get the habit of learning to do without what you only think you want.

To make a dollar go further—put it in the bank.

Dollars into riches run; not all at once, but one by one.

Never a borrower nor a lender be—unless it is to lend to your bank, by depositing your savings, and borrowing from the bank on good collateral at an equitable rate of interest.

People who live in mortgaged houses should not throw around their money.

Make haste to get rich slowly.

Spend carelessly and thrive miserably.

Banked money talks compound interest twice a year.

On the average poverty is the result of bull-headed negligence.

Not only has the confidence of the public been shaken in our banking system and the Bankers' Association, but our courts are being subjected to considerable criticism. A large number of people in my city are disgusted with the manner in which the prosecution of the Home Bank directors is proceeding. The case has already been before several judges, and it seems likely to go to the Pricy Council before a note of evidence has been taken. For this reason the public are urging parliament to take action. Under our constitution parliament is the highest court in the land, and the people are urging, in view of the failure not only to hold an inquiry into the failure of the Home Bank but to bring the wreckers to justice, that up-to-date legislation be passed for the protection of depositors and also, that something be done in the premises to deal with the Bankers' Association.

[Mr. Church.]

I may say just here that I have received a petition from the depositors of the branch of the Home Bank in Toronto at the corner of Woodlawn avenue and Yonge street, signed by 1,372 persons. I wrote to the Canadian Bankers' Association last August asking that they do something for the depositors of the Home Bank, and I wish to read the reply which I received. It says:

Sir Edmund Walker's secretary has forwarded me your letter of the 12th instant, addressed to me in Sir Edmund's care, in reference to Home Bank affairs.

The suggestion that the members of the Canadian Bankers' Association should take care of the probable losses of depositors in the Home Bank, while doubtless made with a desire to remedy an unfortunate situation, has not, if I may with respect say so, been considered in all its bearings. In the past the basis of the purchase by individual banks of the assets of weaker banks and the protection of their depositors, was that the assets purchased were at least of sufficient value to meet the demands of the depositors.

There is no legal or equitable ground, so far as I am aware, on which the shareholders of banks which have had prudent and conservative management should contribute out of their resources to make good losses which a bank imprudently managed has sustained. If it were once understood that banks with prudent and conservative management were under obligation or were even likely to make good to depositors of a bank which closed its doors, all incentive to honest and careful management on the part of an executive with little sense of responsibility would be removed; capital would desert our banking institutions and the business of the country would as a result be seriously crippled.

These in my opinion are the probable consequences of the application of the doctrine that banks are guarantors of the deposits in every other bank

I am, Yours very truly,

F. W. TAYLOR,
President.

Well, it would not shake the confidence of the people half as much as the closing of the doors of the Home Bank did. It would not shake the confidence of the country half as much as the representations made by this association in the pamphlet which I hold in my hand and which was distributed among members of the House. Let me read a few more paragraphs from this pamphlet. With regard to noteholders and depositors, it says:

The creditors of the banks consist of noteholders and depositors, one of whom may be classed as involuntary, the other as voluntary. When a bank bill is paid out in settlement of wages or accounts, the receiver does not concern himself about the bank of issue; all bills look alike to him in regard to their value... What of the depositor? What protection is extended to him? Before answering this question it is pertinent to repeat that noteholders and depositors stand in different positions. The noteholder is an involuntary creditor. In the course of business, selling goods or receiving wages, he has practically no option other than to accept the currency given him, and is therefore entitled to have that currency made sound and unchangeable in value.

He says that this is the only country in the world where the depositors have protection. Then there follows a supposed conversation between a farmer and a student of finance—the student, I suppose, being the Canadian Bankers' Association. Then further on there is a reference to the western farmers being misled by uninformed agitators. Well, I think this legislature was misled by a lot of uninformed agitators when members were told that a bank could not fail without the depositors being protected. Otherwise I do not believe this parliament would ever have passed the act giving them their charter. All the cards should have been laid on the table. Parliament gave to the Canadian Bankers' Association tremendously wide powers. Let me mention a few of the purposes of the association as set out in the act of incorporation:

(1) to promote the interests and efficiency of banks and bank officers, etc.; (2) to establish sub-sections of the Association; and (3) to establish clearing-houses for banks, by-laws regarding which require the consent of the Treasury Board. More serious powers were those imposed by the Bank Act. When the banks undertook to guarantee the note issue of every bank they found that they needed the power to inspect the note issue records of each bank and some protection at the moment of the suspension of a bank. For these purposes the Bank Act gives the Association power (1) to appoint a curator to supervise the affairs of any bank which may suspend payment, until the resumption of its business or the appointment of a liquidator; (2) to supervise the issue of bank-notes, including the making, delivery and destruction of the notes, and the inspection of the circulation accounts of the banks; (3) the custody and management of the Central Gold Reserves; and (4) to impose penalties for the breach or non-observance of any by-law, rule or regulation made by virtue of the section of the Act in question.

So that to all intents and purposes the Canadian Bankers' Association to-day have the powers of parliament, and instead of having only a Senate and a House of Commons in this country we have a Senate, a House of Commons and a house known as the Bankers' Association. Among the vast powers given to them under the act is that of inspection. But they did not inspect; they led us to believe everything was safe. Now, they say that the depositors of the Home Bank have no claim, but in my opinion they have a good moral claim. This legislature is responsible for the position in which these poor people who have lost everything now find themselves. They put their money in the bank because they thought they were protected. Let me quote just here the words of the Right Reverend Bishop Fallon of London in this connection:

But how can this end be reached in the matter under consideration. By the simple method of making the banks collectively responsible for the money they accept as deposits. The banks borrow our money without other security than the charters the people give them; they pay no, or a very low, rate of interest. When they loan us our money they charge us the highest rate of interest obtainable, and every shred of security that can be squeezed from us is rigorously exacted. We are actually made financial slaves by the very power of our own savings. And the bankers gamble with our earnings, and tell us to go whistle when the crash comes.

No further faith can be put in those who have been hitherto our financial guides. They have been weighed and found wanting. And they know it themselves. We are now being told that the banks have no objection to "government inspection," but that the government must bear the consequent "responsibility." The people of Canada will not tolerate the placing of any such "responsibility" on their government, that is, on themselves. They shall demand an effective guarantee for their hard-earned savings, and they will look to the forthcoming session of the federal parliament to exact that effective guarantee from those to whom these savings are confided.

I had a resolution on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, asking the government to consider the advisability of assisting the depositors and of calling upon the Canadian Bankers' Association to that end, but the motion has been ruled out of order on the ground that it involves a matter of finance. In my opinion, if the Canadian Bankers' Association will not voluntarily come across with this money, their association should be assessed for the amount of loss sustained through their failure to carry out proper inspection and audits and to maintain a state of efficiency in the banking business. Hon. members of this House should put their heads together and see what can be done to bring about some active measure of relief for these unfortunate depositors, many of whom lost their all and can never get back to the position in which they were before. I hope that this parliament will take such steps as may be necessary to restore confidence in the banking system of the country, and will see to it that the Canadian Bankers' Association carry out the conditions under which they received their charter. I suggest that should they fail so to carry out those conditions, parliament should take their charter from them and vest those powers where in my opinion they should be vested, in the Finance department of this country.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I agree with much that has been said by hon. members on both sides of the House with regard to the desire on the part of every person that the Home Bank depositors should be reimbursed if it is at all possible. I am not one of those who believe that our banking system is the last word in banking; I think that some useful amendments could be made to the Bank Act, amendments that would serve a good purpose in this country. Only a very few years ago we had twice as many banks in Canada as we have to-day. We had then a much better banking system than we have at the present time. The smaller banks in Canada are gradually being absorbed by the larger until it is perfectly obvious that within a very few years we shall have not more than three or four very large banks in Canada, serving the people by a system of branch banks. I do not believe that that system will serve the people in developing this Dominion. The branch banks to-day are merely gathering points for deposits. These deposits in turn are sent on to head office for investment. It is quite apparent to any person who will study the Canadian banking system that it would be impossible for these branch banks to make loans in the country; the system will not permit it. Some of our banks have three or four, and some as many as seven hundred, branches throughout Canada. They select a boy from school in the country, put him in the bank as messenger, later on he becomes an accountant, and in a very few years he blossoms out as a branch bank manager, with absolutely no experience in any kind of business except book-keeping and the making up of interest. Under the present system of banking a branch bank manager can make a good showing for his branch by not lending one cent from his branch. He can do that in this way: If he can get sufficient deposits in his bank to forward to head office he will be allowed enough interest on that to show a profit in his branch, and he does not need to lend a cent out of his branch. The result is that the cautious boy adopts that course and sends the deposits to head office. The money that is deposited in the branch banks all over Canada is forwarded to head office, and head office makes the loan.

I did not agree with much that was said in the Banking and Commerce committee last year about the banks not wanting to make loans. It goes without saying that no bank can make a profit and succeed unless it does make loans, for the only way they make a profit is by making loans, and the only way in which you can obtain a loan under the present system is by going to head office, where the money is accumulated from the branches. As a result of this accumulation, head offices have from time to time made improvident loans, and the bank failures in Canada in the past have been caused by head office loans. The money accumulates at head office, and if they cannot make legitimate loans they do what was done recently in the case of the Home Bank, make speculative loans where the ordinary business man would say they have no chance of recovering their capital. The Home Bank failure has brought to the notice of the Canadian people more forcibly than anything else the shortcomings of our banking system, but the Home Bank failure did not disrupt the business of this country to anything like the extent it was disrupted by the Merchants Bank fiasco. When the Merchants Bank closed its doors there were hundreds of thousands of customers and depositors who had to look elsewhere for their banking connection. They had to make new banking arrangements, start all over again in the tedious business of building up a credit.

Let me say that I have no grievance against the bankers of this country. I have never in my life made an application to a bank for a loan that was refused. I could always get all the money I wanted from the bank, so I have no grievance on that score.

Mr. JACOBS: Can the hon. gentleman tell me how he did it?

Mr. CAHILL: I shall be glad to, because it will illustrate one of the points I want to bring out. After I had made a few loans at first, as my business developed and I required more money I did what everyone else does who wants to get a loan; I went to head office. You cannot get money any other way. The branches have no authority to make loans under the present system, and unless a man who wants to borrow money can get acquainted with the officials at head office his business is in a very precarious state, because he cannot get anywhere with the branches.

Mr. JACOBS: How is it that no money would be advanced to my hon. friend where he is best known and that he could get all the money he wanted where he was not known?

Mr. CAHILL: Of course, my hon. friend knows as well as I do that every man has to be recommended by his home office before he can get to head office, so there is nothing in my hon. friend's contention. Apparently he is not able to get recommended at either place.

We are told that we have the best banking system in the world, that we have very few failures. I have been told repeatedly that in the United States this past year there were four or five hundred failures of banks. That would mean forty or fifty bank failures in Canada, in proportion to our population, and as a matter of fact we have had sixty or seventy bank failures in Canada in the past year. The failure of each branch of the Home Bank is the failure of a bank just as much as the failure of an individual bank at any point in the United States. They have several systems in the United States, and I am not competent to speak with authority on any of them, but I do know that in some of the states where the branch bank system is operating—not on the same lines as ours but along similar lines—they have had more failures than in other states where branch banks are not permitted.

I believe that the motion of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) is very good, but I think that instead of referring this matter to a special committee his motion, or something similar, should be referred to the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce, and I therefore propose to move an amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this House, in view of the failure of the Home Bank and of the fact that official prosecutions and inquiries have been instituted, including the royal commission which has been appointed to investigate the facts alleged in the petition represented by the shareholders of the bank and the affairs of the bank generally, and considering that the evidence received and to be taken before the several tribunals will be available for consideration, the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce should be instructed to consider the provisions of the Bank Act, with a view to recommending such amendments to the act as will better protect the interests of the depositors generally and will prevent similar occurrences in the future; and also to consider the report of the royal commission in its bearing upon these matters and with respect to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss.

I think that will serve the purpose better than my hon. friend's resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West Toronto): I propose to support a motion which will enable the standing committee on Banking and Commerce to consider this question, not in the autumn—even if a special session is called for it, which we know will not take place—not next year or the year after, but this session. The amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Cahill) simply means that the hands of parliament are to be entirely tied for an indefinite period. We may just as well cut out the camouflage and get down to facts. My hon. friend talks about the evidence to be got from trials and the like, the help that will be given to the committee. He asks the committee to wait until this royal commission has royally functioned, and he ties the hands of parliament just as absolutely and effectively as if the motion itself was defeated. What is the need of the commission at all? What is the need of putting the question at all if the matter is to be so determined? Why, the whole thing has been inquired into, threshed over backwards and forwards. And what is to prevent the banking committee at any time taking up any question on banking? The thing is a farce and is intended as a farce—that and nothing else. Wait until the trials? Why there is to be a case tried before the Privy Council some time this summer, in the early summer, to find out how these fellows are to be tried; then after all that you have to get your trials. Let us be honest about this thing. Let us start in by trying to be a little honest about it. We can have no action now—action of any and every kind would be impossible now—if that amendment is accepted. That is the way, Mr. Speaker, which this amendment strikes me. It rather carries on the whole game the government is playing in connection with this bank.

Let us start out with the first order. That first order is theirs. There is nothing in it except the attempt that was made to get the hide of Sir Thomas White nailed by somebody. That is all that is in it. Is there any suggestion that there was anything wrong—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he intend by that remark to say that was the object of the depositors in presenting the petition which they did?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will get to that in a minute. I at least credit the government with some common sense and some knowledge of what they are doing. I credit them with that. I cannot credit them with this: That they are so fatuous as to think there was anything wrong with the Home Bank except those particular dates that they so particularly picked out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who picked out?—not the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend asks me who picked out the dates. Why, his very good supporter and a counsel of the depositors, Mr. W. T. J. Lee. He was the prime mover.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The counsel of the depositors.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly that is what I am saying; that is where it comes from.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me understand aright. Does my hon. friend say that a certain gentleman took a position because he was a Liberal, or because he was counsel for the depositors?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I say that a certain gentleman, acting for this government took a position that was very convenient for the government to take.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to state to my hon. friend that so far as this government is concerned it knew nothing whatever of the actions of the depositors in this matter, or of their counsel until they presented to the government the petition which the government has now placed before the commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is nothing to take back. I repeat. Whether it be an accident, or anything else, that was a most convenient position for this government. What does it mean? What object is there in it?

Mr. FORKE: Do not get politics into this thing, anyway.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, the life line is already thrown out, and it is grabbed enthusiastically by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am anxious that this House, Mr. Speaker, shall have its hands untrammelled in doing what it thinks ought to be done and doing it now, and not in some other day within the future, and I am just trying to trace exactly how this thing works out. Is it intended to help the depositors? One would hardly think so. If it was to help the depositors there would be a plain straight declaration on the face of the very order in council itself showing that the government was not committed in the slightest degree to help out a depositor to the extent of one single sou. Oh, no, that was not the intention. What was it done for?

Mr. JACOBS: Would the hon. member tell me if he is in favour of helping the depositors?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman is seeking very anxiously to get information just at the time he wants it. I do not think he really wants it. Let us see. We have that order in council, and it is an order in council not for the purpose of ascertaining what is wrong with banks, banking and bank laws; not really what was the matter with the Home Bank but what was the matter with Sir Thomas White, and that is just about the last thing that any depositor is really interested in, unless the government had said to the depositors "Make a case out against Sir Thomas White and we will undertake to pay you." If that had been done we could at least understand the order.

Now, what is the next thing? The next thing we have is an amplification of this order in council, an amplification of the order to this extent: That the business of the Home Bank—mind you the business of the Home Bank—this time is to be inquired into from the time it gets its charter until it winds up. Why one of the matters is known to my hon. friend. I have myself drawn it to the attention of the Prime Minister. I tried to-day to get an answer and did not succeed. One of the matters that ought to be inquired into is the question as to whether or not this institution ever should have been allowed to function. We have the application one year, then we have the delays and the trouble, and we have the removal of the hand of the person whoever it was, who in the first instance said "This is an institution that ought not to function as a bank". That is something we do not get under this order in council, amended and extended as it is to-day. That is something I would have thought the standing committee on Banking and Commerce would have the right at any time to look into.

There is another question about this bank which is really not touched at all. After all the chief crime about the Home Bank is that it was allowed to smash. Oh yes, there have been representations made to other ministers besides Sir Thomas White. Does anyone doubt it? Does not everyone know it? Why should we not know what representations were made in matters having to do not only with the bank business but having to do with the stand of the country towards keeping banks going? Why should we not get some information upon that point? That is another matter which is entirely outside of this order in council. That is some information as to facts and allegations placed before the government by the bank directors on their visit to Ottawa. That is entirely outside of this order in council. Oh, no; there may have been tremendous governmental mistakes that allowed a bank to crash, but nothing in the world is to be said about it, it is not to be inquired into.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The order in council was amended to include everything from the time at which the bank was created to the day of its failure. What does my hon. friend mean by saying that anything has been left outside of the scope of the inquiry?

I venture to say that if anything that touches this bank is outside the scope of the order in council it will be included.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know what the trouble is with my right hon. friend, but I think I put him a pretty plain question not so very many days ago. I thought I repeated it here only to-day. He says everything is included. Why he knows the very question as to the incorporation of the bank is kept out and is not included.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend right here that his remarks to-night have been directed along the line that this inquiry is going to take too long. The government, when it instituted the inquiry, took what the depositors were most interested in and desired to have looked into, and referred that to the commission, hoping they would get through with it as quickly as possible. It was thought that by confining it in that way it would not take so long.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am trying to answer my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will let the right hon. Prime Minister answer any question he likes, but I have been waiting to get from this government some notion as to what their ideas were, but have not heard a single word, and now when I try to say something the hon. Prime Minister tries to make a speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I tried to answer the question as to whether or not the very points he speaks of should be included, and I have given him the reason why the order in council was framed as it was at the time. It was enlarged to bring the matter up to the time the bank failed. With regard to what happened before the bank was created. the circumstances that brought it into existence, I do not hesitate for one minute to say that the government will ask the commission to inquire into that point as well, if that will satisfy my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have made a little progress. We have got something else from the government. Let us see if we can make some more progress.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is all going to take time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. Prime Minister give us now, if he has them, the representations made by the directors who were here begging government assistance? He has got them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know what representations my hon. friend has reference to, but any representations made to the government will be placed before the commission, whatever they are and wherever they are.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I am referring to I think my hon. friend understands.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I refer to the representations made by the directors who came to Ottawa for the purpose of acquainting the government with the situation, and the statements made by them, the action taken by the government in allowing the bank to go, and their reasons for it. Now, none of these questions, Mr. Speaker, is covered by that order in council, and if there is anything that is vital for us to know, it is just exactly what happened at the wind-up, to see if anything could be done, for it is possible that something could be done. It has been done. My hon. friend knows it has been done. It is something that is possible. After all, the function of a government is to uphold banks, rather than to let them go in the discard.

Mr. JACOBS: Even if they are rotten to the core.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says "Even if they are rotten to the core". Banks have been saved which have been pretty rotten, and my hon. friend can find that out very, very quickly and very, very closely, and if there is anything that I am certainly not ashamed of, it was the action I took in saving that institution.

Mr. ROBB: What institution?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We all know that—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What institution does the hon. gentleman mean that he saved?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that I can add to my hon. friend's information on the point.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I did not catch the institution he referred to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot add to my hon. friend's information.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend did some wonderful thing and will not tell us about it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows it is going to take a long time for any commission to go into the matter and to report. If we do not know that we are just as foolish as the right hon. Prime Minister thinks we are, but I do not think we are quite so foolish. I think we know that it is going to take a long time, and that it means there will be no action taken one way or the other.

I do not for one minute identify myself with many of the remarks made by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Irvine). I think he is all wrong. But there is one matter I want to identify myself with, Mr. Speaker, and that is that the worst thing that can be done to our financial institutions at the present time is the maintenance of a smoke screen and keeping up a situation which will not admit the fullest discussion and the brightest light of day. And the way to get it and the way to have it, to my mind, is before the Banking committee without restrictions. Why should this parliament shackle the Banking committee with a resolution of this character? I say I do not agree with ground taken by our hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine). I think he is wrong. Take for example, what he says as to the assets of the banks of Canada, and what he says as to the 12 or 15 per cent—I forget the figure he gave, I think it was 12—of excess of assets over liabilities. Then in a subsequent sentence he said that that was only arrived at including bad debts, frozen credits, bank premises, and so forth. My hon. friend is quite wrong. That means that the banks, after every possible allowance is made, find themselves in that position. My hon. friend again is wrong. It is idle to say that there are no liars; but because we find a liar here—

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be absolutely wrong to say that they were all liars over there. Some of them may be honest and I think they are. Just in the same way, it is ridiculous to say that because there is one thief, everybody else is a thief. We know that is not so. Because one bank is improperly run and managed, it is ridiculous to say that the rest are the same, or that simply because one bank goes wrong, all are to be suspected. My hon. friend goes too far altogether. He says that he wants to put Canadian banking upon a proper basis in order to restore confidence. His speech this afternoon, if taken seriously, would go a long way to dispel any possibility of confidence.

There is another point, and I think if my hon. friend looks into this, he will see the fallacy of it. In one part of his speech he tells us that the banks are in this deplorable condition. In the next part of his speech he takes the position that the banks are so well off and prosperous that, without affecting their depositors or the interests of their shareholders, they can afford to shoulder the whole burden. My hon. friend is wrong there. He is right in this—that it is always better to have open and free discussion. The bank that ought to be respected has nothing to hide. Therefore, the position that I take is, in short, this, that any investigation into the Home Bank ought to be full and thorough; it ought to have to do, not only with its governmental connection during a certain period of its lifetime, but most particularly with its birth, and then, a great deal more emphatically and particularly, with its death. Further, if anything is to be done in connection with this matter, it is a great deal better that it should be done now. Why leave in the public mind the suspicion that people are giving voice to, that members of this House are giving voice to, as to the solvency of our institutions?

Mr. McCONICA: In the opinion of the hon. gentleman, would it be possible for the Banking committee or any other select committee during this session of Parliament to investigate fully the affairs of the Home Bank and to come to a definite conclusion as to its condition at the time it was formed, as to the maner in which it conducted its business and as to the shape in which it was when it went into liquidation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They can do that at least as quickly as any royal commission, and there is no reason why they should not get to work, stick to it, and do it.

Mr. McCONICA: They cannot finish it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know why they could not or should not. In any event, they will have to do it sooner or later. Whatever work is done by any royal commission, if anything is wrong, has all to be done over again before that committee. No measure of relief or change in the law can be carried out by the commission. Any fences that are found to be down cannot be re-erected by the commission. In any event, the work has to be done by the committee. If the government wants to have the commission running around, all right; but if we are really serious about this, we should say one of two things: Either that because there is a royal commission, nothing is to be done until that commission reports in so many words—and that means that we shall do nothing this year—or we should reject the amendment moved by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill).

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the admission of my hon. friend the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is one of the most peculiar utterances we have ever heard in this House on a serious question. Altogether it is rather a unique situation that an hon. gentleman speaking for the opposition should have been a Minister of Finance of this country during a period in which he ought to have known something about this bank. It is generally understood that my hon. friend had in his possession certain information that had been given to Sir Thomas White in previous years, and I think many in this House would view with some suspicion this attempt to sidetrack a deliberate effort which I believe the House will appreciate on the part of this government to find out the true facts in regard to the whole situation and to take action immediately those facts are found. That is the policy of this government. Imagine my hon. friend intimating to this House that the sole purpose of the organization of the commission was to get after Sir Thomas White. That is a peculiar statement, and one which my hon. friend knew, when he made it, had no warrant in fact.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says I made a statement which I knew to be untrue when I made it?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What did he say.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No warrant in fact. That is what I said.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He said that I knew it had no warrant in fact. I now ask for a ruling from the Chair whether that is a parliamentary expression.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the Minister of National Defence said that what had been stated by the hon. gentleman was not warranted in fact. I did not catch the words "that he knew."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: "To my knowledge."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of National Defence said, and very emphatically, that the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) had made a statement which, at the time he made it, he knew had no warrant in fact. That is a distinct violation of the rules, even though supported by the laughter of hon. gentlemen behind.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do I understand that my hon. friend says that he did not know that there was no warrant in fact for his statement?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have asked for a ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: No hon. gentleman can impute motives, and if the Minister of National Defence said that the hon. gentleman knew that the statement was not warrant in fact, that is not parliamentary.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I will say this, that if my hon. friend did not know it, he ought to have known it, because if my hon. friend had taken the slightest trouble—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask the Chair to request the hon. member to withdraw his statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will ask the hon. gentleman if he will withdraw that statement.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Certainly. And I will show this House before I finish the few remarks I have to make that my hon. friend ought to have known there was no warrant for that statement. He knew there was presented to the government a petition from—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The rule is of no avail whatever if that is to be considered a withdrawal. I ask again for a ruling as to whether anything the minister has said is a withdrawal in any sense whatever.

Mr. SPEAKER: He has withdrawn the statement. He made a sign.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not hear it.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, he withdrew the statement.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister says he has withdrawn, I am satisfied.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Certainly. My hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) knew that there had been a petition presented to the government on behalf of sixty thousand depositors who had lost their money in the Home Bank. That petition was presented by a representative delegation of men from all parts of the country, from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. It was in the following terms:

To His Excellency General the Right Honourable Lord Byng of Vimy, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., M.V.O., Governor General of the Dominion of Canada, in Council.

The petition of the undersigned members of the Executive Committee of the depositors in the Home Bank of Canada, humbly sheweth:—

(1) Your Petitioners are residents of various parts of the Dominion of Canada and are the duly appointed executive committee representing about sixty thousand depositors in the Home Bank of Canada.

(2) The said Bank was a Chartered Bank doing business under the provision of the Bank Act. Your petitioners are informed and believe that in the years 1915 and again in 1916 and in 1918 representations were made to the Department of Finance of the Dominion of Canada respecting the condition of the Home Bank of Canada and revealing a state of affairs that would have justified an investigation by the Department of Finance under the powers conferred upon the Minister of Finance under Section 56A of the Bank Act, whereby he was authorized to examine and enquire specially into any of the affairs or business of the Bank.

(3) Your Petitioners realize the seriousness of such action on the part of the Minister of Finance, and that the mere fact of causing an audit to be made might in itself bring about the failure of the said bank.

(4) Your Petitioners are also aware that at the time such representations and disclosures were made, the Country was at War and that the Minister of Finance, having regard to the public interest, was unwilling to precipitate a bank failure or crisis, or in any way disturb the financial condition of the Country, and that for such reason and on other good and sufficient public grounds, may not have deemed it advisable to exercise the power above referred to.

(5) If such audit had been made your Petitioners believe that the condition of the Bank would have been shewn to be such that its continuance in business could not have been further permitted.

(6) Your Petitioners believe that if the said Bank had ceased doing business at the time the said disclosures were made the then existing assets would have been almost, if not quite sufficient to meet all claims of creditors, whereas, by reason of the Bank continuing in business until the 17th day of August, 1923, and greatly increasing the amount of money belonging to the public on deposit, and at the same time permitting the assets of the said Bank to be greatly diminished in proportion to the amount of the deposits, the present depositors have suffered and will unless relief is granted, suffer a very severe loss.

(7) Your petitioners submit that the reasons an audit was not made of the said Bank, in accordance with the powers vested in the Minister of Finance, were reasons of a public and national character, and intended for the benefit of the public at large, and that therefore the loss to the present depositors occasioned by the Bank being permitted to continue to do business should be borne by the public at large and not by the present depositors.

(8) The said Bank and its predecessors. The Toronto Savings Bank and the Home Savings and Loan Company had for over fifty years been regarded as a safe depository for the savings of the public and the class of people who deposited their money in the said Bank was largely composed of wage earners with small earnings and their deposits consisted in many cases of the whole savings of a life-time.

(9) Your Petitioners submit that the confidence of the simple people throughout Canada in the banking institutions of the country is of the very greatest importance to the industrial and commercial interests of the country and that the lack of such confidence would have a serious and detrimental effect on the whole industrial and commercial prosperity of the country.

(10) Your Petitioners therefore submit that whether rightly or wrongly the depositors of the Home Bank of Canada were largely of the opinion that the Finance Department of the Government of Canada exercised such supervision over chartered Banks that it was impossible for depositors to lose their savings entrusted to such a bank the charter of which had been renewed from time to time by parliament and it is further submitted that the confidence of the people as a whole would be greatly restored if adequate relief were granted to these depositors.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Excellency be pleased to submit to Parliament an Act for the full indemnity of the depositors of the Home Bank of Canada against any loss suffered by reason of the failure of the said bank.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

Dated this 23rd day of January, 1924.

The delegation which presented that petition, made up, as I have said, of representative men from all parts of the country, alleged that in the years mentioned in the petition the attention of the then Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, had been called to the condition of the bank, and they asserted that instead of performing his duty under the provisions of section 56a of the then Bank Act, he made no audit such as was contemplated, and that had he taken this course a situation would have been disclosed which although it would probably have caused the failure of the bank, would have enabled the depositors to be reimbursed. That was their case. Therefore they claimed that on principles of justice and fair play they should be paid their deposits. They presented for the consideration of the government an interview which was given by Sir Thomas White to the Canadian Press, in which he admitted that he had received representations in regard to the bank, but gave the war and other reasons—I need not quote the interview in detail; most of it is unquestionably known to hon. gentlemen—as his justification for not having an audit made.

Now, I leave it to the judgment of every hon. member as to what was the duty of this government under the circumstances. Would the government have been justified, without any investigation, in asking parliament to vote the money necessary to compensate the depositors for their losses? If, without a full and complete investigation, they had done so, then they would have been making the Treasury liable not merely to those who lost money in the Home Bank, but to those who had lost money in the Farmers' Bank and in all other bank failures which had occurred in the history of the Dominion. Well, what was to be done? Was not the most natural and ordinary thing to do to make an investigation into the truth of the allegations set out in the petition? It was when we decided to make that investigation, in making which my hon. friend says, we were taking a political course entirely in order to get after Sir Thomas White.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): In the face of the petition presented to us, does my hon. friend mean to say there was any other course open to the government than the course we adopted of ordering a judicial investigation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, what was the course adopted by the government of Sir Robert Borden in 1912, when allegations were made by the depositors of the Farmers' Bank which had recently failed with regard to the circumstances under which its charter was granted? Sir Thomas White himself was the finance minister at the time, and he and his friends cannot now complain if we have followed what he then recommended—Sir Thomas White recommended to Council the appointment of the late Sir William Meredith, then Chief Justice of Ontario, to examine into the truth of the statements contained in the petition. We have taken the same course to-day.

Then when parliament meets my hon. friends opposite say: "Oh, you are not investigating this thing completely enough." Well, we started out to do what the depositors wanted us to do. We took the position that if the statements contained in their petition were proved to be correct by the Chief Justice of New Brunswick, a jurist of high repute, then the government would be bound to take some action in regard to the matter. But my hon. friends come along and say: "We don't want to find out what these depositors want to find out; we want everything investigated from the beginning to the end."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the government was so anxious to do just what the depositors asked, may I ask whether this sentence was put in at the request of the depositors:

—without in an way accepting the view that in the circumstances mentioned it is proper for the government to expend public moneys in the relief of the depositors of the said bank.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have no doubt that the same clause was inserted in the order in council appointing Sir William Meredith. We were not going to prejudge the case; by that statement we simply reserved to ourselves the right to act upon this matter when the commissioner reported. If we were to decide in advance that we were going to pay the money without any investigation, then—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You are having an investigation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend knows that very well. We simply reserve our judgment until we have an investigation made by Chief Justice McKeown into the allegations made by the depositors. If we find that those allegations are true, then the government will have to consider what course to pursue. We appointed a commission; the commissioner has made full arrangements; he has given up his circuit in New Brunswick and begins his hearings in Ottawa on April 16. He is prepared also to go to Toronto in order that full evidence may be heard. Was there anything wrong in our course up to that point? Did a single depositor find fault with us for taking that course? What other course could we have taken? If the commissioner had had nothing else to do than inquire into the statements made in the petition, there is no reason why we could not have had a report from him within a very short time. But my hon. friends come along and they want all sorts of things inquired into, which may not have the slightest relevance to the question whether or not the country should contribute any money to the depositors. The depositors have made their case; they have submitted their argument, and we are finding out the facts. We are prepared to act either on an interim report or upon the final report when presented, which we hope will be at the earliest possible day.

The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) to a certain extent is involved in this matter. As a result of the representations made by hon. gentlemen opposite, the powers of the commissioner have been extended——to an investigation of the affairs of the said bank during the whole interval between the issue of the bank's charter and the failure of the said bank, including any representations made to the government of the day, as to its condition, any action taken by any of the ministers of finance upon such representations as may have been made, and the effect on the position of the depositors of any audit under Section

56a of the Bank Act if made at any time in consequence of such representations.

So my hon. friend's conduct as Minister of Finance comes under review before the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not in the first order, but in the one we wanted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend did not know what he wanted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, he did.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): He did not know anything about the order until we brought it here. He talked about having wide investigations. We are willing to have wide investigations—anxious to have them. But we do not want the case of the depositors as presented to us—and because it involved Sir Thomas White we are told we are playing politics in investigating the matter—to be imperilled or interfered with; we do not want anything to prevent its full consideration by the commissioner and his early report thereon to the government.

Now, my hon. friend, speaking of the amendment of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), said that it meant that nothing could be done, that parliament was tying its hands until the result of the criminal actions was known. Probably my hon. friend made that criticism simply on hearing the resolution read, and did not know just what the effect of the resolution was. In other words, he made a hasty criticism of it—and that is speaking very kindly. As I understand the resolution of the hon. member for Pontiac, it deals very fully and completely with the proposal that was brought before the House to-day by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine).

What did the hon. member for East Calgary propose? His motion is:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a parliamentary committee should be appointed immediately to investigate the Home Bank failure, with a view to discovering any weaknesses in the Bank Act which may be amended to prevent a similar occurrence; to devise some means of protecting depositors generally; and to make recommendation as to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss.

The resolution of the hon. member for Pontiac deals with the three matters that are referred to by the hon. member for East Calgary; He recognizes the fact that investigations have been made by the curator; that investigations have been made at the request of my hon. friend, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that other information is obtainable from the investigation made by the Attorney General of Ontario; that the commission which we have appointed is proceeding to function; and that the evidence taken before that commission will be available day by day to go before the Banking and Commerce committee. My hon. friend suggests that an inquiry by a commissioner will take longer than an inquiry before a parliamentary committee. But hon. gentlemen should remember that the commissioner in this case is a judge who will sit every day from ten o'clock in the morning until the usual time for the closing of the day's proceedings, and he will be attending to the one task of ascertaining the facts in connection with the allegations made by the depositors in their petition. That is his business; that is his duty. How can a committee of the House of Commons sit except in the mornings for an hour or two? How can they give full attention to this matter with hon. gentlemen giving consideration to the other important questions that come before this House? What possible attention could be given to details except by the retaining of counsel and all that kind of thing? Any gentleman who has had experience in regard to inquiries the purpose of which has been to ascertain the truth in reference to public questions will realize that a trained jurist who devotes himself exclusively to the task of getting at the truth will do so more effectively than a parliamentary committee which can only sit occasionally and do desultory work. So that as I understand the resolution of the hon. member for Pontiac, there will be committed to the Banking and Commerce committee at once the task of considering this question of the Home Bank failure, of considering the evidence adduced before the commission and of obtaining it day by day as it is given. With that evidence before them they can proceed to make such recommendations as they deem wise and which can be crystallized into legislation for the purpose of preventing a condition of affairs from arising in the future similar to that which has arisen in connection with the Home Bank, and for the purpose of protecting the rights of depositors in the future. The motion also provides that when the report of the commissioner is presented—which the government hope will be well before the conclusion of this session—the committee on Banking and Commerce will have the right to consider it and to deal with the question whether something should be done to assist the depositors in the matter of their losses. I submit that the resolution of the hon. member for Pontiac is one that ought to commend itself to the judgment of every hon. member of this House who is anxious that the interests of the public shall be protected and that a full and proper inquiry shall be made into this matter. And that inquiry should first be into the facts alleged by the petitioners,—let us never get away from that; hon. gentlemen may talk about paying these losses, and it is right that they should talk about it. But when we come to consider how this matter was first initiated and brought to the attention of the government; when we remember that representatives of 60,000 depositors, who had made their organization and retained counsel, came to the government and made requests based on a certain statement of facts, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this House will agree that this government did the wise thing in endeavouring to find out first as to the truth of the facts alleged, and the government will be prepared to act. The committee will be asked to consider the findings made by the commissioner dealing with that particular matter. It should be the first matter submitted to the commissioner.

That is the situation, Mr. Speaker. What more could this government do? Every hon. member that sits in this House knows of hard cases that have arisen wherever the Home Bank had an agency. Pathetic stories have come to us all, of the widowed mother left alone with no money, and of organizations that have lost all their funds. Sad cases are to be found all over the country, and I am sure that every hon. member of this House approaches the consideration of this question in a most sympathetic way. I think I can speak for my colleagues as well as myself when I say that we all do so. But we want to have the matter dealt with on proper business lines. We want to have findings made by a proper tribunal, to be submitted to this House.

It is alleged that there were certain peculiar circumstances in connection with the Home Bank which were responsible for its failure. It is alleged that those circumstances were such that in the interest of the country and as a matter of fairness and justice this parliament should reimburse the depositors. It is alleged too that the circumstances in this case are different from those which existed in the case of any other bank that failed, but unless it is shown that that condition existed, in what different position are the Home Bank people from those of any other bank that has failed ever since confederation? We want to find out what the facts are, and I think we are taking the most effectual way for the purpose of getting the facts, and the government will act in this matter. The desire of the government is that the commissioner should proceed with the greatest possible speed in dealing with this question.

It has been suggested by somebody that this government have some reason for not wanting a full investigation. As the Prime Minister has said more than once, there is not a single item in connection with this Home Bank from the period previous to the granting of its charter down to the last moment but what this government is fully prepared to have investigated. But I want to say to hon. gentlemen that those who desire to have speedy action taken in this matter do not want to have a herring drawn across the trail, as the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) attempted to do to-night in order to mix this matter up. Let the commissioner deal with this question of the request of the petitioners and report, and then let us have the fullest possible investigation of all the doings of the finance ministers during the life of the bank.

I just want to make one point more. It is alleged here that Sir Thomas White has given as a reason that he did not have the audit made which was contemplated under the old Bank Act the fact that we were at war and the danger to public credit by proceeding at that time. Now, when a duty is imposed on a minister of the Crown under a statute he is bound to carry out that duty, and if the statute does not create some exception which would enable him to evade responsibility, then he should proceed to carry out his duty. It does not make, to my mind, the slightest difference in the consideration of this question as to what reason Sir Thomas White gives why he did not act. The statute says that he could act, that the audit could be made, and he has not made the audit; that is the situation. You may excuse, you may explain, but you cannot justify. If there was given to Sir Thomas White in 1916 and in 1918 evidence from responsible and competent sources which required action on his part, it does not make a bit of difference whether the country was at war or not; I submit he should act under the statute. I only mention that because we have had discussions in this House as to whether he should or should not have acted in view of the fact that we were at war. There is nothing in the statute that exempts him or excuses him for not acting in case of war or in any other case.

Now the question before the House, Mr. Speaker, is this. Approaching the consideration of this matter, as I am sure hon. members do, or ought to do, from a sympathetic point of view, and having regard to the general interests of the whole country. I do submit that the course which the government has adopted will result in a more speedy inquiry, an inquiry which will be complete and full, and which will give to the House and the country a report and information upon which we can act. The amendment of my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) will give full and complete authority to the Banking and Commerce committee to go into this whole question and enable them to report to parliament their recommendations in regard to this whole matter.

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take a non-partisan stand in this debate to-night. I submit, Sir, that what is most needed to-day is the restoration of confidence in our banking institutions. To-day throughout the country business is stagnant, and men are not sure just where they are at. I am sorry to see this debate develop into such a partisan squabble as it has to-night.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is the function of government to provide a sound monetary system for the country. If a government sees fit to do that by proxy, it may; but I do think that a government cannot delegate its moral obligations to banks. The government has a duty to the people which it can only discharge by providing a sound, monetary system and a thorough banking system which will be absolutely safe.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) said that he was against the government reimbursing the depositors of the Home Bank because it would create a precedent, and other hon. members have taken the same view—a precedent that would be very costly to Canada. I wish to state that such a precedent would not be as costly as the repetition of bank failures has been. Some change is very, very necessary. The annual reports of our banks for the last two years have all been such as would lead the public to believe that they were all absolutely sound, and yet a number of them were in considerable difficulties. What confidence can be expected to be placed in the other banks more than in those that have been proved to be in difficulties?

Last year when the Bank Act was under discussion the banks used all their powers, which were many, in resisting the attempts of some hon. members to provide for government inspection of the banks. Now we have the evidence that some other system of inspection than prevails at present is very necessary in the interests of the banks themselves as well as of the people.

I do not think the comparison of the Farmers' Bank with the Home Bank is a fair one, as the government knew in 1916 the Home Bank was not in a sound condition. Sir Thomas White, it is alleged, said that it was not in the public interest to permit a bank failure. I think he meant it was not in the public interest to admit a bank failure. If the Home Bank was wrong at that time, which we have every reason to believe, if it was really broke then, and that knowledge was kept from the public, I do not see why this $11,000,000 loss should be saddled on the shareholders of the Home Bank. Some say it will be eleven millions that Canada will have to shoulder and that we cannot afford it. We can afford to stand the loss of such a sum much better than the depositors can. Eleven million dollars sounds like a lot of money. It is a lot for the few depositors of the Home Bank to lose, but it is not too big an amount for all the people of Canada to pay; and if it was lost in the interest of the Dominion as a whole, if it is to be regarded practically as a war measure, then it is right that we should shoulder the burden and not place that obligation on the shoulders of a few. The country is engaged in looking after the returned men and providing for them, loaning them money and financing them, because of the sacrifices they made during the war. If the sacrifices of the depositors of the Home Bank can also be regarded as a war measure, and the people of Canada benefited therefrom, I think the Dominion should come to their assistance and assume the burden.

Mr. A. F. HEALY (North Essex): The constituency I represent is vitally interested in this question. At the time of the Home Bank failure we had five branches with $1,120,000 on deposit and 4,000 depositors. Now, up to the moment the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) spoke this debate had been carried on absolutely free of any political complexion of any kind. I am sorry indeed to see any hon. member of this House attempt to make the just claims of the depositors of the Home Bank a political football. No good can come from taking that attitude and I, for one, say, Mr. Speaker, that whether the charter was granted wrongfully, whether any minister of finance or officer at a later date did something, or did not do something, that he should have done is not the question that interests the depositors of the Home Bank. I have no desire to attempt to attach blame for the failure of the Home Bank to any one, or to any party; but I do say that in my opinion in seconding the amendment to the resolution I have taken the best course to protect the rights and interests of four thousand of my constituents. If it can be shown, and if it is shown, that something was not done that should have been done, and for that reason this case is entirely different from some of the other failures and that it was for the benefit of the general public or for the benefit of the Bankers' Association, then I think these depositors should be paid, and paid in full.

Now, what is the best and quickest way to get relief? Are we to throw this question into the hands of a committee who can summon witnesses from all over, or is this committee to sit and duly accept the evidence that is submitted before the commissioner and duly to consider these points, and at any time bring in a recommendation to this House? The committee may not have to wait until the final report is in before making a recommendation. If the hon. member for West York is prepared to move to-night that these depositors be paid at once without any further investigation I will support his motion. But surely no member of the House is prepared to-night to take such an attitude. If the depositors are to be paid the question comes up, who should pay them? I claim that the members of the Bankers' Association, in co-operation with the government, should pay the depositors, for the reason that if anyone was saved by the action of the then finance minister it certainly was the chartered banks of Canada. On whom would have fallen the first loss? On the chartered banks. For that reason these banks should take an entirely different attitude from what they are pursuing in this situation.

From time to time last year I attended the sittings of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce when they were considering the Bank Act. I was not a member of the committee, but I found an atmosphere there that should not have existed. When the representatives of the people were attempting—and they do not pretend to be experts; none of us are financial experts—to amend the Bank Act I found an atmosphere of war existing, an atmosphere of war between the banks and the people of Canada—that was what existed at the sitting of the committee on Banking and Commerce. When I went there I viewed a circle of the highest-priced counsel in Canada surrounding the representatives of the people, and I felt that they were being surrounded by a bunch of high-priced gunmen. Why, some hon. members were almost afraid to open their mouths before that committee.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not all of them.

Mr. HEALY: That is not an atmosphere that should exist in this country. We are groping for light in this situation. I will admit that I would not be able to give a suggestion, because I am not an expert in banking; but I do say that from the bankers of this country a group can be got together, and a very small group, that in a very short time can show the people of this country how their savings can be ensured. The bankers of this country are the only people who can do it and do it safely. Therefore, they should co-operate with the representatives of the people, and bring the suggestion here so that we can put it in the form of legislation. That is one point.

Another point is that there should be a different method of inspection. It should not be government inspection but inspection of banks by banks. The bankers of this country can form a corps of inspectors, comprising expert government representatives whose inspection could be so thorough that it would be impossible for a single cent to be lost by the depositor, because before the capital employed in the bank would be used up from the knowledge that these men would have the bank would be closed and loss to the depositors saved. Therefore I say that with that inspection it is possible to ensure deposits. In bringing about that desirable result I am asking the co-operation not only of the bankers but of every member of this House and of every party. By carrying out this suggestion, we shall be doing what I believe the people are to-day demanding of their representatives.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I desire only to add a few words at the present time to what has been said, chiefly with a view to making more clear—and placing if I can in a fair light before the House—the position of Sir Thomas White, not now a member but formerly Minister of Finance.

May I commence by saying that I have never been disposed to assume an attitude of hostility, either to the depositors on the one hand or the government on the other, in relation to this matter. I have had many delegations—well, not many but some—wait upon me up to the time of the issue of the first commission which is under review to-night, and I fancy if any of those delegates are interviewed they will say that I expressed no criticism whatever of the relationship of the government to the bank. I have had some experience in matters of this kind and I know how difficult such a situation is for an administration. I was, however, astonished when the terms of the commission were first announced. I may be wrong but I think I can divine to-night the hand that wrote the commission. I think I see behind the throne in this matter the instigator of what was intended to be a purely partisan investigation designed to injure a political opponent. Let us look over the history of the matter. The bank failed in the month of August. Many depositors over the length and breadth of our country were ruined. Others were nearly ruined. Widespread distress prevailed. People in distress are not disposed to be quite as fair-minded as they would be under other circumstances. They are disposed to grasp at anything at all that can be elevated into a complaint or a greivance, and to seek to build thereon a claim to be recouped. In doubtless this state of mind those who suffered most, the depositors, came to the government. They alleged that at a period in the prior history of the bank certain representations had been made impeaching in some way the integrity of the institution, and they alleged that had certain action then been taken the failure which they admitted would have resulted would have been less disastrous than now is the result, after some years delay. One would imagine that they had gone much further, to listen to the words of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). One would have imagined—indeed, he stated in so many words—that they had asked for an inquiry into allegations of negligence and breach of duty, and that the government had simply acceded to their demand in granting the inquiry.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I did not say that they had asked for an inquiry. I said they asked for the payment of the money and that the government felt that it would be necessary to ascertain the truth of the allegation before acting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister went further.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He stated that in asking for the inquiry they had only done what was asked for by the depositors.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well. I put myself in the judgment of the House if that was not the statement of the minister. Now as a matter of fact there was no allegation, either of malfeasance of office, of negligence or of error in judgment in any of the representations of the petitioners to this government. Indeed, the whole body of the petition was an admission that Sir Thomas White had performed his duty in each of the decisions he had arrived at in relation to the bank. But the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) to-night has gone so far as to plainly intimate that there was a compulsion in law upon Sir Thomas White, and that to that compulsion he failed to respond and that in failing so to respond he could not plead the exigencies of the war.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What I said on that point was this: that if a proper complaint requiring an audit under the provisions of the Bank Act, section 56 (a), as stated in the petition, was made to Sir Thomas White that he would be bound to carry out the statute; and the fact that the war was on was no excuse or justification, as it is not provided for in the statutes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the minister said what I have stated, or words to the same effect, he did say what he says now; but he preceded it with the other statement. The intimation he wished to convey was that there was an allegation of malfeasance of office, an allegation of neglect of duty against Sir Thomas White, which allegation never existed and never was presented to the government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I never used those words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, "neglected duty" is a mild expression for what Sir Thomas White would have been guilty of, had the minister's words been given their full and complete interpretation. What I say is this: That Sir Thomas White has not pleaded the war by way of any defence for omission of a duty he otherwise would have performed. Sir Thomas White has said that because a war was raging, because of the financial conditions that necessarily surround a war, he had to be all the more careful that he did not unnecessarily precipitate a financial crisis. But what I want to say to-night is this: That in order to ascertain the facts connected with Sir Thomas White's relationship to the bank, the government do not need any commission of inquiry. There were not any allegations of verbal representations and of verbal replies. What took place took place in writing and all was on the record, open to the inspection of the government, and open for their review and decision; and if upon that record they came to the conclusion that they were responsible as a government, that in any way Sir Thomas White failed in his duty—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does the right hon. gentleman mean to say that this government got the complaint that was made to Sir Thomas White in 1916? All I have to say is that there was no such record in the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I fancy, from the hon. minister's knowledge of the department, that I was right in divining who was behind the order in council. But let me say that the records of the department showed what the complaint was, and showed what was done. The records of the department were transmitted to Sir Thomas White after the failure of the bank, and had been in the department up to that time. I have a copy of them in my hand. They disclose the nature of the complaint complete, and disclose Sir Thomas White's conduct after, and there is never an allegation that either the complaint or the conduct that followed the complaint differed in the least degree from that reflected in this correspondence. So that the government had everything before it. The government was in a position to act, but the government shunted the thing, in order to bring the country, if they could, to a suspicion or a belief that in some way the question revolved around the culpability of Sir Thomas White; and in that way they hoped to secure a sort of political advantage as respects himself and his party, and consequently, what is dear to their hearts, a postponement of their responsibility.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend still maintain that there was in the public records of the department the correspondence that was sent to Sir Thomas White?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: Or does he mean to say that Sir Thomas White, when he left office, had left with his secretary an envelope to give to his successor; and that when the announcement of the failure took place that secretary sent this confidential document on to Sir Thomas White, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) gave out a statement that it was private correspondence and he supposed it belonged to Sir Thomas White?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sir Thomas White left it to the department as a public record.

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, he did, and I have Sir Thomas White's letter to that effect in my possession. It never was intended to be anything but a public record, and in its essence it is a public record. You cannot make a public record a private record.

Mr. ROBB: These documents were sent to Sir Thomas White. Does the right hon. gentleman deny that the secretary sent the documents on to Sir Thomas White? Will he say now that Sir Thomas White, up to this minute, has yet returned the original documents to the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know who sent them to him. I know they were sent from the department to Sir Thomas White after the failure of the Home Bank, having lain there all the time prior to that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Private and confidential.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, they were not. Sir Thomas White never intended them to be. If they were private and confidential, why did he not take them with him?

Mr. JACOBS: Ask Sir Thomas White.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were public documents.

Mr. ROBB: If they were public, why has Sir Thomas White not returned them to the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No doubt the department has a record of them. The government would know what they were before they sent them out.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is this difference of opinion not the best proof possible that an investigation is necessary?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will answer my hon. friend. In the first place, I do not think there is any difference of opinion. These were documents on the records of the department. Some of them had been marked "private" at the time, as many a document is; but when a minister leaves a department and leaves documents there, those documents are public documents. If they are private documents, he takes them with him, because he is a private citizen after that. He does not leave a private file in the department to be treated as private, and he never intended these to be treated as private.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why does he not send them back?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Evidently the government does not want them, and I would presume he would expect the government to have a copy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The leader of the opposition has said that the government had a knowledge of those documents to which he has just made reference. The member of the government that would have the knowledge, if any, would be the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). When I came back from England, I took occasion to ask the Minister of Finance whether he had any knowledge whatever of this particular document. Mr. Fielding told me that he had not; that if the question were raised at any time, I had his authority to say that he had not; that until after the private secretary in whose hands Sir Thomas White had left those documents, had returned them to Sir Thomas White at Toronto, he had no knowledge that any such documents existed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All I can say is that from the information I have it would be his own fault.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If Mr. Fielding were here to answer that insinuation, I would not reply to my right hon. friend when he says, "it was his own fault."

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does my right hon. friend mean by that? I am saying that the documents are public documents. I cannot help it if he did not look at them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were not public documents; they were documents that Sir Thomas White had left with his secretary as private documents. He regarded them as private documents and they have been so treated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The previous minister ought to know best of all, and he has stated —and I have his word in writing—that he left them in the department intending them to be public documents. The documents themselves disclose the fact that they are public documents. They deal with public matters in a public way. In fact, I do not know that I have observed that even the word "private" is marked upon them. Certainly, the word "private" is not marked upon many of them. Some of them, I notice, have the word "personal" upon them, as many documents are marked.

Mr. ROBB: Does my right hon. friend now admit that he has those documents in his possession?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I have copies of them! Sir Thomas White has given me copies of the documents.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Why does he not send copies to the department?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a wonder to me why they were sent to Sir Thomas White immediately after the failure of the Home Bank.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The private secretary of Sir Thomas White was also private secretary of his successor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Ask the private secretary why he returned them.

Mr. GRAHAM: Ask Sir Henry Drayton. He knows about them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the kernel of the whole thing, and consequently it excites hon. gentlemen opposite. They do not get rid of the fact that the documents were all at their disposal and that they were not sent to Sir Thomas White until after the bank failure. The government knew right well that if they would send them out, they could easily get them. The whole thing is open and clear as day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): As clear as mud.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen are hiding themselves in laughter, and I admit that they have attained a certain degree of perfection in that art that far surpasses any that they have attained in any other. All is on record. All was before them in their files for nearly two years. They sent it away afterwards on the plea that it was a private document.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take strong exception to the remarks of my right hon. friend. He says that the government sent away these documents; that they were on the government files. I repeat that the Minister of Finance himself stated emphatically that there were not such documents on the files of the department; that he had no knowledge of them whatever; that he never sent them away, nor were they sent away by his authority nor by that of any member of the government. My right hon. friend has said and repeated over and over again statements which are absolutely untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, the ruder the language the more the applause. Is the private secretary not now an officer of the Finance department?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the gentleman who acted as private secretary for Sir Thomas White is still in the government service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is he not an officer of the Finance department?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he is in the Finance department, but he is in that department in a particular capacity. He is not there as private secretary of Sir Thomas White, nor there to disclose to the department matters which were confidential and which Sir Thomas White in his day regarded as confidential.

Mr. ROBB: I think it is fair to the young man who is now an officer of the department to make this statement, that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) learned, through a statement in the press that those documents had disappeared, he called in this young man for an explanation. This young man said that the documents had been left him by Sir Thomas White to be given to his successor; that they had remained there in the pigeonhole; that when he learned that the Home Bank had failed, he called up Sir Henry Drayton and told him that those documents were there, and Sir Henry Drayton told him: "You had better return them to Sir Thomas White."

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has proved what I said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps hon. gentleman will get through with their laughter after things get a little more serious for them in the investigation. The documents were left to the successor in office. Were they private if they were to be handed to the successor in office?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The successor in office was a political and personal friend of Sir Thomas White. That is a very different thing from having the documents on file in the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The successor in office was the next Minister of Finance. Sir Thomas White is alleged to have handed to the next Minister of Finance a file which was a private file! Can hon. gentlemen conceive of any greater rubbish than that? I have not seen the gentleman since; I do not remember his name; I have not seen him since to my knowledge; but if he had those documents in his possession and afterwards, being told to deliver them to Sir Henry Drayton, reported to him that they were a private file, no doubt Sir Henry Drayton would so advise him. But a minister does not hand to his successor a private file.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why did Sir Henry Drayton not hand the file to Mr. Fielding?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because apparently Sir Henry Drayton never got it. Sir Thomas White never intended the documents to be regarded as private.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why did Sir Henry Drayton ask that the documents be sent back to Sir Thomas White? Why did he not ask that they be sent to Mr. Fielding?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because, I suppose, it was reported to him by the secretary that the file was a private one. But the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) distinctly says to-night exactly what Sir Thomas White said, that Sir Thomas White handed them to his successor.

Mr. ROBB: But they were marked "private".

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume they had been marked "private" all along. Those things are usual; but when they are to be handed to the successor, there is nothing private about them; they become the property of the department. That is all I have been saying right along, and if hon. gentlemen find much cause for either amusement or self-congratulation, while I admit that they are badly in need of it, I can only admire the elasticity with which they spring for it. Now may I ask the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb): Have they not now copies of all these documents in the department?

Mr. ROBB: We have copies that were discovered in the Home Bank files of certain letters that were sent out. We have not copies of the letters that came down to Sir Thomas White.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. member (Mr. Rinfret) say? I notice he usually leads the cackling. Now will he tell me what he says? Oh, he will not get up. Well the fact is that to the successor of Sir Thomas White the documents came or should have come—if they did not it was not the fault of Sir Thomas White—and the department well knew that those documents could have been procured by them at any time, and thereupon they could have come to a decision in this matter. Instead, they appoint a commissioner to look over the documents—I presume instead of themselves—and they confine his efforts to investigating what happened in 1916 and the two succeeding years.

Now, Sir Thomas White in the published statement he gave, said that nothing had come to his attention which at all called for investigation under the section referred to in this debate, but that what did come to his attention came there presented by three of the directors. Those directors made certain representations to him. Pursuant to those representations, and with their full concurrence as to the method adopted, he had certain inquiries and investigations made, and the result of those inquiries and investigations was entirely satisfactory to those three directors and accepted by them as satisfactory. Sir Thomas White adds that to have made an external audit, to have sent in representatives from the outside, would in his judgment have precipitated a collapse of the bank. No hon. member would there be in this House at all acquainted with financial matters who would not agree that to take such a step is in itself very serious and likely to do very great injury to the institution under investigation. When that becomes known, to carry on further, even though the other circumstances would warrant it, would probably become impossible.

What I want to impress is this. As to what a minister of finance should do on representations made him, that minister, in association with his colleagues or alone, must decide in the light of the public interest and under the circumstances that surround him at the time. That is his duty, and his duty alone. And I want to know how any judge of the court of New Brunswick or of any other court is going to say now what a minister of finance should have done under the circumstances of five, six or seven years ago. How is he going to put himself in the position that the minister of finance was in then? It cannot be done. He cannot possibly surround himself with the circumstances that then prevailed, nor can he to-day revive the circumstances which surrounded the minister then. He may find out what the position of the bank was at that time. But what were the circumstances that then surrounded the minister? The minister had to decide in the light of the representations made to him, in the light of what he knew of the record of the Home Bank, in the light as well of the circumstances of the hour in Canada, what it was his duty to do. How is a judge of a court now to report upon what the duty of the minister of finance was at that time? This government is in a far better position to decide than any judge. This government knows, or ought to know, something of the duties of a minister of finance. The present minister of finance knows without question, and looking over that record which reflects the whole situation, he is in an infinitely better situation to judge what should have been done than any official of any court in Canada. Consequently I say, keeping in mind the object of the expanded order in council to ascertain whether there is liability, moral or legal, to the Home Bank depositors, the minister of finance, knowing that all is reflected in the documents, is in a far better position to determine than any judge could ever be.

But the motion of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) goes further. As I read the order in council, while it is wide in its terms, its purpose is very definite. Its purpose was definite from the beginning, and is definite now. Its purpose, as stated in the document, is to inquire into certain things, first a few, now many, but all in order to ascertain what the government should do in relation to the depositors. I do not think any hon. member will say that there is any other object in the investigation. The object, though, of the motion of the hon. member for East Calgary is much wider. He seeks to review the circumstances of the failure for the purpose not only of seeing what ought to be done in relation to the depositors, but as well what ought to be done in relation to the law. Consequently there is an object to be served by such investigation and inquiry that cannot be served by the present one.

Now as to the amendement. I was not in the House when the amendment was moved, but really it is an extraordinary motion, and I hope hon. members will realize its full import—what it entails if it is going to carry. I do not think any hon. member imagines that this amendment means other than another evasion. It reads:

> That in the opinion of this House, in view of the failure of the Home Bank and of the fact that official prosecutions and inquiries have been instituted, including the royal commission which has been appointed to investigate the facts alleged in the petition representing all the shareholders of the bank and the affairs of the bank generally, and considering that the evidence received and to be taken before the several tribunals will be available for consideration, the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce should be instructed to consider the provisions of the Bank Act with a view to recommending such amendments to the act as will better protect the interests of the depositors generally and will prevent simlar occurrences in the future; and also to consider the report of the royal commission in its bearing upon these matters and with respect to the possiblity of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss.

Put succinctly, is it not this? That the committee on Banking and Commerce shall not hear evidence, but shall consider the report of this royal commission—when it comes; shall consider as well the evidence in the prosecutions and inquiries that have been instituted; and upon that evidence and upon the report of this commissioner shall then make recommendations to protect the interests of depositors generally and to prevent further occurrences in the future, and also with respect to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors.

Well, nothing apparently is going to be done by the committee on Banking and Commerce, nothing can be done until the prosecutions and appeals are over, until the other inquiries referred to, whatever they are, which have been instituted, are over too, and until, as well, this commissioner gets through the investigation of the whole history of the bank back to 1903 for his purpose of deciding what should be done about the depositors; when all these things are over they are, I presume, going to review the reports and make recommendations to this House. Well, that simply means—one can hardly tell what it means, but it certainly does mean that nothing will be done this session; it means another shelving. Hon. members talk about investigations; it means piling on top of the investigations, already so numerous, according to the Minister of Defence, still another. It will be a case of waiting until all these investigations are over and then having the Banking and Commerce committee review the matter again. Is that going to be satisfactory to the depositors? Is that going to meet the general demand of the country? Is that going to meet the demand for an answer to the question, has there been negligence; has there been malfeasance; has there been neglect of duty; has there been anything to justify or compel a recoupment of the depositors? I do not think it will, but that is the position the government takes. I protest against this continual postponement of responsibility. If the government is not able to meet its responsibility let the government get out and give place to some other which will meet responsibility. Now, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), smiles, and sometimes as I look across the floor of the House I really think he would like to do that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not see the more responsible man to take the job.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I can see some who have some notion of responsibility, and that this government has not. The art of government, to this administration, consists in taking the most circuitous and long-winded route by way of evading every responsibility they confront. That seems to be what they keep themselves in office for.

There was an investigation by commission in the case of the Farmers' Bank, and why? I remember it; it was some years ago, I do not say I remember it with absolute accuracy. But in that case there was a division of statement as respects certain representations made that were not in writing, as respects certain warnings given to the then minister of finance in relation to the issue of the charter of that bank, and which could only have been made clear and only have been established by something in the nature of a judicial investigation. So far as I can recall, no committee investigation was asked for; I do not think there was any asked for and denied. Here, though, the investigation looks to one object and one alone, an object much narrower than that in the mind of the hon. member, an object that will be defeated if the commission alone is relied on and an object that will be indefinitely postponed if the amendment is adopted. I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that practically all hon. members who desire to speak on this motion have done so, and I do not see why we should not conclude the debate this evening.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood from the whip that the adjournment was to be moved at any time after eleven. Perhaps I am misinformed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is the wish of the House to conclude the debate to-night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Chief Government Whip say that I am misinformed?

Mr. KYTE: No; I said that if a motion was made to adjourn the Prime Minister would express a desire to conclude the debate, but he would leave it to the sense of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion (Mr. Meighen) negatived.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my right hon. friend through speaking?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, if I cannot get an adjournment. I wished to bring some other matter into the debate in relation to this correspondence, and I understood definitely from the whip that a motion for adjournment would be accepted at any time after eleven. If I am wrongly informed I have no right to go on, and I yield.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the time of the House just for a moment. In view of what the right hon. leader of the opposition, (Mr. Meighen) has said one or two remarks on my part may not be out of place before the debate concludes.

In the first place it is desirable that the House should understand just how the government came to take the course it did in this matter. The matter came to the government's attention officially through a deputation representative of the depositors of the Home Bank. The depositors are the persons most interested in this matter; indeed, the House is debating the subject because the House realizes that a very large number of men and women in this country have lost sums of money and have endured great hardship as a result of the failure of this bank. They feel, and I think rightly feel, that it has been through no fault of theirs that the bank has failed; they wish if possible to have their losses recouped, and they have asked the government whether it would consider the recouping of those losses. It is from the point of view of the depositors and from the desire of the government to consider their wishes and to see that their representations are fully considered by parliament, that we are discussing the matter at all. It was the depositors we were considering; that being the case we acted upon the representations made by the depositors themselves.

I was amazed to hear the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) say that the depositors had framed their resolution at the instance of one who was a political friend of the government. His insinuation, if not, indeed, his direct statement, was to the effect that there was some arrangement between the government and the solicitor in virtue of which representations were made in this manner; that, in other words, there were political considerations at the bottom of the representations that were made. I am sorry that the ex-Minister of Finance is not in his seat; I should like to tell him that his remarks in that connection were unprofessional, were unparliamentary, and certainly unworthy of himself. He referred to Mr. Lee who was one of the counsel for the depositors. Mr. Lee is a gentleman of high professional standing, a gentleman whose sense of honour is as high as that of any honourable member of this parliament, and I think it ill becomes an ex-minister of the Crown and a member of parliament, under the privilege of parliament which shields him but which does not permit of any reply to his remarks being made on the floor of the House by the person attacked, to direct an insinuation or to make a charge of that character against a member of the legal profession in high standing. I would like to point out that Mr. Lee was not the only gentleman who came before the government representing the depositors in this matter. The deputation which appeared before the government, and which, I may say, was received by all members of the government, came to Ottawa on January 23. Mr. Lee was one of the speakers on that occasion, but other members of the legal profession and members of other professions also spoke and presented the case of the depositors to the government. Mr. R. J. McLauchlin, K.C., of Toronto, spoke on behalf of the depositors and made representations to the government in this matter. Will the hon. member for West York say that Mr. McLauchlin was speaking as a Liberal or was acting other than as a true counsel for those whom he was representing. Mr. J. F. Edgar, K.C., also spoke on behalf of the depositors, as did Mr. V. D. Sinclair, K.C., Mr. I. E. Weldon, Mr. Kernahan, and the Rev. Dr. Tracy. All these gentlemen presented the petition of the depositors to the government. If the charge made by my hon. friend has any foundation, then it must apply to all these gentlemen. But more than that, two hon. members sitting behind my right hon. friend on the other side, members of the Conservative party—the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), who is in his seat at the moment, and the member for West Elgin (Mr. McKillop) were also members of that deputation. Will my hon. friends say there was a conspiracy between the government and these gentlemen to play politics in this matter?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct the Prime Minister. I did not attend on any such deputation in connection with the Home Bank. I was not here at all on that occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is right. I should not have said the hon. member for Leeds but the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Stewart). There are two Mr. Stewarts in the House from Ontario. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. McKillop) also appeared with the delegation. I do not think I need to labour that point, however. It will be apparent to hon. members of the House that the gentlemen who presented this petition to the government were all trusted counsel and representatives of the depositors. They came with a written petition, a petition not addressed to any individual member of the government, but adressed to His Excellency The Right Honourable Lord Byng of Vimy, Governor General in Council, of the Dominion of Canada. That was the form in which their petition was presented, carefully drafted and signed by twenty or more persons acting on behalf of the depositors.

In the petition which was presented to the government there were certain charges, direct or indirect, against former ministers of the Crown. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, says that the government could have taken upon itself to pass judgment upon these former ministers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister tell us what charges were made against the ministers of the Crown? Read them from the document.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I cannot do better than quote the words of the petition. Clause 2 reads:

(2) The said bank was a chartered bank doing business under the provisions of the Bank Act. Your petitioners are informed and believe that in the year 1915 and again in 1916 and in 1918 representations were made to the Department of Finance of the Dominion of Canada respecting the condition of the Home Bank of Canada and revealing a state of affairs that would have justified an investigation by the Department of Finance under the powers conferred upon the Minister of Finance under Section 56a of the Bank Act, whereby he was authorized to examine and enquire specially into any of the affairs or business of the bank.

(3) Your petitioners realize the seriousness of such action on the part of the Minister of Finance, and that the mere fact of causing an audit to be made might in itself bring about the failure of the said bank.

(4) Your petitioners are also aware that at the time such representations and disclosures were made, the country was at war and that the Minister of Finance, having regard to the public interest, was unwilling to precipitate a bank failure or crisis, or in any way disturb the financial condition of the country, and that for such reason and on other good and sufficient public grounds, may not have deemed it advisable to exercise the power above referred to.

(6) Your petitioners believe that if the said bank had ceased doing business at the time the said disclosures were made the then existing assets would have been almost, if not quite sufficient to meet all claims of creditors, whereas, by reason of the bank continuing in business until the 17th day of August, 1923, and greatly increasing the amount of money belonging to the public on deposit, and at the same time permittng the assets of the said bank to be greatly diminished in proportion to the amount of the deposits the present depositors have suffered and will unless relief is granted, suffer a very severe loss.

(7) Your petitioners submit that the reasons an audit was not made of the said bank, in accordance with the powers vested in the Minister of Finance, were reasons of a public and national character, and intended for the benefit of the public at large, and that therefore the loss to the present depositors occasioned by the bank being permitted to continue to do business should be borne by the public at large and not by the present depositors.

(8) The said bank and its predecessors, The Toronto Savings Bank and the Home Savings and Loan Company had for over fifty years been regarded as a safe depository for the savings of the public and the class of people who deposited their money in the said bank was largely composed of wage-earners with small earnings and their deposits consisted in many cases of the whole savings of a life-time.

(9) Your petitioners submit that the confidence of the simple people throughout Canada in the banking institutions of the country is of the very greatest importance to the industrial and commercial interests of the country and that the lack of such confidence would have a serious and detrimental effect on the whole industrial and commercial prosperity of the country.

(10) Your petitioners therefore submit that whether rightly or wrongly the depositors of the Home Bank of Canada were largely of the opinion that the Finance Department of the Government of Canada exercised such supervision over chartered banks that it was impossible for depositors to lose their savings entrusted to such a bank the charter of which had been renewed from time to time by parliament and it is further submitted that the confidence of the people as a whole would be greatly restored if adequate relief were granted to these depositors.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Excellency be pleased to submit to Parliament an Act for the full indemnity of the depositors of the Home Bank of Canada against any loss suffered by reason of the failure of the said bank.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is a charge that a man acts in the public interest a charge against him?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I remarked, Mr. Speaker, that at the time of the presentation of this petition there were several gentlemen who spoke to it, and as I listened to the petition being read it seemed to my mind to carry the implication that the Minister of Finance of that day for some reason or another had not carried out what he should have carried out by way of investigation in accordance with the law existing at the time. The elaboration of their remarks caused me to ask of the deputation at the time, on what ground they were asking the government to indemnify the depositors for their losses. I pointed out to them that they had really presented what seemed to me to be two diametrically opposite points of view. One was that the minister of finance of the day had taken the course that he did for public reasons, that he had not complied with the act in some part for public reasons. Another view was that he had taken the course he did because of some neglect or oversight, that he had shifted his responsibility on to some other person. He had made casual inquiries, and had referred the matter to the late Mr. Lash, I think it was, of Toronto, and that he had not gone into the matter as fully as he should have done so I asked the deputation at the time: On what ground are you basing your claim? Is it on the ground of neglect on the part of the Minister of Finance of the day to do his duty, or is it on the ground of his having failed, because of some public reason, to do a certain thing which the law requires? And the answer I received was that in a court of law it was permissible to plead alternatives, and that they were there for the purpose of presenting both points of view. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that using the word "charge" in the sense I meant it, namely, a reflection on the Minister of Finance, is the essence of the ground upon which the appeal is being made to the government. The whole ground upon which the depositors have asked the government to see they are indemnified in this matter is that of a certain neglect of duty or failure to perform duty for a public reason or for some other reason, on the part of a previous minister of finance. That is the ground.

Now if this government were to attempt to pass upon that, what would be said? We are being asked to-night not to treat this question in a political, partisan fashion. But were we to say that Sir Thomas White had not done his duty, and to ask this country to pay so many millions of dollars to the depositors because a previous minister of finance had not done his duty while he was in office, what would be said about this administration? From one end of the country to the other it would be heralded abroad that the government had taken advantage of a political opponent, and out of the public treasury had spent this vast sum of money in order to secure political advantage. If in any way this government were to attempt to pass judgment on any of its predecessors in office who were of a different political party, it would be said that our reason for doing so was because we saw in it a political advantage. That is the one thing, Mr. Speaker, we desire the people of this country to know we are not seeking. We wish no political advantage in this matter. We want this question removed from the realm of politics altogether. We want fair play and justice done in this matter in as fair a way as justice can possibly be done.

The question then presented itself, how was an investigation to be made? My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has spoken about the government having responsibility. He is sometimes fond of asserting that he himself has responsibility, and will carry it out. Hon. gentlemen opposite of the Progressive group, or rather, my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) representing, I think, in part those who sit in the Progressive group, has brought forward a resolution in this House. One of the members of the Liberal party, on this side, has moved an amendment. The government will accept that amendment in full. We will take that responsibility. Now will my right hon. friend and some of his friends show where they stand by moving an amendment to the amendment? We have made our position clear. All hon. members in the House, with the exception of my right hon. friend, and his supporters, have made their position clear. My right hon. friend is the only leader of a party who is not prepared to stand up and say whether he would or would not settle this matter on some particular line. We have taken a position. We realized that an investigation was necessary, and I contend, Mr. Speaker, that, without investigation, the public of this country would never have sanctioned for one minute action on the part of the government in this matter. It is unthinkable that, without any investigation, the government of to-day on the representations of depositors alone, with reference to a matter which took place some years ago, would ask parliament to vote so many millions of dollars out of the public treasury to indemnify depositors for their losses. An investigation is absolutely necessary in this matter. Now an investigation could be of one form or another. We could either have had a parliamentary investigation—could have had this matter referred to a special committee of parliament—or a judicial investigation. Those are the alternatives. Assuming that we had adopted the plan of having a parliamentary investigation, assuming that when parliament met we had said "We have decided to refer this matter to a committee of parliament, to a special committee, my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, would hardly have waited to draw a breath until he would have jumped to his feet and declared "The government has a majority on that committee and is doing what it likes in the matter." We realized the tactics of my right hon. friend, we realized the attitude that parliament would have a perfect right to take towards any action of that kind, we surrounded this matter with the greatest care and caution—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister will permit me to say, in view of the fact that I have already spoken, that he has no right to misrepresent me. I did not say that the government should have referred the matter to investigation by committee. When I spoke I said the government had the facts before it, or should have had, and could have decided the matter on these facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say my right hon. friend stated we should have referred it to a committee. What I said, and what I repeat, is that if the government had taken the course of referring this question to a special committee of parliament my right hon. friend would have been the first to condemn us for having done that, and he would have condemned us on the ground of our adopting a partisan course, of making a political matter of this very serious question. My right hon. friend knows it and will not deny it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said such a thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what statement of mine are you answering?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend admits we have taken the right course—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —in having a judicial inquiry instead of a parliamentary inquiry. When it came to the matter of a judicial inquiry the government was anxious that whoever was chosen should be chosen from another part of the Dominion. I mean from a part of Canada that was not immediately interested in this matter. Many names naturally presented themselves to the government when we were selecting a commissioner. We might have taken a commissioner from Montreal, Toronto, or from Winnipeg or elsewhere. As my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) mentioned this afternoon, this failure affected people from the province of Quebec out to the Rocky mountains but it did not affect, I think, any persons from the Maritime provinces. It was for that reason the government went to the Maritime provinces and chose as commissioner to investigate this matter, the chief justice of one of the courts, who as commissioner receives no salary for the services he is rendering. The government's whole course was taken with a view of inspiring confidence on the part of the members of this House, on the part of the public, and particularly on the part of the depositors who are most affected.

Now, as to the matter of the correspondence, to which my right hon. friend has referred, let me repeat that the communication spoken of that was in the possession of Sir Thomas White and was passed on by him to Sir Henry Drayton was, so far as the government has any knowledge of it at all, a private document in the possession of these ministers or their private secretaries. Let me direct the attention of the House to this circumstance: The gentleman who was secretary to Sir Thomas White was also the private secretary to his successor, Sir Henry Drayton, when the latter became Minister of Finance. The same gentleman was secretary to both. Sir Thomas White when he left the Finance department gave certain instructions to his secretary, left certain papers with him, told him that some of these papers were to be given to Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No not "some," all of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says all of them were to be given. Very well, "all of them." Then if they were to be given as public documents to Sir Henry Drayton I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it was equally the duty of Sir Henry Drayton to give instruction that these papers be put in the possession of the Minister of Finance who succeeded him. My right hon. friend will recall that when he left office he had a private secretary or a couple of private secretaries; that when he left the position which he formerly held he took with him a large part of the correspondence of the office of Prime Minister, and it was quite right that he should. Some of it he subsequently returned, some of it could not be found anywhere and on this account I asked if I could not obtain it and he had it sent over to me a week or two later by the private secretary who had it. That was perfectly proper and perfectly right, but would I have thought of going to the secretary of my right hon. friend and saying to him "I want you to tell me about all the papers that were in Mr. Meighen's possession. I want you to give me his private papers, the documents that he has left with you." Had I done that I should have felt that I was taking an extraordinary course, and I should think no person who had been secretary to a minister who would be prepared to hand over documents to his successor without instructions, would be worthy of a position of confidence in the government service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister forgets that the secretary was instructed to hand them to the minister's successor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has not forgotten anything. My right hon. friend says he was instructed to hand them to the minister to whom he was going to be private secretary?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who was Sir Henry Drayton, a political and personal friend of Sir Thomas White. If that was the right course of procedure, if that was a duty performed at the time, then I say the duty equally devolved on Sir Henry Drayton to see that these documents were put in the possession of Mr. Fielding which they were not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If Sir Henry Drayton got them. I do not know that he did get them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says he does not know whether he got them. Then how could he expect that the subsequent Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), would ever get them? The whole object my hon. friend has in mind is perfectly apparent. However, the point is a small one, I do not think it need be stressed. There is one circumstance, however, I would like to bring to the attention of the House: The administration is convinced of the necessity of having an investigation into this matter. We want the public to know the truth about these papers. Unfortunately the Minister of Finance, through illness, is unable to be in his seat. He told me in his own room, and I talked with him at his bedside, that he had no knowledge whatever that any of these papers were in existence until after he read about them in the press and discovered that there were some documents which he had not seen and has not seen yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was that not long before the investigation was ordered. Why were not the documents requested if the government had not copies, and the facts gone into by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already answered my right hon. friend as to why the government did not go into the facts. Supposing the government had started to investigate Sir Thomas White's doings and the doings of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) what would have been said of its method of procedure? We have taken the proper course. We have appointed a commissioner before whom all parties can appear, and before whom all parties will be made to appear and give evidence in this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so as not to take up too much time of the House let me conclude briefly with a statement of the further action of the government. When the petition was presented in the form in which it was presented, by all the persons whose names I have mentioned, drawn up with the great care and great skill with which it was drawn up, the government assumed that it would be impossible to present a case to any tribunal for the depositors in a stronger or more effective form than that in which the depositors themselves thought best to present it to the government. And so we decided to use the language of the petition, not with a view to directing any investigation against Sir Thomas White, not with a view to inquiring into the acts of our predecessors, but that by taking only what was put before us by the depositors we might be removed from any criticism of any kind. We took their language, their words and their documents, and made them the basis of the investigation. The period mentioned in the document that was presented to us included certain years, and those years were mentioned in the order in council just as they were presented in the document; but when it was suggested to us the period should be extended, as soon as representations were made on that score, we immediately amended the order in council and had the inquiry carried on to the time the bank closed its doors. I submit it would be impossible to have a representation presented in a fuller, clearer, more unbiased, and unprejudiced manner than that. Let me recall a remark of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). He asked, why did the government not refer the representations that were made to it before the bank closed? For the life of me I could not make out what representations he had reference to. I do not know what representations were made, unless it was possibly one or two gentlemen coming and asking the government if they would not help to save the situation the day before the closing of the bank.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. minister say these gentlemen came just before the bank closed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My impression is yes. The only recollecion I have of any deputation is a deputation that came late one evening to ask if the government would make some huge deposit, in order to meet the situation for the next day, and I myself declined to entertain a thought of the kind. My recollection is that we were told the bank would fail if that were not done, and I think it was the day following, or two days after, that the bank closed its doors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. Prime Minister tell us who the gentlemen were?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will be prepared to make a statement as to who they were, every one of them, but I think the proper place is before the royal commission appointed to look into the matter. They were representatives of the bank. I will give the names to the commission when it is taking evidence on the matter. The point I want to direct attention to is that the order which the government drafted covers this very point. Let me read one clause of it—

> The Committee of the Privy Council therefore advise that the powers of the commissioner under the said order in council be not limited to the specific years 1915, 1916 and 1918 referred to in the petition of the depositors, but should extend to an investigation of the affairs of the said bank during the whole interval between the issue of the bank's charter and the failure of the said bank.

Then listen to this—

> Including any representations made to the government of the day.

Does that not include everything? Does that not include the representations of anyone who ever spoke to the government or made any reports to them from the day the bank opened its doors to the day they were closed. The government's order in council says:

> Any representations made to the government of the day as to its conditons, any action taken by any of the ministers of finance upon such representations as may have been made, and the effect on the position of the depositors of any audit under Section 56a of the Bank Act if made at any time in consequence of such representations.

I say it is not possible to put into the English language words more comprehensive and words more inclusive than the words used there, but I say if it is possible, if any hon. member will point them out to the government, I will try to have them inserted in another order in council, if that is necessary for the purpose. I cannot make it too plain that the government wants this matter investigated from beginning to end, and every feature and aspect of it investigated, and if there is anything that is material which is not covered by the order in council, we are prepared to see that those matters are inquired into. If the government has not sought to go back to the days when banking began in Canada, it is because the government has been seeking to confine its inquiry within limits that will make it possible for this parliament to deal with this matter at this session. It is not the government that has been delaying the inquiry or causing it to be prolonged. We brought down the order in council couched in the words of the depositors, who are the people most interested. We took it in their own language and did not deduct from it or add to it, for the reason that we were anxious to see that their wishes in the matter were met. But hon. members of the House were the ones who raised the point that we had not carried the investigation down far enough. They and others asked that we should supplement it, and we added to it, and now the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) says we should go further and that we should not be content to have the inquiry from the day the bank started business to the day it closed. He blames us because we have not given authority to examine conditions which in the first instance led to the establishment of the bank. I think, after all we have heard to-day, that as a government we would perhaps be wise if we confined this investigation to what we have already set out in the orders here. But let me say this: That rather than be under a suspicion that there is anything in the matter that we are seeking to conceal, I am agreeable that the commission shall inquire into what took place before the bank was instituted, when the bank was instituted, and after it was instituted, and any period that any hon. member of the House can suggest to the commission. I do not think it can be made broader or more comprehensive than that.

Let me come to the amendment of my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). As I read this amendment, it clearly has one object above every other object in view. My hon. friend wants immediate action, just as the hon. member (Mr. Irvine) who moved the resolution wants immediate action. They do not want to wait until the commission has completed its inquiry to have the matter looked into. They want to go to work at once with a parliamentary committee. We are prepared to say that that part of the matter which it seems wise and expedient should go in the first instance to such a committee, shall go to a parliamentary committee. We do not think it is wise or right or proper to put those who are our political opponents in judgment before a parliamentary committee. We do not think that is a proper way of proceeding. But with respect to such matters as those which affect the Bank Act, the possibility of amending it, or as to anything growing out of investigation which will help to show wherein the Bank Act can be amended to the benefit of depositors, and to the saving of similar situations in the future, we not only agree but will welcome any suggestion that may be made in that connection; and for that reason we are only too glad to accept the amendment which has been moved—and which I think my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) will feel is very much akin to his own motion, if not largely in the identical words of it—to refer such matters to the committee on Banking. The right committee to which to refer these matters is the Banking committee. Now what does the amendment say? It does not say we are to leave these matters until the commission has made its report. The amendment says:

In the opinion of this House, in view of the failure of the Home Bank and of the fact that official prosecutions and inquiries have been instituted, including a royal commission which has been appointed to investigate the facts alleged in the petition representing all the shareholders of the bank—

I would like to direct the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that I think he meant "depositors" when he used the word "shareholders".

—and the affairs of the bank generally, and considering that the evidence received and to be taken before the several tribunals will be available for consideration, the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce should be instructed to consider the provisions of the Bank Act with a view to recommending such amendments to the Bank Act as will better protect the interests of depositors generally and will prevent similar occurrences in the future, and also to consider the report of the Royal Commission in its bearing upon these matters and with respect to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss.

In other words, there are, in connection with this matter of the failure of the Home Bank four or five public investigations proceeding at the present time and every one of these investigations will throw some light on this bank failure and its causes as well as consequences and will reveal some aspect, some important question in connection with it. There are the prosecutions against all the directors and certain officers of the Home Bank, conducted by the Attorney General of Ontario under the Bank Act and the Criminal Code. As soon as those prosecutions are gone on with, that matter will be available. If they are delayed, that need not delay this committee; there will be other matters to consider. There is an investigation by a special auditor appointed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), to report to the Minister as to the condition under which the business of the bank has been carried on since opening its doors as a chartered bank. This is being done under existing legislation. This report, as soon as it is made to the Acting Minister of Finance, will be available, and I imagine that it will not be very long in being made. Then the liquidators appointed by the courts to take charge of the affairs of the bank are going into these matters and making reports. The evidence and material coming before them will all be available for the Banking committee in considering this matter.

Finally, the government has appointed this royal commission which will begin its sittings immediately; some of these sittings will be held at Ottawa, some at Toronto and elsewhere. The proceedings of this commission will be reported from day to day, and they can be taken to the committee from day to day. The committee need not wait until the commission has made its final report to have matters brought out. If hon. members are interested in some particular phase of the question, they can appear before the commissioner at Ottawa, while he is here, and have such matters brought out. With all these investigations proceeding, I submit that it is not possible to conceive of any manner in which a committee could be supplied more effectively with all relevant and pertinent facts.

Mr. GOOD: How far will the committee be restricted in the matter of calling and hearing witnesses?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that is a matter entirely for the committee to decide for itself. I could not say as to the question of restriction; but I assume the Banking committee has pretty large powers, and it will be free to exercise them in a matter of this kind.

The point that I wish to make in addition to what I have said is this: The government has gone even further; it has said that the report of the commissioner can also be placed before the committee on banking. The government might very well have said: "No, we will not do that; we will take this report and handle it ourselves." We have not taken that position; we have said: "We want this House of Commons as a whole, the different groups in it, to have a voice in this matter, and therefore we are prepared, in accepting the amendment of my hon. friend, to permit this report of the commissioner to go before the committee." For what reason? In order that the report of the royal commission, in its bearing on these matters, that is to say matters affecting the amendment of the Bank Act and with respect to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss, may be considered by the committee. This may take a little time, but this is a big and important matter. Not only is this a matter that involves the vast sums of money which it does, but there is a very important precedent being considered. There are far-reaching questions involved in any action that the government may take, questions affecting not only the future, but the past. I have a list somewhere of the different banks that have failed since confederation. One question that will have to be considered in regard to this matter is this: If the depositors of the Home Bank are to be indemnified, what about the depositors of other banks that have failed in Canada? Are they not also to be indemnified, or are there special reasons in this case, reasons which single it out from other cases of bank failures? Are there in this case considerations which do not apply elsewhere, but which impose a special obligation on the government and the country to meet these particular losses? Those are big questions. They cannot be dealt with quickly, hurriedly; they can be dealt with effectively only by their being gone into carefully and fully. In agreeing to the amendment which my hon. friend has moved, we have taken the course of expressing our hope that parliament will see its way to adopt that full and thorough method of investigating the question. In the last analysis, the committee has to report to parliament, and the government has to take its responsibility. We are prepared to take our responsibility. If the committee recommends a certain course, we have to do one of two things, either accept that course, or reject it, and we are prepared to accept it or reject it, but not to do so in the dark. We want to know all the facts and circumstances bearing on this case, and when we have the facts and circumstances, in the light of them, in the light of the best judgment that can be brought to bear from the point of view of the different inquiries that I have mentioned, from the point of view of the members of the committee, the judgment of hon. members of this House—when we have that before us, then we will take our responsibility, and I can assure the House that we will take it, I believe, in accordance with what will be the wish and expectation of the people of this country.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, the resolution has been pretty thoroughly discussed, and I want to offer just a thought or two on the amendment. I do not wish to prolong my remarks unduly, because I do not think there is anything very much more of value that I have to offer. Let me first of all point out that I think the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) made the only attack on my speech that has been made by any hon. member. I am sorry that he is not in his seat now, but I think his attack was a little unfair. I think he misrepresented my statement when he said that I had argued that because one bank had failed that proved that all banks were going to fail. I did not argue that. Then the hon. member made a definite charge that I was wrong in my estimate of the assets of the bank over its liabilities. I have laid claim to many things, but I have never laid claim to infallibility. It is just possible that I was wrong, but I am not wrong merely because the hon. member for West York says so. He offered no arguments or facts or figures to prove that I was wrong, and I do not accept his statement in that regard, neither do I think the House will accept it. When I challenge the statement of the hon. member for West York as definitely as he has challenged mine, I shall have more to put forward than a challenge; I shall have the facts to put forward as well.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) has explained the position of the government; he has given us a history of the whole movement towards investigation; he has referred to the deputation from the Home Bank depositors; he has pointed out the situation which practically compelled the government to take some action and to take action along the lines of a royal commission.

As I pointed out in my first speech, the position of the government is a difficult one in dealing with this matter, and I certainly wish to do all in my power—and I believe hon. members will concur with me in this—that we all wish to help to the best of our ability to bring this matter to a successful issue. I have no politics, Mr. Speaker, of the popular type. I do not know whether that is a matter of shame or pride. But some portions of the debate have verged sometimes on the acrimonious and have dealt with matters that, I think, might have been left to the royal commission and so have saved a good deal of debate. I am bound to say, as a new inexperienced member, that in listening to the debate I felt sometimes a little uncertain as to what confidence to place in the government and in the amendment. When the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) moved his amendment, I felt that in it were the principles that I had contended for in my resolution. When I heard the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), who is an experienced parliamentarian and has an undoubted gift and power of analysis, I began to wonder whether the hon. member for Pontiac was not trying, as we say in popular parlance to "put one over on me." Now, however, I do not think the government is doing so. I think it is unfortunate that such an opinion should be created by the discussion. I am going to take the government's word. I am going to assume that the amendment is sincerely moved and that the government in accepting it is going to do its best to carry out the spirit of the amendment. I hope that hon. members to my right will concur with me in taking this attitude. Surely the government will not, after we have placed such confidence in it, attempt to play fast and loose with its word. I would take the same position with the right hon. leader of the opposition. I would be prepared to give him all the advantages in this regard, and I trust that he will extend the same to me when the Labour party comes to power in this Dominion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after having heard the declaration of the Prime Minister that we will be allowed to at once proceed to action, and after having been assured that we will receive the evidence as it is adduced before the royal commission from time to time, and be in a position to deliberate thereon, I see no reason why I should not accept the amendment and withdraw my resolution, with the consent of the House, for, after all, what I was trying to get was action. I do not want any more investigation than is necessary. I think we can get action in this committee, and in that way co-operate wth the royal commission that will furnish us with the requisite information.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) and seconded by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy):

That in the opinion of this House, in view of the failure of the Home Bank and of the fact that official prosecutions and inquiries have been instituted, including the royal commission which has been appointed to investigate the facts alleged in the petition represented by the shareholders of the bank and the affairs of the bank generally, and considering that the evidence received and to be taken before the several tribunals will be available for consideration, the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce should be instructed to consider the provisions of the Bank Act with a view to recommending such amendments to the Act as will better protect the interests of the depositors generally and will prevent similar occurrences in the future; and also to consider the report of the royal commission in its bearing upon these matters and with respect to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss.

By unanimous consent shall I substitute the word "depositors" for the word "shareholders."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment. The House must pass judgment on the amendment before the hon. member who moved the motion can have leave to withdraw the motion. That is in accordance with rule 324 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Cahill) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. CLIFFORD: I was paired with the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Stansell). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the amendment carried. I understand that the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) withdraws his motion. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman should have leave to withdraw his motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, how can there be an amendment carried to a motion that is withdrawn? The amendment is to the motion; the amendment having passed, there is no motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no motion left, but I wanted to give effect to what the hon. member for East Calgary had stated prior to the vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It cannot be given effect to after the vote just taken. I may say that a large number of our members had gone home on the faith of the report from the whip to the effect that an arrangement had been made that there would be not a vote, but an adjournment.

ADJOURNMENT—HOME BANK PETITION TABLED

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to lay on the Table of the House the petition of the depositors of the Home Bank, which I promised I would bring down before the sitting was concluded.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 12.55 a.m. (Friday).

The House met at three o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF ADDRESS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

> I have received with great pleasure the Address you have voted in reply to my Speech at the opening of Parliament and thank you for it sincerely.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 22, to amend an Act to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Clark.

Bill No. 23, respecting the Commercial Travellers Mutual Insurance Company.—Mr. Ryckman.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the petition of the Hon. Oswald S. Crocket and 434 others, communicants and adherents of St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, Fredericton, New Brunswick, against the proposed church union bill; also the petition of William A. Shaw, of the Presbyterian Church Mission of New Maryland and Hanwell, York county, New Brunswick, against the proposed church union.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): I desire to present a petition from members and adherents of St. Andrew's Church, St. John, New Brunswick, asking that the church union bill be not passed.

DIVORCE

EQUALITY OF GROUNDS FOR RELIEF AS BETWEEN THE SEXES

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, respecting divorce.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. SHAW: The object of the proposed bill is to place the sexes on an equality so far as divorce is concerned. It is in accordance with the resolution which I introduced into the House a short time ago.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOME BANK

PERSONNEL OF DEPUTATION—CORRECTION BY THE PRIME MINISTER

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, last night in referring to the gentlemen who appeared before the government to present the petition of the depositors of the Home Bank I stated that two hon. members of the House of Commons were present with the deputation, namely, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. McKillop) and the member for Leeds (Mr. H. A. Stewart). The hon. member for Leeds corrected me, and then I said it was the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. T. J. Stewart). I was speaking from memory at the time. I have since looked at the record and I find I was in error in saying that it was the hon. member for West Hamilton; it was the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St. Père), who was present with the hon. member for West Elgin. I wish to make that correction.

EXPORT OF PULPWOOD

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the government to a very obvious error in the reply to a question of yesterday, and I would like the government to have the question restored and the correct answer given. The question was by myself, and appears on page 726 of Hansard. I quote:

Under what authority of what statute did the government pass Order in Council P.C. 1563 of August 14, 1923, guaranteeing to permit for a period of ten years the shipping out of pulpwood from Canada under existing contracts?

The answer was:

Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King: Under authority of chapter 46, Statutes of Canada, 1923. 13-14 George V. [Mr. MacLaren.]

This statute I have before me. It is very simple. The statute simply authorizes the government to prohibit the exportation of pulpwood and was passed on the 30th of June, 1923. It adds pulpwood to the articles permitted to be prohibited under chapter 50, of the statutes of 1906, which statute reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may by regulation prohibit the exportation from Canada of petroleum in its crude or partly manufactured state.

With the addition of last year it will read:

—and pulpwood of the variety, kind, place of origin or having the particulars of identification or ownership or production described in the regulation.

The government will see at once that it merely authorizes the prohibition. It does not authorize any exception.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In giving the answer I may say I was guided by the order in council itself. The order in council was drafted by the ex-Minister of Justice, and I assumed that it stated accurately the authority. I will be pleased to lay on the Table of the House a copy of the order in council. I am glad my right hon. friend has brought the matter up if the authority is not correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask the Prime Minister to refer the matter to the Justice department again. I am sure they would never allege there was authority there.

DOMINION LANDS ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. NEIL McTAGGART (Maple Creek): Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session of the House amending the Dominion Lands Act with its amendments, and if so, what is the nature of the proposed legislation in this regard?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): We have the matter under consideration, but at the moment I am unable to say definitely what the amendments will be.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BRANCH LINES BILLS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Is it the intention of the government to refer the various branch lines bills to the select standing committee on Railways and Canals for consideration?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): It is not the intention to refer the branch lines bills to the Railway committee.

INTERNATIONAL DEEP WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Does the government deem it necessary it should give consideration to the allegations of some United States newspapers, including the Engineering News-Record of New York, of March 20, that President Coolidge's appointees to the International St. Lawrence Deep Waterways Commission, with few exceptions are strongly in favour of the project?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If I gathered my hon. friend's question aright it is: Does the government intend to observe that most of the appointees on the National Committee the United States government is appointing are in favour of the deep waterways project, and will this government govern its action accordingly?

Mr. MILLAR: In effect, does the government consider it its duty to recognize or take cognizance of that fact in any way?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say, of course, how accurate the report may be. I cannot say whether it is true or not true, that the American appointees are all in favour of the deep waterways project. I imagine that what my hon. friend wishes to elicit is whether our government in making its nominations to our National Committee intends to appoint only those who are in favour of the project. If that is what he has in mind, I would say to him that the government will endeavour to name as members of the National Committee gentlemen whose judgment will be recognized as independent in a matter of this kind.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT, 1907, AMENDMENT

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Penitentiaries Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Power of warden and officers to prevent escape and to effect arrest and recapture of escaping convicts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I gave the explanation on the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has any concrete case arisen where the power of the warden has been impugned?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed by the department that some tribunals have expressed a doubt as to the power of the wardens and officers to use the same means in arresting or preventing the escape and effecting the recapture of convicts who were escaping as if the convict had been convicted or was under imprisonment for felony. Practically, under the Criminal Code, the former distinction between a felony and a misdemeanour has been abolished, but still there is a doubt as to whether the same force could be used in arresting a prisoner or preventing his escape, when the offences are not those which were felonies under the former act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who would be included within the meaning of the term, "officers"?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The guards.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Where convict to be confined pending determination of his appeal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As my right hon. friend knows, there was an amendment made to the Criminal Code last year giving prisoners the right of appeal against their conviction, but no amendment was made to the Penitentiaries Act to say where those prisoners should be kept until their case was finally disposed of. Of course, the penitentiary is a place of punishment, and is not a proper place for the detention of prisoners whose fate has not been decided, and who are not considered as convicts. The purpose of this section is to provide that they shall be kept in a common gaol until their appeal has been disposed of.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is, if there is an appeal. But in cases where there is no appeal?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are rules of the various courts that under the act you must determine the period of delay during which the appeal must be made. Until that delay has expired they shall be kept in the common gaol unless before the expiration of the delay they serve notice that they want to appeal, and then they shall be moved to the penitentiary.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The principle of this legislation seems to be that a man shall not be taken to the penitentiary until after the expiration of the time limited for appeal?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Whether he takes an appeal or not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Provided the person committed may notify the Crown that he does not intend to appeal?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly.

Mr. McQUARRIE: This seems to me to be a wrong principle to embody in legislation of this kind; that is, it is not necessary to anticipate appeals in all cases. If a man does not wish to go to the penitentiary he can give notice of appeal. In that case, of course, it would be quite proper that he should not be taken to the penitentiary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will not be of any advantage to the man to act as my hon. friend suggests, because he will be in gaol pending the appeal, and the time in which the appeal may be entered will not count on his sentence. He will have to serve the full period of the sentence if he goes to the penitentiary.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Sub-section 4 of section 2 reads as follows:

> Any period during which a convict is detained in the gaol or other place of confinement pursuant to the authority of this section shall not be computed as time served in the execution of his sentence.

I understand it has been customary in the past to leave such a matter to the discretion of the judge—that is, as to whether time served in the place of confinement prior to the execution of a sentence shall count as part of the prisoner's term.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The judges will take that into consideration, after this bill has been passed, just as they have been doing previously. However, my hon. friend will understand this: A prisoner who is awaiting conviction cannot be treated as a man who is serving a sentence—he is not as a matter of fact—and by lodging an appeal he hopes to escape conviction. He is in the position of a man who is awaiting his trial. In the case of the man who has been tried the time during which he is in gaol is not computed in connection with his sentence. The judge, of course, can impose a lighter sentence if he pleases, but under the law the time of the prisoner's stay in gaol does not form part of his sentence.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister's explanation convinces me that this subsection is not necessary. I would therefore suggest that it be withdrawn, leaving the law as it is at present. The subsection specifically states that the time served in gaol shall not be computed as part of the sentence: the minister is laying down a definite regulation in this bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree wholly with what the minister says; but suppose the judge on appeal says the sentence shall be reduced from six years to four years? Then the question comes, does the time the prisoner has served count? This law applies and says it does not; he must serve four years in the penitentiary.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT—YUKON

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That it is expedient to amend the act to amend the Judges Act, chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1920, section seven, to provide that the salary of the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon Territory be increased from seven thousand to nine thousand dollars per annum, but the increase of salary so granted shall not entitle the judge to any increase in the annuity which may be granted him on retirement in excess of six thousand dollars.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister explain how it is that every resolution we ever have about salaries, or almost any other subject, means an increase in expenditure? I remember strong pressure for years back—

Mr. BELAND: Especially for judges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Especially for judges?—I do not know but that that is correct;—and deputy ministers too, especially for those who have pretty good salaries. I do not want to be taking that stand merely arbitrarily on every case, but is it not a fact that the judge of the Yukon district has been drawing $10,000, in reality, as compared with another judge?—that is to say $5,000 denominated salary, and $5,000 as living expenses which, of course, the ordinary judge does not have. Possibly that $5,000 was increased to $7,000, it must have been, according to this resolution, so that this judge has been drawing $7,000 of late years as salary and $5,000 living expenses. Well, in all conscience, is not that enough?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a living allowance for the judge in the Yukon of $5,000 as my right hon. friend says, and we are going to see that he does not receive that full allowance when he receives this increase. He is getting an increase that puts him on the same level as all the other judges of superior jurisdiction in Canada. He is the only one, out of all the judges of the land, in the High Courts, who does not receive a salary of $9,000. This is just for the purpose of placing him in a position of equality with the others. He has the same standing, he must possess the same qualifications, and he must be there to do the work. Hereafter, instead of receiving $5,000 living allowance he will be paid only $3,000 and will be given the status of the other judges.

Mr. BELAND: After that I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I believe in one way it is just as indefensible as it was before. Is he really not getting $3,000 more than any other judge? He certainly has not the heaviest jurisdiction.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, he was receiving $5,000 of a living allowance on account of living in the Yukon. After this resolution is passed he will receive only $3,000, and there will be a saving to the country in that respect.

Mr. HOCKEN: He will not get any more in future than he has been getting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: Then what is the sense of making the change?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I should like to make the situation clearer to the committee. By the revised statutes of Canada, chapter 138, the salary of the judge of the Yukon territory was fixed at $5,000 a year. By the same act the salaries of the Superior Court judges of Quebec and of the High Court of Justice of Ontario were fixed at $7,000 a year; and those of the judges of the Supreme Courts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and of the Court of the King's Bench of Manitoba, at $6,000 a year. By section 192 of the act it is provided that the judges of any of the above courts, after serving fifteen years, might be retired on an annuity equal to two-thirds of their salary at that time. In the case of the judges of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec the amount would be $4,666. The judges of the other provinces would receive $4,000, and the judges of the Yukon territory would be entitled to receive $3,333. By chapter 59 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, the salaries of the judges of the classes mentioned in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, were increased to $7,000. There was no corresponding increase for the judge in the Territorial Court of the Yukon. By chapter 56 of the Statutes of Canada, 1920, the salaries of the judges of the classes I have named—New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and including the judges of the High Court division in Ontario and judges of the Supreme Court in Quebec—were all increased to $9,000. The salaries of the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon was increased to $7,000. By section 20 of chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, it is provided that if one has continued in office as judge of one or more of the said courts for thirty years or upwards he may resign, and the government may grant him an annuity equal to his salary for life. By chapter 56, 1920, under which act the salaries of the judges of the provinces were increased to $9,000, and the salary of the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon was increased to $7,000, it is provided by section 13 that the increases of salary granted by that act shall not entitle any judge to any increase in the annuity which may be granted to such judge under the provisions of section 20 to which I have referred, and the effect of this is that the judges of the province, if retiring after thirty years' service, retire at $7,000 per year, while without this resolution now before the House the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon would retire at $5,000, and with this resolution he would retire at $6,000 a year. This resolution is doing him partial justice, but I say that it does not put him on an equal footing with judges of his rank throughout Canada. I therefore move that the word "six" be struck out of the resolution and that the word "seven" be substituted therefor; so that when the judge in the Yukon has served thirty years he may be retired on the same terms as his brother judges. After serving thirty years there is no reason why he should not be put on the same footing as the others. It may have been extravagant to increase the salaries of the judges all over Canada as was done in 1919 and 1920, but if you are going to do it, be consistent and do it for the whole of Canada. I say that the government should not consider granting a judge an annuity of two-thirds of his salary and accepting his resignation now. I do not think there should be any thought of that on the part of the government. I do not know that the judge has it in mind, but, if he has, the government should not stand for it. I am happy to say the judge is in excellent health, and a comparatively young man. The time has not come for his retirement. The judge is there, and the court is necessary for the territory. The community is an isolated one, far removed from any of the provinces. Valuable interests, valuable property and civil rights are involved in actions. It is necessary to have a judge of Supreme Court jurisdiction to preside at the criminal court. The idea that judges might be sent on circuit from British Columbia to take the place of the Yukon judge has been mooted. This would not be practicable nor economical, and it would be most disastrous to the people before the court. I would like to point out that should the government accept the judge's resignation now his retiring allowance would be $6,000, in addition to which it would be necessary to appoint and pay another judge, and there is no reason to suppose it would cost less than the cost at present, which is $12,000 per annum, and instead of costing the country $12,000 it would be costing $18,000 a year to retire the judge and appoint another. In fact it would be costing $23,000 a year because we have now one judge who has been retired for a good many years on a pension of $5,000 a year. There is no need for such increased expenditure. Our present judge is quite competent physically and mentally to discharge the duties of his office, and I for one hope he will be spared for many years, and hope the government will continue him in office.

I say this judge should be entitled to retire at the same amount as the judges of his rank throughout Canada, which is $7,000. The amendment to the resolution will not at this time cost the country a cent more than the resolution as it stands. And in fact the resolution as it stands does not at this time entail any extra expense to the country; it only provides for dealing fairly with the judge when the time comes for his retirement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad my hon. friend has come to my rescue in regard to the mild charge of extravagance laid by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen). The hon. member says that apparently I am not doing justice to the Yukon Territory by the bill which is before the committee; but I think we are doing full justice to the judge there. Under the Statutes of 1920, to which my hon. friend referred, all the judges who would avail themselves of the increase by the statute would lose the benefit of section 20 which gives them the right to retire after a certain number of years with their full pension. Section 20 of the Judges' Act is repealed, so far as the judges who have accepted the increase given by the Statutes of 1920 are concerned. I think the same principle can be applied today, and the judge of the Yukon Territory whose salary is $9,000 according to the increase which is provided for by the present bill, should not benefit by section 20 of the act, and should be entitled only to two-thirds of his salary when he is superannuated. I really believe that by this bill we are placing the judge of the Yukon in exactly the same position as the other judges whose salaries were increased in 1920.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black) provides for an increase in the impost, and in my opinion is out of order.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I do not want to discuss the point of order at any length. I note the way the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) put it, but my intention is not to come to his rescue against any fair criticism that may be offered to this resolution. I merely wish to put the facts fairly before the committee, and let the House understand that in this resolution the only object as far as I can see is to do justice to the judge of the Yukon. And I submit that while the resolution goes part way it does not go far enough. If the amendment is ruled out of order, it has the same fate as any other resolution which is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the resolution moved by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black) out of order.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25, to amend the Judges' Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

AGRICULTURE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Agriculture—experimental farms, $1,400,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the annual cost of each of the following sub-stations: Fort Smith, Fort Resolution, and Fort Providence, Northwest Territories, and Fort Vermilion, Alberta?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): It will take only a moment or two to hunt up those figures, and in the meantime I might perhaps make some explanation with respect to this somewhat substantial reduction in the appropriation for experimental farms. Possibly this reduction will be too large to suit some and too small to suit others; but, speaking generally, I think it is in fair conformity with reductions in the estimates which have resulted in an aggregate reduction of $46,000,000. We hope, however, not to curtail the services to any appreciable extent; but certain activities will have to be dispensed with in order, with this reduction, to take care of the work.

I might refer to the contemplated establishment of a new experimental farm in the northern part of British Columbia. In a sense, there was a commitment to that by the government which preceded this one. I visited that territory myself two years ago, and with certain reservations I would say that the promises of my predecessor were substantiated by myself. We find, however, that that will have to be deferred a little longer. As regards the proposed extension of the Brandon farm which has been flooded very considerably during the past two years, and which should have an extension of territory attached to it on the bench land above the valley at Brandon, we shall have to wait a little while before we make that necessary outlay. These are some of the retrenchments that we shall have to consider in order to carry on these farms without any decrease in efficiency. The figures asked for by my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) are as follows:

Swede Creek, Dawson, Yukon Territory..	$2,020
Fort Smith, Fort Resolution and Fort Providence	690
Fort Vermilion..	5,525

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would now ask the minister for justification for the Fort Vermilion farm. It is very far in the north country; it has very little settlement around it, and it costs quite a bit of money.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, it is quite possible that we may have extended our frontier rapidly in many respects as well as in the establishmnet of sub-stations. Our policy used to be that we could not get too far towards the setting sun, and that was carried out by our pioneer farmers as well. I presume that it was in conformity with that general policy, that this sub-station was opened about fifteen years ago. While possibly we are living in a period of retrenchment, we have not thought it advisable to do anything in the way of abolishing experiments that have been conducted at that sub-station. Whatever my personal views might be with regard to this work, I feel a little loath to begin to tear down any of the work of my predecessors who have been building up those institutions for the last forty years. Yet I hope, where it is shown that they are not required; that the money is either wholly or partially wasted; that there is no possible chance of settlement or of gaining useful information, that change can be brought about if necessary.

Mr. LEWIS: How does the expenditure at Fort Vermilion this year compare with previous expenditures?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It will be about the same. I have a note that indicates that wheat has been ripened every year except one at Fort Vermilion, and of course where wheat will ripen, coarse grains will ripen better still. I shall be glad to have any views regarding the desirability of keeping those northern sub-stations open. The expense is not very heavy. I understand that in that district there are some three or four hundred settlers. I am sure the advantages of that pioneer district will be comparatively limited, and if we do anything to abolish this institution, those settlers may feel that we are deserting them altogether. I understand settlers are still going in there.

Mr. GARDINER: What value has this station to the settlers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Exactly the same information is given by this farm as is given by any other experimental station. Instead of every settler carrying out a line of experiments at his own expense, this sub-station demonstrates just what the locality is adapted for. There is no doubt that we have had pioneer districts established in Canada, particularly in the older parts of Ontario and some other places, without the aid of such institutions; but it is equally true that new settlers coming in are materially assisted by these experimental stations.

Mr. GARDINER: How far is this sub-station from a railway?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About four hundred miles.

Mr. GARDINER: This station would no doubt induce other settlers to locate in that district and ultimately the cost to the country of the work carried on there would be considerably greater. The place being so far from a railway, does the minister think he is justified in keeping the station open?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That, of course, is a question that is open to argument. I might say that I myself once went in two hundred miles from a railway, and from my experience I am inclined to be somewhat sympathetic towards these people.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister forgets that he was self-supporting, whereas this experimental farm is not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That, of course, is true. But there are a great many institutions that are not self-supporting which at one time were, and I do not know whether this is to our advantage or not. If we take the ground that these settlers should not have gone in there, and if for that reason we discontinue the work of this station, it will be tantamount to telling these people that so far as we are concerned they will have to get along as best they can. If that is the view hon. gentlemen take, then I shall look into the matter; but for my part I do not think that would be wise.

Mr. GARDINER: What income is derived from this particular station?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The gross income is practically nil, because there is no market.

Mr. BRETHEN: Is it a home market for the settlers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Perhaps my hon. friend from New Westminister (Mr. McQuarrie) could answer that question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not wish to be unfair to the minister, but, frankly, I think that he might very seriously consider the advisability of suspending all operations at this sub-station. I understand that we are bending all our efforts to the settlement of those parts of Canada that are situated within reasonable distances of our many railways; but there is no prospect of a railway going into this particular locality. It is four hundred miles from a railway and I hope it will be many years before very many people go there, because it will cost the country so much, and without a railway I do not think the expense would be justified. I am not suggesting that the minister should virtually say to the settlers out there that he throws up the sponge and that no one can exist in that part of the country. But it seems to me that the settlers themselves realize far better than the minister does that they cannot make money there; probably they are barely existing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The question is a proper one for discussion. This winter I have discussed the matter fully with my officers, somewhat along the line indicated by my hon. friend, and I was forced to the conclusion that it would be very much like cruelty to deprive the people in that district of the advantages they get from this station. I do not know that we should have too much sentiment in matters of this kind, but, as one who has pioneered in the West, I do not feel just now like taking the institution away from them. In my opinion the policy of development in the West has suggested a reaching out towards the setting sun.

Mr. FORKE: What is the population?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are about three or four hundred in the district. These small communities are getting smaller all the time, because, although new settlers are going in, the old ones are leaving.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): This district is located three hundred miles down the Peace river from the town of Peace River, and about six hundred and fifty miles north of Edmonton. I understand, as the minister himself has said, that the population is between three and four hundred. An hon. member asks what can be grown in this place. For thirty-six years there has been general farming and I think it was in 1917 that some 3,000 or 4,000 bushels of wheat were shipped to Fort William from this point. If that farm serves no greater purpose than an experimental station for three or four hundred settlers I am doubtful whether we can afford the expenditure it entails. I am not familiar with all the circumstances in connection with the establishment of the farm, nor do I know just what work has been done there. I have never been able to get down to the district to look into conditions and so I am not in a position to speak with authority. I feel however that as we have been advocating economy generally, some of us possibly will have to begin at home. I should hate to say, however, that the farm should be discontinued, because I do not know enough about the work it does to take any emphatic stand on the question. There is in that north country, in the Grand Prairie district, another station, the Beaver Lodge farm which serves a very much larger territory, and I understand that the cost of that farm is about $10,000 per annum. The great difficulty which the people at Fort Vermilion have to contend against is that of transportation. I think they know pretty well what they can grow and I would very much rather see the money spent in providing them with some sort of transportation. I have been advocating some assistance to a steamboat that would run between Peace river and Fort Vermilion and also up to Fort St. John. There are a number of settlements scattered along between Peace river and Fort Vermilion, such as the Keg river settlement, which are all served by this experimental farm. Speaking generally, the experimental farm business has got far ahead of the practical possibilities of the ordinary farm. While we have a vast territory up there, as large almost as all the rest of Alberta, we have at Edmonton a great provincial government farm under the university. One hundred miles south we have the Lacombe farm, and south of that again the farm at Lethbridge. While the farm at Lethbridge does different work from that of the other two farms, in that it is in the centre of a district that required irrigation, I cannot see and never could see any reason for two farms in the territory between Lacombe and Edmonton when they do exactly the same work under practically the same conditions.

4 p.m.

Mr. LUCAS: Does the minister not think that the time has come when a different policy should be adopted in connection with experimental farms? I believe that the different provinces throughout Canada, now that they are all properly organized, are in a better position to conduct experimental work than the Dominion, and some policy should be instituted that would obviate a great deal of the overlapping which now obtains. If this work were left to the provincial governments, aid being given by the Dominion such as was given under the Agricultural Instruction Act and the Dominion devoting its energies entirely to research work, the results would be much more beneficial to the country. We are all familiar with the great benefit that resulted to Canada from the introduction of Marquis wheat by Dr. Saunders. The research work of Canada is being starved to-day through lack of sufficient money to pay adequate salaries in order that capable men may be attracted to it. One thing we in western Canada suffer from to-day is lack of suitable grasses for that country, and if our research institutions could produce a grass that would become native to the western districts as clover is to Ontario, they would render a service of inestimable value. The minister might well consider the matter of a new policy in connection with experimental farms.

Mr. TOLMIE: In view of the very large expenditure to be made on the experimental farm system, $1,400,000, I suggest that the minister give us an outline of the work which is the justification of that expenditure. The work being carried on is a very valuable work indeed, and we would like to know what progress is being made with those farms and what new developments have taken place within the last year or two.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Replying to the hon. member (Mr. Lucas) with respect to the advisability of adopting some new and advanced policy in dealing with experimental farms, I might first recite briefly some of the steps taken during the last forty years in connection with the establishment of these farms. During the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald, the first group of farms was established, consisting of the central one here and four branch farms at Nappan, Brandon, Indian Head and Agassiz respectively. For a number of years this was the entire establishment, but under the administration led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier eight additional branch farms were established, and during the regime of the government that preceded the present one a further addition of eight or nine branch farms was made. Since we came into power we have not established any new ones, although we have discussed the possibility of establishing one in northern British Columbia on account of there having been a tacit understanding in regard to it. There is also an experimental station in western Ontario, but it is a tobacco farm, not one of the regular establishments. So that we have at least stopped the expansion of these branch farms, and we are endeavouring to carry out the policy that I enunciated the first session that this government was in power, namely, that before any new farms should be established we would endeavour to put the present ones in good shape and make them a credit to the country. To that extent at least we have met the wishes of my hon. friend, who thinks that possibly there should be a reduction rather than an expansion of these institutions. Now, that is an open question. Possibly we have expanded too rapidly in this respect as we have done in many other respects, and we are now considering all along the line just how we may deal with the situation. I believe it is generally thought that we have too many trunk railways throughout Canada. Some people think we have, in the West at least, too many agricultural colleges for present needs. But I think the country will grow up to them and that we shall ultimately be able to make use of all these facilities, though just at present the burden of so many educational institutions of this kind is being felt. Some even think that we have too many universities in the West. I would not like to say that; I think the time will come when they will all be required to meet the country's needs. The point is, what are we to do in the meantime? Are we to close these institutions now, or should we get along the best we can until we grow up to the facilities which they provide? My hon. friends will note that in nearly all cases where there is alleged overlapping it is because provincial institutions have sprung up since the Dominion farms were established. Take the Lacombe farm, for instance; it was started many years before the provincial farm at Edmonton was established, and now you have the two farms comparatively close together—100 miles or so, which may not be so very close after all. Coming to Saskatchewan, some time after the Rosthern farm was established, the University farm at Saskatoon was instituted, in a very suitable place about 40 miles from Rosthern. I indicated at that time that we hoped in the reasonably near future to transfer the Rosthern farm to some northern part of the province where the people had not the benefit of any such institution. I now find, however that it would cost more to establish a new farm in the north than it would to maintain the present farm where it is; therefore we have so far refrained from taking any action. Coming to the Maritime provinces, one of the first institutions of this kind was established at Nappan, and some time afterward the provincial county farm at Truro was established. We have been endeavouring to co-ordinate the work, to use a rather hackneyed expression, and we have been endeavouring to avoid overlapping. For instance, at Rosthern we would slack off on the work, leaving it to the university, and the same might be done in other cases. We have not, however, done that at Lacombe owing to the fact that there is a reasonable distance between that station and the provincial farm at Edmonton. If hon. gentlemen on any side of the House have a recommendation to make along the line of closing these farms, those in their own constituencies, for instance, I would be very glad to entertain it. I do not say that we would promise to close any but I think we could get along with less. All the farms, however, are doing good work; it has been my privilege to visit nearly all of them. I had been told that some of the farms in the Maritime provinces were comparatively useless, but on visiting them I found that there were not any better conducted experimental farms in Canada than those in that part of the country, and that the work was under the supervision of four exceedingly good superintendents. I have no doubt that if there were twice as many farms they would all be doing good work, but the point is, have we more than the circumstances warrant and than we have money to maintain at this time? If we have, then what shall we eliminate? Now, I am open to advice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think in the present nebulous state of the minister's mind we are going to get much change of policy with respect to these sub-stations. I would like to get at the minister's general policy, what principle he is following in relation to these estimates. I notice that in this estimate there is a reduction this year over last of $125,000. Last year in the very same item there was an increase from the year before of $200,000, or taking the agricultural estimates as a whole, while the minister wanted more money last year, an increase, this year he cuts down, and wants $1,269,000 less—an increase all along the line last year and a large diminution this year in agriculture, and according to the Speech from the Throne we are getting better off all the time. How does the minister account for diminishing the agriculture vote this year against an increase last year when, according to his own words, we are in better shape this year than we were last?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was coming to that; one at a time is good fishing. I was answering the question of my hon. friend from Victoria as to what was our policy. I think I enunciated that two years ago. What new policies have we adopted? One was this: With regard to cultural methods, farm practices in the matter of experimentation with new cereals and crop rotations, which, after all is all right, we believed the time had come in the older districts where these farms have been established for at least twenty-five years when the farmers in the neighbourhood had obtained nearly all the information they were likely to get in cultural methods. In new districts that does not apply. The Indian Head farm, for instance, has done magnificent work in the matter of cultural methods for the prairies, but the farmers for miles around that station have already adopted all the modern methods of cultivation on the prairies, and therefore we think less attention should be paid, and less attention is being paid, and this is one change in policy, to cultural methods in the way of experimentation. But more attention is being paid to proper rotations for western Canada, the best rotation of crops including grass; that is something that has not yet been worked out.

In addition, we are paying more attention all the time to live stock. As I have already intimated on former occasions, we are endeavouring to feature live stock, practically all kinds of domestic live stock, at all of these stations. I spoke at one time of trying to establish something in the nature of breeding stations for the purpose of encouraging high-class live stock for breeding purposes. We have already shipped in from the Old Country, during the last year, forty or fifty breeding animals, and we are only deterred from getting more by the embargo against us, which prevents us from getting animals from the United Kingdom at the present time. Those are two features we are developing.

Many hon. members will also recall that the question of shipping chilled beef to the Old Country has been before the people of this country ever since I can remember; but whenever anyone who was endeavouring to improve conditions would suggest that the embargo be taken off cattle or we tried to get the embargo removed he would be met with the objection: What does it matter; we should be sending our cattle across to England in the form of chilled beef. Now we have been reading up and keeping track of experiments by packers and private individuals for a number of years, and finally last year we made a shipment of chilled beef from the Experimental Farm at Ottawa. Some fifty head were killed at Montreal and shipped to the Old Country in the form of chilled beef. We have found in actual practice that it did not pay at all. We lost a very substantial sum as compared with selling them as stockers or killing them as fats on arrival. The shipment was divided into three equal parts, as nearly similar as we could get them. One part was killed at Montreal and shipped as chilled beef; another part was sent across as stockers, and the other part shipped as fats and killed on arrival. There was not very much difference between the stockers and the fats, but there was a tremendous difference to the disadvantage of those that were killed at Montreal and shipped as chilled. This chilled meat came into direct competition with Argentine frozen meat, and the loss on that chilled meat, as compared with similar cattle sold as stockers, was $5.62 per one hundred pounds, or over 5½ cents a pound.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not a recognized fact in business that it takes a certain time to develop a trade? And is it fair to consider we cannot ship chilled meat from this country when we have made only one trial shipment? Is it not possible, if the trade was worked up and given a reasonable time to develop, that chilled meat could be put on the English market at a profit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right in a general sense, but similar experiments have been conducted by the Harris abattoir for two consecutive years, and their experience has been practically identical with ours. In conversation some of their representatives took the ground that they had lost enough money already experimenting on behalf of the people of Canada. Furthermore, I have met a number of people who have not very much faith in the packers and who take the ground that the packers were trying to queer this prospective business by making shipments and pretending to lose money on them. To clear that up we made the shipment I have referred to, and we certainly lost money. We would not like to have been doing that business for private individuals, and have had to report a loss of $50 a head, as compared with selling the cattle as stockers.

Mr. KNOX: Was the loss on the chilled meat attributable to the extra cost of transportation or the low price at which it was sold on the English market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was a little advantage on transportation; the principal loss was on the beef. We also gained a little on the offal, which was worth more in the Old Country than here. The beef, however, was worth very much less, so when you struck a balance the result was as I have indicated. I have no doubt if we were prepared to stay in the business long enough and lose money enough we might in time be able to break even, but I am not prepared to come before this House and go before my colleagues and ask for an appropriation when I know I am going to lose a lot of money. I might say that on my recommendation this House voted $25,000 last year to continue that experiment.

Mr. BROWN: Is not this aside from the experimental farms?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We assembled at Ottawa steers from the experimental farms at various points and shipped the steers we had on hand, and the shipment gave us such very vivid information from the standpoint of distinct loss that we did not feel like spending the $25,000 that was voted by the House in making further experiments. It would have taken years to have built up that trade, and it is a question whether we would have broken even in the end.

Mr. BRETHEN: To get back to the experimental farm, I have listened at different times with a great deal of interest to suggestions of the minister that these farms be made breeding depots. In view of the fact that private individuals with Ontario Holstein breeders won the herd prize for ten animals at the International Dairy Show last year in competition with the best in America, and that the Ayrshire breeders of Quebec won a similar prize, that the breeders of Clydesdale horses, beef, Shorthorn cattle and Aberdeen-Angus can go to the Chicago National Show and win in competition with the best in America, the Aberdeen-Angus winner selling for $15,000 there this year, does not the minister think that it would be a very safe principle to leave the breeding of pure-bred cattle to the private breeders of the Dominion. I know, because I sold some cattle to the experimental farms, that these institutions do provide a home market for the breeders; but I believe that the experimental stations, as breeding depots, are very expensive luxuries for the people of this country to support.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That attitude is sometimes taken, I appreciate that fact, by the breeders themselves, but I cannot recall a single instance where the breeders have come to the department and complained that the government was competing with them. Here is the way the thing usually works out —I will give an illustration with respect to forestry farms. After the forestry farms were established, the nursery companies were very much alarmed for fear their business would be interfered with. Now, instead of the business of the forestry firms being injured by a free distribution of shrubs and trees it has actually stimulated the demand for nursery stock; instead of hurting the nurserymen the forestry farms actually helped them.

With respect to this particular question I do not believe the average breeder sees any menace in the way of unfair competition with his business. Every time you put a pure bred animal to work—either through horse clubs, cattle associations, or any similar organization—the results from that animal are so apparent that you will stimulate the demand throughout that particular territory for pure bred stock. The result is that the private breeder is actually benefited by the operation of these farms in my opinion. At any rate that is the way it works out. I know that on the surface the system may appear as competitive and possibly injurious, but because of the educational value of these pure bred stock, the actual demonstration of the value of better stock, the appetite for them is increased with a result that the breeders have larger sales instead of smaller ones. I think that is correct.

Mr. WARNER: The minister may have stated but I did not catch his answer. Of what breed were the steers that he sent over, were they all of one breed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can recall that they were pretty nearly even, the three standard breeds—shorthorn, white face and black; pretty nearly even. There were none of them I imagine actually pure bred. They were well bred steers of these various breeds.

Mr. WARNER: All beef breeds?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All beef breeds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister remembers the question I asked him does he feel like making an answer yet?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In regard to the policy of the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend has not recognized it although I have been trying to describe it all along.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I confess I did not recognize it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think that is my fault.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked the minister what principle he was following in a year ago coming to the House and asking for a largely increased appropriation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is last year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, last year. Last year in this estimate my hon. friend asked for an increased appropriation of $200,000 over the year before and this year he is asking for $125,000 less. The general estimates of his department also were increased last year, and are decreased this year by $1,269,000. What has impelled the minister to take that course? If he is right this year was he not wrong last year; and if he was right last year is he not wrong this year? I am prepared to come back at eight o'clock if the minister would rather think over his answer for a while.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I have given the answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to sit here and hear the minister pretend to answer by talking about chilled beef.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend has been paying very little attention because I have been explaining the matter ever since I started.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the minister gave us an harangue about chilled beef and told us about the money he had lost. In the meantime is the minister prepared to abandon everything else he made a failure of as well as the shipping of chilled beef?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend does not seem to know the difference between a "failure" and an "experiment." Why, the worst failure often turns out the biggest success; my right hon. friend does not realize that. The very fact that we lost money will be a warning to others not to try it. I have explained the question of there being an increased vote last year. I will take my right hon. friend's statement that it was $200,000. This year we are reducing the vote for experimental farms by $125,000. I explained that we would be able to conduct the farms without any very great loss of efficiency and still save $125,000, but we would have to defer some of the expansion contemplated. We would have to put off the expansion at the Brandon farm that is needed very badly. We would have to cut off some of the frills and flounces, instead of taking care of the lawns and the borders and the boulevards—all of which should be repaired for receiving company. We will have to be less careful, we will have to disregard some of these little features that experimental farms are expected to have. The farms are supposed to be in apple pie order and not to get into a careless or slovenly state, but it takes some money to make them look attractive all the time. However some cutting is needed and we have done it without affecting the usefulness of these institutions. In the Maritime provinces some of these farms are very rough. Take the Fredericton farm. I have always endeavoured not to criticize my predecessors in the establishment of these farms and I am not going to do so now except to state that that was a very expensive farm to clear up. Last year we spent a considerable sum of money, I was there when they were at it. It will give some idea of the kind of soil it was when I state that we have to plough with oxen so rough, stony and stumpy is the ground. It certainly was very expensive land to clear. We will put a stop to the clearing of that land until our revenues are more buoyant. The same may be said of the farm at Kentville.

Mr. TOLMIE: What year was that farm established?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know and I do not care much. The year 1910 I understand from my deputy. An addition of twenty-three acres was made to the Kentville farm a year ago but the land is exceedingly rough and requires some clearing up. We will have to abstain from these improvements in view of our policy of retrenchment at this time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why were not the frills, and flounces and boulevards cut out last year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will explain that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the minister has been a party to the statement that we are in better condition this year, that there is greater prosperity in Canada than last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The reason the expenditure is cut out this year is because there is an united effort all along the line to make the budget of this Dominion balance, and we all have to do our share.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why was it not done last year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It seemed so hopeless last year that we did not make the same amount of effort. But as the result of better conditions—better conditions on our railways and all along the line—we are making a supreme effort and everybody has to contribute a quota.

Mr. FORKE: I think with the experience of the past years the minister is able to make greater advances in the question of economy. I quite sympathize with him in his endeavours to have the leader of the opposition understand agricultural matters.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is quite a job.

Mr. FORKE: It is a long time since he was actively engaged in that line, and he is a little dense. However, I rose for the purpose of asking if the minister would care to express an opinion upon the idea enunciated by the member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) as to the provinces taking over a little more of the experimental work, and the Dominion devoting more of its attention to researches. Probably the Dominion might make a grant to the provinces, and I think they could expend the money probably more economically than the Dominion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that is right, and that is what we are endeavouring to do. Wherever our farms are in too close proximity to provincial farms of the same kind, we are trying to fit into their activities by refraining from doing what they are doing. That is about the extent to which you can do it, unless you abolish the institution altogether.

An hon. MEMBER: Abolish it.
